However, I disagree utterly that the bill is not empowering: it is. We are not trying to empower people in a patronising way, by suggesting that they are not living their lives properly. We are removing barriers, creating consistency and giving people access to resources that are, in essence, already theirs through public ownership. That is empowering and it builds on the momentum that we have experienced this year.

If Alex Rowley wants to lodge amendments that would make the bill stronger or radical, I would happily consider them. That is the challenge that I have put to other commentators who may have views on what we should do.

Paul Wheelhouse has made it clear that, in response to the land reform review group, the Government will set out a timetable that includes a land reform bill, which will capture some elements of land reform and other areas. I do not want to impede the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill’s ability to get on with what we have committed to do.

John Wilson (Central Scotland) (Ind): Good morning, minister. I go back to the financial memorandum and the fears that COSLA has expressed about additional costs that local authorities might incur. Has the minister considered discussing with his ministerial colleagues some of the financial benefits that might be accrued as a result of the community asset transfer proposals, particularly in terms of health and wellbeing, the economic and employment opportunities that may be created in communities, and the benefits that will accrue to health boards and other Government agencies that are currently spending money to tackle issues such as obesity? If we are asking communities to be responsible when drawing up business plans and looking at financial sustainability, surely we should ask other agencies to indicate what benefits could accrue to their budgets as a result of asset transfers to communities. It should not be a one-way street.

Derek Mackay: Mr Wilson makes the very fair point that some benefits will derive from the bill and the actions around it that are not yet quantifiable; indeed, they may never be quantifiable. The importance of the prevention agenda is front and centre in the minds of all ministers and in the Government’s approach, and it is a key pillar of our response to the Christie commission on public service reform. On the point about wellbeing and health more widely, part 1 of the bill is about national outcomes for Scotland and embedding the Scotland performs approach in legislation. The Government will have to consult on and produce the outcomes, and there will be that outcomes focus going forward. That approach goes way beyond gross domestic product or economic growth; it is about a wider understanding of wellbeing.

To relate that to projects on the ground, one of the first projects that I visited was Lambhill Stables in Glasgow, which has a great community base and great community activity, with a range of organisations meeting at the site. There is some allotment space and growing space and a nice community garden. The organisation wanted to expand into a piece of land but, “Computer says no,”—the council said no, if my memory serves me correctly. There was no reason why it could not expand and no understanding of that. The bill will put in place a process for that organisation to request a transfer, with a presumption in favour of transfer. That would be a transparent process and, crucially, there would be an appeals mechanism if the answer was still no, so the council would have to produce solid grounds for a no.

I use that project in Glasgow as an example because it is the kind of project that provides benefits by encouraging more active lifestyles. If the organisation had access to the land, that would expand the options available to it. It is a great example of a project that encourages wider health and wellbeing and getting out in the environment, so we should encourage the facility to expand its resources.
That was one organisation that was key in convincing me that the bill is the right thing to do. The organisation understands how the bill could make a difference to its agenda and objectives—the connection is well made. The Government is focused on the wider measurement of wellbeing and the preventative approach, and we want to allow communities to lead for themselves the kind of projects that will make a difference.

When I was a council leader, I represented Ferguslie Park. I found that the best champions for life-changing actions were sometimes not the social workers or council-employed development workers, as worthy as they are, but the community champions who lead and deliver the projects. Let us free them up to do more of the good work that they do rather than have them mired in bureaucracy and refusals from the state. The point is well made.

Mark McDonald (Aberdeen Donside) (SNP): I want to touch on a few areas, if possible.

In response to Alex Rowley, the minister referred to the difficulties that some communities might have in taking advantage of the bill. I am thinking particularly about deprived communities, where there are undoubtedly a lot of active groups and organisations, but they perhaps do not have some of the skills that are required, for example, on drafting business plans. At our evidence session in Dumfries, some local authorities said that they would be reluctant to assist groups in that process, because of potential conflicts of interest. How can we ensure that support is provided so that we do not find that communities that have the required skills base take advantage of the bill while other communities are left behind?

Derek Mackay: I have to say, in all reasonableness, that it sounds like an excuse to me if a local authority thinks that it cannot support a community group in compiling a solid and robust business plan for the benefit of a community that leads to an asset transfer. Conflicts of interests arise when a local authority could be compromised, but I see no reason why a local authority cannot support local groups to produce such a case. Local authorities and other public sector authorities might frustrate community groups by not providing the information that is required, which is why there will be a requirement in legislation to produce the information that is needed to understand the nature of the assets and buildings.

If we need to produce guidance to inform local authorities of their responsibility on the matter, we will do that. If local authorities or other organisations that Government supports cannot support community groups in building the business case for transfer, who will? I think that the local authorities are more at liberty to do that than they suggested to you.

Mark McDonald: Let us move on to the role—or otherwise—of community councils and community planning partnerships. Both have statutory functions and underpinnings, but there is a view abroad that they are often not representative of the communities that they serve. Some deprived communities find it difficult to be involved in community planning partnerships, and some community councils cover geographical communities that are not represented by anybody on those community councils. Are you concerned that those groups with that statutory underpinning may be looked on more favourably or be given more support than groups and community organisations that do not have that backing?

Derek Mackay: It is correct to say that community councils have a statutory function. They are statutory consultees in the planning process and go-to organisations for most local authorities and other organisations that are seeking the opinion of local communities. However, it is also fair to say—that relates to Alex Rowley’s point about the variability of community councils—that, although some are very good and provide services or run things, others are more mid range, some are talking shops and some are, frankly, barely legitimate. That is why we will not pick one group over another as a key community anchor organisation and say that that group is more important than another. The situation will differ from one community to another. The key organisation might be the housing association, the community council or the parent and toddler group. A range of community-led organisations is carrying out a range of work.

Under their statutory responsibility, community councils have to abide by the regulations. Nevertheless, we must improve the health and vibrancy of our community councils, which is why we continue to work with the Improvement Service and COSLA to support them. It would be wrong to say that the bill does not touch on community councils—it does. For example, when disposal or change of common good assets is being considered, there should be consultation with community councils. There is some reference to community councils. However, their performance continues to be variable across the country.

It is telling that, in this year of empowerment and engagement, irrespective of how we might have voted in the referendum, so many people registered to vote, voted and are now involved in political parties, I would like to think that we can harness some of that energy for community action and activism as well, although that may not involve community councils. The committee will remember that, before the referendum, I launched a consultation on turnout in elections, and look what it achieved in the referendum. In all seriousness, it was not about how easy it is to vote, where people vote or on which day elections are held; it was about whether the subject of an election or, indeed, the referendum is meaningful enough to motivate people to vote—and, in the case of the referendum, it was. Is the business of community councils meaningful enough to motivate people to participate in it? That is the question.

I do not propose a transfer of powers from local authorities to community councils, but by unlocking the potential of communities through the bill we can allow a range of groups to come forward to participate in the process, initiate dialogue or consultation, challenge the running of a service or take over assets and property for the benefit of a local community. All that will assist, but—you are right—I am not being prescriptive about community councils. No action plan has been presented to me that proposes to shift the power radically towards community councils. I am sorry to say that, were I to do that, the general competence of many community councils would have to improve drastically.

Mark McDonald: I appreciate that point. The committee has received evidence from Scottish Enterprise that it does not currently set locally based targets for community planning partnerships or share resources with them. Are you concerned that Scottish Enterprise may not be fulfilling its duties as a CPP partner under the terms of the bill?

Derek Mackay: No, I am not. To reassure myself further about that, I met Scottish Enterprise just a few weeks ago. The Scottish Government has a location director—a very senior civil service official who represents the Government and supports the agenda—at every community planning partnership. Every area also has a Scottish Enterprise location director who is employed at a very senior level within Scottish Enterprise.

Mr McDonald makes a fair point. Scottish Enterprise does not commit specific budgets or targets at the most local level, although some community planning partnerships, through their single outcome agreements, have targets on economic growth. Some councils have set out how many organisations they aspire to have account managed by Scottish Enterprise.

I can guarantee to Mr McDonald and to the committee that Scottish Enterprise is very mindful of our obligations on community planning, as was reinforced during my recent visit. Lena Wilson, the chief executive, is very clear that, although Scottish Enterprise might not be bringing its budget to the table, it should be bringing its expertise, support, networks and contacts to the table. That is the kind of support that a community planning partnership would want.

The bill deals with what is agreed at community planning partnership level. Scottish Enterprise can bring its business expertise. Economy is one of the key themes in community planning, and Scottish Enterprise is of course well placed in that regard. I hope that that reassures the member.
Scottish Enterprise’s functions and remit are very clear. Its growth areas are equally clear.

Sometimes, town centres—a very important part of my portfolio—can be pressure points for community planning partnerships or indeed for councils. Scottish Enterprise would not ordinarily associate itself with that, but that is not to say that business support and contacts cannot be provided, or that the right connections to support that agenda at the most local level cannot be made.

I believe that Scottish Enterprise will be far more engaged with community planning partnerships than it was before. To assist with that, the chief executive of Scottish Enterprise now sits on the national community planning group.

Mark McDonald: On the issue around participation requests and asset transfers, we heard evidence in Dumfries about local difficulties with the timescales for asset transfers. Whether they are provided for under the bill or in the guidance, should reasonable timescales be established for those processes? For many community groups and organisations, the funding to which they have access is often time limited. If a local authority drags its heels, the funding that groups have acquired can be lost.

The Convener: I will give you some examples of that, minister. At our evidence session in Dumfries, two of the local authority representatives stated that they hoped to have proposals in front of elected members within six months. Dumfries and Galloway Council hoped to have things done within 18 months, and it seems that the council has not kept to that in at least one case, which we are now involved in. Mr McDonald said that there should be a general rule about how long those processes should take.

Derek Mackay: Mr McDonald is right to identify that point. There is some provision in the bill around timescales. Orders could be made regarding specific timescales. Is that correct, Jean?

Jean Waddie (Scottish Government): Yes.

Derek Mackay: We do not wish to create an overly bureaucratic process that sets arbitrary deadlines. However, that might be required, with responsibility sometimes lying with the planning system. An applicant can make a challenge if they think that the planning authority is taking too long. In essence, they can go for a decision to be taken elsewhere—by ministers, through an appeal.

We can consider the timescales issue more closely, but I would rather that authorities acted in good faith and considered and responded timeously to any requests that are made of them. I would be slightly fearful if an arbitrary timescale were set whereby they might simply say no. Fortunately, however, because of the provisions in the bill and the presumption, there would be an appeals mechanism that would ensure that the organisation would be heard.

I am happy to give more consideration to the matter of timescales if, given the evidence that the committee has gathered, you feel that to be necessary. It feels ever so slightly centralising for me to set timescales rather than leaving it to the local authority, but if you have specific cases and it is felt that the process has dragged on, that is clearly unreasonable. We would expect local authorities and other authorities to be reasonable.

The Convener: From the evidence we have heard, it seems that timescales are critical for some organisations. We understand that circumstances can be different in different places and that there may be funding issues—the Big Lottery Fund has been mentioned as something that can cause delay—but we have not seen any penalty written into the bill for a council that may be intransigently holding things up. Will you comment on that? There seems to be no stick to deal with a local authority that is stalling for no apparent reason.

Derek Mackay: Again, I have listened carefully to what the committee has said. I have to do two things. First, as I said to the committee before when we discussed the draft bill, we must ensure that we better calibrate and organise the various funding streams to support community groups, rather than going through the process time and time again. There is something in that around the timing and alignment of resources to support worthy projects.

Secondly, in terms of the provision, we were looking at prescribing in regulations to be made by ministers how long it should take for such a request to be considered; I can be specific on that period. I would not want that to be in primary legislation; it feels more proportionate and relevant to include it in the regulations.

There may be reasons why a community group wants to take longer—perhaps because of funding or another reason—so that even within that specific timeframe, because there may be exceptional circumstances, we propose in the bill: “such longer period as may be agreed between the authority and the community transfer body”.

I will take on board the committee’s evidence and reflect on that in the regulations.

The Convener: In addition to the evidence, we will send you a communication that we have received from a council, which you will find of interest.

Mark McDonald: The minister makes a fair point. I was keen to ensure that we were not setting an absolute timescale, but were looking at how one could be reasonably reflected. The minister has said that he is willing to consider that.

To stay on the subject of timescale, but in respect of common good, I note that in your correspondence to the committee, minister, you discuss the “benefit in requiring relevant authorities to publish their registers of assets”.

I know that that will apply in terms of common good assets.

We have heard evidence that suggests that for some local authorities the identification of common good assets is proving to be difficult—that is a significant understatement, given some of the evidence that we have heard. There will be some local authorities for whom this will be a much simpler exercise than it will be for others, so I wonder whether there will be an issue around timescales. The evidence that we took suggests that without some kind of defined timescale in putting together a register of common good assets, some local authorities could drag their heels in perpetuity.

Derek Mackay: Mr McDonald makes a valid criticism when he says that some local authorities may take their time. However, current CIPFA guidelines are clear that the best professional practice is that local authorities should maintain a separate register of their common good assets, so it should not be a significant cost or bureaucratic exercise to fulfil the bill’s requirements. I fear that the understanding of some local authorities might be that they have to clarify title deeds and have them registered, but that is a different interpretation. I am looking for an understanding of what common good assets there are, so that communities can understand and then have a say over how they are constructed and disposed of—essentially, I am pursuing a register.

Of course, we could dedicate a whole bill to the history of common good, and I do not propose to go through every complication relating to common good. I simply seek greater participation and identification of common good assets in a register that the public can understand.
On the timescale issue, I believe that we will produce guidance. In a similar vein to Mr McDonald’s point on the timescales for consideration of asset transfer requests, I will also consider whether we should set that out in regulations. I am mindful that the land reform review group considered common good matters, so that may well be something that could come under a future land reform bill, alongside the provisions that I have outlined in the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

Mark McDonald: I am aware that I am testing your patience, convener—this will be my final question.

Should a broader approach be taken to the public bodies that have a duty in relation to allotments, given that there are a number of public bodies other than local authorities that own large areas of land that could perhaps make a significant contribution with regard to both allotments and the food-growing strategy?

Derek Mackay: That is a very helpful suggestion. I have to place the responsibility somewhere and, as it currently rests with local authorities, they seem the most appropriate bodies for it to lie with. However, in taking all the reasonable steps that I mentioned earlier to address provision, I would expect a local authority to be able to work with other public sector—or even private sector—partners to identify suitable sites. For example, it might be in the interests of a private sector project to address provision in a stalled space. Although the absolute duty rests with local authorities, I would expect them to work with other public sector partners, whether the police service, the fire service or the health service, to meet that demand. That would be an example of the true joint planning and resource management that we intend to take place in community planning partnerships.

Stuart McMillan (West Scotland) (SNP): Good morning, minister.

I have a couple of quick questions on the part of the bill on allotments. In its written submission for last week’s meeting, the Scottish Allotments and Gardens Society suggested that 250m² should be the defined size of an allotment. In evidence, Ian Welsh from the society said:

“We want the 250m² there as a reference standard, not as an obligatory standard that has to be applied in all instances.”—[Official Report, Local Government and Regeneration Committee, 5 November 2014; c 21.]

I heard what you said earlier, but do you think that the proposal that Mr Welsh made last week that the size of an allotment should be defined is a fair option?

Derek Mackay: Yes. I gave the reasons why we did not want to legislate immediately on the size of an allotment. That would be inflexible. However, we will produce guidance, which will state what we believe is a good size for an allotment. That will be provided for in legislation. The bill includes provision for the Scottish ministers to prescribe the size of an allotment, should the need for that arise in the future. If the scenario that Anne McTaggart mentioned were to arise, whereby local authorities gave folk tiny sites to meet their needs, we could legislate, although I hope that that would not be required. We will produce guidance along the lines that you indicated in your question, which will offer the necessary flexibility. I hope that we will be able to meet everyone’s needs in the balanced way that you suggest.

Stuart McMillan: Would putting a defined size in the bill avoid ministers having to prescribe the size of an allotment at some point in the future? That would save time and public resources further down the line.

Derek Mackay: No, because if we sought to change that prescribed size for whatever reason, we would have to produce a bill dedicated to the size of an allotment, which would incur the wrath of the population of Scotland, who might wonder why the Parliament could not be a bit more adept and flexible. I realise that you are sitting beside the member who was in charge of the High Hedges (Scotland) Bill. I am not saying that such matters are not important, but if we are not flexible and we do not take account of local need and local geography, the approach that we take will be far too centralist.

We will provide the guidance and will expect people to apply it. The provision is available for us to make changes through regulation, if that is required. That is a far swifter way of effecting change than primary legislation on the size of an allotment, which seems utterly disproportionate. The provision is there, if it requires to be used. Other committees might accuse me of being a centralising minister, but I am trying to allow for local flexibility while reserving the right to prescribe the size of an allotment if we are required so to do.

Stuart McMillan: I have a question on part 3, which concerns participation requests, and part 5, which concerns asset transfer requests.

Representatives from Dundee suggested that having a named officer from that local authority was beneficial with regard to their ability to do the work that they wanted to do. I am keen to find out the Government’s opinion on that. Do you support the idea of having a named officer in public bodies to support groups that make requests under part 3 and part 5?
Derek Mackay: It is for local authorities to consider how they will approach the matter. It might be that there is a procedural function in relation to purposes of contact that might be helpful. However, we want to ensure that there is a shared understanding of community participation. Having clarity on who community groups go to is a good thing, but we are not passing all the responsibility for community engagement or communication in a full public authority to one named person. It might be good practice for that person to be a co-ordinator who can oversee the sharing of information, but that is a matter for that authority. As long as there is a clear channel of who to go to, how to get information and how to initiate the process, that is fine. We will not specify that there must be a named officer.

In the exploratory consultation, some people expressed a concern that, although having a named person might bring some clarity, it might also just shift responsibility from every other officer to that one person.

With regard to liaison with community councils, it is good that, normally, a council has a community council liaison officer, but that person is not the only person who is responsible for engagement with community councils. It has to be much wider than that.

The idea is good practice, but we see no need to legislate for it, particularly because it might make community participation the responsibility of just one person in an organisation, even though it should be the responsibility of everyone in the organisation.

Stuart McMillan: I have a question relating to the report by the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee, which I also sit on. The report says that no specification has been provided about why the power in section 10 has been taken, nor the circumstances in which it could be exercised. How do you propose to address those concerns?

Derek Mackay: Do not ask me such unspecific questions.

It is my understanding that ministers have agreed a general power to issue guidance, which does not have to be covered in the delegated powers memorandum. The Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee’s concern was that community planning partnerships must comply with the guidance, rather than having regard to it, but that there would be no parliamentary scrutiny of that binding requirement. The committee has proposed that the concerns would not apply if CPPs only had to have regard to the guidance, rather than having regard to it, but that there would be no parliamentary scrutiny with the guidance, rather than having regard to it, but that there would be no parliamentary scrutiny with the guidance, rather than having regard to it.

The Convener: You said that you do not think that there is a need to legislate in relation to named officers. There has been some discussion about a definition of common good, and the committee has debated how it might be defined. Why has the Government chosen not to include a definition of common good in the bill?

Derek Mackay: It chose not to do that because there is an understanding of what common good is at the moment. If people are carrying out their duties with the CIPFA guidance in mind, they should already have an understanding of what common good is.

There is a range of definitions in legislation because the issue is historical. However, if we were to define it in new legislation, we would be certain to miss a bit. That is invariably an unintended consequence of writing legislation on historical matters.

The Convener: Is it possible that having a definition on the face of the bill could lead to circumstances that would disempower communities rather than empower them?

Derek Mackay: Essentially, yes, because assets would be lost. People would interpret the new definition when reassessing what was common good, and we could lose assets that people previously understood to be common good. It is a legal minefield, and I do not think that the approach would empower communities. Frankly, I think that it would be a feast for lawyers, and I do not see the need for that. That said, I am well aware of the committee’s concerns about how some common good battles have had to be progressed through the courts. However, as I said, I think that a definition would impede any progress brought about by the bill.

The Convener: I am sure that we do not want to see a feast for lawyers.

Do the same reasons apply to there being no definitions of alienable and non-alienable common good? You will notice that I said “non-alienable” because nobody can say the other word. [Laughter.]

Derek Mackay: Essentially, yes, the same reasons apply because of how common good has been constructed over the years. Some approaches are centuries old and some are the construct of changes to local authority structures. It would be complex and bureaucratic to define the terms, and I do not think that the benefit of doing so would be proportionate. That said, the land reform review group has covered some of the same issues, so the question of definitions might be picked up in future legislation. However, I do not believe that definitions are necessary for the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

The Convener: I was very interested in your response on common good registers. The experience of many of us around the table who have been in local government, supported by the evidence that we have received, is that there seems to be a need for people to go back through what can sometimes be centuries of paperwork to ensure that something belongs to the local authority. Some of us might argue that an asset should go on the register until somebody challenges that. Do you think that common sense needs to come into play on the construction of common good registers? Beyond that, do you think that it would be helpful if Audit Scotland, which, according to its evidence, seems to have a light touch on common good, looked at the issue a bit more than it does?

Derek Mackay: Your reflection on the need to apply common sense is very helpful. We should bear in mind that not all common good assets are land—some might be artefacts, investments or other resources—so not everything will have a title. The register is a collection of what we believe to be common good—for example, it could include a provost’s chain of office from a former burgh. When constructing a register, would it not be good practice to consult communities on how common good assets were used or disposed of? Where there is doubt about an asset, it would not do any harm to put it on such a register. That would mean that there would be greater community engagement and participation with regard to the disposal of such assets.

I am not requiring all common good assets to be registered with the keeper of the registers of Scotland or with the land register. The common good register should be a user-friendly register that people can understand and which can trigger their involvement when decisions are being taken about the disposal of assets. I agree that, as you suggest, common sense should be applied.

The Convener: Some witnesses have suggested that there should be a national register. Do you think a difficulty of creating such a register is that it might give an opportunity to folks who have tried to gain title to land and might make their job easier? Do you think that a national common good register would be workable?

Derek Mackay: Not particularly. I suppose that a live update of the 32 councils’ registers could be produced, but I do not see what purpose that would serve. As this is about local empowerment and participation, I do not see how a national picture would help us. We know the value of the assets and the investments, as reported by local authorities, and I do not think that a national register would help.

We need to understand that common good assets, which are important to local communities, might be paintings or other artefacts, such as provosts’ chains. Some are investments, the value of which changes daily; and, of course, some are land. They are different in each local community. Some people in local authorities, particularly those in the accountancy and legal worlds, would have us wind up common good funds and put the money into mainstream budgets for local authorities to distribute as they see fit. This Government’s position has been to protect the common good portfolio because the assets reflect local communities’ inheritance. We do not propose winding up the funds and putting them in general funding.

The Convener: Finally on this subject, how do you see the asset transfer provisions in part 5 of the bill operating if land or a building is deemed to be common good?

Derek Mackay: There are specific provisions on that. That is where the inalienable—

The Convener: Non-alienable.

Derek Mackay: That is where the non-alienable provision comes into play. If an asset is inalienable—I will go for that word—the local authority’s ability to transfer it is restricted. The restriction is just like any other condition or burden in the title deeds. The local authority can seek court approval for disposal in the usual way. However, that is because it is a common good asset. I do not think that there would be any problem with how common good land could be used—depending on its use. My point is that there would be no restriction on a community body using, managing or leasing such an asset—transfer of ownership or disposal is the issue—as long as that fits with the use for which the property was acquired.

John Wilson: Convener, I should have made the declaration earlier that I am the chair of a community organisation that is currently going through negotiations with a local authority on community asset transfer. I want to bring up some issues around that topic.

Stuart McMillan asked about the named person. Minister, you will be aware of some evidence to the committee in which community organisations claim that they have been sent round council departments, trying to pin down the responsible council officers who can deal with and answer questions about community asset transfer. Although you said that you are not in favour of having a named person, would you be minded to review your position if we found that many community organisations were being blocked, as they would put it, from requesting a community asset transfer because they could not identify—or the council was not prepared to identify—officers to deal with such requests?
Derek Mackay: If there was legal provision and a presumption in favour of either a participation request or an asset transfer request, I would think that procedures would be in place to take account of that. Just as with freedom of information requests, which were mentioned earlier, there is a responsibility for such requests to be processed. The legal requirements should encourage authorities to put good processes in place. If they do not and a request is not handled competently and effectively, I suspect that the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman will have something to say about that.

That takes us back to the timing question. If an authority messes around with a bid or a request, the clock is ticking for that authority. It will be at greater risk of not being seen as handling requests competently if it does not even get the right person involved.

To answer your question, I do not want be too specific about how local authorities should conduct themselves—I say “local authorities”, but this will apply to all parts of the public sector—although they will have to show that they have seriously considered any bid timeously and effectively. If they refuse, there will be a burden on them to show on what ground. Leaving that to the last minute would seem careless on their part and they would risk challenge if they did not carry out the process properly.

John Wilson: Thank you for that response. I am glad that you have put on record the legal requirement for local authorities to engage actively with communities on such issues.

My next question goes back to the convener’s point about the value of land or property involved in asset transfer. From discussions with community organisations, I know that some local authorities put a market value on the land or property that is to be transferred. That can be a disincentive, particularly when organisations are drawing down funding from bodies such as the Big Lottery Fund so that they can carry out major improvements to or building works on the land or property that is being transferred. What advice would you give local authorities when community organisations request asset transfer at either zero or low-cost value?

Derek Mackay: I would first like to make a point on the previous question about the named officer. There is an important point of emphasis. Previously, the ombudsman or the courts would not have had any legislation to point to—only good or bad practice—to say that a local authority did not handle a bid for an asset transfer competently. However, given the presumption in the bill, the courts and the ombudsman will be able to point to what councils should have done. That is a game changer for community rights.

On the value of asset transfer requests, local authorities can already transfer assets without realising the full commercial value. They have been able to do that for some time, so long as they do transparently.

The Scottish Government could not do that, because the Scottish public finance manual made no mention of it—in fact, it expected market value to be realised. I have already changed the situation—in advance of the bill—so that, right now, if an asset is transferred to a local community, not just the realisation of commercial value but the wider social benefit can be considered. That change has already happened; it required a change not in law but in our accountancy practice. The change also extends to the Government.

The bill will raise expectations and deliver the culture change that is required, although it will be for each local body to determine the proportionate and relevant level of transfer or contribution. It could be zero: if the public benefit justifies it, the local authority may not want any cash value for a property transfer. Some groups may choose leasing, or use of rental, rather than ownership, but we do not say specifically that it should be a zero-sum game. We are keeping local flexibility. The council has to show reasonableness around that, and if the refusal of a request is challenged, it can go to appeal at the local level.

To be clear, right now, local authorities do not have to realise the commercial valuation of a property. It will be made very clear in the guidance on the bill that that is already the case. That is something that local authorities should already know.

Alex Rowley: I will focus on outcomes, which I have a couple of questions about.

The Scottish ministers will have a duty to develop, consult on and publish a set of national outcomes for Scotland. What currency or value will those outcomes have and where will they sit alongside the work of national organisations that are working to a set of national targets? For example, community planning partnerships often say that some of the targets to which the national health service is working can conflict with the outcomes that they are trying to achieve. Will that be joined up? Will the national outcomes supersede targets or will organisations still have conflicting and competing interests?

Derek Mackay: We should all operate as team Scotland at a national level. The 16 national outcomes feed into the local outcomes through the single outcome agreements. Therefore, there should already be alignment. That will be put on a statutory footing.
The way in which the Government conducts its business by aligning its agencies and departments with the national outcomes and our purpose is recognised internationally as good practice. That approach works all the way through in partnership, down to community planning partnerships.

There are indicators beneath each of the national outcomes. The national outcomes are difficult to argue with, but they give clarity on what the Government is trying to achieve.

I would expect even closer alignment, because the approach will be on a statutory footing. Agencies that are currently aware of the approach will be even more aware of it when the bill makes it a duty on ministers.

Alex Rowley: People in the NHS commonly refer to health improvement, efficiency and governance, access and treatment—HEAT—targets. I have attended meetings at which the minister and the Cabinet Secretary for Finance, Employment and Sustainable Growth have also been present when NHS chairs have said that there is sometimes a conflict between the targets that they are trying to meet and the outcomes that the NHS has agreed.

Can the minister explain a bit more his thinking about how those national outcomes will relate to community planning partnership outcomes, given that communities need to have a more proactive role in how services are planned and delivered?

I repeat an example that the convener gave from his constituency during an earlier evidence session. A local community argued that mental health was one of its key priorities, but was told that one of partnership’s key priorities was smoking cessation, as that was in its health and wellbeing outcomes. The priorities seemed to conflict a bit.

How can things operate in a joined-up way so that we have joined-up government and joined-up services and so that that approach filters through into community planning and somehow filters up from the community’s views on its priorities?

The Convener: I should clarify that that example was not from my constituency; it was from my previous council ward and happened before the integration that we are now going through. I am sorry, minister, but I had to clarify that.

Derek Mackay: Most of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill is about people, empowerment and the preventative approach, but integration is another pillar of public service reform, of course. At the national level, the outcomes are straightforward things that we can all agree on. They are not in conflict at all with the accountability of local community planning partnerships, departments or agencies.

For example, one national outcome is:

“Our children have the best start in life and are ready to succeed.”

Alex Rowley mentioned health, and another national outcome is:

“We live longer, healthier lives.”

Another is:

“We have tackled the significant inequalities in Scottish society.”

I could go on. The national outcomes are all quite clear, and public bodies should align themselves to support them. The Cabinet, ministers and departments certainly do that, and local community planning partnerships have a range of indicators and a menu of options so that they can align themselves to the most appropriate at the local level.

Alex Rowley raised a critical issue. The health service is driven by the HEAT targets, which are very specific. Local authorities are sometimes driven by other statutory targets and, increasingly, by their own benchmarking. Everyone involved has a sense of responsibility to their own organisations, but at community planning partnership level they should be sharing the responsibility and accountability for one another’s actions in delivering the plan for place and the single outcome agreement.

Most of those outcomes cannot be resolved nationally or locally in isolation—children will not have healthier lives if public bodies do not work together. The targets all matter because we are accountable, as the Government and as MSPs, for meeting those targets, just as councillors are accountable for meeting their local obligations. The bill expects public sector partners to work together in focusing on the outcomes that are delivered by the process, but there will still be room for localism. It is about sharing the goals and targets and having a greater sense of shared responsibility. The Accounts Commission has identified the need for people not to be too departmentalised but to think more as a partnership about how to provide local services.

We have heard some examples of great partnership projects happening in spite of community planning partnership boards rather than because of them, so the boards have to create the right culture of partnership and be mindful of their own targets. I am sure that, if we abandoned the HEAT targets or other input measures, the Labour Party would be first to criticise us. We have to keep the targets in place, and they are not in conflict with one another. In working in partnership to focus on outcomes, the Parliament must increasingly move away from a focus on outputs. The process is recognised as world-leading practice in that respect.

Alex Rowley: I am not saying that there are any easy answers, but I suppose that it is a question of getting a tangible outcome that you can measure and can say has made a difference as a result of the organisations coming together and planning. You referred to the Christie commission, which was clear that we could not go on in the way that we were going and that much more preventative work needed to happen.

You mentioned children. The number of children who are being taken into the care of local authorities across Scotland continues to rise, although community planning partnerships have had a strategic outcome on that. At what point does that become real and measurable for people and communities so that we can say what community planning means, what community planning partners are signing up for, what role the third sector plays and where funding is being driven? Is there a point at which that can happen, or are we simply talking at a high level, while the reality is what is happening on the ground and the two never meet?

Derek Mackay: The issue is difficult, and your question identifies that it is difficult to legislate for. We already say, “Thou shalt work in partnership to focus on outcomes.” That will certainly be strengthened by the bill, because local community planning partnerships have to be consistent with the national outcomes, although there is flexibility about how to operate locally.

The analysis is right; we need to take a more preventative approach, but it cannot be done through legislation unless we are amending the structures of health and social care. The best interventions are coming from projects, partnerships and joint working. The positive parenting programme and partnership nurseries are examples of projects delivered in partnership between health boards and local authorities—that involves not just one part of the public sector but a partnership aligning resources, sharing good practice and co-locating, which we should not have to legislate for. That should happen through the statement of ambition, the preventative approach and the general approach to public service reform.

The change funds of more than £500 million were intended to achieve some of the transformational change, and health and social care integration should achieve more of that. We are doing what we can within our existing resources and I do not think that we need a further legislative basis to achieve that. The issue is about leadership and practice on the ground.

Alex Rowley: I do not disagree with you about legislation, which is why we should be careful about what the bill can achieve. We will need something more fundamental if we are to tackle some of the national outcomes out there.

I will focus on another example: Scottish Enterprise’s role. Scottish Enterprise gave evidence to the committee about its role as a community planning partner. I assume that it has national outcomes. It is focused on inward investment, large companies and jobs that come from those things. However, at the local community planning level, there are two key issues. The first issue is targeting and supporting the growth of small and medium-sized enterprises, which is where job creation comes from. The second issue concerns people having skills, holding to account education authorities and colleges, and working together.

At the local level, Scottish Enterprise’s input to community planning partnerships is fairly limited. We need to engage local employers to play a leading role. At a meeting that you attended with COSLA, one of the criticisms from the third sector was that it believes that CPPs are dominated by local authorities and health authorities. What is the third sector’s role? What is the role for business and industry at local level? Should we look again at that, at what measurable outcomes are put in place and at who is in charge of driving the agenda?

Derek Mackay: Mr Rowley will be aware that local economic development is the responsibility of local councils. The function was transferred post the 2007 concordat. Business gateway provides some of the interface for smaller businesses and new business start-ups.

Scottish Enterprise still has a role to play in bringing its expertise to the table, as I mentioned. It has a clear remit, which it is very good at fulfilling. Bringing hundreds of jobs to a specific site, or sustaining or expanding the number of jobs is, on scale, as important to a local community as small and medium-sized enterprises are. That is all about balance.

There is a point to make about greater engagement of the private sector—be it the chambers of commerce or key local employers—in understanding what CPPs are doing. That connects to the employment agenda, to preparing young folk for vocational opportunities and to understanding the local population. There is some benefit to that. We do not want to create a new bureaucracy, but there is a greater role for the private sector to be party to CPPs, although engagement must first be with the community, to establish what it wants.

I do not disagree that we have to make the right connections with the business and industrial world to ensure that our young people have skills and opportunities for the future. Someone from Scottish Enterprise might attend a CPP board meeting and listen for hours to discussions about inequality, health inequality, deprivation and housing and think, “Why does that matter to me—to Scottish Enterprise?”, but it would help them to understand the local workforce and some of the challenges that it faces, including those that result from geographic inequality and deprivation. Then, in partnership, Scottish Enterprise could work out how to support the workforce and produce strategies.

I do not object to greater private sector exposure to community planning. The sector does not have just a seat at the table; the participation must go much wider and deeper than that.

Cameron Buchanan: As common good land—inalienable and alienable common good—is such a minefield and we do not have a definition of it, would you consider leaving it out of the bill?

Derek Mackay: I could do that for an easy life, but I propose to include it because, in all our work, including exploratory work, people have said that they want a greater say in how their taxes and resources are spent and used in their area. That is even more the case with common good, because much of the population understands that common good land is for the benefit of an area’s inhabitants. There has been criticism that there is not enough engagement in, understanding of, transparency about and community involvement in that. The bill will redress that with the register, participation, transparency and involvement.

I am not trying to undo hundreds of years of legislation and accumulation of common good disputes but, as a principle, we want communities to have greater involvement in how their common good is used and recorded. That has been welcomed.

Cameron Buchanan: Common good property cannot be defined, so the bill will be very loose. Surely that is the problem. Will we get hung up on common good land and concentrate on it rather than on the rest of the bill? I am concerned about that.

Derek Mackay: No. My time has been consumed by common good only in relation to one act of Parliament, which concerned Portobello high school. In that case, the City of Edinburgh Council made a specific request through a private bill to use land for a different function. Other than that, the issue does not dominate my mailbag—or inbox, as it is in modern times.

My fear is that, if we try to define common good, we will leave something out and we will disempower the community through an omission rather than empower it. I do not see an urgent need to define it, but I see a need to give communities greater involvement in our current understanding.

CIPFA and accountants in local authorities largely know what common good assets there are. All that we are asking is that the assets are put on a register so that the public can understand them and be involved in how they are used. That is not a huge new burden.

Cameron Buchanan: Does that include moveable assets such as pictures?

Derek Mackay: Yes. I do not think that we can exclude those elements. The approach should not be too bureaucratic. There should be an inventory.

Cameron Buchanan: There probably is in most cases, but not necessarily in some cases. I was just trying to clarify that.

Anne McTaggart: I share with the minister that, on one of our fact-finding visits, I met a plot-holder who is a single parent, who told us:

“my allotment is my garden, my kitchen, my dining room, my gym and my social worker.”

Their allotment is an enriching thing for them, and their comments showed how the allotment community supports itself and the impact that allotments have on the lives of people who are involved.

How will the bill further help those with mental and physical disabilities? What help will they receive to run allotment plots?

Derek Mackay: I do not think that the bill says anything specific about that. Anne McTaggart has identified some of the benefits of having an allotment and participating in a healthy lifestyle, which many of us could benefit from. I propose to lodge an amendment that talks a bit more about inequalities. That is necessary so that, when people are weighing up decisions on asset transfers and so on, they think about inequalities. Local authorities might well want to consider that more fully in relation to allotments.

The benefits are well understood, and those who can benefit most may pursue allotments, but I would not put anything specific in the bill about who benefits. [Intercession.] I am being corrected.

The Convener: If Dr Fox wants to comment, that is fine.

Derek Mackay: Okay—because the other two officials are silent. [Laughter.]

The Convener: You might pay for that, minister.
Alasdair McKinlay (Scottish Government): We know when we are supposed to speak. [Laughter.]

Dr Amanda Fox (Scottish Government): The provisions in the bill apply only to physical disability. We have had discussions with stakeholders since the bill was drafted and we recognise that an extension is needed, so we suggest that an amendment be made at stage 2 to broaden the definition in relation to disability.

Derek Mackay: There you go. You heard it here first.

The Convener: Does Anne McTaggart want to come back in?

Anne McTaggart: No, that is fine.

Derek Mackay: Go for something else while you are on a roll. [Laughter.]

The Convener: The bill talks of annual reports on local outcomes improvement plans. How important will those annual reports be, and how will they encapsulate the involvement that there has been with communities and the CPPs?

Derek Mackay: The improvement plans will identify what needs to be done and how, particularly in partnership. Given the extended and expanded duties to consult people, we will expect local communities to be involved. The plan for place is important. I said that I wanted to strengthen accountability in community planning partnerships, so reference needs to be made to the national standards on engagement, which are in place, although not everyone keeps to them. That legislative provision, which I should be able to introduce at stage 2, will sharpen and refine that, although of course we will expect people to take the local improvement plans seriously. There will also be proportionate inspection and auditing of community planning partnerships and local authorities through the quality assurance programme that we have undertaken.

The Convener: We heard from the Accounts Commission and the Auditor General for Scotland on various auditing points. How can the Government and Parliament hold CPPs to account for the delivery of their local outcomes?

Derek Mackay: We look at the national picture, and you will see reports, as I will, about the Government’s role. We will have a location director in every community planning partnership and we will see the indicators.

I am not sure that the committee and the Parliament should have a specific role in probing individual community planning partnerships, because it would feel slightly centralist if we were to pick on a community planning partnership. We should understand the national strategy, the national themes and the legislative framework, and the committee should hold the Government, ministers and local authorities to account collectively on our performance.

More energy has to be spent on how communities hold their community planning partnerships to account, and that is fair criticism. We cannot just wait for the rolling programme of audit agencies to reach a community planning partnership. Something more specific to local communities has to hold them to account, rather than us in Edinburgh holding each of the 32 community planning partnerships to account. That does not feel proportionate. How can we know better than a community what is right for it? It is the community, not Parliament, that needs to be empowered, although I am sure that we will execute our national duties adequately. I look forward to the committee’s recommendations if it thinks that a further process should be considered.

The Convener: If we take all that together, consultation with communities is the key. People must be involved at various levels in their communities and in the local outcomes improvement plans. How do communities deal with the national outcomes? Will communities be consulted on the formulation of national outcomes?

Derek Mackay: We expect to consult widely and to publish and review that set of outcomes. If something is about the people of Scotland, we should engage with them. I would not want to specify in primary legislation how that should be done, but it absolutely should be done.

The Convener: We have been out and about and we often hear a lot of negative stories about things that are not working, but there are also a huge number of positives. I know that it is difficult to legislate to ensure that common sense goes across the board, but how do we ensure that best practice is exported throughout the country?

Derek Mackay: I am loth to say that we should have a website, because we tried that and it did not really work, but new social media are showcasing great community projects and third sector projects. We will work closely with the what works Scotland initiative, which has conducted research into what is working well in community planning partnerships, and with the national community planning group and third sector organisations nationally and locally to showcase what can work. However, the best projects speak for themselves, whether they are transformative or life changing, and we can replicate much of those projects’ work around the country.
It is worth looking at projects that have received funding. I mentioned the funds that we are expanding, and I hope that they will have a domino effect on other projects, whether they are for land acquisition or the transfer of assets, to make a difference for local communities and empower them. Notwithstanding some criticism, we need to raise expectations of the bill so that people take advantage of it when it is enacted.

The Convener: Thank you for your evidence.

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener (Kevin Stewart): Good evening and welcome to the 30th meeting in 2014 of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee, at Lochaber high school in Fort William. I ask everyone present to switch off mobile phones and other electronic equipment as they affect the broadcasting system. Some committee members might consult tablets during the meeting because we provide meeting papers in a digital format.

I thank the organisations and individuals who have helped the committee to organise today's event. I particularly thank the staff at Highland Council and the staff and students at Lochaber high school, including the principal, Jim Sutherland. I also express my gratitude to the folks from the Sunny Lochaber United Gardeners who kindly talked to the committee about their work earlier today.

At the end of today's formal meeting, we will have a short, informal question-and-answer session for those of you who are watching from the public gallery. That will be an opportunity for you to question the committee on what has been discussed today. I will speak more about that later on in the evening.

We have received apologies from Alex Rowley MSP and Stuart McMillan MSP, who are unable to attend the meeting today.

Agenda item 1 is our final oral evidence session on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. We have two panels of witnesses giving evidence this evening. In the first panel, I welcome Councillor David Alston, the deputy leader of Highland Council; Steve Macfarlane, a board member of Lochaber Chamber of Commerce; Sarah-Jane Laing, the director of policy and parliamentary affairs at Scottish Land & Estates; Rachael McCormack, the director of strengthening communities at Highlands and Islands Enterprise; and Sandra Holmes, the head of community assets at Highlands and Islands Enterprise. You are all very welcome. Would any of you like to make an opening statement?

Councillor David Alston (Highland Council): I hope that it is clear from our written evidence that we support the direction of travel and spirit of the bill, and that we hope that our comments are seen as constructive and show ways in which the bill could be improved in detail.

I draw attention to the general comments section at the end of our submission. We have added something about community councils, which are not in the bill. Highland Council operates across a wide geographical area with 140-plus community councils. We see community councils as one of the building blocks of community empowerment. What those community councils do varies a lot. The best are very much part of their communities and of the empowering of the community.

The comments that we have made in our submission are comments that we have made at every opportunity when there has been a consultation on community councils over the past 12 years. It would be nice to see some movement on them. Our main concern is that community councils are not corporate bodies. That means that when the community wants to do something that involves large sums of money and when it wants to take control, it has a choice. Either it forms another organisation and the same people become members of it, which means additional bureaucracy, hassle and expense, or it runs the risk and acts as an unincorporated body that owns assets and employs people but is not given the protection that people who are giving something to their community should be able to expect. If community councils were made into corporate bodies, it would help to solve the problem.

I know that part of the issue is that these bodies operate quite differently in different parts of Scotland, but we hope that our comments can be taken on board as part of the solution for the Highlands.

The Convener: Thank you. As nobody else wants to make opening comments, we will move on.

To what extent will placing community planning partnerships on a statutory basis be helpful?

Rachael McCormack (Highlands and Islands Enterprise): The provisions in the bill on CPPs are positive. Our written evidence highlights the fact that there could be benefit in having a degree of flexibility about the composition of CPPs. Statutory provision is powerful, but a further positive step would be to have local flexibility and the ability for partners to identify the most appropriate composition of CPPs and, within that, the most appropriate form of representation of communities and the third sector.
Sarah-Jane Laing (Scottish Land & Estates): We support the provisions on community planning. We are slightly concerned that they do not go far enough but, to be honest, that is not to do with community planning. Community planning is not just about the statutory framework. It is about relationships, dialogue and involving all members of the community. The bill is a good starting point, but we have to have commitment to guidance, support and assistance that will give us a properly functioning community planning process. Lots of things in the policy memorandum probably cannot be put in statute and we would like to see how those are going to be implemented in future.

Councillor Alston: We believe that there should be a defined core membership, with the flexibility to add members to it. The defined core membership is important because, although it does not matter when everybody is willing, and although we have a very good community planning partnership in Highland, it is important for everybody to be at the table and to take on the responsibilities, including the responsibility to put something into the pot of resources.

The Convener: We will find out from community representatives later whether they think that the CPP works well or not.

Steve Macfarlane, do you think that business has a good enough input into the community planning partnership and the formulation of the single outcome agreement?

Steve Macfarlane (Lochaber Chamber of Commerce): I have no comment on that, unfortunately, as that is not an area in which I have got involved.

Sarah-Jane Laing: I could comment on that from a land-based business point of view. There are some very good examples, and we referred to one in a previous consultation response. The Scottish Borders Council’s working countryside group proactively encouraged businesses to be involved. That included changing the whole format of the dialogue and having meetings at different times and in different locations.

There are businesses of all sorts that are not involved in community planning. I support the need for a core group, but we have to consider what other people can bring to the party when it comes to community planning. Core groups still seem to be very public agency focused and organisationally focused.

The Convener: The bill lists those folks who will be involved on a statutory basis. David Alston mentioned that that should be the core group, and that others could be added. Should any other groups be added to the community planning partnership framework on a statutory basis?

Councillor Alston: We value the involvement of the third sector interface at the core level.

We are working across a very big geography in Highland, and there has been a discussion about the community planning partnership as a Highland-wide body. There are different questions about how things operate at a local level. That needs to be cashed out, considering the different methods and subject matters at local level. At the core level, the involvement of the voluntary sector is important.

I can understand that point about the involvement of the business sector. Perhaps that is part of the flexibility that we need in considering how we expand from the core membership.

The Convener: Does anyone else wish to comment on that? Should there be any expansion?

We have heard today from a number of folks from the Lochaber area. We have also heard from folks from Argyll and Bute, but I will concentrate on Highland. Highland has a large landmass, and you have already explained about the 140 community councils that you have. How does Highland Council ensure that community voices are heard and that what they view as being the most important priorities fit into your single outcome agreement?

Councillor Alston: To be honest, we struggle with that. At the moment, we are trying to get the community planning partnership to be more effective at a local level.

In the past, in some areas such as community safety, there have been some very good working practices at local level. As part of our integration with the national health service, we created bodies called district partnerships, where people could come together—not as part of the governance but as solution-focused local groups where people could bring things that were causing problems. We are now in the process of adding the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service and Police Scotland to the district partnerships. The meetings are held in public, with opportunities for the public to get things on to the agenda, to have them discussed and, at the end of meetings, to be part of the public discussion.

We are trying different things with different bits of the community planning partnership. The council has an area committee structure. Ward forums have been important, although they work better in some areas than in others. We are finding slightly different solutions in different parts of the Highlands to the question of how the community gets a voice. It is by no means perfect, and we have a long way to go.
Mark McDonald (Aberdeen Donside) (SNP): The convener has touched on where I was going to go, but perhaps you could expand on this point. The committee has taken evidence in different places, including the Western Isles. When people talk about a centralisation agenda or a centralisation of power, it is not Edinburgh or London that they talk about but Stornoway. Here, we have found that it is not Edinburgh or London but Inverness. Is that a criticism that Highland Council and the other agencies here acknowledge and accept? If so, do the provisions in the bill allow for some of that to be addressed and altered?

Councillor Alston: The answer is yes to both questions. We would accept it as a criticism and we think that the provisions in the bill can help. It is fundamentally when communities find the opportunities to take control themselves that their voice becomes more powerful and it plays a part in the system.

It is still in the very early days, but we have created something that we have called the community challenge fund. We have said to communities that, if there is a council service that they feel they could run better at a local level, we will look at transferring the budget to them, and we have a capital sum that we can put in to ease the transition. We are looking at what we hope are creative ways of empowering communities, and I think that the provisions in the bill will be of great assistance.

Rachael McCormack: We absolutely understand the suggestion that things are Inverness centric. The structure of Highlands and Islands Enterprise has, over time, consciously rooted a significant number of offices and a significant number of staff within the communities and close to the businesses that we support, and we are committed to that. We recognise that, across the region, we have diverse local economies and communities with wide-ranging ambitions and aspirations, and it is imperative that we are close to them and accessible.

In addition to our area teams, we have other locally based teams, so, wherever someone is in the Highlands and Islands, they are not terribly far from HIE staff. The majority of those teams have strengthening communities teams based within them, as well as economic development teams. The reach of our agency in terms of our dual remit of economic and social development is very much spread across the region.

We measure, record and feed back our investment to the Government annually, and part of the reporting that we do looks at the split between our investment in our urban or built-up areas and our investment in our fragile areas. Although about 13 per cent of our population stay within our fragile, most remote and socially and economically challenged areas, about 20 per cent of HIE investment over the past three years has been targeted to those areas. That disproportionate per capita investment recognises the over-and-above challenges that are faced by some of our most rural communities.

Sarah-Jane Laing: One problem that we have had in the past and have at the moment is that local flexibility and local priorities are seen as costly complicating factors. I hope that the bill will allow us to move to a stance where they are seen as solutions and not as problems. As soon as we move to that, communities understand the part that they can play.

The biggest thing—again, it is not statutory—is communication. Lots of communities across Scotland have felt that their engagement and feedback have not been recognised and valued. They probably have been taken on board, but the communication by local authorities and nationwide agencies has possibly not been that effective, so people have got to a stage where they are not sure whether there is any value in being involved in community engagement or feedback to Highland Council or other organisations.

We have to encourage people to understand that, when it comes to policy setting and priorities at the regional level, you have to do the hard yards. I know that that is a bit of a hard sell, but people can have much more of an impact if they are involved in setting policies than when they get down to individual decisions. If people are involved in setting the policy for new housing or new enterprise in Highland Council, they will have much more of a say than they will if they are just dealing with one application from someone who wants to build a house at the end of their garden. Making people understand how their voice can make a difference in rural Scotland is something that we all have to play a part in.

Mark McDonald: Mr Macfarlane, do you have anything to say on that?

Steve Macfarlane: The opportunity for business to be involved in some of the discussions here seems to be distinctly lacking.

Mark McDonald: That feeds into my next point. Some of the discussions at the events that we had earlier were about who is at the table in community planning partnerships. Councillor Alston talked about business, but community bodies and community groups would like to be much more embedded in the process. The bill talks about “appropriate” community bodies, but the difficulty is how we define what an appropriate community body is.
Councillor Alston spoke about the 140 community councils in the area, which presumably operate at various levels of functionality. Some communities do not have a community council, but they have other groups or organisations that, in effect, fulfil that role and function. How does Highland Council determine who are the best people to be either at the table or engaged with as part of the community planning process?

Councillor Alston: At the high level of the community planning partnership which, at the end of the day, directs the work of the chief officers of all the public agencies, we use the third sector interface. It is extremely difficult to find a mechanism at that level to involve somebody who can claim to represent communities. Therefore, the more direct involvement with communities is at a lower level.

We have community councils throughout Highland. If they are given more responsibilities, they will have more chance of becoming the bodies that we can count on as the first port of call for community representation. That happens within the community, at ward level, where we hold ward forums, and by feeding into the district partnerships that I mentioned. It also happens through things such as the ability to petition the council through our petitions committee and the ability to input into the overall umbrella of the community planning partnership through the third sector interface.

Mark McDonald: Is there anything to prevent local authorities from taking a more empowering approach to community councils at present? Is legislation required for that to happen, or could local authorities do that anyway within their current powers?

Councillor Alston: Legislation is required to give community councils corporate body status so that the individual members have protection. In the community where I live, the community council employs people and owns assets, and it has taken a conscious decision to do that rather than set up separate bodies. That is for a whole bundle of reasons, but one is about keeping things simple and allowing the effort to go into the activity rather than into the creation of the infrastructure of organisations. Community councils deserve the protection of corporate body status, which protects the individual members, and that requires legislation.

Mark McDonald: There is obviously more to empowering community councils than the issue of corporate body status. Is there anything to hold back a local authority from, for example, changing the way in which it allocates funding to community councils to give them a bit more flexibility and to empower them a little more at local level?

Councillor Alston: We do that in two ways. We have ward discretionary budgets, and community councils are one of the main groups that bid into those for local projects. We also have the community challenge fund, which involves asking communities whether they think they could take over a service, which could be grass cutting or grounds maintenance, although some communities are looking at bigger things. I do not want to give the wrong impression. We are on a journey, and we are aligned with what the bill is trying to achieve. There are things that we can do at our own hand, but the bill will help us.

Mark McDonald: You mentioned that you ask community councils whether they can take on X, Y or Z. The bill will allow for participation requests, which are less about a council asking communities whether they can take on X, Y or Z and more about communities saying that they want to be involved in X, Y or Z or they would like the council to deliver something that is not currently delivered. That strikes me as the flip-side of what you suggested, because it is more about the community being empowered in relation to what is happening than the council shovelling things towards the community councils or communities that they might not wish to take on but which they may have to take on as hostages to fortune.

Councillor Alston: No—we are certainly not shovelling things towards the community. The process is very much that, when a community feels that it can do something better and more effectively, we will consider transferring control of the budget to that community.

The Convener: The ward budgets, which you mentioned, also came up earlier today. In Highland, they are controlled by councillors, whereas in places such as Dundee we have found that budgets go to the communities, which are then allowed to spend the money, with some restrictions but not a huge amount. Why did you decide that local elected members, rather than communities, should be able to decide where the discretionary moneys go?

Councillor Alston: Actually, the budget holder is the ward manager, although they take advice from local members. We decided to take that approach partly because we wanted to make the ward budgets work. They are a new creation and, in some ways, a building block. At the moment, if we simply divvied up the money among the 143 community councils, some would find it easy to deal with that and others would not. I cannot speak for the council in this regard, because we do not have a policy on the issue, but personally I am certainly keen on finding a way of devolving budgets further to community councils. I am sorry to go on about this, but corporate body status is important in that regard. If we are to push down budgets to a lower level, people will be taking on more responsibility, so they will need the protection of corporate body status.

The Convener: It seems, however, that other local authorities can deal with the issue at present without community councils becoming corporate bodies. Perhaps we can pass you the information from Dundee, which you might want to consider.

Councillor Alston: I am sorry—do you mean incorporating the community planning partnerships?

Cameron Buchanan: It is community councils, really, and community planning partnerships.

The Convener: I think that it is both.

Cameron Buchanan: Yes, I meant both. I am sorry. They are two different things, but I meant both.

Councillor Alston: I think that I have made the point about community councils.

On community planning partnerships, the important issue is the core membership and ensuring that everybody is not just at the table but is there with an obligation to deliver outcomes at the end of the day. When I said that I thought that we had a good community planning partnership in Highland, I meant that it is good at that level. By and large, we have excellent commitment from across the public sector. There is no feeling in the community planning partnership that its becoming a corporate body would have any particular advantages or disadvantages. That has not been on our horizon.

Cameron Buchanan: Would the situation vary among regions, or would each have the same sort of membership and structure?

Councillor Alston: Do you mean within the Highland Council area?

Cameron Buchanan: Yes—within Highland.

Councillor Alston: We work with one umbrella community planning partnership, and we are trying to get it to operate according to the themes that relate to the key outcomes, such as community safety. We are trying to get that down to local level. There has to be flexibility at local level to get the right people at the table, because places differ. It is not just the geography that is different; there are different cultures and different key players in each community, so we have to keep flexibility when we get down to the organisations that are nearer the community.

The Convener: Does business have an input at local level? Does business manage to get its say on community planning in Lochaber?

Steve Macfarlane: It is hard for me to comment on some things without having knowledge of the background, which unfortunately I do not have. All I will say is that in the last wee while we have formed a new chamber of commerce and are in the stages of bringing it together, and it will build in strength. I have no way of commenting on that today, but rest assured that the next time we meet I will have more to say.

The Convener: I look forward to that.

Steve Macfarlane: That is probably the safest way I can put it at the moment.

The Convener: From an HIE perspective, what is the situation at local level? Let us take Lochaber, since we are here. Is there enough business input in formulation of the local plans that feed into the SOA?

Rachael McCormack: There could always be more business input, and the same is true of the community and social enterprise sides. One of the things that we did internally as the bill was being produced was consider its implications for HIE and our role as a community planning partner. We often lead across our local authority area partnerships on the economy and employment subgroups or strands, but we recognise that we can make a greater contribution to CPPs from the point of view of our community and social enterprise input. However, more real-time economic intelligence and information from businesses is required as well.

As one of my colleagues here remarked, though, it is incumbent on us to ensure that information comes back out of that process as well, and that it is not just linear input from businesses into the CPP, so that information is more complete.

Sarah-Jane Laing: There is input from businesses, but it is limited to feeding in views on what HIE, Highland Council or other agencies are doing. There is a failure to recognise that businesses can be the delivery mechanisms for much that is in the single outcome agreements or for localised priorities. That is where the frustration tends to come from in community planning: it still feels like something that is done to communities.

Anne McTaggart (Glasgow) (Lab): I thank the panel for having us along here tonight and I also thank the audience.

The bill requires that “A community planning partnership must ... make all reasonable efforts to secure the participation of ... community bodies” that it considers

“are likely to be able to contribute to community planning”.

To what extent will the bill’s proposals allow meaningful participation by communities in the community planning process? Does more need to be done in that regard? Can you give examples to show what meaningful participation by communities looks like?

The Convener: Who will have a crack at that first? I am going to pick on somebody if nobody puts their hand up. Councillor Alston, do you want to have a go first?

Councillor Alston: Right. It is a very big question.

The Convener: It is.

Councillor Alston: But it is a very important question. My observation is that community ownership of land and other assets is very often the key step that a community takes that gets people involved in the running of something. For example, we had examples of communities that owned and ran their village halls while the council owned and ran other village halls. We decided some years ago—it was not popular with some communities, but it was the right decision—that all village halls had to be taken over by communities.

That was a good move and it is a very small example, but if communities can move from that to extending what they have control over, that is when they get involved and take power. Empowerment can sometimes sound as if it is about the council sitting in Inverness handing out power. Of course we have to be willing to let go, but it has to be about the communities taking control themselves. It is about communities owning assets, running projects and seeing the outcomes of what they do, and getting the hunger to do more.

The Convener: Okay.

Sarah-Jane Laing: Anne McTaggart’s first point was that the provision is limited to community bodies that “are likely to be able to contribute to community planning”.

For me, a decision on that will still be subjective, and it will be taken by the CPP perhaps without it having real knowledge of what the community body is capable of and can achieve. I am therefore not sure that the wording is right in that provision in the bill. I do not have a suggestion as to how it might be changed, though.

To pick up on Anne McTaggart’s other point about community participation, as David Alston said, community ownership is only one part of that. Opportunities for participation are limited if people feel that it is just about ownership and transfer of assets. There are community bodies out there that want to get involved in running services and activities but do not want to go down the route of community ownership. We must ensure that their views and aspirations are as valid as those of people who want to pursue full community ownership.

Rachael McCormack: What is key to participation by not only communities but social enterprises and businesses is the mechanics of community planning partnerships. A chief executive in the fire service, police service or health service has a clear remit to be the conduit for all things within their ambit that come in and go out, but community bodies by definition focus on what is local. They might be communities of interest and have a broader geographic reach, but they focus on specific areas and interests.

There is a dichotomy in terms of the nature of the entities that we are trying to bring round the table. The key will be in designing a mechanism through which the community voice can be heard, and which will be a powerful conduit between communities and social enterprises and businesses that can be, as Sarah-Jane Laing said, at the heart of delivering the objectives in single outcome agreements. However, we must draw together the macrostrategic public bodies and the need for businesses, communities and social enterprises to contribute.

Anne McTaggart: I thank you for your comments.

Transport is significant in this area of the Highlands. How would you get the community to participate in discussion on that issue? Would you ask for their views? For example, would you ask a community if it would be harmed by a change to a particular transport link? What would you view as meaningful participation in that regard?

Rachael McCormack: In our experience, meaningful participation is when communities identify an issue in, for example, transport, healthcare or elderly care, and talk to partners about ways in which they can take on the responsibilities themselves or take over services that are centralised in order to decentralise them back to communities, with support and investment by agencies for capacity building.

Our community body—as an HIE account-managed body—in Helmsdale on the other side of the Highlands prioritised care for elderly people who would otherwise have to be transported to Inverness. The community body also prioritised community transport because it was not happy with a service being lost, it prioritised local social housing because it understood that it was needed, and it prioritised activities for young people.

True engagement is not about a conversation; it is about creating the conditions that enable a community to be supported and truly empowered to take on things that it has prioritised for itself.

Councillor Alston: There is a very exciting initiative in Lochaber at the moment. Alasdair Nicholson from Voluntary Action Lochaber is on the next panel and he is probably better placed to give you the detail. There is an awful lot of transport about: school minibuses, ambulances, patient transport and so on. That project is looking at how all that transport from across the public sector and the community sector can be pulled together and used much more effectively. That is a very good example of what can happen at tactical level.

Right down at community level, I am aware of quite an interesting example from my ward, where the community council was concerned about the bus service. There were issues with the frequency of the buses and with buses not keeping to the timetable. The timetable was not really working. Instead of just complaining about it, the council got together with the bus company. It said to the bus company, “Look, we’re on the ground. We can monitor your service and we can promote it if we know that it is going to be reliable.” The community council entered into an agreement with the company. The local community monitored the service and let the company know when the buses were not running to time, so the company was not just reliant on a driver filling in a sheet. The bus company offered to use a mystery shopper. It gave a member of the community who was travelling on the bus anyway free tickets for a number of weeks so that they could check on the service.

The company accepted the community’s suggestions about how the timetable could be altered and the community council then went out to people and said, “We’ve got the timetable altered to suit what you wanted—you’ve got to use the bus if you want to keep the service.” It was an interesting example of a business being involved at local level; it was good for the business, but it was also about trying to make things better for the community.

The Convener: Anne—do you want to come back in?

Anne McTaggart: I think Sarah-Jane wants to add something.

Sarah-Jane Laing: One thing that we probably have to do quite early on is change the language that is used in community participation. People are often put off because we tend to use policy speak or agency speak. We need to move that dialogue; the recent Scottish Rural Parliament event in Oban was an excellent example of moving away from policy wonk speak to having real conversations.

Some tangible things came out of the workshop on transport. It did not just call for sustainable transport strategies; it also called for a change in how bus passes are allocated, and said that young people should get them, as well as old people. It talked about the need to change significant parts of our approach.

We also need to ensure that we involve not just the people who use the service or who have an interest in it but those who do not use the service. There was a project in Ballater, called Ballater one voice our future, which brought in everyone who might have a stake in the future of Ballater to ask them why they were not using the buses. It was not just about speaking to the people who already used the buses. It was very resource intensive but it was valuable.

The Convener: Anne, do you want to come in now?

Anne McTaggart: I think David wants to come back in first.

Councillor Alston: I gave the example of the community council working with the bus company—that community council now has email addresses for getting on for 40 per cent of its community. There is full compliance with data protection and it uses the addresses only for community council purposes. If an issue comes up and the question is, “What does the community want?” at the touch of a button, the council can reach 40 per cent of the community to ask them.

Anne McTaggart: What happens, though, if the community council then disagrees with the bus company? Where is your role within that, given that you subsidise transport?

Councillor Alston: The services were all non-subsidised services, so what happened was purely on top of what we might be able to lever out through subsidising services. That example was about a direct link between a community and a business. They identified the mutual interest of improving services to the community.

John Wilson (Central Scotland) (Ind): Good evening. Councillor Alston made reference on a couple of occasions to the 140 community councils that exist in the Highlands. Can you give us an idea of how those community councils are established, how the boundaries are set and how many hold annual elections? Are there more nominations than there are places on the community councils?
Councillor Alston: We reviewed the community councils scheme about two years ago. The boundaries are set in that scheme. They vary a lot across Highland—some community councils cover large areas. Wick has one community council, while Nairn has three. It is sometimes to do with the history of the area. If community councils are given more power, we might need to look in more detail at having a bit more uniformity so that they are treated equally.

The scheme now has a system in which elections happen all at the same time. Election is for a four-year term. That gives us the opportunity to promote community councils and election to community councils. You asked about how many councils have contested elections; I am sorry, but I do not have that figure. We can get it.

The Convener: That would be useful.

Councillor Alston: The number is not nearly as high as we would like, but there are contested elections. Obviously, where there are hot local issues, there tends to be contested elections.

John Wilson: Who drew up the boundaries for the community councils? Was there dialogue with the existing community councils and existing communities? You mentioned that having three community councils in Nairn is part of a historical situation. However, what type of dialogue took place two years ago with the communities and the community councils to ensure that the community councils that were recognised by the council were set up around a community’s agenda and not the council’s agenda?

Councillor Alston: We consulted widely. We asked the community councils themselves to identify anomalies. Since community councils were first set up, places have moved on and in some cases have themselves identified some redrawing of boundaries that would make sense.

As far as I recall, we did not go beyond accepting the suggestions that came from the community councils themselves. We did not try to impose on them a geography that we thought might make more sense.

John Wilson: We might hear more about that later on this evening.

How does HIE interact with communities and how often does HIE interact with community councils? Does HIE see community councils as the main community forum to engage with if it is dealing with potential economic or social investment in a particular area?

Rachael McCormack: From a strengthening communities perspective, community councils are very often part of the mix within a community. We account manage about 50 communities across the region at the moment; those are long-term relationships. Although community councils are very often part of the mix, we always talk to the community about it setting its own defined boundary that best describes its community. It does not lean towards an administrative boundary unless the community itself brings that forward as a sensible boundary for its community.

I was reminded, in talking about communities and businesses and social enterprises, that sometimes—perhaps more so in more remote and rural areas—you can be talking to a person one day from a community perspective, you can be talking to them the next day about a business growth agenda and you could be talking to them the next day because they sit on the board of a social enterprise.

Across our region, the range of the remit of HIE cannot be subdivided. It would be completely artificial to say that we transact with businesses in a particular way and with communities and social enterprises in a different way because, as I said, it is very often that same person who is involved and there is a bit of a revolving-door scenario.

The important thing for us is that communities define themselves; they define their interests, and they come to us with their ambitions and their growth plans. We look for where we can support them and where partners can support them, but it is very much the community’s choice as to whether to be a community council or another form of incorporated body. That is entirely for the community to determine, and we will support them in pursuing the most appropriate route towards the form that they choose. That would involve consideration of the type of business transaction on which they want to embark, the assets that they want to acquire and the purpose that they want to serve in their community.

John Wilson: On incorporated bodies—Councillor Alston referred to this issue earlier—if there was a community council in a particular village but another organisation or group of individuals in the community were to approach either the local authority or HIE regarding proposals for the area, would any dialogue take place between the community council and the local authority or HIE on those discussions? A question that has come up relates to who the bodies and agencies are engaging with at a local level. Is there any potential conflict if the community council has one agenda while another, smaller group of individuals has a different agenda that they want the local authority or HIE to support or buy into? How would you solve such potential conflicts?
Councillor Alston: I certainly hope that there would be dialogue in that situation. If the council was involved in funding or supporting such a proposal, we would be talking to everybody. Such a situation, in which different groups want to go different ways, can arise in communities.

Community councils are important partly because of the important role of representative democracy and participation at the community level. However, the process works only—as you indicated earlier—if it reaches the point at which people are contesting elections and we can genuinely say that those who are on the community council have stood in front of their community and been elected.

That is the case in some communities, and in such situations it is right to give particular weight to the community council. However, if such a conflict arises, we have to help the community to work through it. If there is still a conflict, the funders have to make the decision at the end of the day about where the funding goes, but we should do all that is possible to overcome conflicts.

Sandra Holmes (Highlands and Islands Enterprise): Within HIE, we respond to whoever makes contact with us. We often engage strongly with community councils, usually at the start of a project.

We have encountered situations in which a community council has not, for whatever reason, completely bought into the idea of a wider development trust as part of its overall priorities. In such a case, we would engage with both parties, and we respond to whoever contacts us. The process is very much community led.

In one particular situation, it was decided—through dialogue that was led by members of the community—to offer the community council a place on the development trust board. In our experience, communities seek to find solutions themselves: they do not look to carry on with conflict.

I reiterate that community councils are often the starting point. We have been invited to many meetings hosted by the community council to get dialogue going, although it does not necessarily see itself as the right organisation to take a project forward.

We will provide support—and often funding—in the early stages, until the direction of the project is clear. If the project goes ahead, the body in question—a community company or whatever—can then work out the right way forward. We certainly treat and respond to community councils in the same way that we would treat other community organisations and businesses.

John Wilson: Councillor Alston, you said in response to my previous question that it would be up to the funders to make the ultimate decision on whether to go ahead with a project and which projects would be funded.

The bill is aimed partly at ensuring that communities are fully engaged in the decision-making process with regard to funding. You said that ultimately the funders would make the decision, but how would you deal with the demand from many communities to be more closely involved in decision making where funding is being spent by the local authority in a particular area, without bodies—the community council, for example—having to become incorporated? Is there no other way in which the council could actively involve the community council or other community groups in making decisions about where funding should go and which developments should go ahead?

Councillor Alston: The issue regarding incorporated bodies relates very much to the question whether a community council wants to take something forward at its own hand. If it is concerned with helping to form the decisions that are being made, it would need to have incorporated body status.

I think that all the bodies that are represented here today have experience of working with communities and of trying as far as possible to get to a consensus. That often takes time, and it is a lot of hard work.

It is important that we can rely on one another and work together as partners. That is one aspect of community planning: it is about all elements of the public sector trying to pool their resources so that where there is something to be worked through, we are not all pulling against one another.

There are many techniques to be used in trying to make a judgment in such a situation. I gave the example of a community council that can now instantly contact 40 per cent of the community. That is a really good start in terms of finding out the community’s view on something, but different techniques are needed if the community is trying to work up the solution to a problem itself.

Steve Macfarlane: I am following the list of things that we are going through. We have talked about community ownership, ownership of assets and managing and running services, but I think that I am right in saying that we skipped over the phrase “community right to buy”, although we have been talking about that general area in our discussions. Perhaps I could say a few words on it.

There are some fundamental flaws in part 2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 that I have yet to see corrected in part 4 of the Community...
Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. They are not addressed in there yet.

The Convener: Can you indicate what you think those flaws are?

Steve Macfarlane: Certainly. The proposal is for the community—that is if it is defined, because a community can define itself—to be able to go through the community right-to-buy process and acquire an asset that can be developed and improved to provide community benefit. As I see it, that is the basis of and reason for that proposal.

Where that falls down is that there is no protection from people using that particular provision as an aggressive mechanism, and no way to stop it being used against a fully functioning business. There is no mechanism to enable a business to defend itself, other than just waiting and waiting for what may never come. It might come via an inhibition—an inhibition can be put on as a result of an application—which then sits there for five years.

If the asset in question is purely redundant, unused or underutilised, or if it is a relatively small part of the whole and can be used for the betterment of the community but needs some improvement, such a process is understandable. However, it is not understandable where the asset is already fully functioning and operating as a business—it can still be on the receiving end of an aggressive application. There is a fundamental problem in that respect.

The Convener: Okay. We will pass that on to the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee, which is looking at part 4 of the bill for us. We will ensure that it is aware of your comments.

Steve Macfarlane: Can I come back on that? I am with you on the rural affairs issue but, as part 2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 stands, all assets in all areas are affected by that law and are currently at risk.

The Convener: I understand that. The Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee is looking at all aspects of part 4. We will pass on your remarks to that committee, and they will feature in what it feeds back to us for the final report. I assure you that that will be done.

Steve Macfarlane: Thank you.

John Wilson: I have a final question. One of the issues that I picked up in the discussions that we had this afternoon related to local planning and strategic planning. There is a feeling at the local level that people are being excluded or bypassed, particularly when community planning partners and community planning partnerships draw up strategic plans. Can you assure me that every endeavour is made to consult communities and that what communities propose or ask for is fully considered in the strategic planning process? Some communities feel that, despite the engagement that takes place, their voice just gets lost when it comes to the strategic planning process, and that decisions are made regardless of what they might think.

Councillor Alston: Do you have any examples of specific areas of strategic planning in which that is happening, or are you describing a general feeling?

John Wilson: It is a general view. Communities feel that they are excluded from the decisions that are made. Even though they might have concerns, the plans of the various agencies seem to go ahead anyway.

Councillor Alston: That can sometimes happen because it is only when something happens on the ground that the issue emerges and people realise that the point at which they could have had an influence was a bit earlier in the process. All parts of the public sector need to stress the importance of getting in early. The process is not perfect, but an example of the progress that has been made recently is the fact that the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service and Police Scotland plans are all consulted on at ward level. There is a process of reporting back on and renewing those plans. The policing priorities are being set at that level.

John Wilson: You say that the plans are being consulted on at ward level. Who is being consulted—the communities, the elected members or the officers?

Councillor Alston: The plans are consulted on at open public meetings, to which all the councillors in a ward and all the community councils are invited. Those are open public sessions at which the public can speak.

The Convener: Does anyone else want to comment on that?

Sarah-Jane Laing: I commented on consultation earlier. I think that there needs to be a cultural change on the part of those who are consulted. Communities of interest and communities of geography have to understand that they cannot always get what they want when it comes to the consultation process, but they should at least be given a reason why they are not getting what they want. That is what is missing from the dialogue.

The other problem is that we often get plans that are presented as being fully formed. People are simply asked whether they agree with those plans, rather than having any role in their evolution. The fact that people can be involved only at a relatively late stage means that, realistically, they have little chance of changing anything significantly.

Mark McDonald: When we were in Dumfries recently, we took evidence on a community asset transfer. The process had been going on for some 18 months without reaching a resolution. When it initially made contact, the organisation concerned had to make about 14 or 15 phone calls to different individuals to find the person who it should have been talking to.

Should public bodies be required to have an identified contact whose duty it is to draw together the various people in the organisation who have responsibility for such matters? Should there be a time limit for dealing with an asset transfer request, at which point a report should be submitted to the board or, in a local authority context, elected members, explaining why the transfer has not been concluded within the required period?

Sandra Holmes: In HIE, we have a community assets team. Our job is to support communities in asset purchases, whether they are purchasing an asset from HIE, an asset that is privately owned and on the open market or an asset that is owned by a local authority. We have not one person but many people throughout all our offices, and it would not take somebody long to find the right person; certainly, they would not require to make 14 phone calls. I cannot speak for what is appropriate for other organisations, but we have that covered.

What was the second part to your question?

Mark McDonald: It was about the length of time that an asset transfer should take and whether there should be a time limit by which a report should go to the board or, in a local authority, elected members.

Sandra Holmes: The reality is that asset transfer, through whatever route, is often measured in years rather than months, and there are often good reasons for that. Having a defined time limit might be difficult, although a target timescale would be helpful.

We managed to do a transfer to a community body in months, but we are also involved in other purchases that are happening over years. There are often good reasons that are external to the community and the organisation why a purchase might take time.

Mark McDonald: That is fine and, in individual cases, years might be required. However, community bodies and organisations are often sitting on time-limited funding from trusts and other organisations that will disappear if the asset transfer does not take place, with the whole thing falling apart. That is why having some mechanism to ensure that asset transfers do not drag out might be appropriate. I would be interested in views from other witnesses.

Councillor Alston: If a council asset was being transferred, our ward manager would be the key point of contact. I would hope that people would not be bounced around between different officers.

If an asset that had been declared surplus to requirements was being transferred, there would be regular reporting and a clear categorisation of the stage reached. Such transfers are subject to monitoring, so it should be possible to see what is happening.

We often find that the issue is the other way round: people express an interest and then need time to form the body to seek the funds. However, once they know that they can acquire an asset, the transfer needs to move quickly. We would expect it to be reported to ward members at ward business meetings and to be monitored through our resources committee, which monitors all asset transfers.

Sarah-Jane Laing: When it comes to planning and other matters, there is some evidence that, once we introduce an arbitrary timescale for decision making, the likelihood is that the decision will be no. We have to be careful that we do not create a position that prevents Sandra Holmes and others from having the required flexibility.

Mark McDonald: To be clear, I propose not a time limit within which a decision must be made but a deadline by which, if a decision has not been reached, a report should be made on why it has not been reached.

Sarah-Jane Laing: I would fully support that approach.

Cameron Buchanan: The Scottish Land & Estates submission has an awful lot of stuff about "abandoned and neglected land". I did not follow your line on that. It is a very long submission on that point and full of legalese. Do you approve of the bill's provisions? The submission was difficult to follow.

The Convener: Again, that concerns part 4, which we are not considering. If you could be brief, Ms Laing, we will feed your response to the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee.

Sarah-Jane Laing: I will have a session with the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee about that next week. We have a number of concerns about the issue, the main one being that we want to see an explicit definition of "abandoned or neglected" in primary legislation.
Cameron Buchanan: Okay, thank you.

The Convener: You will discuss that with the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee next week.

Sarah-Jane Laing: I will.

The Convener: The Highlands and Islands transport partnership has come up on a number of occasions today. How does it fit in with your community planning partnership? Is there a good relationship between the various bodies and HITRANS in the delivery of what local communities want and need?

Councillor Alston: The council and HITRANS have a good relationship but I am not aware of HITRANS being mentioned at the community planning board.

The Convener: It does not take part in your community planning partnership.

Councillor Alston: No, not at the board—or senior—level.

The Convener: What about at lower levels? Does the CPP have a transport committee?

Councillor Alston: HITRANS would work closely with the council. There are a number of situations in which we rely on one partner to feed in views from another organisation. For example, the Forestry Commission does not sit at the table in our community planning partnership, but we expect Scottish Natural Heritage to co-ordinate the expression of views. If we were looking at an economic development issue in which transport was important, we would look to HIE to feed in from the consultation.

The Convener: Should regional transport partnerships have a more prominent role in community planning partnerships? I will ask HIE the same question in a second.

Councillor Alston: I do not know what the right answer is. We have to have a mechanism by which views can be fed in, to help the partnership to work. The approach applies in other areas as well.

The Convener: Does HIE have an opinion?

Rachael McCormack: Physical connectivity and digital connectivity are two long-standing challenges facing our remote and rural areas. Any step towards greater engagement and bringing agencies, whatever their focus, closer to communities’ needs is positive.

The Convener: Thank you. I thank you all very much for your attendance and your evidence.

Meeting suspended.

On resuming—

The Convener: I welcome our second panel. We have with us Duncan Martin, secretary of Oban community council; Alasdair Nicholson, chief executive of Voluntary Action Lochaber; and Patricia Jordan, chairman, the Nevis Partnership. Would you like to make opening statements before we move to questions?

Alasdair Nicholson (Voluntary Action Lochaber): I would like to, if I may.

The Convener: On you go.

Alasdair Nicholson: I have given your staff a written submission, some of which might be pertinent to the other committees that you mentioned earlier; I hope that the comments might be passed on where they are relevant to other discussions. If I may, I will highlight one or two particular points.

Overall, we do not believe that legislation empowers communities. We believe that communities empower themselves. However, legislation is important in facilitating and enabling communities to do more, particularly taking into account asset transfer and the extension of the right to buy. All of those are important.

Earlier on, you heard evidence about changing the culture of how things are done, and that is important if we want to maximise community benefit in the longer term as these things play out.

We draw attention to the role of third sector interfaces. They should be named bodies in community planning.

Empowerment must be about more than consultation, particularly in tackling rural poverty, marginalisation and regeneration. We welcome the idea of participation requests to enable communities to have a say in the design and delivery of public services, but that should have participatory budgeting as a follow-up requirement to help to give that participation teeth.

I also draw the committee’s attention to some of our current activities in Lochaber in partnership with the British Council. That is establishing a cohort of people who have gone through a programme that is about capacity building, helping people to identify need in their area and having dialogue and discussion that enables the participants to look at the development of social action plans. That is a way of delivering real community empowerment to individuals. There is
We believe that empowerment begins with people, their education and their organisation.

Patricia Jordan (The Nevis Partnership): I thank the committee for giving me the opportunity to speak today. As well as being the chair of the Nevis Partnership, I am a community councillor.

Part 2 of the bill places community planning partnerships on a statutory footing. I welcome that, but I feel slightly uneasy at the size of the partnerships being formally defined. I would like some scope for smaller community planning units. In that respect, the committee might be interested to know that around eight years ago the Lochaber area was commended by Audit Scotland for its handling of community planning. We took the plans of all the public bodies, extracted the Lochaber elements, ran a series of community meetings, rewrote the plan and submitted it back to the public bodies. That was real community engagement. At that time, each of the main public bodies had senior staff based here who, as part of the Lochaber partnership, could sit around the table with community activists, and we had a good chance of knowing what was going on and could play our part.

I am therefore disappointed and surprised to find that no community bodies appear in either part 2 or schedule 1, which lists the community planning partners. If you were serious about community empowerment, it would be perfectly possible to include in the bill something along the lines of “any regional association of community councils which is situated in the area of the local authority”, or something similar. In the Highland Council area, that is likely to refer to no more than six or eight community bodies, and given that there is three times that number of public bodies, we could easily be accommodated. That would also give some legitimacy to the creation of the sort of smaller community planning units that I have just suggested. The planning of public services with the community should be the norm, not an add-on.

Overall, it is disappointing that the bill contains no specific proposals to change the status of community councils. We need to invigorate community councils, which after all are the first link with the community. At the moment—as I think we have heard—community councils are a mix of the good, the bad and the thoroughly indifferent. [Interruption.] Excuse me, convener—I do not have too much more to say.

Although we have statutory status, we do not have statutory powers, and that is a major reason for our disenchantment. As I am sure you are aware, Scottish community councils are not eligible for lottery funding. When the United Kingdom lottery legislation was brought in, parish councils in England and Wales were debarred from lottery funding because they were able to raise money through the rates; Scottish community councils were simply swept along with that, even though we were unable to do the same. That injustice needs to be corrected. That is just an example, but I think that having tangible assets and powers would re-energise community councils.

Part 3 of the bill encourages communities to play a stronger part in their communities. Of course, I welcome that, but I would welcome even more some way of recompensing activists—or, indeed, their employers—for having to take time off work, in the same way that jurors are recompensed. As for part 4, which extends community right to buy to all of Scotland, you will be aware of excellent examples of community ownership in Lochaber, and all communities need that kind of encouragement and opportunity.

As I am representing my own community council and the association of Lochaber community councils today, I cannot speak for others but as one of the 200 delegates from community councils, community groups, grass-roots activities and public bodies from the north, south, east and west of rural Scotland who attended the inaugural meeting of the Scottish Rural Parliament from 6 to 8 November in Oban, I can quote from many of those activists who I met over those three days. Their comments included:

“No power to exercise local rights”,
“Funding criteria doesn’t always fully fit local needs and timescales are often problematic”, “Growing distrust of solutions/answers”,
“Lack of meaningful local democracy”,
“No control or influence”,
“Communities need to decide and deliver more for themselves”,
“Please stop using political terms and speak in plain language. No need to use words such as charrette”,
“Are we strengthening or weakening local democracy”, “Huge disparity among CCs and no young people joining”, and “Communities need to express their concerns and ambitions.”

Over the past year, the Scottish rural action group has been engaged in advisory meetings throughout rural Scotland, culminating in the inaugural meeting of the Scottish Rural Parliament in Oban, which was felt by all to be a really important step forward for rural groups. On the Saturday morning, delegates gave a very positive and resounding vote for the action group to go ahead to create an assembly, recruiting members early in 2015, and to arrange the next Scottish Rural Parliament meeting in 2016. The overarching view was the need to safeguard rural communities.

I have just one more bit to say, convener.

The Convener: I am telling you, Patricia—this is longer than the average MSP speech. On you go, though.

Patricia Jordan: I do not get this kind of opportunity often.

There was overwhelming agreement on our shared concerns for the future and our need for engagement and interaction, strengthened by a single voice. There was also whole-hearted agreement that it is time for a national conversation on local democratic renewal as a first step towards a radical reform of local government that will bring power much closer to local communities. If there is a serious commitment to a radical strengthening of democracy—I believe that there is—I think that that can be achieved only by considering community councils, community associations and community groups as planning partners. May I be so bold as to add that although the Scottish Rural Parliament is only in its early days it, too, should be given consideration.

Thank you very much.

The Convener: Thank you. We will hear from Duncan Martin next.

Duncan Martin (Oban Community Council): We seem to be sticking to a very short agenda, which—if I have understood you correctly, convener—is all about part 4. Is that right?

The Convener: I would prefer it if we did not touch on part 4 to a huge degree.

Duncan Martin: I think that our submission to the committee reflects the fact that our community council is fortunate to have a lawyer and an accountant who is a director of Community Land Scotland. If I move away from what has been written here, I make it clear that I am speaking for myself rather than for my democratically elected community council, which is having by-elections at the moment. I should add that those by-elections are being contested and that most of the candidates are young people, which will substantially reduce the average age of the community council. We are moving forward in that respect.

I found the contributions in the previous session very interesting. As Alasdair Nicholson made clear, empowerment is not something to be given out by those at the top but something that communities need to take. In a democracy, individuals and communities cede powers to the centre, and they can recall them at any time. The powers are ours to take back if we feel that they are not being used properly.

I note that Argyll and Bute has a community planning partnership, but Argyll and Bute itself is not a community but an administrative area. The same is true of Highland. Technically speaking, Argyll and Bute would have, I think, 67 community councils, if they all existed, but it has more communities than that; some communities share a council. It is very convenient for bureaucrats—if that is the right word—to think about services on Mull. The people of Mull might share a community council, but they do not consider themselves a whole community; the Ross of Mull, for example, is quite separate from Tobermory. The people on the Ross of Mull never go to Tobermory; if they want to go shopping, they come to Oban.

As has been said, communities are self-defined. Sarah-Jane Laing made it clear in the previous session that it appears to people that community planning and community planning partnerships come from the top down, not from the bottom up. That is the crucial part of the empowerment agenda. In some ways, things are easier in the small communities, where a few activists can start something small; it is probably more difficult in slightly larger settlements such as Oban, where you have to ensure that everyone is on board or that the whole town is enthusiastic about whatever it is. However, it is really the way we have to go.

Solutions to almost every problem lie within the community rather than outside it. As was mentioned earlier, consultation tends to take place after officials have put together options to be appraised and this, that and the next, and they are most unlikely to accept that they have wasted their time creating those options and to start from scratch again with what the community actually wants, needs and feels would deliver a service. We have to get back to basics and grass roots.

The Convener: Thank you. You have certainly taken up the opportunity with your opening remarks, folks—I give you that. [Laughter.]

I am interested in what Patricia Jordan said about the Lochaber partnership plan. Am I right in saying that you said that Audit Scotland praised that plan?

Patricia Jordan: Yes.

The Convener: How long ago was that?

Patricia Jordan: It was eight years ago. It was when we had the—

The Convener: Was it a full Audit Scotland appraisal?
Patricia Jordan: Yes. We had excellent local partnership working with the community. There was—dare I say it?—an element of trust, because everyone was round the table and everyone was talking. There was a real feeling that it was bottom-up working. At present, we are looking at the Scottish Government and the local authority being involved, and by the time it comes down to the community there is an element of “also”.

I think it was stated earlier that organisations and public bodies sit round the table and it is a fait accompli. People feel that they are presented with plans that have already been agreed and decided on and it is just a tick-box exercise to get the community to agree.

The Convener: Can I ask you—maybe you are not a boring anorak like I am—whether you have read any of the Audit Scotland reports on community planning partnerships?

Patricia Jordan: I have to answer that honestly. No.

The Convener: Well, you are a wise woman in some regards. [Laughter.] I think that the committee may have to look at the report on Lochaber and compare it with some of the recent reports on community planning partnerships, because there may be some lessons to be learned there.

Patricia Jordan: Yes.

The Convener: John Wilson has a supplementary question.

John Wilson: What has happened in the eight years since the Audit Scotland report? Has the plan been enacted or have things just fallen apart? Do communities feel that they are no longer actively engaged?

Patricia Jordan: Over the years, we have had changes in the ways in which local authorities work. I cannot remember when it was, but there was a change in the way that local areas are run, and that made a big difference.

I think that everyone—the local authority, the councillors and the community councillors—wants to work together and is looking to do that, but somehow the system is broken. That is the best way I can explain it. The communications are lost and we are not having the same meaningful discussions that we had before about community needs.

The Convener: What has changed? Highland Council was in existence eight years ago. Were the area committees in place then?

Patricia Jordan: Lochaber has two wards and we have seven local councillors. They go to meetings in Inverness, where there are 70-odd councillors. The planning structure has changed—

The Convener: But that was happening eight years ago. What has happened in the meantime?

Patricia Jordan: When was the change? I think that it was in 2007. That was—

John Wilson: The change in 2007 was just to transfer from wards with individual members to multimember wards. Was that such a significant change?

Patricia Jordan: I can speak only for Lochaber, but it was a significant change locally. It was almost as if we lost local democracy at that point. Partnership working may have worked for the agencies, public bodies and services, but the community became disengaged from the process. Whether it was because of disenchantment, a feeling of loss of control, a feeling of loss of empowerment or whatever, communities have become disengaged.

At the end of last week, I sat at the table at the district partnership meeting. All the public bodies were there. I think that there were two representatives from the community—me and Alasdair Nicholson. I feel that we are questioning everything that is being said and everything that is being agreed, asking where it has come from, what the reason is for it and why it is being done. It is top down rather than bottom up. That is not always the case, but that is the feeling. That is the perception.

John Wilson: Yes, and you are expressing that perception today. The committee is trying to understand the move away from what the Audit Scotland report said was an excellent example of partnership working with the community. You highlighted that the change in the electoral system changed that partnership regime.

I am trying to understand the difference between the situation before 2007, when you had seven members who went to Inverness and participated in the decision-making process, and the situation in May 2007, when you had seven members who were elected in a multimember ward system who went to Inverness to make decisions. I am trying to fathom how that drastically—in your opinion and your perception—changed the partnership working that Audit Scotland saw as excellent prior to 2007 such that it is now seen as being broken, dysfunctional and not working in the way the communities would wish it to work.

Patricia Jordan: I would not say that it was drastic. Seven years is a long time, and in that time we have had budget cuts, changes in administration, changes in staff and changes in the agency. The community does not change. Everything changes round about it.

John Wilson: So it is about more than just the elections that took place.
Patricia Jordan: Oh, yes.

John Wilson: It is about the budget cuts, the changes in administration and the way it works now compared with eight years ago.

As I said, we are just trying to understand the change from a situation in which you had an excellent report that said that things were working, to a situation now in which the community feels that it is disengaged from the process. Does Alasdair Nicholson or Duncan Martin have a view on that?

The Convener: Can we go to Duncan Martin first? Do you think that the multimember ward system changed things in Argyll and Bute?

Duncan Martin: The Boundary Commission for Scotland, in its wisdom, decided to cut Oban in two. Part of Oban is in one ward and part of it is in another. As I think you are hinting, the issue is not so much multimember wards but that the thinning out of local government structures has meant that there is less empowerment of staff locally, such as in Oban, than there was before. More decisions are being taken at the centre and there is less empowerment of staff locally because there has been a thinning out of the number of layers of management. That may be the issue.

Argyll and Bute is a peculiar place. Highland at least has Inverness as a centre—the black hole into which everything goes. In Argyll and Bute, we have no single centre. Indeed, the council is run from Lochgilphead, which is one of the smaller places. The settlements of Oban, Helensburgh, Dunoon, Rothesay and Campbeltown are scattered round the periphery, and we have no centre. There is an issue to do with local empowerment of council staff.

Alasdair Nicholson: I cannot say what the position was eight years ago because I was elsewhere at that time, but since I have been here, in the past year, my impression has been that the partnership work in Lochaber is probably better than that in other parts of the Highlands. There is quite a strong partnership, certainly on health and wellbeing, and the chamber of commerce, which my organisation is a member of, has been involved in economic development workshops that feed into the local plan—there is a local Lochaber plan.

Of course, all those things can be improved. Apart from the mechanisms, one element on which progress needs to be made is the culture of the interaction between the agencies, the community and other organisations. A lot more work is required to get that right. The engagement of community organisations and—

The Convener: Can I stop you there for a second? Do you think that legislation will change the culture?

Alasdair Nicholson: It will not by itself, but it helps to create the framework. Where it places obligations and duties is part of the change of culture that is required. It takes a long time to make some of those changes. The support that is needed to enable the kind of participation that we require will take a lot more effort and a longer timeframe. We have to move beyond consultation to the bit about participation, public social partnerships and designing and building alternatives with communities. That is even more important in times of austerity.

To pick up on a point from the earlier panel, the transport initiative that was mentioned—

The Convener: Can we come back to transport? I would like to stick to one issue at a time.

John Wilson: I have no further questions, convener.

Mark McDonald: Based on the evidence that the witnesses have given so far, would it be fair to say that your view is that we need a flexible approach to community planning that takes greater cognisance of rural and remote areas? Although community planning partnerships in fairly compact urban areas such as Aberdeen or Glasgow might be able to incorporate the views of the communities there, in places such as Highland that are extremely sparsely populated and where there are great distances between communities, a more flexible approach to community planning should be taken.

Alasdair Nicholson: Some members of the public who have participated at the Lochaber partnership come from Strontian, Lochaline and other areas that involve journeys of 30 or 40 miles, including using the Corran ferry, which is one of the most expensive sea crossings in Scotland, if not Europe. Those individuals are trying to participate and they are making a big effort.

In my view, the work that needs to go on is below community planning and below the level of the Lochaber plans, so that things are not just jammed in at one level. One of the best ways to encourage and develop community involvement is through some of the other measures in the bill, such as those on asset transfer and the right to buy. A range of things need to be done to enable communities to do more themselves and to have the resources to do that. That requires a lot more capacity building and a lot more support for communities.
Some communities might have people who know the system and who can do things, but others are weaker in that regard and might be less well equipped for that, so they will need to go on a longer journey. Some of the effort and support need to be targeted to ensure that smaller communities that do not have the mix of skills that other places have do not fall behind but are encouraged to become active and engaged, so that they can empower themselves and do more.

If we want to combat poverty and tackle all the other issues that exist, we need not just the efforts of one agency but the combined efforts of all the agencies, so we need to get everything pointing in the right direction. Community planning is supposed to do that but, as a whole, it has been far too top down.

Mark McDonald: I am interested in hearing the views of Patricia Jordan and Duncan Martin on that point.

Patricia Jordan: At the end of the day, community planning comes down from Inverness, which is difficult. There is an element of fragmentation in this area. Lochaber was one area with seven councillors, but we are now split into two areas, as there are two wards, which means that we cannot go forward with the united voice that we had in the past.

Mark McDonald: You say that Lochaber was united in the past, but I presume that there were individual council wards in the area, each with its own councillor. You now have two multimember council wards and seven councillors representing them. You have the same number of councillors, but you just have fewer council wards. Hypothetically, that ought to make it easier to present a united front because, rather than seven wards, you have two.

Patricia Jordan: No, we had one council ward with, I think, eight councillors. We now have two wards with seven councillors. Is that right?

Mark McDonald: No.

Patricia Jordan: How am I putting it wrongly?

Mark McDonald: Pre 2007, there would have been individual council wards with one member for each ward. Since 2007 we have multimember wards.

Patricia Jordan: Okay—I know what you are saying now. Sorry.

Mark McDonald: Let us take councillors out of the equation—to be honest, most people would be happy with that. I am talking about how the community is represented and how community planning relates to communities. Leaving aside the elected member layer, does community planning as it is done at present take enough cognisance of sparsely populated areas such as Highland, where a huge area is covered by one community planning partnership? Should community planning be more flexible in such areas compared to the approach in places such as Aberdeen, which I represent?

Patricia Jordan: Highland Council covers a massive area with huge diversity in culture and geography, and that needs to be considered. That is one reason why I said that we need to bring back local planning into local areas. In an area as wide as Highland, decisions for the local areas cannot be made from Inverness. We have huge diversity even within Lochaber—we have Fort William, which is urban, as well as islands and remote rural areas. That creates a massive problem with regard to services across the board, such as transport and health. That is one of our difficulties.

One of the most shocking things that I have heard today is that HITRANS is not a member of the community planning partnership.

The Convener: We will come back to HITRANS.

Mr Martin, do you want to comment?

Duncan Martin: I do not have anything to add. Alasdair Nicholson made a lot of points for me, so I will leave it there for the moment.

Mark McDonald: I am aware that we have a lot to get through before we conclude, so I will ask a final question that I posed to the previous panel on points of contact and the time that is taken for community asset transfers. If a community organisation seeks to take on an asset from a council or a health board, should it have an identified officer to contact rather than having to go round the houses? Should there be an expected time that an asset transfer should take, with a report going to the board or to councillors if the process goes beyond that time, to explain why it is taking so long?

Duncan Martin: I have not had any experience of that, but we have one person in the council whom we speak to. I do not know whether there would be a problem if we were to try to negotiate assets from the health board or other organisations such as Scottish Water. I do not have any experience of that, so I cannot say whether it is a problem.

Patricia Jordan: If there is to be meaningful strengthening of community voices and empowerment of communities, it is important to ensure that communities have a contact and know where to go. There has to be clarity about how they are to be empowered. I talked about looking at the system and the structures that are broken. Having a contact is a big part of the issue. I know that, at times, community councils and the Nevis Partnership need a contact in Highland Council. If we can go immediately to that person and either be directed to somebody else or advised where to go or what to do, that saves time and energy and prevents the frustration and anger that often come from going round the houses. It is important that there is a contact in place and that community activists and groups or community councils are aware of that.

Alasdair Nicholson: As has been mentioned, time and communication and dialogue are important factors. One thing that is missing is identification of assets that might be available for disposal by public bodies such as local authorities and health boards. People should be enabled to get that information. That should be a two-way process. Communities need to be able to inquire about assets that they have already identified an interest in and they need to be able to get a response.

Another issue is that a council that wishes to dispose of a building or a piece of land might communicate with only a very narrow section of the community, and that communication might not be transparent to everybody. I would argue for an accessible online public register. There should be an obligation on public authorities to log or register assets—buildings, land or whatever—that might be available for community use so that communities could get more forewarning and could begin to think at an early stage about whether they could use any of those assets to further their ambitions. At the moment, that is missing from the equation. That would go a long way towards stopping people being dependent on the views and assumptions of one particular officer. That element needs to be given substantially more thought. That could link in to things such as the right to buy.

The way in which the asset transfer process works at the moment is inadequate. I have been discussing with Highland Council a building that is not being used. It might take a considerable time to come up with a business plan for such an asset, particularly if a lot of technical data is required, so I think that there needs to be some flexibility. If I had not noticed that that building was already on sale in the public arena, I would not have known about it. A duty needs to be placed on public bodies such as local authorities to get that information online as early as possible so that the community has access to it, in addition to individuals being able to write to inquire about particular assets. At present, such inquiries may or may not be ignored.

The Convener: The minister has already indicated to us that he is likely to favour a register, so you might get your way.

Cameron Buchanan: At a meeting earlier, we heard that HITRANS is not represented in community planning in the region and that, in many instances, it does not co-operate. Could you comment on that? As far as its role in the integrated transport system is concerned, HITRANS does not seem to be functioning very well and is being criticised.

Alasdair Nicholson: My organisation has been involved—along with HITRANS, Highland Council, NHS Highland and the Scottish Ambulance Service—in a partnership in Lochaber that is aimed at providing more co-ordination, support and advice to people who need transport, who are often people with health needs.

The Convener: What is HITRANS's involvement in that?

Alasdair Nicholson: It is one of the partners on the top-level board. I have represented Voluntary Action Lochaber, and HITRANS has been a partner along with the other agencies that I mentioned. The Inverness board has also discussed transport issues that relate to other initiatives. In a sense, that is a partial public-social partnership. HITRANS has certainly been involved at that level, even if it has not been involved in other community planning initiatives.

Cameron Buchanan: Is HITRANS represented in other planning activities?

Alasdair Nicholson: I can answer only from my knowledge and experience. I know that HITRANS is involved in that piece of collaborative work, so I cannot criticise it on that side of things.

The Convener: I think I know the answer to this question. Do you think that regional transport partnerships should be involved formally in community planning partnerships?

Patricia Jordan: Very definitely, I do—especially when we consider the problems that we have had on the A82 and the work that local groups and the A82 campaign group have done over the past 10 years. There has been single-line traffic on that road for decades.

Duncan Martin: Yes—regional transport partnerships should be involved. In Oban, we are—technically—part of the Strathclyde partnership for transport area, although the A82 falls within the Tayside and central Scotland transport partnership area, in Stirling Council's area. We wander from one transport partnership to another. Admittedly, I have seen Frank Roach from HITRANS in Oban far more often than I have ever seen anyone from SPT. We are a very minor fish in SPT’s pool, so HITRANS is of more relevance to us.

The Convener: The former chair of HITRANS was from Argyll and Bute Council and also sat on the SPT executive, which was an extremely strange situation.

Duncan Martin: Yes. I am not quite sure how Councillor MacIntyre ended up on HITRANS.

We are right at the boundaries, and we do not see much of any of the regional transport partnerships. It is clear that they ought to be involved in community planning partnerships.

Alasdair Nicholson: I am just thinking about the principle of subsidiarity. If that was strengthened and applied, some of the answers would probably follow.

The Convener: I thank the witnesses very much for their evidence, which has been extremely useful.

The next committee meeting will be held at 9.30 am on Wednesday in the Parliament’s committee room 1.

Meeting closed at 19:12.

Dear Sirs,

I should like to draw your attention to the need for the Bill to require local authorities to give local organisations which are backed by their Community Council an opportunity to exchange views face to face with the relevant committee members before decisions are made.

Earlier this year the Scottish Borders Council (SBC) was faced with the necessity of making repairs to the historic Carlowse Bridge, Tweedsmuir, which has been damaged by timber traffic. The Tweedsmuir Bridge Action Group and the Upper Tweed Community Council favoured a particular option, which would have installed an alternative bridge for timber traffic, leaving the historic bridge needing less extensive repairs and providing a much safer access on to the main road for timber lorries. Delegates from the two organisations offered to meet the SBC’s councillors before the meeting where they took the decision, but this was refused. The councillors making the decision also declined to visit the site, even though a site visit had been recommended by another council committee. The decision was then made to adopt a different option from the one favoured by the local community. It has subsequently transpired that the option adopted will cost the SBC much more than they estimated at the time the decision was made, but they have decided to proceed regardless.

Whether or not the decision made was the best one - and there are increasing doubts about it - the process followed by the SBC has left the local community with a strong feeling that the very significant amount of work which they did on their preferred option was undervalued and not properly understood. A face to face meeting would have cleared up any misunderstandings, on either side. As it is, the local community believes that it is not worth working hard to help the SBC to reach the best decisions on any important matter in future, unless the decision processes are changed.

Yours faithfully,

C.G. Lewin

Chairman, Upper Tweed Community Council
As Chair of Currie Community Council I welcome the direction you are taking but, there is always a but, one main concern remains. Community engagement is very patchy at best with lots of councils withering on the vine with an increasingly elderly pool of the SAME faces. We all need to get better at engaging other generations. In Currie we are incredibly lucky and have a very diverse and lively group of people but this is not necessarily the norm. We are very focused in helping our community and with mostly new members there is, at least at present, no internal politics or cliques.

However my concern remains..... at most meetings I attend it is generally the same faces saying the same things. For this to be a legitimate platform we must first engage a larger audience an inclusive voice not exclusive

NHS GRAMPIAN CONSULTATION RESPONSE

The Scottish Parliament has issued a call for evidence to inform its consideration of the new Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. The five areas they are focusing on are:

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

NHS Grampian believes that the Bill will support the empowerment of communities in its provisions which support:

- Community ownership of land and assets;
- Removal of barriers that prevent communities taking on more responsibility for assets;
- Potential for communities and community groups to own and deliver key local services to that population, close to home, and based on clear knowledge and understanding of what communities want;
- Enablement of community capacity building, resilience and wellbeing and the ability to support focused change in disadvantaged communities or areas of deprivation;
- Direct engagement of communities with Public Sector organisations and Community Planning Partnerships and ability to directly influence and suggest improvement and change in services; and
- Potential for innovation and sustainability of local services through local ownership.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

Potential Benefits to Public Sector Organisations

- Empowered, enabled communities with ambitions to take more responsibility for local assets and potentially service provision;
- Public Sector organisations being able to target, through the provisions in the Public Bodies (Joint Working)(Scotland) Act, community empowerment at some of our more disadvantaged communities, supporting their development, capacity and resilience;
- Ability to engage in more productive dialogue with communities on the potential innovative use of assets to deliver and drive modern, 21st century models of health and care;
- Supporting development under Self Directed Support Act and ambitions for local people to develop and manage their own care and support and also support social entrepreneurship;
- Strengthening the role of the Community Planning Partnership and potential, through that for innovation through partnership working and with input from communities

Disadvantages / Challenges to Public Sector Organisations

While welcoming the policy intention of the draft Bill NHS Grampian would note its concerns regarding potential disadvantages and challenges for Public Sector organisations and for NHS Boards in particular:
Significant capacity will be required of NHS Boards and other public sector organisations in relation to supporting the processes enabled by the Bill. For example, organisations will be required to put in place processes to manage community requests to improve outcomes of services. The parameters for such requests has not been set out in detail in the Bill and we would welcome more guidance on what constitutes an ‘appropriate’ community body and what is ‘reasonable’ in terms of refusal of such a request. Similarly, the provisions of the Bill enable community organisations to request and receive ‘detailed’ information about a property that they are interested in. This may include detailed information about the energy efficiency and maintenance costs. This would again require a process to be put in place and for current NHS Board Estates capacity to be directed at providing such information, at a potential cost to maintenance and delivery of Board outcomes and target. Finally, in relation to this section—capacity and processes will also be required in relation to Public Bodies having to assess community bodies’ proposals. As set out in the policy memo, this work would include: ‘economic, social and environmental benefits of different proposals.’ and goes on to conclude: ‘The authority must agree to the request unless there are reasonable grounds for refusal.’ NHS Grampian would note concern of the untested nature of this Bill and concern that the extent of work required by Public Sector organisations, with no additional resources to manage it, would place significant additional pressure upon them and challenge their ability to deliver core work and statutory targets. We would reiterate the need for guidance on what would constitute ‘reasonable grounds for refusal’;

This is a time of far reaching change in Public Sector organisations, especially as we move to implement Integration under the Public Bodies (Joint Working)(Scotland) Act and it would be imperative to ensure that there was no duplication of effort and reporting. The Public Bodies Act prescribes actions around locality work, prescribes groups that must be engaged with in the development of Integration Schemes and Strategic Plans and there is a risk that this sits in parallel to, rather integrated with, the intention of the Community Empowerment Bill. Public Sector organisations will need guidance on how these aligned policies are intended to interact to ensure best outcomes.

All communities are different and have different capacities and capabilities. One challenge will be to ensure that all communities, especially those that are disadvantaged and which don’t have the confidence or capability to engage with the policy and local Public Sector organisations are supported and enabled to do so. NHS Grampian recognises that a lot of work in this area is already being done, both in NHS Boards, within Councils and across other areas of the Public Sector. Community Planning Partnerships are potentially well placed to support this agenda, as are the emerging Integration Joint Boards which have a duty to engage with local communities. The Bill, and associated guidance can support this work and focus through sharing good practice and research in relation to what organisations can do to maximise community capacity and capability.

4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?
See responses at section 3 and 4.

5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

NHS Grampian has no specific response to these sections.
COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL

Call for written evidence as part of Stage 1 consideration of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

A. Background to CRNS

1. Community Resources Network Scotland (CRNS) represents reuse, recycling and repair organisations across Scotland on issues of sustainable community resource management.

2. The majority of members of CRNS are social enterprises managing waste resources at a local level through recycling, re-use, composting, waste reduction and waste education activities.

3. Members prevent tonnes of valuable product and materials from ending up in landfill, create local jobs and other economic opportunities, and typically work to help those on low incomes or who are disadvantaged.

4. The CRNS State of the Sector survey for 2014 shows that:

   a) Third Sector re-use and recycling activity was reported in all 32 local authority areas. The greatest concentration of activity was in Edinburgh and Glasgow.

   b) The Third Sector diverts in excess of 46,000 tonnes per year from landfill or other final disposal routes. Recycling tonnage is the largest proportion of that figure at 31,575 tonnes (68%) followed by re-use tonnage at 13,695 tonnes (29%) and community composting at 427 tonnes (1%).

   c) Third Sector re-use and recycling activity generates in excess of £24 million turnover per year. There is an uneven distribution of turnover across the third sector: Five organisations (4%) reported a turnover of over £1 million whilst 21 organisations (19%) reported a turnover of less than £250,000.

   d) Fifteen organisations reported that they had experience in winning tenders to deliver re-use and recycling activities with 41 organisations reporting they had not considered tendering at all. Twenty three organisations reported that they currently had at least one service level agreement in place to provide re-use and recycling services.

   e) The finance data shows a trend towards more earned income and less grant income for Third Sector re-use and recycling organisations: 51% of gross income was reported as earned income for 2010-11 and this figure had risen to 64% for 2012-13. CRNS has seen an increase in diversification among members as a matter of necessity and views this as an opportunity for the sector seeing diversification into recycling bike, jewellery and other such items. This shift appears to be driven by economic necessity for the sustainability of member organisations.
f) Third Sector re-use and recycling organisations reported employing 685 full-time equivalent staff, involved 3,448 volunteers and supported 682 placements annually. Twelve organisations employed over 50% of the total staff numbers reported and 75 organisations reported having five or fewer full-time equivalent staff.

In response to the invitation to give evidence to the Scottish Parliament’s Local Government and Regeneration Committee’s call for written evidence on the above Bill, CRNS has consulted members and provides a summary of collated responses below.

Specifically the call for evidence focuses on the following questions.

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give a reason for your answer.
2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions of the Bill?
4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not why what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

CRNS Responses

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give a reason for your answer?

CRNS Response

CRNS welcomes the provisions in the Bill and agrees that these will empower communities in Scotland. In particular the removal of barriers to make it easier for communities to achieve their goals by giving ‘clear rights’ to play a more proactive role and placing ‘clear duties’ on public sector bodies to engage with communities is welcomed.

a. CRNS would welcome transparent guidance on the duties and responsibilities of public sector bodies and the requirement for these bodies to publish their approach to community engagement, the timescales attached to each stage and the arbitration process applied where a community feels it has not been given sufficient opportunity to respond.

b. CRNS would also propose that the ‘clear rights’ for communities to play a more proactive role in their community is clearly publicised and distilled into easy to understand, plain English guides.
c. The Bill clearly extends community participation in planning and this is welcomed, however CRNS is concerned that many communities will still be disadvantaged by the ‘weight’ of public bodies over smaller less resource rich community groups. CRNS would advocate for support for such groups to have access to funding to enable them to engage, where appropriate, professional support to represent their views without incurring major expense.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

CRNS Response

CRNS welcomes the Bill placing statutory duties on Community Planning Partnership to engage with the community will, in the view of CRNS provide a more robust methodology for engaging communities across Scotland. However focusing the definition of communities by geography, with passing reference to areas of mutual interest may disadvantage like-minded groups forming alliances to work together over a wider area. The Christie Commission stated that Scotland’s public services is founded on four pillars: People, Partnership, Prevention and Performance. Applying these principles with the Empowerment Bill will enable a wider definition of Community and allow for greater engagement across Scotland where communities of interest can participate alongside local (geographic) communities to greatest advantage.

a. Reference is made to community in terms of geography, common interest and/or characteristics of its membership, however it is up to the public body to determine the validity of the community body corporate structure. Reference to corporate structure suggests bureaucracy and has the potential to put off small community groups with little secure funding. CRNS would welcome clarification on this point and would suggest that public bodies should engage with communities of all sizes and types, regardless of corporate structure. Over prescription of structural requirements of community bodies will disadvantage small groups.

b. CRNS’ view is that public sector bodies planning processes will be greatly enhanced by engaging with the wider community if the process applied is equitable and fair. Public bodies by their nature tend to be large, run by professionals and have well defined administrative systems. While this is appropriate and reassuring for the wider public to know that public funds are well managed it also may be that the very structure of large public bodies creates an immediate barrier for engagement.

c. CRNS would advocate that engagement with community groups is held at community level – in community environments where the symbols and structures of public services are less in evidence and so removing what could be viewed as an intimidating consultative process. While this approach may cause an extended timeframe for public bodies it would have the advantage of overtly showing willing in true engagement and should lead to better quality decision making.

CRNS Response

As previously stated, CRNS’ view is that many community groups will be capable of self-representation where they are of scale, however smaller groups may be disadvantaged through lack of resource. Resource in this context is viewed as time, expertise and/or finances. Where this situation occurs CRNS would advocate for intermediary bodies to support such representation as may be required. This in itself is not a wholly perfect solution as many intermediary bodies are also cash or time poor. Specifically CRNS determines intermediary bodies in this context as membership and other representational bodies and not the more widely understood definition of government intermediary agencies.

a. CRNS would support simplified methodologies for engagement with communities to ensure that they are able to participate in the new provisions. Such methodologies could make use of technology – on-line survey, facilitated discussion, local newspaper or television articles, Facebook and other social media streams that can allow for fast and effective interaction across a wide range of people.

b. CRNS’ view is that too often changes in the community are seen to be ‘under the radar’ and only when a change is made do communities who would have engaged react. A proactive approach to engagement is needed to ensure that the flow of change is and is seen to be open and transparent, allowing for decisions to be taken collectively.

c. CRNS accept that no matter how extensive a consultation not all views will be capable of being addressed, however it should be possible to extend the process of local governance to incorporate the widest community if effective methods are applied. The cost of non-engagement is surely higher than an extended timescale to bring as many views to the table as possible.

d. A CRNS concern is the weighting given to small groups in terms of their ability to lobby. Size of a group is not necessarily a representation of its importance and CRNS does not find in the Bill anything that reassures that the minority view can be heard or credited as easily as that of larger, resource rich and/or more organised groups.

CRNS Response

CRNS welcomes the Bill and its provisions, with the proviso of comments above. In relation to changes CRNS considers the following improvements could be included:

a. Clarity of the rights of community groups
b. Stronger emphasis of community definitions to support communities of interest and collective working

c. Clear methodologies for promoting engagement with timescales and remedies for review of challenged decisions

d. Clarity on the weighting given to small group responses

e. Clarity on what constitutes ‘corporate’ structures and how small groups can accommodate such requirements

f. Clarity on the use of intermediaries in responding to community planning

g. Clarity on the availability of funds for small groups to engage professionals to support them in effective engagement on their behalf.

CRNS Response

CRNS’ view is that the application of the Equalities Act in relation to the rights and impacts of island communities and sustainable development is fair and welcomes the inclusion of the need to consider this issue when determining asset transfers or participation requests.

1 State of the Sector Report 2013. A study into the activities of the Scottish Third Sector re-use and recycling organisations. CRNS; March 2014
Comment on published Community Empowerment Bill from Dr L D Neil, Selkirk. 18/8/2014

I am resident in a Borders town which possesses a Common Good Fund (CGF) and have been a Community (CC) Councillor since 1980, chairing it twice. As a founding member of Selkirk Regeneration Company (SRC) which started as a group in 2005, I am nevertheless no longer a CC member and have ceased temporarily to be a director of the SRC.

Over many years I have studied and been engaged in all matters to do with CGFs, both our own and those elsewhere. Many dialogues with regard to Selkirk’s CGF have taken place over these years with Scottish Borders Council but have had largely unsuccessful outcomes. The Section of this bill dealing with CGFs will play a major part in restoring the local status and community relevance of CGFs, largely address the legal shortcomings and sloppiness of previous legislation and will markedly improve hitherto unsatisfactory outcomes in LA administration of CGFs.

However, there are still some items that could be modified or added to the bill which, I suggest, will help avoid dubiety and circumvent potential future conflict.

In general terms, the greatest risk to the integrity of CGFs arises from the activities or inactivity of local authorities (LAs). Insufficient time and effort has been spent in the past to administer CGFs in most Scottish LA areas in order to carry out the duties imposed on them since the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973. In addition, councillors elected to an LA area are beset by the conflict of interest between their duty to the local authority and the duty of trusteeship of SGFs prescribed by the act.

I shall not comment other than superficially on the implications of the proposed bill with respect to matters outwith the Common Good but I will add my wholehearted approval to measures to enable the return to Scots people of control and ownership of the land that was originally theirs in common ownership.

I hope my comments will be perused and endorsed, at least in part, by both the Selkirk Community Council and the SRC who will be circulated with these comments.

Comments on Part 6 ‘Common Good’

Para 63:
Sub-sections 1 – 8 are clear and commendable.
However (ref note 276 & 277) it would be unfortunate to miss an opportunity to define and clarify that LAs own only the ‘title’ to CGFs, and that burgh inhabitants are the ‘beneficial’ owners as in Trust Law. I have had 2 QC opinions, one endorsing the other, that the distinction is important and efforts should be made to undo the damage of the wrong assertion, often quoted by LAs, on p1 of Ferguson’s book ‘Common Good Law’ that LAs own CGFs “outright”. They don’t.

Para 64:
Sub-sections 1 & 2 are good.

Para 65:
Sub sections are commendable except 3 and 6; under 3, LAs should be held to publish widely, not “at their discretion” and under 6, there should be wider representation of communities on bodies administering CGFs¹ with voting powers and a limited veto power². (ref paras 17& 18 of sect. 14 of Part 3, Land Reform Review Group Report)

Para 66:
Disposal is still governed by the limitations imposed by Section 75 of the 1973 act which along with observations in notes 281 & 282 should safeguard CGFs from depredation. This continued legal safeguard could be clearly stated in the act to avoid confusion and reassure CGF ‘owning’ communities.

It is noted that it is anticipated (Financial Memo.) that the costs to LAs of bringing the currently inadequate CGF registers up-to-date will not generate an additional cost to LAs. That is unrealistic given the work that will be involved in correcting the neglect of decades of LA failure to compile adequate and accurate registers.

¹ The rationale of having local community representation equal to that of the LA on the management of CGFs is to restore local involvement and awareness of CGFs, which is one of the main aims of the act - and:
   a) to secure protection of CGFs for the future;
   b) to compensate for the proprietorial ineligibility and lack of knowledge of some LA councillors on the administration of local CGFs;
   c) to improve management efficiency and financial viability of CGFs;
   d) to re-create an attractive receptacle for bequests;
   e) to reduce some of the administrative burden on LAs by voluntary work.

² A simple measure to help restore some control to local CGF ‘owners’ over their CGF would be to institute a limited veto – say 2 years bar on proposed change of use or disposal of GCF property. A veto operated by a majority of the community representatives on the CGF management group, reversible at any time during the 2 year period by the veto being withdrawn by those who exercised it, if discussions led to a proposal that was satisfactory to the community.

One final point is that there should be much tighter scrutiny on how LAs spend CGF money. We have several examples of profligacy here in Selkirk eg. £718.00 spent by the LA in fruitlessly trying to draw up a simple lease for £50.00 pa. Such incompetence is intolerable and local CGF beneficiaries have had no say in the matter and no powers to prevent such occurrences of CGF raiding. For this reason, a clause/amendment subjecting charges proposed by LAs on CGFs to independent assessment, before they are debited, would stop this nefarious practice.

As far as Section 6 of the Act is concerned generally, the suggestions in ¹ & ² above would go a long way to restoring community empowerment to the local CGF administration consequent upon its removal in 1975. The same principle is embodied in the referendum.

Consultation on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

Response Questionnaire

Chapter 3 - Proposals with draft legislation

Please read the draft Bill provisions before you answer these questions. You do not need to answer all the questions in this questionnaire, only answer the questions that you have an interest in. Separate questionnaires are provided for each chapter of the consultation paper.

Please make sure you also return the Respondent Information Form with your response, so that we know how to handle it.

3.1 Community Right to Request Rights in Relation to Property

Please read Part 1 of the draft Bill (Annex C pages 1 to 9) before you answer these questions:

Q1 Do you agree with the definition of community body at section 1? Yes

Do you have any changes to suggest?

CG= Common Good; LA= Local Authority; CGF= Common Good Fund; CB= Community Body; CC=Community Council, CRTB=Community Right to Buy

Yes;
There are other community bodies besides Community Councils which fulfil the criteria of LA (S) Act 2003, Annex C Part 2, 15,4 ; Draft CE(S) Bill, Ch 3, Part1,1,5 a-f or Part 2, 11,2.
There is no clear indication as to how such bodies can play a part, apply to play a part or be approved to play a part. The mechanism for this should be made clear.

Q2 Do you agree with the list of public bodies to be covered in this Part at Schedule 1 (Annex C page 21)?
What other bodies should be added, or removed?

Any representative body which fulfils the criteria as above. Most Community Councils do not fulfil all the criteria eg enabling them to submit a CRTB request. Some CBs in the same locality do. This needs clarification.

Q3 What do you think would be reasonable timescales for dealing with requests, making an offer and concluding a contract, in relation to sections 5(6), 6(2)(c) and 6(6)?

The ones proposed seem reasonable and conform with the CRTB regulations.

Q4 Do you agree that community bodies should have a right of appeal to Ministers as set out in section 8?

Yes

Are there other appeal or review procedures that you feel would be more appropriate?

Under Annex C, Part 1, 8, 2 (b);

It appears that a body wishing to appeal a decision by a Local Authority is debarred from doing so. The reason given is that LAs are democratically accountable. However it is wrong to say that (para 30) a Local Authority is democratically accountable to the (local) electorate in this context for 3 reasons:

a) Since the imposition of arrangements for unitary authorities in the LA etc (S) Act 1994, the majority of councillors responsible for eg. the common Good are from outwith the constituency area pertaining to the Common Good Fund. Thus the beneficial owners of the CG have no opportunity to exercise democracy if they can’t vote on the councillors taking decisions on their CG property.

b) In practice, most of the decisions pertaining to Common Good are made by unelected officers of the Local Authority, endorsed by councillors but not acting under direct scrutiny of elected councillors.
c) There is an inevitable conflict of interest where councillors try to balance local community interests with their Local Authority duties. This conflict is irreconcilable so Local Authorities should remain answerable by appeal by local bodies where disputes arise.
Therefore, 8 2 (b) should be deleted as most appeals would result from a dispute between a spuriously democratic Local Authority and a community body. A sheriff court would be unbiased and acceptable route to resolving disputes and the result of its determination could be made binding on all parties.

Under Annex C, Ch 3, Part 1, 10;2
It would be fairer if a ‘decline’ to consider a new request were treated as a refusal thus allowing an appeal. Why should a public authority have the discretion to refuse to consider an appeal simply because they refused a previous one? (Accepted that the grounds for appeal must be materially different from those of the original appeal)

Q5 What form of appeal or review processes, internal or external, would be appropriate in relation to decisions made by local authorities and by Scottish Ministers?

The reinstatement of judicial requirements as laid down in LA (S) Act 1973, Part 4, 75, 2.
As regards the disposal of Common Good assets, the removal in the draft bill of a requirement to seek judicial approval for alienation of inalienable assets is a seriously retrograde step. Decades of legislation to protect Common Good property, while in need of improvement, is still essential in giving Common Good owning communities protection against overbearing local authorities and ensuring the conservation of the Common good assets.

Q6 Do you have any other comments about the wording of the draft provisions?

No, pretty clear what is proposed.
Q7 What costs and savings do you think would come about as a result of these draft provisions? Please be as specific as you can.

Delegation of powers and budgets to local bodies to administer some local services would:
- a) allow some limited new local employment;
- b) avoid some wasteful practices;
- c) be more responsive to local needs; better cost-targeting.
- d) diminish costly administration and tortuous routes to effective action;
- e) involve local people in better control of their own environment and avoid the cost of some area supervision.

3.2 Community Right to Request to Participate in Processes to Improve Outcomes of Service Delivery

Please read Part 2 of the draft Bill (Annex C pages 9 to 14) before you answer these questions:

Q8 Do you agree with the definition of community body at section 11?

Yes +/-

Do you have any changes to suggest?

Same comment as answer to Q1. But in addition, some CBs, not necessarily CCs, have a wide range of expertise to draw on which under the present LA arrangements is wasted. It would be fair enough to establish the qualifications/expertise of individuals within it when assessing a PB for eligibility, and try to recognise and enlist this expertise in devolving some tasks presently undertaken by LAs.
Q9 Do you agree with the list of public bodies to be covered in this Part at Schedule 2 (Annex C page 21)?

Yes +/-

What other bodies should be added, or removed?

Same as Q 2.
Q10  Do you agree with the description at section 13 of what a participation request by a community body to a public service authority should cover?

Yes

Is there anything you would add or remove?

Couldn’t a ‘Community Body’ be recognised as such in advance, reviewable at prescribed intervals, and save applying for recognition to each public service authority? It would save time/admin costs and be far easier. It would also put the CB on an address list where matters affecting them are proposed.

Q11  Do you agree with the criteria at section 15 that a public service authority should use when deciding whether to agree or refuse a participation request?

No

Are there any other criteria that should be considered?

A body with particular expertise in a certain area could be recognised for participation in that area of expertise alone. The system of recognition could be streamlined by recognising such a body in advance. eg local renewable energy groups.

Q12  Do you have any other comments about the wording of the draft provisions?

No
Q13 What costs and savings do you think would come about as a result of these draft provisions? Please be as specific as you can.

As in Q 11, a lot of toing and froing could be avoided by what we propose – admin costs reduced if the CB was already seen as ‘kosher’.

3.3 Increasing Transparency about Common Good

Please read Part 3 of the draft Bill (Annex C pages 14 to 16) before you answer this question:

Q14 Do you think the draft provisions will meet our goal to increase transparency about the existence, use and disposal of common good assets and to increase community involvement in decisions taken about their identification, use and disposal?
Yes, up to a point but largely No ☐
What other measures would help to achieve that?

CG= Common Good; LA= Local Authority; CGF= Common Good Fund.

The main thrust of the declaration (paras 45 -47) that defining what constitutes CGF property is likely to result in unintended outcomes is a failure to address the question. An Inner House judgement by 3 judges in the Court of Session in 2003 established clearly what the CG is.

Therefore:
1. Better definition and understanding of who owns the Common Good. Counsel opinion we have obtained is that the title alone is LA owned, the beneficial owners are the populace of the burgh. Councils do not own CG outright despite being misled by p1 of Andrew Ferguson’s book. (Common Good Law, Avizandum Press)
2. Restoration in the bill of the requirement to seek judicial approval for all proposals to change the use of inalienable CG assets.
3. The discarding of the legally meaningless phrase “having regard to the interests“ of the CG beneficial owners. Substitution with a more democratic, legally tight local decision-taking method involving a local referendum if indicated. At present, LAs can do what they want, ‘have regard’ to local interests and simply disregard them.
4. Removal of the unlimited and unscrutinised charges put on CG Funds by Local Authorities, largely for services that LAs are obliged to provide under the LA(S) Act 1973 such as legal services. What they do is quite wrong and can cost a CG dear, and is a way for Local Authorities to subsidise their staff costs at a CGF’s expense. Over £20,000 has been deducted by Scottish Borders Council from Selkirk’s CGF for administration, most of it for ‘Legal Services’ in the 2 years 2011/12 & 2012/13.

5. An enforceable requirement on LAs to compile accurate and complete CG asset registers. Despite their legal obligation and the March 2007 encouragement by Scottish Government to LAs to do this, the advice has been largely ignored. This is a small area of Audit Scotland’s monitoring responsibilities but continually neglected by them.

6. The restoration of the two categories of CG assets, (heritable and moveable) and the requirement to account for each separately.

7. Inclusion of representative bodies, other than Community Councils, in decision taking of the CG fund. (see 10 below)

8. The establishment of business plans to exploit CG assets is sadly neglected by LAs. No attempt is made by LAs to enhance the assets of a CGF. The neglect should be corrected.

9. Where a LA uses CG property or any part of CG property for any purpose, a formal written lease should be mandatory even if no leasing charge is involved. The costs of drawing up such a lease should be borne by the LA, not the CGF. This would put the repair and maintenance obligation on a formal footing and avoid unnecessary charges on the CGF. (eg £728.00 legal charges to Selkirk CGF to secure a £50.00 pa lease – not yet even concluded after 5 years)

A clause to regulate this should be fitted into the bill somewhere.

10. A mechanism whereby the beneficial owners of a CGF have decision-taking rights over their own CGF is needed. This is a fundamental quality of democracy which is sadly lacking under present legislation. Local people should have a defined veto power over decisions taken by non-owners acting on behalf of the beneficial owners. There should be an equal number of local citizens, beneficiaries of the CGF, to balance elected Local Authority Councillors. They could be CC members or nominated from a local body, voted on by CC members.

11. Greater transparency is a modern expectation. Any steps to achieve this are to be welcomed. The proposed bill must include more democracy and devolved control over CGFs, giving CGFs the protection they need, or else it will fail to fulfil its intentions and will be a continual source of contention until it is improved.
3.4 Defective and Dangerous Buildings – Recovery of Expenses

Please read Part 4 of the draft Bill (Annex C pages 17 to 19) before you answer these questions:

Q15 Do you agree that the cost recovery powers in relation to dangerous and defective buildings should be improved as set out in the draft Bill? Yes ☐

Q16 Do you agree that the same improvements should apply to sections 25, 26 and 27 of the Building (Scotland) Act 2003? Yes ☐

However, where buildings or parts of them belonging to the Common Good but occupied by a local Authority are in need of repair, the local authority should be obliged to conduct the repair on a ‘repair and maintenance’ basis. This should apply whether a formal lease is in operation or not. That should be embodied in the proposed bill. Some necessary repairs are deliberately delayed by LAs resulting in much greater costs. There should be included a mechanism for an independent assessor to evaluate timescales for repairs to CG property.

The Royal Burgh of Selkirk Community Council submitted a response to the Sept. 2012 consultation on this proposed Bill. Owing to a failure on our part, the response was out of time. It is still relevant however and as we are in close liaison with the Community Council we ask that it is considered alongside this submission although neither of the authors are currently members of the Community Council having resigned in May 2013. Response Questionnaire

Chapter 4 - Detailed Policy Proposals

Please read the draft Bill provisions before you answer these questions. You do not need to answer all the questions in this questionnaire, only answer the questions that you have an interest in. Separate questionnaires are provided for each chapter of the consultation paper.

Please make sure you also return the Respondent Information Form with your response, so that we know how to handle it.

4.1 Improve and extend Community Right to Buy

Q17 The Scottish Government proposes to extend right to buy to communities in all parts of Scotland, where the Scottish Government is satisfied that it is in the public interest. Do you agree with this proposal?

Yes ☐

Are there any additional measures that would help our proposals for a streamlined community right to buy to apply across Scotland?

1. Pre-recognition of Community bodies already with CRTB status.
2. Some straightforward mechanism whereby community bodies such as Community Councils, not presently in a position to entertain a CRTB, can rapidly fulfil the criteria along a smooth pathway with minimum admin. That would enable these groups to respond rapidly to emergent opportunities when they arise to the benefit of the local community and its economy.

Q18 Do you think that Ministers should have the power to extend “registrable” land to cover land that is currently not included as “registrable land”?

Yes ☐

What other land should also be considered as being “registrable”?

All sporting estates.
Any land with agricultural potential whose use is currently being squandered or its potential stifled by landowners for other purposes where national interest is involved eg food production, green energy generation.

Community responsibility could be considered for defined coastal areas to safeguard fishing stocks and conserve a community’s fishing livelihood. (Remember, the coastal shelf administered by the Crown Estates is actually the property of the Scottish people, not like England/Wales. The Crown Estate is simply an administrative convenience. There is no apparent reason why coastal areas should not be considered for CRTB)

It could be in parallel to or within the existing EU legislative framework which gives protection in some areas.
Q19 Do you think that there should be a compulsory power for communities to buy neglected or abandoned land in certain circumstances?

Yes ☐

What should these circumstances be?

Land sterilised by an owner/developer through not being developed within a reasonable timescale eg If building is not started within 1 year after planning permission is granted and not completed within 3 years, that development should automatically be targeted and identified as eligible for CRTB. If no plan for development is submitted by an owner, he/she should be given 18 months to submit one or the land becomes eligible for CRTB and a compulsory sale arranged. This would clear the blight of undeveloped brownfield sites.

Q20 How do you think this should work in practice? How do you think that the terms “neglected” and “abandoned” should be defined?

Common sense, but disinterested (unbiased) valuation on derelict or abandoned sites/buildings should be undertaken at the owner’s expense, the property then advertised for auction at the valuation and any unrecovered expenses incurred recovered from the buyer’s payment, the remainder paid to the original owner. Barren unsightly sites would certainly diminish in number. Abandoned or derelict – apply Q19 criteria.

Q21 Do you think that the criteria to be met by a community body in section 38(1) of the Act are appropriate?

Do you think that there should be additional criteria? Please set out what changes or additions should be made to the criteria.
However, it is unlikely that there will be a need as stated in the 2003 Land Reform (Scotland) Act 38 (1) (c) to acquire the ownership of contiguous land to allow access to fishing as this is covered under the same act in Part 1, Chapter 1 allowing access to your ‘property’ in pursuit of a sport such as fishing. The DDA may also apply allowing vehicular access to disabled fishermen to access and exercise rights in a fishing lease.
Q22 Do you think that the information that is included in the Register of Community Interests in Land is appropriate? Yes ☐

If not, what should that information include?

Q23 How could the application form to register a community interest in land be altered to make it easier to complete (eg, should there be a word limit on the answers to particular questions)?

No other suggestions

Should the questions be more specifically directed to the requirements of sections 36(2) and 38(1) of the Act? No ☐

Do you have any other suggestions?

None

Q24 Do you agree that communities should be able to apply to register an interest in land in cases where land unexpectedly comes on the market and they have not considered using the community right to buy? Yes ☐
If so, what changes should be made to section 39 to ensure that such communities can apply to register a community interest in land?

See Q 17

Q25 Do you agree that the process to re-register a community interest should be a re-confirmation of a community interest in land?
Yes □

Q26 Do you think that the community body should be asked to show that its application is (1) still relevant, (2) has the support of its “community”, and that (3) granting it is in the public interest?
Yes □

Q27 What do you think should be the length of the statutory period for completing the right to buy, taking into account both the interests of the landowner and the community body? Please explain the reasons for your proposal.

The existing statutory periods seem reasonable but if both parties, landowner and community body have said after consultation that it should be longer, we would agree. Communities may need more time to secure financing and that should be made possible also.

Q28 Do you think that some of the tasks within the right to buy (such as valuation, ballot etc) should be rearranged and the timescales for their completion changed in order to make the best use of the time available within the right to buy? Please set out what changes you think should be made and why.

6 months should be the guideline, but extension of the time limit should be possible where it is outwith either a community’s or landowner’s power to complete proceedings within the time limit.
Q29  Do you agree that Scottish Ministers should organise the undertaking of a community body’s ballot and pay its costs?

Yes ☐

If you disagree, please provide your reasons.

That would be desirable because most community bodies have very little money. Provided that outside scrutiny of the process is built in, any ballot could be undertaken locally more cheaply using volunteers than hiring commercial enterprises to do it.

Q30  Should Scottish Ministers notify the ballot result to the landowner?

Yes ☐

Please explain your reasons.

He has a right to know local feeling, but it should contain only the barest of detail.

Q31  Do you think Ministers should develop a pro-forma for community bodies to set out their plans for the sustainable development of land and community?

Yes ☐

Please give reasons for your view.

That would be helpful as many local community bodies do not inherently have that expertise to do so themselves and it would shorten the time factor. We agree paras 92, 93 & 94.
Q32  Do you agree that community bodies should be able to define their “community” in a more flexible way by the use of either postcodes, settlement areas, localities of settlements, and electoral wards, or a mixture of these, as appropriate?

Yes and other criteria at the minister’s discretion.

Q33  Are there any other ways that a “community” could be defined?

Probably! eg particular varieties of wildlife preservation associations.

LAs could hold lists of eligible CBs using criteria defined under the proposed act but the Minister should retain the power to allow some flexibility in definition.

Q34  Do you agree that other legal entities in addition to the company limited by guarantee should be able to apply to use the community right to buy provisions?

Yes  No

Q35  Do you agree that SCIOs should be able to apply under the provisions?

Simply being a charity is not enough in itself.

Q36  What other legal entities should be able to apply under the community right to buy provisions – and why?

Other organisations can be considered on their merits but only if they can demonstrate sustainability, viability, transparency and manifest community benefit. Some charities are not subject to rigorous enough scrutiny. (See 33)
Q37  Do you agree that Ministers should only have to “approve” the changes to Articles of Association for community bodies that are actively seeking to use or are using the community right to buy?

Yes ☐

Q38  Do you think that the length of a registered interest in land should remain as five years or be changed? If it should be changed, how long should it be – and what are your reasons for making that change?

5 Years is not long enough; an increase to 10 years would be better, thus lessening the paperwork but without reducing the strength of the regulations.

Q39  Do you agree that the valuation procedure should include counter representations by the landowner and community body?

No ☐

If you disagree, please give your reasons for your decision.

It is too easy to persuade valuers to err on the side if the paymaster. A disinterested valuer is mandatory but agreed in advance and agreed by both parties to be binding. Having competing valuations is simply going to prolong the process.

Q40  Do you think that there should be a provision to deter landowners from taking the land off the market after they have triggered the right to buy?

Yes ☐

Please explain your reasons.

If embarked upon, it should be carried through otherwise communities are going to expend time and money and lose confidence in the capacity of the Act significantly to achieve its stated aims.
Q41 Do you think that there should be greater flexibility in a community body’s level of support for a right to buy in the ballot result than is currently permitted?
Yes □

Q42 Do you think that the ballot result should focus on a sufficient amount of support to justify the community support to proceed with the right to buy the land?
Yes □

If yes, please explain how secured community support should be measured

Local ballot, overseen by LA electoral officers.

Q43 Do you agree that community bodies should be able to submit evidence to Ministers in support of their ballot result where they believe that their ballot has been affected by circumstances outwith their control?
Yes □

Q44 Do you think that Scottish Ministers should be able to ask community bodies for additional information relating to their right to buy “application” which Ministers would then take into account in considering their right to buy “application”?
Yes □

Please explain your reasons.

In a CRTB submission, communities may have left out important details which would amplify their intentions and means to succeed. It is fair enough to find out significant further information. Also, if the voting turnout was low, an opportunity to expand the application could be helpful.

Q45 Do you think that Ministers should be able to accept an application to register a community interest in land which is subject to an option agreement (on part or all of the land)?
Yes □
Q46 If there is an option agreement in place, do you think that the landowner should be able to transfer the land as an exempt transfer while there is a registered interest over that land?

No ☐

Please explain your answer.

While the system should be flexible, no option should exist for landowners to manipulate the system to their unfair advantage. If the observance of the option makes the CRTB unviable, the whole point of a CRTB is compromised. If permissible, landowners would simply put options in place over their land to make CRTB unattractive.

Q47 Do you think that the prohibition on the landowner from taking steps to market or transfer the land to another party should apply from the day after the day on which Ministers issue the prohibition letter rather than the day when the owner/heritable creditor receives the notice?

Yes, but see below ☐

Please explain your answer.

Again it diminishes the landowner’s ability to manipulate the system to his/her unfair advantage. Why not make it from the day and hour on which the decision is taken? That would preclude fiddling.

Q48 Do you agree that public holidays should be excluded from the statutory timescales to register a community interest in land and the right to buy?

Yes ☐

Q49 Do you agree that where a landowner makes an “exempt” transfer, this should be notified to Scottish Ministers?

Yes ☐

If you disagree, please provide reasons for your decision.
Q50  Do you agree that community bodies and landowners should notify Scottish Ministers of any changes to their contact details (including any registered office)?

Yes  [ ]

Q51  Do you think that Ministers should monitor the impact of the community right to buy?

Yes  [ ]

How do you think that monitoring should be undertaken and what information should Ministers seek?

A yearly assessment of viability in years 1 – 3. This would give an insight into the success or otherwise of the Act and permit adjustments as necessary.

Should the monitoring process be a statutory requirement, including provisions for reporting?

Yes  [ ]
Questions 52 to 60 are being submitted by a member of the Royal Burgh of Selkirk & District Community Council in a separate submission. He is also a director of the Selkirk Regeneration Company (SRC) and the answers he has given apply equally to the SRC.

4.2 Strengthening Community Planning

Q52 What are your views on our proposals for requiring a CPP to be established in each local authority area, and for amending the core statutory underpinning for community planning to place stronger emphasis on delivering better outcomes?

See Selkirk CC answers

Q53 What are your views on the core duties for CPPs set out above, and in particular the proposal that CPPs must develop and ensure delivery of a shared plan for outcomes (i.e., something similar to a Single Outcome Agreement) in the CPP area?
Q54  Do the proposed duties of the CPP support effective community engagement and the involvement of the third and business sectors?

☐ Yes  ☐ No

What other changes may be required to make this more effective?

Q55  How can we ensure that all relevant partners play a full role in community planning and the delivery of improved outcomes in each CPP area? Do the proposed core duties achieve that?

☐ Yes  ☐ No

What else might be required?

Q56  What are the respective roles of local elected politicians, non-executive board members and officers in community planning and should this be clarified through the legislation?
Q57 Should the duty on individual bodies apply to a defined list of public bodies – if so, which ones? Or should we seek to take a more expansive approach which covers the public sector more generally?

Q58 Local authorities are currently responsible for initiating, facilitating and maintaining community planning. How might the legislation best capture the community leadership role of Councils without the CPP being perceived as an extension of the local authority?

Q59 How can the external scrutiny regime and the roles of organisations such as the Accounts Commission and Auditor General support the proposed changes? Does this require changes to their powers or functions?

Q60 What other legislative changes are needed to strengthen community planning?
4.3 Allotments

Q61 Do you agree with the proposed definition of an allotment site and allotment plot? [Yes] How else would you suggest they be defined?

Q62 In order to include all existing allotments in the new legislation they must fit within the size range. What is the minimum and maximum size of one allotment plot in your area/site?

Don’t know. The allotments in Selkirk were sold off for housing. 10 poles is a good number Q63 Do you agree with the proposed duty to provide allotments? [Yes] Are there any changes you would make?

Local (non-council) initiative has produced a small number of allotments. There is a waiting list and more allotments are needed. If it is necessary to provide allotments to a set scale, compulsory purchase should be considered.
Do you agree with the level of the trigger point, ie that a local authority must make provision for allotments once the waiting list reaches 15 people?

No ☐

It should be much less.
Q64 Do you prefer the target Option A, B or C and why? Are there any other target options you wish to be considered here? Do you agree with the level of the targets?

Allotments should be encouraged by every means. The future need will be for food production. Individuals/communities should be encouraged wherever possible.

Q65 Do you agree with the proposed list of local authority duties and powers? Yes ☐
Would you make any changes to the list?
No

Q66 Do you think the areas regarding termination of allotment tenancies listed should be set out in legislation or determined by the local authority at a local level?
Legislation Yes ☐
Determined by local authority

Q67 Are there any other areas you feel should apply to private allotments?
No
Q68  Do you agree that surplus produce may be sold?
Yes ☐
If you disagree, what are your reasons?

Q69  Do you agree with the proposed list of subjects to be governed by Regulations?
Yes ☐
Would you make any changes to the lists?
Add excessive noise generation to Table 4 list.
Written Submission on Draft Community Empowerment Bill
Dr Michael Pugh and Dr John Connolly, University of the West of Scotland

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

This Bill’s inspiration by principles of subsidiarity, community empowerment and improving outcomes, and its intention to make for harmonious practical links between these so that they become more of a lived reality for citizens throughout Scotland, is admirable. The need for more local devolution downwards and the ceding of controls by local councils to their communities and community groups was a key finding of the recent Enquiry into the Flexibility and Autonomy of Local Government. Nevertheless this Bill’s intentions to promote community empowerment and partnership between groups of citizens and public bodies serving communities might be more fully and effectively realised through the establishment of a more user-friendly and accessible set of procedures for specific forms of community empowerment and partnership (which could be part of a wider public communications strategy on the content of the Bill and its implications for individuals and community groups). For example, there could be clearer steps for community groups taking control of common good property - and in what circumstances - than is currently available within the present wording of the bill. An accessible appendix could provide a general overview of such processes for citizens and groups who relatively lack resources and politico-legal expertise, absence of which might otherwise present a barrier to non-professional groups and inadvertently favour more established interest groups.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

To the extent that public sector organisations’ raison d’etre is to serve citizens and communities, it might be argued that this question places public bodies’ corporate interests ahead of these. Still, there are risks that the enshrinement in statute of community empowerment in principle without clear practical and accessible procedures and processes for achieving this could prove unnecessarily bureaucratic and burdensome for public bodies, ironically drawing resources away from citizens and communities. In this context, it is important to be clear about procedures, criteria (particularly for refusing requests) and routes to appeal. Transparency about these issues should benefit citizens in their communities, alongside the public bodies that serve them, rather than hindering the latter in their work.

The Bill solidifies and legally enshrines the role of CPPs and the ‘outcomes agenda’ to local service provision which, in theory, should generate efficiencies as a result of the cross-fertilisation of functions and services (and this is in the spirit of the Christie report recommendations). The development of local improvement plans is a helpful step forward in this regard. However there are significant assumptions here in terms of the ability of local... authorities to take an outcomes-focused and partnership approach with a view to monitoring and evaluating their work to demonstrate impact. There are considerable capacity problems in local contexts in terms of how to take a outcomes-based approach to their programmes and how to evaluate against outcomes. This requires certain skills-sets which are not always available in local areas (e.g. specialisms in research methodologies, evaluation design, facilitation, and evaluation practice). This means that although outcomes-based approaches to community planning have major benefits - in that partners can understand and communicate their contribution to CPP outcomes - there is a risk that this process will be conducted ineffectively (due to deficits in skills and knowledge) and, in short, this could be to the detriment of local improvement plans (with the plan being something which will be expected by local areas as a result of the Bill).

In line with the above observations, for this Bill to achieve its desired aims, it is important to ensure that the procedures and processes deriving from it are accessible and user-friendly for all community groups, rather than inadvertently privileging established organisations with inbuilt resource and expertise advantages. It is therefore important that the Bill, assuming it is passed, be accompanied by plain language guidelines for community groups who might wish to take advantage of its provisions. Likewise, there needs to be serious attention given to publicising these in order that all citizens and groups, not just established interest groups, are aware of the opportunities it offers.

In relation to Part 1, consideration could be given to strengthening ministers’ and / or local authorities and public bodies to develop national outcomes in genuine partnership with local community representatives, such as through participatory budget-setting, consulting citizens’ juries on policy priorities or holding online referendums in relation to these matters. In relation to Parts 3, 4, 5 and 6, it would be very helpful if consideration could be given to providing a more accessible summary and / or step-by-step guide for community groups wishing to take advantage of these sections. This could form an appendix to the bill itself, but also form the basis of guidance notes for all interested parties, which needs to be widely publicised in the event of an Act being passed.

In light of the response provided to question 2 above there could be clarity within the provisions of the Bill (or on supporting information/guidance) in terms of the nature and availability of national/central support by government and agencies when it comes to helping to enable CPPs to undertake outcomes planning and evaluation activity. Are there resources in the Scottish public sector that will be made available to CPPs? Examples include the expertise of NHS Health Scotland, Analytical Services Division of Scottish Government when it comes to monitoring and evaluation. There are also questions about the role of the government’s Improvement Service? In short, there are key gaps in the Bill in terms of the nature, availability and provision of national level support.

Whilst we have no specific response to these points, we would suggest that our thoughts under points 1, 3 and 4 relate to equal rights promotion, and would help to ensure that the Bill results in a real and vibrant framework for community activities throughout Scotland.
I write as the chairperson of LoveMilton, a Scottish Charity and Company Ltd by Guarantee, operating according to the principles of a Development Trust according to the Development Trusts Association Scotland, for the Milton housing scheme in the north of Glasgow. Milton sits within the bottom 5% of parishes on the SIMD, with its poorest 3 datazones ranked 16, 18, & 50 on the 2012 SIMD.

We were founded by local people wanting to improve our community in 2009, and have received financial support from the Climate Challenge Fund. We have grown from nothing, to 283 members, from a catchment population of 6659 according to the 2012 census, just over 4% of the population. We aim to increase our membership so that all of the population of Milton become members of LoveMilton.

We think we are just the kind of community organisation that the Community Empowerment Bill is designed to assist.

Since our creation we have sought to create our own community self-build community centre, from reclaimed and natural materials, owned and run by the community, for the benefit of the community. We have identified a piece of derelict and vacant land, which used to have tenement housing on it about 15 years ago. Within Milton there are many areas of derelict and vacant land which are now within the remit of Glasgow City Council’s arms length company City Property.

City Property are willing to sell LoveMilton the land to build our community centre, at the full market value for a residential development of £350,000, on the basis that the site had housing on it and is zoned for housing. If we choose to ‘underutilise’ the space, that is our problem.

So while I am interested in the right to buy being extended to local communities, I wonder if there will be any provision to low cost or no cost right, when the land is already in theory in community ownership via a council or its agent, but who are intending to maximise financial return as they are duty bound to do?
I am responding to the request for evidence on the Bill on behalf of Maybole Community Council.

Firstly we would like to say that the concept is very good and will provide a standard for all to follow and to allow for the appropriate levels of accountability and transparency.

We would however point out some concerns we as a Community Council have, with specific regard to the “Easy Read” document.

1) On Page 2 it states that “Local councils also understand the needs of their communities”. This is highly debateable as there is a distinct lack of consultation and an even greater lack of communication between the local council and ourselves. We have had occasion to write to the Chief Executive pointing out these deficiencies and advising our intention to lodge complaints with the Local Authority Ombudsman, as we are not alone in situation. Such circumstances make it extremely difficult to function as prescribed in the Community Council Handbook and represent our Community.

2) Page 5 states “….. But some places in Scotland have done well and some places have not done so well. We want to find out what has worked well and make it happen for all parts of Scotland”. We agree that ‘best practice’ is imperative, but surely this should be established prior to establishing of a Bill. It is accepted that changes can still be made to the Bill, but will all the ‘best practice’ be established prior to the Bill being finalised? Unless this is done, the existence of “some places have not done so well” will not be eradicated. Maybole does not want to be seen as being unprofessional despite all CC members being volunteers. The basic question is “How do you stop things ‘not working’”?

There is also a need for all parties to fully understand the nuances of the Bill to ensure that all parties interpret it in a uniform manner – removing the instances of individual interpretation. It is assumed that there will be a need for training – the Bill cannot be managed without it.

As highlighted in Point 1, communication (both timely and pertinent) is imperative to the success of the Bill and this has to be instilled to all parties as failure will lead to the Bill falling into disrepute.

I trust this feedback is appropriate and relevant.

Regards

Michael Connell

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill
RESPONSE TO CALL FOR EVIDENCE BY LOCAL GOVERNMENT & REGENERATION COMMITTEE

A LOST OPPORTUNITY

Personal Introduction
I am active in the community of Linlithgow, being the chairman of Burgh Beautiful Linlithgow, one of the town’s leading environmental groups. I have been involved with Linlithgow Civic Trust for over twenty years, am a member of the town’s community council and am a director of a trust aiming to redevelop the site of a prominent derelict building for a community-owned performance venue. In my professional life, until my recent early retirement, I had nearly thirty years’ experience of planning and regeneration experience with Glasgow City Council. I have a particular interest in Scottish local history, including the past organisation of local government.

General View on Community Empowerment
In my submission to the Scottish Government’s initial consultation on community empowerment, I expressed the view that community councils were ineffective, that ‘community planning’ (in itself a misnomer) was a top-down bureaucratic process and that true empowerment of local communities could only come through devolution of power to localities through re-establishment of bodies akin to the old town and district councils which were abolished in 1975.

Since 1975, Scotland has not had any proper form of ‘local’ government; there has been a mistaken belief that larger authorities are somehow more ‘efficient’ in the use of resources when in fact money is squandered on unnecessary activities and staff, unseen by the local populace. Matters were made worse in 1996 when the present, fairly irrational, distribution of unitary councils were created. It is often quoted that the average population served by a ‘local’ authority in Scotland is 163,000, around 30 times that of the European average (5,620). The Community Empowerment Bill could have been regarded as a golden opportunity to restore local democracy and accountability to Scotland and it is very disappointing that no steps have been taken towards remedying the lack of community empowerment in this country. Of course it is not surprising that leading councillors and officials in the unitary authorities wish to maintain their power and prestige and thus will not have made representations supporting devolution of their power to a more 'local' form of government.

Two examples from my own experience of how devolved local power could become manifest for the benefit of local people are social housing and the operation of local parks and gardens. Here in Linlithgow, not a single mainstream house for social renting has been built since the Town Council was abolished in 1975. This for a population now over 13,000 and during a time when most properties have been sold and several have been demolished to make way for private flats! It is hard to imagine that a local authority with a direct and focussed interest in the town would have allowed such a lack of provision over such a long period.

With regard to parks and floral displays, I have personal knowledge through the Britain in Bloom competition that most entries competing against Linlithgow have been submitted by town or parish councils south of the border. These communities are able to coordinate grass-roots action without the need to worry about the level of support from a more remote 'local' authority. These councils raise their funding from a supplement to the Council tax charged by the larger authorities; equally, if local town or burgh councils were re-established in Scotland, they could collect the Council tax and pass on the relevant share to the larger authorities as was the practice in Scotland before 1975.

With regard to the Community Empowerment Bill, I must confess that I am somewhat bemused by the constant repetition of the word 'outcomes', a meaningless term without any reference to standards or quality. Are we looking for the best standards or fulfilment of objectives, or will any result suffice?

The Committee’s Five Questions

My response to questions 1, 3 and 4 is as follows.

1. I do not believe that the Bill, as proposed, will ‘empower’ communities except in regard to their assuming ownership of property assets. It has to be said that disposal of property is not really ‘empowerment’, it is transfer of responsibility, generally to volunteers who are not renumerated for such responsibility and cannot afford to pay staff.

3. The capacity of communities, or rather local volunteers, to take on responsibilities varies from place to place. ‘Middle-class’ towns and villages, or parts of cities, can provide a greater range of professional skills than more disadvantaged communities. This disparity can be addressed by the proposals below.

4. I would like to see the bill making provision for, or at least paving the way towards, the proposals set out below.

My Proposals for Community Empowerment

All communities in Scotland over a certain population size should have the right to apply to the Scottish Government for devolved local government in the form of burgh councils, whether urban or rural. Any such application would require to be accompanied by a petition signed by at least, say, 10% of the local electorate. It is suggested that the minimum qualifying population might be 5,000 (close to the European average), perhaps less for islands and remoter rural areas.

The general spatial pattern of these towns or areas would have to form a logical subdivision of the current ‘local’ authority areas, laid down at the initial stages, although there would have to be provision for appropriate boundary amendments, sub-divisions or amalgamations. The ‘new burghs’ might be termed ‘royal burghs’ where historical precedent existed. Any relevant community councils within the new burghal areas would be entirely superseded by the new, empowered, truly ‘local’ authorities.

The devolved responsibilities could include parks, cleansing, maintenance/lighting of minor roads and car parking, tourism, housing (akin to the idea of community-based housing associations) and determination of building warrants, minor planning applications, etc. The finance would come from a relevant share of Council tax, collection options for which have already been mentioned. In order to attract a better cross-section of the communities to stand for election, the new burgh councils would be strictly non-political.

The new system might be accompanied by the revision of the existing unitary authority boundaries in certain areas – for example extending Glasgow’s boundaries to take in truly suburban areas might be more palatable if accompanied by opportunities for burgh councils to be established in places like Bearsden, Giffnock, Clarkston and Newton Mearns.

Overall, the devolution of certain powers to local burgh councils would give true local empowerment, increase local accountability and foster the sort of civic pride that is much lacking in many towns and villages. At the same time, the more strategic services would continue to be provided by the current (or perhaps slightly amended) unitary councils.
A response to the Scottish Parliament's Local Government and Regeneration Committee's call for evidence as part of its Stage 1 consideration of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

1.0 Introduction

The Care Inspectorate is the official body responsible for inspecting standards of care in Scotland. That means we regulate and inspect care services to make sure they meet the right standards. We also carry out joint inspections with other regulators to check how well different organisations in local areas are working to support both adults and children. We help ensure social work, including criminal justice social work, meets high standards.

We welcome the opportunity to provide evidence about the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. We have particular interest in Parts 1, 2 and 3 of the Bill, as introduced, and this response is centred about these parts.

We welcome the Bill and believes it affords the opportunity for public services to be designed and delivered in ways which have a positive impact on people. We believe that the subsidiarity inherent in the Bill is welcome because it offers the opportunity for services to be designed in ways which can reflect local circumstances, strengths and opportunities.

2.0 The Care Inspectorate’s locus in the Bill

Our interest in the national outcomes, community planning and participation in decision-making derives from both our statutory responsibility and our corporate plan. The Public Services Reform (Scotland) Act 2010 places the general duty on the Care Inspectorate “of furthering improvement in the quality of social services”. This includes both care services and social work services. This duty is undertaken by providing scrutiny of such services in order to protect and enhance the safety and wellbeing of people using them, ensuring that people using such services have their personal independence promoted, that diversity of provision affords choice, and that good practice is promoted.

In 2012/13 we began a programme of joint inspections of services for children and young people in each part of Scotland. These models of joint inspection provide a joined-up scrutiny approach that can evidence how well services work together across CPPs in delivering positive outcomes for people in local communities.
These inspections are carried out in conjunction with Education Scotland, Her Majesty’s Inspectorate of Constabulary, and Healthcare Improvement Scotland. They seek to examine, in each community planning partnership area, whether and how services are working together to improve both the delivery of public services. In 2013/14 we began a similar programme of joint inspections for adults, initially focusing on health and social care services for older people, working with Healthcare Improvement Scotland. Both joint inspections have established suites of quality indicators which allow community planning partnerships to understand what quality looks like.

Our joint inspections of services for children and young people are already providing an evidence base of how CPPs are currently working, including identifying areas of concern and areas where improvements are required. The joint inspections of health and social care for older people with HIS will allow us to consider and report on the effectiveness of local partnership working and the outcomes it generates for people.

We believe that the Bill has scope to empower communities by placing community planning partnerships on a statutory footing. We believe this will more clearly establish how joint and shared decision-making occurs in local areas and facilitate wider community and voluntary involvement in the planning of public services.

Our joint inspections of services for children and young people show that members of the public, private, voluntary and community sectors are already working well together in some areas and have a shared commitment to improving outcomes for children and young people. However, in some CPP areas we have found that integrated children’s services plans are not always up-to-date and as a result there can be limited joint financial planning and joint commissioning of services. As a result, this can impact on opportunities for engagement with children and their families.

We believe that a statutory footing will place a stronger emphasis on delivering better outcomes for people who use public services. It will complement the focus on outcomes established by the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014 and the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Act 2014.

The proposal to allow participation requests, as set out in Section 17, has the scope to empower local communities. The Care Inspectorate actively seeks to involve people affected by our decisions and work in planning and designing our scrutiny, and we expect both care services and the public authorities we inspect to do the same. This improves the quality of services being provided and helps ensure they are fit for purpose. We welcome the requirement in Section 19(3)c that consideration of such requests will be considered, inter alia, against the likely effect on public health and social wellbeing.
We welcome a wide understanding of what communities might be regarded for the purpose of the Bill: during previous consultation, we advised that a simplistic understanding based solely on geographic or administrative units may not be sufficient. Different localities will define communities in different ways. They should be focused on the needs of the local population and organised in a logical way that is credible with the local population. We need to be clear whether, in the context of health and social care, localities are designed around – for example – GP practices or clusters or schools, or in another way. We believe this is a critical issue and that some shared understanding across the public sector would aid efficiency and public understanding, but we understand this may be more helpfully developed in guidance than on the face of the Bill, Section 14 notwithstanding.

4.0 What will the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations be as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

First, a set of statutory national outcomes can help bring clearer focus to the mission, vision and values of public bodies in the discharge of their duties. Effectively drawn, they may be regarded less as governmental objectives, and more as Scotland-wide objectives in which many parties, not just the public sector, have a role in achieving.

Clearly, future national outcomes may change, but the current non-statutory outcomes provide effective high-level strategic guidance to public bodies at present. For example, the Care Inspectorate itself sets out, in our Corporate Plan 2014-18, how our strategic objectives align with both the Scottish Government’s strategic objectives and the national outcomes.

Second, we believe placing these national outcomes on a statutory footing may, to some degree, strengthen opportunities for Scotland-wide public sector organisations to work together more closely in the discharge of statutory duties.

Third, we welcome the proposals around the local outcomes improvement plan. Our joint inspection activities have found that the Single Outcome Agreement currently plays an important role in setting out how CPPs work towards improving outcomes for people in Scotland in a way that reflects local circumstances and priorities. We believe the proposal for CCPs to consult on and publish local outcomes plans is therefore welcome. These must articulate a shared vision for achieving better outcomes for people, and we would welcome further clarification on how these will link with our own framework of quality indicators used for joint inspections of CPP services. We support the proposal for a local outcomes improvement plan progress review, and would welcome further proposals of how this can be aligned to the existing scrutiny landscape to ensure it is robust, verifiable, and takes account of emerging effective practice from other parts of the country, and, where appropriate, internationally.

We welcome the proposed duty for CPPs include consulting and engaging with communities and the third and business sectors on the local outcomes improvement plan should be developed and delivered. Our inspections of services for children and young people have found that third sector organisations often play a key role in providing support services to children, young people and families at risk.

It will be important that key stakeholders continue to be involved in assessing if the outcomes are being delivered effectively. CPPs must also consider a variety of engagement methods to ensure that seldom-heard parts of the community (for example, those who experienced homelessness, domestic abuse, drug and alcohol addictions, criminal justice services) are involved in identifying outcomes and helping decide how these are delivered.

In order to achieve equality of impact and participation, statutory and other public sector agencies should address directly the importance of building the capacity of community organisations where required, and developing the capacity of communities to become organised.

