What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

Good. Still, A Focus on Participation with Communities having status of Equality is necessary to understand real needs and impacts of communities, everywhere, including island communities. New Models of landuse is necessary. Community Empowerment stated as a National Outcome to establish community empowerment as equal in our society All that stated in item 54 appears to be very much going in the right direction. 55 is a good target from which much can be learned, and the transformative power of community landownership best be fully supported through attention to community empowerment as an approach as well as the provisioned approach. Item 53 highlights capacity that is already leading and needs support, specifically within an approach of communities establishing sustainability, and for bodies to include enabling communities to pursue sustainability within provisioning. Item 57, this new part 3A in the 2003 Act needs to include that communities and bodies that facilitate communities have that right to buy. The question refers back to the creation of Schedules, Community entities and templates conjunct with organisations that can facilitate communities with socio economic and legal function, in order to secure such rights for community. Item 69 does state communities rather than community bodies, and so should the Acts. Ownership of use, that is based on reduction of non-domestic rates, reward to communities who tend land, not least in enabling livelihoods in multiple ways to remove barriers in relation to tending and stewardships of land. Sustainability as a central focus as led by communities and communities supported in that approach by policy and bodies are essential. Item 59 applies same rights to urban areas, as valid. Item 65 correctly infers a direct relationship between access and ownership fo land with development of facilities by community. Again communities rather than community bodies ( as defined in the bill) need to be empowered to have positive impact on their lives by having right of development of land within a balanced framework of nature stewardship, public realm awareness, and needs of communities directly. Provision of land directly to communities is part of a sustainable approach, where communities develop resilience, given sufficient intitial empowerment and support.

Comment on Policy Memorandum and a possible Participatory Democracy between community and bodies and forms of government:

Highlight: 8. Scotland has a long and proud tradition of people coming together to use their energy and creativity to make a difference for their communities. Comment– To be more fully embraced. Highlight: 10. Community empowerment means different things for different communities. Comment –Including communities being interested in being community as well as participating or taking on guise of service provision and representation. Highlight: 4. In line with trusting the people who live and work in Scotland to make decisions about the nation’s future, the essence of self determination, the Scottish Government is also committed to supporting subsidiarity and local decision making. Comment – great Concordat… Local authorities have a key role to play in providing leadership, and in promoting and supporting community empowerment. Comment – by supporting community to lead. They have a strong understanding of the needs and aspirations of local communities, comment -Not without participatory democracy. …. together with a democratic mandate to make decisions which balance the needs and aspirations of people across the local authority area. Comment – Communities themselves need to have mandate in own decision making. Highlight: 5. Communities can often achieve significant improvements by doing things for themselves, because they know what will work for them. They become more confident and resilient; there are often opportunities for people to gain new skills comment - Policy needs to understand this literally.

Final Comment:

Particularly interpretation and emphasis on community is necessary as to community empowerment, and empowerment that comes from effective land use by effective access, and that all forms of access to land need to be fully facilitated towards community empowerment be that through ownership or be that through highly appropriate facilitation via land owners and facilitator bodies as duty bound towards community with direct community empowerments in a balanced society that includes all Government purpose targets and national and single outcomes, as well as biodiversity targets, along with community empowerment with equality to communities and as an additional national outcome.

Local Government and Regeneration Committee
The Scottish Parliament
Edinburgh

Dear Sirs

Scottish Parliament Local Government and Regeneration Committee
Written submission on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

Thank you for the opportunity to give evidence to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee as part of Stage 1 consideration of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. We welcome the opportunity.

There are two elements of the bill which are relevant to Scottish Water:

Community Right to Request Rights in Relation to Property

Scottish Water is supportive of the principle of communities being given the opportunity to submit “Asset Transfer Requests” to public sector bodies whereby they can request a transfer of ownership or use of land belonging to such bodies. We believe there will be situations where such transfers will be mutually beneficial.

Scottish Water would welcome more detailed guidance when the Bill is enacted regarding the framework within which decisions over transfer requests are to be made by the relevant authorities, although we recognise that guidance cannot cover the myriad of circumstances that may apply to specific requests. We would highlight some areas where there could be strong drivers for Scottish Water to wish to retain an asset and would welcome guidance in areas such as:

- How public authorities with a pan-Scotland remit should seek to balance local community interests with their wider customer base in dealing with transfer requests.

- How to balance transfer requests which may be less than market value/rent with obligations under the Scottish Public Finance Manual and Section 48 of the Water Industry (Scotland) Act 2002 to achieve market value for disposals.

- The appeals process to Scottish Ministers, including sufficient detail and safeguards to prevent the appeals process from being used for spurious or vexatious purposes. In addition, if the relevant authority only wants to lease out a site rather than sell it or does not accept the purchase price/rent offered by the community, will these in themselves be grounds for an appeal?

• In the case of assets which have renewables potential, balancing Scottish Water’s duties under the Water Resources (Scotland) Act 2013 to promote the use of its assets for the generation of renewable energy against a desire by a local community to utilise such assets for a different purpose.