Public services should ensure that their overall dealings with communities are carried out in ways that build their capacity and thus empower them.

We would be further interested to know how such duties fit with other public involvement and participation arrangements.

We have sought further clarification about how the proposed national outcomes will link with the national health and wellbeing outcomes set out in the Public Bodies (Joint Working) Act 2014, and also about how these outcomes will be scrutinised. We will need to work closely with other scrutiny bodies to consider how these outcomes complement our quality indicators framework for joint inspections. It is important that the outcome measures align to other national policies such as GIRFEC, the National Dementia Strategy and the Healthcare Quality Strategy for NHS Scotland, although we understanding why such detail may not appear on the face of the Bill.

During previous consultation phases, we stressed the need to take account of the move towards integration of health and social care. We therefore welcome the extension of the key CCP partners to include integration joint boards and would welcome assurance that the governance arrangements for CPPs set out in Section 8 are sufficiently flexible to support the involvement of integrated health and social care arrangements. Ensuring the involvement of the joint integration board in the CPP will help mitigate the risk of it being perceived as an extension of either the local authority or the health board. Establishing the role of the CPP, or the local outcomes plan, in contributing to strategic commissioning plans will be important as the Care Inspectorate and Healthcare Improvement Scotland develop an inspection methodology due for 2015.

As part of our joint inspections of services for children and young people, we have identified the need for CPPs to better prioritise early intervention and prevention via targeted services for children, young people and their families identified as at most risk. We believe that the core duties for CPPs should include a specific duty to ensure that early intervention and prevention is set out as a shared priority and clarity is provided to show how outcomes are linked to these.

We welcome the fact that it is reported that the EQIA concludes that the Bill’s provisions are neither directly or indirectly discriminatory on the basis of age, disability, race, religion or belief, sex, sexual orientation or gender reassignment. It is important that, in engaging with and supporting the empowerment of communities, public bodies are mindful of the public sector equality duty.

The provision of public services on island communities can have particular characteristics and we expect these to be reflected carefully as guidance associated with the Bill is developed, and as the powers it affords to Scottish Ministers are used.

8.0 Other remarks

The Care Inspectorate plays a key role in improving the quality of care across CPPs, working closely with other partner bodies such as Healthcare Improvement Scotland (HIS), Education Scotland, Audit Scotland, and Her Majesty’s Inspectorate of Constabulary Scotland (HMICS) to co-ordinate our scrutiny activities.

Our corporate plan sets out our continued commitment to focus our scrutiny activities on holding CPPs accountable for the delivery of positive outcomes for people in local communities. Through our improvement function, we will carry on supporting and providing constructive challenge to CPPs to develop capacity in building strong, resilient communities. We would welcome extending the scope of shared risk assessments amongst community planning partners.
We have also enhanced the role and function of our link inspectors to provide regular public reports on the quality of care across CPPs. We expect them to play a key role in helping scrutinise how the proposed changes are being implemented.

COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL

Background

1. Nourish Scotland is a not-for-profit organisation campaigning for a fairer food system in Scotland. Nourish facilitates this change through engaging with organisations, community initiatives, politicians and officials. We work to influence policies from local to EU level and provide a platform for networking and sharing best practice. We make sure that food is brought to the fore in public debates of various kinds, making the link between a localised food system and its positive outcomes for economic development, community cohesion, job creation, skills development, public health, environmental stewardship and justice.

2. Nourish is pleased to be able to comment on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. The Bill is wide-ranging in its scope and Nourish only comments here on the sections in which we feel we have interest or expertise.

National Outcomes, Community Planning and Participation Requests

National Outcomes

3. Nourish is generally supportive of the Bill and notes that the Bill has already undergone extensive consultation with stakeholder groups. Nourish endorses the principles of subsidiarity, community empowerment and improving outcomes which underpin the Bill.

4. Nourish generally supports embedding the process for determining Scotland’s national outcomes in legislation, along with the requirements to review and report on these outcomes. However, delivering on these outcomes, and promoting a vibrant and joined up public, private and third sector will require more effective community planning and community involvement mechanisms to be developed and resources to be invested in ensuring community participation in decision-making.

Community Planning

5. Nourish welcomes the introduction of the new community planning provisions in the Bill. Current practice is patchy and uneven across the country and these new provisions should bring some consistency. We welcome the wider range of bodies that will contribute to the process and believe it is important that the CPP is not just seen as an extension of the local authority. While the local authority will always play a lead role, the CPP should be a wider platform. We are also pleased to see the provisions resources to be aligned with agreed CPP priorities, along with new reporting mechanisms which require partners to set out how they contributed to the CPP outcomes. This should ensure that more than just lip service is paid to joint priorities.

6. We also support the new provisions requiring the CPP to make all reasonable efforts to secure the participation of community bodies in the process and to take reasonable steps to enable bodies to participate. It should be recognised that some community bodies, and some areas where community participation has not been strong, will require capacity building efforts for this legislation to be successful and for genuine partnerships, not based on top-down models, to be developed. We recommend that the Accounts Commission and Auditor General be specifically asked to look at the level of community engagement, and the steps taken to ensure this engagement, as part of the audit process for CPP bodies.

7. It goes without saying that we would also support the production of guidance supporting the CPP process that gives proper consideration to crosscutting areas such as food. Food can cross multiple work-streams, from planning (land use and retail provision) to health (food poverty and diet-related ill-health issues) to environment (waste, biodiversity loss, energy use and emissions) and economy (business creation). It is important that the CPP process is used to adequately address these issues in a joined up way.

Participation Requests

8. Nourish generally supports the provisions regarding participation requests. However, we note that, unlike the CPP process, there is no requirement on the public authority to take reasonable steps to facilitate the involvement of community bodies or to assist community bodies to fully participate. This may undermine the effectiveness of this provision if communities are not supported during this process.

Community Right to Buy, Asset Transfers and the Common Good

Community Right to Buy

9. Nourish generally welcomes the extension of the right to buy to urban areas, along with the suggested improvements to the definition of community, the extension of the types of legal entities that can use the provisions and the provision for third-parties to carry out ballot procedures. Nourish also recommends that consideration be given to extending the power to purchase land to co-operatives as well as to SCIOs.

10. While not disagreeing with the symbolic target of having a million acres in public ownership, we believe it is important not to be sidetracked into pursuing high-acreage targets for the sake of the numbers. Sometimes small urban sites may be of importance to a high number of people and have a considerable impact on the surrounding community, even though they may not contribute much to the acreage target. There is also a need to ensure that funding is available, both for communities seeking to buy land and for advisory bodies to support this process. We would welcome confirmation that such funding will be secured and that resources will be put into supporting communities engaged in land acquisition, either through the expansion of existing services or the creation of new bodies.

11. Nourish also agrees with the creation of an absolute right to buy neglected or abandoned land, where it can be shown to be in the public interest. However, this is a significant power, and we question whether it is appropriate to leave the definition of abandoned or neglected land to subordinate legislation, as is currently proposed.
At the very least, a working definition ought to be available to the Committee during stage 2 deliberations in order for effective scrutiny to take place.

Asset Transfers

12. We are pleased to see the powers to transfer assets to the community and particularly welcome the fact that these powers will include the ability to transfer the use, management or occupation of land or buildings as well as just the ownership. For many communities, usage may be as important as ownership. However, we are concerned that these powers do not appear to apply to any hybrid or reserved bodies, such as the Crown Estate, the Forestry Commission, Ministry of Defence or Network Rail, all of whom are significant land-owners. We urge the Committee to seek clarification on the position of these bodies and the progress of any negotiations between the Scottish Government and the UK Government in relation to the landholdings of these bodies in Scotland.

Common Good

13. While understanding the difficulties in defining common good land, we remain concerned that many local authorities cannot or have not identified the extent of their common good holdings. We support the creation of the proposed register and the requirement to consult before disposing of or changing the use of such assets.

Allotments and Food Growing

14. Nourish welcomes the decision to completely re-write rather than simply amend the existing allotments legislation. This is clearly the best solution in terms of readability and simplicity. We are happy with the content of the revised allotment provisions, as we believe they reflect the results of previous consultation exercises. However, the decision to simply “add-on” elements about community growing into this Part of the Bill has resulted in an uneasy and inconsistent mix of allotments and community growing provisions. Community gardens and allotments are not the same thing and have very different rights and responsibilities attached to them in law. Sufficient land needs to be available to meet the needs of both forms of growing and there must be an appropriate mix of the two to meet respective local demand. Nourish believes that these provisions should be restructured to give due attention to each element of the food growing picture.

15. At the moment this Part of the Bill is a strange mix of detail, timescales and reporting requirements. For example, the local authority is under an obligation to maintain waiting lists for allotments and to provide allotments. They must also issue a yearly report on allotments, waiting lists and the measures they have taken to provide allotments. However, the local authority is also under an obligation to prepare a food growing strategy within two years of the Bill coming into force. The strategy should also identify areas that might be used to provide allotment sites or other areas of land that may be used for community growing. This must be reviewed every 5 years but there is no requirement to report on it.

16. It seems perverse that a local authority has to report every year on allotments, which are just one part of an overall strategy for growing, but have no requirement to report on community growing provision. Surely it would be more sensible to require a local authority to report annually on its overall provision for growing in the area, both in relation to the provision of allotments (both council and privately owned) and in relation to community growing? The current provisions seem to risk community growing being lost amongst the (necessary) specifics as they relate to the re-written allotment provisions.
17. Nourish is very much in favour of local authorities being scrutinised on the steps they are taking to meet the increasing demand for land to grow on. We support the introduction of a requirement for local authorities to produce a food growing strategy as this may provide a useful impetus for councils to consider food production issues and increase the likelihood of better provision of growing facilities.

18. However, planning policy must also begin to consider the requirements of food production and distribution and unless this is changed the proposal for developing local authority led food-growing strategies may not have much of an impact. The food–growing strategy must be dovetailed with the land-use, planning and development framework if it is going to have any real effect. This will require changes to be made to the current framework, which only mentions food production in a tangential sense. We would also welcome a situation whereby new developments have to address the provision of land for growing and community use as part of the process for obtaining planning consent.

19. Given that other areas of the proposed legislation confer a power to buy neglected or abandoned land, we see no reason why the less controversial proposal of allowing “meanwhile” growing spaces on such land should not also be supported. We support any measures that will encourage both public bodies and private landlords to develop this “meanwhile” provision. This may require a tweaking of the planning regime to clarify that meanwhile growing activities do not require planning consent and/or that they will not impact on current planning consents which may be pursued at a later date.

Conclusion

20. Nourish welcomes the publication of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill and notes that the Bill has been preceded by an extensive consultation process. We support the broad thrust of the proposals in the Bill but believe that thought needs to be given to how these proposals will be developed and resourced in practice. We also believe that the Part of the Bill concerning allotments and food growing would benefit from restructuring and clarification of the respective roles and rights associated with community gardening and allotments.
Dear Sir/Madam
If you want to empower communities, give them power. In other words, give them the decision-making powers necessary for them to become self-governing. This bill is a joke and its title is a lie.
Yours faithfully,
Michael Gallagher
COMMENTS ON PROCEDURES PROPOSED UNDER NEW PART 3A OF THE LAND REFORM (SCOTLAND) ACT 2003 INTRODUCED BY SECTION 48 OF THE COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL

1. This note comments on a couple of specific aspects of the procedures introduced by Section 48 of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Act. These relate to mapping land and holding a community ballot, apparently based on procedures in Part 3 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 and its associated regulations. I have been closely involved as a Director of the Pairc Trust with applications made under Part 3 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003. Pairc Trust is the only crofting community body in Scotland which has used these procedures to the stage of applications being approved by Scottish Government, and our experience may therefore be of relevance when considering the proposal to insert a new Part (apparently based on the procedures in the existing Part 3) to enable purchase by community bodies of abandoned and neglected land introduced by Section 48 of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

2. I also understand that the Scottish Government now intends to use the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill to amend Part 3 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 in relation to the crofting community right to buy. My comments below are therefore also relevant to the reform and simplification of this latter piece of legislation.

3. In general, my experience indicates that these are (i) sometimes There is in my view a need wherever possible to simplify procedures so that genuine and strong applications cannot be thwarted by legal action on technical issues contrary to the wishes of Parliament when they passed the legislation.

4. I note that the Scottish Government, through other provisions introduced by Part 4 of the Bill, is proposing simplifications to Part 2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003. This is welcome, and I would suggest that the same approach should be taken in relation to the Part 3 procedures. This note is confined to ways of simplifying the requirements for mapping and the holding of a community ballot. I understand that others are commenting on ways of simplifying the definition of a community body, the legal status of the type of community body permitted, and that a Part 2 community body should be able to become recognised as a Part 3A community body.

5. requiring simplification under Part 3 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act should say that I completely 6. , there seems no logical or functional rationale for being required to provide the following details:

* a map and written description showing not only the boundary of the land or lease to be acquired, but also all sewers, pipes, lines, watercourses or other conduits, and fences, dykes, ditches, or other boundaries. This goes far beyond what is required in other land or lease transactions, and there seems no functional reason to require this information. It is particularly onerous when the area to be purchased extends to several thousand hectares. Yet similar detailed requirements are proposed in Section 48 of the Bill (Clause 97G (6)(d) and (f) for the new proposed Part 3A).

* further, if the same regulations as are applied to the existing Part 3 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 were to be applied to the new Part 3A, this would require a list of all postcodes and O.S.
Km. grid squares included in the land or lease area to be purchased (Question 4(c)). Again there seems no reason for this if the boundary is properly defined on a map. If the area concerned extends to several thousand hectares, the list simply opens up scope for a technical challenge if particular postcodes or grid squares are inadvertently omitted.

7. Finally, the regulations under Part 3 require crofting community body to supply a This runs the risk of a technical challenge if any of the information on the detailed list, however trivial, is inaccurate. The proposed new Clause 97J(3) and (4) to be included in a new Part 3A do not require a detailed list, but if similar regulations to those which apply under Part 3 were to be drawn up under the proposed new Part 3A then a similar risk would apply. In my view in the community a sa it contains any 8. A criterion of proportionality should be applied to all such provisions so that an application which meets the essential purposes of the Act is not at risk of refusal or legal challenge on minor technical details. For example, an error in one listing of one postcode or grid square should not invalidate an application if the boundary of the land or lease to be acquired is clear.

Hi,

I would like to add a further point to my submission. I have just been dealing with a dispute between Dumfries and Galloway Council and Langholm Community Council regarding their Common Good Fund. Basically, D & G Council have never compiled a moveable assets list since 1975 for Langholm despite there being dedicated oil paintings etc and are now claiming that as they don't have a list they don't need to keep one.

Added if possible, somewhere in the proposed Act;

"If a community through its representatives is able to demonstrate to the minister that a Local Authority has failed to comply with either the spirit or the letter of the Act with regard to Common Good Fund administration, the minister is empowered to apply financial sanctions to that LA until such time as it complies with the Act to his/her satisfaction"

Thanks,

Lindsay Neil

Dear colleagues

Local Government and Regeneration Committee call for evidence:
Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

The Carnegie United Kingdom (UK) Trust welcomes the opportunity to respond to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee call for evidence on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. The Trust works to improve the lives of people throughout the UK and Ireland, by changing minds through influencing policy, and by changing lives through innovative practice and partnership work.

We warmly welcome the introduction of the Bill and we have been pleased to participate in the Reference Group which has helped to support its development. We believe that the proposals set out in the Bill provide a unique opportunity to significantly alter how we organise our society in Scotland and deliver major improvements in our collective wellbeing. We have chosen only to respond to the questions where we have experience and relevant evidence. Further information on our work is available on our website www.carnegieuktrust.org.uk.

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

   The Bill and its legislative framework is an important step towards empowering communities, as it gives them the right to acquire assets and new opportunities to become involved in shaping and running local services. However, there are other steps which governments can take to support individuals and communities to achieve positive change and ensure that the most vulnerable are not left behind, such as working to an outcomes focussed approach and building capacity in disadvantaged communities.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

   Communities know best about their own situation, aspirations, preferences, interests, knowledge and capabilities, and giving them more opportunities to take part in the community budgeting and planning process will lead to improved local outcomes. Empowering individuals and communities with the opportunity to become involved in setting national and local outcomes will give them more flexibility and autonomy to improve their own lives.

requires to be done to the Bill, or to assist communities, to ensure that this happens?
There is a real risk that more affluent communities have the most to gain the most from these new opportunities and that other communities are left behind. It is crucial therefore that the Bill is accompanied by investment in disadvantaged communities, including financial support for the means to buy assets or participate in services, support for access to skills, knowledge, training and social capital and support for co-production at the national and local level. The development of a review programme would ensure that national outcomes are improved over time and that the package of support to disadvantaged communities remains relevant.

We would like to see the introduction of a national asset register used by all public sector bodies, which is publically available, accessible and can be modified over time. Community bodies may have an interest in a wide range of public sector assets and a publically available database of publically owned assets which details where the asset is; what it is currently used for; which public sector body owns it and who to speak to about it would be very helpful.

We hope that you find these comments helpful. If you would like to discuss our response, or would like to find out more about our work please contact my colleague Jenny Brotchie, Policy Officer at jenny@carnegieuk.org or by telephone 01383 721 445.
Submission of Written Evidence – Community Empowerment (Scotland)
Bill submitted by Friends of Midmar Inn Community Company

A) Summary of FOMICC Experience with CRTB

The historic Midmar Inn, aka The Cottage Bar and a one time Drovers Inn, had been a busy and successful meeting place for over 200 years, it has always played a central role in the community life of Midmar and the surrounding area. In 2004 it was sold and under the new ownership, rapidly declined because of poor management and lack of investment, in September 2007 it was closed.

In late 2007 a group of local residents were interested in buying the business and property from the owners and these approaches were rejected, therefore in January 2008 this group formed the Friends of Midmar Inn Community Company (FOMICC) (SC 337914) and commenced the process of applying for a Community Right to Buy (CRTB), this was originally awarded in 4th July 2008.

In parallel with the CRTB process the owners applied for Change of Use of the building (part public house and part private residence) to entirely residential and also sought planning permission for an extension to the property. This was planning application G/APP/2008/0932, the Garioch Area Committee refused the application. The owners then appealed the decision (ref P/PPA/110/810) and as per the judgement in July 2009, this was not successful, primarily because the owners had made no attempt to market the business before they had closed it down.

On various occasions since the closure of the Midmar Inn, FOMICC has attempted to negotiate its purchase however the general attitude of the owners has been that :-

1) By not offering the property for sale they can avoid engaging with the CRTB process
2) they have not allowed any independent valuations or surveys to be undertaken, choosing instead to initially set an indicative sale price equivalent to the property value had it already been converted to a private residence and then more recently at a level below that value but still much more than it is probably worth.

In undertaking this project, FOMICC intention is to procure the property at a fair value on behalf of the community and re-establish the business; we have not therefore been able to conclude any deal with the owner.

The CRTB award lasts five years, therefore in July 2013, with more than 75% support from our community (as indicated by validated ballot) FOMICC re-applied for the CRTB which was awarded again in August 2014.

As witnessed by one of the many communications we have had from the owners over the past six years, in a similar vein, following the Ministers decision the owners wrote:- “This screwed up decision by the Scottish Ministers to grant you lot another 5 years make no difference to me at all, the Midmar Inn will fall down before I sell it to the supposed Friends of the Midmar Inn.”

To summarise the Current Situation at August 2014:-

- Under CRTB, the FOMICC has the Right to Buy the Inn, but the Owners will not engage with this process
- FOMICC has the money to buy the property at a fair valuation as a Public House
- The planning system and associated appeal have both refused a Change of Use until the option to reopen as a Public House has been fully tested in the open market.
- FoM ICC has a business plan in place (that has been validated by experts) showing that with the right investment and under professional management the business will be a success.
- This historic building has been boarded for more than 5 years and continues to decay when it should be a source of economic activity and benefit to our community.

B) Response to Committee Questions

In this section we have summarised our views regarding questions highlighted by the Scottish Parliament press release “Putting the ‘power’ in community empowerment?” (link https://www.scottish.parliament.uk/newsandmediacentre/78922.aspx) announcing the Community Empowerment Bill consultation process on 26 June 2014.

Our experience is particular to the Community Right To Buy (CRTB) process which was originally defined by Part 2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 and may now modified refined by Part 4 of the proposed Community Empowerment Bill. We have therefore limited the scope of our evidence as to how this new Community Empowerment Bill effects the CRTB legislation.

B.1 To what extent does the bill empower communities?

a) General

It is FOM ICC opinion that the original act has been of enormous benefit to communities all around Scotland. Where existing landowners have demonstrated by their actions (or lack of), over a long period of time, that they have no interest in embracing the social and economic responsibility that comes with ownership of their land, it is right that a mechanism should exist that allows others to take action.

The CRTB process, as defined in the original act, sets out a fair mechanism by which communities, if they are so minded, can take over the operation of land (with associated buildings and businesses) and run it for the benefit of all, including the original owner if they are a local resident.

It is evident from many projects around Scotland that where there is a willing seller and an organised community body that the CRTB process has been a force for good over the last 10+ years. Even in cases where the seller is not willing the implementation of a CRTB has helped to facilitate the sale process, because:-
  - The community companies that are established are “not for profit” (any profits being returned to the community), this is a powerful incentive for everyone to want to contribute and thereby create social pressure on the owner to either improve or sell-up.
  - The mechanism establishes a framework that allows sufficient time for monies to be raised to procure at a value that has been established by an independent valuation
  - Other community improvement bodies and local government can engage because the community companies are a recognised legal entity

We would cite the case of the Crook Inn (Tweedsmuir near Peebles) as an example of all of the above, by virtue of establishing the Community Company this created pressure on the owner who initially set an unrealistic value.
The Crook Inn had been made a Listed Building in 2002 and consequently the local Council were able to approach the owner in regard to his responsibilities to maintain the building. As a result of this approach the owner sold the Crook Inn to the Community Company within 3 weeks.

Unfortunately the Midmar Inn is not a Listed Building, nor is it in a Conservation Area, which means that the Local Council is unable to enforce maintenance of the building.

b) Unwilling Owners (Seller)

As highlighted in the Policy Memorandum for the Community Empowerment Bill, clauses 57 and 65, the proposed Part 3A to be inserted into the original act to provide a framework for community bodies to purchase abandoned or neglected land without a willing seller, this, we hope, will solve the deadlock situation that our project has been in for six years.

The owners of the Midmar Inn (Aberdeenshire) have steadfastly refused to engage with the CRTB process presumably believing that if they wait long enough then the community will lose interest in the project. As evidenced by the survey we undertook in 2013 to re-establish the CRTB the community is still interested, more than 75% of those polled were in support of the FOMICC ambition to procure the land and re-establish the Midmar Inn business. The dilapidated state of the building and site is a constant topic of discussion both in Midmar and the wider Aberdeenshire community.

Unlike the Crook Inn (Tweedsmuir), the Midmar Inn building is not listed, either in part or whole, and hence there is no mechanism under current legislation for FOMICC or government to encourage the owners to engage, nor is it in a conservation area. By this means the Midmar Inn owners, over the last 6 years, have successfully frustrated the intention of the CRTB awarded by the Scottish Ministers in 2008 and 2013 to FOMICC and denied our community the opportunity to improve the economic and social welfare of our area.

FOMICC has no doubt that if the Part 3A if inserted into the original act and is made applicable to all land will be hugely empowering for all communities since it should ensure that owners will engage. It is important that the process is fair to both parties and FOMICC believes that the CRTB procedure ensures this through confirmation ballots, independent valuation and time limiting the period to raise the funds.

c) Definitions of Registrable and Excluded Land

We do not believe these changes will affect our situation as the Midmar Inn is already registered land and is hence not excluded land. What is proposed would seem sensible; the effect of the bill should be applicable throughout Scotland to ensure all communities have equal opportunity.

d) Definition of Community Area

The existing regulation about post code areas has caused the FoMICC a number of problems. The changes to section 34(5) of the original act are interesting but we are unclear as to what effect they may have on us. We would hope that rather than having to use Post Code to define the community area the Community Company could apply to use a combination of Geography and Post Code. As indicated in the drafted changes this would become a “prescribed type of area”.

Because we have only a small population within the Post Code area around the Inn it would be beneficial for FOMICC to continue to use the Post Code to define the voting population for the Purpose of ballot but also allow members of the company (there needs to be 20 in number) from the wider geographical community, for example within an eight mile radius of the Inn.

e) Changes to Timelines and Procedures

FOMICC notes the various changes proposed to time limits and procedures, notably:

a) The Confirmation Ballot to be performed by an independent “Balloteer” appointed by ministers.

b) That Ministers may waive the requirement for a confirmation ballot if the application ballot had a sufficient majority.

c) Extension of the time to raise funds from six to eight months.

d) Making the valuation process more robust.

e) Requiring minutes of company meetings to be shared with those requesting to see them.

Point (a), as drafted, provided the Community Company does not bear the cost of using an independent “Balloteer” to run the confirmation ballot, therefore FOMICC supports this initiative because it will improve the credibility of the result and ensure impartiality.

Point (d), we welcome the changes to strengthen the valuation procedure, in FOMICC experience this has been one of the major reasons that the owners of the Midmar Inn have refused to engage with the CRTB process. They have always stated their belief that the independent valuation would not be fair and they had no right of reply. FOMICC throughout have steadfastly maintained the position that we will pay a fair price, considering what was originally paid by the owners in 2004 and the state of the property and business as it is today.

B.2 Benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations?

FOMICC cannot offer any evidence in this regard except that it may make it clearer for such organisations what their responsibilities are.

B.3 Do communities across Scotland have the capabilities to take advantage of the provisions in the Bill? If not, what requires to be done to the Bill, or to assist communities, to ensure this happens?

In our opinion, where the cause is important enough, communities will find the skills required to take advantage of the provisions in the Bill. To mobilise these skills does however require a financial input, organisational and leadership skills and a significant voluntary contribution by members. This has been FOMICC experience. The original act, and the improvements proposed by the Empowerment Act “open the door” and it must be up to the community to grasp these opportunities to move forwards.

We would however qualify this support by stressing that it is important that the legislation must not impose an onerous requirement on the community for financial outlay at the inception of a project which would be a wasteful and unnecessary expenditure of a scarce resource. We believe that by the government funding ballots and independent valuations etcetera that are required by the process, this goes a long way towards satisfying this requirement.

We would also recommend that the bill offers to support the community with legal costs if owners take a challenge to the courts over rulings that have been made, i.e. the independent valuation.
C) Concerns and Other Information Regarding the Bill

C.1 Drafting of section Part 3A regarding Abandoned or Neglected Land

Having read all appropriate documents, we are confused as to whether or not the right to buy Abandoned or Neglected land, with an unwilling seller applies equally within the proposed amended Land Reform Act to land registered under Part 2, such as the Midmar Inn and to crofts registered under Part 3A. To comply with the principals as evidenced by items 57 and 65 of the Policy Memorandum, we strongly believe that it should.

We do not understand why Part 3A has been drafted separately to the original Part 2 and modifications to this to be applied by the proposed Empowerment Bill. The wording of the new Part 3A is very similar to Part 2, with the apparent exceptions that a community company constituted under this Part 3A can :-

a) Have less than 20 Members, if Ministers think it in the public interest to allow this.

b) Procure Abandoned or Neglected Land from an unwilling seller

We note that Part 3 of the original act was concerned with crofts and therefore query if this new Part 3A is intended for application only to crofting land?

It is our concern that because FOMICC is a Community Company constituted under Part 2 of the original act, if the proposed drafting of the new bill using this Part 3A will preclude us from using this legislation to deal with the scenario of an “unwilling seller” who has totally neglected the property for the past 6 years that we describe in our evidence B.1(b). If this is the case, we regard this as a major deficiency of the Empowerment Bill and in direct contravention of the ambition expressed in items 57 and 65 of the Policy Memorandum.

C.2 Existing Local Authority Powers to bring property back into use.

The Policy Memorandum (on its Page 6, 5th Bullet of Section 25) states that :-

“There are already a range of powers available to local authorities to bring long term empty property back into use, and it was not clear that new legislation would be more effective than the current powers. The Government is continuing the work of the Empty Homes Partnership and monitoring the use of other powers, such as compulsory purchase for immediate re-sale and the Local Government Finance (Unoccupied Properties etcetera) (Scotland) Act 2012.”

It has not been FOMICC experience that local government has been in a position to help.

Though our local councillors have been supportive, in 2013 we approached our local authorities about the state of dilapidation of the Midmar Inn and to paraphrase received the negative response that, planning were “concentrating on listed buildings and buildings in a conservation areas”. The implication being that the officials in our local planning department had different priorities. Conversely of course the Crook Inn in Tweedsmuir did get indirect assistance from their local councillor pursued maintenance requirements on the Crook Inn.

FOMICC view is that the proposed bill will make the responsibilities uniform throughout the country and this must therefore be a good thing.
C.3 Penalties for non-compliance with CRTB Process

Not being professional legislators it is not clear to us what the penalty is for non-compliance with the CRTB process.

For our own part we understand that if we fail to meet the criteria specified by the original Act and proposed Empowerment Bill then the CRTB will be withdrawn by the Scottish Ministers from FOMICC.

We do not see anything in the existing or proposed legislation that defines what penalties may be imposed on the owner if they do not comply with the process.

Part 2 of the Bill

Executive Summary

Although Community Councils are statutory bodies, local authority officials have no duty to act upon their representation of community wishes within the planning process. Our evidence is based on the Dollar Community Council (DCC) attempt to influence the Local Development Plan (LDP) in Clackmannanshire (Clacks) during 2012-2014:

- In 2012, at the cost of £5,000, the DCC created a Community Plan that articulated the vision of the community detailing the wishes and preferences of its residents and business owners for its development until around 2040;
- In 2013, at a cost of over £35,000, the Community Council appointed an Urban Design & Town Planning Consultancy to develop a Masterplan for the same period;
- The aim was to stimulate sustainable growth of an appropriate style and character to an historic town;
- In 2013 a Masterplan Steering Group was formed by DCC comprising landowners, residents and a representative from the local authority;
- Details of how the steering group operated are provided below.

When submitted to the Clacks Council it became clear that the officials felt no duty, obligation or professional need to consider changes to the LDP that would enable the aims set out in the Masterplan. DCC believe that whilst efforts made over 3 years to convey the wishes of residents have been ignored because the existing statutory process does not place a duty on local authorities to involve community partners.

It is therefore hoped that the Community Empowerment Bill will impose duties on local authority officials to respond to officially organised community processes as part of the envisaged ‘Community Planning Partnership’. The bill must also include an ombudsman to which Community Councils may turn when these duties are not properly performed because it is felt that, based on our evidence, the Committee should not underestimate the changes needed to counter the ‘top-down’ inclinations and culture of present-day planning departments.
Dollar as a community

Dollar is a town in Scotland’s smallest county, Clackmannanshire. It is one of the Hillfoots Villages, nestling below the Ochil Hills to the north and the River Devon to the south. Dollar is on the A91 road, which runs from Stirling to St Andrews, around 3 miles east of Tillicoultry. In 2010 the population was estimated at 2,970. The Historic Scotland Castle Campbell, a well-preserved, late medieval tower-house castle, overlooks the town centre. Dollar Academy, one of Scotland’s top independent schools, is integral to the old town.

It displays many of the characteristics of a vibrant society with its own Museum, 10 hobby groups including the Hillfoot Harmony choir, 11 sporting clubs all which have junior programmes, 5 organisations specifically supporting child and youth development such as scouting and guiding and 5 groups catering for neighbours and friends. Its primary school has a roll of over 200 pupils. There are 2 church congregations.

However Dollar is certainly not immune from many of the challenges facing similar sized settlements. One of the most common challenges relates to the gradual decline of independent retailers in small towns and how this process can be managed and potentially reversed. There is also a lack of business park type accommodation for local micro businesses.

DCC took the approach that an expansion of the town boundaries would mean positive outcomes providing housing development was managed in the interests of the community.

Community Planning 2012

A Community Plan provided the means in which the Dollar community came together to collectively decide on a range of initiatives that meet the growing needs of their town and how these can be appropriately co-ordinated and phased with and without an expansion. The main goal of the Dollar Community Plan was to identify short, medium and long term proposals designed to maximise not only the social and physical potential of the town, but also address the economic benefits needed.

The creation of the community plan took place during the period April to August 2012. Through a series of meetings, workshops and public consultation the plan realised its vision as:

‘Dollar will be an attractive and vibrant rural town, offering a safe and friendly environment in which to live, work and visit. Building upon its community spirit, strong historic and educational roots, Dollar must continue to evolve towards a sustainable and prosperous future. This headline vision was substantially supported by detailed ‘what and how’ plans. With regards to the size of Dollar, it was concluded that whilst some would prefer there to be no change in the town, the majority of residents felt that Dollar would benefit from some appropriate growth. The Community Plan emphasised that this must be carried out to a very high standard of planning and design, leading to the following potential benefits:

- Increased population to support and sustain local shops and services;
- Provision of new homes, including affordable units for local people ‘priced out’;
- New facilities including an improved primary school, park, cemetery and sports fields;
- Opportunities for employment via new office space and a sports campus.

A copy of the Community Plan was sent to the Chief Executive of Clackmannanshire Council on August 13th 2012 and to Derek Mackay MSP at the same time.

The 2013-2014 Masterplan Initiative

Context
The Masterplan became the means by which the community vision could be articulated on the ground. In late 2013 DCC were able to obtain draft copies of the LDP for the county and it was decided to commission a project to develop as Masterplan for the expansion of the town.

In considering a Masterplan approach DCC was aware of the provision made under Section 22 of the Planning etc. Scotland Act 2006 for the preparation of supplementary guidance in connection with a Local Development Plan. It understood that Supplementary Planning Guidance (SPG) can include documents such as Masterplans, Development Briefs and expressions of detailed policy which expand upon or supplement the policies and proposals in the current Adopted Local Plan.

DCC was also aware of PAN 83 covering the Masterplanning process from beginning to end, including understanding the need for Masterplanning, to preparing, creating, processing and implementing a Masterplan.

DCC was therefore confident that the commissioning of a Masterplan would fit into the statutory process of the Clackmannanshire LDP and this belief was strengthened by the involvement of a senior manager in the steering group stakeholders.

Key Component
A key component within the Masterplan is the ambitions of Dollar Academy to develop a Community Sports Campus operated as a regional/ national centre of excellence with the duel benefit of modern facilities and, crucial to the needs of the town, employment opportunities. However to enable this major project the proposed LDP boundaries did require extension to the south of the town.
Masterplan development and timetable

The Masterplan was developed during the 7 month period October 2013 and April 2014 involving seven monthly working group meetings chaired by the DCC chairman and attended by the stakeholder partners, professionals, Dollar community council members.

In February 2014 a two week public consultation was mounted to obtain feedback on the emerging document.

The consultation established 80% support for the principle of a community led Masterplan and over 80% support of the outcomes.

A commercial appraisal was commissioned late in the process. However this step simply highlighted how unfeasible it would be to implement the Masterplan when Clacks Council refused to contemplate financial involvement.
Involvement of Clackmannanshire Council

During meetings 30 October and 8 November 2013 Clacks Council was kept briefed of the Masterplan progress. However the reaction to a request that the new LDP green belt boundaries were revisited (to overcome good practice issues such as defensible edges and the concern of constraining development in relation to the economics of funding a new long term and permanent access off the A91) the planning department manager responded by saying that there was no time to promote a schedule 4 change in the LDP for the south boundary despite accepting a similar change to the east boundary, even though the LDP had still become public.

The advice that we could express our objections during the LDP public consultation period in early 2014, thereby relegating the Masterplan process to the status of a ‘public contribution’, is clear evidence that the authority officials had no intention of amending the draft LDP in relation to the south boundary, critical to the smooth passage of the Community Sports Campus.

Final Response from Clackmannanshire Council

Prior to Clacks Council putting their proposed LDP forward to the full body of elected members for adoption Dollar Community Council was again informed that this proposed LDP would not be altered by the inclusion of any boundary changes as set out in our Masterplan because that would mean going out to public consultation and hence delay.

After the members adopted the LDP Clacks Council informed Dollar Community Council that the submission to the Scottish Government would include the preparation and submission of Schedule 4 forms laying out their views and acceptance of these proposed boundary alterations as laid out in our Masterplan. We have had no confirmation that this was done or even that the LDP has been submitted to the Scottish Government.

Dollar Community Council conclusions and appeal for change

Dollar Community Council, as well as Dollar Civic Trust, has made many representations over the years to Clacks Council not only on planning proposals but on the general well-being and upkeep of the town.

It is our view that decisions taken by Clacks Council do not always reflect the views and wishes of the majority of Dollar Townsfolk.

We would ask the Scottish Government to take these observations into account and develop statutory orders to compel Local Authorities to heed the wishes of local communities within the parameters laid down in current and future planning regulations. The bill must also include an ombudsman to which Community Councils may turn when these duties are not properly performed because it is felt that, based on our evidence, the Committee should not underestimate the changes needed to counter the ‘top-down’ inclinations and culture of present-day planning departments.
Strengthening the Community Empowerment Bill to empower every community in Scotland

As organisations we welcome the Scottish Government’s plans to pass a Community Empowerment Bill. However, as organisations working with and advocating with Scotland’s most disadvantaged communities, it is important that the Scottish Government’s proposals help to address Scotland’s most significant inequalities, and empowers communities right across Scotland. We have developed these proposals together, as ways that we believe the Bill can be strengthened, so that all communities, including those who are currently the most disempowered communities, can be empowered through the Bill’s provisions.
Standards for Community Engagement

There is much good practice in the public sector when it comes to consultation with communities. However, this practice is not always of a consistently high standard. To genuinely involve communities in the design of public services, the high-quality involvement of communities in local decision making must become second nature to public services, as well as being a part of their everyday core purpose.

There are already existing national standards for community engagement, but their implementation is varied across Scotland, and the passing of a Community Empowerment Act would create an ideal moment to renew them and place them on a statutory footing. Requiring all public bodies to adhere to a set of national standards for the engagement of communities, and to regularly report on them, would be a major step advance for the rights of communities to participate in decisions that affect them.

A key part of the standards should be a focus on addressing inequality and empowering Scotland’s most disempowered communities.

More than two thirds of respondents to the Scottish Government’s consultation on this topic in summer 2012 responded favourably to this proposal, including a clear majority of local authorities and other public bodies.

We recommend:

- That a new power is created that allows Ministers to create statutory regulations for the engagement and empowerment of communities, which all public bodies must follow and regularly report upon.
- When Community Planning Partnerships are creating a local outcomes improvement plan, they should be required to adhere to the Standards.

Makes community empowerment central to the purpose of Community Planning Partnerships

The new Bill will put Community Planning Partnerships onto a statutory basis, enshrining their existence, and the contributions of public bodies, into law. As the Scottish Government has recognised this is a golden opportunity to improve the functioning of Community Planning.

As things stand, the focus of CPPs tends to be on bringing public bodies together to plan for communities. In the spirit of the Christie Commission, we must fundamentally change this, so that, instead, communities come together with agencies to co-produce their public services. The development of local outcomes improvement plans should be through a participative process of community engagement.

There should be duties on CPPs that reflect this, and that require them to involve people who live and work in the local area in local decision making, and the deciding of outcomes. This must go beyond consultation or engagement to participation in the decision making process.

The need for this change is supported by the 2013 Audit Scotland report on Community Planning\(^2\), which found that:

“Community planning takes account of a wide range of consultation activity, but there is a long way to go before services are truly designed around communities and the potential of local people to participate in, shape and improve local services is realised”

This change would also join the dots between different sections of the Bill. At the moment the sections of the Bill about the empowerment of communities, and the sections about public service reform sit in isolation from each other. This change would help make the empowerment of communities the common thread underpinning all of the Bill.

We recommend:

- The legislation should require that the local outcomes improvement plan that each CPP must create, is created through a participative process of community engagement.

Strengthening the proposed ‘Right to request to Participate’

It is welcome that the proposals set out participation requests, as a right of communities – the involvement in decision-making is very much a human right. However, in order that this right can be fairly and equitably exercised by all communities, there must be a clearer arbitration and review mechanism. The current proposals give the public body the power to decide whether to accept or decline requests, as well as how to facilitate requests and so on. We therefore believe that a third party must be able to act as the protector of this right, through a challenge mechanism or appeals procedure, and we suggest that the Scottish Human Rights Commission could be an appropriate body.

In addition, we would suggest that public bodies should not only be passive recipients of participation requests. There should be a clear role for public bodies in bringing together and connecting communities, especially communities of interest such as young care leavers, removing barriers to participation and supporting communities to take advantage of their rights to request participation, and their other community empowerment rights.

We Recommend:

- That the Bill sets out an arbitration and appeal role for the Scottish Human Rights Commission, in the event that there is a dispute about a participation request.
- That there is an additional order making power for Ministers, that would allow them to set out requirements about how public bodies must support communities to come together, connect, and make participation requests.

Participatory Budgeting

Participatory budgeting has significant potential as a means to devolve money, power and resources to our communities. In parts of Brazil this has had tremendous success stimulating engagement and subsequent investment in public services.

We believe that there is a great deal of enthusiasm for participatory budgeting approaches throughout Scotland, but as yet, there have been limited attempts by the public sector to trial the implementation of participatory budgeting approaches. However, in recent years where participatory budgeting has been used on a small scale in Scotland there is some evidence to suggest that its application has been transformative in increasing local democratic participation and community involvement, leading to stronger and more cohesive communities. On that basis, we suggest a new duty on community planning partnerships to set aside a small proportion of their annual budget, for communities to decide where it is spent, through a process of participatory budgeting.

We recommend:

- That the Bill requires each Community Planning Partnerships to set aside 1% of their annual budget, to be decided upon through an appropriate community participation process or processes, and assess the impact of doing so with a view to further embedding this approach.

Where empower is giving someone the power or authority to do something then the Bill gives this to an adequate extent for the areas set out that the Bill addresses subject to the concerns raised in response to Q2-5. Where empower is making someone stronger and confident to control their life and claim their right then the Bill does not adequately address this, as the Bill does not take due consideration of the resource required to enable people in communities and community groups, as defined in the Bill, to become stronger and confident in order to access the rights being provided. The Scottish Government should consider this aspect of empowerment and the costs and resources required in order to fully realise the potential of the Bill. We would suggest that there is a need for more work to explore these implications rather than the immediate process implications so to address risks of inequality in the access to rights outlined in this Bill. Currently the Bill only addresses part of the full meaning of empowerment.

Currently the Community Right to Buy legislation requires the Community Group to conduct a ballot with the local community. The new proposals indicate that Scottish Ministers will appoint a balloter who will undertake the ballot on behalf of the community and this will be paid by Scottish Ministers. The Bill gives greater opportunity to communities by increasing the ballot time from 28 days to 12 weeks. In addition, the Bill affords communities greater time to conclude a sale. This increases from 6 – 8 months. The required evidence arising from a ballot to justify a sale is reduced within the Bill. The proposed provisions simply refers to a proportion sufficient to justify a sale to a community being required cast votes in favour whereas at present a voting turn out of 50% or greater is required or less than 50% but with a significant proportion of those who did vote being in favour.

The Bill also contains a proposal for Community Groups to apply for land which is deemed to be neglected or abandoned although the owner of the land does have the right to make a case for any future development proposals to be taken into account. In addition, the Bill gives community bodies the right to make requests for the transfer of assets and envisages that these should be granted unless it can be demonstrated that reasonable grounds exist for not doing so. It appears that the community group making the request does not require to provide justification to demonstrate what benefits would accrue to the community if the asset was transferred. There are particular issues around this from the Council’s point of view. Legitimate community aspirations need to be balanced against, in the case of publically owned assets the need to secure both land, and capital receipts, to enable future developments.
2) What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

Possibly the principal disadvantage to public authorities would arise from the additional time afforded to conduct a community ballot and also to conclude a sale. In respect of the former there are potential financial implications for the local authority in maintaining an asset for the duration of the ballot period, which is not beneficial. The latter provision could hold up wider marketing of an asset. The Bill also appears to grant community groups the right to acquire land that they deem to be abandoned and also on an unsolicited basis, to make request for the transfer of assets. From a local authority perspective, this could be a detrimental step particularly if there is no requirement on the part of the community to produce a business case to demonstrate the benefits that would arise to the wider community from the transfer.

Ultimately, such an approach could carry the risk of the community being unable to sustain the asset. In addition, the Bill requires to carry a requirement for the Council to provide allotments if the number of people requesting one exceeds 50% of the number of allotments available or if there are more than 15 people on a waiting list. Local authorities are also obliged to make regulations in relation to allotments and must prepare a food growing strategy together with an annual allotment report. This could prove to be a considerable burden to local authorities both in terms of land assembly and the requirement to allocate officer time to these additional tasks.

The language in the Bill is also confusing and will disadvantage organisations trying to engage communities for example in Community Planning, if the Bill is using terminology such as Local Outcomes Improvement Plan. Can clarity please be given to what is meant by this in the Bill? Is this another term for delivery under Single Outcome Agreement? The Bill could set expectation that a Local Outcomes Improvement Plan is to be developed separate to development of delivery under Single Outcome Agreements and it is not beneficial for any public sector organisation for there to be confusion with this.

Communities across Scotland are likely to be encouraged by the provisions of the Bill but in many instances, depending on the nature and complexity of the asset in question, they are likely to require additional professional support to develop business cases or funding applications. Future sustainability of large scale assets is also of critical importance and although community activists can support the initial thrust to secure and manage an asset, it is questionable whether this can be sustained in all instances particularly when key individuals move away from an area or their ability to continue to support the project diminishes over time. Therefore, particularly with respect to larger and complex transfers of assets, the long term sustainability of proposals should be investigated thoroughly at the outset.

From a community planning perspective, it would be beneficial to have reference to the National Standards of Community Engagement as this guidance enables communities and those working with communities to understand best how to identify what provisions in the Bill a community may wish to take forward.

There is also a need to provide community capacity building support for those communities which may not currently be able to access the opportunities afforded by the new legislation. For example, support to strengthen the skills, abilities and confidence of people and community groups to take effective action in the development of their communities. Without this support, the opportunities of the bill may not be enjoyed equitably and some communities will benefit while others may not, particularly those communities which are most marginalised, and in remote and rural locations. Resource is required for this and this must come through Scottish Government funding to those working with communities.

The provisions of the Bill appear to give communities greater encouragement to apply for the transfer of assets. However, the transfer is only the beginning of their task so alterations should be made to ensure that the long term sustainability of individual projects is more adequately taken into account.

The Bill must be clear on its impact to existing legislation. For example, it is not clear in what way the reference to partners in community planning impacts the provision for the council to be the lead in the CPP as laid out in the Local Government Act 2003. It would also be beneficial for the definition of terms such as community planning in section 4.2 to be written in a way that is meaningful and understandable for the public.

In respect of the equality impact assessment that has been carried out, which concludes that the Bills provisions are neither directly or indirectly discriminatory in respect of age, disability, race, religion or belief, sex, sexual orientation or gender reassignment, it would be useful for this to be published for viewing.

The equality duty has been included when considering asset transfer and participation requests, but does not appear to be applied for the other parts of the bill – why is this?

Island Communities – given the recent publication of the report “Empowering Scotland’s Island Communities”, it would be useful to understand how much of the bill has been “island proofed”, and to understand which aspects of the bill will produce a differential impact on the islands.

There is limited consideration of the Bill on the various elements of Scotland’s sustainable development (e.g. land use/environment) and it would be useful if a more comprehensive assessment of the impact was provided.

Specific comments in respect of Part 8 – Non Domestic Rates

This creates a power to allow local authorities (as rating authorities) to reduce or remit business rates within our areas in any financial year from 2015-16 onwards as a local rates relief scheme. Any such rates relief offered has to be fully funded by the local authority. In creating the scheme, the local authority must have regard to the interests of persons liable to pay council tax. This is because they will be the ones who pay for any such relief. CoSLA has previously welcomed the Scottish Government’s intention to create this power. This came out of the earlier consultation entitled “Supporting Business – Promoting Growth: Business Rates Consultation” and this was set out in the Scottish Government response issued on 4 September 2013. Argyll and Bute Council responded to this consultation and were of the view that there should not be any flexibility to introduce local relief schemes as NDR is a national tax which local government collects on behalf of the Scottish Government and as such there should be very limited difference in how this is levied across Scotland. We therefore do not welcome these proposed new powers. They will mean that we are subject to many more calls for us to offer rates relief e.g. in response to roadwork disruptions. However it will usually be difficult to fit individual circumstances into an overall “scheme” - which is what is required under this new legislation.
Dear Mr Cullum,

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

Thank you for the opportunity to contribute to the Committee’s scrutiny of the Bill.

You specifically requested feedback on the non-domestic rates aspect of the Bill, namely the proposed new power to award ‘local discretionary relief’ that local authorities will have at their disposal from next Spring should the legislation be enacted.

It is worth noting that our members believe Scotland’s non-domestic rates system is no longer fit for purpose and is in need of fundamental reform. The tax only ever rises, it is a disincentive to invest in retail or commercial premises, and retailers pay around a quarter of all business rates in Scotland which, next year, is set to generate £2.9 billion in total tax revenues. A comprehensive overhaul of the business rates system would increase retailers’ confidence about investing in premises, create more jobs and help revive our high streets and town centres.

We support the principle behind the proposed local discretionary relief, and view it as a welcome acknowledgement of the need to keep down costs for retailers and other businesses.

We have similarly backed the flexibility provided through the introduction of Business Improvement Districts, and are calling for the Business Rates Incentivisation Scheme (BRIS) to be resuscitated. Our members do not support the repatriation of control over the poundage rate to local authorities.

However we would strongly counsel against the provisions within the Bill being amended to allow councils to increases rates bills, for example in the form of a local discretionary supplement. Our research shows that one in every eleven retail premises is empty, and anything that makes it more expensive or more difficult for retailers to invest will only exacerbate this problem.
While we support the principle behind the proposed new relief, we remain to be convinced that its use will either be widespread or substantive enough to be effective, particularly as we understand no Scottish Government funding will be available to help offset the cost to councils. Indeed, the lack of use of a similar power which is already in existence in England has been highlighted by a joint government/industry forum on the future of high streets. One possible solution would be to couple BRIS with the local discretionary relief scheme, so that any additional revenues accruing from BRIS could be used to incentivise further business expansion through the local discretionary rates relief.

I enclose a copy of our recent submission to the Scottish Government on its Budget for 2015-16, in which we set out a number of recommendations for stimulating further investment in Scotland’s retail industry and town centres, and which I hope will be of interest to the Committee.

Yours sincerely,

David Lonsdale

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

Response from Midlothian Voluntary Action (MVA)

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

There is the potential that it will empower communities, however, there is also the risk that it will only empower the communities that are either more affluent (with professionals on their committees/boards e.g. architects, accountants, etc); or that have long-established organisations with support already firmly in place.

Also, communities need to know about the Bill and the possibilities arising from it before they can benefit from it.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

The public sector will need to be seen to treat every community body equally and fairly, particularly if there are conflicting interests, for example, to take over a community building.

3. Do you consider communities across Scotland have the capability to take advantage of the provisions in the Bill? If not, what requires to be done to the Bill, or to assist communities, to ensure this happens?

Further to question 1, some communities undoubtedly do have the capability to take advantage of the provisions in the Bill, however, many will not. From experience, we are aware that there are communities that contain well educated and confident professional/retired professional workers that would find it relatively easy to take advantage of the provisions of the Bill. Also, that there are individual community bodies in more deprived areas of Scotland that are also fairly well able to take advantage of the Bill because they are long-established, and have been well trained and well supported over a considerable period of time.

However, we are also well aware that there are many other communities (and individual community groups) that will be less able to take advantage of the Bill for a number of reasons, for example, less education; transient populations; no access to professionals to join Boards; less confidence; and less relevant skills. These communities could potentially need considerable support. We are concerned that sufficient support might not be available as there are still substantial staff cuts being made at local authorities, and there are likely to be substantial cuts also at voluntary organisations including support organisations such as Third Sector Interfaces.

Part 2 – Community Planning

We welcome Community Planning Partnerships having statutory requirements, however we have some concerns, for example:

(a) Clause (5) “a community planning partnership must (a) consider which community bodies are likely to be able to contribute to community planning”. This lets CPP to choose the community body(ies) they want to engage with. The Bill does not give the local voluntary sector the right to nominate one or more community bodies of their choice. We do not think this is “community empowerment”. We believe that it is important that communities, including voluntary organisations, have some say in who represents them as it is important that community bodies involved in the community planning process engage with other organisations in order to feed into/and from the process.

We are disappointed to see that whilst the Consultation in January 2014 stated (clause 151) “We further proposed that, reflecting the Statement of Ambition, the core duties of each CPP should be to:

consult and engage with the third sector and the business community on the outcomes to be achieved and how they can best be delivered” - this statement has not been included in the Bill which has been watered down to state (Part 1, clause 5 (3)) – “in preparing a local outcomes improvement plan, a community planning partnership must consult –

(a) such community bodies as it considers appropriate, and

(b) such other persons as it considers appropriate.

Part 4 – Right to Buy

We welcome the inclusion of bodies that are SCIOs (Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisations) to the list.
Local Government and Regeneration Committee

Submission Number: 21

Part 7 – Allotments

We are pleased to see the requirement for each local authority to maintain a list of persons who make a request under section 70 (1); and a Duty to provide allotments. However, we are concerned to see that there is not a timescale set down for the provision of allotments.

We also welcome the requirement for each local authority to prepare a food-growing strategy for its area which will include the identification of land that may be used for allotment sites, etc.

No comments.

Further Comments

We are aware that this Bill cannot be looked at in isolation. For example, the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Act 2014 will drastically change the community planning environment.

Although the Integrated Joint Boards are included as Community Planning Partners in Schedule 1 of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill, we are concerned that there will be a reduction in the ability of the voluntary sector to get involved in sectors where we previously were integrated into the Community Planning process.

In addition, we are aware that the economic crisis, Council Tax freeze, and the results of the forthcoming Referendum could all impact on this Bill and the ability of many communities to benefit from it.

We are concerned that the creation of Police Scotland has led to reduced subsidiarity, with more decisions apparently being taken centrally, and that there may be a reduction of importance of Community Planning accordingly.

The Policy Memorandum states that “.. the Scottish Government expects all public service providers to support communities in using these processes and in becoming more empowered generally”. We are concerned there are still substantial staff cuts being made at local authorities, and there are likely to be substantial cuts also at voluntary organisations including support organisations such as Third Sector Interfaces. These are likely to impact on the ability of many community bodies to take advantage of the opportunities arising from the Bill.
This leads to the concern that potentially only already advantaged community bodies and communities will benefit from the Bill.

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill
Submission to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee
Alison Johnstone MSP on behalf of the Green MSPs
28th August 2014

Background

- This document follows the consultation response submitted by the Green MSPs to the Scottish Government to the then Community Empowerment and Renewal (Scotland) Bill in January 2014, a document which was informed by consultations made by the Green MSPs with representatives of football supporters' trusts across Scotland. To avoid repetition, an edited version of that earlier document is included here as an annex.

- Although this current document will consider all the questions posed by the Local Government and Regeneration Committee in their call for evidence of 26th June 2014, the focus of this response will be on a series of legislative options designed to empower football fans' trusts to take control of their clubs, set out in the answer to question 4 below.

The Green MSPs believe the Bill will deliver more of the tools communities need to deliver community empowerment. We support the general principles of the Bill but would like to see some of the legislation and policy intent go further.

We support the proposed statutory footing for a system of national outcomes and associated reporting. Up-to-date reporting will be essential to inform the periodic reviews and we suggest a requirement for reporting to be as up-to-date as practicable, either generally or in advance of a review.

The inclusion of community bodies within the community planning process represents an improvement on the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003 definition (point 39 of the policy memorandum), as does the inclusion of a formal right for communities to initiate dialogue with public sector organisations (point 45). We continue however to have concerns about the centralising nature of the Single Outcome Agreements, which will be delivered in part through the Community Planning Partnerships. In fact this concern goes much wider and rests on the inability of Scotland’s very large local authorities to address local needs and deliver community empowerment. Many of these issues are set out in COSLA’s Strengthening Local Democracy report.

Scottish Government’s decision to reject the "Community Right To Challenge" approach, as used in England and as described in point 52 of the policy memorandum, is undoubtedly correct. Adopting that process would indeed expose key services to privatisation, the antithesis of community empowerment.

The extension of the community right to buy as described in point 57 of the memorandum is also a cautious step in the right direction, in our view. We support a single framework for the right to buy that covers both rural and urban land, one that recognises communities defined not exclusively by geographical area, and one where communities have more flexibility about the legal structures they adopt for this purpose.

The enlarging of the scope of legal entities that can be applicable (described in point 61 of the policy memorandum) is to be welcomed, although we believe Community Benefit Societies should be included in the initial primary legislation rather than merely optionally through subsequent subordinate legislation. We believe this is a matter of critical importance, because whilst both the proposed legal vehicles that would be eligible to exercise the rights – companies limited by guarantee (CLGs) and Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisations (SCIOs) are excellent vehicles to own and operate assets - they are very poor at raising capital to do so, because both are prohibited in law from having equity. The Community Benefit Society is, by contrast, able to be asset-locked whilst also issuing equity, but is prevented in law from paying dividends to members and is legally required to work for the benefit of its defined community which it seeks to benefit. We can see no reason to exclude the CBS, and every reason to include it in the legislation to enable communities to immediately draw upon the support of bodies like Community Shares Scotland, a joint venture of Locality and the Carnegie UK Trust.

We fully support the measures set out in point 94 onwards of the policy memorandum concerning allotments: better and more consistent community access to space to grow food would have substantial and wide-ranging benefits.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?
The Bill rightly places additional duties on public sector bodies to engage with communities on a range of planning and ownership issues. These duties will have administrative costs associated with them, costs which will (at least initially) only partly be offset by the benefits brought by such engagement. We would urge Scottish Ministers to consider the provision of additional direct support on a transitional basis to bodies most affected. We also believe that these changes have the potential, at least, to lead to some beneficial culture change across the public sector, provided they are implemented with a degree of flexibility and openness.

Some communities do, but not all have the financial assets or institutional capacity to take advantage of the benefits that the Bill can bring: in fact, the communities which could benefit most from greater control over their lives are likely to include those for whom these kind of changes may be inaccessible. We believe the biggest restriction will be on the inability to utilise the community-friendly capital-raising powers of the community benefit society, a vehicle that fits superbly with the powers the Bill proposes to extend to Scottish communities but which has been omitted so far.

We also believe that – for reasons outlined below – that the ability of football supporters to use the powers of proposed in the Bill to buy the football clubs they support are limited and that without amendment, this potentially sizeable group of potential users will be excluded from bringing the benefits of community ownership to their sector of economic and cultural life.

We would like to see specific changes to the Bill’s provisions to provide football fans’ trusts with more rights to be part of the ownership and governance of what is an important community asset. To do this requires a broadening of the community right to buy to a right not defined by land and physical assets alone.

The Bill’s values are set out very clearly in the policy memorandum. It states: "In line with trusting the people who live and work in Scotland to make decisions about the nation’s future, the essence of self-determination, the Scottish Government is also committed to supporting subsidiarity and local decision-making." (point 4)

It continues (point 5) to observe that the Bill seeks to: "Empower community bodies through the ownership of land and buildings and strengthening their voices in the decisions that matter to them."
These are objectives that the Green MSPs share. In particular, we wholeheartedly agree with the following assessment of the benefits this kind of empowerment can bring (point 7):

“When people feel they can influence what happens in their community and can contribute to delivering change, there can be many benefits. Communities can often achieve significant improvements by doing things for themselves, because they know what will work for them. They become more confident and resilient; there are often opportunities for people to gain new skills and for increased employment as well as improved access to services and support. These in turn can lead to improvements in a wide range of areas such as crime, health, and reducing inequalities.”

However, the focus on land, in terms of the community right to buy, directly contradicts this excellent summary of the varied needs and aspirations of communities across Scotland (point 10 of the policy memorandum): "Community empowerment means different things for different communities. Some communities will want to take on the ownership or management of land or buildings, or delivery of services to members of their community. Others may be more interested in engaging with the public sector to have more say in how services are delivered or how assets are used."

Furthermore, the asset transfer provisions are broader and not limited in this way (and Section 27 of the Bill as introduced does recognise non-land assets: just salmon fishings or mineral rights). The Green MSPs believe a community value test for other private assets (including services) should also be introduced for consistency, effectively broadening the terms of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 to cover a range of additional non-land assets. This could cover assets which are often crucial to rural communities but which are currently excluded: for example, village pubs, local post offices, and so on. Some services flow directly from the control of the physical assets in which they are operated from, such as pubs or cinemas. If you own the pub building, you can run the pub as a service. But in other cases the right to provide the service is key: for example, the building where the Post Office is run from can change, and the community’s core transport may be provided from a depot nowhere near where they live. In these cases, it is the right to provide the service that is the core property asset, not the premises most strongly associated with its delivery. The policy memorandum recognises this, in the section below (point 53), but provides no route for democratic community control over a local shop or community hub unless those assets are owned by a public body:

"Whether it is retaining the local shop, renovating a derelict site or providing a hub for community activities, control of assets can be a key factor in making a community more attractive to live in, supporting economic regeneration and sustainable development.”

These same principles and benefits apply with regard to football clubs, and the Green MSPs believe clubs should therefore be included in the scope of these changes. The nature of football administration means this would require specific amendments to be made through this Bill to the 2003 Land Reform (Scotland) Act.

In our view, the “compulsory” community right to buy for abandoned and neglected land implemented through Section 48 should be extended to cover sports clubs that enter administration, using the same protection of Ministerial oversight and approval, including similar tests. Similarly, the right of community purchase where a “willing seller” exists should be extended to include sports clubs when they come up for sale, just as is already permitted with land in rural communities.

Under point 46, the policy memorandum also covers, for public engagement purposes, the definition of appropriate community bodies. The test set out there fits neatly with the structure and nature of fans’ trusts: “Section 14 identifies the key features of a body which meets these requirements, ensuring that it is open to all members of the community and controlled by those members. It is for the body to define the community it represents, whether that is by geographical boundaries or by common interests or characteristics of its members."

Annex 1 below sets out the specific amendments which the Green MSPs believe the Committee should consider at Stage Two. In particular, we believe options 1, 3 & 6 there would be straightforward to implement, while option 5 should be considered: options 2 and 4 are probably beyond the scope of amendments that could be brought to the Bill as drafted. The Scottish Government has this year set up a working group on fan ownership, and we believe that, given the absence of another suitable legislative vehicle, it would be a major error not to lay the legislative groundwork for any recommendations about fans' right to buy which that working group may propose. Given the proposed tests around Ministerial assessment of each bid, adopting these amendments would also not prejudge the outcome of that work.

At Stage 1 we hope the committee will consider how the right to buy provisions could be broadened to include eligible assets beyond land and buildings. In terms of football clubs this asset would be the membership shares enabling the club to play in the league – further explanation is given in Annex 1. Finally, we encourage the committee to invite representatives of football fans trusts to give oral evidence on a fan’s right to buy.

As per the Pairc case in 2012, we believe these proposals, and the extension of them set out above, are within the margin of appreciation afforded member states with regard to Article 1 of Protocol 1 of the ECHR. We also share the Scottish Government’s assessment of the impact of this Bill on island communities, and also on sustainable development as defined by the Scottish Government (with the caveat that the latter is defined by Scottish Ministers in a way which promotes growth at the expense of true sustainability).

Annex 1 - January 2014 response to Scottish Government consultation

Outline

Greens believe football clubs are prone to suffering from many of the same problems tenants have historically had with absentee landlords, and that football clubs are frequently at the core of communities across Scotland. We believe that a right for fans to buy their clubs, either at any point or when their clubs get into financial difficulties, would be desirable in policy terms and also that the CE Bill represents the ideal vehicle for such legislative changes.

Purpose and background

Fan ownership in Scotland and beyond

Fan ownership is a common ownership model for sports clubs, and is the norm in Scandinavia and Germany. However across Scotland and the rest of the UK, private ownership remains the norm. Fan ownership in Scotland has grown during the devolution era, mainly thanks to the efforts of Supporters Direct, and in particular as a response to clubs’ financial difficulties.

Several clubs have been majority owned by their supporters, notably Clyde FC, East Stirling, Stirling Albion and most recently Dunfermline Athletic, currently the largest club to hold this status with Annan Athletic expected to join them in the coming months. The current preferred bidder for Heart of Midlothian is the Foundation of Hearts, a fan-led consortium. Both Ayr United and Motherwell are working on plans to be community owned by the start of season 2014-15.

There are two major problems affecting the take-up of fan-ownership.
At present, owners are under no obligation to even deal with their supporters, let alone involve them in ownership and governance. As a result, fan ownership overwhelmingly comes about against a backdrop of corporate failure, where the lack of willingness of clubs’ owners to engage with supporters is followed by the willingness of an insolvency practitioner to deal with anyone proposing a realistic rescue plan. However, as a result, most fan ownership arrives against a legacy of failure, debt and limited capital.

Relatedly, a common model is for a private owner/supporter to commit the club to spending money it cannot afford and to supplement revenue with their own resources. That means that without a wealthy benefactor, Scottish clubs are regularly faced with a dilemma in which sporting goals cannot be achieved through ‘normal’ trading, i.e. trading where expenditure is based on earned income.

As a result, financial success and sporting success are, for the vast majority of clubs, mutually exclusive. Under this model, clubs continue to be solvent only as long as their benefactors have the means to support them, but when such means are exhausted, the club quickly moves from apparently rude health to severe insolvency. It is this which lies at the root of the deep structural instability of the game, which has seen the majority of professional clubs in the UK go into formal insolvency over the past 20 years, most spectacularly at Rangers - one hundred and fifty four administrations in the UK since 1992.

While there are mechanisms which seek to address this in terms of controlling club expenditure, these efforts have had limited effects at best. The evidence is that expanded fan ownership is the only current option to go beyond those mechanisms in the interests of the sport at both a club and national level. Where the fans are in a position of control unsustainable options are simply taken off the table; if the club has no wealthy benefactor, there is simply no way for it to be run other than as a ‘normal’ enterprise in which income and expenditure are linked in a sustainable manner.

A critical mass of fan owned clubs would be the most effective way to achieve sustainable Scottish professional football, and sustainable football is also a necessary condition for successful and sustainable fan ownership.

A decisive break is required with the failed models of ownership. While the Scottish football authorities can address overspending in a slow and incremental way, the governing bodies are creatures of their members, and as a result, regardless of the ways in which fan ownership helps deliver their stated goals of a more sustainable sport, the authorities inevitably cannot endorse it as an ownership model. They will remain structurally unable to drive greater fan ownership until such a time as a majority of clubs are fan-owned in order, i.e. when this objective is already largely achieved. That leaves the Scottish Parliament as the only body with the means and ability to effect change.

Constitutional and policy basis

Schedule 5 of the Scotland Act does not reserve sport to Westminster, meaning the Scottish Parliament can legislate in this area. There are limitations to the powers of the devolved institutions here, though: the prescribed forms of corporate vehicle and terms of their registration are not devolved, so more radical options - such as creating a specific legal form for sports clubs, as is the norm in the rest of Europe - are not possible. Similarly, the Scottish Parliament will not be able to amend insolvency legislation, but can use insolvency as a trigger for the right to buy (see below).

Human rights

To quote the Land Reform Review Group’s Interim Report from May 2013:
A free society also has to respect the rights of an individual with regard to his or her property. The European Convention on Human Rights, at Article 1, Protocol 1,5 states

Every natural or legal person is entitled to the peaceful enjoyment of his possessions. No one shall be deprived of his possessions except in the public interest and subject to the conditions provided for by law and by the general principles of international law.

The preceding provisions shall not, however, in any way impair the right of a state to enforce such laws as it seems necessary to control the use of property in accordance with the general interest or to secure the payment of taxes or other contributions or penalties.

Central, therefore, to a consideration of land ownership lies the concept of the public interest and the tension between it and individual human rights.

This tension would similarly apply where the right to buy is extended to non-land assets such as football clubs. However, in our view the public interest arguments (economic and social) for community ownership of clubs will typically be stronger than any human rights arguments used by a transient owner of a football club, especially where a club has a long history of community support.

Consistency with the 2003 Act
The thrust of the CER Bill is to enable communities in every part of Scotland to enjoy the same rights around land reform and related issues as communities in places where the 2003 Act already applies, and in so doing, extend the benefits of community ownership across Scotland.

The assumption inherent in the CER Bill is that community ownership is good for the assets owned by communities and good for communities themselves, indeed that it is in the broader public interest: a principle which the Green MSPs support wholeheartedly. The Bill focuses on local self-determination, and it would be hard to find a situation more likely to lead to feelings of disempowerment than the collapse of a football club.

Football clubs are one of the few places where people across a community meet each other on equal terms, regardless of the differences between them in terms of occupation, income and education. They are critical parts of their various community networks, and benefit from being owned and operated by people for whom that character is more important in their strategic management of the club than its potential to maximise profits for the short term.

A wealth of reports at national, UK and European levels have illustrated the advantages of community ownership of football clubs for the greater sustainability of clubs (and thus incidentally supporting their contribution to general taxation), their greater focus on long-term community engagement, increased usage of local suppliers to maximise local economic multipliers, and their overall contribution to community well-being and resilience.

In short, supporting fan ownership of football is an ideal opportunity to enhance the social, economic and environmental benefits clubs bring to their communities, and to boost local decision-making and control.

The first important amendment required
The 2003 Act is specific in its focus on land and physical assets, and the focus of the CER Bill is consistent with this. In this case, though, the physical assets (the football stadium, training ground) are not the focus of the community interest: that is in the football club itself. It is what is done through the ownership of a form of property - a club - which matters, and it is ownership of the club, not the land, which gives the power to current owners to make the operating decisions they do.

To bring football clubs themselves under the control of this process of community empowerment will require an amendment to the 2003 Act to broaden the scope of eligible assets beyond land and buildings on it to encompass a class of related assets which are better understood as rights that entitle the asset owner to undertake certain functions (although the land clubs use remains important). This could be delivered either as a football-specific amendment or as a more general change.

In this instance, the particular asset aimed for here is the membership share in the Scottish Football Association and leagues (hereafter called ‘membership shares’). These are the key asset which underpins football clubs, as they give them the right to play football under the aegis of the respective bodies. No club can be a member of the SPFL which is not already a member of the SFA, and no club without a member share in the SPFL can play in any of the Scottish leagues.

As a result, the right to participate economically in Scottish football flows from ownership by the football club company of these assets. A club without a stadium can share a ground with another club; a club without a league membership share cannot play football against anyone else in the world.

The goal therefore is to enhance in legislation the definition of eligible assets or property to encompass the limited companies that own league membership shares in Scottish football governing bodies. This, ultimately, is what defines a Scottish football club, and is not dependent on whether a club’s ultimate corporate parent has a registered office in Cumbernauld or the Cayman Islands.

That might be done through direct legislation. Better, however, would be to allow a broader definition within constraints, such as:

- Eligible assets upon which the Community Right to Buy powers may be exercised shall be any land in Scotland (unless deemed to be excluded under the terms of the Act), and other property of a consistent community character which may be deemed to be included.
- Ministers shall be responsible for all determinations as to which assets may be included and excluded under this definition.
- In defining what non-land property shall be included, Ministers shall have regard for assets whose ownership and operations are a matter of significant public concern and interest in their community of operation.
- Ministers may only define such non-land property as included by reference to a specific class of assets or asset and not by direct reference to a specific asset in isolation of comparable assets in the same sector of economic or cultural activity, to avoid discrimination or the appearance of same.
- The process by which each class of assets shall be registered, the groups eligible to register and launch a bid and the terms under which they may do so may be varied by Ministers to reflect the specific operating environment of assets in that class, within the framework established by the Act.

Once this has been legislated for, we propose at the same time that Ministers are directed to include all companies registered in the UK which own a league membership share in a Scottish football governing body.
The result would be that football clubs would be classed as suitable cases for community right to buy.

Detailed options

Beyond that, several other options should be considered, in part to reflect the diversity of Scottish clubs, in terms of scale, value, indebtedness, and wealth of the community they are based in.
For all of these options, the assessed prices of any club would be subject to revaluation at the end of every football season, and in the event of a club entering insolvency, the fair price is determined by the insolvency practitioner at the time.

1. Right to buy when clubs are being sold.
   This would require a time limit to assemble funds - provisionally six months - and would probably also require a cooling-off period after any unsuccessful bids, perhaps two years, to reduce uncertainty for clubs. There could be an exception to the two year restriction where the assessed price falls sufficiently far to allow the sum raised during the six month period to be viable (e.g. if land is sold off or if a club is relegated). This is aligned with the existing model for rural land reform.

2. Right to a say when clubs are sold.
   Where fans simply can't afford to buy a club, and where more than one bid meets that assessed price, the fans get to be involved in the decision. This would ensure bidders take account of fans' views, and might include incentives to offer fans' trusts free shares, seats on the board, or other increased involvement.

3. Right to buy when clubs go into administration.
   We do not believe that changes to insolvency and company law would be required: those areas are reserved, but the relevant parts of this proposal would merely use insolvency as a trigger.

4. Right to buy a proportion of the shares at any point where a right to buy overall exists.
   This would probably apply in blocks of 5% or 10%, allowing fans' trusts to make a start and head towards control without having to find the entire sum. It could be particularly useful for the larger clubs, whose fans might find a full purchase in one go impractical. The same time limits would apply as above.

5. Right to buy at an independently assessed price at any time.
   This would keep owners in check, and would protect against sale of grounds without change of ownership. A change of this sort would be powerful in particular in combination with 4 above.

6. Access to SG funding to support clubs.
   Funds will be made available for urban community purchase through this Bill, and it would be straightforward to adding clubs to the list if the other amendments pass. The objective here would be merely to add clubs to the list of assets for which such funding could be applied, rather than to pursue new money or to mandate specific amounts of funding. The decisions here would be for Ministers, who would merely be empowered to act in this way.

In addition, the current consultation by the Scottish Government asks for views on the issue of which legal forms can be considered eligible for the purposes of exercising rights to buy. It is imperative that this definition includes Industrial and Provident Societies in general, and specifically in the case of football.

The supporters' trusts, who would be the bodies in football who would seek to exercise a right to buy, are all legally registered as IPS Community Benefit Societies, and so these legal entities need to be included to allow supporters trusts to be able to access these rights.

Secondly, IPS are not regulated by the Financial Conduct Authority for the public offer of equity, and so can undertake share offers to raise capital quickly and cheaply. Since the right to buy is dependent on the ability to raise the necessary capital, a vehicle which has proven very effective at raising capital for community ownership would seem to be essential; such vehicles have raised over £20m in the last 3 years over the UK across all sectors, and are on track to increase that to £30m by the year-end.

Representations by Portmoak Community Council (PCC) on Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

Preliminary
PCC’s general comment on the bill is that it ignores the potential to use community councils as the elected representatives of their respective areas as the means of empowering those communities. It acknowledges the difficulty created by the fact that not all areas have a community council, but that is largely the result of their being seen as powerless and given (at least in Perth & Kinross) scant recognition by their Local Authorities. If given more concrete functions than they have at the moment there would be more interest in forming and joining Community Councils. For example the introduction of a “Community Controlled Body” into Part 3 of the bill is completely unnecessary in an area where a Community Council (which fits the definition of a Community Controlled Body exactly) is already in existence.

There is no common good asset in PCC’s area and so it has concentrated its attention on Parts 2 and 3 of the Bill.

Parts 2 and 3
An issue which affects both parts is the misuse of the word ‘outcome.’ Its dictionary definition is ‘result or consequence’ yet that is clearly not what it means in Part 2. It appears to be used as a synonym for ‘objective.’ Yet in part 3 it appears most of the time to be intended to convey its dictionary meaning. The clarity of the drafting would be much improved if the word ‘outcome’ were to be avoided and another word, appropriate in the context substituted.

Part 2
Community planning partnerships will consist of officials from councils and the various quangos mentioned. There is no community empowerment in that. They should also include representatives of the community councils in the local authority area by right and not by invitation. Other ‘community bodies’ without statutory authority to speak for their respective communities could still participate by invitation.

Part 3
A community controlled body should only fall within the definition of ‘community participation body’ if there is no community council in that particular area.

The definition of an ‘outcome improvement process’ is verbose and unclear. Should it not be simply ‘a process...established... with a view to improving the provision of a public service’?

In section 17(2) the reason for a request to participate will surely be that the provision of the service is seen to be inadequate, or simply capable of improvement, in some way. That should be stated in this subsection.
1. Introduction

Scottish Enterprise is delighted to contribute to the Committee’s scrutiny of this Bill. As directed by the Committee’s call, and in line with our remit, we have focused primarily on Part 2 of the Bill, on Community Planning.

In contributing to the delivery of the Scottish Government Economic Strategy, we are committed to a strong partnership approach, recognising the real benefits and outcomes that can be achieved from clear alignment and engagement behind a common goal. For each Community Planning Partnership (CPP) in Lowland Scotland (27) we have a designated Location Director, a senior member of SE staff, who leads on our contribution to ensure there is purposeful alignment between our work and that of the partnership.

As statutory partners in Community Planning we have welcomed the renewed focus the Scottish Government has given to improving the process to ensure greater impact and this Bill will contribute to that. We have, in this submission, highlighted aspects of the Bill and what they would mean for our involvement in Community Planning.

2. Local Outcome Plans

One of the key things introduced in Part 2 of the Bill is the Local Outcome Plan. This plan will take into account the needs and circumstances of the local area and any representations arising from the consultation that the CPP must undertake during its development. Each outcome to be improved must be set out, along with a description of the improvement and a timescale.

We welcome this focus on an evidence-based approach to setting tangible, time-bound outcomes. Through an assessment of the opportunities and challenges in an area, the CPP will be better able to identify areas that will benefit from partnership activity. This should also recognise what the appropriate contributions should be from national and local bodies in improving the outcome.

In looking at the needs and opportunities, it is important that each Local Authority area is not treated in isolation. Therefore it is vital that the outcome improvement plan development looks at the regional opportunities through, for example, supply chains or travel-to-work areas. We would suggest that the Regional Advisory Boards are included in the consultation process.

SE’s own activities are informed by, and developed in line with, a robust evidence base and we subject all of our programmes to rigorous evaluation to ensure they deliver the best possible impact. For example, our Account Management service underwent a substantial evaluation last year which identified much strength in the programme, to be welcomed, but also identified areas for improvement. These areas have been looked at and have resulted in an improved service better focused on ensuring businesses get the right service at the right time. Targeted outcome improvement is something with which we are very familiar.
A good example of such evidence-based partnership working to improve a local outcome is Team North Ayrshire. This example (box) shows how SE and a Local Authority can work together to improve local outcomes, through aligning our key strengths and assets.

Team North Ayrshire

North Ayrshire has experienced many years of economic challenge and it was clear that there was a need to expand and increase the business base, improve skill levels and redevelop town centres to provide a basis for future improvement.

Acknowledging this challenge, SE and North Ayrshire Council (NAC) developed an Economic and Regeneration Strategy to support the area's businesses, increase economic growth and attract inward investment.

Partnership working, across both public and private sectors, and ensuring that resources fully supported delivery, were crucial to the success of the strategy. SE engagement was informed by our strategic framework based on the principles of supporting growth, maximising opportunities, developing partnerships and facilitating full engagement. This framework approach led SE to bring its expertise, experience, knowledge and networks to the table and help form an alliance-based partnership.

Reviewing the existing business support model, and with support from SE, NAC created an Economic Development and Regeneration Board consisting of both public and private sector board members. This mixture of public and private working allows an appreciation of the concerns raised by the business base whilst also accepting the structure in which progress can be delivered.

This work culminated in the board's principal goal, to deliver tailored business support to approximately 150 North Ayrshire companies. From there, the result was the formation, in December 2013, of Team North Ayrshire: a network of public and private partners dedicated to driving the area's business growth and offer local access to expertise and financial support.

In supporting this development, SE's Company Growth team brought invaluable expertise, for example sharing best practice from SE's Account Management Programme and the SE Competency Framework for Account Managers.

Team North Ayrshire is now providing local businesses one dedicated, streamlined single point of contact for advice, support and assistance. The partnership is growing and already includes representatives from the education, tourism and hospitality sectors. SE will continue working alongside the council as the new economic strategy develops.

3. Involvement of Community Bodies

A vital part of the evidence base for any outcome improvement plan is the views of the end user of the service being improved. As such, we welcome the prominence given in the Bill to the involvement of the community in developing the outcome improvement plans and involvement in the CPP.

In particular however, we would like to draw attention to the importance of involving the business community. This has, in the past, been quite difficult due to the high level nature of the Single Outcome Agreements. Given the focus on sustainable economic growth it is critical that the business voice is heard. With evidence-based improvement plans focused on tangible outcomes however, local businesses and business groups are more likely to become involved.
This being the case, and recognising the past difficulty, we would like to see the guidance on community involvement explicitly mention the business community.

The Team North Ayrshire example shows that, with such a solid evidence-based plan, it is possible to get private sector participation at thematic level in Community Planning. It also shows the value in having service delivery agents and representatives of their customer base working together in the delivery of a strategic plan.

4. Participation Requests

SE is mentioned as a public sector authority in relation to part 3 of the Bill on participation requests. This provides for community participation bodies to request involvement in an outcome improvement process.

We would welcome further clarification in guidance on how this will work in practice. 17(2)(a) refers to an outcome resulting from a service provided to the public by the authority. SE does not deliver services to the public at large but to a particular subset of businesses which have growth potential. It would therefore be helpful to clarify what form the community participation body could take, and in what way they can be involved.

Involving our customers, and the business community, in the identification and improvement of our services is standard practice in Scottish Enterprise. At the strategic level, our approach to industry sectors is informed by sector strategies, developed for and by the industry itself through Industry Leadership Groups (ILGs), which are majority private sector bodies providing strategic leadership and advice to both industry and the public sector in Scotland.

As mentioned above, we subject all of our programmes to a rigorous evaluation, both to ensure that they are delivering as they should and to identify areas for improvement. In this, engagement with customers in receipt of the service is crucial. For example, at the core of the Account Management evaluation last year was engagement with 601 companies which had been account managed at some point over the previous four years.

5. Conclusion

We hope this submission proves useful to the Committee in its consideration of the Community Empowerment Bill. We look forward to discussing this further at the round table on 1 October.
Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill – Written Evidence at Stage 1

Introduction
The Equality and Human Rights Commission (EHRC) is the National Equality Body (NEB)\(^1\) for Scotland, England and Wales, working across the nine protected grounds set out in the Equality Act 2010: age, disability, gender, race, religion and belief, pregnancy and maternity, marriage and civil partnership, sexual orientation and gender reassignment. We are an “A-status” National Human Rights Institution (NHRI)\(^2\), and share our human rights mandate in Scotland with our colleagues in the Scottish Human Rights Commission (SHRC).

The Commission welcomes the opportunity to comment on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill at Stage 1. We have previously responded to the pre-legislative consultation on the Bill, and have discussed its provisions with ministers and officials. As we have made clear in these discussions, there are a number of areas – such as community planning, setting and meeting outcomes, and community involvement and participation – where the Bill’s proposals resonate with the existing regulatory and policy framework for equalities in Scotland. This response will briefly set out that framework before looking at the Bill’s provisions.

The Public Sector Equality Duty
The general equality duty, as set out the Equality Act 2010, requires public authorities, in the exercise of their functions, to have due regard to the need to:

- Eliminate unlawful discrimination, harassment and victimisation and other prohibited conduct
- Advance equality of opportunity between people who share a relevant protected characteristic and those who do not
- Foster good relations between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.

\(^1\) www.equineteurope.org/-Equality-bodies-

The duty is to ensure that public authorities and those carrying out a public function consider how they can positively contribute to a more equal society through advancing equality and good relations in their day-to-day business, to:

- Take effective action on equality
- Make the right decisions, first time around
- Develop better policies and practices, based on evidence
- Be more transparent, accessible and accountable
- Deliver improved outcomes for all.

Key public authorities, such as councils, health boards, and Police Scotland, are subject to the specific devolved equality duties which set out the steps they must take to meet the requirements of the general duty, and to publish information on, among other areas, the outcomes set for different equality groups in their geographical or policy area.

Analysis undertaken by The Equality and Human Rights Commission in 2013 suggests that only one in three of the listed public bodies in Scotland have robust – i.e. clear, measurable and evidence-based – equality outcomes in place. Whilst the Commission is taking remedial action to improve the weakest of these sets of outcomes it is discouraging to note that such a high proportion of Scottish PAs were unable to equality outcomes. This suggests that there is still a significant issue of equalities capacity in PA which is preventing effective mainstreaming of equality issues.

We note the reference to the centrality of equality and human rights to the bill’s aims, as set out in the Policy Memorandum (para 6) and look forward to the publication of the Equality Impact Assessment for the Bill. Given the centrality of equality principles, law and policy to the Bill’s proposals, it would have been helpful to have seen the Equality Impact Assessment earlier in Stage 1: at the time of writing (late August) it is still not available.

Comments on the Bill

National Outcomes: The EHRC strongly supports the outcomes approach to policy in Scotland. As the policy memorandum accompanying the bill mentions, this approach has been recognised internationally as defining national policy goals and measuring progress. We therefore support the proposal to place National Outcomes on a statutory footing, and well as the requirement to consult on and regularly review these outcomes.

However, as the evidence above suggests, more work is needed to support public authorities to set robust, meaningful outcomes, and to ensure proper alignment with existing requirements such as the Public Sector Equality Duty. We note the work already underway to improve performance under the PSED\(^6\) and would welcome more detail on how ministers intend to assist public bodies and the communities they serve understand better how to set clear and robust outcomes. We would also urge early consideration of how these new statutory outcomes will be aligned with ministers’ and public bodies’ responsibilities under the Public Sector Equality Duties.

It is also important to recognise that, since the launch of the consultation on the draft Bill, Scotland’s first National Action Plan for Human Rights (SNAP) was launched\(^7\). The plan has empowerment – “increasing people's understanding of human rights and their participation in decisions”\(^8\) – as one of its main priorities, and the highlights Community Planning and the present Bill as key opportunities for doing so. As with the Public Sector Equality Duty, we would expect to see over time the closer alignment of the Scottish Government’s National Performance Framework with SNAP.

Community Planning and Local Outcomes: the policy memorandum cites public service reform and the recommendations of the Christie Commission as principal policy drivers for the Bill. The Commission endorses the approach set out in the Christie recommendations particularly in relation to the mutually-reinforcing nature of equality, participation, prevention and high-quality public services\(^9\).

\(^7\) www.scottishhumanrights.com/actionplan
\(^8\) www.scottishhumanrights.com/actionplan/bcempowerment
As much local engagement, prioritisation and outcome-setting is now done through Community Planning Partnerships, the EHRC would support placing CPPs on a statutory footing. We would recommend that:

- Adequate attention is given to effective “read-across” from individual public authorities’ equality outcomes and the outcomes set by statutory CPPs. This will also be important for other multi-agency outcome-setting processes, particularly the new health and social care partnerships.
- CPPs as statutory bodies in their own right should be covered by the General Duty of the PSED. The question of whether they should also be covered by the devolved specific equality duties should be kept under review. For example, should CPPs begin to take on more of a role in procurement, or policy formation this may be an area where it would be useful to have more structured approaches to equality.

Participation Requests: The EHRC’s guidance on involvement and the Public Sector Equality Duty makes clear, active, ongoing, structured and focused involvement helps public bodies better understand the communities they serve, and provides the evidence on which to develop robust and measurable outcomes. We therefore support the proposals to give community participation bodies the right to make a request to participate in an outcome improvement process.

We welcome the policy memorandum’s recognition of stakeholders’ concerns on the importance of ensuring that community bodies are open, inclusive and genuinely representative (paragraph 46). As the EHRC noted in our evidence in the draft Bill, this is particularly important where participation requests relate to sometimes contentious local issues such as, for example, the provision of stopping places and authorised encampments for Gypsies/Travellers.

With this in mind, we would recommend accompanying guidance in this provision makes refers public authorities back to their existing responsibilities.

in relation to the elimination of unlawful discrimination, advancement of equality and fostering good relations.

Community Right to Buy: the EHRC supports the policy intention of extending the provisions of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 so that they apply throughout Scotland, not just rural areas. We would however underline that where an asset passes from a public authority to community ownership, the public authority must have due regard to the need to meet the three requirements of the General Equality Duty in managing that process.

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill - Written evidence for the Local Government and Regeneration Committee

Introduction

Voluntary Health Scotland is the national intermediary for a network of voluntary health organisations and workers. Our members range from large national health charities to small, local service providers, and members’ interests span service planning and provision, prevention, early intervention, self-management, advocacy, and support for service users and carers.

We welcome the opportunity to respond to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee’s call for evidence on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. We support the policy principles behind the Bill, as described in the Policy Memorandum, that aim to empower communities and improve the processes of community planning within public service reform.

However, there are areas that could be strengthened to ensure that communities have the capacity and support to inform, influence and shape services more effectively. The policy memorandum recognises that there are differences in levels of involvement, engagement and empowerment across Scotland, but there needs to be a stronger emphasis on addressing inequalities, and empowering and building capacity with local communities.

Consultation

The Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill has the potential to empower communities by placing community planning partnerships (CPP) on a statutory footing. This will place a stronger emphasis on delivering better outcomes for people using public services and should complement outcomes established in the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Act 2014.

However, the legislation does not go far enough. It states that a CPP must make all reasonable efforts to secure the participation of any community bodies considered likely to contribute to community planning, and take reasonable steps to enable them to do so. Following the recommendations of the Christie Commission on the Future Delivery of Public Services, this should be strengthened to include a significant focus on communities coming together to not only participate, but to co-produce services.
Co-production recognises the skills and assets of people in designing and delivering services. Full engagement for the people who use support and services, and the third sector, is necessary to meet the needs and requirements of people in their local communities. The Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill should ensure that people are meaningfully engaged in this process, and there are mechanisms in place to monitor and report on this involvement.

In addition, the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill does not detail the support needed to allow communities to take advantage of its provisions on an equal basis. The policy memorandum acknowledges that, to date, there have been variable levels of empowerment and engagement between public sector organisations and community groups, stating that:

While this legislation seeks to address this inconsistency and promote best practice throughout Scotland, it is vital that the capacity of all community groups is supported at local levels by public sector partners to ensure that the most vulnerable groups are not further marginalised, and in turn, inequalities are not strengthened by the legislation.

Our concern is that there are no provisions for how public bodies should support less empowered community bodies, or those who are unable to mobilise their own participation to take advantage of the routes of engagement. We support the addition of provisions to ensure that there are mechanisms and resources in place to support, empower and capacity-build with local communities and organisations to support them to adequately engage with the process.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

The development of national outcomes provides a clear focus and steer to public bodies, however it is imperative that communities have the opportunity to contribute to the shaping of those outcomes.

The policy memorandum states that ‘Scotland’s people are its greatest asset: they are best placed to make decisions about our future, and to know what is needed to deliver sustainable and resilient communities’.

Empowering and engaging local communities will strengthen community planning processes and provide a significant focus on outcomes, and improved local outcomes.

We welcome the provisions in the Bill, however, as previously stated in our response to question 1; our concern is that the legislation may unintentionally have a negative impact on inequalities. Community bodies that are already empowered or have the capacity to engage will benefit the most from these opportunities. The most marginalised and vulnerable groups might not be in a position to take advantage.

We would therefore strongly support the addition of provisions to ensure that there are mechanisms and resources in place to support, empower and capacity-build with all local communities and organisations, particularly those from disadvantaged communities/areas, to support them to adequately engage with the process. The legislation should ensure that there are mechanisms in place to monitor and report on community involvement.

Overall, we are content with the provisions of the Bill, but we would like to see a genuine focus on a human rights based approach and a real commitment to reducing, preventing and reversing health inequalities. We recommend the addition of provisions to ensure that there are mechanisms and resources in place to support, empower and capacity-build with all local communities and organisations, particularly those from disadvantaged communities/areas, to support them to adequately engage with the process.

We welcome Section 25 of the Bill which deals with reporting and believe this reporting requirement will ensure a robust planning and evaluation process. However, we would also like to see a provision to ensure that people and communities have the opportunity to report on their experiences of their involvement and engagement in the process and whether this has contributed to delivering national outcomes.

COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL

1. This is the response from Scottish Natural Heritage (SNH) to the call for evidence from the Local Government and Regeneration Committee as part of the Stage 1 consideration of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

2. We have been pleased to contribute to the development of this legislation, through our response to the consultation on the draft Bill which concluded on 24th January 2014, and on the earlier exploratory consultation which closed on 26 September 2012.

Q1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

3. We welcome the Bill, which reflects and builds on the Christie Commission agenda. The Bill sets out approaches to community involvement in service delivery, land ownership and asset management. We believe that the combination of a strengthened framework for community planning, a wider right to buy, increased co-production of services and a stronger focus on outcomes should all help to empower communities.

4. While this legislation should do much to empower communities, a key need is for these communities to have the skills and capacity to engage fully in the opportunities that the legislation should help provide. SNH believes that the current capacity of community groups in relation to environmental issues varies considerably and that many communities and groups (including Community Councils) will need further support and capacity-building in order to take up these opportunities. In recent years, our Sharing Good Practice programme and Learning Through Doing project have helped some community groups to develop more skills and capacity. Developing these sorts of approaches should help, and we would be ready to support such work in the environment field.

Q2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

5. We comment here on the individual Parts in the Bill.

Part 2 Community Planning

6. We support efforts to strengthen and extend community planning, including the widening of the membership of Community Planning Partnerships to include SNH and the other bodies listed in Schedule 1. Requiring the bodies listed to engage where there is a need for them to do so is more likely to bring about the joint working that is required to help areas that have multiple disadvantages and to improve places for people.

7. SNH believes that whilst we are well-engaged with some CPPs we have struggled to become involved with others, particularly in the Central Belt. Schedule 1 begins to illustrate the range of partners and expertise required to help deliver shared outcomes, and this may help to switch the emphasis from some organisations ‘pushing’ to get involved in relevant CPPs to seeing a ‘pull’ from Partnerships and communities for their input.

8. To be consistent, Historic Scotland could be added to the list of community planning partners in Schedule 1 (they acquire NDPB status with the creation of Historic Environment Scotland Scotland in 2015).

9. We welcome the clarification of the roles and responsibilities of community planning partners, particularly around governance.

10. The Bill introduces a requirement for community planning partners to produce a local outcome improvement plan. Given that the Policy Memorandum states that the recently completed Single Outcome Agreements are the equivalent of Local Outcome Improvement Plans, it might be helpful to use one term or the other. This should help to avoid any confusion when the legislation is implemented.

Part 3 Participation requests

11. Co-production is a major theme of the Christie Commission recommendations on the future delivery of public services in Scotland. Together with SEPA, we have been exploring the implications of this for our work and for the environmental sector in general, as set out in the published report on social productivity carried out for us by the Royal Society of Arts. From this it is clear that co-production requires significant changes in the way that the public sector works, and the Bill provides for many of these. We are also working with the Scottish Leaders Forum through their Skilled Workers Skilled Citizens initiative to build capacity in SNH for this approach.

12. The Bill requires that a Participation Request be accompanied by a simple statement of benefits, basically “an explanation of the improvement in the specified outcome”. The Bill also states that the public body receiving the request must evaluate it against a list of factors (Section 19 (3)). For the avoidance of doubt, it would be helpful if the legislation was clear on whether all of these factors need to be considered in every case, or only those that are appropriate.

Part 4 Community Right to Buy Land

13. Paragraph 73 of the Consultation on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill, 2013 stated that “Land which is intended for recognised conservation purposes would not be considered to be neglected or abandoned.” This does not seem to be reflected in Section 48 of the Bill.

14. In our response to the consultation, we commented that the term neglected or abandoned land should be defined so as to exclude land that is delivering wider public goods in the form of ecosystem services despite it not being “actively” managed. The absence of active management is not necessarily a sign of “abandonment” or “neglect”. For example, areas of peatland might be helping to deliver carbon capture, which is part of the Scottish Government’s response to climate change. Owning and managing land for nature conservation is an important land use. We would welcome the legislation reflecting the statement made in the consultation on the draft Bill.

15. The identification of community assets could be done through collaborative ‘co-production’ approaches involving local communities.

Part 5 Asset Transfer Requests

16. SNH has been involved in the transfer of local assets to the community on Rum. It is possible that community bodies may apply to organisations like SNH for funding and advice in support of managing natural assets that are transferred. This may have resource implications but this is very dependent on each case and so it is difficult to estimate generally.

17. Details of what is to be included in an asset transfer request are expected to be set out in (forthcoming) Regulations. We would hope that these include the need to demonstrate that any transfer would be financially sustainable in the long term, providing confidence that the proposed benefits can realistically be achieved.

18. It might be helpful to consider whether the requirements under Part 5 could be aligned with those under Part 4, so that a community body would need to set out a “plan for the land” to help show how the transfer of that land would be “in the public interest and compatible with furthering the achievement of sustainable development in relation to the land”. This would build on what we believe has been productive experience for all parties in negotiating purchase of community woodlands and other land assets under the Community Right to Buy.

Q3. Do you consider communities across Scotland have the capabilities to take advantage of the provisions in the Bill? If not, what requires to be done to the Bill, or to assist communities, to ensure this happens?

19. Please see our response to Q1 above.

Q4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

20. We have no comment on this question.

Q5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

21. We have no comment on this question.
Dear Sir

COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL

Oban Community Council is pleased to support the provisions of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. We believe that this Bill shall bring additional powers to communities to progress projects and initiatives which shall advance economic and social development.

In relation to the proposed ‘Community Right to Buy Abandoned or Neglected Land’, we note that the definition of eligible land is land which is in the opinion of Ministers wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected.

We consider that it will be very difficult for community groups to persuade Ministers that land is abandoned. It is quite difficult to envisage the circumstances when a Court of Law would rule that land had been truly abandoned, as it would only take some minor activity to take place upon the land to convince otherwise.

It may be easier for communities to present an argument that land has been neglected, although we have concerns that this would also end up in a legal dispute concerning the definition of neglected. Community groups reliant on volunteers, and with limited financial resources, would find it difficult to pursue the registration of interest in land in such circumstances.

We note in the Explanatory Notes supporting the Bill that the concept of abandoned or neglected land is ‘for the purpose of the sustainable development of that land’. We would suggest, therefore, that the wording of the Bill itself be changed to define eligible land as land which is in the opinion of Ministers wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected having regard to its potential in furthering sustainable development.
Call for evidence (June 2014)

1 Background

1.1 The Scottish Health Council was established in April 2005 to promote improvements in the quality and extent of public involvement in the NHS in Scotland. It supports and monitors work carried out by NHS Boards to involve patients and the public in the planning and development of health services and in decisions that affect the operation of those services. The Scottish Health Council has a network of 14 local offices across Scotland and a National Office in Glasgow. The Scottish Health Council is part of Healthcare Improvement Scotland.

2 Introduction

2.1 The Scottish Health Council welcomes the opportunity to respond to this consultation. Our interest relates particularly to public involvement, community engagement and how well people are involved and supported in the planning and delivery of services. In that context, Healthcare Improvement Scotland and the Scottish Health Council (working closely with Scottish Government officials, third sector and representative organisations, service users and members of the public) are currently working on developing proposals (due in December 2014) which will ensure that the views and experience of service users and the public define health and social care services in future. This follows an announcement by the Cabinet Secretary for Health and Wellbeing in June 2014 that voices of our patients, those receiving care and their families, needed to be heard in a much clearer and stronger way.

2.2 The Scottish Government’s ambition is to ensure that our services are co-produced with the communities they serve, build on people’s assets and support the health and wellbeing of the whole person and their family. The Scottish Health Council believes that this can only be achieved by creating a much stronger voice for people and communities using services. A voice that is respected, representative and informed and focused on improving outcomes and has a key role in driving the future shape of health and social care services nationally and locally.
2.3 Also, recognising people as assets brings demonstrable benefits to individual and community health and wellbeing. Co-design and co-production are essential as we tackle the continuing challenge posed by health inequalities.

3 Comments

Comments relating to specific sections of the Bill are outlined below.

3.1 Section 4 highlights the important role of community bodies contributing to community planning. There is, however, no mention of how they will supported to make contributions so as to ensure their involvement is meaningful.

3.2 Section 7 mentions that Community Planning Partnerships will be required to produce a Local Outcomes Improvement Plan and publish it. They will also be required to "prepare" a progress report. There is no indication of whether the intention is for the Progress Report to be published. The Scottish Health Council suggests that both reports are published and in accessible formats.

3.3 Section 15, talks about the involvement of "Community Controlled Bodies". It would be useful to include a short description of what they are and/or an example for clarity purposes.

3.4 Section 18 highlights that communities can recommend topics for consideration of outcome improvements. Whilst the process for submitting them is quite clear as well as the criteria, there doesn't seem to be much about any prioritisation process. It would be helpful to make that element clearer.

3.5 With regards to Section 17, the Scottish Health Council supports the process as outlined for dealing with participation requests or communities asking to take part in a process to improve the outcome. It is important to recognise that participation requests should, however, not negate the responsibility on public bodies to engage proactively but instead enable community groups to make a more formal approach to them if they felt necessary (and with the body then having to respond in an open and transparent way).

3.6 Section 20 describes the outcome improvement process in agreeing to a participation request by a community participation body. It does not offer any further description as to how this may operate in practice, and without this the extent and remit of participation could become inconsistent. It may benefit from the reference of recognised standards such as the National Standards for Community Engagement to inform practice.

Response to the Call for Evidence

Preamble

The Bill is a mix of specific provisions with little commonality and cohesion.

Its primary purpose as set out in the Policy Memorandum is the firming up of National Outcomes – Part 1. These outcomes, Single Outcome Agreements [SOAs], are to be achieved by Community Planning through the strengthening of local authority Community Planning Partnerships (CPPs) - Part 2. Communities may set themselves up as Community bodies to assist the CPPs in delivering services to their communities - Part 3. However the Bill provides no guidance on which services such Community bodies might target – they may choose to come forward in an ad-hoc way. Further provisions are made within the Bill that are largely ‘catch ups’ – the extension of the Right to Buy to urban as well as rural areas – Part 4; Requests from Communities for transfer of under used or derelict public assets – Part 5; auditing of Common Good Properties – Part 6; formalisation of Allotments – Part 7 and setting of Non-domestic Rates.

The five points:

<th>1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<td>I consider that the Community Empowerment Bill is built on the wrong premise. The title itself is misleading. The Bill has nothing to do with decentralising local democracy below the existing local authority level. Indeed bullet 6 of paragraph 25 specifically excludes from this Bill any immediate change in the democratic responsibilities of Community Councils. Paragraph 191 of the Consultation to the Community Empowerment Bill itself states: ‘We also recognise that councils [local authorities] are the level of government closest to the citizen. This is currently the situation; local authorities are indeed to level of government closest to the citizen. But as the COSLA in its sponsored report COMMISSION ON STRENGTHENING LOCAL DEMOCRACY forcibly states this is not tenable for a modern state. For example the democracy appropriate for our town Linlithgow is very different from that that is appropriate for the ex coal mining towns of Uphall, Broxburn and Armadale and that from the burgeoning new town of Livingston yet it comes under the West Lothian local authority. One can hardly imagine the needs of the Highland Council covering as it does an</td> area larger than Belgium; the same will be true of a city like Glasgow.

If the Bill is to go ahead as it stands it will allow communities to help their local authorities to undertake work set out in the Single Outcome Agreements (SOAs) and by extension the Scottish Government to improve services to their communities. However very little in the Bill indicates that Communities will be empowered to undertake work that is outwith a local authority’s SOA. The extra powers that the Bill will give to Community Planning Partnerships will further tighten the rein that the Scottish Government has over the scope and flexibility of public services. Witness the centralisation of the Scottish Police Service – it should be evident that the policing of the large cities is very different from that from highland rural areas.

Elliot Bulmer in ‘A Model Constitution For Scotland’, commissioned by the Constitution Commission, features the lack of local democracy, page 90, and advocates a number of ‘lower tier’ authorities consisting of the restored Burgh Councils and reinvigorated Community Councils with proper budgets and paid staff, to which certain powers could be delegated. – see also Article VI of his draft constitution – Local Government.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

The public sector will be able to save money by Community Bodies taking over work that the public sector would have done themselves. In the cash strapped economy we are in, this may well be seen by Government as beneficial.

Some Communities may well be in a position to help themselves within the scope of Point 1. Such Communities are likely to be ones where its citizens have the time and good access to non-governmental funding to do so. The Bill as written indicates that the Government does not propose to help Communities with any finance directly. Witness Community Buy-out where community bodies will need to seek funds from charitable organisation

And it should be noted that even the Government’s Annex A in response to the Call for Evidence gives little concrete evidence that empowering Communities is a real ‘goer’

The specific provisions for extending Community Right to Buy, Asset Transfer and Common Good Property look appropriate. However the provisions for National Outcomes, Community Planning and Participation Requests look to provide for increased central government control through the strengthening of the Community Planning Partnerships:
the latter in particular are formal organisations who at least currently have little connection or knowledge of local communities. In this latter respect I am not content. As stated in Point 1. the Bill makes no provision for further local democracy – for Communities to decide and implement what are the priorities for their own areas. These will continue to be exercised by the existing local authorities and their Community Planning Partnerships. I would like to see a provision for local communities to apply by petition to the Scottish Government for delegation of powers to local town or parish councils.

I refer to paragraph 12 of the Policy Memorandum

Democratic Engagement

12. Local government and other public service providers increasingly use a range of community engagement and participatory activities to seek views on their service delivery. This recognises that representative democracy needs to be complemented by other ways in which people can express their views and influence decisions which affect them. Such activities can in turn inspire increased engagement with local and national government. When people are actively engaged in tackling issues in their communities, have direct contact with elected representatives and feel that they can influence decisions, they are more likely to become involved in the electoral process themselves, whether at Community Council, local authority or national level. This enhances the relationship between elected members and the communities they represent and can lead to better-informed decision making all round.

This paragraph is laudable but it would be so much more laudable if citizens were able to be responsible for managing and prioritising through their own democratically elected bodies what public services they need for the flourishing of their own communities; a major irritant in Linlithgow is ‘parking’ – recently parking attendants were dispensed with and the responsibility for parking is now transferred to the police – but the police have no resources to do so. If Linlithgow had its own local council it could decide to provide funds for reinstating a parking attendant if it wishes to allocate funds for this provision. Again West Lothian council in its SOA is targeting an increase for its 4 key visitor attractions by 16% over the next four years - how much more appropriate for Linlithgow itself together with Historic Scotland to come forward with its own figures and involving the whole town to ensure that its figures are achieved in the way most appropriate. On a wider scale in

<td>As the Bill focuses on Community Bodies helping themselves within the constraints of Government Policy, the Communities likely to participate most effectively are those with time and money to do so. This militates against the poorer less well-off communities who may well be those that would benefit most from improved public services. Without Government money it is unlikely that there will be many more Island Buy-outs as happened in Eigg, Gigha and Knoydart – all supported by independent charities. Call for Evidence Response to:

The Scottish Parliament’s Local Government and Regeneration Committee has launched a call for written evidence as part of its Stage 1 consideration of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. This Government Bill was introduced into the Scottish Parliament, on 11 June 2014.

Organisations are invited to submit written evidence to the Committee setting out their views on the provisions of the Bill. The Committee has stated it would be helpful if written submissions could address the following questions —

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

   SAS Response

   There is an opportunity for communities to become more involved in the design and delivery of services through improved use of local assets. The Scottish Ambulance Service is supportive of this approach and recognises the benefit for communities where improved partnerships with traditional service providers leads to increased community resilience. An example of this exists on the Ardnamurchan peninsula where the community have redesigned the use of a local building to allow them to access clinicians and care advice via a tele-health link.

   SAS Response

   The benefits to public sector organisations will be an increased opportunity to co-design and produce a local service model which the community recognises as being fit for purpose and supports. This will help address areas where delivering traditional a service model is impractical and/or unaffordable. It will also offer opportunities for public services to have access to local buildings, which have passed into community ownership, in support of delivering the service locally e.g. for the SAS increasing the number of stand-by and deployment points.

   In terms of disadvantages there is a potential risk within Part 3: Participation Requests which could result in ill informed challenges to public service delivery which requires mitigation through effective ongoing local engagement.

   SAS Response

   Broadly, we are confident that communities have the capability to take advantage of the Bill. Where there are difficulties in individual cases partners within public sector organisations should be able to effectively assist communities to achieve their aims obviously dependant on the issue.
4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

SAS Response

The provisions within the bill seem reasonable however guidance is required to ensure there is consistency within the partnership process. This is particularly relevant to the Scottish Ambulance Service given that, as a national service, we will engage with all 32 Community Planning Partnerships across Scotland.

5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

Having reviewed the Bill in the context of these questions I have provided responses to the questions I feel are relevant to the business of the Scottish Ambulance Service.

I’d therefore ask the Executive Team to endorse the response to this call for evidence request.

Head of Strategy Implementation
Reform Scotland submission to the consultation on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

I am pleased to respond to the Local Government & Regeneration Committee’s consultation on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

I refer to part 8 of the bill which includes provisions for local relief schemes to NDR as well as additional measures which Reform Scotland believes would improve community empowerment in Scotland.

NDR relief scheme

Whilst the ability to create localised relief schemes to reflect local needs and support communities proposed by the bill is to be welcomed, we would like to see far greater decentralisation. Reform Scotland believes that each tier of government should be responsible for raising the majority of what it spends. Councils in Scotland today arguably have no real control over raising the tax revenue they spend (due to centralisation of NDR and the council tax freeze) despite being responsible for a significant proportion of expenditure.

Our report Local Taxes, published in March 2012, explained in detail how council tax and non-domestic rates could be properly devolved to councils, giving them far greater control over raising the money they spent, as explained below.

Business rates are a form of local taxation and Reform Scotland believes that as well as collecting the tax, councils should be responsible for setting it too. Just as it has been argued that there is little incentive for the Scottish Government to improve the economy if any increase in revenue as a result of greater economic growth is returned to Westminster, the same argument applies to business rates. There is little incentive for an individual council to develop the local economy if any increase in business rate revenue resulting from a stronger local economy is simply returned to Holyrood. Devolving business rates to local councils would restore the link between local economic development and higher revenues. It would give councils a real incentive to work with local businesses to improve the performance of the local economy.

Devolving business rates would obviously lead to a reduction in the grant given to councils and would result in a situation of net winners and losers since some councils account for a larger proportion of business rate revenue collected relative to their resident populations than others. Some of this is due to differences in economic performance across the country and some due to council boundaries not reflecting real economic flows. Reform Scotland recommends that, in the first year of operation, the Scottish Government grants to each council should be based on the grant they received the previous year, less the business rates collected from the council area. Councils would then receive the revenue raised from business rates in their area, with the remaining part of their revenue grant adjusted to ensure no council was better or worse off.

Each council would then have to decide whether to retain the business rates inherited or to seek to increase or reduce business rates. Councils would have an incentive to provide a competitive economic environment. A council could seek to increase business rates which might have the effect of increasing income in the short term, but is likely to lead to poorer economic performance and lower income from business rates in the longer term. However, the increase in local financial accountability is more likely to provide an incentive for councils to design business taxation policies and broader local economic development strategies to support the growth of local businesses, encourage new business start-ups and attract businesses to invest since this will benefit the council directly by increasing its income from business taxes.

Passing control of business rates to local authorities would also mean giving them control over business rates relief schemes. As a result, it would be up to each individual local authority how the tax operated within their area.

Reform Scotland also believes that local authorities should be able to introduce other taxes, such as a ‘bed tax’, if they feel they are appropriate for their area. If the electorate disagrees, they can register this protest at the ballot box. Such schemes also increase diversity and allow councils to learn from the experiences of other local authorities. Importantly, they also make councils less dependent on central government grants.

As well as giving local authorities freedom to raise and cut council tax as they see fit, we also believe that local councils should be able to choose to whom the tax applies, where discounts can be offered and indeed the type of local tax they wish to operate. There are a number of different types of local taxes which are used around the world; each with its own pros and cons. Reform Scotland believes that it should be up to local authorities to decide what type of tax system they want. There is no reason why, for example, Edinburgh couldn’t operate a council tax system while Midlothian used a Land Value Tax. By allowing different forms of tax to exist around Scotland, this would help to increase diversity as well as discovering which systems work best for different communities.

Reform Scotland’s proposed reform to local democracy Devolution was never supposed to stop at Holyrood, but increasingly this seems to be the case. This is why Reform Scotland’s reports on a range of issues from healthcare to policing and finance to planning have argued that more power needs to be devolved down to our local authorities and beyond to make those services more responsive to local needs and priorities as well as making service delivery more accountable and transparent.

We believe that local authorities should have greater fiscal powers to help ensure that they are responsible for a greater proportion of their own expenditure. Given the current limitations of the fiscal powers of the Scottish Parliament, at present this could be done only by giving councils full power over council tax and non-domestic rates, which would also require legislation to enable the councils to have control over issues such as the tax base, the bands, discounts etc. Further powers could be devolved once they are first devolved to Holyrood.

Reform Scotland favours a diverse structure of local government in Scotland, reflecting the diverse circumstances of the different parts of Scotland. Two options which we feel should be considered by the new councils would be an enhanced area committee system where more decisions are taken for the local area by the councillors from that area and directly-elected mayors, or provosts as they could be known in Scotland. Reform Scotland does not believe that either of these options should be forced on a local authority from the centre, but should be options that they could introduce should they wish. To enable this, Reform Scotland would recommend the introduction of legislation which would allow local authority areas to hold referendums on the introduction of a directly-elected mayor, or provost, where 5 per cent of the population signs a petition or a council resolution is passed. Elected civic leaders would help address the problems of local government’s lack of visibility and, therefore, accountability. As they are elected by the public across their council area, rather than just one council ward, they have a stronger democratic mandate and a much greater incentive to focus on responding to the concerns of their electorate.

Local authorities should, in turn, consider devolving greater responsibilities to community councils in order to better involve the local community and encourage participation within community councils. While some community councils are viewed as effective, others are not and participation is low. However, just as is the case with local government, if a community council is seen to have no meaningful role in a community it is very difficult to encourage volunteers to become interested and increasing responsibilities should help address this issue.

Reform Scotland does not think there should be a single model for community councils across Scotland, rather local communities in conjunction with their local authority should develop a system that best suits their area and circumstance.

Worryingly, there appears to be an appetite for reforming public services by bringing more power to the centre. While this may be being done in the name of efficiency (i.e. apparent financial savings from merging the police) or to save people money (council tax freeze), the end result is the erosion of local accountability and decision making.

Whilst there is near unanimity that more powers should be passed down to Holyrood, on the basis that politicians in Scotland are better placed to make decisions for the people of Scotland, this argument has yet to apply to local government in Scotland.

Reform Scotland believes there needs to be a fundamental change in approach towards extending devolution beyond Holyrood.

Yours sincerely,

Geoff Mawdsley
Director, Reform Scotland
For 130 years, as the RSSPCC and now as CHILDREN 1ST, we have campaigned for every child in Scotland to enjoy a better start in life and for no child to grow up in fear of abuse and violence. We will continue to be a strong public voice for vulnerable children and young people in Scotland, listening to them, to influence public policy and attitudes. Then, now and for another 130 years, as long as Scotland's children need us.

CHILDREN 1ST has 63 local services and five national services across Scotland, and we work closely with many local authorities as well as working in partnership with other organisations. All our services are child centred and the children, young people and families we support are key partners in all aspects of our work.

CHILDREN 1ST welcomes the opportunity to provide written evidence to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee on the general principles of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. We welcome this bill and support its general principles, particularly its ambition to remove barriers to make it easier for communities to engage and play a more proactive role in community planning. However, we consider this bill could go further to ensure that children and young people, and vulnerable families are able to participate.

Summary of our key points:

- There should be a duty for Ministers to consult with children and young people on the National Outcomes
- There should be a duty for Community Planning Partnerships (CPPs) to consult with children and young people
- This bill does not address the barriers to community engagement for many members of the community
- Third Sector Interfaces should be part of CPPs
- This bill needs to link with the aims and duties of children’s services planning as set out in Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014
- The bill should work to further UNCRC, the child poverty strategy and wellbeing of children and young people

We note that this bill does not mention children and young people and their role in community empowerment. The Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014 places duties on Scottish Ministers to take UNCRC requirements into account, and we therefore consider that a Child Rights Impact Assessment should have been conducted to assess the bill’s impact on the rights of children.
We also consider it important for the bill to connect with other Scottish Government national policies that strengthen our communities and would like to see the bill link with the work and the stretch aims of the Early Years collaborative; a main driver of the community assets based approach.

Early intervention and prevention is a key aim of children’s services planning in the new Children and Young People (Scotland) Act. The Community Empowerment bill is an opportunity to focus and connect this important aim into all community planning and participation, to enhance the delivery of services and to prevent issues arising, particularly for children.

Part 1 – National Outcomes

CHILDREN 1ST support placing the National Outcomes in legislation and are pleased that there is a duty on Scottish Ministers to consult on the outcomes. We would like to see a duty for Ministers to consult with children and young people here, and for this to be outlined on the face of the bill. All the current national outcomes already set by Ministers relate to children’s everyday lives, and it is necessary and important to include children and young people in decisions which will impact them. Doing this will adhere to Article 12 of the UNCRC.

Part 2 Community Planning

CHILDREN 1ST is pleased that Part 2 of the bill provides a statutory basis for community planning partnerships and that the bill defines community planning as the process by which public bodies work together and with community bodies to plan for, resource and provide services to improve local outcomes. However we have concerns about whether this bill will actually enable all members of the community to be involved in decisions which impact their lives.

There are barriers for many members of the community to participate in community planning. Poverty, lack of means, childcare issues, trust, confidence, lack of transport and language barriers all impact people’s ability to participate in community planning. This, coupled with reduced funding for local community learning and development workers, means many people will find it difficult to participate in the formal process of community planning.

Using third sector organisations, and local services or community groups used by more vulnerable people to support relevant consultation, can help improve participation for more vulnerable members of the community, helping them to feel empowered.

We welcome the bill’s definition of “community bodies” as bodies that can represent “the interest of any communities”. We consider children and young people as a community with a right to be consulted and included. We would like to see the bill set out a duty on CPPs to engage with children and young people in creation of the local outcomes improvement plan. This is important as Article 12 of the UNCRC states that when decisions are made that affect children, children have the right to contribute to the process and have their opinion taken into account. This consultation should be done in a child friendly way, perhaps involving schools and youth clubs. Indeed the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act states that public authorities must every three years report what steps it has taken to further UNCRC requirements in its area of responsibility. It makes sense for the duties spanning the Children and Young people Act and this bill to link together.

CHILDREN 1ST also considers that clarity is needed around the impact of community planning structure and outputs and the new requirements of children’s services planning as set out in part 3 of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act. The Children and Young People (Scotland) Act places duties on public bodies to coordinate the planning, design and delivery of services for children and young people with a focus on improving children’s wellbeing outcomes and report collectively on how they are improving those outcomes. We believe it is vital for this bill to create links between the new duties under that Act and the local outcomes set by CPPs to ensure joint planning. CHILDREN 1ST would welcome reference to the duties of children’s services planning within this bill.

The aims of children’s services planning in part 3 of the Children and Young People Act include a focus on early intervention and prevention\(^1\). We consider it helpful for the duties of CPPs to mirror this in their planning, outcomes and objectives. This will also ensure a joined up approach and core focus within community planning. To help this approach, CHILDREN 1ST would also like section 9 to state a duty for CPPs to further the effect of the Scottish child poverty strategy, to consider the wellbeing of children and young people (through using the GIRFEC framework\(^2\)) and the UNCRC within its community planning.

We also believe it is vitally important that the local Third Sector Interface is a member of the CPP and recommend that the Schedule 1 list is amended to state this, while keeping section 9. 1 (a) and (b) as they stand.

It is also vital that there is meaningful representation of third sector organisations and services within local community planning processes. It is important that those third sector organisations that can provide and share the best practice and outcomes are invited to the table, to share their knowledge whether they are services that are part of a larger national organisation, or are singular small local organisations.

We also consider it important for CPPs to demonstrate how the community groups they have engaged with, such as children and young people, have been able to help proactively shape and ideally co-produce outcomes in community planning. This will help ensure participation is not just a tokenistic gesture, and ensure transparency and fairness.

Part 3 Participation requests

\(^1\) Part 2 section 9 (2) (a) (ii) ensures that any action to meet needs is taken at the earliest appropriate time and that, where appropriate, action is taken to prevent needs arising,

CHILDREN 1ST welcomes Part 3 of the bill regarding participation requests to public service authorities from community participation groups and that the weight is in favour for public service authorities to accept this request. The aspirations of the bill to meaningfully involve the community must be matched by resources; we are concerned that in reality this may not be accessible for certain members of the community. The bill does not mention how community members will be made aware of the opportunity for participation requests, or what support will be offered to those interested in participation requests. It is vital that this information is available in communities.

Part 3 section 19 states that in reaching its decision, the authority must take into consideration whether agreeing to a request would improve or promote economic development, regeneration, public health, social wellbeing, or environmental wellbeing. We would also like the public service authority, in this instance, to consider how such a request would further the UNCRC, the child poverty strategy, and how it will impact the wellbeing of children and young people. It is important that any changes in service delivery take into account the consequences and impact on the rights and wellbeing of children and young people.

We also have questions around the funding and information sharing of budgets of a successful participation request. It is unclear who will continue to provide the funds to run that service, if a community participation body is successful in applying to run a service, and if budget information will be shared and passed on. We are also unclear how this may impact tendering and strategic commissioning of services and would welcome clarity on this.

Part 4 & 5 – community right to buy and asset transfer requests

During an asset transfer request, we hope there will be safeguards and consideration of how members of the local community are already using the land on a formal or informal basis. The authority’s decision to accept or refuse a request should also take into account any potential impact on children and young people. For example if children are using an area of grassland as recreational ground for play, then consideration of this need should be given before the transfer request is agreed to.

We hope there will be safeguards in place to ensure that any profit from acquisitions is used for the benefit of the local community. Finally, the bill does not outline any support that will be offered to those interested in registering an asset transfer request. Support to navigate complex bureaucratic processes is vital to ensure communities do not find the process alienating.

CHILDREN 1ST welcomes the general principles of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) bill but believes it could and should go further to ensure that all members of the community, including children and young people, can be empowered to take part in the process of improving their local community and services.
I welcome the opportunity to respond to the Call for Evidence of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee in relation to Stage 1 of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. This response is made in a personal capacity, but two points should be noted in that regard. First, I am employed by the University of Aberdeen at the School of Law. Second, I was an adviser to the Land Reform Review Group (appointed in June 2013). Neither role has had any direct impact on this submission.

I am happy for this response to be in the public domain.

This response will focus on: human rights; the use of the term “abandoned”; the need for a company limited by guarantee in the proposed Part 3A of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003; and the Part 3A register

Human Rights

The right to property is recognised in the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (“ECHR”), that right being expressed in Article 1, Protocol 1 (“A1P1”). A1P1 does not mean that private ownership is sacrosanct in all circumstances. A landowner can be divested of ownership when it is in the public interest for that to happen. The Committee may be interested to note that in South Africa, there is a specific constitutional declaration in section 25 that “the public interest includes the nation's commitment to land reform, and to reforms to bring about equitable access to all South Africa's natural resources” (although the recognised need for reform in post-apartheid South Africa is not a direct comparator to Scotland).

The yin that is the apparently retarding force of A1P1 is balanced against the yang of Article 11 of the UN International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, which guarantees certain rights such as sanitation, food and housing. Scottish legislation must not be in breach of the ECHR, in terms of the Scotland Act 1998, but the Committee should be aware that human rights do not began and end at Strasbourg (where the European Court of Human Rights sits).

That said, the ECHR is crucial because of the role it plays in relation to devolved legislation (in the Scotland Act 1998 (as amended)). The Committee should therefore note that a compulsory transfer of property from one landowner to a new private landowner is acceptable in ECHR jurisprudence, as seen in James v UK (1986) 8 EHRR 123 and more recently in Pairc Crofters Ltd v Scottish Ministers [2012] CSIH 96; 2013 S.L.T. 308.

It can also be noted that the operation of positive prescription (under the Prescription and Limitation (Scotland) Act 1973) can serve to replace a remiss owner of land with another owner, where the new owner has possessed that land for a certain length of time and registered a deed at the Land Register of Scotland. That process is due to be reformed very soon, by the Land Registration etc. (Scotland) Act 2012, but for present purposes it shows that Scots law is perfectly comfortable with the idea of one person’s ownership being usurped by another.

As such, it would seem the current proposals to introduce a new Part 3A to the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 and to widen the scope of the right already conferred by Part 2 are well within the realms of ECHR compliance.

Clause 48 of the Community Empowerment Bill deals with “abandoned and neglected land” by giving communities a right to acquire land that is “wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected” (see the proposed s.97C(1) of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003. The word “abandoned” is suboptimal, because it has a very specific meaning in Scots private law. Property lawyers would use that term in a situation where an owner has actively sought to walk away from an item of property. This is most readily imagined with corporeal moveable things (i.e. tangible objects that are not attached to land): consider Carey Miller with Irvine, Corporeal Moveables in Scots Law (2nd edition, 2005) at paragraphs 2.07-2.08. Whilst land cannot be cast away in quite the same manner, an owner may seek to disclaim land. This was most recently witnessed in the case SEPA v Joint Liquidators of Scottish Coal (2014 SLT 259).

As such, a synonym for abandoned seems preferable, but it is tricky to pick one. "Unused" and "underused" are ripe to cause arguments and there may be issues where an owner has made a conscious decision to not manage land (i.e. allow it to go wild, perhaps for conservation purposes). "Derelict" might be appropriate, but in common usage that normally relates to buildings. "Deserted" might imply a complete surrender of any relationship to the land. Unfortunately, I do not have an ideal substitute for "abandoned", but the Committee should consider carefully whether "abandoned" is appropriate. One drastic solution might be to remove "abandoned" entirely, leaving the legislation to relate to "wholly or mainly neglected land".

There is no compelling reason to mirror the requirement for communities to incorporate as a company limited by guarantee (but see below relating to the Part 3A Register). Whilst it might be argued consistency with the rest of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 is useful, this comes at the cost of flexibility for a community. An alternative approach is to focus on an organisation's rules/constitution, as is the case with some common property options in the comparator jurisdiction of South Africa (See further Combe, “Parts 2 and 3 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003: A Definitive Answer to the Scottish Land Question?”, (2006) Juridical Review, pp.195-227).

The Part 3A Register

Although publicity is undeniably important when dealing with land, a query might be raised about the need for a new register. Assuming the requirement that a community be embodied as a company limited by guarantee is retained, publicity about that community comes via Companies House. The Land Register will provide publicity about the land. Notifications from the Scottish Ministers can (presumably) be publicised without a new register. Is a new register justified?

That said, a central reference point for Part 3A could be useful for a variety of people, so this potential criticism should not be overstated.
Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

The Scottish Parliament’s Local Government and Regeneration Committee’s Call for Evidence.

The Meldrum Bourtie and Daviot Community Council’s written submission of evidence addressing the Committee’s stated questions is as follows:

A representative of Meldrum Bourtie and Daviot Community Council attended the National Conference on 6th May 2014 at which the keynote speaker was Mr Derek McKay MSP, Minister for Local Government. The conference provided an excellent insight into the proposed Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill and allowed our delegate to meet other presenters and attendees who provided a great source further background information.

We were very disappointed to learn that the future of Community Councils is not addressed as part of this legislation, but worse still that there seems little appetite to change the status quo.

The only “Empowerment” that the Bill will provide for Community Councils is, “a new statutory role in relation to the common good, recognising their important role as voices for local communities”.

The “common good” is not defined in the Bill because “at this stage our view is that there are significant difficulties in framing a satisfactory definition”. Suffice it to say that the common good is comprised of property and funds which have been bequeathed to the Council for the benefit of all its citizens.

So in a nutshell, we get to have a say on what already belongs to us anyway.

One question asked of the Minister was if this “so-called Empowerment Bill” was just a means of validating the principle of independence, in that what is good for Scotland was also good for Scotland’s individual localities independence within Scotland. The Minister’s response was to laugh it off by suggesting that some cynical people would obviously see it this way, without actually giving a straight answer. He is a politician, after all.

The Minister made very few references to Community Councils but for us his most telling comment was his dismissal of any idea that Community Councils should be given any further powers at present, because they are largely unelected and therefore unrepresentative generally of their communities. We were promised a copy of his speech after the event but this has not been forthcoming. We therefore requested a transcript and were advised by email on 15th May 2014 that, “Unusually, the Minister spoke off-the-cuff at the conference last week, with minimal handwritten notes and without an official writing his speech. We have been advised by his office that they are unable to provide a summary in this case”
It is we feel a lost opportunity to finally devolve power to the communities via the long-established framework of the Community Councils. We also feel that the COSLA Commission on Strengthening Local Democracy gives a fair answer to this question.

The interim COSLA Report makes very interesting reading, but again fails to tackle the potential (or in some cases lack of potential) of Community Councils. This is very surprising, as the most startling fact is that Scotland has the most centralised government system in Europe. This is illustrated on the table below (Figure 1).

[Our Community Council was invited to send one member to this forum, but due to an overwhelming response, the invitation was reduced to one per Local Authority Area in attendance and one on a web-inar]

Prof Richard Kerley was also a speaker at the National Conference on 6th May 2014 and he concluded that Community Councils should not be simply given more grants by “higher authorities” but should be given more power and the associated accountability. That way they would become more representative and the funding would follow. Either do this or “just kill them off”, was Prof Kerley’s conclusion.

On this same subject, Donald Manford of Voluntary Action Barra & Vatersay a delegate to the Conference, spoke to the floor when responding to the speakers about the centralisation of Scottish Government, “Don’t be fooled into thinking that there is anything “Local” about Local Authorities”. [Donald Manford is also the elected member for Barra on the Western Isles Council.]

Empowerment = Give (someone) the authority or power to do something (Oxford English Dictionary)

It is clear to us that Local Authorities have no intention of relinquishing any of their true power and the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill as it stands will not change this in any way.

Meldrum Bourtie and Daviot Community Council is not a public sector organisation so, we cannot state what the views of Local Authorities might be.

From the Community Council’s perspective the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill would appear only to be a means for providing an avenue for Local Authorities to dispose of assets only when they see a benefit of saving costs by transferring the responsibility of those assets which are becoming a burden to their finances.

The “disposing” of Local Authority assets for the benefit of the Local Authority rather than truly for the benefit of the Community seems to be embodied in the two actionable parts of the Bill:

PART 4 - COMMUNITY RIGHT TO BUY LAND
PART 5 - ASSET TRANSFER REQUESTS

There is very little evidence of any appetite for Community Council reforms in the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill, so the only course of action is for Community Councils to learn how to lobby those in actual power more effectively. In some areas of Scotland there is very poor engagement between Community Councils, their communities, and their Local Authorities, in some cases leading to the disbandment of them entirely.

Reform should start at home and Community councils should be encouraged by Scottish Government to strive towards better representation by involving people throughout the community, especially younger people.

The “Seven Principles of Representation” as laid out in “The Principles of Representation: A framework for effective third sector participation” published by the Cabinet Office.

This would be a more tangible way of Community Councils gaining more credibility and then empowerment would be the next rightful step.

The “Seven Principles of Representation” are:

1. Accountability – clearly defined responsibilities for all decisions and actions
2. Equality – place equality, diversity and inclusiveness at the core of what you do

3. Leadership – the sector’s representatives will need to think and act strategically

4. Openness – be as open as possible in all your dealings and relationships

5. Purpose – be clear about the local sector’s objectives and support them with a strong evidence base

6. Sustainability – ensuring the continuation of the collective voice

7. Values – identify and build on the values of the local sector

There are many occasions where the Local Authorities and Community Councils should be working together but end up working at cross-purposes. There must be mutual respect and this should be fostered by Scottish Government.

As a Community Council we see very little benefit to us or to our community. The Bill does not “Empower” any of us in any meaningful way. All the true “power” remains with Central and Local Government.

The worthy principals currently being championed by the argument for Scottish Independence from the UK should logically be passed down the line to allow our community independence from a centralised government in Edinburgh and the “Local” government, in our case based in Aberdeen.

Equal rights are very important to us and it is good to see that the often forgotten and voiceless members of our being provided with an opportunity to have their say. It has to be said though, that this is not true empowerment, simply a better means of lobbying those actually in power.

We are not an Island Community, so we have no views on the impact on Island Communities.

Local Government and Regeneration Committee on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

Q1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

1) SCDI is an independent membership network that strengthens Scotland’s competitiveness by seeking to influence and inspire government and key stakeholders with our ambition to create shared sustainable economic prosperity. SCDI’s membership includes businesses, trade unions, local authorities, educational institutions, and the voluntary sector.

2) SCDI welcomes the Community Empowerment Bill, and agrees it provides a legislative framework which supports the empowerment of communities through provision of powers to take ownership of land and buildings and request rights in relation to property and services.

3) These mechanisms can be considered necessary to support the pace and scale of public service reform required by ongoing budget restrictions. By 2013-14 only 40% of cuts to the Scottish Government’s resource budget have been undertaken, and the rest are expected between now and 2017-18\(^1\). This reduction in spending is compounded by increased need, caused by the economic downturn itself and the effect this had on pay and opportunities, as well as longer-term demographic issues which will increase pressure on services. As such, it is no longer possible to continue providing the same services with less resource. We must instead find new, innovative ways to provide the services communities need, and the Community Empowerment Bill supports this.

4) Alongside the Bill however, communities will also require some form of capacity building or support service if they are to access these new opportunities and use them to their full effect. Likewise, public bodies must be supported by guidance in order to effectively assess and respond to requests by community groups around property and services.

Q2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

5) Communities can be considered experts in their own needs and by enabling greater input into service planning and delivery, the public sector may uncover innovative delivery mechanisms which more effectively meet their service users’ requirements.

6) The provisions around community rights in relation to property and participation in outcome design and service delivery could provide an efficient mechanism to deal more effectively with the requests which public bodies already receive and respond to. Where community bodies take on ownership or maintenance of assets which previously incurred costs to the public body, savings could be realised. However, some public bodies are anticipating high demand in the initial stages to request such rights which will have cost and resource implications. As such, it is essential that any new duties placed on public bodies must either be cost neutral or appropriately funded, and any significant changes in duties must also be subject to an appropriate notice period.

7) Likewise, community bodies should be able to appeal decisions where they have legitimate concerns around reasons for refusal, the application of significantly different terms and conditions from those specified in the request, or where no decision notice is given. Unfounded appeals, however, will have resource implications for all bodies involved. Clear and practical processes are required to minimise the propensity for burdensome disputes to arise, drawing resources away from service delivery and community capacity building.

Q3. Do you consider communities across Scotland have the capabilities to take advantage of the provisions in the Bill? If not, what requires to be done to the Bill, or to assist communities, to ensure this happens?

8) While Scottish Government has articulated a clear desire for greater community ownership of assets and community led regeneration, the rhetoric may outweigh the ability of these groups to meet increased expectations and transform themselves into enterprising organisations in thecontinuingly difficult economic conditions unless appropriate organisational and community development support is provided.

9) The Big Lottery Fund’s ‘Growing Community Assets’ evaluation, for example, identified over-dependence on the same people, managing volunteers, and making the transition from voluntary organisations to social enterprise or other professional business structures as challenges that face projects as they develop. In addition, capacity between communities can be affected by the social and demographic make-up of the area, with more affluent areas likely to have greater access to pro-bono professional skills. These must be overcome in order to ensure the opportunities of the Community Empowerment Bill are realised.

10) As well as support effective community engagement, Community Planning Partnerships could also involve other important stakeholders in the community including businesses and the third sector. Part 2, Section 5 of the Bill states that each CPP must prepare a local outcomes improvement plan through consultation with (a) such community bodies as it considers appropriate, and (b) such other persons as it considers appropriate. ‘Other persons’ could include business; however, this should be expanded on in

guidance through recognition that business can have an important role in certain communities through employment opportunities and wider impacts.

11) Awareness amongst the private and third sectors of the Single Outcome Agreements at a local level is low – businesses have limited understanding of the process and Agreements or input into their development, despite their often vital role in delivering the outcomes. This tends to embed the belief that the public sector is alone responsible for service provision and delivery of the outcomes, and does not encourage attempts to draw on private sector finance into the provision of underlying infrastructure.

Q5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

12) No comments.

Policy Executive
Scottish Council for Development and Industry
1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

North Ayrshire Council welcomes the Community Empowerment Bill and agrees that the Bill goes some way towards empowering communities in certain policy areas, including:

- Increasing sustainable economic growth;
- Seeking to increase individual and community capacity, making communities more confident and resilient;
- Making use of community talent, creativity and combined resources to achieve an empowered community (asset based community development approach);
- Empowering communities to influence and effect change in the way services are designed and delivered; and
- Engaging with communities so that community voices are heard in public sector processes.

However, a number of opportunities to embed broader principles of community empowerment could also have been included.

For example, the proposed use of the National Standards for Community Engagement, and the requirement to publish and implement a community engagement plan as discussed in the previous consultation on the Community Empowerment and Renewal Bill, should be reintroduced. It is acknowledged that the requirement to engage with communities is included in the Bill in relation to community planning, and is expressed with a focus on the outcome, rather than the process. A more rigorous approach may be required.

The Bill requires Community Planning Partner agencies to report annually on their community engagement activity. The Bill could be an opportunity to encourage Community Planning Partners to jointly plan and monitor community engagement, and the resultant outcomes.

A 'place based' or neighbourhood planning approach is at the heart of getting effective business and third sector engagement. There should be a requirement to develop an evidence-based neighbourhood profile within the Community Planning approach, to agree priorities and obtain partner commitment to pursue such priorities. This process provides ample opportunity to engage with businesses, community and third sector, both in agreeing the priorities and their roles in implementing these.

The Council welcomes the Government’s statement that it is committed to subsidiarity and local decision-making in public life and the recognition that councils are the level of government closest to the citizen, giving people an opportunity to participate in decision making affecting their everyday environment. However, the importance of the role of young people should be recognised, including their right to statutory consultation.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

The Bill places a duty on the Scottish Ministers to develop, consult on and publish a set of national outcomes for Scotland, which must be reviewed at least once every five years. This provides a positive and constructive basis for policy development within Community Planning Partnerships.

Moreover, the clarification and strengthening of the role of Community Planning Partnerships is a helpful direction of travel, especially with its emphasis on place and the importance of community engagement.

Evidence shows that involving people more regularly and more effectively in the decisions that affect them leads to better outcomes, making the most of the knowledge and talent that lies in communities. It also increases confidence and fosters more positive relationships between communities and the public sector. Community bodies might use the “Right to Participate” provisions to discuss with service providers how they could better meet the needs of users, to offer volunteers to support a service, or even to propose that they take on the delivery of a service themselves. It will be for the public body to decide whether to make any changes to existing service delivery arrangements.

If the community body proposes to deliver services itself, the public body will need to decide whether the community body has an appropriate corporate structure and the capacity to take on that role.

The processes set out for requesting a right to participate are fairly complex. Unless appropriate support and guidance is provided for marginalised and less organised communities, the complex process will result in further marginalisation of less powerful communities and interests.

The above is also true in relation to the right to buy legislation.

In relation to the Common Good provisions, a challenge is provided in identifying all of the community bodies which are known to the authority. Central registers will require to be established, which can be accessed when representations are required to be offered.
The Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill contains a potentially significant change for non-domestic rates (Part 8 of the Bill).

The Bill proposes that the Council can from the 1 April 2015 introduce its own scheme for the reduction and remission of rates to meet the needs of local business and communities.

The Council will have the discretion to reduce or remit the rates for any non-domestic property, in any designated area, for any designated activity or for any other reason decided by the Council. The only condition detailed in the Bill is that the relief ends when there is a change of occupation.

Councils will need to fund the scheme themselves and take into account the interests of the council tax payer; this is because any loss of income from non-domestic rates incurred by the scheme must be offset from other income raised by the local authority.

The two broad implications for local authorities in relation to allotments are based around the responsibility of the local authority to manage waiting lists and respond to demand for allotments by providing more allotments should waiting lists exceed certain trigger points.

As communities become more empowered they are likely to seek partnerships with organisations in the public private and voluntary sector to achieve their goals. Supporting such approaches is increasingly becoming a priority in the context of re-shaping public services. In North Ayrshire a recent review of directorates brings together Economy and Communities which will be well placed to drive the ambition the Scottish Government has for local community empowerment and local economic growth.

However, the availability of appropriate support, guidance and a culture of nurturing community action are key.

Support for groups and organisations to build their own capacity and aspirations is a basic requirement, and needs to come from the public and third sectors. Resources have been reduced through the process of public sector reform and are often insufficient to effect lasting change in communities.

The Bill provides the right for communities to be consulted on local budgets. The Bill will strengthen requirements for communities to be involved in setting priorities for public services, which has a significant impact on how budgets are spent. The Scottish Government also supports Participatory Budgeting (PB), which directly involves local people in decisions on a specific budget. The Scottish Government is funding consultancy support to help more local authorities develop PB in their areas. Significant training and support will be required for community organisations to participate.

While the Bill does not amend the legislative status of Community Councils, it does recognise their interest in shaping local services, and gives them a specific role in relation to common good assets.

The Scottish Government is taking forward work to strengthen the role of Community Councils and increase the diversity of members, but significant support, training and resource implications will result at national and local level to ensure that Community Councils fulfil their responsibility to be genuinely representative and effective.

4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

The provisions of the Bill are largely already being addressed by North Ayrshire Council as evidenced in:

- The Community Planning Partnership;
- Neighbourhood Locality Planning;
- The Review of Community Councils;
- Review of Corporate Management Team 2014;
- The Community Engagement Strategy - including the corporate cohort training with the “Consultation Institute.”
- Asset Transfer Policy and Guidance;
- The Community Contract/ SLA partnership with Community Associations in the management of Community based assets;
- The Asset Based Community Development programmes with key partners including Health and the CPP with regard to early and effective intervention; and
- The Allotment Strategy.

North Ayrshire Council would be happy to discuss any of the above initiatives in relation to the call for evidence.

North Ayrshire Council wishes to reiterate its support for the Bill but also the requirement for additional resources to continue to build capacity in communities, particularly in deprived communities, to develop the approach which underpins the Bill. Specific policy initiatives, such as the right to buy, the right to participate, the provisions for non-domestic rates and the development of allotment and food strategies will be resource intensive and will require public sector partners, especially local authorities, to identify and prioritise resources in a climate of financial austerity.

5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

   North Ayrshire Council agrees with the assessments as set out in the Policy Memorandum.
Introduction
I am submitting this evidence based on my 15 years of experience working in local government in Scotland, in a range of roles relating to community participation and empowerment, combined with evidence from my current research into community participation policy and practice in Scotland and England, and related academic literature. At the previous consultation stage of the Bill, I and colleagues from the Neighbourhoods and Wellbeing Research Group in Glasgow University submitted a joint response, but we have not had time to agree a joint response to this call for evidence, so this is a personal submission.

Evidence submission

The Bill should make some significant advances in terms of empowering communities, particularly through the new rights regarding participation requests and the extension of rights regarding community control of land and buildings. In relation to participation requests, there is research evidence that communities desire influence over the public services they use, and that gaining such influence has important feedback effects within communities in terms of increased confidence, skills and feelings of efficacy. In relation to community control of land and buildings, there is significant research evidence regarding the benefits for communities, such as increased confidence, financial sustainability and social capital.

There are, however, two key areas of concern regarding potential limitations to the impact of the Bill, which form the core of this submission.

Firstly, as I and colleagues emphasised in our response to the earlier consultation document, there is a risk that these new rights may disproportionately benefit more affluent communities, where community bodies are able to draw on a stronger base of skills and expertise, and where property is more likely to be an asset rather than a liability. Thus there is a risk that this new right could exacerbate inequality, undermining the Scottish Government’s solidarity ambition.

The research literature has evidenced increasing concern in recent years that community participation may be used to shift responsibility from the public sector onto communities. This is particularly true of the Big Society/Localism agenda in England, so the Scottish Government may wish to ensure that the Bill cannot be used or interpreted in a similar fashion. Thus it will be important in relation to this new right, to ensure that community bodies are given appropriate support to participate in outcome improvement processes, and to plan effectively for and make good decisions about asset transfer. An explicit link to the new Community Learning and Development Regulations may be useful here, either in the Bill or in related guidance. Furthermore, in order to enable all communities to make use of these new rights, it will be important to ensure that they are communicated effectively to all communities, whether this is by the Scottish Government directly, or by placing a further duty on local public service agencies.

Secondly, whilst the proposals to strengthen Community Planning are to be welcomed, there is a concern that there may be a disjuncture between community involvement in Community Planning processes and the new right regarding participation requests. As the Policy Memorandum rightly makes clear, ‘community empowerment cannot be delivered by legislation alone’ and the importance of creating a public sector culture that assumes community participation as a starting point cannot be under-estimated. In this respect, there is a risk that CPPs interpret the new Community Planning duties as meaning that communities need only be involved in the initial development of the Local Outcome Improvement Plan, thereafter taking an entirely reactive approach to participation requests rather than proactively working to engage communities.

It would therefore seem important to draw a specific link, either in the Bill or in related guidance, between these two approaches to community empowerment. Whilst it is important for communities to have the new right to request participation, one of the aims of this legislation should be to ensure that it rarely needs to be used, as public sector agencies incorporate community participation and support for community action into their everyday operations. The recent report of the Commission on Strengthening Local Democracy suggests there is considerable support for this approach to public service provision, but changing organisational culture is a complex and challenging business. As well as drawing stronger links between Community Planning and participation requests, it could be useful to add a duty on public service agencies which mirrors the new participation requests, requiring them to proactively identify and engage with relevant community bodies when undertaking any outcome improvement process. Given that public service agencies should be looking for continuous improvements in outcomes, this might help to reinforce the message that community participation should be an ongoing relationship rather than an occasional consultative exercise.

A further option in relation to this second area of concern would be to return to the original proposals to require CPPs to produce a Community Engagement Plan and to follow the National Standards for Community Engagement. Although there will inevitably be concerns that these might become bureaucratic exercises, as suggested in the Policy Memorandum, it should be possible to limit the bureaucratic burden of such a duty, and the lack of a Plan raises considerable questions about how CPPs can be held to account by communities, auditing bodies or Ministers. Similarly, the notion of having a lead officer for community engagement has been left out of the Bill on the basis that it might lead to the perception that other officers are not responsible for community engagement, but a lead officer role need not work in this way at all. Given the need for all CPP services and agencies to engage with communities, a central coordinating point will become increasingly important to avoid duplication, inconsistency of standards, and consultation fatigue in communities. And such a lead officer could play a vital role in shifting the culture of public services away from limited consultation and towards effective community engagement, taking responsibility for improving other officers’ approaches to community engagement, rather than delivering it personally.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

As indicated above, the key benefit of the Bill for public sector organisations should be the development of public service reform through enhanced community participation. On the one hand, community participation in relation to services can improve their targeting and efficiency, enhancing their outcome impacts. And on the other hand, community self-help activities and strengthening of community assets such as social capital can result in reduced demand for public services.

In terms of community participation in relation to services, there is relatively little robust research evidence which demonstrates savings as a result of community participation. However, the research review conducted by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister in 2005 ('Improving delivery of mainstream services in deprived areas – the role of community involvement') suggested that the process benefits of community involvement (e.g. better local knowledge, better access to services, etc.) feed through into reduced unit costs of service provision, and reduced costs in other aspects of service provision such as lower housing management costs through reduced tenant turnover.

There is even less in the way of clear research evidence about the potential savings to public sector organisations arising from community self-help activities, although this is an area that I am currently working on.

The additional short-term costs of establishing community participation processes need to be balanced against longer-term savings, as part of the wider re-design of public services.

As indicated in response to question 1 above, there are significant concerns that the new rights included within the Bill could disproportionately benefit more affluent communities. Ensuring that public sector organisations address such issues through an explicit link to the CLD Regulations and possibly additional duties to proactively engage with communities would go some way to alleviating this concern.

4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

Other than the points raised above, I have no difficulty with the specific provisions in the Bill.
5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

No specific comment.
RIAS’s submission to the Call for Evidence on The Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

The Royal Incorporation of Architects in Scotland represents architects and architecture in Scotland. The RIAS welcomes the opportunity to respond to this consultation and our Planning Committee have prepared a response.

The RIAS support The Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill and its aims to empower community bodies through the ownership of land, buildings and strengthen their voices in the decisions that matter to them; and an increase in the pace and scale of Public Service Reform by focusing on achieving outcomes and improving the process of community planning.

We have addressed the five questions as requested, however have made some specific reference to the parts of the Bill and the Memorandum where appropriate.

The Bill has the potential to empower communities to a considerable extent however will be dependent on how accessible the Bill will be to communities and how equipped communities will be to take on such responsibilities. With reference to the eight separate parts of the Bill please note the following:

Part 1 National Outcomes - The outcomes have yet to be determined however when set Ministers need to be aware of the responsibilities that communities will undertake and ensure that suitable resource is made available to turn these outcomes into reality.

Part 2 Community Planning - Putting Community Planning Partnerships on a statutory basis is most likely to have a positive effect on empowering communities however it is important that the partnerships truly represent the community. Can measures be taken to ensure that this is the case.

Part 3 Participation Requests - It is important that communities are aware that they can make such a request.

Part 4 Community Right to Buy Land - This will create opportunity to empower communities however we ask that measures are taken to prevent protracted legal battles.

Part 5 Asset Transfer Requests - It is positive that communities can request to take control of land and buildings however it is important that local authorities retain their responsibilities for the upkeep of these assets and this is not seen as a means of disposing unwanted liabilities.

Part 6 Common Good Property - This will help understand what is important to local communities as well as the wider good and that when determining what is for the common good, local communities are consulted.

Part 7 Allotments - This will help individuals and will empower the local community if the local community wish more allotments. This is most likely to be the case but not necessarily a given, if this was not the case we would consider an individual's right to grow their own food should be the priority consideration.

Part 8 Non-Domestic Rates - This will help empower communities to create solutions to their needs and revitalise run down town centres. It will be dependent on how much rate relief will be given, to have any impact this has to be reduced to a level which will realistically help. The Ministers need to be aware that local commercial opportunities will change and that there is a need for the extent of relief to vary from area to area.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

The most obvious disadvantage to the public sector will be the additional workload which is likely to ensue from the Bill and will additional resource be made available or will tasks be delegated to others. We would also note that there may be some public bodies which could be added to the current lists e.g. Forestry Commission, Marine Scotland. With regards to specific benefits and disadvantages please note the following;

Part 1 National Outcomes - This will put pressure onto public sector organisations however the purpose of these organisations is to serve the public therefore their key role will be enhanced.

Part 2 Community Planning - Putting Community Planning Partnerships on a statutory basis is likely to have a positive effect on empowering communities however it is important that the partnerships truly represent the community. Measures should be taken to ensure that this is the case however care is required to prevent divisions within the community.

Part 3 Participation Requests - This is likely to generate complex relationships for local authorities however will lead to the better use of assets and a more satisfied local community. The process should be simplified and be made as easily understood as possible.

Part 4 Community Right to Buy Land - If land and/or buildings which are falling into disrepair / neglect are taken on by an able group this could help local authorities resolve specific problems.

Part 5 Asset Transfer Requests - This will take the control of assets away from local authorities however this may improve their use and take some of the burden of organisation away from public sector organisations and into the hands of the local communities.

Part 6 Common Good Property - There could be different opinions on what is common good property, this may be beneficial and also a disadvantage to public sector bodies. Will there be an independent assessor to determine this list and will all parties be involved in any judgement.

Part 7 Allotments - There will be a pressure for local authorities to supply land for allotments which especially in cities will be difficult. This could be a disadvantage but also a potential benefit as redundant space can easily be transformed.

Part 8 Non-Domestic Rates - There is a case to argue that a reduction in non-domestic rates will increase the use of redundant / neglected properties with a net financial gain, it could though also result in a loss. The judgement of what would qualify for reduced rates will be influenced by local circumstance and although overall criteria can be agreed it would be best left to the local public organisations to set rate relief.

This as one of the fundamental problems of the Bill, how will communities be made aware of these opportunities and how will they be able to deal with the inevitable legal problems, monetary issues, responsibilities and likely differences of opinion. We are not best placed to comment and capabilities will vary across Scotland, the Ministers will have to find ways of ascertaining these and additional resource is inevitable to ensure these problems can be overcome.

As needs will vary across Scotland, our cities will face different challenges to the island communities, each local authority should draw up its own plan as to how it intends to take advantage of the Bill. To what extent these are devolved around the country likewise needs to be determined and Ministers need to include timescales for these into the overall programme.

We fully support the aims of the Bill and many of the specific provisions, these will though be subject to development. The control of the development stage after adoption of the Bill has been placed in the hands of the Scottish Ministers e.g. in setting / reviewing the outcomes the Ministers will consult with persons ‘they consider appropriate’, it is not clear how the Ministers will determine who is appropriate. This is one example and it is important that this part of the process is transparent.

It would be helpful if there was more accountability to the developmental period of the Bill and that although a five year review is appropriate once outcomes have been set, a time period and programme should be set for the development and implementation of the Bill.

Equal Rights - The memorandum states that an equality impact assessment has been carried out although has yet to be published but concludes that the Bill’s provisions do not affect equal rights, we are happy to accept the findings of the EQIA.

Island Communities - The Bill will apply to all communities across Scotland including island communities. It is noted that there may be a potential shortage of land available for allotments in island communities, it is important that this is addressed especially as this is a remote setting where this need seems greater.

Sustainable Development - Best use of land and local decision making is at the heart of the Bill. The memorandum notes no impact or minimal impact on the environment, however there is a strong socially sustainable argument that the overall potential of the Bill is more sustainable than the current position.
The above community council respectfully submits its own evidence on the community empowerment bill for consideration.

1. We believe the government’s basic idea is clear and sound, the problem as we see it as has always been is the delivery of it, unless there is clear unambiguous legislation /standing order’s it will result in some local authorities delivering their own interpretation on it and leave the communities frustrated.

2. The communities made up on average of people with a wide range of life skills and disciplines are more than capable of taking advantage from the Bill’s provisions given a level playing field to start from, time and again we the community suffer when if only for the sake of backing and finance we could be able to do a better job in some cases than the authority.

3. One example is here in Glasgow the authority is throwing everything at CPP and whilst the community councils are now given a seat at the table with a vote, as a body the community council is heavily bound by council rules and standing order’s unlike other partner’s such as RTO’S, we survive on an administration grant of £500 less £20 insurance premium to the council and that can be means tested, if we have more than twice our annual grant in our account, where other groups can have thousands.

It is not positively promoted that we take on properties which we could use as a community base, but at the same time the council contradict itself by saying we need to be more obvious to the community and promote ourselves better, but how can this be when the registered address is the secretary’s hall cupboard, who has to in some cases hold down a full time job, and run the community council affairs using his /her home phone, mobile, lighting, and to store and run the CC computer and files etc. with no remuneration, and as we say every other group can run as any small business would and the council go on about equalities.

4. The council have a CCLO for support and administration most of this is seeing that we are run to the council’s traffic light standard there is no promotional material, training courses on the essential things we need such as planning and licensing very poor in fact only now since the CPP have offered through the NHS will licensing training be given, and planning aid Scotland have offered to pick up the bill for a one day seminar on planning the offer on the table being if the council supplied the venue the PAS will supply the materials and the bodies to deliver it, which is ridiculous when if the community council could be allowed to run its own affairs we could do this for all local community groups on a local basis.

5. The Communities Minister addressed a group of community councils from around the city and he gave us the his analogy as the Nike advert on TV if there is something needing done in your community (JUST DO IT) all very well for him to say try getting the Authority to believe in it, even with CPP there are still some dinosaurs who don’t want to be partners here, then the issue we had when the authority withheld our grant for nearly 10 months because of an internal problem as it turned out and no apology, which again begs the question why the Community councils are not independent of the council as they were at the start as it could be construed that he who pay’s the piper calls the tune again an equalities issue when none of our other non council community groups have to go through this and can and do JUST DO IT, without any hassle.

6. We are not going to get overly optimistic on this community gaining any more autonomy or financial independence without the requisite back up legislation/standing order’s being in place it does at times make you feel like giving up and let them get on with it.

7. The Bill Says it will make provision for unused properties to be brought back in to community ownership, perhaps someone could point this out to the authority we have at least 5 such properties and the authority don’t want to know nor do they want to interact with us on other issues, if it wasn’t for our MSP taking up the cudgel’s for us we might as well live in the mess forever, as we say we are not overly optimistic on the delivery but support the idea.

Thank you for this opportunity to submit our concern’s and wishes you well with the Bill.

Regards Bill Carson
Secretary Pollokshaws /Eastwood Community Council.
COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL

Background to The Coalfields Regeneration Trust

The Coalfields Regeneration Trust (CRT) is dedicated to improving the quality of life for people in Britain’s former coalfield communities.

Established in 1999, our mission is to lead the way in coalfields regeneration and restore healthy, prosperous and sustainable communities.

We work with people at a grassroots level in order to build confidence and encourage them to take their communities forward. Since 1999 CRT we have supported just over 1000 projects promoting and supporting regeneration activities in the coalfields across Scotland. We have supported a wide range of initiatives that provide added value to the community planning process whilst making significant progress towards our Objectives.

We deliver programmes and services that;

- support people into work
- improve skills and help people gain qualifications
- create pathways into volunteering
- improve health
- develop sustainable solutions for community facilities
- engage young people in positive activities
- grow new businesses and social enterprises
- provide community development support

We work in the heart and soul of coalfield communities, investing resources, expertise and knowledge to ensure local people are able to fulfill their potential. Coalfield communities had a strong history of unity and we have galvanized local people enabling them to participate in building a new positive sense of community.

In response to the invitation to give evidence to the Scottish Parliaments Local Government and Regeneration Committee’s call for written evidence on the above Bill.

Specifically the call for evidence focuses on the following questions.

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?
2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill, and why?

CRT RESPONSES

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

CRT has nearly 15 years experience of supporting community action in the coalfield areas across Scotland. A key area of our work involves focusing more explicitly on building capacity in our most fragile coalfield communities, and where we and others have found it difficult to invest in the past.

CRT welcomes the Bill and agrees that it will help to empower communities across Scotland, because

- It sets out a plan for empowering people of Scotland to get involved and make important decisions about their communities
- It is about helping residents play an active role in regenerating their communities, the people living in the communities know what’s best for their area
- It also encourages public service providers play a more active role in listening to communities and encouraging them to take part in partnership working arrangements

The Bill suggests that public service providers should talk more to communities, help them have their say about services, and be listened to.

Many residents think ‘it’s the councils responsibility’ to develop communities and provide services, more needs to be done to promote to residents that it’s okay for them to take ideas forward and let them know who can help them do this.

Local Authority Officers don’t always live in the areas where they work, yet it’s often the same officers who make decisions about a particular community, for example Community Planning Agencies. We anticipate that the Bill will ensure greater interaction with communities should work towards ensuring a local issues and concerns are taken into account when decisions are being made.
The Bill works towards making sure the right people will be heard and have a greater input, its local people from the communities who know what the issues and concerns are for their communities, ‘coming from the horses mouth’ so to speak would result in more sustainable communities – getting it right

It is clear that the affluent communities are more successful in being heard. CRT has found that our most disadvantaged communities struggle to deliver regeneration activities as people don’t know how to go about regenerating their communities and they have low confidence levels, skills and knowledge to take forward their ideas. This could be improved by financial investment and services to encourage and support residents to become involved in their communities at a local level.

A combination of partnership working, development support with funding is a potent mix for village and neighbourhood level organisations, which will help, bring about neighbourhood renewal and social inclusion.

‘They don’t know what they don’t know’

4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill, and why?

More needs to be done to help communities:
- Know who is there to help them become involved
- Easily find out what assets, land etc is available to them
- How they can go about acquiring assets and develop their communities

We hope you will find the comments useful

COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT BILL (SCOTLAND) BILL 2014
RESPONSE TO QUESTIONS IN THE CALL FOR EVIDENCE:

Q1 - To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

The bill will only empower communities if they are able to be sufficiently organised to take advantage of the provisions of the bill.

Currently there is a so called community consultation process within the Scottish Planning system. However, community representative whether community councils or self organised groups, are usually up against big developers who employ their professionals effectively against lay people with no matching resources. The process is unequal, power conferred by virtue of the process is simply not there in reality. The same will happen with this bill.

It seems to me that in this bill, everything is in the spirit of empowerment and in the procedures, yet nothing about the reality of how communities will be represented other than in the case of specific one issue groups.

Power to the people is meaningless if the people whilst been shown the route, do not have the wherewithal for the journey, let alone reaching the outcome stage set for them.

Q2 - What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

I am not especially interested in the benefits or disadvantages to public sector organisations.

It seems to me simply more time distracted from doing what they should be doing already. This might end up being yet another layer of bureaucracy. It is very telling that they need a new bill in order to know that they have to take account of community aspirations and needs.

Q3 - Do you consider communities across Scotland have the capabilities to take advantage of the provisions in the Bill ? If not, what requires to be done to the Bill, or to assist communities, to ensure this happens?

No I do not.

What do we mean by communities, local residents, active groups with a single goal or what ? Who exactly are community organisations and who do they represent ? A community can be a group, a village of a whole town or urban district. How will they organise themselves in a democratic manner and be truly representative of the wider community.

When making an application a community participation body is expected to provide details of any knowledge, expertise that the body has. How are they expected it do this ? They will need professional expertise. How are they expected to be funded ?

Passing power to communities is only going to work if you have a model for structuring and organising what they can do and how they do it. For example saying that communities have the right to buy land is no use if they have no professional help and funding, to investigate its condition ( e.g. any contamination ), its suitability for the project, to value it, to buy it and then to manage it.
I think we need a community assistance bill with funding mechanisms.

I applaud the spirit of the bill viz. greater power to communities to take on public sector land and buildings, greater transparency in the management and disposal of all local authority owned property whether or not common good property etc. However, I am not content with certain aspects of the Bill.

The process in very rigid and dictatorial and controlled from the top down and not the bottom (i.e. the community level) upwards. I can appreciate the need for the process to be controlled at each stage presumably to ensure accountability, combat corruption and guide the process. However, national outcomes, determined by the Scottish Minister, local outcome improvement plan determined by each community planning partnership. No community involvement there then! Who sets the outcome and on what criteria? Those eligible to be community planning partners seems to be extremely limited!

NB: I am anyway, sceptical about the term 'outcome', a word now used to replace aims, potentially ignoring needs and opportunities which should be the basis on which to make assessments for future aims. Simply setting an outcome, at outset is too specific, with the risk of ignoring issues cropping up during the process, which may put the initial outcome in question.

I am not convinced that the process will be sufficiently inclusive at any level. The community planning partnership decides what are the priorities as regards outcomes and then also decides whom they will or will not consult. A vociferous and very active, one issue, community group can end up having more of a say that the wider community, who historically speak through their community council. Thus under 'Governance', I think there should be something about inclusiveness e.g. that each local authority and community planning partner must ensure that they are satisfied that all relevant community opinions are catered for in the process.

Another flaw is the lack of guidance and support to communities to take advantage of this new freedom to decide, this new empowerment. The proper setting up of the community controlled bodies is crucial to ultimate empowerment of communities and to ensure that it is not the community planning partnership which decides the outcomes sought but local people.

With regards to communities tasking over apparently vacant or abandoned land and buildings. It is morally wrong that government can force anyone to sell their property. Why should an owner have to sell a building or land to a community and at what price, the market price, valuation figure, highest bidder? Land is rarely abandoned another word which needs defining. All land is owned by someone whether it has a building on it or not.

I do support the notion of more local authority unused and vacant land and building (including common good property) being available for community use. However I can see the present trend of Councils selling off such land to developer to counter Government cuts, will continue. They cannot simply give the land to communities as communities will struggle to raise the necessary purchase price. There have to be other financial mechanisms in place to help fund communities aspirations.
Q5 - What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memoranda.

Community empowerment increases equal rights but also raises human rights issues. It is important to strike a fair balance between the general community interest and the protection of land owners’ human fundamental rights.

Clearly the right to buy can be beneficial to island communities and especially if the land has been so abandoned and neglected and that it is counter to the survival or the whole community.

I am concerned about how all this land which is passing into community hands is to be secured legally, and properly and transparently managed and safeguarded for future generations and in the best interests of the wider community.
Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill
Further Comments From Helensburgh Community Woodland Group, 3/9/14

This note has been initiated since the above Bill was put forward on the 11th June 2014. The Bill states that people can still ask for changes to the Bill whilst the Scottish Parliament is looking at it. The following are comments of endorsement, alterations and suggested changes.

Part 4 of the Bill- Community right to buy.

We fully endorse and welcome the proposal to extend the right to buy to the whole of Scotland including the urban areas such as and including Helensburgh. We also support the recognition that has been given to SCIOs as being suitable bodies to deliver and exercise this right.

Specific Concern and suggested amendment:

1. We are concerned that the definition of “community” and their subsequent involvement in a ballot could be prohibitive, time consuming, causing unnecessary delays and potentially precluding the community from being able to register their interest and ultimately buy the land.

In urban areas “the community” served by any community body could easily be in excess of 10,000 people. Yet, individual projects which a community body wishes to promote under the CRBL may concern only part of its area and a minority of those who live within it. It is unreasonable to have to ballot 10,000 people for projects that concern only 1,000. We suggest that it would be better if the community for balloting purposes could be defined separately project by project. For example it may be appropriate to use a single Council election ward for a specific area as the interested community, rather than the settlement as a whole. Another example could be to include people who reside within half a mile of the area of interest. A final one which is our preferred option, would be that of defining the community by people who will be affected or directly benefit from the facility.

We therefore recommend that the Bill should amend Section 37(1) of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act to require any application to register a community interest in land to specify the particular community affected by that project, and that there should therefore be no automatic presumption that the community served more widely by that community body necessarily equates to the particular community that should be balloted for particular projects. Of course, any community body that misused this flexibility by seeking to ‘gerrymander’ the area to be balloted would run the risk that its application for registration would be rejected by Ministers. These suggestions are therefore intended to make the ballot process easier, more efficient, quicker and cheaper to carry out.

2. We are concerned that there are still too many opportunities within the Bill in its current form that enables the landowners/property owners to avoid the community’s ability to register / lease or buy. For example there exists an option for owners to grant a ten year option to purchase to their siblings, children or other family members.
members. If this type of loopholes is not removed it will only frustrate the CRBL process, and ultimately lead to the Bill having to be amended.

3. We would suggest that there is no logic in limiting the powers on abandoned and neglected property to specifically companies limited by guarantee and excluding SCIOs from access to these areas of land. The Bill should be amended to allow SCIOs to have powers and access both neglected and abandoned properties.

We hope you find these observations and comments of use

To Scottish Parliament

On behalf of Polmont Community Council, we would like to raise the following concerns regarding the Community Empowerment Bill.

1 Right to buy:
We feel that this aspect of the Bill is unnecessary as we already have the power to buy land or property given funding and the wish to do so.

2 Right to take over services:
We feel that it is not the role of a Community Council to take over existing Council services but to support, enhance and consult on services which affect the residents of our community.

3 Common Good:
We feel that, given the transient nature of membership of Community Councils, it would be inappropriate to take on long term responsibilities of guardianship and security of commonly held resources.

4 Equality Impact Assessment:
While we welcome the positive outcome of the Equality Impact Assessment on the Bill, we would have concerns if every Community Council had to conduct its own Equality Impact Assessment, as this is a specialised process which would require training, resources and support.

While we are committed to our communities, we are apprehensive about taking on additional responsibilities and long term commitments.

Yours sincerely,

Rosemary Taylor

Convener Polmont Community Council
NHS Tayside response to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee’s Call for written evidence on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

The Bill will certainly encourage and give communities a formal footing to have a right to be involved in the improving outcomes processes and greater rights to buy/lease/manage land and properties.

The lessons learned and successes of community involvement / public participation pre community empowerment Bill will be important factors in its implementation and support for communities. It will be important to ensure that there is evaluation of the impact of the sections of the Act which in turn will determine the extent to which the Bill will have empowered communities.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

Part 3 – Participation requests –

   i) Strengthening the engagement of communities

The introduction of ‘A community body being able to make a request to a public service authority to permit the body to participate in an outcome improvement process’, is welcomed as a way of strengthening the engagement of communities.

   ii) Definition of outcome

The definition of outcome or what constitutes an outcome may be challenging.

   iii) The involvement of all key stakeholders

It is important that this is not seen as the only way to engage stakeholders in improving services. The public service authority should continue to also have the right to invite others to be involved in an ‘outcome improvement process’ if it

Submission Name: NHS Tayside  Submission Number: 45

Considers that there is a need to gather the views of people not included in the community body. For example if the outcome would also impact on the provision of a service to a particular patient / condition related group. It is important that regulations capture details relating to the involvement of all key stakeholders and not just those who are part of the community participation body.

iv) Patient Rights Act (Scotland) 2011

It is welcomed that the provisions of the bill do not say that a ‘body’ has to be a community participation body in order to be involved in improving outcomes / services. In practice a group would not have to be a ‘community participation body’ to be involved in improving services. This will allow for ‘informal’ groups, such as patient participation groups linked to GP practices or patients of a particular clinical condition to be involved and make suggestions for improvement and to outcomes. It would also mean that individuals can contribute. Indeed the Patient Rights Act (Scotland) 2011 makes provision for individuals to have a right to be informed, and involved in decisions, about health care and services. The Bill makes no reference to this Act. It will be important that the Rights contained therein continue to be observed.

v) Clinical considerations

It is crucial that regulations and future guidelines bring clarity around aspects relating to ‘clinical’ considerations. Section 19 requires a public service authority to agree to or refuse any participation request it receives and sets out how the authority must make that decision. It describes factors that should be considered relating to public health, social or environmental wellbeing and other benefits or matters the authority considers relevant. Clinical reasons could fall under ‘a matter the authority considers relevant’, however these could be substantial and surely justify particular reference to them in this section.

Parts 4 and 5 Community Right to Buy and Asset Transfer Requests

The benefits to communities to exercise their rights to buy and request asset transfers have many potential positive outcomes. However, at a time when we are and will continue to be challenged financially, for most NHS Boards, the need to vacate property ‘not fit for purpose’ and secure optimal returns from the sale of such assets via the open market has been an absolute necessity. The right to buy should therefore be at the full market value of the land or buildings and through the open market.

Yes, communities will have the capabilities to take advantage of the provisions of the bill. But not necessarily all communities may recognise this. There are existing structures to help communities building capacity however additional support / education / training should be made available with community involvement to help people to develop the skills required around this. Public service authorities will have a role in this but a key player would be the voluntary sector.

4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

Part 2 – Community Planning -

We have some concerns about the following two clauses in the Bill:

9 Community planning partners: duties

3) Each community planning partner must, in relation to a community planning partnership, contribute such funds, staff and other resources as the community planning partnership considers appropriate—

(a) with a view to improving, or contributing to an improvement in, the achievement of each local outcome referred to in section 5(2)(a), and

(b) for the purpose of securing the participation of the community bodies mentioned in section 4(5)(a) in community planning.

12 Establishment of corporate bodies

(1) Following an application by a local authority and at least one other community planning partner for the area of the authority, the Scottish Ministers may by regulations establish a body corporate with such constitution and functions about community planning (including in particular its conduct and co-ordination) as may be specified in the regulations.

With regard to 9.1, we have no difficulty with the concept of CPP members challenging each other’s expenditure, but to give the CPP powers actually to stipulate the sum to be spent by each partner is a step too far.

Likewise with 12.1, it seems to us questionable to give the power to the Council – and why specifically the Council? -with only one other partner to make an application to Ministers to establish a body corporate.

Part 3 – Participation requests -

As described in 2, Section 19 requires a public service authority to agree to or refuse any participation request it receives and sets out how the authority must make that decision. It describes factors that should be considered relating to public health, social or environmental wellbeing and other benefits or matters the authority considers relevant. Clinical reasons could fall under ‘a matter the authority considers relevant, however these could be substantial and fall under particular standards relating to provision of care. It is suggested that specific reference is made to clinical reasons for accepting or refusing the participation request in this section.

Submission to Local Government and Regeneration Committee’s call for evidence on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

Scottish Community Development Centre
4th September 2014

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

SCDC has published a briefing on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill, which is primarily focused on the above question. The full briefing can be read at: http://www.scdc.org.uk/media/resources/policy-and-practice/SCDC_Towards%20Empowerment.pdf.

In summary, our interpretation is that the Bill proposes to reflect the policy principles of subsidiarity, community empowerment and improving outcomes through providing a legislative framework to:

- “empower community bodies through the ownership of land and buildings, and strengthen their voices in the decisions that matter to them”, and to
- “support an increase in the pace and scale of public service reform by cementing the focus on achieving outcomes and improving the process of community planning”

The detail in the Bill confirms that the provisions do indeed fall within these two key aims, but we agree with the Committee that it is important to consider the extent to which these aims might empower communities, especially in respect of the new duties on community planning. Our response to the Committee is therefore focused primarily on the provisions of the Bill concerned with the empowerment of communities through the community planning process.

The logic of the provisions is that community planning will be strengthened and more clearly focused on outcomes; while the community empowerment element will essentially be the extent to which community “voice in decisions that matter” will be strengthened. If the provisions of the Bill are to succeed in empowering communities we need to question where the locus of power lies and the ways in which it should be channeled.

The policy memorandum distinguishes between community empowerment and community engagement, by arguing that: “it is important that community voices are heard in public sector processes, but that this engagement differs from community empowerment, where communities lead change for themselves.”

If this is the case we would argue that the draft legislation, in respect of community planning, implies an important shift in the relationship between communities and public services from recent years, but not necessarily a shift towards more empowerment. Until now, engagement was seen as a mutual relationship between communities and public agencies, as expressed in the National Standards for Community Engagement, which define community engagement as:

“Developing and sustaining a working relationship between one or more public body and one or more community group, to help them both to understand and act on the needs or issues that the community experiences”

This definition of engagement is a much stronger statement than simply “hearing community voices”. It clearly acknowledges that many communities, in particular disadvantaged and disenfranchised communities, are not always in a position to lead change for themselves as they do not always necessarily have the resources or confidence to do so.

The Policy Memorandum (para 11) argues that community empowerment is a key plank of public service reform, and this should result in “strong, independent and resilient” communities that are “best placed to determine outcomes for local services” and, therefore, public service providers should fully engage communities in decisions about the design and delivery of services to achieve such outcomes. This raises interesting questions about the anticipated relationship between ‘empowerment’ and ‘engagement’ in improving service delivery and other outcomes.

If, in policy, effective engagement remains the critical factor for effective community planning, we would argue that the Bill does not go far enough in its requirement to “consult such community bodies as it considers appropriate” in preparing the local outcomes improvement plan. Instead, this part of the Bill should specify that community planning partners should ‘engage’ with community bodies, and that this engagement should be in line with the definition of community engagement embodied within the National Standards for Community Engagement.

1 http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Topics/Built-Environment/regeneration/engage/standards
Furthermore, we reiterate our desire to see the National Standards for Community Engagement, endorsed, tested and proven by a range of agencies including Scottish Government, placed on a statutory basis within this Bill as a framework for guiding and assessing the extent of community planning partners’ commitment to involving and empowering communities.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

The provisions of the Bill are clearly in the spirit of public service reform, given their emphasis on strengthening collaboration and partnership between public bodies in assessing needs, designing solutions and delivering change through a more robust community planning process. Equally, the rights for communities to request participation in an outcome improvement process opens opportunities for greater and more purposeful engagement with communities, and this is consistent with the reform objectives of decentralisation, prevention and co-production.

We believe that the ways in which each public sector organisation provides its services and whether or not they utilise participatory practices will be the key factor in the way benefits and disadvantages come to be distributed.

These provisions will be welcomed by those public service organisations that see themselves as working with the grain of civil society, with communities and community organisations, and with an enabling, developmental philosophy.

It will be a greater challenge for organisations that continue to operate a traditional, top-down, consumer model, and those that, to date, have not been committed to community planning/community engagement. For such bodies, the Bill may well appear to be disadvantageous as it may be seen as a potential distraction or obstacle to their ability to meet centrally driven targets.

However in response to the larger question of whether the Bill is likely to encourage public sector organisations in the direction of public service reform principles, our opinion is that it will be broadly beneficial.

While we welcome the provisions that better enable communities to take more control over land and buildings, and to have the right to request participation in outcome improvement processes, we question the extent to which these provisions, in isolation, will empower those communities that are excluded or marginalised, or who are unaware of the rights enshrined in the Bill.

In general, SCDC is of the view that the provisions concerning participation requests will potentially be very useful to “community participation bodies” (as defined by the Bill) to trigger action on a concern or opportunity, in the knowledge that it will be a legal requirement for the CPP to respond and react. We do, however, have some concerns about the way these provisions may operate in practice and which groups and organisations utilise the legislation.

As with other aspects of the Bill, the key issue is the extent to which the provisions may serve to further empower those communities that are organised and influential, while not achieving meaningful change for marginalised or excluded communities, or those with weak infrastructure. Such communities may well be unaware of the rights they will now have, or be aware of them but may not currently have the capacity to take advantage of their rights without impartial support and advice.

From our consultations on the Bill with community groups and community development practitioners, and from our experience in working directly with local communities, we know that, in order to benefit from the Bill, disadvantaged and marginalised communities often need assistance to:

- find common cause on issues that affect them
- work together on such issues under their own control
- build local independent networks
- build equity, inclusiveness, participation and cohesion within their organisations and within the wider community
- influence and help transform public policies and services and other factors affecting the conditions of their lives
- advise and inform public authorities on community needs, viewpoints and processes
- work in partnership with public services

Community-led anchor organisations such as community development trusts, community-based housing associations or representative councils can play a leading role in gathering intelligence and information about the community, understanding community needs and issues and working with public services to improve outcomes, or to provide services directly.

Where such anchor bodies do not exist, or where they do not enjoy the support of the whole community, community development approaches can help build a stronger network of interests, groups and organisations; and can help assess needs and issues, ensure engagement is conducted well, and assist with evaluation and learning lessons.

In section 10 (3) of the Bill, it is recognised that funds, staff and other resources need
Local Government and Regeneration Committee

Submission Name: Scottish Community Development Centre

We strongly recommend that similar provisions should apply in the case of participation requests, and more broadly, in order to achieve a level of equity in the way communities may access and use the legislation.

We believe the Bill is limited in its ambitions and is informed by a centralised view of governance and government, rather than the more participatory model as advanced in the Christie commission report and elsewhere. We agree with the recent report of the Commission on Strengthening Local Democracy report where it argues that:

“The Community Empowerment and Regeneration (sic) Bill contains many interesting ideas, but its major thrust is still within a relatively centralist mind-set in this regard. Communities have the right to take proposals for asset transfer or outcome improvement to national or local government, but it is for them to decide and there is no appeal. In other words, communities have to persuade government and local government to “cede” powers. This seems like the reverse of subsidiarity, and the Commission’s view is that this tends to keep us where we are rather than taking us forward.”

In addition, SCDC is concerned with questions of equality of access to the new rights in the Bill, fearing that it could further empower the best organised communities at the expense of the most vulnerable and disadvantaged. Rebalancing power in favour of the least powerful is more important than a broad-brush intention to empower.

In response to this, we recommend that priority is given to supporting disadvantaged communities to enhance their power and influence through direct work in communities to support local people to articulate and address their own issues and concerns, through building confidence and developing community relationships and through supporting community-led organisations to take advantage of the provisions of the Bill.

We believe that the specific provisions of the Bill could be improved by:

- Replacing references to ‘consult’ in the Community Planning provisions

2 http://www.localdemocracy.info/2014/08/14/time-to-rebuild-scottish-democracy-what-the-referendum-decides/with a requirement to ‘engage’ (as defined in the National Standards for Community Engagement)

- Aligning with the way in which the regulations have been framed to support community learning and development\(^3\), by incorporating provisions which place a specific requirement on community planning partners to plan services with the full involvement of communities (in line with the National Standards for Community Engagement)

- Placing a similar requirement on community planning partners to commit funds, staff and other resources to engage purposefully with community bodies and respond meaningfully to participation requests, as is proposed for securing the participation of community bodies in setting outcomes

Furthermore, we recommend that the Committee, as part of its scrutiny of the Bill, explores the following questions:

- Given the recognition within the documents accompanying the Bill of the need for resources and support to back up the Bill’s empowering potential, what is the existing and planned policy that will meet this need?

- If such support does not currently exist, what needs to happen to put it in place?

- What additional benefits might be accrued from the reinstatement, into the Bill or accompanying support and guidance, of proposals outlined in the legislation at draft stage, namely;
  - A requirement for the publication of community engagement plans
  - A named community engagement officer
  - The adjustment of procurement in favour of community groups,
  - The right for communities to be consulted on local budgets
  - Enforcement of the sale of empty property
  - Changes to the status of community councils

SCDC is satisfied with paragraph 106 and those following, where the implications of the Bill from the perspectives of human rights, island communities and sustainable development

\(^3\) The Requirements for Community Learning and Development (Scotland) Regulations 2013
http://www.educationscotland.gov.uk/communitylearninganddevelopment/about/ssi/index.asp development are considered and reported. In the body of the Bill the main references are to the question of sustainable development, and in several places it is proposed that the transfer of land and assets, particularly derelict assets, will be in the interest of sustainable development.

While we support the transfer of land and assets to community use we do not believe that such use will, of itself, necessarily be sustainable. Proposed uses of land by communities will presumably be governed by planning, licensing and environmental legislation and it is here that we would expect the issue of sustainability to be to be scrutinised.

Community Health Exchange (CHEX)
September 2014

About CHEX

CHEX supports community-led health organisations (CHOs) that work in areas of poverty and disadvantage to create opportunities for community members to come together and to work towards positive health outcomes for individuals and the wider community.

CHOs use methods such as participatory research to reach and engage people who traditionally do not access services or readily get involved in community health activity.

CHOs address barriers such as language, income, disability, race, and age that prevent people to become involved in community health activity and decision-making processes. They support people at various stages of development towards empowerment. For example: some people who experience severe mental health problems may only wish to become involved in therapeutic activity, while others may want to organise for a new health facility or work in partnership with public sector agencies to co-produce health services.

CHOs therefore have an informed and in-depth understanding of the processes that assist community members to become involved, remain involved and engage with decision-making processes that affect positive health outcomes.

The Bill as it stands should enable strong and cohesive communities to influence local decision-making processes/structures and, if so desired, become involved in the transfer of local assets and services. The Bill is however a major opportunity to support the empowerment of people in more disconnected communities of poverty and disadvantage. To do this effectively, we believe it needs strengthened in certain areas. If empowerment is a core value of policy it needs to be used to rebalance and not reinforce power relationships that contribute to disadvantage. The Bill will only succeed in empowering communities in this way if it can prevent already powerful interests furthering their advantage at the expense of marginalised and excluded interests unable to take advantage of the provisions of the Bill.

The Bill should go further to strengthen the openness and engagement of communities in community planning processes. The current policy drivers aspire to the participation of communities in the shaping and implementing of health and social policies. The Christie Commission, the integration of health and social care and the draft Community Empowerment and Renewal Bill all offer optimism and encouragement to people in low income communities to participate in reshaping public services.

The previous Chief Medical Officer (2011) stated that “an important aspect of improving wellbeing is to ensure communities have involvement in choosing and shaping the programmes in which they participate.” The recent report from the Ministerial Taskforce on Health Inequalities (2014) reinforces the importance of building social capital, working with the third sector, communities co-creating and co-delivering services, harnessing community assets and place-based approaches.

Further, NHS Health Scotland’s Health Inequalities Action Framework recognises the value of participation and of “lived experience, in particular the voice of the voiceless” in helping to respond to health inequalities.

CHOs currently support community groups to engage and influence services through a number of district-wide processes and structures including; Community-led Health Networks, Healthy Living Networks, Patient Participation Groups and Strategic Health Inequalities Group. To a certain extent this enables engagement with strategic partnerships such as Community Planning Partnerships and the evolving Health and Social Care Partnerships. However, CHOs consistently highlight significant challenges and barriers to ensure participation in these processes is influential and achieves the desired outcome for community health groups.

We recommend:

1.1 The Bill should enshrine processes that enable disadvantaged communities to fully participate in decision-making that directly affects their lives. Allied to this would be the necessary approaches from public sector services to ensure meaningful community engagement. While the right to participate is vital, the expertise and skills to exercise that right to participate is critical. The Bill therefore should include duties whereby community groups should be able to automatically access support and resources to fully participate.

1.2 Communities are integral to decision-making processes within community planning and therefore should automatically be offered opportunities to shape and implement local policies. They should not have to ‘request’ attention to their priority and/or issue as currently outlined in the Bill.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

The evidence shows that empowering communities brings significant benefits to public sector agencies/services e.g. local knowledge and expertise in finding joint solutions to complex health problems\(^7\) and better use of resources and ‘value for money’ in the delivery of services.\(^9\)

Community members stated in our consultation that having a greater stake in their community leads to stronger relationships with health providers together with enhanced responsibility and accountability for all parties.\(^10\) Further, informed, active and connected community members bring significant assets and transform the demand on service provision.\(^11\)

We recommend:

2.1 The Bill should strengthen the duties of community planning partners to build the capacity of their respective public sector workforces to create the conditions to release community assets. This will assist the co-production of services and support communities to both lead on health priorities that they

It is clear from the range of evidence on community-led health, community-led regeneration, community-led environmental sustainability etc. that communities do have the capabilities, creativity and perseverance to transform their community. However, the evidence also shows the inequalities that exist in and between communities in Scotland. Many communities have already tapped into and use the wealth of talent, expertise and experience that is held in their neighbourhoods. However, many more communities require interventions to build capacity and social capital. Compared to more affluent communities, marginalised and disadvantaged communities are often less organised and have fewer resources to draw on - financial resources and established social capital. The Bill’s proposed processes on asset transfer, buying land and buildings and requesting the right to participate in decision-making demand knowledge, confidence, skills, contacts and resources. This should be recognised and met with the systematic targeting of resources to disadvantaged communities.

CHOs have suggested the type of resourcing and support that would be effective and recommended that the Bill places duties on public agencies to:

“Support community groups to organise to respond to the needs that they themselves have identified as priorities”;

“Create opportunities to get information, training on different methods to reach, involve and sustain involvement from different groups of people in the community; especially with those people who traditionally do not access services or are under-represented in groups”;

“Support involvement in forums to gain more influence and reflect identified health priorities. It is important to reach out to communities that do not come within designated strategic boundaries for priority funding resources.”

We recommend:

3.1 Duties are placed on community planning partners to create processes and offer tailored support whereby communities that experience disadvantage in relation to levels of poverty and inequalities are empowered to fully engage in asset transfers and decision-making structures. The systematic implementation of the National Standards for Community Engagement would support and assist this process.

Not as the Bill currently stands.

We recommend:

4.1 Strong consideration is given to increasing the duty of Community Planning Partnerships to include community body representation on a continued basis. No sector is as rooted and as knowledgeable about local communities as the community sector itself. Therefore, the Bill should place a duty on CPPs to ensure that consistent opportunities are created for community bodies to influence decision-making processes and that a community body is a full partner and is represented at the table.

4.2 Section 10 (3) stipulates that funds, staff and other resources need to be committed by community planning partners to secure the participation of community bodies in setting local outcomes. We would recommend that similar provisions should apply in the case of participation requests (Section 17) in order to achieve a level of equity in the way communities may access and use the legislation.

Average health in Scotland continues to improve while health inequalities continue to increase.

NHS Health Scotland’s recent review of health inequalities highlights the stark impact on life expectancy and health outcomes between the most affluent and least affluent communities in Scotland. The indicators show social, economic and health inequalities will continue to increase if cuts in welfare provision continue to be implemented. The NHS and the community and voluntary sectors are already experiencing an increase in demand on services as a result of austerity measures.

There is real concern that implementation of the Bill as it stands will exacerbate health inequalities with stronger and more powerful voices prevailing from already organised and more affluent communities. It is expected that more affluent areas will mobilise further to take up new opportunities that the Bill’s offers. Therefore, priority attention and resources should be allocated to communities that have greater challenges in motivating and sustaining involvement towards empowerment.

We would recommend:

5.1 Resources allocated in relation to implementation of the Bill are directly targeted at low income communities and that every action is taken to create an environment for those communities to have equal opportunities to influence and sustain a healthy community for all.

SRUC Response, September 2014
Local Government and Regeneration Committee

Call for Written Evidence on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

September 2014

Introduction

SRUC (Scotland’s Rural College) welcomes the opportunity to contribute to the call for written evidence from the Local Government and Regeneration Committee on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

SRUC is an innovative, knowledge-based organisation that supports the rural sector through research, education and expert consultancy services. SRUC wishes to see, and contribute significantly to delivering, a sustainable agricultural and rural land use sector in Scotland. SRUC staff work in a broad range of areas (for more information see www.sruc.ac.uk) and our responses to the questions below reflect this broad expertise, but draw on specific research projects and expertise where appropriate.

Several SRUC staff have contributed to this submission¹ which has been co-ordinated by SRUC’s Rural Policy Centre.

Introductory comments

1. The Rural Policy Centre (RPC) welcomes the statutory commitment of the Scottish Government to the empowerment of communities. We welcome the legislative framework being put in place which seeks to create the conditions for community empowerment, subsidiarity and self-determination, operating in a consistent manner across Scotland.

2. Our evidence suggests that, in order to maximise the impact of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (hereafter referred to as CESB), specific concerns would need to be addressed. We now outline these in relation to specific points clarified in the CESB Policy Memorandum (hereafter referred to as the PM). We then explore how these concerns are even more pertinent within rural Scotland, before concluding with some pointers to evidence and cases which may feed into an enhanced understanding of how CESB might best deliver its outcomes.

Our concerns and their associated risks

1. Narrow focus: In PM paragraph 18, the Scottish Government rightly states that: “Ultimately, community empowerment cannot be delivered by the legislation alone, although creating a supportive legal framework will enhance the process”. The emphasis within the CESB is on statutory outcomes, where community empowerment is defined as: “a process where people work together to make change happen in their communities by having more power and influence over what matters to them” (PM paragraph 9, originally stated in the Community Empowerment Action Plan [Scottish Government/COSLA, 2009]). Further, in the National Performance Framework, Outcome 11 is: “We have strong, resilient and supportive communities, where people take responsibility for their own actions and how they affect others”. However, the CESB primarily focuses on service provision, together with community ownership of land and other assets, as the ways in which communities become empowered. This is narrower than the original (2009) definition. CESB therefore also omits potential wider empowerment aspirations, such as participatory democracy. There is a risk that the CESB will become primarily focused on service provision and community ownership of land and assets, rather than on delivery of wider empowerment outcomes.

2. Empowering the empowered: There is considerable onus on communities to come forward, with pre-existing, demonstrable capacity, to identify and bring about change in partnership with other stakeholders. For example: “Where an appropriate community body, or a group of bodies, believes it could help to improve the outcome of a service, it will be able to make a request to the public body or bodies that deliver that service, asking to take part in a process to improve that outcome. The community body will need to explain what experience it has of the service and how it could contribute to its improvement” (PM, paragraph 47). Further, communities will be able to “initiate dialogue on their own terms” (paragraph 45) (see also paragraphs 76-79 on communities’ Asset Transfer Requests). What this implies is that those communities which already have the capacity to engage will do so, and will become more empowered. As is it currently written, the CESB acknowledges the need for wider capacity-building (PM, paragraph 18: “the availability of appropriate support, guidance and a culture of nurturing community action are also key”); however, the CESB does not legislate for it. The Community Right To Buy Register indicates that of the 173 registered interests, the Right to Buy has been activated in just 16 cases. This is an indication of a risk that the CESB legislative framework may result not in a wider spread of power, but in the increased empowerment of those already empowered. We have found evidence of this, and have raised concerns over “Darwinian” development which operates at two speeds, where those who are able can ‘harvest’ the resources (project funds, service delivery opportunities), leaving those less able even further behind. So, “empowerment for whom?” becomes a really pertinent question.

3. Public sector capacity: When discussing “community empowerment”, the focus is typically on enhancing the capacity of communities. However, the differing capacities within the public sector to deliver community empowerment (PM paragraph 20) must also be addressed. Although the CESB states: “a key reason for bringing forward this legislation is to address this inconsistency and promote best practice throughout Scotland” (PM paragraph 20), no guidance is given as to how this is to be achieved. In CESB we read that: “All public service providers have a responsibility to create the conditions that encourage and support strong, independent and resilient communities, and ensuring a focus on supporting community empowerment is a key plank of public service reform” (PM paragraph 11). Under CESB, this specifically translates into:

Community Planning Partnerships (CPPs) having a statutory basis with additional duties and developing “Plans for Place”; potential restructuring of service delivery; arranging and supporting asset transfer; statutory requirement for establishing/maintaining/publishing/updating the register of “common good” property, and consulting with community bodies before disposal of such assets; providing more allotments where waiting lists exceed certain trigger points, publishing an Annual Allotments Report and a food growing strategy; and using new powers to create localised non-domestic rate (NDR) relief schemes (PM paragraph 102) to “reflect the needs of businesses and the local economy” (PM paragraph 101). Implementing these required changes in a “universal and enduring” (PM paragraph 20) manner will, in turn, necessitate an increase in the underpinning processes of consultation, partnership-working and trust, and bringing more parties to the table. This in turn will require changes in public sector working processes, governance practice, and decisions over re-routing of resources (time, people, finance – PM paragraph 43). Capacity-building within the public sector will therefore be essential. Otherwise there is a risk that the CESB will be implemented in a way which operates at the level of the “lowest common denominator” – i.e. ticks the boxes required by the CESB, rather than seeing a cultural shift towards encouraging and proactively supporting greater community engagement in decision-making and outcomes delivery. Further, the fact that community engagement plans and a named community engagement officer are not being taken forward (following the initial consultation period) (PM paragraph 25) is also a concern in this regard, since there is a risk that this will reduce any strategic approach to community empowerment, and its distinct resourcing.
4. Evaluation and attribution: It is not possible to see, from the CESB Policy Memorandum, how the CESB’s outcomes-based approach will be evaluated; and whether a baseline will be established from which to assess progress towards delivery of the CESB outcomes. The risk is that it will be more difficult to review/identify/attribute progress towards community empowerment to the CESB and/or to other measures, and thus to improve processes etc.

Specifically rural concerns

The issues which we have raised above have particular pertinence to the “how” of delivering community empowerment in rural areas. There are three key points which we believe need to be taken into account.

1. Geography: although in rural areas, “communities of place” may perhaps be easier to define (than in some urban areas) due to physical boundaries such as villages or islands, their populations tend to be more dispersed. This means there are physical and distance challenges in bringing people together, and in ensuring the inclusion of all sectors of the population. This is exacerbated by the costs of private transport, and the unavailability of public transport. Empowering the (social and economically) disempowered therefore, is a particular concern in rural areas.

2. Demography: The fact that rural populations comprise small numbers has two main implications.
   a. Firstly, a phrase often used in rural areas is “the usual suspects” – that is, the same group of people who repeatedly input to development at community level. This can lead to concerns over how ‘representative’ people might be of the wider community. Additionally, there is a limited pool of people from which to draw, and evidence of ‘burn-out’ exists.
   b. Secondly, those who may benefit most from empowerment may exist in small numbers, such as those with mental or physical illness, those from black and minority ethnic groups, younger people and single parents. This means that ensuring their empowerment becomes more challenging, particularly for the public sector, where small numbers of ‘clients’, ‘customers’ or citizens is a criterion which influences support decisions.

3. Poverty and disadvantage: For the majority of public agencies, the Scottish Index of Multiple Deprivation (SIMD) remains the Index for determining their focus of spend and activity in relation to addressing poverty and disadvantage. However, as reported in our Rural Scotland in Focus 2014 Report\(^2\), SIMD is poorly-suited to rural areas (due to dispersal and small numbers of population). This makes it much more complex to direct community empowerment measures to those experiencing poverty and disadvantage in rural Scotland, since they exist in dispersed pockets (sometimes of individuals within communities) below datazone level. This increases the risk that such people within communities will remain untouched by CESB since they live ‘below the radar’.

Evidence and existing models which may help address these concerns

1. Empowering the disempowered:
   a. We have been involved in evaluating two projects which were delivered through the LEADER 2007-2013 Programme: Capacity for Change (C4C) in Dumfries and Galloway, and Ayrshire 21 (A21) in North, South and East Ayrshire. Both had as their core aim the reaching of those who are typically under-represented, and who can be considered to be low capacity/low-resourced. In C4C we produced a resilience framework, and studied changes in resilience over time due to C4C; in A21, we worked alongside community support workers to assess the impact of their processes, and the associated outcomes. These two innovative projects seeking to include those otherwise “on the margins” could be useful exemplars of enhancing empowerment through inclusive processes.
   b. The CESB Policy Memorandum mentions the work of DTAS, both as a network and as the providers of the Community Ownership Support Service (COSS). In addition to DTAS, lessons could be identified from the rolling out of the People and Communities Fund (delivered through the Scottish Community Development Centre [SCDC]). Other established approaches also include the community engagement officers in the Cairngorms National Park, and the Community Account Managers of Highlands and Islands Enterprise. Further, the European LEADER Programme has been operating in since 1991, seeking to empower communities throughout rural Scotland; there will be a wealth of learning and experience which can be ‘harvested’ from these examples. The work of the Plunkett Foundation and the Carnegie UK Trust could also be of value in this regard.

2. Evaluation and attribution:
   a. There is a range of evaluations which have been carried out over many years, including, for example: Rural Voices; Growing Community Assets 1 and 2; LEADER programmes. Work needs to be carried out to identify the meta-lessons, the ingredients of what works.
   b. Ex ante evaluations have been carried out for various schemes and programmes (including the SRDP). Learning from these approaches could be useful in establishing a baseline and appropriate monitoring and evaluation frameworks for CESB, so that CESB can be improved during its implementation.
   c. It would also be beneficial to pull together evidence of what communities have already been doing to empower themselves. Examples may include communities who have bought the land they live and work on (not only those who achieved this through the Community Right to Buy but also those who worked through this independently); communities who have bought and run community shops, pubs, transport and other services etc. It should be possible to identify the critical success factors of these projects and build these into the on-going implementation and evaluation of CESB.

3 More information on these projects is available by contacting any of the authors of this response.

d. What Works Scotland is mentioned in PM paragraph 37. SRUC is included in the 'academic pool' in this initiative and we would be keen to identify synergies, as appropriate, between CESB and WWS, particularly from a rural perspective.

3. Targeting empowerment in areas of rural poverty and disadvantage:
   a. SRUC’s 2014 Rural Scotland in Focus Report showed how the use of existing data types gives a picture of the ways in which rural poverty and disadvantage are being experienced by people and communities in rural Scotland. Further work can be developed from this, to enhance the targeting of CESB in areas of such disadvantage.
   b. Highlands and Islands Enterprise (HIE) has been developing maps and measures of Fragile Areas since the early 1990s, and have recently updated these following the release of the 2011 Census data. There is scope to explore how the HIE Fragile Areas assessment might feed into more focused implementation of CESB ensuring better “fit” for rural areas, certainly within the Highlands and Islands area.

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill
Submission on Bill Provisions

I thank you for the opportunity to provide a Submission regarding this Bill and my comments are as follows:-

Section 97C, Sub-section (2) (Explanatory Note 121)

It is noted that Ministers may make regulations setting out what factors they must have regard to when deciding where the land is wholly or mainly neglected or abandoned. It is very important that the criteria set out to define ‘wholly or mainly neglected or abandoned’ land are very clear, otherwise there may well be a large number of appeals to the Sheriff under the appeal provisions in 97V.

Section 97J, Sub-section (1) (Explanatory Note 164)

It is noted that, unlike the provisions for rural subjects in Part 3 of the 2003 Act, the community body in this case will not know the valuation at the time at which the ballot takes place. Under the current 2003 Act, community bodies, when the ballot takes place, are well aware of the valuation which has taken place and know exactly what they are voting for. This could cause difficulties if the community body vote to approve a Right to Buy, and the valuation is significantly higher than they anticipate. This difficulty would be averted if, as in Part 3, the valuation took place prior to the ballot.

Section 97J, Sub-section (6) (Explanatory Note 168)

It is noted that it will be the community body which is responsible for the expense of conducting the ballot. This again is different from the procedure in Part 3 of the 2003 Act, where it is the Scottish Government which is responsible for that cost. This could also cause issues for more disadvantaged communities which, without adequate financial support, might find it difficult to source the money to conduct the ballot.
Section 97S, Sub-section (8) (Explanatory Note 213)

This requires the valuer to ask both the owner and community body for their views in writing on the value of the land. However, unlike the new amendments to Section 60 of the 2003 Act, where both the owner and community body have rights to make comments on the other party’s representations, there appears to be no such right in this case. Those changes to Section 60 were, presumably, made in order to ensure that both parties were treated fairly by giving the each party the opportunity to comment on issues raised in the other’s representations, and draw attention to anything inaccurate or potentially misleading, and thus to ensure that the valuer had received accurate representations. It also brought the procedure into line with that outlined in the RICS Guidance Note for Independent Experts and Arbitrators, and I suggest that it would be useful to introduce such additional representations to the procedure in this section also.

Section 97S, Sub-sections (9) and (10) (Explanatory Notes 214 and 215)

It is not quite clear to me what happens if the valuer disagrees with the valuation which has been agreed under Sub-section (9) between the community body and the owner of the land. My assumption is that the valuer must report his or her own assessed value, whilst noting the figure agreed by the two parties. This will be of relevance if, for example, the figure agreed by the parties is higher than the valuer’s assessed valuation, and public money is being used to fund the acquisition.

Section 52, Asset Transfer Requests (Explanatory Notes 256-257)

It is noted that the community transfer body, in making an asset transfer request, must specify, inter alia, the transfer price or the amount of rent, whichever is appropriate. This could cause difficulties if the property concerned is one where the community body would prefer to obtain professional valuation advice, as unlike the circumstances in either Part 3 or Part 3A, there are no provisions for payment for such costs to be met by the Scottish Government. It should be noted that although the Council’s Asset Register may contain a valuation of the property, for many properties this would be calculated on a depreciated replacement cost basis, and that figure would be inappropriate as a basis for a transfer price or rent. It might therefore be helpful if payment of necessary professional fees were possible.

Section 58, Appeals (Explanatory Note 267-269)

It is possible that the reason for the disagreement and the Appeal is because the relevant authority has a substantially different idea of value from the community body. In such a case, it would be helpful if there were provisions allowing the Scottish Ministers to appoint a valuer acting as an Expert, as happens elsewhere in the Act, to provide a valuation.

Thank you for the opportunity of making this submission.
Pinsent Masons LLP response to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee's call for written evidence as part of its Stage 1 consideration of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

Pinsent Masons LLP are a multi-national law firm with three offices in Scotland advising national and international clients with property interests in Scotland. We have extensive experience of acting for landowners, developers, investors and funders. We advise both the public and private sectors. We have restricted our comments to the extension of the community right to buy land and the introduction of asset transfer requests as these are the areas which are of most concern to our clients. Those concerns centre around ensuring that the rights of landowners, and the interests of other affected parties such as developers and funders, are given due balance.

We responded to the consultation on the draft Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill which closed on 24 January 2014.

Part 4 of the draft bill (Community right to buy land):

Section 44 Expenses of valuation of land

Where a land owner gives notice (under section 54 (5) of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 ("2003 Act")) of the owner's decision not to proceed further with the proposed transfer of the land it is proposed (new section 60 (A) (2) of the 2003 Act) that the Ministers may require the owner of the land to pay any expense incurred by the Ministers in connection with the valuation of the land. We consider that further clarification of the criteria which would form the basis for the Minister's decision on expenses should be given. A land owner must remain free to deal with his or her land as he or she sees fit and having the threat of recovery of expenses against the land owner could adversely affect the land owner.

Section 48 Abandoned and neglected land

We remain concerned as to how land will be identified as being abandoned or neglected as land management can take so many forms. A land owner may be pursuing long term development proposals in good faith which are not evident to the community. Section 97C (1) and (2) leaves it to the Scottish Ministers to flesh out its meaning but we believe more statutory guidance is required as this is a very important concept, leading as it could to the transfer of land to a third party community group under compulsion.

In relation to the proposed new section 97G (10) the information to be provided by the owner should include information about the effect on the owner's funder. Account also needs to be taken of the existence of any leases or other contractual commitments which bind the owner in relation to the land. We do not consider that section 97G (10)(d) is sufficiently clear in that regard. This is particularly important as such contracts can be rendered void by section 57 (5).

Where land is acquired by, or under threat of, compulsory purchase a non-statutory arrangement known as the Crichel Down Rules provides that surplus land should be offered back to former owners and their successors. The procedure for the resale of the land is set out in Planning Circular 5-2011 in the Scottish Government Planning Series (Disposal of surplus government land- the Crichel Down Rules).

We consider that the equivalent to Crichel Down Rules should apply where land acquired under the amended 2003 Act is not used for the purpose for which it was acquired. The former owner or their successors should be entitled to first refusal if the land is no longer used by the community for the intended purpose.

Under new section 97S (assessment of value of land etc) does the market value take account of the owner's special interest if it is the owner of other land nearby?

Part 5 of the draft bill (Asset transfer requests):

Section 55 Asset transfer requests: decisions

Sub-paragraph (h) refers to any obligations "imposed" on the relevant authority, by or under any enactment or otherwise, that may prevent, restrict or otherwise affect its ability to agree to the request. This should include contractual obligations which the relevant authority has entered into; but contracts are not "imposed" on the relevant authority, rather contracts are freely entered into and obligations are accepted by the relevant authority. The drafting should be amended to reflect this. Under section 55 (5) it should be made clear that a pre-existing contractual obligation by the relevant authority affecting the asset is a "reasonable ground" for refusing an asset transfer request.

There will need to be some sort of publicly available register of asset transfer requests to and decisions by relevant authorities so that third parties contracting with the relevant authorities are able to ensure that they do not unwittingly enter into a contract which will become void under section 57 (5). Also in relation to section 57(5) contracts should only become void "to that extent".

Section 56 Agreement to asset transfer request

The transfer of the asset to the community transfer body should contain a restriction on the use of the asset for the agreed public use. If the community body later use the land for a different (and perhaps more lucrative) purpose, this hardly serves the public good in that the assessment made at the time of the transfer request is just being disregarded.

Section 58 and 59 Appeal and Review by local authority

The draft legislation provides appeal procedures in section 58 which apply unless the relevant authority is the Scottish Ministers or a local authority. Section 59 provides for a review procedure if the relevant authority is a local authority. Why does this review procedure not also apply if the Scottish Ministers are the relevant authority?

We would be pleased to expand upon any of our points should that be helpful to the committee.

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

Glasgow Life welcomes the Bill’s aspiration to improve the involvement of local communities in the design and delivery of public services. We particularly welcome the statutory focus on understanding, specifying and achieving outcomes as we believe this is a fundamental component of meaningful empowerment and participatory approaches. The focus on prevention and reducing inequalities specified in the new approach to Community Planning processes via the requirements for Local Outcome Improvement plans is also particularly important.

Our view is that the Bill will change the dynamic between well organised communities and public services and will go some way towards empowering local communities to drive positive changes. The main reasons for this from our perspective are:

- the new obligation on Community Planning Partnership (CPP) to consult community bodies in the development of local improvement plans and resource these processes
- increased clarity around the need to understand the complexities of local communities
- the simplification of asset transfer
- enabling community controlled bodies to make formal requests to public bodies regarding involvement in the outcome improvement processes
- a recognition that funding, staff and resources need to be committed by CPPs to support communities to engage

More excluded, fragmented or disparate communities with weaker infrastructure or capacity may continue to struggle to engage with public bodies. Power sharing among and across disparate stakeholders trying to address highly complex issues in an increasingly tight fiscal environment is also likely to result in conflict. If the Bill’s aspirations are to be achieved then the skills and capacity to manage this positively may need additional investment.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?
From our perspective the likely benefits to public organisations will include:

- a more sophisticated understanding of community need and the diversity of communities we serve which will enable better planning, design and delivery of services
- opportunities to develop a more sophisticated and practical understanding of outcomes and impact and how to use these to shape services
- increased social capital in communities
- transfer of assets to communities which may facilitate access to additional resources

Possible disadvantages may include:

- communities with less power being marginalised in decision making or co-production
- skills development and capacity building around co-production for agencies and communities will require investment
- increased potential for tension and conflict given the diversity of communities and interest and the complexity of the issues

Communities are fluid and diverse. Many are well organised and focused on achieving agreed objectives. However there are many facets to personal identities. Public agencies often (and often by necessity) conceptualise “community” in a manner which meets their service deployment needs but does not take into account these complexities.

Communities which are less well organised or have not developed common visions may struggle to fully engage with the Bill’s provision without sustained capacity building support. In addition in order for asset transfer to be successful and sustainable many communities are likely to need a level of support that agencies find it challenging to provide given the fiscal environment.

4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

We would welcome more detailed guidance around the roles and responsibilities of “arms-length” public organisations such as Glasgow Life. We are part of the City’s Community Planning networks but it can also be inferred that we should be consulted by the CPP because of our other functions.

5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy Memorandum?
We welcome Bill’s synergy with the aspirations of the range of equality and human rights legislation. Given our urban focus we have no comments to make regarding island communities. We would welcome additional information regarding the definition of “environmental wellbeing” specified in the Policy Memorandum.
Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

Response to the Call for Written Evidence from the Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee

The UNISON Scotland Submission to the Scottish Parliament’s Local Government and Regeneration Committee
Introduction

UNISON is Scotland’s largest public sector trade union. UNISON members deliver a wide range of services in the public, community and private sector. Members are also tax payers and service users and are ideally placed to provide evidence to inform the committee during its scrutiny of public sector reform. UNISON Scotland welcomes the opportunity to submit evidence to the local government and regeneration committee.

Evidence

UNISON is generally supportive of involving community groups, including trade unions, in the design and delivery of services and extending the community right to buy particularly round neglected and abandoned land. We do though have a range of concerns about the impact of this Bill on communities, services and the workers who deliver them.

Staff

UNISON is concerned that both the Scottish and UK governments see community empowerment as a way to deliver services more cheaply. Where outsourcing services has claimed to save money it has been through cutting jobs, wages and the terms and conditions of the staff who deliver those services.

Despite concerns raised by UNISON during the earlier consultations the workers, who currently deliver services on/in the land and building that community groups will have the right to ask to takeover, are not mentioned in the Bill. There is a big difference between a community taking over unused public buildings and land and putting then to public benefit than for example taking over the health centre, library or swimming pool. UNISON is also concerned that the staff who currently deliver services could be replaced by untrained volunteers. There needs to be much more clarity about how this will impact on services and the staff who work there.

- Who will the new employer be?
- Will this require new legislation?
- How will staff transfer to a new employer?
- Will staff still be employed on local authority terms and conditions?
- How will these be negotiated going forward?
- Will staff still be able for example to apply for internal vacancies with the local authority?

Privatisation

The Bill does not contain enough protection against for privatisation of public services. The outcomes approach means that organisations could focus on specific outcomes and set up bodies to bid for services claiming they can achieve one of the government’s outcomes.

Community bodies having taken over an asset may also then bring in a private partner. If the aim of empowering communities is to be achieved and privatisation avoided the Bill needs to contain measures to prevent this happening.
The experience of Leisure Trusts and Housing Associations shows that in order to achieve economies of scale organisations originally set up to be small and responsive to their local communities end up joining together for financial reasons recreating the large corporate bodies they originally sought to escape. They can also be “captured” by their management again losing the benefits of co-production.

What happens if the community group cannot sustain the service? Can a private provider take over? What happens if a group in future want to sell assets to another body? Public bodies at a minimum need the right to buy back the assets at the original price.

Equalities
UNISON believes that empowering communities through increased participation is not about transferring assets or ownership of services to groups of people, but about ensuring that citizens are consulted and listened to at all points of the process. This requires appropriate resources. As the Christie Commission highlighted there are communities of interest as well as communities of place. There needs to be recognition of the many different groups and individuals who want and need to access public services. There must be substantial protection service users, particularly those voices that are already less well heard in Scotland, from the well organised well off further controlling assets and influencing service delivery to suit their needs. The Equalities Impact Assessment of the Bill has not yet been published. This should be a fundamental part of the policy development process not an add-on once the main work has been done. It is impossible to see if this has been investigated and protections are in place without access to the assessment.

Resources
The Financial Memorandum states that the Bill will not place substantial costs on public bodies and that most costs will be administrative. The Bill will be implemented at a time of severe financial pressure and job cuts in the public sector. Further detail is needed on how public bodies will find the resources to fund the implementation of this Bill.

The Bill proposes more rights for local authorities to reduce business rates but not to increase them. UNISON would prefer local authorities to be given full control of business rates.

Outcomes approach
UNISON has been generally supportive of an outcomes based approach to public service delivery particularly as an alternative to the more accountancy based approach of the past. UNISON is concerned though that the current performance framework is not delivering on its promise. Scotland Performs was launched, with much fanfare in 2008. Finance secretary John Swinney said:

"Scotland Performs is about responsibility and accountability."

"By making this information easy to access, and by showing exactly whether we as a country are doing well or need to do more, everyone in Scotland will have the ability to judge for themselves how Scotland is performing.

"This website is about how all of Scotland is performing. For many of the progress measures responsibility for success is shared between the Scottish Government and partners in local government, with our universities, the business community and in many cases with individual Scots. Decisions we all take will determine whether we are becoming the more successful nation we all seek.”

The release also stated that “Scotland Performs is based on the Virginia Model, a strategic planning and communications tool used in the State of Virginia, USA.”

UNISON believes that Scotland Performs has not lived up to this promise. The site itself does not have easy to understand pages, does not provide “quick access to information” nor is there evidence of it being a strategic planning tool. Scotland Performs has surface similarities to Virginia Performs but is nowhere near as extensive in terms of data or analysis. The Virginia site offers both easy to read graphics for a range of geographical and subject areas for those looking for snapshots as well as explanations/discussions of issues and extensive data for those seeking wider information or wishing to do their own analysis. Scotland Performs is not the “go to” place for data on Scotland or the delivery of its services nor has it become a source of debate or discussion. Sites like Virginia Performs and Baltimore’s city website (https://data.baltimorecity.gov/) give access to data that require freedom of information requests in Scotland, including the amounts of individual procurement contracts. Scotland Performs may be modelled on Virginia Performs but it has only a surface resemblance to that performance framework.

UNISON is not aware of Scotland Performs updates or indicators being used in question/debates in the parliament. The outcomes and indicators do not seem to have become part of the in the discussion in parliamentary committees or the wider body of Scottish debate. UNISON has not found it useful in our policy development or analysis process. So far it has not become part of Scotland policy debates. If we are to embed the outcomes approach in legislation then the method of monitoring this approach needs a great deal of work.

UNISON is supportive of a role for communities and voluntary organisations, including trade unions, in influencing the planning and delivery of services. There is little evidence that people want to take over services and run them for themselves. For example in the Big Lottery Fund paper Growing Community Assets Evaluation (April 2013) referenced by the Minister in his response to the committee states that while people thought that community ownership was a good thing only 10% were actually interested in volunteering or making the decisions themselves.

There needs to be clear mechanisms to ensure that such a community body is representative of the community it claims to represent and how the wider community influence decisions, made if an asset comes under the control of that body. There is a great deal of difference between a group of activists in a community and the many large third sector organisations who currently deliver outsourced services. Many are in the conflicted position of providing advocacy for disadvantaged groups and also delivering services directly to those groups. There needs to be an onus on community groups to consult with the wider community and to publish meeting dates and minutes to ensure that citizens out with the group do not lose out when an asset moves out of local authority control.

Communities are not homogenous whether they are geographical or of interest. Even in small communities there will be differing needs and more and less powerful individuals. Graduates are more likely to be active already than those with no qualifications 23% versus 3%. (2020 report What do people want, need and expect from public services). UNISON is concerned that those people who already are or feel disempowered could be further marginalised as they are the least likely to participate in policy making processes. There needs to be substantial protection for the wider community, particularly those voices that are already less well heard in Scotland from the well organised well off and articulated further controlling asset of influencing services delivery to suit their needs. "Sharp Elbows": Do the Middle-Classes have Advantages in Public Service Provision and if so how? shows that this is already the case and there is a real risk that in its current form this Bill will make this worse.

Giving Communities assets in itself will not bring change: JRF highlight the following as key success factors

“Allowing time for staged growth and development was a key success factor, along with access to support technical aid, brokerage and community development. The diversity within communities and the nature of local community organisations were also important factors; assets needed to be embedded in a strategic approach to local community development that recognised organisations’ interdependence with other public, private and third sector agencies.”

The Big Lottery Fund report states: “Another issue that has grown in importance as community ownership has developed is ensuring that projects are driven by, and fit within, a wider community vision rather than in isolation. Projects that are driven by a small group’s desire to develop, or rescue a building, for example (and then try and find another use for it) are less likely to succeed in the long term. With the potential for more building assets transfers to take place in the future, care needs to be taken by both communities and funders to ensure that these are led by local demand and complement other developments. Local authorities are therefore particularly important stakeholders and partners”

It is clear that public bodies will still need to be involved if the wider aspirations of the Bill to transform Scotland are to be achieved. While the financial memorandum suggest that costs will be minimal local authority budgets are under severe pressure. Many community bodies will, as research indicates, need support from local authorities in particular to support their bid and the ongoing viability of the project.

UNISON also has concerns about openness and access to information about assets and services once they are out with local authority control. These concerns have not been addressed. Citizens should be able to access information about the public services they use and about public and political decisions which affect them. This must be the case whatever type of body holds the information or provides the service. The availability of information is key to community empowerment and any organisation including community groups that deliver a service or take control of a public asset must be subject to the Freedom of Information Act. They should also be subject to the same Equalities Duties as a public body.

The extension of the right to buy and the power to buy derelict and abandoned land even when the owner is unwilling to sell could support communities to make use of land in their areas. This could improve both the “look” of an area and where these spaces are used for anti social behaviour reduce the impact of that behaviour on communities. This also saves money for public bodies like the police who no longer have to deal with this behaviour.

There are though disadvantages for public bodies from such transfers. Firstly they will lose an asset. Many will have earmarked assets for future use or to be sold in order to raise funds for other projects. This will also impact of long-term planning as bodies will not know what requests will be made. Even though public bodies can refuse to transfer an asset the time taken to deal with a request may impact on the timing and costs of projects.

There is also the risk to service delivery and maintaining standards if services become fragmented. There is also a risk of higher costs as some of the savings made by economies scale will be lost.

It would be easier to comment on this aspect of the Bill if the Equalities Impact Assessment had been published. UNISON is concerned that better educated and connected members of communities will be far more able to make use of the provisions of the bill. This could lead to increasing inequalities rather than achieving its stated outcomes. Giving Communities assets in itself will not bring change: JRF\(^3\) highlight the following among key success factors

> “well established community organisations may be able to thrive and grow in this new environment if the right conditions are in place. In disadvantaged areas there may be a lack of capacity and more limited opportunities to generate revenue from community assets. There is a real risk that some communities will be left behind in the asset transfer agenda, representing a missed opportunity that may exacerbate existing inequalities among communities”

4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

The Bill needs to be much clearer about protections for those workers who currently deliver services on/in the land and building that community groups will have the right to ask to takeover. Public bodies should have the right to buy back assets at the original price if a community group decides to sell. Any groups which deliver public services should also be subject to the same Freedom of Information and Equalities duties as public bodies.

\(^3\) Community Organisations controlling assets: a better understanding June 2011

UNISON is concerned that the Equalities Impact Assessment of the Bill has not yet been published. This makes it very difficult to comment on this question. Communities are not homogenous whether they are geographical or of interest. Even in small rural communities there will be differing needs and more and less powerful individuals. There need to be measure within the Bill to ensure that women, people with protected characteristics are able to take part in and have a say in the future of public services and that where groups do take over services they are not excluded from those services.

Conclusion

UNISON as Scotland's largest public sector trade union has long been a supporter of empowering communities to have a real say in the delivery and design of public services. UNISON is concerned that the Bill does not contain protection for public sector workers or for less powerful and marginalised citizens. We therefore welcome the opportunity to submit evidence to the committee.
Regarding the call for evidence to the Community Empowerment Bill. Lynne Palmer 4th Sept; 2014

I have already contributed on the consultation paper which had to be in by 24th June. This is a further attempt, on the 5 questions.

Q1. I have to say that I don’t think the Bill will empower communities; what it will do is make a start on empowering communities & individuals. Groups & individuals must come forward genuinely wanting to make changes. Changes in their personal lives will come before this so that a person or a few people realise they are disempowered. The problem known as ‘the Scottish psyche’ is at the back of this, but people don’t realise the power it has over them. If people moved to change themselves, years & years of training & adjustment of their personality to a certain extent would be necessary.

Q2. The benefits would be that some volunteers could be given responsibility for some tasks, relieving some staff & requiring less staff. This would help to remove the ‘them & us’ problem; a certain amount of equality with staff could be achieved, so genuine working together. This would help members of the public & groups to sense their own innate power. But Scottish people don’t want to do this! The disadvantages for public sector orgs. is that staff resent the above happening!, they will have to be assisted to get over this. There is also the problem of volunteers or any member of the public showing signs of becoming ‘semi-professional’ in their ability level. This is a good thing, but some professionals will not like it. Some volunteers when realising the effect they are having may shrink back, but mentoring should be used to keep them on track.

Q3. No they generally do not have the capabilities to take advantage of the Bill. Insert something in the Bill regarding mentoring. Keep raising the profile of personal empowerment in what ever way it can be done for the whole of Scotland. You could put something about empowerment in the Bill; something like an introduction to the theory of empowerment & what it can do for people. This should have to include an easy-read way of speaking about fear.

Q4. Yes; no doubt there will be amendments as years pass.
Q5. I have nothing that I can think of to say, except that equal rights must include the chance to become empowered for every Scottish person whether individual or group.

Lynne Palmer.
To Whom It May Concern,

I am writing on behalf of Kincardine & Mearns Community Planning Group – one of the six local Community Planning Groups in Aberdeenshire – with our response to the call for evidence on the Community Empowerment Bill.

We endorse the response made by Aberdeenshire Community Planning Partnership and would like to add that in our Group has understood the wording of the bill to effective exclude community councils as a statutory body within Community Planning Partnerships by not including them in Schedule 1. Instead they seem to be included as a ‘community participation body’ and even these community participation bodies do not appear to be statutory partners and may be excluded. If that is not the case, then the bill could be worded more clearly. Our group feel that it is important that community representation is necessary and statutory within Community Planning Partnerships, and furthermore it is preferable, at least in our location, that Community Councils are the nominated body acting as a hub for other community organisations in the area.

Relating to the section on Common Good Land – we feel that it would be unmanageable and unadvisable that every community council in Aberdeenshire be located on every possible change of use of common good land – our area is too big for this to be a good idea. We do feel that consultations should ideally involve community councils and also go wider.

Thank you.

Local Government & Regeneration Committee enquiry – Community Empowerment Bill

SCVO response
05 September 2014

Summary

- The Community Empowerment Bill is a small part of the change required to enable more empowered communities.
- The primary role for government and the public sector in this agenda is a supportive one, which enables community empowerment but does not direct or control it.
- Involving people in top-down public sector-led agendas is not community empowerment and can in many instances be disempowering.
- The barriers that communities face are rarely just legislative - culture and attitude are much more likely to restrict a community’s development.

Comments on the Bill

- To give communities a greater say over local spending priorities, 10% of the total budget for the public sector in each local authority area could be allocated for participatory budgeting processes.
- We support the introduction of a single, clear process for the transfer of assets to communities from public bodies.
- We would like to see the bill amended to include a duty on public bodies to maintain an asset register and publish asset management plans.
- We support changes to the land reform legislation which would extend the Community Right to Buy to all communities in Scotland.
- We are concerned that the definition of ‘neglected or abandoned’ used for the new part 3A of the Community Right to Buy could prove an impossible barrier for communities to overcome in rural areas.
Our response

SCVO has worked extensively on the Community Empowerment Bill since its inception in 2011. This response draws from a large number of discussions held with our members, third sector intermediary bodies and our Policy Committee over that period. Most recently, SCVO convened a group of third sector organisations to discuss what is needed ‘beyond the Bill’ to empower communities. The main points arising from these discussions have been incorporated into this response.

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

The Community Empowerment Bill is one small part of the change needed to enable more empowered communities. It is vital that this Bill is considered in those terms and not seen as the totality of the approach that is required. It is our view that the impact of the Bill itself on community empowerment will be minimal unless there is a wider strategy adopted.

As a starting point it should be clear that governments, public sector bodies, politicians and third sector organisations don’t empower communities. Communities empower themselves. The role of all the agencies involved with this agenda should be a supportive one that does not seek to direct or control.

The Bill includes a mix of legislation that has been brought forward to achieve different purposes. This can make the policy objectives of the Bill seem at times incoherent. By mixing legislation on land reform and asset transfer with measures on community planning and public service reform, the Bill adds to the confusion that exists between community empowerment and community engagement. This is despite page 3 of the Policy Memorandum for the Bill making it clear that the Scottish Government understands the distinction: “The Scottish Government is clear that it is important that community voices are heard in public sector processes, but that this engagement differs from community empowerment, where communities lead change for themselves.”

If it is done well, we support people and communities having a greater say in the improvement of public services and other local decision making processes. However, involving people in top-down public sector led agendas is not community empowerment and can in many instances be disempowering.

A bottom-up process of genuine community empowerment involves a community coming together collectively and pursuing a set of shared objectives through a collaborative effort. The best expression of this type of empowerment can be seen in the many Development Trusts or Community Land Trusts that have taken their own future into their hands. They set the agenda, decide their priorities and lead the development of their own communities.

The Royal Society of Edinburgh ‘Community Empowerment and Capacity Building Paper’ gets to the heart of the issue:

“The extent of the power shift is less pronounced if a ‘top-down’ approach is favoured, because agenda design remains with the relevant public body, and community action is only sought when the implementation phase is reached. However, this approach falls short of genuine empowerment. The ‘bottom-up’ approach, which sees the identification of local agendas and desired outcomes taking place at the grassroots level, requires that a much larger degree of power and trust be handed to communities. By this approach, it truly is the community which identifies the societal challenges it wishes to see addressed, and it is the community which designs the processes to address these and to deliver the changes it wants. If empowerment is to be an aim of public policy, taking a bottom-up approach will be necessary and inevitable.”

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

The net effect of the Bill on public sector organisations should be positive. Hopefully the Bill will become part of a wider reform of the way public bodies interact with communities. If successful it could lead to greater and more equal collaboration that will deliver significantly improved outcomes. Changing the culture in public bodies to provide a more bottom-up approach to their work is vital. We welcome the contribution of the Commission on Strengthening Local Democracy to this debate:

“A fundamental review of the structure, boundaries, functions and democratic arrangements for all local governance in Scotland based on the principles of strengthening local democratic accountability, subsidiarity and public service integration in order to localise and simplify accountability of public services to local communities.”

The ability of communities to take advantage of the provisions in the Bill can be shown from the many successful community projects which have already been taken forward. Significant and challenging projects from North Harris to Cassiltoun, demonstrate the scale and diversity of successful projects that have been achieved in communities of all types. However, there are also communities that have been unable to achieve their objectives. The reasons this happens are complex and can range from financial problems to volunteer fatigue. If we wish to see more success, then creating the right conditions for communities to thrive should always be the priority and there are a number of practical ways this can be achieved.

Different communities have different capacities and will therefore need different types of support to realise their ambitions. It is important to recognise that this isn’t as simple as saying disadvantaged or poorer communities will need greater support. Many communities have significant social capital but might need specialist advice to cover a skills gap. Many deprived communities are perceived as disempowered but the reality can be that they are better connected, more united and have the capacity to undertake fantastic projects and influence decision making. Appreciating this complexity and diversity of communities is crucial.

Guidance or support should be accessible to communities and available at the time when they require it. The Development Trusts Community Ownership Support Service is a good example of how to approach this.

There should be a greater priority given to sharing of ideas and experience between communities and bridging skills gaps by establishing connections between communities. Research on Community Land Trusts vi showed how significant external connections are in creating more resilient communities. Schemes such as the Scottish National Rural Network Project Visits or the DTAS Knowledge & Skills Exchange Fund should be supported to provide further opportunities for establishing these connections.

Funding is hugely important, particularly in the early stages of a community’s development, to support voluntary effort and help get projects of the ground. Finance of this type is best invested directly in the organisations communities have established to progress their priorities. We would like to see additional funding assigned to these ‘Community Anchor’vii organisations that perform this role and bring other community activities together.

The People and Communities Fund is a good example of the problems with current funding programmes and the reluctance from Government to trust communities to set their own priorities. Despite being established for ‘community-led regeneration’, the fund proscribes outcomesviii for applicants to conform to. If outcomes are decided in a top-down way, it is not community-led regeneration. The Strengthening Communities programme is a positive step forward but needs additional support. Funding programmes for empowerment must have open outcomes that allow for the breadth of activity that communities wish to undertake.

Part 1 National Outcomes
We are generally supportive of the proposal to embed Scotland Performs and the National Performance Framework in legislation. This could improve accountability of reporting mechanisms while offering greater opportunity for more people to become involved in the process of deciding outcomes. The key to the success of this proposal is the process that is developed to implement it and how participative and inclusive it is.

Part 2 Community Planning
We question the relationship between these proposals and community empowerment. It is difficult to see how the proposals for community planning outlined in this Bill will empower communities as they mainly concentrate on tightening up and enshrining in legislation processes which have proven to be unsuccessful in improving outcomes or engaging communities.
Local Government and Regeneration Committee

Submission Name: Scottish Council for Volunteer Organisations
Submission Number: 55

It is difficult for us to see how the Bill will reverse that trend. A better way to improve community planning would be to build on good practice examples of partnership working which can be replicated across CPPs.

Both third sector and statutory agencies are often at the forefront of producing exemplar projects, responding quickly to change and working closely with the people they support to deliver positive outcomes. We must learn from what made these projects successful, particularly where they involve partnerships between third sector and statutory agencies. We can then use this learning to nurture similar initiatives in other areas - up-scaling, replicating and adapting where needed. We hope the outcomes from the new 'What Works Scotland' centre will contribute to this.

Part 3 Participation Requests

There may be some value in legislating for this process. Allowing organisations to initiate a process to improve services could open up discussions between communities and public bodies. However, its effectiveness will still be dependent on the culture and attitudes within the relevant public body. Improving the understanding of participative approaches within public bodies through training or demonstrations of good practice is more likely to achieve success than bringing forward legislation that could be ignored or regarded as a nuisance by these bodies.

We are also concerned that introducing this process might disrupt the positive ways that third sector organisations and public bodies already work together. The formal process that has been proposed might disrupt positive interactions which already take place if it becomes the main route for engaging the sector in improving public services.

1. We would like to see an appeals mechanism created for this process that provides an additional route for communities to take if their request is declined.

2. We are concerned that the legislation as drafted wouldn’t permit a community to initiate an outcomes improvement process for a service that does not already exist. This would prevent communities from working with public bodies to design and develop a new service in their area that is a priority for them.

3. We are disappointed that this single mechanism is the only concrete proposal for increasing participation in the decision making and the design and delivery of public services. The Scottish Government’s single line in the Policy Memorandum to offer consultancy support for local authorities to develop participatory budgeting in their areas is insufficient and underwhelming.

4. We welcome the Commission on Strengthening Local Democracies' commitment to participatory democracy:

“...The right of individuals and communities to local democracy needs legislative expression through a clear duty in law to support and resource participation in decision making.
Voluntary Organisations

Democratic innovations such as deliberative assemblies, participatory budgeting and citizen scrutiny of public services should also become the standards by which this is delivered in Scotland.

“Implementing arrangements for participatory budgeting that go beyond a consultation on predetermined options for budget cuts, and instead focus on local tax and spend priorities.”

5. We would like to propose a considerably more ambitious approach to participation than that proposed by the Bill.

In order to give communities a greater say over local spending priorities, 10% of the total budget for the public sector in each local authority area could be allocated for participatory budgeting. This would have a number of benefits:

- Improved collaboration between public agencies
- Greater participation in democratic processes
- Greater transparency and accountability in public spending decisions
- Improved trust between communities and public bodies
- Greater understanding of the public’s views
- Improved outcomes that genuinely reflect people’s priorities
- Increased social capital

We are under no illusions that this would be challenging to achieve on a practical basis, but it is our view that the benefits would make it worthwhile. Scotland’s experiments with participatory budgeting have so far been small scale, we could be much more ambitious and give the public a real say over the priorities for spending in their area. This could involve a wide variety of models from local authority level processes with large budgets being considered, right down to the neighbourhood level with small amounts being assigned. The schemes that have taken place in Porto Alegre in Brazil were undertaken with as much as 18% of the overall budget allocated.

Part 4 Community Right to Buy Land

We support changes to the Land Reform legislation which would extend the Community Right to Buy to all communities in Scotland. We appreciate that there will be different opportunities and challenges in urban communities that require further investigation but we see no reason why they should not enjoy the same rights as rural areas.

1. We welcome the introduction of part 3A which will provide a Right to Buy without a willing seller. This will provide a last resort for communities by giving them the right to buy land if it can be shown to be in the public interest and important for sustainable development.

2. We are concerned that as the legislation stands the current definition of “neglected or abandoned” could prove an impossible barrier for communities to overcome. This will be particularly problematic in rural areas where landlords wishing to avoid coming under the scope of legislation could easily claim that land is being returned to a more natural state.

3. We would like to see the Bill amended to remove the limitation to “company limited by guarantee” in part 3A. Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisations (SCIOs) should also be able to access these rights as they can do elsewhere in the Bill.

4. While we support this radical change in the underpinning presumptions about ownership, there would be a responsibility on the community to establish that they have the will and capacity to take on the responsibilities of ownership, and that they have pursued other avenues before seeking to exercise this right.

5. The amendments made to part 2 of the Land Reform Act are on the whole very welcome and should simplify the process for communities. However, we would not support the additional requirement for community bodies to make minutes available within 28 days. There is no justification provided for this in the policy memorandum and it would place an unnecessary and impractical burden on organisations.

We would recommend that the Committee pays particular attention to the submissions from Community Land Scotland and Community Woodlands Association whose experience and expertise in this area allows them to give a more detailed consideration to the specific provisions in part 4.

Part 5 Asset Transfer Requests

SCVO supports the transfer of assets to communities, provided that the community has an active desire to take ownership of them. Whilst recognising the benefits of asset ownership, we welcome the Bill’s support for management of assets, which will hopefully ensure the most appropriate model is available to each community.

It is vital that communities have as much information as possible prior to taking control of an asset. Knowing the yearly running costs and potential rental value as well as details of impending repairs or maintenance costs would all be vital information to a community’s assessment of whether to obtain an asset and should therefore be easily accessible. Legislation or regulations must ensure that this type of detail is made available to communities prior to any asset transfer so they can make an informed decision.

1. We support the introduction of a single, clear process for the transfer of public sector assets to communities that has been outlined in draft legislation.

1. We are disappointed that the Bill does not provide a duty for public bodies to maintain and publish an asset register. Knowing what assets a public body holds which could be made available for community use would be a significant resource for communities. It would allow them to look at all the assets in their area and identify those which would suit their purpose.
2. As well as maintaining a public asset register we would like to see a duty on public bodies to publish asset management plans. As communities play an increased role in delivering public services and owning and managing assets, they should also have the opportunity to contribute to the development of these plans.

3. If this process is to be successful it will be necessary to clarify the situation around the valuation of assets and how they can be transferred from public bodies at less than market value.

The Development Trusts Association has significant and valuable experience in this area and their response to these proposals should be given particular consideration.

Part 6 Common Good Property
We support the introduction of an asset register and proposals to consult on the disposal and use of common goods assets. These assets are valuable to communities, so we support provisions which would create greater involvement from communities in the decisions made about these assets. However, we recognise the limitations of the approach being taken by the Bill and note the recommendation of the Land Reform Review Group: “The Group recommends that a new statutory framework should be developed to modernise the arrangements governing Common Good property.”

This should look to develop a statutory definition of common good, the right for communities to take back the assets that were foregone in 1975 and provide additional rights for communities to own and manage common good assets.

Part 7 Allotments
We support the proposals outlined for the provision of allotments by local authorities. Underused and unused land is one way of meeting the demand for growing spaces but sites must be suitable and free from contamination to be viable. This means prioritising and setting aside uncontaminated sites for use as allotments or community growing spaces.

The use of land for therapeutic projects, such as the models developed by the care farming, therapeutic gardening or the men’s sheds movements should also be supported by local authorities, both as a way of making better use of assets and also as a part of a support for wellbeing and early intervention strategy in partnership with NHS and other agencies.

We would encourage the committee to pay particular attention to the response from the Scottish Allotments and Gardens Society who have done extensive work with their members on these proposals.

Part 8 Non-Domestic Rates
We have no comment on this proposal.
Conclusion
We welcome the central role that community empowerment now occupies in public policy. However, we have concerns about the priority given to community engagement and the extent to which the policy has translated to change on the ground. Culture and attitude must be addressed and support provided to communities to help them achieve their own ambitions. The primary role for government and the public sector in this agenda must always be a supportive one which enables community empowerment but does not direct or control it.

We are supportive of the introduction of proposals for transferring assets to communities from public bodies but are disappointed that an asset register has not been legislated for. Bringing Community Right to Buy legislation to all communities, introducing an absolute Right to Buy and improving the processes involved in the Land Reform Act is an important step. We are disappointed that Participatory Budgeting was not included in the Bill and would like to propose that 10% of the total budget assigned for the public sector in each local authority are should be assigned to a participatory budgeting process.

Introduction

The Fife Partnership is the community planning partnership for Fife. It provides strategic leadership, overseeing partnership activity to support the delivery of its agreed vision and outcomes, as set out in Fife’s community plan and single outcome agreement.

Response to call for evidence – Community Empowerment (Scotland Bill)

To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities (please give reasons for your answer)?

What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

Summary answer to the above questions:

Many communities will have the skills, knowledge, experience and confidence to advance, and benefit from, the greater opportunities to own, manage, and deliver services the Bill affords.

However some communities and groups still struggle and will require additional support, for instance in areas that may be new to them, such as:

- becoming a trust;
- managing staff;
- contracts and tendering;
- business planning and financial planning.
This will require targeted resourcing by CPPs and an acknowledgement of suppressed aspirations and a lack of confidence in some communities, generally those in the most disadvantaged areas. The gap between communities that have the skills, knowledge and experience required to take advantage of the provisions in the Bill and those that do not may serve to increase inequalities.

It is implicit in the process that a degree of power and responsibility will be devolved from public services to local groups and communities. Communities, in particular some rural communities, may feel inhibited by top-down agendas, competitive bidding processes, pump priming and short term funding, which may have the effect of reducing community confidence and deter people from becoming involved. Inherent within this is the need for a culture change within large centralised organisations. A culture of working with, rather than doing to, along with genuine partnership is required. Empowering communities can enable communities to become more resilient, while at the same time relieving some of the burdens on public services, including local authorities.

In rural areas community members and voluntary and community groups often have a substantial role in service provision. In some areas they deliver key services, such as lunch clubs and activities that address inequality and exclusion. Policy measures often fail to impact effectively on those who are excluded. Many centralised agencies have not embraced community representation, community membership, engagement and consultation. It is to be hoped, therefore, that the preparation of a clear plan for place will strengthen local community planning and acknowledge the different areas, both urban and rural.

Feedback on Part 2 – Community Planning

Para 4 (a) Persons listed in Schedule 1 must participate in community planning

Evidence: We consider that listed partners should participate as appropriate – this will not necessarily involve full membership of the CPP Board. It may be more appropriate for some partners to become involved as members of thematic partnerships.

Para 5(c) CPPs must take reasonable steps to secure the participation of community bodies and enable community bodies to participate in community planning

- Evidence: Fife Community Planning Partnership is supportive of any measures to promote effective community engagement in community planning. In Fife, this is being achieved by promoting community engagement in local community planning. This is being supported through the Partnerships involvement as one of four What Works Scotland case study areas.

Local Outcomes
Para 3 (a) & (b)

- Evidence: Consultation with community bodies and other persons is common practice in Fife and this requirement is welcomed.

- Evidence: Rural Proofing
  As part of the duties of CPP, of planning and the achievement of local outcomes there should be a requirement to undertake rural proofing audits especially in a mixed urban/rural local authority area.

  Rural proofing is part of the policy making process and should be used to scrutinise proposed policies. It should ensure fair and equitable treatment of rural communities and ensure that a policy does not directly or indirectly have a detrimental impact on rural dwellers and rural communities.

  The process should also involve monitoring the implementation of the policy to ensure that this is achieved.

  This rural proofing should be included in the local outcomes improvement plan.

  It may be that the national outcomes to be developed by Ministers should also require to be rurally proofed and adjusted, if required, to ensure equality and fairness for rural communities.

6. LOCAL OUTCOMES IMPROVEMENT PLAN: REVIEW

Para 2 (a) & (b) CPPs must from time to time review and revise plans

- Evidence: This is common practice in Fife where there is generally a 3-yearly review of the plan

7. LOCAL OUTCOMES IMPROVEMENT PLAN: PROGRESS REPORT

Para 1 CPPs must prepare an annual progress report

- Evidence: This is common practice in Fife.
8. GOVERNANCE

Paras 1 & 2 Partners named in subsection (2) must facilitate community planning and take reasonable steps to ensure the CPP carries out its functions efficiently and effectively.

- Evidence: Fife CPP considers that the boards of management of regional colleges should also be included in this list.

9. COMMUNITY PLANNING PARTNERS: DUTIES

Para 3 Each CP partner must, in relation to a CPP, contribute such funds, staff and other resources as the CPP considers appropriate:

(a) With a view to improving, or contributing to an improvement in, the achievement of each local outcome; and

(b) For the purpose of securing the participation of community bodies in community planning.

- Evidence: This provision should help to encourage community planning partners to commit resources to the delivery of community plan outcomes. However, it is difficult to see how this provision will be effectively enforced.

10. GUIDANCE

Paras 1 & 2 Each CPP and CP partner must comply with any guidance issued with the Scottish Ministers.

- Evidence: This is common practice in Fife. However, there are occasions when detail contained in guidance from Scottish Ministers may be inappropriate for particular local circumstances. National guidance should not stifle innovation and local flexibility.

Feedback on Part 3: Participation Request

Section 14 defines a “community-controlled body” – as a corporate body or unincorporated, but it must have a written constitution.

Evidence: Unincorporated associations are not recognised as entities separate from their members. Consequently, such organisations cannot carry out acts, such as entering into contracts, owning property or engaging employees. The lack of legal personality can also give rise to unforeseen repercussions for members (even within an umbrella body) in civil or criminal liability. For example, it is possible that, under the current law, a member of an unincorporated association could, by virtue of that membership alone, find himself or herself personally liable to a third party injured at an event hosted or organised by the association.
We would therefore suggest that all community controlled bodies require to incorporated and liability limited.

Feedback on Part 4: Community Right to buy

General Comment:

We would make some minor points in the proposed arrangements in order to alleviate some of the burdens on communities.

- Groups wishing to undertake Community Right to Buy only have access to the edited register whereby up to 30% of the electorate may not be included. This makes the initial 50% threshold difficult to achieve.
- We welcome the continuation of the Scottish Land Fund or similar to help ensure that communities have the necessary resources in place.
- Could re-registration be streamlined or the registration period increased?
- We welcome the inclusion of urban areas. However in an area that is more densely populated areas, there may be some competition with different groups registering fan interest in the same asset. Ministers would make that decision. However would there be a right to appeal?

FEEDBACK ON PART 6: COMMON GOOD

Part 6 of the Bill, which deals with common good property, in many ways reflects what should be good practice amongst local authorities. It requires local authorities to establish and maintain common good registers, to consult on those registers, and to consider any representations made by members of the public.

So far as disposal is concerned, again it is current good practice that, before common good property is disposed of, consultation takes place with at least the Community Council. Legislation now proposes to extend this to “any community body that is known by the Authority to have an interest in the property”. Again, that seems to be perfectly sensible.

So far as the existing provisions are concerned, the only comment might be in relation to proposed section 65 (1) (b), which applies the requirement for consultation on any change of use to common good property. Whilst that might seem a reasonable suggestion, it does mean that local authorities will have to consult with community councils and community bodies, for example, where there is a request by an existing tenant for a change of the user clause in their lease. The consultation process, whilst not long, may have an impact on a commercial business – and may well be in respect of a common good property which has been leased out for some time.

Of more concern are the areas which the current provisions do not cover in respect of common good.
The first of these is in relation to appropriation of inalienable common good land for another Local Authority purpose. This issue was discussed in the case of Portobello Park Action Group, Petitioners [2012] CSIH 69 where it was held, correctly, that the current legislation does not allow local authorities to appropriate such land for other uses – in this case a school. The net effect of that was to force the City of Edinburgh Council to put private legislation through Parliament to enable the development of a school which a large sector of the community wishes to see happen.

This case has now been bolstered by the recent decision of East Renfrewshire Council, Petitioners [2014] CSOH 129; in that case, East Renfrewshire, faced with a similar proposal to develop a school on inalienable common good land, chose to characterise the arrangement they had for the new school's development with Scottish Futures Trust as a disposal rather than an appropriation for the purposes of the Act. However, following previous case law, it was held that this too was not an option open to local authorities.

The net effect of these two cases is that local authorities are not able to appropriate inalienable common good land for other public purposes. It seems counterintuitive that they can, on the other hand, dispose of such land with the court’s consent for commercial purposes such as a supermarket. It would in fact be a relatively simple amendment to the existing section 75 (2) of the Local Government (Scotland) 1973 to enable a similar assessment to be made by a court as to whether, taking into account all the circumstances, an appropriation of common good land was the correct way forward for a community, in the same way that the court currently assesses whether a disposal to a third party would be the correct way forward.

A suggested minor amendment to existing sections 75 (2) and (3) is appended for information.

Also of concern in this context is the division of common good land into alienable and inalienable common good land. The determination of whether common good land can be safely disposed of or appropriated without court consent is a matter of interpretation of facts and circumstances, but also interpretation of case law, many of the cases dating back to the 19th or early 20th century.

There is an opportunity in the current legislation to provide more certainty for local authorities and communities alike as to what common good property needs consent for disposal, and what does not. This could be provided by a requirement on local authorities to maintain, in their register, separate lists of what they consider to be alienable and inalienable common good property; to do this, it would be extremely helpful to have a statutory definition inserted. Again, this would not in itself be overly difficult. It would be a case of codifying the existing case law and ensuring that the definition was as clear as possible.

Such definitions could be added to the end of existing draft section 67.

Suggested amendments to s.75(2) and (3) of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973

75 (2) Where a local authority desire to appropriate or dispose of land forming part of the common good with respect to which land a question arises as to the right of the authority to alienate, they may apply to the Court of Session or the sheriff to authorise them to appropriate or dispose of the land, and the Court or sheriff may, if they think fit, authorise the authority to appropriate or dispose of the land subject to such conditions, if any, as they may impose, and the authority shall be entitled to appropriate or dispose of the land accordingly.

(3) The Court of Session or sheriff acting under subsection (2) above may impose a condition requiring that the local authority shall provide in substitution for the land proposed to be appropriated or disposed of other land to be used for the same purpose for which the former land was used.
Response to the Community Empowerment Bill:

Part 2:

Community Planning.

Schedule 1
Community Planning Partners.

1. Third Sector: given the importance, both economic and social, that the Third Sector plays in community development, the Bill should consider giving it a much higher prominence within Community Planning. This would be possible since the establishment and the increasing strength and sophistication of local Interfaces is leading them going beyond administrative bodies and becoming service providers for the Third Sector.

2. One recommendation from the ‘Community Council Short Life Report 2012’ was

➢ That as a matter of course, through a suitable forum, Community Councils have a principal role in Community Planning Partnerships by identifying the most appropriate group to represent specific community views for the purpose of community planning.

In East Ayrshire this was practice before the Report:

About: The Coalfield Communities Federation (CCF) is a representative body of communities within the Coalfield Area of East Ayrshire and acts as a key mechanism to ensure that the community is fully integrated in the activities of East Ayrshire Community Planning Partnership (CPP).

The CCF provides a forum through which the activities of the CPP can be made known and debated throughout the Coalfield Area as well as ensuring that partnership activity reflects local need. The CCF has representation on the CPP Board and assists to inform strategies and future programmes promoted and funded by the CPP. The CCF is also practically involved in the design and realisation of local projects and initiatives.

This fragile arrangement will end in 2015 however as a result of the grant funding being terminated by the newly formed Grants Committee. Where the decision making process was carried out on a cost-benefit basis.

We feel that the recommendation above was sound it should be supported and where arrangements of this sort are made they should be given some form of protection.
Thank you for the opportunity to contribute to the dialogue in the development of the Community Empowerment Bill. This is an important piece of legislation which should, if it is developed fully, contribute to strengthen communities throughout Scotland, and help to foster stronger engagement of the people within the communities, enabling them to take control of their own destiny.

I am writing this as the Chair of the Holmehill Community Buy-out group. Full details of our organisation, its aims and experiences are on www.holmehillblog.org and www.holmehill.org. These comments are based on our experiences which, as one commenter observed, are considerable as we are probably the longest established buy-out group still functioning, but who have not secured their land ownership goals. The last ten years have been frustrating and hard work, requiring tenacity in the face of the “system”, but we have survived and intend to continue, until we secure our goals.

These comments are not on the detailed clauses, as we do not have the technical capability to make detailed comments on the legal clauses of the Bill. They are around the objectives that we consider will make the Bill more effective and generate considerably more community involvement, changing the balance of power in communities from speculators to the local people.

Options

Our second attempt to lodge a “right to buy” was thwarted by the “sale of an option to sell” on the land we wished to register, at an apparently late stage in the registration process. Our understanding is that “options” are not registered so it is not possible to see who holds an interest in the land – an issue that needs resolving. It is not clear to us that the Bill, as proposed, has sealed this loophole. We would be grateful for confirmation that it has, or if not, for confirmation that it will be sealed.

Neglected or abandoned land

Up until June 2013 we might have considered that this clause would have been useable in the case of Holmehill, but our experience over the last 14 months has suggested that it has a limited application as currently drafted.

It is quite clear that the landowner is not currently, in the dictionary definition, neglecting the land, nor is it abandoned. What is happening is the wholesale destruction of the woodland that makes it the special... place that it is. This destruction is at a slow pace, but also includes the denial of access to a considerable part of the space.
So we are concerned that the concept as presented in the Bill will be of limited value in many cases. There may be cases where it will be of real use to communities so we are not suggesting that it is removed, rather that it is strengthened.
The key issue is not that the land is un-managed, but how it is managed. In our case when we went to court over the refusal to register our first application the judgement against us was partly based on the grounds that we were seeking to purchase the land to subvert the planning process. We would argue quite the contrary – at the time of purchase by the current owner, after our rejected registration, Holmehill was designated in the Local Plan as public space. Our desire to purchase it was to retain it as public space and develop it as a public amenity. Thus our intentions were actually in support of the planning process, unlike the current owner who paid a price based on the idea that they would overturn the designation and build on the land – a speculation.

What has transpired has been years of neglect, two planning applications for building that have had to be fought through the planning process and which were ultimately respectively withdrawn by the owner and rejected by Stirling Council. Moreover we secured a continuing, and strengthened designation, as public space, in the new Local Plan with strong support from the Local Plan reporter.

However all of this has been at considerable cost to the community, both financial and emotional.

Now the neglect has now been replaced by an illegal felling of a large number of protected trees and subsequently the very slow destruction of the woodland on Holmehill by the owner, Allanwater Developments. This is restricting its use by the public, has damaged the general aspect and reduced habitats for birds and other wildlife. It is significantly reducing its amenity value to the people of Dunblane.

To prevent this ongoing destructive activity we still wish to purchase Holmehill and to develop it into a vital green space for all of the community to use.

Consequently we consider that the Community Empowerment Bill should include the ability for the local community to take ownership of land that is not being used in line with the defined planning designation and where there is a clear community demand.

This is critical in the case of land bought speculatively, where communities have to endure repeated planning applications to change be use of the land, often against consulted local plans, by the speculators as they try to realise significant profits. This aspect of the planning and land ownership process causes great cynicism amongst communities and considerable backlash against development in general.

As a group we hope that you will address these issues so that we can secure Holmehill for the community and then develop it into the valuable and accessible community resource that the community desire, rather than its remaining as a semi-derelict woodland.

Chair Holmehill Community Buyout
Evidence to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee of the Scottish Parliament on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (CEB), as introduced.

Community Land Scotland (CLS) is the membership organisation of Scotland’s community land owners which between them own and manage some 500,000 acres with assets valued in excess of £60,000,000.

CLS members have significant experience in the workings of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 (LRA) which the Community Empowerment Bill (CEB) seeks to amend.

The principal focus of this submission is on Part 4 of the CEB – the amendments to the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 (LRA).

High level summary of CLS evidence – CLS:

- Welcomes Part 4 of the CEB and the proposed simplifications to Part 2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act made
  - Welcomes the extension of the Community Right to Buy to all of Scotland
  - None-the-less, there are important omissions, clarifications and measures needed to strengthen this Part of the CEB
- Strongly welcomes the extended Community Right to Buy in Section 48
  - However, there are important clarifications and strengthening of the provisions required if they are to be effective
- Welcomes the recent indication by the Scottish Government of its intention to use the CEB to also simplify Part 3 of the LRA. Not have done this would have been a serious omission and and would have left important inconsistencies between Part 2, Part 3 and Part 3A.

Committee Call for Evidence - Questions

The Committee asked a number of questions and this submission principally addresses question 4 about the specific provisions of the Bill and changes respondents would like to see. Beyond this, CLS considers the Bill will help empower communities by giving them new or improved rights to exercise. The effect of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003, which established community rights to buy land, has been to see a change in the whole climate for community purchases, in the knowledge that rights exist to support community aspirations. Community land owning, along with other asset owning activities through, for example, community woodlands and development trusts, has shown that communities do have the capabilities to do remarkable things, and have the capacity to utilise legal rights to help deliver the regeneration of their communities. This Bill puts in place an enabling framework which should add to the ability of communities to act in positive ways.

By enacting provisions that will empower communities, public sector organisations can benefit by more informed and capable communities acting to deliver sustainable development and help better design the delivery of public services. CLS can see no disadvantages to public bodies from this, even though it is recognised they will have some new obligations.

Part 1 – National Outcomes; and Part 2 – Community Planning

CLS does not have sufficient expertise in these matters to make comment on these provisions.

Part 3 – Participation Requests

CLS regards these provisions as important in strengthening the hand of local communities to seek to be involved and potentially secure improvement in matters important to the life of their community. These provisions complement other provisions in the CEB designed to strengthen the rights of communities.

Part 4 – Community Right to Buy

Modifications of Part 2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003

In principle and for the most part these modifications are welcome as a means to improve the workings of the LRA in light of experience over the decade since its implementation. This experience has shown a number of problems with the LRA and the provisions in the CEB seek to deal with key aspects which have been criticised.

Section 27 – extending the Community Right to Buy to all of Scotland

This is a welcome extension of community rights. There is no reason why communities in the urban realm and in towns of over 10,000 should not enjoy the same rights as smaller rural communities.

Section 28 (3) (c) and (4) (1A) (g) - Provision of Minutes upon request

There are practical matters that would benefit from clarification and/or change in what is proposed. It is not clear whether the minutes are of all meetings; in particular, the question of whether this is intended to include board meetings as well as members meetings; sub-committees; and whether it is ‘approved’ minutes that are referred to. Further, it appears this provision would apply retrospectively to community bodies and, if that is the case, the implication would be that existing community bodies would have to take steps very quickly to convene members’ meetings for the purpose of passing special resolutions to make these alterations to their Articles. Failure to make change may have wider implications arising from 35(2) and (3) of the LRA and could terminate a registration of interest or trigger consideration of compulsory purchase by Ministers. It is not believed this is intended. Perhaps the same policy could be effected by, for example, a requirement for Community Bodies to enact such byelaws or Rules. These provisions do not seem to apply to a Part 3A or Part 3 body, and this would be anomalous.

Section 30 - Period for indicating approval

The proposal for a 6 month limit, before which time Ministers may not take into account certain matters, appears impractical. Registration of a community body can take in excess of 6 months itself in certain circumstances. Important feasibility and other studies which may be put to a community for support may well date back before 6 months. CLS believes Ministers should be free to take account of anything they consider relevant in indicating approval and not be artificially restricted, and this 6 month limit is unhelpful.

Section 31 (4) - Late applications to register an interest in land

This is an issue of very real significance to the future prospects of community ownership. For a variety of legitimate reasons, communities do not to think of or register an interest in land as an abstract exercise. For all communities to protect the potential interests of the community through timeous registrations of interest in land, may require registrations of interest in a significant number of areas of land, with little prospect that they may ever come on to the market. There are considerable administrative implications for a community and for government from any process of ‘mass registration’ of interests in land by communities, yet the current LRA rather founds on that broad assumption. Experience shows communities are also very reluctant to register an interest in land if they feel that might be interpreted as a hostile act by an owner.

Communities tend only to engage with the need to register an interest in land when they become aware the land may be available for sale and this can happen often quite unexpectedly, thus triggering the need to consider a late registration of interest in the land. It is not unreasonable that communities behave in this way.

On the face of it, it is not clear why the proposed changes, which replace the need for a community to show “good reasons” why they did not apply timeously, with a new provision to show they had undertaken, sufficiently in advance, “such relevant work as Ministers consider reasonable was carried out, etc”, are any less onerous than the original provision, if this is what is intended (Section 31 (4) & (9)(6)). The new provision may well make the opportunity for a late registration more difficult than it already is, and this would not assist any objective of greater community ownership that was in the public interest.

It would be best to accept late registration as the likely norm and of itself need not be justified by any prior action or lack of action, and instead rest on the other existing tests for late registration and which are already demanding;

- first, in showing significantly greater support for within the community than for a timeous application
- and second, that registering the interest would be strongly indicative that it is in the public interest

These provisions will continue and seem sufficient in themselves, without the new provisions, but with the deletion of the current need to “show good reasons”.

Additionally and more pro-actively it might be possible to make provisions that where Ministers were notified by a land owner that they had an interest in selling their land, Ministers would take steps (through existing government agencies) to seek to establish whether a community had an interest in buying the land.

Section 37 51A (6) - Information for ballotor.

It is not clear why the ballotor would require this information to conduct the ballot, nor why, if that were justified, it would need to be separately supplied, when it forms part of the application process.

Significant omission from Part 2 LRA revisions

There is one significant omission from the potential amendments to Part 2 of the LRA regarding re-registration of an interest in land after 5 years. The current re-registration provisions are seen as demanding and unnecessary.

The 5 year period is considered too short, and consideration should be given to extending this to 10 years. This would retain the ability to occasionally test the will of the community on their continuing interest in purchase, while reducing the burden on communities. Further, re-registration requires replicating the original registration demands, which can be considerable. A further way to simplify matters would be to change this requirement to one that is less demanding, while still open and transparent and providing opportunity for a community and landowner view. These points are supported in the final report of the independent Land Reform Review Group (Section 17.1 – 9 & 10)

The latter suggestion could be achieved through a registered interest remaining valid, with an occasional and simple procedure being adopted to confirm community views if there were no material changes in circumstances. For example, the community body could be required to take an advert in a local newspaper indicating that the community body was under an obligation to re-register its interest in land, what its view was, and offering an opportunity for any qualifying residents (on the electoral roll) to lodge an objection with the Scottish Government.

Section 31(4)(aa)(iii), appears unnecessary and restricting.
The 7 day limits set above appear potentially tight for all circumstances and providing some latitude for a different time, if that was ever considered appropriate, might be helpful to all parties.

Schedule 5 - repeals the word ‘substantial, and this is welcome. However, when it came to any question of the settlement or re-settlement of once cleared land, it may be difficult still to demonstrate a contemporary connection to the land, and this matter ought to be provided for by a separate permissive provision.

Section 48 Part 3A - extending the community right to buy “abandoned or neglected land”

CLS strongly supports the introduction of this new power extending the community right to buy. This is viewed by CLS as a last resort power. This proposal responds to a weakness in the current LRA that, even if it were in the public interest, there is no means for a community to acquire land unless it came on to the open market. The new provision means this matter can now be considered.

The challenge of this part of the CEB is to find the right balance between granting this welcome extended right, and setting tests for the exercise of the right so high that they would not, for all practical purposes, be possible to meet. CLS believes that the significant qualifications on the new right probably makes it impossible to be exercised in practise. There are a number of ways in which the provisions in the CEB could be helpfully clarified and strengthened, and the balance in this regard improved, while still meeting all ECHR requirements. It would only be with important amendment to what is proposed that the cause of community land owning would be likely to be advanced by these provisions.

The Explanatory Notes and the Policy Memorandum make it clear that, respectively, the land in question, to be eligible, is wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected “for the purpose of the sustainable development of that land” and “in order to further the achievement of sustainable development”.

However, the provisions at Section 48 - 97C (1) do not make explicit that sustainable development connection. The provision appears to stand alone with the considerations solely about the physical condition of the land, not about the social and economic development of the place, the classic two pillars of sustainable development in addition to environmental considerations (See Lord Malcolm in the Pairc Crofters Ltd and Another v Scottish Ministers 2012 CSIH 96 at Para 112).

The everyday interpretations of “abandoned” and “neglected” do not link with the issue of the land’s lack of, or potential or need for, sustainable development, and there is therefore a risk that, even if subsection (2) of section 97C was used to bring in these issue as prescribed matters to which Ministers must have regard in determining whether land was eligible, that could be the subject of challenge on the grounds that the linkage between the concepts was not sufficiently warranted or reasonably envisaged by the statutory provisions, or was stretching the normal interpretation of the primary tests set out in subsection (1).

This matter could be clarified and the CEB strengthened by making it clear – within subsection (1) or via a further subsection within section 97C itself - that the land in question, to be eligible land, could be regarded as wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected, or otherwise in need of sustained development, when having regard to the sustainable development of that land. This would be one approach to seek to make clear the concepts of abandonment or neglect of land were related to sustainable development and not solely constrained to its physical condition, use or occupation. This would be consistent with policy as set out in the Policy Memorandum, and the agreed and statutorily required Scottish Land Use Strategy which stresses the use of land for community well-being contributing to a more prosperous and successful nation. Even with this improvement, the requirement to show land was wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected still sets a very considerable hurdle to be overcome. This clarification would need to apply equally to 48 97G (6) (b) and 97G (10) (c).

Any amendments along such lines above would, CLS believe, be compatible with ECHR A1P1 which requires that the interference in individual ownership rights must be - provided for by law; to pursue a legitimate aim; and the means of doing so must be proportionate to achieving that aim; and must achieve a fair balance between the demands of the community and the requirement of the protection of the individual’s rights. All these tests would be met as the matter would be provided for in law; would pursue the policy purpose of furthering sustainable development; would be proportionate [see Pairc case and Lord Gill, paras 36 and 40]

In the case of urban areas and particular sites within such areas, it may be possible to argue that a particular site or building had been abandoned or neglected (in the normal sense of those words) by pointing to its physical condition or the absence of occupation or use, and it is probably why these provisions are in the CEB. They still remain very high, or impossible, hurdles for a community to clear.

However, when considered in the rural context and over the potentially extensive areas of land of the sort that communities have acquired by voluntary agreement in recent years, it is difficult to see how a successful case could be made that land (except in the very narrow circumstances of a building, for example) had been abandoned. The sort of defences that an owner might put up can readily be seen; the abandonment being a deliberate act of land management for conservation purposes for example, or the appearance of abandonment is simply a function of the market conditions for development not being sufficient and there being an intention to use the land, or to take some small and immediate action which would have the effect of showing the land had not been abandoned.

Similar arguments can be made about the question of whether land is wholly or mainly neglected. Had these provisions existed at the time of the initial struggles by the islanders of Eigg, for example, to secure the island into community ownership, would they have been effective in securing that outcome (the ‘Eigg Test’)? Even with these provisions, this may still have been an impossible case to successfully argue. This might be marginally helped by the addition of “or significantly” to “wholly or mainly” in the definition at 97C(1).

Further, however, tying this Part 3A route to community ownership of land solely to the concept of abandonment or neglect, is too limiting. Community ownership of land is not only potentially motivated by questions of abandonment or neglect, it is principally motivated by communities considering barriers to the sustainable development of their place.

The objectives in the Policy Memorandum make clear the purpose of this part of the CEB is to remove barriers to the sustainable development of land. Wider human rights considerations also point to more positive justifications to promote change in the human condition toward achieving more adequate standards of living and the continuous improvement of living conditions, of the sort sought in the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR) (Article 2, Subsection 1). The ICESCR sets out that signatory states should, to the maximum of its available resources, seek to progressively achieve the full realization of the ICESCR by all appropriate means, including particularly the adoption of legislative measures. The Scotland Act 1998, Schedule 5, Paragraph 7 (2) makes clear that Scottish Ministers may take actions, inter alia, “observing and implementing international obligations”. With ICESCR having been ratified by the UK Government, it is brought within the terms of the Scotland Act 1998 and as such, not reserved for this purpose. Ministers are empowered and encouraged by these various provisions to take actions that would further improvement in the human condition.

In all, the Bill could therefore be significantly strengthened with the addition of further criterion to the effect that eligible land could include land, for example, the ownership of which by a community body would be conducive to furthering sustainable development (and in pursuance of objectives of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights); or, (when having due regard to International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights) the ownership of which by a community body would be conducive to furthering sustainable development and the public interest. These are initial ideas of potential ways to clarify and strengthen the CEB.

CLS recognise that part of the Scottish Government’s reasoning in these matters is likely to be in relation to ECHR considerations and the rights of existing owners. CLS believes potential strengthening provisions, such as from the concepts above, would not threaten ECHR compliance, given their nature and given the provisions and procedures elsewhere in this part of the CEB which, in the view of CLS, addresses the principles of human rights law round due process. Further, CLS notes that the existing provisions in the LRA, and which have withstood Court challenge on ECHR Article 1 Protocol 1, do not require any notion of abandonment or neglect of land in order for it to be eligible land, so it is not clear why this would now be required. (See Lord Gill’s judgement in the case of Pairc Crofters Ltd and Another v The Scottish Ministers 2012 CSIH 96)

It is further not clear whether, even if it were possible to identify some parts of a land holding in which a case could be mounted that they were either wholly or mainly (and possibly ‘or significantly’) abandoned or neglected, it is only those parts which could be eligible land, or whether it could be argued that the entire land holding was abandoned or neglected by virtue of those parts being abandoned or neglected. This matter needs further clarification.

As noted above, the Bill makes clear that (97C(2)) Ministers must have regard to prescribed matters in relation to what is eligible land. This makes the Regulations here absolutely critical to the interpretation of this provision and it would be vital to see these draft regulations before a final judgement could be made on the provisions or amended provisions themselves.

Lastly, with regard to 97C, it is not clear why bona vacantia land is excluded from being eligible land, particularly when related to the need to identify ownership of land which, for reasons set out above, may not always be possible and potentially therefore rendering it bona vacantia.

Further still, 97H (c) requires that Ministers must not consent to an application to buy by a community body unless they are satisfied – “that, if the owner of the land were to remain as its owner, that ownership would be inconsistent with furthering the achievement of sustainable development in relation to the land.” It is difficult to see how this could ever be proved, it appears to require proof of a negative as distinct from proof of a probability and it goes much further than would be required in order to achieve a “fair balance” required by ECHR A1P1. This appears a very high and most probably an impossible hurdle to be overcome and unnecessary to meet ECHR requirements; it implies that, even if a community was able to show that the land was mainly neglected for the purpose of its sustainable development, and this was not in the public interest, if that owner could show that, none-the-less, their continuing ownership was not of itself “inconsistent” with some level of sustainable development, then the community’s application must be refused.

Under the provisions, the Ministers already have to satisfy themselves that:

- The land is eligible land, ie, it is wholly or mainly (and possibly ‘or significantly’) neglected
- Purchase by the community body is in the public interest
- Purchase by the community body would be consistent with the achievement of sustainable development in relation to the land

Given these tests, and the fact that there is no equivalent of this requirement in Part 3 of the LRA, which was held to be compatible with ECHR A1P1 in the Pairc case, it appears unnecessary to have this further requirement. There is a strong case for deleting it entirely, which failing, it would be essential to clarify it to the effect that, the ownership of which by the current owner would be inconsistent with (or not conducive to) the public interest when having regard its potential for contributing to the sustainable development of that land. There is potential here too of linking this consideration to having due regard to (or, in pursuance of the objectives of) the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights.

It would be further helpful to clarify here and throughout Part 3A that in referring to “the sustainable development of that land” that the term “that land” refers to the place and community of that place and not just some physical condition of the land.
Clarifying that the date when it is to be determined that land is eligible land is the date of the application for consent. There appears no provision to this effect, although it may be argued that it is implied. In the absence of some provision, there could be arguments about this.

It may be worth considering the merits of providing whether or not a minimum period has to elapse before land is to be regarded as wholly or mainly (and possibly ‘or significantly’) abandoned or neglected and, if so, what is it and whether that period can be, or commence, before the date of commencement of Part 3A.

97H (d) requires that the owner of land is accurately identified. However, even if reasonable steps are taken to ascertain the ownership, this may not always be possible and may indeed be the root of why the land is not being used in a manner conducive to its sustainable development. There are instances where it might appear that ownership is purposefully concealed in off shore arrangements and/or and by other means; in addition, the existence of large areas of rural land which have not yet been brought within the mapping system of the Land Register continues to create uncertainties in identifying the owner in certain cases. It will, therefore, be important to make provision for such a deadlock to be broken through providing for the community taking reasonable steps by publicly advertising their intentions in an appropriate journal, when their reasonable steps to ascertain ownership have failed.

The requirement (97D) to have a separate Part 3A community body means that the creation of that body is an open and public process. This, of itself, can have the effect of alerting an owner such as to permit them to take steps at that point to seek to demonstrate the land in question was not wholly or mainly (and possibly ‘significantly’) abandoned or neglected, or to shift and possibly seek to conceal, ownership. It will be important to provide for these circumstances in some way, so as not to allow an owner to circumvent the provisions of Part 3A, having been alerted to the community’s interests by the provisions of Part 3A itself requiring a public process of registering an interest.

Further, 97H (j) might benefit from some clarification, possibly in guidance, as to what might have constituted circumstances in which it could be held a community had tried and failed to buy the land. This would be important in general, and not least in circumstances where ownership was not known.

97B the definition does not seem to include salmon and mineral rights, and this may be necessary for clarity.

97R could helpfully make it clear that whenever the process of valuation is complete, there is a period of 4 months for the completion of payment. This would exist if the valuation is completed timeously, but could be shorter if that was not the case, to the disadvantage of the community and while not a matter in their control.

Greater diversity in Scotland’s land ownership patterns

The Scottish Government has made clear in recent PQ answers, replies to debates in Parliament and policy pronouncements that it wants to see a greater diversity in the ownership of Scotland’s land. This Bill could usefully support that objective. One way would be for the provisions at 97C to have a further provision to the effect that, eligible land would be land, the sale of which to a community body, would contribute to the achievement of a greater diversity of ownership of land in Scotland.

Consistency in revisions to Part 3A and Part 3 of the LRA

Part 3A extends the community right to buy and is modelled on the crofting community right to buy in Part 3 of the LRA. Experience has shown real difficulties with Part 3 of the LRA which are, therefore, repeated in this new Section 48 Part 3A. This also has the effect of leaving substantial inconsistencies between the community right to buy for a community body in the revised Part 2 of the LRA introduced by Part 4 of the CEB (with the suggested amendments above), while utilising none of the helpful simplifications and flexibilities introduced into Part 2 in this new Part 3A, let alone Part 3 of the LRA. This is why it is very welcome the Scottish Government now intend to use the CEB to change Part 3 of the LRA.
The simple way to manage this would be for the changes to the definitions of a community body brought in by Part 4 of the CEB in relation to Part 2 of the LRA to be applied to the definitions of a Part 3A community body at 97D, and to Part 3 of the LRA. Similar provisions for the new balloting procedures in the revised Part 2 of the LRA introduced in Part 4 of the CEB should apply to the new Part 3A, and Part 3 of the LRA. Consistency more generally between the new Part 3A, Part 3 of the LRA and the revised Part 2 of the LRA should be sought throughout the provisions of the CEB, as appropriate.

Most importantly, among these matters, the mapping requirement at 97G (d) (ii), and in Part 3 of the LRA, are excessive. CLS contend that it is not necessary for any purpose for a Minister to know of all “sewers, pipes, lines, watercourses or other conduits and fences, dykes, ditches or other boundaries in or on the land”, in order to make a decision and given all the other criteria, including a map of the location and boundaries of the area. This requirement is a near impossible task for any significant land holding and gives substantial room for technical appeals based on a minor error in the extent of a ditch within, say, a 40,000 acre estate of the sort purchased voluntarily in recent years. This mapping requirement should be deleted as being far in excess of what is needed. The Land Reform Review Group in their final report has acknowledged the excessive nature of the mapping requirements on which these requirements are based.

In addition, it seems odd and unnecessary that a Part 2 community body could not also be a Part 3A community body by some simple means, otherwise an unnecessary duplication of effort would be required when it is conceivable that a Part 2 community body which had registered an interest in land could proceed to the Part 3A provisions if they subsequently formed the view the land in question had in fact become abandoned or neglected.

CLS is aware of detailed evidence from Mr Simon Fraser on Part 3 of the LRA. Mr Fraser is highly experienced and respected in these matters and CLS draws particular attention to his submission in raising issues of importance for attention.

Prescribed matters

There are significant matters to be dealt with in regulations throughout Part 4 and it would be important that a clear understanding of what the regulations will contain is seen prior to Stage 2 and where possible to see actual draft regulations, in order to consider whether leaving important matters to regulation is appropriate in all circumstances.

Power to Ministers to facilitate discussions and make regulations

The new Part 3A sets up a process which holds the prospect of dispute arising between community and current owner, because of the nature of the request for what is a compulsory sale. These are circumstances under which dispute resolution or mediation would be helpful. Ministers do not have powers to facilitate this at present.

It would seem appropriate to give Ministers power to make such arrangements as they may regard appropriate to facilitate discussions between the community body and owner upon a request from either party and to have powers to set out procedures for such facilitated discussions through regulation, if they ever felt the need for this.

Part 5 - Asset Transfers

CLS strongly supports the provisions of Part 5 as important in improving the potential transfer of public assets and building on practical experience in, for example, forest estate transfers to date.

The provisions could be strengthened by a duty to provide publicly accessible asset registers, and making clear, possibly in guidance, the local authority discretionary power to transfer at less than market value is available to other public bodies in the Scottish Public Finance Manual, under certain conditions.
CLS recognises the expertise within DTAS and CWA both of whom have made submissions on these provisions, and supports their suggestions.

Part 6 - Common Good Property

In so far as the provisions go, they are advantageous to greater transparency on the ownership, use and disposal of Common Good property. In the context of recent developments in community ownership of assets, the potential of common good land to be managed more locally and put to wider community development use could be significant. A wider review of the common good issues may be a preferred way of moving forward as part of the actions flowing from the recommendations of the Land Reform Review Group. This could embrace a statutory definition, rights for communities to take back title to common good assets that were foregone in 1975. A further useful change in the legislation, now, would be to remove the requirement for Sheriff Court approval for common good assets being transferred to communities. This seems an unnecessary and additional hurdle and adds extra time and cost.

Part 7 – Allotments; and Part 8 Non-domestic rates

CLS has no comments on these Parts.

Conclusion

Community Land Scotland continues to consider and develop thinking on suggested improvements, particularly to Part 3A, and will publish supporting reasoning on its website and share with the Committee and the Scottish Government any significant developments in thinking relevant to the above submission.

CLS will be happy to expand on any of the issues raised in this submission.

Dear David

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

Thank you for providing the Scottish Environment Protection Agency (SEPA) with the opportunity to give written evidence on the Bill; our submission is attached. While we are very supportive of the Bill in many aspects, it will potentially have significant implications for SEPA in terms of resources and delivering our priorities. Our key points can be summarised as follows:

1) the environment should be just as important, and is as legitimate as human health, in terms of policy setting for the Bill

2) SEPA is not resourced to carry out any significant work in this area without seriously prejudicing existing priorities

3) as a national agency, it is extremely difficult to identify, and then to meet, the demands of localised interests; and where we can, there could be a major issue with consistency in delivering policy objectives, so a careful balance is required.

As a public body committed to openness and transparency, SEPA feels it is appropriate that this response be placed on the public record. If you require further clarification on any aspect of this correspondence, please contact Paula Charleson, Head of Environmental Strategy, SEPA Corporate Office at the address shown.

Yours sincerely

SEPA response to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee call for evidence on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

The Scottish Environment Protection Agency (SEPA) is a non-departmental public body, accountable through Scottish Ministers to the Scottish Parliament. We are Scotland’s principal environmental regulator. We support and are aligned to the Scottish Government’s overarching purpose of sustainable economic growth. SEPA’s role is wide-ranging, from environmental regulation and reporting on the state of the environment, to promoting sustainability and advising on environmental issues. As such our response reflects that national focus as we seek to embed protection and improvement of the environment into communities’ priorities and activities.

The Committee may also be interested to refer to SEPA’s response to the Scottish Government consultation on the Bill in January 2014, available here.

1.1 As is the case with most primary legislation, the operational detail will be set out in regulations and guidance which follow. The Bill provisions alone are unlikely to transform the day to day experiences of the most vulnerable individuals and communities in society. All public services – including SEPA – need to drive reform at increased scale and pace and create conditions that encourage and support strong and resilient communities right across Scotland.

1.2 Realising the Bill’s full potential will be significantly dependent on individuals and communities having both the capacity and will to drive reform. Those less mobilised and more vulnerable individuals and communities will require significant support to do so. It is perhaps those very parts of Scotland, where the ‘skill and will’ are less mobilised, that the greatest potential for driving change potentially exists.

1.3 The primary role for government and the public sector in this agenda is a supportive one which enables community empowerment but does not direct or control it. Yet, there needs to be strong leadership and culture change at all levels to build individual and community capacity, and ensure a more level playing field for participation and engagement. Culture change, leadership and real, fruitful partnerships with Scotland’s citizens and communities will be the ultimate game changers when it comes to addressing multi-faceted and multi-generational environmental, social and economic problems or “wicked” problems. It will require careful thought to ensure all parties maximise the benefit from the limited resource we each have to achieve the aspirations of the Bill.

1.4 SEPA’s involvement in community planning has often become a significant resource demand with limited return, especially where social and economic outcomes have been prioritised over environmental outcomes. If the environment were to feature more explicitly in the six agreed national priorities1 for Single Outcome Agreements (SOAs) it would help strengthen our mandate. Environmental protection and improvement delivers many multiple benefits for communities. The environment has a very important role in supporting early intervention and preventative approaches in reducing outcome inequalities.

1 economic recovery and growth; employment; early years; safer and stronger communities, and reducing offending; health inequalities and physical activity; and outcomes for older people
1.5 Tackling problems with urban air quality is a good example. Air quality is likely to be poorer in some of the more deprived areas of our towns and cities. Reducing the number of people exposed to poor air quality in these areas by greening our cities, promoting active travel, and reducing black carbon and other air pollutants that contribute to climate change can achieve lasting benefits that go far beyond improving air quality - to help tackle health and social inequalities and may even stimulate investment for sustainable growth.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

2.1 SEPA sees the Bill as an additional mechanism to help deliver our new statutory purpose, under the Regulatory Reform (Scotland) Act 2014. SEPA’s work delivers important benefits not just for the environment but also for communities and the economy. A healthy environment is essential for a healthy population and also for a healthy economy.

2.2 Wellbeing, sustainable economic development and a good quality, well-functioning environment should collectively be at the heart of empowered communities. And yet the Bill misses the opportunity to put the environment on a level footing with health and social care and sustainable economic growth objectives. SEPA’s vision is for a future where the people of Scotland have taken increasing responsibility for their own environment and wellbeing, and a joined-up approach to health and well-being is achieved through active dialogue, whereby individuals and communities engage and are involved in decisions that affect them. Environmental services can, and do, complement health, social care and blue light services in the delivery of strong, healthy and resilient communities. The six agreed national priorities for CPPs could do more to embed the environment as a golden thread throughout.

2.3 A protocol or common statement between government and its agencies, local authorities, CPPs, and the third sector could help drive pace and culture change around community planning and empowerment to support wider public service reform. We could perhaps take a lead from Delivering Planning Reform (2008). This was extremely valuable because it demonstrated a concerted and determined joint effort to deliver fundamental change in the way that planning stakeholders work.

2.4 The opportunity for SEPA and other public sector organisations to formally engage with Ministers in identifying National Outcomes for Scotland to build on the “Scotland Performs” framework is a further benefit of the Bill. The people of Scotland – including the public, private and third sectors – should rightly have a more proactive role in shaping them. SEPA is keen to continue its dialogue with the government in identifying future qualitative and quantitative wellbeing and environmental indicators.

2.5 The Bill presents some very real challenges to us as a national Agency. Many aspects of SEPA’s business do not naturally lend themselves to self-determination. Likewise, Bill provisions which enable community bodies to make a request to improve the outcomes of a service could be limited in the context of SEPA’s regulatory role, but equally other opportunities may arise, for example in relation to River Basin Management Planning and Flood Risk Management, where SEPA already engages with communities. We are keen to engage with the government in drafting regulations and guidance on participation requests.
2.6 We anticipate that new duties which stem from SEPA being named as a community planning partner will be a real challenge. It is quite difficult to see how we could exercise these new duties cost-neutrally.

2.7 There could be false expectations that SEPA will fully engage with all CPPs in Scotland. That would be highly resource intensive, and not cost neutral. We have previously audited our involvement in CPPs and we see it as important that SEPA can engage with CPPs at a level most appropriate to the key environmental challenges and opportunities of the local area, to the prioritisation afforded within that area, and in the most efficient and effective way for us as an Agency. This means having the flexibility to adopt different types of levels of engagement with different CPPs, deploying our limited resource where we can add the most value. We have similar concerns about resourcing new duties relating to participation requests and the associated processes and procedures this could require.

2.8 Even where SEPA is not participating directly or closely with a CPP at a local level, we will have a duty to take the local outcome improvement plan (LOIP) into account while carrying out our own functions at a local level. Again, this will probably not be cost-neutral. Guidance on the ways in which public authorities are to take account of LOIPs, and LOIPs relationship to SOAs, would be helpful.

2.9 There could be some real challenges around the practicalities of dovetailing SEPA’s own priorities with those identified in the LOIP. SEPA’s priorities set out in our Corporate Plan and Annual Operating Plan tend to be strategic and usually non-locally specific. The environment is intrinsically inter-connected and we work hard to focus our resources in a truly strategic way in order to deliver maximum improvement through achieving multiple benefits. Priorities in the LOIPs are more likely to be locationally specific and targeted. There will be challenges aligning local and national outcomes from the bottom-up, and reconciling conflicts where they arise. It should be recognised, for example, that SEPA additionally sets national standards in its approach to licensing and in its delivery of European directives such as the Water Framework Directive.

3.1 It is unlikely that communities across Scotland have the capabilities to take advantage of the Bill provisions in equal measure. Appropriate support mechanisms need to be put in place to create a more level playing field. These should include individual and community capacity building as well as financial support packages for communities experiencing multiple deprivations.

4.1 There will be limited or no scope for asset transfer from SEPA, so the value of including SEPA in Schedule 3 as a ‘relevant authority’ for such requests is probably negligible.

4.2 We do though have an interest in ensuring that right to buy and asset transfer can be delivered in ways consistent with our primary duty to protect and improve the
Local Government and Regeneration Committee

Both aspects of the Bill should consider Scotland’s natural environment as a stock of potential resources and assets able to produce value and ongoing services to Scotland’s economy, underpinning the health and wellbeing of communities. We would like to see an ecosystems approach included in the matters which the authority must take into consideration in reaching its decision on whether to agree or refuse an asset transfer request.

4.3 Land is eligible for right to buy provisions if, in the opinion of Ministers, it is wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected. It would be helpful to have greater transparency, in regulations or guidance, as to what constitutes wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected land.

4.4 There could be cases where abandoned or neglected land is partly or wholly contaminated and may not be suited to a use the community would like to see. Appropriate mechanisms will be needed to ensure that communities have access to expert advice and support in this regard.

4.5 Conversely, land which may be wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected could also have a high value in terms of the ecosystem services it offers - such as supporting biodiversity and flood risk management. Having a robust evidence base will be important to inform decision making. Both the land valuation and process of determining requests for transfer of such land should take account of ecosystem value in a systematic way.

4.6 It may be useful to build in a proportionate consultation process between the relevant authority and other public bodies in reaching a decision on an asset transfer request, to help achieve shared outcomes.

5.1 The Policy memorandum provides a ‘light touch’ assessment of the sustainable development impacts of the Bill. The Bill has the potential to make a positive contribution to sustainable development and there may be an opportunity for government to provide regulations and/or guidance to help all parties maximise these opportunities.

5.2 A pro-sustainability culture could help community planning partners better integrate and align their sustainable development outcomes. The UK National Ecosystems Services conceptual framework may provide a useful toolkit for community planning partners. It helps decision-makers understand the wider value of our ecosystems and the services they offer, summarising the cycle that links human societies and their wellbeing with the environment.

5.3 There may be challenges for communities around ensuring that right to buy land and asset transfers are used sustainably, are suitably managed, and are maintained in perpetuity.

5.4 In reaching decisions on asset transfer and participation requests, authorities are required to take into consideration specific matters, including ‘social wellbeing’ or ‘environmental wellbeing’. These are ambiguous terms. We would prefer to see...
‘social wellbeing replaced with ‘wellbeing’ and ‘environmental wellbeing’ replaced by ‘environmental protection and improvement’.

Dear Committee

COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL – CALL FOR WRITTEN EVIDENCE

I am writing to you on behalf of the eight Community Justice Authorities (CJAs) in Scotland. We welcome this opportunity to submit our evidence, setting out our views on the provisions of this wide-ranging Bill.

Our particular interest in this Bill stems from the Scottish Government’s plans to transfer the responsibility for Community Justice and reducing re-offending from the CJAs to Scotland’s 32 Community Planning Partnerships (CPPs) by early 2016.

Our experience is that resilient, confident communities are at the heart of developing a safer, stronger Scotland. The Bill will provide CPPs with the powers to engage with Community Justice organisations at both national and community levels. Communities will need to be supported to acknowledge, engage and take ownership of the agenda and to realise their own potential to reduce re-offending.

Given that our interest in the Bill is specific, we have not responded directly to the five questions set out in your call for written evidence. However, there are a number of issues that we feel remain unresolved and should be brought to the Committee’s attention - we have outlined these below:

i. There is an absence of specified justice bodies within the list of public bodies to be covered in Schedule 2 (Annex C, page 21). If we see Community Planning as the critical partnership for driving the public sector commitment to Community Empowerment, then we need to ensure CPPs link strategically with all key partners.

For community justice, we note that under the lists of Relevant Authorities and Public Services Authorities, key partners are not explicitly listed. Community Empowerment, in relation to improving justice within communities, will fall short without the critical input from partners within justice, in particular the Scottish Prison Service, the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscals Office and the Scottish Court Service.

There are also a number of key third sector partners, many unique to justice, who are vital, not least of which is Victim Support Scotland.

ii. Whilst the definition of Community Body, set out at section 1, appears widely embracing, the necessary steps within the definition may inhibit engagement with broader, informal communities of interest. Such communities are not necessarily organised or constituted groups. This would potentially limit the opportunity for many justice-based communities of interest to engage with public bodies, such as offenders and ex-offenders (including those recently released from custody), families affected by the criminal justice system and victims of crime.

iii. It is vital that there is a clear place for Community Justice on the agenda of CPPs that does not get overshadowed by other, high profile issues. CPPs need to be clear on what Community Justice encompasses, and to be resourced to take on their new duties and responsibilities. This should be clearly linked into the lessons that can be shared from the CJAs.

iv. CJAs have demonstrated the added value of partnership working across a wide range of groups and organisations, including a strong role for the third sector. It is our experience that partners can and will commit to shared outcomes where these are clearly defined and of mutual benefit. CJAs have also developed and tested out new models of collaborative funding and joint capacity building. To develop, drive forward and sustain this level of partnership requires significant coordination and support.

v. Community interests and priorities must continue to play a central role in community justice within the new arrangements. Operating as CJA Boards, local Elected Members have brought communities’ voices to the table.

vi. We welcome the impetus on partners to contribute (rather than simply identify or align) funds, staff and other resources that the CPPs deem appropriate. We do however have concerns around the priority Community Justice will receive amongst the competing demands that this will bring.

vii. We welcome the enhanced focus on neighbourhood planning within community planning. It should be noted though, that within Justice, there is very little data available at a neighbourhood level, therefore most justice partners will need considerable support (and in some cases resources) to report in this way.

Thank you again for the opportunity to submit written comments on this Bill. We believe that communities lie at the heart of promoting community justice and reducing reoffending, and that the Community Empowerment Bill therefore has the potential to create a safer and stronger Scotland.

Yours faithfully

Cllr Peter McNamara
Chair of National CJA Conveners Group

NHS Health Scotland welcomes the bill and also recognises that a number of the committee’s questions reflect concerns we raised in our previous consultation response and which overlap with our experience and current activity around third sector and community engagement, the establishment of a place standard, support for Community Planning Partnerships and health inequalities impact assessment.

An important introductory point would be use of consistent terminology in this and other current and emerging legislation. The Scottish Public Health Observatory’s brief introduction to ‘assets’ outlines meanings, background and challenges and could be a useful contribution to maximising clarity and consistency.

Engagement

NHS Health Scotland have a long history of supporting third sector and community engagement, funding the Community Health Exchange (CHEX) and Voluntary Health Scotland (VHS) for over fifteen years. These are well respected national intermediaries tasked to ensure the least vocal communities have the capacity and confidence to be heard. Health Scotland’s experience and understanding of working between low income communities and national policy development and delivery was further strengthened last year when Community Food and Health (Scotland) transferred in to the organisation following sixteen years with Consumer Focus Scotland.

All three national intermediaries have worked closely together over the years, most recently contributing to the development with government of the engagement matrix and a learning exchange programme. The broad nature of the bill would suggest that the collaboration of appropriate national intermediaries, not only in health but in community development, economic development and sustainable development could provide the right mix to support take up and effective impact of the bill’s provisions by the communities with most to gain.

Working with Health Scotland, CHEX was central to the delivery of the government funded programme ‘Healthy Communities: Meeting the Shared Challenge’ and all three national intermediaries worked closely with Health Scotland around the confidence and capacity of communities to work with economic evidence, a key ability when engaging with the bill’s provisions.

Health Scotland’s experience of engagement with the third sector suggests that a focus only on community bodies with a written constitution (part 3 section 14) could miss the communities at the sharpest end of deprivation and health inequalities with evidence south of the border suggesting that deprived areas have fewer charities and voluntary groups. The picture concerning place-based policies and dimensions of equality was very usefully reviewed north of the border by the Equalities and Human Rights Commission.
Place

NHS Health Scotland is working in partnership with Scottish Government (Architecture and Place) and Architecture and Design Scotland to develop a Place Standard for Scotland. The Place Standard will be specifically designed to support communities, the public sector and the private sector (where appropriate) to work together to deliver high quality places that nurture health and wellbeing. This initiative stems in part from a recognition of the importance of the environment as an influence on health, and ensuring deprived areas gain most benefit will enable the Place Standard to contribute to a reduction in health inequalities. Key themes within the Place Standard are likely to include walkability, the use and maintenance of public spaces, local services and amenities, and perceptions of safety. Community voice and influence and the capacity for communities to drive improvements to their local neighbourhood will be essential components of the Place Standard and critical to its implementation. Provisions within the Community Empowerment Bill should augment this capacity. For example the idea that CPPs should empower communities; community influence over public services; and community use of public land and buildings are consistent with the principles and goals of the Place Standard. The Place Standard will provide a resource to support and encourage communities to influence their neighbourhoods using provisions contained within the bill where appropriate, and conversely the bill should empower communities to exert greater influence over their local environment.

Support

Alongside this an Inequalities Action Group has been established. Its remit includes identifying feasible actions to address health inequalities through the Community Planning Partnership process (national and local) over the next three years. It flows from the Ministerial Task Force report. NHS Health Scotland’s Chief Executive, Gerry McLaughlin, chairs the group, comprising of a core partnership between NHS Health Scotland, Scottish Government, COSLA and SCVO.

Impact

NHS Health Scotland has developed a Health Inequalities Impact Assessment (HIIA) toolkit which offers an integrated approach to assessment of potential impacts of a policy or plan on groups legally protected by the Equality Act 2010, wider population groups, the social determinants of health and human rights.

The main aim of HIIA is to strengthen the contribution of policies and plans to reducing health inequalities by improving equity of access, ensuring non-discriminatory practice and acting on the social determinants of health. Any public sector agency that makes a contribution to reducing health inequalities can use the toolkit.
HIIA fulfils the legal requirement to conduct an impact assessment under both Section 149 of the Equality Act 2010 (the public sector equality duty), and the Equality Act 2010 (Specific Duties) (Scotland) Regulations 2012.

NHS Health Scotland is able to offer a variety of support mechanisms to agencies wishing to undertake a Health Inequalities Impact Assessment

NHS Health Scotland clearly believe the proposed legislation impacts on a number of areas where we have experience, evidence and an active involvement and would be happy to assist the committee in your deliberations in any way we can.

Scottish Community Alliance (SCA) is a coalition of national networks that provide specialist technical advice and opportunities for peer to peer support across a broad range of community based activity that takes place throughout Scotland. Many of these intermediary networks have developed a body of knowledge and expertise which relate to specific measures proposed in the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. For instance, Community Land Scotland, Community Woodlands Association and Development Trusts Association Scotland have significant expertise in relation to the provisions which seek to extend the Community Right to Buy and simplify and improve the provisions contained in the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003. Some, like Scottish Allotments and Gardens Society, Nourish and Federation of City farms and Community Gardens have a special interest in those proposals that relate to allotments and the expansion of community growing and will be providing expert evidence in that regard. Others have a more general interest in the broader principles of community empowerment and may offer some comment or detailed evidence on that basis. The evidence submitted here by SCA will not replicate the detailed evidence and analysis of its member networks. Instead SCA seeks to offer some general comments on the measures proposed by the Bill.

During the early consultations on the Bill, SCA took the view that legislation of this nature should be underpinned by some ‘first principles’ of community empowerment. These are:

- Subsidiarity is an organising principle that should inform all aspects public policy in Scotland and be at the heart of the new legislation on community empowerment. The principle of subsidiarity requires any matter to be handled by the smallest, lowest, or least centralised authority capable of addressing that matter effectively.

- Self-determination. Local people should be allowed to determine for themselves how their community is defined and which local organisational structure is best suited to take forward their programme of local empowerment.

- Local people leading. Community empowerment only occurs when local people lead the process of taking power and resources to themselves. Communities empower themselves through bottom-up activity and the evidence points to the fact that better outcomes are invariably achieved when this occurs.

- Land and self-generated income. Ownership of land and control over land use, and the capacity to generate income streams which are independent of the state, are critical in determining the degree to which a community is able to empower itself.
1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities?

This Bill needs to be seen as one element in a series of related policy developments, particularly over the past five years. When Scottish Government and COSLA launched the Community Empowerment Action Plan in 2009, Alex Neil MSP, the Minister of Housing and Communities described community empowerment as a journey with no fixed destination with the Action Plan being just one of many staging posts along that journey. The Action Plan had special significance because it represented the first time that the Scottish Government had published a formal policy position in relation to community empowerment. And since 2009, the policy context has become steadily more encouraging and supportive of community empowerment.

The most recent national regeneration strategy published in 2011 – Achieving a Sustainable Future – being another example of this change. This new strategy, with its focus on community led regeneration, reflected a clear departure from previous approaches (which had been predominantly top down and led by investment in physical infrastructure) by acknowledging that these regeneration efforts had largely failed to achieve the desired outcomes, and in any event were now ‘fractured’ as a result of the financial crisis in 2008. The crisis in our system of public services identified by the Christie Commission (2011) and the new emerging consensus around the value of co-produced services, added further weight to the view that communities would have a central part to play in the design and delivery of public services in the future. The developing land reform agenda, and the emergence over the past ten years or so of a vibrant community sector based on the ownership of land and other asset classes, have further contributed to a general policy environment into which a Bill of this nature can only be viewed as adding further momentum.

However, we are aware that that the principal driver behind this Bill is the Scottish Government’s commitment to the public service reform agenda rather than any belief in the intrinsic value of community empowerment as a ‘social good’ in its own right. That said, this Bill contains new opportunities that communities can take advantage of and, if they do, these communities are likely to become more empowered than they otherwise would be. It has often been said during the course of the consultations for this Bill, that legislation cannot empower communities - only local people can empower themselves. Therefore, it is important to be clear that the Bill on its own is only going to present opportunities that local people may or may not be able to take advantage of. The extent to which local people choose to, or are able to, take advantage of these opportunities will inevitably vary across the country and be determined by a range of other factors – some internal, some external. These factors may be categorised as capacity (skills, experience, confidence and access to external networks), resources (funding and human), and the immediate context (supportive public agencies, local development opportunities). Each of these factors will need to be addressed if the full potential of this Bill is to be maximised.

One further point is worth making in the context this section. The debate around community empowerment is heavily shaped by the extent to which communities have been able to engage with the current system of local government. Concerns about the health of Scotland’s system of local representative democracy are well documented and most recently these have been laid bare in the final report of The Commission for Strengthening Local Democracy. It could be argued that the current level of interest in how communities can be empowered correlates directly with the level of concern about this democratic deficit. In other words, if this deficit in the quality of local democracy was to be resolved, the community empowerment debate might well be very different. It could also be argued that the proposals within the Bill to enhance levels of community empowerment are in effect only compensatory measures for a deeper problem within local democracy.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

While it is true that only communities that can empower themselves, it is equally true that public sector organisations are not passive around this process – they can either play an enabling role or they can play an obstructive one but they cannot be neutral. If those in the public sector choose to see the community empowerment process as an opportunity that can assist them in the design and delivery of public services at a time of ever decreasing resources, then there are very significant benefits to be gained. If on the other hand, they see it as a threat or an unnecessary distraction at a time of ever more scarce resources, then trouble lies ahead. At the heart of this policy shift towards community and co-produced solutions lies a requirement for an openness to new thinking and ways of working. Changing attitudes and culture on this scale is very difficult to bring about in large organisations and remains one of the biggest obstacles to be overcome. If public sector organisations are able to view an empowered community sector as a partner, with parity of esteem, within the community planning process then significant long term benefits may well accrue.

All communities are different, have widely varying capabilities and levels of capacity with which to take advantage of opportunities as they present themselves. There is well researched evidence to show that when resources are scarce, those communities with ‘sharp elbows’ end up with the lion’s share of what is available. Given the absence of a level playing field in this respect and in the interests of supporting those communities where need is greatest, there is going to have to be substantial investment in compensatory measures. But this is not just about resources – although that is important – it is as much, if not more so, about how these resources are allocated. Since the days of New Life for Urban Scotland, 100’s of millions of pounds have been spent and much of it wasted in the name of community regeneration. In particular, much of this wasted investment has been in short term, revenue funded projects with no eye on the long term sustainability of the regeneration process, with many of these projects conceived of and parachuted into these communities in top down fashion. If this fundamental problem is to be addressed, there requires to be a serious reappraisal of how the key issues of trust and risk are to be managed in the future. In the past, by effectively controlling all decisions of how and where regeneration investment was to be made, the public agencies were working within very low thresholds of risk and trust – ‘risk’ in terms of the risk of money being misspent (although that depends on what is understood to be meant by misspent) and ‘trust’ in terms of trusting local people to know what is needed to improve their community. In respect of both of these critically important elements of the regeneration process, what is required more than anything else is a fundamental shift in terms of attitude and approach towards risk and trust.
With respect to which measures are needed to assist communities, SCA believes much greater emphasis needs to be given to investing in the community sector’s capacity to support itself. In particular much more could be done to support peer to peer learning and support. This already goes on in an informal, ‘under the radar’ fashion with a number of community anchor organisations around the country being called upon to offer ‘fire-fighting’ support in other communities where the need for such help has been identified. Most of this is informal and comes about as a result of the constant networking that runs throughout the community sector. This work however could be built upon and expanded with appropriate levels of investment.

In some cases, a very little investment can make an enormous difference. A small grant to allow a community to visit with another group that has already achieved something of interest, can have a massive impact. Previously, a Knowledge and Skills Exchange Fund which enabled this kind of activity across the sector had proved to be very popular and successful. It was simple idea – to remove the financial barrier to communities learning from each other. However it fell victim to the budget cuts. This year the Scottish Government has demonstrated that it has been listening to the sector and has invested significant resources into a Strengthening Communities Fund which invests directly into a number anchor organisation with aim of helping them to accelerate their business plans and become more sustainable. This is to be welcomed but it is important it does not become another piloted approach that is soon forgotten. Instead we would argue that this is the kind of investment that will be critical to the successful implementation of this Bill and should be expanded upon at the earliest opportunity.

i) National outcomes.

Enshrining the national outcomes in legislation is a statement of the Government’s commitment to this way of setting out its strategic priorities and in showing a degree of accountability and transparency in reporting progress towards these priorities. It is therefore to be supported although the extent to which it is relevant to community empowerment is less clear.

ii) Community Planning

As with the section on National Outcomes, the relevance of community planning as it has been widely understood and practised since its inception in 2003, to community empowerment is not clear. Other than the duty to engage with communities which, as the Policy Memorandum, acknowledges is a distinct activity from community empowerment, it is not clear how putting CPPs on a statutory footing will improve the situation but there again, neither should it make it any worse.

iii) Participation requests

This is a positive measure that presents communities with a new opportunity to enter dialogue with a public service provider over an aspect of a public service and ultimately to affect real change and improved outcomes within a service area. However its value will depend largely on the internal culture of the public body and how that body receives and responds to this request. The absence of any appeal process leaves the balance of power... with the public body which may ultimately discourage communities from exercising this right. It is however to be welcomed that there appears to be a presumption in favour of the community’s right to participate with a requirement on the part of the public body to explain its refusal.

There is some concern as to the applicability of this provision to the arms-length organisations that many Councils have set up to run services and administer assets. Clarification is sought on this.

iv) Community right to buy

There is much in this section that is to be welcomed. In particular the extension of the community to right to buy to all communities in Scotland and the changes to the procedures of the Land Reform Act to make it simpler and more widely accessible. There are some technical aspects of these proposed procedures that colleagues from the community land movement have identified which make sense and would improve the operation of this part of the Bill.

There are three areas of this section we would like to make specific comment on:

a) Late applications to register interest in land. In an ideal world, a community body would survey all local land and assets, agree amongst themselves which assets are of strategic long term importance to the community and then set about making a multiple set of applications, thereby registering interest in all these key assets. But the real world is not the ideal world. Communities are reactive not proactive by nature, and are galvanised into action usually only when something is threatened. But even if they had the inclination to think forward to the day that any of these strategic assets were to be put on the market, it is unlikely they would wish to assert their rights due to the potential for ill feeling that this might arouse from the potential seller who will perceive this as a constraint on their freedom to access the best market price possible. The additional hurdles associated with a late registration also appear to be too burdensome. We would therefore support the position of Community Land Scotland in respect of this aspect of the Bill.

b) Reregistration of interest. Given the procedural burden placed on communities to re-register their interest after five years has lapsed, and given the assumption that late applications are viewed generally as the exception rather than the rule (and therefore the assumption that multiple applications should be being made by community bodies) we would support the proposition that the re-registration should be required after ten years rather than five.

c) Absolute right to buy – abandoned and neglected land. We support the introduction of this provision in principle but would also support a number of concerns that members have raised in their more detailed submissions. Particularly around some inconsistencies with the procedures as laid down for this section as compared to the improved procedures for the pre-emptive Community Right to Buy. In particular, we would agree with the comments from the Federation of City Farms and Community Gardens with regard to the suggestion that this section in the new Bill has followed the same wording as the Land Reform Act 2003 rather than the new improved wording for the pre-emptive right to buy. We would also support the view that more clarity is needed to determine what is meant by abandoned and neglected land as the same description of land in two very different settings (city centre vs remote rural) can be interpreted very differently. Given that these provisions could result in an asset owner being deprived of his/her property against their wishes, it is very important that there is absolute clarity around the circumstances in which this will be permissible. A number of SCA members have raised specific and technical questions regarding this section. While these issues need to be addressed, it is also clear that all these responses are in support of the broad principle of having an absolute right to buy as a backstop provision.

v) Asset transfer requests

These provisions are to be welcomed and in particular the principle that it is not only the transfer of ownership of an asset that communities might be interested in but also the management or use of an asset. In each of these respects the Bill will strengthen the hand of communities. The presumption in favour of the community’s interest in a public asset and the placing of an onus on the public body to respond and give reasons if the transfer is not possible is also a step forward. It would be an even bigger step forward if there was a duty on public authorities to maintain and publish an asset register which communities could inspect and consider which, if any, public assets they were interested in.

vi) The Common Good

This section lacks real substance and it is unlikely to resolve the long running issues that have surrounded the common good. In particular it does not resolve the issue of what is meant by the common good. Requiring local authorities to publish a register will be of little value if there is no statutory definition of what should be included in it. There are other substantive questions such as whether the administration of common good funds should be invested with communities rather than local authorities and who should hold the title to common good assets that have not been resolved and should perhaps be the subject of wider debate.

vii) Allotments

This section has been broadly welcomed by SCA members with specialist knowledge of growing and the local food agenda. In particular the requirement on local authorities to produce a local food growing strategy will provide an important focus for this important aspect of building local resilience. In general it is to be welcomed that the previous and outdated allotment legislation which was no longer fit for purpose is to be replaced by this new legislation. However there are aspects of the old legislation that appear to have been lost. In particular the duty on local authorities to provide suitable land to meet demand from their existing stock or by leasing or purchasing new land does not appear in the new legislation and this will undermine the aim of providing better support for demand for allotments and community growing spaces. SAGS have raised a specific concern about the lack of precision in the Bill when referencing the size of an allotment and have proposed that the Bill should refer to a normal plot as being 250 square meters (which can then be subdivided into halves or quarters to suit local circumstances).

5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

SCA has no comment to make.
Dear Clerk to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee,

Please find attached evidence to your committee on the Community Empowerment Bill from the Edinburgh Compact Partnership and Edinburgh’s Third Sector Strategy Group – on behalf of the City’s Third Sector.

In answer to the specific questions you have asked in your call for evidence,

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

1: As it stands, the Bill will further empower Scotland’s strongest communities – those with the greatest power, influence, and voice. Considerable work would need to be undertaken to redress existing imbalances in power. Our evidence suggests better engagement with the third sector and with third sector interfaces.

2: Significant impacts on public sector agencies could flow from this Bill. In our opinion, these are likely to be differently perceived by different people, agencies and sectors. Embarking on a process of culture change such as this Bill could well engender will very likely have a range of impacts, and much will depend not only on the legislation but also on how it is interpreted and applied.

3: Some communities already have the capabilities to take advantage of the provisions in this Bill, but too many – in our opinion – do not. Greater coproduction and a concerted effort to tackle social inequalities could go a long way to ensuring that more people and communities are better able to benefit from this Bill.

4: As per written evidence, and previous submissions linked from the attached document.

5: Please see comments within our written evidence.

I am happy to take any questions you might have about our input.

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

Evidence to the Local Government & Regeneration Committee from the Edinburgh Compact Partnership and the Third Sector Strategy Group – on behalf of the city’s Third Sector.

The Edinburgh Compact Partnership is a multi-agency strategic partnership within the Edinburgh Partnership (Community Planning Partnership) family: EdinburghCompact.org

The Third Sector Strategy Group (TSSG) brings a range of thematic and geographic Third Sector interests together with Edinburgh’s Third Sector Interface. The TSSG feeds Third Sector partners in to the Edinburgh Compact Partnership. See: EVOC.org.uk/partnership/third-sector-strategy-group/

EVOC (Edinburgh Voluntary Organisations’ Council) – as part of Edinburgh’s TSI (Third Sector Interface) – supports both the TSSG and the Edinburgh Compact Partnership.

EDINBURGH’S Third Sector Strategy Group (TSSG) has responded previously to calls for submissions in the journey towards this Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. First in September 2012, then again in January 2014. It might be helpful if this submission is read together with those documents.

First, it is important to establish that both the Compact Partnership and the TSSG clearly welcome the Scottish Government’s intention to enable the development of empowered communities.

Stripped down to the bare essentials, there are two core themes to our input: Coproduction and Equality.

By our definition, Coproduction presumes equal and respectful relationships characterised by trust and predicated on shared purpose. This joint purpose may be to make budget or policy decisions, or to plan, deliver and assess human services. We support the Community Empowerment Bill, and the Government’s intent, to the extent that it enables and encourages coproductive behaviours and relationships.

Similarly, we are wholly supportive of the Community Empowerment Bill, and the intention behind it, if (and Only if) the Bill acts to reduce social inequalities rather than exacerbate them. A Bill drafted in ‘general’ terms, without recognising that different people and different communities bring with them unequal abilities to engage and to shape change, will only perpetuate existing inequalities in wealth, power, and voice.

In addition to these two general points, as well as the points made in our previous submissions, we hope the committee will be receptive to the following key messages.
Role of the Third Sector

Within a vibrant and engaged Scottish social context the Third Sector plays a key role. Edinburgh has arguably been somewhat ‘ahead of the curve,’ with a Compact Partnership (bringing a range of Third Sector and Public Sector partners together) installed 10 years ago.

Increasingly the Third Sector delivers services under contract to local government and/or the NHS, and can – in that regard – be seen as a delivery agent acting on behalf of ‘the state.’

Simultaneously, however, and often particularly because the Third Sector delivers services to those people and communities furthest beyond the reach of public services, the Third Sector is also an effective conduit from the public sector to disadvantaged communities in greatest need. While they may not have been set up expressly for that purpose, many voluntary organisations find themselves acting to articulate the voices of people most distant from mainstream services. These are often the voices which are the most difficult for the public sector to reach and to hear.

For these reasons, the Third Sector occupies a unique role within Scottish society today – both reaching out to and speaking out for the least powerful communities. The very communities, in fact, most in need of empowerment.

Given this unique position that Scotland’s Third Sector occupies, it should be enabled to positively and creatively impact on various elements of the Community Empowerment Bill including: setting, reviewing and revising National Outcomes; engaging and supporting engagement with Community Planning; developing, engaging with, and enabling voice in setting, reviewing and reporting on Outcome Improvement Processes; and more supporting and enabling Community Participation and Community Right to Buy. A stronger duty placed on Community Planning Partnerships to engage with the Third Sector, and with Third Sector Interfaces, would be welcome.

Within the Third Sector, Scotland’s 32 Third Sector Interfaces play a unique, pivotal role in (among other things) enabling participation in and participating in Community Planning. Over and above support for Scotland’s Third Sector in general, the Community Empowerment Bill should include a particular role for local Third Sector Interfaces. Interfaces engage with Community Planning Partnerships, enable Third Sector engagement more widely, and – where appropriate – themselves represent the interests of the Third Sector. This role requires effective support, and explicit recognition (we would suggest) outlined within the guidance accompanying the Community Empowerment Bill.

Edinburgh’s Third Sector wishes to add its voice to those proposing that (for the first time ever) the guidance accompanying this legislation be coproduced - with legislators, Third Sector Interfaces, and the broader Third Sector engaging with each other in equal, respectful, trusting and purposeful ways.
Specific Suggestions

In line with the themes of Coproduction and Equality outlined above, our specific suggestions are these:
1 Coproduce the Guidance which will accompany the Bill. We would be pleased to help support this process.
2 Add ‘the reduction of social inequalities,’ ‘social equality,’ ‘a flattening of Scotland’s social inequality gradient,’ or similar to the list at 19 (3) (c)
3 Add explanatory notes in the Guidance which explicitly draw out how the reduction of social inequalities and the removal of poverty from Scotland lie behind all of the terms within 19 (3) (c)
4 Strengthen the imperative on Community Planning Partners (and Partnerships) to engage effectively with all Communities who wish to, actively redressing existing imbalances in power, influence and voice.

Comments by Ardrishaig Community Council

Paragraph 2, page 6 Community Planning

The new law should require that public service providers must make every effort to engage with the community ideally via the community council. Public service providers should be required to attend a community council meeting or organise public meetings in order to have meaningful discussion on people's needs. Given the volunteer make up of a community council, public service providers should provide personnel resources, to help the community council develop meaningful outputs and outcomes which can contribute to community plans.

Paragraph 3, page 7 Community Organisations

Public service providers should pass all proposals for service changes to a community council as a statutory requirement for discussion.

Paragraph 4, page 7 Community Right to Buy.

Ardrishaig Community Council supports the new law to allow for the purchase of land or building assets even if the owner does not want to sell.

Paragraph 6, page 9 'Common Good' Property

The new law to require that local councils should make a list of common good property should also apply to other public bodies. For instance, this would require a list from Scottish Canals, owners of the Crinan Canal and land and building assets in Ardrishaig.

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill Call for evidence (June 2014)

Response from Community Learning and Development Managers Scotland

The aim of Community Learning and Development Managers Scotland (CLDMS) is to provide a national focus on professional issues and standards for Community Learning and Development (CLD) provision, provided directly or indirectly by local authorities. Managers from all of the 32 Scottish local authorities are involved. They provide, or plan with partners for, a wide range of services including community development and community capacity building, youth work and community-based adult learning.

The Bill is a step in the right direction. It has the potential to give communities more confidence that they will be heard, that they can help to set the agenda for change, and that they can acquire and use assets for their own benefit.

The proposals on new duties for community planning partnerships and partner organisations set out in the Bill do not directly facilitate community empowerment. It refers only to ‘consulting’ and ‘engaging’, and only in the context of identifying and prioritising outcomes. Empowerment is not simply a matter of having rights to participate. Although these rights are necessary, they are not sufficient. The enhanced duties for community planning will not lead to the empowerment of communities unless they are used to continue to engage with communities across a broad range of issues, to give community empowerment the priority it needs and to apply principles of social justice in doing so.

The definition of the community planning partners ‘at the table’ does not include community interests. Instead their participation appears to be at the invitation of the partners from other agencies, should they choose to do so. There is a danger that this may further centralise and cement power with local authorities and other public bodies.

The Bill fails to give Community Planning Partnerships any overall responsibility for supporting community empowerment in their areas, through co-ordinating the community development work and community engagement processes of partners. Nor does it place obligations on individual partner agencies to support community empowerment, but only engagement in Community Planning itself.

The requirement that each CPP should consult and engage with communities is to be welcomed, but further guidance may be required to ensure that engagement is properly planned, resourced and integrated across partners. There is a need for a clear statement, agreed across each Partnership, of responsibilities for delivering community engagement, expressing a commitment to engagement that applies both jointly and severally to the partners demonstrating how the National Standards for Community Engagement will be applied, and providing accountability for engagement at the same level as the Key Performance Indicators for services. There must be flexibility and innovation in the approach to offering opportunities for dialogue with groups of people who might not otherwise take part – including young people.

Mechanisms need to be established to enable communities to be more involved in the planning and delivery of public services and the identification and delivery of local solutions to issues. The right to raise issues and obtain a response is an integral part of effective engagement and the proposed rights to make Participation Requests are a welcome contribution to ensuring this.

The provision could, rightly, potentially be used at many levels from e.g. influencing a city-wide service providing care to influencing provision in a neighbourhood facility. The scale and nature of the improvement processes involved would be significantly different and therefore the Bill must be worded to allow considerable flexibility in interpretation.

The definition of ‘outcome improvement processes’ should also be sufficiently broad as to allow communities to be enabled to make appropriate choices from a range of options, from engagement in decision making through to direct service delivery, participatory budgeting etc. It should be made clear that a right to request participation in ‘delivering outcomes’ can include a request to be involved in how services are designed, delivered and evaluated.

Ideally we should work for a system where participation in outcomes is offered without the need for formal requests. Arriving at this situation will require offering potential users of these provisions the opportunity to participate in learning and community development processes.

We also welcome the provisions that better enable communities to take more control over land and buildings.
But we have to question the extent to which all of these provisions, in isolation, will empower those communities that are excluded or marginalised, or who are unaware of the rights enshrined in the Bill. We need to be vigilant over which communities are actually able to exercise the new rights. Deprived or marginal communities remain so partly because they lack the power to make the case for the changes that they seek. For such communities the rights introduced in the Bill will not in themselves confer power or influence. For them empowerment is better understood as a long-term, purposeful process that builds cohesion and confidence and establishes a social and organisational infrastructure.

The next steps need to focus on ensuring that all communities are equipped and supported to take advantage of the rights and duties contained in the Bill, and we would encourage Scottish Ministers to consider actions to take this forward.

The values and skills that are put in to practice by Community Learning and Development workers in all sectors are vital to this process. These include not only community organising and capacity building work but also adult learning and youth work that equips people with the necessary knowledge and skills.

We welcome the fact that the Policy Memorandum reminds us that legislation alone cannot deliver community empowerment and that ‘appropriate support, guidance and a culture of nurturing community action’ are also vital. We do however consider that, as we outline in response to the questions 3 and 4, more could be done to make these links explicit in the legislation.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

It is entirely appropriate that Community Planning becomes more outcome focused. We welcome the emphasis in the Policy Memorandum (37), which states that the local outcome improvement plans should provide: ‘a clear “plan for place”, focused on prevention and reducing inequalities’.

Community empowerment is a key plank of public service reform. Public service providers should fully engage communities in decisions about the design and delivery of services to achieve such outcomes.

Public sector bodies should be encouraged to develop Community Asset Transfer strategies and establish a set of ground rules against which prospective transfers are identified, supported, assessed and taken forward. The process should assist communities in making appropriate choices from the range of options from full ownership to rights of management and use. Overall, the aim must for public authorities to set out a transparent framework that proactively enables and manages the transfer of assets to community organisations in order to bring about long term social, economic and environmental benefits to the community and to public services, and not merely in order to assist authorities to dispose of troublesome assets.

Whilst the Policy Memorandum is clear that support is needed to enable communities to take advantage of new rights, it is less clear on how this should be provided and by whom, other than a vague reference to ‘the attitudes, skills and commitment of many people working in many different organisations’. This is not enough to address the acknowledged inconsistencies in support to communities or to promote best practice (paragraphs 19 and 20).

A clear link is needed to a strategy for meeting Community Learning and Development needs. Community Planning Partnerships need to demonstrate clearly how they have taken account of the 2012 Strategic Guidance for Community Learning and Development and have embedded planning for CLD in their processes.

The needs for community development support, community capacity building, and learning aimed at enabling people to take action on issues that concern them are among the needs are being assessed as local strategies that are being drawn up under the Community Learning and Development (Scotland) Regulations 2013. It would be helpful if the Bill could explicitly state that support to communities to exercise their rights under the Bill and to enable community empowerment are needs that must be taken into account in future strategies developed in terms of the Regulations.

We welcome the provision in section 9 (3) of the Bill which states that: ‘Each community planning partner must, in relation to a community planning partnership, contribute such funds, staff and other resources as the community planning partnership considers appropriate’ (a) with a view to improving, or contributing to an improvement in, the achievement of each local outcome referred to in section 5(2) (a), and (b) for the purpose of securing the participation of the community bodies mentioned in section 4(5)(a) in community planning. This makes it clear that resources do need to be made available to support community involvement and participation in the outcome improvement process.

We would recommend that similar provisions should apply in the case of participation and asset transfer requests.

Consideration also needs to be given to the skills that may be needed to advise community-led bodies to raise concerns under the participation process, and potential conflicts of interest between community bodies and between communities and public bodies must be recognised. Potential conflicts will presumably need to be addressed through the CPP process. Guidance on how disputed or conflicting outcomes might be handled should be explicit. This is not to question the right to request participation – which should be fundamental – but an acknowledgement that the process may be fraught with difficulty.

We would like Community Planning Partnerships to be given an explicit overall responsibility for supporting community empowerment in their areas (Part 2, section 4), through co-ordinating the community development work and community engagement processes of partners, and an explicit duty on partners to make appropriate contributions (Part 2, section 9).

The 2013 Community Learning and Development Regulations require CLD partners to target resources to community need. The Bill should explicitly require partners in the recognising to take into account the need to support communities to make effective and equal use of its provisions when developing future Community Learning and Development strategies in terms of the Regulations (Part 2, section 9 or as appropriate).

The provisions in the provision in section 9 (3) for appropriate resourcing should be extended to apply in the case of participation and asset transfer requests.

We note that in response to the Committee’s questions about the effect of the Bill on Arms Length External Organisations the Scottish Government has stated that it is not its intention “to place duties in terms of participation requests on bodies which include members from outwith the public sector.” We are concerned that this is unduly restrictive, since many such bodies will include a minority of directors from other sectors. We would suggest the inclusion of all bodies covered by the Freedom of Information (Scotland) Act 2002 (Designation of Persons as Scottish Public Authorities) Order 2013, which designates as ‘a Scottish public authority in relation to any function of a public nature’ a body

The implementation of the Bill’s proposals at a local level will require robust equality impact assessments to identify and overcome any barriers, identify and implement actions that will promote protected communities’ inclusion and participation in the processes of outcome improvement and asset management or ownership.

The experience of communities in areas of multiple deprivation may be restricted in relation to complex processes such as the transfer of assets and participating in outcome improvement processes. Properly resourced support will be crucial to ensure that such communities can access and experience the full benefits of the opportunities which the bill is creating. Individuals may also have general and specific learning needs in order to enable their effective participation, and such needs are most effectively met in a community learning context.

People with communication, physical and sensory issues will require additional resources to fully participate in these processes. Those tasked with the implementation of the programme must ensure that all delivery agencies are aware of their Duty under the Equality Act 2010 and that due regard is given in meeting the needs of all communities. This will require adequate resources to be made available to community groups to support equality of access e.g. communication supports, accessible buildings etc. and an awareness amongst public services of how to engage protected groups, and all disadvantaged groups, in developing an inclusive approach.

If community groups can acquire assets then they may be able to access funds for property/environmental improvements otherwise denied to local authorities. The converse also applies in that a community group may not have the resources to maintain an asset in an environmentally friendly fashion, which may leave the asset without sufficient environmental protection. Consequently, ongoing support to ensure the sustainability of any community group acquiring assets is vital.
Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill: Written Evidence on the provisions of the Bill.

Annette Hastings, Professor of Urban Studies, School of Social and Political Sciences, University of Glasgow

I am grateful for the opportunity to contribute to the scrutiny process for the above Bill in written and oral form. I support the development of such a Bill - primarily because of the symbolic support it lends to the idea of giving community bodies a more central role in decision making about the nature and quality of the public services they use. I also support the opportunity it affords to such bodies to take on the management of land and assets where they so wish. The fact that the Bill envisages that the community empowerment agenda is of relevance to communities across Scotland is also to be welcomed. As a consequence the Bill might be expected to challenge the expectation that only disadvantaged communities should be required to voluntarily give of their time and effort if they are to achieve the outcomes from public services that they need.

However, I am concerned that the Bill does not centrally address the issue of inequality between communities. This concern relates mainly to the potential impact of the new right to request participation. It relates in particular to questions 1 and 3 in the Call for Evidence.

Historically a key driver of community development approaches to securing more effective participation has been the belief that more and effective participation might contribute to narrowing the gaps in resources, attention, opportunities and outcomes between more and less disadvantaged communities. However, I am concerned that provisions in the Bill may exacerbate already existing social and economic inequalities by further empowering those who already hold or have access to power. While the Bill and the associated Policy Memorandum acknowledge concerns voiced during the consultation process that communities are not equally equipped to take advantage of the provisions in the Bill, it lacks specific provisions designed to address these concerns. While I appreciate that the Guidance which will be drafted to support the Bill may address this issue in part, I would like to take this opportunity to suggest:

1) That the Bill itself should more explicitly recognise that participatory and empowerment processes can empower the powerful. This recognition might be expressed via a clear commitment to hold public bodies to account if they fail to:
a) take action to actively promote and provide additional support to participatory processes with disadvantaged communities at levels beyond that provided to better off communities;

b) consider the wider implications of participation requests on the outcomes likely to be experienced by other, particularly more disadvantaged, communities as a result of granting the request. In order to achieve this I would suggest an additional provision which might also place a duty on public bodies - when faced with a request to participate from one community body - to identify and invite other community bodies with an interest in the outcome to participate in the outcome improvement process. This would supplement Paragraph 49 of the Bill in which public bodies are facilitated to aggregate different requests into one outcome improvement process.

2) That the Guidance which accompanies the Bill should be centrally concerned with identifying specific measures, supports and good practice which could help ensure that disadvantaged communities are not further disadvantaged by aspects of the Bill. In particular it should make a clear and prominent link between the new rights in the Bill and the duties set out in the recent CLD Regulations.

3) That the Scottish Government should put in place a process of evaluation and review of the outcomes of the Bill designed to ensure that the new right to request participation does not result in the displacement of existing community development and engagement activities undertaken by public bodies with disadvantaged community groups. There is a need to build safeguards into the implementation of the Bill which are focused on ensuring that it results in additional levels of engagement in processes to improve the outcomes on public services, particularly amongst disadvantaged groups.

I would like to justify these suggestions with brief reference to the evidence of a series of research studies I have conducted over the past 10 or so years which have sought to understand the processes by which ‘middle class capture’ of public services can occur. The studies build on long standing concerns in both the policy and research communities that better off social groups are often the main beneficiaries of public services. The research offers some insight into how the participation of affluent groups in processes which can impact on the distribution of resources and benefits from public service provision can sustain and exacerbate inequalities. The studies have largely been conducted in collaboration with colleagues from the University of Glasgow and Heriot Watt University.
A key strand of this work has focused on the distribution of local government environmental services. One study involved a forensic analysis in three case study authorities of the allocation of street cleansing resources in order to understand the differences in workloads between staff providing services in more or less affluent streets. The distribution of staff workloads was then related to cleanliness outcomes. In one Scottish authority, there was clear evidence that better off streets enjoyed higher levels of street cleansing resource than streets which were home to more disadvantaged households. Thus, staff servicing better off streets had smaller workloads in terms of street length and per capita population levels than staff in deprived streets. These better off streets also enjoyed the best cleanliness outcomes. There was evidence that this pattern of resource distribution and outcomes had also previously been the case in one of the English case studies.

Evidence from senior and local managers, as well as with ‘front line’ operational staff, helped to explain this skew of resources and outcomes. It appeared to be a consequence of the participation of better off individuals and community groups in discussions with the local authority over the nature, quality and quantity of street cleansing services. These discussions generally took the form of complaints from individuals and community bodies about the quality or quantity of service received, or took place in fora such as community council meetings. While they were not the result of formal participatory processes, the discussions were focused on improving the outcomes of a particular service for a particular community. The evidence from staff suggested that the regressive pattern of workload allocation evidenced was not the result of a deliberate strategy to skew resource to better off areas, but was rather a consequence of numerous small adjustments to workloads made over a number of years to accommodate the demands of better off communities.

This example illustrates some of the challenges that public authorities will face as they try to be responsive to requests from community bodies to improve outcomes. In the example, improvements in the outcomes in some streets were at the expense of the quality of outcomes in other streets. Given that resources are limited and require to be rationed – and the extra demands placed on rationing by austerity – then the processes encouraged in the Bill could increase the degree of challenge faced by public bodies in this respect.

Indeed, question 2 of the Call for Evidence asks about the advantages and disadvantages of the provisions in the Bill on public bodies. A key disadvantage may be that it increases the expectations held about public bodies with respect to their capacity to improve outcomes. Such bodies may feel compelled to divert resources to particular places or populations, whether or not improving these outcomes for this particular community is a strategic priority. Our research suggests that a key part of the work undertaken by those working at a range of levels within public services involves ‘managing the middle classes’: that is, resisting or accommodating the demands of an often vociferous, articulate and well connected social group.
The need for substantial investment and practical support for disadvantaged communities to avail themselves of these new rights is also evidenced by research conducted with Peter Matthews at the University of Stirling. In this work, we demonstrate that there is a systematic bias within many public agencies to be more responsive to the ways in which the ‘sharp elbowed middle classes’ interact with the local state. Our synthesis of research evidence from the UK, US and Scandinavian countries suggested that the language, modes of argument and social connections of better off groups produced an inadvertent ‘alignment’ between these groups of service users and those making decisions within public services. We also argued that the practical support historically offered to support community participation in poorer communities (community development and CLD approaches focused on building competencies and confidences) can help to offset these disadvantages. In particular, it can help individuals and organisations in poorer communities to develop the modes of speaking and acting which predispose service providers to take their expressed needs and demands seriously – to deem them ‘appropriate’ according to their own value set and world view. This is a key reason for arguing for real practical action and investment in supporting more disadvantaged social groups.

One final issue is in relation to asset transfer requests, and the concern that public bodies may use the provision in the Bill to facilitate the offloading of liabilities rather than assets. My ongoing work with English local authorities involved in ambitious asset transfer programmes as part of their approach to managing severe budget cuts suggests that this will be a real danger in some places. For example, senior officers in one case study council were quite willing to admit on the record that a driver of the asset transfer programme was to transfer the risks, liabilities and future costs of facilities such as community centres and sports pavilions from the council to other bodies. Para 77 of the Policy Memorandum suggests the secondary legislation will stipulate what information public authorities will be required to provide to community bodies before they decide to request the transfer of an asset. The Memorandum states that this requirement “may include, for example, information about maintenance costs and energy efficiency”. I would argue that this secondary legislation must require public bodies to provide exactly this information.

Plunkett Foundation is an independent charitable body which has been supporting the empowerment of rural communities throughout the UK and Ireland since 1919. Our philosophy is based on enabling each generation to address the issues that matter to it through co-operation and enterprise. Today our focus is on community-owned and run businesses in rural areas, often centred on the ownership of physical assets, land and buildings. In 2013 Plunkett Foundation merged with Scotland’s Community Retailing Network to create Plunkett Scotland, a comprehensive community enterprise support service for rural Scottish communities.

Plunkett helps communities to respond to the challenges they face, providing ideas and inspiration, access to online and face-to-face networks, business advisors, mentors and trained staff who can advise on legal structures, incorporation, business planning, community engagement, access to development finance. Our interest in this Bill stems from our conviction that communities know best how to tackle the challenges they face, and empowerment is the way to unlock their potential.

General Comments

In general we welcome the Scottish Government’s foresight in putting the principles of subsidiarity, community empowerment and improving outcomes at the heart of the government’s purpose. We are conscious however that a supportive legislative framework, while a vital precursor to empowerment, is not enough. To achieve genuine and widespread community empowerment, and the beneficial outcomes that can flow from it, communities need appropriate support to exercise those rights. It is important that the processes and details reflect the ways in which communities respond to the challenges facing them. In an ideal world communities would sit down and put together a considered plan for their long-term development, and identify which assets they will need. In practice however communities are often only galvanised into action by the threat of loss or withdrawal, and there is little time to plan. We are concerned that this Bill should not restrict communities’ options and the tools available to them, nor put undue burdens on them in accessing and operating the provisions.

1. To what extent do you consider that the Bill will empower communities?

This Bill can be seen in the context of an evolving public policy agenda in Scotland which over the past 10 years has seen community empowerment and community-led regeneration taking over from the previous top-down approaches based on investment in physical infrastructure. The Bill presents communities with a number of new opportunities to take control of some of the issues affecting their lives, but the extent to which this genuinely empowers communities will depend on other factors. Ownership of assets and the ability to generate income streams independent of the state are critical factors in determining the degree to which a community is enabled to empower itself. Legislation alone cannot empower communities, only local people can do that for themselves. In addition to the legislative framework communities need Capacity (skills, experience, confidence), Resources (both human – volunteer effort and paid staff – and funding), and a Supportive Context (local authorities, public agencies, voluntary bodies and third sector intermediaries).

While it is true that only communities that can empower themselves, it is equally true that public sector organisations have a key role to play. The community empowerment process can assist public sector bodies achieve more efficient outcomes in the design and delivery of public services at a time of ever decreasing resources. But if the process is seen as a threat or an unnecessary distraction at a time of ever more scarce resources, then those in the public sector can prove obstructive. At the heart of this policy shift towards community and co-produced solutions lies a requirement for an openness to new thinking and ways of working. Changing attitudes and culture on this scale is very difficult to bring about in large organisations and remains one of the biggest obstacles to be overcome. If public sector organisations are able to view an empowered community sector as a partner, with parity of esteem, within the community planning process then significant long term benefits may accrue.

In the past, by effectively controlling all decisions of how and where regeneration investment was to be made, the public agencies have worked within very low thresholds of risk and trust – ‘risk’ in terms of the risk of money being misspent, and ‘trust’ in terms of trusting local people to know what is needed to improve their community. In respect of both of these critically important elements of the regeneration process, what is required more than anything else is a fundamental shift in terms of attitude and approach.

3. Do you consider that communities across Scotland have the capabilities to take advantage of the provisions in the Bill?

It is critical that communities are properly supported to take advantage of opportunities the Bill presents. Simply extending CRTB (Community Right to Buy) to the whole of Scotland will not achieve the policy objectives if it only gets used by most able and advantaged communities. Undoubtedly some communities will have the capacity and support to take advantage of the opportunities. Within the Highlands & Islands communities are able to access a comprehensive support service through HIE’s Community Assets Team and local development officers. Outwith this area, in lowland and southern rural Scotland, the support is much more fragmented, and communities face a patchy landscape of advice and signposting. Marginalised and disadvantaged communities will need a lot more support in capacity-building and confidence raising to realise the potential opportunities. That support needs to be properly resourced through third sector intermediaries. Big Lottery’s programmes such as Investing in Ideas and Growing Community Assets have been very useful in funding feasibility studies and development projects, but can’t be relied upon to deliver national outcomes – community empowerment requires properly resourced grassroots development support or community initiatives will never get started. In particular there is a need to support those organisations doing the proactive 'inspire' work – promoting the benefits and opportunities of community ownership and enterprise – networking, inspiring and showing what can be achieved.

4. Are you content with the specific provisions within the Bill?

With regard to the operation of CRTB we welcome the attempts to streamline the application process, increase flexibility and reduce the burden on communities to meet deadlines, however we feel that the process is still weighted in favour of landowners, and where they choose to be obstructive the options available to a community are still very limited. Given the onerous nature of the registration process for community interest in land, we would support the proposition that re-registering should only be required every 10 years, not 5 as is currently proposed.

We are however disappointed that definition of an eligible community body has only been extended to include SCIOs, and we suggest that is too narrow. The decision on what type of legal entity best represents their interests should be left to communities. It would be better for legislation to simply define characteristics of a democratically accountable community body (as CERB does), and not go on to restrict the choice of legal structure to the two options currently proposed (CLG & SCIO). The decision on whether a particular proposed structure meets the eligibility test for a community body could then rest with Scottish Ministers. Restricting the choice of legal structure to two options now cuts off opportunities for communities to select the most appropriate vehicle to acquire and manage an asset in the future under circumstances which cannot be known now.

In particular the exclusion of Registered Societies (formerly known as Industrial & Provident Societies) from eligibility has created anomalies whereby Scottish communities (for example Tweedsmuir in the Borders, and Midmar in Aberdeenshire) that wished to exercise the CRTB to acquire their local pubs through a Community Benefit Society have been prevented by the current Land Reform Act from utilising the potential of community shares to fund the acquisition of the assets. Within the UK as a whole 62% of community owned shops and 90% of community owned pubs have chosen to adopt the Registered Society legal structure as their preferred vehicle for ownership of a community asset. These are fundamentally democratic structures with a long and proven history of successful community co-operative enterprise. We cannot predict now what legal structures communities will need in the future to take advantage of the opportunities presented by the Bill, so cannot see any reason to restrict them unnecessarily?

If Ministers are uncomfortable with the proposal that the exact type of legal structure for an eligible community body is left open, eligibility in principle should at the very least be extended to include Community Benefit Societies and Community Interest Companies as well as SCIOs.
We welcome changes to the legislation around allotments, especially the imposition of a duty on Local Authorities to be more accountable over the provision of allotments, waiting lists and development plans for allotment land. We would also like to see specific duties on a Local Authority to make provision for communal (as opposed to individual) allotments where demand is evidenced by a group of people.
Community Woodlands Association evidence to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee of the Scottish Parliament on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

The Community Woodlands Association (CWA) welcomes the opportunity to submit evidence on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (CEB) as introduced to Parliament.

CWA was established in 2003 as the direct representative body of Scotland’s community woodland groups. The first community land buyout in Scotland was at Wooplaw Community woodland in the Borders (1987), and there are now well over 200 community groups across Scotland responsible for the management of tens of thousands of hectares of woodland and open space. More than half of our members own their woods, the remainder lease or work in partnership with public and private sector landowners.

We have extensive experience of supporting our members to acquire land by a variety of means: often through negotiation or open market sale but also often via Forestry Commission Scotland’s National Forest Land Scheme (NFLS) or the Community Right to Buy provisions of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 (LRA).

In its call for evidence the Committee asked five specific questions. Our submission largely covers Q4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why? but also has important implications for Q1 To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer? and Q3. Do you consider communities across Scotland have the capabilities to take advantage of the provisions in the Bill? If not, what requires to be done to the Bill, or to assist communities, to ensure this happens?

Our evidence concentrates on two parts of the CEB: Part 4 - the amendments to the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003, and Part 5 – the provisions for asset transfer from public authorities. In general we are very supportive of the proposals; however we believe there are some important clarifications required, some unfortunate omissions and some areas where amendment would strengthen the Bill and contribute to more effective delivery of the Scottish Government’s community empowerment objectives.

The Land Reform (Scotland) Act has had huge symbolic significance since enactment, but the complexities and hurdles contained within the act have severely limited its use on the ground: Registration, and even more so activation of registration, are exceptions rather than the norm. In part this is due to shortcomings in the legislation which, it is hoped, the Community Empowerment Bill will address. However, in our view it also reflects a certain lack of imagination as to how these provisions might be used to facilitate proactive community development planning, as the norm rather than the exception, and some of the points made below are designed to make the LRA fit for a much wider purpose, so that its value is not just symbolic, but hugely significant to and supportive of the empowerment of Scotland’s communities.
Part 3 – Participation Requests

We support the provisions as contained in the Bill but are disappointed that a number of the more radical proposals discussed in earlier consultations, such as participatory budgeting, appear to have been dropped.

We also note that not all public bodies (e.g. Forestry Commission Scotland (FCS)) are included in the scope of this part of the legislation.
CWA welcomes the Scottish Government’s commitment to revise Part 2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 (LRA), and we are very pleased to see a number of amendments which should improve the usability of the legislation.

27(1)(a) allowing community bodies (CBs) to register an interest in land across Scotland, irrespective of size of settlement; we see no reason why “urban” communities should not enjoy the same rights their “rural” counterparts;

28(4) extending the range of eligible types of community body to include Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisations (SCIOs) and any other type specified in regulations;

28(7) giving Ministers powers to prescribe other methods of geographic definition for communities;

36 removing the reference to at least half of the members of the community voting in the ballot and provides that the requirement in section 51(2)(a) of the LRA is met if the proportion of the members of the community who voted is sufficient to justify the CB proceeding to buy the land;

37 providing for the ballot to be conducted by an independent person appointed by Ministers.

We also welcome the various adjustments to timescales: taking public holidays into account, ensuring adequate time for the valuation and increasing the time to finalise community acquisition from 6 to 8 months.

There are, however, a few elements of the Bill as introduced, and some omissions, that we believe will hinder the achievement of the Scottish Government’s stated objectives.

Constitutional requirement to provide minutes

28(3)(c) and 28(4) require that a community body include in its constitution the provision that the CB give any person a copy of the minutes of a meeting within 28 days. The rationale for this requirement is not given in the policy memorandum or the explanatory notes, and it is not included in the list of criteria for a Part 3A Community Body.

Whilst it may be good practice for a community body to make approved minutes of meetings available, e.g. on a website, few if any will have such a provision in their constitution. This requirement may not be a significant obstacle for future community bodies that have not yet been incorporated, but it does, however, erect a barrier to the hundreds, possibly thousands, of existing community bodies who will have to amend their constitutions to comply with the new requirement. This is not necessarily a simple operation, as the standard LRA-compliant constitution provides that CBs can only amend their constitution by special resolution (requiring 75% vote) at a general meeting called for that purpose.

Moreover, it raises the prospect that CBs who have already used the CR2B provisions to acquire land, or those with active registrations, will be required to amend their constitutions to maintain these registrations or keep the land thus acquired. We note that 35(2) of the LRA provides that if Ministers are satisfied that a CB which has registered an interest is no longer eligible to do so they may direct the Keeper to delete that interest, and that 35(3) of the LRA provides that if Ministers are satisfied that a CB which has used the CR2B to buy land which it would not now be entitled to do so, then Ministers may acquire the land compulsorily.
The requirement to include this in their constitutions be replaced with provision to allow Ministers to require that Community Bodies enact byelaws or Rules with the same effect. Any such regulations should:

- specify that the reference is to approved minutes, recognising that approval typically takes place at a subsequent meeting;
- clarify whether they apply only to the approved minutes of the main board, or to those of subgroups, committees and subsidiary companies;
- maintain the provision for CB to withhold information contained in the minutes.

Period for indicating approval under section 38

30 precludes Ministers considering any community support that is dated earlier than 6 months before the date an application to register a community interest in land is received by Ministers (quoted from explanatory notes)

We believe this 6 month limit is unnecessary, and that Ministers should be free to take account of anything they consider relevant in indicating approval. In particular, where the approval of community members is being demonstrated through a coherent and proactive development planning process such support may well be over 6 months old by the time an application is lodged.

Late applications to register an interest in land

CBs face significant additional burdens in attempting late registration: demonstrating significantly greater support than for a timeous application, showing that registration is strongly in the public interest, and doing so in constrained timescales. However, in the absence of a process that supports proactive community development planning and promotes (or permits) mass and multiple registrations, it is inevitable that in many cases communities will only engage with a specific building or piece of land when they become aware that it may be available for sale, and thus it is essential that there be a usable mechanism to permit late registration.

31(4) replaces the requirement for a community to show “good reasons” for not submitting a timeous application, with a new provision to demonstrate they had undertaken, sufficiently in advance, “such relevant work as Ministers consider reasonable was carried out, etc”. Whether or not this is an easing of the demands on CBs will depend on the interpretation of the text.

31(4)(aa) requires that “the relevant work was carried out … (ii) in respect of land with a view to the land being used for purposes 20 that are the same as those proposed for the land in relation to which the application relates,” which suggests that for instance where a community need has been identified (i.e. for affordable housing) which could be met by acquiring suitable land, then such work would be admissible as “relevant work” even though the land now being registered had not been specifically been identified. This would be a positive step in our view.

However the explanatory notes state “The new paragraph (aa) also provides that the relevant work or steps undertaken must be in relation to the land to which the application relates or other land being used for the same purposes as the land to which the application relates,” which could be taken to imply that the “other land” must be already be being used for the same purposes as the land to which the application relates. This could be usefully clarified.

Information for ballotter

37 51A(6) requires that the CB provide the ballotter with “its proposals for use of the land in relation to which it has confirmed it will exercise its right to buy”, although it is unclear why this is required when 37 51A(2) requires Ministers to supply the ballotter with a copy of the application to register an interest.

We note two significant omissions from Part 2 LRA revisions: removing the prohibition on blanket registrations and easing the requirements for re-registration

Blanket registrations

67(2) of the LRA should be amended to permit community bodies to buy part of the land which has been registered where this intention has been notified in the registration.

67(2) of the LRA specifically prohibits community bodies from exercising the right to buy over only part of the land which has been registered. The official guidance says (para 30) You should not use multiple registrations as a “blanket” registration. Should your CB consider submitting multiple registrations, you should demonstrate serious intent to purchase any land subject to its registration. Your CB should make applications only in respect of land which, given the opportunity, you would want to buy. Any attempt to register a larger piece of land when a smaller piece is required will … result in your CB having to buy either all or none of the registered land if the whole lot is put up for sale.

There are many scenarios where a community body might, e.g. though a development planning process, identify specific needs/issues that it wishes to address, (e.g. retail, workshop or office space, or land for community growing / extension to cemetery / children’s play / affordable housing etc) and then, after an inventory of their community area, identify say 10 premises or plots of land that would fit their parameters.

If those plots/premises are in separate ownerships then separate registrations are required. However, if those ten plots / premises are all in the same ownership (not uncommon in some parts of Scotland), and in particular if they are subsections of a contiguous piece of land, then it would make much more sense for the community to make a single registration covering all suitable plots/premises with the stated intention of only buying one if it came on the market. This would require the community to state the size and other parameters (e.g. shape. road access, services, etc) of the plot that they wished to buy.

So for example, a single registration might cover 10ha of land, on either side of a road, but would stipulate that the community wished to acquire 1ha for their defined purpose, with the proviso that this must be a contiguous 1ha plot, with road frontage and a minimum width of 50m. If and when the whole or part of the registered area came up for sale the landowner would identify the plot, which would have to meet the parameters laid down in the approved registration, for sale to the CB.

The Bill contains no provisions to simplify the re-registration provisions, which are widely seen as unnecessary, and unduly demanding. The current 5 year cycle for registration is too short, and consideration should be given to extending this to 10 years.

Rather than replicating the original registration demands, which can be considerable, the re-registration process should be simplified, with a presumption in favour of continued registration unless the circumstances have materially changed. The community body should be asked to confirm that it wishes to continue re-register its interest, for the same objectives. There would also be an opportunity for the landowner or any other qualifying residents to lodge an objection, based on change in circumstance since the previous registration.

CWA welcomes the introduction of a new power extending the community right to buy to circumstances where there is not a willing seller. We consider it a significant shortcoming of the LRA that community acquisition of an asset can be assessed and approved by Ministers as in the public interest and furthering sustainable development, and yet in the absence of a willing seller there is no mechanism to take it forward.

These proposed new powers should be viewed as a last resort, to be exercised when other methods and negotiations fail. The existence of such powers will, however, have an important role in incentivising negotiation. It is essential therefore that they are usable and credible, and that special care is taken to prevent avoidance on the part of landowners.

We believe that as proposed, the new right would be impossible to exercise: the bar is being set too high, there are too many obstacles in the way and there are clear opportunities for avoidance on the part of landowners. There are, however, a number of ways in which the Part 3A provisions could be helpfully clarified and strengthened, and thus made fit for purpose.

Eligible land “abandoned and neglected”.

48 97C(1) stipulates that “Land is eligible for the purposes of this Part if in the opinion of Ministers it is wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected.” We are concerned that this requirement is overly limiting and whilst it may be possible to demonstrate this requirement is met for buildings, we do not believe it will not be workable in practice with respect to woodlands and other extensive landholdings.

We are aware that Community Land Scotland’s submission contains very detailed consideration of this point, and in particular on the importance of relating this requirement to the furtherance of sustainable development and potential interactions between these provisions and European Human Rights law; we endorse their submission on these points.

Eligibility requirements for Part 3A bodies

The eligibility requirements for Part 3A bodies and many of the procedures they will be required to follow have been drawn from the unamended Part 3 provisions. We believe that eligibility requirements should be harmonised with those in the (amended) part 2, i.e. including SCIOS and any other types specified in regulations.

Balloting

The provisions for the new balloting procedures in the revised Part 2 of the LRA introduced in Part 4 of the CEB should also apply to the new Part 3A.

Mapping requirements

97G(d)(ii) reproduces the mapping requirements from Part 3 of the LRA, which are widely considered to be excessive. Again we see no justification for any higher mapping requirements than those that apply to Part 2 of the Act.
Ownership
97H(d) requires that the owner of land is accurately identified. We note that whereas Part 2 of the LRA as enacted includes provisions covering circumstances where the owner of the land in question cannot be found, there is no equivalent in the proposed part 3A; although such circumstances might well be pertain if the land in question was actually “abandoned”. Equivalent provision should be included in Part 3A.

Current ownership “Inconsistent with furthering sustainable development”
97H(c) requires that Ministers must not consent to an application to buy by a community body unless they are satisfied “that, if the owner of the land were to remain as its owner, that ownership would be inconsistent with furthering the achievement of sustainable development in relation to the land.”

We believe this requirement should be deleted. Given that Ministers already have to satisfy themselves that the land is eligible land, (i.e. abandoned or neglected), and that purchase by the community body is both in the public interest and compatible with furthering the achievement of sustainable development in relation to the land, this further test is either an unnecessary duplication or sets an impossible hurdle, as it is unclear what additional level of mismanagement (successful prosecution for wildlife crime?) would be required to actually trigger such a judgement, and begs the question why statutory authorities would not already be intervening in such a case.

97H(j) provides that Ministers must not consent to an application unless they are satisfied that the CB has already tried and failed to buy the land. Guidance is needed to clarify whether this means the CB simply has to make an offer which the landowner refused, whether the offer has be based on a specified valuation methodology, and also on whether the CB required to have gone through a formal process (e.g. registration under part 2).

Potential for avoidance
97H(j) provides that CBs must have already tried and failed to buy the land, and 97J(1)(a) that the CB must have carried out a ballot in the 6 months preceding the submission of an application. These actions would give plenty of warning to landowners, who if minded to obstruct the process, could obfuscate ownership by selling (or giving options on) some or all of the land (unless the CB already had an active registration on the land), or by carrying out the bare minimum of management activity required to counter the “abandoned and neglected” criterion. Regulations and guidance will need to be framed to guard against such avoidance, in particular in taking a long-term view of management practices on the land in question.

Timescale for completion
97R provides that where the valuer has taken longer than expected, this will cut into the time that the community has to raise finance and complete the acquisition. This seems unjust, and we suggest that it be amended to ensure that whenever the valuation process is complete, there is a period of 4 months for the completion of payment.

“Market value” of the land
97S(5)(c) identifies “the amount attributable to any disturbance to the seller which may arise in connection with the transfer of the land to the Part 3A community body” as a component of “market value” and which must be paid by the CB. This seems unnecessary, as given that the Bill requires the CB to already have made an offer, it is in effect the landowner’s choice to force the CB to use... the Part 3A provisions. It also raises the prospect that landowners may choose this route deliberately in order to gain such compensation and thus inflate the sale price.

Relationship with Part 5 Asset Transfer provisions
The interaction of Part 3A and the Asset transfer provision contained in Part 5 for the CEB needs to be addressed: can communities, having failed with asset transfer request, then attempt a Part 3A acquisition? And if so, what are the decision making processes where Scottish Ministers are the landowner?
Power to Ministers to facilitate discussions and make regulations
We believe it would be useful if Ministers had powers to facilitate discussions and dispute resolution between communities and landowners.

Part 3 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act
We were concerned at the apparent omission of any measures amending part 3 of the LRA, and welcome the recent correspondence from the Scottish Government to the Conveners of the LGRC and RACCE notifying them of its intention to use the CEB to also simplify Part 3 of the LRA. Amongst the key points that should be addressed are streamlining the mapping process, and aligning the eligibility criteria with those for Parts 2 and 3A of the amended act.

Part 5 - Asset Transfers
We strongly support these provisions. We have considerable experience of working with Forestry Commission Scotland’s National Forest Land Scheme (NFLS), and believe that there is much that can be learned from the experience of operating this scheme, in particular the value of:

- Within a public authority, there should be a single point of entry to any asset transfer process, with identified administrators, dedicated guidance, and a single decision making process, to maintain consistency of advice to applicants and assessment of applications.
- The criteria and the levels of evidence required to meet them should not be "one-size-fits-all" but commensurate with the size/value of the asset in question; as for example, with the NFLS, where a full business plan and a community ballot are only required where the asset is valued at >£50,000.
- External input to the evaluation process helps maintain consistency and enables the process to remain positive (as an assessment of what an application is attempting to achieve) rather than a negative sifting (approving applications on the basis that they don’t fail any specific, rigid criteria). Additionally, external evaluation distances public authority staff charged with administering the scheme from the decision making process, which assists the management of both external and internal relationships, whilst the public authority is not perceived to be sitting in judgement on decisions to which it is also an interested party.

We consider that the effectiveness of these asset transfer provisions would be strengthened by a duty to provide publicly accessible asset registers, and by amendment of the Scottish Public Finance Manual to ensure that all public authorities have the discretionary power enjoyed by local authorities, to transfer at less than market value under certain conditions.

The provisions as introduced are relatively light in a number of areas of detail, which are explored below. In general we agree that it is better to cover these aspects in regulations and guidance, rather than in the legislation itself, but this makes it critical that the regulations are written effectively. We would recommend that there is thorough stakeholder (and in particular user) input to the regulations and associated guidance.
Eligibility criteria

50(2) appears to allow a wide range of local community of interest groups (e.g. sports clubs) and social enterprises to use the provisions, subject to Ministerial order.

We welcome this apparent flexibility, but consider that regulations and guidance should include elements of definition to ensure a local connection with the asset, and that the requirements are commensurate with the asset

Valuation

52(4)(e)&(f) place the onus on the community transfer body (CTB) to indicate the price / rent that it is prepared to pay for transfer of ownership / lease of the asset, but price / rent is not explicitly included in the list of matters (55(3)(c)) to be taken into consideration by the public authority when reaching its decision, e.g. whether agreeing to the request would be likely to promote or improve economic development, regeneration, public health, social wellbeing, or environmental wellbeing.

However, 55(3)(h) provides that the authority must also take into consideration “any obligations imposed on the authority, by or under any enactment or otherwise, that may prevent, restrict or otherwise affect its ability to agree to the request”. which appears to allow public authorities to use their obligations to the Scottish Public Finance Manual to refuse an asset transfer request which does not (in their opinion) comprise an appropriate valuation.

Guidance should be made available to CTBs on determining the price / rent they offer. Where this is carried out by an independent professional valuer to specified criteria, either a “full market valuation” or such other valuation methodology as prescribed by a revised Scottish Public Finance Manual, there should be a presumption that public authorities be obliged to accept it the valuation. If not, then guidance needs to describe what processes will be used to facilitate settlement when the CTB and public authority disagree over price or rent.

Decision-making

The Bill as introduced says nothing about the decision-making processes within public authorities: who receives and administers asset transfer requests, who assesses eligibility and who makes decisions on whether or not the asset transfer request is granted.

We agree that such matters should be covered by guidance rather than directly legislated for, and believe there is much to be learned from the experience of the National Forest Land Scheme, as noted previously. We trust these issues will be addressed in statutory guidance, and would request that stakeholders, particularly those with experience of asset transfer, be consulted in the process of drawing up such guidance.

Forestry Leasing

We note that there is a potential conflict between a community transfer body as defined in the CEB and the definition given in the Section 11 of the Public Services Reform (Scotland) Act 2010, which amends the Forestry Act (1967), (which otherwise restricts FCS’s ability to delegate its responsibilities) to permit leasing of land for forestry purposes to community-controlled companies by guarantee.
This should be dealt with by placing an appropriate amendment to the Public Services Reform (Scotland) Act 2010 in Schedule 4 (introduced by section 98(1)), Minor and Consequential Amendments.

Evidence on the Community Empowerment [Scotland] Bill to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee

Participation and Asset Transfer

This submission comments on some parts of the CE[S] Bill, specifically Participation and Asset Transfer [P&AT] as requested in your recent email.

CSPP may submit comments on other parts of the Bill at a later date.

Background

The Centre welcomes the publication of the Bill and view the underlying principles as desirable and consistent with the direction we wish to see public policy on engagement and democracy moving.

That said, some aspects of those principles are likely to be hard to put into legislative form and we therefore think that the Bill will benefit from wider discussion and review.

We hope this will lead to a position where amendments and change emerge from such discussion and are not seen by the government ministerial sponsors as hostile and provocative.

What is a ‘community’?

Seeking to define community is a complex challenge that has been much discussed since the use of the word became fashionable in policy circles perhaps some 4 or 5 decades over. The presumption in the Bill appears to be primarily based on geographic notions of community. This might usefully be supplemented by some wider reflection and debate on communities of interest, and other forms of affiliation other than just geography.
The phrasing used in various Bill related documents to describe community organisations is curious: “...organisations open to everyone and really speak for their community.” This might well be thought to capture the essence of Community Councils and is similar to the form defined for these in the 1973 Act. The Bill appears light on discussion of these statutory entities which have struggled to thrive in all council areas ever since their creation in post 1975.

In terms of geography, research evidence in various settings shows that people can concurrently hold more than one concept of community in their mind. Part of a town or city for others who live in that town or city; often the entire city/town itself for others who are further afield; and approximation for those from further away or overseas. To one person a community might be described variously as: Fisherton; Musselburgh; Edinburgh at different times and in different conversations.

Therefore both proximity and scale are relevant to any consideration of participation as the next section discusses.

Participation

One aspect of the Bill is the provision for strengthening Community Planning; we view this as desirable. It is not clear whether an increased and mandated expectation of greater participation is best channelled directly through the [strengthened CPP] or through individual partner organisations. Where there are multiple approaches to participation there may well be tensions over asserted or inferred community wishes. So, for example, it appears that Police Scotland invested considerable street police time in seeking ‘community’ views on the local [ward and council] policing plans. To take one example, there is little available evidence – certainly not in published neighbourhood policing plans -that action on saunas in Edinburgh was a high community priority. Yet such action was taken, apparently in contradiction of health organisations & council views.

The other key issue is how different communities are resourced to engage in such discussion. Capacity building and purposive participation encouragement is needed if such participation is not simply colonised by those with loud voices and high order access to communication channels. This is particularly important as we are increasingly more aware of differential access to media such as the internet, telephony and similar channels across Scotland.

We have stated above that proximity and scale are relevant to notions of community and participation, another feature is representativeness. We currently operate most of our public institutions on the basis of some form of representative decision making. In local government through election; in health boards through appointed representation [trials of partial election having been abandoned]; in other public bodies through the appointment of various stakeholders of proximately interested parties [e.g. economic interest on Scottish Enterprise].
In such a context it is not clear that any other form of ‘participation’ that involved the co-option; appointment or even election of ‘community’ interests would be other than effectively creating a small number of people to attempt to represent wider interests. A current listing of, say, Community Councils in Glasgow appears to show 100+ of which some are dormant - how is any participation other than by representative numbers to be achieved in such circumstances?

Asset transfer

This appears to refer to ‘publicly owned land and buildings’ as some documents referring to the Bill state is one of the key features of the proposed legislation.

This seems to derive from the [generally very successful] experience of community right to buy in some remote and undeveloped areas of Scotland.

The explanatory documents refer here to councils, government organisations and other public bodies and explicitly indicate that the intention is to take this acquisition right beyond rural areas into all parts of the country.

A key difference between such rural areas and other developed parts of the country is that boundaries are often clearer in the former. Eigg is Eigg; Glen Elg is Glen Elg. Acquisition for ownership or use with clearly defined parameters is much more readily achieved in those places than it is in, say, Leith or South Edinburgh.

The other key difference between land [essentially the key subjects of Community Right to Buy] and properties [more probably the subjects in developed areas] is that undeveloped land can decline in quality or use value, but it is relatively inert in costs terms. A neglected field; woodland or estate may grow more weeds and collect more rubbish, but clearance/usage costs can be incurred gradually.

Urban assets tend to be costly from the date of acquisition, particularly if, as inferred from the Bill documents they are unused or underused. The LG&R Committee can walk with 15 minutes of the Parliament to at least two examples of privately and publically owned buildings that are ‘...not in good use...run down.’ In each case, to retrieve/restore each to acceptable standards might incur £0.5/1.0M. Similar buildings are in the ownership of public bodies across Scotland. It will be a formidable business case that is required in each instance.

Summary

A commendable Bill, with underlying principles that are excellent and consistent with our ambitions in the Centre. It will be hard to capture some such sentiments and ambitions in legislative form; harder still to implement.

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill
5th September 2014

On behalf of

[Logo: Assemble Collective Self Build]
Background

Assemble Collective Self Build is currently in the process of registering as a Community Interest Company with the purpose of enabling community-led housing projects within Scotland.

Assemble believes that traditional mainstream housing options do not suit a growing sector of society, whether based on affordability, design, sustainability or community involvement grounds.

The role that Assemble seeks to fulfil is to guide groups through the entire process, including agreeing suitable governance structures and tenure, land identification and procurement, planning, design, construction and management.

In this respect, Assemble wishes to provide a brief general response to the Community Empowerment Bill and specifically address Question 3 of the Committee’s Call for Evidence invitation, which asks:-

Community Empowerment Bill – the benefits

Assemble supports the Government’s key aim of creating the conditions for community empowerment. Specifically, Assemble considers that there is a real opportunity to address a number of core social, economic and environmental aims through the control of suitable land and buildings by appropriate community bodies. These include addressing the housing affordability issue, direct participation in local decision-making, energy efficiency, financial sustainability and more varied and smaller-scale urban design. The need for a legislative framework to support these aims is clear and the emerging Bill provides the basis to continue previous community and land reforms in Scotland, and seek to address elements of the Land Reform Review Group recommendations.

Community control of land and buildings

Assemble believe that land control is a core requirement to enable greater community engagement and empowerment. As is widely accepted, land control (whether outright ownership or under a secure long lease) provides direct power in terms of ability to control use and associated security of tenure and management.
For community groups to benefit from the same degree of control that is afforded to large public and private landowners, the opportunity must not just be for one-off community buildings but areas of land of a scale that can deliver local homes, workplaces and recreation.

Community Right to Buy (Part 4)

Assemble supports the legislative changes to allow for community bodies to acquire abandoned or neglected land without a willing seller and more importantly, to extend community right to buy across urban areas. This will enable ‘mainstreaming’ of community empowerment throughout the greater population of Scotland. The definition of community-controlled bodies is critical in delivering these aims - representative groups are required but obstacles to delivery through over-prescriptive requirements must be avoided. For example, the ability for existing groups such as non-profit housing co-operatives to avoid overly onerous administrative changes required by registered charity status requires to be examined.

Asset Transfer Requests (Part 5)

The process of public asset transfer to community groups has to be fully embraced by the public sector – when assessing a request, the relevant authority must be obliged to give equal weight to social, environmental and economic benefits so that best value against perceived market value doesn’t remain the key determination (clearly with regard to Common Good land, there should be a presumption in favour of asset transfer unless there are strong material reasons why the public authority should retain control).

Community Capacity

In terms of Question 3 and the capability of community bodies to access these opportunities, programmes and funds linked to the 2003 Land Reforms generated expertise to advise communities but it is considered that community groups still generally suffer from lack of resource and access to information to assist with delivering these aims.

Assemble believes that, with the extension of community right to buy to urban areas in particular, a clearer framework should be provided for public authorities to minimise impact on pressurised resources (including staffing). In this respect, both advisory and funding assistance will require to be addressed if the aims are to be delivered.

With regard to advice, there should be opportunities for community empowerment ‘enabling’ organisations to be appointed to assist in delivering the desired outcomes through matching community groups with land and funding opportunities. This could involve a framework agreement for each local or public authority and the Bill should perhaps address this requirement at the outset.

Whilst those groups with funds and knowledge will be able to move forward in the short term, more disadvantaged groups will require guidance if aspirations are to be met.

In terms of funding, whilst it is appreciated that it is not the remit of the Bill to identify specific mechanisms, work should be developed in tandem with the finalisation of this legislation to identify where support can come from. Government funding either from existing or new programmes for communities should be linked to social investment funds to generate a deeper resource to really make a difference and deliver community-led housing for example on a larger scale.

Linking the two aspects of community ‘enabling’ and community funding is critical to the success of this legislation whereby a clear framework should exist so that groups seeking to improve their living environment or protect and develop local assets can get immediate access to required expertise and/or financial assistance.
The Health and Social Care Alliance Scotland (the ALLIANCE) is the national third sector intermediary for a range of health and social care organisations. It brings together over 700 members, including a large network of national and local third sector organisations, associates in the statutory and private sectors and individuals.

The ALLIANCE welcomes the Local Government and Regeneration Committee’s call for evidence on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. The Bill has the potential to empower individuals and communities to be contributing, active citizens and encourage greater levels of community ownership and control. We would like to reinforce the message in the Scottish Community Development Centre’s 2013 response to the consultation on the Community Empowerment and Renewal Bill¹ “community engagement is effective if and when it involves developing and sustaining a working relationship between one or more public body and one or more community group, to help them both to understand and act on the needs or issues that the community experiences”.

Consultation Questions

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities? Please give reasons for your answer

Community Planning

The ALLIANCE welcomes the provisions in the bill to make community planning a statutory function and shared responsibility of specified public bodies. Effective community planning has the potential to bring together the totality of partners in a local area whose assets and views are essential in driving change, not only for the purpose of participation, but to co-produce person centred services.

We believe, however, that there is an opportunity to strengthen the Bill in order to ensure a more robust system in terms of shared planning and community involvement. For example, while the Bill extends the list of key partners to include a wider range of public bodies, the involvement of community interests appears to be on the terms of statutory agencies, who must “consider which community bodies are likely to contribute to community planning” and “must make all reasonable efforts to secure the participation of such community bodies in community planning”. This language should be strengthened in order to more closely capture the spirit of empowerment which forms the basis for the Bill and to avoid further centralising power with public bodies, as per the recommendations of the Christie Commission.

Community planning will be most effective when it can demonstrate back to communities how their desired outcomes and priorities are being listened to and reflected in decision making. In this regard, we believe that further clarity is required within the Bill and accompanying guidance over whether invited community bodies will be considered as full members of the Community Planning Partnerships (CPPs), and if not, what ‘contribute’ can be expected to mean in this context.

At present, Third Sector Interfaces are represented on all 32 CPPs in Scotland. This is a position strengthened by the ‘Agreement on Joint Working on Community Planning and Resourcing’ which states “Making the most of the total resources available locally means ensuring that the Third Sector Interface is a full community planning partner and drawing on the huge commitment of all those, including volunteers, who work to improve communities.” To consolidate this position, we support Voluntary Action Scotland’s proposal that it is possible to write Third Sector Interfaces, as an advocate for the sector, into legislation whilst excluding them from certain duties places on statutory partners.

Asset Transfer

The ALLIANCE welcomes the aims of the Bill in giving the initiative to communities to take ownership or make more effective use of land and buildings, and believe that this process could be supported by the introduction of an asset register. This should be collated by statutory bodies and made readily available to the public in order to promote transparency in the asset transfer system, and should provide sufficient information to enable community bodies to make informed decisions on their viability.

It is important to recognise, however, that the hard work for many community-led organisations will begin after an asset transfer has taken place, e.g. securing funding for refurbishment and ongoing costs. The ALLIANCE therefore believes that additional capacity building is required to ensure that community bodies taking on assets are adequately supported.

The Bill should encourage further proactive work with communities rather than simply encouraging transfer of assets. It provides the opportunity to strengthen this partnership, however there is a possibility that the practical implementation of this legislation will result in either the community taking over an asset or the public body retaining control – when the public body working closely with local communities can often result in the best outcome.

Capacity Building

As the policy memorandum recognises, “community empowerment cannot be delivered by legislation alone… the availability of appropriate support, guidance and a culture of nurturing community action are also key”. In order to secure the adequate input from “community bodies” to inform community planning this must be strengthened, with a particular emphasis placed on the duties on Community Planning Partnerships to resource community engagement.

At present, there are no specific proposals for statutory intervention to achieve this capacity building. We support the proposal of Voluntary Action Scotland that the duty on Community Planning Partners should be extended in order to pro-actively develop the capacity for community bodies to exist and develop their knowledge in order to contribute to the community planning process.

“It would be possible to amend 8.1(b) to include a responsibility on statutory partners to provide adequate resourcing of community and third sector involvement. There should also be an onus on community planning partners to produce materials at CPP level in an accessible and timely manner to allow smaller organisations the opportunity to process and prepare their response in order for them to contribute fully to the CPP process. Further to this a mechanism needs to be introduced to allow for a right to appeal should a community bodies application to participate in a CPP be rejected.”

4. ‘Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill’, Briefing note and VAS policy statement, 2 September 2014
2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

Strengthened partnership working has the potential to improve outcomes for public sector organisations, communities and people who use support and services and result in long term, preventative savings.

The third sector plays a significant role not only in supporting amplification of the voices of people who use support and services, but as a provider of community-based support that is often preventative and represents high value for money. In light of this, and in order to support the desired culture change in the way in which resources are managed and services are designed and delivered, it is important that the Third Sector is recognised on the face of the bill, which is not currently the case.

There is also a growing interest in ‘asset-based approaches’ in Scotland that recognise that individuals and communities are part of the solution, work with people rather than viewing them as passive recipients of services, and empower people to control their future.⁵

There is existing evidence of communities and the third sector being engaged in a range of ways and bringing about the change they wish to see. This works well when people are engaged with local public bodies and feel listened to, but there is clearly an appetite for greater engagement and empowerment, as per the below example.

Case Study: Partners for Change - Inverclyde⁶

Like most areas of Scotland public services in Inverclyde are now under increasing strain. In order to sustain services and deliver better local outcomes, the Council and CHCP are taking steps to recast their relationship with the third sector. The first Local Authority area in Scotland to participate in the Partners for Change process, Inverclyde is now implementing wide-ranging action to involve the third sector more fully in service planning, to ensure a level playing field during procurement processes, and to grow the role of the sector in public service delivery. The Partners for Change (PfC) process is a tried and tested approach to securing better local outcomes through improved collaboration with the third sector. In Inverclyde the process involved:

Three intensive half-day workshops, each bringing together mixed groups of public sector service heads and commissioning/procurement staff (from the Council and CHCP) with representatives from leading third sector providers.

Development of an action-oriented Commissioning Improvement Plan focused on maximising the benefits of commissioning health, social care and other services from the third sector.

Ongoing mentoring and advisory support to help deliver on agreed actions and take the next steps to partnership improvement.

This process was delivered by the Social Value Lab and partners as part of the national Developing Markets for the Third Sector Providers programme. Among the priorities identified in Inverclyde was enabling the third sector to bring to bear its capacity for innovation in the redesign of public services.

A range of mechanisms were agreed to harness this innovation, including the increased use of outcomes-based specifications, introduction of service-focused ‘innovation forums’, and the piloting of one or more Public Social Partnership projects.

Recognising the fact that all communities are different and have different capacities and capabilities, a key issue will be ensuring that they are properly supported to take advantage of the Bill’s provisions on an equal basis. If this is not addressed, there is a danger that the provisions may serve to further empower those communities that are organised and influential, while not achieving meaningful change for communities which may not have the confidence or capacity to engage with the process.

In this regard, the Bill would be strengthened by the addition of provisions specifying measures and resources to build capacity within marginalised and excluded communities. This issue is fundamental to facilitating community empowerment and tackling inequalities.

National Outcomes

The ALLIANCE welcomes proposals to embed an outcomes-based approach in the legislation as a means of driving quality and consistency and allowing for scrutiny of the progress made in this area.

Developing a set of national outcomes offers the potential to meet the local needs of the community; however this cannot be achieved without strong involvement of a cross section of community interests in establishing what the outcomes (and underlying indicators) should be. The Bill outlines that in determining the outcomes, Scottish Ministers will be required to “consult such persons as they consider appropriate”. We would welcome a stronger duty that requires the direct involvement of community-based and third sector organisations in the development of outcomes in order to help empower communities and avoid embedding a centrally driven process.

Where national outcomes are developed, it is critically important that there is a mechanism in place to hold public bodies to account for meeting these. A sufficiently robust and transparent mechanism is absent within the Bill at present, within which public authorities or any other person carrying out functions of a public nature are required to “have regard” to the national outcomes and Scottish Ministers would be required to to publish reports on the extent to which they have been achieved.

Co-production

The ALLIANCE recommends adopting the term “co-production” on the face of the Bill to ensure that it is strongly embedded in the Scottish policy landscape across all sectors.

Co-production is a term which is increasingly in use to describe a strengthening of the relationship between people and public bodies and increasingly resonates with the role of the third sector. Co-production can describe partnership at the individual level but it is also about involving people in decisions about the design and delivery of services. This is an essential mechanism for producing models, services and systems that are person-centred.

Co-production has a significant role to play in empowering communities to be actively involved in supporting the design and the delivery of better, more sustainable services, and offers an approach to service design and delivery that makes the best use of the capacities of all stakeholders to create effective, sustainable solutions.
About the ALLIANCE

The ALLIANCE vision is for a Scotland where people of all ages who are disabled or living with long term conditions, and unpaid carers, have a strong voice and enjoy their right to live well, as equal and active citizens, free from discrimination, with support and services that put them at the centre.

The ALLIANCE has three core aims; we seek to:

- Ensure people are at the centre, that their voices, expertise and rights drive policy and sit at the heart of design, delivery and improvement of support and services.

- Support transformational change, towards approaches that work with individual and community assets, helping people to stay well, supporting human rights, self management, co-production and independent living.

- Champion and support the third sector as a vital strategic and delivery partner and foster better cross-sector understanding and partnership.
Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill ("the Bill")
South Lanarkshire Council ("the Council") - Response to Scottish Parliament’s Local Government and Regeneration Committee

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

The Council considers that the Bill will empower communities. However, as discussed in question 3 it will not necessarily enable communities to successfully secure an asset transfer. The requirements placed upon the community in making an application are very specific and it is unlikely that organisations would succeed if making an application without prior engagement with an authority.

The requirement for the Community Planning Partnership ("CPP") to involve and consult local communities is welcomed, and the provisions within the Bill present opportunities for increased community engagement and empowerment. The Bill proposes to strengthen the governance and accountability arrangements of CPPs, placing a statutory duty on the CPP that should ensure a shared understanding of roles, responsibilities, commitment and common purpose. The duty to consult and involve community bodies in decision making and the requirement to take into account the needs and circumstances of those affected by introduction of Local Outcome Improvement Plans is positive, presenting CPPs with enhanced opportunities to inform, engage, involve and empower communities.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector or ganisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

It is difficult to assess the impact on authorities’ resources and processes in the absence of the detailed regulations and guidance. However, the Council considers that there are benefits and disadvantages.

Benefits

The Bill enshrines the outcomes approach to legislation. Partnerships and collective decision making will be strengthened and robust processes will need to be put in place to support the delivery of shared planning, co production, community involvement and community influence.
CPP partners will have a shared understanding of roles, responsibilities and common purpose.
Provisions will encourage local democracy, enhanced (CPP) partner and public accountability and transparency.
Existing arrangements around community ownership and asset transfer will be able to be developed and streamlined.
Communities will be more engaged in community planning and able to participate in processes to improve outcomes in service delivery.
Disadvantages

Some duties remain vague, information and guidance is required around funding, staff and other resources, priority setting and the fulfilment of duties. Duties remain vague about collective accountability and how this will work. The definition of a community body is unclear – does this include "local" and "national" communities?

The process for participation requests is onerous for public sector organisations and for community bodies.

There is a lack of clarity around resource implications of community engagement and the capacity building required to support this.

More clarity is required around the principles of right to buy process legal status of community bodies (e.g. Section 28(4) of the Bill mentions that a Scottish charitable incorporated organisation ("SCIO") is a community body. Does this mean that unincorporated associations registered with the Office of the Scottish Charity Regulator ("OSCR") cannot be community bodies?), development needs and attending timescales to secure the transfer of assets.

More guidance is required on how community engagement will be planned, resourced and integrated across partners.

The Council considers that larger organisations and those in more affluent areas have capacity and are best placed to take advantage of asset transfer but there is nothing in the Bill to support the development of capacity for new or small scale organisations with aspirations. Accordingly, organisations in disadvantaged areas are unlikely to be able to develop the capacity to manage an asset without assistance.

Extensive capacity building and community infrastructure development would be required particularly in disadvantaged areas, to ensure that the provisions, advantages and opportunities of the Bill can be realised across all communities. The definition of community bodies could be fine tuned and improved. The National Standards for Community Engagement have already been endorsed by public sector bodies; implementation and use could be further supported by the introduction of a CPP Community Consultation Plan or Engagement Strategy. A clear articulation of the commitment to deliver effective community engagement is required at a CPP level to ensure that this is supported and promoted at all levels of decision making.

However, there needs to be a focus placed on ensuring that communities are adequately supported and equipped to take full advantages of the arrangements in the Bill, particularly in relation to participation requests, right to buy and asset transfer.

In relation to the costs associated with community capacity buildings, the Council considers that as councils will likely be responsible for managing the process of supporting participation requests, and the other key provisions on behalf of the CPP, additional resources should be provided to ensure that the appropriate level of support is in place. The Council already supports capacity building work, in particular in its most deprived communities. However, the provisions of the Bill will require additional investment, some of which could be sought from Community Planning partners to establish the appropriate structures. In relation to resourcing community capacity building / engagement, the Council considers that the Scottish Government should be providing additional resources to ensure CPPs are able to maximise the impacts of these Bill provisions. Additionally, the Council is working closely with CPP partners to develop a more strategic approach to community capacity building and engagement and this will require consideration of partner contributions in addition to the current Council investment into community capacity building / engagement structures and activity.

It is unclear whether the intention of the Bill is that community-controlled bodies will have the ability to make application to authorities under both the Community Right to Buy and Asset Transfer. It would seem onerous on authorities to have to deal with applications under both routes.

The inclusion of land leased by an authority has an adverse impact upon the ability of the Council to negotiate cost effective commercial lease terms and should be excluded from Asset Transfer.

The disapplication of restrictions in lease of land to relevant authorities does not reflect the different governing regulations between the different types of Relevant Authority who on occasion share ownership or leasehold interests in property.

The definition of "community- controlled body" is very open and although there are predefined "tests" in terms of the organisations constitution it will, presumably, still be possible for national organisations, geographic or special interest groups to make applications under the Bill. Therefore, the concerns previously raised in the Council's response to the consultation on the Bill in January 2014 still apply.

The Council would comment on particular Sections of Part 5 of the Bill (Asset Transfer Requests) as follows:

Sections 52 -54 (Asset Transfer Requests, Community Bodies requesting ownership transfers, Regulations)

As the Bill is currently written a "community transfer body" is the same as a "community-controlled body" as defined in Part 3 until such times as Scottish Minister make an order that provides further designations. This is a very broad definition.

In addition, however, the organisation must also be a SCIO. This could be seen as discrimination. It is also noted that it is not OSCR but Scottish Ministers who will decide where an asset goes to if an organisation is wound up. This is contrary to the position that generally applies to charities in their constitutions and, as the Council understands it, the requirements of OSCR and charity law.
The Council considers that the requirement for an organisation to have at least 20 members is positive as in order to sustain a project and maintain a property there will need to be capacity within the organisation and succession planning which would be difficult with a lesser number.

The Bill recognises that asset transfer can be by lease or sale which is positive as many groups are not ready for outright ownership and in some cases lease offers more flexible opportunities and allows a project to grow gradually taking on more space as required. However, of concern is the extension of asset transfer to include land which is leased to the Council. The terms and conditions of leases to the Council will contain restrictions in terms of alienation and use and the rental charged takes into account these restrictions. If this legislation takes precedence over the terms of existing and future lease contracts, it will impact adversely upon the Council's ability to negotiate lease terms which are in its best interests. It could result in landlords refusing to renew leases and potentially lead to increases in rental values, particularly if use clauses are opened up. It may be that this is only intended to apply when the lease is between 2 Relevant Authorities however if so the wording is not specific (see Section 60 below for further comment).

The Bill places a duty on the community organisation to specify up front the reason for the transfer and to justify the community benefits that could be derived from the transfer. From the Council's experience most groups are nowhere near ready to make a formal application for transfer when they first approach the Council and if there is no prior engagement upon a proposal an asset transfer is request is unlikely to succeed.

It is very difficult to assess the impact of the Bill on the Council's approach to Asset Transfer without the further regulations and guidance referred to in Section 54. The matters referred to in this Section fundamentally affect how asset transfer requests are managed and processed but at present there is no detail.

Section 55 (Asset Transfer Requests – Decisions)

The process for reaching a decision upon an application is not far removed from that the Council has although it may need to be adapted. However, the main concern will be the time scales placed upon reaching decisions and there is no detail in the current Bill wording which would enable useful comment at this stage.

Section 56 (Agreement to Asset Transfer Requests)

At present the Council separates out the decision to consider asset transfer from the negotiation of the specific terms of the transfer. However, this Section implies that as soon as a decision is reached Heads of Terms will be issued and the organisation has to submit a formal offer.

If the timescales (as yet undefined) are restricted then there will be little opportunity for negotiation of terms, particularly price, or refinement of proposals. Given that most organisations will not have a full business plan in place, or an agreed funding package approved at the time of making the application this seems onerous. The development of a viable and sustainable project usually relies upon several matters running in parallel. Organisations will only make a formal offer on a conditional basis not wanting to commit until they have funding in place over and above the normal matters such as planning consent etc. This is not unreasonable. Therefore, the ability for the authority and the organisation to agree a period is welcomed.

However, the right of the community organisation to apply to Scottish Ministers to set a period for the submission of an offer seems unfair. As there is no right of appeal to Scottish Ministers in terms of the decision to grant an asset transfer it seem inconsistent to allow the Scottish Ministers to determine the length of time that an authority must hold an asset pending transfer. The authority has already agreed to the principal and terms of transfer by this stage in the process, and has under the Bill to agree a minimum of 6 months for the submission of an offer. It is reasonable to allow the authority to set a long stop date, particularly if the asset is a vacant building the condition of which is deteriorating or for a property which has other market interest. The agreement to a long stop date is critical to the transfer negotiations particularly in view of the conditions of Section 57 where authorities cannot even enter into short term lets or uses during the process. It may be that an authority would prefer to make the offer to transfer and it is not clear what is gained by prescribing that the organisation makes the offer. This is particularly relevant if the transfer is by lease where almost certainly the Authority will wish to draft the detailed terms and style (which is the “norm” in landlord-tenant relationships).

Section 59 (Review by local authority)

The Council will have to establish a review process for dealing with applications that are refused or the terms and conditions proposed to the organisation are substantially different to those made by the organisation. Again Scottish Ministers have the right to issue further regulations on the process so at present there is insufficient detail to comment.

The Council’s Executive Committee currently takes the decision to agree an asset transfer and the terms and conditions of transfer are approved by its Housing and Technical Resources Committee. The Council will have to give consideration to the appropriate forum for appeals.

Section 60 (Disapplication of restrictions in leases)

This Section of the Bill removes restrictions in lease agreements which would hinder the asset transfer and only applies to leases between Relevant Authorities. However, it can affect the asset value of properties and does not reflect for instance the different legal and financial regulations that apply to the health boards and Councils. For example, if a council has transferred its assets to an arms’ length organisation as part of a financial arrangement then the commercial terms of that financial arrangement could be affected by this Section. If a property was owned by the Council and leased to a health board could a community organisation apply to both authorities? It is not clear.
The Council would comment on Part 6 of the Bill (Common Good Property) as follows:

The Council has 4 common good accounts and a list of assets held on each common good account, so initial publication in accordance with the Bill can be achieved quickly. However, the duty to consult on the lists and consider applications for additional assets to be added to the lists will be resource intensive. Common Good accounts are the subject of considerable local interest and it is anticipated that the Council will receive many representations. Detailed title investigations will likely be required which will have an impact on staff time and the Council finances (e.g. through instructing external advice where the title position is unclear).

Again, the impact on the Council in terms of the process of consultation on disposal or alternative use of assets held in common good will depend upon the regulations made by Scottish Ministers in the future.

At present the Council has no common good assets under disposal but a number that are under long term lease agreements.

5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

The Council considers that an explicit duty should be placed on CPP partners to reduce inequality and increase a focus on early intervention and prevention.

Specifically, in relation future allotment development, the Council will seek to encourage greater social inclusion as residents participate in this social and educational activity. There is currently provision within the existing allotments for client groups who include physical and mental special needs, and this will be taken into consideration with any future allotment site designs. Again, the provision of any new sites will be taken after considering factors such as available infrastructure, existing utilities, population, minimising nuisance to existing residents etc. The Council will encourage through the development of management rules, sound environmental and horticultural practices and this will provide education benefit to users and communities and encourage biodiversity within the proposed sites.
Introduction

The Community Learning and Development Standards Council for Scotland (CLDSC) (http://www.cldstandardscouncil.org.uk/Home) is the body responsible for the registration of CLD practitioners, the approval of relevant training courses, and the continuing professional development of the CLD workforce. It is a member–led body, currently located within Education Scotland.

Access to professional qualifications in CLD, which is directly relevant to the ambitions of the Bill, is increasingly utilised by people active in their own communities. The CLDSC has supported this access by developing and operating an approvals process at three levels (professional qualification at degree level; developmental qualification, for example at National Certificate and Higher National Certificate level; and a Standards Mark to recognise quality provision of continuing professional development); and by promoting pathways for individuals to enable them to develop their competence and progress in occupational terms, whatever the starting point.

CLD has a key role in building the capacity of communities, through a workforce that is itself substantially embedded within them. The CLDSC’s specific interests are in working with the CLD field to improve practice.

The CLDSC welcomes the ambition of the Bill to empower communities. We believe that the need for the Bill implies that a broader process of change is required. We need to clarify how, through the provisions of the Bill and the actions that accompany or follow from it, we can empower communities to empower themselves.

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

To start by stating the obvious, a bill will not in itself empower communities. If communities are to be empowered, they will do it themselves, assisted or hindered by a range of factors, including the legislative framework, their economic and social circumstances, their access to political influence, the degree to which they have developed their own capabilities, their access to support in doing this and the quality of this support, and the willingness and capability of public service agencies to engage with and respond to them.
The Bill includes a number of provisions that in broad terms create rights that will result in communities being able to either take direct control of assets, or to influence the way in which services are provided, in ways that have been less open up to now.

In assessing the extent to which this will “empower communities”, it is important to consider the question of which communities are most likely to exercise these rights successfully. The rights, and the raised expectations of the role played by communities created by the Bill, are not matched by the current opportunities for disadvantaged communities to develop the capacities to make use of its provisions.

There is a risk that the communities most likely to do so are those that have the readiest access to technical skills, networks of influential contacts and other relevant resources, and the confidence that results from these; in other words those that are already significantly “empowered”.

Our view in the light of this is that the extent to which the Bill will empower communities will be critically dependent on the availability of support to those communities that are currently dis-empowered, and on the nature of this support. We have provided further comments in relation to this in answer to question 3 below.

A further critical factor in the extent to which the Bill will empower communities is the adequacy of the skills, knowledge and capability base of government and national agencies in relation to the demands raised by the Bill; these need to be questioned and re-assessed.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

Both the Bill and the issues it seeks to address present a major challenge to public sector organisations. Without significant change in their culture and the resulting ways of working, they are likely to face a growing disconnection from the communities they exist to serve. To avoid this and to grasp the positive opportunities offered by the empowerment of communities, they need to re-assess their own capabilities in relation to the changing context, and take steps to develop them in the light of this.

For public sector organisations committed to working in partnership with communities, to challenging and reducing inequalities and to enabling communities to play a greater part in shaping their own future, the benefit of the provisions in the Bill is that they provide a clearer statutory framework for a range of initiatives and activities that can support progress in these areas.

Potential disadvantages for public sector organisations with these commitments could arise from the interaction of provisions in the Bill for community planning and for the setting of outcomes at a national level, which may have the, presumably unintended, consequence of “planning for outcomes” at local level being constrained by the transmission of nationally-set outcomes via the Single Outcome Agreement and the Community Planning Partnership.

A public sector organisation committed to reducing inequality could find itself in difficulty as a result of the relative scale of demands arising from provisions in the bill from better-off and already-empowered communities and from those that are relatively disempowered. This again highlights the point made in relation to question 1 on the availability and nature of support to those communities that are currently dis-empowered.

It is clear that some communities are much better-placed than others to take advantage of the provisions in the Bill. Communities that are relatively advantaged in terms of income, employment, health, education and influence are also not only already in a far stronger position than others to gain control of community assets and to participate in decision making, but also in a far stronger position to take advantage of many of the bill’s key provisions. Indeed these inequalities of power and influence can be seen both as a central cause of other continuing inequalities of opportunity and outcome, and a product of them.

As a result they have a massive impact in preventing the development and use of the latent capabilities of a large section of the population.

As noted above, our view is that in this context, the issue of the availability and nature of support available to communities, and in particular those that are relatively disadvantaged, is critical for the Bill achieving its stated objectives.

Suggested changes to the Bill

We therefore welcome section 9(3) which states that each community planning partner must contribute funds, staff and other resources, as determined by the community planning partnership (CPP) with a view to improving identified local outcomes and “for the purpose of securing the participation of the community bodies mentioned in section 4(5)(a) in community planning”.

At the same time there are a number of respects in which we think it is important that this provision is added to, strengthened, and widened.

- There is currently no direct indication of how the CPP, or community planning partners, should decide on which community bodies should receive support in this way, or to what level. It may be suggested that a link with the local outcomes improvement plan will ensure that those community bodies that are active in communities that are currently least empowered secure the most benefit from this provision. However, we suggest that this is much more likely to happen if there is a specific provision that resources should be allocated in a way that addresses inequality and prioritises those communities that are currently least empowered.

- The provision in section 9(3) relates solely to securing the participation of community bodies in community planning. While this is welcome in itself, support provided on this basis is concerned with community participation viewed from the perspective of the CPP and community planning partners, rather than with enabling communities to identify and progress their own concerns, using community planning, participation requests, requests to own or manage assets and/or other methods as determined by them.

This latter type of support is ultimately far more effective in bringing about the empowerment of communities, and also in stimulating real participation in community planning that provides a dynamic for change, than support solely for “securing participation in community planning”, which inevitably starts and ends with the perspective of the core community planning partners.

We therefore suggest that section 9(3) is reframed as a duty on community planning partners to contribute funds, staff and resources to assist communities to determine their own priorities, organise themselves to achieve these and to participate in community planning, and take advantage of other provisions of the Bill, in pursuit of the goals and objectives they have identified; and to ensure that these funds, staff and resources are allocated in such a way as to maximise their impact in reducing inequalities between and within communities and in empowering those communities experiencing relative disadvantage.

- On that basis, the duties set out in the current section 9(3) in relation to participation in community planning would become duties in relation to a range of provisions in the Bill and we suggest that consideration is given to how provisions of this sort could best be incorporated into the Bill.

- The effectiveness of support provided to communities will depend crucially on the competence – the relevant skills, knowledge and understanding – of the practitioners providing it, whether as paid staff or as volunteers, and their commitment to appropriate values informing their practice. We therefore suggest the addition of a duty on community planning partners and CPPs to take steps to ensure that, in providing or securing staffing support for communities in support of the objectives of the Bill, the staff or volunteers have the appropriate competences and values, and are assisted to develop them further.
Action to assist communities

It is generally recognised that the Bill needs to be accompanied by a range of other action in order to achieve the significant change that is sought. Ensuring that the appropriate support is available to communities, and that central and other public service agencies develop the additional capabilities they need to respond to and engage with communities, are key areas in which this action is needed.

Developing the values, skills and competence to assist communities to take advantage of the Bill’s provisions

In relation to the final bullet point above, the CLD Standards Council can offer advice on how community planning partners and CPPs could best ensure that staff and volunteers have the appropriate competences and values, and are assisted to develop them further. The Standards Council’s competence framework¹, statement of values and Code of Ethics², all developed by working with the field, provide a ready-made framework for use by community planning partners and CPPs in this context.

The Standards Council’s remit, as directed by the Scottish Ministers, includes responsibility for setting out a model and framework for continuing professional development (CPD) for all involved in CLD (including qualified and unqualified staff, paid or voluntary). The CPD Strategy for CLD³, currently being refreshed, sets the direction for the development of a learning culture that could support all those involved in supporting the empowerment of communities in line with the provisions of the Bill.

The i-develop – learning for CLD platform⁴ provides a framework for practitioners to manage their own CPD. It provides a resource for paid staff and volunteers to develop their competence and effectiveness in empowering communities, and could be utilised by paid staff and volunteers supporting disadvantaged communities to make use of the provisions of the Bill.

Mobilising and co-ordinating support for communities

In order to organise, mobilise and co-ordinate support for communities to make use of the Bill’s provisions, we suggest that the Scottish Government should make clear that it expects the various lines of policy and legislation related to this to be supported and implemented in a joined-up way. National public agencies and third sector support organisations have key leadership roles in this, which to be exercised effectively require them to give up some of their own power to control in order to create the space for others to act. The remit and role of national support and umbrella organisation should be audited and refreshed to meet current and developing needs and opportunities.

In particular we suggest that the Scottish Government should emphasise that the CLD plans that each local authority is required to work with partners to prepare by September 2015 (under the provisions of the Requirements for CLD [Scotland] Regulations, 2013) should be utilised to assist development of support for communities to make use of the Bill’s provisions.

All those involved in providing this support should be encouraged to communicate with each other, to avoid duplication of effort and to collaborate with each other wherever this will be to the benefit of communities themselves. Differences of method and approach should be respected, and critically explored as a means of improving the impact of support provided in empowering communities. The Standards Council’s frameworks referred to above provide one means of developing agreed standards as a means of improving practice.

Ensuring that accessible, high quality professional education to develop the support required by communities is available

Access to professional education, in particular for volunteers involved in empowering their own communities, is a key means of developing the skills and competence needed to assist disadvantaged communities to make effective use of the Bill’s provisions. However, people from the communities that need support to take advantage of the Bill’s provisions face major barriers, including financial ones, to entering full-time further or higher education.

In a wide range of human service disciplines, the practice placement element of professional education is recognised as critical to its effectiveness. In line with this, the CLD Standards Council requires professional education programmes in CLD to include a minimum of 40% practice-based learning. This requirement restricts the amount of time that participants on programmes are available for work; whereas in a number of other professional areas practice demands are recognised in the offer of various forms of financial support, these are not available to students on CLD courses.

Given the importance of developing the skills and competences to support communities to take advantage of the Bill’s provisions within disadvantaged communities themselves, we suggest that a review of the organisation and funding of professional education in CLD is considered. Such a review would also provide the opportunity to ensure that all aspects of professional education in CLD are fit for purpose in the context of the evolving needs and aspirations of communities across Scotland.
4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

As outlined above in response to question 3, we would like to see changes in the provision currently set out in section 9(3).

5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

Assessment of equal rights

We suggest the following two issues relating to equal rights, not mentioned within the policy memorandum, should be given consideration.

1. We have highlighted throughout these comments that there are significant risks that the Bill’s provisions inadvertently increase inequalities between communities.

These are not primarily inequalities relating to the “equalities groups” considered by the Equality Impact Assessment. However, it seems likely that in some instances the members of “equalities groups” are over-represented in geographic communities that are economically and socially disadvantaged, and/or that the effects of inequality experienced by members of “equalities groups” are exacerbated by living in disadvantaged areas. These are likely to be important factors in developing realistic strategies for supporting community empowerment.

2. “Community bodies” are not invariably benign, and it is important to acknowledge that the potential always exists for particular community bodies to be controlled by one grouping within a community and used for the perceived benefit of that grouping and to the detriment of others within the same wider community. Those discriminated against in such circumstances can be members of “equalities groups”.

We suggest firstly that further consideration is given to whether any additional or amended provisions of the Bill can assist, together with existing equality and human rights legislation, in minimising risks of this nature.

Secondly, we believe that addressing inequalities issues within and between communities must be a key focus of the assistance provided to communities to take advantage of the provisions of the Bill. Addressing issues of this kind requires the work of those enabling the empowerment of communities to be informed by a strong values base, an understanding of how this values base informs day-to-day activity and a high level of competence. All of this underlines...
the points already made about the importance of developing the values, skills and competence to assist communities to take advantage of the Bill’s provisions.

Impacts on island communities
Those working to empower island communities are faced with particular challenges in relation to accessing learning opportunities to support the development of their skills and competences, including opportunities to network and share experiences with their counterparts in other areas. This should be given consideration in addressing the issues of developing the values, skills and competences for empowering communities.

Sustainable development
Support for communities informed by a strong values base, an understanding of how this values base informs day-to-day activity and a high level of competence is a critical factor in enabling communities to work effectively for the sustainable development of their area or in relation to their shared interests.

In summary, the CLDSC believes that a number of fundamental conditions need to be in place if the change required to bring about community empowerment is to happen:

- There should be a clear focus in the Bill and associated actions on how we empower communities to empower themselves.
- Disadvantaged communities need access to high-quality support in identifying their own priorities, developing strategies for achieving them, building the organisational infrastructure required and engaging with decision-makers.
- This support should be informed by a clear value base and competence framework; underpinned by professional learning opportunities focused on how to empower communities to empower themselves and accessible to people active in their own communities.
- Public agencies should reassess their skills, knowledge and capability base in relation to the challenges posed by the change required to meet the Bill’s ambitions.
- Section 9(3) of the Bill should be reframed as a duty on community planning partners to contribute to assisting communities to determine their own priorities, and to organise themselves to achieve these.
- The duties set out in the current section 9(3) in relation to participation in community planning would become duties in relation to a range of provisions in the Bill.
- The Scottish Government should make clear that support for implementation of all the policy lines directly relevant to the empowerment of communities should be co-ordinated.
• National public and third sector agencies should take an active, enabling lead role in mobilising and co-ordinating support to empower communities to empower themselves.

• A review of the organisation and funding of professional education in CLD should be considered.

• Further consideration should be given to additional or amended provisions of the Bill that would assist, alongside existing equality and human rights legislation, in minimising risks of exacerbating inequalities.

• Addressing inequalities issues within and between communities should be a key focus of the assistance provided to communities to take advantage of the provisions of the Bill.
Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

Committee’s call for evidence

The Poverty Alliance is a network of individuals and organisations across Scotland working together to combat poverty. Our membership is made up of a wide range of organisations including grassroots community groups, individuals facing poverty, voluntary organisations, statutory organisations, policy makers and academics. We now act as the national anti-poverty network in Scotland, working with voluntary organisations, policy makers and politicians at Scottish, UK and European levels.

To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

The Poverty Alliance welcomes the Community Empowerment Bill, as an organisation representing people from some of Scotland’s most disadvantaged communities it is important to us that this Bill empowers all communities and seeks to narrow inequalities. We have been working alongside Barnardo’s and Oxfam Scotland to develop proposals on how this Bill could be amended to ensure that Scotland’s most disadvantaged communities are empowered. We have submitted a joint document representing the views of the three organisations separately.

For the Poverty Alliance, the most important aspect of this Bill is around empowering Scotland’s most disadvantaged communities, and narrowing inequalities between those communities which are already empowered and those which will require more support. We would like to see this Bill prioritise Scotland’s poorest communities. There is a danger that the Bill, in its current form, will most benefit those communities which are already empowered and able to take advantage of the provisions in the Bill.

Standards for Community Engagement

We would like to see the high quality involvement of communities in local decision making become central to public bodies’ core purpose. Standards for community engagement exist currently but their implementation is varied across Scotland. We believe that the Community Empowerment Bill is the ideal opportunity to renew these and place them on a statutory footing. Placing a requirement on public bodies to adhere to a set of national standards for community engagement would be a welcome step forward for communities’ right to participate. A key part of standards should be a focus on inequality and empowering communities.

Recommendation: A new power created enabling Ministers to create statutory regulations for the engagement and empowerment of communities. Community Planning Partnerships should be required to adhere to the standards when creating local outcome improvement plans.

In order for the process to be transparent, the Poverty Alliance would like to see parliamentary review of the national outcomes at the point of them being reported on. This would allow for increased accountability of both the Scottish Government and public bodies.

Recommendation: Parliamentary review of outcomes to be added to the Bill.

Community Planning Partnerships

Community empowerment should be central to the purpose of Community Planning Partnerships. This Bill will put CPPs onto a statutory basis and so this is the ideal time to consider how we improve the functioning of community planning. The focus of CPPs needs to change so that communities are given a meaningful role in producing their public services. CPPs should have a duty requiring them to involve communities in a meaningful way in the decision making process.

Recommendation: A requirement that the local outcomes improvement plan, that each CPP must provide, is created through a participative process of community engagement.

Right to request to participate

We believe there should be a clear role for public bodies in bringing together and connecting communities, removing barriers to participation and supporting communities to take advantage of the right to request to participate.

In order to increase transparency and accountability, we would like to see a requirement for public bodies to include in their public report a view of the process from the community body.

Recommendation: A requirement for public bodies to include an opinion piece by the public body in their final report.

Participative budgeting

The Poverty Alliance believes that including participative budgeting in the Bill would help further empower communities. CPPs should be required to set aside a percentage of their annual budget to be decided on through community participation.
Local Government and Regeneration Committee

Submission Name: The Poverty Alliance  Submission Number: 75

Recommendation: That each CPP is required to set aside 1 per cent of their annual budget to be decided upon through an appropriate community participation process.

By including these recommendations, the Poverty Alliance believes the Bill could be strengthened so that it works for all communities. As the Bill exists currently, there is a danger that it will only empower those communities who are already advantaged, and further widen inequalities.

What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

It is important that this Bill is about communities and this should be kept at the centre of all decision making. All decisions should be made around what is in the best interest of the community and it is important that public bodies support communities to take advantage of the opportunities available to them. If communities are to make use of any new powers granted by the Bill they will need resources to help finance projects and support to carry out their ideas. There may also be financial costs to public bodies in supporting communities and it may be necessary to set up a fund to help communities take advantage of the proposals in the Bill.

It is important that transferring assets to a community group is not viewed as a cost cutting mechanism for public bodies, and decisions on any asset transfer should not be made based on financial reasons. The main purpose of any asset transfer must be clear community benefit. Communities’ greatest assets are their people and by including these people in decision making processes public bodies will benefit from hearing different voices and from people with different expertise. Including communities in planning services may also lead to a more cohesive relationship between public bodies and communities.

There will be some communities who already have the capacity to take advantage of the Bill but the Poverty Alliance is concerned that the Bill does not do enough to empower the most disadvantaged and disempowered communities. People living in disadvantaged communities have the same desire to see the places where they live improve, the same desire to have greater influence and indeed control over the matters which affect them and their communities. However, often the practical capacity to act on these desires may be limited, perhaps through the lack of resources, the absence of crucial social capital, or the expertise in key areas (e.g. legal or planning issues)

We are concerned that there is insufficient recognition in the Bill that not all communities are equally empowered and there is too little in the Bill to change this. As the Bill currently stands, the communities which will benefit the most are those which are already empowered. The Poverty Alliance would like to see capacity building included in the Bill to help tackle the existing inequalities between communities.

Communities experiencing the greatest poverty have many assets, but often lack financial resources, relevant skills and the time necessary to be able to take advantages of the proposals in the Bill. We have been advised by one community group who have already taken over an asset, that funding applications are one of the biggest challenges they face. They are often notified by the Local Authority about funding opportunities but are not supported in their completion. One possible suggestion is a commission to support deprived communities.

Recommendation: An additional duty on local authorities to support disadvantaged communities to take up the opportunities presented by this new Bill.

Communities need to be made aware of the opportunities available to them. Being aware of assets available for community use is a significant resource for communities. It is also important that communities have as much information as is available about these assets before they request a transfer. This includes running costs, potential rental value and maintenance costs.

Recommendation: A duty placed on public bodies to publish and maintain an asset register.

The purpose of Community Planning Partnerships needs to change to ensure that all communities are all able to come together with public agencies to co-produce their public services. The development of local outcomes improvement plans should be through a participative process of community engagement. There should be a duty on CPPs to reflect this and for them to involve citizens in local decision making and the deciding of outcomes. This must go beyond consultation and should be a genuine process of engagement.

Recommendation: A legislative requirement for CPPs to create a local outcomes improvement plan through a participative process of community engagement.

In order to ensure that all communities are able to take advantage of their right to request to participate, all communities need to be made aware of process and their rights. The Poverty Alliance would to see a duty on local authorities to advertise the right to request to participate and encourage communities to become involved. As part of this, there has to be an open, transparent and straightforward process of review. We believe that there must be a third party to protect the right of communities to participate. Communities must have the knowledge of where they can turn in the event of requests being declined.

Recommendation: The ‘Right to request to participate’ to be strengthened through a clearer arbitration and review mechanism.
Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

The Poverty Alliance has highlighted a number of issues with this Bill in our answers above and also in our joint submission with Oxfam and Barnardo’s.

To summarise, our recommendations are:

- A new power created enabling Ministers to create statutory regulations for the engagement and empowerment of communities. Community Planning Partnerships should be required to adhere to the standards when creating local outcome improvement plans.

- Parliamentary review of outcomes to be added to the Bill.

- A requirement that the local outcomes improvement plan that each CPP must provide, is created through a participative process of community engagement.

- A requirement for public bodies to include an opinion piece by the public body in their final report.

- That each CPP is required to set aside 1 per cent of their annual budget to be decided upon through an appropriate community participation process.

- An additional duty on local authorities to support disadvantaged communities to take up the opportunities presented by this new Bill.

- A duty placed on public bodies to publish and maintain an asset register.

- A legislative requirement for CPPs to create a local outcomes improvement plan through a participative process of community engagement.

- The ‘Right to request to participate’ to be strengthened through a clearer arbitration and review mechanism.

The reasons for these recommendations are given in response to previous questions.

What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the policy memorandum?

The Poverty Alliance is supportive of the explicit requirement for public bodies to consider the Equality Duty when making decisions on asset transfers and participation requests. We believe is would be appropriate for public bodies to carry out an Equality Impact Assessment when developing policies in relation to the provisions of the Bill.
Museums Galleries Scotland response to the Call for Written Evidence on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

Museums Galleries Scotland (MGS), the national development body for museums and galleries in Scotland, welcomes the opportunity to respond to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee’s call for written evidence on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

- The legislation is timely as Local Authorities are working with more community / volunteer run museums. The draft Bill provides a process for those activities which are already taking place.
- It improves community engagement and involvement in decision-making and identifying outcomes. The processes included in the Bill are supported by clear mechanisms and appropriate policy frameworks. There is a stronger voice for communities regarding service provision and the outcomes that affect them.
- The Bill should enable Local Authorities to work closely with independent community and volunteer run museums in delivering improved outcomes for the communities in which they operate. It should be of benefit for museums as they will be able to contribute to Single Outcome Agreements and the National Performance Framework through involvement with the Community Planning Partnerships.
- The Bill should ensure improved relationships between museums and communities, enabling stronger support through shared ownership and responsibility for heritage and culture.
- The Bill allows for improved transparency of process and decision making about assets management and transfer, particularly in relation to Common Good.
- Extending the legal entities that can use the community right to buy provisions to include SCIOs will be good for those museum organisations which are using this governance model and may wish to acquire land or property for their museum activities.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

- Benefits
  - The main benefit we see is that of vacant or under-utilised public buildings and land being made more use of for purposes relevant to / required by communities.
Another benefit is the clear structure, roles and responsibilities of the Community Planning Partnerships as laid out in the Bill. This will enable communities to see how they can engage with the various community planning processes. It will also help to convey that those organisations involved in the Community Planning Partnerships have a shared responsibility and accountability.

- Disadvantages
  - A current disadvantage is the lack of clarity regarding the Ministerial role in the appeals process. It is very important that we have more information about how this would work. There is a need to ensure transparency and to have an understanding of how decisions would be made.

   - The capabilities and confidence about taking advantage of the provisions in the Bill will vary both across Scotland and across different community groups. There could be a role for public sector organisations in providing support for some areas, whether this is for a geographic area or relating to a specific sector.

4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?
   - The current section relating to the Ministerial role in the appeals process does not provide sufficient information about how this element would work. There is a need to ensure transparency and for all parties to have an understanding of how decisions would be made.
   - Common good
     - Local Authority museums can request the common good register from their Local Authority and extract relevant information when required. It should be possible for museums to include this information in their Accession register and in their Content Management System.
     - In relation to disposal of common good items it might be helpful to refer to any ethical guidance from a relevant body, e.g. Museums Association disposal toolkit and the Code of Ethics. The Disposal toolkit only has to apply to accessioned collections (it represents best practice which may not be followed for non-accessioned items.)
     - Museums should have a policy on assets and asset (both tangible and intangible) transfer to be published and made available on request. See FRS IPAC policy process for Accounting for Heritage Assets: IPAS 31 and FRS 30.
   - Overall, we are content with specific provisions in the Bill.

5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?
   - We are content with the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum.
Children in Scotland is the national network organisation for the children’s sector in Scotland. We have over 400 member bodies in the public, voluntary, community and independent sectors. We are aware that several of our member organisations have responded at length and in detail to the call for evidence and we would not propose to reiterate many of the points made. In particular, the evidence submitted by Barnardo’s Scotland is both extensive and comprehensive and we generally endorse its content. There are a few additional points, however, we would like to contribute.

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities?

While we very much welcome the commitment to community empowerment embodied in the Bill, we do believe that its provisions could be made more robust. We are concerned that the level of formality and organisation required of groups before they can apply to participate may deter or disqualify less formal and ad hoc groupings, or single-issue topical campaigns. Specifically we are concerned that those in less advantaged communities and groups may find these requirements a barrier to access. We also believe it is important to provide opportunities for empowerment in settings outwith designated community planning partnership arrangements. Many people may be concerned, for example, about litter in their street, about standards in their local school, about local transport provision, about the quality of their social housing or about the accessibility of local healthcare. They may not wish to be engaged in the wider issues with which CPPs concern themselves. Community empowerment is more likely to be effective, both in terms of reach and impact, if it allows individuals and groups, formally constituted or not, to be involved in issues that affect them directly.

Similar issues apply to the matter of appropriately empowering children and young people. Communities will in the longer-term be much more effectively empowered and have meaningful influence over issues of importance to them if co-production of services becomes perceived as the norm for all citizens, whatever their age. Ensuring that systems and methods are in place to involve children and young people in contributing to the development of the services they use will build active citizenship that is likely to be sustained into adulthood.
2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

The bill will certainly have an impact on how public bodies discharge their functions. Whether these are seen as benefits or disadvantages depends on the values that underpin the organisations’ work. There is certainly potential for an increase in bureaucracy without any measureable impact on community wellbeing. Processes may be more time-consuming, particularly if dialogue with community groups is detailed, thorough and inclusive. Public services are, however, likely to be more responsive to community need, thus more likely to result in positive outcomes and potentially, to generate cost savings.

3. Do you consider that communities across Scotland have the capabilities to take advantage of the provisions in the Bill? If not, what requires to be done to the Bill, or to assist communities, to ensure that this happens?

We strongly believe that growing empowerment ‘from the ground up’ is the most effective approach to ensuring that capacity exists within communities to take advantage of the Bill’s provisions. We therefore urge that building capacity, through relevant knowledge and experience, among children and young people is given high priority. We are concerned that many individuals and groups already involved in community planning processes are not adequately representative, in terms of diversity, of the communities they seek to represent. We also believe that there are groups and individuals who are detached and disengaged from effective engagement with community structures and that they are likely also to be those who experience marginalisation in other aspects of their lives. It is should not be a case of ‘training’ such people to fit in with structures largely devised and driven by large bureaucratic bodies, but ensuring that systems are accessible, enabling and, critically, can show that community participation is not a tokenistic compliance with a statutory duty but can bring about positive change. It is, however, important that community capacity is developed and supported through an adequate level of relevant service such as Community Learning and Development, much of which provision has been eroded in recent years.

We would like to see changes that address the issues we have raised above. We would also wish to see a requirement to demonstrate the impact of community empowerment by the gathering and analysis of appropriate data. We believe that increasing the level of information and evidence available to communities on relevant issues should be increased; for example most school and hospital closures are resisted even though improved outcomes may result from a review of provision. This is vitally important when developing meaningful participatory budgeting as assumptions may be inaccurate and unreliable. It is important that participation in budgetary processes is not a ‘popularity contest’ among services but increasingly becomes an informed and informative contribution to achieving better public services.

We believe that a Child Rights Impact Assessment should be part of this process. We would also like reassurance that the degree of impact on socio-economically disadvantaged groups will be fully considered.
The Historic Houses Association Scotland (HHAS) represents individually owned historic castles, houses and gardens throughout Scotland; many regularly open to the public. Historic houses are not only not an expense which the public purse has to pay, but are in fact net contributors to the Scottish economy. Collectively member properties make a major contribution towards employment in Scotland, both in terms of the rural and national economy. The bulk of Scotland’s built heritage is in independent ownership which means that its future stewardship is secured for the benefit of Scotland and the Scottish people at little or no public expense. We recognise the importance of preserving these assets and engage with both the Scottish and UK Governments and local communities across Scotland.

We have focussed our evidence on the parts of greatest relevance to our areas of primary responsibility. However, it is important to note given the integrated nature of historic houses with adjacent related enterprises such as farming or holiday lettings, that any reforms in respect of “abandoned and neglected” land will very probably impact upon heritage properties too. Frequently, historic houses are dependent upon the productivity of the land and assets around the building itself as a support for the historic house and separation of the different components or any cherry-picking of land would potentially have a detrimental impact upon the house.

We welcome the opportunity to provide evidence since our members have wide-ranging interests in their local communities and many are already working to deliver the aims of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (“the Bill”).

General Comments

HHAS is supportive of the principles of the Bill and the extension of community right to buy on the current willing seller basis to the whole of Scotland, but it is important that the Bill provides a framework through which groups, individuals and businesses are empowered to deliver locally. We fully recognise that successful community empowerment results from local enthusiasm leading to local initiatives, local decision-making and local processes, and wish to ensure that all parts of the community are truly empowered. Voluntary agreement has to be the essence of genuine community empowerment, and there are many benefits to be gained through collaboration and partnership. It is noticeable that much land which has been transferred into community ownership, has been undertaken without recourse to the provisions of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003. It is imperative that lack of use of the powers is not seen as a failure of the community ownership agenda. The lack of information on land and property assets transferred to the community without recourse to the legislation must be addressed.

The apparent focus on ownership in the Bill does not of itself equate to “empowerment”. There are many ways in which a community can become empowered. As Stuart Hashagen, senior Community Development Adviser at the Scottish Community Development Centre said in evidence to your Committee on 12 March 2014, “My point is that not every community wants to take over buildings, land and assets.” Specifically we have concerns regarding the provisions in relation to abandoned and neglected land which we have addressed below.

Local interests are important and we do not underestimate the quality of expertise available in many local communities, but there is also significant knowledge and expert advice in national civil society outwith central and local government.

Generally, it will be vital for the measures in the Bill to strike the correct balance between the policy objective of strengthening the role of communities in influencing the stewardship of local property assets, on the one hand; and the right for owners of historic properties for instance to be in a position to progress their own long-term asset management objectives on the other.

Part 2 - Community Planning

HHAS is broadly supportive of clauses 4 to 13 of the Bill in relation to Community Planning. We are of the view that effective community planning is central to helping enable more people across Scotland have a stake in the ownership, governance, use and management of land. Therefore we welcome the alignment with national outcomes at Clause 4(3), having previously called for further work to align national policy initiatives with local planning. The sentiment in the Policy Memorandum in terms of maximising involvement from all partners, which obviously needs to include the private, independent and third sectors, is also encouraging. A strategic joined-up approach is vital and we would have welcomed specific reference to Community Councils in Schedule 1 to the Bill. Overall, it needs to be borne in mind that legislation alone will not establish successful community planning which is dependent upon the relationships between and culture of, organisations. We would like a clear commitment from the Scottish Government that significant activity will be undertaken in addition to the legislation to improve the community planning process.

Part 4 - Community Right to Buy Procedure

HHAS is keen to ensure that the community right to buy process is as straightforward and equitable as possible for both parties, community and owner. It is in neither party’s interest for a community acquisition to be protracted or for there to be any uncertainty.

Clause 33 introduces a requirement for an owner to inform Ministers within 28 days of an exempt transfer being made of this taking place. We consider this to be at odds with the fact the transfer is “exempt”. Further, Registers of Scotland maintain both the Land and Sasine Property Registers as well as the Register of Community Interests in Land and at present it is sufficient to include a declaration in the disposition, detailing the exemption which is being relied upon. It would therefore appear to be most straightforward for there to be internal communication within Registers of Scotland as opposed to placing an additional unnecessary burden on the owner to notify.

Under the current legislation there is certainty regarding the outcome of the ballot result and we are therefore concerned that clause 39 of the Bill removes this certainty, reducing the worth of the ballot and increasing the time period for determination. A ballot is the best and fairest way to measure support as there requires to be transparency, clarity and a tangible outcome. The Post Legislative Scrutiny Report of the 2003 Act published in September 2010 noted, “there was strong support among Community Bodies for the principle of holding a ballot, and most (though not all) supported some level of minimum turnout requirement. One interviewee noted that the demonstration of community support achieved through conducting a rigorous ballot was very useful to their organisation because —no-one can say that the community don’t support what we’re doing.”

In terms of extenuating circumstances which may be taken into account we would be keen to guard against spurious claims and specifically would be interested to know if there is any standard practice or guidance from the Electoral Commission or other impartial body in relation to elections generally which should be reviewed if such a measure is to be adopted. It is entirely proper that circumstances such as adverse weather should be accounted for.

We appreciate that the Financial Memorandum suggests expenditure involved in running the ballot will not be onerous, but this is predicated on a certain restricted usage of the measures in the Bill. In our view, as the ballot is at the initiation of the community body it should be for the community body to meet the expenses and not the public purse as proposed in clause 37 of the Bill.

Late applications were intended to be the exception rather than the rule, but now account for around one-third of community right-to-buy applications. The Bill further relaxes the criteria in terms of Clause 31. In reality if the process is working properly we believe that this should reduce the need for late applications. Community right to buy in our view is intended to be a proactive as opposed to reactive tool and the legitimacy of the process is undermined where late applications become almost standard.

One suggestion which may improve the late application procedure would be if a landowner could obtain exemption from a late application by giving forward guidance of say, six months, of a potential sale of land by advertisement in a local newspaper, giving the community body say, 4 months, to organise itself and register an interest in that land, failing which no late application would be entertained by Ministers.

One part of the existing process where there has been undue delay in consideration of applications to date is in relation to the discretion which Ministers currently have and there is no recognition in the drafting of the Bill or accompanying documentation of the potential role of Scottish Ministers delaying determination of matters, whether that be political or resource-led. Ultimately it should not be forgotten that community right to buy involves three parties, not just the landowner and community body, but also the Minister as well. The Final Report published in September 2010 on the Post-Legislative Scrutiny of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 by Calum MacLeod and others flagged this issue of Ministerial discretion. We would welcome the introduction of a monitoring system into delays in this part of the community right to buy process.

Clause 44 of the Bill means that a landowner who withdraws from a sale to a community body following Ministers appointing the valuer, will be at risk of having to pay to the Ministers, at their discretion, any expense the Ministers have incurred. This provision is a cause for concern, given that under the Community Right to Buy, an owner has the right to withdraw his land from a sale to the community body, after the right to buy has been activated, provided the appropriate notification has been given. We would look for comfort that Clause 44 is not used to arbitrarily penalise a landowner who for a variety of reasons decides not to proceed to sell land, as is his right. A landowner may decide not to proceed for a number of valid reasons, such as where land is owned in Trust, not all of the trustees being made aware of the sale, where family or financial circumstances of the landowner change. Further clarification of the criteria which would form the basis for the Minister’s decision on expenses is required. A landowner must remain free to deal with their land as they see fit and having the threat of recovery of expenses against the landowner could adversely affect them.

Abandoned and Neglected Land

HHAS members similar to others in their respective communities will be supportive of moves to deal with derelict, vacant and untidy ground which impacts on the local amenity and environment. However, we have serious concerns about the current drafting of clause 48 of the Bill in relation to “Abandoned and neglected land”. If the aim of this section is genuinely to stop community blight and allow for productive use of the land as the Policy Memorandum appears to indicate, then this is not realised in the current drafting of the Bill. We are concerned that the provisions will in fact give succour to those seeking to thwart development or other management plans.

It was noticeable that of the seventy-five questions in the second consultation document only two of those concerned this absolute right to buy provision on neglected and abandoned land and there was no reference to it in the draft Bill which accompanied the consultation. The responses to those questions by consultees across various sectors expressed concerns about how this proposal could be adequately legislated for and it is extremely disappointing that definitions have not been developed by the Scottish Government since that second consultation, given the passage of one whole year. It will not be clear at all how this will work in practice until regulations are published and even then it will depend upon the drafting of those regulations which will enjoy less thorough scrutiny than primary legislation. While we recognise there is a purpose for secondary legislation where detailed procedural matters require to be fleshed out, in this instance the critical matter of definition is being left to secondary regulations.

In our view, an owner is entitled to know, prior to the Bill becoming law, what is meant by the separate terms of “abandoned” and “neglected”. As the Bill is currently worded neither owner nor community body will have certainty on the circumstances in which these provisions could be used. We would suggest that is not appropriate to deal with the transfer of fundamental property rights through secondary legislation. The definitions of “abandoned and neglected” need to be set out in the Act, given this is such a major issue and introducing compulsory acquisition.
The clause heading in the Bill refers to “Abandoned and Neglected” land which we assume refers to the fact that both areas are to be dealt with in that clause, since the part which is to be inserted in the Act refers to “abandoned or neglected”. Clarity is required not only in terms of definition of both, but also that these are being considered exclusively in that the land need only meet the tests of one definition. We also question whether consideration has been given to this part of the Act relating to urban areas alone, rather than coverage being for the whole of Scotland? If we are looking to address those small parcels of land which prevent sustainable development or cause blight then should we restrict use to settlements over a certain population?

We are unclear as to the reference to “wholly or mainly” at 97C(1). The extent of the landholding to be considered requires to be thoroughly scrutinised in forming any legislation in this area. Indeed, 97C(3)(a) requires further consideration in terms of the definition of “an individual’s home” and also the extent to which the location of stables, log sheds and other outbuildings are considered. We also have concerns regarding 97C(3)(f) which allows for the exclusion of prescribed land, particularly if this includes large charities.

While we recognise abandonment as a concept in terms of a leasehold interest, we are not clear how title to a property can be abandoned. The Court of Session only last year on appeal ruled in relation to Scottish Coal Company that Scottish liquidators were unable to abandon land owned by an insolvent as a means of avoiding onerous duties relating to the land. Indeed we are also unclear how land can be “mainly abandoned”. This does not appear to be a legally competent term.

In terms of the process set out in the Bill, we believe that deprivation of ownership is not the appropriate final outcome and it is questionable in ECHR terms whether this is in fact a proportionate response. Where there is “abandoned and neglected” land, the key issue the Bill requires to address is land use, not ownership. This is not realised by 97H(c) which solely relates the criteria for consent to ownership. In contrast the Housing (Scotland) Act 2006 addressed problems of condition and quality in private sector housing with Housing Renewal Areas very much focused on addressing use.

For example, owners of land under agricultural tenancies may have very limited control over the utilisation of the leased land and short of going through time-consuming and potentially costly court processes may be unable to rectify this. It would seem inequitable for land to be compulsorily acquired, where the owner is not actually responsible for the perceived absence of activity or poor management.

Some redevelopment projects can take a considerable period of time and the sense that nothing is being done with the land is not the reality. The various flora and fauna that may be existing in an “overgrown” site may have a value all of their own. This must be carefully examined. In a rural context a scheme to return land to wild land status may appear neglectful to some in a community, but in fact the absence of active management is not necessarily a sign of either “abandonment” or “neglect”. Land may be delivering wider public good in the form of ecosystem services despite not being actively managed. Active management of itself can therefore not be properly used as a term in defining abandonment and neglect. Biodiversity, carbon capture, recreation and cultural value may all be components of different sites and the Bill as drafted does not take into account such circumstances, despite page 19 of the consultation document stating “Land which is intended for recognised conservation purposes would not be considered to be neglected or abandoned”, the Bill as drafted does not reflect that.

Under the provisions there is a risk that land which is lying fallow as a result of sound farming practice or land which cannot currently be developed for justifiable commercial reasons or land subject to a conservation agreement to reduce sheep grazing would be threatened. Rather than empowering a community, this provision as it stands could lead to conflict in a community.

There is in the present drafting no clear opportunity afforded to the owner to counter suggestions of abandonment or neglect. The only provision available is clause 97G(9) whereby Ministers may invite views in writing on the application by the owner and the community body thereafter has another opportunity to address those points, without further input from the owner of the land. This would seem to be inequitable.

In tackling land abandonment, the reasons behind this, not necessarily related to statute should be better explored. These can include environmental such as a decrease in soil fertility; socio-political, for example rural depopulation; or economic, market globalisation. Whether abandonment poses a threat or an opportunity may depend on a whole variety of factors. The Final Report of the Land Reform Review Group highlighted “long-term urban land vacancy and dereliction” and we feel that the focus ought to be on urban renewal where there are recognised problems.

One area of concern we have is that the abandoned or neglected ground might give the appearance of that owing to a blight such as ransom/lack of access, which any community body purchasing would only inherit and be equally incapable of defeating – unless it was envisaged that the Government would use compulsory powers to remove the blight. We would sincerely hope that Ministers are not following that arbitrary route which we believe would be discriminatory.

We understand from the proposed section 97H that Ministers are to be satisfied that if ownership was to remain with the existing owner, that would be inconsistent with furthering the achievement of sustainable development in relation to the land and conversely that the community body’s exercise of the right must be compatible with the achievement of sustainable development in relation to the land. HHAS would contend that sustainable development is development which, when completed, can be seen to have been compatible with the natural and historic environment in which it is situated; with the people who use it or benefit from it; and which contributes not only to the local economy but also to the costs of its future maintenance.

We are not clear in terms of the proposed clause 97D why the community body for this part of the Act effectively requires to be a company limited by guarantee and suggest that there is parity with the new provisions for normal community right to buy.

In summary, we support the aims of this section but do not believe that the mechanism is the appropriate tool.
HHAS welcomes clauses 63 to 67 of the Bill in relation to the common good. In our consultation responses, we supported the establishment and maintenance of a publicly accessible common good register following clarification of the assets which form part of the common good. The Bill rightly focuses on this area and we do not have any further comments at this stage.

Part 8 – Non-Domestic Rates

HHAS is encouraged by the fact that while clause 94 provides powers to local authorities to create localised relief schemes, the local authority must have regard to their council taxpayers’ interests and we appreciate in specific instances like flooding, such a power may well be worthwhile. However, the potential and viability of such schemes is not yet known and we may wish this part to be re-visited if there are adverse consequences for private sector businesses. In particular local authorities will require to be cognisant of ECHR and Competition Act rules in relation to this provision. We would oppose any relief scheme which arbitrarily gives a market advantage to one particular type of ownership or governance structure and we could perceive difficulties arising for instance in the rural sphere where a community-owned shop was party to relief, which was not available to an adjacent privately family owned historic house shop paying full rates. It may be helpful if your Committee were to take soundings as to how similar provisions in the Localism Act 2011 work.

We would be happy to provide further detail on any of the issues raised in our written evidence.
Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill
Local Government and Regeneration Committee Call for Evidence Response from Voluntary Action Scotland
4th September 2014

About VAS

Voluntary Action Scotland (VAS) is the umbrella body for Scotland’s network of 32 Third Sector Interfaces (TSIs). We work with TSIs (unitary agencies and partnerships of Councils for Voluntary Services, Volunteer Centres and Social Enterprise Networks) around three keys themes; advocating on their behalf, supporting practice development and co-ordinating with them to help deliver stronger and more resilient communities. An important aspect of the role of VAS is to better inform the Scottish Parliament, Scottish Government and the statutory sector of the challenges and opportunities TSIs, the local third sector and local communities face. We aim to work with stakeholders to ensure that TSIs can play their role in supporting communities and delivering a consistent and valued impact across Scotland.

Introduction

VAS welcomes the opportunity to provide evidence on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. We see potential within this Bill and believe that if amended appropriately it can have a beneficial effect on the communities our members work with on a day to day basis. At the core of our response is the theme of co-production and co-design, this thread runs throughout our response and is central to empowering communities. We believe that the third sector and TSIs in particular have an important role to play in the successful implementation of this Bill.

As a network organisation we have consulted widely with our members when producing our response, although some points will vary between members. As such we found the most productive way to gather members views was by inviting comment on each section of the Bill, our response reflects this format.

Overall, we do not believe this Bill on its own will produce the empowered communities that we wish to see. However, if taken as part of a wider public service reform agenda and coupled with increased capacity building we believe it provides a useful stepping stone on the journey to real community empowerment. Crucial in achieving this is a culture change within public bodies that moves from a ‘top down model’ of service design and delivery to a ‘bottom-up’ community led model. We acknowledge that legislative provisions can only achieve so much in this regard, they can however provide the impetus to public bodies to move towards more collaborative ways of working.

We believe a culture within the public sector that works closely with local communities in service design and delivery will be hugely beneficial for the public bodies involved and crucially advantageous for the individuals within our society. It will lead to greater community buy-in and services which are more reflective of the true needs of the community.
The areas we have focussed on within the Bill are Part 1 – National Outcomes, Part 2 – Community Planning, Part 3 – Participation Requests, and Part 5 – Asset Transfer Requests.

Provisions within the Bill

VAS has made a number of recommendations on provisions within the Bill. These have been broken down by section:

Part 1 – National Outcomes

VAS supports putting the setting of national outcomes into primary legislation and therefore supports the Scottish Government in this regard. However, we believe this section needs to be strengthened further to ensure that meaningful consultation is undertaken on the outcomes with a broad range of stakeholders, allowing for civic society and communities to voice their opinion and help set the outcomes. This will help empower communities rather than the process being driven and set by the centre. In order for a participatory approach to be successful the process for setting national outcomes needs to be simple and done in plain English that people in communities can relate to. Throughout this response we are calling for the National Standards for Community Engagement to be adopted in this regard to act as a code of conduct for engagement, albeit an updated list of standards that has co-production embedded within them.

We would also advocate for Parliamentary review of the outcomes at the point of them being reported on. This would allow for greater scrutiny and transparency and would help hold the Scottish Government and public bodies to account for achieving the outcomes. Finally, we consider the wording of ‘having regard for’ the outcomes when carrying out functions to be not assertive enough at present and would welcome stronger language being used.

Part 2 – Community Planning

Overall, VAS is seeking two key changes in the Government’s approach. Firstly we believe the outcomes for CPPs must include tackling inequalities in outcomes and secondly that legislation must ensure that community involvement is not confused with third sector involvement but that both are understood and specified.

VAS argued in our response to the consultation on the draft Bill that in order for community planning to be effective it must undergo significant reforms, making it a community led, collaborative, budget sharing, bottom-up process. We are therefore concerned about the limited progress that has been made in the current iteration of the legislation.

The reforms needed in community planning extend far beyond this Bill, however, we do believe it is necessary to make changes to the Bill at present in order to facilitate these longer term reforms. Therefore there are a number of additions and amendments that we believe would improve the Community Planning section of the Bill:

Resourcing\(^1\) released in September 2013 which states: “Making the most of the total resources available locally means ensuring that the Third Sector Interface is a full community planning partner and drawing on the huge commitment of all those, including volunteers, who work to improve communities.”. VAS is therefore keen to ensure legislation recognises the role of the third sector in community planning via the support of Third Sector Interfaces (TSIs), this role is not currently recognised or alluded to within the Bill. We acknowledge that ‘community bodies’ have been mentioned, and welcome this development, but are unclear as to what this refers to. Regardless of its definition we would advocate for clarity in guidance of the role of Third Sector Interfaces (TSI) in connecting and developing the third sector to community planning: bringing the voice and assets of the third sector to the table. This would ensure clarity, responsibility and accountability for the TSI.

The definition given in Section 4(8) does not seem to encompass the unique role TSIs play in our communities, connecting and enabling voices and assets from the third sector and bringing these to the community planning table. Whilst we do not wish to see duties placed upon Third Sector Interfaces, as they are not statutory bodies, we believe that in order to ensure they are a mandatory member of CPPs it is vital that there is a mechanism within the Bill for them to be written into guidance, perhaps by including reference to an advocate for the local third sector on the face of the Bill, this in turn would be described in guidance as the Third Sector Interface. If the Scottish Government fully believes in creating a culture change in the way resources are managed and services designed and delivered it needs to provide parity of esteem to TSIs as a voice for the local third sector. Community Planning should be about harnessing the totality of a localities assets and using them effectively to improve person centred, co-produced, outcomes, this is not possible without the inclusion and recognition of the third sector. We believe it is possible to write an advocate for the third sector into legislation whilst excluding them from certain duties placed upon statutory partners. VAS will suggest amendments to this effect.

- In order to secure the input from community bodies that is necessary to inform community planning there needs to be a strong community capacity building element, however, this does not appear to be present in the current iteration of the Bill. The duty on Community Planning Partners should extend to beyond merely securing input from community bodies to pro-actively developing the capacity for community bodies to exist and develop their knowledge in order to contribute to the community planning process. There needs to be an acknowledgement of the role the TSI plays in third sector engagement, involvement and capacity building. It would be possible to amend 8.1(b) to include a responsibility on statutory partners to provide adequate resourcing of community and third sector involvement. There should also be an onus on community planning partners to produce materials at CPP level in an accessible and timely manner to allow smaller organisations the opportunity to process and prepare their response in order for them to contribute fully to the CPP process. Further to this a mechanism needs to be introduced to allow for a right to appeal should a community bodies application to participate in a CPP be rejected.

- The current wording around involvement of community bodies is too ambiguous, stating that the CPP must ‘make all reasonable efforts to secure participation of such community bodies in community planning’ and “consider which community bodies are likely to be able to contribute to community planning”. The language still leans towards top-down involvement rather than bottom-up processes, involvement is on the terms of the statutory agencies, at the very least we would be advocating guidance on the Bill once enacted to define more clearly what constitutes ‘reasonable effort’. Important in this is that legislation should outline that the CPP must ensure demonstrable community involvement (beyond community bodies solely) in the development and scrutiny of CPP progress against outcomes. Third Sector involvement in this regard should be included independent of community bodies, third sector and community bodies are not the same thing and therefore the role of both, and needs to engage both, needs to be stipulated individually in relation to section 4.5 and section 5.3. The use of mechanisms such as participatory budgeting and citizen’s juries are two methods by which the CPP could demonstrate community involvement, VAS would encourage the committee and Scottish Government to consider how these approaches could be incorporated into guidance.

- The Bill does not make it clear whether invited community bodies will be considered as full CPP members or if they are just there on a consultative basis. If only on a consultative how do they guarantee that their views have an influence on the CPP?

- A key element of local outcome improvement plans (5), in our view, is demonstrating how that outcome will help tackle inequalities. Therefore, we would argue that the Bill should make it mandatory for local outcome improvement plans to outline how inequalities in an outcome will be tackled (5.2(b)). Further to this, we believe it would be beneficial for outcome improvement plans to be able to demonstrate the involvement of the community and third sector in that locality (5.3) rather than just outlining who to consult.

The VAS vision for community planning extends beyond what can be accomplished through this Bill and we acknowledge that there will be challenges in achieving this vision, particularly around a culture change in sharing resources and co-producing outcomes. We hope this Bill can be a step in the right direction and will continue to call for a much improved, community focused, version of community planning.

VAS welcomes the inclusion of participation requests in the Bill and believes it is a move in the right direction in terms of communities having a say in the design and delivery of public services. We would emphasise the need for participation requests to be a simple process to ensure high levels of participation, key to this is the community capacity building element we proposed in the community planning to section that will help secure participation from a wide cross-section of society. The third sector has significant knowledge and expertise to bring to the table and can help significantly improve outcomes, however, the system must be simple enough that it does not overstretch their current capacity and resources as this may detract from their current role. The onus must be placed upon statutory bodies to actively pursue and resource the input from relevant community and third sector organisations in order to improve outcomes for all society. We welcome the removal of the need for community bodies to provide evidence of how their inclusion in an outcome improvement process would be beneficial, as was written into the draft Bill.
There are certain elements in this part that we believe could be strengthened further. Section 14 lists criteria describing a community-controlled body, we have concerns this is overly prescriptive and that a body having a written constitution would suffice in the majority of cases. Added to this is the lack of an appeal process should the public service authority reject the participation request. This leads to a lack of transparency and accountability and goes against the general principles of the Bill. We would also like to see a duty on public service authorities to have to publicise the existence of the participation request mechanism and encourage and support community bodies to become actively engaged.

Consideration must be given to the role of ‘arm’s length organisations’ (ALEOs) and their potential role in participation requests and throughout the Bill. We are currently unclear of their potential role and are keen to ensure any role they do have is not to the detriment of the communities and local third sectors potential impact.

Again, this section would benefit from the adoption of an updated set of National Standards for Community Engagement in primary legislation. This is very much in line with the spirit of the Bill.

Part 5 – Asset Transfer Requests

A number of public bodies are already involved in schemes which work towards transferring assets from the public body to community bodies. This Bill looks to extend this further, placing this approach into legislation and opening to the whole of Scotland. It gives the initiative to communities to identify property they are interested in and places a duty to agree to the request unless they can show reasonable grounds for refusal.

VAS welcomes this approach as it extends rights and potentially releases much needed assets to communities. The principles are therefore sound but could still be refined further. VAS believes an asset register should be collated by statutory bodies and made readily available to the public, creating a transparent asset transfer system, along with a duty to publicise when a transfer request has been made. This should be coupled with a transparent approach to the current state of assets and whether they are in a suitable condition to be transferred to community organisations. Clarification also needs to be given over the process whereby more than one community body initiates an asset transfer request.

Finally, one area has already reported the transfer of local authority assets to an arm’s length organisation on a significant scale. We have concerns that in a situation where a public body wishes to protect property and withhold it from possible asset transfer that they may also be inclined to place these assets in an arm’s length organisation or trust and therefore exclude it from this piece of legislation. This is clearly not in the spirit of the Bill and does nothing to empower communities, therefore we are calling for clarification on the position of assets that were previously controlled by a public body but have been voluntarily transferred to an arm’s length organisation.
Please note that our response is limited to Points 1 and 4 as we, as a Community Council, consider these points most relevant to 'empowerment' in our local community of Linlithgow and Linlithgow Bridge.

Point 1: To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

We consider that the Community Empowerment Bill is built on the wrong premise and will not empower communities in any meaningful sense. As written, the Bill could in many respects be misinterpreted by some as “the Entrenchment of Central Government Control Bill”. It does next to nothing to advance the idea of subsidiarity at the local level.

Paragraph 191 of the Consultation to the Community Empowerment Bill states: “We also recognise that councils are the level of government closest to the citizen.” This is currently the situation - local authorities, albeit the largest and most remote in Europe, are indeed the level of government closest to the citizen. As stated forcibly by COSLA in its recent final report, Commission on Strengthening Local Democracy, this is not tenable for a modern state. Our own 'local' authority of West Lothian is much too large to cater, effectively and sensitively, for the different needs and aspirations of communities as diverse as our town of Linlithgow, ex mining towns like Uphall, Broxburn and Armadale and the burgeoning new town of Livingston. Of course, the situation is even worse in some of the larger councils, Highland Council covering an area larger than Belgium and a city like Glasgow having many times the population.

Example 1: Housing

There has been no social housing built in Linlithgow for nearly 40 years since the Town Council was abolished in 1975; indeed some council houses have been demolished and not replaced, despite a ten-year waiting list. A local council would be much more aware of the needs of the whole community – in particular the need to retain young people in employment in the town for the long term.
economic health of the community. This clearly demonstrates disconnection between community and government.

Example 2: Planning

A recent planning application on the town's outskirts for the construction of 600 houses, supermarket and related development led to over 1,000 individual written objections submitted by local residents who were desperately worried that a decision on this project, to be taken by 33 West Lothian councillors of whom only 3 represent the Linlithgow ward, would be taken contrary to the likely recommendations of the planning officers and without proper regard to the needs of the community. There had been previous insensitive decisions which had caused concern. Such concerns are widespread throughout the country because the planning system is insufficiently ‘local’ in its democratic application.

Example 3: Linlithgow & Linlithgow Bridge Town Management Group

This body has representation from local groups, councillors and officers with a view to the implementation of town enhancement projects. However laudable are its aims, there appears to be little imperative on the part of West Lothian Council and its staff to implement decisions made by the group. Community input has frequently been ignored, thereby stifling the enthusiasm, energy and commitment of the true local community.

The Bill proposes that Community Planning Partnerships will take over the role of the local council in managing relations with the community – but it is near impossible to find anything in the Bill likely to produce that outcome. Community Planning Partnerships are no closer to communities than are Councils – and, judging by the proposals in the Bill, are never likely to be.

Nothing in the Bill indicates that communities will be empowered to undertake work on their own initiative; nor is any local authority likely to delegate any powers to local communities, whether within the scope of existing local organisations such as Community Councils or through any other lower tier of local government. This is confirmed in West Lothian where the recently revised Scheme Review for Community Councils rejects community councils taking action on their own behalf.

The extra powers that the Bill will give to Community Planning Partnerships will further tighten the rein that the Scottish Government has over the scope and flexibility of public services. Witness the centralisation of the Scottish Police Service – it should be evident that the policing of the large cities is very different from that from highland rural areas.

Point 4: Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

The specific provisions for extending Community Right to Buy, Asset Transfer and Common Good Property look appropriate. However the provisions for National Outcomes, Community Planning and Participation Requests look to represent increased central government control through the strengthening of the Community Planning Partnerships: the latter in particular are formal organizations, the centrally-based staff of which, at least currently, have little connection with, empathy for, or knowledge of, local communities. In this respect we are not content.

As stated with reference to Point 1, the Bill makes no provision for further local democracy – for communities to decide and implement the priorities for their own areas. These will continue to be exercised by the existing ‘local’ authorities and their Community Planning Partnerships. In order that the local democratic deficit be addressed, we would like to see a provision for local communities to apply by petition to the Scottish Government for delegation of powers to local town or parish councils.

In this context, we refer to paragraph 12 of the Policy Memorandum:

Democratic Engagement
12. Local government and other public service providers increasingly use a range of community engagement and participatory activities to seek views on their service delivery. This recognises that representative democracy needs to be complemented by other ways in which people can express their views and influence decisions which affect them. Such activities can in turn inspire increased engagement with local and national government. When people are actively engaged in tackling issues in their communities, have direct contact with elected representatives and feel that they can influence decisions, they are more likely to become involved in the electoral process themselves, whether at Community Council, local authority or national level. This enhances the relationship between elected members and the communities they represent and can lead to better-informed decision making all round.

This paragraph is laudable but it would be so much more laudable if citizens were able to be responsible for managing and prioritising, through their own democratically elected bodies, what public services they need for the flourishing of their own communities.

Example 4: Party at the Palace
This was a ‘first’ for Linlithgow, a hugely popular event on Linlithgow Peel, organised from within the community, featuring high profile bands and performers. Welcomed by all across the town, not least local businesses and employers, its status as a repeat annual event has been thrown into doubt because of the attitude of West Lothian Council – not only did it not make a positive contribution but it actually threw up barriers and obstacles to seriously hinder the organisers.

Example 5: Burgh Beautiful Linlithgow
After winning the ‘Small Town’ category in the 2013 Beautiful Scotland awards, Linlithgow once again this year was invited to take part in the premier competition – Britain in Bloom. Although this initiative is largely driven and funded by the local community members, wholehearted council support might have been expected towards the Britain in Bloom entry, especially given that success in this prestigious event has the potential to promote Linlithgow as a visitor attraction across the UK. Although some welcome help was in fact provided, there was a general corporate unwillingness to engage on the part of the council which led to extra work for volunteers and certain works being carried out too late for the benefit of the judges.

Example 6: Car parking in Linlithgow
A major irritant in Linlithgow is ‘parking’ – recently parking attendants were dispensed with and the problem of irresponsible parking was transferred to the police – but the police have no resources to tackle the problem. If Linlithgow had its own local council it could decide to provide funds for reinstating a parking attendant. Additionally, one or more central car parks could be run by the town for the town, proceeds being used to fund a traffic warden rather than being exported out of the community to the benefit of a remote private company.

Example 7: Heritage-based Tourism
West Lothian’s Single Outcome Agreement is targets a 16% increase in visitor numbers for its four key visitor attractions over the next four years - how much more appropriate would it be for Linlithgow itself, in liaison with Historic Scotland, establish its own figures and embrace the whole town to ensure that these figures are met.

Example 8: Heritage-based Charrette
Over the past couple of years, members of various community groups have been working with Historic Scotland to arrange a charrette to consider how best to capitalise on Linlithgow’s heritage, not least Linlithgow Palace, but also all the other heritage aspects of the town. Funding for the charrette was agreed in principle, subject to the presence of selected officers of West Lothian Council at the event. The Council refused to participate and as a result the opportunity was lost – sadly another example of remote disinterested, ‘local’ government failing to co-operate with active community members and losing an important opportunity for the development of tourism in the town.

End-Notes

Community Planning Partnerships
Community Planning Partnerships were introduced in 2003. The contributors to this submission have been engaged in community activities as members of Linlithgow Civic Trust, Burgh Beautiful Linlithgow, Linlithgow Business Association, Linlithgow Union Canal Society, Linlithgow Community Development Trust, Linlithgow Victoria Hall Trust and Linlithgow’s Community Magazine, as well as Linlithgow & Linlithgow Bridge Community Council – collectively a, very wide experience of working in the community. During these 11 years, through all these activities, we have never once heard of, or been contacted by, or had any form of communication from, even a single known member of the ‘Community Planning Partnership’, the only exception possibly being grant advice on one occasion. Nor does there appear to be any provision in the proposed Bill to remedy that deficiency with a view to establishing a real, live working connection between the local community and government.
COSLA Report

In our view, the recent final report of COSLA’s Commission on Local Democracy is founded on acceptance of the single most important concept of true community empowerment, and that is that there must be a ‘bottom up’ approach to the deployment of power in local communities. As stated above, the local communities should have their own powers to act over a specified range of services and activities within their own community. This is not revolutionary, it is the norm elsewhere in Europe and should be a central theme of the Community Empowerment Bill.

With reference to the contents of the COSLA Report when compared to the contents of the Bill, we find it difficult to understand why the claim is made that the two are working closely together, along with the Improvement Service, when the contents of the Bill and the COSLA Report are poles apart in terms of the way they address the issue of community empowerment. COSLA is radical in addressing the root of the problem, the Bill is at best superficial and, give or take some minor changes to property rights, amounts to little more than “steady as she goes”.

Unfortunately we were not aware of the Inquiry into the Flexibility and Autonomy of Local Government, but note now that no community representatives seem to have responded to the call for evidence, while many councils have. We would therefore assume that community councils were not invited to offer evidence – our community council is certainly not aware of an invitation – which at face value seems odd as it is the community that is on the receiving end of whatever powers ‘local’ government currently has. Interesting points could have been made under the first and second inquiry points at least.

‘ “Local” Government should get out of the way’

Based on our experience of trying to get things done in Linlithgow, and what we have learned by listening to others in similar circumstances throughout Scotland, we would wholeheartedly agree with the above recommendation made in the COSLA Report referred to above, and identified in the Sir John Elvidge/Carnegie UK Report ‘A Route Map to an Enabling State’ as the number one step required to begin a process of community regeneration.

We have noted above several, cumulatively significant, examples in our town of how a ‘bottom up’ administrative and democratic approach would more sensitively meet the needs of our local community – an approach which is needed throughout Scotland. In addition, it would combat the current demoralisation of willing community activists and encourage creativity and innovation, to the great benefit of all concerned. Devolution of power to more truly local councils (of whatever nomenclature) is urgently required.

Community empowerment (Scotland) policy memorandum.

Fossoway and District Community Council generally welcomes the tone and thrust of the memorandum.

Community Planning
How are local communities involved? There is no mention of their representation it is only public service providers.

Community Organisations
The principle of involvement is welcomed but there has to be a means by which the service provider is judged on their involvement. At present Perth and Kinross Council do not listen to the Community Councils in the Kinross-shire area, although it preaches involvement. It does not provide support for the Community Councils in the manner recommended by the Scottish Government. i.e. it does not provide support services, it charges for meeting places, and pays a very low administration grant. The Community Council wishes to work in partnership with Perth and Kinross Council and not be ignored. The Community Council is in agreement regarding the taking over of public buildings. In particular those which have been donated by benefactors such as Andrew Carnegie.

Sincerely

The National Trust for Scotland – Response to call for evidence by the Local Government and Regeneration Committee on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

We refer you to our previous submission on this topic, much of which remains relevant. We have chosen to emphasise key points, but would be extremely happy to expand on these.

To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer.

Definition of community

PAN3/2010 notes:

“"Defining 'community' is not simple. It means different things in different situations. It can be based on location - those who live, work or use an area. But it can also be based on a common interest, value or background - for example societal groups (based on race, faith, ethnicity, disability, age, gender or sexual orientation), members of sports clubs and heritage or cultural groups. Each community will have different desires and needs which have to be balanced against the desires and needs of others.""

We remain concerned that community is defined more narrowly in the context of Community Empowerment than it is in Community Engagement and fails to recognise the complex nature of inter-connecting community interests.

Partnership Approach to Resilience

The proposed Bill may strengthen the weight of communities in decision-making. This would help improve current methods of community engagement where communities often feel that their input (which can be considerable) is ignored.

As a membership organisation, we manage our national estates on behalf of 320,000 members, and ultimately the national benefit, rather than as an individual landlord, or for private gain.

With property managers and staff often living locally at each of our properties we are members of the geographical community as well as land managers. Our employees contribute to deer management committees, mountain rescue teams and even community councils as well as manage our property interests. In doing so community partnerships have evolved and relationships with the geographical community enhanced and community assets developed both in rural locations such as Balmacara and urban properties such as Robert Burns Birthplace Museum.

The Trust also plays a key role in engaging with those who are socially isolated or part of a harder to reach community. The ability for a community body to do this may be harder and changes to ownership could inadvertently cause further lack of participation, engagement and empowerment as well as social isolation for members of the geographical community who are not members of the community body. From our own research we know how few people in Scotland feel they are able to influence local decisions and that this falls further with socio economic status. There is a need to protect and ensure engagement and participation in decision making amongst our most vulnerable citizens and ensure that they too can benefit.

Community resilience is not about ownership alone, it is about how the people living and working in an area interact and engage inclusively with one another and work together to influence changes for mutual public benefit.

Hopefully the Bill will allow better community planning across the local area and ensure that everyone feels empowered to get involved with local decision making. The change towards local service provision may also help target services to those who need them most.

Particularly in relation to community buy outs, it is essential that appropriate evaluation researches all members of the postcode community to see how they have been impacted and how their feeling of empowerment and wellbeing has been enhanced.

What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill

We are strongly supportive of the desire to improve community and civic engagement in local decision making and are very aware that individuals struggle to influence local decision making at present. We also think that there is much that third sector organisations could do in improving services and share knowledge across local authorities. However, this wide-ranging legislation may cause local authorities and public bodies to perform less effectively.

The scope of the proposals is very wide. It would be helpful to have further explanation of the public services covered by the proposals - it is understood that the Bill covers all services which is very broad.

Strong Support Function

Without exceptional guidance and support from the outset the Bill could lead to many speculative bids for assets, partnerships and buyouts which are not fit for purpose. We would strongly urge the Scottish Government to create a strong support mechanism which saves community bodies from spending significant finance on building applications which should not have been raised in the first place. There is a need for this portal to also bring together the various funding bodies which will support these applications and ensure that they are clear on the capacity of their funds so that false expectations of finance are not raised. Many inappropriate or under-developed applications could be stopped at an early stage with the right support and gatekeeping.

This gatekeeping should be designed to manage expectations, ensuring well funded and planned applications can progress, but ensuring those which need more work or are not going to bring public benefit are put on hold to avoid community bodies from over-extending themselves.

This will also create less administrative burden on local authorities, public bodies and land owners.
Managing Market Failure

The issue of community failure and the inability to deliver against objectives must be considered carefully.

- Will the Ministers have power to step in and save the asset for its community if the community body faces market failure and the asset is at risk of being seized by creditors?
- Similarly, if a community body tries to sell or develop a transferred asset, are there wider community protections in place to consult on this before the change of use is permitted?

There are instances where land – particularly in urban areas – may be deemed abandoned, but is allocated for development, subject for example to an improvement in market conditions. Here we could see temporary community gardens, art installations and general improvements to site condition which improve the area during the interim. Thus improving the appearance of abandonment and neglect and improving placemaking. This could also help with capacity growth and skills development within the community and is something that the Community Planning Partnership could help facilitate.

Are you content with specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

Conservation Provision

The Bill gives Scottish Ministers huge discretion to deem land to be “wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected” and, further, to grant a right to buy over it. Although it is stated in the policy memorandum, there is nothing in the Bill which would suggest that land or buildings held for conservation could not be considered to be abandoned or neglected.

The National Trust for Scotland would like all land held for conservation to be excluded from the statutory provisions and the Trust’s inalienable land deemed to be held for conservation.

Should this not be accepted by the Committee, we would suggest that the Scottish Ministers should have power to reject an application where the land is held for conservation and the Trust’s inalienable land should be presumed or (preferably) deemed to be held for conservation.

If the Trust’s inalienable land is not absolutely excluded from the statutory provisions, then we would seek a special parliamentary process to be built into the legislation to allow the Trust to appeal any compulsory sale order (in the same form as in the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) (Scotland) Act 1947 and the Crofters Acts, expanded on below).

Inalienable Land

There is no recognition in the text of the bill of the statutory status of the Trust to hold inalienable land and buildings. In terms of section 22 of the National Trust for Scotland Order Confirmation Act 1935 we have power to declare land held by us for the benefit of the nation, to be inalienable. This provides an extra protection for donors and members, meaning the sale of significant properties, gifted to NTS for the nation, must ultimately be approved by the Scottish Parliament. This is why we argue that, if the Scottish Ministers decide not to deem inalienable land as excluded, where land has been granted that status we should have a right of appeal by special parliamentary procedure against any buy out order. The rationale for this is not new and has been recognised in public statute already – notably within the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) (Scotland) Act 1947:

“4(1) If no objection is duly made by any such person as aforesaid [or if no objection is duly made by the National Trust for Scotland in a case where the land comprised in the order was held inalienably by the Trust on the date of the passing of the Crofting Reform (Scotland) Act 1976 and was acquired from the Trust by a crofter as defined in section 3 of the Crofters (Scotland) Act 1955 in pursuance of an order under section 2(1) or 4(1) of the said Act of 1976] or if all objections so made are withdrawn, the confirming authority, on being satisfied that the proper notices have been published and served, may, if the authority think fit, confirm the order with or without modifications.”

and crucially:

“9 A compulsory purchase order shall, in so far as it authorises the compulsory purchase of land which is the property of a local authority, or has been acquired by statutory undertakers, not being a local authority, for the purposes of their undertaking or of land belonging to the National Trust for Scotland which is held by the Trust inalienably, be subject to special parliamentary procedure in any case where an objection has been duly made by the local authority or the statutory undertakers or the National Trust for Scotland, as the case may be, and has not been withdrawn.”

The Crofters (Scotland) Act 1993 also has conditions attached in section 17(4) and 17(5). Whilst such legal parallels were not drawn in the drafting of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003, it is our view that this was accidental and that it would be logical to recognise existing legal precedents and to adopt similar conditions in community buy out to that given for compulsory purchase orders and crofting.

The National Trust for Scotland has been responsible in using its power of inalienability, which also binds the Trust in its management of properties, and has not used this power to prevent needed or useful developments, while maintaining the public interest in conserving places of historic interest and natural beauty.

We would also question, under the ECHR, whether it is in the public interest for land held in trust for the nation should be subject to sale.

Conditions of Transfer

We would seek S97L to be explicit that the conditions set could include the application of Conservation Agreements or Conservation Burdens. As mentioned above, our preferred position is land which has been granted inalienability for conservation purposes might be deemed to be “excluded” land.

Alternatively, on transferring any land, it may be in the public interest for conditions to be attached to ensure their long term conservation or preservation. We note that the Crofters (Scotland) Act 1993 makes clear that the Scottish Land Court can establish the conditions attaching to a compulsory transfer of crofting land. In doing so though in cases where the owner of the land is the National Trust for Scotland (and in terms of section 17(4) of the Crofters (Scotland) Act 1993) the court shall have regard to the purposes of the National Trust for Scotland. We suggest that a similar provision should be inserted into the draft Bill in order to allow us to apply appropriate conservation conditions.

Looking at s97H: where a Heritage Lottery Fund or other grant has been awarded – or a duty placed within a donor’s bequest – would this be considered reason that the Trust cannot sell land? We would seek clarification of whether this legislation is intended to override the wishes of donors and force disposal.

Other Issues

We refer you to our previous consultation response with regards our concerns on lack of definition for common good assets. It would seem too easy for a local authority to not recognise a common good simply by omitting it from the register.

Under the Register of Common Good we would like the Keeper to note whether the asset is held inalienably and for what purpose it was acquired.

We have some questions for the committee on the proposals:

- How will the Ministers judge competing public interests? Where two community bodies have put forward bids which are deemed to be in the public interest, what criteria will be used to measure their respective strengths and contributions to public benefit?
- Similar to this point, where there are competing statutory provisions, what procedures are in place for Ministers to prioritise the public interest where a right to buy land has been registered say by an individual croft, a crofting community and a community body?
- Can community bodies choose to enter conservation agreements – for example with the National Trust for Scotland – when they take over title of land?
- At what point does a landowner or land manager’s decision to leave a field fallow become neglect? Neglect must be carefully defined.

The Scottish Government proposes to extend right to buy to communities in all parts of Scotland, where the Scottish Government is satisfied that it is in the public interest. Do you agree with this proposal?

As the Scottish Government is well aware the feeling of engagement with decisions made locally varies greatly and people with the protected characteristics listed are often disengaged and feel unable to influence. We are unsure how the proposals will assist in enfranchising these individuals, and indeed there is a risk that the strong voices in a local community simply become stronger and these individuals become less engaged or worse still caught between two competing bodies who each feel they better represent the local community.

We welcome any proposals by the Scottish Government which strengthen the equality testing of community buyouts. Many communities struggle to recruit active and able volunteers, resulting in pressure for the same core group of volunteers appearing on several community groups. A critical issue is the sustainability of community groups in this regard.

We note that a number of community buyouts have also benefitted from support from communities of interest, for example the Scottish Wildlife Trust on Eigg.
The impact of urban stewardship of nationally important assets could be positive or negative depending on the capability and strengths of the community group.

We would hope that Scottish Ministers take due care in protecting our built heritage and ensure that the impact of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill enhances place-making and community and encourages us to re-use and re-vitalise, where reasonable, our rich built heritage and existing infrastructure.

Please do not hesitate to get in touch should you wish to discuss any of our evidence further:

Submission in response to the call for evidence in relation to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

The Church of Scotland General Trustees wish to submit the following representation in response to the call for written evidence in relation to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

Introduction

The Church of Scotland General Trustees are the property-holding corporation for the Church of Scotland having been set up by Act of Parliament in 1921. The Church of Scotland (Property & Endowments) Act 1925 and the subsequent amending Act of 1933 transferred into their ownership the majority of functional buildings used by congregations – churches, halls, manses as well as holdings of agricultural land (glebes).

The Trustees hold glebes and buildings not for themselves but primarily for the benefit of the congregations in whose parishes the properties are located. They are a registered Scottish Charity (SC014574). The Trustees have two charitable objectives which are to support parish ministry and to support congregations in the provision of suitable buildings. As a result, they require to exercise legal and fiduciary responsibilities in the administration of the assets in their care.

General comments

The Trustees have been given administrative responsibilities for the land and buildings vested in them which they discharge in collaboration with congregations. Every congregation is also a registered Scottish charity. In rural areas and in areas of urban deprivation, congregations often represent one of the few stable organisations which exist and which provide a social capital to local communities. It is usual for churches and halls to be well-used not just by congregations but also by non-religious groups. Glebe land is usually let for agricultural use, with the income helping to pay for parish ministry including the provision of services such as weddings, baptisms/blessings and funerals. In other cases, glebe land is used for a wide variety of amenity purposes which often provide a direct community benefit such as a play park, sports pitches, community spaces, woodlands etc.

Specific Areas of Concern

The Trustees wish to comment on item 4 of the questions posed in the call for evidence:
4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

(1) Operating the Community Right to Buy –

In principle, the Trustees have no difficulties with the extension of the community right to buy to urban areas, provided that this continues on a “willing seller” basis. However, they do have concerns as to how this will operate in practice. While the Trustees are not a geographically discrete community body (as defined by the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 and as proposed in the Community Empowerment Bill) they would emphasise that they hold each property on behalf of and for the benefit of a local community group – the congregation – with a specific geographical connection to the property in question. Accordingly, although not meeting the statutory criteria for constituting a “community body” the Trustees are required to operate for the benefit of a specific and identifiable geographical community.

The Trustees are therefore concerned as to how a potential conflict between the interests of a property-owning organisation holding assets for a community group on the one hand and a different community body seeking to register an interest on the other, would be managed, particularly in relation to two aspects:

(a) It is proposed that entitlement to be recognised as a “community body” is to be extended to Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisations. If implemented as proposed, there would be an intolerable situation whereby two charitable organisations – an SCIO and the General Trustees – would be expected to discharge their legal and fiduciary responsibilities in opposition to each other. The Trustees would therefore propose that the definition of “community body” is widened to include charities such as themselves and that land owned by a registered charity as opposed to a profit-making commercial body is excluded from the right to buy.

(b) The Trustees have experience of how the exercise of the existing, preemptive, community right to buy can cause division within communities. Current guidance states that, in determining whether it is in the public interest for land to be registered as subject to a community right to buy: “Ministers will also consider the wider public interest. This may include the interest of any sector of the public (however small), which, in the opinion of Ministers, would be affected by the exercise of your right to buy. Ministers do not see this as a measure to place the interests of your CB above the wider public interest. This is intended to protect the interests of distinct existing communities and groups other than the community which your CB represents.” Even when the Trustees are in the position of being a willing seller, with a sale in prospect (the proceeds from which would benefit the local congregation) that sale can be imperilled by the intervention of a community body attempting to exercise the right to buy.

The Trustees are therefore firmly of the view that the “public interest” referred to should have a clear, statutory definition and application rather than being defined in guidance published subsequent to the passing of the Bill.

The Trustees would also observe that while the Bill proposes a method of adjudicating between two or more competing “community buyers” at the time of first purchase there is no method of dealing with a post-purchase move by a registered community body to acquire property held by another registered body despite the likelihood of such cases becoming more frequent as the target of 1 million acres in community ownership is achieved or exceeded.

(2) Register of Community Interests in Abandoned or Neglected Land

The Trustees are opposed to the introduction of an absolute right for communities to buy abandoned or neglected land when no attempt has been made to define these terms.

The Trustees are concerned that Ministers will make regulations subsequent to the enactment of the Bill to stipulate what factors are to be taken into account in deciding whether land is “abandoned or neglected”. While there are clear difficulties in setting out criteria to define “abandoned or neglected”, it appears to the Trustees that the definition of these terms is at the heart of this element of the proposals. Without statutory definition of these terms, Parliament is being asked to approve a concept, rather than scrutinize the specific terms and application of the legislation with the danger of unintended consequences.

The Trustees would strongly suggest that when the result of the use of this legislation will be to remove property rights from a property owner particularly one which is registered as a charity, it is essential that such definitions are set out and approved by Parliament at the start.

The Trustees submit that the terms “abandoned or neglected” should be defined within the primary legislation and should take into account:

- a property owner’s right to peaceful enjoyment of his or her possessions;
- that land may be “inactive” for valid land management or commercial reasons;
- whether existing local authority powers to enforce maintenance (but not use) of buildings and land have been exhausted.
Final Comment

The General Trustees are aware of the terms of the response which has been submitted on behalf of one of the Church of Scotland’s central Councils, the Church & Society Council, and do not consider that anything in that response cuts across the foregoing submission.
The Development Trusts Association Scotland (DTAS) is the national member-led organisation for development trusts in Scotland, with a membership of 210. Our members are community-led organisations engaged in the regeneration of their communities through a combination of enterprise, community ownership, creativity and voluntary effort. The most recent survey of members, established that in 2011, DTAS members had a combined annual turnover of £39 million (of which £21 million was derived from non-grant income) and owned assets valued at £51 million. See: www.dtascot.org.uk

Over the last 5 years, DTA Scotland, has run a Promoting Asset Transfer programme (2009-11) and we currently operate our Community Ownership Support Service (2011 to present). Both these Scottish Government funded activities have focused on the sustainable transfer of local authority assets to appropriate community organisations, although COSS has more recently began to engage with other public agencies seeking to explore asset transfer. See: www.dtascommunityownership.org.uk

Early this year, a DTA Scotland-led consortium was awarded a contract from the BIG Lottery Scotland and Carnegie UK to run a 3 year community shares programme. Community Shares Scotland aims to create a step change in the awareness of, and knowledge about, this exciting new form of social finance, and will directly supporting tens of community share issues across a range of community sectors. This is likely to include community renewable energy projects, community owned shops and other businesses, and the acquisition and development of community owned asset. See: www.communitysharesscotland.org.uk

DTA Scotland welcomes the opportunity to submit written evidence on the Community Empowerment Bill and this submission to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee draws heavily on the combined knowledge and experience of DTA Scotland as an intermediary organisation, and the collective wealth of knowledge and experience of our membership.
To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities?

Over the last couple of decades there has been an almost organic growth in development trusts, community land initiatives and other types of community anchor organisations throughout Scotland. The emergence of these organisations builds on, and complements, the proliferation of community controlled housing associations and tenant co-operatives during the previous couple of decades. These community anchor organisations are running an increasing range of services, activities and businesses, and the approach taken is invariably characterised by the use of community ownership and community enterprise. The progress which these organisations make over the coming years, will determine the success of the Scottish Government’s aim of promoting community-led regeneration.

DTA Scotland believes that key parts of the Community Empowerment Bill (CEB) reflect and build on this grass roots development, and have the potential to strengthen the ability of communities to take the initiative, be innovative and enterprising, and unlock local creativity. In particular we believe that the CEB has the potential to encourage and support many more communities to become involved in community-led regeneration and crucially, to make it easier for communities to acquire vital or important physical assets, and / or have a greater role in the delivery of local services. DTA Scotland acknowledges that this will depend to a large extent on getting the detail within the accompanying statutory guidance right, but believes that parts of the Bill provide a useful overview and framework for this to take place.

DTA Scotland particularly supports Parts 3, 4 and 5 of the Bill, covering the areas of community involvement in service delivery, community right to buy and asset transfer respectively. It is however less clear how some other parts of the CEB contribute to community empowerment, and caution needs to be taken to ensure that the range of provisions included, do not confuse rather than clarify what we mean by community empowerment. For example, top down, community engagement, which is a valuable activity in its own right, is not community empowerment. Too often in the past, opportunities to empower communities have been lost on the altar of community engagement.

In general however, DTA Scotland is very supportive of the Community Empowerment Bill. We recognise that some key messages have been picked up within previous consultation phases which we believe have undoubtedly strengthened the Bill. We also believe that there is potential to further refine and strengthen the CEB, and we offer some suggestions which we hope will assist the Local Government and Regeneration Committee’s discussions and deliberations.

DTA Scotland believes that the existence of strong, independent community anchor organisations provides the public sector organisations with an additional, alternative and potentially dynamic partner as they grapple with the undoubted challenges which the public sector will continue to face in these straightened financial times. The ability of community organisations to utilise local passion and access alternative funding to maintain important and heritage assets, to find new and creative ways to deliver (or co-deliver) key local services, to take a more enterprising approach to address some public sector challenges, and to take increased responsibility and build community resilience, should all be regarded as a useful and positive contribution which provides an alternative but complementary option for public sector organisations.

The experience of development trusts suggests that this is precisely what happens when a mature and mutually respectful relationship develops between community anchor organisations and, in particular, their local authority. However, far too often, the emergence of a development trust is seen as a threat, rather than a potential ally and partner, and the relationship is characterised by a lack of understanding and respect, and can often be undermined by bureaucratic inertia.

The Community Empowerment Bill ushers in a new approach which, if it is to have impact and be successful, requires significant culture change within large parts of the public sector. This is unlikely to be easy or quick, but the Community Empowerment Bill has the potential to give out a serious and important message about Scottish Government intent. DTA Scotland welcomes the recent COSLA report which embraces the principles of subsidiarity and empowerment, and regards this report as an extremely important contribution to the debate and to the necessary culture change process.

The Minister has made it clear at many public appearances over the last 12 months that legislation will not be enough in itself, to deliver community empowerment, and DTA Scotland totally endorses this position. There is clearly two additional issues which need to be addressed – one of ensuring the sufficient availability of funding and resources which support the activities covered within the Bill, and secondly, as the question suggests, ensuring that the right kind of information, advice and support is available to, where necessary, build the capacity of community anchor organisations to take advantage of the provisions.

DTA Scotland, reflecting the experience and views of our members, have argued consistently that we need to re-think how we do ‘capacity building’ in Scotland if we are serious about supporting community-led regeneration. We need to be clear about whose capacity is being built, and for what purpose. On the basis of this we may need to re-prioritise, reconfigure and refine the capacity building support which is currently available. DTA Scotland would be happy to expand on our thoughts on how we do this, but in the interests of brevity, we would draw the Committee’s attention to two specific areas.

Firstly, the experience of development trusts throughout Scotland is that if we want to build organisational capacity, we need direct (and focused) investment in community anchor organisations. We are delighted that the Scottish Government’s Regeneration Unit recently launched an innovative ‘Strengthening Communities’ programme which does exactly this, and while this is being regarded as a pilot to demonstrate impact, DTA Scotland believes that the roll out of this programme would go a long way to addressing the question of capability.

Secondly, DTA Scotland would argue that we need to recognise that the knowledge and expertise increasingly rests, not within external support organisations, but within the development trusts and other community anchor organisations who are turning around failing assets, developing renewable energy projects, managing landed estates, successfully regenerating high streets, taking over post offices, petrol stations and local shops, etc, etc! The implementation of the Community Empowerment Bill presents an exciting opportunity to recognise this, and develop a peer education and peer support programme which taps into and effectively utilises this knowledge and expertise. Such a programme would be incredibly resource efficient in relation to other methods of capacity building, with the added benefit that the main financial beneficiaries would be community organisations themselves.

Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill? If not what changes would you like to see and why?

While this submission focuses on the Parts 3, 4 and 5, DTA Scotland would like to reiterate a couple of comments made in previous submissions about Community Planning and offer some a further general observation. We also recognise that some of the issues highlighted below may be best addressed within the development of the statutory guidance, but would welcome assurances that this will be the case.

(a) In the interests of clarity and plain English (key principles of Community Empowerment) we request that Community Planning Partnerships (CPPs) are re-named to describe what they actually do. Whatever your views about CPPs, they are strategic public sector planning organisations, and their title should be amended to reflect this.

(b) The suggestion that CPPs will drive the full public sector reform agenda lacks evidential support. While most CPPs are undoubtedly addressing the integration of public services, there seems no evidence that the kind of increased role for communities envisaged by the Christie Commission will be delivered through CPPs. This is a crucial aspect of the public service reform agenda and thought needs to be given to what kind of mechanism or what space is required to facilitate the engagement of what are, effectively, top down and bottom up processes. Whatever this mechanism or space looks like, it would be the view of DTA Scotland that given the, at best marginal, involvement of communities, it is unlikely to be created within CPPs.

(c) Given the innovative nature of the Community Empowerment Bill, DTA Scotland suggest that the Local Government and Regeneration Committee may wish to seek an assurance from the Minister that the legislation will be reviewed within a specific period of time.

Part 3: Participation Requests

This is a crucial part of the Bill, and one which DTA Scotland believes is a potential game changer. However, a lot has been left to regulation, and there is a danger that the processes will be overly complex and inaccessible. We would therefore welcome a commitment to keep processes simple and in plain English, within the guidance.

While welcoming this provision, we would offer the observation that it may be helpful to separate the ability of communities to influence service delivery, from the ability of communities to request to be involved in delivering / co-delivering public services. These are quite different activities. While there is a relationship between both aspects, it would appear to us that a more light touch process would be applicable to the former activity, which should also arguably be available to a wider range of community organisations.

We note that there is no right of appeal for this provision, and would request that this is included in the legislation, or that an assurance is given that this is included within the guidance.

Part 4: Community Right to Buy

DTAS fully supports the creation of a universal community right to buy (CRtB).

We also fully support the efforts of the Bill to simplify and refine the CRtB. Our colleagues in Community Land Scotland and Community Woodland Association have provided detailed comments on the simplification and refinement of the CRtB processes and we would add the weight of DTA Scotland to the relevant comments made on this area within their respective submissions.

While we are pleased to see the inclusion of Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisations (SCIOs) in the definition of an appropriate community body, we would urge the Committee to request the legal reasons why Community Benefit Societies (BenComs) have been excluded. In our experience many community organisations using a BenCom structure can meet the ‘prescribed requirements’ of an appropriate community body, and given the increasing use of community shares to fund the acquisition and development of assets, the omission of BenComs from the legislation seems perplexing.
DTA Scotland commends the Scottish Government for introducing a provision for dealing with abandoned or neglected land. However the Committee may wish to explore why SCIOs (and BenComs) are not regarded as an appropriate community body for this provision.

Section 97 requires that the application must specify the owner of the land. If the land is abandoned or neglected, it may not be possible to identify the owner of the land. Does this invalidate the application? Given that the issue of establishing clear title is a common problem when dealing with abandoned or neglected land, how will this be addressed?

Also in section 97, is it possible to clarify what is meant by “the community body has tried and failed to buy the land”. For instance what happens if the community has tried to buy the land, but the asking price bears no relation to the value of the land?

Section 97 places a duty on the community body to expedite transfer on completion of purchase. There needs to be a public commitment of support (both technical and financial) to ensure that this is not too onerous a burden, which effectively prevents the use of this provision.

We also note that in clause 97S, the valuation of land includes separation or disturbance value for the owner. If the value of the landowners wider holding is diminished this is the result of them abandoning or neglecting the land. Could the Bill team explore whether the valuation could be limited to market value only.

DTA Scotland has a concern about clause 97T, which provides owners with a right of compensation from the community body. Surely this should be limited to those situations where the application is granted. If the owner loses land due to their own negligence, it does not seem disproportionate that they have to cover their own costs. There is also a danger that owners sue community bodies for high levels of solicitors’ fees, etc.

Finally, clause 97X, which allows any interested party to refer questions to the land tribunal, seems to add unnecessary delay to a process which already has sufficient checks and balances. Could the Bill be amended to request that Ministers can refer to lands tribunal, if considered appropriate?

Part 5: Asset Transfer Requests

DTA Scotland acknowledges that this area of the Bill has been strengthened in a number of ways since the consultation process. While we fully support the asset transfer provisions, we feel that they could be further strengthened.

DTA Scotland has consistently requested that all local authorities and public bodies should make registers of assets publicly available. This is essential if community bodies are to look critically and proactively at what assets would best further their aims, rather simply respond to ‘fire sales’ of surplus assets (many of which will be liabilities).

In the CRtB provision, there is a useful discretion which allows for a body of less than 20 members, but this discretion is not reflected within Section 53 – Asset Transfer Requests. DTA Scotland is currently working with the development on the island of Canna for whom the ability to take on a couple of assets will be critical to sustaining the small population on the island. While this discretion is likely to be used infrequently, it could be crucial for small, marginalised communities, and we would, therefore, seek to see it included.

DTAS would seek assurance that within the statutory guidance there is a requirement to provide relevant information about public sector assets (conditions surveys, utility costs, etc) to prospective community buyers within asset transfer processes.

The issue of transfer at less than market value is a crucial element within this area of activity, and the Committee may wish to seek an update from the Minister on how relevant revisions of the Scottish Public Finance Manual are progressing. It is imperative that the discretionary power, which local authorities currently enjoy, to transfer assets at less than market value, is extended to other public bodies, and that advice on how to arrive at an appropriate value (perhaps with the help of a third party) is included in the statutory guidance.

The commercial sustainability of an asset transfer will often hinge on the value of the asset and the conditions (eg economic burdens) attached to the transfer. It is essential that there is scope for negotiation on these issues within the asset transfer processes and we suggest that clause 56(2)(a) could be reworded to encourage negotiated settlements.

We welcome the introduction of an appeal provision within the local authority asset transfer process, and would request that appeals are considered by elected members. DTAS would seek an assurance that this is reflected within the statutory guidance. It would also be helpful to clarify whether the appeal process will apply to the valuation of the asset and the conditions attached to the transfer.

Part 6: Common Good

While DTAS welcomes the ‘tidying up’ of Common Good, we would have liked to see this area addressed further within the Bill. We are however satisfied that there will be the potential to address this concern within the Land Reform Bill, which we understand will be brought forward within this administration.

However, within the specific context of community empowerment, there are 2 issues which we would like to highlight.

Firstly, we would suggest that it is essential that common good registers make clear reference to the specific area (town or burgh) from which common good assets came. We would seek confirmation that this will be picked up in the statutory guidance.
Secondly, where a common good asset is, in effect, clearly being transferred back to the community from where it came, we would suggest that the Bill removes the requirement for Sheriff Court approval of the transfer. This adds time and money to what is already a sufficiently costly and expensive process for both the community body and the local authority.

What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

It seems reasonable to demand that community bodies who benefit from the various provisions are democratic and inclusive organisations, and can demonstrate this in terms of their governing documents and practice.

The provisions of the Bill should create opportunities for all communities. As referred to above, there will be a challenge in doing this in those communities which are more grant dependent and less enterprising, and which currently lack the necessary capacity to embrace the opportunities which the Bill will create. Pro-active intervention may well be required in communities (particularly deprived or disadvantaged ones) which do not have the kind of strong, community anchor organisations necessary.
ERS Scotland response to the call for evidence by the Local Government and Regeneration Committee on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

ERS Scotland campaigns for a better democracy, where every vote and every voice is valued. We welcome the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill, Parts 1-3 of which are of particular interest to the society.

The most interesting of these is the introduction of ‘Participation Requests’.

We are also interested in the opportunities offered by putting Community Planning Partnerships on to a statutory footing, and in placing the outcomes approach in legislation.

National outcomes

The Democracy Max inquiry uncovered a general frustration with the short-termism of the current political structures, and suggested setting out overarching outcome based goals that all political parties could agree to as being of benefit to the country.

Different governments might implement different policies to achieve these goals but it was felt having a longer term outcome would enable citizens to better hold politicians to account. It would also better provide an understanding of the long term progress of policy development. We hope cementing the outcomes approach will help move towards us more to this style of policy making.

It is possible that decision making may be slowed down as a result of the proposals in the bill, but this should be balanced with the better decision making provided for. There may be variation in how local outcomes improvement plans choose to meet the national outcomes. This should be acknowledged and minimum requirements included in the national outcomes (and the associated local outcomes).

Community Planning Partnerships

The Bill requires Local Authorities to establish Community Planning Partnerships, and also legislates for the involvement of listed partner organisations. Community Planning Partnerships are a means to bring together interested organisations in the process of planning public services at a local authority level and to involve the community in developing those services. The role of CPPs is to prepare a plan for improving local outcomes, in consultation with community bodies and others. The Bill improves current guidance and puts it on a statutory basis.

The vision in the Bill suggests that every local authority will establish a CPP. Since every local authority does already have one, the key parts of the Bill are the additional requirements that public sector partner bodies work collaboratively with the CPP and that once the partners have come together (including community groups), they prepare and publish a plan for improving local outcomes. The CPP must then monitor progress and report annually on that progress.

In its best iteration, this could be a group encompassing local authority representatives, public sector partners and community groups. They would jointly decide on local outcomes reflecting the national outcomes, and would hold public meetings to report on progress and hear back from the community.

But as it stands, the Bill does not provide that this will be the model. There is a requirement to report, but not to do so in public, and no mention of to whom the report should be made. It is also unclear whether a community response would be required, what the role of existing Community Councils would be in this process, or how bodies who have instigated a participation request would be involved.

Suggested amendments

In order to make the local outcomes improvement plan as transparent and well publicised as possible, we would suggest that when preparing the local outcomes improvement plan (s5(3)) CPPs should be required to bring forward a participation plan that indicates how they will ensure full participation in the process across the community. The participation plan should be approved by a stratified sample jury type group (also known as a mini-public) which would be required to be formed in order to act as a monitor and assessor of the effectiveness of the CPP.

We would also suggest that the Bill requires each CPP to set aside at least 1% of their annual budget, to be decided upon through an appropriate community participation process or processes, and assess the impact of doing so with a view to further embedding this approach. This participatory budgeting approach has met with significant success in a number of countries including Brazil, France, Spain and Italy but is always more successful when required by legislation rather than taking a voluntary approach.

In reviewing the local outcomes improvement plan (s6(2)) we would suggest that the CPP report to the stratified sample jury type group review who would help the CPP consider the progress and if necessary review the plan. The CPP should also present the annual progress report (s7) to this group, and to a public meeting called with at least 1 months’ notice and with the agenda and supporting papers published online at the same time as the meeting is called. There should also be a capacity for members of the community to comment via the internet ahead of the public meeting.

Participation Requests

The Bill introduces an exciting new proposal: that a community body, effectively constituted, can identify a local outcome where it thinks it can add value and can request of the local authority that they be involved in delivering that outcome.

ERS Scotland would suggest that information and advice about how to go about forming a group as per the legislation should be provided. We would propose that each Local Authority should have staff members trained to assist and advise – and should promote the advice and information, along with a means of contacting said individual in an obvious area on their website.

Communities should not feel that using the Community Empowerment legislation is a last resort, or a difficult process, but rather should be a norm, which allows the community to be empowered and encouraged to take part.

We would also suggest a review, preferably including a report to the Scottish Parliament, after a defined period of no more than five years of the legislation being in operation, should be committed to in the legislation to ensure the process isn’t preventing willing, able and justified groups from being formed.

The Scottish Government already encourages public sector organisations to engage with communities and support their participation in setting priorities and designing and delivering services. The Bill gives community bodies an additional power to themselves initiate that participation and a right to have their request to do so properly considered. If the public body refuses the request it must explain the reasons.
We would suggest the maximum amount of transparency be applied in considering any participation request, and that an acknowledgement of the possible, indeed likely, lay role of the community body be considered in applying the criteria set out.

It may also be worth considering additional criteria regarding the socio-economic status of the community that is putting forward the participation request, alongside other engagement measurements like turnout in elections, and number of registered voters. We suggest this as we consider that the proposals in the draft Community Empowerment Bill could serve to re-engage communities in formal politics if it is successfully and effectively implemented. The flip side of this is of course that if badly implemented this Bill could further deter and discourage people from becoming involved in community issues.

ERS Scotland would also recommend that there be a reporting requirement required of public bodies to say how many requests they have had, how many approved and denied and the outcomes. Additionally, we think it would be useful if there was a requirement to undertake outreach to inform communities and citizens of the ability and methods to request participation that the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill makes available.

At the end of the process the public body must publish a report as to whether the outcomes were improved thanks to the community involvement.

If more than one community body requests to participate in the design and delivery of an outcome they can all join the same participation process, and indeed community bodies can themselves group together in order to request to participate in a chosen outcome.

The Bill does not specify how the local outcomes will be publicised, nor how existing participation requests will be made public. It does not indicate how the participation should be undertaken, nor how the wider community might be involved, either during the process or in considering whether the outcomes were improved due to community body participation at the end of the process.

ERS Scotland feel this is a missed opportunity to ensure wider community engagement and empowerment through the use of innovative participation methods. We are also feel the reporting requirements could be strengthened.

Suggested amendments

Section 19 should include a requirement that any participation request must seek to involve the wider community in order to avoid vested interests influencing decision making without due consultation with the wider community affected. This could include publicising the participation request, holding public meetings and consulting the wider community. It should include the use of deliberative and participative methods of decision making.

In section 25, as mentioned above we would suggest that a stratified sample jury type group be selected and the report be made to them for comment and feedback. Their response should be published alongside the report of the outcome process and the participation request.

In requiring both the CPP overall outcomes and the results of participation requests to be reported in public to a stratified sample of the community, this would therefore assist in holding the CPP and the LA to account but also, and perhaps more importantly, would provide the opportunity for reflection and learning, from failure as well as success. This process should be publicised and the results disseminated – something which may instigate participation requests if groups feel the outcomes could be better met.

Conclusion

In suggesting this approach we are proposing that the Bill introduce an additional requirement for a ‘mini public’ to be established to which the CPP would report as detailed and which would also respond to reports of participation requests. This would introduce an innovative method of public reporting to the CE Bill process and would allow for all parts of the community to be represented. It would begin a process of communities understanding how decisions are made, how processes are followed and how communities can assist in delivering outcomes. Where required the mini-public should have the power to request additional information from the CPP or the LA and to suggest alternative actions for the CPP or LA (and community body who has submitted a participation request) to consider.

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill
Local Government and Regeneration Committee

The Highland Council Evidence

NB a response from officers and not considered by elected members at this time.

Highland Council officers welcome the opportunity to provide written evidence to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee in respect of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. The Council has previously supported the aims and objectives of the Bill and envisions that this legislation will have positive impacts across the range of areas it provides for.

Officers are pleased to see a number of the points the Council made during the consultation phase taken on board in the drafting of this legislation. This includes:

- The focus on outcomes and the importance of all relevant partners contributing to community planning.
- A core list of public bodies to be involved while enabling flexibility to include others and the ability for the Community Planning Partnership (CPP) to consider how best to enable the participation of all partners within the CPP’s governance arrangements.
- Definition of community body – it is helpful that attempts have been made to simplify the various definitions.
- Community Right to Buy – the inclusion of Community Right to Buy within the Bill will go a long way to promoting community ownership and the benefits that can result.
- Community Participation – the legislation now provides for public service authorities to decline multiple requests for the same outcome.
- The flexibility for public authorities to extend the period in which community bodies have to submit an offer, reflecting the need to be response to the needs of individual groups.
- Asset transfer decision review - that it would not be appropriate for an external body to review any decision taken by a Local Authority but now includes a process for Local Authorities to review their own decisions.
- The definition of allotments – ensuring it is now broad enough to take in community growing.
- Size of an allotment plot – no specific size enables Local Authorities to use such a definition as appropriate to their area.

The Council's evidence focuses on 2 key areas:

1. Previously Drafted Legislation: Points of concern which we have previously highlighted and yet have not been taken on board. These remain of significant concern that we wish to note these once more.

2. Newly Drafted Legislation: Relating to those areas where draft legislation has not been previously seen and its current form causes some concern.

The comments outlined below are intended to be constructive to enable this legislation to be as effective as possible in its operation for both communities and public service authorities.

Part 1: National Outcomes

The inclusion of the requirement for Ministers to determine and publish national outcomes following consultation is welcomed. This will provide clarity not only of Government intentions but also provide a focus for public service providers, including public sector organisations. The proposals for reviewing outcomes and reporting performance appear sensible. The extent to which the provisions for national outcomes, their review and performance reporting will empower communities will depend on:

- what those outcomes are;
- how Ministers consult on them, the reach of that consultation and how they can demonstrate they have listened;
- the accessibility of performance information to a range of interests and community groups and how that can have meaning to individual communities.

Part 2: Community Planning

We welcome that the Bill as drafted reflects the Council’s earlier feedback on: including a defined list of core public bodies to participate in community planning while providing flexibility to include other community bodies operating in the area; the engagement of partners to fit local CPP governance arrangements and with scope for partners to be involved in particular outcomes or all as the CPP decides; a focus on outcomes; emphasising the importance of all relevant partners contributing to community planning; and recognising that some community bodies might need more support to participate in community planning.

It is helpful to public sector organisations to:

- have a definition of community planning included and for it to mean improving the achievement of outcomes through public services delivered by a range of providers;
- have clarity on which core bodies are expected to participate in a community planning partnership while enabling flexibility over identifying other community bodies to include;
- enabling the CPP to decide how best to arrange their governance arrangements effectively and efficiently and for it to agree which partners may not comply or be involved in a particular theme.
• to be required to prepare, publish and review a local outcomes improvement plan as this is not dissimilar to the current practice for preparing Single Outcome Agreements;
• for the duty of facilitating community planning to be shared across the defined partners for community planning given the shared responsibility for delivering on outcomes;
• that the duties of community planning partners includes contributing funds, staff and other resources as the partnership decides, as this will make collaboration more meaningful and that this relates to achieving outcomes and enabling community bodies to participate; and
• that guidance for community planning will be issued and it will be consulted on.

It would be more helpful to public sector organisations and for empowering communities if the following amendments could be made:

• Under section 4(3) on the requirement for local outcomes to be consistent with national outcomes, a qualification or reference to 5.(4)(b) should be included. This relates to the need for local outcome improvement plans to take into account local needs and circumstances. Otherwise the legislation may be seen to be contradictory, particularly if national outcomes are cast in a narrow way. This could also disempower communities if national policies do not reflect the needs in a CPP area and are too top down.
• Third Sector Interfaces should be listed in the schedule of core bodies to include in community planning partnerships in schedule 1. This would not preclude the engagement of individual third sector bodies from participating in the community planning partnership because they can be included in a CPP’s identification of other community bodies to involve. This would enable a better representation of the third sector in the CPP.
• Under section 4(8) the community bodies to include should only be those that are formally constituted. This provides more assurance of their aims, membership (and by default their representativeness) and governance arrangements. Given the support available from Third Sector Interfaces for community groups to be formally constituted this should not be a barrier to the involvement of appropriate groups. It also aligns better with the Bill’s provisions for formally constituted groups to be able to participate in improving outcomes. Community groups that are not formally constituted would not be excluded from community planning processes and could e.g. still be consulted as part of a CPP’s normal consultation process, but that is different to being a community planning partner. We seek removal of the reference to community bodies not being formally constituted from the definition of community bodies as community planning partners.
• There needs to be clarity in the Bill on the external scrutiny and inspection regime for community planning. Given that the focus of community planning is for the improvement of outcomes, how this will be inspected and audited needs to be clarified along with information on any remedial steps that may need to be followed.
This does not appear to be included at all in the Bill and in earlier consultation we have expressed our view that this needs to comply with the principles of the Crerar Review.

Part 3: Participation Requests

Section 14 and 15 – Definition of community bodies
Whilst the attempt to simplify the definition of community bodies able to submit a participation request is welcomed, it still appears overly complex. It is beneficial that there is now synergy between the definition of community body for both asset transfer requests and participation requests, however, it still appears confusing and is likely to be so for both public service authorities and more significantly, community groups.

Section 17 – Participation requests
The process set out under this legislation is a formal process, with a number of key steps. It is therefore surprising that the requirement to present a participation request in writing has been removed. It would appear appropriate, given the circumstances, that community bodies should outline their request and reasons for it in writing to ensure there is no misunderstanding.

Section 19 (5) – Participation requests: decisions
There is still a lack of clarity around the reasonable grounds for refusing any request.

General comment – Simple Guidance
In order to encourage communities to participate, the guidance accompanying the legislation should be written in simple language explaining what terms mean e.g. a definition of outcomes. This will be critical to ensure that groups are not only enabled legislatively, but are able to understand what they have been empowered to participate in.

Part 4: Community Right to Buy Land

Section 28 (3) (c) – Meaning of community
We are concerned about this provision - whereby any person may receive a copy of minutes of the meetings of the company, if the request is reasonable, within 28 days. There is a need for further clarity here. Does the provision apply to all meetings (sub-committees and AGM meetings, which may be available only after approval and once a year)? Is the provision concerned with the provision of approved minutes only or may it include draft minutes? Another concern here is what information may be withheld if any. There is a need for clarity here too.
Council officers would also wish to express concern that this provision may require a wide number of existing associations to change their articles of association. This is particularly significant given that this now must be done prior to the commencement of any process under the modifications made to Part 2 of the Land Reform Scotland Act.

Section 28 (7) – Meaning of community
This provision introduces flexibility for Ministers to prescribe the definition of types of area, other than defined by post code. Clarity around what is meant by ‘type of area’ should be provided. Perhaps an example would illustrate what the flexibility provided may achieve.

Section 31 – Procedure for late applications
Applications for late registration are becoming the norm (two in Highland in last month). Given the likelihood that the number of late registrations will increase, it is considered that existing hurdles regarding the requirement to demonstrate additional community support and that the registration would be strongly in the public interest are of themselves sufficient, without the new requirements suggested in the Bill.

Section 48 – Abandoned and neglected land
This section appears to introduce a significantly higher barrier to community ownership than is currently the case. There is concern that the requirement for an interested community to demonstrate that land has been abandoned (particularly in a rural setting) would be very challenging indeed.

General comment - Re-registration of an interest in land:
The potential amendments to Part 2 of the Land Reform Scotland Act have omitted to consider the re-registration of an interest in land. We would therefore suggest that there should be simplified arrangements for the re-registering of an interest in land provided that ongoing and continuing community support can be demonstrated. It is also suggested that registration should be extant for 10 years rather than 5 years. This is an issue that has been considered by the Scottish Government’s Land Reform Review Group and is one that Council officers would like to see included within the Bill before approval.

General comment – Mapping requirements for Part 2 of Land Reform Act
A further unfortunate omission is the Bill’s failure to simplify the onerous mapping requirements which currently exist. Council officers would strongly recommend that it should not be necessary to detail every sewer, line or watercourse, fence, dyke or ditch in order to demonstrate the area of land which is of interest. This is another point considered by the Land Reform Review Group.
Part 5: Asset Transfer Requests

Section 52 (1) – Asset transfer requests
There is no current provision within the legislation if more than one community transfer body makes an asset transfer request (ATR) in connection with the same or similar piece of land/property either:

   a) at the same time, or
   b) at different times (ie. the relevant authority is already responding to one ATR and another ATR is made).

 Provision/guidance will be welcomed for dealing with this eventuality either within the legislation or the regulations.

Consideration should also be given within the Bill/regulations to prescribing some form of period of ‘advertisement ’ (ie. a fixed period of time and place) to allow potential interested community bodies to express interest in an asset transfer of a particular property. This will allow a) multiple requests to be progressed and considered at the same time; b) will allow equal opportunity between different community bodies to prepare and raise a request, and c) will avoid requests being submitted very late in a property disposal or other asset transfer process thereby extending the period over which the authority is required to retain a vacant and surplus property.

Section 52 (4) (d) – Asset transfer requests
In considering any ATR, the relevant authority must take into account whether the transfer will promote or improve: (as section 55(3)(c))

   (i) Economic development
   (ii) Regeneration
   (iii) Public Health
   (iv) Social Wellbeing, or
   (v) Environmental wellbeing

 It is therefore recommended that this requirement should also be applied at 52 (4) (d) and that any community transfer body should specify and evidence within its ATR how its proposal will promote or improve and deliver the five requirements outlined above. The ATR should evidence how the proposal and each of the above criteria will promote, improve and deliver the benefits to the community, and how these link in with the Aims and Objectives of the Relevant Authority. Ideally such evidence should be SMARTA (ie. Specific; Measurable; Attainable; Results-Orientated; Timebound; Agreed).

Section 53 (2) (b) - Community transfer bodies and ownership of land
The legislation, as currently proposed, does not deal with or address the asset transfer requirements between the ‘company’ (ie. the original community transfer body benefitting from the original (below market) asset transfer from the Relevant Authority) and the successor (ie. another community transfer body, or charity).
What would prevent a successor community asset transfer body or charity from selling a public sector asset, originally transferred at below market value to the original company, on the open market and receiving capital receipt? How will the public pound be protected in this scenario?

There is a need to put safeguards in place, either within the legislation or regulations to ensure that the successor owner (ie. another community transfer body, or charity) benefitting from the asset transfer promotes or improves (as section 55(3)(c)) and delivers:

(i) Economic development
(ii) Regeneration
(iii) Public Health
(iv) Social Wellbeing, or
(v) Environmental wellbeing

Section 55 (3) (c) – Asset transfer requests - decisions
As outlined above (s52(4)(d)), the Community Transfer Body Request should specify in its request how its proposal will promote or improve and deliver :

(i) Economic development
(ii) Regeneration
(iii) Public Health
(iv) Social Wellbeing, or
(v) Environmental wellbeing

The ATR should evidence how the proposal and each of the above criteria will promote, improve and deliver the benefits, and how these link in with the Aims and Objectives of the Relevant Authority. Such evidence should be SMARTA (ie. Specific; Measurable; Attainable; Results-Orientated; Timebound; Agreed). This will assist the relevant authority to appropriately and fairly assess any ATR.

Section 55 (5) – Asset transfer requests - decisions
This removes the discretion of the (local) authority to seek a Best Value outcome to a property disposal, and thereby potentially foregoing a capital receipt that could be reinvested/recycled through its capital programme to deliver improved public services.

The Bill does not favour/encourage asset transfers at market value, and may, by stipulating that an ‘authority must agree to the request ….,’ inadvertently encourage ATRs at below market/nominal value.
Given the above, we would query whether other aspects of legislation require to be repealed to reflect this.

Further guidance (including in the regulations) would be helpful in this area.

Section 55 (6) – Asset transfer requests - decisions

As outlined above, provision or guidance is required, either within the legislation/regulations, should more than one community transfer body make an asset transfer request (ATR) in connection with the same or similar piece of land/property either:-

a) at same time, or
b) at different times (ie. the relevant authority is already responding to one ATR and another ATR is made?

How will different ATRs be assessed to ensure equality and objectiveness between different proposals?

How will different ATRs submitted at different time intervals, possibly with different development and funding timescales be assessed and progressed?

Many (surplus and vacant) properties continue to attract on-going revenue costs (eg. rates; rent; utility costs; maintenance; security/vandalism costs) for the duration that they are retained, as well as having a potential capital asset value that could, upon generation of a capital receipt through an open market disposal, be reinvested/recycled through its capital programme to deliver improved public services.

Provision is required within the legislation or regulations to take account of these issues.

See also 56 (3) and (7) below.

Section 55 (9) – Asset transfer requests - decisions

It will be vital that the ‘Relevant Authorities’ should be consulted and given the opportunity to comment on the regulations and the procedures within the regulations to ensure that they are pragmatic and achievable.

Section 56 (3) – Agreement to asset transfer request

There are extended time periods prescribed within the Bill:

a) the period in which an offer is to be made (ie. minimum 6 months ); and
b) period of 6 months beginning with the date of the offer (or such longer period agreed/prescribed) - also having regard to the requirements of 55 (5))
This may well entail the relevant authority retaining vacant and surplus property for extended periods of time that could otherwise:-

i) be disposed of at market value and thereby contributing through redevelopment/recycling to the creation of local employment/economic (re)development;
ii) be used to generate a capital receipt through an open market disposal, that could be reinvested/recycled through its capital programme in to delivering improved public services;
iii) could cause blight and attract anti-social behaviour in local communities whereby properties are left vacant, boarded up etc. for extended periods of time.

Section 56 (4) (ii) – Agreement to asset transfer request Clarification/guidance may be required regarding what is a ‘reasonable time’.

Section 56 (7) – Agreement to asset transfer request
As outlined at section 56 (3), there are extended time periods prescribed within the Bill:
a) the period within the decision notice in which an offer is to be made (ie. at least 6 months) (section 56 (3)); and
b) period of 6 months beginning with the date of the offer (or such longer period agreed/prescribed) (Section 56 (7)) - also having regard to the requirements of 55 (5)).

This may well entail the authority retaining vacant and surplus property for extended periods of time that i) could otherwise be disposed of at market value and thereby contributing through redevelopment/recycling to the creation of local employment/economic (re)development; ii) generation of a capital receipt through open market disposal that could be reinvested/recycled through its capital programme in to delivering improved public services; iii) could cause blight and attract anti-social behaviour in local communities whereby properties are left vacant, boarded up etc for extended periods of time.

Section 57 (2) - Prohibition on disposal of land
The inclusion of a prohibition on the disposal of land during the relevant period and the timescales specified with the Bill (Sections 56 (3) and (7)) may stifle or deter local/national business entrepreneurialism and inward investment that could otherwise contribute through property redevelopment/recycling to the creation of local employment/economic (re)development.

Section 59 Review by local authority
Council officers welcome that the Bill now provides for Local Authorities to review their own decisions as opposed to an external body. However, the regulations which Ministers will prescribe need to ensure they take account of Local Authority standing orders and existing procedures for reviewing decisions taken. It will therefore be important for Local Authorities to be consulted upon any regulations.
Section 61 (1) (b) – Power to decline certain asset transfer requests
This may require Authorities to keep registers and records of ATRS received in order to ascertain whether new requests relate to previous asset transfer requests.

Part 6: Common Good Property

General comment – Bodies to consult with
A concern which the Council raised during the development phase of the Bill was the extent of the consultation proposed. The proposed definition of ‘Community Bodies’ in terms of the Community Empowerment(Scotland) Bill is extremely broad and would appear to be an unnecessarily onerous task and one open to interpretation. As also noted within the Community Planning section of the Bill, the definition of community body applied in this section also includes unconstituted bodies which would appear inappropriate. A constitution provides assurance of an organisation’s aims, membership (and by default their representativeness) and governance arrangements. Overall however, we would suggest it far more appropriate to consult only with Community Councils, as proposed, as representatives of their communities. This would require a change at 22 (5) and 24 (5).

The Highland Council has responsibility for administering ten different Common Good Funds (Cromarty, Dingwall, Dornoch, Fortrose and Rosemarkie, Grantown, Invergordon, Inverness, Kingussie, Nairn and Tain). In relation specifically to Community Councils, the current wording in the Bill would require Highland Council to consult with all 156 Community Councils in its area on the establishment of a register and each disposal of property across any of the funds. We would therefore strongly suggest that the wording be amended to read “consult only with Community Councils that represent the inhabitants of the areas to which the Common Good related prior to 16 May 1975.”

Part 7: Allotments

Section 70 – Request to lease allotment
The draft legislation states ‘any person may make a request to the local authority in whose area the person resides to lease an allotment from the authority’ 70 (1). With an area the size of Highland the legislation still does not allow for a geographical approach within the Authority to ensure allotments are developed and allocated within an acceptable (defined) geographical limit from the requester’s home.

Section 70 – Request to lease allotment
The bill only refers to local authority owned or leased land. The legislation still does not recognise the role of other statutory bodies by placing duties on all public sector land owners to make suitable surplus land available. We have evidence that some public sector agencies are however approaching this on an ad hoc basis. The Forestry Commission for instance has encouraged, assisted in the development of; and leased land for allotments directly to allotment associations.

Section 72 – Duty to provide allotments
There is still no provision for the Local Authority to limit the number of sites that must be provided simultaneously across the entire Local Authority area. This should be viewed in the context of the Highlands overall allotment strategy, budget, priorities and man power to meet the duty effectively.

General Comment – Equalities
It would be appropriate for the Community Empowerment Bill to make direct links to the general equality duty of the public sector equality duty set out in section 149 of the Equality Act 2010. The connection should recognise that different groups have historically been under-represented in community activities or faced barriers to participation - the Empowerment Bill is an opportunity to help mainstream the duty into the scope of its powers.

Those subject to the equality duty must, in the exercise of their functions, have due regard to the need to:
- Eliminate unlawful discrimination, harassment and victimisation and other conduct prohibited by the Act.
- Advance equality of opportunity between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.
- Foster good relations between people who share a protected characteristic and those who do not.

Having due regard for advancing equality in particular involves:
- Removing or minimising disadvantages suffered by people due to their protected characteristics.
- Taking steps to meet the needs of people from protected groups where these are different from the needs of other people.
- Encouraging people from protected groups to participate in public life or in other activities where their participation is disproportionately low.
The Act states that meeting different needs involves taking steps to take account of disabled people's disabilities. It describes fostering good relations as tackling prejudice and promoting understanding between people from different groups. It states that compliance with the duty may involve treating some people more favourably than others.

General Comment – Community Councils

We would once again like to take the opportunity to register our disappointment at the noticeable absence within the Bill of any legislation relating to Community Councils. Given the extensive work over recent years in considering the roles and responsibilities of Community Councils, it would appear a missed opportunity not to address this within the current Bill where it would sit so comfortably. Community Council legislation primarily dates to the 1973 Local Government Act. The current community context has changed dramatically, as evidenced by this Bill, and therefore it is at odds with the current direction of community empowerment in general not to consider Community Councils given that they are a key building block within our communities.

There is one critical anomaly that urgently requires review and legislation to address it. This Council has consistently lobbied on the issue of Community Councils and the need for legislation to be amended to enable these bodies to have incorporated status. Some Community Councils already own assets but without a change in legislation, the liability and risk will continue to lie with individual office bearers. This is unhelpful we would urge that this particular element is considered as one component of the Bill. It should be considered in the context of an enabling provision for those Community Councils keen to have such a role. This would empower those Community Councils without expecting or compelling all Community Councils to take on this role.

It is important to emphasise that this would not change the fundamental definition of the role of a Community Council but provide protection for individual office bearers and enable any Community Council who would like to take a greater role within their community to enable them to do so.

Of course Community Councils can set up Community Trusts or alternative bodies to take on these roles, however, as noted in previous consultations, within small communities this can result in a lack of interest in a Community Council with individuals more interested in participating in the activities of the Trust.

A strength of Community Councils in terms of owning assets would be that their operation is governed by strict rules and regulations overseen by the Local Authority.

The Bill is about empowering communities and Community Councils are a key building block within our communities. Amending the unincorporated status of Community Councils would greatly assist and empower many Community Councils who wish to play a greater role within their communities. This is an ideal opportunity to address this challenge within an appropriate legislative process and we would urge this element to be included within the Bill.
Barnardo’s Scotland response to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee’s call for evidence on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

About Barnardo’s Scotland

Barnardo’s Scotland is Scotland’s largest children’s charity, running over 100 projects around Scotland and working with over 10,000 children and families every year.

Our services work with children, young people and their families in some of the most vulnerable and disadvantaged communities in Scotland. These communities are often disempowered in comparison with other communities in Scotland and have often become the communities that are easiest for public services to ignore.

The overwhelming majority of Barnardo’s Scotland’s services involve some form of relationship with statutory partners, including local authorities and health boards. Many of our services are commissioned by local authorities or other community planning partners.

Summary

Barnardo’s Scotland has welcomed and supported the introduction of a Community Empowerment Bill by the Scottish Government and we urge the Local Government and Regeneration Committee to recommend that the Parliament supports the principles of the Bill at Stage 1.

However, we also believe that it is imperative that the Bill is strengthened in a number of ways and through our evidence we have outlined some suggestions that we believe will help ensure that the Bill empowers the most disempowered communities in Scotland, ensures that the Bill fits with the rest of the Scottish Government’s programme of public service reform and ensures that the Bill supports the rights of children as laid out in the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC).

We also support the joint evidence provided by Barnardo’s Scotland, Oxfam Scotland and the Poverty Alliance, entitled Strengthening the Community Empowerment Bill to empower every community in Scotland¹, and further supported by a large number of other civic organisations including the Church of Scotland, the Scottish Community Development Centre and Children in Scotland, and we call on the Local Government and Regeneration Committee to support the proposals outlined in that paper.

In this evidence we suggest a number of ways that the Bill could be strengthened, including:

- Placing National Standards for Community Engagement onto a statutory footing.

- Requiring Community Planning Partnerships to create local outcomes improvement plans through a participative process of community engagement.
- Requiring Community Planning Partnerships to allocate a proportion of their budget through a participatory budgeting process.
- Requiring the Scottish Government to involve children and young people in the identification of the National Outcomes, and to undertake a Children’s Rights Impact Assessment.
- Measures that would ensure that the Bill was aligned with other parts of the Scottish Government’s programme of public service reform, including the integration of Health and Social Care and the recently passed Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014.
- The establishment of a suitable appeals process for participation requests, and a duty to support disadvantaged communities to utilise the process.

We have provided responses to the Committee’s specific questions below:

Barnardo’s Scotland has welcomed and supported the introduction of a Community Empowerment Bill by the Scottish Government and we urge the Local Government and Regeneration Committee to recommend that the Parliament supports the principles of the Bill at Stage 1. Empowered and connected communities, that have control over their collective destinies and that are able to organise their public services to suit their needs, experience better outcomes and are more likely to have all of their human rights upheld. The concept of community is a complex one, with individual people often feeling a sense of belonging to a complicated set of interconnected communities. We are therefore pleased that the Bill adopts a broad definition of ‘community’ throughout, and that these definitions include communities of interest.

Governments cannot, on their own, fully empower communities, nor should legislation be the only means with which governments should seek to assist the empowerment of communities. However, our view is that there is an important role for legislation to play, establishing new rights that empower communities and ensuring that public services in Scotland are structured around the ethos of the Christie Commission which states that public services should be designed and delivered with communities, rather than “delivered ‘top down’ for administrative convenience”\(^2\). The empowerment of communities should be one of the fundamental purposes of all public services. However, legislation must be accompanied by other policies, including funding and supporting community development activities and other initiatives that help to make communities more connected.

In the Scottish Government’s response to the Christie Commission’s Final Report, amongst other actions, the Scottish Government committed to;

"Developing a Community Empowerment and Renewal Bill that will significantly improve community participation in the design and delivery of public services, alongside action to build community capacity, recognising the particular needs of communities facing multiple social and economic challenges”\(^3\)

We believe that this statement continues to provide a good summary of what this Bill should be trying to achieve, and much of our comments arise from this statement providing a benchmark for comparison. However, as an organisation working with vulnerable children, young people and families in some of Scotland’s most disadvantaged and disempowered communities, we are concerned that the Bill, as introduced, does not go far enough in helping to address Scotland’s most significant inequalities – it does not, as yet, fully recognise the particular needs of communities facing multiple social and economic challenges. We believe that it is imperative that this Bill is able to empower communities right across Scotland. In this evidence, and in the joint evidence we have submitted with Poverty Alliance and Oxfam Scotland, we suggest a number of ways that this can be achieved, including the placing of the Community Engagement Standards onto a statutory footing, proposals that make community empowerment central to the purpose of Community Planning Partnerships, a strengthened right to request to participate and the introduction of participatory budgeting to the Bill.

If community empowerment is made central to the purpose of all of Scotland’s public services, it is also imperative that the provisions laid out in the Community Empowerment Bill are in keeping with the remainder of the Scottish Government’s programme of public service reform, and in particular with other recently passed public service legislation. In particular, as an organisation that supported the Children and Young People (Scotland) 2014 Act, we are keen to ensure that the Community Empowerment Bill builds on the provisions in that Act that relate to the rights of children and the delivery of children’s services.

Community Planning Partnerships (CPPs) have played a role in the development of more effective, more closely-aligned public services in Scotland. In particular, CPPs have been successful in bringing together public services to plan for communities, as they have so far been principally designed to do. Whilst this has successfully encouraged collaborative, cross-sector working, it has not directly empowered communities. We believe that if communities are going to become more empowered in relation to their public services, Community Planning Partnerships must focus much more on the potential of local people to participate in, shape and improve these services. We believe there is much more that the Community Empowerment Bill could do in this area, so that communities come together with agencies to co-produce their public services. For example, the development of local outcomes improvement plans or Single Outcome Agreements (SOAs) should, ultimately, be through a participative process of community engagement.

Most CPPs have also, to varying extents, involved Third Sector Interfaces (TSIs) in their work. Across Scotland, third sector organisations, like Barnardo’s Scotland, deliver a wide range of services that support the improvement of communities’ outcomes. On that basis, we believe that it is important that the third sector continue to contribute to the shared decision making of Community Planning Partnerships, and we therefore hope that the Community Empowerment Bill can be amended to ensure that TSIs continue to represent the third sector in CPP areas.

We support the intention of putting the National Outcomes onto a statutory footing, on the basis of the proven benefits of focusing service delivery on the achievement of outcomes. However, this will only be empowering for communities in Scotland if those communities have an opportunity to shape and decide upon what those outcomes are. We therefore recommend that the Bill is strengthened, to require Ministers to involve communities in Scotland, and encourage their participation in deciding upon the National Outcomes. We also suggest that this should specifically include a requirement to involve children, and that the National Outcomes should be subject to a Children’s Rights Impact Assessment, before they are agreed to.

Barnardo’s Scotland supports the principle that people using services are experts in those services, and are often best-placed to judge how those services can be improved and made more effective. As the Bill recognises in its definitions, communities are diverse in nature, and include communities of interest, geographic communities as well as groups of service users. Therefore, it is from the principle that communities of service users are experts in the services that they use that the benefits of sections 2 and 3 (the sections where we have concentrated our comments) will come to public sector organisations.

The involvement of people who use services in the design and delivery of public services has tremendous potential to improve services, whether that is the identification of new service needs, ways to improve the efficiency of services, or simply to improve outcomes. However, we believe that, whilst there is good practice in many places across Scotland, the full potential of service user involvement in public services is not yet being fully realised. Indeed, in the case of community planning, the 2013 Audit Scotland report on community planning found that,

“... there is a long way to go before services are truly designed around communities and the potential of local people to participate in, shape and improve local services is realised.” [our emphasis]

Ultimately, more consistent, high quality engagement of service users will lead to public services in Scotland that are more effective, efficient and that are more attuned to the needs of the public who live and work in Scotland. However, as stated elsewhere in this consultation response, we believe that the Bill as introduced could be strengthened, and many of our suggestions would help ensure more regular, higher quality, community engagement by public bodies. We believe, therefore, that the suggestions we make for strengthening would help the Bill to achieve further benefits for public sector organisations.

As an organisation working with some of Scotland’s most disempowered and disadvantaged communities in Scotland, we believe that the Bill must empower communities across all of Scotland, and help to address Scotland’s most significant inequalities. Whilst we support the general principles of the Bill, and see some merit in all of the provisions it contains, we are concerned that the Bill will not create a significant shift in the empowerment of Scotland’s most disempowered communities, unless it is amended and strengthened.

Together with Oxfam Scotland and Poverty Alliance we have created a number of proposals that we believe would help ensure the Bill empowers all communities. One of these is a proposal to place the National Standards for Community Engagement onto a statutory basis.

Standards for community engagement
There is much good practice in the public sector when it comes to consultation with communities. However, this practice is not always of a consistently high standard. To genuinely involve communities in the design of public services, the high quality involvement of communities in local decision making must become second nature to public services, as well as being a part of their everyday core purpose.

There are already existing National Standards for Community Engagement, that have been endorsed by a number of national agencies, but their implementation is varied across Scotland, and the passing of a Community Empowerment Act would create an ideal moment to renew them and place them on a statutory footing. Requiring all public bodies to adhere to a set of national standards for the engagement of communities, and to regularly report on them, would be a major advance for the rights of communities to participate in decisions that affect them.

A key part of the standards should be a focus on addressing inequality and empowering Scotland’s most disempowered communities.

More than two thirds of respondents to the Scottish Government’s consultation on Community Empowerment in summer 2012 responded favourably to this proposal, including a clear majority of local authorities and other public bodies. The Scottish Government’s Policy Memorandum on the Bill does not include any explanation of why this proposal has since been dropped.

It may be helpful, in amending the Bill, to make it a requirement for public bodies to follow the National Engagement Standards or other statutory guidance when undertaking particular forms of engagement with communities. We would suggest that, in particular, CPPs should have to follow the standards for community engagement when engaging with communities participatively to draw up local outcomes improvement plans. Ministers should also have to follow the standards when involving people in Scotland in drawing up national outcomes under Part 1 of the Bill. Other engagement exercises, which public bodies must now undertake under recent legislative changes, where a requirement to follow the National Engagement Standards could include consultation on children’s services plans, as required by the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014, consultation on procurement strategies required by the Procurement Reform (Scotland) Act 2014 and consultation on the creation of integration schemes under the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Act 2014, should be considered.

4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

The parts of the Bill that have most relationship to Barnardo’s Scotland’s work are parts 1, 2 and 3. We have supplied further comment on these sections, and suggestions for changes that would further strengthen the Bill, below.

National Outcomes – Part 1

Barnardo’s Scotland welcomes the embedding of the National Performance Framework (NPF) into legislation, as we support a focus on outcomes across public services. Indeed, we believe that the embedding of an outcomes focus into the exercise of government has the potential to become an extremely important part of the democratic process in Scotland. We have said before that the Outcomes in the NPF are overdue for review, as some have been overtaken by events, and the requirement in legislation that this Bill provides for them to be regularly reviewed is welcome.

However, we are keen to suggest a number of ways in which we believe that the National Outcomes part of the Bill can be strengthened.

If the creation of National Outcomes is going to be a process that is empowering for people in Scotland, then it is important that national outcomes are created through a participative process that involves people who live and work in Scotland. On that basis, we believe it is important that the provisions in the Bill which require Ministers to consult on the creation of national outcomes are strengthened, to make it clear that everybody should have an opportunity to have an input. We also believe it should be made clear that children and young people, and organisations working with children and young people, should have an opportunity to shape the national outcomes, in order that the voices of children and young people do not become marginalised or ignored. We also suggest that Ministers should have to follow standards for community engagement when consulting on the national outcomes, to help ensure that consultation occurs in a positive and effective way.

We also believe that the Parliament should give consideration to whether parliamentary scrutiny of the national outcomes, would be an appropriate mechanism to help ensure that Ministers have involved people who live and work in Scotland in a participative process to determine the National Outcomes.

The recently passed Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014 created a new requirement on Ministers to take steps to secure the further effect in Scotland of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC)\(^8\). On that basis we suggest that the Bill should be amended to include a requirement of Ministers to undertake and publish a Children’s Rights Impact Assessment, and then take account of it, before the National Outcomes are finalised.

There are also a number of outcomes that have already been placed into legislation by other pieces of legislation and we believe it is important that the Community Empowerment Bill is appropriately linked to these other pieces of legislation. In particular, we would not wish to see the Bill overshadow the requirements of the Child Poverty Act 2010, which require the Scottish Ministers to achieve a particular set of outcomes, relating to levels of child poverty in Scotland, by 2020. These important outcomes, which continue to enjoy cross-party support in Scotland, should not be superseded by the National Outcomes provision in the Bill. We therefore suggest that the Parliament consider appropriate mechanisms to ensure that the statutory child poverty targets continue to be key national outcomes.

Similarly, the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014 creates a set of wellbeing outcomes for each child in Scotland, collectively described as SHANARRI. This outcome definition has wide support and is already in use by many professionals working with children in Scotland. The SHANARRI framework has also been linked to the rights set out in the UNCRC\(^9\). Again, the Parliament should consider what opportunities exist to link the national outcomes to the SHANARRI wellbeing definition.

Community Planning – Part 2
Barnardo’s Scotland has long been supportive of moves by successive Scottish Governments to support greater working across organisational boundaries within the public sector. This is most obvious in the development of Community Planning, but is also evident in the provisions in the Children & Young People (Scotland) Act 2014 and the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Act 2014 which both also create local joint service plans, with a statutory footing. Barnardo’s Scotland welcomes this kind of cross public-sector working for the potential improvements in effectiveness and efficiency that it brings, and we therefore support placing community planning onto a statutory basis in order to further improve joint-working across public bodies. We therefore particularly welcome the emphasis that the Bill gives on community planning as a shared endeavour of all public bodies in the area, and we believe that this will help to address the perception that community planning is primarily the responsibility of the local authority, rather than a shared endeavour.

However, as the Scottish Government has recognised, placing Community Planning onto a statutory basis provides a golden opportunity to improve its functioning. We have provided a number of ways in which community planning could be strengthened through the Bill below.

Making community empowerment central to Community Planning
The role of Community Planning in creating joint working between public bodies should not be confused with the purpose of involving communities in planning their future and their public services. As things stand, the focus of CPPs tends to be on bringing public bodies together to plan for communities. In the spirit of the Christie Commission, this must be fundamentally changed, so that, instead, communities come together with agencies to co-produce their public services.

The need for change is supported by the 2013 Audit Scotland report on Community Planning\(^\text{10}\), which found that:

We therefore suggest that the Bill is strengthened, so that the local outcomes improvement plans that each CPP must create (the equivalents of current single outcome agreements) have to be created through a participative process of community engagement. This would also bring the Bill together ensuring that community empowerment is a common thread throughout the Bill, including in Part 2.

The Bill currently places a great deal of emphasis on the role of community groups, and whilst community groups have a very valuable role and their recognition is welcome in the Bill, their role should not be a substitute for direct engagement. This is particularly the case in the most disempowered communities, which, by definition, tend to have the least community capacity. Whilst the Bill includes a duty to support the participation of community groups in community planning, the Bill does not include any resources, or any duty on public bodies, to support the formation of community groups or the connecting of communities.

The Bill should also make it clear that Community Planning Partnerships, when involving people participatively in the creation of local outcomes improvement plans, should involve children and young people. This would also ensure that the Bill is consistent with the duties imposed by the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014 on public bodies to further the rights of children (which includes a right for children to be involved in decisions which affect them) and the duty imposed on health boards and local authorities to consult users and potential users of children’s services in constructing a children’s services plan.

It is also important that the quality of involvement of people is high, and we therefore suggest that Community Planning Partnerships are required to follow the Community Engagement Standards (suitably revised, and placed on a statutory footing by the Bill) when drawing up a local outcomes improvement plan. In particular, we would hope that suitable recognition of equality, poverty and socio-economic disadvantage within the community engagement standards would help ensure that CPPs involve, and give power to the most disempowered and disadvantaged communities.

Lastly, as we have previously referenced there are diverse notions of community, and the way people experience their communities is often different to how statutory bodies define communities. For example, in its current consultation duty, the Bill does not recognise that for many people ‘community’ means a rather smaller and more local area than the scale of a CPP. For example, in our experience, for many families with young children, the primary school catchment area is much closer to their understanding of their local community. As things stand, there is currently limited development across Scotland of this scale of micro-local decision making and involvement. Even where Local Authorities have developed micro-local decision making or planning processes, or where there are thriving community councils, there may not be strong links between the more local decision making and the geographic scale of planning at CPP level. Most CPPs will have a more nuanced understanding of the communities in the CPP area, and we suggest that the Bill could be amended to require CPPs to demonstrate the range and nature of communities in their area, and how this links to the outcomes identified with those communities. This could be particularly important in terms of addressing inequalities, as it could also require CPPs to identify those communities (whether geographic or otherwise) that are particularly disadvantaged, disempowered or vulnerable, and consequently demonstrate in their outcomes how they would make a particular difference for those communities.

The role of the Third Sector in Community Planning
The Third Sector makes a significant contribution to the delivery of services and improvement of outcomes across Scotland. This has been reflected in the involvement of Third Sector Interfaces (TSIs) as the representatives of the third sector in every Community Planning Partnership in Scotland. Barnardo’s Scotland is of the view that this involvement by the third sector in community planning must continue, and there must be a continuing right for TSIs to be full partners in community planning partnerships, in order to represent the contribution that the third sector makes to improved local outcomes. This may require complicated legislation, to ensure that TSIs do not become subject to ministerial direction or control and maintain their important independence from government, however, we believe that it is possible to find a way that embeds the role of TSIs within community planning partnerships, and that this is very much desirable.

Whilst the Bill currently recognises the role of ‘community bodies’ in legislation, Barnardo’s Scotland does not believe that this definition would include (or is intended to include) TSIs.

Alignment with the remainder of the Scottish Government’s programme of public service reform
The Scottish Parliament has recently passed a number of other Bills that form part of the Scottish Government’s programme of public service reform. In order that the Bill is as effective as possible in empowering communities, Barnardo’s Scotland believes it is imperative that the Bill fits with the remainder of the Scottish Government’s programme of public service reform.

The recently passed Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014 requires health boards and local authorities to jointly produce children’s services plans. Barnardo’s Scotland believes it is important that there is close co-ordination between local outcomes plans and children’s services plans, and that community planning does not supersede children’s services planning. MSPs should consider opportunities in the legislation to ensure that this co-ordination takes place.

The Children and Young People Act also makes clear some of the issues that children’s services plans must address. This includes a focus on early intervention within children’s services plans. A greater focus on early intervention has cross-party support in the parliament, proven financial benefits and was highlighted in the Christie Commission final report as a priority for change. Nevertheless there is still progress to be made in achieving a significant shift in public spending, across the board, towards early intervention. However, we were disappointed to see that there was not an explicit focus on early intervention within the Bill. In order that this does not become a missed opportunity, we suggest that again consideration is given to opportunities within the Bill to further focus public bodies on early intervention and preventative spending.

Barnardo’s Scotland and NSPCC Scotland also recently published a joint report, Challenges from the frontline: Supporting families with multiple adversities in a time of austerity, which reported experiences from the managers of 14 services across Scotland. The report found that families were finding it increasingly difficult to make ends meet and that there were a growing number of families experiencing very extreme forms of poverty and destitution. The report’s conclusion recommends that all public services take responsibility for addressing child poverty, and that they set out how they will do this in the range of plans that they are now required to produce as

A result of recent legislation\(^{12}\). In turn, we suggest that there is a need to ensure that all CPPs take responsibility for addressing child poverty on a local level through community planning processes, in order that Scotland achieves its duties under the Child Poverty Act 2010. We would recommend that the Committee and MSPs consider options for how this could be ensured through this Bill.

Lastly, we would welcome clarification from the Scottish Government that any body-corporates established under the Public Bodies (Joint Working) Act 2014 are suitably included under the Act, that they would be suitably required to contribute to Community Planning Partnerships and that they would be subject to the participation request provisions. This may be an area in which amendments to the Bill as introduced are necessary. Additionally, we would welcome clarification from the Scottish Government as to whether there is a need to amend any aspects of the Public Bodies Act, which includes a schedule of local authority duties that may be delegated to an integration scheme\(^{13}\), to ensure that, in the event that key services are integrated, integration bodies are able to suitably contribute to community planning partnerships.

Participatory Budgeting

Barnardo’s Scotland supports the principle that people using services are experts in those services, and are often best-placed to judge how those services can be improved and made more effective. This applies just as much in decisions about where funding can be directed, and this means communities are well placed to determine which services are most beneficial to the community and therefore should be a priority for public spending. Community engagement in decisions about funding are also very much engagements that give people a strong sense of involvement in important decisions. On this basis Barnardo’s Scotland supports the further development of participatory budgeting approaches, of all types, in Scotland.

Although there is a great deal of enthusiasm for participatory budgeting across Scotland there are only pockets of existing good practice, and therefore Barnardo’s Scotland, along with Oxfam Scotland and the Poverty Alliance, sees the Community Empowerment Bill as an opportunity to further extend the use of participatory budgeting approaches by public bodies in Scotland. In particular we recommend that, in order to give community planning partnerships an initial focus on participatory budgeting, each Community Planning Partnership is required to set aside 1% of its budget (calculated on the basis of the combined local spend by the statutory partners in the area covered by the CPP) to be decided on by an appropriate community participation process.

Participation Requests – Part 3

The policy memorandum describes these provisions as additional to the requirements on public bodies to regularly consult and involve communities in decision making. On this basis, and notwithstanding our recommendations about how the regular duties of public bodies should be strengthened through putting the Community Engagement Standards onto a statutory footing, we support the creation of these additional provisions.

“The first round of Children’s Services Plans, which will be required under Part 3 of the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014, the strategic plans created by each of the integration authorities created by the Public Bodies (Joint Working) Act 2014 and the procurement strategies developed by public bodies under the Procurement Reform (Scotland) Act 2014 will all have a major impact on the future shape of children’s services. ... We would hope that the wider issues raised by this research – the impact of austerity, benefit sanctions or delays in payments and increasing prices for basic commodities – are recognised as the context for these new statutory plans, and that tackling the growth in, and changing nature of, child and family poverty is therefore recognised as a key priority.”

However, our view is that there needs to be a clearer arbitration and review mechanism, in order that this right can be fairly and equitably exercised by all communities. The current proposals give the public body the power to decide whether to accept or decline requests, as well as how to facilitate requests and so on. We therefore believe that a third party must be able to act as the protector of this right, through a challenge mechanism or appeals procedure. On the basis that the involvement in decision making is very much a human right (and is also recognised as a right of the child in the UNCRC), we suggest that the Scottish Human Rights Commission could be an appropriate body for appeals to be directed to, recognising that this might require some changes in the responsibilities of the SHRC, and that there are also other bodies that could provide a suitably independent appeals facility.

We are also concerned that there is no provision in the Bill that would place a duty on public bodies to support the involvement of community organisations in participation processes (in the event that a participation request is accepted) or a duty that would require public bodies to support communities to come together, connect, form community groups and make participation requests. We suggest an order making power for Ministers, which would allow them to address these issues in further statutory regulation or guidance.

To further ensure that all communities are able to take advantage of the new right and to exercise it in a way that gives them power in relation to the public body, we suggest that the Bill requires public bodies to give an opportunity for the community body to contribute to the final report required in section 25 of the Bill as introduced. We also suggest that the list of matters that a public body must take into account when reaching a decision about a participation request is extended to include poverty, inequality and the rights of children.

In this evidence we have raised a number of concerns relating to the impact of the Bill on socially and economically disadvantaged communities, and set out a number of ways that we believe that this can be addressed.

We have also set out a number of ways in which we believe the Bill can be strengthened in order to ensure that children have equal access to the rights set out in the Bill. We are disappointed that a children’s rights impact assessment of the Bill was not carried out, particularly given the new duty imposed on Ministers through the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014 to take steps to promote and improve access to the rights set out in the UNCRC.
The Community Empowerment and Renewal Bill

About HIV Scotland

HIV Scotland is the national HIV policy charity for Scotland: we speak out for people living with and at risk of HIV. We want a society which is well informed about HIV and devoid of HIV related stigma and discrimination. Our mission is to ensure that all HIV relevant policy and practice in Scotland is grounded in evidence and the experience of people living with and affected by HIV.

Introduction

The most effective way to ensure the best outcomes for people living with and at risk of HIV is to involve them in all aspects and decisions about their health and care. The 2014 Positive Persons’ Forum which brought together people living with HIV from across Scotland, named patient involvement as one of five priority issues for change. This Bill is of particular relevance to people living with and at risk of HIV, given its implications for increased involvement of communities in the work of public bodies. The Bill has the potential to ensure that communities are meaningfully involved in the planning, design and delivery of public services. However, HIV Scotland believes that the provisions in the Bill require to be strengthened if this potential is to be realised and to ensure a genuine focus on the needs and rights of individual patients and service users.

To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

Involvement in decisions that affect you as referenced by the UN convention on the rights of persons with disabilities and Scotland’s National Action Plan is a principle which underpins a human rights based approach to health and social care. Involving people in decision making processes also helps ensure that services are responsive, flexible and able to meet the needs of all communities. It is therefore essential that people living with and at risk of HIV are empowered to participate in the decision making processes of public bodies. Despite some significant improvements in understanding of HIV, people living with and at risk of HIV are sometimes still an ostracised and disempowered community and for this reason, HIV Scotland welcomes the Scottish Government’s plans to pass a Community Empowerment Bill.

However the Bill, as it stands, could have unintended negative consequences for some less well established community groups, including those working with people living with HIV, which are currently marginalised from mainstream engagement.

The current Bill provides additional routes to engagement for established community bodies who are already well placed to make use of them. Our concern is that there are no provisions to ensure that public bodies support less empowered, less formalised bodies such as peer groups of people living with HIV, sex workers, and LGBT communities to take advantage of these routes.

If communities of interest are to be affectively empowered and barriers to engagement in decision making processes removed, public bodies also need to proactively inform communities of their rights as proposed in this Bill. Public sector staff will need support to understand and fulfil their roles and responsibilities. Successful implementation of these proposals will require guidance for public bodies in supporting peer community projects to meaningfully engage with them.

What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

In order for public services to be truly successful in their aims, it is vital that the people using those services are involved in their development and delivery from the offset. For this reason we consider the provisions in this Bill to be of benefit to public sector organisations by advancing their ability to deliver quality, flexible services which are able to meet the needs of all communities.

However, public sector organisations will also need to acknowledge that the voluntary sector has a key role to play, both in engaging people and communities and giving them a voice in decisions which affect them.

The Bill makes some positive proposals to help communities have more control in local decision making and builds on examples of good practice in patient and service user involvement. However, it will be critical that there is a consistency across Scotland in the extent to which people living with and at risk of HIV are able to take advantage of provisions in the Bill.

We support proposals by Oxfam, Barnardos and the Poverty Alliance to renew existing national standards for community engagement. We agree that the Bill should enable Ministers to create statutory regulations for the engagement and empowerment of communities, which all public bodies must follow and regularly report upon. We also believe that a key part of the standards should focus on empowering communities of interest rather than just those of place and are supportive of proposals to require Community Planning Partnerships to adhere to the Standards when they are creating a local outcomes improvement plans.

However, if community engagement standards are to be relevant to patients and service users, consideration needs to be given as to how such standards would interact with existing policy. This includes: the Patient Rights (Scotland) Act 2011\(^4\), General Medical Council’s guidance for shared decision-making\(^5\) and British HIV Association ‘Standards of Care for People Living with HIV\(^6\). The new standards should be easy to understand and patients and service users should be informed about how to effectively use them.

Involvement in decision making is central to a human rights based approach to health and social care and it is paramount that people living with and at risk of HIV are active participants in the design and delivery of services. It is therefore welcome that the Bill proposes protecting the existence of Community Planning Partnerships (CPPs) and creates a community’s right to request to participate in decision making and improvement processes.

We believe that these proposals have the potential to increase the participation of people living with and at risk of HIV in service delivery. However, in the spirit of the Christie Commission, it is important that the Bill also challenges the existing hierarchy and focus of community planning in order that people living with and at risk of HIV can meaningfully influence the planning of the services they use.

Taking into account comments in the 2013 Audit Scotland report on Community Planning which said that “there is a long way to go before services are truly designed around communities and the potential of local people to participate in, shape and improve local services is realised”, the Bill needs to clearly articulate how local outcomes improvement plans will be produced through a meaningfully participative process.

Regarding the proposed ‘right to request to participate; current proposals give public bodies the power to decide whether to accept or decline requests, as well as how to facilitate them. A more robust challenge mechanism is required in order to ensure that the proposals are fairly implemented for the benefit of people living with and at risk of HIV. We agree with the proposal that it would be preferable to have an independent third party act as a facilitator and mediator through a challenge mechanism or appeals procedure.

5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

HIV Scotland supports the principles of the Bill and doesn’t consider that it would have a negative impact on the rights of people living with and at risk of HIV. The Bill has the potential to help communities better exercise their right to be involved in decisions that affect them and to particularly help marginalised groups identified by the World Health Organisation as the key groups at risk of HIV. These include gay men and other men who have sex with men, transgender people, prisoners, people who inject drugs and sex workers.

The Scottish Parliament’s Local Government and Regeneration Committee has invited organisations and individuals to submit written evidence to the Committee setting out their views on the provisions of the Bill.

Committee’s Call for Evidence

The Committee is inviting responses in relation to the following questions:

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

   Overall the Bill itself will not empower communities on its own, success in this area will be determined by how communities and the public sector respond to the provisions and aspirations contained in it, and to what extent it acts as a catalyst to encourage increased participation and action on specific projects.

   The Bill creates opportunities for communities, however whether it will empower remains to be seen. Certainly it provides opportunities to develop community participation and engagement in decision-making and delivery of outcomes and services generally. For this to be successful, communities need to be supported and enabled to take up these opportunities. Capacity building is critical to ensuring that all communities are empowered and can be involved in improving outcomes. Without real support (both practical and in kind) many communities/bodies will be precluded from fully engaging or pursuing the opportunities presented by the Bill, and it will be those community groups with a fortunate blend of members or access to commercial support who will most likely benefit. This in turn may lead to frustration and disengagement for some and it could also increase inequality of community engagement and access to opportunities.

   Throughout the Bill there are different definitions used for community bodies etc. It is essential that whichever definition applies, that the focus is on the needs and wishes of the community itself as opposed to those “representing” that community. It is also essential for there to be mechanisms to ensure that groups do in fact represent the stated community.
The Bill allows communities to identify local issues/priorities and how they would wish to contribute to addressing these priorities by delivering certain services or assisting public bodies in the delivery of services. This may assist in the setting of local priorities, action plans and through additional community involvement local resources to assist in the delivery of shared objectives.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions of the Bill?

There are definite challenges and opportunities for public sector groups. The following are some of the potential implications.

Benefits

The Bill provides an opportunity to ensure genuine community engagement, consultation and active participation by citizens in identifying local needs and involvement in setting priority outcomes and how they should be addressed. Also, in theory, it provides public sector partners with the opportunity to rewrite the way we engage with communities for the better and involve local people more in seeking and participating in local solutions to local issues through “co-production” and community led service design and delivery.

Also, by opening up all public services to participation requests and making participation opportunities core within service delivery there is the potential for improved service delivery and improving public perceptions of public bodies service delivery alongside a better public understanding of existing decision making processes and constraints.

For local authorities and community planning partners it reinforces the importance of the Single Outcome Agreement, joint accountability for delivery, and the need to engage citizens fully in the processes of planning services and plans that deliver improved outcomes. This should strengthen community planning and ensure a wider understanding of what community planning is seeking to achieve, the shared goals of the partnership and ultimately improved accountability for public bodies to the communities they serve. Potentially, this may contribute towards improved public health and social well being, safer communities and through regeneration better economic outcomes for our most disadvantaged communities and individuals.

The provision in the Bill relating to transfer of assets provides public bodies with the opportunity to transfer surplus and unused assets, thereby acquiring a capital receipt and saving on existing property/maintenance costs. If these types of assets can be moved quickly then better use can be made of existing assets, reduction in backlog maintenance and better use of budgets on core assets.

We agree with the note included on page 58 of the financial memorandum i.e a case by case basis for assessment of financial consequences is required.

For community groups that may have an interest in these assets this could provide an opportunity for them to hold and manage assets to deliver initiatives and projects to the benefit of their organisation and the wider community. Community groups have the potential to attract sources of funding not available to the public sector, borrow investment funds against an asset and via the development of social enterprises bring unused, or underused, assets into use that can become financially viable and contributing towards an improved property infrastructure available in the city.

The requirement to maintain an asset register is a positive provision and should have regard to the practicalities of being responsible for land that has been in public ownership for centuries. Likewise, the similar requirements in relation to Common Good assets and how they are being used will improve transparency.

In principle, the aspirations around increasing allotment space has the potential to increase the “green” aspects of the city and support increased citizen activity, encouraging healthy eating and growing linking to SOA outcomes around improving health.

Disadvantages

The Bill has the potential to significantly reduce the control/determination of what happens to publically owned assets. This loss of flexibility e.g. in determining whether to market estate commercially/for full market value could lead to subsequent loss of income and receipt.
The issues around transfer price requires to be addressed and given further clarity as the assumption of a transfer at market value is not clear. If properties are transferred at less than market value this will impact on capital planning from loss of capital receipt and there may be state aid implications.

There may be additional costs to a public body in terms of staff and asset management costs maintaining an unused property for the time taken to deal with a transfer request by a community body including an appeal, where relevant.

In responding to transfer requests, potentially from multiple community bodies making requests for the same asset, officer involvement from a range of skills and expertise will be required as part of assessing bids and quantifying community benefit.

In relation to Common Good assets if the common good asset holding is large and not transparently documented it may require considerable efforts to create and maintain an accessible register.

Based on the figures supplied - Aberdeen City Council’s Common Good makes up approx. a third of the total city assets therefore Aberdeen has one of the most substantial asset bases of Common Good land in Scotland. While we have a significant asset register that ensures the Common Good secures the rental income it is entitled to, there are occasions, when selling other Council land, the title search is performed resulting in the identification of land that is actually in Common Good ownership. To undertake a detailed review of every title, which date back centuries would in our view be cost prohibitive.

Further clarification is required in relation to Common good assets – definition/other statutory requirements including critchel downs.

In relation to Localised Rates relief currently we have 9 schemes for rate relief, this covers 3528 buildings and the total relief value is £21.6m (41% of properties in Aberdeen currently have some form of relief).

An additional scheme could be considered, systems can cope, but cost would be the Council’s and a procedure/scheme would need to be established to identify why/who. We are not clear at this point whether this is required.

There are so many schemes for some form of rates relief it is unclear what the additional benefit would be of another one.
Finally, in relation to potentially having to provide additional land for allotments it is not clear how funding for this would be sourced.

Community capacity and capability will vary. For communities to be truly empowered, affordable and accessible independent support will be required e.g. professional/commercial/financial and technical advice etc. Awareness raising and significant marketing will also be required to ensure that all communities are aware of the rights and opportunities afforded by the proposed legislation, not just those who are accustomed to engaging in this way, or who have members/volunteers with the knowledge and/or confidence to pursue the opportunities afforded by the bill.

Community bodies and groups do not always speak with one voice so there will be a need to consider how the various voices that may at times conflict, or oppose, can be considered and ensuring that community empowerment goes beyond those citizens who are already actively involved. This is perhaps an area as the Bill is implemented that the Scottish Government may want to develop good practice guidelines.

Support requirements will vary from community to community and in particular this should be channelled towards engaging with previously excluded or hard to reach communities and those with specific difficulties in some of the processes envisaged by the Bill e.g. submitting written applications or responses to consultation.

There will need to be extra support provided to support communities to create plans and effectively participate in outcome setting processes via community planning. Due diligence will be needed within projects particularly where purchase of property and transfer of assets is under consideration. The Third Sector Interfaces i.e. Aberdeen Council for Voluntary Organisation here, currently provide some of this type of support but would need to increase staff numbers if the bill was to encourage a regular stream of proposals where community groups and organisations might be seeking independent support.

The potential complexity of individual projects may also require funding for project appraisal by “professionals” in order that correct, legal and financial advice is sought by communities. Whilst some communities will undoubtedly be able to secure pro bono support from such firms, not all will and if not there immediately exists an inequality in the provision.

4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

Clarification on common good and an ability for Council’s to transfer inalienable common good land to communities, where there is agreement, without the need of seeking consent from the Court of Session.

More flexibility for Councils to transfer common good land between council functions.

- Is the bill consistent with the Disposal of land by local authorities (Scotland) Regulations 2010.
- Do public sector partners have similar mechanisms to transfer assets
- Does the bill have to consider restriction on sale/ common good/ HRA/ critchel downs/ title burdens/ land held for future development.
- Asset transfer request has a presumption on transfer to communities taking away the discretion of a LA to manage their own assets.
- Is further consideration required to consider how competing community interests are dealt with.
- Are displacement issues mentioned in provision of facilities and state aid.
- Definition of common good assets required. Appropriate that a register is established albeit this may be an ongoing process.
- Common Good property may fall outwith the scope of the land disposal regs 2010.
• Concern over any CPO powers for communities in relation to complexity, legal process and skill to implement.
• Further work required to identify a range of detailed reasons to refuse an application. – Council property asset management plan. Market value with other sites etc.?

Equality – it is difficult to be specific in identifying potential problems, however there is scope for inequality and public bodies will have to be vigilant in implementing the terms of the Bill e.g. where a community body seeks to acquire an asset to prevent its use by another group. There is also an issue in relation to the various definitions of community group/body as they all appear to be focused on geographical communities. The inclusion of communities of interest, would perhaps increase the positive impacts of the Bill, as it would help encourage engagement by groups of people with a shared interest.

In addition to the above, and as stated previously, care will be required to ensure that all communities are enabled and supported to develop. Otherwise, communities where there is already capability and capacity will gain more from the Bill, leaving others behind. Community capacity building and support must be properly resourced.

Environment/Sustainability - The Bill throws up some concerns in relation to environmental and sustainability issues e.g where a building which is the subject of an asset transfer request is listed or otherwise classified. Public Bodies need the assurance that they can require robust evidence/guarantees from a community body that they are aware of any restrictions and the difficulties in managing those restrictions e.g. additional maintenance costs etc.

Generally, there must also be absolute clarity in relation to responsibilities and costs in terms of compliance with environmental issues e.g. energy performance.
There are also positive implications in relation to environmental and sustainability issues. The potential for communities to acquire abandoned and neglected land will help promote sustainable development and communities by bringing such assets back into productive and beneficial use.

COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT BILL
ADDITIONAL COMMENTS ON THE DRAFT LEGISLATION

PART 1 NATIONAL OUTCOMES
Commentary/Analysis
National outcomes will clearly shape local outcomes and priorities. As such national outcomes will need to be sufficiently wide so as to apply to all communities so as to ensure relevance, and must not impinge on the ability of local communities to set local outcomes which are relevant to local circumstances.

There is a lack of certainty around consultation and reporting. It would perhaps be clearer and enhance transparency if the Scottish ministers were required to consult with a list of specific bodies and required regular reporting within a statutory time table which references a minimum frequency.

PART 2 COMMUNITY PLANNING
Commentary/Analysis
The statutory basis for the CPP and its functions is important in underlining its significance and enabling improvements. This is also mirrored by the statutory emphasis on outcomes and an outcomes based approach.

Throughout the Bill there are different definitions used for community bodies etc. It is essential that whichever definition applies, that the focus is on the needs and wishes of the community itself as opposed to those “representing” that community. It is also essential for there to be mechanisms to ensure that groups do in fact represent the stated community and are reflective and representative of communities and are also pursuing the community’s interests.

Whilst it makes sense for the CPP to co-ordinate arrangements for partnership working there may be tensions with other reform and integration initiatives, such as adult health and social care integration. It may be worth specifically listing each Integrated Joint Body as an organisation required to participate in the CPP in its own right.

PART 3 PARTICIPATION REQUESTS
Commentary/Analysis
It is unclear what arrangements would apply if two, or more Community Participation Bodies, which relate to the same community, make a participation request at the same time. The Council, and the Community Participation bodies, could potentially find themselves in situations where two groups, representing the same community, but with diametrically opposing views, are seeking to participate. The potential for conflict would therefore seem obvious.

Further, if one body makes a participation request that is approved, then other bodies appear to then be excluded from participation if their outcome is the same or substantially the same given that their requests can then be declined before consideration.

There appears to be no provision allowing the authority to decline to consider a participation request deemed to be vexatious or malicious in nature.

It is not clear if the authority has the final decision on a participation request or if ‘rights of appeal’ against the authority’s decision will apply.

Existing forums for community representation / community involvement in outcome improvement processes may be undermined by the very formal nature of the process outlined in Part 3 and some communities may be disengaged / disempowered as a result.

Additionally, the requirement to prepare a submission detailing why the community participation body should participate in the outcome improvement process may impede the ability of some bodies to participate, particularly those with little or no support and those for whom communication may not be particularly easy.

Community participation bodies may find themselves in a position where, having had a participation request agreed, they are bound into the outcome improvement process. Depending on the development of the outcome improvement process, this may have adverse implications on the body’s ability to represent the views of the community and may stifle Community Empowerment rather than enhance it.

It is not clear where the onus for communicating with the wider community about outcome improvement processes will sit – whether with the public service authority or the Community participation body. Should this not be clear, and followed through on, the wider community may feel less empowered than before.

The potential for fairly ‘piecemeal’ involvement for communities in outcome improvement processes appears to be fairly high. If the community participation body requires to make a formal request to participate in each process, the potential for opportunities to be ‘missed’ may increase. There would need to be safeguards to ensure that communities remain engaged with the wider community planning agenda.

It is unclear what the implication, if any, will be if, once a participation request is approved, the body is unable to, or refuses to, then participate in the outcome improvement process.
PART 4 COMMUNITY RIGHT TO BUY LAND
Commentary/Analysis
Whilst this right has applied in rural communities for 10 years, the Bill now proposes to extend its application to urban areas. It also introduces a new community right to acquire abandoned and neglected land where the seller is not agreeable to a sale. As such it will apply within the Aberdeen City boundaries once the Bill is enacted and brought into force.

Value/transfer value?? Will the Disposal of Land by Local Authorities (Scotland) Regulations apply? It would be helpful for this to be clarified.

Timescales – extending the deadline for completion could mean that the Council ends up paying more to maintain an asset. Also, opportunities may be lost if the purchase doesn’t complete.

Community right to buy for urban communities may deliver significant benefits to the community, where the community’s activities are consistent with the Council’s objectives.

It may be prudent to include reference to potential restrictions on transfer/disposal of land e.g. HRA, Common Good, or other legal restrictions on the Council’s ability to transfer ownership e.g. where land was acquired by CPO – will the Crichel Downs rules still apply? If these restrictions are made clear from the outset then they could feature in the Scottish Ministers’ consideration of an application.

HRA land – should this be included within the community right to buy? If so, what cognisance will/should be taken of the restrictions already in place e.g. consultation with tenants?

On the face of it, the proposals for abandoned and neglected are to be welcomed, however there may be human rights challenges as the Bill proposes that Scottish Ministers can extinguish an individual’s ownership rights. There should perhaps be greater clarification in terms of the community benefit to be secured in such a transfer, thereby making it more akin to compulsory purchase.

Landowners may hold on to land for various reasons which may not require maintenance of the site. The Bill could provide an incentive for these owners to ensure that sites are properly maintained, even when not in use.

PART 5 ASSET TRANSFER REQUESTS
Commentary/Analysis
Value/transfer value?? Will the Disposal of Land by Local Authorities (Scotland) Regulations apply? It would be helpful and avoid conflict, delay and expense if this were clarified.
What is more than one community body is interested in the same asset?

Should a public body be required to intimate receipt and consideration of a request to any other public bodies that may be interested in the same asset?

What if the request conflicts with the interests of another community/community body?

There should perhaps be further consideration in relation to public companies and the likes as there may be external funding arrangements in place which are not conducive to these provisions.

PART 6 COMMON GOOD PROPERTY

Commentary/Analysis

Common good property is not defined, therefore it is not clear whether the provisions are restricted to heritable property or extend to moveable assets also? For the purposes of this commentary, I have assumed that it is restricted to heritable property, however even this poses a problem given that there is no standard, agreed definition of common good property. This may result in divergent views as to whether property is, in fact, held on common good and whether it can or cannot be transferred.

On the face of it, the idea of a common good register makes sense in terms of good asset management and transparency. The difficulty may be in the creation of the register. Title checks often throw up unknown common good issues. If it is envisaged that the initial register must contain all property held on common good (as opposed to all property known or believed to be held on common good) then it will create a significant resource issue for the Council as the Council’s extensive property holding will require to be checked. This is a massive exercise and would take up substantial staff time, thereby diverting limited resources away from operational work. It is proposed that the Council should be required to establish and maintain a register of property which is known or believed to be held on common good and which can be updated as other common good property comes to light.

As a follow on from this, it would assist the Council if there was clear direction regarding the on-going maintenance of the common good register. How often should it be reviewed or updated and how often should an amended version be published? Should the Council produce a list of properties and consult with community bodies prior to publishing an updated or amended common good register. If there is no clear guidance or direction re this, then it is almost certain that different practices will develop in each local authority area.

The Bill sets out certain conditions which the Council must comply with before disposing of common good property, including consultation with community bodies and complying with any guidance issued by Scottish Ministers. However the Bill is silent in respect of other statutory obligations e.g. the duty to secure best value and s.75 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973, which requires the Council to obtain consent of the Court of Session before it can transfer ownership or otherwise dispose of common good property which is inalienable, even to a community body for the benefit of the community. Indeed, in these circumstances the Council is prohibited from even transferring the common good property from one holding account or function to another. Therefore, in terms of the Bill as drafted, the Council may be in a position where it has undertaken extensive community engagement but is ultimately precluded from transferring common good property to a community body by the Court of Session. This would appear to undermine the intention to increase community empowerment. Even where consent is forthcoming, the process involved will cause substantial delays which may have knock on consequences e.g. in relation to the condition and state of repair of the common good property and may ultimately compromise transfer to a community body.

There is an opportunity within the Bill to deliver a genuine improvement in relation to common good property by removing the need for court consent so long as the transfer is within the Council’s functions or to a community body, and where there has been a comprehensive and robust consultation exercise leading to unanimity in terms of the transfer and/or change of use for the community’s benefit.

Publish details of proposed disposal/change of use – This might impinge on commercial confidentiality considerations, which may adversely affect the value that a Council can secure for a property by putting potential private purchasers off. It may also delay transactions, which again could have cost implications for the Council.

PART 7 ALLOTMENTS

Commentary/Analysis

The bill effectively requires the Council to provide allotments. Whilst there are good reasons for this, it does not take account of the potential cost. Land values in Aberdeen are high and the Bill could result in the Council requiring to spend money purchasing land or making land available (which it would otherwise sell for a capital receipt) for the purposes of providing allotments.

The delegation of powers to tenants may result in a saving for the Council and allow for greater community involvement. However this could also create problems depending on how the allotment is run and whether there is harmony amongst tenant of an allotment site. The Council may find itself having to settle disputes or differences which may be more time consuming than exercising the powers itself.

The provision of allotments should perhaps be based on local priorities, as opposed to a national target.
PART 8 NON DOMESTIC RATES
The proposed amendment is relatively straight forward in terms of the legislation, however the bigger issue relates to policy/operation and whether another relief scheme is required. At present the Bill does not specify the purpose/extent of the relief scheme.
A RESPONSE FROM THE SCOTTISH FEDERATION OF HOUSING ASSOCIATIONS

IN RESPONSE TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT AND REGENERATION COMMITTEE’S CALL FOR EVIDENCE ON THE SCOTTISH GOVERNMENT’S COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL 2014

September 2014
1 Introduction

1.1 As the representative body for housing associations and housing co-operatives in Scotland, the Scottish Federation of Housing Associations (SFHA) welcomes the opportunity to comment upon the Scottish Government’s Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

1.2 To provide context, housing associations and housing co-operatives in Scotland own and manage approximately 46% of the country’s affordable social housing stock. This represents 274,996 homes across Scotland. This is concentrated in some of the poorest communities in our country.

1.3 For 35 years, the housing association sector has been at the forefront of developing, building and managing high quality homes in Scotland. The sector has shown itself able and willing to contribute to the direction of national housing policy. It has delivered effectively a range of housing solutions at a local and national level. As the Scottish Government is aware, housing associations and housing co-operatives are leaders in community involvement and empowerment across Scotland. Their role as Community Anchors is to be recognised and celebrated, in their long history of housing provision and community involvement in Scotland.

1.4 This response has been developed following consultation with our members across Scotland.

2 Committee’s Call for Evidence

2.1 The SFHA has responded to both of the Scottish Government’s consultations on the proposed content of the Bill. The issues we have raised previously remain valid now that the Bill has been introduced. The work of housing associations as community anchors in developing sustainable communities remains crucial to regenerating local areas, and housing associations continue to be key proponents of regeneration in many areas across Scotland. Community planning, if administered appropriately, is also an important mechanism in ensuring the community’s voice is heard.

2.2 The Committee has invited specific responses on the following questions:

The main aim of the first consultation paper on the proposed Bill was very strongly in favour of strengthening communities. It is the SFHA’s view that this has been lost or at least diluted in a broader sense, along with the lack of an express link to all the various strands of regeneration. The published Bill places a greater emphasis on: community ownership/right to buy; allotments; statutory authorities and large public bodies (both national and regional). If statements such as the ‘...presumption of agreement to participation requests’ (s19 (5)) was afforded greater prominence in the Bill’s structure, it would be symbolic of a commitment to empowering communities.
Whilst issues such as community right to buy are important in themselves, these areas will not be of relevance or of interest to all local areas. It is our view that communities are looking to this Bill to be a vehicle by which they could empower themselves to improve their working relationship with public authorities and other partners so as to have a more equal footing. They are also looking for help in growing and developing their skills and experiences as community groups. The Bill as currently drafted does not meet this need.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions of the Bill?

Public sector organisations will now have other partners to share some of the onerous tasks such as managing Community Planning Partnerships: conversely, they may feel that some of their control may be lost and public bodies may find this a disadvantage. There may, however, be inconsistencies between local authorities in how ‘power’ is shared, and how they are able and/or willing to deal with the potential for increased community involvement. The authorities will also have to take on new duties such as establishing, managing and maintaining the Common Good Register, and managing participation requests.

We welcome that the CPP in Glasgow has now incorporated housing association representatives to sit on its various committees, and it would be good to see this replicated around the country. This has the potential to benefit community groups by the mere fact of their recognition and inclusion. The sharing of roles in some instances will mean that public bodies may have to look differently on how they work and engage with wider groups and this will be no bad thing.

A main disadvantage to public sector organisations is the missed opportunity to effectively empower and promote community bodies to help shape and deliver the future of those communities.

It is the SFHA’s view that, under the current provisions, not all communities will have the capability to use the provisions of the Bill to their full potential. This is partly due to the lack of subsidiary/parallel funding and practical help to assist community capacity building. It is also due to the absence of practical help (perhaps on a peer- to-peer basis) to encourage and support communities to make the Bill work for them. A grass-roots approach has to be taken to ensure communities are at a good starting-point in order for them to progress, both in using the provisions of the Bill and in developing within their own areas.
4. Are you content with the specific provisions on the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

The Bill must overtly mention housing associations and co-operatives as community bodies. Housing associations and co-operatives fulfil the requirements of community controlled and led bodies perfectly. We would urge Scottish Ministers to address this omission immediately. Also, as we have stated above, there is too much emphasis on community right to buy and allotments, and not enough on how communities are to be assisted to develop and grow and enter into meaningful partnerships with public bodies.

We remain concerned about the continued lack of budgetary powers being conferred on local communities, which would truly allow them to be empowered.

5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy Memorandum?

Assessment of Equal Rights: It is useful to see reference made to the need in many cases for an Equality Impact Assessment (EQIA) to be carried out. It may be necessary to provide information to some bodies on best practice to ensure a common method of assessment is adopted by all.

With reference to compatibility with Human Rights, we would ask if the Scottish Government has satisfied itself, through specialist legal advice, that the Bill provisions are compatible with the European Convention on Human Rights?

SFHA notes with interest this comment from the Commission on Strengthening Local Authority: “…as a country we have simply become used to a culture that doesn’t empower people locally. We have an ethos where…for something to be delivered efficiently it has to be centralised, for national outcomes to be achieved, national agencies have to be created and where local discretion is available, this is often seen as a postcode lottery rather than legitimate local choice and local democratic accountability. …only a very major initiative can alter the direction of travel.”1 This Bill does not address the issues of empowerment, of helping communities to become ready to participate, and allowing for real local involvement in its basest and broadest form.

Impacts on Island Communities: In some ways, positive discrimination may be a useful tool when applying the Bill provisions to island communities. The Oxford Dictionaries define positive discrimination as “… (In the context of the allocation of resources or employment) the practice or policy of favouring individuals belonging to groups which suffer discrimination”. In responses to previous consultations on the Bill, some responses advised that the islands suffer adversely from a shortage of land for allotments in crofting areas. It may be that some stronger measure is needed than “… (suggesting)… (that) local authorities …work with other landowners and public service...

providers to discuss the possibility of allotment provision on their land."\(^2\) As the Commission on Strengthening Local Democracy said, "What is right for the islands is unlikely to be right for the cities. What is right for large rural authorities is unlikely to be what is right for our towns."\(^3\)

Another issue that is of concern to island communities in particular is absentee landowners, where communities may have difficulty in tracking someone to ask if they could purchase the land under the Community Right to Buy.

Sustainable Development: whilst recognising that the Bill provisions per se do not have any environmental impact, individual proposals may do. It is important that those bringing the proposals do undertake an Environmental Assessment if it is appropriate for them to do so.

Additional Comments

There are certain aspects of the Bill that have afforded some further questions, and which have potential resource implications (such as Part 2, (s) 5 para (1)). Besides a possible resource implication, information on firm timescales for review of the local outcomes improvement plans would have been welcome (Part 2 (s) 6 para 2 (a)).

There is a lack of information on any further appeals processes available to communities where a participation request may have been rejected by the local authority in Part 3, and it would be useful for this omission to be addressed in a formal sense.

There seems to be a ‘push’ towards enforcement, rather than encouragement of, partnership working (Part 2, (s) 4 para 10 (1)). It is better to encourage such relationships in order that they work to best effect, not try to force a relationship.

If regeneration is stated as one of the areas needing promotion or improvement, why is social housing (and housing associations in particular) omitted from this Bill as main agents of regeneration? (Part 5 (s) 55 para 5 (c)). There needs to be a link back to regeneration in its broadest sense to allow this Bill to be as rounded as possible. Both the SFHA and Glasgow and West of Scotland Forum of Housing Associations (GWSF) agree that the opportunity that this Bill afforded in terms of community empowerment may not be as obvious now as once was hoped.

We wish to see housing associations and housing co-operatives recognised in the Bill as appropriate community bodies, as mentioned in our response to question 4.

3. Conclusion

SFHA is disappointed that the Bill’s focus has been diluted since the first consultation paper and that an overt linkage to regeneration in all its forms is absent.

3.1 We would urge the Scottish Government to address issues of local involvement and empowerment through another route if these issues are not to be at the heart of this Bill.

Dear David

Call for Evidence: Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill
Local Government and Regeneration Committee Meeting 1st October 2014

I very much welcome the Local Government and Regeneration Committee’s scrutiny of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. I would like to thank you for inviting me to attend the meeting on the 1st of October to provide my views on the provisions of the Bill from a local authority perspective.

Attached in Annex A, is a written response to the public call for evidence issued by the Committee. This response addresses the five questions outlined in your letter of 25 July 2014.

I hope this written response is of value to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee and I look forward to attending the meeting on the 1st of October.

Yours sincerely

Call for Evidence: Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

Local Government and Regeneration Committee Meeting 1 October 2014

Response from John Mundell, Chief Executive, Inverclyde Council

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

The Bill will empower communities by establishing processes through which they can:

- Have influence over the design and delivery of public services
- Participate in community planning; and
- Acquire and use buildings and land for community benefit.

However, the extent of this empowerment is constrained by a number of factors:

- Not all communities will have the capability or desire to take advantage of the provisions within the Bill
- Terms like consultation and engagement are not defined and could lead to compliance without achieving empowerment (a missed opportunity to build on the Standards of Community Engagement.)
- Empowering concepts such as co-production, doing things with communities, not for or to them and developing asset based approaches are not supported by this Bill, as communities are not held to be equal partners.

Further detail regarding these factors is outlined below.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

One significant element of the legislation is the requirement on community planning partners to commit resources, both towards the delivery of local outcomes and for securing the participation of community bodies. This is proving challenging to map, particularly as many partner organisation’s budgets are agreed across more than one Community Planning Partnership area, and there is not the freedom in budget setting that would facilitate the easy commitment of resources to particular projects.

Issues for Community Planning partners could include what resource they currently have available within services to respond to community bodies and the capacity of officers to be able to engage community bodies effectively. In order to engage effectively with communities across a range of partner services, training may be required which will have a cost attached. In addition, the development of a report of the process, and ongoing updates on changes in the outcomes and related matters will require dedicated officer time. In the current climate with ongoing budget savings being made, this could become even more problematic, with fewer staff across partner organisations available to dedicate to these tasks. This is, however, all dependent on demand, which at present is difficult to predict.

Not all communities will have the capability or desire to take advantage of the provisions within the Bill. This is particularly true for disadvantaged and marginalised communities who may be unaware of the rights afforded to them by the Bill or lack the capacity to claim them.

The Bill does make reference to CPPs contributing ‘such funds, staff and other resources as the CPP considers appropriate’ to assist with capacity building, but in the present financial climate this is unlikely to be achievable.
The capacity building required to support those communities who currently lack the capacity to take advantage of the provisions of the bill, is currently under-funded across Scotland, and there has been no indication from the Scottish Government that funding would be made available to carry this out. In a climate of budget cuts and service reduction, it is unrealistic to expect local authorities to be able to provide the appropriate amount of support for disadvantaged communities as is required, without additional budget provision.

Part 1 National Outcomes

National Outcomes have been in place for some time, however, enshrining these in legislation in a Community Empowerment Bill without detailed reference to the consultation process is a missed opportunity for Scottish Government to make this consistent with the spirit of the Bill and to make it clear that this will not be a centralised process requiring ministers only to ‘consult such persons as they consider appropriate’.

This concern applies to the involvement of local community planning partnerships in the development of national outcomes as well as the involvement of communities within those partnerships.

Paragraph 2 should therefore be changed to encourage more robust engagement in the development of National Outcomes.

Part 2 Community Planning

Section 4: Paragraph 25, requires CPPs to ‘consider which community bodies are likely to be able to contribute to community planning’ and ‘to make all reasonable efforts’ to secure and enable their participation. This neither encourages CPPs to consider community bodies as equal partners nor empowers community bodies to see themselves in this way. Without guidance on when and how consultation should take place, this may not lead to the type of empowerment envisaged in the Bill.

Part 3 Participation Requests

The requirement on a community body making a request to ‘explain what experience it has of the service and how it could contribute’ is reasonable, however, as well as the requirement for CPP’s to report on the impact of their engagement on the specified outcomes, there needs to be an expectation of ongoing involvement of the community bodies and its members as well as the community planning partners, as in most circumstances the ‘improved’ outcomes will not be a one off quick fix. The practice of reporting on the impact of engagement should not be restricted to those who have formally made a request to participate.

Part 4 Community right to buy

With reference to Part 4, in so far as it may relate to the purchase of land in the ownership of a local authority, (and also per below to Part 5 on asset transfer requests), there is no explicit provision on how these parts of the Bill will interact with the following:

- The obligation on a local authority to obtain best value in a disposal;
- Title restrictions affecting disposal; or
- Common good issues.

The absence of such provision will mean these other considerations will still apply and the law in that regard will be unchanged. Nevertheless it would be a benefit if this was clarified in the body of the Bill by expressly stating either that they still apply, and therefore need to be considered in such applications or that they do not apply and can be discounted when considering such applications.
Greater clarification is required of the Local Authority role in this process in general. We foresee an expectation from community groups that they will be able to ask Local Authorities to exercise compulsory purchase powers to acquire such land. If such powers can and are to be exercised, then there will also be a question as to who will meet the cost of that process.

We also have a concern as to the sustainability of groups exercising this right, as there is a possible danger in that there will be an expectation on Councils to step in and take over assets acquired under Community Right to Buy should the acquiring organisation, for whatever reason, be dissolved or simply fall into inactivity. This would probably be more likely in respect of assets in a non-rural setting.

Part 5 Asset transfer requests

There are potential additional costs should community groups require support to go through an asset transfer process. Resource will be required to provide community groups with that support. There are also potential future costs for relevant authorities should the community group holding an asset cease to exist, with a potential expectation for the relevant authority to take back ownership and responsibility for the asset.

The comments above regarding the absence of explicit comment on interaction between Part 4 and the following issues are also applicable to Part 5:

- The obligation on a local authority to obtain best value in a disposal;
- Title restrictions affecting disposal; or
- Common good issues,

Part 6 Common good property

A number of issues with regards to Part 6 have previously been highlighted by this authority and others as part of the previous consultation process. However, this has not resulted in amendment to the Bill.

1. This Bill is an opportunity to include immediate improvement to the current law on common good, namely addressing the question as to whether or not a Local Authority may re-appropriate under S73 land that is common good land in respect of which “a question arises as to the right of the authority to alienate”. This is a grey area that has been left by the wording of S75 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973, and can act as a barrier to effective use of Local Authority assets. The recent example of the Portobello Park/High School proposals demonstrates this.

2. This Bill is also an opportunity to provide clarification on the legal definition of common good. The consultation document circulated in respect of the draft bill acknowledged at para. 47 that “at this stage our view is that there are significant difficulties in framing a satisfactory definition [of common good]”. It is suggested that imposing an absolute obligation on Local Authorities to produce lists of common good assets in the context of those acknowledged significant difficulties:

- Is exposing Local Authorities to a significant risk of judicial review, with resultant resource and financial implications;
- May also result in such authorities adopting a risk averse approach, in that in cases of doubt over the common good classification of an asset, then it be classed as common good, which it is assumed is not the outcome that the Scottish Government sought in promotion of this Bill; and
- May furthermore result in an increase in the barriers to the effective use of Local Authority assets, which it is again assumed is not the outcome that the Scottish Government sought in the promotion of this Bill.

In short, the absolute nature of the obligations imposed under the Bill combined with the continued uncertainties around the definition of common good will present Local Authorities with a resources demand and a risk of challenge. Both of these have financial implications, at a time when they, like all public bodies, are operating under funding limitations.

Whilst it is accepted that defining common good is not an easy task, the inclusion of a statutory definition would be a significant improvement providing clarity for both local authorities and the public at large.
It is noted that this issue is discussed in the Land Reform Review Group’s recent report “The Land of Scotland and the Common Good”, and that therefore further provision may appear in the recently announced Land Reform Bill. Nevertheless, our comment on the present Bill must proceed in the context of the current law.

3. No distinction is made as regards heritable and moveable common good assets in terms of the draft Bill. The task of a common good assessment on heritable property, with the benefit or recorded deeds, is a difficult enough task. When dealing with moveable assets, where in many cases there are no such records, this task becomes significantly more difficult and may in some cases be impossible. If the intention of the Scottish Government in promoting this bill is that various provisions relating to common good extend to both moveable and heritable assets, in the knowledge of the resource implications this has for local authorities, then the wording as it stands achieves that. However, if the intention was only that heritable assets be covered by one or all of those provisions, then amendment to that effect is required.

4. The provision requiring consultation on the disposal or change of use of common good assets impose greater restrictions than currently apply. We consider that this creates a greater barrier to effective use of these assets.

- Firstly, no distinction is made between “alienable” and “inalienable” common good, or to adopt the wording of the 1973 Act assets where “a question arises as to the right of the authority to alienate” and assets where “no question arises as to the right of the authority to alienate”. By way of explanation, common good assets include many assets that may not be typically expected to be characterised as “common good” but nevertheless as a matter of law are. For alienable common good, a Local Authority is under the current law at liberty to dispose of or re-appropriate under S73 of the 1973 act. If the intention is that consultation requirement in this Bill is to cover all common good, both the higher profile “inalienable” assets and the less controversial “alienable” assets, then that is achieved. However, if the intention was not to include the “alienable” assets amendment to the wording is required.

- Secondly, the obligation is to consult with all community councils in the local authority area, not simply those connected with the Burgh whose common good the asset forms part of. Whilst current consultations prior to seeking S.75 consent for disposal of an inalienable common good asset need not necessarily be restricted to community groups in the Burgh in question, they would not in all cases extend to all community councils within a local authority area. This will present significant difficulties for local authorities covering a large geographical area. If this is not the intended result, then again an amendment to the wording is required.

Part 7 Allotments

The financial memorandum highlights that there will be costs incurred by local authorities regarding allotments depending on how much provision is required to meeting local authority targets and how much provision is actually possible. There will be costs to hold and maintain waiting lists and a major officer resource required to produce and report annually on a food growing strategy. The memorandum does not state whether the Scottish Parliament will make funding available for authorities to meet these costs.

Should there be an increased demand for allotments such that trigger points are reached, then there will be a resource issue both in officers’ time and funding in order to comply with the provision to provide allotments.

More emphasis and or explanation on the “reasonableness” of any request to enable resources more time to respond and react to demand should be incorporated.
Part 8 Non-domestic rates

This power may be useful in allowing the Council to be responsive to local problems or needs and to have the flexibility to offer a range of options which could help new businesses to locate in the area, to retain current businesses, sustain local employment and improve the local economy.

The scheme would require to be carefully thought out as 100% of the cost of any relief awarded would be met by the Council.

With respect to equal rights, the Bill may not have the impact it seeks if marginalised and disadvantaged communities are not assisted to become aware of this legislation and to understand the rights it offers. These groups may also lack the capacity to claim these rights without additional support.
The GYOWG is generally supportive of the draft Bill. Some of the members of the GYOWG have concerns about specific details in the Bill, and are raising these concerns on an individual organisation basis.

For the Bill to be effective, communities need support to have the capacity to cope with changes to the legislation, including with the assets they acquire, and in engaging with and understanding Local Authority Food Growing Strategies. Therefore the CE (Scotland) Bill needs to be properly resourced, with a dedicated fund (in a similar way to the Climate Challenge Fund accompanying the Climate Change (Scotland) Act, or the Scottish Land Fund accompanying the Land Reform Act). This fund could include loans as well as small grants, for developing projects at a grassroots level and capacity building by intermediary organisations.

4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

- In the previous Government consultation over the draft Bill the GYOWG were concerned that the right to buy was not the answer in many situations where communities want to grow food. Many community groups do not want the added responsibility of actually owning the land they work, they simply want to be able to use it. The GYOWG is supportive of the proposals for Participation Requests (Section 17) and Asset transfer requests (Section 52) as these support the right for communities to use land, without taking ownership, for purposes such as growing. The GYOWG is however concerned that these proposals only relate to land owned by those public bodies listed in Schedule 2 and 3 to the Bill, and so do not include land owned by other public bodies or do anything to promote meanwhile use of privately owned land.

- The GYOWG supports the proposal that Local Authorities must prepare a food-growing strategy (Section 77), but would like to ensure that any gaps in training requirements are identified in food growing strategies, and/or that training is a matter to be prescribed in future regulations (Section 77(3)(d)). At the moment, there is a significant shortage of skills relevant to food growing. This may be a contributory factor in the high turn-over of new allotment plot holders. Providing training is therefore essential to a thriving community growing sector, and there is untapped horticultural expertise in many traditional allotment sites and community gardens.

- The GYOWG are satisfied with the provision for finding alternative sites should an allotment site be closed (Sections 75 & 76).

- The GYOWG would like the legislation around Permitted Developments in the Planning System to be amended so that structures on community growing sites (E.g. sheds, polytunnels etc) do not require individual planning permission (they are usually permitted developments when within the curtilage of a dwelling). The current system is expensive and time consuming for poorly resourced community groups. If such features have been permitted and regulated by the local authority within site management regulations (Section 73(4)(a) – (c)), we do not think that a separate planning application should be required.
Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill
Local Government and Regeneration Committee - Call for Evidence

Introduction

The Glasgow and West of Scotland Forum of Housing Associations (GWSF) is the leading membership and campaigning body for local community-controlled housing associations and co-operatives (CCHAs) in the west of Scotland. The Forum represents 63 members who together own around 75,000 homes. As well as providing decent, affordable housing for nearly 75,000 households in west central Scotland CCHAs also deliver factoring services to around 13,000 owners in mixed tenure housing blocks. For almost forty years CCHAs have been at the vanguard of strategies which have helped to improve the environmental, social and economic well-being of their communities.

The Forum’s key objectives are: to promote the values and achievements of the community-controlled housing movement; and to make the case for housing and regeneration policies that support our members’ work in their communities.

We welcome the opportunity to contribute to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee’s Call for Evidence on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. Our response has been developed by members of the Forum and reflects their experiences of working alongside local people in their communities for the past four decades. We have answered the Committee’s specific questions but begin by offering some overall comments.

- We support the duty which the Bill places on Scottish Ministers to “develop, consult on and publish a set of national outcomes for Scotland, which must be reviewed at least once every five years. We also welcome the fact that Ministers must regularly and publicly report progress towards these outcomes. However, we would caution that the outcomes in relation to community empowerment must be developed in conjunction with communities and must be meaningful to them.

- The overall policy aims of the Bill in relation to community empowerment, including supporting subsidiarity and local decision making and taking an assets-based approach, echo the core values of the community controlled housing movement. Consequently, we are extremely happy to endorse them.

- We strongly believe that true community empowerment can only be achieved as a result of action taking place at local level with local people leading, supported by trusted community anchor organisations. As the community controlled housing model demonstrates, when community empowerment happens in this way it leads to sustainable and enduring physical and social regeneration within communities. We are therefore delighted that the Bill highlights the important role of community anchor organisations, and community controlled housing associations specifically.
However, we would like to reiterate here our concerns (as stated in our previous consultation responses) that the Bill does not develop thinking about how to support the role of CCHAs and other community anchors (e.g. Community Development Trusts). We would like to see the Scottish Government more clearly setting out the key characteristics of community anchors, and to use this as a platform for promoting innovative and collaborative approaches to public service planning and delivery in our most disadvantaged neighbourhoods. GWSF’s working definition of a community anchor is an organisation that:

- Operates within a particular neighbourhood;
- Has the interests of the community in that neighbourhood at the core of its purpose and activities;
- Operates at a local level and is both trustworthy and stable;
- Has a governance structure based on control by local residents and accountability to them.

The potential savings to public sector budgets of the early prevention and intervention activities which community Controlled Housing Associations are involved in are huge. Our model is based on real community empowerment which has stood the test of time over the last 40 years.

We know that the Scottish Government recognises this and we are delighted that the Government’s Third Sector Directorate has recently provided funding for one year for a GWSF post of Regeneration Partnership Coordinator. The aim of this post is to support CCHAs who wish to further develop their role as community anchors, improving on the social, economic and physical outcomes for their tenants and local areas. This type of formal acknowledgement and support will help to underpin our members’ work in their communities as we move into the next 40 years.

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

1.1 Overall, we believe that the Bill includes measures which have the potential to empower communities. But, we would add, not on its own, and with the following caveats and comments on particular sections. (Please note these draw upon our previous responses to CEB consultations).

1.2 We are pleased that the Bill highlights the fact that “community empowerment means different things for different communities.” As our members know from years of experience all communities are unique, and all are equipped with distinctive assets and often face distinctive obstacles.

1.3 Subsequently, we believe that there is no ‘one size fits all’ approach to community empowerment. Different approaches will work in different communities and some aspects of the Bill will be more relevant for particular types of communities. Furthermore, some communities will have an advantage/be better placed to take advantage of the measures in the Bill than others. (We have elaborated on this issue in our response to Question 3.)
1.4 Community Planning Partnerships

We support the emphasis on delivering better outcomes. We strongly welcome the proposed focus on outcomes, and a shared plan for outcomes is a sensible approach.

However, our view is that community planning has been (and is likely to continue to be) a mechanism for improving the way that public sector organisations work together to achieve agreed objectives. It has generally operated at a local authority level, and we believe is likely to continue. The current proposals do not challenge this ‘top down’ view of community planning.

There has been a serious disconnect between the (valid) objective of public sector organisations agreeing common and shared outcomes and the need to effectively engage communities in the decisions that affect them.

The most effective community engagement takes place at a neighbourhood level or within particular communities of interest. So there is currently a serious mismatch between the scale of community planning and the scale at which community engagement is likely to be effective.

Community planning partners have (on occasion) tried to bridge this gap by encouraging community activists rooted in particular geographic or thematic communities to ‘represent’ the community at a local authority wide level. This has led to frustration (on both sides) and to community engagement in community planning being ineffective.

In our view, there is a real need to redesign community planning from a neighbourhood level up, to allow effective community engagement and empowerment. This would make sure that the outcomes for community planning were directly relevant to the communities which were affected and that there was a direct interest in the planning, resourcing and integration of services. We see no way that this can be achieved at a local authority wide level.

We believe that community anchor organisations (suitably supported by resources from community planning partners) should have a key role in co-ordinating community planning at a sub-local authority level. This approach is being encouraged in Glasgow where New Gorbals Housing Association has been spearheading the new Thriving Place approach outlined in the Glasgow SOA, and Govanhill Housing Association has hosted the Hub - an operational joint tasking approach across all the main agencies operating in the area.

1.5 Participation Requests

We strongly support the participation of communities in the decisions that affect them. However, we are not convinced that legislation is the best way to deliver this. For example, our experience is that most public bodies have not embedded the National Standards of Community Engagement in the work of their organisations.

We believe that this has to do with the culture of the organisations and their leadership (and a fear of giving up any power to communities): legislation, certainly on its own, is not going to bring a major improvement here, in our view. The process that is suggested seems designed to introduce a confrontational, ‘stick rather than carrot’ approach between the community and the public body rather than a partnership or co-productive approach.
1.6 Community Right to Buy

We recognise that the Community Right to Buy provisions of the Bill refer to a specific legal mechanism. More generally, though, we would assert our strong support for community ownership. After all, each of our 63 members is a community owner and collectively our members own around 75,000 homes. This is beyond doubt the most effective community ownership approach in the UK.

Community controlled housing associations are the best and most enduring example of community ownership in Scotland today. They have achieved this through:

- well supported capacity building for community members;
- a balance of local accountability and appropriate external regulation;
- the creation of substantial community controlled housing assets;
- their local offices and staff resource;
- longevity and sustainability and a degree of resilience that is highly unusual in community based organisations;
- the development of a wide range of services; and
- providing the ‘social glue’ that holds communities together, strengthening local networks and making people in communities more connected with each other.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

2.1 We can envisage several benefits for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill. These include:

- Meaningful engagement with communities and an opportunity for genuine co-production of services with Third Sector partners and communities themselves;
- The opportunity to develop innovative ways of working;
- The opportunity to align key policy areas including Reshaping Care for Older People and Health and Social Care Integration with community empowerment and a preventative agenda which incorporates a grass-roots, locally focused approach;
- The opportunity to overcome ‘silico’ style working and its associated perspectives and behaviours.

2.2 In our experience, public sector organisations often perceive these potential benefits as disadvantages. Framed in this way this, the key disadvantages might include:

- The need to relinquish control to the Third Sector and to communities themselves;
- The need for a top-down and extensive culture change in public sector organisations.

3.1 As we have stated already (paragraphs 1.2 and 1.3), all communities are different and we believe that there is no ‘silver bullet’ approach which can be used to engender community empowerment.
3.2 Furthermore, some communities will be better equipped to take advantage of the provisions in the Bill since they are already farther down the road to empowerment and have more assets and skills at their disposal which will enable them to potentially benefit more. Consequently, an unintended outcome of the Bill might be increased inequalities between communities.

3.3 Most of our members operate in the most deprived communities in Scotland - and the achievement of real community empowerment in these areas has been an enormous influence in increasing confidence and self-esteem for individuals and communities in these areas.

3.4 We would like to have seen the Bill directly draw upon this experience and set out a coherent and explicit strategy for community capacity building with the community anchor model at its core. Although, we do welcome the Bill’s intention to ‘build on existing guidance and the experience of communities themselves in becoming more empowered, as well as those who have been working over the years to support communities.’

4.1 Whilst we broadly support the overall aims of the Bill we feel that there are two main areas of missed opportunity. In our preliminary comments we have already stated our concerns over the lack of a clearer recognition of the main characteristics of community anchor organisations.

4.2 As we have stated in our previous responses to consultation on the Bill, we are also disappointed that the explicit link between community empowerment and community-led regeneration has disappeared. We passionately believe that the two operate in tandem to deliver tangible results. This has been demonstrated time and time again through community-led physical and social regeneration initiatives in our neighbourhoods.

4.3 Dr Kim McKee\(^1\) (2011) highlighted this success stating “the success of localised interventions is nonetheless dependent on engaging the community in regeneration, so initiatives can be sustainable and genuinely reflect the vision of residents.”

4.4 As representative sector bodies both GWSF and the SFHA agree that the opportunity that this Bill afforded in terms of effectively making the links and establishing a framework between community empowerment and community-led regeneration may not be as obvious now as once was hoped.

We believe the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum is both reasonable and adequate.

The views we have expressed in this response reflect the community controlled housing movement perspective on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. We hope that they are of value to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee in its evidence gathering process. If the Committee wishes to follow up on any of the issues we have discussed we will be happy to provide further information.

Evidence submitted to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

5 September 2014

Background

The Scottish Woodlot Association Limited (SWA) is an Industrial & Provident Society: a Co-operative. It is a grass-roots, non-profit distributing, forestry co-operative, whose members are working to implement Woodlot Licences and encourage small-scale forestry. It was founded in 2012 by a group of forestry professionals to bring Woodlot Licences to Scotland, giving rural people a stake in their local forests.

A Woodlot Licence (WL) is a lease agreement whereby an individual rents an area of woodland from a landowner on a long-term basis, to manage productively. The model has been inspired by the situation in British Columbia, Canada, where a successful Woodlot Licence programme has been running for over 30 years.

Benefits of woodlot licences include:

- They allow individuals and their families affordable access to woodland to manage
- They support rural lifestyles & livelihoods, and wider rural development
- They deliver high quality management due to the personal input of the WL holder, & their intimate knowledge of woodland
- They can bring ‘difficult’ areas of woodland back into management, generating income for landowners

Introduction
The SWA welcomes the opportunity to comment on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (CEB), as introduced. Whilst we support much of what is proposed by the Bill, we confine our comments to those sections most directly relevant to our work. We consider these below, in order of priority to us, rather than the order in which they appear in the Bill.

In recent months, the SWA has begun to roll out pilot Woodlot Licences on private ground across Scotland. We now wish to extend this to include publicly-owned woodland, including that owned by Scottish Ministers, believing that in many situations this will deliver enhanced public benefit.

At present there are legislative restrictions on who can lease woodland for forestry purposes from Scottish Ministers, and we have previously held discussions with Scottish Government and Forestry Commission Scotland in an attempt to address this issue. Our briefing paper outlining the issue and proposing solutions is attached to this submission as Appendix A.

Comments on Bill

1. Part 5 Asset Transfer Requests
We welcome the statement that a ‘community controlled body’ as defined in Section 14 of the Bill can be a ‘community transfer body’, and particularly that it can include a community of interest. We note however that this statement is qualified by Section 53 such that eligibility for a particular ‘community controlled body’ to request asset transfer by purchase, may be different from its eligibility to request asset transfer by leasing. We consider these situations separately below in relation to the consequences for the SWA.

Asset Transfer by Leasing
As the CEB stands, the SWA would currently be eligible to request asset transfer by leasing, which we welcome. This will potentially allow us to lease woodland from most of the ‘relevant authorities’ listed in Schedule 3, which will greatly expand our ability to deliver Woodlot Licences.

However, there is one key problem for the SWA in relation to requests to Forestry Commission Scotland (FCS), representing Scottish Ministers: the provisions in the CEB are incompatible with the Forestry Act 1967, which precludes FCS from leasing woodland for forestry purposes. Hence despite the flexibility afforded by the CEB, the Forestry Act still would not allow the SWA to lease woodland from FCS. This represents a major problem to the SWA, as Scottish Ministers are the largest owners of woodland in Scotland.

This restriction was addressed to some degree in the Public Services Reform (Scotland) Act 2010 (PSRA), in relation to community bodies, to allow them to lease woodland from FCS.
However, at that time the definition of community bodies used was much narrower than that of the ‘community controlled body’ proposed in the CEB – and in our view, unduly restrictive.

In January 2014, the SWA therefore proposed amending the PRSA to allow leasing for forestry purposes to a broader range of bodies, more in keeping with that proposed by the CEB. Full detail of our proposal to the Minister for the Environment & Climate Change is attached as Appendix A.

The SWA believes the current CEB is the ideal opportunity to introduce such a legislative amendment to the PSRA, and remove the incompatibility between CEB, and PSRA & Forestry Act.

The necessary amendment could usefully be included in Schedule 4 ‘Minor and Consequential Amendments’.

Asset Transfer by Purchase

As mentioned above, we note that the definition of ‘community controlled body’ eligible to make a request for asset transfer by purchase is qualified by Section 53.

We have no problem with such restriction in principle; however we are concerned that this section not only introduces qualifying criteria (which we accept as reasonable), but introduces some specific organisational types (companies & SCIOs) as eligible, but not others.

The SWA would like to see the inclusion of Industrial & Provident Societies (IPS) – with appropriate rules – in this section.

We recognise that paragraph 2(a) of Section 50 and paragraph 1(c) of Section 53 together give Scottish Ministers discretion to designate particular bodies (which might include IPSs) as eligible for asset transfer by purchase, but at this stage the process and timescale for this is not clear, and hence our preference would be for Section 53 to include the additional flexibility proposed above from the outset.

2. Part 4 Community Right to Buy Land

The SWA does not expect the Community Right to Buy to be a significant opportunity for our organisation, hence we make minimal comment on this section.

Our comments do however echo our thinking above on the definition of an eligible community body. The CEB proposes to extend the types of legal entities that can use the community right to buy provisions to include Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisations (SCIOs), and allow for other legal entities to be added by subordinate legislation.
As above, we believe Industrial and Provident Societies with appropriate rules should be included from the outset, and not have to await the uncertainty of subordinate legislation.

It is the belief of the SWA that the qualifying criteria for a body to be accepted as eligible are most important, not the organisational type, and that legislation should define what these criteria are, rather than specifying particular organisational types.

3. Part 7 Allotments
The SWA notes that the inclusion of allotments in the CEB introduces an element of provision for individuals, rather than communities per se.

We welcome this recognition that the well-being and prospects of individuals, as members of their community, can be important elements in the health and well-being of the community more widely.

We note that the principles attached to allotments – the right to request an allotment; their personal & non-profit nature etc – could also be extended to small Woodlot Licences, which could provide similar benefits for a family, but based on woodland produce (firewood, Non-Timber Forest Products etc).

We invite the Local Government and Regeneration Committee (LGRC) to consider the potential of small Woodlot Licences, analogous to allotments, as a way to support families especially in rural areas; and to consider whether the CEB might be a good opportunity to introduce this concept, if necessary on a pilot basis.

We further note that, should such personal Woodlot Licences be supported, whilst they would be possible on most publicly-owned woodland, the restrictions of the Forestry Act as described earlier would preclude the use of FCS land, and thus a legislative amendment to the Act would be required.

APPENDIX A (submitted to Scottish Government on 21 January 2014)

SWA Background Briefing:
Proposal for Scottish Government support for woodlot leasing on state land by the Scottish Woodlot Association (SWA)

Summary
Current legislation permits Forestry Commission Scotland (FCS) to lease land for forestry purposes to eligible community organisations. However legislation wording precludes cooperatives such as the SWA. This paper proposes a positive legislative amendment that would facilitate woodlotting on state forest land.

Background
Historically, under the Forestry Acts, the Forestry Commission was unable to lease land for forestry purposes although it has been able to lease land for non-forestry purposes such as managing recreation facilities. In 2008, the Scottish Government consulted on proposals contained in the Scottish Climate Change Bill that would enable the leasing of 25% of the National Forest Estate to raise revenue for climate change mitigation. Whilst this proposal was dropped, support was expressed by consultees for powers to enable FCS to lease land for forestry purposes to communities. Enabling legislation was passed in 2010.

The Public Services Reform (Scotland) Act 2010 allows FCS to offer eligible community organisations the opportunity to lease national forest land for forestry purposes. Discretion is reserved to the Forestry Commissioners and/or Scottish Ministers in some areas, however there appears to be limited flexibility for including groups such as the SWA in the definition of community.

We reproduce the relevant sections of the PSR Act in the Appendix, highlight current limitations in the text and make a proposal for a positive amendment to the Act.

Discussion
The limiting factor in Section 7C is the requirement that a community body must be a company limited by guarantee. The discretion to vary this is not given to Commissioners under subsection 2, which allows other criteria to be varied. Nor is discretion available to Scottish Ministers. This is an issue for SWA as an Industrial & Provident Society, and more widely for community groups who are adopting other alternative structures such as Community Interest Companies and Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisations.
The solution – an amendment to the PSR Act (2010)

We suggest including further eligible organisational types in Section 7C, subsection (1). These organisations to include:-

- Industrial and Provident Societies
- Community Interest Companies
- Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisations

Further, we recommend that the wording of Section 7C, subsection (4) be amended to include community of interest groups; whose purpose complies with Section 7C, subsection (3).

Conclusion

We suggest a simple amendment to the PSR Act (2010) will have a transformative and positive impact on Scotland’s forestry sector, making it more diverse, more resilient and yielding more economic benefits at a local level.

This proposed amendment could be introduced as a Scottish Statutory Instrument (SSI) tabled in the Scottish Parliament.

11 Delegation of certain functions of Forestry Commissioners under Forestry Act 1967

In the Forestry Act 1967 (c. 10), after section 7A insert—

“7B Delegation of functions of Commissioners: Scotland

(1) The Commissioners may, to such extent and subject to such conditions as they think appropriate, delegate their functions under section 3(1) and (3) of this Act to such community bodies as they consider appropriate.

(2) A delegation under subsection (1) may only be made in relation to land in Scotland—

(a) placed at the disposal of the Commissioners by the Scottish Ministers under this Act, and

(b) which is let to the community body to which the delegation is made.

(3) A delegation under subsection (1) does not affect the ability of the Commissioners to carry out the function delegated.

(4) A delegation under subsection (1) does not affect the ability of the Scottish Ministers to—

(a) determine which land in Scotland is placed at the disposal of the Forestry Commissioners,
(b) give directions under section 1 to the Commissioners in relation to the land in question.

(5) A delegation under subsection (1) may be varied or revoked at any time.

(6) In this section, “community body” has the meaning given in section 7C.

7C Delegation of functions under section 7B: community bodies

(1) A community body is, subject to subsection (3), a company limited by guarantee the articles of association of which include the following—

(a) a definition of the community to which the company relates,
(b) provision that the company must have not fewer than 20 members,
(c) provision that the majority of the members of the company is to consist of members of the community,
(d) provision by which the members of the company who consist of members of the community have control of the company,
(e) provision ensuring proper arrangements for the financial management of the company and the auditing of its accounts.

(2) The Commissioners may, if they think it in the public interest to do so, disapply such requirements specified in paragraphs (b) to (d) in subsection (1) in relation to any body they may specify.

(3) A body is not a community body unless the Commissioners have given it written confirmation that they are satisfied that the main purpose of the body is consistent with furthering the achievement of sustainable development.

(4) Unless the Scottish Ministers otherwise direct, a community—

(a) must be defined for the purposes of subsection (1)(a) by reference to a postcode unit or postcode units, and
(b) must comprise the persons from time to time—

(i) resident in that postcode unit or in one of those postcode units, and

(ii) entitled to vote, at a local government election, in a polling district which includes that postcode unit or those postcode units (or part of it or them).

(5) In subsection (4) above, “postcode unit” means an area in relation to which a single postcode is used to facilitate the identification of postal service delivery points within the area.

(6) In subsection (1), “company limited by guarantee” has the meaning given by section 3(3) of the Companies Act 2006 (c. 46).”

Inclusion Scotland response to Local Government and Regeneration Committee’s Call for Evidence on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

1. Introduction

1.1. Inclusion Scotland (IS) is a network of disabled peoples’ organisations and individual disabled people; and part of the disabled people’s Independent Living Movement. Our main aim is to draw attention to the physical, social, economic, cultural and attitudinal barriers that affect disabled people’s everyday lives and to encourage a wider understanding of those.

1.2. This response has been prepared by Inclusion Scotland using evidence we have gathered from our members, which include Disabled Peoples Organisations (DPOs) and individual disabled people. In particular Glasgow Disability Alliance, our largest member organisation with over 2,000 disabled people affiliated to it, carried out a large scale consultation exercise on the Bill proposals and the views they gathered have inform this response. Our submission also reflects our commitment to the social model of disability, and specifically our commitment to Independent Living.

1.3. Disabled people continue to ask for, campaign for, work for and fight for a right to have a say in decisions which affect them. This includes both decision which affect them individually and those which have an impact on them as a community.

1.4. Disabled people share, with others in communities across Scotland, the ability and the potential ability to be community participants at all levels including as leaders, volunteers, commentators and service providers, and to contribute equally to the advancement of community interests for all. However, many disabled people are hindered from fulfilling such roles and being fully participative citizens, or where they are proactive, their influence is unheeded.

1.5. Disabled people have the least ability to speak up for themselves as their participation in community life is hamstrung by the chronic underfunding of local disabled peoples organisations; disabled people’s social isolation from the communities that they live in and their declining income. A recent Inclusion Scotland survey of 138 disabled people found that a third felt that they rarely have adequate opportunities to be included in their community. Cuts to disability benefits & care services and rising living costs, including community care charges, are all reducing disabled people’s ability to meet the access costs of participation.

2. Community Empowerment Bill – general comments

2.1. Inclusion Scotland are concerned that the Bill as currently drafted is a missed opportunity to embed the National Standards for Community Engagement\(^2\), co-production, and the lived experience of disabled people into the design and delivery of public services. There is a real danger that, whilst some communities may be empowered by the proposals in the draft bill, marginalised communities, such as disabled people, may become even more disempowered.

2.2. The consultation for the Bill itself excluded disabled people as a community. No versions of the legislative proposals were produced in accessible formats such as Easy Read, BSL & Braille and no events for disabled people or their organisations were arranged.

3. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

3.1. We share the concerns of the Scottish Community Development Centre: that in absence of genuine and meaningful community capacity building and engagement, the opportunities created by the Bill will not be enjoyed equitably. Communities which are the most marginalised, fractured and impoverished are likely to benefit least whilst communities already rich in resources and human assets are likely to benefit most through their acquisition of new assets.

3.2. Recommendation: Fundamental to the success or otherwise of the draft Community Empowerment Bill is how “community” will be defined. Community should not be defined by a narrow definition based on location and residence. Disabled people are often excluded from traditional communities, or have specific needs and interests that are best addressed by their own community.

3.3. The Bill’s focus on Community Planning is likely to lead to a focus on geographic communities rather than communities of interest – which by their very nature are not necessarily sited or organised in particular localities.

3.4. Geographic communities may unfortunately not necessarily be mindful of equalities and human rights responsibilities when exercising rights that are conferred by this Bill. Research compiled for the EHRC\(^3\) by Heriot Watt University suggests that where equalities groups live in the poorest areas, they do not always benefit from place based policies.

3.5. This is because the reasons for disabled people’s poverty may differ from those around them – for example a disabled people may need specific support with transport to enable them to work. However if disabled people’s specific problems are not addressed, but those identified by the majority community are, then their disadvantage may actually intensify rather than be reduced. The report concluded that “place based policies will not achieve their aims unless they embrace issues of equality, and that a strand based approach could therefore improve outcomes more equally”.

\(^3\) ‘Hard-to-Reach’ or ‘Easy-to-Ignore’?, Mathews, Netto et al, Institute for Housing, Urban & Real Estate Research, School of the Built Environment, Heriot-Watt University for EHRC, September 2012
3.6. There is also a risk that public assets and services currently covered by public sector equality duties may no longer be so covered if passed to local community ownership or control. It is therefore essential that the rights of disabled people and other equalities groups are not unduly affected, and that opportunities to promote equality are not ignored in favour of the majority voice in the community.

4.1. No. Disadvantaged and marginalised communities, including disabled people, are less likely to be able to take advantage of the opportunities afforded by the community right to buy, and this is likely to exacerbate inequalities between them and more well-resourced communities.

4.2. The Bill does not make any specific mention of Equalities considerations. Nor do the proposals offer any level of support to marginalised communities which would enable them to engage with the Community Planning process. In addition marginalised, fractured and impoverished communities will, by definition, have fewer assets, or assets of lower quality, in their areas, which will in turn be harder and more expensive to manage and maintain.

4.3. Recommendation: We would prefer an approach that embeds the principles of the National Standard for Community Engagement and co-production in all aspects of the planning and delivery of public services, including monitoring and review.

4.4. The Bill as proposed puts the onus on the community to request a right to participate and to prove they have legitimacy to do so. The following issues need to be addressed in terms of the request to participate —

(i) The processes set out for requesting the right to participate are overly complex and not accessible to large numbers of disabled people and other disadvantaged communities.

(ii) The process is legalistic and will tend, by its nature, to favour the loudest and most powerful voices, potentially diverting attention away from the key issues and interests of marginalised communities.

(iii) The Bill proposals require community groups to demonstrate what part they will play in delivering change and to provide details of their knowledge, expertise and experience. This will tend to ensure that professional-led, funded organisations will gain recognition whilst further marginalising those communities whose organisations are less developed and well-funded.

(iv) The proposals completely fail to recognise the intrinsic value of community participation and the assets, skills, knowledge and lived experience that communities can bring to the table.

4.5 Inclusion Scotland believes that the requirement placed on community groups to request participation disempowers rather than empowers communities, as it leaves the power with the public bodies, which should instead have a duty to effectively engage with communities.
4.6 Another specific concern that we have is the lack of a provision for review or appeal where a public body refuses a participation request. Such a right to review and appeal should therefore be included on the face of the Bill and an independent body empowered to carry out this duty.

4.7 Inclusion Scotland further believes that the principles of co-production should be enshrined in the design and delivery of public services. Co-production describes a relationship between service provider and service user that draws on the knowledge, ability and resources of both to develop solutions. Co-production changes the balance of power between professional and service user and is thus a genuinely empowering process⁴.

4.8 Community empowerment will not be possible unless there is support to develop the skills, abilities and confidence of people and community groups to take effective action and leading roles in in the development of communities. Without this capacity building, the balance of power will always lie with the professional public servant rather than the communities that they supposedly serve. Recommendation: That a duty is placed on Community Planning Partnerships to dedicate part of their budgets to developing the capacity of disadvantaged and marginalised communities to participate.

4.9 Disabled Peoples Organisations (DPOs) do a great deal to build the confidence and capacity of disabled people. Empowering disabled people enables them to contribute to the civic and economic life of their community. It also makes genuine coproduction possible, for example improving services through partnerships between planners, providers and service users. However, DPOs have not been immune to spending cuts, and few have the resources and capacity needed to meet the increasing challenges of welfare reform, health & social care integration and community empowerment. Therefore the need to develop the capacity of DPOs must be recognised.

5.1 Whilst we welcome the proposals to place new duties on community planning partnerships to engage with communities, Inclusion Scotland remains concerned that community planning is something that is done to communities rather than with communities.

5.2 Much we have said above applies as much to community planning as it does to community participation. Community bodies, made up of community members, are the most significant stakeholders in services. Whilst service providers are guaranteed places on Community Planning Partnerships the communities that they supposedly serve have to prove their worth before being admitted. That does not strike us as very “empowering”.

5.3 The Bill should instead make explicit the right of communities to be involved in and contribute to the work of Community Planning Partnerships. The Bill should also describe the role of communities in Community Planning structures.

5.4 As stated above we also wish to see the incorporation of the principle of co-production on the face of the legislation as this would ensure genuine empowerment of marginalised communities. We would also like to see clearer links made between the Community Planning process and the current and ongoing integration of Health and Social Care.

⁴ See http://www.ilis.co.uk/get-active/publications/co-production-toolkit
5.5 Inclusion Scotland would also welcome the embedding of the national performance framework, provided there is genuine engagement and coproduction of the national outcomes and performance indicators. In particular, we believe that there should be a proper match between policies and budgets and the national outcomes, which is lacking at present.

5.6 This would include ensuring that human rights, as well as equality, is integral to the budget process for national and local government, and involving disabled people in the budget planning process as recommended by the Equal Opportunities Committee of the Scottish Parliament in its report on the Scrutiny of the Draft Scottish Government Budget 2014/15.

6 What are your views on the assessment of equal rights

6.1 It is essential that equalities and human rights are protected in in transfer of public assets, to ensure that these assets remain available to all sections of the community. There must also be opportunities for communities of interest, such as disabled people, to take over assets to protect or enhance services for disabled people.

6.2 Although local discretion and decision making can be valuable in ensuring public services are responsive to local needs, disabled people also need assurance that there needs and services will be assessed to consistent national standards that promote equality and human rights.

6.3 Inclusion Scotland would like to see a much more robust Equalities Impact Assessment carried out which properly addresses the potential dangers that marginalised communities, such as disabled people, may face if recognition of community groups is granted to professional or already well-resourced groups at the expense of groups representing disadvantaged or equalities groups.

7 Conclusion

7.1.1 In conclusion, whilst there is much to be welcomed in the Community Empowerment Bill, we currently view it as a missed opportunity to truly empower disabled people (and other marginalised and disadvantaged communities) to participate in Community Planning.

Dear Colleague,

I am writing as Vice Chair of Glasgow’s Third Sector Forum, a partner in Glasgow’s Third Sector Interface. The Forum provides a collective voice for the Third Sector in the city, so we welcome the opportunity to contribute to this Call for Evidence for the Community Empowerment Bill.

Much of the Third Sector: comprises of community led or community based groups; responds to or has evolved out of community need; and has its core the desire to support communities to empower themselves. We therefore believe that the Third Sector has an important contribution to make, both to the Bill process and to its subsequent implementation, and that its role should be made explicit in the Bill. On this basis, we would welcome the opportunity to discuss in more detail both the Bill and the role of the Third Sector within it.

We have answered the questions provided in the Call for Evidence below. We also attach a detailed review of the main sections of the Bill, highlighting our assessment of both the strengths and challenges of the Bill as it currently stands. This has been written by members of Glasgow’s Third Sector Executive Committee, which is the governing body of the Third Sector Forum.

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

We believe that as it stands, the Bill contains some important provisions which will go some way to empowering communities. However, if this legislation is really to achieve empowerment, it will require political commitment, a long-term view, and sustained investment and support. We would also highlight that the need to request to participate, and the lack of grounds for appeal in the participation process, present serious challenges to communities wishing to avail of the spirit of the legislation. We would further suggest that if the Bill is to inform service design and provision in line with Christie Commission recommendations, its implementation must address existing public sector cultures, and as such, an investment must also be made in workforce development.

There is a need to ensure a synergy between this Bill and other Scottish Government priorities and commitments, for example, the Community Learning and Development legislation and guidance. It is important to ensure that these policies reinforce rather than undermine one another, with each adding incentive and pressure to really do things differently.

2. What will be the benefits and challenges for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

It is our view that this Bill, if implemented well, could deliver significant and transformative benefits - not just for communities, but for the public sector too. In particular we would highlight a democratic benefit and a financial benefit. Empowered communities are active communities, and the legitimacy and trust in our public institutions could be greatly improved if this Bill is well implemented. To us, empowered communities go hand-in-hand with public sector reform. Therefore the delivery of the Christie dividend, savings to the public sector budget, will only be possible if communities are supported to empower themselves. By co-producing services with communities, services will become better targeted and more effective in responding to need.

We believe that in the long-term, empowered communities will deliver the benefits above, and so the challenges for public sector organisations are essentially short to mid-term. However, we would note that the public sector may experience a big demand on its resources and services as communities seek to use the Bill. Public sector organisations may need to disinvest in some services in order to re-invest in more preventative, co-produced and community oriented services. It will need to balance responding to ongoing priorities with facilitating a shift to a more preventative approach. Resources will be required by the Public Sector (and others) if we are to address culture change and staffing issues.

We would argue that an indicator of the success of the Bill will be an increased demand on public sector organisations. We believe that public services should be supported to respond to this demand.

From an asset-based perspective, we believe that all communities at their core have the capabilities to take advantage of the Bill. However, we feel that communities may need supported to help unlock these capabilities. Given the diverse nature of communities in Scotland, this support will vary but it is likely to include:

- Support to ensure they have the opportunity to develop or access the skills, knowledge, confidence, finance, technical expertise and time to engage with the process;
- Support to take responsibility for any outcome – for example managing a facility or delivering a service.
Recognising this, we believe the Bill should reduce obstacles and acknowledge and address structural barriers.

As such, our key recommendation is that there is a ‘universal’ approach to support, ensuring that all communities, of interest and of place, have access to a basic level of support which they would identify as necessary to empower themselves. At the same time, it is important to recognise that particular support may need to be concentrated on disadvantaged communities to ensure that existing inequalities are not reinforced.

4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

This question is answered in detail in our attached submission. However, we would draw attention to two key issues:

- We would like to see an explicit recognition of the role and purpose of the Third Sector, as outlined in our opening statement;
- The right to request to participate puts communities at an automatic disadvantage. By having to ask to participate, the power imbalance between communities and public sector organisations is reinforced from the beginning.

Finally, we would suggest that the rest of the Bill process would be enhanced and validated by working with communities.

5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

We believe the Bill should be underpinned by a human rights and equalities approach. This should be viewed as fundamental, not as an add-on. This should be explicitly stated in the Bill.

The rights of property owners is welcome, but universal and fundamental rights should be the overarching principles and are therefore just as important, if not more so.

Glasgow’s Third Sector Forum would welcome further opportunities to be engaged and to discuss the Bill and its implementation. We would like to note out interest in giving oral evidence to the Committee and look forward to hearing from you in the future.

Yours sincerely,

Bronagh Gallagher

Introduction

The TSEC believes the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill to be an excellent opportunity to engage communities, promote local, participatory democracy and devolve decision making to communities and will give communities greater control over their built environment. However, it does not take into account the work required to ensure that all community members have equitable and fair access to the powers outlined in the legislation. Our comments are designed to help address this and strengthen the provisions in the Bill.

The Third Sector Executive Committee (TSEC) is the governing body of the Glasgow Third Sector Forum, and welcomes the opportunity to offer feedback on the proposals contained in this Bill. We hope the government will seize this opportunity to utilise the diverse nature of Scotland’s communities of place and of interest to reinvigorate participation. Delivering the rights of communities will require an understanding of human rights and their impact on the participation of people in decision-making.

Wider rights context

Human rights

Awareness and learning about human rights promotes understanding and acceptance of people who are at the margins of communities. Without this, many in communities would remain disadvantaged. Embedding openness, human rights and equalities is therefore vital if the Bill is to deliver the opportunities it aspires to.

We believe that the Scottish Government endorsed Scottish Human Rights National Action Plan (SNAP) is central to the concept of community empowerment. A key SNAP priority is to promote empowerment. The plan acknowledges:

“People don't know enough about what human rights are and their benefits in everyday life. There is a need for greater consistency to ensure meaningful participation of people in decisions that affect their lives. While ideas of fairness and ‘difference’ are widely accepted in Scotland; negative social attitudes against certain groups persist.”

SNAP promotes a human rights based approach which emphasises: Participation, Accountability, Non-discrimination, Empowerment and Legality (PANEL). We believe that the Bill, and its associated guidance, should adopt these principles. We propose that the Bill’s proposed ‘right to request to participate’ is strengthened by adopting the PANEL approach.

Equality

While welcoming the concept of a right for community bodies to request participation, we feel that this cannot be delivered in isolation from the Public Sector Equalities Duties. These duties recognise that public bodies must adopt consistently proactive approaches to empowerment through community engagement and funded community development. The Bill should therefore address the empowerment aspects of equality.

These duties require public bodies to work to eliminate unlawful discriminatory conduct; advance equality of opportunity, and foster good relations. Fulfilling duties such as assessing equalities impacts, monitoring and setting equalities outcomes all rely on high-quality community engagement and sustainable community development approaches.

International duties

Regardless of the outcome of the referendum, any future government is bound to uphold various international obligations, such as the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. We would argue that empowerment is central to this, and therefore an important aspect of the Bill.

For the Bill to effectively enshrine human rights, the TSEC recommends the following:

- The Bill incorporates explicit reference to the need for marginalised groups within communities to have access to specialised support to realise benefits from the Bill;

- The human rights principles of non-discrimination, accessibility, participation and accountability be enshrined within the Bill. We feel this is especially pertinent to the section defining and underpinning “Community Bodies”, as well as the more general expectations of public bodies;

- The right to request participation be kept simple, rendered fully accessible, and underscored by focussed community development with marginalised groups. Specialist support organisations should be used as necessary to achieve this aim;

- The Bill contains a duty on public authorities to produce and oversee the implementation of viable community engagement plans;

- An explicit connection be made between community engagement, Community Planning Partnerships (CPPs), the relevant equality duties, and SNAP;

- The Bill embraces its role in delivering Scotland’s international commitments to participation and democracy.

Part 2: Community Planning

Setting national outcomes

We support embedding the setting of national outcomes in the Bill, and see this as a critical framework for policy development, including that of Community Planning. However, this should be subject to meaningful consultation with civic society and communities. It is essential that the outcomes are consensually agreed, address inequalities, and are not determined solely by government. Explicit national outcomes about empowerment, participation and public sector reform could then be included in, for example, SOAs, and CPP improvement plans.

The proposals to put CPPs on a statutory basis – with defined roles, responsibilities and duties on public sector partners – are broadly welcomed, provided that the mechanisms for genuine partnerships with the Third Sector and communities are in place. We are concerned that limited progress has been made on achieving this in the current iteration of the legislation.

In particular, in relation to Community Planning we would highlight:

- The role of the Third Sector within Community Planning and the need for Third Sector parity within the community planning process for it to fully play its role as working for, and behalf of, on communities

- To secure the input of community bodies, there needs to be clearer duties on public bodies for the resourcing, planning and co-delivery of work. This would strengthen community confidence, knowledge and skills via asset based community development and capacity building techniques.

- We would advocate that the Bill and associated guidance should define more clearly what constitutes ‘reasonable effort’ in securing the participation of communities and explores how genuine participation opportunities are maximised and measured;
A key element of local outcome improvement plans is tackling inequalities either of income and/or other protected characteristics. We believe it is essential that CPPs link closely with the Third Sector and groups with expertise in this area to assist CPPs to respond to these issues through a human rights and equalities lens.

The interim report of the Commission on Strengthening Local Democracy concludes: “The link between representative democracy and participatory democracy has become hard to bridge because of the gap between the scale of representative institutions and the community base for participation”.

We think the work of the Commission should be considered alongside this Bill, in order to ensure that the powers of the Bill are strengthened. Work is required to rebuild the trust of local communities in the democratic structures that represent them. Local authorities, CPPs and other public bodies should be required to state how they will respond to this challenge.

We would like to see the following requirements for CPPs included in the Bill:

- To advise local communities of their activities through public information and dialogue with representatives;
- To conduct ongoing monitoring and evaluation of engagement levels, such as attendance at community council meetings and public partnership forums, and conduct research with communities to determine reach and impact;
- To engage in active dialogue about how participation and empowerment could be improved;
- To be accountable – for example by ensuring community members are given feedback on their issues and suggestions and on the effectiveness of CPP actions.

These measures should foster a greater degree of trust and understanding of the role of local structures, encourage wider engagement, and improve the impact of the Bill for the wider community.

Additionally, building local, participatory democracy that will demonstrably allow equitable access to the powers of the Bill requires an asset based approach. We believe that people are the greatest asset of any community, and it is the responsibility of local and national government to give everyone equal opportunity to engage in any decision-making or service design that impacts upon them. This may mean developing long-term, achievable action plans. The Bill could require the development of long-term achievable action plans to help strengthen communities.
Part 3: Participation requests

We welcome that this Bill provides an additional and robust process for participation and engagement, as well as a clear requirement on authorities to justify the rejection of requests.

We do, however, see a potentially negative impact on participation arising from a bureaucratic process with no right to appeal decisions. We therefore strongly recommend that a streamlined system with minimum bureaucratic hurdles be developed, with clear guidance from government about what this should entail.

The TSEC believes there is a need to be explicit in the Bill and associated guidance that this new power is in addition to, and in enhancement of, existing routes. These existing routes include things such as direct representation to officers or elected members, membership of existing joint planning structures, and lobbying and campaigning for the use of legal instruments such as the Equalities Act. This would be consistent with the stated intention in the policy memorandum.

It is important to ensure that the right to participation is promoted to and understood by communities. We believe the resourcing of participation, as outlined in the duties, should extend to other ‘outcome improvement processes’, whether these arise from a participation request or from involvement in other partnership work with CPPs or with public authorities, where a request to participate has not been required to secure a seat at the table.

Participation request decisions

The Bill states that the authority must agree to the request unless there are reasonable grounds for refusing. The emphasis on authorities to justify their position is welcome, but the lack of an appeals process is a concern in a context of challenges around engagement, participation, and connection to the decision-making process. We strongly recommend an appeals process be introduced to improve confidence in the system and avoid a negative impact on the Bill’s overall community credibility.

Generally

We further recommend that:

- Authorities be instructed in the Bill to demonstrate fairness and equity in the setting of any bar for the agreement of participation requests;

- An authority instigating a process based upon a community request is required to clearly document the aims, methods and outcomes of participation. These should be co-produced with community and Third Sector partners in order to achieve high standards of participation;

- The participation requests process is extended to apply to CPP boards, and this be made explicit in the Bill;
• Involvement of community bodies and other stakeholders should be standard in establishing outcome improvement processes, therefore reducing the need for participation requests;

• Participation goes beyond one-off dialogue, and services must provide specifications of the ‘outcome improvement processes’ to applicants when these are approved, so the community’s role is defined;

• Co-production should be the design assumption of outcome improvements in relation to all public services;

• Whilst “reasonable” is a term extensively used in reference to processes and decisions about participation requests, this can be open to interpretation. Introduction of a definition of reasonable’ and guidance on the issue should appear within the Bill.

We believe that resourcing empowerment is crucial, especially where the resources to help build community strengths are very limited. Such resources need to be based on accurate assessments of need, and provided for as long as is required to make participation work for all partners. Such issues must be systematically addressed if this Bill is to have real impact. As such, the Bill, or its associated guidance, should make clear links for the provision and resourcing of community learning and development support with other statutory requirements for CPPs and Local Authorities.

A community body taking on responsibility for delivering a service as a result of a participation request or an asset transfer should be enabled to ensure that future funding arrangements are sustainable.

We note that authorities can decline a participation request related to a service within a period of two years if it is substantially the same as a previously refused request, regardless of which body has made the request. We would like clarification on the reasoning behind this, and suggest that it should be possible to accept requests when circumstances have changed. This should be the subject of co-produced guidance.

We note that Ministers can designate bodies as public service authorities if they are wholly owned by one or more public service authority, or deliver services on their behalf. However, we feel it is essential for the Bill to be explicit in terms of how Arms Length External Organisations (ALEOs) are to be included in provisions. Specifically, we would like clarity over who or what entity can agree or refuse requests when a service is being delivered on behalf of a health board or council. Could, for example, an attached ALEO be involved in the refusal, where they may have a conflict of interest?
We respect the requirement for a participation request to be submitted from a body with a written constitution, especially when public funds are involved.

However, this may not be desirable in all circumstances and may create a barrier to participation. The level of formality of the arrangement should be flexible. Groups of people such as domestic abuse survivors, pupil or parent councils, or organisations in the process of forming may have an essential perspective on how services could be improved. There should therefore be scope to apply some latitude in such circumstances.

The TSEC wants this Bill to be a genuine engine for involving communities in the design and delivery of services. We do, however, recognise that this will necessitate a culture change for public services. It is essential to incorporate an open monitoring process which looks at outcomes and allows cultural challenges to be pragmatically resolved in an effective and equal partnership process. We accept that this is partly recognised in the policy memorandum, and recommend that it is also addressed in the guidance.

We recommend that at all stages, parties to the Bill’s implementation are encouraged to simplify the steps to be taken in achieving its aims. This principle should be enshrined in the Bill.

Part 5: Asset transfer

The TSEC welcomes the commitment to enabling the transfer of assets from public bodies to local communities. We believe that the ownership and/or control of local assets is an important lever in empowering communities, enabling them to make best use of the resources available to them.

There are many welcome provisions in the Bill, including: recognising that the leasing of assets is more viable for some communities; the right to appeal; a number of the duties placed on the relevant authority during the process; and the timescales indicated for dealing with requests. However, we would suggest that a number of areas could be enhanced to ensure that the benefits intended by the Bill can be achieved.

The TSEC firmly believe that this section of the Bill has the potential to be transformative, particularly for our most disadvantaged communities and groups.

It is imperative, therefore, that those who have the most to gain from it are able to make best use of it, by being supported to develop and obtain the skills and capacity needed and by having access to essential financial resources.

In particular:

Further clarification on what is meant by “reasonable grounds” for refusal of a request would be helpful (Section 55, subsection 5). This would help to ensure that the grounds are not subject to arbitrary decision-making by the authority, but rather are subject to criteria which have been understood and recognised from the start of the process.

We recommend that further guidance is needed on the appeals process to be followed by Local Authorities. It should be independent, fair and proportionate. There is a need to ensure that all stakeholders can have a voice in the appeals process.

We recommend that any transfer proposal should be subject to published stakeholder analysis. This would identify legitimate and reasonable entitlement to involvement in the decision, for example by neighbours, service users, local groups and community representative organisations. Such views should be actively sought as part of the decision making process.

Underpinning the ability of any community to request a transfer of assets is access to the resources – skills, capacity, time, and finance – to do this. It is, we feel, essential that there is adequate and agreed support available to communities to help them develop and grow their own capacity to both submit a request and manage or own local assets.

The TSEC recommends it be recognised that assets in more disadvantaged communities may be fewer, in poorer condition and in need of more support or resources, to develop or maintain, than in more affluent areas.

The TSEC recommends this issue be, at least in part, addressed through a register of assets, helping to establish that “assets” are not, in fact, liabilities.

Part 6: Common good property

The TSEC welcomes the proposals in relation to common good property. We feel the proposals offer the best possible opportunity for identifying and agreeing all common good property, both locally and nationally. Locally agreed registers will allow all interested parties to keep track of common good assets. We welcome the proposal that the register be permanently available online. In our view this represents a step forward for transparency in government.

We recommend use of a simple, standardised, online database to record the inventory. We believe this is critical, and would allow local datasets to be combined into a national record of common good assets.

We note with concern that consultation is planned with community bodies only as Ministers "see fit", with representations only taken from community councils or a community body "known by the Local Authority to have an interest". In making this initial draft available for local consultation, it is essential that government explicitly facilitate individuals and groups to make local comment on the first draft.

The TSEC is of the view that local people with good local knowledge of past benefactors should be enabled to have their voices heard. While section 63 (6) (b) makes provision for “other persons” we suggest this be more specific, such as “people with local connection”. With this in mind, we think that local papers, local radio and the Edinburgh Gazette should be utilised to ensure the widest possible knowledge of the exercise for local people and for past estate trustees to add commentary.

In relation to future disposals, we are concerned that consultation with community bodies would take place only as Ministers "see fit". We feel that representations taken only from community councils or community bodies “known by the Local Authority to have an interest” could be potentially inadequate in some situations. We recommend that the Bill be explicit in awareness raising in the local press of any proposed changes to the register to allow true local engagement to take place. The TSI would welcome a further consultation on the issue of future disposals, perhaps in guidance on the Bill.

There does not appear to be an appeals process in this section of the Bill. We recommend that it should be possible to appeal the register’s initial content, and thereafter appeal on proposed disposals of assets from the local Common Good Register.

Part 7: Allotments

The TSEC generally welcomes the rationalisation of previous legislation and the enhanced proposals for allotments.

We recommend adding a requirement to include a proportionate number of accessible allotments in any new allotment, for use by wheelchair users and buggies. Accessibility aspects would include wide, all-weather decking and raised planting areas.

For all existing allotments, we recommend that accessibility be phased-in over five years from the date of the implementation of the Bill. This equalities-based suggestion would clearly need to be resourced, and public bodies should be encouraged or required to make provision for this.
Volunteer Scotland welcomes the opportunity to respond to the Scottish Parliament’s Local Government and Regeneration Committee consultation on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

Summary: Volunteering and Community Empowerment

In our response, we highlight:

- the critical role of volunteers in managing the asset transfer process;
- the critical role of volunteers in empowering communities;
- the realistic role for volunteers to assist in the delivery of asset transfers and participation requests;
- the requirement for public bodies to shift their culture of engagement to ensure an empowered community / communities;
- the requirement for public bodies to recognise the value and worth of engaging volunteers in the early stages design and delivery of participation request regulations;
- the role that positive early engagement can have on communities, public bodies and the long term sustainability of community assets; and
- why a person centred approach to public service through community empowerment is both possible and critical to creating a healthier, wealthier and sustainable Scotland.

Voluntary participation is at the heart of community empowerment. Without volunteers community empowerment will fail. Volunteering is used (alongside other measures) as a proxy to understand the extent to which a community is empowered, and to assess a community’s social, economic and cultural capital. Volunteers set-up, drive, lead and run community organisations and charities, and they also carry out a wide range of governance and service roles. For example:

- Volunteers are community leaders: leadership spans all aspects of our society - campaigning for local older people’s services, campaigning for or against service changes and local planning decisions, vocalising their communities’ experience and needs, and leading on empowerment formally and informally. Volunteer leaders have a special creative role in empowering communities; their drive and passion to encourage and inspire others to get involved and challenge accepted norms transforms their communities.

- Volunteers are activists: passionate about their cause, these volunteers make a difference and change society and culture to create a modern Scotland promoting equality, women’s rights, the rights of those with disabilities, fair pay, and supporting community activities defined by the lived experiences of those communities.
- Volunteers are community helpers: often the most hidden and least recognised but who provide substantial daily/weekly help to clean premises, provide meals and offer a listening ear to those in need and vulnerable in our communities. They also offer virtual online support or offer their skills and services such as pro-bono accountancy. They carry out formal volunteering roles such as maintenance, cleaning and technical help to ensure the daily maintenance of assets are accessible to communities at minimum cost.
- Volunteers are governors: we know that Scotland’s 23,000 charities can only function with volunteer board members or Trustees who seek to ensure these bodies are well governed, lawful, responsible and meeting their charitable objectives. Critically it is these volunteers who are culpable for mistakes which may require legal intervention and sanction on both the charity and the individual volunteers.

Our Response

Our submission does not simply represent our organisational position; during the publication and initial consultation period we spoke directly to volunteers actively making a difference in their communities and community organisations, as part of our own consultation process, this included talking to those volunteers formally involved in managing community assets. Our response is therefore based on our own knowledge and expertise, as well as the views and experiences of volunteers and communities of volunteering.

1. To what extent do you consider the bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

The Bill presents a real opportunity for change and to implement significant improvements in terms of how volunteers are engaged and enabled to participate in their communities, and how their contribution is recognised and fully valued. However, it is critical to understand the context in which the Bill will operate: it needs to recognise Scotland’s volunteer deficit where we are seeing a decline in the proportion of people volunteering formally\(^1\) at least once a year from 31% in 2010 to 28% in 2013\(^2\). The figures for those volunteering regularly are even starker – only 18% of adults volunteer at least once a month. While we recognise and celebrate the significant contribution of volunteers and volunteering, this means that 82% of adults are not providing the regular help we would expect to see happening to create empowered communities.

The Bill must grasp the opportunity to reflect the reality of those central to community empowerment - volunteers. The Bill may also create new chances for volunteers to rise to new challenges and...

\(^1\) Providing unpaid help to an organisation or group avail themselves of new opportunities in taking on community assets, influencing decision making and taking greater ownership of their communities and sphere of influence. It is clear, however, that this Bill could have aspired to go much further by shifting power from public bodies to communities.

Much more needs to be done to ensure volunteering continues to develop and thrive; where everyone can volunteer and every community is empowered through sustainable approaches to volunteering. For example:

- Part 3 of the Bill relating to Participation Request only recognises the role of three distinct entities “community controlled body”, ‘community participation body’ and ‘public service authority’. The Bill in no shape or form reflects that at the core of its agenda are individuals building empowerment through their volunteering activity.

- The Bill does not recognise the level of support required to facilitate them or the requirements placed upon those volunteers who will be responsible for the day to day management and decision making relating to the asset, nor its impact on a defined geographic or thematic community. The Bill and its memorandums do not reflect the reality of volunteering landscape across Scotland.

- The formal process for making a request to a public authority the Bill in no way recognises the skills, support and or time commitment required of volunteers.

- While Part 3 Section 17 Participation Requests subsection (c) seeks to gain an insight to the knowledge, expertise and experience of the community participation body in relation to specific outcomes, it does so leaving the public body to define the knowledge, expertise and experience required of the community participation body. It is critical that there is an agreed base for such measurement and that public bodies recognise the full value of the individuals involved, this will require transparency, collaboration and support in the pre-application stage.

Volunteer Scotland would draw to the Committees attention that volunteering rates across Scotland have started to move in a downward trend (as mentioned above), and that the additional burden of asset management on the volunteering landscape leaves existing volunteers burdened with policy makers and public authorities unrealistic expectations of their capabilities and capacity to take on new community commitments. This may have a long term detrimental impact on community experience and diminish the value and worth of volunteers in Scottish society. For a number of years the direction over various administrations has been to invest in Third Sector which is seen in policy terms as the only volunteering related sector. While the sector has seen substantial investment we continue to see falling volunteering rates, for some this is part of a process of the professionalization of the Third Sector and the slow uptake of other community planning partners to fully recognise the value of volunteering to achieve their priority outcomes. It is noted that Third sector income – where the majority of volunteering takes place (81%) – has risen from £2.1 billion in 2001 to £4.5 billion in 2011\(^3\)

It is important for the Committee to recognise the diversity of volunteering across Scotland. Volunteering across local authority areas varies greatly and has changed significantly over time in some places. 19 of the 32 LAAs have a fairly stable rate of volunteering between 2007 and 2012. Western Isles has seen the greatest increase in volunteering from 35% in 2007 to 57% in 2012. However, some areas have also experienced a significant decrease - for example, East Dunbartonshire’s volunteering rate has decreased by -21 percentage points from 45% in 2007-08 to 24% in 2012\(^4\) (see Appendix).

- Recommendation 1: The Committee and Government must recognise the requirement to focus resources and investment in support for potential and active volunteers and challenge all Community Planning Partners to recognise the value and worth of volunteering to community empowerment and improvement in overall health and well being.

- Recommendation 2: The Bill should recognise the value and worth of utilising national standards for community engagement to ensure volunteers play a central role in defining basic criteria for knowledge and expertise standards before assets are transferred. The national community engagement standards are an agreed standard measurement component of each Community Planning Partnership.

- Recommendation 3: The Bill should include a formal clause recognising the role of volunteers in empowering communities and society.

2. What will the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the bill?

A unique benefit to the Bill is the challenge it sets for a range of sectors; critically the public sector will need to develop an enhanced understanding of the impact of volunteering in the management of community assets and in delivering of public services. The impact of involving individuals in the design and delivery of services, either by utilising existing volunteers or working in partnership across Community Planning Partnerships to deliver local understanding of a community’s needs, will involve communities volunteering time and commitment to engage in discussion, planning and assisting in the delivery of services.

Both elements of enhanced engagement and participation of the wider community pose benefits and challenges. However, we challenge the concept of disadvantages. Based on our experience a person centred approach to community empowerment can bring a key benefit to public sector organisations - the talent, skills and capacities volunteers and volunteering brings; enabling and enriching the way in which communities will be empowered to take on assets, influence decision and deliver services. This can only serve to increase public confidence in public services designed around the needs of communities.

Volunteers told us they were concerned about the suitability of legislation to solve the problems of empowerment – they felt that a change in attitudes and behaviours in the public sector is needed more. Similarly some volunteers strongly believed that ‘empowerment’ cannot be bestowed on people in a top down way through legislation.

In addition, these volunteers were clearly of the view that volunteering connects them to a community (of other volunteers) and is in itself empowering; allowing citizens to contribute to their communities and in the design and delivery of services. The key is to allow communities to realise their own ambitions through participation. Through early engagement with volunteers public bodies could ensure a cohesive, locally empowered person centred approach to determining the direction of travel for the Community Empowerment Bill in their communities, and therefore allowing for participation requests to be founded on support prior to submission. This approach offers the potential for volunteers and public bodies to better recognise the requirements and expectations of each other in delivering and designing public services and managing assets.

- Recommendation 4: The Committee recognises the value and worth of a person centred approach to community empowerment and supports the early engagement and support of volunteers in asset transfers to better reflect a community focus to asset transfers.

The success of the Bill, and community empowerment more generally, is built on the assumption that individuals and communities can/will do more on a voluntary basis to empower their community – take on assets, join representative bodies; deliver services and activities locally – but the evidence tells us this is unlikely to happen. The Bill needs to recognise this assumption and the facts of Scotland’s declining volunteer numbers\(^5\). In this context much, more needs to be done to support individuals and communities to participate and tackle inactivity.

It should be noted by the committee that despite increased funding and resources to infrastructure development and the third sector, volunteering participation has not changed. Third sector income – where the majority of volunteering takes place (81%) – has risen from £2.1 billion in 2001 to £4.5 billion in 2011\(^6\), yet volunteering participation is in decline (as above).

In as much that the Bill is seeking to empower communities, we will find that asset transfers will increase pressure and burden on a limited and reducing volunteering pool. These volunteers are already delivering a diverse range of services across divergent policy headings; from criminal justice to older people’s agenda, from early years to health and social care, from transport to community resilience.

Potential volunteers have told us that they are willing to do more for their community if the opportunities are flexible and fit their own interests and commitments. 19% of those not currently

\(^5\) Scottish Household Survey: 2013 Volunteering
Volunteering would start or restart volunteering with an organisation or group\(^7\), and people would be more likely to do this if it fitted in with their existing commitments\(^8\). A plurality of approaches to volunteer engagement and involvement is needed.

The Bill should encourage a move beyond traditional service models of volunteering - which are currently dominant and lagging behind social, economic, cultural and technological drivers of change and based on old notions where supply (volunteers) should meet the demand of organisational needs. More consideration needs to be given to the motivations, interests and needs of citizens as volunteers to enable sustainable solutions to community empowerment; a person centred approach.

The gravest consequence of the Bill would be an unrealistic expectation of an individual volunteer’s ability across a range of communities to manage community assets. For example:

Case study

In 2011, a swimming pool and leisure centre in a small town in Scotland was transferred to community ownership by the local Council. It was clear that the centre had suffered from under investment for decades, had been closed and had been scheduled for demolition. The community mobilised to oppose this and a campaign group and Committee was formed to oppose and reverse the Council decision, which it did successfully. The facility was sold to the Group for £1. The Group has now formed itself into a social enterprise and has charitable status and it is working to reopen the Centre.

Initially a large numbers of volunteers in the community became involved in the group and campaign but since then more and more responsibility has fallen on a small group of volunteers. The group is now grappling with health and safety issues, environmental issues and the need to attract funding.

Nevertheless progress has been made in refurbishing the Centre. The involvement of volunteers has been crucial to this. A key aim of the Group is: The advancement of citizenship and community development by encouraging and increasing involvement of individuals in community activity through volunteering.

Recommendation 5: The Committee recognises the governance implications of asset transfer; as they may have implications for the managing organisation and its volunteers. The Bill should therefore include provision for investment to support volunteers through the pre-application and post application processes. For example, a public body providing long term support to volunteers through a change-management process to ensure sustainability and longevity for transferred assets.

\(^7\) Volunteering in Scotland (Omnibus survey) http://www.volunteerscotland.net/policy-and-research/research/volunteering-in-scotland/

\(^8\) Scottish Household Survey (2012)
Measuring the success of the Bill and the extent to which communities are empowered is crucial. However, the current Bill is institution centric and public sector lead and requires to recognise that only a person centred approach to community empowerment will ensure change in attitudes across public bodies and enhance the public services they and others provide (including the private and third sector). Critically the Bill should consider an effective measurement tool to influence public sector change in enabling community empowerment.

Consideration should be therefore given to the inclusion within Scotland Performs National Performance Framework of an indicator for volunteering, ensuring that all public service partners recognise and engage in volunteering development. This challenge would be best met via Community Planning where the national performance framework is already leading to substantial changes in local working practices and promoting collaboration. Such an approach would improve overall CPP recognition of volunteering enabling volunteering involving organisations across sectors to better plan and develop opportunities based on potential volunteer’s requirements.

Building upon this proposal would improve Community Planning Partnerships understanding of the role of volunteering. In their recent criticism of past and emerging regeneration policy, the Centre for Regional Economic and Social Research highlighted the recent statement of Audit Scotland:

“Audit Scotland has undertaken a couple of major reviews of the workings of CPP’s and both were highly critical of the relative absence of strategic capacity and tangible evidence of joint working arrangements”

While volunteering is reflected in the majority of Community Planning Partnerships Single Outcome Agreements the absence of strategic capacity and evidence of joint approaches to volunteering reduces community empowerment opportunities. Volunteering is not reflected in the majority of SOA’s. It is hard to evidence the connection between community empowerment and volunteering through the strategic document for localism in Scotland’s local authorities.

Much is made of the asset transfer disposal by non-governmental departments and that these should be passed to volunteer governed organisations. While Volunteer Scotland agrees that a range of assets may be best serviced by volunteering governed organisations it is critical in light of public service reform that any such adjustments to asset management are based on best value and effective management linked to outcomes for the wider community, and based on sustainability not merely a movement of financial responsibility and fundamentally risk to individual volunteers.

Recommendation 6: We would therefore seek the committees support to develop a National Performance Framework Indicator that will measure volunteering in the broadest sense across a wide range of public bodies – that is, taking account of the full value of volunteering activity in Scotland from the very formal to informal to which all public bodies should measure themselves.

Recommendation 7: Part 3 must better reflect the community in the design of transfer processes.

5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the policy memorandum?

We would at this stage reiterate that voluntary participation is at the heart of community empowerment, and volunteering is used (alongside other measures) as a proxy to understand the extent to which a community is empowered, and to assess a communities and social, economic and cultural capital. The evidence suggests that the people who volunteer do not reflect the diversity of Scotland. The Scottish Household Survey (2012) suggests there are certain groups of people who are less likely to volunteer, specifically:

Group dimensions
- Men
- People with disabilities
- People from low income households
- Unemployed people are significantly less likely to volunteer than those who are self employed, employed full or part time or retired
- People with no formal qualifications are less likely to volunteer than those with qualifications.
- People with no families or caring responsibilities

Place dimensions
- People living in urban areas (particularly large urban areas) 26%, compared to 45% of those living in remote rural areas
- People living in the most deprived areas, 19% compared to 31% of those living in the rest of Scotland

In addition, a Scottish Government analytical report ‘Exploring Dimensions of Social Capital’ supports the above points, also finding that social capital – using multiple proxy measures - varies significantly across individuals and groups and communities of place. Based on this evidence, we would argue that some individuals, groups and communities do not have equal access to the provisions in this Bill.

The Bill must ensure that volunteering and community empowerment is supported, developed and targeted to enable all groups to participate. It is crucial that a positive, bottom up approach is adopted where the existing skills, capacities, talents and assets are recognised and built upon by individuals and communities themselves.

Volunteer Scotland is disappointed that the assessment approach is procedural. It is critical that the Committee and Parliament recognise the overall inequality of volunteering and the possible impact of the Bill across Scotland. The evidence demonstrates that the people who volunteer do not reflect the diversity of Scotland, and members of committee and Parliament should be mindful that not everyone in Scotland has equal access to volunteering thus limiting community empowerment.

10 Scottish Household Survey (2012)
Consideration should be given to ensuring:

- Identification of effective deliver agents to enable community asset transfers (identifying those best placed to manage assets e.g. volunteer skills, individual understanding of responsibilities in asset management)
- A clear public outcome focus on asset transfers (reflecting local community need and volunteer ability to manage community assets)
- Leadership responsibility (recognition of the existing skills improvements in volunteering management skills base)
- Accountability (openness & transparency, improvements in standards and or their enforcement)
- Changes in working practices (organisational change & development and cultural shifts in relationships with volunteers)
- Innovation in volunteering development (identifying requirements of potential volunteers to meet their needs)

Recommendation 8: That the Bill should recognise the inequality of volunteering and the challenges to be faced by individual volunteers in promoting and enabling community empowerment in those areas with low volunteering rates.

Conclusion

Volunteering empowers individuals and creates a strong sense of community – volunteers already feel empowered by contributing to their communities across Scotland. Volunteers significantly contribute to our nation’s success as a wealthier and fairer, healthier, safer and stronger, smarter and greener place to live, but this is not well recognised. Nevertheless, the Committee must recognise that only 18% of the adults volunteer regularly (at least once a month), meaning 82% of adults are not providing the regular help we would expect to see happening to create empowered communities. There is a need to improve volunteering rates which is central to realising the success community empowerment as laid out in the spirit of the Bill.

In light of our response, we would advise the committee to consider the following recommendations:

Recommendation 1: The Committee and Government must recognise the requirement to focus resources and investment in support for potential and active volunteers and challenge all Community Planning Partners to recognise the value and worth of volunteering to community empowerment and improvement in overall health and well being.

Recommendation 2: The Bill should recognise the value and worth of utilising national standards for community engagement to ensure volunteers play a central role in defining basic criteria for knowledge and expertise standards before assets are transferred. The national community engagement standards are an agreed standard measurement component of each Community Planning Partnership.

Recommendation 3: The Bill should include a formal clause recognising the role of volunteers in empowering communities and society.
Recommendation 4: The Committee recognises the value and worth of a person centred approach to community empowerment and supports the early engagement and support of volunteers in asset transfers to better reflect a community focus to asset transfers.

Recommendation 5: The Committee recognises the governance implications of asset transfer; as they may have implications for the managing organisation and its volunteers. The Bill should therefore include provision for investment to support volunteers through the pre-application and post application processes. For example, a public body providing long term support to volunteers through a change-management process to ensure sustainability and longevity for transferred assets.

Recommendation 6: We would therefore seek the committees support to develop a National Performance Framework Indicator that will measure volunteering in the broadest sense across a wide range of public bodies – that is, taking account of the full value of volunteering activity in Scotland from the very formal to informal to which all public bodies should measure themselves.

Recommendation 7: Part 3 must better reflect the community in the design of transfer processes.

Recommendation 8: That the Bill should recognise the inequality of volunteering and the challenges to be faced by individual volunteers in promoting and enabling community empowerment in those areas with low volunteering rates.

About Volunteer Scotland:

As the national body for volunteering we:

- Provide the most comprehensive online source of volunteer opportunities in Scotland, which is free to the public: www.volunteerscotland.org.uk
- Support tools to help volunteers get the most from their volunteering experiences.
- Build the skills, knowledge and aptitudes of staff that engage with volunteers.
- Work with organisations to connect better with volunteers; we do that by exploring where there’s a need for volunteers; we listen to people to understand how they want to make a difference; we make it easier for them to volunteer and we help volunteers and organisations make a difference and evaluate the benefits.
- Have an information service for volunteers, organisations, Government, and others. This provides insights into what volunteers are saying and experiencing, who volunteers in Scotland and demonstrates the difference this is making to our common good.
- Work with Change agencies in Government and funding bodies such as the Big Lottery, Third Sector Interfaces and Volunteer Centres - there’s a consensus about the value of volunteering and new opportunities such as the 2014 Glasgow Commonwealth Games offering real potential for growth and development.
- Are members of a European network (CEV - link) and have a track record of European projects and relationship building.

Keep Scotland Beautiful welcomes the opportunity to respond to the call for evidence from the Committee on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

Keep Scotland Beautiful is the national environmental charity that campaigns, acts and educates and a range of local, national and global sustainability issues – we are committed to making Scotland, clean, green and sustainable, today and tomorrow.

If real progress is to be made in tackling the environmental challenges facing Scotland then we need to engage individuals, families and local communities in a meaningful way. Enabling and empowering them to effectively tackle local environmental issues that affect them on a daily basis can be the first step towards successfully addressing national and global issues.

Therefore, we welcome the introduction of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill and believe that it can make a positive contribution to empowering communities across Scotland.

We have addressed the specific questions asked by the Committee in the attached document.

However, we have two specific concerns regarding the Bill we would like to draw to the attention of the Committee

1. the lack of prominence given to sustainable development, and
2. the ability of communities to access and utilise specific provisions of the legislation.

Our first concern is that an opportunity has been missed by the Scottish Government to embed sustainable development as an underpinning principle of this Bill and to ensure that this is effectively reflected in the relevant provisions of the legislation.
We would also want to be reassured by the Scottish Government that the Bill, and its component provisions, will, support and strengthen low carbon measures being progressed in the context of the Climate Change (Scotland) Act 2003.

We believe the provisions on participation requests, right to buy and asset transfer could cause changes in land use or public service delivery, and an increase in greenhouse gas emissions if the provisions of the Climate Change (Scotland) Act 2003 are not taken into account.

We note the response by the Scottish Government to specific questions raised by the Committee which relate to these concerns (Questions 21 and 147). We don’t believe that the answers provided specifically address the questions raised by the Committee or our concerns.

Our second concern relates to the ability of communities across Scotland to make use of the provisions of the Bill to have a positive impact on their neighbourhood or local area.

Although the broad thrust of the proposals contained in the Bill are worthy of support the reality is that they will be more easily accessed, and effectively utilised, by more affluent communities with well-developed civic infrastructure and associated knowledge, skills and expertise.

It is likely that those communities in areas of multiple deprivation will be less able to access and utilise the opportunities afforded by the provisions contained in the Bill. The Bill itself cannot create or improve capacity in communities across Scotland or equip them with the knowledge, skills and expertise to make effective use of the various provisions to take action to improve their neighbourhood or the services they receive.

Therefore, to ensure that the Bill has the anticipated positive impact at a local level across Scotland there is a need for the Scottish Government and other public bodies to provide additional advice, support and investment to avoid less affluent communities being left behind.

It is essential that public bodies in general, and Community Planning Partnerships in particular, work with communities to enable them to the develop the capacity and capability to take advantage of the opportunities afforded by the Bill.

We hope that you find our comments on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill useful. If you would like to discuss our response, or have any further queries, please contact Catherine Gee, Head of Corporate Services at catherine.gee@keepscotlandbeautiful.org.

Yours sincerely

Derek A. Robertson

Response by Keep Scotland Beautiful

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

Keep Scotland Beautiful believes that if real progress is to be made in tackling the environmental challenges that face our country then we need to engage individuals, families and local communities in a meaningful way – enabling and empowering them to effectively tackle local environmental issues that affect them on a daily basis can be the first step towards successfully addressing national and global issues.

We welcome the introduction of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill and believe that it can make a positive contribution to empowering communities across Scotland.

The provisions of the Bill should enable communities across Scotland to become more actively engaged in local decision-making and empower them to play a meaningful role in the design, development and delivery of the services that affect their daily lives.

The Bill should generate a positive shift in the relationship between public bodies and the communities they serve, with a recognition the communities have an important perspective to share on their needs and aspirations and increased emphasis on collaborative working.

For example, the proposal that Community Planning Partnerships must consult and engage with the third sector, business and local communities is welcome given that their views should be central to determining local priorities and outcomes.

The challenge for CPPs will be ensuring that disadvantaged communities are equipped to be able to take advantage of any new arrangement for consultation and engagement to participate in the community planning process.

For example the proposal to extend the community right to buy, particularly the introduction of a framework for community bodies to purchase abandoned or neglected land.
This will be especially important in areas where a local community group can demonstrate that they have raised concerns about the neglect or abandonment of a specific site with the owner or relevant public body over a period of time and that no action has been taken.

This would help address a significant environmental blight in communities across Scotland and empower, in conjunction with other provisions in the Bill, local communities to take action to improve their local environment. However, we believe any community body established in this context must be able to demonstrate that if has made appropriate provision for the responsible management of the land in question and fully understands the associated legal requirements and long term implications for them.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

Keep Scotland Beautiful believes that the Bill should be viewed positively by public bodies as an opportunity to strengthen their relationship with the communities they serve and to ensure that the unique insight of local people regarding their neighbourhood, needs and aspirations is reflected in the design, development and delivery of local services.

We are concerned about the ability of communities across Scotland to make use of the provisions of the Bill to have a positive impact on their neighbourhood or local area. Although the Bill itself is worthy of support the reality is that its provisions will be more easily accessed, and effectively utilised, by more affluent communities with well-developed civic infrastructure and associated knowledge, skills and expertise.

It is likely that those communities in areas of multiple deprivation will be less able to access and utilise the opportunities afforded by the provisions contained in the Bill.

The Bill itself cannot create or improve capacity in communities across Scotland or equip them with the knowledge, skills and expertise to make effective use of the various provisions to take action to improve their neighbourhood or the services they receive.

To ensure that the Bill has the anticipated positive impact at a local level across Scotland there is a need for the Scottish Government and other public bodies to provide additional advice, support and investment to avoid less affluent communities being left behind.
It is essential that public bodies in general, and Community Planning Partnerships in particular, work with communities to enable them to develop the capacity and capability to take advantage of the opportunities afforded by the Bill.

4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

Keep Scotland Beautiful welcomes the proposal for the National Performance Framework and Scotland Performs to be placed on a statutory basis.

We also welcome the duty that the Bill would place on Scottish Ministers to develop, consult on and publish a set of national outcomes for Scotland, which would be reviewed at least once every 5 years, with regular public reports on progress towards those outcomes.

However, Keep Scotland Beautiful believes that careful consideration should be given to the outcomes identified within the NPF, specifically those that relate to sustainable development and community and environmental wellbeing.

We believe the current set of outcomes relating to sustainability and wellbeing are fragmented and do not allow a holistic view to be taken of either the current position in relation to these outcomes or positive/negative movement.

Keep Scotland Beautiful welcomes the proposals contained in the draft Bill to strengthen community planning and the core duties of Community Planning Partnerships.

However, as stated earlier, the challenge for Community Planning Partnerships will be ensuring that disadvantaged communities are equipped to be able to take advantage of any new arrangement for consultation and engagement to participate in the community planning process.

We welcome the proposal contained in the draft Bill to introduce a framework that allows an appropriate community body, or a group of bodies, where it believes it could help to improve the outcome of a service, to make a request to the public body or bodies that deliver that service, asking to take part in a process to improve that outcome.

We already support joint working between local authorities, other public bodies and local communities to facilitate and support activity to improve local environmental quality.

We believe that the proposed framework would allow this activity to be developed and strengthened in a structured way, enabling a local community group or groups to become more actively engaged in the planning and delivery of activity that has a direct impact on their neighbourhood and local environment.

We note and welcome that the provisions of this bill amount to a presumption in favour of agreeing to participation requests.

We also note the provision for consideration of the following in the determination of participation requests:

Whether agreeing to the request...would be likely to promote or improve-

- Economic development
- Social wellbeing
- Environmental wellbeing.

As these components essentially represent the three pillars of sustainable development, we feel an important opportunity has been missed to embed sustainable development as an underpinning principle of the Bill that is suitably reflected in all of its provisions.

We are also concerned that the potential benefits of this framework will be limited to affluent communities with well-developed civic infrastructure who have the capability to navigate the proposed process which could be considered onerous and overly bureaucratic.

Without the provision of additional support for, and investment in, capacity building it will be difficult for communities in areas of deprivation to take advantage of the legislation to become more actively engaged in the planning and delivery of activity that has a direct impact on their neighbourhood and local environment.

We welcome the proposals contained in the Bill to make changes to the community right to buy legislation and extend the provision to the whole of Scotland.

We particularly welcome the proposal to introduce a framework for community bodies to purchase abandoned or neglected land.

This will be especially important in areas where a local community group can demonstrate that they have raised concerns about the neglect or abandonment of a specific site with the owner or relevant public body over a period of time and that no action has been taken.

This would help address a significant environmental blight in communities across Scotland and allow, in conjunction with other provisions in the Bill, local communities to take action to improve their local environment.
However, we believe it is essential that any community body established in this context must be able to demonstrate that if has made appropriate provision for the responsible management of the land in question and fully understands the long term implications.

Keep Scotland Beautiful notes the proposal contained in the draft Bill that would allow communities to request that ownership of assets in their area owned by the public sector be transferred to enable them to address local needs and deliver community benefit.

Again, we believe it is essential that any community body established in this context must be able to demonstrate that if has made appropriate provision for the responsible management of the asset in question and fully understands the long term implications.

Keep Scotland Beautiful welcomes the proposal to place a duty on local authorities to hold and maintain waiting lists for allotments, and to take steps to provide more allotments if the waiting list exceeds certain trigger points. We support a range of food growing projects in communities across Scotland through funding from the Climate Challenge Fund and advice and recognition from the Beautiful Scotland and It’s Your Neighbourhood Campaigns.

Access to an adequate supply of allotments would enable the work currently being supported at a local level to be maintained and expanded. A number of groups who we have worked with have identified issues in relation to the provision of allotments and their ability to reach agreement on an appropriate lease with their local council.

5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy Memorandum?

Our concerns regarding equalities and sustainable development are reflected in our covering letter and in the detail of this response.
Background and context

Social Enterprise Scotland supports the principles of and motivations behind the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. We appreciate the work that The Scottish Government has done so far in bringing the Bill forward, as well as the inclusive process of a wide-ranging and comprehensive consultation. We also recognise the important role of local authorities and community groups in facilitating community empowerment and their work in driving forward this agenda at a local level.

Empowerment is not just a word. It should also be seen in the real world context of improved relationships with neighbours, better physical and mental health, sustainable economic growth, greater individual life chances, in unlocking democracy and in the raising of the ambitions and potential of a community.

While we support many of the provisions contained within the draft Bill we believe that more can be done to improve and strengthen the legislation as we go forward. Community empowerment is part of a longer term process and we see the current Bill as a step in the right direction on this journey.

Many social enterprises across Scotland are already taking practical action to empower communities. It is people in communities who are forming development trusts, community-owned co-operatives and other local social enterprises, to take forward this agenda and drive innovation in areas like Community Shares and regeneration.

Specific provisions in the Bill and potential changes

We refer the Committee to our submission to The Scottish Government consultation on the Bill, as well as the response to the Commission on Strengthening Local Democracy (COSLA and partners) consultation.

We also support and refer the Committee to the joint submission by Oxfam Scotland, Barnardo’s Scotland and The Poverty Alliance, particularly the proposal regarding Participatory Budgeting.

Key points and questions:

- Finance is the key element in driving community empowerment. While we understand that the Bill is part of a wider legislative and regulatory framework, at least some provisions regarding finance should be included in this Bill.
Participatory Budgeting is one concrete way to empower communities. Specific ways to operate it in practice can be left up to individual local authorities and local organisations but 1% of CPP budgets should be specified in the Bill.

There may be scope to include provisions about boosting crowd-funding and Community Shares, without introducing regulation or stifling the organic progress that is already being made.

As a general principle a far larger proportion, at least 50%, of local authority funds for public expenditure should be raised at a local level than is currently the case.

Asset transfer - can the Bill cover additional public bodies such as the National Museums Scotland, National Galleries Scotland and VisitScotland and perhaps the SQA and SDS and other smaller bodies?

Asset transfer - despite the different legal status of universities, is there scope to include universities within the provisions of the Bill?

Asset transfer - a right of appeal to Ministers is welcome but is there scope for an independent appeals process too or instead?

Asset transfer - is there scope for a “right to try”, whereby there is a phased trial process for community organisations to take on assets?

Asset transfer - can we include an “absolute right to buy” for community organisations in certain circumstances?

Asset transfer - can Community Interest Companies (CICs) be specifically mentioned by name in the Bill, as SCIOs are?

Community Planning Partnerships - need to recognise the role of and include local social enterprises and community anchor organisations like Housing Associations and Credit Unions.

Community Planning Partnerships - equality of participation in CPPs e.g. ALEOs and social enterprises should be treated the same. Local authorities (despite an appropriate facilitation role) should not always be “leading”.

Allotments - change wording to clarify that community organisations and other social enterprises can use allotments to make profit and sell produce for community benefit, so long as they have appropriate asset lock etc.

General point - there should be serious moves towards hyper-local neighbourhood democracy. Services are best delivered at the most local level possible, with the greatest level of democracy possible and by community organisations and social enterprises.

- General point - democracy is not just about elected representatives or local authorities but is also about direct community democracy and community organisations i.e. social enterprises.

- General point - we need to begin the process of a real shift in the delivery of services from the public sector to community control and ownership.

Local Government and Regeneration Committee

Submission Name: Scottish Allotments and Gardens Society

We are pleased that the Government has recognised that the existing legislative framework for allotments is complex, and consultation has shown strong agreement that it needs to be updated.

We welcome the statutory protection of allotments in the Bill. However we are concerned that the Bill repeals the existing legislation and in doing so some of the protections for plot-holder and allotment sites contained in the provisions of the old legislation appear to have been lost. There is no duty on the local authority to provide suitable land from their existing stock or by lease or purchase. Without such a duty the aim of the Bill to strategically support allotments and community growing spaces cannot be fulfilled.

We hope that the following amendments to strengthen the current legislation will be accepted by the Local Government and Regeneration Committee. The detail in this document is from a working group of twelve members of SAGS who have discussed and researched it over the summer. Our response has been shared with the wider membership of the organisation which covers every region in Scotland. We are all volunteers and have no legal or legislative expertise so we hope the Committee will take this into account when considering our requests.

Q4: are you content with the specific provisions in the bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the bill and why?

4.1 Plot size

Amendment 68 (d) replace 'of such a size as may be prescribed' with 'normally of size 250 sq m. which may be subdivided into half or quarter plots with agreement of the members of the local association'.

Rationale

1. The power to define a standard size has been delegated to the Scottish Ministers under Sections 202-204 of the Delegated Powers Memorandum. The reason given for delegating this power to secondary legislation is to enable existing variability of size to continue because the variability "reflects the individual tenants needs and abilities to maintain and grow on an area". This infers that the decision was taken in the interests of plotholders’ needs. We are concerned that unless a standard size of 250 sq.m is stipulated within the Bill, plot-holders will not be able to acquire sufficient area of allotment to fulfill their needs. There is also a concern that the reason for taking power, as described in Section 203, may be untenable in light of UK Parliamentary precedents set under scrutiny of the Delegated Powers Regulatory Reform Committee (DPRRC)

2. SAGS and its membership have consistently called for a 250sq.m plot size throughout this consultation process. This currently accepted size is based on the research contained in Finding Scotland’s Allotments and is an average of the current plots found across Scotland. Any sub division of this size can be accommodated, after consultation at the local association level and with the plot-holder depending on need, demand or expertise. This would ensure that the local community of plot-holders would have the power to determine flexibility of plot sizes. The proposed description in Section 68 (d) "of such size as may be prescribed" is not sufficient to secure an area that allows for the horticultural and environmental sustainability of plots to be maintained. A standard plot of 250 sq.m. would enable families and individuals to grow sufficient, nutrient dense, fresh foods to feed themselves throughout most of the growing year. This is especially important in areas of multiple deprivation.

3. The recommendation from the Grow Your Own Working Group (GYOWG) Report 2011 that fed into the 2011 SNP Manifesto was to facilitate:
Local Government and Regeneration Committee

Submission Name: Scottish Allotments and Gardens Society
Submission Number: 100

“an amendment to the Allotments Act that specifies a time-scale for allotment provision and number of allotments per head of population”

SAGS welcome the acknowledgement of GYOWG, set up by the Scottish Government and that its recommendations initiated that the allotment provisions in the Bill. However key recommendations made by the GYOWG are absent from the proposed legislation. It is estimated that at present there are about 8,000 allotment plots in Scotland which, assuming that an average of about 1.5 people cultivate each plot, means that only 1 person in 500 has access to an allotment plot. To put this into perspective, (assuming a mixture of standard size plots of 250 sq m and some smaller half and quarter plots) then all the land that is needed to offer 1 plot for every 100 people is only equivalent to the area of Holyrood Park or about 8 golf courses. (The figure of 1 plot for every 100 people is an estimate of potential need based on the current provision of plots across the UK and in Europe.)

4. The current proposal, in focusing only on waiting lists and not on the provision of land may result in the subdivision of current plots to satisfy the numbers on the waiting list. We are concerned that a small fraction of a plot will be offered as the norm by the local authorities. All those who wish should be able to access a full size plot for sustainable horticulture, food sufficiency and well-being.

5. The information contained in our answer to Question 2 shows that if the predicted need for allotments is satisfied with standard plots available for all who require them then allotment sites will contribute significantly to many priorities of the Government and local authorities including climate change and carbon reduction, health and well-being and food production.

4.2 Section 72 ‘Duty to provide allotments’
We are concerned the ‘Duty to provide allotments’ in this section rests on the proviso that each local authority must take ‘reasonable steps’ to ensure the waiting lists do not exceed a certain value. The following amendments to section 72 would clarify the ‘reasonable steps’ that a local authority should take.

4.2.1 Statutory duty to provide suitable land
Amendment Section 72 (1) Where subsection (2) or (3) applies then the local authority will by purchase, lease, or transfer make any suitable local land available for the purpose of allotments. This should take no more than 3 years as applicable in subsections (2) and (3).

Rationale
1. There is no provision for the local authority to acquire land. There is a duty to reduce the waiting lists 72 (1) and a duty to identify land 77 (3) (a), but there is no duty to provide land that is identified in section 77 (3). The provision or acquisition of land is at the very core of the previous legislation. The loss of these duties of land provision and other powers is a major loss from all the previous legislation and creates a significant barrier to the establishment and sustainability of local allotment communities.

2. The issues of access to land are core to the historical aspects of inequality in Scotland. Land held in Scottish Government departments or in Strategic Land Banks by Local Authorities, or vacant and derelict land, need to be transferred out in a form of social contract not an economic contract to communities. This will entail the creation of a new type of community vehicle of provision; one that does not take on the burdens associated with vacant and derelict land, but has powers of rebuilding brownfield neighbourhoods through an integrative public health and planning approach, which will be essential for improving the odds for sustainable redevelopment and securing long-term gains in public health.

3. Access to land to cultivate, care for, and grow food is a social justice issue. The neighbourhood statistics for Glasgow in 2007, where people often live in tenements or high rise flats showed that in some places only 6 per cent of the population had access to a garden and that 84 per cent were without a car. In 2009 the Scottish Allotments and Gardens Society (SAGS) and Scottish Natural Heritage (SNH) analysed access to allotments in Scotland against the Scottish Index of Multiple Deprivation. This confirmed that with fewer plots accessible per person there is less opportunity to garden in deprived areas. Since other statistics show that up to 70 per cent of the population enjoy and benefit from gardening this is clearly a social justice issue. It also means the priority must be to provide allotments in some of the most deprived areas of the country.
Data
1. Allotments (Scotland) Act 1892 Section 2: If the Local Authority is of the opinion that there is a demand for allotments in their area they have a duty, subject to the provisions in the Act, to acquire and let suitable land for allotments.

2. Allotments (Scotland) Act 1922 section 6 (2) Where land is acquired by a Local Authority for use as allotments under an order for the compulsory leasing of the land, the lease must be for over 10 and no more than 35 years.

4.2.2 Duty to provide suitable land and infrastructure

Amendment Add to 72: In consultation with the local group, the local authority has a duty to provide land that is 'fit for purpose' including initial reports, remediation, infrastructure and special provisions together with access to the allotments by suitable roads or paths, where such means of access are not already available.

Rationale
1. Costs that may be incurred before ground is deemed fit for purpose including soil tests, wildlife / ecology surveys, planning applications, building warrants etc. These are generally out-with the capacity of local groups. Funding may not be available until planning permission, which includes these reports are in place.

2. Land should be 'fit for purpose'. From July 2001, all Local Authorities were required to have a Contaminated Land Inspection Strategy in place. This ensures that formal notice of any contaminated sites is given and appropriate person(s) with responsibility for any remediation are identified. Allotment Associations should not be responsible for any remediation nor liable for any effects from contamination on the site.

3. The design and layout of the site which might include infra-structure such as fences (or hedges), water and drainage; provision for those with physical disabilities, mental impairment, the elderly or community groups should be agreed in consultation with the local group of potential plot-holders. Partnership funding could be acquired but it should be the duty of the local authority to lead on this and ensure the site fulfils the needs of the local community. Local groups are usually not cognisant with the difficulties and issues that may arise.

Data
1. Allotments (Scotland) Act 1892 Section 5: The Local Authority may improve and maintain any land acquired by them under this Act, and adapt the same for letting in allotments, by draining, fencing, making roads, and otherwise, as they think fit, to maintain the allotments in a proper condition.

2. Allotments (Scotland) Act 1922 Section 15 The Local Authority has a duty to provide access to allotments by suitable roads or paths, where such means of access are not already available.

4.2.3 Triggers –

Amendment Add to 72: Local authorities have a duty to provide land for allotments so that no-one on the lists waits more than 3 years for a plot.

Rationale
At present: 72 (1) Where subsection (2) or (3) applies, each local authority must take reasonable steps to ensure that the number of persons entered in the list maintained under section 71(1) is no more than one half of the total number of allotments owned and leased by the authority.

At present on established sites there is a turnover of about 5% of plots each year. This means that if the local authority only has to ensure the list is less than 50% of available plots, people could still wait 10 years for a plot.

The historic and current lack of appropriate provision of land is the key factor in the length of waiting lists and lack of allotment gardens and sites.
4.3 Consultation:

Amendment 79 (1) As soon as is reasonably practical after the end of each reporting year, each local authority must in consultation with the organisation representing allotment associations in their areas, publish an annual allotment report for its area.

Rationale
1. In Edinburgh, Glasgow and Dundee allotment associations come together as federations or forums. These bodies support the allotments officer, enable good practice to be disseminated and allow issues to be discussed.
For community empowerment, local groups should be involved with all the strategies, reports and evaluations. Direct involvement would ensure continuing interest and support for the local authority.

4.4 Governance

Amendment: Add 81 Delegation of management of allotment sites: The Scottish Ministers will appoint an Ombudsman to adjudicate in any causes of conflict between the parties involved (local authorities, allotment associations, individual plot-holders).

Rationale
1. As with other small organisations, allotments can be the site of conflict however community mediation provision across Scotland is not readily available to allotments. There is no ombudsman or regulator for disputes in sites that are not directly managed by the local authority.
To ensure that participative democracy and self management results in empowerment for all and to minimise cases of discrimination within the community, a system of controls and checks and balances needs to be developed to ensure that everyone is able to participate and any dysfunctional cliques or conflicts are minimized. Most public bodies, services and sectors have some forms of quality control or regulation and systems for appeal and conflict resolution, for example a local authority ombudsman. However there is very little detail in the Bill about how small-empowered organizations and communities will be regulated.

Data: Conflict is not often brought to the public domain so instances are anecdotal, reported in newspapers or captured on television series and films. However it is acknowledged that conflict is endemic in small community projects.

4.5 Recognising the needs of those with mental impairment or the elderly:

Amendment 70 (3) Where the person making the request is a person who has a physical or mental impairment, the request....

Rationale
1. Mentally impaired individuals and those with unseen difficulties may also require adjustments to their allotment sites and plots in the same way that individuals with a physical impairment do. Other people, such as the elderly, might also require adjustments, for example, those with Alzheimer’s are known to benefit from specialised sensory sites.

Any legislation which increases and supports allotment provision will empower the community and create the locus for new communities. ‘An allotment isn’t just a place to grow spuds. In each and every plot in this country you will find a wide range of people with a breadth of knowledge and experience in many areas, from the unemployed, the disabled, doctors, lawyers, engineers, environmental enthusiasts and kids who want to grow the biggest beanstalk in the world. There are few places where such a diverse mix of the population regularly get together and share information, advice and a cup of tea on an equal footing with each other because at the end of the day everyone is equal in wellies and an old torn jumper “ Raising
The reasons for the creation of the first Allotments Bill in 1892 are still present; the original wording of the ‘labouring classes’ encompasses the terms the poor, the working poor, the disadvantaged in use today. Legislation clarifying and updating the Allotments Acts together with the Explanatory notes, Policy Memorandum and Delegation of Power shows support for allotment provision. There is a proven need for more allotments in areas of deprivation; allotments provide community spaces where individuals can access cost-effective food sources by growing their own, as well as keeping active during the winter months so reducing their food and fuel bills. This legislation should provide the means for communities to work with the local authorities to rebuild brownfield neighborhoods, design sustainable redevelopments and secure long-term gains in public health.

1.1 Gains from the previous legislation:
(i) The disposal of sites will be the responsibility of Ministers whereas previously it was only considered to be a local matter. This recognises the significance of allotments to the national agenda.
(ii) The Bill contains an increased recognition of issues facing plot-holders together with containing the mechanism for more co-operation and collaboration between the Scottish Government, local authorities and plot-holders.
(iii) There will be an increased transparency and recognition of need through the duty on local authorities to keep records and report to communities through the Allotments Report. If these together with the amendments suggested in answer to Q4 are en-acted, the new legislation should decrease the frustration over lack of sites and long waiting times.
(iv) The power for training, promotion and support will help to make allotment sites productive and accessible for all.
(v) Equality of provision through recognising the needs of those with physical impairment - which we hope will be extended to the needs of those with mental impairment and the elderly.

1.2 We trust that:
(i) sufficient suitable land will be made available for all who wish an allotment plot to have one.
(ii) the Food Strategy will lead to the promotion of allotments and a long term strategy with an assessment of need.
(iii) precious land, particularly in urban areas that is suitable for cultivation will be conserved.

1.3 We have concerns about
(i) how land will be acquired and the right to a standard plot if required. (see Amendment 4.1)
(ii) how are voices heard – Allotments and allotment communities have the capacity to meet many of the national outcomes but the process for these communities to participate, articulate and demonstrate this is unclear when the onus is on the CPP to decide which bodies they consult and engage with. (Policy Memorandum (Pages 34 – 43)).

There are potential competitive tensions between some official partners within the CPP and some community bodies, particularly over land. The fact that one interest is elevated to official partner within the CPP imputes against the empowerment of some small communities. There is a need to ensure participative democracy does not become eroded. Therefore a stronger mechanism for statutory engagement of small communities is required. (See Bill section 4 (5)).
(iii) long term leases and permanent allotment sites - the current support for stalled spaces with very short term leases could mitigate against the need for permanent sites to justify the long term commitment plot-holders have to improving the soil and nurturing the environment.
(iv) asset transfer – problems with conflict (see Amendment on Governance in 4.4 in answer to Q4)
(v) the level of powers delegated to Ministers particularly in regard to the meaning of ‘allotment’ – see response to Q4 and amendment suggested in 4.1.

Q2: What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the bill?

2.1 Government agenda
(i) Climate change and carbon mitigation
• The CO\textsubscript{2} emissions of a Scottish plot-holder are 10% lower than the UK per capita average.

Increasing allotment provision to eliminate the known waiting lists would reduce CO\textsubscript{2} emissions by a further 5,700 tonnes per year.
Increasing allotment provision to the SAGS target of 1 plot per 100 people, would give a total CO\textsubscript{2} emissions saving of 45,000 tonnes per year.

(ii) Soil conservation:
Currently there is concern about the deterioration in quality of the soil across the U.K. Research has shown that 'Urban cultivation in allotments maintains soil qualities adversely affected by conventional agriculture'.
Many plot-holders have expertise in composting and in the virtuous cycle of cultivation.

(iii) Health and well-being:
It is known that gardening and allotment gardening specifically contributes significantly to physical, mental and overall health and well-being across generations and those with an allotment have better health than those without.

• Gardening greatly improves the health and well-being of older gardeners. Currently we have an ageing population and therefore any activity that improves the health of older people will in due course lessen the demand on health organisations.

• Gardeners have better balance, health and fewer falls than non gardeners demonstrating that allotments improve health and lessen the burden on pubic sector health organisations.

• Empowering small communities such as allotments may compensate for the loss of neighborhood in some areas, particularly socio-economically disadvantaged areas and areas where spatial organization of buildings do not promote neighborhood and social relations.

(iv) Food production: 250m\textsuperscript{2} will feed a family of four “five a day” for almost the whole year.
Good horticultural practice includes crop rotation, space for fruits and trees, composting and recycling, water management, boundary maintenance, soil care, peer education etc. All of which enables families and individuals to grow sufficient, nutrient dense, fresh foods throughout most of the growing year.

(v) Social enterprise: clear channels are emerging between stalled spaces that can introduce people to cultivation, through allotment plots which enable them to develop their skills and interest and some are then moving into social enterprises such as market gardens and community development projects. e.g. Nairn Academy has areas for the local students on the Rural Skills module.

(vi) Equality - average size of an existing allotment in Scotland today is 244m\textsuperscript{2}. A standard plot size of 250m\textsuperscript{2} should be available for everyone who wishes and can cultivate it regardless of area in which they live.

2.2 Local Authority agenda
(i) Allotments can contribute to the SOA e.g Edinburgh uses them in the outcome that Edinburgh’s natural and built environment is supported and enhanced.

2.3 Financial cost
(i) Savings to local authorities through devolved management of allotments, in particular by the contribution from plot-holders through taking over collection missives, responsibility for maintenance sites etc. For example in Glasgow it costs £15 per plot to send out and process the missives. The cost to the Council is about £14K. On devolved site management this would be about £400. There is of course a reciprocal cost from the plot-holders involved who take over this task.

(ii) Partnerships with local groups to acquire funding and develop sites. Implementing a stalled space can be extremely expensive whereas allotment sites that are larger and more sustainable in the longer term can be developed or far less money.
(iii) The amount of land we need in order to enable 1 in 100 is about 1000ha which even if it was all acquired at current agricultural price of land (<£4K per acre) would be less than £10M.

(iv) The estimated cost in the Explanatory notes to the Council ranges from £1900 to £6250 per plot. This does not take into account the contribution plot-holders can make especially if they are involved from the start with site design and lay-out. They can also access external sources of funding. We suggest that a reasonable figure is between £750 and £2000 per plot. However this will depend on the land being suitable and ‘fit for purpose’, as highlighted in Q4.3. The surveys etc can cost as much as £9K.

(v) Cost of producing reports is between £500 and £1K. If allotment associations were involved in this the cost would be reduced.

Q3: Do you consider communities across Scotland have the capabilities to take advantage of the provisions in the bill? If not, what requires to be done to the bill, or to assist communities, to ensure this happens?

3.1 Sites are sustainable – The allotments at Cowlairs Works were founded in 1842 covered about 3.5 acres, remained for more than a hundred and thirty years. New Victoria Gardens in Glasgow was created around 1875 and is still in existence as are other sites across Scotland, created during WW1 and so almost 100 years old.

With support from local Councils or Development Trusts, many communities have organised new allotment sites across Scotland.

3.2 We need

(i) capacity building within communities is required to realize the provisions and the spirit of the CEB. Resources must be set-aside for this. Allotment communities consist of members of other communities in their area and can therefore reflect the social and economic disadvantage of the communities from which they draw. Many allotment communities will therefore be constrained from their entitlement to be empowered by a lack of capacity building.

There should be a duty for local authorities to build capacity by providing information and expertise to communities who request this. Knowledge and expertise is developed within local authorities and other public bodies: a mechanism to transfer this capacity more directly to empowered communities needs to be developed to avoid this being lost. Some allotment communities are dealing with complex issues that require expertise across several functional areas, for example in planning, land, leases, conflict resolution and environmental health issues. Much of this is currently embodied within councils and public services and a means of transferring this should be developed.

(ii) local authorities to work on a collaborative and participative basis with local groups in setting up allotment sites. An example of good practice is found in Fife where the Council has almost doubled the allotment provision in the last five years.

(iii) a new legal entity for allotments and other small community organisations. Empowerment brings responsibilities however without appropriate protections the default position may be small community organizations managed by office bearers who are either subject to unfair personal risks or a lack of participation for fear of personal liability. Even SCIOS are burdensome for small volunteer groups without time or experience to administer them. An alternative perhaps following the tradition of Mutuals (which several allotment associations were in the past) could be developed in consultation with Scottish Government and COSLA to cover the legal concerns regarding un-incorporated organisations and Governance of sites (see Amendment 4.5)

(iv) good practice guidance such as the SAGS Sustainable Allotment Site Design Guide and the New Plot-holders Guide to be promulgated through the Councils to all sites. The horticultural expertise already existing in sites should be recognised and disseminated among local associations. A mentoring scheme such as that originally set up by ARI (Allotments Regeneration Initiative) which no longer runs in Scotland would be most useful.

(v) support from local authorities for networking between local allotment associations but also with other associations and organisations such as housing, health etc to learn from each other.
(vi) encouragement for participative democracy perhaps with funding for schemes such as ‘art of hosting’

(vii) implementation of the Scottish Community Development Centre’s suggestion that a community engagement plan, as well as an officer to ensure engagement is facilitated, and provided for within the CEB.

Q5: what are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the policy memorandum?

[118] Local Authorities must make regulations about site management justified in public interest in making land available for community growing including allotments. Fair balance between public interest & tenants rights.

We are content that the Local Authorities make regulations about allotments although we wonder if it is necessary to specify these in so much detail. We strongly recommend that a duty is imposed on the local authority to consult relevant bodies when developing regulations. The knowledge and expertise that the allotment community has in terms of governance and disputes is an invaluable resource.

Dear David,

COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT BILL – WRITTEN EVIDENCE

I refer to the Committee’s call for written evidence on 26 June as part of its Stage 1 consideration of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. Whilst we have not specifically responded to the questions laid out in the committee’s call for evidence we do offer the following in relation to Part 2 and Part 5 of the Bill sportscotland is the national agency for sport. We are the lead agency for the development of sport and we have a clear focus on developing and supporting a world class sporting system in Scotland.

Part 2 – Community Planning

We note the proposals contained in section 1 and schedule 1 of the Bill that requires sportscotland (listed as The Scottish Sports Council) to participate in community planning. This does, of course, apply equally to a number of other identified ‘core partners’ as originally trailed in the Scottish Government consultation earlier this year. The suggestion is that national organisations should participate fully in the community planning process and in helping Community Planning Partnerships (CPP) fulfil their core duties linked to local outcomes.

sportscotland already works closely with, and invests, in 32 Local Authorities (and partners) to develop and implement integrated plans which will improve the quality and delivery of sport at all levels. Much of our work with Local Authorities is to achieve focused and shared outcomes. There has been extensive growth in our partnerships and relationships in recent years.

Investment into our Local Authority partners is based on robust plans that have a clear focus on agreed local outcomes. sportscotland invests in local authorities against these agreed priorities and outcomes with a clear focus on our Corporate Plan areas of School Sport, Club Sport, People and Places. This includes our flagship programmes of Active Schools and Community Sport Hubs. These are underpinned by an integrated approach to the People [coaches, teachers and volunteers], Places[ local facilities] and Partnerships and Planning which are essential to deliver quality experiences in local schools, clubs and communities at a local, regional and national level.
Annual action plans are developed and reviewed by the local partners and sportscotland Partnership Managers to ensure that the outcomes and priorities are successfully achieved and delivered. Open and continuous dialogue between local authorities and sportscotland results in a strong and effective partnership for local sport.

Whilst we understand that CPPs include a number of statutory partners, local authorities do have a responsibility to lead these partnerships and it is our view that our work in supporting local authorities to deliver local outcomes for sport is not being communicated to the partnership.

This view is backed by evidence based on work conducted by sportscotland in the wake of the consultation carried out on the Bill by the Scottish Government. The underlying aim of this work was to help assess the role sportscotland could or should play in supporting the work of CPPs as recommended by the consultation and proposed by the Bill. The secretariat of each of the 32 CPPs was approached and interviews conducted, either face to face or by telephone, during the period 23 April – 28 May. In summary the feedback from the 32 CPP secretariats resulted in the following:

- There are few calls for sportscotland to be involved with CPPs – certainly not at Board level. Most CPPs have streamlined Board membership to include those agencies that have a day to day presence in the local area.

- Secretariats believe an approach from sportscotland would be welcomed, but it should be an approach about how it can specifically contribute to achieving priorities of the Single Outcome Agreement. Involvement would only likely be with relevant working groups.

- Few CPPs have considered sport-related implications of the Community Empowerment Bill. Those organisations that CPP secretariats suggest could have a role to play in supporting community empowerment, in relation to sport, do not include sportscotland.

- CPPs have been approached by other agencies mentioned in the Community Empowerment Bill as having a perceived role to play in CPPs. For all those currently not involved, current CPP members suggest only being involved where they can support day-to-day activities.

- There is strong support for sportscotland and its contribution, but little call for it to be doing more.

We are, of course, willing to share more of the feedback gleaned from CPPs if the committee would find that useful. It is our view that connecting with CPPs on the back of the existing proposals in the Bill is about working with local authorities to better communicate to the wider partnership our work in delivering local outcomes for sport.
Part 5 Asset Transfer

From a sport point of view we are concerned with some of the language used in the published documents linked to the Bill. In that context we question whether a community empowerment bill that would ‘give local people a greater say in their area, enabling them to deal more easily with derelict and eyesore properties and take over underused or unused public buildings for the benefit of their community’, is an asset or liability transfer.

We are, of course, in challenging economic times and funding is unlikely to grow. sportscotland’s budget accounts for around 10% of Scotland’s public sector investment in sport and we know that it will require robust partnerships and bold decisions to achieve our vision for sport and a legacy from the opportunities we have during what is a golden period for sport.

We would not wish to see liabilities handed to community groups who then need to seek financial or other support from national organisations such as ours which funding rules do not allow us to give. As a distributor of National Lottery resources, continuing to invest in line with national guidance, we are required to ensure we protect the additionality principle. This means lottery investment adds to, and does not replace, other funding sources, achieving additional impact to what otherwise would have been achieved. Furthermore our standard terms and conditions attached to awards state that lottery monies must be used for the purpose set out in the approved application and are non-transferable. Any proposed disposal of assets wholly or partially acquired, restored, conserved or improved through lottery (or Scottish Government funding) cannot be progressed without first giving us written notification and we are satisfied that full market value is being sought.

There are also repayment terms and conditions that could apply in the case of proposed transfer of sports facilities under our current policy guidelines. We can share these terms and conditions with the committee if that was considered helpful. I should also point out that sportscotland has raised these matters with the Scottish Government Bill Team which intends to look into the policy implications, if any, of the points raised.

We have also raised with the Scottish Government Bill Team the importance of developing and building capacity in community groups, before asset transfer, and the number of funding sources there are for such work. Funding such as that provided in the Legacy 2014: Sustainable Sport for Communities Fund which is a £1 million partnership between the Robertson Trust and Scottish Government which has a goal to support more sports social enterprises to be able to own and/or manage facilities and deliver sustainable services. We wonder whether some or all of these sources of funding should be rationalised or co-ordinated to support community groups more strategically. We also question whether there will be sustained funding to support the implementation of the Bill and its proposals.
In sport we also have many examples of communities that are already empowered and have taken on the responsibility of asset transfer. The Bill provides further opportunities to enhance this approach. We have provided the Scottish Government Bill Team with case study information that provides learning that could help other communities to build individual and community capacity to take best advantage of the Bill. The Bill could have gone further in terms of demonstrating this type of learning. Much of what is being proposed by the Bill is also resource intensive and will need investment to release capacity in communities. As mentioned previously in this response we would not wish to see liabilities handed over to community groups without careful consideration of financial implications of doing so. We would also caution against strong community groups being able to seek asset transfer that results in ‘asset grab’ for exclusive use to the detriment of the wider community. It is important to foster inclusivity within the community in any asset transfer. Developing the type of community capacity described above would ensure a focus on the strengths and abilities of individuals who could then empower themselves.

Should you wish to discuss the content of this submission to the committee please do not hesitate to contact me.

Yours sincerely

COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL
Introduction

As the Scottish Government’s economic and community development agency for the Highlands and Islands, we welcome the legislative framework brought by the Bill. We strongly support the Bill’s aims.

HIE is an established advocate and exponent of community empowerments and community-led development. The CEB presents an unprecedented opportunity to create a policy and legislative environment focused on community empowerment, community engagement and with community-centered outcomes. We are pleased to continue to be involved in the CEB development process and provide the following evidence for the Committee.

1 Extent of empowerment of communities

Community empowerment means different things to different communities. Some will want to take on the ownership or lease of assets (land and buildings) and/or delivery of local services. Others may be more interested in engaging with the public sector to directly influence how services are delivered or how public assets are best used.

The Bill usefully differentiates engagement from empowerment; engagement is about giving communities a voice in public sector processes whereas community empowerment is where communities lead change for themselves. The Bill gives all public sector bodies responsibility to create the conditions to encourage and support strong, independent and resilient communities. Ensuring a focus on supporting community empowerment is a key tenet of public service reform. As such we consider the CEB will fundamentally provide opportunities for community empowerment and will do this by both the formative (new) provisions it includes and the provisions which update and strengthen existing legislation.

The extent to which the CEB will empower communities is most significant in the following areas:

Within Part 3 – provisions formalise the opportunity for communities to engage in improvement processes – which has the potential to create a step change in levels of engagement by communities in the design and delivery of public services.

The suggested amendments to improve the effectiveness and efficiency of Part 2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003, have reflected well on the experience to date of using the provisions. We believe these will make operation of that Act more workable, and therefore empowering, as a means to realise community asset ownership. The extension to urban land brings equity of the provisions across Scotland.

Part 5 - Asset Transfer Requests confers significant new powers to communities that can appropriately demonstrate their ability to deliver enhanced community benefit through Public sector assets.

Similarly, the enhanced transparency of the extent of common good property through Part 6, enables communities to effectively use participatory, Community Planning and asset acquisition powers within the CEB, directly enabling community opportunities and potential benefit.

2 Benefits and Disadvantages

What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

We comment here from HIE’s perspective, covering Parts 2-5 of the CEB only, as those are the most relevant to our work.
The CEB will impact on all public sector agencies and authorities. However the greatest impact may be on local authorities given the provisions which include: Community Planning; participation requests; public asset transfer; common good; allotments; and non-domestic rates. These provisions are equally pertinent to HIE in our role as Community Planning partner and owner of public assets.

Our dual remit of economic and community development means we have a corporate focus on strengthening communities. As such, many of the CEB’s provisions can be integrated into our working practices. The CEB also provides an enhanced range of opportunities for us to further support communities to realise their aspirations and growth ambitions.

There are also significant benefits for our pan-Scotland work supporting communities through the Scottish Land Fund and Community Broadband Scotland, where access to assets and ability to influence service design are very relevant. The empowering provisions of this Bill have a significant beneficial alignment with HIE’s strengthening communities work.

The Bill will require us to take a range of steps to address its content. In particular, we will revisit and further enhance our internal focus on CPP delivery, we will look to work with public sector partners in receipt of participation requests and review our policy positions around property and asset transfer. New mechanisms to enable us to respond to CEB provisions will be needed and we anticipate being able to work with partners across the region as they develop their own responses. We consider regional coordination and collaboration across public sector authorities on CEB provisions may in some areas be appropriately led by HIE – having consulted our partners.

Whilst not significant in terms of resource implication, these actions arising from the Bill will mean some permanent adjustment corporately as we comply with the provisions of the CEB.

We recognise that the demand from communities, stimulated by the CEB, will undoubtedly have resource implications for all those engaged in community capacity building, locally, regionally and nationally.

3. Community capability to take advantage of the Bill

Many, but not all, communities in Scotland will have the capabilities to take advantage of the CEB’s provisions. Communities comprise individuals with wide ranging skills and abilities, but the capacity of individuals to contribute to community development varies due to issues such as competing priorities (employment, personal and family priorities) time availability, financial status and individual confidence. In addition there are cultural, experience and capacity differences between communities. For example, land ownership aspiration and practice is not uniform across Scotland, with that being much stronger in parts of the Highlands and Islands than in other parts of Scotland. The extension of powers to urban communities introduces many more communities to the opportunities which asset based community development offers, and those communities may require support in order to realise the opportunity. Our experience evidences that community-led developments often evolves over time, starting with smaller initiatives, to build up capacity/skills, following which more ambitious undertakings can be driven forward.

There are also differences between rural and urban communities as a result of service provision design/availability between more easily serviced population concentrations and the challenges of servicing more remote, sparsely populated communities. Remote communities for example over time have more frequently exercised their capability to deliver a lifeline or amenity service themselves rather than do without it. In doing so, experience and capability is developed - even if out of need rather than opportunity. The provisions of the CEB may therefore be capitalised on more readily where capacity has been built through earlier experiences.

Public and third sector partners will have an on-going role to strengthen the capabilities of communities across Scotland to ensure equity of access to the empowering provisions of this Bill.

4 Suggested Changes to Specific Provisions in the Bill

Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

We are content with the specific provisions of the CEB with the exception of the areas detailed below. We have made suggestions for changes which we believe would enhance the intended outcomes and workable delivery of the legislation. We are focusing our suggested changes on Parts 2 to 5 of the Bill, which relate most strongly to our remit and where we believe we have most value to add.

Part 2 Community Planning

We have commented through earlier consultations that high impact outcomes through CPPs can be seen in those CPPs where strong engagements at the appropriate leadership level by partner organisations is in place. Where this is the case, the partnership can identify shared and lead responsibilities for the CPP outcomes and enable strong collaborative delivery. The CEB substantially strengthens CPP duties and this will support the process of mutual commitment to a shared locality agenda and allow innovation in public service design, planning and delivery.

The proposed approach to determining the make-up of community planning partnerships is proportionate and provides the necessary flexibility to ensure all relevant stakeholders are included in the setting of local priorities and outcomes. However, we are unclear as to the merits of establishing the proposed ‘corporate bodies’ as set out in section 12 within part 2 of the draft CEB. Effective collaboration and the established understanding of the advantages to CPP delivery through powerful partnerships should negate the requirement to establish new structures in this manner and would therefore suggest there is no need for its inclusion within the CEB.

Clear articulation of local outcomes provides valuable direction to operational teams across the public agencies; however, measuring progress requires reliable, timely and informative small area statistics. In many sparsely populated areas the availability and robustness of socio-economic data does not easily allow for the tracking of changes over time – at a sufficiently granular level to inform policy decisions. Complementing the objectives of the CEB, it would be helpful to in tandem review the approach taken to capturing and publishing small area statistics to ensure progress reporting can be undertaken in a meaningful manner.

The CEB policy memorandum suggests (para 41) that the list of key partners will be extended and schedule 1 indicates this. However, this does not appear to be consistent with Part 2 Section 8 (Governance). It may be helpful for CPPs to determine their essential partners to reflect local circumstances and priorities. In addition, under this section and in schedule 1, given the connected economic development remit of HIE and Scottish Enterprise, it would be reasonable for the Enterprise Agencies to agree together with CPPs the most effective representation (rather than require both to be represented across the Highlands and Islands, which appears to be indicated).

Part 3 Participation Requests

We welcome the broad definition of ‘community-controlled body’ and ‘community participation body’ as by adopting this inclusive approach and not defining community in too narrow a context will enable a range of organisations with diverse interests to put into practice the provisions of the CEB.
The criteria as detailed for the refusal of a participation request appear to be proportionate. However, issues around consistency may arise if the criteria are open to interpretation. Guidance notes on each individual criterion would help in this respect, and we would be pleased to offer input here in due course. Additionally, it may be advisable to clarify whether all, or some, of the criteria are required to be met as detailed in Section 19(3)(c). Parity of the value(s) placed on qualitative and quantitative outcomes in the decision process would also be relative to include.

Outcome improves process - where a public service authority does not have an outcome improvement process in place (Section 20(3)), and subsequently Section 23, the consultation period from the time of agreeing a participation request to agreeing the outcome improvement process and subsequently establishing the process is extensive. This time period, as currently detailed in the Bill, may have a detrimental effect on the momentum of the community participation body making the request. Similarly, the CEB does not identify a maximum timeframe for the outcome improvement process to be completed within. Whilst we recognise that this may be agreed once the process has commenced, a maximum time period for the process would be beneficial for all parties involved as well as bringing clarity and certainty.

The reporting required within the CEB may be further enhanced if the learning from successful participation requests was linked more strongly to the Community Planning Process, and enhancing early community engagement in the design of services, as this may reduce the need for and number of participation requests in the future.

Part 4 Community Right to Buy Land (CRtB)

The provisions will extend the scope and flexibility of the CRtB and make the existing legislation more workable. Noted below are a number of detailed points for consideration which we would be pleased to discuss further with officers or the Committee.

31(4): Late registration relevant work/ steps requirements Removing ‘good reasons’ is helpful as this normalises late registrations. For a variety of well documented reasons late registrations are very much the rule rather than the exception.

31(4)(a)(i): It would be most helpful if this subsection enables communities to progress a late registration if they have considered purchase of an asset, specific or general, as detailed in a local development plan.

We advocate communities taking a strategic and holistic approach to their development through the establishment of whole community plans. Amongst other identified needs, these plans are likely to include asset ownership aspirations of specific or general nature. These plans involve widespread and detailed community consultation and are resource intensive for the community. As such they tend to have longevity of 3-5 years or more. If a whole community plan containing relevant asset ownership aspirations is considered appropriate evidence under the proposed ‘taking relevant work’ provision then this would be welcome. If so, it would be important for these actions to be considered ‘eligible’ for the lifetime of the plan. Consideration of guidance notes to clarify eligible relevant work/steps would be beneficial.

31(4)(aa)(iii): It is commonplace for the initial work to be undertaken by a community council or a working group with the intention that another body would pursue the CRtB. Pursuing a CRtB is a significant consideration and we advise communities to establish a community body (compatible with Section 34 of the Act) only when they are confident an application is to be made. Consideration should be given to decoupling the requirements for relevant steps/relevant work and the application being made by the [same] community body. This is an appropriate practical approach and does not render the initial work undertaken less relevant. Rather, it preserves capacity within the community as they consider a CRtB.
37(6) Appointment of ballotter Much of this information has already been submitted to Ministers as part of the application process and as Ministers supply background information to the ballotter in the proposed section 51A(2) we do not see any merits in this subsection. Further, we are not persuaded of the need for the ballotter to hold this information as the ballotter’s role is solely to undertake the ballot.

48 Abandoned or neglected land – compulsory purchase powers The inclusion of compulsory purchase powers, as a lever of last resort when all other efforts have failed and in certain considered circumstances, is noted. However, we would emphasise the need to be mindful of the local and wider consequences of inclusion of compulsory purchase provisions in contemporary legislation, especially where pre-existing powers are in place, for instance within other public body legislation. Having considered in detail the application of the CEB, we note the possible role of compulsory purchase as a mechanism (evident from the crofting community right to buy (CCRTB) where the lever of a form of compulsory purchase has been a largely passive facilitator). However, we would favour resort to existing compulsory purchase powers rather than re-prescription of these within the CEB. To ensure a balanced approach, we would only wish such powers to be available once a willing seller (negotiated) route to ownership has been exhausted and where a purchase by the community is demonstrably in the public interest.

Abandoned or neglected land

Although supportive of this principle, we consider the proposed new section, Part 3A, could be strengthened by additional definitions and information, which could be provided as guidance notes.

For instance, how might the difference between abandoned and neglected be distinguished? What criteria might “prove” a land asset is abandoned or neglected? We are not aware of an obligation on an owner not to abandon or neglect their property – might this obligation be an unintended implication through the CEB as presently worded? Consideration might usefully be given therefore to definitions, terminology and the ability for their consistent applications in urban, rural and remote areas.

Proving continuing ownership – this requirement will be challenging to demonstrate and it is unclear how the proving of ownership is connected to the intentions of sustainable development and the mitigation of abandoned/neglected land.

As drafted, the Part 3A provisions reflect the content of the CCRTB which is widely acknowledged to be challenging for crofting community bodies to use. We welcome the recent development to address CCRTB through the CEB and we will comment fully within any consultation offered in respect of these matters.

Part 5 Asset Transfer Requests

Public assets account for just over 10% of Scotland’s land area (excluding the seabed) so it is beneficial to facilitate the transfer of public assets to communities where this will lead to enhanced outcomes and potentially a reduced demand for public services. Whilst supporting the intent of these provisions – which we consider to be appropriate and balanced - their effectiveness will be determined to a great extent by the regulations. Consultation on the regulations would be welcomed.

51: Meaning of ‘relevant authority’ We suggest the Bill would be strengthened and simplified by extending ‘relevant authority’ to all Scottish public sector bodies.

52: Asset transfer requests To promote a connection between the community and the asset, we suggest the community transfer body is required to demonstrate a connection with the asset. NB As currently drafted, a large conservation body or third sector organisation operating at a national or UK level may satisfy the community transfer body requirements – if this is unintended, and local communities/communities demonstrated interests connected with asset are intended, wording may benefit from revision.
54: Asset transfer requests - regulations  We recommend the regulations identify the criteria to be demonstrated by the community transfer body's asset transfer request. These could include:

- Information/evidence of organisational capacity
- A sustainable management/development/business plan
- Community involvement and evidence of community support
- Information on who/what will benefit and how they/it will benefit

55: Asset transfer requests - decisions  We have a portfolio of industrial/commercial premises throughout our region, which we deploy to assist in achieving wider economic development. Our policy is not to be a long-term landlord but to sell on properties when appropriate. We favour an outcomes based approach regarding the assessment of asset transfer requests. This would be consistent with Parts 1 and 2 of the CEB and will ensure maximum impact and benefit is achieved taking full cognisance of local circumstances. For example, it is our standard practice to offer sitting tenants the first refusal to purchase the properties they occupy and we have also supported asset sales to community bodies. In the event of interest in one of our assets from both the sitting tenant and a community organisation we would wish to consider the merits of both these proposals. We are confident section 55(3) accommodates this approach.

Inclusion of the following, in our view, would further strengthen these provisions:

The establishment of a national public asset register; the Minister’s announcement for all public assets to be recorded in the Land Register will facilitate this.

The experience of the Community Right to Buy and National Forest Land Scheme is that communities often respond to opportunities. We therefore suggest these provisions extend to the disposal of surplus assets by relevant authorities.

Finally, there is scope for communities to register an interest (CRTB) in public assets and common good land. We assume both routes will be available unless a prohibition is applied and suggest the guidance notes address such matters. At present there are examples of public authorities willing to sell assets to communities, yet require the community to first register an interest in the asset via the CRTB. This is a complex and demanding undertaking for the community and unnecessary where there is a willing seller. However, that public authorities currently use the process might indicate a preference to adopt an established process (potentially overlooking complexity for communities) over one which is more streamline and potentially effective. The opportunity exists within the CEB therefore to require public authorities to use the most efficient asset transfer mechanisms available for both the public authority and the community body.

5 Equal Rights Impacts as set out in Policy Memorandum

What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

The Bill explicitly recognises the enabling power of the current duties placed on public bodies by the Equality Act 2010 and the Public Sector Equality Duty (PSED) and acknowledges that its provisions are compatible with the European Convention of Human Rights. These are powerful foundations on which to build on the realisation of equal rights through community empowerment (e.g. when making asset transfer or participation requests), making explicit the provisions on equality impact assessment already covered by PSED. The requirement to form Community Planning Partnerships strengthens opportunities to develop partnership equality outcomes which reduce inequalities through collective responsibility and action, ensuring an equalities dimension is integrated into place-based policies and activity, which are recognised as having a particularly beneficial impact on some groups of people in both urban and rural settings.
The provisions on participation requests and addressing concerns that community bodies are open, inclusive and truly represent their communities have the potential to significantly increase the realisation of rights for some groups of people. This strengthens community empowerment by creating the right for communities to be engaged and to be supported by public bodies, taking into account the potentially differing needs of individual community groups, whether rural or urban.

The Policy Memorandum summary of the EqIA carried out focuses on only one element of the PSED, that the Bill is not discriminatory. Much of the impact of the Bill in achieving equality, as outlined above, will be accomplished through public bodies’ influence in maximising opportunities to advance equality of opportunity and foster good relations, the other elements of the General Equality Duty. This may be outlined in greater detail in the full EqIA document.

Determination of the compatibility of right to buy proposals as they affect the landowner and the community require legal consideration and we are aware of the detailed legal engagement undertaken during the CEB development period.

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill: Submission by the Chairs of Scotland's 7 Regional Transport Partnerships

This submission is by the Chairs of Scotland's 7 statutory Regional Transport Partnerships (RTPs). The RTPs have a statutory duty to engage in community planning. All RTPs currently seek to proactively support community planning in Scotland’s 32 community planning areas generally through the implementation of their statutory Regional Transport Strategies (RTSs), and specifically by contributing to the achievement of national and local SOA outcomes relating to sustainable economic growth, improving personal and community health and wellbeing, and improved environmental sustainability, including carbon reduction. As indicated in the Policy Memorandum accompanying the Bill, transport is a key cross-cutting community planning issue, which helps ensure that communities have efficient, effective and accessible services; that local economies are vibrant and well connected to markets; and that local communities are better and healthier places to live, work, visit and enjoy.

The RTPs are working proactively on a wide range of initiatives, including improving local and regional strategic connectivity; reducing peripherality and combatting social exclusion through a range of transport connectivity measures, including issues related to transport and health; and reducing the environmental impacts of transport, which are aimed at supporting achievement of local and national outcomes in partnership with our constituent Councils, Health Boards, Police, Fire & Rescue, Universities and Colleges, the Voluntary sector and other statutory community planning agencies.

The RTPs support proposals which will improve efficient and effective partnership working and will strengthen the role of community planning. Part 2 and Schedules 1, 2 and 3 of the Bill propose designation of various public sector bodies in relation to community planning. The RTPs welcome the inclusion of RTPs as:

- Public Service Authorities, as introduced by section 4 (1) of the Bill;
- Relevant Bodies, as introduced under section 16 (1) of the Bill; and
- Relevant Authorities, as introduced under section 51 (1) of the Bill

The reinforcement of the current statutory role of RTPs within community planning implied by these designations is strongly supported.

However, the RTPs have concerns relating to Part 2 of the Bill which, in Section 8, defines those partners having a statutory Governance role in community planning as Councils, Health Boards, Scottish Enterprise/HIE, Police Scotland and Fire and Rescue Scotland only, omitting RTPs and other defined bodies in Schedules 1, 2 and 3. In addition Part 2, Section 9 on community planning partners’ duties states that they:

- must cooperate with other community planning partners in carrying out community planning;
- must, in relation to a community planning partnership, contribute such funds, staff and other resources as the community planning partnership considers appropriate to ... improving, contributing to achievement of local outcomes ... and for the purpose of securing participation of community bodies in community planning;
- must provide such information to the community planning partnership about local outcomes as the partnership may request; and
- must, in carrying out its functions, take account of community planning local outcome improvement plans.
Whilst the generality of the above duties to cooperate in the achievement of community planning outcomes is also supported, it is of serious concern that RTPs are not included within the list of specified Governance bodies for community planning in Part 2, Section 8 (2) of the Bill and, therefore, have the potential to be excluded from core governance and resource decision-making in relation to determining and agreeing community planning resource requirements in accordance with Part 2, Section 9 of the Bill. This appears to be a potentially serious and hopefully unintentional governance dis-connect within the Bill, as currently drafted.

Part 2, Section 8 (3) of the Bill indicates that Scottish Ministers may, by regulations, add to the community planning partners listed under Part 2, Section 8 (2). However, in order to ensure that RTPs can continue to play a fully supportive role in community planning, the RTP Chairs formally request that the Bill is amended to specifically include Regional Transport Partnerships, along with the other statutory community planning Governance bodies, listed within Part 2, Section 8 (2).

COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (Scotland) BILL

Introduction
Fortrose & Rosemarkie Community Council has responded to previous consultations on this Bill. The following response to the Call for Evidence avoids repetition except when necessary to emphasise the points being made.

Definition of “Community”
A group of people who have a shared ‘interest’ is not necessarily a community body. They are self-selected bodies, can overlap other communities to which they are not accountable
A community council is an elected, statutory body representing the population of a defined area. It is governed by a standard Constitution and Code of Conduct. A community council is in a unique position, but to enable it to develop its full potential to serve its community, best practice requires changes of legislation.

Legislation
Fortrose & Rosemarkie Community Council has previously stated its views regarding:

- Corporate Body Status with the appropriate legal powers.
- Status as a Participant in decision making on delivering Public Services.
- Clarification of its role which is not very clear in the 1973 Act.

The strength of a Community Council can be enhanced by these amendments and the consequent benefit of better outcomes for their residents.

Community Planning
Fortrose & Rosemarkie Community Council took part in workshops and seminars during the Highland Council’s pilot scheme on Community Planning. The Pilot Scheme was authorised by the Scottish Executive. The community council also took part in an annual meeting of Highland Council’s ‘Renewing Democracy and Community Planning Select Committee’. At discussions and seminars on Community Planning the public services included Police, Fire and Transport; the Wellbeing Alliance and many members of the Scottish Council of Voluntary Organisations (SCVO) were also involved. The role of communities was not clearly defined. Attendance at some seminars was poor and officials outnumbered delegates. Participation in matters of community safety seemed to be reserved to Fire and Police and there is valid criticism that this type of Planning is too centralised. Recent command structure changes could lead to better direct liaison between the emergency/safety service providers. As far as communities are concerned the outcomes of Community Planning discussions have not been productive. The value of maintaining this section of the Bill needs critical re-assessment.

Common Good
The Local Authority holds and administers Common Good assets on behalf of the community which owns them. This Community Council monitors its holdings, including two caravan sites and a Town Hall regularly. The proposed Register of property should have details of cash and/or investment holdings and a short statement of the current bank account. There are some matters of principle:

- Applications for grants from the Common Good must be submitted to the Local Authority through the Community Council. Lobbying elected members by special interest groups for Common Good grants is unacceptable. The Community Council is the appropriate consultee.

- The Community Council should be able to veto any proposed use of Common Good assets or income made by the Local Authority and its elected councillors. The right for Community Councils to decide must be embedded in statute. (This was recommended in an earlier submission.)

Allotments
Even in rural areas there is a shortage of suitable land. In this community 14 hectares of grade 1 farmland has been lost to housing, contrary to Scottish Planning Policy. Gardens are classed as “brownfield” site for housing. The loss of gardens is detrimental to healthy activity and to the environment. This misuse should be rectified by the Bill. Allotment sites may require vehicular access and possibly a power supply. Given that they can contribute to a food growing strategy the administrative and financing management as proposed in the Bill is not excessive. A community body might have a supervisory role on behalf of the Local Authority e.g. keeping waiting lists.

CONCLUSIONS
1 The Bill could add extra duties to the work of a community organisation. Empowerment is achieved by participating in the decision process relating to the provision of public services, and monitoring the outcomes of these decisions. Consultation with community organisations is too often tokenistic. The principles listed in the previous paragraphs on Legislation and the Common Good are necessary for Community Council to feel that they are “empowered”.
Local Government and Regeneration Committee

Submission Number: 104

2 The Bill imposes extra administrative tasks on public services providers. Transfer of ownership of unused buildings or land, if any is available, will make little difference to the administrative workload.

3 The capability of community bodies to take on all or some of the actions in the provisions of the Bill could be limited. Community Councils in particular have had their membership reduced on a population basis and appointing suitable Associate Members is not always possible. Many community bodies may not have the time to carry out the detailed tasks involved in the provisions of the Bill.

4 Apart from Community Planning there are no comments on the choice of matters and provisions of the Bill.

Yours faithfully

James Cornwell (Community Councillor)

Pp Mrs Elizabeth M Brown
Chair Fortrose & Rosemarkie Community Council
The Church of Scotland has a commitment to, and an active presence in, every parish community in Scotland; in particular, the Church has prioritised work in Scotland’s most deprived and vulnerable communities, recognising the commitment of resources required to support and sustain that work. In many of these communities we are happy to work in partnership with Faith in Community Scotland and the Poverty Truth Commission (welcoming the part played by the PTC as in the Bill’s reference group). The Church’s structure has always been rooted in local, community-based decision-making through Kirk Sessions.

The Church’s original submission to the Scottish Government’s consultation on this Bill came from that commitment and engagement, and our reflections now, on the Bill as presented to Parliament, come from reading the Bill in light of that experience and our earlier submission.

The Church’s General Trustees will also submit evidence on matters relevant to their remit in relation to church properties.

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

While retaining some reservations about the effectiveness of legislation in bringing about the culture change we believe is needed to move from tokenism to real partnership, we broadly welcome the Bill. In shifting the emphasis from consultation to participation and empowerment, the Bill lays down a significant marker for change.

Because we believe in the importance of a clear consideration of values, we welcome the clear opening statement in the policy memorandum of the principles underpinning the Bill as “subsidiarity, community empowerment and improving outcomes”, although we would also prefer to see an explicit aim of tackling inequalities running through the Bill rather than an occasional reference to that as a by-product.
We agree with the Poverty Alliance and others that a power for Ministers to create statutory regulations for engaging and empowering communities, which all public bodies must follow and report on, would help move from expectations which are patchily fulfilled to real empowerment across the board. The aim must be to ensure communities are embedded in the design of services in their areas. There remains a risk in the working of CPPs with two tiers of “partners” and “participants”.

A significant limit to the effectiveness of the Bill lies in the neglect of provision for building capacity, both in community bodies and in established public bodies. The financial memorandum anticipates extra administrative costs but appears to expect no additional funding need for building capacity (see further below). Without this funding, other measures may prove ineffective.

We welcome the recognition of the role of communities of interest as well as of place, while recognising that CPPs etc. continue to work with a geographic focus.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

People are the greatest asset of any community, not a hurdle to be overcome; and community bodies are key resources, not competitors to traditional public bodies. Genuine engagement in the design and delivery of services will improve outcomes.

Empowering communities has to mean more than opening a few doors into existing structures while only expecting some extra administrative costs. While some community bodies and individuals can readily slot into these ways of working, others will not. This is partly about building capacity – for which there would be clearer provision than the hope that it “may” happen (Scottish Government response to the LG&R Committee question 39 re s9(3) of the Bill) – but also about developing new models and practices of decision-making.

4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

Our major concern is in the absence of specific provision in the Bill for participatory budgeting. In responding to the LG&R Committee, the Scottish Government has pointed out that the Bill will “strengthen the involvement of communities in setting priorities for public services, which is closely related to how budgets are spent” and that “a participation request under Part 3 of the Bill … may also address how budgets can be spent more effectively”. We believe that the Bill would be significantly strengthened by going further in making clear provision for participatory budgeting, such as in the Poverty Alliance’s suggested requirement for CPPs to set aside 1% of their annual budget to be decided by some appropriate community participation process, to kick-start the process of embedding this in practice by demonstrating its value. While we welcome the establishment of a working group on Participatory Budgeting as a step in the right direction, and legislation may – as the Government states - not be “necessary to make participatory budgeting (PB) effective”, to fail to give a clear impetus through this Bill would be a missed opportunity.

We broadly welcome the sections on Community Right to Buy Land and Asset Transfer requests. In particular, we welcome the recognition that “ownership is not always the best answer; leasing, or managing a site on behalf of the owner, may be a better solution which allows for a division of responsibilities and costs”. A flexible set of tools, combined with flexible responses on rents, rates etc. and appropriate professional support, is important to empowering communities here (as is reflected, for example, in the evidence to the Committee from Love Milton). In addition to those already stated, we support the amendments proposed together by the Poverty Alliance, Oxfam, Barnardo’s and others.

5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

The lack, at this point, of a published equality impact assessment is a concern, especially as there are some expressed hopes for tackling inequalities. As indicated above, we believe this (tackling inequality) should have been one of the key principles underpinning the Bill, in order to keep that focus throughout.

In relation to sustainability, we particularly welcome the requirement for local authorities to prepare and keep under review a food-growing strategy. Our work towards finding ways forward “beyond food banks” sees this as an important dimension of putting the need for food banks behind us.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT AND REGENERATION COMMITTEE

COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL

STAGE ONE CALL FOR EVIDENCE

Response from East Ayrshire Council

INTRODUCTION

1. The Scottish Government introduced the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill to the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014. The Government says that its Bill will:
   - Empower community bodies through the ownership of land and buildings and strengthen their voices in the decisions that matter to them; and
   - Support an increase in the scale and pace of public service reform by cementing the focus on achieving outcomes and improving the process of community planning.

2. The Bill has been preceded by two Government consultations, in 2012 and 2013/14, and subsequently has been sent for scrutiny to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee, which has issued a Stage One Call for Evidence, with a deadline of Friday 5 September 2014.

3. East Ayrshire Council has responded to previous consultations on the proposed Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill, the most recent being in January 2014, following approval by Cabinet on 14 January 2014.

4. The following information provides East Ayrshire Council’s response to the five questions, which the Committee has asked to be addressed.

CALL FOR EVIDENCE

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

5. East Ayrshire Council supports the principle set out in the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill, which provides a positive step in providing people with more confidence that their views are heard, and that they can influence what happens in their community and contribute to delivering change.

6. In East Ayrshire, through Community Planning, good progress has been made in empowering local people and involving them in planning and decision making; however, the Council and its Community Planning Partners recognise that much more needs to be done to address the recommendation of the Christie Commission to build public services around people and communities, their needs, aspirations, capacities and skills, and work to build up their resilience.

7. As a result, we are continuing to build on existing arrangements for the delivery of community based services, which ensure that we focus on empowering our communities and neighbourhoods, and the need to move away from a culture of dependency to social integration, enhanced community cohesion, co-production... and the promotion of local ownership, responsibility and participation. In East Ayrshire, the National Standards for Community Engagement have served well in ensuring the quality of engagement with communities and consideration should be given to reintroducing them into the Bill.

8. The Bill provides an enabling legislative framework to support community participation in setting priorities and in the design and delivery of local services. It would be our view that the Bill is not intended to be prescriptive and provides a framework to help communities to realise the outcomes which matter to them. It will be important for Community Planning Partnerships (CPPs) to have flexibility locally to agree how communities are involved in or, can best support improving local outcomes for their communities through Community Planning.

9. The proposals in respect of the ‘Community right to request to participate in processes to improve outcomes of service delivery’ support participatory democratic processes and the empowerment of communities, and place their right to be heard firmly in a legislative context.

10. East Ayrshire Council recognises that community ownership of assets can be a valuable tool in empowering communities, building the capacity of local citizens and inspiring others to create locally responsive solutions to local needs. The proposed extension to the community right to buy provisions and amendments to the procedures contained in Part 2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 will assist in this regard.

11. East Ayrshire Council is committed to community asset transfer and has since the adoption of its Community Asset Policy in October 2012 and the establishment of a dedicated Community Asset Transfer Team in July 2013 authorised seven transfer applications and received expressions of interest in pursuing transfer from more than 100 community groups or voluntary organisations. The introduction of a statutory framework in this regard will enable the Council to build on its existing policy and processes.

12. By creating a number of statutory rights for community bodies, and corresponding duties on public authorities, the Bill will provide a degree of consistency and a supportive legal framework to underline the Scottish Government’s expectation that all public authorities will support community empowerment and participation.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

National Outcomes

13. The shared Statement of Ambition (15 March 2012) makes clear the commitment of the Scottish Government, COSLA and representatives of CPPs to retain and develop Community Planning and Single Outcome Agreements (SOAs) as the foundation of an outcomes based approach to public services in Scotland.

14. The development and implementation of SOAs in the context of Community Planning have provided the foundation for working towards jointly agreed outcomes. In moving forward, there has been a clear commitment by the Scottish Government and CPPs to SOAs, as the key framework for the delivery of outcomes, to ensure that all partners are focused on one set of key local outcomes, for which they are jointly accountable, linked to national outcomes.

15. Within the overarching framework of the National Outcomes Framework, a range of local outcomes have been agreed with the full involvement of local communities. This is based on the understanding that local partners and local people understand their communities best and are able to identify the priorities for local areas.

16. The proposal to place a duty on Scottish Ministers to consult on and publish a set of outcomes that describe their long term strategic objectives for Scotland would strengthen the link between locally agreed outcomes identified in SOAs, within the context of Community Planning, and the national outcomes set out in a national outcomes framework. Improved co-ordination and collaboration between national and local government and CPPs would result in the development of a national outcomes framework founded on a wide range of priorities and outcomes agreed by Scotland’s communities, resulting in improved outcomes for communities.

17. A complementary duty on Ministers to report on and publicly progress towards these outcomes would not only ensure transparent public reporting as a key element of scrutiny and accountability but also provide clarity for communities on how delivery of outcomes at local level has impacted at national level.

18. East Ayrshire Council welcomes the move to place the requirement to plan for outcomes on a statutory basis. It will be important, however, that involvement in this process allows consultation and engagement across CPPs and other key stakeholders to provide a range of opinion on priorities and expectations; otherwise, this could result in a centrally driven process by the Scottish Government.

Community Planning

19. East Ayrshire Council welcomes the proposals being put forward by the Scottish Government, which will further strengthen Community Planning Partnerships by clearly laying out the core duties on CPPs and all relevant Partners in the local authority area.

20. Within East Ayrshire, our Community Plan, which acts as the Council’s Corporate Plan, is recognised as the sovereign planning document for the local area, providing the overarching strategic policy framework for the delivery of services by all the Partner agencies. Our Single Outcome Agreement is the associated performance reporting framework for the East Ayrshire area.

21. The National Statement of Ambition and the associated Agreement on Joint Working on Community Planning and Resourcing are very clear about the expectations on CPPs in driving forward service integration, increasing the focus on early intervention and prevention, and securing continuous improvement in public service delivery. In this context, clarity on the core duties of CPPs and all participating Partners is welcomed.

22. A statutory underpinning for the SOA or similar process will support us to build and strengthen the work which has been taken forward locally with Partners and communities in respect of the SOA and ensure a focus on a range of challenging issues, including the joint resourcing of activity to achieve agreed outcomes; robust scrutiny and challenge of Partners’ contributions to the achievement of outcomes; and the management of performance across the Partnership.

23. The proposed duties of the CPP support effective community engagement and the involvement of the third and business sectors and will build on the existing robust arrangements within the East Ayrshire CPP.

24. Starting from the premise that communities should lie at the heart of Community Planning, East Ayrshire Council and its Community Planning Partners have a joined up and systematic approach to community engagement, which ensures that partners work together to understand the challenges faced by local communities and promote and support the involvement of local people at both the strategic and local level.

25. Good progress has been made in empowering local people and involving them in planning and decision making; however, the Council and its Community Planning Partners recognise that much more needs to be done to address the recommendation of the Christie Commission to build public services around people and communities, their needs, aspirations, capacities and skills, and work to build up their resilience.

26. As a result, we are continuing to build on existing arrangements for the delivery of community based services, which ensure that we focus on empowering our communities and neighbourhoods, and the need to move away from a culture of dependency to social integration, enhanced community cohesion, co-production and the promotion of local ownership, responsibility and participation.

27. This work includes an increasing emphasis on working with community groups to build the capacity of community representatives and groups, and to explore ownership of local facilities and the establishment of community trusts.

Participation Requests

28. The proposals in respect of the community right to request to participate in an outcome improvement process are designed to support participatory democratic processes and the empowerment of communities, and place their right to be heard firmly in a legislative context; however, they appear overly bureaucratic. The cross reference to the new proposals in relation to engaging communities in Community Planning is important in ensuring that the request to participate does not stand alone and that engagement with community views is seen not only as the responsibility of communities but also as a duty on public sector authorities to initiate participatory processes of community engagement.

29. However, while the Council and its Community Planning Partners continue to support the engagement of local people and involving them in planning and decision making, we have concerns regarding the volume of participation requests that could potentially be made by community participation bodies to participate in an outcome improvement process, and the associated capacity issues and resource implications around managing this process. Community Planning Partnerships should have flexibility to develop locally responsive solutions to engagement structures and procedures within a legislative context.
Community Right to Buy

30. As indicated above the extension of the Community Right to Buy provisions and the streamlining of procedures are welcomed by the Council particularly those that relate to the definition of community. Again whilst the Council appreciates the need for communities having a role in taking on responsibility for abandoned properties it considers that that outcome, if it is to be achieved on a sustainable basis through the introduction of specific rights, will result in a requirement for additional capacity building and ongoing support to be provided from the Council.

Community Asset Transfer

31. Whilst the introduction of a statutory framework will allow the Council to build on its existing policy framework, the terms of the legislation, and in particular the initial onus on community groups to identify terms and conditions, will require the processes within that framework to be re-evaluated and reviewed. It is our experience that community groups are not in a position to identify terms and conditions and prefer a framework which places this responsibility of the local authority. If the desired outcome is to be achieved additional capacity building will be required which will have a resource implication for the Council.

32. Whilst the Council welcomes, in terms of Section 53 of the Bill, a clearer definition of those groups which will be eligible for statutory transfer, it is felt that the requirement for 20 members, both in the case of a company or a Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisation may be difficult to achieve particularly in a number of our more rural communities.

Common Good

33. East Ayrshire Council welcomes the opportunity provided by the Bill to provide clarification on the law surrounding common good and has already carried out a common good title audit and maintains a separate record of its common good assets. Whilst it is appropriate for communities to be aware of the common good assets held by a Council the introduction of a statutory consultation framework particularly in the absence of a definition of common good property will have resource implications for the Council particularly given the proposal that communities should have the option to identify assets which they consider to be part of the common good.

Allotments

34. The Council has responded to allotment demand by adopting an Allotment Strategy. This has sought to extend community participation by allowing the Council to act as facilitator in the management of allotment gardens and allotment service by promoting site self-management through allotment associations. In this regard, the Council’s recent experience has indicated that there is limited demand for allotments within its area which can be met from existing provision from allotment associations. It believes therefore that the proposed duties and requirements set out within the Bill will have resource implications to achieve the desired outcomes when there is a limited demand for allotments within its area.
35. Under Part 8 of the Bill, we note that there will be a new power to allow the Council to create a localised relief scheme for Non-Domestic Rates to develop local responses to local issues and this is to be welcomed.

36. However, the introduction of a local relief scheme will be expected to run alongside existing national schemes (for example, the Small Business Bonus Scheme) and billing will still be calculated using national poundage rates. This will place the financial burden of the local relief scheme on the Council with the total contribution to the National Pool being unaffected by those local schemes. There is therefore concern that some of the national schemes currently in place (for example, Small Business Bonus Scheme, Fresh Start, New Start) may either end or be significantly amended by Scottish Government. Accordingly, should the Council wish to continue such schemes for example, to help regenerate town centres by encouraging empty properties back into use, then it would be potentially at the Council’s expense. It would be important therefore that Scottish Government/national funding streams continued to be made available and accessible to support local authorities.

37. Consultation and engagement with communities and local businesses will be key to ensuring local schemes deliver the right results and, Elected Members, in setting budgets, will require to recognise that resource allocation will also now require to include the cost of local relief schemes. An impact analysis will be a useful tool to adopt in determining the benefits (to communities as opposed to individual businesses / sectors) against the cost of the scheme.

38. A further consideration for the Council around local relief schemes will be to ensure they are fair and transparent, with any scheme requiring to stand up to scrutiny. In addition, the administration of local relief schemes could result in a significant administrative burden through design of a scheme, management of the reliefs, software updates (currently a national “one size fits all” applies) at a local level, consideration of challenges/appeals, and reporting to the Scottish Government. This will require to be part of the overall analysis of cost versus benefits.

39. Business Rates Incentivisation Scheme and future developments/amendments to the current rating scheme will require to be carefully considered prior to introduction of this type of proposal.

40. Finally, the ability to introduce local relief schemes puts a degree of control in the hands of the Council. However, while we continue to operate a national pool, this will only impact on the margins. The key determinant of the cost of Non-Domestic Rates for businesses will remain the rateable value (determined by the assessor) and the rate poundage (determined by Scottish Ministers). The challenge will therefore be ensuring that any scheme is fair, affordable and delivers community benefits.

41. East Ayrshire Council is committed to community engagement in all service areas with all sectors of our communities, not only with constituted bodies but those with potential to develop, as well as individual members of the community. Capacity building support designed to assist communities to develop their skills, confidence, organisation and influence is required to equip communities to fully participate in the engagement process.

42. Empowering community development and participation will require an initial investment to ensure that adequate capacity building support can be provided to allow groups to develop their confidence and skills to enable them to fully participate in the decision making process. There is potential for this investment to be offset by savings in the longer term which will result from enabling communities to take more responsibility within their communities.

43. To further strengthen this approach the legislation requires to ensure that the Scottish Government supports CPPs to resource capacity building at community level, with a particular focus on deprived communities, in order to build the ability of communities to take ownership of community assets, participate in processes to improve outcomes of service delivery and contribute to the priorities of the work of CPPs. Failure to do so may result in those communities which are less established and active, particularly within our smaller and most disadvantaged communities, becoming more marginalised.

Local Outcomes Improvement Plan

44. Under section 5, we note that each community planning partnership must prepare a ‘local outcomes improvement plan’. This introduces new terminology which requires clarification and further detail. In particular, we would seek explicit clarification on how the Local Outcomes Improvement Plan would link to the development and delivery of the current Single Outcome Agreement process.

45. Within the Community Planning context, the development of the SOA has ensured a focus on jointly agreed outcomes and allowed CPPs to monitor their progress on achieving these outcomes. While putting the requirement to develop and deliver on a shared plan for outcomes (for example Community Plan and linked SOA) on a statutory basis will support us to build on the work which has been taken forward locally with Partners and communities in respect of the SOA, we would have concerns regarding an additional requirement to develop a supplementary local outcomes improvement plan.

National Standards for Community Engagement

46. Some of the concrete suggestions contained within the pre-draft Bill consultation have been stripped out, including compulsory use of the National Standards for Community Engagement. As previously highlighted at paragraph 7, consideration should be given to reintroducing them into the Bill as they have served well in ensuring the quality of engagement with communities.
Common Good

47. East Ayrshire Council feels that the Bill has missed the opportunity under Part 6 to provide clarity both in respect of the definition of common good, the distinction between alienable and alienable common good land and the interpretation of the terms of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973. The present situation remains unacceptable particularly given the appropriation issues raised in the case of Portobello Park Action Group v City of Edinburgh District Council [2012] CS1H69 and should be addressed by statutory amendment.

5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

48. The legislation requires to ensure that public bodies, such as the Scottish Government and CPPs, resource capacity building for communities, particularly deprived communities. Failure to do so may result in them failing to meet their General Equality Duties through not taking steps to involve all members of the community, including those with protected characteristics.

49. In the absence of a published Equality Impact Assessment (EQIA), the Council would agree in principle that the Bill has the potential to have positive impacts for people from protected characteristics. The Council is mindful of the public sector duty and recognises the importance of conducting local EQIAs as and when required to ensure that there are no negative impacts for people with protected characteristics.

5 September 2014
Written Evidence to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

Scottish Land & Estates represents landowners, land managers and rural businesses across Scotland with wide-ranging interests in their local communities, many of whom are already working to deliver the aims of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (“the Bill”). We were pleased to form part of the Terms of Reference Group for the Bill and to have the opportunity to respond to the two previous consultations.

General Comments

Scottish Land & Estates is supportive of the principles of the Bill and the extension of community right to buy on the current willing seller basis to the whole of Scotland, but it is important that the Bill provides a framework through which groups, individuals and businesses are empowered to deliver locally. We fully recognise that successful community empowerment results from local enthusiasm leading to local initiatives, local decision-making and local processes, and wish to ensure that all parts of the community are truly empowered. Voluntary agreement has to be the essence of genuine community empowerment, and there are many benefits to be gained through collaboration and partnership. It is noticeable that much land which has been transferred into community ownership, has been undertaken without recourse to the provisions of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003. It is imperative that lack of use of the powers is not seen as a failure of the community ownership agenda. The lack of information on land and property assets transferred to the community without recourse to the legislation must be addressed.

The apparent focus on ownership in the Bill does not of itself equate to “empowerment”. There are many ways in which a community can become empowered. As Stuart Hashagen, senior Community Development Adviser at the Scottish Community Development Centre said in evidence to your Committee on 12 March 2014, “My point is that not every community wants to take over buildings, land and assets.” Specifically we have concerns regarding the provisions in relation to abandoned and neglected land which we have addressed below.

Generally, it will be vital for the measures in the Bill to strike the correct balance between the policy objective of strengthening the role of communities in influencing the stewardship of local property assets, on the one hand; and the right for owners of property to be in a position to progress their own long-term asset management objectives on the other.
Part 2 - Community Planning

Scottish Land & Estates is broadly supportive of clauses 4 to 13 of the Bill in relation to Community Planning. We are of the view that effective community planning is central to helping enable more people in rural and urban Scotland to have a stake in the ownership, governance, use and management of land. Therefore we welcome the alignment with national outcomes at Clause 4(3), having previously called for further work to align national policy initiatives with local planning. The sentiment in the Policy Memorandum in terms of maximising involvement from all partners, which obviously needs to include the private, independent and third sectors, is also encouraging. A strategic joined-up approach is vital and we would have welcomed specific reference to Community Councils in Schedule 1 to the Bill. Overall, it needs to be borne in mind that legislation alone will not establish successful community planning which is dependent upon the relationships between and culture of, organisations. We would like a clear commitment from the Scottish Government that significant activity will be undertaken in addition to the legislation to improve the community planning process.

Part 4 - Community Right to Buy Procedure

Scottish Land & Estates is keen to ensure that the community right to buy process is as straightforward and equitable as possible for both parties, community and owner. It is in neither party’s interest for a community acquisition to be protracted or for there to be any uncertainty.

Clause 33 introduces a requirement for an owner to inform Ministers within 28 days of an exempt transfer being made of this taking place. We consider this to be at odds with the fact the transfer is “exempt”. Further, Registers of Scotland maintain both the Land and Sasine Property Registers as well as the Register of Community Interests in Land and at present it is sufficient to include a declaration in the disposition, detailing the exemption which is being relied upon. It would therefore appear to be most straightforward for there to be internal communication within Registers of Scotland as opposed to placing an additional unnecessary burden on the owner to notify.

Under the current legislation there is certainty regarding the outcome of the ballot result and we are therefore concerned that clause 39 of the Bill removes this certainty, reducing the worth of the ballot and increasing the time period for determination. A ballot is the best and fairest way to measure support as there requires to be transparency, clarity and a tangible outcome. The Post Legislative Scrutiny Report of the 2003 Act published in September 2010 noted, “There was strong support among Community Bodies for the principle of holding a ballot, and most (though not all) supported some level of minimum turnout requirement. One interviewee noted that the demonstration of community support achieved through conducting a rigorous ballot was very useful to their organisation because —no-one can say that the community don’t support what we’re doing.”

In terms of extenuating circumstances which may be taken into account we would be keen to guard against spurious claims and specifically would be interested to know if there is any standard practice or guidance from the Electoral Commission or other impartial body in relation to elections generally which should be reviewed if such a measure is to be adopted. It is entirely proper that circumstances such as adverse weather should be accounted for.
We appreciate that the Financial Memorandum suggests expenditure involved in running the ballot will not be onerous, but this is predicated on a certain restricted usage of the measures in the Bill. In our view, as the ballot is at the initiation of the community body it should be for the community body to meet the expenses and not the public purse as proposed in clause 37 of the Bill.

Late applications were intended to be the exception rather than the rule, but now account for around one-third of community right-to-buy applications. The Bill further relaxes the criteria in terms of Clause 31. In reality if the process is working properly we believe that this should reduce the need for late applications. Community right to buy in our view is intended to be a proactive as opposed to reactive tool and the legitimacy of the process is undermined where late applications become almost standard.

One suggestion which may improve the late application procedure would be if a landowner could obtain exemption from a late application by giving forward guidance of say, six months, of a potential sale of land by advertisement in a local newspaper, giving the community body say, 4 months, to organise itself and register an interest in that land, failing which no late application would be entertained by Ministers.

One part of the existing process where there has been undue delay in consideration of applications to date is in relation to the discretion which Ministers currently have and there is no recognition in the drafting of the Bill or accompanying documentation of the potential role of Scottish Ministers delaying determination of matters, whether that be political or resource-led. Ultimately it should not be forgotten that community right to buy involves three parties, not just the landowner and community body, but also the Minister as well. The Final Report published in September 2010 on the Post-Legislative Scrutiny of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 by Calum MacLeod and others flagged this issue of Ministerial discretion. We would welcome the introduction of a monitoring system into delays in this part of the community right to buy process.

Clause 44 of the Bill means that a landowner who withdraws from a sale to a community body following Ministers appointing the valuer, will be at risk of having to pay to the Ministers, at their discretion, any expense the Ministers have incurred. This provision is a cause for concern, given that under the Community Right to Buy, an owner has the right to withdraw his land from a sale to the community body, after the right to buy has been activated, provided the appropriate notification has been given. We would look for comfort that Clause 44 is not used to arbitrarily penalise a landowner who for a variety of reasons decides not to proceed to sell land, as is his right. A landowner may decide not to proceed for a number of valid reasons, such as where land is owned in Trust, not all of the trustees being made aware of the sale, where family or financial circumstances of the landowner change. We do however appreciate that there may be cases where use of these provisions is warranted.

Abandoned and Neglected Land

Scottish Land & Estates’ members similar to others in their respective communities will be supportive of moves to deal with derelict, vacant and untidy ground which impacts on the local amenity and environment. However, we have serious concerns about the current drafting of clause 48 of the Bill in relation to “Abandoned and neglected land”. If the aim of this section is genuinely to stop community blight and allow for productive use of the land as the Policy Memorandum appears to indicate, then this is not realised in the current drafting of the Bill. We are concerned that the provisions will in fact give succour to those seeking to thwart development or other management plans.

It was noticeable that of the 75 questions in the second consultation document only 2 of those concerned this absolute right to buy provision on neglected and abandoned land and there was no reference to it in the draft Bill which accompanied the consultation. The responses to those questions by consultees across various sectors expressed concerns about how this proposal could be adequately legislated for and it is extremely disappointing that definitions have not been developed by the Scottish Government since that second consultation, given the passage of one whole year. It will not be clear at all how this will work in practice until regulations are published and even then it will depend upon the drafting of those regulations which will enjoy less thorough scrutiny than primary legislation. While we recognise there is a purpose for secondary legislation where detailed procedural matters require to be fleshed out, in this instance the critical matter of definition is being left to secondary regulations.

In our view, an owner is entitled to know, prior to the Bill becoming law, what is meant by the separate terms of “abandoned” and “neglected”. As the Bill is currently worded neither owner nor community body will have certainty on the circumstances in which these provisions could be used. We would suggest that is not appropriate to deal with the transfer of fundamental property rights through secondary legislation. The definitions of “abandoned and neglected” need to be set out in the Act, given this is such a major issue and introducing compulsory acquisition.

The clause heading in the Bill refers to “Abandoned and Neglected” land which we assume refers to the fact that both areas are to be dealt with in that clause, since the part which is to be inserted in the Act refers to “abandoned or neglected”. Clarity is required not only in terms of definition of both, but also that these are being considered exclusively in that the land need only meet the tests of one definition. We also question whether consideration has been given to this part of the Act relating to urban areas alone, rather than coverage being for the whole of Scotland? If we are looking to address those small parcels of land which prevent sustainable development or cause blight then should we restrict use to settlements over a certain population?

We are unclear as to the reference to “wholly or mainly” at 97C(1). The extent of the landholding to be considered requires to be thoroughly scrutinised in forming any legislation in this area. Indeed, 97C(3)(a) requires further consideration in terms of the definition of “an individual’s home” and also the extent to which the location of stables, log sheds and other outbuildings are considered. We also have concerns regarding 97C(3)(f) which allows for the exclusion of prescribed land, particularly if this includes large charities.

While we recognise abandonment as a concept in terms of a leasehold interest, we are not clear how title to a property can be abandoned. The Court of Session only last year on appeal ruled in relation to Scottish Coal Company that Scottish liquidators were unable to abandon land owned by an insolvent as a means of avoiding onerous duties relating to the land. Indeed we are also unclear how land can be “mainly abandoned”. This does not appear to be a legally competent term.
In terms of the process set out in the Bill, we believe that deprivation of ownership is not the appropriate final outcome and it is questionable in ECHR terms whether this is in fact a proportionate response. Where there is “abandoned and neglected” land, the key issue the Bill requires to address is land use, not ownership. This is not realised by 97H(c) which solely relates the criteria for consent to ownership. In contrast the Housing (Scotland) Act 2006 addressed problems of condition and quality in private sector housing with Housing Renewal Areas very much focused on addressing use.

For example, owners of land under agricultural tenancies may have very limited control over the utilisation of the leased land and short of going through time-consuming and potentially costly court processes may be unable to rectify this. It would seem inequitable for land to be compulsorily acquired, where the owner is not actually responsible for the perceived absence of activity or poor management.

Some redevelopment projects can take a considerable period of time and the sense that nothing is being done with the land is not the reality. The various flora and fauna that may be existing in an “overgrown” site may have a value all of their own. This must be carefully examined. In a rural context a scheme to return land to wild land status may appear neglectful to some in a community, but in fact the absence of active management is not necessarily a sign of either “abandonment” or “neglect”. Land may be delivering wider public good in the form of ecosystem services despite not being actively managed. Active management of itself can therefore not be properly used as a term in defining abandonment and neglect. Biodiversity, carbon capture, recreation and cultural value may all be components of different sites and the Bill as drafted does not take into account such circumstances, despite page 19 of the consultation document stating “Land which is intended for recognised conservation purposes would not be considered to be neglected or abandoned”, the Bill as drafted does not reflect that.

Under the provisions there is a risk that land which is lying fallow as a result of sound farming practice or land which cannot currently be developed for justifiable commercial reasons or land subject to a conservation agreement to reduce sheep grazing would be threatened. Rather than empowering a community, this provision as it stands could lead to conflict in a community.

There is in the present drafting no clear opportunity afforded to the owner to counter suggestions of abandonment or neglect. The only provision available is clause 97G(9) whereby Ministers may invite views in writing on the application by the owner and the community body thereafter has another opportunity to address those points, without further input from the owner of the land. This would seem to be inequitable.

In tackling land abandonment, the reasons behind this, not necessarily related to statute should be better explored. These can include environmental such as a decrease in soil fertility; socio-political, for example rural depopulation; or economic, market globalisation. Whether abandonment poses a threat or an opportunity may depend on a whole variety of factors. The Final Report of the Land Reform Review Group highlighted “long-term urban land vacancy and dereliction” and we feel that the focus ought to be on urban renewal where there are recognised problems.
One area of concern we have is that the abandoned or neglected ground might give the appearance of that owing to a blight such as ransom/lack of access, which any community body purchasing would only inherit and be equally incapable of defeating – unless it was envisaged that the Government would use compulsory powers to remove the blight. We would sincerely hope that Ministers are not following that arbitrary route which we believe would be discriminatory.

We are not clear in terms of the proposed clause 97D why the community body for this part of the Act effectively requires to be a company limited by guarantee and suggest that there is parity with the new provisions for normal community right to buy.

In summary, we support the aims of this section but do not believe that the mechanism is the appropriate tool.

Part 6 - Common Good

Scottish Land & Estates welcomes clauses 63 to 67 of the Bill in relation to the common good. In our consultation responses, we supported the establishment and maintenance of a publicly accessible common good register following clarification of the assets which form part of the common good. The Bill rightly focuses on this area and we do not have any further comments at this stage.

Part 7 - Allotments

The Bill repeals the Allotments (Scotland) Acts of 1892, 1922 and 1950 in their entirety as well as the allotments provisions contained in the Land Settlement (Scotland) Act 1919.

While the original legislation refers to local authorities letting to tenants, subsequent legislation does, at least in part, envisage private letting of allotment sites in the wording of some sections. This is particularly in relation to the termination of tenancies and compensation to both landlord and tenant. Therefore while we support the tidying of older legislation and the clarity and consistency which comes with the definitions in clauses 68 and 69 of the Bill, it does not appear that the relevance of some of the older legislation to privately owned allotment sites has been accounted for. This needs to be carefully reviewed prior to the passing of the Bill.

We support the duty incumbent on local authorities at clause 77 to prepare a food-growing strategy. While we note that in relation to allotments this only incorporates land owned or leased by a local authority per the definition, we are pleased that clause 77(3)(b) extends this to “other areas of land in its area that could be used for the cultivation of vegetables, fruit, herbs or flowers”. As we commented in our consultation response we consider that the totality of land available, including that outwith local authority supply should be taken into account in shaping such a strategy.

We disagree with clause 87 of the Bill in relation to the sale of surplus produce. While there is reference to “other than with a view to making a profit”, this does raise issues around trading income etc. There is a danger that this clause could be used to circumvent regulations and requirements which other businesses require to meet and could potentially raise environmental health matters. Allotments have moved towards a recreational hobby pursuit and are not commercial enterprises as recognised in clause 68 (c)(ii) and we would perceive allotments as being for non-commercial personal or community food growing. Therefore this clause ought to be deleted.

Part 8 – Non-Domestic Rates

Scottish Land & Estates is encouraged by the fact that while clause 94 provides powers to local authorities to create localised relief schemes, the local authority must have regard to their council taxpayers’ interests and we appreciate in specific instances like flooding, such a power may well be worthwhile. However, the potential and viability of such schemes is not yet known and we may wish this part to be re-visited if there are adverse consequences for private sector businesses. In particular local authorities will require to be cognisant of ECHR and Competition Act rules in relation to this provision. We would oppose any relief scheme which arbitrarily gives a market advantage to one particular type of ownership or governance structure and we could perceive difficulties arising for instance in the rural sphere where a community-owned farm shop was party to relief, which was not available to an adjacent privately family owned farm shop paying full rates. It may be helpful if your Committee were to take soundings as to how similar provisions in the Localism Act 2011 work.

We would be happy to provide further detail on any of the issues raised in our written evidence.
Community Empowerment Bill

Response from: Maryhill and Summerston Community Council

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

There is a clear need and increasingly broad support for a return of meaningful power and responsibility to community level in Scotland.

The Bill - as proposed - is generally a welcome step towards giving community bodies (including CCs like our own) meaningful powers that can be exercised both independently and also in broader partnerships with public service authorities. Acknowledging the significant pre-consultation effort before drafting the legislation, we have the following comments:

Our (Maryhill & Summerston) Community Council area highlights many of the challenges facing the much-needed revival of real localism in Scotland. Notwithstanding the efforts of many active community councils across Glasgow, 22 of the 100 Glasgow City community councils are currently inactive and this has led to an increasingly centralised approach to the 'delivery' of 'services' in many Glasgow areas. Our ward has a number of well-networked community organisations and there is good community spirit around, but the ward experiences higher than average crime rates and unemployment (and many of the other indicators of 'social deprivation', which are inevitably imperfect proxies for determining the health of our 'community'). Set up in 1976, the Community Council was in abeyance for 10 years, and re-constituted in 2006 with the support of the local Maryhill Housing Association. The CC has worked to engage with planning applications, organise community events and support the initiatives of other local community groups. This has occurred whilst Community Councils across Scotland have been struggling (eg resulting from the cut in pooled financial support for CC networking via the website/secretariat of the Association for Scottish Community Councils in 2012).

We welcome the fact that the CE Bill is aimed at empowering a broadly-defined class of community bodies in Scotland. The extent to which the CE Bill can support the development of and empower, both urban community councils - and community bodies (eg Maryhill Burgh Halls Trust and local charitable organisations including SCIOs in our ward - is therefore of strong interest to this CC.

Three aspects of the proposed legislation – which if enacted - promise significant and welcome reform of the current level of community involvement and responsibility for decision-making and use of local assets.

- The right to buy 'abandoned or neglected' land even if there is no willing seller. Amendments to the Land Reform Act 2003 which alters definition of excluded land to enable community bodies in more urban areas such as ours to register a community interest in the right to buy. Although there is going to be a need to further define the term ('abandoned and neglected'), there are likely to be a number of buildings and land areas that fall into this category in Maryhill and Summerston. Some of these buildings/land are in important public areas of the ward and their condition has a depressing effect on the area. If they were brought into community ownership this could help to improve community life in the ward Legal provisions enabling the community to purchase and sustainably develop such land/property would give this CC a defined power that would actively help to engage the community in the work of CC: with more power, comes greater local participation.

- A transparent avenue to participate in the strategic decisions that shape the delivery of local public services

- Statutory underpinning for Community Planning Partnerships and provisions for participation requests would - if effectively communicated and resourced - start to better harness local views and knowledge about how public services are directed at a local level. For example involving local community organisations in prioritising maintenance contracts and investment planning to ensure that local communities are not neglected. Sometimes it seems that landscape maintenance focuses on the wrong areas and investment and cyclical maintenance misses out the works that are most needing done.

- Statutory access to information

  There are many provisions which place a duty on relevant public service authorities to publish information (eg about a "proposed outcome improvement process" and related report, "annual allotments report", "food growing strategy", "common good property register"). This access to information is vital for community bodies to assess their options and understand how they can participate in - and influence - what should be fully, public processes.

Inevitably the CE Bill is not comprehensive and there are areas which remain unaddressed by the Bill and some aspects of the Bill do not go far enough to secure the conditions necessary to ‘empower’ communities,

- Community Councils

  the Bill does not address the specific role and powers of Community Councils to reinvigorate local democracy. We note the work and recent report of the Commission for Strengthening Local Democracy and are aware that provisions of the CE Bill may well be supplemented by a wider review prompted by the findings of the Commission.

- Right to Request a CPO over Land

  Whilst the right to buy 'abandoned or neglected' land provides a route to purchase land where there is no willing seller, we would support the recent findings of the Land Reform Review Group report which recommends legal provision for an additional channel to facilitate community purchase of land where there is no willing seller, namely a "Right to Request a Compulsory Purchase Order over Land" - where a local community body could in certain circumstances request Scottish Ministers to exercise a CPO over land for re-sale to the community body, where that is deemed by Scottish Ministers to be in the public interest.

- Access to information

  As highlighted above, open access to information is vital and statutory duties to provide details of reports/registers/processes are welcomed. However, there are no specific provisions to ensure: that a "Common Good register" or a "Register of Community Interests in Abandoned or Neglected Land" are map-based and thus easily navigated. There are also no provisions to ensure that the local outcome improvement processes are made public at every stage (see answer to Question 4).

- Financial burden on community bodies

  Some of the provisions of the CE Bill establish powers that may not be easily afforded by a CC or community body.

It is acknowledged that some of these issues would likely be addressed via policy-fixes by the administration of the day, (e.g. the financial burden of administration and/or cost of 'capacity-building' could be surmounted by the development of targeted funds to support public authorities and communities engaging with the provisions), but it might be worth considering how to embed them in this or other legislation.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill

Whilst we cannot speak for those public sector organisations that would be affected by the CE Bill, we would imagine that in the long-term, the provisions of the Bill would as the Bill's title suggest 'empower' communities and therefore be of significant benefit to relevant public service authorities - as empowered communities are more likely to help shape and guide the delivery of services in a more strategic, targeted and efficient way.

Again, Maryhill & Summerston Community Council cannot comment broadly on the capacity of communities across Scotland, but for our area, it is unclear whether we would have the capability to take advantage of the s 48 right to buy 'abandoned and neglected' land. There may be significant sums of money involved in both the legal and administration costs of ballots indicating community approval (new Section 97J of the 2003 Act) and conveyancing. These costs, however, are the inevitable aspects of community responsibilities for. Without recourse to changing the Bill itself, there would be ways to assist communities by:

  - Ensuring resources were invested to promote easy access to the information for communities. A public register of common good land must be easy to navigate and map-based to enable CCs and other community bodies to easily assess the status of land in their area
  - Amendments could be made to broaden the remit - and increase the funding - of the Scottish Legal Aid Board to provide publicly-funded legal advice to assist community bodies in asset transfer/right to buy applications..

4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

We consider a list of certain provisions in turn. Some comments on provisions detail potential changes to the legislation, some offer observations for deliberation:
• s 4(3) "Outcomes of the type mentioned in subsection (2) ("local outcomes") must be consistent with the national outcomes determined under section 1(1) or revised under section 2(4)(a)." What happens if/when local outcomes proposed by a CPP do not cohere with national outcomes?
• s 11 duty to promote - How will this be achieved? It would be difficult to be too prescriptive in legislation, but there could be some more specific reference to how Scottish Ministers will "promote" community planning effectively.
• s 19(5) makes a provision that a public service authority can refuse a participation request on if there are "reasonable grounds." This is highly subjective and there is no way to appeal the decision. This should be amended.
• s 19(7)(a) does not specify a period and leaves this open to subsequent regulation by Ministers. What is the rationale for this?
• s 21(7) states that "The authority must publish the information mentioned in subsection (6) on a website or by other electronic means is inadequate," but s 21(6) leaves this open: "The authority must publish such information about the process as may be specified in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers." It is crucial that participation requests and decisions are public at every stage and that this is built into legislation.
• s 22(1)(c) re: the power to decline participation requests The two year rule seems too restrictive, given that a refusal notice may have been issued due to the ineligibility of the initial, requesting community participatory body. Although the power to refuse is discretionary, there should be different categories of refusal (eg technical or substantive) so that requesting CPBs are not disadvantaged by eg previously poorly-framed requests of other CPBs.
• s 22(4) The rationale for this clause is not clear. It could be material as to whether the body making the request is the same as that which made the previous (and similar request).
• s 24(2) - This provision is a good idea, but potentially open to abuse. What does 'in consultation with' mean? What happens if the CPB does not agree. What happens if there are multiple CPBs and they do not all agree to modify the "outcome improvement process"
• s 48: See our response to Question 2. We would support the Land Reform Review Group's proposals for an additional avenue of community acquisition of land if there is an unwilling seller, ie a 'Right to Request a Compulsory Purchase Order over Land'
• s 48 97F "The Keeper must set up and keep a register, to be known as the Register of Community Interests in Abandoned or Neglected Land (the “Part 3A Register") Would there be benefit in proactively developing a publicly accessible register of Abandoned and Neglected Land - for which there isn't necessarily a registered community interest?
• s 48 The new 97J has a procedural provision for establishing a ballot to evidence community support for the application. "that at least half of the community voted in the ballot or where fewer than half of the members of the community voted, the proportion that voted is sufficient to justify the community body proceeding to purchase the land; and finally, that the majority of the votes cast were in favour of making the application. What does "proportion that voted is sufficient to justify" mean? This may create confusion.

5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

We support the views laid out in the Assessment of Equal Rights and sustainable development as set out in the Policy Memorandum. Sustainable development would likely be well-served by community-led planning and ownership of common good land.

COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL
Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee
Evidence from the Big Lottery Fund

There is no doubt that the intention behind the Bill is indeed to empower communities. It does not demand that all communities become empowered but instead, in most cases, the Bill makes provision for communities to become empowered only if they wish to, and only to the extent that they wish to become empowered. So, for example, the Committee will already be aware that one of our major investment areas, Growing Community Assets (or GCA), has, since 2006, made over £60 million available to communities throughout the whole of Scotland - both urban and rural - so that they can have more control and influence over their future development, prosperity and resilience through owning and developing local assets that are important to them. Although we have seen our investment bring about some spectacular transformations in a number of communities, nevertheless, the Fund has always been clear that asset ownership is not appropriate in all circumstances or for all communities. The Bill recognises this too in that while it does give communities the right to request to buy public sector land or buildings, it also gives them the option to request to lease, manage, occupy or use such land and buildings. This provides communities with a variety of ways in which they can make better use of public land and buildings. It also gives them the option to ‘test their mettle’ by maybe starting off by leasing and managing an asset to see how they get on before deciding to buy it outright from the public authority.

It should be stressed, however, that our GCA investment area only supports communities to acquire and own assets (private as well as public). But while GCA will not fund communities that simply want to lease, manage, occupy or use public sector land and buildings, some of our other investment areas and programmes may support community groups to provide services and activities from public sector premises.

The variety of ways in which the Bill permits communities to get involved in improving public services is also welcomed because of the choice it affords them to get involved to the extent that they want to. However, because the Big Lottery Fund is unable to financially support statutory obligations, there is probably an interesting debate to be had here as to just what funding we will be able to provide to communities who decide to accept this challenge.

The success or otherwise of the Bill’s proposals on participation and asset transfer requests, as well as a number of its other proposals, will depend to a great extent on the attitude and position taken by the public bodies affected by them, and especially, of course, by local authorities. In addition, success will depend upon the extent to which communities, and the statutory and voluntary organisations which support them, can access and develop the skills and resources they need to successfully exploit the opportunities the Bill creates.
Perhaps nowhere will this be more key than in the Bill’s proposals around community planning. The Bill legislates for this activity to be the process by which public bodies work together and with community bodies to plan for, resource and provide services which improve local outcomes in the local authority area. By putting forward these provisions, the Government is signalling how it intends community planning to operate and that it expects communities to be at the core of the process. It is to be hoped that the public bodies involved pick up this signal and include community bodies as full partners.

Community bodies will require help and resources to enable them to play this fuller role and this point will be returned to in our response to Question 3 below.

Other provisions in the Bill that are particularly welcomed include:

(i) The attempt to provide greater clarity and transparency around common good assets held by local authorities by placing a requirement on Councils to establish and maintain registers of all properties held by them that fall into this category;

(ii) The new measures aimed at making the ‘right to buy’ provisions in the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 easier to use, as well as the extension of these provisions to urban Scotland (though, as was pointed out above, GCA has been supporting communities throughout the whole of the country to acquire and develop all sorts of assets that matter to them (not just land and buildings) since 2006). This will also assist us, and our partners, Highlands and Islands Enterprise, in our delivery of the Scottish Government’s Scottish Land Fund; and

(iii) The introduction of a new Part 3A of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003, permitting community bodies to acquire neglected and abandoned land, even where there is not a willing seller (though it is anticipated that agreeing definitions of ‘neglected’ and ‘abandoned’ will not be straightforward).

A surprising omission from the Bill perhaps was the provision of greater clarity on a substantive future role for Community Councils. The Bill does recognise these Councils’ interest in shaping local services and gives them a specific role in relation to the monitoring of common good assets. However, it had been anticipated that the Bill would provide an opportunity to increase Councils’ profile and their contribution to civic and community life.

A final concern is one that it is understood was expressed previously by others, namely, that some people and communities might have difficulty understanding the language used in the Bill. It is appreciated that the Bill must follow the usual format and conventions, but this makes it all the more important that it is accompanied by clear, concise and easily understood explanatory notes. The recent publication of an ‘easy read’ version of the Policy Memorandum for the Bill is welcomed. Highland and Islands Enterprise’s work in producing support materials for communities using the provisions of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act are a good example of how this challenge can be addressed. Based on experience gained in over ten years of working with communities to acquire, develop, manage and operate local assets and services, we believe the Bill’s publication presents a perfect opportunity to work with communities already doing this to co-produce support materials and other resources.
2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

Asset transfers

Although public bodies will lose the capital value of any assets they transfer to community bodies (especially if, as the Big Lottery Fund prefers, they transfer the asset at a discount or even at nil cost), they will also be free of the associated liabilities. At the same time (and especially if we support them through our GCA investment area), the community will acquire an asset which may have fallen into disuse or has not been used to its full potential, but which the community themselves can now put to productive use to address local needs and benefit local residents.

In some instances, community asset projects and public sector organisations can be mutually beneficial. For example, instead of operating a separate local office, the public sector organisation could become a core tenant of the newly community-owned asset, thereby going a considerable way to help with the asset’s future sustainability too.

As mentioned above, since the introduction of GCA in 2006, the Fund’s policy has been to only fund acquisition costs when public sector assets are sold to community groups at a discount. This position is endorsed in the Report, ‘The Land of Scotland and the Common Good’ published by the Scottish Government’s Land Reform Review Group in May this year which states that:

“The Review Group considers that assets should be transferred to local communities at a reduced cost or no cost where that is judged in the public interest because of the wider public benefits it will deliver.”

What is more, the Review Group went on to state that it saw:

“no logic to the circulation of public funds”, which we interpret as one public body (such as the Fund) having to provide grant assistance based on full market value to a community body to pay another public body (such as a local authority) for land or an asset which it is selling to a community.

Work to clarify and ensure a more consistent interpretation of the Public Finance Manual in relation to asset transfer will be important to the success of this part of the Bill.

Neglected and abandoned land

The Bill’s provisions allowing community bodies to apply to acquire neglected and abandoned land from unwilling sellers will see communities bringing such land into productive use, thereby removing what could be a blight on the areas affected and, in some cases, relieving public bodies of the burden of dealing with the consequences of this neglect. This can only be good for the communities and the local authority areas concerned - environmentally, but also maybe socially and economically. Moreover, the community’s development of such land may even stimulate the local property market and encourage further sales by others.

There will, however, be challenges, particularly in cases of unwilling sellers in ensuring that a community body is able to gain sufficient information about an asset in order to make a reasonable decision about both its value and the aspirations the community harbours.

Allotments

The proposed new duty on local authorities to hold and maintain waiting lists for allotments will hopefully provide welcome clarity for all concerned (both the local authority and those wishing an allotment) about the availability of allotment sites in the local authority area. It will also provide a valuable source of intelligence about the demand for, and potential to develop, community growing sites. However, it will also put further pressure on local authorities to respond to increased demand for such sites.

Participation requests

While the outcome for everyone involved must be to provide a better service for those who need it, public bodies will inevitably have to spend scarce and precious time and other resources assessing any participation requests they receive from community bodies. This coincides with dire warnings from the Improvement Service for Scottish local government about sizeable cutbacks in expenditure that Councils and other public sector bodies are going to have to make.

Our experience indicates that many communities - and especially community anchor organisations - are already undertaking the sorts of activities described in the Bill. Nevertheless, the capability of communities across Scotland to take advantage of the provisions in the Bill will, as would be expected, vary enormously, and will do so to different degrees at different times. Many able and capable communities will undoubtedly have the capacity to take full advantage of the Bill’s provisions - or at least to take advantage of them to the extent that they wish to. Other communities - whether capable or not - will have no interest in the Bill’s provisions, while there will be others still who would probably like to make use of the provisions but lack the capacity to do so. Indeed, some of these latter communities may not even know how to start to take advantage of the provisions. And, as suggested earlier, even something as basic as the language used in the Bill and its associated documentation will be off-putting to communities if they are unable to understand them.

That said, we know that with the correct mix of capacity, engagement and support, communities are more than capable of rising to significant challenges and seizing substantial opportunities successfully. For that to happen though, the eventual Act will need to be underpinned by a significant effort to ensure that it is well understood and used.

The preparation of applications and compilation of business plans, etc., are complicated and time-consuming tasks, especially for voluntary organisations. This should be recognised in the timescales given to such groups to put these documents together and to submit them.

A lot of community groups will probably need help and support to build their capacity so that they can put quality applications together. As well as this practical support (with things like business plans), the Big Lottery Fund has found that applicants often also need relatively small amounts of money to develop and test their ideas and thinking, for feasibility studies, technical reports and scheme design studies, community consultation, professional advice, or to visit similar operational projects elsewhere to see how they work and to learn from them. This latter activity is a particularly powerful and effective way for projects to learn from one another so as to build on positive experiences and avoid pitfalls. The Fund therefore offers grants of between £500 and £10,000 through its Investing in Ideas programme for these purposes.

Our years of experience of operating grant programmes which support communities to acquire and develop assets, as well as the independent evaluations of these programmes, have confirmed how much applicants need support to help them put together large scale and complicated capital projects. We have therefore made specific budgetary provision so that we can provide Investing in Ideas awards to potential GCA applicants. We have also put contractual support in place to help applicants and grantholders with self evaluation, financial and business support, and with renewable energy projects. Indeed, all applicants who make it through to stage two of the GCA application process are automatically referred on to our business support contractors (who are themselves a social enterprise). In addition to all of this, applicants can also apply for up to £50,000 (and sometimes more) in development funding. This is intended to help meet the costs of, for example, options appraisals, feasibility studies, site investigations, design development, statutory consents, business plans, professional and legal fees, market research and capacity building, between stages one and two of the application process.

We also employ two members of staff who can help applicants and grantholders with advice and support on a wide range of building and technical matters. This form of support is particularly highly valued by applicants and grantholders.

The findings from the five year, independent evaluation of GCA, published last year, provide very useful indicators, identified by projects themselves, about the factors that contribute to successful community ownership projects, as well as the sorts of challenges (including some that are not inconsiderable) that they face. The capability and capacity of a community group can have a direct bearing on a lot of these factors and challenges. So, for example, GCA project managers recommend that group members need to be committed to their projects, willing to give generously of their time, effort and expertise, and to engage constantly with the members of their communities. Major challenges included an over-reliance on the same office-bearers, members and volunteers and, of course, achieving financial sustainability. Fortunately, GCA projects also suggested some practical measures that can be taken to help make community ownership a success and thereby contribute to the success factors.
The GCA evaluation also made another couple of interesting observations which have a bearing on the capability of community groups to make a success of their projects.

The first was how crucial local Councils can be when it comes to enabling communities to achieve their aspirations to own and manage public assets. This can range from the authority’s fundamental attitude to the community ownership of assets (i.e. whether they are prepared to even consider the disposal of their assets to community groups), through to the support – financial or otherwise - they are willing to provide to the new community owners after they acquire the former Council property. The GCA evaluation makes it clear that there are both benefits and challenges for both parties to such transactions.

The second observation arose from a survey of households in areas where GCA projects are located. This demonstrated more limited interest in volunteering and managing projects in urban areas. The evaluators suggested that the greater interest shown in rural areas, and particularly in remote rural areas, might be due to the stronger tradition of volunteering and of ‘doing things for themselves’ that exists there. In looking ahead, therefore, the evaluators suggested that urban communities, and especially the most disadvantaged of these, will continue to need greater support with community ownership projects if the potentially greater benefits (particularly in terms of their impact on larger numbers of people) are to be achieved.

A summary of the evaluation findings was e-mailed to all MSPs on 13 September 2013 but it can be viewed at:

http://www.biglotteryfund.org.uk/-/media/Files/Programme%2520Documents/Growing%2520Community%2520assets/GCA%2520eval.pdf?rct=j&frm=1&q=&esrc=s&sa=U&ei=rhfyU5G2Olyy7Aa6_IGYCg&ved=0CBQQFjAA&usg=AFQjCNF-Jxk31dmGnzLeFBNlVRzTMczvYQ

The Big Lottery Fund has also accumulated a significant amount of learning about the capacity of some communities to respond to funding opportunities from developing and delivering the Our Place initiative.

Information about Our Place has been included in previous evidence supplied to the Committee (and to the consultations on the Bill), but members will recall that it is a place-based initiative by the Fund to invest in communities with high levels of deprivation but whose share of Big Lottery Fund investment has fallen furthest behind their share of need. Our Place is committed to focusing on a neighbourhood, offering long term support, pursuing opportunities and reaching out to communities to help us invest in their places. The theory behind the programme is that in doing so, the people and organisations in those neighbourhoods and communities will build stronger connections and relationships, and be empowered to work together to bring about positive changes in their communities.

Our learning from Our Place is drawn both from the positive outcomes it is achieving and from things that have not worked well or which did not complement the initiative’s overall approach. Further information about Our Place and some learning points are given in Annex A to this evidence paper.

While the Big Lottery Fund generally welcomes most of the specific provisions in the Bill, there are a small number which we think would benefit from further clarification or consideration. However, at this stage it is not possible to recommend that the provisions concerned need changed because in a lot of cases, they are subject to secondary legislation, regulations or Ministerial guidance. In other words, ‘the devil may yet be in the detail’. Three particular examples illustrate this point.

The first example relates to the proposed modification to the Community Right to Buy process whereby Scottish Ministers will arrange for the ballot required after the right to buy has been triggered to be conducted by an independent third party, not the community making the right to buy as formerly. Ministers will also meet the cost of the ballot. Whilst the proposal that Scottish Ministers organise and pay for the ballot has much to recommend it, the Fund’s evidence on the draft Bill previously pointed out that there was a danger that this might also, in a way, divorce the community body wishing to make the purchase from the community whose very support it needs to be assured of. Nevertheless, it will only be once the detail of this proposal is made plain that we will be able to gauge whether or not it will work to a community’s advantage.

The second example concerns Section 52(4)(e) of the Bill which requires the ‘community transfer body’ making an asset transfer request to specify in its request the price it is prepared to pay for the asset it wishes to acquire. In our evidence to the draft Bill, we pointed out that this will entail the community body having to arrange and pay for a survey/valuation at a very early stage. This seems unfair and onerous at this stage of the process. Instead, it would expedite the transfer process if the relevant authority gave prior notice to the community body of the minimum price it would accept. This could prevent the community body having to become embroiled in a costly and time consuming negotiation. However, this particular issue is another that may yet be resolved further down the line because the Bill allows Scottish Ministers to make regulations enabling community transfer bodies to request information from public authorities about the assets they are interested in.

It would be useful for the community body to have the valuation early as it could provide the basis for a negotiated settlement with the owner. It will also let the body know the amount of funding they will need and give them the opportunity to make early contact with potential funders to gauge the likelihood of funding being made available. More ‘realistic’ valuations would also be welcome: that is to say that while a valuer may insist that a property can command a certain valuation on the open market, the reality is that no party other than the local community may actually be interested in buying that property! This issue may take on added importance with the extension of the community right to buy to urban areas where, more generally, there is likely to be a more competitive market for relatively more expensive land and buildings.
The third example concerns a community’s right of appeal where its request for the transfer to it of an asset held by either Scottish Ministers or a local authority is refused. If such a request by a relevant public authority other than Scottish Ministers or a local authority, the Bill provides for the community body to appeal to Scottish Ministers. The Bill currently makes no mention of any right of appeal against a refusal by Scottish Ministers to agree to an asset transfer request. Local authorities on the other hand, being democratically accountable in their own right, are required by the Bill to make separate arrangements for the review of decisions to refuse asset transfer requests. Here again, however, the Bill empowers Scottish Ministers to make regulations about the form these arrangements must take.

The Fund supports the proposal in the Bill to require local authorities to provide detailed waiting lists, annual reports and strategies in relation to allotments. However, in our responses to consultations on the Bill, we indicated that we would like to see Councils being required to produce registers of all their land assets - not just allotment sites - and to make them publicly available. We also suggested the minimum information that these registers should contain. We believe that the production and existence of asset registers would greatly assist both sides involved in community right to buy transactions involving public sector assets.

Equal rights

The Fund welcomes the fact that in making decisions under the provisions of the Bill, public bodies will require to constantly be mindful of their duties under the Equality Act 2010. We would also support suggestions that public authorities be required to carry out an Equality Impact Assessment when developing policies in relation to the provisions in the Bill. This is because in addition to our fundamental, intrinsic belief in equality, and our commitment to our own equality principles, we also believe that the promotion of full accessibility, diversity, equality of opportunity and inclusion, and the reduction of disadvantage and exclusion can all have practical benefits for communities and community projects too. So, for example, in our experience, most community-based service provision aims to ‘rectify wrongs’, or fill a gap or deficit. And on a very practical level, the opening up of community asset projects to as many people and different groups as possible could increase usage, business, and thereby sustainability.

Impacts on island communities

We have seen contrasting responses to the opportunity to take on community ownership of land across the three island local authority areas reflecting the relative importance, differing patterns of use and availability of land in these areas. Moves to improve the operation of the community right to buy will be especially helpful in Eilean Siar (as well as in the island communities in Highland and Argyll and Bute Council areas). In our experience, Councils in these areas are generally well disposed to community engagement.
in assets ownership and service provision. Consequently, all three island Council areas have high levels of community ownership in terms of buildings and other assets, including renewable energy resources. This underlines the point made earlier in response to Question 3. about how crucial local authority support and encouragement can be in facilitating community ambitions. The Community Empowerment Bill may create further opportunities in island communities, as well as important opportunities for these communities to share their considerable and valuable experience and expertise more widely.

Sustainable development

At a project level, and specifically for community asset ownership projects, our experience suggests that the provisions in the Bill relating to this activity are likely to have a positive impact on sustainable development.

The GCA1 evaluation tells us that the projects funded under the investment area have had a positive impact on the local, and thereby the global, environment. This is because environmental concerns have been an important part of most of the projects supported and their efforts have taken a variety of forms.

17 GCA1 community energy projects are now in operation and generating roughly 9.8MW of renewable energy. These projects have, in turn, inspired other communities to generate their own power and therefore income, while at the same time making a major contribution to reducing CO2.

Thanks to the shops, post offices and petrol stations saved or created by communities, there has been a positive impact on reducing fuel consumption. And there is evidence that involvement with GCA projects leads households to reduce their household energy consumption too.

Almost all the new build and refurbished projects use environmentally friendly heating systems and building materials. For example, the new centre built with GCA funding by the Gairloch and Loch Ewe Action Forum (GALE) was the first public passive building in Scotland, and The Big Shed project in Loch Tay won a Carbon Trust Scotland Low Carbon Building Award in 2013.

A number of recycling projects (such as RECAP’s Community Recycle North Lanarkshire and the Ballantrae Recycling Workshop and Retail Outlet) not only save users money but also divert waste from landfill.
BIG LOTTERY FUND EVIDENCE ON THE COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL

OUR PLACE

What is Our Place and what do we want to achieve with this initiative?
Our Place represents a different way of investing Lottery funding based around priorities and a vision statement set by local people. It is a place-based initiative from the Big Lottery Fund that aims to build stronger connections and relationships in communities, empowering local people and organisations to bring about positive and lasting changes in their neighbourhoods.

Our Place 1 launched in five neighbourhoods in 2010 and has since invested approximately £11 million across 25 projects that positively contribute to their neighbourhood vision. In addition to grant funding, we invested in support contracts that built the capability of local people and organisations, supporting them to develop their own neighbourhood vision statement and providing them with the best possible opportunity to make effective applications to us that reflected both local priorities and the outcomes the Big Lottery Fund wanted to invest in.

A project team at the Fund has developed Our Place 2 and our learning from the first initiative has been built into our approach. The new Our Place delivery framework essentially splits the initiative into two phases. Phase 1 is focused on asset based community development work, which will be ongoing throughout the life of the programme, and phase 2 is focused on project development, grant making and project delivery, which will start approximately 12 months into the process.

Our Place 2 will work in seven neighbourhoods across Scotland and will adopt an approach that is flexible, long-term and locally determined in a way that focuses on the assets within each neighbourhood. The initiative will also explicitly aim to have more impact on the way the public sector works with communities. All of these developments are reflected in the outcomes that Our Place 2 will be working towards, and projects funded through the initiative will be required to meet all three of these outcomes.

Our Place 2 Outcomes

- Communities have more influence on decisions taken locally
- Communities have more sustainable services and facilities that reflect their local priorities
- People say their community is a better place to live
The Big Lottery Fund is investing in five year support contracts to provide intensive, asset based community development to develop the skills and confidence of local people and organisations. There is a support contract for each Our Place 2 neighbourhood.

What will support contractors be doing in each neighbourhood?
The focus of the support contractors’ work will be less about funding in the early stages and more about doing the right groundwork in neighbourhoods, building connections, strengthening relationships, facilitating asset mapping and visioning, and developing skills and confidence. We expect the early stages of Our Place 2 to take up to 12 months, depending on the local context.

Support contractors will then support neighbourhoods through the project development and grant making stage of Our Place 2 and we will expect them to be aware of every application that is submitted through the initiative. A Community Chest of £20,000 will be administered by the support contractors and available to each community to be accessed in small amounts as and when required. We anticipate that the Community Chest will be used to run events, pilot activities, undertake research and learning visits, or to deliver community capacity building in the first year or two of the initiative. The final stage of the support contracts will be focused on supporting grantholders through project set-up and the early stages of project delivery.

It is essential that the support contractors work closely with key agencies operating in these neighbourhoods throughout the lifetime of their contract - sharing information and learning, complementing existing initiatives, facilitating joint-working and avoiding duplication of efforts will be of critical importance.

What kind of projects will Our Place 2 fund?
The Fund has set broad outcomes and eligibility criteria for this initiative, but we have not specified any particular types of projects that we would like to fund. All projects should stem from the community and fit with their vision for their future. Although we cannot know for sure which types of projects will emerge from each of the seven neighbourhoods, our learning from Our Place 1 tells us that they are likely to include a variety of revenue and capital. Funding through the first initiative has been invested in projects around community transport, community gardens, community food, financial inclusion, Development Trusts, community health, family support, community facilities, additional capacity building support to voluntary and community sector organisations and much more.

What have we learned from Our Place 1 and how has it influenced Our Place 2?
Our Place 2 aims to get in alongside communities through support contractors, helping people and organisations to form ideas by supporting them over a long period of time and in a neutral way. The Our Place journey thus far offers a number examples of how citizen-led activity has been enabled, increasing people’s confidence and empowering them to come together to deliver community-led projects. However, the journey also offers examples where community groups perhaps feel that they are taking on too much too soon, and other examples where groups are delivering successful projects but struggle with sustainability and therefore remain dependent on Our Place funding.
The following key learning points appear to be particularly important for any discussions around community-led approaches to empowering communities:

- Genuine community empowerment, and asset based community development in particular, takes a long time and is very resource intensive. The Fund did not fully appreciate how long until Our Place 1 delivery was underway. We extended Our Place 1 support contracts from two to three years. As we embark on taking the Our Place approach to seven new neighbourhoods, we have committed to five year support contracts from the outset.

- Genuine community-led approaches require a depth and breadth of consultation that goes beyond most of our expectations for our other funding programmes. The community must be in control of the consultation and every effort must be made to bring people from the margins into the centre of the process as citizens and not as a member of a specific policy group.

- Small amounts of money can make a huge difference to encourage citizen-led activity. Our Place 2 will include a community chest that can distribute small amounts of cash (approximately £250) to enable things to happen quickly and build momentum at a pace that is right for a community.

- Good things can happen when citizens are in a position to sit at the table and influence decisions that affect their community. Our Place 1 offers a good example in Newmains where Newmains Development Trust are leading a significant £2 million capital project to build a new community hub, and the local authority have agreed to base the local library and housing services within the new building. The discussions between people and organisations have not only led to an important revenue stream for the Trust, they have also built people’s confidence in their ability to shape the future of their community.
COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL RESPONSE FROM SOLAR TO CALL FOR EVIDENCE

The Society of Local Authority Solicitors and Administrators in Scotland (SOLAR) welcomes the opportunity to respond to the call for evidence issued by the Local Government and regeneration Committee on 26 June 2014. The SOLAR response is solely to question 4 of the call for evidence paper: “Are you content with the specific provisions of the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

1. SOLAR’s principal point in relation to the Bill as published concerns Part 6 of the Bill which deals with common good property. SOLAR’s view is that the Bill misses the opportunity to deal with the legal issue identified by the Court in the Portobello Park Action Group Association v City of Edinburgh Council case.

2. That issue arose from the court’s view, supported in a more recent case involving East Renfrewshire Council that it is not possible for a council to change the use of land that is viewed as being inalienable common good land. This contrast with the position of a council wishing to dispose of inalienable common good land where the legislation provides that this may be possible but only with the approval of the court.

3. SOLAR’s position is that a proposed change of use of or appropriation of inalienable common good land should be subject to the same controls as those that already exist for a disposal of the same property.

4. Such a change would avoid the need for an Act of Parliament to be promoted should another case arise where a council wished to appropriate common good land for another council function. The approval by the Scottish Parliament of the City of Edinburgh Council (Portobello Park) Act 2014 earlier this year demonstrates that there will be circumstances in which councils will legitimately wish to apply land held on common good for purposes different to the purposes for which the land was given to the council’s predecessors. Therefore, it is right that there should be a process short of promoting legislation to enable this to happen.

5. It is acknowledged that any proposal that could be perceived as weakening the existing legislative restrictions on changing the use of common good may be viewed with suspicion by some. However, the SOLAR proposal would not allow any appropriation of land to take place without the approval of the court. This, combined with the provisions in the Bill relating to consultation would give ample opportunity for scrutiny and challenge of any proposed appropriation.
6. The change could be accomplished by some minor, technical amendments to section 75 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973.

7. SOLAR, in line with its response to the earlier consultation which closed on 24 January 2014, believe that the current provisions in the Bill relating to common good miss the opportunity to provide clarity on the interpretation on some key terms used in the 1973 Act. These include:

   - How and in what circumstances moveable assets held on the common good account could be disposed of. The legislation is currently silent on this point
   - Definitions of “alienable” and “inalienable” common good. The lack of clarity on these definitions has resulted in the Keeper of the Registers of Scotland refusing to issue a full title indemnity on the sale of any common good land, even where the property is clearly alienable.
   - Ideally, the Bill would attempt to define common good rather than having to rely on less than perfect common law definitions.

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

Response to call for evidence as part of Stage 1 consideration of the Bill

Introduction

The Scottish Fire and Rescue Service (SFRS) commenced on 1 April 2013, and replaced the previous eight Fire and Rescue Services in Scotland. The main purpose of the SFRS, as articulated within the Fire and Rescue Framework for Scotland 2013, is to work in partnership with communities and with others in the public, private and third sectors, on prevention, protection and response, to improve the safety and wellbeing of people throughout Scotland.

The SFRS is supportive of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill and welcomes this opportunity to provide evidence. We believe that the Bill will facilitate the SFRS’ purpose to work in partnership with communities, affording the opportunity for services to be co-produced in a manner that reflects local circumstances, within the context of a national organisation.

The aforementioned Fire and Rescue Framework for Scotland 2013 sets out the overarching strategic direction for the SFRS. It contains 58 priorities for the Service including such areas as working in partnership with local communities, prevention, protection and emergency response. The SFRS has created a Strategic Plan 2013 – 2016, which articulates how the Service plan to deliver against the priorities within the Framework, in a manner that supports the Scottish Government’s National Outcomes.

To support local scrutiny and engagement, the SFRS has appointed a Local Senior Officer (LSO) for each of the 32 local authority areas across Scotland. By working in partnership, LSO’s have developed Local Fire and Rescue Plans for each local authority area. These plans set out the priorities and objectives for the SFRS within the local authority area, the reasons for their selection, how they will be delivered and measured. The plans also articulate the contribution that the SFRS will make to other relevant local outcomes that have been identified through community planning. These plans are widely consulted upon and must be submitted to the relevant local authority for approval.

To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answers?

The SFRS believes that the Bill provides the landscape within which communities can become empowered. This is due to the strengthening of Community Planning Partnerships (CPP’s), placing them on a statutory footing. The SFRS contributes to all CPP’s within Scotland, and welcomes the opportunity to strengthen them that the Bill provides.

In addition to the enhancement of CPP’s, the SFRS also supports the other aspects of the Bill that will empower communities. This is due to the opportunity provided by the Bill for communities to have a greater say in the delivery of public services and local decision making processes. The SFRS is very supportive of a bottom-up approach to empowering communities, through collaboration and co-production, using all the assets within a community, including those from the public, private and third sectors as well as the inherent skills all communities possess. The SFRS considers that the Building Safer Communities Programme will be a vehicle for mobilising communities in this manner.

The SFRS recognises that improving outcomes cannot be done by organisations working in isolation, or indeed without the involvement of communities themselves. This is an approach that the SFRS already takes, for example in relation to our partnership approach to engagement with communities from a prevention perspective. We recognise that we cannot make people safer without working in partnership with others, and have also successfully utilised ‘community calls to action’ to assist safeguard more vulnerable members of society from fire. We therefore welcome the opportunity to strengthen these principles, which the Bill will provide.

The SFRS believes that the Bill will have a positive impact upon public sector organisations. As an organisation within the public sector we recognise that our purpose, as articulated above from the Fire and Rescue Framework for Scotland 2013, is to improve the safety and wellbeing of people throughout Scotland. We are organised as a Service to fulfil this purpose, and measure our success in terms of improving outcomes for communities.
The SFRS supports the sentiment within the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill Policy Memorandum that communities can achieve significant improvements by doing things for themselves. This is because communities invariably know what would work for them, and will grow in confidence and resilience when their endeavours have positive results. By working with communities, right from the point of design, services can be co-produced, which we believe will have an enhanced impact on outcomes. This is to be welcomed by the SFRS as our purpose is to improve all outcomes for communities, particularly those associated with safety and wellbeing.

Many successful initiatives undertaken to date demonstrate the ability of communities to take advantage of the provisions of the Bill. Notwithstanding this, some communities will face greater challenges than others in becoming proactive.

The strengthening of legislation around community planning should be welcomed, as it will further enhance the imperative around CPP’s engaging with communities in identifying and prioritising the local outcomes that should be delivered.

Public services should ensure that their engagement with communities promotes the building of capacity within [community] organisations. This will promote community participation, and should be done in a way to address inequalities. In doing so, those communities that may require additional support to mobilise their own resources should be identified and appropriate support given by all relevant partners in the public, private and third sectors. It is not suggested that the Bill requires to be amended to meet this imperative, but rather practical support should be given locally to develop the necessary skills, confidence and resilience within communities.

Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

Part 1 – National Outcomes

The SFRS welcomes the enshrining of national outcomes in legislation and looks forward to making a continued contribution across them.
As stated above, the SFRS welcomes the strengthening of community planning via this legislative route. We would also advocate the benefits of engaging the third sector and anchor organisations through this process to strengthen the connection with communities.

Part 3 – Participation Requests

Part 4 – Community Right to Buy Land

The SFRS welcomes the inclusion of this provision within the Bill, particularly in relation to the positive impact it could have on the vibrancy of communities, and the reduction of fire-related and other antisocial behaviour, which can have significant impacts upon areas.

Call for Evidence – Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

General points:

There is much that is good in the proposed Bill; it is well thought out and is aspirational in its content. It also reflects feedback from the previous consultation; in particular it places Community Planning Partnerships (CPPs) on a robust statutory basis.

The Bill includes a lot of detailed information which requires time to fully understand the content and context. It would have been helpful to have a summarised version of the Bill contents for consultation purposes. This would generate a greater and wider response. However, the policy memorandum was considered to be very helpful.

In broad terms it is felt that among the many stakeholders in this agenda the public health function can make an important contribution particularly in relation to tackling health inequalities.

Outcomes:

It is considered that creating outcomes is a good idea and sets out a robust outcome focused approach. Indeed, delivering local outcomes stemming from national outcomes is an appropriate focus. However the national outcomes as currently stated leave much room for improvement to make them more specific and ensure they complement one another. Consideration should also be given to the skills and capacity required to support outcome focused planning and delivery.

So, yes to outcomes and the right to change them, but they need to have inputs which describe more sophisticated and SMART outcomes which can be measured and reported on.
Community ownership:

This is well intentioned. However the part that allows communities to be defined by any characteristic could result in requests by specific religious groups to run their own services on a non-geographic basis which would undermine area-based accountability. Additionally, area based measures to establish the impact of inequalities on health or health determinants would be undermined.

Business rates relief:

This should be amended that CPPs may NOT create business relief schemes to apply to businesses which have a negative impact on health.

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

The Bill will empower communities to the extent that councils actively engage with the Bill in the spirit it is being written. However the context and language of part two ‘Community Planning’ raises concerns about the overall approach. The imperative of local community engagement from the outset within this section is absent. CPPs are requested to ‘make all reasonable efforts to secure participation’ from ‘appropriate’ community bodies and ‘take steps to enable them to participate to the extent they wish to’. This mitigates against a co-production approach where local community members are integral to any planning or development within their communities. Without key engagement from the outset, how else are communities going to plan outcomes, build capacity and develop their own community assets? Consultation on the ‘Local Outcomes Improvement Plan’ is not enough.

Part three highlights that a ‘community participation body’ can make a request to participate, but the right to participate is set against tight criteria and can be declined. Additionally there is a fear that some councils will see elected representatives and their executives as the only credible method for community engagement and empowerment. However, this risk can, perhaps, not be legislated for.

The development of national outcomes is seen as a benefit as public sector organisations are already familiar with outcome focused approaches (although some skill development may be required). The Bill advocates that there will be flexibility as to how the national outcomes will be presented and measured. This will support local approaches. Consultation on the outcomes will include a wide section of public sector and partner organisations, including private and third sector; this will only enhance the final content. The outcomes will be reviewed within a given timeframe. This means challenges can be addressed expediently.

An engaged community is seen as a benefit, however the wide definitions for community bodies which can be defined by characteristics such as common interest or personal characteristics such as gender, sexuality, religion etc could lead to fragmentation of public services and an inability to monitor the safety and effectiveness of any such services. For instance if a religious community sought to take on a public service, the fact that the service might be delivered in a non-geographical way, would prevent measures of deprivation, which are all area-based, from being used in assessing the impact of that service. It would seem preferable to ensure that any services which exist must retain a geographical basis. Additionally, there are concerns about any vulnerable group who are not fully engaged within “communities” and their ability to be able to access any of the potential benefits that the proposed legislation may bring. There is the potential of the unintended consequence of increasing inequalities.

A provision of the Bill which may empower communities is extending the communities’ right to buy (part four). This power will support the development of the local environment and infrastructure. The extension of this provision to allow purchase of neglected and abandoned land will only facilitate this outcome.

Whether all communities have the capacity to take advantage of this provision will need to form part of the review. However, the Bill will need to be explained to communities and individuals through pathways which are additional to and do not rely upon local authorities alone. This could involve work through the third sector and support from the NHS and other public bodies as they will need to fully understand the aims of the Bill and not simply the impact of the support requests which they receive.

The provision of more allotments is welcome.

4. Are you content with the specific information in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill, and why?
The following changes should be made:

- CPPs should be required to collaborate across local regions to share costs and learning to ensure effectiveness and efficiency.

- Ensure the need for community-owned services to be limited by the need to provide on a geographical basis to allow good governance. This is to ensure equity, fairness and governance.

5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the policy memorandum?

It is not felt that the memorandum advances the equality agenda. Defining communities and community-owned and operated services by equality determinants such as gender, sexuality, religion etc seems to be a retrograde step which could lead to segregation. However, the memorandum is positive in that it recognises people as the country’s best assets, plus the importance of them influencing what is happening in their own country.

It is not felt that this overview is well reflected in the community planning section (part two) of the Bill with the content and language regarding community engagement that is used.

Introduction

Co-Cheangal Innse Gall is the Third Sector Interface for the Western Isles and a partnership of 5 organisations. Our remit is to promote, support and develop the third sector, social enterprise and volunteering, and to provide a bridge between the third sector in the islands and the Outer Hebrides Community Planning Partnership.

We do not make representation on all parts of the Bill, but only on those parts which most affect our communities, our sector and our role as a TSI.

While welcoming the Bill, there are issues which are of concern as they have particular relevance in rural, peripheral and island communities and which should be noted in any future iterations of the Bill. Similarly, the role of TSIs in engaging with, and advocating on behalf of, communities needs to be further defined.

Part 1 National Outcomes

The inclusion of setting national outcomes in to primary legislation is welcome but this must be underpinned by a commitment to a consultation process which is fully inclusive and which has co-production with the third sector and communities at its core. The National Standards for Community Engagement should be reviewed and adopted as a code of conduct for engagement, as at present, there is no definition of who or what should be consulted, on what matters, nor is there an effective mechanism for ensuring consistency. Review of the Standards will have desired outcome of allowing true priority setting within communities and enhancing local democracy.

Part 2 Community Planning

The Bill focusses on the duties of statutory partners and makes little mention of Third Sector Interfaces; rightly so, as it should be remembered that TSIs are not statutory bodies, nor is it in the interest of either national government or local community planning partnerships that they be required to adopt the duties imposed in the legislation. However, it is crucial that TSIs are recognised as a mandatory partner within Community Planning Partnerships and there is scope for closer definition of the role of TSIs as advocates for the third and community sectors in the guidance, particularly as it relates to any review of National Standards for Community Engagement. This should be aligned to a programme of community capacity building around issues such as participatory budgeting and the setting of local priorities. TSIs are the natural vehicles for these mechanisms and should be defined as such in the guidance. Properly briefed and resourced TSIs are vital if community planning and community engagement is ever to be truly effective and the guidance should reflect this. This can only result in a strengthening of the community planning process.

Similarly, if the spirit of the Bill is to be upheld, the diverse nature of island communities and their very specific needs must be recognised. There is a long history of community engagement within island communities and if the final Act, in its aspiration to the effective utilisation of all the assets of a community, is to be effective, then there needs to be a recognition at this stage that there is much to learn from the experience of small, island communities and that this represents a considerable community asset.

Part 3 Participation Requests

If the final Act is to have any hope of realising a community’s aspiration to true and equal say in the design and delivery of services, then the legislation must give it some teeth to participation requests and impose a duty on statutory agencies to be proactive in their engagement with the community and third sectors, backed up by the mechanisms through which this will be achieved within the guidance.

There is still an assumption that statutory agencies will have the right to invite participation to those organisations or communities as they see fit. In fact, the spirit of the Act demands that this top down approach be reversed. Only through recognition of this will a culture change across all agencies and sectors – including the third sector – be realised and it is scarcely in doubt that such a change is necessary. The Bill as it stands at the moment does not fully articulate this duty and is very woolly on how it will work in practice. If allowed to proceed to the Act, this will represent a significant “watering down” of the spirit of the legislation and if this is to be restored, there needs to be a commitment to a programme of capacity building within communities and smaller third sector organisations in order that the third and community sectors can fully engage with the process. Without this, progress will be slow and may never be effective. It will be “business as usual”.

Part 5 Asset Transfer

Much of what is contained in this section of the Bill is already in practice in the Western Isles and in other rural areas of Scotland, and Comhairle nan Eilean Siar maintains an asset register and encourages asset transfer. However, this is not the case for all public bodies; other agencies are more reluctant to pass assets into community control as a first option, even when there is an existing leasing arrangement, and the Bill needs to address this.

There is, at present, no clarity on the process for asset transfer, on regulation of transfer to ALEOs or on transfer to consortia of community groups within either the Bill or the guidance. There needs to be further consultation on these issues. At present, the onus is on the community to ensure that these issues are addressed but this is against a background of lack of capacity within some communities to fully realise this, meaning that there is inherent disadvantage. Law is supposed to address fundamental inequalities and the lawmakers, as was pointed out in the previous section on participation requests, require to give the Bill teeth and apply similar solutions in providing for community capacity building within the guidance.

Part 6 Allotments

The Bill makes no mention of the particular landholding issues of rural and crofting communities and in the Western Isles, where 75% of the population live on land which is in community ownership, it makes absolutely no sense for the local authority to acquire land for allotments when much of it is already in community ownership. The Bill should recognise the particular arrangements in crofting and community landholding communities and extend the definition to include use of community owned land for allotments. The local authority could retain the duty to maintain the list of requests and to work with community land owners to deliver allotments. The current provisions in the Bill do not allow for this.

I understand the proposed Community Empowerment Bill is open for evidence from the public.

Question 1 - To what extent do you think the Bill will empower communities?

I would like to draw attention to the anomaly which exists between the Town and Country Planning Act (Scotland) 1997 and the Electricity Act 1989. "Section 36" applications for Wind Farms greater than 50MW are determined under the Electricity Act 1989, these applications by-pass the Local Planning Authority, going directly to the Scottish Ministers for determination.

Wind farms under 50MW are covered by the Town and Country Planning Act (Scotland) 1997 and provide a statutory pre-application consultation for the public. Under the Electricity Act, there is NO statutory requirement for developers to hold a pre-application consultation (PAC) with our communities.

Scottish Ministers have recently opened up the National Forest Estates, allowing Forestry Commission Scotland to enter into joint venture partnerships with commercial Wind Farm developers. FCS manage this land on behalf of the Scottish Ministers. The Scottish Ministers own this land on behalf of the public. Section 36 applications determined under the Electricity Act, result in Scottish communities having no statutory right to be consulted on the proposed use of our own land!

This is surely a sad reflection on what passes as democracy in modern day Scotland!

In this year of the Referendum, when Scotland's people are being asked to vote on the future of our Nation, it seems inconceivable to find that at grass roots level, we have no legal right to be consulted on how Scotland's own land is to be utilised.

England already has compulsory pre-application consultation for Wind Farms greater than 50MW under their Planning Act 2008.

Scotland has "Government Guidelines" highlighting community engagement methodology - why should Scottish communities find themselves reliant on guidelines, when what we actually require is "statutory" legislation in place to ensure we have a right to be consulted and guaranteed a right of public participation in these important planning issues?

If the Community Empowerment Bill can achieve this, then it will obviously have justified the time, money and effort which has gone into it's inception - otherwise, it could be seen by many as a parody of it's own name.

I sincerely hope this Community Empowerment Bill is successful - the people of this country need to have faith in an open, transparent and democratically robust planning system, and our communities need legislation in place which "guarantees" them a statutory right to be consulted on the proposed use of our own land and the power to have our collective voices heard.

Written Submission on Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

In response to the invitation to give evidence to the Scottish Parliament's Local Government and Regeneration Committee's call for evidence on the above Bill, Glasgow City offers the following comments.

In general, the Bill presents a package of measures designed to encourage community empowerment and create conditions that will encourage active citizenship and participation in civic life. Many of the provisions in themselves are helpful. However, the Council, has concerns as to whether the measures in the Bill will, on their own, achieve these aims.

In earlier submissions to this Committee (the Inquiry into the Flexibility and Autonomy of Local Government March 2014) we presented evidence to argue for a reinvigorated local government, able to effectively exercise a broad range of powers on relevant local issues and properly resourced to do so. In that submission we set out the range of powers or issues where we believe it is essential they are returned or devolved to more local decision making. These include raising local income and taxation, enhanced local economic powers, transport; and welfare. We continue to believe that a significant increase in local decision-making powers is essential to achieve the Bill's stated objectives.

In relation to responses to the specific parts of the Bill, we offer the following comments.

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answers

PART 1 – National Outcomes
Dependent upon how the Scottish Government intends to “consult on” a set of national outcomes for Scotland, this may increase involvement and engagement. Further details would be helpful.

PART 2 – Community Planning
CPPs should already be engaging with their communities in identifying and prioritising the outcomes that are to be delivered, and working with communities to develop their capacity to contribute to community planning and to their achievement of better outcomes. However, this is not currently a clear statutory requirement.

PART 3 - Participation Requests
Glasgow City Council welcomes the Bill’s recognition of points raised by the City Council in the earlier consultation in early 2014 in relation to:
- Representativeness and accountability of community groups
- The inclusion of “communities of interest”
- The inclusion of groups without a constitution but with a statement of aims and purposes. GCC welcomes this, and suggests that the Bill or Guidance nonetheless suggest that it would strengthen such bodies position if they worked towards becoming constituted.

However, in relation to the specific matter of empowerment, the City Council remains concerned regarding the detailed process which will ensue following refusal of a participation request. Whilst this may be included in regulations or Guidance, until there is clarity in this area, the effect may be disempowering, as in having raised expectation and then having hopes dashed. This could impact on working relationships and may be counter productive to establishing longer term collaboration and trust on which effective community planning and community empowerment should be based.

PART 4 – Community Right to Buy Land
Whilst some communities may be able to take advantage of this provision, the mere introduction of a community right to buy will not, of itself, empower communities. It is what can be then done with the building/land through self sustaining use that could allow a community take decisions for themselves. If the new ownership relies on significant ongoing financial and capacity building support from the public sector then, the community will, in practice, be no more empowered than before. If reliant on such support, and vulnerable to its withdrawal due to other competing locally expressed priorities taking precedence, this is not being truly empowered.

PART 5 - Asset Transfer Requests

Comments as above for “Community Right to Buy.”

In addition:
- The timescales (and stages) involved each have associated costs. The level of costs incurred at stages could be significant if organisations are to be properly empowered by local authorities and other bodies.
- The interested organisations may incur costs in preparing their case – e.g. producing business plans and provision of technical advice.
- If organisations take over assets but did not wish to TUPE staff or use maintenance services previously provided then this could have cost implications.
- Paragraph 52 (4) should perhaps also make explicit that a community transfer body should provide when making a request:
  1. a Business Case (possibly as part of a Business Plan) outlining its credentials and expertise (whether internally or sourced) including but not limited to its ability to execute and monitor delivery of the services
  2. a timetable for when it expects to start delivering the benefits it consider will arise if the authority were to agree the request

PART 6 – Common Good Property

As above for “Asset Transfer”.

PART 7 - Allotments

Glasgow City Council is in general supportive of the Bill in relation to Allotments. However, GCC would question extent to which the Bill increases the opportunities for empowerment currently in place through devolved management to allotment associations.

PART 8 - Non- Domestic Rates

Not applicable.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for the public sector organisations as a consequence of the provision of the Bill

PART 1 – National Outcomes

If the National Outcomes are co developed in consultation with local authorities and CPP partners, there may be an opportunity to rationalise priorities.

PART 2 – Community Planning

The new formulation of community planning - “planning that is carried out with a view to improving the achievement of outcomes in relation to the area of a local authority resulting from, or contributed to by, the provision of services delivered by or on behalf of the community planning partners.”

This is a much clearer statement than the current one in the 2003 Act.

S. 8 lists those partners who must “facilitate Community Planning” and take reasonable steps to ensure that the CPP “carries out its functions … efficiently and effectively.”
S. 9 sets out the duties of these “core” partners. These are clear. However, it is not clear what steps will be taken to make it easier for partners to meet them in particular how they will be assisted to commit “appropriate resources to the achievement of local outcomes set out in … (the Local Outcomes) … plan “

Whilst the change in duties addresses perceived problem of lack of accountability of other public bodies for their contribution to Community Planning, the question arises as to whether this new formulation alters the role of local authorities in Community Planning. On one reading the new duties offer a shared leadership model. However, how will this work in practice, if partners don’t agree roles and responsibilities. In addition does it meet the test of accountability?

The summary of consultation responses published with the Bill states that -

“The predominant view amongst respondents was that local authorities should retain their statutory duty to initiate, facilitate and maintain community planning on account of their democratic mandate, but structural and cultural changes are needed to shift perceptions away from CPPs being seen as extensions of local authorities. “

Rather than simply end local authority leadership the summary of consultation responses suggests that the consensus was to seek “robust accountability frameworks, in which individual CPP partners are held to account for their contributions, coupled with statutory duties on different public bodies, supported by guidance on their roles” This was to “help to address perceptions of council dominance.”

Neither the Policy or Explanatory Memorandum are clear on the rationale behind the wording of the Bill on this point.

PART 3 - Participation Requests

Benefits

There may be the opportunity for groups not currently involved to become involved and bring different perspectives, expertise and knowledge to bear.

Disadvantages

Unspecified or unknown costs for staff time to deal with participation requests and asset use/transfer requests. Depending on Guidance, costs for staff time building community capacity may be significant. Staff development in relation to working with communities and costs to improve assets for handover would also be significant additional burdens.

GCC proposes that for the aspirations of the Bill to be achieved, for community empowerment to become part of the culture of organisations a programme of organisational/staff development would be helpful, even essential. We suggest that the Scottish Government initiate discussions with Local Authorities and community planning partners on how to support this and delivery of the Bill’s aspirations.

PART 4 – Community Right to Buy Land

Benefits

It potentially allows the City Council to work with community bodies to take over surplus assets and undertake community owned and backed projects or deliver some public and/or provide services required or not currently provided in a community.
Part 3A: In the circumstance where Council and/or Council ALEO land is identified there will be the financial implication of putting a process in place and of utilising resource from a range of services in order to enable a response to be made within a very short timescale. In addition, the financial implications for Glasgow may be significant in the circumstance where the proposed acquisition may deal with a short term issue but is not aligned to the Council’s longer term strategy. As a precaution the Council and/or Council ALEO will require to resource a search in the Register of Community Interests in Abandoned and Neglected Land in advance of both marketing and disposal of property which could potentially fall within this category.

Part 4: The financial implications for Glasgow may be significant in the circumstance where a registered interest has a negative impact on potential investment in the City. The Council and/or Council ALEOs will require to resource responses to applications and the cost of searches in the Register of Community Interests.

PART 5 - Asset Transfer Requests

Benefits

Disadvantages

Local authorities may incur costs in getting assets into a state where they are transferable. Local authorities would incur costs in supporting the empowerment of organisations to participate in the process of community asset transfer and beyond. If organisations take over assets but did not wish to TUPE staff or use maintenance services previously provided then this could have cost implications. As indicated earlier Q3 abortive costs, which may be substantial, could be incurred by both the applicant and the local authority. However each party would require to bear these costs with no re-imbursement. If an organisation purchased an asset from Glasgow City Council and then, for whatever reason, the organisation failed or ceased to exist, then GCC may, for wider public interest, be compelled to buy the asset back.

PART 6 – Common Good Property

Benefits

If a Register was definitive this could reduce the chances of disputes re Common Good. It is not clear this will be achieved.

Disadvantages

One of the main difficulties encountered by Local Authorities in dealing with Common Good issues is determining what actually constitutes ‘Common Good land’. The existing law on Common Good is obscure and uncertain due, mainly, to the lack of legislation in the area and the absence of definitive and clear case law. The Bill does not attempt to define ‘Common Good land’ and no guidance is given as to which assets ought to be included in the Register.

Therefore, the Council will be required to make its own assessment, based on the existing case law, as to which assets should be included in the Register.

In establishing the Common Good Register, the Council will be required to review the title deeds to all land which may potentially form part of the Common Good. If the title is silent on Common Good, or the position is unclear, other information may have to be looked at, such as the Minutes of the Council meeting at which the acquisition was authorised or historical Common Good accounts - these may give an indication as to how the property was intended to be used and whether it was considered to be Common Good.

In compiling a Common Good Register, the Council will require to review the status of all property in its ownership. This not only involves a detailed review and interpretation of the title deeds, but also an at times resource-intensive review of available historic and current information.

Given the high number of properties owned by the Council, reviewing the status of all of them will be a time-consuming exercise and will have significant cost and resource implications. In the absence of a definition of ‘Common Good’, the Council will require to make its own judgement as to which assets should be added to the Register. This adds to the complexity of the task.

Due to the time and resource required, Local authorities tend to consider common good on a case by case basis should they be intending to dispose of, or otherwise deal with, a property. Glasgow has an approved policy to this effect: any assets have to be reviewed against the law of common good prior to disposal.

The lack of definition of ‘Common Good’ also means the completed Register will not be definitive and will still be open to challenge. In the event of any Court decisions which clarify, or change, the law on Common Good, the Register will have to be reviewed.

The duty to consult with and take into account representations made by community bodies and community councils, and anyone else, when compiling the Register, and again when disposing of, or changing the use of, Common Good assets will also have significant time, cost and resource implications for the Council.

This definition of ‘community bodies’ is very broad; it includes groups which are not formally constituted, there is no requirement that they are of a minimum size or that they can demonstrate that they are representative of the wider community.

Given the broad definition of ‘community bodies’, there will potentially be a high number in any ‘community’, with the result that the Council will be required to liaise with each of them, and take into account representations from a potentially wide range of parties.

PART 7 - Allotments

Benefits.

Empowering allotment communities with ambitions to take responsibility for their local assets

Ability to engage in a more productive dialogue with wider communities on potential innovative use of assets which could assist in the delivery of health and well being and other national outcomes.

Disadvantages

The detailed policy proposals in regards to allotments will come with a significant requirement for capital investment to meet the demands of Section 72 (Duty to Provide Allotments). See sub section 1 ie where sub section (2) or (3) applies, each local authority must take reasonable steps to ensure that the number of persons entered in the list maintained under section 71(1) is no more than one half of the total number of allotments owned and leased by the authority.

There will potentially be capacity issues within the local authority to comply with Section 71 Duty to maintain list
Section 77 Duty to prepare a food growing strategy
Section 78 Duty to review food growing strategy
Section 79 Annual Allotments Report
All may require additional financial support.
Local Government and Regeneration Committee

Submission Name: Glasgow City Council  Submission Number: 115

PART 8 – Non – Domestic Rates
Benefits- No comment

Disadvantages
The Bill proposes powers for local authorities to create local NDR relief schemes from 2015/16 onwards. The scheme would not be funded by the central NDR pool. Therefore any local relief scheme would have to be funded by the local authority and so would therefore have to be built into the budgeting process.

PART 1 – National Outcomes
See comments above

PART 2 – Community Planning

Neither the Policy or Explanatory Memorandum are clear on the distinction, if any, between the Local Outcomes Improvement plan, and the local Single Outcome Agreement. If there new plan is additional, there are clearly implications for community engagement and for resources required to undertake the consultation required.

PART 3 – Participation requests
GCC welcomes the Bill whilst recognising that resources are limited. Giving public bodies the capacity to prioritise those communities with greatest need (poverty, barriers to participation, etc) for resourcing, in the form of capacity building support, contributions to improving assets before handover, etc would be essential. This would help with the risk of the Bill unintentionally increasing inequalities by helping only those communities who are already empowered.

PART 4 – Community Right to Buy Land
It would be useful if examples of what “conditions” might cover were identified (probably in Guidance) in order that the Part 3A community body might have an idea of their responsibilities re eg timescale for delivery of their objective; and in the event of a failure of sustained delivery of their objectives by the Part 3A community body (or its permitted nominee), would a right of pre-emption in favour of the owner be a way forward?

PART 5 – Asset Transfer Requests
No comment

PART 6 – Common Good Property
No comment.

PART 7 – Allotments
Allotment communities are run on a voluntary basis. Allotment communities have varying capabilities, skills profiles and capacity. There may be skills gaps. The impact of the Bill could perversely lead to disadvantage communities effectively becoming more isolated and further disadvantaged. A challenge to achieving the purpose of the Bill would be to ensure all communities have access to training in capacity building and personal skills development with the appropriate financial commitments being attached to the Bill.

PART 8 – Non – Domestic Rates
No Comment

4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill, and why?

PART 1 – National Outcomes
As above details of consultation process would be helpful.
PART 2 – Community Planning
As above, clarity on the future role of local authorities in relation to co-ordination of Community Planning would be helpful and avoid potential confusion. In addition, clarity of relationship between SOA and Local Outcomes Improvement Plan would assist.

PART 3 – Participation requests
GCC remain unclear to what extent the Community Learning and Development Regulations and the requirements of the Bill fit with the existing requirement to engage local communities in the development and delivery of CLD services. Clarification of this is essential to ensure we avoid confusion and competing expectations.

PART 4 – Community Right to Buy Land Issues are -
- Definition of what is wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected land is unclear and may be the subject of litigation;
- the interpretation of sustainable development will be a subject of debate;
- Council (including Council’s ALEOs) land may fall into this category which may have an adverse impact on the delivery of Council strategy;
- the 60 day period for owners to respond is an extremely short timescale and we query whether this is compatible with the preservation of human rights;
- right to compensation is not available to the owner if the decision is to refuse – surely a fairer outcome would be that the owner is not out of pocket. Is it possible for this to be reconsidered?

In addition,
- there is no reference to the proposals being required to be consistent with planning policy. It would be useful if Guidance were to confirm the need to liaise with Planning Authorities; and
- it might be useful in Guidance to suggest that there be a liaison with Police/Council etc in order to find out whether there is any evidence of the condition of the land causing a public nuisance.

The Council has a concern that in a still fragile economic environment, when the role of the public sector in enabling development is of increased significance, the additional layer of potential problem which this register creates for proposed investors may deter them. Clarification is required regarding the interaction between Parts 3A, 4 and 5 of the Bill.

PART 5 - Asset Transfer Requests
The Bill refers in Paragraph 54 to the possibility that Scottish Ministers may by regulation make further provision about asset transfer requests. Glasgow City Council would caution against any measures in this regard without first seeking input from authorities experienced in administering such processes.

Glasgow City Council has a process in place in relation to Community Asset Transfer. Its emphasis is on the pre-application stage and providing support to organisations empowering them to advance their case in a coherent manner. Our experience thus far is focused on enabling organisations to submit proposals in the form of an Expression of Interest (covering many elements outlined in Paragraphs 52 and 55) and allowing the request to progress at a pace which enables both parties (authority and community transfer body) to work together. This does not mean that all requests are approved but it does generally mean that in working with the community transfer body is better able to understand the context and reasons for why a request has not been progressed.

Glasgow City Council’s experience is that community transfer bodies have different levels of expertise. Even with a well established body the process can be complicated (e.g. technical and legal considerations) and more costly than first anticipated which may not be in line with their expectations.

Consideration also requires to be given to the consequences of where the Bill interacts with existing legislation, for example:
Local Government and Regeneration Committee

Submission Name: Glasgow City Council

- Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973, Section 74(2), which places local authorities under a duty to achieve best consideration – it will be essential to clarify that in responding to an asset transfer request, it is deemed to have complied with this duty
- In relation to Common Good, clarification is required on whether the law pertaining to disposal of Common Good property prevails over the Local Authorities statutory obligations
PART 6 – Common Good Property

The Common Good Register will not be definitive; it will still be open to interpretation and challenge. Anything omitted from the list could still be held to be part of the Common Good. What is “all property held [by a local authority] for the common good” will be open to interpretation unless a definition is provided. Certainty as to what property is included and what restrictions there are to be on that property cannot be achieved without also setting out which type of dealings or disposals are permissible, and which are not. The Council could incur significant cost and resources in establishing a Register only for the law to be overturned by a court decision.

Likewise, although community bodies or members of the public would still be able to object if they disagree, the new legislation will not give the public any greater certainty that their contention is correct than they have at present.

The likelihood of delay, expense and ultimately contentious litigation will remain the same – whether as regards what is common good property and what is not, whether that property is alienable or not, or as regards which types of dealing amount to alienation (or disposal) and which do not.

By addressing the definition of common good in the legislation, the difficulties with the current position could be resolved, or at least significantly reduced. Once there is a clear definition, the goals of increasing transparency and increasing community involvement in the use of common good assets can be properly addressed. Until there is a clear definition, there will continue to be disputes about what is and what is not part of the common good, and what can be done with such assets.

With regard to the terms of the draft Bill, as noted above, the definition of ‘community bodies’ is broad and the exercise of consulting with all of them could have significant time, cost and resource implications. Therefore, the definition of community bodies should be such that only community bodies which are formally constituted, have a reasonable level of support from the community (e.g. can demonstrate a minimum number of members with an identifiable connection to the locality, such as residency or a business interest) and have expressed an interest in a property to the local authority should be consulted.

PART 7 – Allotments

The Financial Memorandum attached to the Bill would put the Capital Invest required to comply with the Section 72 Duty to provide Allotments at £3.4m. Glasgow City Council's own estimates are significantly higher. It is essential that the Financial Memorandum which accompanies the Bill makes adequate provision for the costs of implementing the provisions. It is also unclear whether conversion of existing green space to Allotments by the Local Authority constitutes permitted development.

Regarding Section 77 Duty to prepare a food growing strategy, this appears to be an attempt to add on community gardens to allotment legislation. Both are specific legal constructs, with very different rights and responsibilities attached to them in law. Recognition of this should be given in the Bill and it may be separate legislation is required to address community gardening.

PART 8 – Non – Domestic Rates

The council welcomes the provision of powers to local authorities to create local non-domestic relief schemes. This is in keeping with the wider localisation agenda, and will help the council respond to local needs.

5 What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

No comment.
West Dunbartonshire welcomes the opportunity to provide evidence on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill, particularly in relation to the likely empowerment of communities, their capacity to take advantage of this and the benefits and challenges to public organisations.

To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

Through provisions in the Bill communities and community groups will have a clear role and clarity of purpose for their involvement in localised community planning. The model is inconsistent in Scotland at the moment so the ‘minimum standard’ defined in the Bill gives more consistency and allows communities to understand their role more fully.

The focus on the role of local residents and community groups will also facilitate a more comprehensive approach to community led regeneration across Scotland with a focus on priority setting based on ‘place’. Within West Dunbartonshire we are testing a model of neighbourhood management which dovetails well with the provisions set out in the Bill and would allow for more accountability at a local neighbourhood level.

It is important however that while we ensure a focus on local residents at the heart of decision making, we also recognise that this level of involvement is not wanted or required for all community groups seeking involvement. We must work on a spectrum from informing through to full empowerment and coproduction. It is critical that a suite of models and mechanisms for engagement are available and that these are determined based on local need and capacity.

While we welcome the Bill and the desire to strengthen empowerment of our communities and residents we would urge caution around the assumption the Bill will fully address need in this area. While the Bill fully sets out the additional ‘delegated authority’ communities will have through provisions it does not address the supports required by communities to take up this ‘delegated authority’. There is a need to full investigate and scope the requirements of communities to become stronger and more confident in assuming the provisions of the Bill.

What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

West Dunbartonshire welcomes the proposed widening of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 2003 to all agencies. This shared leadership of the CPP extended to all partners gives stronger governance and accountability to the partnership.

The provisions of the Bill will support public sector organisations to drive forward the pace of reform. The shared responsibility and accountability will support the national focus on joint planning and resourcing for CPPs. The statutory basis for the SOA guidance going forward is also helpful and will strengthen the focus from all agencies on improving wellbeing.

The support on offer through What Works Scotland will be invaluable for progressing the early intervention and prevention focus inferred from the Bill, and will support empowered and involved communities as the route for consultation and engagement from all partner organisations.

The role of the National Performance Framework as a supporting structure for the direction of CPPS in building and strengthening empowerment is also welcome, particularly within a streamlined and focused outcomes framework model.

There are however areas where caution is required and further scoping and detail needed when exploring the provisions of the Bill. There is a significant cost associated with capacity building and responding to participation requests, it is critical that this resource requirement is met to enable local areas to deliver on the provisions of the Bill and give it ‘teeth’ within local communities.

There are also a number of practical challenges for CPPs likely to arise in implementation, such as the timely availability or data to show progress and the likelihood of localised data being available from all partners for each small community given the lack of coterminosity of key agencies across Scotland.

There will also be a challenge in each area, linked to the use of the NPF, in relation to how progress is shown annually given the generational nature of the outcomes being addressed. It is critical that progress and direction of travel can be shown and reported regularly to fit with the strengthened model of accountability to local communities.

While there is appetite and desire in local communities to take advantage of provisions in the Bill there is a need to provide national support to allow CPPS to support communities in building capacity and resilience. Community led regeneration is welcomed and perhaps there could be more public social partnerships funded to allow this model to grow further. Support around the challenges and process of procurement will also be needed, both for agencies and for community groups if delivering a new model of commissioning and regeneration.

It is important to note that not all community groups want involvement and engagement at the same level. It is important that groups can fit into a framework at the appropriate level for their needs and that this Bill does not assume a single model of engagement and participation.

The national work currently underway to build the role of Community Councils is welcome as they will be a key mechanism for representation and for the dissemination of information locally. Community Councils will also be an ideal vehicle for developing and strengthening local community involvement and engagement and may act as an umbrella organisation for many smaller groups in the local area.

Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

While the provisions of the Bill appear to give communities greater encouragement to become more involved and engaged in local planning, design and delivery of services much support would be required to enable this. There is also a significant lack of direction around long term sustainability, particularly in relation to transfer of assets.

Additional clarity could also be added on the relationship between the Bill and other existing legislation and policy areas. This would be of particular assistance in relation to the Local Government (Scotland) Act 2003 and the 2012 specific duties of the Equality Act 2010.

Given the focus on empowering local community groups it would also be helpful if the provisions in the Bill provide clarity and are written in a manner which is easily accessible to all readers.

What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

The policy memorandum notes that the legislation will be in line with the Equality Act 2010 and the 2012 specific equality duties. It would be helpful if the eventual guide that accompanies the legislation takes account of evidence and positive practice such as using Equality Impact Assessment as a key tool for ensuring inclusion fairness and effectiveness.

The memorandum highlights the desirability of Local Authorities having impact assessed policies and procedures in place for transfer of allotments and assets, and we would be highly supportive of this. Ensuring that Equality, Human Rights, Health and Social Economic impacts are assessed at the same time would add value to the process, and this is already the direction of travel for many Local Authorities in terms of their impact assessment processes.

Among Local Authorities and to a lesser extent other public bodies it is common to have an equality outcome on increasing participation and involvement based on local evidence of a deficit for some groups. This is one way to help ensure that the eventual legislation is brought to life with fairness and inclusion at the fore.

Specific Comments:

Non Domestic Rates
In general the intention to permit the rating authority to introduce a scheme for the reduction and remission of rates is well founded. This would be particularly helpful in areas of deprivation or where incentives are required to stimulate economic development and the creation of jobs. However the concept may cause difficulty where localised works are affecting the short term trading ability of businesses. Under the previous regime it the Assessor would have dealt with the matter under a material change of circumstances appeal. It would be helpful for the legislation and provisions to be more specific and make strong reference to an economic benefit rather than a generalised scheme.

Community Right to Buy
The Bill and provisions provide clear guidance on the procedures to be undertaken by all parties when a community body wishes to acquire a property. This includes a clear definition of the size and scale of the acquiring organisation. The definition of abandoned or neglected land relies wholly upon the dictionary definition. Land however need not necessarily be abandoned or neglected just because it has not been worked. This could be the case where a developer has banked land for future development. Clearer definition and guidance should be included; failing which there is a risk that issues will have to be referred to the courts for clarity.

Asset Transfer
While the Bill provides clear guidance on the procedures to be undertaken it may be prudent to all detail to ensure that in the situation where the body with acquired interest is the subject of a winding up order the disposing party should be considered as part of the process for the onward transfer or return of the property.

Allotments
The detail in the Bill and supporting provisions in relation to allotments is welcome. Trigger points are particularly welcome, as is the simplification of duties and increased transparency in relation to cost recovery powers.

Written evidence for the Local Government and Regeneration Committee

Scottish Youth Parliament
September 2014

Introduction and background to the Scottish Youth Parliament

The Scottish Youth Parliament is the democratically elected voice of Scotland’s young people. Our vision is of a stronger, more inclusive Scotland that empowers young people by truly involving them in the decision-making process. In working towards our aims, we support the following values:

- Democracy - All of our plans and activities are youth-led, and we are accountable to young people aged 14-25. Our democratic structure, and the scale of direct participation across Scotland, gives us strength and sets us apart from other organisations.

- Inclusion - We are committed to being truly inclusive. The Scottish Youth Parliament believes that all young people have a right to a voice, it doesn’t matter who we are or where we come from; we celebrate our diversity.

- Political independence - We are independent from political parties. Only by working with all legitimate political parties can we make progress on the policies that are important to young people.

- Passion - We believe that drive and energy are key to successful campaigning. We are passionate about the key issues and believe that young people are part of the solution, not the problem.
The Scottish Youth Parliament welcomes the opportunity to respond to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee’s Call for Written Evidence for the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

As an organisation, we exist to provide a platform for young people to discuss the issues of importance to them, and affect the change in society they wish to see. We believe that young people are active, engaged and passionate citizens who are keen to engage positively in their local communities. As such, we welcome that the Scottish Government has brought this legislation to the Scottish Parliament with the view to strengthening community engagement in local decision making.

However, in recognising the opportunity that this legislation presents to improve the ability of young people to engage in local decision making, we believe that the legislation could be strengthened in a number of crucial areas, specifically with reference to Parts 2 and 3.

The Context to our response

Our submission is based on the policies selected and passed by our democratically elected Members of the Scottish Youth Parliament (MSYPs) at our tri-annual National Sittings, where MSYPs meet in plenary to debate policy issues of importance to their constituents. Our contribution is further grounded in the policy statements contained in our youth manifesto “Change the Picture”, which received almost 43,000 consultation responses. Therefore, our remarks are shaped by the genuine views of young people.

In addition, we carried out a piece of small scale primary research to ascertain the views of young people to inform our response to the initial public consultation. This response will also form the basis of our evidence.

The Scottish Youth Parliament holds the following pieces of policy that directly impact upon this legislation:

All young people should be involved in the services which affect them and should have the opportunity to get involved in local decision making opportunities.

1 You can see the list of SYP Policy, including our youth manifesto here: http://www.syp.org.uk/policy-W21page-340.
In addition, the following Members’ Motion was passed by the Membership of the Scottish Youth Parliament:

The Scottish Youth Parliament believes that young people must be given the opportunity to contribute to civic life if Scotland is to achieve its potential. A strong commitment from Government must be given to achieve genuinely effective youth participation.

Through our engagement work locally, and the experiences shared by our Members of the Scottish Youth Parliament, we know that the level of engagement with young people in local decision making is extremely variable.

There are a number of fantastic examples of how local authorities, and their decision bodies, engage with young people through youth representative bodies. Conversely, we are also aware that the quality of genuine engagement with young people is of a very low standard in other areas.

We believe this legislation represents an opportunity to improve the quality of engagement with young in community decision making, but crucially, in a more systematic and consistent manner.

Recommendation: We believe that the Committee should consider how wider principles or minimum standards for representative community engagement could be included on the face of the Bill, or through provision for additional statutory regulation or order making powers. Public bodies should have to provide evidence as to how they have met these standards.

Part 2: Community Planning

Part 2 provides a statutory basis for Community Planning Partnerships and imposes duties on them to secure the participation of local community bodies. However, we believe that the provisions could be strengthened to ensure that efforts must be made to ensure such participation is representative.

In addition, we believe that the provisions pertaining to the Local Outcomes Improvements Plans could be strengthened and be made more representative.

Presently, Section 5(3/4) places requirements on Community Planning Partnership to “consult” with appropriate community bodies. Similar to other organisations, we believe in the principles of co-design. Such plans should be established by the community together, rather than a simple obligation to consult. In our experience working with young people, we have found that where the principle of co-design is implemented, improved policy outcomes ensue.
In addition, we believe that this Section could be strengthened to ensure Community Planning Partnerships are representative in their consultation, with a particular emphasis on young people who often face additional barriers to engagement.

Recommendation: Specifically, in relation to Section 4(5), we believe that this should be considerably strengthened by outlining a requirement to ensure that efforts to secure participation are representative, including age, gender, sexual orientation, ethnicity, socio-economic background etc.

Recommendation: Specifically, in relation Section 5(3/4), we believe that a duty to consult should be strengthened to a duty to collaboratively produce Local Outcome Improvement Plans, ensuring that any community bodies involved are representative of the whole community.

Part 3: Participation Requests

Part 3 provides additional mechanisms for communities to be more proactively involved in decisions as to how public services are planned and delivered. While we welcome these provisions, the young people we consulted with made a number of recommendations for improvement.

In relation to Section 17, the young people felt that there needed to be a duty on public service authorities to make available information about participation requests, notably, how they can be made, and what opportunities exist that could entail a participation request. It was felt that this was very important in order to ensure accessibility to organisations that work with, or are run by, young people.

In addition, the young people consulted also felt that there public authorities should be required to make information available about the process in which participation requests are considered, and decisions are taken. Specifically, as part of Section 19, there should be a duty on public service authorities to make information available detailing the process for deciding whether participation requests should be accepted.

Furthermore, similar to other organisations, we believe that where a participation request has been declined, there should be an appropriate appeals procedure in line with the basic principles of due process and transparency. The young people we consulted with felt that this procedure should be independent.
Recommendation: As part of Section 17, there should be a duty on public service authorities to make information widely available about participation requests, how they can be made, and the opportunities where a participation request may be applicable.

Recommendation: As part of Section 19, there should be a duty on public service authorities to make information widely available about the process used to assess participation requests.

Recommendation: As part of Section 19, there should be additional provisions detailing an appeal mechanism.

Local Government and Regeneration Committee: Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

September 2014

Introduction

The FSB is Scotland’s largest direct-member business organisation, representing around 20,000 members. The FSB campaigns for an economic and social environment which allows small businesses to grow and prosper.

Small businesses are at the heart of Scotland’s communities. Micro and small firms account for almost all of our businesses and provide almost half (42%) of all private sector employment.¹ These businesses provide local jobs and training, sell goods and deliver services in communities across Scotland, from city centres to remote villages. Accordingly, the role of small businesses needs to be considered in any discussion about empowering local communities.

Some of the measures in the Bill will directly impact upon local businesses but more likely are indirect opportunities or threats for firms. Our response discusses this in more detail, as well as setting out thoughts, from the small business perspective, on the community planning process.

Background: community planning and businesses

From the beginning, the FSB has been involved in the community planning process across Scotland. A number of FSB members attended Local Economic Forums, the remnants of which often formed economic sub-groups or partnerships at local authority level. We now have a number of FSB members and staff representing the small businesses community on such groups, which are usually the main input of economic development issues to the community planning process. In a very limited number of cases, FSB representatives have been invited to sit on the community planning partnership (CPP). Broadly, the FSB continues to support the principle of community planning and recognises the efforts made to embed an evidence based, outcome focused approach. However, we have some concerns about the effectiveness of the process and the involvement of the private sector:

- Feedback from our members suggests that business involvement still largely relies on the traditional approach of inviting them to attend committee-style meetings. Business attendees express frustration that meetings can be process-driven and high-level; focusing on updates on strategies and SOAs (we have been told that 100+ pages of paper is not unusual in some areas). They often feel they have little to contribute to such discussions and that meetings achieve little.

- While such processes are probably unavoidable, they are perhaps not the best way to get local businesses involved. Busy small businesses can be difficult to engage with, so a number of approaches will be required. In our experience, small businesses prefer to get involved in specific projects or groups, such as Leader or traders groups, and it might be better to consider how such groups can more effectively contribute to the community planning process. In recent years, and particularly following criticisms made about economic development and community planning by Audit Scotland\(^2\), local authorities have placed greater emphasis on improving business involvement.

- We are very disappointed that, based on our experience from different parts of the country, community planning has failed to deliver a more co-ordinated approach to services for small businesses from the public sector. For example, multiple new initiatives to encourage employment developed and deployed by public bodies in isolation. The development of binding ‘plans for place’ are welcome, but whether they encourage local and national partners to overcome the apparent clash of priorities and funding issues remains to be seen.

- It may no longer be possible for representatives from the FSB, or similar non-delivery or community organisations, to sit on CPPs if formal requirements are placed on these bodies without a guarantee of exemptions from certain duties. For example, our representatives cannot make any commitment to provide resources to the CPP.

The Bill

1. Community planning

As outlined above, the Bill should avoid placing any unnecessary restrictions on certain community planning partners. Further guidance on partners which should be excluded from certain duties e.g. community representatives may be helpful.

2. Participation requests

We welcome these provisions and believe there may be opportunities for local business groups (e.g. tourism groups) to consider the opportunity to become involved in an outcome improvement process in relation to relevant local services.

3. Right to buy and asset transfer

The FSB understands the rationale behind efforts to simplify how communities can use vacant or underused public sector assets. In some areas, such as town centres, this approach could have a positive impact. We would also like to see greater consideration of the opportunities for small businesses to be given the opportunity to manage or occupy certain assets. In some areas, supporting a business to run a service from a public asset may be a more sustainable option since the business might have experience and could provide employment. However, transferring assets to communities could also present a threat to small businesses.

Firstly, if the transfer of an asset is accompanied by any form of public funding, a rigorous test of displacement is required when assessing the proposed activity. For example, using a vacant building to fund community-run commercial activity which directly competes with existing businesses (or may do so at some point in the future) is particularly unhelpful for our high streets.

Secondly, it should be a statutory requirement that the asset owner must identify and consult with any business or organisation using the asset, prior to agreeing any transfer request. We are aware of concerns from businesses that this does not always occur and a change in ownership or conditions may have a huge impact on businesses which rely on the asset. This might include assets such as parks or open spaces, filling stations, halls, cafes/visitor centres or piers. Notwithstanding the business impact, problems arising from lack of consultation and agreement, can lead to community breakdowns, especially in small communities.

Lastly, while recognising the potential community benefit of purchasing neglected land, small business owners who own local land or buildings might be alarmed at the prospect of losing what is often a significant medium to long term investment. The Scottish Government should ensure that small landowners, without the means to afford expert legal support, are not left unprotected.

4. Non-domestic rates

In our response\(^3\) to the Scottish Government’s 2013 consultation on non-domestic rates we highlighted the need for relief schemes in an arbitrary property-based system.

We suggested that the current system of reliefs is varied and complex but, without question, the key relief for small businesses is the Small Business Bonus Scheme (SBBS). Having long argued for a scheme to address the disproportionate burden of rates for small businesses,\(^4\) the FSB warmly welcomed the introduction of the SBBS in 2008. This relief has been a lifeline to small businesses in exceptionally challenging economic times. A survey of our members, published in 2013, indicated that 75% of respondents are receiving some level of discount to their rates bill as a result of the SBBS. Indeed, 52% of FSB members told us they now pay no rates at all because they receive 100% relief.

In our comments to the Scottish Government, we highlighted two categories of small business often excluded from the SBSS. Firstly, those whose business model requires larger (and usually higher value) premises, such as hotels and nurseries. Such businesses may operate on tight margins, with relatively modest turnover yet their RV excludes them from support for small businesses.

Secondly, small businesses operating in higher value locations, where RVs are higher, like city centres, are also excluded from support. We understand that the system has to have thresholds and some businesses will always be on the wrong side of the upper limit, but many businesses currently feel they are denied assistance intended to support small firms.

We suggested that local discretion over extending reliefs may be one way to support small, independent businesses. However, we remain cautious about the likely impact of this new power, particularly if they have to be fully funded by the local authority. In England, where similar powers already exist for local authorities, there has been virtually no introduction of relief. A recent report by the FSB in Wales, also found that where local authorities have power to grant relief (using discretionary rates relief), only half had granted any discretionary relief in the previous 3 years.\(^5\)

Nevertheless, we hope that local authorities will consider how they can build on the foundation of the SBBS to support business start up and growth in communities.

\(^4\) As a percentage of profit, rates are around 3 times higher for small businesses, compared to larger firms. See: “Evaluation and Effectiveness of the Small Business Rates Relief Scheme”, DTZ Pieda, December 2004.

Dear Sir

COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL

The Cairngorms National Park Authority welcomes the opportunity to respond to the Committee’s call for written evidence as part of its Stage 1 consideration of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. We have sought to provide some contextual information, before answering the specific questions in turn.

The principles of sustainable, community-led local development are central to the management of the Cairngorms National Park. CNPA considers that the Bill will support us in helping communities take an even more active role in managing the Park.

Over the last 11 years CNPA has developed a number of approaches, in partnership with other organisations, to help communities to identify their own priorities, principally through a process of community action planning. This has been tremendously productive, both in the development of the National Park Partnership Plan – the overarching management plan for the Park – and its delivery.

The story does, of course, vary across the National Park with each community at different stages and with varying priorities. However, community-led activity has covered a variety of themes, including: the acquisition or creation of assets; the development of locally-tailored solutions to specific issues such as provision of broadband, affordable housing and local food production; and the establishment of trading subsidiaries, or social enterprises to develop sustainable income streams. The additional resources provided by the dedicated Leader programme for the Park – the only one of its kind in Scotland – have been of considerable assistance.

We are aware from the number of specialist and professional visits from overseas, and especially Scandinavia, that our approach to community-led development in a protected area of national significance is both innovative and stimulating at an international level. We were pleased recently to celebrate this approach and share experience though hosting the first Regional Preparatory event in Scotland for the Scottish Rural Parliament. CNPA would be happy to share information about our other examples of good practice, or to supply further information on request.

At a strategic policy level, we view the proposals, particularly those around strengthening community planning, as opportunities to improve collaborative working across Scotland. Collaboration between all sectors is at the very heart of Scotland’s unique approach to National Parks, as set out in the National Parks (Scotland) Act 2000. We feel that to realise the ambition, some further work is required to ensure that community planning arrangements are working well in National Parks and in our response to the consultation, we comment on the relationship between the National Park Partnership Plan and Single Outcome Agreements/Local Outcome Improvement Plans in more detail.

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

As the supplementary guidance and other information surrounding the Bill makes clear, the legislation alone cannot empower, but it can create the conditions to do so. By formalising, extending and giving additional weight to a number of existing processes around asset transfer, right-to-buy and service planning, CNPA considers that the Bill provides a good framework through which appropriate community groups and public agencies can work collaboratively and in partnership to empower communities.

One of the concerns that CNPA highlighted during the consultation process for the Bill was the limited focus on the provision of support for community capacity building. There is relatively little information about this in the Bill and associated guidance on this topic. If the intention of the Bill is to empower the most disadvantaged communities then capacity building is essential and additional support for agencies which provide this role (particularly through the voluntary sector) will be central to this success. This issue is not specifically picked up and our concern would be that those communities who stand to benefit most from the Bill will be unable to take advantage of the provisions.

In addition, those communities who are in a position to take advantage of the provisions will also require support to ensure that they understand the advantages and possible drawbacks from any activity they take forward. For example, it would be in nobody’s interest for a community to take on a potential liability as opposed to a sustainable asset.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

As an organisation, CNPA is committed to the principle of community-led local development as described above. As a result, we foresee three several advantages as listed below.
a. The provisions place greater emphasis on communities in the National Park having opportunities to take forward their own ideas and ambitions for their communities. This approach is extremely welcome.

b. The Bill provides additional opportunities for some of the most rural communities in Scotland to have a greater say on the delivery of public services which are most important to them and which are often tailored to suit more urbanised communities.

c. One of the issues that CNPA has highlighted previously about community planning in the National Park is that there are essentially two key processes about partnership working in particular places (or regions), the Single Outcome Agreements (proposed to be supplemented by the LOIP) and the National Park Partnership Plan. CNPA considers that while there are many good examples of strategic joint working around priority themes in National Parks that draw on both SOAs and the National Park Partnership Plans, there is still some scope for confusion and duplication of effort. The difficulty is in seeking to integrate or align these strategic processes and identifying where the National Park Authority should engage with the relevant CPPs (five CCPs in the case of the Cairngorms NP).

Within the Park priority attention is now being given to the coordination of partnership delivery around certain key themes including planning, biodiversity management, economic development, active lifestyles and community-led development. CNPA has recently agreed a process with each of the CPPs based on a mutual exchange of monitoring information to inform a joint annual review. It is intended that this will help to coordinate strategic planning around the SOA or NPPP and demonstrate how activity in the National Park helps to deliver the SOA and how activity in the CPP helps to deliver the NPPP.

CNPA considers that with the provision of appropriate guidance and encouragement, the requirement for Local Outcome Improvement Plans (LOIPs) as an annual supplement to the three year SOA provides an opportunity for partners to work towards closer alignment of our strategic plans, using the process set out above.

Some communities are much better placed than others to take advantage of the provisions of the Bill and it is likely that the most disadvantaged (i.e. those who may stand to benefit most) will be the least well placed. As referred to in answer to Question 1, support for community capacity building will be essential in the most disadvantaged or least prepared communities. CNPA has sought to address this within the National Park by working with partners and communities to create a structured process for community empowerment through engagement and community-led local development. The process has varied to reflect the context of each community, however, the general principles focus on intensive community engagement to agree the priorities for a geographic area; identifying the partners that need to be involved; and supporting communities through the creation of Community Development Officer projects to build capacity and deliver community-led projects and initiatives which address local concerns and support the delivery of the National Park Partnership Plan. The required capacity building support may be very basic, but has the potential to be very intensive, requiring some significant resource commitment. Key issues are likely to include:

- Governance – from getting the best legal framework in place for a particular organisation (e.g. SCIO or other) to how various community groups work together on an agreed set of priorities;
- Building skills in terms of running meetings, taking minutes, establishing partnerships and effective relationships; and
- Identifying initial funding and how to run a sustainable project/initiative for long-term viability.

Supplementary guidance should seek to achieve a situation in which resources are targeted at the most disadvantaged communities and may require regular review to check progress. Guidance should also provide additional clarification on where ultimate responsibility for ensuring adequate capacity building support sits, for example it may be the local authority as the local democratically accountable body. The new CLD Regulations indicate that this is the case, but confirmation of this would be helpful in determining the role of other key partners, in order to avoid duplication of effort and provide the best chance for adding value.

4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

CNPA is positive about the main provisions and the overall intention of the Bill and feel that it will help to create the conditions necessary for positive community empowerment. The balance between clear provisions and providing flexibility in terms of local interpretation is about right and the guidance should seek to address:

- Integration of National Park Partnership Plans and SOA/LOIP processes;
- Prioritisation of investment of resources to support capacity building; and

5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

The key impact from a CNPA point of view will be that around sustainable development. The National Park Partnership Plan sets out clearly how the aims of the National Park will be delivered through partnership working and with sustainable development at its core. The provisions in the Bill around asset transfer and participation requests already refer to public benefit and public sector agencies are required to consider the impact on sustainable development as part of their deliberations. Therefore, this is generally covered; however, a specific requirement for the community-controlled body or community participation body to demonstrate how their proposal contributes to sustainable development may be helpful in this regard.
Should you have any questions regarding any of the points laid out here, or if you would like more information on any of the examples given, please do not hesitate to contact me.

Yours sincerely

MURRAY FERGUSON
Director of Planning and Rural Development
NFU Scotland is encouraged by the Bill, and considers that encouraging partnership working with communities has wide ranging benefits for the rural economy.

However, NFU Scotland is concerned that there is not a concrete definition for what constitutes ‘wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected’ in the context of land. Parcels of land may be out of regular ‘use’ for periods of time when they are involved in an agricultural enterprise. Reasons for this are numerous, but could include the following:

- Land which has been sown in crop which has subsequently become unviable, for example in years of extremely wet weather conditions.
- Where changes have occurred to an agricultural enterprise, for example reduction in stock, or change in type of stock.
- Where fields are grazed on a rotational basis and are empty for extended periods of time.
- Reduced levels of activity on parcels of land due to farms establishing Ecological Focus Areas under the new CAP.

NFU Scotland considers that where land is classified as agricultural land it should not be possible for a community to purchase that land as ‘abandoned or neglected’ unless it can be proven that it fails to meet GAEC requirements. Under the scenarios listed above, a community could make an application to buy a parcel of land as neglected or abandoned, when in fact this is not the case.

NFU Scotland is also concerned that there are no timescales in relation to how long land has to be considered ‘abandoned and neglected’ for before a community could attempt to purchase it. Again, in relation to the scenarios listed above a time scale would recognise that land could appear to be abandoned or neglected for a period of time, but ultimately not qualify as a subject of a community purchase.

Without clearer definitions and timescales, NFU Scotland is concerned that those who own land may erroneously stand to lose it in the event of a community wishing to purchase it.

Ends.
1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

Given the strength of the voluntary sector within the North East, Aberdeenshire Community Planning Partnership is supportive of the overall direction of the Bill. In many cases the Bill will place into statute many approaches which are already well established in Aberdeenshire, such as in community planning and asset transfer. It should be recognised that many of the best examples of empowerment we have seen have taken place where community bodies have had the opportunity to grow through time to develop the confidence and capacity to take on large-scale projects.

It is significant that much of the current good practice around asset transfer has been enabled through a variety of different national grant and investment schemes. There are numerous examples in Aberdeenshire of active community-led organisations that have developed assets as a result of this:

- Fraserburgh Development Trust worked to renovate a blight sight in the town centre and funded this through Town Centre Improvement funding. This asset has since been used as security to purchase a bakery in a rural community thus sustaining existing jobs and leading to the creation of further training opportunities.
- Huntly Development Trust have recently purchased a farm with Scottish Land Fund support and are developing renewable energy projects.
- Udny Community Trust have set up a community grant scheme with the funding from a wholly owned turbine. They now have a Big Lottery (Growing Community Assets) funded Development Officer and are delivering on needs identified through ‘Planning for Real’ completing a virtuous cycle of identifying and meeting need.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequences of the provisions in the Bill?

Aberdeenshire Community Planning Partnership is committed to community engagement and partnership working and as such welcomes the thrust of the Bill. Ensuring that all partners will support and allocate resources towards the delivery of a shared plan is an important step in empowering community planning partnerships.

In terms of disadvantages, it is possible that the Bill will be perceived nationally as a means of dumping responsibilities on to community bodies. ‘It is important therefore that there is sufficient support in place for communities to get what they need out of the Bill. On that note, there are resource implications arising from the provisions in the Bill. Aberdeenshire Community Planning Partnership through its Single Outcome Agreement and Local Community Plans remains committed to focusing on outcomes and it is important that the administration of certain provisions within the Bill do not take resources away from delivering improved outcomes for communities. While specific concerns raised by officers of Aberdeenshire Council are set out in section 4, the Bill will require additional resources to implement.

There is an ongoing process of capacity building that happens as organisations grow. This process of building capacity involves a range of partners and agencies but to succeed must be driven by the vision of local people themselves.

Clearly, access to funding streams is an important factor in this as the examples in Fraserburgh, Huntly, Udny mentioned earlier demonstrate. The long-term process of creating anchor organisations has also been evident through the work of some local Rural Partnerships such as Buchan Development Partnership who were case studied in the original Community Empowerment Action Plan.

The Policy memorandum makes reference to Participatory Budgeting and the desire of the Scottish Government to see this approach more widely utilised. There is an opportunity to link a new national participatory budgeting seed-corn fund to support the implementation of this Bill – perhaps utilising the ‘Change Fund’ approach which has previously been used in relation to enhanced outcomes for older people.

Inevitably some communities will be better placed to take advantage of the provisions in the Bill than others. To reduce against any potential for increasing inequalities between communities, it is important that public bodies continue to target resources to the areas of greatest need.

The proposed core duties are welcomed and support the high-level messages expressed in the Christie Commission and Statement of Ambition. It is important that these duties are placed on an equal footing with other duties that partner organisations hold. Driving a shift from participation at meetings to participation in delivery and resourcing is a significant step forward. There will of course remain a tension between the existing lines of accountability that public bodies hold with the newer responsibilities funnelled through the Community Planning Partnership. There is no easy way around this and it has proved a barrier to partnership working so far.

For the provisions relating to common good, the Bill as drafted requires the Council to consult every community council in Aberdeenshire for every possible sale, rather than the local community council. Given the number of community councils in Aberdeenshire, this would be very time consuming for both the Council and community councils. It may be beneficial to amend the wording of the legislation to focus on the local and relevant community council. In addition, there are significant resource implications arising from the creation of a register of common good assets. While there is an existing audit obligation to maintain such a register, CIPFA acknowledges that current practice of dealing with common good issues as title queries rise is acceptable. The geographical area of Aberdeenshire Council and volume of titles means it would require significant resources and time to complete a full and comprehensive review of the Council’s titles. This is the position reported to, and accepted by, the Council’s Policy and Resources Committee. The draft provisions relating to common good have financial implications for the Council as these would require significant legal and archivist resources to take forward.

There needs to be clear links between any wider Scottish Government work to develop the role of community councils and the contents of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. It should be acknowledged that community councils along with other community bodies have a role to play in supporting the implementation of the Bill. The capacity and will of community councils to take on these provisions can vary significantly across Scotland. Further clarity on the role of community councils in the context of the Bill would be welcomed.

5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy Memorandum?

It is worth highlighting that equalities considerations will need to be built into future policies and practices that emerge to help implement the provisions in the Bill. Aberdeenshire Community Planning Partnership has previously responded to the consultation highlighting the need to carefully manage the implementation of the Bill. This is important to ensure that those areas well placed and capable of taking advantage of the provisions do not further pull away from areas with less capacity and knowledge of community development.
Local Government and Regeneration Committee

Call for Evidence
Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

The Angus Community Planning Partnership welcomes the development of this important legislation and the opportunity to provide written evidence to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee.

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

We believe that the legislation alone will not empower communities, but will help to create the right culture for partners to engage with communities and for communities to take control themselves.

We believe that this legislation has the potential to create conditions that further empowers those communities who are already empowered and that as partners we need to ensure that the whole community can benefit. This is a key concept about the breadth and depth of empowerment.

It is our contention that empowerment flows from relationships and that it is up to people themselves what they take or do in respect of empowerment.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

We welcome the broadening of the Duty of Community Planning however the Third Sector Interface or the Regional Transport Partnership, are listed as key partners. Councils are also not listed in the appendix, but are provided for earlier in the legislation. It would be a significant disadvantage if all key partners were not able to play a significant and named part in the delivery of community planning in Angus, either at a strategic board level, or at a local level.

We do wonder about the provisions in the legislation. It would appear that it is trying to sort out some ‘known’ problems and is therefore very specific about allotments and community right to buy, whereas other parts of the Bill are rightly establishing a vision and framework for the future, which we welcome. It is almost as if the Bill has different authors and therefore the expectations in each section are not consistent.

It is not difficult for the Council to publish a list of common good assets, but understanding the legal rights and properties of each takes more time and significant resource. With respect to allotments, we are supportive of the concept, but find the number on the waiting list a bit arbitrary at 48. We would rather work with and support communities to develop their own community gardens and allotments which we have already established locally. This requires a change in thinking that the local authority must always ‘provide’ rather than ‘facilitate’.

We believe that the Bill has the opportunity to support the development of Community Planning, but it will be for partners locally to put the effort in to develop the relationships necessary to deliver better outcomes. Fundamentally this is also about a new relationship with individuals and communities and therefore the culture of public sector organisations needs to change.

We need to become more comfortable with managing risk and look for opportunities that open up through, for example, community asset transfer. We need to find a way to shift our resources which can make both the asset and the community more sustainable. But we also need to know what will happen if something fails over time, when community energy, commitment or relationships break down. Clearly this requires thought and a balanced approach to risk.

We note the key connections to other legislation such as Community Learning and Development and Health and Social Care Integrations in particular. We will need to manage these connections locally, but currently the Community Empowerment Bill is silent on these matters.

We do not envisage a great sea change in Angus following the introduction of the Bill as we are already striving to improve our partnership arrangements and the way in which we work in and with communities, as well as supporting communities to do more for themselves. However, enshrining these key principles in legislation is a positive step towards a bigger goal of shifting resources towards prevention and collective outcome activity.

Partnership working takes on many forms and it is essential that partners, including local communities, find the approach that suits them best.

As previously mentioned, we believe that many communities are already empowered and the Bill will provide further opportunities for them. However, people and communities are often at different starting points and we believe that the Bill could have gone further in terms of recognising learning that is sometimes needed to build individual and community capacity. This can often be resource intensive and requires investment by partners to release capacity in communities. The Bill could be more ambitiously linked to tackling poverty. A connection with the Community Learning and Development regulations and guidance needs to be articulated and understood.

Partnerships need to provide assistance to local communities need to provide assistance to local communities who are struggling to take control and help themselves. Coaching/leadership is one approach, but communities will often need public finances to help run a service. Community officers from local authorities is another approach, but many have been lost owing to funding cuts. This is the aspect of community planning that is most difficult; least supported, but has most to. Indeed, this does need a radical change to local ways of working which will be much more challenging than the current, mostly centralised approach.

We believe that it would be beneficial for the Bill to also focus on peoples’ strengths and ability to empower themselves. There are many empowered communities in Angus and sometimes they require very little, if any, input from the local authority or public sector organisation. We are also seeing evidence of empowered individuals through, for example, Self Directed Support.
This is also about relationships, understanding people’s stories and building from there. We remain unsure that we can legislate and expect that people will be empowered as a consequence, but we do also recognise the positive intent in the Bill.

4.1 Partnership Governance

We are particularly pleased about the section on the Duty of Community Planning and its articulation of outcomes linked to an improvement plan. This will help us enhance our governance arrangements and use our resources more effectively which should in turn lead to better outcomes. But would make the following observations: -

9 Community planning partners: duties
3) Each community planning partner must, in relation to a community planning partnership, contribute such funds, staff and other resources as the community planning partnership considers appropriate—
   (a) with a view to improving, or contributing to an improvement in, the achievement of each local outcome referred to in section 5(2)(a), and
   (b) for the purpose of securing the participation of the community bodies mentioned in section 4(5)(a) in community planning.

With regard to 9.1, we have no difficulty with the concept of CPP members challenging each other’s expenditure, but to give the CPP powers actually to stipulate the sum to be spent by each partner is perhaps a step too far.

12 Establishment of corporate bodies
(1) Following an application by a local authority and at least one other community planning partner for the area of the authority, the Scottish Ministers may by regulations establish a body corporate with such constitution and functions about community planning (including in particular its conduct and co-ordination) as may be specified in the regulations.

Likewise with 12.1, it is questionable to give the power to the Council, with only one other partner, to make an application to Ministers to establish a body corporate.

4.2 Common Good

Firstly, we would wish to reiterate the comments I made in the earlier consultation. No cognisance has been taken of our concerns with our perceived inadequacies of the drafting. The Bill’s wording is identical to the draft consulted upon in January 2014. Thus, our original comments stand. We do not think that the provisions go far enough to address the current difficulties faced by councils in dealing with their common good assets. Proposals to use the land in a manner which is in the public’s best interests are stymied by the delays and costs involved in disposing or alienating the land where a question arises under Section 75 of the Local Government (Sc) Act 1973. Moreover, the recently reported Opinion of Lord Tyre in the hearing of East Renfrewshire Council’s Petition confirms that section 75 does not cover appropriation and thus the court has no power to authorise such appropriation. Thus, the council has no means to promote or have authorised an appropriation other than Act of Parliament. A process which could be time consuming and expensive. We appreciate that there would be difficulties in defining common good but would urge the Scottish Minister to take this opportunity to use this Bill to advance proposals which would empower councils to deal effectively with common good property. There are also issues with determination of common good assets and where these assets should be held. Angus Council submitted a petition to the Scottish Parliament “Calling on the Scottish Parliament to urge the Scottish Government to introduce an amendment to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill or to introduce legislation relating to common good property providing any asset which has been regarded and managed as common good property for 50 years without successful legal challenge shall be treated for all legal purposes as common good property” in late 2013. No response has been received.

As regards the specific provisions relating to common good:-

Section 22(3) – It would be preferable if the Scottish Ministers were to determine how the proposed register should be published to any argument as to the perceived insufficiency of publication.

Section 63 (6) – No details are provided as to how local authorities should deal with representations. Para 23 of the Improvement Service Report “The Management of Common Good Assets and Funds” published June 2008 proposed a public testing of the register “This should be for a specified period only, after which the register would be taken as definitive and unchallengeable”. The Improvement Service recommended that statutory provision should be made that any asset that has been regarded and managed as common good for 50 years without successful legal challenge will be treated for all legal purposes as common good. We support this principle of a fixed period for holding assets as is evidenced by our petition to the Scottish Parliament.

Section 63 (8) is unnecessary as details of land and buildings managed by a local authority should be published under class 5 of their publication scheme as required by the Freedom of Information (Sc) Act 2002.

Section 65 (1) – clarity is required to ensure that “disposing of “ or “changing use to” would encompass alienation as the terms has been developed in recent case law arising from the disparate interpretations of section 75 (2) of the 1973 concerning the property arrangements arising from PFI/PPP/SFT projects.

The provisions relating to common good should cover all the necessary aspects of this important area of property law to local authorities. Full and effective provisions would mean that section 75 of the 1973 Act could be repealed.

Turning to the Financial Memorandum, it is noted that “local authorities [had] expressed some concern about the potential resources involved in establishing registers”. The Memorandum then addresses the issues in terms of the consultation process. Whilst we agree with the statement that councils would be starting “from a very firm foundation”, it is our view that the full costs of any check or audit which would be necessary prior to any effective public consultation has not been taken into account. Angus Council recently commenced an audit of common good property. It took a number of months to check the title deeds of over 50 properties in one burgh and minutes of meetings etc located in archives against with the conclusions reached by Andrew Ferguson in his book “Common Good Law”. Without such an audit, we would suggest that public consultation alone may not result in an improved register. Following this audit, we sought public consultation on one particular property, namely Arbroath Library. It is held on the common good account but was acquired for a statutory purpose and thus, should not be treated as common good. This view was confirmed in a Senior Counsel Opinion. This consultation failed to resolve the issue as the representations received supported the position that it should continue to be held on the common good account. No representation took cognisance of the legal position.

4.3 General Points

We are particularly concerned about the language used about participation. We see communities as partners and there is a connection missing to the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003 in this respect. The intent may be to replace some or the entire 2003 Act, but this is not clear and would in our view diminish community empowerment in legislation.

We also need to think about power deprivation and our vision for local education and learning linked to our values and aspirations for the future in respect of, for example, new infrastructure and economic inclusion.

Also, some partners operate at a national or regional level and creating some difficulty for participation in a range of partnerships with the knock on consequences of servicing arms length companies that are sometimes created. The Bill could give further consideration to enable partnerships to have direct employment by a public body possible.

The Bill is definitely more strongly worded where it talks about physical assets but less so when dealing with creating a new culture of participation. It comes across as people/communities having to make a request rather than an expectation of a way of working. We believe that this does not provide the right environment for growing empowerment through changing cultures within the public sector. The Bill needs to be ‘future proofed’ and it could be clearer in saying that communities should not only have their voice heard, but be influential and part of decision making.

We also believe it would be helpful to consider how we will know if the legislation will have made a difference. We believe it can help us move towards greater empowerment but the ‘proof is in the pudding’ and monitoring will be important. We think communities would welcome knowing how that will be done.

We think allotments are too narrowly defined. Use of green spaces, planning for place, pride in place are better i.e. our environment needs to link outcomes and be part of a bigger vision.

5. What are the views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

We note the Policy memorandum and imagine that much of the content of the Bill will hinge on either guidance or how partnerships embrace the change required through the Bill.
The issue of rurality also applies to many parts of Angus.

6. Conclusion

We hope that you find our comments and observations useful.
Comments by the Scottish property federation on the Local Government & Regeneration Committee’s call for Stage 1 Evidence – the Community Empowerment Bill

Introduction

1. The Scottish Property Federation (SPF) is a voice for the property industry in Scotland. We have some 150 corporate members with interests in Scottish real estate including; property funds, major institutional investors, lenders, developers, landlords of commercial and residential property, and professional property consultants and advisers.

2. We are pleased to submit comments to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee on the Community Empowerment Bill. We recognise that our views will be made public and shared with other authorities at the Committee’s discretion.

General Comments

3. The Scottish Property Federation supports the principle of greater community engagement, empowerment and involvement in the delivery and use of local community assets and services. We believe it is important that communities are properly represented and that due processes, safeguards of property rights and checks by local authorities or Ministers applied where necessary. It is crucial in our view that major investment is supported and not frustrated. In particular, we are keen to ensure that the Bill does not interrupt or disable the many positive and important partnerships and joint ventures achieved by public authorities, or publicly supported authorities, that have been established with the aim of securing development and investment, jobs and regeneration in major urban areas of Scotland such as the east end of Glasgow.

4. On this last point we assess that the Bill has evolved over the past two years to ensure that public authorities and Ministers have a right to reject proposals for Community Right to Buy (CTRB) and Asset Transfer. This will be an important safeguard for their private sector partners engaged in joint ventures or similar arrangements. Notwithstanding this progress we feel there remain a number of publicly supported bodies who are outside this zone of protection, such as Urban Regeneration Companies (URCs) and we would like to see this rectified. Similarly, we believe uncertainty remains regarding the status of assets previously compulsorily purchased by public authorities yet subsequently unused.
and therefore potentially subject to CRTB or Asset Transfer applications. The Crichel Down rules would suggest that the previous owners should remain entitled to a first opportunity to re-purchase these assets but we see no clarification of this position within the Bill or its supporting documents.

5. We believe that the government may also have underestimated the extent of complexity that may be involved with the CRTB and additional asset transfer powers being extended to urban areas. We suspect that questions of ownership and interests over land will prove to be much more complicated with much higher values involved than has hitherto been the case where CRTB has been invoked under the existing 2003 powers. We comment on this further under paragraph 12.

Questions

To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

6. The Bill significantly expands the scope and extent of community empowerment in Scotland. The current restriction on Community Right to Buy to communities of 10,000 or less will be replaced by a provision extending this right to all communities across Scotland. In addition, new powers to participate in the provision of local services or to initiate asset transfer of public sector land and property to a community group is enabled. CRTB is also extended to include ‘abandoned’ and ‘neglected’ land within its parameters. In addition the Bill continues to enable Scottish Ministers to support processes for community right to buy financially, relieving some of the financial burden of the processes involved.

7. Beyond the property aspects of the Bill (CRTB and Asset Transfer) there are also significant provisions for the inclusion of community bodies within the community planning partnership process. This requirement may impose significant demands upon local authorities. It could however feasibly lead to greater community involvement in local decision-making than the enhancements to ownership and rights to property powers (CRTB and Asset Transfer) that the Bill bestows.

8. Public sector landowners will be subject to the same provisions as private landowners in relation to community right to buy. There is an additional right for community bodies in relation to asset transfer although the revised Bill includes safeguards for Ministers and local authorities to reject a request for asset transfer of their assets. Other public authorities will not have this power of veto and therefore will be subject to appeal by a community body even if they initially reject a request.

9. It is possible that one benefit would be to encourage a community group to take responsibility for an asset that has lain unused for some time and has no alternative or better use or value to that which a group might propose. Disadvantages could include the potential loss of valuable sites earmarked for investment or development, or the potential loss of interest in sites by the development community as a result of perceived due diligence issues. For example, where the risk that land earmarked for development will become subject to CRTB/Asset transfer rights deters a developer from pursuing their interest in a site.

10. Our members have questioned the relationship between the Bill’s provisions for CRTB and the application of the Crichel Down rules, whereby a public sector asset that may have been compulsorily purchased must be offered to the original owner if the public authority decides the land is surplus and therefore moves to sell the asset for a different purpose to that which the land was originally purchased for. Scottish Ministers have produced a Planning Circular (5-2011) which explains the obligations of public authorities in relation to the disposal of surplus land previously subject to CPO yet the Bill is silent on this issue and it would be helpful to see some clarity from the Scottish Government in relation to this aspect of the CRTB process. It seems to us that this is a matter of public law which the government cannot simply ignore.

Do you consider communities across Scotland have the capabilities to take advantage of the provisions in the Bill? If not, what requires to be done to the Bill, or to assist communities, to ensure this happens?

11. The example of a number of Development Trust projects across Scotland suggests that communities are certainly able to take on projects successfully. The sustainability of successful applications will inevitably be on a case-by-case basis to see if the appropriate case has been made for the asset in question. However, there is already significant government support for the development trust association (Scotland). This could be further improved and made ready as a vehicle to advise aspirant community groups before they embark upon what could be complicated arrangements for CRTB or Asset Transfer under the much more expanded scope of this Bill.

12. Each case will clearly need to be decided on its own merits and it will be important for the Scottish Ministers to be appropriately advised. We would welcome any clarification the LGR Committee might be able to secure from the Scottish Government about its intentions regarding resourcing the Community Empowerment section within the Scottish Government. Hitherto the demand for CRTB has been limited by the extent of the 2003 statute and therefore the resources required by the government have been relatively minor. This must be expected to change radically with the expansion of the CRTB and Asset Transfer powers to cover all communities in Scotland, regardless of size. Not only is the scope much wider but we believe the complications involved with delivering the due process involved with CRTB can be extensive. In discussion with one developer it was explained to us how even in the case of one building this can involve tracing owners and trustees from around the world and ensuring that due notice is provided and legal rights respected.

13. Property investment and redevelopment is a capital intensive business and the maintenance and rejuvenation of listed buildings in particular may add to this cost. Even without the community empowerment measures some local authorities have been actively encouraging the creation of community trusts to take charge of disused buildings which could play a positive community role. The motivations for this may be to try and divest the authority of financial burdens and liabilities but the ability of community groups to take advantage of this willingness to make such assets available to community groups has not always been forthcoming. The appetite for taking on major liabilities such as old buildings for the purposes of regeneration may be less than expected.

14. This begs the question of what happens to a community group asset where the group ceases to exist or is unable to continue to function. It appears to us that the asset will fall into the ownership of Scottish Ministers, or authorities, who may find themselves burdened with unexpected liabilities and responsibilities that are not budgeted for.

Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

15. The Bill has been amended since its original incarnations but a number of outstanding issues remain to be considered.

Appeals – Community Right to Buy (Part 4)
16. Our understanding is that a community body will be able to re-apply for asset transfer or CRTB within two years of a previous failed application. We would like to see the Bill specify that such re-applications should not occur within two years of the Minister’s Notice of a decision. With CRTB enabled for up to 8 months it is in our view important to ensure there is significant gap between CRTB applications in order to avoid unfair delay and restriction upon the landowner.

17. We are also keen to see further clarification of the obligations upon land and property owners in relation to notification of intention to sell land or property. Commercial property sales will frequently be unadvertised in order to protect commercial sensitivity.
Does the Bill really require, where a major property asset is set for sale by its investors, that they should notify all communities within their area and be forced to wait 8 months before being able to dispose of the asset or seek permission from Scottish Ministers if a sale is achieved (as it would be) within 8 months?

18. We do not think that it is the intention of Ministers to interfere in the normal workings of the Scottish commercial property market through the Bill but it would be helpful to see some clarification within the legislation in order to prevent any future misuse of the CRTB powers. The legislation is far too open to interpretation in this light and needs to be tightened.

19. The government could consider introducing a maximum valuation, say of £500,000, above which CRTB could not apply. In reality this would simply clarify market reality as few community groups would be able to participate in purchases of valuable commercial land (however see our later comments on the beneficial ownership of companies limited by guarantee). While we accept this could be done via secondary legislation it would be better to be achieved via primary legislation.

Duty to provide information under CRTB – commercial confidentiality

20. We are concerned to ensure that where landowners provide information to Ministers that such information as is deemed to be commercially confidential is not publicly available. This might include the relative value of a property company and its land-holdings and the related impact of these holdings on their funding facilities for example. The recent recession demonstrated the sensitivity of changes in valuation to the survivability of a property company and we would not wish to see CRTB as a trigger for companies to be put into administration (which would in addition potentially complicate the CRTB process). There is already a power for a community body to ask for information to be not made public in relation to a register of Community Interests in Abandoned or Neglected Land (S48(97F)(3)), so this request for commercial confidentiality does not appear to be against the spirit of the Bill.

21. We are aware of concerns raised by members and other organisations about the imposition of costs on the landowner to cover the expenses of the government-appointed valuer, in the event of land being withdrawn from sale because of a CRTB notification. A withdrawal of sale may occur for reasons other than the application of a CRTB. It will be important for Scottish Ministers to exercise discretion where expenses are charged.

Proportion of ballot required for a valid application – S36

22. We note the 2003 Act is amended so that it is no longer required that more than half of the balloted community support the intention to CRTB. This is now replaced in S36 (a)(i) by simply a majority of an undefined proportion. However the Bill expands the scope of CRTB to more heavily populated communities than under the 2003 Act so if anything the concern that a relatively small number of people may initiate a CRTB is if anything increased. It will be important that the proportion is not set at a level that would undermine the credibility of a community body.

Abandoned or Neglected Land (S48)

23. We remain concerned with the potential scope of the CRTB measures and the notions of abandoned or neglected land. In the first instance these are subjective terms, so government guidance will need to be definitive and consequent decision-making robust. Of greater concern is the possibility that applications for land by community groups based on grounds of abandonment or neglect when in fact the land in question is part of a complex development process that could take many years to unfold. For complicated mixed used development schemes this length of time is not unusual and the land itself may be comprised of several smaller plots or existing buildings which may form an important part of the whole value of the site. This wider picture could be important for the landowner or the investors behind a scheme and we feel that affiliated land interests ought to be a consideration for Ministers in deciding the merits of an application for transfer to a community transfer body. Although we acknowledge that the landowner will have the ability to make representations about the assessment of value under S48 (97S) we would like to see it specified that these factors should be taken into consideration by Ministers in making their determination. Any uncertainty caused by land being subjected to applications for CRTB, or asset transfer if the asset is in public hands, will prejudice this process and will make investors more reluctant to take on such sites or to invest significant sums in the development process.
24. Neither does the legislation clarify the position of applications for land that might be the subject of a CRTB application on the grounds of abandonment or neglect when in fact the land is owned by an entity which is in administration or other insolvency process with the land. This could in itself result in inevitable delay but absolutely does not mean the land is abandoned or neglected. There are numerous examples of this in towns and cities throughout Scotland with land possibly ‘owned’ by banks as the senior debt lender or other creditors. This situation does not appear to be considered in the Policy memorandum, the Bill or its Explanatory Notes and we feel it is important that there is appropriate and clear policy in relation to this issue. Indeed the relationship between a developer and their funders, onward investors and any pre-completion lease agreements are also issues which we believe it would be important for Ministers to be aware of in the context of making a decision over abandoned or neglected land.

25. The Bill is silent also on the issue of what happens when a successful CRTB for abandoned or neglected land does not deliver the re-use of a building within a reasonable period of time. Surely Ministers do not intend that a successful community transfer body should then not be required to deliver their state-aided purchase for community benefits, or should be able to sell it on for some other use for a profit? Again we see no account taken of this issue.

Companies Limited by Guarantee – S48

26. The Bill expands the definition of the 2003 Act to include charities regulated by SCIO as well as companies limited by guarantee. In addition it is required that the community body should be comprised of 20 persons (or less depending on S48 (97D)) and that the body should be connected to the local area. The definition of ‘connected’ has been specifically watered down from the term ‘substantially connected’ for reasons we do not perceive and we believe this could be considered by the Committee. In addition the legislation requires that the individual members of the Board may have the liability of its members limited to such amount as the members undertake to contribute to the assets of the company in the event of it being wound up’. This suggests unequal interests will be allowed in the company and the extent of individual contributions to the community body may be an issue to be considered under subsection (4) where Ministers have to be satisfied as to the intentions of the community body.

Option agreements and other interests relevant to the land – S32

27. We were concerned during the consultation process at the prospect of option agreements not being respected in the process of CRTB. The consultation appeared to recognise this concern and support the view that option agreements made by investors should be respected. We welcome the government’s decision to introduce S32 although we believe that other pre-agreed rights over the land that may be extent between the landowner and a third party should also be considered by Ministers.

Asset Transfer - notifications

28. We would wish to see some form of public notification upon a request for a public sector asset or leased asset to be transferred to a community transfer body. We would certainly wish to see a requirement for interested parties in the asset to be notified that a request for asset transfer is outstanding – not to do so could cause significant cost to interested parties in the site.

Rights of third parties with interests in land subject of asset transfer request – S55

29. We believe it is important for the position of third parties with interests in land that may be the subject of an asset transfer request to make representations to the authority or seek appeal to Ministers. There is significant scope under S55 for authorities to reject a request for asset transfer but the rights of other parties are not specifically covered other than by implication and even in the event of an authority being obliged to compensate a third party for the effective loss of the asset due to asset transfer it is not certain that this would support an ability to refuse the request.

Asset Transfer – leased properties

30. We seek clarification whether assets leased – even if not used – by a public authority from a private owner are within the scope of this Part of the Bill. If so that would have significant issues for the owner who might see their asset transferred from a strong public sector covenant to a much weaker community body covenant, possibly also seeing the use of the property changed with little or no consent.

Position of ALEOs and URCs

31. We are particularly concerned with the position of local authority ALEOs (Arm’s Length External Organisations) and URCs (Urban Regeneration Companies) within the context of the Community Empowerment Bill. Clyde Gateway and other URCs have worked tirelessly and with a major degree of success to regenerate areas of abandoned, neglected or simply vacant and derelict land: this is requiring a significant effort to attract private investment and indeed public sector occupation. Clearly, in the case of URCs there has been substantial public resource put towards these regeneration initiatives and we find it bizarre that they should not have the same rights as local authorities in relation to rejecting applications for CRTB and asset transfer. If anything this underlines our view that there should be a maximum value level above which CRTB and Asset Transfer applications should not be eligible.

Other Areas of the Bill

Part 1 National Outcomes

32. Our only remark in this area is to ask how these statutory national outcomes will reconcile to the democratic process and the Scottish Parliament’s electoral cycle in particular? It would seem odd if a party(ies) is elected to government on a particular mandate but then finds it is left with a series of national outcomes that are contrary to the electoral mandate it had just secured. It may be better to stipulate that national outcomes will be set at the onset of each parliament, as proposed by the government of the day.

Part 2 Community Planning

33. The committee will know that one of the major changes to the Scottish Planning Policy passed earlier in the year is the requirement for development plans to have regard to the proposals of community planning partnerships. This Bill’s requirements go further with a broader definition of community planning and engagement in the planned delivery of local services. Local authorities are in the best position to comment on the extent of this engagement but it will be important to ensure as with all other aspects of the Bill that community groups are appropriately representative of their communities.

34. Under S5 the Bill requires that every community planning partnership ‘must’ prepare a local outcomes improvement plan. This could impose considerable support costs on a local authority and the community bodies that may make up the partnership. In many ways the requirements of this part of the Bill offer many challenges for local authorities and we will be interested to see the response of COSLA to the proposals. The stipulation of an annual report by the community planning partnership in particular is one that we fear will prove difficult to deliver consistently.

Part 6: Common Good Property

35. We think this is a good initiative and that it will help to resolve any uncertainties about parcels of land and buildings that are the subject of community speculation or private speculation. We welcome the transparency associated with the proposal.

36. S65 requires local authorities to consult with community groups that the authority knows will have an interest in a particular asset before it is considered for disposal. Again we see no problem with this approach although there may be concerns from some companies about commercial confidentiality in relation to potential purchases of common good assets. We think that the parties to such consultations should be obliged to respect such confidentiality if it is requested.

37. It would be helpful to know how this part of the Bill interacts with the CRTB process. We assume that if consulted and notified of a disposal of a common good asset that the community would be able to initiate a CTRB or an Asset transfer request.

Part 7: Allotments

38. We have no comments on Part 7.

Part 8: Local Rate Reliefs

39. During the course of engagement with the Scottish Government at the time of the Empty Property Rates legislation SPF highlighted an example of partnership working with landlords by Manchester Council, whereby the Council and local landlords contributed to rates support for businesses seeking to start up in their locality. Our members continue to highlight the burden of rates which can far outweigh rental values in many parts of Scotland and as a consequence are a major burden on start-up businesses and entrepreneurs. We support partnership arrangements and initiatives to alleviate this burden and therefore we support this part of the Bill.

What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the policy memorandum?
40. The Bill clearly impacts on property rights and this is recognised in the policy memorandum. The government argues that it interprets Article 1, protocol 1 of the ECHR as relating to rights that are not absolute and that the ‘use of property can be controlled where it is in accordance with law, justified in the public interest and is proportionate’.

41. We have no comments on this interpretation but would add the caveat that while it may well be right - and indeed the processes of compulsory purchase orders proves that this is not a new concept - then the government would also wish to maintain the high regard for property rights that is enjoyed in Scotland and the wider UK. Because of the differing member state interpretations of the ECHR Article 1, protocol 1 this cannot always be said to be true of all EU members’ and a number of UK citizens have indeed found this to be the case to their cost. It is important therefore that robust and transparent processes are formed where CRTB or asset transfer (or CPO for that matter) is involved and that proportionate and fair compensation is enjoyed by owners whose assets are compulsorily transferred to a community transfer body.

42. We find it bizarre that no mention or statement has yet been made by the Bill team or Ministers in relation to how the Bill interacts with the Crichel Down rules. The Crichel Down rules relate to the position whereby land that has been compulsorily purchased and is later to be disposed of by the relevant public authority. The rules stipulate that where this is the case the authority must first make an offer for the land in question to the former owners. CRTB and asset transfer (which is for sale or lease) process will clearly impact on the Crichel Down rules where an asset is the subject of State-enabled compulsory acquisition, yet we have seen no mention of this in the consultation or the policy memorandum. We ask the committee to seek to clarify the relationship of Crichel Down with the Bill as soon as it can during the process of parliamentary scrutiny. To fail to do so may be to set the Bill’s procedures up for challenge on grounds of wider public law principles.

43. The SPF would be pleased to answer any further enquiries from the Committee at its convenience.

Introduction

Skills Development Scotland (SDS) welcomes the opportunity to respond to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee’s scrutiny of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

SDS is Scotland’s skills body, focused on contributing to the delivery of the Scottish Government’s Economic and Skills Strategies. Our services are further shaped in response to the Scottish Government’s Career Information, Advice and Guidance Strategy and the Youth Employment Strategy. We set out our vision, future development and delivery plans in our Corporate Strategy (2012-15) and annual Operating Plan.

SDS’s key aims include the delivery of support to young people and small and medium sized businesses. SDS has a key role in supporting people towards and into employment and to progress within their jobs. SDS is working collaboratively with individuals, employers, training providers and partners throughout Scotland to raise aspirations and create a more skilled workforce and thus contribute to Scottish Government’s overarching purpose of increasing sustainable economic growth with opportunities for all to flourish.

SDS partnership work and service delivery arrangements at local level

SDS’s ambitions can only be delivered through collaboration with partners. We continue to work with national and local partners to improve, further integrate and make our services for customers more accessible and deliver them in response to their needs.

The SDS contribution to improved outcomes in Community Planning Partnership (CPP) areas is delivered through a range of resources provided on a national, regional and local level. Although SDS is not currently a member of all CPP Boards we are members of the Employability/skills related sub groups in all 32 areas.

At a local level, we currently work with local authorities and contribute to Single Outcome Agreements enabling us to translate our national offer into a local context. Going forward, we would plan to articulate our contributions to local services through the CPP local improvement plans and Youth Employment Activity Plans.

A key part of our work is the delivery of Careers Information, Advice and Guidance (CIAG) services by local staff to meet the specific needs of local areas, enabling SDS to make a significant contribution to key policy drivers such as Opportunities for All as well as wider employment and economic development priorities within each local area. Our work is augmented by offerings such as My World of Work, Scotland’s careers information and advice web service, and Our Skillsforce, our web service for employers, with information on the national and local skills support available to them from the public sector.

We are committed to the principles of shared planning and the move towards shared outcomes; our co-commissioning approach for the Employability Fund with CPP partners in each area is an example of this. Working with CPP partners aims to ensure that our provision fits with the local employability skills pipeline and complements the provision from other CPP partners in local areas in order to help improve outcomes.
Proposal for SDS to become a formal Community Planning Partner

Part two of the Bill (Community Planning) proposes that SDS formally becomes a community planning partner for the first time. SDS welcomes this. When CPPs were established, SDS was not in existence, and therefore SDS is not a core member of all CPP Boards. However, we would like to highlight that despite not being an official community planning partner in all CPPs over the last five years, SDS has been strongly committed to working with CPPs and individual partners to support the delivery of Single Outcome Agreements and optimise public sector resources to improve outcomes for local people. A move which reflects the importance that SDS places on its continued engagement with CPPs is the recent suggestion posed by our Chair to the CPP Chairs, in the areas where SDS is not currently a board member, that SDS strengthens its strategic engagement on CPP Boards, by having a senior SDS representative sit on each Board.

Although the majority of CPP boards in Scotland have invited SDS to nominate a representative to join their Board, we welcome the proposal for SDS’s inclusion as a statutory member of CPPs as this will provide more scope for SDS to input to local strategic outcomes. The provisions of the Bill would allow SDS the opportunity to work more closely, strategically and consistently with all CPPs across Scotland.

Suggested points of clarification to the Bill

Establishment of Corporate Bodies

The Bill gives CPPs powers to make an application to become a body corporate by regulations, following an application made by a LA and at least one other community planning partner in the area. As we understand it, a CPP could hold its own budgets and assets and employ its own staff. SDS would therefore welcome clarification as to whether all community planning partners would be obliged to be members of the body corporate if they were not the partner making the application with the LA, and what legal and financial obligations could be placed on community planning partners should they be amongst the members of the CPP body corporate. Any financial implications associated with the establishment of a body corporate do not appear to be taken account of in the Financial Memorandum to the Bill.

Governance

SDS welcomes the Bill’s clarification of the definitions of “Community planning”, “community planning partners” and “community planning partnerships”. However, the Bill does not clarify how CPPs should be structured and the specific membership of separate governance groups within CPPs by partners.

More specifically, there appears to currently be various approaches to CPP governance arrangements including a two-tier model involving e.g. a scrutiny group or “Board” (chaired by the Leader of the Council and including elected council members and the local commanders of fire and police) and a strategic group or “implementation/management” group (chaired by Chief Executives of the LAs).

It is unclear going forward which partners should sit on which group(s) and indeed if it is possible to sit on both, or even another separate management group or sub-group at the same time. It is important that all partners are represented on CPP subgroups, such as an implementation group, as this is where the bulk of activity will take place at a regional and local level. We believe partners should be able to sit on both the strategic and implementation groups. As an example, although SDS is more involved in operational activities and local service delivery with CPPs and other relevant partners we believe we can make a valuable contribution to the strategic direction of CPPs. SDS’s unique position as a national agency with a local remit, means that we can help other partners to look at local issues in a national context and provide a strategic perspective on how national activity can have an impact locally. We would welcome clarification of this point either in the Bill or guidance to the Bill.

Local outcomes improvement plan

SDS assumes that the aim of the Bill is to avoid the duplication of effort and resources at local level. While we welcome the proposals for each CPP to prepare a local outcomes improvement plan, as this will be a tangible plan around which to plan local service delivery, we would be grateful for clarification as to whether these plans are expected to replace the existing local Single Outcome Agreements, or if they are expected to continue to be implemented in parallel.

SDS would also value clarification, either in the Bill or in accompanying guidance, as to who will have responsibility for final sign-off of the local outcomes improvement plan and its annual report, and how all CPP partners (and community interest groups) will be invited to comment and agree upon it, in order to ensure all views are taken into account.

Duties on community planning partners

The Bill places responsibilities on community planning partners, including the obligation for each community planning partner to provide the partnership with information about local outcomes in the plan. SDS has existing management information reporting arrangements in place which meet SDS’s individual business needs and our ability to produce reports are constrained by the functionality of the systems we already have in place. We would welcome further clarification as to what our duties, and other partners, will be in terms of the provision of information to the CPP and whether this may have financial implications for SDS. The Financial Memorandum does not appear to take account of any additional costs which may be incurred by community planning partners as a result of having to comply with this duty.

Conclusion

SDS is delighted that the Bill recognises the valuable contribution we can make to community planning by being proposed as a statutory community planning partner; this would allow SDS to formally engage in CPPs and integrated planning work at local level across Scotland for the first time. At the heart of the Bill is the intention for appropriate community bodies to be given the opportunity to, and be encouraged to, participate in community planning by the CPP, and crucially, that CPPs should have to take steps to enable them to participate to the extent they wish to. SDS welcomes this positive, inclusive approach to community engagement, as well as the proposal for a structured approach to the agreement of measurable local outcome plans. We look forward to receiving feedback on the clarification of the points we have raised about the Bill over the course of its scrutiny.

<td>Question 1</td>
<td>To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?</td>
<td>N/A</td>
<td>Community representation on CPPs already exists in many areas, through the funding requirements of third sector interfaces and other routes ie community councils, community land and youth. The Bill will ensure that the Partners have a duty to engage with community bodies which, where participation within CPPs has not previously taken place and may help a more meaningful input from the communities. Enabling communities to have a direct input into the CPP, will influence and shape local outcomes and improvement plans.</td>
<td>Community Organisations will have an opportunity to instigate service improvement reviews where they feel services could be improved. Though currently a community organisation could challenge an outcome there is no formal process for doing so. Knowledge of the legislation may prompt community bodies to make participation requests. Some communities will only be able to take advantage of this legislation if they are supported through the process. Unfortunately it maybe those community bodies who feel most disadvantaged already who are least likely to be able to undertake the participation request process. Communities will only be able to take advantage of the legislation if there is awareness about the opportunity.</td>
<tr>
<td>Question 2</td>
<td>What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?</td>
<td>The process outlined within the Bill is similar to what happens in practice already and so there will be no additional benefits or disadvantages.</td>
<td>Benefits: For some partners the provisions within the Bill will only strengthen their current involvement and commitment to the CPP and delivery of local outcomes. One of the benefits of the Bill will be to ensure that all partners are responsible for delivering the outcomes and will take an active role within the community planning process. Disadvantages: For those partners who have a national remit there might be issues with ability to respond at the local level. For those partners who have thus far not engaged fully in the CPP processes there may be additional resources required to enable full participation.</td>
<td>Benefits: Public Sector Organisations may benefit from having an external view of their service. Community input into the outcomes can bring benefit and change that will improve outcomes for communities. Disadvantages: The potential disadvantages may be an increase in workload through unplanned service reviews and the resultant diversion of activities from service delivery.</td>

<td>Question 3</td>
<td>Do you consider communities across Scotland have the capabilities to take advantage of the provisions in the Bill? If not, what responses are required to be done to the Bill, or to assist communities, to ensure this happens?</td>
<td>N/A</td>
<td>In the main Community Bodies within the local authority area have the capability to participate within community planning, and locally already do so. There might be training issues for some community bodies</td>
<td>Community Organisations across Scotland will vary in their capacity to participate both on a skills level and resource level. Some Community organisations will not have the skills needed to enable them to take advantage of the opportunities the Bill provides and to enable them to engage constructively in the process. This will require an allocation of resources which may prove difficult to identify. There will be a need to raise awareness of the Bill and the various opportunities it offers.</td>

<tr>
<td>Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?</td>
<td>The National Outcomes are of extreme importance. We would submit that there should be some further detail in respect of the process for the creation and review of the National Outcomes; we note that there is provision under s.12(2) for Ministers to consult those persons “as they consider appropriate”, there should be greater transparency around this consultation. We would suggest it should include those persons listed as Community Planning Partners per Schedule 1 of the Bill, and possibly the Integration Authorities following implementation of the Integration of Health and Social Care services; at the very least, the Bill and ultimately the Act should provide that Ministers may prescribe by Regulations those persons that must be consulted with in the creation and review of National outcomes, and those Regulations should be consulted upon.</td>
<td>There should be a definition of &quot;Local Outcomes&quot;; s.13 refers to a definition of same as being in s.4(3) (which intern refers to s.4(2), but there should be a clearer definition as to scope. s.14 of the Bill refers to Community Controlled Bodies; in addition to the definition criteria provided, it would be helpful to have a definition of “community” i.e. as to whether this has to be geographical and if so, within the Local Authority area, or indeed whether it could be a community of common interests - eg for particular types of care services/disability. The definition criteria in s.14 should also include a requirement that the body has in place provision for the dissolution of the body as constituted and specifically how assets/liabilities and obligations of that body are to be dealt with in the event of it’s dissolution. Schedule 1 should include representation of the Social Housing Sector, which sector plays a vital role in communities; if not generally then it should be mandatorily included for those Local Authority areas which have completed a Housing Stock Transfer. We are aware of the opportunity to include others within the CP process, but suggest it would be useful if the Housing Sector was asked with the complementary obligations to engage as other CP partners. Schedule 1 should also include local colleges within Island Local Authorities, which have similar status as regional colleges elsewhere. Schedule 1 should also include Community Land bodies where there has been a Community Right to Buy completed.</td>

<td>The retention or even acquisition of land for the purposes of providing allotments would seem contrary to the spirit of Part 5 of the Bill, which is about increasing community involvement in making the best use of heritable assets. Additionally, it should be noted that the nature of land ownership in islands communities means that much is in private or community ownership with the local authority owning very little heritable estate. It would maximise opportunities if Part 7 was drafted permissively and more widely in scope to include the provision of allotments not just by ownership or lease by the Local Authority but also by arrangement with Community Land Owners and others whereby those bodies would have the right and responsibilities pertaining to provision of allotments, as envisaged; this would further enhance community participation, empowerment and benefit with regard to the provision of allotments. The provisions should not be drafted in such a way as to require the Local Authority to provide allotments, but at most to use reasonable endeavours to provide them, for the reasons referred to above: where the local authority has no suitable land within it's ownership it is within the Local Authority's control to acquire land for this purpose, without the risk of the public purse being held to ransom by private land owners. The drafting of subsections 72(1) and (2) do not appear to sit comfortably with one another.</td>
<td>The Policy Memorandum outlines the assessment of equal rights and though an EQIA has been undertaken it is identified policies implemented at a local level may also have to undertake EQIAs. Though the legislation proposes to ensure further empowerment of communities there might be concern that minority groups are further excluded from the benefits of the Bill and may be unable to take advantage of the changes due to lack of capacity and skills. The question of whose responsibility it is to ensure the communities have the capacity, knowledge and skills to take up the opportunities in the Bill, is not addressed at this stage but that would need to be addressed in future guidance. Pleased that it has been recognised that the island communities may have to have a different approach to implementation. Suggestions have been made in relation to question 4 about how this could be further enhanced to ensure that communities can respond appropriately to the spirit of the bill in a way that meets the situations that are particular to island authorities</td>

COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL (as introduced)

Submission by the Federation of City Farms and Community Gardens (Scotland) (FCFCG) to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee of the Scottish Parliament

FCFCG is a registered charity which supports, represents and promotes community-managed farms, gardens, allotments and other green spaces, creating opportunities for local communities to grow. We work with community groups to help empower local people of all ages, backgrounds and abilities to build better communities, and to make a positive impact on their surrounding environment. The FCFCG is a UK wide organisation, and in Scotland has over 70 community gardens and city farms as members, and several more groups and organisations who we work with and support through our network.

Part 2 – Community Planning

We welcome the measures relating to Community Planning. However, the principles underlying (Section 4 (5)) are more in line with community involvement than community empowerment, in that the community planning partnership has the power to decide which community bodies can take part in community planning. This is similarly the case for Section 5 (3)(a) which gives power to the community planning partnership to decide who should be consulted. To increase the level of involvement of the community/voluntary sector in the community planning process, Schedule 1 could include a representative organisation of this sector.

Part 3 – Participation Requests

Participation requests have the potential to empower communities. These give the opportunity for community groups to request to improve outcomes relating to use and upkeep of open spaces which are owned by relevant public service authorities. This might in some cases involve a proposal that the community group take over maintenance of the space from the authority or the authority’s private sector maintenance contractors. Several of our members, including Urban Roots in South Glasgow, and Granton Community Gardeners in North Edinburgh provide examples of how members of a community are transforming areas of ground which the local authority previously struggled to maintain against fly-tipping, dog fouling and other anti-social behaviour.

We welcome the extension of the right to buy to urban areas, and support the right for communities to buy neglected or abandoned land. We would also like to see an absolute right for communities to use land, including neglected or abandoned land, not just to buy it. In our experience, this would benefit many more people than just a right to buy as most of our members are not interested in/able to buy their land. It might also provide a temporary solution in areas where land is not “neglected” or “abandoned”, it is just currently unused.
Following on from this, we are supportive of the proposals for Participation Requests (Section 17) and Asset transfer requests (Section 52) as these support the right for communities to use land, without taking ownership, for purposes such as growing. We are however concerned that these proposals only relate to land owned by those public bodies listed in Schedule 2 and 3 to the Bill, and so do not include land owned by other public bodies or do anything to promote meanwhile use of privately owned land. There are also certain public sector landowners whose functions and governance are reserved to Westminster (such as the Ministry of Defence or Network Rail), who do not appear on Schedule 2 and 3 to the Bill, and so limit the community benefits that might be realised from the use of this land.

Part 6 - Common Good Property

We are pleased to see the proposal for better information available to the public as to what is or is not common good property. The information should be in a clear language accessible to the lay person and state what the rules are as to what may or may not be common good and also what the rules on alienation and appropriation to other uses are.

The rules on common good are a two-edged sword so far as community growing initiatives are concerned. On the one hand, they tend to protect unbuilt land from development and, where a growing project can be established on common good land, help to support its long-term future. However, where the community use is or may be an appropriation to another use, or where a proposed agreement between Council and community group may be considered an alienation, the common good rules stand as a barrier to agreements for community use and also fear of challenge and criticism may inhibit Councils from considering beneficial proposals.

Part 7 – Allotments

Allotments, and other forms of community gardening, can be an important hub for community activity and contribute to empowerment. We welcome the clear re-statement of allotment law and the provisions which will hopefully help to increase local authority provision of allotments and other growing spaces.

In order to remove barriers to allotment growing, we would like to see an additional provision that no separate planning consent is needed for structures such as sheds and polytunnels on allotment sites (they are usually permitted developments when within the curtilage of a dwelling). The current system is expensive and time consuming for poorly resourced community groups. If such features have been permitted and regulated by the local authority within site management regulations (Section 73(4)(a) – (c)), we do not think that a separate planning application should be required.

We are pleased to see that the proposed new duty of local authorities to prepare a food growing strategy involves identification of areas of land suitable for other forms of community growing as well as allotments. All forms of community gardening create community benefits and enhance empowerment, and in some cases other cultivation approaches may be preferable to allotments, for example where a site is small, awkwardly shaped, contaminated or only available for a short period. As the Bill’s proposed new definition of “allotment” restricts it to ground owned or tenanted by the local authority, this approach also means the strategy will take into account what are presently termed “private allotments”; those leased from a private sector landlord.

We propose that food growing strategies also identify gaps in training requirements for allotment and community gardening. At the moment, there is a significant shortage of skills relevant to food growing in a community context. Providing training is therefore essential to a thriving community growing sector, and there is untapped horticultural expertise in many traditional allotment sites and community gardens. Consideration as to how this training is resourced should also be made in the food growing strategy.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions of the Bill?

Studies have shown that communities can be very efficient and effective at running services, and can save public money in the long run using preventative spending. For example, the FCFCG’s Social Return on Investment (SROI) analysis of the Community Gardening Project at Gorgie City Farm in Edinburgh shows that for every pound invested in the project, £3.56 in social value is generated. There may also be more immediate benefits to Public Bodies in the transfer of ownership or management of land in terms of reduced costs for maintenance and repairs, especially following anti-social behaviour and fly-tipping on neglected or abandoned sites. Understanding the relationship between public body and community as being one in which the later provides a benefit to the former and not vice versa is also helpful to countering any argument that the transaction may be subject to the European State Aid rules.

For the Bill to be effective, communities need support to build capacity to manage changes to the legislation, including with the assets they acquire or use, and in engaging with community planning partnerships and food growing strategies. Therefore the CE (Scotland) Bill needs to be properly resourced, with a dedicated funding programme (in a similar way to the Climate Challenge Fund accompanying the Climate Change (Scotland) Act, or the Scottish Land Fund accompanying the Land Reform Act).

Such a fund could include loans and grants for the acquisition or management of land and/or assets. Timescales for applications and decisions should take into consideration the timescales stated in the legislation regarding decision and transfer periods. This fund could also include a knowledge transfer and capacity building element such that community groups can visit and learn from other community groups, as well as benefit from support from a range of intermediary organisations offering training and capacity building. There is also a role for intermediary organisations to support community groups with: impartial advice, mediation, and engagement with public bodies.

FCFCG receives several enquiries a week from our members and other organisations for support on community growing projects. The knowledge transfer fund that was available for projects to use to visit other projects was effective in connecting groups and building capacity. Introducing a similar scheme would help to empower communities through connections and skills development. FCFCG also delivers in depth training through the Community Garden Starter Pack which covers a range of essential considerations for community groups when considering setting up a new community growing space. The availability of resources and training such as this will be essential support for groups wanting to establish new community gardens and allotments in a new legislative framework.
Oxfam response to Local Government Committee and Regeneration Committee’s call for evidence on the Community Empowerment Bill

Oxfam works to overcome poverty at home and abroad. In Scotland we do this in three ways: we work with community groups and people living in poverty to develop projects, improve lives and show how things can change; we raise public awareness of poverty to create pressure for change; and we work with policy makers to tackle the causes of poverty.

We welcome the opportunity to give evidence to the Committee on the Community Empowerment Bill. While supportive of many of the proposals contained in the Bill, we do have a general concern that by empowering the already empowered, the Bill could in fact accentuate, rather than reduce, inequalities.

To address this we believe the Bill, subsequent guidance and related Government strategies and activities need to give more focus to addressing poverty and inequality. As well as providing legislative rights to communities and removing barriers to engagement, we need to provide resources to – and build capacity in – our most deprived communities.

Oxfam’s specific proposals include, ensuring:

- The national outcomes – currently reflected in Scotland Performs – are developed through a genuinely participative process.
- The national standards for community engagement are placed on a statutory footing.
- Community Planning Partnerships develop their local outcomes improvement plans through a genuinely participative process that reaches out to the most deprived communities.
- Participation requests are strengthened by ensuring deprived communities are aware of their rights, supported to access their rights and are able to appeal against decisions.
- Participatory budgeting is taken forward across Scotland.

We also support the submission produced in collaboration with Barnardo’s Scotland, the Poverty Alliance and supported by a range of other organisations entitled ‘Strengthening the Community Empowerment Bill to empower every community in Scotland’.

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

Several of the proposals in the Bill could, potentially, empower communities. This includes Parts 2 and 3 on community planning and participation requests, which along with Part 1 are of particular interest to Oxfam. We believe the Bill provides an opportunity to further community empowerment in Scotland.

Our main concern is that unless a concerted effort and specific resources are provided to engage and support our most deprived communities, the Bill may:

a) Allow better-off communities to utilise the various mechanisms contained in the legislation to become more empowered, thereby accentuating inequalities.

b) Fail to ensure that public sector planning and service delivery is designed with our most deprived communities at the forefront, thereby reducing inequalities and prioritising prevention.

We would also question the statement contained in the Policy Memorandum that:

"The Scottish Government is clear that it is important that community voices are heard in public sector processes, but that this engagement differs from community empowerment, where communities lead change for themselves."

While recognising that there is a difference between community led activity and public sector led engagement with the community, we do not see any reason why genuinely participative processes initiated or funded by the public sector – such as participatory budgeting – cannot also be empowering for our communities.

Below we outline some specific proposals to ensure we empower all of Scotland’s communities.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

If significantly improved, many of the provisions in the Bill could lead to greater involvement of people and communities in the design and delivery of plans and services. Given that public services that involve their users, and Governments which involve their citizens, are likely to be of higher quality and be more responsive to the people they seek to serve, this would lead to better outcomes for the communities and public sector organisations.

Oxfam believes there is significant potential to improve the Bill in relation to Community Planning. The Policy Memorandum states local outcomes improvement plans should “provide a clear plan for place, focused on prevention and reducing inequalities.” Yet the Bill provides no comfort or guarantee that this will be the case. We suggest that as well as core duties for CPP partners to participate in CPPs, the Bill needs to ensure that the core purpose – and starting point – of CPPs should be to strengthen their engagement with the local community. Such a process of community engagement needs to be undertaken when developing local outcomes improvement plans and could be modelled on the participative approach embedded with the Oxfam Humankind Index.

Oxfam’s Humankind Index for Scotland aimed to find out what really matters to people, particularly the most disadvantaged. Developed through widespread public consultation, including focus groups, community workshops, street stalls and an online survey, the Oxfam Humankind Index enables Scotland to measure itself by those aspects of life that make a real difference to people, particularly the most disadvantaged. The factors or ‘sub-domains’ that make up the index are detailed in the table below:

These priorities are matched with Scotland-wide data indicators (from a range of sources including the Scottish Household Survey and the Scottish Social Attitudes Survey) allowing progress against the Oxfam Humankind Index to be measured. This shows that efforts to create nuanced performance frameworks – which embed the genuine priorities of individuals and communities – is possible. More importantly however, it shows that communities and individuals can define what matters to them in a way which is often very different to the priorities of policy-makers.

Of course, what is important to people will differ from area to area, so it is crucial that outcomes are decided by the community for the community. We believe the Oxfam Humankind Index could be replicated for each of the 32 CPPs. Such a process would, as well as identifying what the community thinks is important, have the added benefit of building common ownership of CPPs across statutory partners and community bodies, ensuring CPPs are not simply seen as a local authority led exercise. It also meets many, if not all, of the principles for stronger democracy outlined in the recent Commission for Strengthening Local Democracy report.iii

Specific, additional concerns around Part 2 on Community Planning

In addition to our comments above, we have some specific concerns with the draft legislation:

Section 5 (3) states that: “In preparing the local outcomes improvement plan a community planning partnership must – consult such community bodies as it considers appropriate”. We are concerned about this reference to “consult” and believe this should be strengthened so that community bodies and others participate in the initial process of co-producing the local outcomes improvement plan.

We have a slight concern that certain, admittedly well-meaning, sections of the legislation that aim to increase community engagement in community planning could lead to ‘box ticking’ consultations. For example section 4 (5) seeks to ‘secure the participation of appropriate community bodies in community planning, and to take steps to enable them to participate to the extent they wish to’. While this is not a concern in and of itself – and reference to participation rather than consultation is welcome – we believe that there needs to be a recognition that the ultimate beneficiaries of Community Planning are individuals. While many community bodies do an excellent job of representing individuals, some don’t. There is a risk that CPPs will simply consult a couple of third sector groups and tick the ‘community consulted’ box. While community bodies, the voluntary and third sector are a crucial plank in reaching individuals, we must not lose sight of the main aim of benefiting the lives of individuals and this should be reflected within the provisions of the Bill.

No, we do not consider that all communities in Scotland have the capabilities to take advantage of the provisions in the Bill. In addition to our comments relating to Community Planning outlined above, we believe a number of further measures should be taken:

National Standards for Community Engagement

The Policy Memorandum states: “There is a strong history of the public sector engaging with communities across Scotland. In particular, local authorities have used a variety of engagement methods over the years and have promoted the use of tools like the National Standards for Community Engagement (Communities Scotland, 2005 – now available, with support materials,
Local Government and Regeneration Committee

Submission Name: Oxfam Scotland Submission Number: 127

from the Scottish Community Development Centre). The Scottish Government sets clear expectations that all public sector organisations must engage with communities and support their participation in setting priorities and in the design and delivery of services.”

While this is welcome, as the Audit Scotland report into Community Planning stated: “there is a long way to go before the potential of local people to participate, shape and improve local services is realised”.

We believe the Bill provides an opportunity to place the national standards for community engagement on a statutory basis. This would ensure that during the development of the National Outcomes (Part 1) and Local Outcomes Improvement Plans (Part 2) best practice in community engagement is adhered to.

Such a proposal seems to chime with the Commission for Strengthening Local Democracy report, which states: “The right of individuals and communities to local democracy needs legislative expression through a clear duty in law to support and resource participation in decision making. Democratic innovations such as deliberative assemblies, participatory budgeting and citizen scrutiny of public services should also become the standards by which this is delivered in Scotland”.

Socio-economic and community wellbeing assessments

In order to ensure that the priorities of the Scottish Government and Community Planning Partnerships do not accentuate inequalities, we believe there needs to be a specific socio-economic impact assessment applying to the National Outcomes and Local Outcomes Improvement Plans.

We also believe that for Local outcomes improvement plans to provide a genuinely “clear plan for place, focused on prevention and reducing inequalities” (as stated in the Policy Memorandum) there needs to be an assessment of: which communities make up the local area; who comprises the most vulnerable, excluded or ‘seldom-heard’ communities within the local area; and an analysis of future trends. Such an assessment, which would be undertaken before an engagement exercise to determine local outcome improvement plans, could be modelled on the Welsh ‘Future Generations’ Bill.

4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

Below we set out various concerns and proposals in relation to Parts 1 and 3 of the Bill as well as specific proposals for Participatory Budgeting.

Part 1 - National Outcomes

Oxfam have been involved in a series of Round Table meetings chaired by the Cabinet Secretary for Finance, John Swinney MSP. These have been informal gatherings of interested and relevant individuals and organisations to share views and ideas on Scotland Performs. The Carnegie Trust, nef, Scottish Environment LINK and members from all parties across the Chamber have been involved. The group is exploring ways in which the presentation and coverage of Scotland Performs can be improved along with considering how best to engage with both the public and the Parliament. As such we welcome the proposals to put the National Outcomes on a statutory footing.

However, we do have some concerns in relation to the proposals – not in relation to the work of the roundtable, which from our point of view has been an extremely positive engagement exercise – but in the context of Part 1 of the Community Empowerment Bill.

There is very little in the Bill that would require Ministers to ensure that the National Outcomes are produced through a genuinely participative exercise. If the National Outcomes are to be the core focus of what Government is working to then it is essential that those outcomes are shaped and determined in collaboration by those who will be affected – the people living and working in Scotland. In the same manner as we believe Community Planning Partnerships should undertake an exercise like the Oxfam Humankind Index we also believe this should apply to the Scottish Government; it should lead by example. Similarly, it should also embed the national standards for community engagement and undertake a socio-economic impact assessment.

We would also comment on the Policy Memorandum which suggests that the starting point for the Bill is delivering the Scottish Government’s core purpose: “to focus government and public services on creating a more successful country, with opportunities for all of Scotland to flourish, through increasing sustainable economic growth.” To Oxfam, this seems to be a bit back-to-front. Our experience from the Oxfam Humankind Index is that for engagement exercises to be genuinely empowering they need to ask open-ended questions about what matters to people and work forward from there. A genuinely participative process to determine the National Outcomes would start by asking people what they thought the core purpose of Government should be, rather than be asked to support a purpose they had little opportunity to influence.

Part 3 - Participation requests

We welcome the proposals for participation requests and asset transfer requests. While recognising that these are generally rights to ‘request’/seek permission, they could lead to helpful processes that allow communities greater influence over the direction of public services and the use of assets. We also welcome the manner in which communities are self-defined in this and other parts of the Bill. This recognises that communities are somewhat subjective entities and at times are conflicting, porous, and almost indefinable.

Having said this we have two significant concerns with the participation requests.

Firstly, there is no mechanism(s) in the Bill to support our most deprived communities take up participation requests. This is particularly important given that more than half the people living in Scotland’s most deprived 20% of areas report difficulties in improving local circumstances, compared to less than one-third of people in the least deprived areas. Participation requests therefore risk becoming the privilege of already empowered communities with greater capacity to access, navigate and resource such a process. Consideration should be given to how public bodies can provide clear information and potentially financial resource in relation to participation requests – particularly to deprived communities. Section 9 (3) (b) recognises that funds and resources may be necessary for ensuring the engagement of community bodies in community planning and we see no reason why this shouldn’t be the case in relation to participation requests. As such, the Bill should actively remove barriers to engagement.

Secondly, there is no ability to appeal a decision should a participation request be rejected. This seems particularly strange given that a form of appeals and reviews are available for asset transfer requests (through section 58 and 59). We propose that an independent review process be included in relation to participation requests – with a clear route outlined.

Given that part 3 effectively confers a right to request to participate, we suggest that the Scottish Human Rights Commission (SHRC) may be an appropriate body to adjudicate such appeal, recognising that this may require some changes to the responsibilities and functions of the SHRC.

Finally, to ensure that more focus is given to our most deprived communities we believe socio-economic poverty and inequality should be listed under the matters to be considered in reaching a decision in section 19 (3).

Participatory Budgeting

If the aim of community empowerment is to increase the amount of influence or control that communities have over assets and resources and, if public sector spend can be seen as one of those assets (often the most substantial asset in the least advantaged communities), then it follows that communities should have a greater role in deciding how funds should be applied.

One such mechanism for increasing community control of assets and resources is Participatory Budgeting, recognised internationally as a means by which local people can have a direct say in how and where public funds can be best used to address local requirements. In recent years Participatory Budgeting has been used on a small scale in Scotland and there is some evidence to suggest that its application has been catalytic in increasing local democratic participation and community involvement, leading to stronger and more cohesive communities.\textsuperscript{viii}

We propose that community planning partnerships budgets should go towards participatory budgeting.

5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy Memorandum?

The Policy Memorandum states that empowerment is an important part of a human rights approach. That is welcome. It is also why we believe far greater focus needs to be given to efforts to ensure that the most deprived communities are assisted to make their voice heard.

We would also comment that protected characteristics under the Equality Act don’t include socio-economic factors. Far greater emphasis needs to be given to this if poverty and inequality are to be acknowledged and every community is able to benefit from the measures contained in the Community Empowerment Bill. As mentioned previously, socio-economic impact assessments could be looked at in this context.

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

The Chartered Institute of Logistics and Transport is the leading professional body representing the supply of freight and passenger transport services. Our membership includes many of Scotland’s most successful community organisations which provide community transport services, community hubs, retail, employability programmes, parcel collection and distribution points, patient and social work transport, and many other related services.

We have been keen supporters of the Community Planning processes which have been managed across Scotland over the last decade and share the government’s concern about weak delivery of the 32 Community Plans. Most of the current Plans identify barriers which communities face accessing essential opportunities and services, but links to effective funded programmes are only partially made. In many cases the relationship is therefore not clear between the Community Plan and the investment which is made in logistics and transport systems.

Our scrutiny of the Bill has therefore viewed the plans through the lens of how much practical delivery of much needed community connections will be enhanced as a result of the new legislation. In particular we have asked whether the Bill becoming an Act will overcome long standing barriers which have frustrated community based delivery. Our answers are below under each of the questions asked in the Committee’s Call for Evidence.

Managing the Transition from Community Aims to Practical Delivery

Q1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

The plans for managed delivery of outcomes are very welcome. We would expect that these will become increasingly important in organising local delivery of community based transport and logistics. This will encourage a wider range of enterprises to become involved.

We recognise the difficulties that commercial and social enterprises have faced in the past when engaging with Community Planning. Therefore the Act needs to be accompanied with guidance and training to explain how enterprises, including all parts of the business community, can be more involved. The explanatory notes refer to co-design approaches, and a similar expansion of how to deliver co-production of transport solutions would be very beneficial to follow through to delivery.

The powers to establish corporate bodies are very welcome. The long standing problems which have been experienced overcoming barriers to more efficient social transport delivery may well be overcome by setting up new corporate bodies offering third party social transport services. We cannot see any problems with the proposed legislation being used in this way, but it would be worth working through the details of some of the logistics and transport objectives of Community Plans to ensure that the Act includes all of the necessary provisions to secure delivery. The lack of logistics and transport examples in the policy memorandum contrast with other policy areas where there appears to have been more attention paid to details. Ensuring that the details are clear at this stage will be important to ensure that the Bill empowers communities to make the necessary connections.

Q2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

There are great opportunities for public sector organisations to demonstrate their community leadership role, and threats for public sector organisations that perceive themselves as having a monopoly on building stronger communities.

We welcome the widening of the definition of community to make it easier for communities to define their community in a greater variety of ways, not just by postcode. This will now include many types of transport body working to make local connections.

However the business relationships that define the ability of a community to deliver socially desirable changes involves supply chains that cross geographical boundaries. If we look at a typical community transport operation then their activities interface at many geographical levels and across public and private sectors. Access to hospital is identified as a problem in many Community Plans but action to date through these Plans to overcome the problems has been weak. Successful delivery ‘communities’ include elements of nationally funded programmes such as the services of the Scottish Ambulance Service, alongside local authority, community and private providers of health transport services, including for high care transport. Some public sector organisations may perceive disadvantages from working with this broader community but the advantages of doing so will greatly exceed the costs as pilot projects have shown.

If a Community Plan in one local authority area identifies gaps in access, but these issues are not recognised in the Community Plans of other areas who need to be involved in overcoming problems, then there will need to be mechanisms for resolving these differences of perspective. These mechanisms could include arbitration proceedings or hearings to determine whether the proposed community action was reasonable. If community organisations do not think they will be treated fairly when these conflicts need resolution then they will not be empowered.

Mind the gap

Q3. Do you consider communities across Scotland have the capabilities to take advantage of the provisions in the Bill? If not, what requires to be done to the Bill, or to assist communities, to ensure this happens?

In order to breed a better understanding between communities and the statutory bodies there is a big cultural gap to overcome. Participating in dozens of meetings will stifle the involvement of doers, and there is a real danger that the new procedures for action plans and progress reporting could lead to “death by planning”. There will need to be pathfinder projects in the logistics and transport sector to demonstrate how the new powers can be used to overcome old problems.
Public bodies are highly skilled at ensuring that only optimal delivery approaches are delivered. Community activists are highly skilled at making good things happen, whether or not they are the optimal solutions. Under the proposed Act the Community Plan should be able to frame the good things needed, whilst ensuring social and political accountability, but whether it can achieve this without stifling community energy is perhaps the greatest challenge for Community Planning.

There are many examples over the last decade where innovative joint working solutions have been designed but when faced with the narrower accountability structures of public bodies they have failed to be sustained leading to losses in both efficiency and effectiveness over time.

Q4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

As noted above the specific provisions of the Bill need to be worked through with specific examples to check how delivery might work in practice for projects like community logistics hubs, social transport, social transport commitments, managed improvements in access to fresh food and many of the types of projects that have been suggested through Community Planning but have failed to overcome obstacles to delivery due to a lack of community empowerment.

Q5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

When assessing community need there are four essential lenses needed for the outcome measures: stated need, social needs, expressed need and comparative/distributional needs. There are weaknesses in many of the current outcome measures being used by authorities as they rely excessively on measures of stated and expressed need which tends to benefit wealthy groups who demand the most.

More attention is needed to understanding social benefits and how these are distributes.

Conclusion

Logistics and transport connects up the economy and society and needs to be enabled by the new Act, as much as for the current focus in the policy memorandum on people and places. The broad definition of community is welcome, but it is difficult to see how the Act will be worked through in practical delivery. As part of the scrutiny of the Bill, the detail of the community empowerment enabled through the Bill should be explained for desirable projects such as community hubs, social transport services, community parcel delivery and other logistics and transport provision identified as needed in Community Plans. Without this detail there is a danger that the Bill may not enable as intended if some barriers still cannot be overcome.

Derek Halden, Policy Lead, CILT (Scotland)

5 September 2014
We thank the Committee for the opportunity to present evidence on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. Our response to question 4 is as follows:

4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

4.1 Types of community body

There seems to be room for confusion over what type of community body can do what and potential for overlap between the various community bodies. As drafted the Bill provides for 6 different types of community body as follows:

1. “Community bodies” in relation to a community planning partnership means bodies, whether or not formally constituted, established for purposes which consist of or include that of promoting or improving the interests of any communities (however described) resident or otherwise present in the area of the local authority for which the community planning partnership is carrying out community planning (Section 4(8)).

2. A “community participation body” which includes a community-controlled body, a community council and a body designated as such which may make a request to a public service authority to participate in an outcome improvement process (Section 15)

3. A “community controlled body” (body corporate or unincorporated) which may also be a community participation body (Section 14)

4. A “community body” which is a company limited by guarantee and / or an SCIO which may register an interest in land (Section 28)
5. A Part 3A community body which is a company limited by guarantee which may apply for consent to buy neglected and abandoned land (Section 48)

6. A “community transfer body” which is a community council and/or an incorporated or unincorporated body designated as such by the Scottish Ministers which may make an asset transfer to a relevant authority (Section 50)

We would question whether it is necessary to have so many different types of community body. Do the community bodies which become involved in community planning include all of the bodies listed above?

We would also query the lack of consistency for the requirements for different bodies. For example, it would appear that an SCIO may be a community body under Part 2 of the Land Reform (S) Act 2003 (“the 2003 Act”) but not under the proposed Part 3A. Is there a reason for this distinction? If the number of community bodies is to remain as it is at present in terms of the Bill, we would suggest that clear guidance on how each body may be constituted and what they can and cannot do should be issued for the benefit of lay persons.

4.2 Amendments to Part 2 of the 2003 Act

4.2.1 Extension of Community Right to Buy to Urban Land

Our understanding of Part 2 of the 2003 Act is that it sought to achieve aims specific to rural land. The justification for the community right to buy was specific to rural areas. The Policy Memorandum states that “A key reason given for the extension to urban land was to provide people living in urban areas with the same rights as those in rural areas”. Whilst we appreciate community ownership brings benefits to a community, there are specific reasons why the rural community right to buy was justified and we have concerns about simply extending the right to buy to urban areas for the purposes of symmetry.

Given that urban land is more likely to be developed, if the community right to buy is extended to urban property, it will be necessary to put safeguards in place to ensure that it is not used to stifle the development plans of competitors.

4.2.2 Extension of Time Period to 8 Months

In terms of the draft Bill, community bodies are to be given 8 months to buy a property. The sale and purchase of a typical commercial property would be completed well within such timescales. The owner of a property subject to a right to buy who intended to sell on the open market faces a delay of up to 6 months in situations where they may need the sale proceeds to settle bank debt or fund business expansion.

The community bodies which have successfully used the legislation to purchase land have proven that it is possible to complete the transaction within 8 months. We would therefore question why it is necessary to extend the time period, thus increasing the burden on the landowner. Our understanding is that any infringement of the landowner’s Article 1 Protocol must be proportionate and we consider that the extension of the time frame reduces the proportionality of the community right to buy.

4.2.3 Amendments to “late” applications

“Late” applications permit a community body to register an interest in land once the land has been marketed. This concession interferes with the live land market and so the circumstances in which a “late” application are to be permitted should be restricted as much as possible.

The amendments to section 39 of the 2003 Act appear to dilute the criteria required. In particular, the requirement to show “good reasons” why the application was not submitted prior to the land being put on the market is replaced with a requirement to show that an application was prepared or steps have been taken towards community ownership prior to the land being put on the market. Whilst we appreciate that this test would prevent community bodies who are simply reacting to the land being put on the market from registering an interest, our view is that community bodies should be obliged to explain why an application was not submitted prior to the land being put on the market. Otherwise, this amendment to the criteria for “late” applications could make some landowners wary of putting land on the market for fear of “triggering” community interest.

4.2.4 Cost of independent valuation

The Bill reserves the right for Ministers to recover the valuation costs from a landowner if he withdraws from a sale where a community body had planned to buy his property. Market conditions or personal circumstances may have changed in the additional time required to complete a sale to a community body and so we would hope that this discretion is exercised with care.

4.3 Part 3A - Right to buy neglected and abandoned land

We appreciate that land which is left abandoned/neglected can be a barrier to sustainable development. However, we do not consider that the only solution to this perceived problem is the transfer of land to community bodies and would question whether Part 3A is necessary when local authorities have existing powers of compulsory purchase. The Policy Memorandum confirms that this concern was also raised by local government respondents during the consultation periods.

If it is considered that control of land by community bodies is the best means of achieving sustainable development, the community could be given the chance to lease the property in the first instance. The lease could be for a period of 5 years with an option to purchase the land at the end of that period. This would give the community a fair chance to see if they can make the property work for them and pass the test of sustainable development.

The lease could be for a nominal rent provided the community undertook to make improvements to the property. If the community found that it didn’t work out, the lease could come to an end and the community could remove all equipment and fittings belonging to them and, where appropriate, seek alternative premises. If the community found that they did make a success of the project operating from the property, they could exercise the option to purchase the property at the end of the lease.

4.3.1 Definition of Abandoned and Neglected Land

We note with concern that the Bill contains no substantive provisions regarding the definition of neglected or abandoned land. Leaving the definitions of neglected and abandoned land to the discretion of Ministers and only setting out factors which may be taken into account leaves much uncertainty for all concerned with what may or may not be abandoned and neglected land. This may discourage purchasers from buying land which may be deemed abandoned and neglected if they do not plan to develop or use that land straight away.

We also question whether it will be possible to frame guidance on neglected and abandoned land in regulations which provides sufficient legal certainty. Landowners must be able to look at the regulations and identify whether their land falls within the definition of “neglected” or “abandoned”. They would want to know, for example, how long a property must have been left vacant and unused to be deemed to be abandoned. They would also want reassurance that certain types of property would not be deemed to be abandoned or neglected. For example, there are many examples of rural land which may look abandoned to the naked eye but in fact have deliberately been left as such for agricultural purposes. Some farm buildings may also seem neglected but still be in operation or part of long term plans for the farm. We would hope that Ministers would not consent to the sale of such property.
We note that there is a provision seeking to exclude an individual's home from the provisions. We support this exclusion and, given the protection afforded to a person’s private and family life in terms of the European Convention on Human Rights, consider it to be significant. We are however wary that this exclusion is also subject to further regulation.

It is our understanding of section 33 of Part 2 of the 2003 (as amended by the Bill) that a community body can register an interest in salmon fishings or mineral rights if they are owned by the owner of the land or if they are owned separately from the land. Section 53 of Part 2 provides that Ministers will not consent to the exercise of the right to buy in respect of the salmon fishings/minerals unless the community body is also exercising its right to buy the land (or already owns it).

We do not consider the position with regard to mineral and salmon fishings to be clear in Part 3A. Does the fact that mineral rights and salmon fishings are not specifically excluded mean that they are included in the definition of “eligible land”? Given the possibility for confusion as to whether salmon fishings or mineral rights are included, we would suggest that clarification is given.

If minerals and salmon fishings are included in the definition of eligible land in Part 3A, we are not convinced that the tests of abandoned/neglected land (however they may be framed) may be applied to these rights which, by their nature, are not “used” or occupied in the same way that land is. We would question the justification for including mineral rights and salmon fishings in land which can be purchased under Part 3A if they cannot be “abandoned” or “neglected”.

4.3.2 Criteria for an Application

Ministers must consider whether the owner’s continued ownership would be inconsistent with furthering the achievement of sustainable development. Ministers are entitled to ask the owner to give information about the proposals for the land. This means that even if a landowner proposes to use land in a certain way, if that use is not deemed to be compatible with “sustainable development” the land can be acquired by a community body. In effect, Ministers are being placed in the position of comparing the different proposals for land use and deciding which is preferable for “sustainable development”. We suggest that, if a landowner has a proposed land use (whether that be development in a number of years or planting a crop of turnips next season) which can be supported by evidence, that should be sufficient to prevent a community body from compulsorily purchasing the land.
The final criteria is that the community body has “tried and failed to buy the land”. We would suggest that this should be expanded upon to provide that the community body must have acted in good faith or used reasonable endeavours in their effort to purchase the land.

4.3.3 Points of Process

In terms of Section 97G(11) Bill, the community body is to receive copies of all views submitted to the Ministers. The landowner should also be entitled to see these views and make counter representations if necessary.

The Bill allows the community body to ask the Minister to keep the community’s funding plans confidential. However, we note that the community body is obliged to send a copy of the application and accompanying information to the landowner in terms of section 97G(7). We assume that this includes any “confidential” information withheld from the register and support the idea that all information should be sent to the landowner for comment. The position could perhaps be clarified for the avoidance of doubt.

Ministers are entitled to make Regulations which will freeze dealings with a property in respect of which an application to buy has been received (section 97N). We would ask that this proposal be considered carefully and that any “frozen” period be short.

On registration of a title to land acquired by a Part 3A community body, any standard security over the land will fall. Will a creditor whose debt will not be satisfied by the sale proceeds be entitled to block the sale of the land to the Part 3A community body? If not, will the creditor be compensated under Section 97T?

4.4 Asset Transfer Requests

Where the land is leased to the relevant authority by another relevant authority or a company owned by a relevant authority, the sub-letting and use restrictions do not apply to the lease to the community transfer body. This could put some authorities in difficult positions if they have agreed to such restrictions to comply with title conditions or tenant mix requirements and so this provision should be qualified accordingly.
4.5 Common Good

The Bill should contain a definition of common good based on the principles established by the 1944 Magistrates of Banff case which are clear and have been established for 70 years. These principles should be formally adopted by any reforming statute.

The drafting appears to allow any party to make representations to the Council that property is common good. This raises the prospect that Councils may be requested to register a large number of properties that are not, in fact, common good. Identification of common good can be a time consuming and complex process. The only way to determine whether property is indeed common good is by forensic analysis of the Council's title deeds, historical committee minutes etc. We would therefore suggest that any representations made to the Council that property is common good must be supported by evidence of this status.

With reference to the intention to register common good property, we would suggest that it be clarified whether it can be assumed that Council owned property which does not appear on the Register is not common good. In theory any asset can be common good. On the assumption that it is not practicable to create or maintain a register of moveable common good assets we would invite the government to restrict common good status only to land.

Does the consultation procedure referred to in Section 65 replace the existing statutory provisions (Section 75 of the Local Government (S) Act 1973)? If so, this is potentially more onerous than at present; Councils are currently entitled to determine that common good land can be alienated without requirement for court consent, depending on relevant circumstances (public benefit, public use of the property etc).

The Bill refers to the disposal and use of common good assets but does not refer to ‘inalienable’ common good; that is common good which a local authority is prohibited from disposing of. We would support the view that all common good should be capable of disposal by local authorities; it should not be the case that any land must be held in perpetuity or require consent of the Scottish Parliament to dispose.

Consent is proposed to be required to any disposal or change of use of land. The Government should consider whether there should be exceptions to this, e.g. in the case of de minimis transactions which do not change the overall or primary nature of use of the land, or grant of leases or licences (which we consider to fall within the scope of a ‘disposal’) which preserve the status / use of the land.
Response to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

From: Engage Renfrewshire

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

Response: The Bill offers the potential to empower communities, but it will be up to communities themselves to make sure this potential is realised. In the first instance the debate generated by the Bill itself has raised awareness about the potential of community ownership across Scotland. Engage Renfrewshire has worked to raise awareness of its members regarding the possibility of community ownership and has also sought to capture the experience of community groups that have completed community ownership.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

Response: Public sector organisations have an opportunity to benefit substantially from the Bill. The Bill offers the potential for statutory organisations to release the potential of underused and unused assets. This will enable public sector agencies to divest itself of the management and maintenance of assets for which it has no productive use, which would be a saving to public expenditure. More importantly, assets taken over by the community have the potential to strengthen the capability of the third sector to deliver activities and services either independently or as part of a community planning partnership. By investing in support to help communities take over assets successfully, public sector agencies will see a return over the long term in the strength of local third sector organisations and the appearance and capacity of local areas. These third sector organisations will then be better equipped to deliver policy outcomes shared with the public sector, which may result in longer term savings to the public purse.

Possible disadvantages to the public sector of the Bill may be the costs of dealing with underdeveloped requests to take over community assets, both in terms of financial cost and officer time in negotiating with local communities. Public sector organisations may also have concerns about the costs of failed asset transfers being returned to public sector hands. However, this will be mitigated if public sector organisations have a full and clear understanding of the benefits that each individual asset transfer can deliver in the long term.

Response: Communities across Scotland may have different levels of capability to take advantage of provisions of the Bill. In Renfrewshire, there are successful examples of asset transfers having taken place and other examples where communities have developed the capability over time with support from local agencies.

COSS and DTAS provide invaluable support to communities to build capacity to enable them to take advantage of the provisions of the Bill. Third Sector Interfaces and the officers of statutory sector organisations transferring assets can play a vital role in ensuring that third sector organisations have a full awareness and understanding of the assets available for transfer and the process by which this can be undertaken. Local TSIs and statutory organisations can also work effectively together to ensure that there is an agreed local framework for asset transfer and provision of advice and support that would make the process easier for a third sector organisation.

4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

Response: The specific provisions of the Bill are supported. The Bill provides a positive policy context for third sector organisations to play a leading role in delivering national outcomes through community planning and the transfer of unused or underused assets from the statutory sector to communities throughout Scotland.

5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

Response: The assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development appears to be satisfactory.

6. Any additional comments?

The thrust of the Community Empowerment Bill is to be supported and should now be backed up by positive commitment from statutory sectors and third sector organisations to make this work in practice. Work requires to be undertaken across community planning community planning partnerships to ensure a consistent understanding and approach is shared by all partners.

COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL (as introduced)

Submission by the Community Land Advisory Service (CLAS) to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee of the Scottish Parliament

CLAS is a third sector advisory service initially established in Scotland in 2011 to implement a recommendation of the Scottish Government’s Grow Your Own Working Group. Our function is to work with community groups and with landowners (both public and private sector) to facilitate agreements for community use of land for growing projects. Under this remit, we are usually more concerned with leases, licences and other arrangements for community use of land as opposed to community ownership of land. CLAS now also operates in England and in Wales, but with separate funding arrangements in each country. In Scotland, CLAS’ current main funder is Scottish Government Food and Drink Division.

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities? Please give reasons for your answer.

Part 2 – Community Planning

1.2.1 That I can see, the expression “community empowerment” does not appear anywhere in Part 2 of the Bill – perhaps it should? Section 4(5) makes some provision for community involvement in the process, but arguably this is merely engagement as opposed to empowerment. I think it sends the wrong signal that, in the way the provisions have been drafted, a community body which does participate in the community planning process is not counted as being a “community planning partner” (see section 4(4)).

Part 3 – Participation Requests

1.3.1 I can foresee community growing initiatives making use of participation requests in seeking to improve outcomes relating to use and upkeep of open spaces which are owned by relevant public service authorities. This might in some cases involve a proposal that the community group itself take over maintenance of the space from the authority or the authority’s private sector maintenance contractors. Granton Community Gardeners\(^1\) in North Edinburgh provide an inspiring example of how members of a community are transforming areas of ground which the local authority previously struggled to maintain against fly-tipping, dog fouling and other anti-social behaviour.

1.3.2 I can see a participation request potentially being preferable to an asset transfer request in this scenario as it makes it clear that the community are providing the public sector landowner with an economically and socially valuable service. Accordingly, if any money is to change hands, it should be the landowner paying the community group. Conversely in an asset transfer, there could be an assumption that the community group would need to pay rent or a capital purchase price. Understanding the relationship between public body and community as being one in which the later provides a benefit to the former and not vice versa is also helpful to countering any argument that the transaction may be subject to the European State Aid rules.

1.3.2 The following discussion is relevant if there is a “no” vote in the forthcoming independence referendum. Section 16(4) of the Bill limits the public bodies to which participation requests can be made to devolved areas of government. I can envisage circumstances in which a community might wish to participate in an outcome improvement process with a reserved public sector landowner – for example the Ministry of Defence or Network Rail. As regards land situated in England and Wales, such public sector bodies are subject to the “Right to Contest” provisions of Part X of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 (c.65), under which the Secretary of State can order disposal of underused land, but those provisions do not extend to Scotland. In the event of a “no” vote, I consider that the Scottish Government should negotiate with UK Government to ensure that participation requests (and also asset transfer requests) are made equally applicable to reserved public sector landowners.

\(^1\) See https://www.facebook.com/grantoncommunitygardeners
1.4.1 I agree that extending the pre-emptive right to buy into urban areas is likely to lead to some community bodies making successful purchases under the statutory right and that these may support projects that will empower those communities. As has been the experience in rural areas, I expect that the existence of the statutory right in the background will also tend to encourage more non-statutory deals between landowners and community groups with urban land.

1.4.2 However, I would draw to the Committee’s attention that the types of community growing group that I work with may often be more interested in securing use of land in the here-and-now rather than ownership at some unknown future date. Nothing in the Bill as introduced does anything to promote meanwhile community use of privately owned land.

1.4.3 Scottish Ministers have set a target of getting a million acres of land into Community ownership. I am concerned that this target may be counter-productive. Societal benefit is surely measured in terms of numbers of individuals whose life situation is improved and not in land measure. Speaking as a former Civil Servant, I am concerned that the acreage target will lead to target-driven behaviour under which funds and other resources are focused on acquisitions on large areas of remote moorland at the expense of supporting urban projects seeking to acquire small areas of ground. Community use of small areas of ground can make big differences in urban areas; as examples, Gorgie City Farm in Edinburgh only extends to about 2 acres, whilst The Grove Community Garden, which is contributing to the regeneration of the Fountainbridge area of the City, began with just 600m². In saying this, I am not against further rural buy-outs. However rural communities have had the benefit of the Part 2 right to buy for ten years now; it is now important that proposed urban buy-outs should be properly supported.

1.4.4 The provisions of this Part of the Bill are not by themselves sufficient to empower communities. Rural buy-outs to date have been supported both by the availability of funding toward purchase prices and the provision of support, both by officials and by third sector advisory services. I return to these points in sections 3.1 and 3.2 below.

1.4.5 In my view, the policy of the Bill as introduced is wrong in the scenario where a community body seeks to register interest over land which is subject to a prior option in favour of a third party (the details of this are discussed further at paragraphs 4.4.6 to 4.4.8 below.) Under the current terms of the 2003 Act and Bill, a landowner can make land “community interest proof” by granting an option over it, for example to an associate. In my view the correct policy is –

(a) an application may be made to register interest over land which is subject to a subsisting prior option.

(b) in considering whether to permit registration of an interest, Ministers must consult and have regard to the views of the option holder as well as the current owner.

(c) where an interest is permitted to be registered, a subsequent conveyance by current owner to option holder in implement of the exercised option is an exempt transfer.

(d) subsequent to that exempt transfer, action to sell by the former option holder (and now owner) triggers the community right to buy, as does action to sell to a third party by the original owner in circumstances where the option is declined.

1.4.6 In principle, I consider the proposed introduction of an absolute community right to buy abandoned and neglected land to be a good idea with considerable scope for empowering communities and also bringing about environmental improvement. However I am concerned that the scheme has not been adequately thought through, and that this may have the result that the right is in practice not as valuable as it could be. I discuss this further in paragraph 4.4.21 below.
Part 5 – Asset Transfer Requests

1.5.1 I also consider that asset transfer requests are helpful idea which will in practice contribute to further empowering communities. I think it particularly helpful that a community transfer body will be entitled to request a right to manage or to use an asset as well as a transfer of ownership or a formal tenancy. Grants of rights of management or use seem to me capable of being very helpful for permitting community use in situations where the property is earmarked for another use in the longer term and in situations where the public authority is unable to cede exclusive use to the community transfer body. In practice, the agreements for community use which I currently advise and assist with very often take the form of licences rather than strictly leases.

1.5.2 As with participation requests my main issue with asset transfer requests is that the terms of the Bill do not permit a request to be made to public sector landowners whose functions and governance are reserved to Westminster, so limiting the community benefits that might be realised. Standing what I have said about communities in England and Wales already having better rights in relation to such bodies’ assets than communities in Scotland (see 1.3.2 above), I hope that the Committee may seek an assurance from Scottish Government that they will engage with Whitehall on this point.

Part 6 – Common Good Property

1.6.1 The rules on common good are a two-edged sword so far as community growing initiatives are concerned. On the one hand, they tend to protect unbuilt land from development and, where a growing project can be established on common good land, help to support its long-term future. However, where the community use is or may be an appropriation to another use, or where a proposed agreement between Council and community group may be considered an alienation, the common good rules stand as a barrier to agreements for community use and also fear of challenge and criticism may inhibit Councils from considering beneficial proposals.

1.6.2 I favour there being better information available to the public as to what is or is not common good property. However, in addition to the proposed new registers, I think it important that information be made available, in clear language accessible to the lay person, what the rules are as to what may or may not be common good and also what the rules on alienation and appropriation to other uses are. Without this information, I suspect that both local authorities and individuals and organisations within the community may end up embroiled in unnecessary debate as to what should or should not appear in the common good registers. In my experience, the current law relating to common good assets is not well understood. In this respect, I feel the Bill fails to grasp the nettle; in my view it would have been helpful to create a statutory codification of the substantive law.

1.6.2 As the Committee are no doubt aware, The Keeper of the Registers of Scotland has recently undertaken to register all public land in the Land Register of Scotland within the next 5 years. In respect of common good land and buildings, I consider that there should be cross-referencing between that register and the proposed common good register. The common good register should contain the title number of the parcel, and where a parcel is registered in a common good register, the Keeper should note that fact on the Land Register title sheet.

Part 7 – Allotments

1.7.1 I consider that allotments (along with other types of community growing) can be an important hub for community activity and contribute to empowerment. Accordingly I welcome the clear re-statement of allotment law and the provisions which will hopefully help to increase local authority provision of allotments and other growing spaces.

1.7.2 One of the barriers to getting allotments (and also other community growing projects) going is that structures such as sheds, greenhouse and polytunnels require planning consent (whereas often an identical structure sited within the curtilage of a dwellinghouse would not.) Where in regulations made under section 73 a local authority permits such buildings, I would like to see an additional provision to the effect that no separate planning consent is needed.

1.7.3 I am pleased to see that the proposed new duty of local authorities to prepare a food growing strategy involves identification of areas of land suitable for other forms of community growing as well as allotments. All forms of community gardening create community benefits and enhance empowerment, and in some cases other cultivation approaches may be preferable to allotments, for example where a site is small, awkwardly shaped, contaminated or only available for a short period. As the Bill’s proposed new definition of “allotment” restricts it to ground owned or tenanted by the local authority, this approach also means the strategy will take into account what are presently termed “private allotments”; those leased from a private sector landlord.

Part 8 – Non-domestic Rates

1.8.1 I agree with the proposed introduction of power for local authorities to make schemes for reduction and remission of rates, and hope that Councils would do so for small-scale community activities such a community gardening. This would remove an administrative burden- and in some cases a financial burden – from community growing projects. Community garden projects are not-for-profit and sometimes (but not always) registered as Scottish Charities. Under existing rules, rates reductions of 80 to 100% are often available, but a specific application must be made to the local authority, creating work for both the community group and the Council.

3.1.1 Funding. As I understand it, most if not all of the successful buy-outs to date under Parts 2 and 3 of the 2003 Act have had significant help with grants or loans toward the purchase price. I think that urban buy-outs under revised Part 2, abandoned and neglected land purchases under Part 3A and asset transfers taking the form of outright purchase will all need similar support. The Scottish Land Fund currently has a rule that it will not lend to communities with populations over 10,000. I think that that rule should be changed, and also that making the change should not be left until the time when the new Act (assuming passed) is about to commence. Now that the Bill is before Parliament and it is predictable that the new statutory rights will soon be available, there may be increased willingness from urban landowners to voluntarily agree community purchases and also from public bodies to voluntarily agree asset transfer.

3.1.2 I believe that discussion needs to start now, amongst the community sector but also involving Scottish and local government about the demand for future funding for community purchases and how this may be met. One of the factors for discussion here is how the relatively short timescales between when a community body gets confirmation that it will be able to proceed with a purchase and knows the price to be paid can be squared with the time it takes to make grant applications or to raise funds through, for example, a community share issue.

3.1.3 Although this may seem a small point, in my experience the costs of carrying out property ownership searches at Registers of Scotland is presently a barrier to community groups seeking to take over unused land. As this is often the first thing that has to be done in an intend project, the costs often have to incurred before the project is in a position to apply for grants or start fundraising. Part of the problem is, to start off with, the community group do not usually know whether title is in the Land Register or the Register of Sasines, and if it is in the latter, the amount of investigation required and so cost involved cannot be predicted. As I discuss in paragraph 4.4.21 below, I think this is an issue in potential take-up of the proposed Part 3A right to up. I do not suggest changing Register of Scotland’s self-funding financial arrangements, under which they must charge fees to meet their operating costs. However I suggest that a small fund could be set up with the purpose of providing grants to community groups to cover such costs.

3.2.1 Support Services. At present there are various support services available to help community groups seeking to acquire and use land. As examples, the Community Ownership Support Service, run by Development Trusts Association Scotland support community buy-outs whereas my own service, CLAS, provides technical advice and support to promote voluntary agreements for community use of land for growing projects.

3.2.2 I believe dialogue needs to get underway as to what support by way of, for example, capacity building, training, materials and hands on assistance communities will need to take full advantage of the new rights contained in Parts 3, 4 and 5 of the Bill, and how best this support can be delivered. I think that building on the experience and expertise of existing support services, and not re-inventing the wheel, is the way forward, but changes to remits, funding arrangements and perhaps manpower may be needed. There will of course be new things to be learnt; the participation request and asset transfer processes are completely new, and the extension of the Part 2 right to buy into urban areas seems likely to raise new issues that have not so far been encountered in the rural context; and new materials will need to be prepared. On the assumption that these Parts of the Bill are likely to be commenced around a year after Royal Assent, I think the aim should be for agreement on remits and funding by the summer of next year to allow preparations for commencement to get underway.

4. Are you content with the specific provisions of the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which parts of the Bill and why?

Part 4

4.4.1 Section 27(1)(c). I wonder if the specific mention of salmon fishings and mineral rights in proposed new section 33(2A) of the 2003 Act may create an implication that the right to buy is not exercisable in relation to other separate tenements. I consider that the right to buy should also be available for rights to gather oysters and mussels; rights of port and of ferry; and also sporting rights separate tenements created under section 65A of Abolition of Feudal Tenure (Scotland) Act 2000.

4.4.3 Section 29(2). I suggest that in proposed section 35(A1) of the 2003 Act the words “of association” should be added after “memorandum” to conform with sections 7 and 8 of the Companies Act 2006.

4.4.4 2003 Act section 37(4)(b). Given that the Bill intends to make it clear that the right to buy can be exercised in relation to separate tenements, I think that the requirement to affix a notice to the land needs to be relaxed for those cases. It would be impractical to affix a notice to a mineral interest and impossible to affix one to an incorporeal separate tenement.

4.4.5 2003 Act section 38(1)(c). I consider that the policy behind this section is flawed and the opportunity should be taken to change it. It is not necessary to hold a surface/alveus title in order to exercise salmon fishing or mineral rights as such rights may have either express or implied rights of access over the surface. Therefore I see no reason why an aspirant community owner of such rights should also need to have or be seeking a surface title. If this argument is accepted, section 53 of the 2003 Act should also be repealed.

4.4.6 Prior Options – section 31(7) and (8) and Schedule 5 line 35; 2003 Act sections 39(5) and 40(4)(g)(iv). This discussion concerns the scenario where, at the date when Ministers receive an application for registration of a community interest, the landowner has already entered into a binding option agreement with a third party under which that party may elect at some point in the future to buy the land. The 2003 Act as passed contains what appears to me a contradiction on this point. On the one hand, section 39(5) appears to say that the application must be refused (although section 39(1) limits the application of section 39 as a whole to the different situation where a binding option has not yet been conferred.) On the other hand section 40(4)(g)(iv) provides that, following registration of a community interest, a transfer by landowner to option holder under a prior option is an exempt transfer, this suggesting that the intention was that it should be possible to register interest over land subject to a prior option.

4.4.7 Scottish Government’s view appears to be that section 39(5) prevails over section 40(4)(g)(iv); certainly this was the reason given for declining an application for registration of an interest by the Holmehill community group in
In the Bill, Government are proposing amendments to the 2003 Act that would put it beyond any question that a prior option trumps a community interest application. The proposed new wording of 2003 Act section 39(1) and proposed new subsection (4A) deal with the existing tension between subsection (1) and subsection (5). Schedule 5 proposes to simply repeal section 40(4)(g)(iv).

4.4.8 I think that this is the wrong policy choice; I think that it should be possible for Ministers to consider whether in the given circumstances a community interest may be registered over land subject to a prior option — my view of the correct policy is set out at paragraph 1.4.5 above. Given that if the option is exercised that transfer would be exempt, there is no detriment to either the current landowner or the option holder.

4.4.9 Section 34 — proposed new section 44A(1) of the 2003 Act. I wonder if this subsection should also refer to section 39, on the view that a late application is registered under that section and not under section 37.

4.4.10 Section 44 — proposed new section 60A of the 2003 Act. In my view this section is flawed as it gives Ministers discretion whether or not require payment from the owner but gives no clue as to the criteria which Ministers are to take into account in reaching the discretionary decision. In the current terms of the section, I do not see how a Sheriff hearing an appeal under subsection (4) could decide that appeal.

4.4.11 Section 46 — proposed new section 67A of the 2003 Act. I appreciate that Government have inserted this provision in response to consultation responses. However it seems to me a recipe for mistakes and confusion to make it that some of the time periods specified in the 2003 Act include public and local holidays whereas others do not.

4.4.12 Section 48 — proposed new section 97C(1) of the 2003 Act. As indicated above, whilst in principle I am in favour of a community right to buy abandoned and neglected land, I have a number of issues and concerns with the terms of proposed new Part 3A of the 2003 Act. This provision is to the effect that land is susceptible to the absolute right to buy if, in Ministers’ opinion, it is wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected. Aside from some special cases mentioned in subsection (3) any further specification of the concepts of abandonment and neglect is left to be prescribed by future statutory instrument (which would not, if I am reading the provisions correctly, be subject to affirmative procedure.) I have four different concerns about this approach. Firstly, I think that the terms on which the State will take the important and serious step of depriving a landowner of their land without their consent require proper Parliamentary debate and scrutiny. To me, this is clearly a matter of such gravity that it is for the elected Legislature and not the Executive. The second related point is that if too much is left to subordinate legislation and Ministerial discretion then too many attempts by communities to exercise the new right will end leading to disputes that can only be resolved by the Courts, with all the associated delay and expense. Third, I think it important to give this issue due weight because it is not risk-free. Scotland has such a long history of effective security of title that it becomes easy to take confidence in land title for granted. If it becomes too easy for a landowner to find themselves in a position where they are being deprived of title against their wishes, this could have adverse consequences for the land market. Finally, there is the question of fairness to landowners who, in my view, are entitled to see clear rules so that they can know how they must act to avoid risk of losing their land and who should not be exposed to arbitrariness.

4.4.13 I consider that more consultation and discussion is needed on the sorts of land susceptible to the proposed right to buy. This should include consideration of (1) land landbanked by developers for future development, (2) farmland left fallow as a matter of good agricultural practice and (3) spaces deliberately allowed to go wild for environmental reasons.

4.4.14 Proposed section 97C(3)(a) of the 2003 Act. The exception at the end of this paragraph leaves me concerned; apparently Government have in mind some possible situations in which a person’s home will, without consent, be sold to the community. The Explanatory Notes do nothing to reassure. This provision brings a new human rights dimension to bear; whereas to date in considering rights to buy the issue has been compliance with Article 1 of the First Protocol to the European Convention, on this point Article 7 (conferring amongst other things a right to one’s home) becomes relevant.

4.4.15 Proposed section 97C(3)(e) of the 2003 Act. I do not see why land that should or might be administered by the Queen’s and Lord’s Treasurers Remembrancer (QLTR) should be an exception to the general rule. To my knowledge, the QLTR does not maintain sites that have fallen to the Crown bona vacantia or ultimus haeres. Those sites may therefore be considered neglected or abandoned. Proposed section 97H(j) should have the effect that a right to buy application under Part 3A cannot proceed if the community has not already tried to do a deal with the QLTR. However if the QLTR has been unresponsive, dilatory or unreasonable, I do not see why land which is under the QLTR’s power of disposal should be treated differently from any other land.

4.4.16 Proposed section 97D of the 2003 Act. The types of body permitted to acquire a Part 3A right to buy should be the same as those permitted to acquire a Part 2 right to buy under Part 2 as proposed to be amended by the Bill. Accordingly this provision should be amended to permit SCIOs and other bodies prescribed by statutory instrument to be Part 3A community bodies.

4.4.17 Proposed section 97E(1) of the 2003 Act. Consequential to the point just made, this provision should be amended to refer to constitutions as well as memoranda and articles.

4.4.18 Proposed section 97E(3) of the 2003 Act. I think that the word “body” has been omitted after “community.”

4.4.19 Proposed section 97F of the 2003 Act. I do not see the point of creating a Register of Community Interests in Abandoned and Neglected Land and further adding to the proliferation of different registers that contain land information. In my understanding, the creation of the Register of Community Interests in Land for registration of interests under the Part 2 right to buy was at the time expedient for reasons including the following: – (1) As a Part 2 community interest over land may well subsist for a long time, and given the terms of section 40(2) of the 2003 Act (a purported transfer in breach of community interest is of no effect), there was a risk that an innocent third party transacting with land and unaware that it was subject to a Part 2 community interest could part with money for a void title. (2) At the time of development of the policy of the Bill that became the 2003 Act, not all counties were operational for purposes of the Land Registration (Scotland) Act 1979 and further the Keeper had no power to unilaterally transfer the title to a given parcel of land from the Register of Sasines (which is very difficult to search conclusively) to the map-based Land Register of Scotland (which is easy to search conclusively); accordingly there was a requirement to develop a different way of making public the existence of a pending or registered Part 2 application.

4.4.20 As the proposed Part 3A right to buy is absolute and not pre-emptive, the community right will not hang over the land for a long period as it usually does with a Part 2 right Further, as matters now stand, the Land Register is now operational for the whole of Scotland and the Land Registration etc. (Scotland) Act 2012 will be fully commenced shortly, empowering the Keeper to unilaterally register any unregistered parcel. If regulations are made under proposed section 97N of the 2003 Act prohibiting transfer of land subject to a Part3A application, the necessary publicity and warning to would-be transferees can simply be entered in the Land Register (with the Keeper registering the plot at that time if it is not already registered), where it will be disclosed in routine conveyancing searches. Insofar as third parties might have any interest in seeing the various documents listed in section 97F(2), these could be obtained by making a freedom of information request to Scottish Ministers.

4.4.21 Proposed section 97G of the 2003 Act. This section is based on existing section 73 in Part 3 of the 2003 Act, the crofting community right to buy. In practice a crofting community will always know who their estate landlord is, and how to get in touch with that person or their representative land agent or factor. This will not be the case with abandoned and neglected land. I think that communities will often face real difficulties in establishing who owns or has current right to complete title to such sites. Sometimes even with extensive searching and investigation – which costs money – the Register of Sasines does not provide a conclusive answer (one may either come up with no likely owner or two or more possible owners.) Even where a definite name can be found, it may be a date in the distant past. For example the last transaction on record may show the property to have been owned by a trust in 1919, or to have been bought by a partnership in the 1930s. It can be impossible to get from this information to the identity of the person(s) currently in right of the property. Even where the records show a person who is thought still to be alive (or an entity thought to still exist) as owner, they do not give current contact details, it can prove difficult or impossible to trace and make contact with that person. Accordingly I think that communities would often find it difficult to comply with the requirements of subsections (5)(b)(ii) and (7)(a) to identify the owner and copy the application to them. This is an area where I am concerned that the practicalities of the proposed Part 3A right to buy have perhaps not been adequately thought through. Other situations which I think likely to arise in the context of abandoned and neglected sites, and which may merit thought as they may suggest further needs for changes to the provisions of proposed Part 3A are (a) what is to happen where the owner turns out to be an adult with incapacity, for example with senile dementia and (b) what is to happen where the owner turns out to be a lapsed trust with no surviving trustees who are capable of acting.

4.4.22 Proposed section 97J of the 2003 Act. I think that this should be modified in the same way as the equivalent provision in Part 2 to provide that the ballot is to be conducted by an independent ballotter appointed and paid by Ministers.

4.4.23 Proposed sections 97T and U of the 2003 Act. I note that these are based on sections 89 and 90 in Part 3 of the Act and provide that any claim for compensation has to be raised with the community body, with Ministers having a discretion - but no more - to fund the claim. I note the contrast with section 63 in Part 2 of the Bill where compensation claims are made direct to Ministers. I think that the Part 2 approach may be fairer to landowners in the abandoned and neglected land context. A particular question which arises in my mind – I do not know if it has ever been raised in the context of the Part 3 right to buy – is what is to happen where the absolute right to buy causes the owner a capital gains tax or corporation tax liability on the price which could have been avoided or reduced had the owner had control over the timing of the sale. I certainly do not think that the community should bear this cost, but equally do not think the owner is being properly compensated for the deprivation if they are left in this position.

4.7.1 I note that the definition in section 68 restricts the statutory meaning of the word “allotment” to those rented from a local authority. In contrast, the definition used in the Allotments (Scotland) Acts 1922 and 1950 appears capable of encompassing privately owned allotments as well. As in Schedule 5 to the Bill the 1922 and 1950 Acts are repealed in their entirety, I wonder if anything that has continuing significance for private allotments is being repealed without replacement. Section 17(2) of the 1922 Act and sections 3 and 4 of the 1950 Act are perhaps examples.

4.7.3 Sections 77 and 78. As these sections are not solely about allotments, I suggest that either they should be in a separate part of the Bill or alternatively that a change to the title of Part 7 is required.

4.7.3 Section 77(3)(c). Although this provision concerns both allotments and other forms of community cultivation, it is only triggered when unmet demand for allotments reaches a certain level. I suggest it should also be triggered where it appears to the authority that there is a significant unmet demand for land for other forms of community cultivation.
Moray College UHI: Response to Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

This paper provides Moray College’s response to the call for evidence by The Scottish Parliament in consideration of the proposed Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

This call for evidence focusses on the following 5 key aspects:

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?
2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?
4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?
5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

It is considered that the Bill will assist communities in becoming more empowered with regards:

- Community ownership of land and assets;
- Reduction of barriers currently preventing communities taking on more responsibility for assets;
- Enhanced support to provide communities with the potential to own and deliver key local services in the right place, at the right time and which more effectively meets the needs of the community;
- Provision of mechanism to support community capacity building and resilience
- Strengthens relationships and communication between communities, public sector organisations and the Community Planning Partnership.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

Benefits:
Framework in place to enable and empower communities to provide more local service provision, where appropriate;

- Public sector organisations being able to more effectively support remote, or disadvantaged communities to build capacity, resilience and skills;
- More effective use of local assets to deliver services;
- Improves the effectiveness of the Community Planning Partnership through partnership working and stronger link with local communities.

Disadvantages:

- There is the potential that this Bill could introduce additional threats, complexities and disadvantages which could reduce our ability to serve the wider community;
- Delivering the aims and ambitions of the Bill could have significant impact on our costs and current resources to support the management of local community engagement. Further detailed information would be required to provide a more detailed response, and in particular in relation to:
  - Definition of an appropriate community body
  - Grounds for refusal of request
  - The necessity to provide detailed information on request; this could potentially increase the already heavy burden on providing information through The Freedom of Information (Scotland) Act 2005
  - Requirement to assess community bodies proposals.

- This is a time of far reaching, unparalleled change in both the college and university sector and careful examination should be given to ensuring that this Bill enhances and does not detract from our current aims and objectives. Similarly, it introduces another framework to operationally embraced when other new frameworks are still being implemented and evaluated, e.g. implications of The Post-16 Education (Scotland) Act 2013.

Communities vary in that they have different attributes, characteristics, capacities, capabilities which impacts upon the confidence, aims and objectives of each community. Well promoted and understood frameworks would need to be developed to support public sector organisations to engage effectively with individual communities to meet the aspirations of the Bill. These should be developed, implemented and supported in an integrated manner by the Community Planning Partnership

4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

Moray College concerns are outlined in Section 2 of this response.

5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

No specific response.
Mark McLaren  |  Chief Superintendent | Police Scotland  | Email
Local Police Commander, Aberdeenshire and Moray Division, Inverurie Police Station, Blackhall Road, Inverurie, Aberdeenshire, AB51 3QD

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities? It will give further opportunity and encouragement to community groups to engage with Police Scotland allowing stronger ties to be created and allow local ideas and wishes to be developed. An opportunity for groups to have a home for their organisation. The Bill recognises the importance and strength of community.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for the public sector organisations? Benefits – it will support and develop stronger engagement with communities, allow innovation to flourish and bring communities closer together. Disadvantages – have Police Scotland the resources and capacity to support such engagement?

3. Do you consider communities across Scotland have the capabilities to take advantage of the provisions of the Bill? If not what requires to be done to assist? Disadvantaged communities can struggle to engage with Police Scotland. This can be overcome by positive community work within the area as all areas have individuals or groups able to engage. More advantaged communities have the skills and willingness to engage and embark on projects. But both still need varying degrees of support through the process.

4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill? If not what changes would you like to see? A tighter definition of what a community is, for example defining and confirming the local nature of the group. This could potentially prevent nefarious groups although community groups but not local based moving into an area for their own aims. These aims not necessarily being representative of the local based population.

5. Relates to island population. No return.
The Moray Council response to a call for Evidence on the community
Empowerment (Scotland) Bill 2014

The Scottish Parliament has issued a call for evidence to inform its consideration of the new Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. In repose to the five questions the Moray Council response is as follows;

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

The Moray Council welcomes and supports the key changes highlighted in the Bill and those area that will assist empower communities will be as follows;
- Increased community ownership of land and assets;
- The removal of barriers that have held communities taking on more responsibility for assets;
- Potential for communities and community groups to own and deliver key local services to that population, close to home, and based on clear knowledge and understanding of what communities want;
- Direct engagement of communities with Public Sector organisations and Community Planning Partnerships and ability to directly influence and suggest improvement and change in services; and
- Potential for innovation and sustainability of local services through local ownership.
- improved communication between a stronger community planning partnership and local communities.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

Potential Benefits to Public Sector Organisations
- Stronger communities
- Communities will to take more responsibility for local assets
- Greater community based service provision;
- An increase in opportunity for dialogue with communities, which will inform The Councils and Community planning partnerships in developing strategic and operational planning of services to meet the needs and aspirations of communities
- Strengthening the role of the Community Planning Partnership and potential, through that for innovation through partnership working and with input from communities.

Disadvantages / Challenges to Public Sector Organisations

While welcoming the policy intention of the draft Bill the Council had outlined a number of issues in the consultation that have not been taken on board by the Government and have some concerns that they will impact negatively

- Capacity will be required of The Moray Council and other public sector organisations in relation to supporting the processes enabled by the Bill. For example, organisations will be required to put in place processes to manage community requests to improve outcomes of services. There will be implications for the Council in the need to find additional capacity to deal with new and extended responsibilities contained in the Bill (Community Right to Buy, Asset Transfer, Participation requests, Common Good and the new allotment legislation.)

- The Bill is not clear about the need to develop community capacity of groups particularly the more disadvantaged to take responsibility for assets and to participate in services that affect them and their communities. To implement the Bill effectively will require Public Sector authorities to look at additional resource to effectively support the required capacity building.

- If more disadvantage communities are not supported there could be an imbalance of more articulate and affluent communities acquiring assets while these less affluent and vulnerable communities are unable to.

- The provisions of the Bill enable community organisations to request and receive ‘detailed’ information about a property that they are interested in. This is not part of the Community Asset transfer policy and this is likely to include information about the energy efficiency and maintenance costs of any asset. This would require additional capacity to be directed at providing such information, at a potential cost to maintenance and deliver.

- in relation to Public Bodies having to assess community bodies’ proposals. As set out in the policy memo, this work would include: ‘economic, social and environmental benefits of different proposals.’ and goes on to conclude: ‘The authority must agree to the request unless there are reasonable grounds for refusal.’ In Moray we have a Community asset transfer policy which clearly defines grounds for refusal and has a clear and transparent appeals procedure.

- The Bill places the responsibility of organising Community Right to Buy ballots on Ministers to appoint an independent person with knowledge and experience, This could fall to the Council if dealing with non council land this again could have resource implications for the Council.

- The presumption in favour of a Transfer of property regardless of the Councils usage of that asset means that unless an authority has reasonable grounds for refusal a transfer will take place this could lead to a loss of revenue and capital receipts.

All communities are different and have different capacities and capabilities. One challenge will be to ensure that all communities, especially those that are disadvantaged and which don’t have the confidence or capability to engage local Public Sector organisations are supported and enabled to do so. This will require increased capacity to ensure those more disadvantaged communities are not disadvantaged further as assets could be transferred to more affluent and articulate groups and communities. Community Planning Partnerships are potentially well placed to support this agenda, as are the emerging Integration Joint Boards which have a duty to engage with local communities. The Bill and associated guidance can support this work and focus through sharing good practice and research in relation to what organisations can do to maximise community capacity and capability.

4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

We would like to see the following

- We would like to see a definition of community body as community of interest as well as geographical community needs to be included.

- To assist strengthen communities the legislation should contain reference or a statutory basis for the National Standards of Community Engagement it would provide a degree of quality assurance to the process of community engagement and empowerment in a new and improved context.

- The legislation or guidance should be used to empower local groups, for example to address the issue of Community Councils, membership, roles and powers of Community Councils. Community Councils have a role to play in any empowerment process but there are a number of limitations to their role. Increased powers and a clearer role will add relevance and increase interest amongst a wider constituency.

- Clarity on Timescales for transfers of assets. This would provide both community groups and Authorities with clear parameter which will assist in easing the transfer process.

- We would like to see an “Approval in principle stage” in the Community Asset Transfer section similar to the process contained in the Moray council CAT policy. This provides an important and effective safeguard to ensure community groups have a clear purpose and basis for developing a detailed sustainable business plan for any asset.

- Allowance for a period of dialogue and support prior to submission of an application. The Moray Council would reaffirm our initial response and request that the issues raised in this submission are included when secondary legislation is drafted. Again this provides groups with initial support and clarifies with the group if they have chosen the most appropriate asset and have a clear vision for future and sustainable use.

- We would reaffirm our request that the specific status of Common good is clarified. In terms of the bill freeing up those assets for community benefit may be a simpler solution in future than current processes for Common good. The bill does not provide a clear definition of common good and this leaves each of the 32 local authorities to deal with this issue.

- The Council has concerns that in the absence of a clear definition of “common good” the requirement and the process of creating a “register of common good assets would be made even more onerous.

- The duty to provide allotments would create for moray difficulties in resourcing demand. Our current allotment process is about encouraging and supporting a community based response to the provision of allotments.
In section 7 (paragraphs 75 & 76) This was not mentioned in detail during the consultation and although giving additional protection to tenants, does create an onerous burden on local authorities and could restrict the number of sites within a local authority area which could be used as allotment sites.

In section 8 (paragraphs 83 & 84). Termination of the lease and the resumption of allotment site by the local Authority. Timescales for termination are lengthy at least 4 months where the tenant is in breach of any of the regulations and at least one year when the Local Authority wishes to dispose of or change the use of the land. These timescales will have to be considered when identifying suitable land and could lead to restrictions on the number of potentially suitable sites. This detail was not contained in the consultation and does provide some comfort to Local authorities in that they can resume possession of all or part of an allotment site where that resumption is required for building, or for a variety of other purposes. However, this is now going to be subject to ministerial consent so it is likely that the period of notice required may be longer than the 3 months in the Bill.

5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

Moray Council has no specific comments in this area other than the need to provide capacity building support to those who may be disadvantaged or experiencing inequality.
tsiMORAY response to a call for Evidence on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill 2014

The Scottish Parliament has issued a call for evidence to inform its consideration of the new Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. The response of tsiMORAY to the five questions posed is as follows:

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

The Bill marks an important step forward in the empowerment of our communities. We are particularly pleased to see the introduction of the following elements:

- the enshrining into legislation of the concept and practice of national outcomes setting and review;
- the requirement for Ministers to consult when setting and reviewing national outcomes;
- the inclusion of community bodies in community planning;
- the provision for participation requests by community bodies;
- the extension of the ‘right to buy’ to all of Scotland’s communities;
- the provision for asset transfer requests by community bodies;
- the introduction of a duty for local authorities to establish and maintain common good registers;
- the introduction of a duty for local authorities to consult before the disposal of common good assets;
- the inclusion of an updated duty for local authorities to provide allotments;
- the introduction of a duty for local authorities to prepare and review a food-growing strategy.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

While the implementation of the Bill is likely to require a reallocation and refocusing of resources for some public sector organisations, this disadvantage should be more than offset by the advantages which will flow from the development of more capable and engaged communities in the public sector organisations’ operating areas.

There are different levels of capacity in communities across Scotland. It is important to include provision for community capacity building in the Bill.
or in associated guidance to ensure the implementation of the Bill results in a reduction, rather than an increase, of inequality across communities. The commitment to community capacity building should include a presumption in favour of such activities being resourced by the public sector and delivered by the third sector.

4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

While the Bill marks an important step forward in the empowerment of our communities, some elements could helpfully be strengthened, including:

- more specific requirements regarding consultations by Ministers when setting and reviewing national outcomes, so that a broad range of stakeholders, including civic society and communities, is consulted;
- the inclusion of third sector interfaces, or more generically third sector representation, as statutory participants in community planning, albeit without the imposition of the duties which apply to public sector organisations;
- the provision for community bodies to be able to proactively request to be included in community planning;
- a commitment to community capacity building along the lines set out in our answer to question 3, above;
- the review of the processes a community needs to go through to exercise its ‘right to buy’, to make it easier for communities to exercise their rights in this respect;
- safeguards against the pre-emptying of asset transfer requests through the transfer of public assets and services to ‘arm’s length organisations’ by public sector organisations;
- the introduction of a duty for local authorities to engage with communities when preparing and reviewing their food-growing strategies;
- the introduction of a duty for community planning partnerships and public sector organisations to demonstrably engage with communities and the third sector in the planning, development and delivery of services, including a commitment to the principles and practice of co-production, supported by the adoption of the National Standards for Community Engagement as a code of conduct.

5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

We have no further comments other than those set out in our answer to question 3.

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

About Co-operatives UK

Co-operatives UK is the national trade body that campaigns for co-operation and works to promote develop and unite co-operative enterprises. We have a unique role as a trade association for co-operatives. We work to promote co-operative businesses across all sectors of the economy – from retail and finance where co-operatives are most recognised to key growth areas such as renewable energy, agriculture and education. Together the co-operative economy is worth some £36.7 billion, is owned by 15.4 million adult members in the UK and has grown by nearly 20 per cent since the start of the credit crunch. Co-operatives UK has 75 per cent of the UK co-operative sector in membership.

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

We recognise the positive changes the Bill will make to communities across Scotland, in particular by extending the community right to buy to urban areas and by simplifying the process whereby communities can register and progress their interest.

However, as we detail later on in this response, we would like to see a greater diversity in the structures that communities can use to achieve their objectives. Specifically we want to see the Community Benefit Society structure included as a permitted legal form with the Community Interest Company considered as an option.

It must be recognised though that legislation only creates a framework for community empowerment and the success of the Bill’s aspirations rests largely on whether the support is there to allow communities to take advantage of the provisions.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

Our experience tells us that in any co-operative or collaborative action it is necessary for different participants to develop a high degree of mutual trust and understanding. The benefits of greater community involvement in the operation of public services is that the users of the service can provide a greater level of understanding and feedback in order to continually improve the service.
It is our understanding that in order to achieve this level of mutual trust among community and public sector organisations there will need to be a significant culture change. In terms of the implementation and success of the Bill it is vital that consideration is given by Government as to how to effect this culture change in order to allow community organisations and the public sector to deal with each other as equals and to recognise the strengths each brings to the process.

Our view is that communities across Scotland have a range of capabilities and are at different stages of development and capacity. Some are dynamic and ready to take on the challenge of having direct control of the assets and services in their community. Others have the desire but need assistance and support to get to this stage.

A mechanism or programme of peer support between communities, ie those who have already achieved being able to assist those who are starting out on the journey, would help close the gap and build the appropriate knowledge and experience to increase the chances of successful long-term outcomes. It would also assist those successful development organisations by providing them with a possible income stream.

While this may not be within the scope of the Bill itself it is a key component of the Government action that must support the Bill’s introduction.

4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

Our main concern is that in prescribing the legal form of a ‘community body’ the Bill is overly restrictive, and will simply create legalistic and regulatory barriers in a field full of potential innovation. Being too prescriptive on matters such as legal form tends to have unintended consequences that the public then have to work around.

The Bill clearly defines the make-up characteristics and purposes required of any legally recognised ‘community body’. We are satisfied that within the parameters this Bill sets out communities will have ample opportunities to work together in ways that are open, accountable and economically viable. At the same time the definition of a community body provides adequate protections against misuse and abuse.

That said, if policymakers decide to push ahead with restrictions on legal form we would highlight the opportunity to strengthen the Bill by including the right to use the Community Benefit Society (CBS) structure, particularly in reference to Parts 4 (Community Right to Buy) and 5 (Asset Transfer). The inclusion of the option to use a CBS would extend the range of financial options open to communities, primarily through the use of Community Shares, a unique feature of the CBS structure. In this regard including the CBS structure would be entirely consistent with the aims of the Bill and would considerably strengthen it.
Due to their member-based democracy, registered community purpose, access to different forms of finance such as Community Share issues, and, asset lock, CBSs are ideal organisational forms for asset transfers. When communities utilise community co-operative models they are an excellent form of community owned and controlled enterprise serving a community purpose. The co-operative principles of collective ownership and democratic member control will empower communities to a great effect.

We recognise that the Bill provides the Minister with power to recognise other forms of ‘community body’ at a later date through subordinate legislation and we agree with this provision. We believe that at some point in future co-operative societies may also be 'asset locked', and so hope that this power will be used to give communities the option to use this legal form as well.

There is also a case to be made for including Community Interest Companies (CIC) which would provide communities with another legal option to use and potentially broaden the circumstances in which communities are able to take control and operate local assets and services.

5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

We see no issue in the Bill that causes concerns in regard to equal rights and have no specific view in terms of the impact on island communities or sustainable development.

Evangelical Alliance Scotland Response to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee Call for Evidence on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

The Evangelical Alliance in Scotland is the largest body serving evangelical Christians in Scotland and has a membership including denominations, churches, organisations and individuals. Across the UK, Evangelical Alliance membership includes over 700 organisations, 3500 churches and thousands of individuals. Our members in Scotland include the Baptist Union of Scotland, Vineyard Churches, the Salvation Army, Newfrontiers, Elim Pentecostal Churches, Assemblies of God, The Free Church of Scotland, Brethren, a number of congregations within the Church of Scotland and other independent churches. We have a number of organisations as members in Scotland including Glasgow City Mission, Bethany Christian Trust, Tearfund and Scripture Union Scotland. Within our Scottish membership many of our churches and organisations have considerable experience working with communities all across Scotland.

Introduction

The Evangelical Alliance welcomes the opportunity to submit evidence in relation to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. The Bill affords a vital opportunity to recognise that the future of Scotland will to a large extent be shaped by the strength of its civic society and community life. As an organisation with a network in almost every community of Scotland we welcome the fact that the empowerment of communities has now risen up the political agenda. For our members in churches and organisations up and down the country this bill offers the possibility of empowering them as they go about their daily business providing community services and serving their communities for the benefit of all who live there.

The Evangelical Alliance would be very happy to share some of our knowledge and experience in this area in oral evidence if that would be of benefit to the committee. We offer a number of brief comments on each section of the Bill that may also be taken as answer to Question 1.

Specific Comments

There are many provisions we welcome in the bill. There are also a smaller number of areas in which we believe greater emphasis should be given to communities and less emphasis given to the public sector. We will comment on each area in turn:

Part 1 – We welcome the emphasis on national outcomes and community consultation contained within the Bill. It is vital this consultation reaches out to all parts of the community and is not just a tick box exercise. Groups such as churches have many community links and can be a useful partner in ensuring the whole community can access consultations and ensure all views may be heard.
Part 2 – We welcome the increased definition of roles for CPPs but question whether there is enough emphasis on the ‘Community’ emphasis of Community Planning Partnerships. Whilst a more joined up approach among statutory bodies is very welcome it is important that this does not override the views of the community in local decision making.

Part 3 – We strongly welcome the provision to enable local community groups to be involved in improving service outcomes. This potentially opens the door for a vast increase in local community activism and volunteering that would not otherwise be available to the local authority or agency.

Part 4 & 5 – We welcome the focus on Community right to buy Land and Asset transfer. There are many example among our members of churches and organisations that have worked with the community to retain or develop use for disused buildings and other assets. In an era of public service spending restraint this gives the opportunity to leverage outside funding and enable true community development to be realised. We also welcome the specific simplification of right to buy processes and the planned framework to purchase abandoned land recognise the value Community Right to Buy can have in stimulating future social and economic development.

Part 6 – We welcome this provision though we are perhaps not best placed to comment on the detail of it.

Part 7 – We strongly welcome the provision on allotments. Many churches and community groups are increasingly involved in community gardens and we have found that particularly for those in vulnerable or difficult social circumstances having access to an allotment can bring not only a sense of connection with the local community but also means of productive voluntary work. We strongly support ensuring Local Authorities having an effective allotment regime that allows reasonable access for those who wish to have an allotment.

Part 8 – We welcome the principle of this provision reflecting the principle of subsidiarity.

Mrs Cathy Vincent,

To whom it may concern,

I have read the “easy read” version of The Community Empowerment Bill, and feel that one of the things greatest in empowering anyone or thing involves giving them the means to be empowered.

Community councils may be given the right to acquire land and property but this is a meaningless gesture if they do not have the resources to put this ability into practice.

Throughout Scotland, in recent years we have been inundated with the appearance of wind turbines, whether you love or hate these they are now a fact of life in Scotland.

Some developers gift money to local communities to help ameliorate the proximity and disturbance caused by their presence. This however, is a voluntary gesture. I think that the above bill should make this contribution mandatory, and also, in light of the number of turbines that there are in the country BACK DATE this so that all turbine owners are contributing to local areas and “Spreading the Wealth” that these turbines are generating for them.

Thank you,

M. Cathy Vincent (Mrs).
Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (CEB)
Evidence submitted to Local Government and Regeneration (LGR) Committee by the Forest Policy Group 5th September 2014

The Forest Policy Group welcomes this opportunity to submit evidence to the LGR Committee on the Community Empowerment Bill.

Forest Policy Group
The Forest Policy Group (FPG) supports the development of sustainable forestry in Scotland by producing well researched and authoritative policy guidance. Its membership is drawn from woodland management organisations, forestry and land use professionals and timber processors and users. The group subscribe to a view of forestry in which:

- environmental and social issues are treated as core parts of forestry on an equal footing with industrial timber interests; and
- diversity is actively fostered – diversity of tree species and woodland types, woodland ownership, management approaches, timber production and processing, and wider economic opportunities.

The group has produced position papers on a range of topics, including Forest Ownership by Andy Wightman1.

Our response to the Community Empowerment Bill
The Scottish Government is to be congratulated for producing a far sighted and innovative piece of legislation that will allow communities to better connect with, participate in and benefit from Scottish public assets. The FPG commends most elements of the CEB and we are hopeful that the Scottish Parliament will take into consideration our written evidence on the CEB.

FPG points for consideration:

1. The status of Forestry Commission Scotland as a Public Service Authority

We note that Forestry Commission Scotland (FCS) is included in Schedule 3 Relevant Authorities (introduced by section 51(1)) under the heading of Scottish Ministers. However FCS are not included in Section 2 Public Service Authorities (introduced by section 16 (1)).

We would like clarification on the status of FCS and the reason for its exclusion as a Public Service Authority. We recommend that FCS is included in the list of Public Service Authorities.

1 http://www.forestpolicygroup.org/
2. Part 4, Community Right to Buy Land – definition of the meaning of community

FPG believes that the meaning of a community body, as defined in Section 28 of the Bill, is too narrowly defined. Whilst we welcome the broadening of the eligibility of organisational types to include SCIOs, and any other body that Ministers specify in regulations, we believe that a community body should be defined by eligibility criteria, rather than specific organisational types.

Our starting point for criteria to define a community body would include:

- Being an incorporated body,
- Objectives consistent with sustainable development,
- Open membership within defined (usually geographic) parameters,
- Membership control,
- Non-profit distributing,
- Asset locked

Further, we feel it is inconsistent to include SCIOs as eligible community bodies but not other types of community organisation for example a community benefit society.

In Section 28(2) of the Bill, Ministers will be able to make orders allowing other organisational types of community bodies to be eligible. Our concern with this level of non-specificity is that there is no certainty as to when this might happen or what the mechanism for making an allowance order is. Clarification on these points is welcomed.

3. Part 5, Asset Transfer Requests

We believe that the treatment of a Community Transfer Body, as outlined in Section 50, and which includes the definition of a ‘community controlled body’, as outlined in Section 14 of the Bill, is good.

However there is a potential conflict between a community controlled body as defined in the CEB and the definition given in the Public Services Reform (Scotland) Act 2010, which restricts eligibility to companies limited by guarantee (Section 7C). This issue only applies to leasing for forestry purposes from Forestry Commission Scotland (FCS) and it arises from restrictions in the Forestry Act (1967) on FCS’s ability to delegate its responsibilities.

This anomaly in definitions, whereby greater flexibility in the definition of a community body is required, could be dealt with by placing an amendment to the Public Services Reform (Scotland) Act 2010 in Schedule 4 (introduced by section 98(1)), Minor and Consequential Amendments.

We are concerned that there appears to be a catch all in Section 52(3) in respect of requests for transfer by purchase which conflicts with the flexible definition of Community Transfer Body, as outlined above;
Section 52(3) provides that a request for transfer of ownership of land may only be made by a community transfer body which meets the criteria set out in section 53, in addition to being covered by section 50. This means it must be a company, or a Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisation (SCIO), or a body designated as a community transfer body under section 50, where the designation states that the body may make a request for transfer of ownership. Classes of bodies may also be designated as eligible to make a request for transfer of ownership.

This is a confusing piece of phraseology and it is not clear by what process and what criteria Ministers will designate a community transfer body in Sections 50(2) (a) and 53(1) (c) of the Bill.

The FPG suggest that Asset Transfer Request eligibility be applied to any incorporated community controlled body that has a written constitution as outlined in Section 14, and no restrictions on community definition; the manner of community body incorporation being open for Ministers to designate.

In conclusion, we hope that our submission contributes positively to the LGR Committee consideration of the CEB and we are happy to give further written and oral evidence.
The Scottish Sports Alliance thanks the Local Government and Regeneration Committee for the opportunity to contribute to this call for written evidence. The Bill has the potential to increase the contribution of sport to Scottish society and provides significant opportunities for Governing Bodies of sport in Scotland, sports clubs and others. We welcome the chance to engage with its development.

The Scottish Sports Alliance comprises: the Scottish Sports Association (SSA), the Scottish Association of Local Sports Councils (SALSC) and Scottish Student Sport (SSS). Together the Scottish Sports Alliance represents 52 Scottish Governing Bodies (SGBs) of sport, 40 Local Sports Councils and Scotland’s sizeable student population across further and higher education. Collectively our members provide opportunities for the development and delivery of voluntary sport and provide a formal structure for the over 900,000 individuals in Scotland who are members of one of Scotland’s 13,000 sports clubs. Most of these organisations are run on a not-for-profit basis and are managed by volunteers. They provide coaching, competition and participation development opportunities for their local communities and most of the 150,000 people who volunteer in sport do so within the club structure.

The Scottish Sports Alliance has compiled this response following consultation, as always, with members.

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill: Local Government and Regeneration Committee Call for Evidence: September 2014

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

As stated in SCVO’s response, the Community Empowerment Bill is a small part of the change required to enable more empowered communities. Rather, it will act as a framework to facilitate communities in making use of the provisions it provides. However, it will be a willingness and positive attitude both from community groups and local authorities that will ensure communities in Scotland become more empowered.

There are a number of areas which present potential opportunities for sport:

Right to participate

This provides the opportunity for established sports clubs/organisations to have formal dialogue with public authorities to optimise facility use and services. An example of an area where this could really provide benefit would be in ensuring optimal community use of the available school estate. At the moment there is a significant gap between available space/facilities and what is actually utilised by the local community.

http://www.sportscotland.org.uk/Documents/Research_Reports/School_estate_audit_-_overall_report_July_2013.pdf. Discussion of timetabling/programming of such facilities would be a strong example of how dialogue between clubs and public bodies could be productive in improving service delivery. The above referenced school estate report, conducted by sportscotland, highlighted programming to be one of the key areas for improvement in tackling this under-use issue. A range of Community Sports Hub examples demonstrate the efficiencies and optimal usage when community clubs are engaged and involved in facility programming. Utilising such a community approach to engage community clubs in programming for the whole portfolio of local authority sports facilities would be a relatively simple but highly effective development.

It is important that this provision would be complementary to, rather than compromising of, already established positive relationships that exist between local authorities and sports clubs. In local authorities’ reviewing of applications to participate, the Alliance would see this provision being most effective where the participation of a range of community bodies is facilitated (ensuring a wide representation of the sporting community, rather than overly sport-specific). The focus should be on demonstrating wider community interest and sustainability, rather than personal interest. Perhaps bodies such as Local Sports Councils could be highly effective in supporting and facilitating this process.

Ultimately community sport bodies have a great deal of knowledge which, if further shared in partnership with local authorities, could see significant service improvement. This could then result in increased usage, improved efficiencies and enhanced services. The potential provided by the right for community sports clubs to be involved in enhancing the programming of facilities and delivery of services is highly significant and greatly welcomed.

Requesting rights in relation to property & community right to buy
Where requests are successful and if a community has an active desire to do so, community management – as well as ownership - of facilities could also provide the opportunity for more efficient facilities and services for some communities. Facility costs could be reduced with good management of a previously under-performing property/land. This increased quality could attract higher use of facilities resulting in savings, which overall increases community engagement. It is worth considering the potential impact on Leisure Trusts, were a sports group to rent/purchase land/property from them. Could this create new competition in the sport facility market and potentially bring user costs down (but at risk of reducing maintenance income to facilities)?

However, serious concerns remain around exactly what local authorities will be labelling ‘assets’. For the most part it is unlikely that it will be facilities that are profitable and in a good state of repair, therefore concerns remain around whether an ‘asset’ would actually be a long-term liability.

Furthermore, in the case of management rather than ownership of facilities/land, for community group stability there needs to be provision for long term lease arrangements. A more detailed breakdown of what management would mean for a community group and the benefits it could provide would be welcomed.

Rate Relief
The Bill proposes that rate relief be managed at local level, allowing each local authority to allocate relief based on its own budget and areas where relief is proven to be most needed. Increased rate relief for established sports clubs who currently, or in the future through community empowerment, manage/own facilities will make this more appealing. For example, the current proposed review of the Water and Sewerage Exemption Scheme would only be open to charities and CASCs; there are a lot of structured, efficient clubs who are neither of these and so would not benefit from the proposed change to these exemptions. Therefore, schemes which take into account the reality of sports club structures in Scotland are welcomed. Clubs/organisations demonstrating social benefit to the community from voluntary sport, should be able to demonstrate this and receive rate relief.

The vague language of this part of the Bill does, however, raise concerns – although it provides the opportunity for rate relief to be reflective of local needs and increase those who benefit from it, it also presents a risk in that a local authority could drastically reduce rate relief to the detriment of community groups. This provision should not be seen as an opportunity for local authorities to make cuts to this particular area.

Community Planning Partnerships (CPPs)
Our members support the opportunity for increased dialogue between CPPs and sportscotland. Improved communication in this area will ensure CPPs are aware of what sportscotland, and sport more widely, is doing to deliver a breadth of local outcomes (including outcomes beyond sport) and how these contribute to CPP outcomes more widely. In addition to this, our members continue to advocate for greater involvement of community sport and voluntary sports clubs through the wider Community Planning process. Whilst we support increased communications between sportscotland and CPPs, our members could not more strongly advocate the involvement of local sports clubs and other voluntary sports organisations within wider integrated CPP networks; the potential of this in relation to the Right to Participate provision and more integrated approaches to prevention is significant.

Participatory Budgeting

Our members support the principle of participatory budgeting. As suggested by SCVO and the submission from Barnardo’s Scotland/The Poverty Alliance/Oxfam, a certain budgetary percentage could be set aside to act as a further trial in the development of this principle. Managing competing interests between community groups would be the key challenge.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

The overall effect should be positive. Through right to participate especially, facilitated involvement of community sports groups could feed in useful information to improve service delivery and optimise the use of the portfolio of a local authority’s sports facilities.

Effective partnerships and collaborations have regularly been shown to be key in improving local outcomes – the Bill provides a framework to establish new effective relationships and improve dialogue for existing ones.

Awareness: Most important is accessibility to and awareness of such processes, allowing a level playing field, particularly for community groups who may not be legislatively aware. Local authorities have the key role in ensuring groups are aware of the opportunities the Bill presents. The Bill should have in place appropriate timescales to allow community groups to draw on all available resources. Local authorities should clearly outline how they plan to raise community awareness of the Bill, indicating how partners such as ourselves at the Scottish Sports Alliance, and others, can assist in ensuring the opportunities it presents are widely publicised and facilitated.

Capacity: The role of effective capacity building in community empowerment will be key. For sport there is an opportunity to strengthen local clubs but the right support needs to be in place for this to happen. Although recognising the need for this capacity building, the Bill does not pinpoint any statutory measures that would facilitate this. As stated by SCVO, different communities have different capacities and will therefore need different types of support to realise their ambitions.

Assets versus Liability – covering costs: There is a significant degree of risk in handing over the management or ownership of buildings/land – which may result to be a liability, not asset – to community groups who then rely on national grant bodies (ie sportscotland) to support refurbishment or improve a service. What is the situation where a community group has taken on ownership/management that then suffers damage through force majeure with repair costs beyond the capacity of the group? What mitigation plans for such a situation will be in the legislation to protect both the facility/land and its community group buyers/management? Facility repairs can be further complicated too when involving property/land of historic significance. The Bill is strongly lacking in an explanation as to how groups are to be funded – this needs to be addressed.

There are costs too potentially, in ensuring clubs/groups are well enough equipped and have the capacity to participate to the level that the legislation may allow. Upfront costs may be needed to support community groups for longer term gains.
Employer Supported Volunteering: Volunteers are critical to the success of this Bill; they are its key enablers. The Bill can help to empower them but we also need to enable their involvement. They will drive projects from their conception through to delivery and then maintain them. As such, we believe that the Scottish Government should lead by example, supported by businesses across the country, and should strongly encourage measures to support their staff to help to increase the numbers of volunteers and ensure individuals are able to commit support to such projects. These measures should also enable a constant wave of new volunteers, whilst also leaving a monumental legacy for volunteering following the recent Commonwealth Games in Glasgow. As such, our members seek wider backing for Employer-Supported Volunteering to sustain regular (week in, week out; month in, month out) volunteering, which is the lifeblood of sport in Scotland and of civic and social society.

Areas where clarity is required:

Right to participate: where there is disagreement with a local authority’s decision to allow a request or not, who will arbitrate this? There is a need for a neutral body.

Like SCVO, we too are concerned that the legislation as drafted wouldn’t permit a community to initiate an outcome improvement process for a service that does not already exist. This could prevent communities from working with public bodies to design and develop a new service in their area that is a priority for them.

Asset-transfer and funding: how will the local authority decide between competing groups’ proposals, both claiming ‘community interest’ – what are the specific criteria that define community interest?

As stated earlier in this document, the risk of local authorities listing liabilities rather than assets, is a strong concern. The knock on costs of a community group taking on management or ownership of property/land that requires high levels of investment presents an issue in itself in terms of how this will be funded – the financing of this aspect of community empowerment needs to be clear. Where is this likely to come from? What are the likely sources?

Defining a community group: from a sports perspective it is unclear where Leisure Trusts sit in terms of definition. Leisure Trusts commonly refer to themselves as social enterprises – does this therefore put Trusts in the running alongside much smaller (and lesser resourced) community groups to manage or take over ownership/management of properties? By counter to the aforementioned prospect of increased competition, the risk of Leisure Trusts themselves taking over facilities on a large scale could actually decrease competition in the sports market and cause participation costs to rise.

Rate relief – although a potentially positive provision, the language on this isn’t clear and further clarification is required to ensure that existing resources will not simply be spread more thinly or compromised.

5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

There is a likelihood that those most likely to take up community empowerment opportunities are those already actively engaged and well-resourced in the community. Local authorities need to ensure opportunities are well publicised in the community, especially to those groups who may benefit but need it to be brought to their attention that community empowerment is a means of achieving such benefit.

Asset-grabbing: Increased community empowerment could lead to those with the most resources taking over facilities/land. Systems/legislation need to ensure that local facilities continue to be available for the whole community and that access is not restricted. Community owned facilities should be widely sustainable and not overly advantage one group over another.
Volunteering: Although it makes reference to the importance of volunteers in Scotland’s communities and its commitment (non-legislative) to funds such as the Volunteering Support Fund, the Bill does not propose any measures to support the role of volunteers in facilitating community empowerment. With increased community empowerment will come an increased demand on volunteers. See our point about Employer-Supported Volunteering in Question 3.

All community applications regardless of location/interest should have to demonstrate wider community benefit. Facilitation from local authorities to equip those most in need with the necessary tools/training will be key.

The Scottish Sports Alliance thanks the Committee for the opportunity to contribute to this call for evidence. We take this opportunity to register the interest of the Alliance in being called for verbal evidence on this issue. Please do not hesitate to contact us if we can be of further assistance.

Call for Evidence on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

Response from Orkney Islands Council

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

We welcome the empowerment of our local communities, particularly the emphasis on subsidiarity – the Bill echoes the important messages set out in the ‘Our Islands Our Future’ Campaign and endorsed by the Scottish Government in their response: ‘Empowering Scotland’s Island Communities’. Orkney Islands Council already has a range of initiatives underway which contribute to local community empowerment and has an existing culture of welcoming community bodies wishing to participate in an outcome improvement process.

For these reasons we assume that a community body wishing to participate in a local authority process would still be able to simply pick up the phone and ask, and not be statutorily bound to follow the prescribed process. Given their limited capacity, it could be that this requirement might put off local bodies, rather than empower them. Ideally the legislation should be there to be resorted to if the simpler route to participation were to be blocked, rather than being obligatory on every occasion.

With regard to the Community Right to Buy, we are not aware of any instance since the introduction of this legislation in 2003 when it has been used in Orkney. It is unlikely that the changes in the current Bill will have much impact due to local circumstances, partly as the Council provides existing support to local communities through its assets.

With regard to Allotments, most of the provisions in the Bill relate to new duties for local authorities. There is little new empowerment for communities in Orkney since the Council already consults and invites representation on new policy. The new entitlement to grow and sell food is the most significant new empowerment.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

With regard to community planning, the statutory bodies already participate willingly and the Bill will enshrine in statute the Orkney status quo. Where it might make a difference, however, is in empowering the statutory partners to devote as much time and resource to community planning as they would like to do, but have on occasion found to be incompatible with competing demands.

Parts of the Bill will generate more bureaucracy for public sector authorities, especially if, as explored above, following the prescribed statutory processes is to be obligatory for community bodies and not simply available for their use if required. Any additional bureaucracy carries a cost.
The Allotments legislation will benefit both local authorities and communities, not least by clarifying their responsibilities. However, it will create additional workload such as the development of a food strategy, annual reports, development of websites etc.

Orkney’s communities are relatively well empowered already, with a thriving network of community councils supported centrally by the Council. Several islands have Development trusts and are supported by community planning partners to employ Local Development Officers. Others have done so in the past, using the resource to compile local development plans and raise funds for local economic development, notably wind turbines. This has helped many of the islands to become more resilient. The Partnership is now piloting a new initiative – the Community Empowerment Scheme – in two of the smaller isles, with the aim of enabling them to take on more contracts locally, and we look forward to rolling this out to other island communities in due course.

Quieter local voices may need advocacy to ensure that they are heard by decision makers. Orkney’s Third Sector Interface, Voluntary Action Orkney, has many years’ experience in supporting local voluntary bodies and social enterprises, offering a range of professional and support services and representing their interests on local and national forums. The value of this work has long been appreciated in Orkney. We are therefore disappointed that the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill not only fails to include Third Sector Interfaces (TSIs) among its list of statutory community planning partners at Schedule 1, but does not make any reference to the Third Sector at all. This is doubly disappointing given that the 2012 consultation asked specifically: "How can the third sector work with Community Planning partners and communities to ensure the participation of communities in the Community Planning process?" We feel that the Bill has missed a vital opportunity to acknowledge and embed the essential contribution of the Third Sector to empowering communities. To do so would have helped to empower the TSIs themselves by giving them legitimacy as equal partners in the community planning process.

4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

Part 2

4. Community planning

(3) Outcomes of the type mentioned in subsection (2) (“local outcomes”) must be consistent with the national outcomes determined under section 1(1) or revised under section 2(4)(a).
The meaning of "consistent" in this clause will need clarification, either here in the Bill or in the accompanying statutory guidance. In our response to the draft Bill in January 2014, we endorsed the Scottish Government's adoption of national outcomes but advised that they should not be cascaded to CPP level as every CPP will have its own local priorities. As it happens, Orkney's current SOA lists key local priorities aligned to each one of the 16 national outcomes, and is therefore perfectly consistent with them, but as a result has been criticised for being too lengthy and losing its local focus. Sixteen outcomes is too large a number for an SOA.

Part 2

8. Governance

(1) For the area of each local authority, each community planning partner mentioned in subsection (2) must—
   (a) facilitate community planning,
   (b) take reasonable steps to ensure that the community planning partnership carries out its functions under this Part efficiently and effectively.

(2) The persons are—
   (a) the local authority,
   (b) the Health Board constituted under section 2(1)(a) of the National Health Service (Scotland) Act 1978 whose area includes, or is the same as, the area of the local authority,
   (c) Highlands and Islands Enterprise where the area within which, or in relation to which, it exercises functions in accordance with section 21(1) of the Enterprise and New Towns (Scotland) Act 1990 includes the whole or part of the area of the local authority,
   (d) the chief constable of the Police Service of Scotland,
   (e) the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service,
   (f) Scottish Enterprise.

The Bill does not specify that Scottish Enterprise and HIE are alternatives, i.e. HIE will be the responsible partner body in the Highlands and Islands and Scottish Enterprise elsewhere. This should be clarified. Scottish Enterprise is not a relevant body in Orkney.

SCHEDULE 1
(introduced by section 4(1))
COMMUNITY PLANNING PARTNERS

The list of community planning partners does not include Third Sector Interfaces. As noted above at question 3, we see this as a major omission and would ask that this be remedied before the Bill progresses any further.

PART 7

ALLOTMENTS

Part 7 of the Bill is helpful in such that it makes clear who is responsible for what, what can be challenged and the way in which that should be done.
5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

There is very little in the assessment of impacts on island communities in the Policy Memorandum. As noted in our response to the 2012 consultation, the protected characteristics enshrined in the Equality Act 2010 do not include the key equality consideration for island populations, which is geographical access. We would like to see this addressed as a matter of course in all assessments of impacts on island communities.

In relation to Part 7, and the impact on island communities, we do not foresee there being a shortage of land in Orkney to provide additional allotments. The problem here could be providing sites within a short travelling distance from the two towns.

It would be helpful if the Bill could be screened to ensure that the potential future developments set out in the Island Areas Ministerial Working Group report of June 2014, "Empowering Scotland’s Island Communities", could be accommodated by future legislation within the broader provisions of the current Bill.

Orkney Islands Council
5 September 2014

- To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

The intentions behind the Bill of making it much easier for communities to take more of an active role in local public services are clearly articulated and positive. However the Bill is limited in terms of specific measures proposed and how they will be achieved. The quality of any secondary legislation introduced will be key to successful implementation and this needs to be developed with strong input from the COSLA Working Group and input from others who are at the heart of working with communities and fully understand what works or doesn’t work.

Overall, language and terminology could be more clearly defined and explained in the Bill making it more accessible and easy to understand for communities and to broaden active participation. The Bill should reflect the fact that the landscape of community engagement and empowerment is fast evolving, and not just in Scotland.

- What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

The Bill provides opportunities for public authorities to strengthen and improve service design and delivery through ongoing dialogue with communities about aspirations, priorities and needs. Transferring physical assets and more effectively meeting need in high demand communities will reduce public spend. However this can only take place where asset transfer and community capacity have been developed to a sufficient level to improve outcomes. There will be organisational and skills development needs for staff who need support to work with communities differently. The public sector will need new wider approaches to community engagement and empowerment to ensure that new approaches to local public services are genuinely representative of communities as a whole. There will be a challenge to ensure that the most deprived communities benefit from the Bill as they can require the most support to affect change in their locality, and this will have resource implications for public sector organisations.

At the same time, public sector organisations will need to think about risk appetite and overall risk management when working in new ways. An organisational mindset which sees communities as often best placed to develop local solutions to local issues will be critical. Equally there is a need to maintain accountability to the wider public in how local services are run, and the reasons for approving or refusing asset transfers or other community-led approaches to running local services must be transparent. If local asset transfers or other community-led schemes fail, all the risk and cost will return to the public sector and there may be damage to relationships within partnerships and communities as a result, with local assets becoming potentially unused and unusable by communities and public sector alike.

There is no single answer to this: what works in communities will always be context specific and driven by the issues which communities themselves have identified as important for them. What is clear is that legislation alone won’t bring about the changes required. The levels of capacity and willingness within communities to get more involved in doing more for themselves is a key consideration, and effective dialogue between public service organisations and communities about who can provide what will also be central.

Generally those communities experiencing the most inequalities will require the most support to take advantage of the Bill provisions, some of which are very technical in terms of the process to be followed. In the case of asset transfer requests there has to be a honest and open appraisal of what community capacity exists at the outset; how best public authorities (and other partners, including the voluntary and private sector) can help develop that capacity; what social enterprise model is most appropriate for managing the asset to be transferred; and what risk apportionment is appropriate between the transferring public authority and the community, particularly during the transition phase and initial operating period.

Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

We welcome the explicit duties on all public authorities to participate in Community Planning. We have no objection in principle to making the establishment of CPPs a statutory requirement, but we are not clear about what specific value this will bring. CPPs already exist within every local authority area and it is quite clear to Councils and CP partners that their existence is an imperative. The issue is not the existence of the CPP. The issue is the effectiveness of Community Planning as currently provided for within the LGISA 2003. The accountability of individual CP partners remains a critical success factor for Community Planning in Scotland. We recognise that accountability lines can never be simple in a world of complex public service requirements. There is insufficient detail about accountability and reporting requirements on CP partners and how these would be strengthened in practice to ensure a shift of emphasis away from process (attending meetings, contributing to the drafting of the SOA, etc) and towards effective collaborative action focussed on place based preventative delivery which improves outcomes for communities. It is not clear how new reporting mechanisms would be monitored, or intervention/enforcement would be affected in relation to CP partners which did not meet their new accountabilities.

We are not convinced that increased focus on Common Good (CG) is the most effective way to achieve the Bill’s policy aims. CG is an inefficient administrative burden on local authorities, and can divert resources from wider good work done by local authorities to deliver local services in partnership with communities. If, however, CG is here to stay, encouraging Community Councils and other community bodies to input to decisions relating to the identification, use and disposal of a CG property will be of benefit if undertaken in the spirit of openness and togetherness, and not as a token gesture. The parameters in relation to CG do need to be made clear. CG land is owned by the Council and local authorities have existing responsibilities to ensure it is used effectively. For example, Community Councils are often under the impression (wrongly) that the CG land belongs to them.

There are a number of excellent examples of effective community engagement and capacity building in the North Perth area and we would welcome any visits as part of the evidence collecting process.
Consultation on the Community Empowerment and Renewal Bill 2014
Evidence from Strathblane Community Council

A Real Future for Community-level Democracy in Scotland?
Strathblane Community Council is pleased to take this opportunity to comment on the draft Bill. In making our comments we draw on our experience as an active and relatively effective Community Council in a rural/commuting community of about 1000 households which has an increasingly active, membership based Community Development Trust with whom we have good working relationships.

Of the five questions we are asked to address, therefore, we will focus on the following two in our evidence:

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities— please give reasons for your answer? ........

Some Valuable Proposals but an Opportunity Missed
We welcome the Bill and support its general objectives and, despite some concern over its ‘omnibus’ and ‘catch-all’ form, we see most of the specific changes proposed as potentially beneficial for the empowerment of local communities. We consider, however, that a major opportunity to establish a clear structure of democratic governance at the local community level is being missed. In what follows we therefore focus our comments on a set of core aspects of the Bill which we feel are insufficiently defined. Whilst it is good that the policy draws on principles from the report of the Christie Commission, we also wish to highlight the seven principles from the equally important recent report of the Commission on Strengthening Local Democracy. In particular we would stress one principle not much highlighted elsewhere, that of interdependency — ‘spheres not tiers of government’.

Community Councils as the Anchor Institution for Community Building
For community engagement to be successful in a local area requires, first, a real feeling of community identity, of belonging, on the part of its residents and, second, a democratically answerable anchor institution. For that institution to be effective it must have substance beyond the representation of community views to planning partners and other parts of government. We believe it should have autonomous responsibility for a designated set of provisions for its community for which it is only answerable to its local electorate: that is it should be a separate sphere of governance. Missing from the present proposals are measures to establish real community-building along these lines. The only realistic starting point for this type of democratic ‘anchor’ institution in Scotland is the Community Council (CC).
The Present Limitations of Community Councils

Many CCs are already effective in representing community views to local government and other planning partners and in campaigning, along with other groups in their community, on vital issues. Strathblane can illustrate success in both respects. Most notable is the case of a wholly successful campaign—which reached the UK national media and brought action from both UK both Scottish and UK governments—in support of a local residents association to ensure that blameless residents did not suffer the cost of rectifying contaminated land.

And yet the limitations to our potential effectiveness are also easily demonstrated. First, we discover we have no right of representation on the Management Board of Mugdock Country Park, a public facility which lies in our area and is extensively used by our residents, who in various ways may be affected by decisions taken by the Board. As a CC we also find have no power to refer a planning application which the community feels is detrimental to its general welfare to a Planning Panel.

We recognize first, that the working of CCs, and indeed their very existence, may be extremely uneven, both over time and throughout Scotland, and, that as presently constituted they cannot adequately take the step of becoming, in the Commission’s terms an autonomous sphere of government. In practice CCs can neither independently raise significant funds for projects, nor employ their own staff.

These limitations have led to the growth of a range of Community Development Trusts (CDTs), admirable in most of what they do and, like many local groups, drawing in volunteers who may not wish to fulfill a community wide democratically elected role on a CC. Although many have close relationships to their Community Councils (as currently in Strathblane) CDTs are not anchored by democratic accountability to their communities as a whole.

Community Councils Must Be the Anchor institution of Community Governance

There are many places throughout Europe to which we might go for examples of effective community level government. Visitors here from France and Germany look askance at the lack of any formal institutions of community governance in a community of the size of Strathblane. But we need not go to the extent of the French Commune system in attempting to rectify things. Much closer to home the English Parish/Town Council regime gives us examples of what might be done. There a Parish Council, often in a community much smaller than Strathblane, has designated revenue and a set of powers for which it is not answerable to ‘superior’ levels of government and, at the same time the institutional set-up is flexible enough to recognize the different character and needs of different types and sizes of community – village, small and larger towns, and cities. Subsidiarity does not necessarily mean hierarchy.

We are pleased that the Bill envisages the possibility of local authorities devolving responsibility for the delivery of services for which they are responsible to CCs (or other community organizations). But that is not sufficient. As in most other countries in Western Europe our community governance institutions should form an autonomous sphere of democratic government with its own appropriate share of funding as a right, rather than remain as mere creatures of local authorities as at present.

Whilst they must certainly continue to fulfill their function of collecting and passing on to other spheres of government and public service providers the views of community members on the planning and delivery of services — and on all issues affecting the commonweal of their community, in addition, CCs should be wholly responsible for the provision of that more limited range of local facilities and services whose form and shape is entirely a matter for local community members. These might include grass cutting and the maintenance of public space and footpaths, community halls, public toilets and similar facilities. In many areas the experience and expertise of the volunteers that CDTs and other community groups can mobilize could be important here but democratic accountability is vital and CDTs should therefore become, in one form or another, ‘arms’ of their local CC.

The lack of definition in the Bill of the ‘community organisations’ to be empowered is a significant cause for concern. It is all very well for a community controlled body to have a constitution and a majority of Board Members from the community but there remains every chance it would not represent the whole community which CCs in their constitution must. What is proposed could very divisive in communities — the very opposite of what is intended (and something we have suffered in Strathblane in the recent past).

Genuine empowerment of CCs as a sphere of community-level government would increase their standing and do much to bring forward more volunteers for election. There would be a need to adapt the some features of the operation of CCs to the varying conditions of communities of differing size and character: cooperation between CCs in rural groupings of small village communities is one obvious possibility.

The Bill should specify that Community Councils would be the ‘anchor’ community organisation throughout the country, and only where exceptional local circumstances dictated otherwise would some alternative body be considered. In addition it should raise the standing of Community Councils as autonomous sphere of government with their own funding and powers.

The very possibility of genuine community-level democracy in Scotland is at stake!

Overview

Faith in Community Scotland (FiCS) welcomes the opportunity to respond to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee’s call for evidence on the Community Empowerment and Renewal Bill. This response is based on the insights and expertise of the local communities we have worked with, as well as the observations of our community development practitioners and discussions we have had with a range of other interested parties including Oxfam, SCVO and the Third Sector Forum.

Key Points

- A wider cultural change is necessary for effective community empowerment in Scotland, with legislation being a small, but not insignificant, part of it.
- People are our greatest assets.
- Communities empower themselves. Local and national governments, public service bodies, politicians third sector and voluntary organisations should all play a supportive, not a directive, role in building the capacities of communities towards this.
- Power cannot be given to one section of society without another party losing it. This needs to be clearly articulated in the bill.
- More participatory models of decision making are required. Participatory Budgeting and other schemes have a proven track record of enhanced outcomes, not least for areas with low engagement and constrained finances.
- A human rights and equalities based approach should be adopted, which places tackling inequality in particular as a core objective of the legislation.

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

Whilst recognising the importance of legislation for the promotion of community empowerment, it should be placed within a wider need for seismic change in our decision making culture. What is lacking from the legislation in this regard is a genuine commitment to more participatory models of decision making and clear transfers of power to local communities.

Agendas which are top down will not empower communities and can often in fact disempower them. Instead, what is required is a bottom up approach with governments, civil servants, politicians and those in the third sector playing a supportive, rather than a directive, role.

Communities empower themselves. In discussion with some of its commissioners, the Poverty Truth Commission has heard the successes and broad appreciation for previously participative mechanisms, such as the Neighbourhood Forums. Participatory Budgeting was strongly welcomed by the commissioners, who saw it as an opportunity to overcome many of the barriers which currently prevent them from meaningfully engaging.

We support the SCVO’s call for 10% of the total public sector budget in each local authority to be decided by Participatory Budgeting. The predicted benefits are numerous, including:

- Better decisions being made and improved outcomes
- Outcomes which authentically reflect people’s priorities
• Improved collaboration between public agencies
• Greater participation in democratic processes
• Greater transparency and accountability in public spending decisions
• Improved trust between communities and public bodies
• Greater understanding of the public’s views
• Greater understanding of the reach and limitations of local authorities
• Increased Social Capital

FiCS welcomes the Commission on Strengthening Local Democracies’ commitment to participatory democracy:

‘The right of individuals and communities to local democracy needs legislative expression through a clear duty in law to support and resource participation in decision making. Democratic innovations such as deliberative assemblies, participatory budgeting and citizen scrutiny of public services should also become the standards by which this is delivered in Scotland.

‘Implementing arrangements for participatory budgeting that go beyond a consultation on predetermined options for budget cuts, and instead focus on local tax and spend priorities.’

Power cannot be given to one group in society without another section losing out. This must be more clearly articulated in the legislation.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

Better decisions and thus improved outcomes will only be achieved through genuine engagement which places local communities at the heart of the design and delivery of services. Public sector organisations, as well as broader society, must recognise that people are our greatest asset and not a hurdle to decision making to be overcome.

In the legislation as it stands there is an underlying risk of increased inequality. Without recognising communities of interest, and providing resources accordingly, the bill could favour those communities already well-resourced and currently better placed to act.

Significant capacity building is required to overcome this. Needs, however, must be identified by the communities themselves. Development Trusts or similar mechanisms are vital to properly support local groups to both make a bid to take control over services and to call local authorities to account.
Development Trusts and Community Land Trusts have been successful examples of a community coming together collectively and pursuing shared objectives. There seems to be a lack of recognition of these already functioning positive structures in the bill.

FiCS supports Asset Transfers in theory but these must only be followed when communities genuinely desire them. Vital information must be provided to communities as prior to purchases, with details such as the predicted maintenance costs and requirements being outlined.

A key litmus test for the bill would be to measure if participation has increased for areas currently experiencing low engagement rates.

4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

In keeping with the findings of the Christie Commission, there should be a deeper focus on ensuring meaningful participation during community planning. The ‘right to request participation’ needs to be made stronger, in order to reflect the inherent right of communities to participate in the decision making process.

FiCS supports the call from the Poverty Alliance and others for the creation of statutory regulations for engaging and empowering communities. These would be for all public bodies to follow and report on.

5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

A human rights and equalities based approach should be adopted. This places tackling inequality in particular as a core objective of the legislation, not as merely a welcomed addition as the bill currently implies it to be.

COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT BILL – CALL FOR EVIDENCE

SUMMARY OF CONCERNS

➢ No obligation for councils to work with community groups beyond consultation. This is a very tokenistic approach to community empowerment; one which does not put enough emphasis on involving under-represented groups.

➢ Too great a focus on Asset Transfer. Whilst some community groups could benefit from such legislation; access funding and also upskill their volunteers to take on a bigger responsibility, it fails to address the real needs of the thousands of youth groups, community groups and other organisations, let alone the individual volunteers who are constantly fundraising to full capacity for their group and also developing their employability skills through volunteering. Such groups would struggle to maintain additional Assets. Therefore, Asset Transfer maybe seen as being service led and not needs led. This may be seen as privatisation of the third sector.

➢ No requirement for Local Authorities to support under-represented groups, for example ethnic minority groups, non-Christian faith groups, youth run organisations or LGBT groups.

➢ Whilst it is good that multiple organisations are working together such as Community Planning Partners. These do not seem to effectively include the third sector as true partners.

➢ Scottish Ministers seem to be granted too much power by the Bill. There should be a grass roots approach to community empowerment which cannot be fully achieved from a top down approach or centralised powers.

Though not specifically to do with the Bill, I am curious why the call for evidence from the Scottish Government asks respondents to consider the ‘advantages and disadvantages’ for public sector organisations, but not for third sector/community organisations?
SUGGESTED ADDITIONS:

- Grant additional powers to community councils. For example, allow a community council representative to all council planning meetings that affect their area.

- Raise funding given to community councils to allow them to have a greater impact on local communities.

- Identify under-represented groups and create an obligation for Local Authorities to meet with representatives to discuss ways that the Community Planning Partners could work to improve the representation and conditions of these groups.

- Make funding applications from Government/Community Planning Partners easier to understand, or create an obligation for Local Authorities to assist community organisations to help with funding applications or similar forms.

- Create a greater emphasis on Community Learning and Development staff working to support existing community groups and projects.

- Creation of community hubs, where Social Workers, Nurses, CPNs, Community Wardens, etc. are given a specific area to work in. They could all use a community centre or a similar building which is accessible to the community. This could allow for the community to raise concerns they had more easily, strengthen partnership working across third sector and public sector organisations, and allow services to focus on the individual needs of an area.
Dear Sir/ Madam

COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL

The Royal Town Planning Institute (RTPI) is the champion of planning and the planning profession. We work to promote the art and science of planning for the public benefit. We have around 2,200 members in Scotland and a worldwide membership of nearly 23,000. We:

- support policy development to improve approaches to planning for the benefit of the public
- maintain the professional standards of our members
- support our members, and therefore the majority of the planning workforce, to have the skills and knowledge they need to deliver planning effectively
- maintain high standards of planning education
- develop and promote new thinking, ideas and approaches which can improve planning
- support our membership to work with others who have a role in developing places in Scotland
- improve the understanding of planning and the planning system to policy makers, politicians, practitioners and the general public.

The Institute is grateful for the opportunity to provide written evidence to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

RTPI Scotland welcomes Scottish Government's commitment to taking forward the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. RTPI Scotland fully supports the principles of community empowerment. Democratic accountability has been at the heart of planning for over sixty years, and direct public engagement for over forty. Planning and planners have a duty to all those involved in, and affected by, planning to meet their needs and aspirations, balanced with meeting social and economic objectives while protecting our built and natural heritage.

In submissions to Scottish Government on the then Community Empowerment and Renewal Bill in February 2012 and September 2012, RTPI Scotland suggested ten tests that should be met in taking forward the Community Empowerment Bill, which we still feel are good tests for taking forward the Bill:

1. It allows for a clearly stated and democratically agreed vision of national spatial priorities, including meeting needs for housing and infrastructure, and addressing the challenges of climate change;

2. It takes a broad view of sustainable development that requires all involved to place economic, social and environmental sustainability on an equal footing;

3. It does not assume that the Government’s agendas for sustainable economic growth, for meeting targets for reducing emissions and increasing renewable energy, for social inclusion and housing delivery will be achieved simply because there is the freedom of choice to do so;

4. Any duties placed on local government and others are clearly defined, are resourced and are enforceable where necessary;

5. Any rights given to communities are not token rights unsupported by resources, expertise or democratic challenge;

6. The understandable desire among communities for immediate investment in local facilities does not prejudice longer term investments to meet larger-scale needs such as hospitals, waste facilities and transport infrastructure;

7. Approaches to planning within neighbourhoods not only serves to provide what local communities desire, but also allows for what wider communities need;

8. In exercising powers over the future of their areas, communities accept and fulfil the responsibilities attached to doing so and community groups recognise that they will need to consult as well as be consulted;

9. It gives an equal opportunity for all communities to be involved in shaping their own futures, including those communities and groups whose engagement has often been neglected and have been served by Planning Aid for Scotland in the past and we hope will continue to do so in the future; and

10. It does not hamper the ability of RTPI members to continue to provide a professional, independent, un-biased, evidence-based service to all those involved in, and affected by, planning.
THE ROLE OF PLANNING
One of the key aspects of the ongoing planning reform and the introduction of the 2006 Planning Act was to create a more inclusive planning system. This Bill therefore supports and complements the Planning Act and subsequent regulations and guidance to encourage meaningful engagement of communities, and finding effective ways of engaging communities in developing the vision for their area, including through Main Issues Reports for development plans and Pre-Application Consultation for major planning applications.

Planning is an important mechanism in community engagement and in creating a vision for the future of places, including developing an understanding of the assets that they have. In particular, the Development Plan provides an opportunity for the community to discuss and openly agree its views about the future. Non-statutory planning mechanisms are also such as Supplementary Guidance and Management Plans. Planning has good practice guidance to offer in the shape of Planning Advice Notes and a tradition of community engagement, especially in the context of Development Planning and given this planners use a range of techniques to engage communities in developing an understanding of and an implementable ‘vision’ for their area. However, there is still a need for decision making on planning issues to be guided by professional expertise rooted locally.

COMMUNITY PLANNING
RTPI Scotland welcomes and supports an outcomes based approach in legislation where clear and measurable outcomes are set out and monitored to transparently set out the strategic objectives of Scottish Ministers. We support an outcomes based approach to community planning and spatial planning and we strongly believe in the importance of a more connected and integrated approach between Community Planning and Land Use Planning. If these were to be better connected in terms of outcomes, processes and procedures, it would allow for a more integrated approach and would ensure a more effective articulation of the spatial dimensions of many public sector initiatives and programmes. We welcome the references outlined in the recent Circular 6/2013: Development Planning and would support Scottish Government and COSLA to build upon this.

RTPI Scotland believes that Community Planning is too often seen as an alignment of priorities, programmes and resources among public agencies (and, sometimes, third sector organisations). Although this is important, it can often be something that isn’t articulated in terms of how it will impact on specific places. There has been community engagement in the land use planning system for over forty years, which has allowed communities to shape and influence decisions on the future of their neighbourhoods, towns, cities and regions. If Community Planning Partnerships worked more closely with the development plan process it would enable them to connect decisions on investment to particular places, which in turn could help communities to gain a better understanding of the implications of Community planning for their area. This could also embrace concepts such as ‘Total Place’ which provide a better articulation of the impacts of investment and policy on specific places.

The Institute is of the view that there is a need to ensure that a culture of subsidiarity of decision making to the right level ‘governance’ is adopted in taking forward community empowerment. This requires assessing what level will be most effective in making decisions and giving the people at these levels the power and resources to do this.
Good planning relies upon early and effective public engagement in auditing communities, analysing their needs, planning their short and long term management for community benefit, monitoring action programmes and outcomes on the ground, and reviewing circumstances. This analysis and its associated evidence base should be key considerations also for Community Planning and the development of Single Outcome Agreements.

COMMUNITY RIGHT TO BUY
RTPI Scotland supports the extension of Community Right to Buy where it can be demonstrated that it is possible for that community to own and successfully manage such land and buildings for the public benefit, and this should only be where an acceptable scheme has been identified, carefully worked up and can be afforded in both capital and revenue terms into the future. Funds will require to be identified for capacity building in communities, feasibility studies, acquisition, capital works and maintenance thereafter. Provision for professional fees should be part of the calculations. Where appropriate, local charitable Building Preservation Trusts or Community Development Trusts should be established. There should be reversion clauses which clearly explain disposal procedures in the event of Trust failure.

COMMUNITY RIGHTS
RTPI Scotland believes there is a need for clarity in the definition of "best value" and "best public benefit" in terms of the disposal of public land. This should not only be about financial value, but should also take into consideration social, community and environmental aspects, particularly in terms of the transfer of land to community or voluntary organisations. This would help to bring some consistency across Scotland. With regard to rights in relation to property, we believe that this should be framed within, or linked to the Development Plan where possible.

RTPI Scotland suggests that the Bill should consider not only the right to buy, but the right to manage as part of the community rights, and furthermore detail how this might be facilitated.

We suggest that the process would benefit from the introduction of a preparatory phase, allowing the public authority and the community or voluntary organisation to explore how these community rights might work, hopefully minimising the exposure of community organisations to risk. This could be contextualised through the planning system in the Development Plan.

SUPPORT FOR COMMUNITIES
RTPI Scotland believes that communities need to be able to understand what their powers are and to be proactive in establishing a spatial vision for the future of their area. It might be that there are more pressing issues and community requirements in certain areas than allotments. Meaningful engagement between local authorities and communities, through community groups and Community Councils is key to develop an understanding community needs, aspirations and opportunities.

Given this, RTPI Scotland believes that communities must be supported to ensure that process is not a barrier to action, making the process simple to encourage communities to develop a spatial vision for the future of their area. Communities need to be able to understand what their powers are: if they do not have appropriate expertise within the community then it should be provided externally. The upskilling of communities as to the potential power and opportunities of community groups and Community Councils to deliver local spatial aspirations will have a resource implication, but for the aspirations of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill, and also the modernised planning system to be achieved, communities must be encouraged and inspired to take a more positive and proactive approach.

There is a need to help people navigate through the process. Planning can play a role in providing this guidance, at the local planning authority level. We consider there is a case for creating a one-stop shop for best practice in innovation in empowerment. RTPI Scotland and Planning Aid for Scotland could contribute to discussions and actions on this.

I trust that you will find these comments useful. We would be happy to provide oral evidence to the Committee if they so wish. Please do not hesitate to contact me if you would like to discuss on craig.mclaren@rtpi.org.uk or 0131 229 9628.

Yours faithfully

COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL

NORTH LANARKSHIRE COUNCIL – EVIDENCE SUBMISSION

To: Clerk to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee
   Scottish Parliament
   Edinburgh
   EH99 1SPT

QUESTION ONE
To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

1. The Bill reflects the introduction of a wide range of duties on both Scottish Ministers, Community Planning partners and local authorities and provides access to a range of involvement mechanisms and opportunities for community controlled bodies to become more directly involved in the management of services and property in their local area.

2. The Bill will empower communities by embedding in legislation the right of involvement and also the mechanisms to directly impact on their geographic communities and services through the right to purchase neglected land; to purchase, lease or manage local authority land and buildings and access allotments. Communities will benefit from the clarity in process relating to asset transfer from the public sector to the third sector. The Bill creates a framework of understanding between the public and voluntary sectors and will support and inform policy develop.

3. However, alongside these rights and benefits come responsibilities and obligations (legal and otherwise) which need to be fully understood by the community organisations wishing to exercise them. It will therefore be important to ensure that resources are available to provide such support, thus ensuring that the undoubted empowerment potential of this legislation can be fully and properly realised. Similarly, the requirements of the Bill are being introduced alongside additional demands on local services through a generally ageing population, economic and resources pressures; and wider public sector reform. The challenges that all of this presents alongside achieving community empowerment should not be underestimated.

4. Notwithstanding the above cautionary notes, North Lanarkshire Council is committed to actively involving communities in the shaping and delivery of public services and an outcome based approach to regeneration. Traditionally this has been achieved via North Lanarkshire Community Planning Partnership (NLP) and a programme of consultation via our citizens’ panel, resident’s survey, subject specific consultation exercises and recent community participative budgetary exercises.

5. North Lanarkshire Council is committed to developing and growing the social economy, and specifically opportunities for social enterprise, as a vehicle to empowering communities. Our new social enterprise framework 2013-2018 sets out how the Council and partners will work with communities to develop capacity, realise opportunities, develop community assets and build responsive purchasing arrangements. The Council is currently developing a new Community Asset Transfer policy and is piloting three projects to inform the final policy. The new Bill will support us in this process and provides a mechanism for communities to make informed decisions and have their say about local service delivery.

QUESTION TWO
What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

6. There are potential benefits arising from more clearly defined rights and responsibilities in community planning and participatory democracy; however there could be some additional and un-quantified costs for local authorities as referred to in paragraph 3 above. For example direct costs associated with the need... for professional services, such as legal advice, or capacity building to support community involvement and participation.

7. There is also a real risk that the Bill could widen inequalities by creating further opportunities for those communities who already have the capacity to take action. Ensuring that people in the most deprived and marginalised communities have the same opportunities and can exercise their rights effectively will be a significant challenge for the Bill. Some communities will need additional support and guidance to progress their ideas and develop projects. There is a risk that any regulations and duties emerging will encourage a culture of minimal requirements for compliance rather than a culture shift towards co-production.

QUESTION THREE

8. There is considerable and extensive expertise within the third sector which positions some community organisations to take advantage of the Bill’s provisions. These capabilities, both within and between communities, however, are variable. There are excellent examples of organisations that would be capable of taking advantage of the Bill’s provisions but these skills levels are not universal. It will be necessary to ensure that all community organisations have access to the appropriate level of legal and developmental support to allow them to utilise the provisions of this Bill. This support could be provided through organisations such as the Third Sector Interfaces and/or Law Centres or through direct financial support to community organisations themselves but it will require additional resources to be made available from Scottish Government as it will be unlikely that this work can be accommodated within existing resources. Where capacity needs to be improved community development support will be key to achieving sustained success within communities and projects.

9. North Lanarkshire Partnership has a long history of working with communities to shape and deliver local services and structures and arrangements are kept under review to ensure that they remain fit for purpose and make the best use of opportunities available. It is recommended that the Bill incorporates sufficient flexibility to enable community planning partnerships to review existing structures and put in place improvement actions as part of its local outcomes improvement plan review. All partners and community bodies should sign up to this plan and the underlying principles of cooperation and partnership working to deliver the agreed outcomes.

QUESTION FOUR

Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

10. No additional comments other than those expressed elsewhere.

QUESTION FIVE

What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

11. The assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development appear considered and measured.

SPECIFIC BILL PROVISIONS – PART ONE

National Outcomes Places a duty on Scottish Ministers to develop, consult on and publish a set of national outcomes for Scotland, which builds on The national outcomes must be reviewed at least once every 5 years. They must also regularly and publicly report progress towards those outcomes.

12. This duty would seem appropriate given the community planning duties being proposed for other public sector bodies.
13. In terms of Part 1, subsection (2), the list ought to be more prescriptive (i.e. it should identify who Scottish Ministers will consult with in terms of determining the national outcomes and any associated, subsequent revisions). Or, at least, public bodies ought to be able to apply to ministers to have their views considered. In terms of subsection (5), once again, the list ought to be more prescriptive or alternatively provision ought to be made to allow public bodies to have their views considered.

SPECIFIC BILL PROVISIONS – PART TWO

Seeks to put Community Planning Partnerships on a statutory basis with defined roles and responsibilities, and place new duties on public sector partners to play a full and active role in community planning and the resourcing and delivery of local priority outcomes.

14. This provision will reinforce the importance of the community planning process and provide the necessary legislative support should partners not be engaging fully in the process. In addition the inclusion of provisions in respect of Single Outcome Agreements (or local outcome improvement plans) will also ensure that these plans have a similar status to other strategic planning arrangements for public sector organisations. In addition the Bill places responsibility on public bodies to commit appropriate resources to achieve these outcomes by ensuring that the mechanisms and processes for community planning and joint resourcing are embedded in legislation. It is, however, still not clear how these powers will blend in practice with existing accountability and audit mechanisms.

SPECIFIC BILL PROVISIONS – PART THREE

Participation Requests This provides a mechanism for communities to have a more proactive role in having their voices heard in how services are planned and delivered. Schedule 2 lists “public service authorities” to whom participation requests can be made.

15. Whilst the principle of a mechanism to support communities’ proactive involvement in service delivery and planning is to be welcomed, it is not clear how effective the process outlined in the Bill will be in delivering truly effective involvement. All public bodies have a long history and well developed involvement and participation processes in place to facilitate both service planning and delivery. For example, North Lanarkshire Housing Service takes a pro-active role in ensuring the voices of tenants and residents are considered by virtue of Tenant Participation legislation introduced in the Housing (Scotland) Act 2001. In addition the Scottish Social Housing Charter and regulations introduced to promote Tenant Scrutiny ensure we are constantly engaged with the Tenants Federation and Registered Tenant Organisations (RTOs) on service planning and delivery issues. Any additional participation requests will be considered and aligned within that framework.

16. North Lanarkshire Council would therefore suggest that it is likely that almost all existing organisations, fitting the definition of a “local community controlled body,” will already be involved as routine based on previous and current good practice. It would also be necessary as part of any participation request process to ensure that any community controlled body asking to be involved does not assume that by using such a process their involvement/ perspective carries greater weight than through normal involvement processes.

17. Consideration is also required for inclusion of arms-length bodies whose primary purpose is the provisions of services on behalf of local authorities.

18. Consideration should also be given to the merits of inclusion of the range of public sector authorities in Scotland covered by the Public Sector Equality Duty.

19. As part of the outcome improvement process any participation request should demonstrate that participation will promote or improve service delivery. In North Lanarkshire, our Third Sector Interface, Voluntary Action North Lanarkshire (VANL), will be key to this engagement and is a full partner in NLP.
20. This provision could be helpful to local authorities if the land in question is considered to be a blight or hindrance to development and investment proposals. Housing Services should be included in the list of consulted bodies when any application to buy is lodged to ensure the intended use of the acquired land is consistent with the aims and objectives of the Local Housing Strategy.

21. In terms of section 29, consideration should be given to a prescriptive list whereby articles of association or memorandum can be altered, without consent, if they adhere to the matters contained within the list.

22. Under Section 28 (3) (c), where information contained in the minutes is to be withheld and a reason is to be given, it should be specified that the reason must be a reasonable one.

23. In connection with the late applications procedure (Section 31 (9) (7)), it would appear to be unreasonable that the definition of land to which “relevant work” and “relevant steps” may have been taken does not have to be the same land as that which the landowner is intending to dispose of.

24. The Council understands the potential for Community Asset Transfer to provide a useful vehicle for improved service delivery and effective community empowerment. Working with local community organisations to deliver successful Community Asset Transfers empowers communities and contributes to building resilient communities as well as bringing in additional resources to the local area. Community Asset Transfers should be delivered within a local context to support community regeneration.

25. North Lanarkshire piloted the establishment of Development Trust Associations in 2011 and valuable lessons learned may be applied to Community Asset Transfers. Any potential Community Asset Transfer to a third sector organisation should:
   - Take place via an application process (supported by a robust business plan), which demonstrates clear benefits to the Council, third sector and communities;
   - Ensure appropriate capacity building and business support arrangements are to be in place to support organisations through the Community Asset Transfer process and ensure long term viability and sustainability;
   - Take forward further policy developments required to deliver strategic priorities on asset transfer.

26. Specific recommendation must be made in relation to Section 55 (5), Section 59 and Section 60 where it states that the relevant authority must agree an asset transfer request unless there are reasonable grounds for refusing it. There is to be provision for review of a local authority’s decision by the local authority.

27. If a relevant authority leases land as a tenant and to transfer or share occupation of the land would breach the terms of the lease it must be considered reasonable to refuse a request. This would be without prejudice to the provisions of Section 60. It would be better to legislate to exempt land held on lease in these circumstances.

28. As highlighted in Question One, North Lanarkshire Council is currently developing a new Community Asset Transfer policy.
SPECIFIC BILL PROVISIONS – PART SIX

Common Good Property Places a statutory duty on local authorities to establish and maintain a register of all property held by them for the common good. It also requires local authorities to publish their proposals and consult community bodies before disposing of or changing the use of common good assets.

29. North Lanarkshire Council would reiterate the points made previously in our response to consultation on the draft Bill submitted in January 2014. It will be unclear until Guidance is produced as to what does and does not constitute a disposal for the purpose of the legislation. Leases, especially shorter terms (less than 20 years) should be excluded, as should change of use for public use and benefit and alienable common good property.

30. It is acknowledged in the Explanatory Notes at point 276, that it is sometimes difficult to know whether property is part of the common good and that in some cases this has to be decided by the courts. The Bill does not define or redefine common good or remove or alter any restrictions on the use or disposal of common good property and an opportunity has been missed to assist with the acknowledged difficulties.

31. There is recognition in the Financial Memorandum at point 89 that the new statutory duties will have associated costs. This was not quantified during the consultation process but there is an assumption that the process required to establish an accessible register will be starting from a very firm foundation. Local authorities are currently required to account for common good assets separately and it is for this reason that the assumption of a firm foundation is made. This is at odds with the recognition that it is difficult to know whether property is common good and that in some cases the decision has to be made by the courts.

SPECIFIC BILL PROVISIONS – PART SEVEN

Allotments Updates and simplifies legislation on allotments. It requires local authorities to take reasonable steps to provide more allotments if waiting lists exceed certain trigger points and ensures appropriate protection for local authorities and plotholders. This replaces the provisions of the Allotments (Scotland) Acts 1892, 1922 and 1950, which are repealed in their entirety by schedule 5, and some provisions of the Land Settlement (Scotland) Act 1919.

32. The provisions within the Bill will involve local authorities in the administration and provision of allotments, publication of a food growing strategy and potential for compensation. These may or may not presently be provided by a local authority; either wholly or in part, and as such could have resource and land provision consequences. It can also potentially affect the council’s future use of sites used for allotments, e.g. requiring Scottish Minister consent for change of use or disposal.

33. In terms of section 70 (2) it would be beneficial for regulations to specifically include what information is to be included in the request.

34. Section 72 may be onerous to the local authority particularly if sub sections (4) and (5) are used.

35. Section 75 (2) may restrict the ability of the authority to provide allotments in sites that are temporarily available, an approach that has been successfully tried in other local authority areas, and could provide a mechanism to increase provision.

36. Sections 77, 78, 79 regarding producing strategies, reviewing and providing an annual report may prove onerous on the staff resource. A longer reporting cycle in particular would reduce this burden and still provide adequate information for users.

SPECIFIC BILL PROVISIONS – PART EIGHT

Non Domestic Rates Provides for a new power which will allow councils to create and fund their own localised business rate relief schemes to better reflect local needs and support communities. It does this by inserting a new section into the Local Government (Financial Provisions etc.) (Scotland) Act 1962.
37. At present the strength of the Non Domestic Rates taxation system is that it provides a consistent, and reasonably non-discriminatory, tax on business regardless of the location of that business within Scotland. There is a danger that the proposal may create a ‘race to the bottom’ where businesses will look to the local authority to better the scheme on offer elsewhere and the cost of the relief granted will be met by the Council Tax payer. This may favour larger / Council Tax rich local authorities in their ability to fund such schemes at the expense of other local authorities.

SPECIFIC BILL PROVISIONS – PART NINE

General Provisions Makes general provisions in relation to the Bill, including provision about subordinate legislation, ancillary provision and commencement. Schedule 4 makes minor and consequential amendments to other legislation, and schedule 5 provides for repeals.

The Children's Wood Project is located in one of the last community wild spaces in Glasgow: the North Kelvin Meadow. The project is designed to provide children with the opportunity to experience the natural environment, learn within it, and to build resilience and well-being. The project also brings the entire community together by organising a wide range of community activities and events. The project has participation from sixteen local schools, over 100 local volunteers and provides numerous activities for pre 5s' – in support of Scottish Government policy.

We have experienced difficulties in ensuring that the land is preserved for future generations, and we have experienced a lack of consultation with regard to the land, and barriers to the community making change.

It is within this context that we respond to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee's call for evidence on the Community Empowerment Bill, which aims to support communities and improve the processes of Community Planning.

Though we fully support the Community Empowerment Bill, we believe that there are certain areas within the proposal, which could be made more robust to better achieve the aims of the Bill. In particular, we believe that greater emphasis should be given to the principle of reducing inequalities through empowering and building self-sufficiency within local communities. Key to this, in our view, is the issue of community ownership and lease, the legislation for which should be framed to focus on the interests of the communities the legislation is supposed to serve. We hope that the Bill will ensure that communities like ours will have a voice.

Consultation
1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities; please give reasons for your answer?

It is accepted that the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill sets out and has the potential to empower communities by placing the community planning partnerships (CPP) on a statutory footing. This will place a stronger emphasis on delivering better outcomes for people using public services and should complement outcomes established in the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Act 2014.

However, the legislation is somewhat weak. It records that a:

CPP must make all reasonable efforts to secure the participation of any community bodies considered likely to contribute to community planning, and take reasonable steps to enable them to do so.

Given the recommendations of the Christie Commission on the Future Delivery of Public Services, legislation should be made more robust by including a significant focus on communities coming together not only to participate, but to co-produce services. We would like to see more communication and co-production between the local authority and the community. We support the proposal put forward by Oxfam, Barnardos and the Poverty Alliance who suggest that each Community Planning Partnership set aside a percentage of their yearly budget “to be decided upon through an appropriate community participation process or processes, and assess the impact of doing so.
Co-production both recognises the skills and assets of people in designing and delivering services and helps technically inexperienced community members develop those capacities. This kind of ‘full engagement’ is critical for the people who use the services, and the third sector more generally to be able to meet the needs and requirements of people in their communities. The Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill needs to ensure that individuals are meaningfully engaged in this process. To that end, mechanisms should be established to monitor and report on levels of engagement, and to address any difficulties.

A key concern of ours is that the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill does not detail the support needed to allow communities to take advantage of its provisions on an equal basis. The policy memorandum acknowledges that, to date, there have been variable levels of empowerment and engagement between public sector organisations and community groups, stating that:

Where communities want to do something for themselves this has often been facilitated by good practice guidance, funding being available and the attitudes, skills and commitment of many people working in many different organisations.

The positive view expressed in the memorandum, conflicts with our experiences of running the Children’s Wood which have often been more negative. While this legislation seeks to address issues like this, and promote best practice throughout Scotland, it is vital that all community groups are supported at local levels by public sector partners to ensure that the most vulnerable groups are not further marginalised, and in turn, inequalities are not strengthened by the legislation.

Our concern is that there are no provisions for how public bodies should support less empowered community bodies, or those who are unable to mobilise their own participation to take advantage of the routes of engagement. We support the addition of provisions to ensure that there are mechanisms and resources in place to support, empower and capacity-build with local communities and organisations to support them to engage adequately with the process.

We would like to see provision for increased communication and co-production between the local authority and the community. We agree with the proposal put forward by Oxfam, Barnardos and the Poverty Alliance who suggest that each Community Planning Partnership set aside 1% of their yearly budget or something similar “to be decided upon through an appropriate community participation process or processes, and assess the impact of doing so with a view to further embedding this approach. “

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

Whilst the development of national outcomes is well received, as it provides a clear focus and conduit to public bodies, it is singularly important that communities have the opportunity to contribute to the shaping of those outcomes.

The policy memorandum states that:

Scotland’s people are its greatest asset: they are best placed to make decisions about our future, and to know what is needed to deliver sustainable and resilient communities.
We believe that by empowering and engaging local communities that has major dividends, which will strengthen the community planning processes and provide a significant focus on all outcomes, but particularly local ones.

Although we broadly welcome the provisions in the Bill, our concern is that the legislation may unintentionally have a negative impact on inequalities. Clearly community entities that are already empowered or have the capacity to engage will benefit the most from these opportunities, but little provision is made for those communities where such entities don’t exist, or are too disadvantaged to get the greatest benefits from the Bill. For example, even though the Children’s Wood as an organisation has the advantage of being based largely in a community with many socio-economic strengths, we have struggled with getting any formal assistance from the statutory sector, and do feel somewhat marginalised even though the statutory sector make use of our programmes. Thus, even more vulnerable marginalised even though the statutory sector make use of our programmes. Thus, even more vulnerable groups might find it particularly difficult to take advantage of the Bill unless greater social value is placed at the core of decision mechanisms the legislation is concerned with.

Consequently, we strongly support the addition of provisions to ensure that there are mechanisms and resources in place to support, empower and capacity-build with all local communities and organisations, particularly those from disadvantaged communities, to support them to engage adequately with the process. The legislation must also ensure that there are transparent mechanisms in place to monitor and report on community involvement.

In general we are encouraged by the provisions of the Bill, but would like to see a genuine focus on what we would refer to as a ‘human rights based approach’ with a real commitment to reducing, preventing and reversing health inequalities. The Children's Commissioner for Scotland, Tam Baillie, visited us recently and gave strong support to our activities, our approach to the wellbeing of children, the attendant positive outcomes for teachers and parents, and community involvement and participation. Mr. Baillie was asked if we could state in our response to the bill that he was supportive and believed that it should find a manifestation of policy position for pre-5s. He was happy to confirm this.

Based on our experience over the past three years we recommend the inclusion of provisions to ensure that there are mechanisms and resources in place to support, empower and capacity-build with all local communities and organisation, particularly those from disadvantaged communities, to support them to adequately engage with the process.

We particularly welcome Section 25 of the Bill, which deals with reporting, and believe this reporting requirement will ensure a robust planning and evaluation process. However, we would also like to see a provision to ensure that people and communities have the opportunity to report on their experiences of their involvement and engagement in the process and whether this has contributed to delivering national outcomes.
In conclusion, our direct experience of attempting to involve the Local Authority in supporting our endeavours both within the Children's Wood set in the North Kelvin Meadow in Glasgow has been one in which, at best, we have experienced indifference and at worst a complete disregard in the face of controversial evidence that bringing children into their natural environment is vital for their wellbeing and that of the community.

We are not the only stakeholders in what happens here. If getting outside into nature is duplicated across the City, this will have an impact on health, well-being and success. Places for children to play and learn in are an important part of the jigsaw in delivering immediate and long-term benefits to society. It challenges perceptions that all fun is to be found indoors, on screens or in sedentary activity, while also addressing some of the most serious immediate and long-term issues within society.

The Bill in its general profile reveals for us a realignment of community ownership which can deliver a human rights that every child no matter who they are or where they live, has the right to grow up safe, happy and health. The Community Empowerment Bill is a signal towards that and we ask that our contribution be part of that endeavour.
Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill – Call for Evidence
Local Government and Regeneration Committee of the Scottish Parliament
September 2014

Planning Aid for Scotland
Planning Aid for Scotland (PAS) is a national charity operating on social enterprise principles, working across Scotland to improve the way people engage with the planning system, helping people to contribute to their communities, and thus building active citizenship.

Through its impartial advice, training and education services, PAS is pro-actively involved in raising awareness of the opportunities for all people to be involved in shaping their places and communities. PAS believes that facilitating public involvement in forming a community vision for the future of their areas is a key aspect of civil engagement in creating empowered communities.

PAS considers that the land-use planning system has an important enabling role in delivering the intended outcomes of the Bill, and that better outcomes will be achieved through a closer alignment of land use planning and community planning.

In responding to previous Scottish Government consultations on the Bill, PAS has focused on the following matters:

- community councils* and other community organisations
- community planning
- accessibility of information
- access to training support and advice

*although the role of community councils is not significantly altered by the Bill, PAS believes that their role must continue be re-examined as a key stakeholder who can help deliver the aims of the Bill.

Committee’s Call for Evidence - Questions

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities – please give reasons for your answer.

- PAS has supported the Scottish Government’s proposal for a Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill since the idea was incepted; and has been pleased to contribute to the Scottish Government Reference Group which has supported development of the Bill.

- PAS welcomes the Bill as a demonstration of the Scottish Government’s commitment to devolving, where appropriate, powers and decision-making to communities; and believes - if implemented successfully - the Bill can indeed have a positive impact on empowering communities. A community taking ownership or management of a local asset can be the starting point for the development of community pride, self-reliance and confidence, and thus empowerment.

- Throughout the consultation process on the Bill, PAS has emphasised the importance of focusing on delivery. This needs to happen pro-actively at grassroots level and there are two key aspects: awareness raising and ease of access to information; and training and support for communities. Focus on this will help ensure that the aims and spirit of the Bill are actualised.

- PAS – with its focus on building active citizenship, is ideally placed to provide information and support to ensure the outcomes of the Bill are achieved.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions of the bill?

- The provisions of the Bill offer public sector organisations the opportunity to work more closely with third sector organisations in promoting community empowerment and effective and innovative engagement, as well as performing their key regulatory functions.

- They also offer the opportunity for public sector organisations to work across departments and to pool resources more effectively.

- Within every community there is a high level of local knowledge and insight which should inform communities to make decisions about their own future.

- With appropriate access to information, and where required support and training, PAS believes that all communities in Scotland can benefit from the provisions of the Bill. Utilising more fully the provisions of the Curriculum for Excellence, primary school children and secondary children can learn about citizenship and learn about the opportunities for participating in key decision making.

- It is well documented that communities in Scotland are varied and diverse. Some communities may require a high level of support, guidance and up-skilling to enable them to take advantage of the provisions of the Bill, whereas others may be able and ready to act on their own. There will be no one-size-fits-all approach but PAS would like to see public authorities taking a pro-active and creative approach to engagement around the new opportunities that will arise.
• Part 1 of the Act, with its provision that Scotland’s National Outcomes should be reviewed every 5 years, and consulted upon, will allow local communities to have a voice at strategic level. Combining this with other potentially much more localised outcomes of the Bill sets a strong vision and a robust framework for community empowerment.

PAS would like to comment on the following aspects of the Bill:

Community Planning
• PAS welcomes the provisions of the Bill which will establish Community Planning Partnerships (CPPs) on a statutory basis. However, it is essential that CPPs take a pro-active approach to engagement and ensuring that they are as representative as possible of their communities.

• PAS welcomes the Bill’s requirement for CPPs to undertake consultation-based Local Outcomes Improvement Plans. However, CPPs will only be effective if they are predicated on genuine engagement with communities and pro-actively bring together communities and agencies in a partnership approach. This would represent a co-production approach that will bring about genuine empowerment.

• PAS has commented previously on the need for Community Planning and Land Use Planning – with inherently shared outcomes – to work in closer alignment as part of delivering empowerment.

• PAS’s guidance on effective engagement is a valuable tool which can help CPPs engage effectively with communities.

Community Right to Buy Land
• PAS supports the extension of a right to buy land to urban communities, whilst also recognising that the challenges and issues in urban areas may be different from those in rural areas.

• PAS does not, however, wish to comment on the technicalities of this aspect of the legislation.

Allotments
• PAS sat on the Scottish Government Working Party Group on Allotments and Community Gardens, and is aware that in some areas of Scotland demand outstrips supply.

• The placing of a duty on Local Authorities to provide allotments and hold waiting lists is a positive step in facilitating the provision of a community asset that can promote sociability, as well as health and well-being. Whilst noting the duties to be placed on Local Authorities, it would also seem in the spirit of the Bill to empower communities to take the initiative to propose sites, with appropriate support in terms of skills and finance.

Common Good Property

- PAS supports the provision in the Bill to provide a register and for Community Councils and other recognised community bodies to be consulted about any plans to change the status of Common Good Property.

- PAS would also add that with regard to the land use planning system, there can be confusion as to the status of Common Good Property. Whilst outwith the scope of the Bill, it would be useful for this matter to be addressed.

PAS would like to respond to this question with some concluding thoughts on the content and future implementation of the Bill.

- It is essential to ensure that the spirit of the Bill can be enacted upon by all and this means encouraging communities across Scotland to embrace a can-do attitude.

- There is a need to create a level playing field of opportunity through an increase in access to training, support and information to ensure all communities can benefit. Only with this approach will all of Scotland’s communities have the opportunity to benefit from the Bill.

- It is recognised that a large swathe of individuals, communities and communities of interest in Scotland are still excluded from participating in land-use planning and community planning. Two such groups that PAS is currently working with to promote their engagement in building a more inclusive society are young people and Gypsy/Travellers.

- To achieve the delivery of services that meet the needs of all groups in our society, PAS would encourage measures which will promote awareness, knowledge and access to the opportunities that the Bill provides.

CONTACTS

PAS would be pleased to respond to any queries with regard to these representations and is always willing to consider a joint venture with the promoters of the consultation document to take forward further research or training on any aspect of the subject which relates to the core business of PAS.

SDEF Response
Call for written evidence
Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

Scottish Disability Equality Forum (SDEF) works for social inclusion in Scotland through the removal of barriers to equality and the promotion of independent living for people affected by disability.

We are a membership organisation, representing individuals affected by disability, and organisations and groups who share our values. Our aim is to ensure that the voices of people affected by disability are heard and heeded within their own communities and at a national and political level.

About this call for written evidence

The Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill was introduced into the Scottish Parliament, on 11 June 2014. The Scottish Parliament's Local Government and Regeneration Committee launched a call for written evidence at the end of June as part of its Stage 1 consideration of the Bill.

This call for written evidence allows organisations and individuals the opportunity to comment on the Bill.

SDEF responded to the Scottish Government Consultation in January 2014. Our response can be downloaded from our website: http://tinyurl.com/mmbkr7t

General points
- SDEF are largely in favour of what the Bill sets out to do, but there are areas that could be strengthened to ensure communities are fully engaged and supported.
- Our members feel that many people may not understand the legalities within the document.
- Members feel that those involved in the decision-making process may not necessarily be representative or reflect the needs of the whole community. Additional mechanisms and resources are required to ensure that wider community involvement is encourages and supported.

Answers to specific questions

Before completing this response, SDEF polled its members, made up of individuals, organisations and Access Panels, with a shorter version of this consultation. We have used these to help develop our response.

Question 1
To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities? Please give reasons for your answer.

SDEF agrees with the requirement to establish a Community Planning Partnership (CPP), and strongly supports the proposal for a stronger emphasis on outcomes.

Whilst we welcome the focus on addressing inequalities in the consultation, we are concerned as to how the needs of equalities groups will be met in practice by CPPs.

Historically, disabled people do not believe their needs have been well recognised in the Community Planning Process.

The role and function of the thematic and neighbourhood groups that support CPPs has lacked some transparency and this is not good for democracy.

We are concerned that the requirement to ‘develop and agree a common understanding of local needs and opportunities’ is separated from the requirement to work with local communities and the third sector.

We welcome an outcome improvement process approach.

Members comment “Local empowerment with actual influence on the use of limited local resources must be good”

Question 2
What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

We fully support the “Scotland Performs” plan for all public services in Scotland to work towards, as it provides a clear direction for all public services. However, we suggest when asking people what they want for Scotland that it is considered how disabled people in communities can contribute to the outcomes. By ensuring full inclusiveness in the engagement process, will strengthen the community outcomes.
Members comment “Those who are interested in this decision making process, may not reflect the aims and wishes of the majority of the community”.

In the draft Bill, it is proposed that the public service authority will decide whether a request will provide significant benefit to the community.

Whilst the community applicants can show how a request might improve outcomes in health, regeneration, social or environmental wellbeing, the impact of request can only truly be felt by the community. It is therefore vital that the decision-making process involved disabled people from the outset.

Question 3

We recognise the important role of local government in facilitating local decision making and delivery local services. We also note the challenges that disabled people face in taking part in the democratic process.

Many local authorities have also moved towards restricting support provision to those in the most serious physical need. This means that those with lower levels of need are left without the support they need to gain work, education, relationships or take part in local democracy.

A simple belief in the purity of democracy is not sufficient to ensure democracy is provided. Passing democracy further down the chain to community councils is not the answer. Without a significant improvement in the way that all democratic bodies take into account disabled people’s needs, such a move would be likely to increase the problem.

We believe that any impact on equality groups should be measured as part of the mainstream process of policy creation.

We feel that many disabled people within their communities may not be fully represented or heard within their local community groups. Therefore we suggest that mechanisms and resources are implemented to assist disabled people to be fully engaged in their community.

Question 4

Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

The bill is a start to ensuring that communities can participate more readily in decisions which affect them, but must be fully transparent and allow for those affected to make informed contributions in a meaningful way.

This is why the process of engagement itself should be part of the plan – true co-production requires a willingness on all sides to take into account the needs of others to contribute fully.

Members comment “This is a legislative process and covers the ownership of land and buildings. In my experience, the typical community does not possess the skills and knowledge to suddenly make the right decisions which they may face, and it may end up that a few ‘pressure group’ members make a decision which really doesn’t benefit the community at large.”

If the Community Empowerment Bill is to benefit communities, it must be provided in a language which is accessible to all. Currently, the information within the Bill is high level, containing jargon and concepts which would not be understood by the average layperson; this must be changed if communities are to gain benefit from the Bill.

Dear Kevin

I am very pleased to attach a copy of the Commission on Strengthening Local Democracy’s Final Report for consideration by the Committee. Over the last year, the Commission’s work has led it to consider a number of issues that the Committee has also focused on in its recent inquiries, particularly in relation to its work around the Flexibility and Autonomy of Local Government, and its current scrutiny of the Community Empowerment and Renewal Bill.

As a Commission we have endeavoured to be evidence led, and think holistically about the opportunities to strengthen local democracy in Scotland. Our final report tries to emulate that approach, and for that reason the Committee may wish to consider the report as a whole.

Our focus has not been on any particular Governments or Ministers, but on tackling a 50 year trend in how we ‘do’ democracy here in Scotland. As a country we have tried taking power to the centre over that period, and the evidence that I have received suggests that this has failed to address the deep rooted social problems facing Scotland, and has led to substantial disaffection with our current democracy. As a Commission, we believe that a major transformation is therefore now required if we are to turn that situation around.

COSLA is not scheduled to consider the report until late October, and the following comments are therefore made in my capacity as Chair of the Commission. COSLA will also be providing separate written evidence to the Committee in relation to its call for evidence.

General Comments
The Community Empowerment and Renewal Bill is, in many ways, part of a growing movement that recognises that a different approach to power and decision making is required in future. I welcome its development as a refreshing decentralising step in contrast with the centralising mind-set that has become the dominant policy driver of recent decades.

The Bill itself contains a number of interesting ideas that are designed to push change forward within the system of democracy that we have in Scotland and the UK. However, there are also some key points where its approach stops short of the kind of local democracy that I want to see in this country.

In particular, it is important that we do not lose sight of the fact that Scotland is on many measures now the most centralised country in Europe. In our report, we set out 7 principles around which democracy in Scotland can be made stronger, alongside a number of options where we believe the vital preconditions can be put in place.

Above all, we are clear that democratic power must lie with people and communities, who give some of that power to governments and local governments, not the other way round. To us, strengthening local democracy is therefore firmly about empowering (a subsidiarity mind-set) not “decentralising” (a centralist mind-set).

While I support the aspiration of the Bill, it is built on a relatively centralist approach to democracy in this regard. For example, communities have the right to take proposals for asset transfer or outcome improvement to national or local government, but it is for them to decide. In other words, communities have to persuade government and local government to “cede” powers.

For that reason I am anxious that we do not allow ourselves to believe that bringing forward legislation that allows some power to be ‘handed down’ by the centre is sufficient to challenge the overall direction of travel that has taken place in Scotland over the last 50 years. Ultimately that do little to fundamentally transform democracy in Scotland.

While the Commission was not remitted to review the provisions of the draft Bill in detail, it may also be useful for me to set out some specific observations that may assist the Committee:

National Outcomes

I welcome the Bill’s emphasis on embedding outcomes not inputs and processes as the basis for improving lives effectively in Scotland. So too do I recognise that nationally elected government has a clear locus to set out the national priorities and rights that everyone in Scotland is entitled to. This very much reflects our work as a Commission.

However, the Bill provisions appear to be less clear about the wider interdependencies that are needed for this system to flourish. In my view, the ability to set national outcomes is only one part of the end to end focus on outcomes that is required. To be delivered effectively, communities and their representatives must be much more empowered to address local priorities in ways that suit their local needs and preferences. Indeed, the international evidence we collated suggested that outcomes are best, and inequalities lowest, where national policy interacts effectively with highly localised, empowered and participative democratic arrangements. In our vision for democracy, both are necessary to improve wellbeing and reduce inequalities for the whole of Scotland.

I believe that this means looking at the whole system of governance, not parts of it in isolation. As it stands, the Bill is focused on improving national choice and control around outcomes, but is not equally weighted towards handing over the levers required for effective local decisions and choices around these.

A further element of the Commission’s work may be relevant to the Committee in this regard. Internationally, it is clear from the evidence we gathered that macro-economic and fiscal policy has a critical impact on inequalities and outcomes. It follows that developing these policies, and the national outcomes that drive them, requires significant analysis and scrutiny. Our suggestion has been that an Office of Wellbeing, akin to the Office of Budget Responsibility, is created to independently monitor and report on the wellbeing impacts of fiscal and macro-economic policy in this regard. “Wellbeing” would be defined in social, economic and environmental terms, with a particular focus on inequalities of wellbeing. I believe that this is necessary to ensure transparency and accountability for national decisions at local level.

Community Planning
As a Commission, we have recognised the helpful shift towards local outcomes and partnership working that community planning has sought to put in place. The strengthening of Community Planning has focused on the need for public services to come together to focus on local outcomes, and usefully created Health and Care Partnerships, Community Justice Partnerships, and other developments that are challenging pre-existing silos between different public services, albeit sometimes at the cost of creating organisations that lack a clear line of sight to local democratic accountability. Our report makes a number of recommendations about how participation and accountability around community planning partnerships can be improved now.

Nevertheless, as a Commission our objective has also been to push subsidiarity as far as it can go, and for local governance to be empowered by, and accountable back to, local communities in ways that are not possible at the moment. For that reason we have also suggested that the current architecture of public services and governance in Scotland is out of alignment, and recommended a fundamental review of the structure, boundaries, functions and democratic arrangements for local governance of all public services in Scotland. We believe that this review should be based on strengthening local democratic accountability, subsidiarity and public service integration in order to localise and simplify how all public services are governed and accountable to local communities. Our ambition would be for such a review to create an integrated system of local democratic governance built around the opportunities and identities of different parts of Scotland.

Participation Requests

Notwithstanding my overarching ambition for a much more significant shift in power, I support the principle of a ‘right to challenge’ to take on new responsibilities where this would reduce costs or improve outcomes for communities. However, I believe that the same logic should run throughout the democratic system; including the right for local government to challenge for functions currently delivered by national agencies where it can be shown that doing so will improve local outcomes more effectively or efficiently.

I am also clear that these kinds of processes need to enable the effective participation of every community Scotland, not just the wealthy or articulate. One of the issues that concerned the Commission most in its own evidence gathering was the unequal capacity of individuals and communities across Scotland to participate at the moment. The danger is that if requests are simply dealt with according to demand, affluent communities who may already be relatively well ‘heard’ could gain the most, rather than those communities that could derive the greatest benefits. Enacting the provisions of the Bill will therefore need to be done in ways that actively guard against this and ensure that those facing multiple social and economic challenges, particularly in terms of deprivation, are able to get extra support to help them release their potential. Without effective capacity, delivering the policy aspirations of the Bill may well be compromised.

Non Domestic Rates

The evidence generated in the Commission’s work repeatedly drew attention to the weak state of local fiscal empowerment in Scotland at the moment. We found that national governments, not communities, tend to have held the purse strings in Scotland. The key issue is not only that this disempowers local government, but that it disempowers communities.

I believe that much greater local fiscal empowerment is therefore vital if we are to strengthen local democracy in Scotland, and I support the steps set out in the Bill to allow councils to create localised relief schemes for non-domestic rates in this regard. I believe that doing so is one of the ways in which greater fiscal empowerment would help boost local economies and jobs.

It is important to note, however, that this is far from the only step that is required. In our report, we outline a suite of options that we believe would give local communities the democratic power to look after their own financial affairs, stimulate Local Democracy economies, and bring new thinking and capacity to bear on improving outcomes. Fundamental change is required, and I look forward to working with the Committee to deliver that over the coming period.

Other Issues
My final observation is that the Bill does not contain the legal or constitutional underpinnings that I believe are required to strengthen local democracy in Scotland, and which would provide communities with the rights that other countries have long enjoyed in this regard.

Rather than depend on powers being handed down from ‘higher’ levels of governance, I am committed to a system of democracy that is based on spheres not tiers of governance, and in which different spheres have distinct jobs to do that are set out in ‘competencies’. Of course, this is insufficient if it stops at local government: subsidiarity is ultimately about communities’ right to be full partners in local democracy and to be actively involved in local decision making about the places in which they live.

It seems to me that the Bill presents an ideal opportunity to develop this approach and guarantee a commitment to subsidiarity, local choice and control, and community empowerment, not least of all by putting the European Charter on Local Self Government on a statutory footing in Scotland. Again, the Commission’s report makes a series of recommendations in this regard.

I hope that this information is helpful, and as always I would be pleased to discuss the work of the Commission, or any of specific points with you in further detail.

Yours sincerely

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

The Law Society of Scotland’s written evidence
September 2014
Introduction

The Law Society of Scotland aims to lead and support a successful and respected Scottish legal profession. Not only do we act in the interests of our solicitor members, but we also have a clear responsibility to work in the public interest. That is why we actively engage and seek to assist in the legislative and public policy decision making processes.

To help us do this, we use our various Society Committees which are made up of solicitors and non-solicitors and ensure we benefit from knowledge and expertise from both within and outwith the solicitor profession.

Both the Law Society of Scotland’s Planning Law and Rural Affairs Sub-Committees have considered The Scottish Parliament’s Local Government and Regeneration Committee’s call for evidence and should like to respond on behalf of the Society as follows:

General Comments

The Society while welcoming the policy intent of the bill to empower community bodies through ownership of land and buildings in order that people can meaningfully participate in decisions that affect their lives, expresses some concern with regard to the complexity of this bill.

In particular, the Bill itself in terms of Part 4 (COMMUNITY RIGHT TO BUY LAND) modifies Part 2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003. There are multiple amendments to certain sections of the 2003 Act of the Bill which are rather difficult to follow and this does not seem to sit well with the aim of empowering communities. The Society suggests that it would be simpler to repeal and re-enact part 2 of the 2003 Act.

For these proposals to work effectively, community empowerment requires to be easily acceptable and workable by the very communities it seeks to empower. The Society expresses a concern that if a community body requires to undertake much in the way of initial groundwork then there is a risk that enthusiasm will be lost if the proposals appear overly bureaucratic.

The bill is intended to extend and increase the powers of communities in involving them in community right to buy in both urban and rural settings and also to provide them with a form of compulsory purchase order as outlined at part 4 of the bill (COMMUNITY RIGHT TO BUY LAND) in respect of abandoned and neglected land at section 48 of the bill which appears to be undefined.

The Society also notes that there are already in place a wide range of controls and powers ready for use where councils are so minded and that the justification exists. In general policy terms, the Society notes that the general swing towards de-regulation in order to assist business and increase competiveness has an equivalent in a system in local government to do more with less.

Accordingly increased bureaucracy and managerial control is not always conducive to this. The Society believes enacting new measures which councils may find difficult to prioritise could have the unintended consequence of detracting from the credibility of the policy intent of this bill.

The Society also notes that a lot of the detail will be set out in subsequent regulation and also guidance and this makes it difficult at this stage to anticipate the overall effect of these provisions.

With particular reference to the questions set out by the Scottish Parliament’s Local Government and Regeneration Committee, the Society should like to respond as follows:

Question 1: To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

The Society refers to its general comments.
While the Society that in terms of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 has assisted in bringing communities together in rural Scotland implementing a community right to buy, the Society questions the proposals as set out at Part 4 of the bill which extends the right to buy to the whole of Scotland and also provides a framework for community bodies to purchase abandoned or neglected land.

The Society highlights the marked differences between a right to buy exercised in rural Scotland and one now to be exercised with regard to land in an urban setting which may well have a higher acquisition and development consequent costs.

The Society highlights the unintended consequence of urban land in respect of which community interests may be registered where this land may already be subject to a redevelopment proposal (for example allocated in a development plan and/or subject to an extant planning permission). While the Society notes that Scottish Ministers may in those circumstances conclude that registration is not in the public interest, the uncertainty with such an application could have an adverse impact on investment decisions for developers.

The Society respectfully suggests that there requires to be clearer rules on how Scottish Ministers will deal with such an application where there are active development proposals and accordingly suggests that land subject to an active planning permission will, for a limited period of time, not be subject to registration under Part 4 of the bill. The Society also questions the lack of certainty as to whether the community purpose will be implemented and, in the case that it not being so implemented, what provisions are to be put in place with regard to “clawback”.

Question 2: What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

Again, the Society refers to its general comments.
Question 3: Do you consider communities across Scotland have the capabilities to take advantage of the provisions in the Bill. If not, what requires to be done to the Bill, or to assist communities to ensure this happens.

The Society notes that at present Highlands and Islands Enterprise assist communities by awarding grants and assuming an advocacy role in the direction of other organisations which have exercised the right to buy.

The Society suggests that a central organisation could be set up in order to steer community bodies through the provisions of this bill.

Question 4: Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

The Society's response to Question 1 identifies a requirement for further amendments to section 33 to restrict the application of community right to buy in urban areas where there is an active development proposal. If such provision is not made then an unrestricted community right to buy could have unintended but significant adverse effects on investment decisions. For example, it would not be uncommon to have a situation where planning permission is obtained for a redevelopment proposal with the aim of subsequently selling or leasing parts of the development to individual developers. There would currently be nothing to prevent an application for registration of a community interest being made in these circumstances as there would be no existing concluded missives or option in place. The risk of such an application being made, even if it is rejected by Scottish Ministers, may be a disincentive to investment in a Scottish development. At the very least, it would cause delay.

The Society submits that the primary legislation (as opposed to guidance) should provide greater certainty in the circumstances in which the community right to buy would operate in relation to active development proposals. In particular, the Society suggests that consideration is given to allowing for a mechanism to obtain a certificate exempting a site from community right to buy for a certain amount of time. This would allow investment decisions to be made with a degree of certainty but would also retain the community right to buy in the event that the development did not proceed as envisaged.

The Society makes specific reference to section 48 of the bill (abandoned and neglected land) and notes that this term has not been defined but rather, land is eligible in terms of section 97C of the 2003 Act as amended by section 48 of the bill, if in the opinion of Ministers it is “wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected”. The Bill provides that in determining whether land is eligible, ministers “must have regard to prescribed matters. ”.

The lack of a definition for abandoned or neglected land gives rise to considerable uncertainty in relation to what land would be within the scope of section 97C. The Society believes that there should be a proper definition of abandoned or neglected land. There is a particular concern about how the Part 3A process would operate in relation to long term development projects which may take a number of years to come to fruition.

The Society further notes that the procedure with regard to the community right to buy abandoned or neglected land appears to be a similar procedure to compulsory purchase and accordingly believes that the tests should also be similar. Accordingly, there should be a requirement for a viable business plan and robust development proposals in respect of any community right to buy abandoned or neglected land.

From a more practical point of view, the Society notes that, in terms of section 97Q of the 2003 Act as inserted by section 48 of the bill, there is an ability for Ministers to impose statutory real burdens on the land and accordingly questions the relationship of these burdens with the ultimate decision of the Clerk to the Land’s Tribunal to confer title. The Society believes that it would be helpful to know what was to be envisaged here, e.g. what types of burdens and, in particular what types of clawback provisions should be put in place if the development contemplated by the community authority is not taken forward?

The Society further notes that the Clerk to the Lands Tribunal cannot grant better title than that possessed by the owner or person entitled and that accordingly title to be transferred to the community body will be subject to the same title conditions as that of the previous owner. This may cause difficulties for any project going forward and is to be distinguished from the provisions for a Compulsory Purchase Order which provide for a clean title to be obtained by way of a General Vesting Declaration. Accordingly, it may then follow that title transfer to the community cannot be used to fulfil its intended purchase with the consequent issues around funding.

The Society further highlights the practical issue with regard to the intent of the community bodies’ right to buy against the provisions of the Local Development Plan and whether their proposal conflicts with the Local Development Plan or otherwise.

The Society highlights a further practical issue with regard to any owner who begins to maintain abandoned or neglected land once the provisions of section 48 of the bill are enacted.

The Society makes particular reference to section 97D (4) of the 2003 act as inserted by section 48 of the bill and note that the term “sustainable development” is undefined. The Society also notes Part 5 of the bill (ASSET TRANSFER REQUESTS) and questions how this should apply to local government trusts, companies, joint organisations, or ALEOs (Arms Length External Organisations). The Society questions why there is no appeal to Scottish Ministers against a refusal by a local authority for an asset transfer request.

The Society notes the provisions at part 6 of the bill (COMMON GOOD PROPERTY) and questions how an asset transfer request would work in relation to common good land. The Society would also suggest that the opportunity could be taken to simplify the law on common good land.

The Society makes particular reference to the recent Petition of East Renfrewshire Council for an order under section 75 (2) of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973 in respect of certain land at Cowan Park, Barrhead, East Renfrewshire [2014] CSOH 129 where that a PPP arrangement in respect of a new school to be built on common good account was held not to be a disposal and accordingly the Petition was refused as unnecessary. The case illustrates the current uncertainty on what constitutes a “disposal” as opposed to an “appropriation” in relation to common good land.
The difficulty is that whilst a local authority can submit a petition to court for alienation of common good land, the process cannot be used to authorise appropriation of common good land. The only alternative for a local authority in these circumstances is to petition for a private bill as was done with the recently enacted City of Edinburgh Council (Portobello Park) Act 2014.

The Society would suggest that the current bill could be used to clarify the law on alimentation and appropriation of common good land. It is suggested that a requirement to resort to Private Bill procedure is not necessarily the best use of public resources and that the Bill should include a mechanism to authorise alienation or appropriation. Such a mechanism could, as is currently the case for alienation of common good land, be through a court petition. However, as the bill elsewhere vests public interest decisions on the use of land in Scottish Ministers, consideration could also be given to the authorisation procedure for alienation or appropriation of common good land similarly being through Scottish Ministers.

Question 5: What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy Memorandum?

The Society has no comments
Dear Mr Wixted

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill – call for evidence

This is a joint response from the Accounts Commission and the Auditor General for Scotland to the Committee’s call for evidence on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

We responded in September 2012 to the Scottish Government’s previous exploratory consultation on its proposals for a Bill. We also responded to the later 2013 consultation on the ten topics which had been identified for possible inclusion in the Bill. We therefore welcome this opportunity to provide a further response to the Bill itself, and are prepared to offer further input as required as the Bill progresses.

The Committee will be aware that the Commission and Auditor General carried out audits of the Aberdeen City, Scottish Borders and North Ayrshire Community Planning Partnerships (CPPs) during summer 2012. Our audit reports were published in March 2013 along with a national overview report drawing on the common messages from the three reports.

We are undertaking a further five audits of Community Planning Partnerships during 2014. Three of the audit reports have already been published (Glasgow, Falkirk and Moray) with the remaining two (West Lothian and Orkney) due to be published in October.

We will also be publishing a further national report on community planning in Scotland in November of this year. That report will not only summarise the findings of this year’s local CPP audits, but will also assess and report on the progress that has been made at a national level in supporting improved community planning since our March 2013 report Improving Community Planning in Scotland.

We will be happy to brief the Committee on the findings of that report once it has been published.
Our response to the Committee’s call for evidence is framed around the first four questions upon which the Committee is seeking responses. We have not commented on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum.

1) To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

In our response to the Committee’s inquiry into public service reform and local government in Scotland: Strand 3 (Developing new ways of delivering services) we highlighted the fact that new approaches to delivering services need to be designed with the user in mind and should focus on delivering the highest quality of services within the available budgets. Local people potentially have an important role to play in public sector service redesign. We noted at that time that the community empowerment and renewal agenda highlights the important role that communities can play in participating in new models of service delivery and developing models of co-production that draw upon the knowledge, skills and experience of local people in ways that maximise the impact and value of public assets (people, buildings, knowledge, etc.).

We made the point in that response that we believe that the public sector should consider extending collaboration and joint working with communities to deliver more efficient and effective services in the future where there is a strong evidence based case to do so. The proposals within the legislation to provide for community bodies, or groups of bodies, to request to take part in a process to improve outcomes are a useful addition to existing requirements on public bodies to consult and engage with communities and users of services. The practicalities of such collaboration will require careful thought, to reduce the risk of community disaffection as a result of over bureaucratic arrangements.

Similarly, the proposed extension of the right to buy legislation in the Bill to cover urban areas and the proposed introduction of a right for communities to request to take over a public asset should all give greater power to communities than currently exist.

It is useful that the Bill provides definitions of community bodies to help fulfil its purpose. The Christie Commission referred to the “myriad of overlapping ways in which people come together through a common set of needs, both as communities of place and communities of interest” and to the “benefits of working with service users at a community level to decide what will work for them”. This will be a complex undertaking for public bodies. Delivering the ambitions set out in the Bill will require a commitment to levels of consultation and engagement with communities and users of public services beyond those that we have seen by public bodies to date.
2) What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

The requirement for each CPP to prepare a local outcomes improvement plan will have significant impact on those organisations being given increased duties in relation to community planning. In our response to the Scottish Government’s previous consultation on the Bill, we noted that “the challenges involved in CPPs demonstrating a difference in outcomes will be substantial” and that “progress will require strong and sustained shared leadership and changed behaviours as much as good plans”. We have already noted in our March 2013 report Improving community planning in Scotland the improvements needed to single outcome agreements. Any shared plans will need to specify what will improve, how it will be done, by whom, for whom, when, what resources will be needed, and how progress will be measured and reported.

The proposed introduction of a range of new rights for communities will mean that many public sector organisations will need to establish new administrative systems and processes to support these changes, for example to deal with community participation requests or right to buy assets. This will have resource implications for the bodies concerned. More significantly, there will also need to be a willingness by public bodies to adopt fundamentally different ways of working with communities in the redesign and delivery of public services. Implementing the proposals contained within the Bill may challenge current ways of working within and across organisations and raise legal issues which may not be simple to resolve.

In our report Improving Community Planning in Scotland we reported that many CPPs were rethinking how they consult with local communities with the aim of tailoring services around a clear understanding of local need by involving local communities in identifying local issues and deciding how best to respond to them. However, much of the focus was still on consultation and getting people involved. Therefore there is a long way to go before services are truly designed around communities and the potential of local people to participate in, shape and improve local services is realised.

It is crucial therefore that the Scottish Government and COSLA work effectively with local authorities and other public bodies to ensure that a culture that promotes effective engagement with and empowerment of communities is established. In addition, as the readiness and capacity of communities and service users to participate in contributing to improved public services is likely to vary widely, it is essential that appropriate support (guidance, training and financial resources) are made available to communities to enable them to participate effectively in contributing to improved public services.

There are a number of aspects of the Bill that we would bring to the Committee’s attention:

- Part 1 of the Bill and its related policy memorandum are both clear that Scottish Ministers must prepare and publish reports about the extent to which the national outcomes have been achieved. But they do not specify who might receive these reports or what role, if any, the Scottish Parliament might have in holding Ministers to account for their achievement.

- Further in relation to Part 1, in our response to the previous consultation on the Bill, we noted that whilst the proposal to set national outcomes is, on the face of it, sensible, there are risks that the national focus of much recent reform activity can create tensions between national and local priorities for change. Further, if the commitment to set national outcomes is intended to provide greater clarity about trends in national performance, it is important to recognise that national outcomes can mask significant local variation in performance. Given this, it would be important that any national indicators that are set help assess how reductions in the wide inequalities of outcomes (health, life expectancy, educational attainment, etc.) that persist across Scotland are being addressed.

- Further in relation to Part 1, we note that the Bill commits Scottish ministers to prepare and publish reports about the extent to which the national outcomes have been achieved, and that these reports must be prepared and published at such times as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate. We would suggest that there is benefit in being clearer about the frequency of such reporting, especially given the likely influence of such reports on the proposed annual reports of progress by community planning partnerships against their local outcomes improvement plan, as required under Part 2 of the Bill.

- Part 2, section 8 (governance) of the Bill does not in our opinion clearly set out how the governance and accountability arrangements for the proposed community planning partnerships are expected to operate, not least in relation to auditing arrangements. This includes in particular how the performance of CPPs as partnerships will be assessed, and how they will be held to account for the discharge of the duties set out in the Bill, including their progress against outcomes. This seems a significant gap.

- In its previous consultation on the Bill, the Scottish Government asked “how might the legislation best capture the community leadership role of councils without the CPP being perceived as an extension of the local authority?”¹ The Bill seems silent on any community leadership role of a local authority, given its repeal of the duty on a local authority to facilitate community planning in the 2003 Local Government in Scotland Act. In our response, we stated that “it is difficult to predict what might happen were the specific duty on councils to ‘initiate, facilitate and maintain’ the community planning process to be repealed”. The Committee may therefore wish to explore the implications of this.

- At present, for many CPPs the resources to support the community planning process are predominantly provided by the local authority through community planning officers and/or teams employed by and working within the council. Section 9(3) of the Bill requires partners to commit resources to support community planning. But the Bill appears to be silent on the extent to which the resourcing of the administration of the community planning process should be seen as a partnership task. reporting

- In relation to Part 5 of the Bill (asset transfers), in our response to the Scottish Government’s previous consultation on the Bill, we noted that it would be necessary to be clear about what would happen in case of failure by the community to make effective use of the asset. The Bill seems silent on this issue.

We hope that this response provides a useful reflection of our experience so far from our Best Value audit work and scrutiny of community planning, and of our responsibilities in holding public services to account and encouraging improvement. We are of course willing to share further reflections as appropriate, as the process for the Bill continues.

Yours sincerely

The Scottish Wildlife Trust1 welcomes the opportunity to submit evidence to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee regarding the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

We have concentrated our evidence on the questions which could impact on Scotland’s natural capital2.

Q2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

As stated in explanatory notes: Schedule 1 to the Bill sets out a list of public sector bodies which will be required to participate in community planning. Some of these bodies (including NHS bodies, Scottish Enterprise and Highland and Islands Enterprise) are already statutory community planning partners. Others (including Skills Development Scotland, Scottish Natural Heritage and the Scottish Environmental Protection Agency) are not statutory partners at present but as a matter of practice frequently participate in community planning.

We welcome the inclusion of SNH and SEPA amongst others as statutory partners in community planning. We believe this will help mainstream the environment in community planning and will enable the delivery of better outcome. This accords with the Scottish Biodiversity Strategy which states:

Public bodies are urged to play their part in realising these [2020 Challenge] outcomes, with a more collaborative approach between sectors and connecting single outcome agreements, community planning and health partnerships.

However, we do have concerns regarding present capacity for such government agencies to engage with 32 CPPs. As this will not be cost neutral, will this divert resources away from these agencies performing other functions? This could have a detrimental impact on protecting and enhancing biodiversity and ecosystem services.

That said, there is merit in having such agency expertise in helping influence local outcomes; a high quality environment is essential for a flourishing Scotland and safeguarding Scotland’s natural capital will help deliver the Government’s national outcomes. Indeed, we believe work still needs to be done to mainstream biodiversity amongst decision makers as demonstrated by the agreed six national priorities3 in Single Outcome Agreements which lack an environmental outcome amongst the six.

Q4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

Duty on Ministers

We note Part 1 of the Bill places a duty on Ministers to develop, consult on and publish a set of national outcomes for Scotland, which builds on the “Scotland Performs” framework.

The Trust support the statutory consultation process for determining national outcomes as well as the increased transparency regarding reporting progress towards achieving national outcomes.

Abandoned or neglected land

The Trust notes Section 48 inserts a new Part 3A into the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 Act to give communities a right to buy land that is wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected, for the purposes of the sustainable development of that land, where there is no willing seller.4

We also note that the new Section 97C of the 2003 Act defines land which is to be classed as eligible for the purposes of Part 3A of the 2003 Act. Subsection (1) provides that eligible land is land which is wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected in the opinion of Ministers.5

With regard to Part 3A, the Trust is concerned that there is no definition of what is meant by abandoned or neglected land. A definition would aid the scrutiny of the Bill, even if such a definition were not to be included in the Bill.

We believe a definition is important because land which has high biodiversity value and delivers ecosystem services may give the appearance of being abandoned or neglected; indeed some of the land the Trust manages for wildlife across Scotland, including internationally and nationally protected sites, may appear to the ‘uninformed eye’ to be abandoned or neglected when in fact natural processes, which need little intervention, such as woodland and scrub regeneration are being encouraged. Without this clarity, one could also argue that active blanket bog (outwith a protective site – see below) which is delivering public benefits through ecosystem services such as carbon sequestration, increased biodiversity, water retention and filtration, is neglected or abandoned – purely because there is no active management.

For this reason, the Trust would like to seek assurances that land owned, managed or designated for nature conservation purposes or being of value for nature conservation either within itself or as part of the surrounding ecosystem, is excluded from any definition of what constitutes abandoned or neglected land.

The Trust believes that for land that is not included in the above categories, the opinion of Ministers regarding the value and contribution to sustainable development of ‘abandoned or neglected land’ in its current state should be informed, inter alia, by consideration of the role the site makes in terms of providing ecosystem services e.g. flood prevention, biodiversity, carbon sequestration, pollination, improved water or air quality.

It should also be borne in mind that previously abandoned or neglected land will naturally become colonised (a process known as succession) and thus has the potential to increase in value, because of the fact that it has been left unmanaged. This type of habitat is recognised in the UK Biodiversity Action Plan list of priority habitats e.g. Open Mosaic Habitats on Previously Developed Land. Under this priority habitat, notable features present may include:

- increased species richness especially for invertebrates and birds
- an unusual assemblages of plants

In the context of an intensively managed lowland landscape, such habitats may be an oasis for wildlife.

COSLA’s response to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee’s call for evidence on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

Introduction

COSLA welcomes the opportunity to submit written evidence to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. Please note that COSLA is submitting evidence to the Finance Committee on the resources issues created by the Bill separately.

Having worked closely with the Minister and the Scottish Government Bill team there was little surprise in the proposed legislation. COSLA is supportive of the Scottish Government’s ambition to empower communities and as such welcomes the Bill. In this spirit, there are several areas in which the Bill could be strengthened and we have outlined these below.

General Remarks

COSLA’s vision statement seeks to put the position of local self-government on a constitutional footing as soon as practical. The constitutional debate elicited by the forthcoming Referendum has already been identified as a key opportunity to strengthen local government and democracy, regardless of the outcome of the vote itself. COSLA welcomes the Scottish Government’s willingness to enter into discussion on this matter.

COSLA strongly believes that the most practicable way to do this in the short term is by giving life to the European Charter of Local Self-Government through the enactment of domestic legislation. The Charter is a part of the binding Council of Europe treaty framework intended to protect human rights and democracy across the 47 members. It is a requirement for candidate members of the European Union to sign up to. The European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) is another element of the same treaty framework. All existing members of the EU have signed and ratified the provisions. In the majority of cases the provisions are reflected in the member states’ constitutions.

As is well known, the United Kingdom is unusual in not having a written constitution. The position of local government is defined in a myriad of pieces of legislation, and there is no right to local self-government in Scotland or the UK. We accept that there is evidence of both the UK and Scottish Parliaments being prepared to take forward legislation that enacts some elements of the Council of Europe treaty frameworks. For example, the ECHR provisions are embedded in UK legislation through the Human Rights Act 1998. It places obligations on public bodies to observe its provisions, and is binding on the legislation from the Scottish Parliament. However, the main issue here for COSLA is how local democracy is protected, and in particular how the European Charter on Local Self Government is made available through the Scottish domestic courts, as a means of fully enacting its various articles.
We recognise that the Scottish Government has repeated its commitment to embed local democracy and the Charter’s provisions in a constitution should there be independence. However, regardless of the outcome of the referendum, COSLA strongly argues that local government should be protected. Protection within a constitution would be our preferred method as we believe that a legislative approach could, theoretically, be eroded through later Parliamentary decisions. Nonetheless, the protection conferred through legislation is still significant and something that we firmly support. We recognise a willingness to take such action is hugely symbolic and the political cost to a party or coalition wanting to overturn rights to local democracy would be significant and in all likelihood make it deeply unpopular.

Consequently, COSLA’s position has been, and remains, that the European Charter should be reflected in domestic legislation and that the natural place for this to happen is through the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. Should there at some point in the future be a written Constitution for Scotland or the United Kingdom it would be our expectation that the Charter provisions would be reflected in such arrangements.

Meantime, placing the right to local self-government on a statutory footing in Scotland would give the whole of the Charter a formal legal status in Scotland, ahead of the rest of the UK. While this would fall short of the longer term constitutional embedding we would ultimately argue for, it would set an important precedent and demonstrably reflect the Scottish Parliament’s commitment to local democracy. COSLA suggests including something like the following in the legislation as an intermediate step:

“Ministers of the Scottish Government while exercising their functions must observe and promote the principles and provisions of the European Charter of Local Self-Government (1985) - ETS 122”

This would be a simple way of giving effect to the Charter’s provisions, allow steps to be taken incrementally to consolidate the right of local people to a greater degree of autonomy in the way our communities manage their own affairs, and ultimately allow the possibility of a legal challenge to be made, should the need ever arise. By placing a duty on Scottish Ministers that refers to external treaties / legislation, Scotland would be adopting a similar approach to that already used for the European Charter of Human Rights in UK legislation.

We acknowledge the work that may be required in this area and are keen to develop this in partnership with both the Scottish Parliament and Scottish Government. Furthermore, we are aware that the Commission for Strengthening Local Democracy have provided helpful recommendations in this area which will help inform debate.

Any part of the legislation proposing new duties on Local Authorities would require to be appropriately financed and resourced by National Government and cost neutral to local government.

Part 1 – National Outcomes

While in principle COSLA recognises the right of National Government to set outcomes for Scotland, we have a number of concerns around the proposed legislation.

COSLA very much welcomes the outcome focus approach taken in this part of the legislation. However, we are disappointed to note that while service delivery is undertaken by local government, this is not reflected in the legislation or policy memorandum. Local government remain committed to an outcome focused approach through Community Planning Partnerships and Single Outcome Agreements and already have a good strategic framework in place. COSLA would welcome explicit recognition of the importance of partnership working between national and local government when setting outcomes which affect locally delivered services.

Part 2 – Community Planning

COSLA welcomes the proposals to improve the Community Planning process by requiring all statutory partners to participate equally and fully in the process, through legislation. Given the joint working COSLA and the Scottish Government have undertaken, culminating in the Joint Statement of Ambition, we very much welcome and are supportive of the Scottish Government choosing this Bill as the route to deliver new duties.

COSLA continues to welcome the opportunity to level the playing field, recognise that Community Planning is a genuine joint endeavour that encompasses the whole of the public sector and believe that the democratic mandate of councillors underpins the lead role of local government in the arrangements.

COSLA welcomes the additional partners named in the legislation as statutory community planning partners. However, we still question whether the legislation includes all the relevant partners that should be at the Community Planning table. While we advocate that local Community Planning Partnerships would be best placed to make these decisions, we feel that other NDPBs, such as the Scottish Prison Service and Regional Colleges, should also be considered as statutory Community Planning Partners, wherever they are necessary to delivery of particular agreed outcomes in CPP areas. In particular, with reference to the forthcoming changes in the area of community justice, COSLA notes that under the lists of Relevant Authorities and Public Services Authorities, key justice partners are not explicitly listed.

Community Empowerment, in relation to improving justice within communities, will fall short without the critical input from partners within justice, in particular the Scottish Prison Service, the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscals Office and the Scottish Court Service. More generally, the duties regarding CPP Partners are welcome, including the encouragement to commit resources to the delivery of CPP outcomes, however, it is difficult to see how this can be effectively enforced.

Part 3 – Participation Requests

COSLA notes that some of the proposed provisions here concerning community engagement significantly reflect the content of the Protocol to the European Charter of Local Self-Government. The charter protocol seeks to increase the local accountability of government through the adoption of measures such as citizens’ panels, community petitioning, and similar measures. In essence, while Scottish Ministers are extending the application of the protocol to all parts of the public sector a legitimate question is raised over whether it is right that Ministers should progress this area without protecting the services and representative democracy that the engagement is trying to influence.

Nonetheless, COSLA agrees that public bodies should consider requests, so long as they are reasonable, give reasons for their decisions, where granting those rights to state what conditions are attached to them, and, when declining to grant, stating reasons for not doing so.

It is difficult to predict what the implications of this new requirement on public bodies will be. At one extreme it could lead to large number of requests coming to councils. In particular, in areas of public service change where difficult decisions are being made by elected members such as opposition to the closure of local facilities or services which are a result of the financial pressures being experienced by councils. This could be similar to the current Freedom of Information process and we therefore have some concern over the potential administrative burden that these new duties could create. COSLA is clear that the cost emanating from these new duties require to be fully funded and cost neutral for councils. As indicated earlier in our submission, COSLA will be responding separately on the financial memorandum to this Bill directly to the Finance Committee, however, it is important to stress that we have concerns around being able to quantify the demand for this legislation and in turn the costs that will be incurred by Local Authorities.

Part 4 – Community Right to Buy Land

Part 5 – Asset Transfer Requests

The legislation is increasingly relevant and important to Local Authorities, in particular in the areas of culture and leisure. Given the current fiscal challenges presenting local government many Local Authorities are already working on the development of the Community Sports Hub model with sports clubs, teams and joint management arrangements. In addition to developing community empowerment in the sports sector, the culture sector have also started to consider these types of approach in looking at property rationalisation in terms of community halls, village facilities and cultural facilities, such as museums.

This work is highly reliant on council support and provision of community capacity building assistance, which can be resource intensive. Initial capital investment is also required to cover the cost of the standard lease arrangements required for asset transfer.

COSLA notes that under Part 5, section 53 (2)(b) of the Bill that on the winding up of the company and after the satisfaction of its liabilities, its property (including any land, and any rights in relation to land, acquired by it as a result of an asset transfer request under this Part) passes to either another community body, a charity, a community body approved by Scottish Ministers, a crofting community body, or should no such body exist, to the Scottish Ministers or a charity of choosing by Scottish Ministers. COSLA are very firm in the view that should the asset have been acquired from a Local Authority, then that Local Authority should have a first refusal option to have the asset returned to them. COSLA considers that this section precludes Local Authorities far too early in the process. After all, the Local Authority would be the continuing body with the experience, knowledge and skill around the management and ownership of the asset.

We are supportive of the differentiated approach between Local Authorities and other public bodies outlined in the legislation. COSLA are firmly of the view that as local government is democratically accountable to the electorate there is no need for the requirement to have their decisions appealed, where community requests are declined, via an appeals process involving Scottish Ministers. However, Part 5 Section 56(7)(b) suggests that Scottish Ministers could still override the decision of a Local Authority should a Local Authority and community body be unable to agree a timescale between themselves regarding agreement to an asset transfer.
request. This would appear to go against the intention of section 58(2)(b) and on this basis, therefore, we would welcome changes in the wording of this section of the legislation which is reflective of the Bill’s intention.

It is clear that there is a currently unquantifiable administrative and financial impact on councils with this part of the legislation. However, it is imperative that these new duties on Local Authorities are appropriately financed and resourced by Scottish Government and cost neutral to local government.

Part 6 – Common Good Property

In line with current accounting good practice guidelines, Local Authorities should already hold a register of their common good assets therefore COSLA do not consider that this aspect of the legislation should be overly onerous for councils. However, COSLA repeats the point made in regard to other legislative proposals in the Bill, whereby the administrative burden around the consultation with Community Councils and Community Groups in the establishment of the register and any disposal or any change in use of common good property is unknown and we seek assurances that the cost of this would not fall on the shoulders of the Local Authority.

Given that the Bill has a section dedicated to the issue of Common Good, it would appear to be an oversight that the legislation does not seek to address what is commonly referred to as the “Portobello School” issue. As the Committee will be aware, in the case of Portobello the Court decided that where land is identified as inalienable common good land a Local Authority cannot appropriate it for another function. In this specific case the proposal was to convert the use from a park to a school site. This contrasts with the position on the sale of common good land where councils are able to dispose of common good land with the approval of the court. To enable the land in Portobello to be used for a new High School it has involved an Act of Parliament, which seems somewhat disproportionate and time consuming.

COSLA therefore supports SOLAR’s view that a very straightforward change to existing legislation (Section 75 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973) would enable the use of common good land to be approved by the courts in the same way as a sale can be. The change to section 75 of the 1973 Act would require an additional provision being included in Part 6 of the Bill. To achieve the change would actually involve minimal amendments. All that would be required would be the words “appropriate or” to be inserted at four locations in section 75(2) and in one location in section 75(3) of the 1973 Act.

While COSLA appreciates that the Minister may be wary about being seen to make it easier for councils to change the way common good land is being used, all the above suggestion does in practice is to bring change of use into line with the existing provisions for disposal.

Part 7 – Allotments

COSLA are firm in the view that individual Local Authorities are best placed to respond to the detailed legislation proposed in the Bill. In assessing the legislation, consideration needs to be given to the very great range of circumstances, including geography, of Scottish Local Authority areas. We recognise that Scotland is a diverse country made up of Islands, urban, rural, and city areas. Demand for allotments and potential availability of land therefore differs significantly between Local Authority areas. On this basis COSLA feels strongly that the trigger point requiring Local Authorities to take reasonable steps to provide further allotments is arbitrary and not practical for all Local Authorities.

Furthermore, while a trigger point for the creation of more allotments is specified within the legislation we feel it is important to stress that any proposed new allotments would be subject to the normal, rigorous planning process. Therefore, it is important to note that the provision of additional allotments is not determined by the trigger point specified in the Bill alone.

The Bill proposes that allotment users will be able to sell on surplus produce. COSLA considers that, on this basis, the cost of remediation of contamination should be an explicit ground for refusing a request for land to be given over for allotment use. We have significant concerns around the potential legal implications this could cause Local Authorities.

We note the duty on Local Authorities to produce an annual allotments report. While COSLA does not disagree with this measure, we consider the level of detail set-out within the legislation to be too prescriptive and micro-management.

We again stress that caution should be exercised around the proposed new duties which place an additional administrative burden on councils. COSLA is clear that the proposed duties require to be adequately resourced by the Scottish Government.

Part 8 – Non-Domestic Rates

We note that this section of the Bill contains proposals outlined in the recent consultation on business rates reform “Supporting Business, Promoting Growth”, which includes a new power for local reliefs. COSLA continues to welcome this, as it is very much in line with COSLA’s vision for increased local flexibility on funding and local taxation powers.

Conclusion

Overall, COSLA’s main concerns focus on the lack of opportunities provided by the Bill to secure the statutory protection of local democracy and local government.

Scottish Local Government is also concerned that all the proposals are properly funded and cost neutral for councils. It is imperative that any new duties on local government be fully funded by national government. Furthermore, COSLA continues to stress the importance of ensuring that a reasonable time period be set aside for changes and transition to take place.

The Bill makes repeated reference to numerous regulations and guidelines and COSLA welcomes the opportunity for officers to work closely and constructively with Scottish Government officers around the detail and production of these. We look forward to participating in the ongoing debate and discussion in an active and constructive manner and recognise that it is in all of our interests that we get this legislation right.
I am Secretary of Stromeferry and Achmore Community Council. At our meeting of the 26th August, 2014 we went through the provisions of the bill and it was decided, we would pass comment and object to the proposal to allow local communities to acquire assets through compulsory purchase against owner's wishes if the land is not 'put to good use' or buildings are 'run down'.

Mary MacBeth, Secretary Stromeferry and Achmore Community Council

Community Empowerment Bill - Easy to read version page 8, section Community Right to Buy.

In some communities there is land that may not be put to good use and buildings that may be run down. The Scottish Government wants to change the law so that community organisations can buy this type of land or buildings so they can do something useful with them. This new law would allow that to happen even if the owner does not want to sell their land. This could make local areas better places for everyone to live.
LOCAL GOVERNMENT AND REGENERATION COMMITTEE: CALL FOR EVIDENCE ON THE COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

Given the strength of the voluntary sector within the North East, Aberdeenshire Council is supportive of the overall direction of the Bill. In many cases the Bill will place into statute many approaches which are already well established in Aberdeenshire, such as in community planning and asset transfer. It should be recognised that many of the best examples of empowerment we have seen have taken place where community bodies have had the opportunity to grow through time to develop the confidence and capacity to take on large-scale projects.

It is significant that much of the current good practice around asset transfer has been enabled through a variety of different national grant and investment schemes. There are numerous examples in Aberdeenshire of active community-led organisations that have developed assets as a result of this:

- Fraserburgh Development Trust worked to renovate a blight sight in the town centre and funded this through Town Centre Improvement funding. This asset has since been used as security to purchase a bakery in a rural community thus sustaining existing jobs and leading to the creation of further training opportunities.
- Huntly Development Trust have recently purchased a farm with Scottish Land Fund support and are developing renewable energy projects.
- Udny Community Trust have set up a community grant scheme with the funding from a wholly owned turbine. They now have a Big Lottery (Growing Community Assets) funded Development Officer and are delivering on needs identified through ‘Planning for Real’ completing a virtuous cycle of identifying and meeting need.

2. What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

Aberdeenshire Council is committed to community engagement and partnership working and as such welcomes the thrust of the Bill. Ensuring that all partners will support and allocate resources towards the delivery of a shared plan is an important step in empowering community planning partnerships.

In terms of potential disadvantages, it is possible that the Bill will be perceived nationally as a means of placing additional responsibilities unreasonably on to community bodies. It is important therefore that there is sufficient support in place for communities to get what they need out of the Bill. On that note, there are potentially significant resource implications arising from the provisions in the Bill. Aberdeenshire Community Planning Partnership through its Single Outcome Agreement and Local Community Plans remains committed to focusing on outcomes and it is important that the administration of certain provisions within the Bill do not take resources away from delivering improved outcomes for communities. While specific concerns raised by officers of Aberdeenshire Council are set out in section 4, the Bill will require additional resources to implement.

There is an ongoing process of capacity building that happens as organisations grow. This process of building capacity involves a range of partners and agencies but to succeed must be driven by the vision of local people themselves.

Clearly, access to funding streams is an important factor in this as the examples in Fraserburgh, Huntly, Udny mentioned earlier demonstrate. The long-term process of creating anchor organisations has also been evident through the work of some local Rural Partnerships such as Buchan Development Partnership who were case studied in the original Community Empowerment Action Plan.

The Policy memorandum makes reference to Participatory Budgeting and the desire of the Scottish Government to see this approach more widely utilised. There is an opportunity to link a new national participatory budgeting seed-corn fund to support the implementation of this Bill – perhaps utilising the ‘Change Fund’ approach which has previously been used in relation to enhanced outcomes for older people.

Inevitably some communities will be better placed to take advantage of the provisions in the Bill than others. To reduce against any potential for increasing inequalities between communities, it is important that public bodies continue to target resources to the areas of greatest need. Public bodies will have to support all communities to be able to become more empowered.

4. Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

The proposed core duties are welcomed and support the high-level messages expressed in the Christie Commission and Statement of Ambition. It is important that these duties are placed on an equal footing with other duties that partner organisations hold. Driving a shift from participation at meetings to participation in delivery and resourcing is a significant step forward. There will of course remain a tension between the existing lines of accountability that public bodies hold with the newer responsibilities funnelled through the Community Planning Partnership. There is no easy way around this and it has proved a barrier to partnership working so far.

For the provisions relating to common good, the Bill as drafted requires the Council to consult every community council in Aberdeenshire for every possible sale, rather than the local community council. Given the number of community councils in Aberdeenshire, this would be very time consuming for both the Council and community councils. It would be beneficial to amend the wording of the legislation to focus on the local and relevant community council. In addition, there are significant resource implications arising from the creation of a register of common good assets. While there is an existing audit obligation to maintain such a register, CIPFA acknowledges that current practice of dealing with common good issues as title queries rise is acceptable. The geographical area of Aberdeenshire Council and volume of titles means it would require significant resources and time to complete a full and comprehensive review of the Council’s titles. This is the position reported to, and accepted by, the Council’s Policy and Resources Committee. The draft provisions relating to common good have financial implications for the Council as these would require significant legal and archivist resources to take forward.

There needs to be clear links between any wider Scottish Government work to develop the role of community councils and the contents of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. It should be acknowledged that community councils along with other community bodies have a role to play in supporting the implementation of the Bill. The capacity and will of community councils to take on these provisions can vary significantly across Scotland. Further clarity on the role of community councils in the context of the Bill and how they can be appropriately and proportionately empowered would be welcomed.

5. What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy Memorandum?

It is worth highlighting that equalities considerations will need to be built into future policies and practices that emerge to help implement the provisions in the Bill. Aberdeenshire Council has previously responded to the consultation highlighting the need to carefully manage the implementation of the Bill. This is important to ensure that those areas well placed and capable of taking advantage of the provisions do not further pull away from areas with less capacity and knowledge of community development.

Hi
I hope I am not too late to have these notes discussed.

1. To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

I think there needs to be more emphasis on also to engage BME and other groups into the discussion of community empowerment. I believe these communities will not be able to participate due to many issues:- lack of knowledge of the system/ Bill, language and cultural barriers, not seeing it as their Right to be involved, especially in things they do not understand.

1. Do you consider communities across Scotland have the capability to take advantage of the provisions in the Bill? If not, what requires to be done to the Bill, or to assist communities, to ensure this happens?

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill Call for Evidence

Response from the Chartered Institute of Housing Scotland – September 2014

General comments

CIH Scotland welcomes the opportunity to contribute to the debate surrounding the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. We recognise the importance of community participation in developing sustainable neighbourhoods and organisations that deliver services which are tailored to meet the needs of local communities.

Housing is at the heart of each and every community and it is important that the housing industry continues to build better working relationships to deliver homes that are warm, safe and well managed within communities where residents feel that their participation is valued.

There are already many good examples of tenant participation in the social rented sector and the importance of the relationship between social landlords and their tenants has been recognised through the development of the Scottish Social Housing Charter and enhanced performance scrutiny under the Scottish Housing Regulator. It is hoped that the provisions within the Bill relating to community planning, service delivery improvements and community ownership will present opportunities for more people to become involved in creating successful communities that people want to be a part of.

Responses to the specific questions in the Local Government and Regeneration Committee’s Call for Evidence are outlined below.

To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

The provisions within the Bill will create opportunities for people to become more involved in developing local services that are tailored to the needs of local people. However, the extent to which the powers are actually used will ultimately be driven by demand from within communities.

For example, social tenants already have the opportunity to become involved in the management of their homes but to date there has been little interest in this option. In some cases, perhaps social landlords could do more to highlight the opportunities available to their tenants. However, experience suggests that in the majority of cases, tenants simply do not want to manage their own homes. Tenants expect the rent that they pay to cover the cost of an efficient and professional tenancy management service.

Giving local residents the option to take on ownership or management of underused assets presents an interesting and exciting opportunity for local groups to become more involved in the revival of areas or buildings which might otherwise have fallen into disrepair. When local people are involved in regeneration projects, such as the creation of a community garden or play park, they are more likely to become engaged in the management and maintenance of the project over the longer term.
What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

Benefits
Supporting people to become more involved in their local community helps to foster a sense of ownership and responsibility. Strong communities are less likely to suffer from antisocial behaviour.

Building a sense of community cohesion, encouraging co-operative values and local informal support networks can prevent social isolation and the need for more formal intervention from housing, health and social services.

Involving service users in policy development and review can help to identify efficiencies and better ways of doing things. People who are using services are in an ideal position to comment on how well the service is being run and how to make improvements.

Becoming involved in community projects and local service delivery can help people to build up skills and social networks improving employment prospects which can help to increase household income and quality of life.

Disadvantages
Supporting greater involvement from communities may be resource intensive for public services. However, as demonstrated above, the positives that can be achieved in terms of creating informal support networks, reducing antisocial behaviour and identifying efficiencies in service delivery will help to balance out the financial costs associated with supporting community involvement.

The transfer of land and assets may be more difficult to support in areas where land is at a premium, for example, in densely populated urban areas. Local authorities may also find some conflict if assessing a request for the transfer of HRA land or assets, especially if the community group’s proposal is to buy or lease the asset at below market value. Local authorities will be tasked with making difficult decisions about balancing value for money with the possible social benefits of any proposals involving HRA assets.

Community groups will have different levels of skills and expertise and so will require different levels and types of support.

It is likely that the most disadvantaged groups, who would probably benefit most from increased community involvement, will be the ones who need the most help in making their voices heard. We need to ensure that support is in place to facilitate participation for people with different skill bases.

It may be difficult for public sector organisations to provide the required level of support to properly facilitate community groups given that no additional financial resources are being made available. It would be helpful if the Scottish Government provided a platform for community groups to access information and share their ideas and experiences of involvement in service delivery or taking control of assets.
Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

The provisions set out in Section 61 which will allow authorities to refuse to consider a request for the use an asset within two years of refusing a similar request seem to be at odds with the intention of the Bill by creating barriers for community groups. It does make sense to have some clause in place to prevent local authorities from having to deal with repeat requests but it does not seem fair that a community group could be denied the chance to take on an asset based on the failures of a previous group.

Perhaps the legislation could be updated to state that an authority would not have to consider a request from the same group within two years. This would ensure that a different group would not be denied the chance to put forward a request to use the same asset.

There may be some issues with definitions in the Bill, specifically how “neglected and abandoned” land is defined and what would constitute “reasonable” grounds for an authority to refuse an application for sale or lease of assets. These will need to be clearly set out in Scottish Government guidance.

What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the policy memorandum?

We are confident that equality and human rights issues are adequately summarised in the policy memorandum.

Dear Sirs / Madams,

Permaculture Scotland welcomes this opportunity to comment on land and community as relevant areas of focus in Permaculture. In regard of responding to a call for evidence for the Community Empowerment Bill (as introduced), I am the nominated person within the Association to make response and would be grateful if you directed any enquiries or replies to me.

The Permaculture Association in the UK has some two thousand members. We are an Association of a design science, called Permaculture (derived from permanent agriculture) and part of a global network of tens of thousands of graduates of permaculture courses, who practice disciplines of design, teaching, consultancy, and realisation of diverse projects. In Scotland our events attract as many as 200 attendants, as at our national Year of Natural Scotland event in 2013. The basis of our association and practice is to achieve sustainable projects best by understanding natural processes and design, where reuse of all outputs within a system and maximizing all use of inputs is effective practice in an environment in which all natural living forms have their place, and where a vibrant society and economy is based on valuing people and place. We support people in specific sectors and professions to understand the value of the permaculture design approaches and activities.

One of our members draws on relevant experience and connections that inform as regards important community stakeholder issues in community empowerment. Such as in: Community Allotments, Community Partnership with LA and Developers, Meanwhile Land Use, Urban Gardens, Community Education, Active Community, Positive Health Initiatives, Asset Transfer, Participation in Public Consultations, Resource development, personal development, mentorship with disadvantaged groups, and community systems; and through participation with organisations such as Bridgend Growing Communities, Bridgend Inspiring Growth, The Grove Fountainbridge Community Gardens (Founder Member), Scottish Allotments and Gardens Society (co-opted committee member), Rural Skills Academy & Access to Industry (Oatridge), Venture Scotland (Mentor, Team Leadership), ICARB Scotland.

We support the Scottish Government’s commitment to the Bill. We feel community empowerment can have a direct and positive relationship with Government purposes right across all indicators, and outcomes that reflect a vibrant society, healthy living, and thriving natural, rural and urban environments, and we believe Permaculture can be of valuable assistance towards reaching Government targets in sustainability and economic resilience, food security and ecological footprints, and welcome further engagement.

Yours sincerely,

1. Community and Community Empowerment:

It is noticed that core basics of Community Empowerment have little direct legislative counterpart in the Bill as introduced. Recognition that Community Empowerment, like Community Planning, is a process that can be strengthened with legislative frameworks is necessary. The Scottish Government's commitment to the highly focused CLD and SOAs need to converge well with bottom-up processes of input, whereby people in communities and policy makers both are enabled in improving understanding, policy and action towards community empowerment. It is this process that can be strengthened by legislation. Community Empowerment, itself, needs to be formalised so that consulting deeply with community is enabled well, and for diversity that communities represent. To 'consider which community bodies are likely to be able to contribute', to 'make all reasonable efforts', to 'take such steps as are reasonable' and 'to consult such persons as considered appropriate' may not be enough for communities to feel connected to the Governments stated expectations of CPPs or to feel that the CPP's have any actual concept of communities. 'Those likely to engage' is not comprehensive as an understanding of communities, where only those likely to engage become representative. A 'community body' is defined by 'that wish to participate in community planning'. Participation relates to community planning, 'any community bodies must participate with each other in community planning' where community planning relates to 'provision of services delivered by or on behalf of the local authority or the persons listed in schedule 1("community planning")'. Participation is with community only by that community bodies engage in planning and services carried out for communities, not with communities. As specified, this is significant limiting detail that is not directly empowering. This does not empower communities themselves. Courses of action are very much placed within the comfort zone of planning. Where commercial interests integral to planning tiers are more engaged than communities this is not very robust towards communities. There is plenty left to goodwill in our society, leaving much open to disregard also, requiring that guidance assists, and ensures, respectively, that action in community empowerment results. The key may be in legislating for a clear duty of government and public bodies to cohere with community empowerment through a direct address of Community Empowerment. This requires flexibility towards a wide diversity of approach, matching the diversity of communities and their relative capacities, in extending opportunities to communities to access information and choice.

It is understood that in stating that CPP make 'reasonable steps' there is no danger of representative bodies occupying themselves too directly with the self determination of communities. That is very good, what is missing is that this is not very far reaching in terms of being the legislative address towards Community Empowerment. It is apparent that for Community Empowerment to be effective Community Empowerment must be set out for effectiveness in cohesion with the way an Equality Act or Scottish Legislation to protect rights and welfare in Scotland is set out. It may be necessary for legislative purposes that Community has status as a Person, included in a Schedule, and proposed here thereby, that includes Community, as a Schedule Category in addition to the Community Planning Partners, the Public Service Authorities, and the Relevant Authorities, given legislative status in Schedules 1, 2 & 3. While it is understood that communities may be too diverse to be listed in Schedule, including a Schedule for Community as a legislatively recognised category at least should be able to go some way towards protection of equality, rights and welfare extended generically also to communities, including duties of direct community empowerment by bodies towards communities. Legislation best support a dynamics that underpins both a top down and bottom up approach, without increasing complexity for communities, or diverting their actual interests through excessive focus on meeting needs of planning bodies. Stepping down a Government approach through concordat still needs a bottom up approach direct from community for the local and regional tiers to be effective in community empowerment.

Community Planning Partnerships, including any community bodies and anybody corporates established in relation to community planning must be specifically enabled to act as facilitators for Community Empowerment at local and community level by enabling regular forums and gatherings locally and centrally for discussion and agreement through forms of Participatory Democracy. Processes of participation must be accessible, widely known and openly available. Places and times of participation must be regularly enabled and hosted to enable Communities and People within Communities to come forth and participate effectively and often and in open agendas that allow for communities to bring their interests and concerns. Participation needs to mean via participatory democracy, and that CPP's and LA undergo a process of moderation via communities. It is recognised that CPP's ‘over-arching partnership framework acting to rationalise and simplify a cluttered landscape’ is a key principle for the success of the CPP and the Concordat between National Government and Local Government, and COSLA. Here is a reminder, also, importantly, that communities do form a landscape that is naturally complex, and in ways that need to be embraced. In the way that many streams run down the many hillsides of an landscape in Scotland that is forever changing its directions. This cannot be legislated, but can be embraced by legislative measures towards resiliency of these. There is caution here; to pause, and reflect that in developing resiliency in actual communities, as part of single and national outcomes, developing flexibility in Government makes for a necessary counterpart in the highly developed planning initiatives set forth that will bring so much to Scotland. A dedicated portal for communities that have little requirement to be fully immersed in CPP service level participation but who are connecting to their communities to engage in participatory democracy for engaging with policy, outcomes, and initiatives can be useful to enable widest bases, and smallest endeavours of community to recognised as relevant in their initiatives towards outcomes arising at community level. Intense focus on planning for community and lack of positive affirmation legislatively for working directly with or at the behest of community can prohibit ease of communication by direct forms of equality. There is a need for a culture in which developers, planners, community bodies each, can interact with communities therefore equality for communities is highlighted as to be legislated for.

A key question is: Is this a Bill that communities can understand? Approach and engagement in the very Bill: It is understood that simplification of detail would be decreasing full knowledge of this Bill, thus not empowering. Making the bill available in accessible formats, while enabling understanding with full accessibility of detailed information is, of course, important. A big part though, is one of approach and engagement in the very Bill. CPPs, LAs, Public Bodies, need to be empowered to recognise diversity, and ensure best outcomes for all. Communities are empowered where all other parts of Society can address, and have an approach to community that engages with community empowerment, and not least embraces full and comprehensive community empowerment as an outcome. This is where the Bill needs to address core basics of Community Empowerment. Part 2, 5 Local outcomes improvement plan, (3) (a), and (b), (4), (b); 8 Governance (1) (a) and (b); 9 Community planning partners: duties (3)(b); any other similar sections, clauses need to refer to such in addition to the participatory service provision mainly referred to. There is this need for planning bodies to be able to support, respond to community, and plan with community, in addition to the planning for community with participation. The Community Schedule, proposed in this document, is a suggestion towards that any Community, Individual within Community, that comes forth via accessible, open and participatory democracy be firmly recognised by the structure of Community Partnerships as statutory consultees within the framework of the Community Empowerment Bill, with or without their being a formally constituted body, and also representing self, as a part of community, or a community, or part of one, and as a community body as defined in part 2, 4, (8), while not being part of community planning necessarily. Role as a statutory consultee as community/ individuals in community must be simply enabled through participatory democracy. This in addition to and differently to anybody established for purposes which consist of or include that of promoting or improving the interests of any communities. The principle of a key over-arching partnership framework helping to co-ordinate other initiatives and partnerships is understood, yet must include intents for community empowerment towards the reality of plurality and diversity of community so that equality is practised and genuinely engaged in the decisions made not only on public services, but equally also in working together with initiatives that arise within community. A stepped down approach of Government, which remains in disconnect hovering just above community, can be made effective with mechanisms which allow for community and government to engage, and where structures such as CPP facilitate participatory democracy and the outcomes of engagement.

The Bill contains no direct reference to community or empowerment, or definitions for the purposes of the Bill, making it clear that the duties to be performed by Ministers, Local Government and Public Body Partnerships are not being focused through this Bill on community, or community empowerment, as the frameworks being established have planning for community as a leverage. This means that legislation in the Bill as introduced cannot be as forwards looking as National Outcomes, SOAs, CLD, and other forward looking well intentioned policies. This as an imbalance, needs addressing.

Community, Subsidiarity, Social Contract, Relationships and Representations: Community empowerment as process is evidenced by responses to the draft Bill, where the questions of what is community arose. To understand Community and present a working definition that does not detract from the breadth of, or specifics of what communities are and can be, it is effective to focus on the common denominators; as follows. Community is people. Community is connection to Place and/or Identity and/or Interests and/or Needs. Community can be said to be interests and needs arising of people, place, identity. Community is sharing on any of these. Community is self-determining by these. Community can consist of a community of one, or of thousands. Community is the natural self-determining unit of one or many that exists before representative democracy first comes into effect. Hierarchical constructs, such as local, regional, national levels do not determine community. Level constructs such as partnerships, neighbourhoods also do not define community. This is reflected in that community initiatives and local communities define themselves best, and outcomes result of self-determination more than imposed boundaries.

A consideration towards effective relationships between representative bodies and communities, where recognition of a communities ability to map itself, may benefit a community in more far reaching ways than that community solely benefiting from participation within planned services. This is subsidiarity at community level which requires legislative support for multiple representations by communities / people within community. Where communities benefit from planned services, social contract has place. Releasing need for excessive provision to communities, as per subsidiarity, also has place. A good example is food banks versus community growing projects that can provide more in terms of community empowerment, and sustainable outcomes. Community empowerment – the ability of people to do things for themselves – has not been directly addressed. The relationship between Government, national and/or local, and communities across the country has not been directly addressed. A key way of complementing representative democracy – has not been directly addressed. Strategic approaches to community asset and land ownership in terms of community empowerment have not been addressed. Open, democratic, inclusive and competent communities connecting as community, where is there support in the Bill for these? Where there is support for Models that provide focus for community led action, and involve, in a participatory way actual communities? The Bill must make provisions making the unfolding of process of an approach that is empowering to communities explicit at outset in how the Bill is stated. Scope for developing for as yet not fully understood needs and outcomes for community empowerment is necessary. Recognition that Community Empowerment is a process is realistic.

Submission Name: Permaculture Scotland     Submission Number: 161

Individual Development Trusts & Federations, and their related Project Managed Services, Societies, and Affiliated Member Groups are good examples of organisations focused on community, and are best placed to address matters of community empowerment. These representative groups do not so much service the communities they represent but enable these to get on with their actual goals by providing access to enabling expertise, and by addressing larger issues through dedicated representation. There is need to acknowledge their capacity in community empowerment in a Bill that is about community empowerment. There is no direct acknowledgement of these in the Bill, in regards to this capacity, or with reference to Schedules, unlike CPPs. Furthermore, importantly, in the process that is community empowerment, organisations like these, could be best placed to facilitate. The Federation of City Farms and Community Gardens, The Community Land Advisory Service, project-managed by the Federation of City Farms and Community Gardens, SAGS, a society affiliated to NSALG, and some Transition Towns are all good examples of umbrella organisations currently active in beneficial ways empowering the communities they represent. These are not CPPs, and these are not the organisations Government addresses. These are organisations specifically empowering community.

Community as recognisable society form: Community is a basic core recognisable societal form yet to be enabled with very basic socio-economic legal forms for simplest functioning, and as contender in an equality act, and in the Bill for community empowerment. There is need to acknowledge that communities can function. Welfare/ Service Provision is one national concern, another needs to be including support for self-definition, self-sufficiency and sustainability. For community to be enabled to function without being diverted into the pressures that representative, charitable, trade or business forms bring, adaptations directly relevant and accessible to community can be explored. Placing liability on individuals on behalf of community is not a suitable method of dealing with community empowerment, as per the simplest form of constituting. Even simplest of forms are structured towards creation of an organisation with committees and members rather than enabling and empowering communities, and people. The limit would need to be defined as community or individual and include a mix of community and individual activity as a best driver for community, rather a focus on trade, business, or charity in ways unrealistic for communities and individuals when operative as community or as individual pursuing interests. A generic template could form the basis of simple constituting enabling those who do not wish to engage in creating organisations but do need in basic ways to access land and assets, and be developing their spaces, resources, skills, people and groups, and do wish to and may need to function socially and economically to so do. Propositions could be listed under generic templates, and organisations that empower communities could be empowered to develop acceptable templates for specialist communities, and with regard to common interests, common good and common land and assets, and their use, and individuals, and their needs. A template that includes individual interest, innovation or enterprise would be sensible, so as not to limit community in developing individuals with abilities or interests, or particular projects in communities. A 'community entity' based on simple template and registration with the organisations representing their interest groups could legally be declared a kind of 'exempt' entity where these organisations, either individually or in partnership with relevant organisations take on the steps for people and communities to get on with activities in tenable ways. Working Groups made of people with relevant expertise would be well placed to tackle the requirements of legal and economic questions, including that of liability in communities, towards creation of the form and template and registration process of simple 'community entity', and represent the needs of community. Banking bodies, like credit unions could enable something like a 'community account', or individual accounts 'for community activity', and enable receipt of funds, basic trading at community level in monetary terms and so on. Community based forms of trade, monetary via community banking, or otherwise, and self-help/caring via community entities enabled as beneficiary of funds via community banking, or otherwise. To form, register, and dissolve within small community scale & context, with adequate ease, approval could occur, in place of via committees and boards, within events enabled for purpose, held with mediating organisations, and specialists in attendance. A template that includes individual interest, innovation or enterprise is sensible, not to limit where community contexts empower initiative, in fully functional ways, people or the communities or groups themselves may then choose to take up business or charitable interests and constitute into full organisations accordingly where this is a suitable development onwards. These would be likely to invest back into the communities that sustained their development, where successful. These need not be mutually exclusive, and could develop in relationship. This proposal here is to empower people to register their interests, groups or communities, and represent themselves in simple ways for self-empowering activities, with organisations providing the structural support in terms of socio-economic legal and environmental templates, accounts, forms, liability.

A proposition processed into a generic template for a particular use could include set of related activities, which a community entity could include for their particular proposition. Example: To grow crops, flowers, herbs, forest gardens, biodiversity. To set up land/asset use, community resources, shelters, activity and learning spaces, individual and /or community use spaces. Farmers / flea market styled activities. Engendering self-funding, being beneficiary of funds and engaging in community level transactions, community level trade and enterprise within set limits, enabling basic functional cash flows and resourcing. A template could enable community in a whole variety of growing projects without the encumbrance of business or charitable organisation. Expertise could place adequate legal and economic extents that cushion community within local, regional and national contexts and enables larger commercial enterprise in delivery to sustainable communities. There may be implications in all this that a novice is not suggestions, therefor it is important to highlight the need for working groups of experts to bring this about by way of serious application. The sole main communication in all this here is to empower communities and individuals of locality and/or of interest and/or of circumstance/context as active within their contexts, communities, areas and lives and to be recognised and functionally empowered to contribute significantly, in place of being dis-empowered, and inactive service users and communities, with little voice in strategy and policy, and interests significantly at community level.

Note: Unincorporated Association -- leaves ‘committee trustees’ taking big risks while enabling great projects by taking on assets with personal liability on behalf of a membership community, beyond their personal means and often beyond the means of the entire community. CIC -- safeguards assets/incomes and profits towards community but causes burden of having to trade at levels that are beyond embryonic and may not be continuously sustainable at all times within some community contexts for community empowerment. SCIO- places a requirement to uphold specific charity goals as the main aim and entails running a complex organisation. Memberships and customer or client bases are created around these entities, and this in place of actual community represented or empowered communities. Each form lacks in some capacity towards community and therefore a community entity is suggested. One that enables trade, charitable acts, without either redefining community round these entity types, and one that enables community and/or individual and their stated interest within community as the mainstay of attention. The post office ‘bank accounts’ which replaced giros, may serve purpose, but with no other bank functions than receipt of giro, reflect servicing in very non empowering ways.

National Outcomes & Community Empowerment: Before Scottish Ministers determine review, revise and report on National Outcomes, Communities and People within Communities must be consulted on whether National Outcomes have been achieved in the context of these communities, areas local to communities, and interests communities and individuals within communities find relevant, what further forms of community empowerment may be required to achieve the National Outcomes in local and community based ways, whether any additional requirements and outcomes that have not been set are identifiable as necessary towards Community Empowerment by communities, and People within communities, and how community envisage achieving National Outcomes locally, or as relevant to their communities. The Scottish Ministers, Local Authorities and Community Planning Partnerships must be enabled to consult with Communities, and People within Communities, and any community bodies that are not directly part of CPPs through forms of Participatory Democracy. Legislating a clear structure enabling Participatory Democracy as a function of Government in relation to Communities would be useful. This through Participatory Democracy relevant to Communities as a portal and a series of engagements facilitated and hosted by CPP's and led by communities. This document suggests no less than that Community Empowerment be made a national Outcome. And that Community Empowerment be supported by an Act, that delivers equality directly to communities by making communities statutory consultees, through presence of a schedule that enables Communities to exist, as legal Person, without further formality of organisation. This document also suggests that relationships between bodies are as relevant as the bodies themselves, and by this way formal organisation by communities can be simplified, so that representative bodies can provide legal channels by which smaller bodies do not have to take complex forms in order to be safeguarded from personal liability for community initiatives. There is a need to address various forms of empowerment for different purposes. Have already addressed distinction between participating in services and being recognised as a community initiative and supported in that. In many Community Empowerment issues land is of importance and the bill addresses that, as does this document, in the next section below. In addition to that new forms must be enabled as potential so these can be explored and followed up on via the Bill, both for legal forms, and landuses, to enable new ways appropriate to the issues and needs of our times.

'Acts of Community Empowerment': The Bill gives attentions to some needs and interests that exist in community. It is of practical use to describe these attentions as 'Acts of Community Empowerment'. There are needs addressed by the Bill ad there are additional needed 'Acts of Community Empowerment' suggested in this document. It is necessary and useful to ascertain their value in terms of Community Empowerment. With any of these, whole host of events occur, and at different levels, to different bodies, and in relation to sets of values. Example taken here is Asset Transfer: To be considered as follows: Asset Transfer Sets of Values: Market Value of Assets. Value of Building Maintenance Costs. Value of Eligibility for Funds. Value of Cost of Fund Raising. Value of Services. Value of Cost of Services. Value of Community Initiatives. Value of Sustainability. Value of Achieving Outcomes and Targets (Council, Statutory, Single, National). Value of Commercial Viability. Equation of Balance of those Values: Loss in market value / Gain in asset at less than market value. Decrease / Increase in building maintenance costs. Decrease / Increase in costs of provision of services. Associated decrease / Increase in funding and costs of obtaining funding. Achievement of Council Outcomes, Single Outcomes, Statutory targets / Services or Initiatives provided and achieved + Decrease in Services provided, and Decrease community initiatives achieved due to increased attentions on becoming building caretakers. Funds that may be required that support: Skills in management and maintenance of buildings and land, and in ownership. Bringing buildings and land into new uses. Development of these into places of abundance, Sustainable ways for communities to be self-responsible towards the buildings and land use. Changing patterns of building/landuse to effect changes beneficial to community / outcomes. Sustainable ways forwards: Examples: LAs to develop skills in identifying, allocating and maintaining buildings and land for common good, and for LAs and communities to work together for Sustainability and be part of balancing overall Sustainability accounts together. Specialising in helping other communities who wish to use land and buildings and not manage these may be something that these communities and LA’s wish to invest in.

Equations like this can be set up for any kind of act of community empowerment to evaluate what works. Overview of gain and loss between Local Government, National Government, Public bodies, Community bodies, and Communities and for assessing outcomes and capacity-building that can ensure that communities and LAs are empowered, not burdened is essential. Legislation can ensure this. A perceived reduction in income with Assets not being sold at market value is a gain when offset against the cost of achieving other values, and when seen against reductions in costs associated with releasing the Asset, and when seen as basis for community initiatives fully enabled and understood as a productive part of society and local economy. Enabling communities, which are often voluntary, to accrue reward or gain resource for productive management and use of land need to be understood within the Bill. Reduction and remission of rates as empowering is essential. Affordable concessionary lets that are set at levels to purely enable is a good precedent in Edinburgh. Landowners paying community for the benefits of the community of land can also be enabled as possible. Highly productive projects reinvesting back into community is also a possibility where community empowerment is enabled sufficiently in the first place. Strengthening Legislation so Community Partners have decision making clout and status when working alongside Local Authority and Commercial Partners, and CPPPs, may be what brings positive effects in an area greening up, and by via community initiatives, regenerating, and being the interest that is enabling. Beneficial implementations of community empowerment, national outcomes and statutory targets are values that balance where commercial and economic concerns do not lead regeneration. Setting out fully relevant values, both in monetary/financial terms and as part of an evaluation balances in values effected, accrued or released in interactions, for all bodies and across all bodies, including ‘persons; such as community. This will facilitate overview and understanding that Community Empowerment has a practical relationship to every other National Outcome and that Community Empowerment itself can be considered an Outcome of value. Legislation needs to be put in place to ensure that what the Bill enables in context of community empowerment, as ‘acts of community empowerment’ (as described above) translate to actual community empowerment. There are many examples of balances where community empowerment as included is effective, overall. Food banks/ growing crops is another.

2. Sustainability:

There is need for recognition of the contribution to Sustainability that is made and is possible at Community Level. Sustaining communities is about sustaining initiatives within community and the vision to support the sustainability that communities bring. Development strategy including community and sustainability within the same approach towards empowerment is necessary to enable community initiative to be including sustainability at community level as essential. The 2 dynamics of subsidiarity and social contract, both, must be made explicit and supported by legislation, and vision to support dynamics towards sustainability. Focus on service provision, or on social enterprise, or on community evolving into 3rd sector representative organisations do not do what is required so that a community initiative itself flourishes, and sustainably. These lead rather than bring about leadership by community. Bodies that service Communities are different to community bodies that empower Community Initiatives within their own Communities. It is important that Community Initiatives not be out-competed by business, or be dependent on charitable effects in order to take steps towards sustainability and to be thinking in terms of sustainability throughout, and thereby making the most out of all supports in place by maximising input towards sustainable outcomes. It is important that CPPPs do not practice disengagement towards supporting sustainability in Communities that can be resilient in their initiatives. Legislation aligned to practical effectiveness locally that empowers development that enables sustainability right across use and or ownerships of land and/or assets is necessary. Assets, Buildings and Land effective by community use of these, community benefiting from effective use of these, and communities sustaining sight of their actual goals and contributions, all these must align via dedicated funds and developmental strategies at community level to achieve a sustainable workable base that does not collapse through transience in policy, economy, people, thus bringing longer term regeneration, built up by sustainable steps as led by the communities, which in itself enables learning and empowerment, followed by revenues at community level. While communities may need to be sustained, the key to the sustainability of communities, and community initiatives, is to empower sustainability at community level. This is policy that supports initiatives in becoming sustainable. Communities or community initiatives are often under pressure to perform as a business, or to function as a charitable project, and often under pressure to maintain land and assets as a business, or as a charity, in place of maintaining their actual goals more fully, and significantly, and developing sustainable projects. Community bodies which engage in provision of or access to services, can benefit from sustainable communities, who use their services/buildings. LAs and bodies corporate must allow communities to thrive at their feet, by social, economic, place based, and environmental activities that bring sustainability. The key issue is integrating Sustainability as a legislative concern in planning. Local Authorities, as will CPPS, and other bodies, have need to balance priorities, and requirements, when involved in multi-tiered decision making. Capacity building for the ability to participate, to take on legal forms, and maintenance of buildings and land is one part. The other part is a development strategy that includes empowering community initiatives in land and asset use and ownership via supporting any intents in the sustainability of their projects. Insight as to what can be developed, can be shared by successful projects and where these are struggling, sustainable thinking can be applied. Developing sustainability in as a central organising principle is essential. Communities and services to communities are often understood as being about social welfare and wellbeing of people. The sustainability of community initiatives are just as important to these. Within a supportive developmental environment community initiatives en mass can lend well to single and national outcomes, and can bring regeneration, and revenues that are community led, and bring context for developing enterprise that leads to business, and organisations, and the skill sets needed within these, as well as provisions locally by community to sustain a continuing context for community. Maintaining community as well as servicing people in organisational and corporate or welfare worlds is key. The actual ideas in sustainability can be explored by communities and be supported by bodies that also benefit. LAs and other bodies will need to deal with the time consumption, administration and decision making with regards to community empowerment and need to be empowered to bring in the Bill well without over taxing local people or themselves with excess administrations, financial pressures and controls, or lack of controls. Local people need to be empowered to understand government policy and funds. This is essential. It is sustainable land and asset use that enables empowered communities. The question is of empowerment + Land/asset Use + Sustainability. Whether Land / Buildings be through ownership or through access and use, or both ( as in current crofting law) the key is communities are empowered when community initiative is sustainable and their relationships with land and their initiatives have a legal and economic and social foundation that is also sustainable. Participatory democracy with Government is key.
Local Government and Regeneration Committee

3. Delegated Powers:

The context of community empowerment may be totally missed with regulation and guidance not being addressed, via delegated powers and little detail in relevant procedures which have an effect on Allotments, and by extension any growing spaces. Where a bill is primary legislation there is need to develop detailed regulation and guidance. With regard to Allotments the statement 'Detailed matters relating to procedure are not considered appropriate to be included in primary legislation' is sensible for the reasons stated but there is still requirement for deeper attentions to regulation and guidance. Reasons given as regards detailing procedure include administrative, fair distribution amongst leases and people on waiting lists, LAs having best oversight with regard to local land. Much of this makes sense on the ground, locally, yes. Reasons given for Choice of Procedures include not changing Primary Legislation. Much of this will perhaps make sense with regard to other larger Policy. There is a need to build capacity for knowledge on how this bill CEB relates to other Policy in context, so communities are empowered to understand this. The argument for Taking Power is variability and with an important proviso it is a good argument. That proviso is so long as there is no reduction of the size of Allotments as a result in any other ways than as put forwards by SAGS, who are leading on understanding of the needs of Allotments, and on effective rationales of historical precedents for their recommended minimum sizes for Allotments. The emphasis on the rationale behind variability in the Bill/delegated powers memorandum, is on individual tenants needs and abilities to maintain and grow on an area, and this is given without clear guidance that is effective for these needs. Food growing strategies, on an individual, local level, and communities growing food locally with the foresight to enable growing regionally and nationally through community empowerment are best written more securely into detailed procedure / primary legislation as part of the CEB. This also applies to community empowerment as to creating and maintaining sites of biodiversity and mixed plots, gardens, landscapes, in joined up ways at community level. Decision makers on land allocations regarding allotments, and any land uses that relate to communities, need to have to hand specific guidances on what makes allotments effective in relation to food growing needs for sharing produce, growing for communities, enabling thriving biodiversity that encourages productivity in crops at the small scale, across communities, and over the larger areas in which allotments are situated. Up-sizing land is necessary with reference to 77(3)(d) in the Allotments section, which allows the Scottish Ministers to make regulations setting out additional information that is to be included in a food-growing strategy. Small scraps of unused or available land can be effectively used in a co-ordinated ways by communities active across areas, who may tend numerous sites of varying sizes and justify a community plan for these. Communities do also need sizeable Gardens, but can justify using smaller unused lands within a wider context, unlike Allotments which certainly need sizes not smaller than any historically rationalised minimum sizes, and given increased population, food scarcity/high food prices and carbon accounting, need to be scaled up, both in size and in quantity above any precedents.

4. Land & Community: New Models of Land Use/Ownership:

Our cities and our environments afford land which can be regenerated and preserved through community use. Examples in Edinburgh are Granton Walled Garden, The Orchard at The Royal Edinburgh, areas around Craiglockhart Woods, larger areas around Drum Street, the Royal Infirmary, Canal side sites in Westerhailes, and corridors along these and other waters, in an around Edinburgh, to name just a few. These are fabric of green spaces and connections in urban environments for community. Growing space and biodiversity can allow for peaceful active connected communities where these are recognised as irreplaceable sites, and where seen as vacant spaces, these are still the uses of best value long term for cities that can be proud of themselves. In particular where there are possibilities of biodiversity or green corridors, there is need to value these as otherwise irreplaceable both for reasons of connected biodiversity and connected green spaces that bring fresh air and health in urban areas. Equally, at Fountainbridge, a concentrated area where vacant spaces as used by community demonstrate need for long term green and growing space. In rural areas similar mosaics or partially disconnected wild spaces, and/or vacant spaces can bring about community empowerment by engagement with biodiversity or by development of spaces by community for community. At the same time dedicated spaces based on entirely new models like wholesale inner urban forest crop gardens, or on highly productive farms within inner and outer peripheries very much focused on their local communities and areas of highly concentrated urban needs or new empowerment to crofting models as highly productive newly interpreted rural empowerment, all lend to a wider fabric of really assessing land use based on what does empower locally. The case stands for the bill to empower clearly for many types of land being necessary for very large scale as well and small scale community acreages and for a re-evaluation of land in terms of combined yields of community and food security and thriving areas that give rise to and attract bigger trade, business and investment, that would otherwise be more solely administered within priority to more immediate commercial values. Enough detail, procedure, guidance and regulation needs to be in place to encourage that the many types of land uses for food growing with biodiversity that supports crops are not forever planned around other interests when decisions are made at planning levels. These land uses need to begin to form the very fabric of our rural, inner and outer city planning, so that we have food landscapes implemented via empowered communities, that sustain natures plant and animal communities, with a nurture of nature, including such relevancies as butterfly corridors, as response by community to the major environmental themes encouraged by environmental bodies, and towards developing wellbeing through connection with nature, access to outdoor green spaces that are diverse and thriving in a joined up way. The mix of public bodies making social, commercial and economic decisions on land-use need to be significantly empowering a greener healthier Scotland, where smaller scale activities are productive towards all these goals, and where we develop a landscape within and connecting our cities that makes sense for productivity of small scale food growing and makes sense for biodiversity. There are many are organisations like the Forestry Commission Scotland, some LA’s and some Health Boards, even some developers and private landowners, some housing associations, who have a positive attitude to mixed landuses being effective, including community use of land, and we welcome the Bills support of these, but do strongly suggest that some of these bodies are do need to have the legal backing to really enact positive directions, nor build ways in which priority of use of land for community can be given above commercial uses, by establishing symbiotic relationships with communities and their productive inputs and outputs, whereby a diversity of values can contribute to local, regional, and national outcomes. Other types of land, such as Crown Estates, many housing associations, public trusts and landowners, public and private, rural and urban, are resistant, where land could clearly be responsibly and beneficially used by community and need to be helped with guidances to make land available for people to plant grow and harvest their own food. Some good projects exist already showing this is the way forwards as more than very effective.

There is an opportunity with this Bill to empower people and communities to communicate on land needs, and to form by this a basis for fresh land use models. Community empowerment must allow for community ownership in terms of living and use of the environments that are called home, or are the familiar places of our lives, and as being local and regional, and having collective functions that are deeper than public spaces per se and which can bring positive results like food security, general health and well-being, spaces for activity and learning, that go beyond the public park and recreational spaces model, and which still involve opportunities for direct stewardship for the environment by community. Common land, community based land, green spaces, and general land, in whatever type of actual ownership, or of whatever type of nature, be it public, private, commercial, local, can through their use, be tied into individual integrated landuses for communities and purposes which serve communities, like food growing, or creative activities.

Originally land, alternate rigs of which belonged to different users, served a function within communities such as maximisation of available human resources, and alleviating good land for crops and fresh pasture. Apportioned runrigs and common lands were based on needs. Later these were conveniently re-apportioned into divisions, larger than rigs, of several acres each, adjacent to one another, also taken in turn to work and crop, sustainably. Needs today, based on relevant rationales, including effective community empowerment in how communities use land through rights to land ownership and use, can newly apportion land for functional uses that are well thought out and make sense like in smaller communities that had connection to land. Land can for example be apportioned as set into new woodland models through the SRDP, within national planning for biodiversity and requirements set by statutory bodies for protection of environment, while reducing inequality in determining ownership and use in relation to all needs in community, locally, regionally and nationally.

A system of variable needs can be applied like a grid to all available land uses. Communities can be empowered to produce their own grids based on such system, where lacks and excesses identified can be utilised through community empowerment to develop, explore and implement sustainable workable patterns of use along broad nationally applicable guidelines. Legislative support would include policy around land and assets of all available types, integrating sustainable development around food security including crisis planning with resilient local food supply via empowered communities, giving strategic support for alternative food systems to flourish in community based systems through connecting food production and procurement with people and land. The Bill needs to empower community to bring about evidence and rethinking about land access where people, biodiversity and food-growing flourish simultaneously and locally. Grow your own projects, or any diversity of projects that do grow crops and plants can also be a statutory consultee to better identify best use of available land to maximise functionality, yield and co-ordination over an area in terms of community, in equal standing with those bodies which deeply understand our natural heritage, as well as our built heritage, and futures which are carbon friendly, nature connected and sustainable, and defined as per how local conditions define the needs of the natural environment, and the variable needs of people that variously belong to those environments, through locality, use, heritage and so on.

A crofter may wish to develop their land, but may not be empowered to do so, where remote locations and the effects of previous eras leave an area requiring decades of input to bring land back up to sustainable living, and full environmental health. Native woodland and the ability to make livelihoods being obvious example. People returning to or taking up the crofting way with sufficient wherewithal to stay on the land, exist alongside others who have hardship in that. Funds from SRDP to build up and maintain woodland for example may not cover survival needs to do so, especially when a crofter may be inspired enough to pay for assistance in making the application by not having the requisite skills to do so, nor having the requisite understanding of funds, nor have the cashflows to consider such funds by way as is sometimes required. A form of empowerment is then needed that enables such a crofters to engage in development of the croft. The system needs to be able to address where community and/or any individuals in that community need empowerment either through funds, facilitation, expertise, land access, land use, or through participatory democracy in issues of concern, and such like. Or indeed in building up new models for creating balanced environments in which both nature and man can survive and have livelihood. The Bill best support the creative power of community and individuals within or of community, with the positive intentions of bodies like SNH, the frosty Commission and so on. Financial pressures and regulations that do not make effective crofting communities is a real danger, and the Bill needs to empower communities and individuals each and all to be able to maintain their livelihoods and fulfil their needs, as well as their environment and crofters duties in their diversity. A chartered forester may know how to make an application for funds, while a crofter may not. CPPs and bodies in rural and Highland areas best have a duty to provide the additional services of assisting with applications towards Government funds that enable effective landuse environmentally and support local livelihoods as part of the developmental processes of community empowerment. A person able to afford to develop their inherited croft, may no longer be connected to community and environmental understanding of the land, while the person who does may not be able to afford to use their crofting lands. Community Empowerment is also a capacity to act economically, socially, and legally, and the Bill must be effective here to, and for variable needs of individuals in community as well as communities per se. A community is empowered also by empowered individuals, where community empowerment does address variable needs and equality within that.

Again, empowerment may be the right to buy, or use, or see on a register, and that is a very important part, that needs to be fully upheld yes. These additional perspectives of empowerment are equally significant and it is the combined understanding of community empowerment that really makes intent in community empowerment fully effective, and well. Upholding common land, obtaining funds for livelihoods are empowerments directly applied to where there is need, use, Crofts have a complicated history some of which is enabling and some of which isn’t. Where crofts are to come into a time where people can using the crofting model to survive, real facts need to be addressed. Like that modern crofting needs to be developed, and this will not happen swiftly where crofting communities have to make a living while their crofts provide no ready livelihood, or where loss of connection means dispute amongst crofters who are people who understand little of the land, or needs addressed in community. Community empowerment needs to be realistic about people and the complications that arise that set people apart in communities. Support must not only be available, but also accessible to all circumstances that people may have to deal with, and the problems that may arise when communities are disparate, without working models of landuse that are effective in joined up and up to date ways. Where landowners who own vast tracts of land, are permitted to be absent while having wealth enough to develop ways living on the land, are not overseen by any governing body while crofters are, this needs an overhaul. Legislation for community empowerment must assess legislation across different land uses that may be contradictory in terms of broader or coherent national policy, and remain inequitable in terms of sense. The bill may need to provide for ongoing openness to ongoing amendments where older laws are yet discovered to be dis-empowering.

Common land usage may include re-establishment of native woodlands, running hydroelectric, creating shelters in addition to such needs as the grazing needs of old. In parks, these could include forest gardens and designed spaces by community, and so on. These uses best serve community, and single and national outcomes, while retaining general public benefit. In rural and remote places, allowing people to address their needs in terms of their livelihoods, wellbeing and immediate or wider responsibilities as required to build up capacity to remain in rural areas is essential. This could mean enabling livelihoods, for those who have crofts, or for those who need only responsible access to land, this could mean modernising the concept of the old shielings, with the already thriving Reforesting Scotland’s solution based 1000 huts campaign, in alignment with environmental principles.

At the very least the Bill needs to legislate so that community empowerment leads to an understanding of the needs of communities, and individuals on the land, so that combined land uses within community becomes a real possibility for generating sustainable communities and landuses which are effective socially, economically, and environmentally for communities and individuals within communities. Not least to empower to engage with policy as well as rights, in order to represent their needs.

Direct legislative underpinning of mechanical procedures like extending right to buy, asset transfer, maintaining comprehensive accessible registers across Scotland and in coherence with universal rights, is so very important, and the Bill as introduced makes very welcome steps in those directions. I cannot underline enough, the need to include well supported contexts in the Bill that provision participative sense, understanding, accessibility to mechanical procedures. Such as appropriate community entity forms, community relationships with environmental bodies, which understand our natural environment, community in connection with public and ecological infrastructures given by the built environment and the wild environments, which maintain the realms between unrelated and also connected communities, and initiatives that can sustain communities / be sustained by community in carbon friendly and sustainable ways, and not least with respect to resources and uses of land in relation to resources (example, salmon, minerals, and farming, mining and also foraging, portage) that community not only respect barriers with regard to these but also have right of responsible use/ownership/say/stewardship duties, in addition to right of access, along with other stakeholders, like landowners, and economic interests, and that input of community/individuals in community as productive in variable/ multiple ways includes recognition, and support to livelihoods, and that services in wellbeing, local sustainability include support for community initiative, self care, and developing fresh positive environmentally friendly models of landuse and understanding that enables community use of common good land where such use need not be considered an alienation, while also protecting common land against any uses via community that clearly are or would be an alienation, and also how lands can be considered in good balances, as to use, abandonment, vacancy, and as to appropriate use redefined in ways that do protect the environment and resources, but also community with that, with participatory democracy, to effect community empowerment, where community is the best source of understanding on issues of community. Quite a lot is suggested here, the main import, is for the introduction of a Bill which can underpin forwards looking community empowerment that can be functional to and within society in beneficial ways for individuals and the public alike, can be upheld by and in balanced harmony with our larger environments such as the national economy and the natural environment, and also the tapestry that is community with the very fabric of everything.

Community Example in Capacity to Lead: Incredible Edible TodMorden, while not a Scottish example, is a nearby community accessible to Scottish understanding, and as a community empowering itself specifically through growing on any tiny bits of available land and then as self-enabled taking on larger landuse challenges with aims for sustainability in what was started, and becoming a sustainable community by that process. In Scotland, The Grove Fountainbridge Community Garden started on a small plot of approx 600m2 and then went on to successfully develop extensions and further gardens, leading the way to show what can be done, if on meanwhile land as reliable community in excellent relationship with high end developers as well as community, where private developers (Grosvenor) and Partnership Developers (EDI) and LA’s (City of Edinburgh Council) have been exemplary in positive response to community, and can show the way. Where community is engaged in its own skill and land use, individual and collective planting aims enable greater numbers within community to pass on knowledge about growing. This leading to a sustainable outcome for community, as well as enabling those who through leadership in that can be active for their own development. People who are active in community leading the way can be empowered to benefit from CLD as recognised leaders by representing their journey. Pilton Community Gardeners and Granton Community Gardeners in opening up unused wasteland for food production have led the way in taking action and action that led to affordable concessionary lets. "I am particularly pleased that there is recognition that we can't do things to communities; rather we must work with communities, involving them in their priority issues, and in identifying solutions. This is why the community food movement has such a pivotal contribution to make.'"
Comments on this:

The main body answers the questions as regards the Bill. Answers to the questions, affirms these. The Last question is not a comprehensive re-iteration of the Policy Memorandum, It is clear that it contains important detail that is suggestive of more empowerment than is contained in the bill per se, and therefore needs to be made relevant in underpinning legislature.

To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

Putting in place and extending mechanisms such as asset transfer, right to buy, service provision participation, creation of registers, and so on is very helpful indeed, however community capacity in accessing these mechanisms and sustaining use of these affordably, requires a commitment to enabling the development of a comprehensive cohesive approach to land and resources in terms of access/use/ownership as understood in the context of all balancing needs and equality between all stakeholders in land/resources/built and natural environments, which is everybody and all bodies in our society. A developed depth of understanding of impact on land, livelihood needed to sustain land, obstacles faced where use and ownership of land is made possible, equitable land distribution decision making and laws that underpin varying ranges of land use, types and ownership, is also needed for empowerment in land ownership and use to be effective, or for registers to be well understood and maintained. Reduction in non domestic rates is an excellent help towards sustaining community empowerment. CPP frameworks make much sense, yet, true success is dependent on participative democracy, and the arena for community participation needs to be set out as wider than planning done for communities, to include enabling recognising and facilitating active community and community initiative as leading the way. Recognition that community Empowerment is a process, that needs to be developed, just as community planning is, is essential. This Bill makes an essential start, yet, as yet, as introduced, needs to widen the vision and understanding to underpin community empowerment legislatively enough for policies, and strategies to develop a process in government, public, organisational and community realms that is empowering for all parties to work together with, as much as for community, and with individuals and initiatives within empowered communities, as much as anchors. True social contract that understands true subsidiarity at community level.

What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill?

The ability of established bodies to engage in planning for community with other bodies within a more localised framework, and to include more newly establishing community based bodies to join the decision making tiers.

Disengagement of decision making tiers, even those closer to community, with community via a planning for approach rather than a planning with approach. Danger of cementing an understanding within society that community is about communities of organisations, or people within organisations, and public realms, rather than communities of people in connection with their environments. Creation of a huge middleman tier, that fails to connect communities with empowerment through with livelihoods, sustainability, participatory democracy and fails in recognition of and response to community initiative, self-definition, and communication of actual circumstances and obstacles faced.

The policy memorandum does mention community facilitator bodies such as development trusts but the bill does not. There is need to focus on these types of bodies as facilitators of community.

People with advanced skills and backgrounds remote from communities can benefit from positions and opportunities arising through needs of disadvantaged communities, and this can be mutually advantageous. The danger is where communities are not empowered themselves, even where capability is latent, these are often represented rather than facilitated taking a lead in taking up the type of provisions in the bill. Sustainability, Participatory Democracy, Bodies that are facilitating community in own initiatives and in Engaging with Policy on with communities, Access to Expertise and Funds suitable to connecting with policy and funds that support community goals, Recognition of community leaders, and expertise developed within community, and learning from community rather than relying on anchors more connected to organisations, socioeconomic functionality applied to community as discussed in the main body of response here, such as the establishment of simple enabling templates and entities at community levels supported organisationally by facilitator bodies and working groups of experts that specifically facilitate, and support goals, rather than distract communities with organisational issues. Communities need to make sense of their own circumstances, and communicates and receive support and infrastructure leading to sustainable outcome based on these.

Very good, Just aware, that community empowerment as part of provisions is not directly addressed and that extensive looking at the detail, is necessary. I suggest the bill recognise that community empowerment is a process, and set out for further process, and for further amendments as feasible in ongoing ways therefore at outset.