Improve and extend Community Right to Buy

Scottish Water is supportive of the proposals to improve and extend the Community Right to Buy and the principle of urban communities being given the opportunity to exercise right to buy powers broadly similar to those enjoyed by rural communities in Scotland at present. We have however highlighted the need for clear and unambiguous definitions of what is a “community” in urban areas and believe that community bodies require to be underpinned by strong governance provisions.

I hope this information is helpful and I am very happy to provide further information if that would be useful.

Yours faithfully

Archie Macgregor

Land and Property Development Manager
Dear Mr. Cullum

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill - Part 6 Common Good

Thank you for your letter of 5 December 2014 asking for information on my policy on common good and land registration.

In broad terms, I deal with three types of registration applications that are related to common good. The first is where it is clear that no question arises as to the right of the local authority to alienate the land in question. These cases are processed in the same way as any other transfer of land, and title will have been indemnified under the Land Registration (Scotland) 1979 Act or, from 8 December 2014, be warranted under the new provisions in the Land Registration etc. (Scotland) Act 2012. The second is where it is clear that a question does arise and appropriate Court authority for the sale is in place. Again, these cases will be processed without issue, and the title indemnified or warranted as appropriate. The third category of case is where difficulties can sometimes arise because it is not entirely clear whether the common good land can be alienated. In such cases, the local authority involved may have taken the view that it is sufficiently clear that no question arises. At registration stage, I may, on balance, take a different view, perhaps on the effect of the specific wording in the prior title deeds, or perhaps on questions of fact around whether the land in question has been put to public use. It is not unusual in such cases for applicants to seek advice from my staff prior to submitting their application, precisely because they expect that there may be those in the community who also take a different view to the authority.
My approach to this third type of case has until now been influenced by the Land Registration (Scotland) Act 1979. As the Committee will be aware, one of the difficulties with the 1979 Act is that rectification of the Land Register was only available in very limited circumstances. Indeed, the only way I could ensure that rectification remained possible was to exclude indemnity. Accordingly, in cases of doubt, I have used my discretion to exclude indemnity. This does not mean that I am certain the local authority had no power to alienate, but simply that there is doubt and I wish to preserve the possibility of the register being rectified if there is a challenge to the transfer.

One of the changes made by the coming in of the 2012 Act is to make rectification of the register more straightforward, by breaking the link to the warranty scheme (which replaces indemnity). Accordingly, the consequences of a wrongful registration decision are easier to correct. I anticipate that this may shift the balance in dealing with these borderline cases. In particular, I will be less likely to limit warranty in the majority of cases where the applicant for registration is able to certify the validity of the deed implementing the transfer, bearing in mind that I am entitled to be compensated by the applicant if they fail to comply with the new duty to take reasonable care to ensure that I do not inadvertently make the register inaccurate.

I hope this information is of assistance to the Committee.

Yours sincerely

Submission 163

Written submission from Environment LINK Marine Taskforce

Summary

Scottish Environment LINK’s marine taskforce outlines the potential of Community Empowerment Bill to consider issues of public participation in marine planning and decision-making, namely:

- how the process for participation requests could be adopted in the future by Regional Marine Planning Partnerships
- how broader measures in marine planning governance could assist with community empowerment in Scotland

Background:

The members of Scottish Environment LINK’s marine taskforce collectively engage on a number of marine policy issues relating to the implementation of the Marine (Scotland) Act; specifically the legal framework for marine spatial planning and marine conservation in Scotland via the development of a National Marine Plan, Regional Marine Planning Partnerships and an ecologically coherent network of Marine Protected Areas.

The main interest of LINK’s marine taskforce in the CE Bill is the potential for its provisions to enable community empowerment in relation to marine planning.

The context:

Marine spatial planning is an emerging area in Scotland. It is commonly understood that marine planning in Scotland is 40 years behind the terrestrial planning system, insofar as there has to date been no statutory system that plans, balances and coordinates marine activities in line with national level objectives and commitments to achieve sustainable development. A strategic and responsive marine planning system is urgently required due to the growing competition for limited marine resources: the increasingly varied, interconnected and often competing uses of the sea are occurring within the context of severe ecological decline, documented in the Scottish Government’s own Marine Atlas. Coordinating activities to ensure sustainable development and fulfil a legal duty to “enhance” Scotland’s seas is therefore critical. The role of communities to help drive this sustainability agenda should not be under-estimated – coastal communities can be the agents of change in marine management and often experience before the wider public the consequences – both positive and negative - of marine policy and planning decisions.

Marine governance in Scotland is complex. The Scottish Government is a signatory to the UK Marine Policy Statement. The Scottish Government has consequent jurisdiction over marine planning matters from 0 -12 nautical miles and has executively devolved powers (from the UK Government) for marine planning matters from 12 – 200 nautical miles. Marine Scotland takes overall responsibility for most marine planning matters; Transport Scotland is responsible for ferry services, ports and harbours; and Scotland’s local authorities currently have responsibilities for aquaculture. This work is also supported by Local Coastal Partnerships. There are also considerable overlaps with components of the terrestrial planning system via statutory arrangements such as the River Basin Management Plans of the SEPA-led Area Advisory Groups. In short there is a complex multi-agency governance framework for policy and decision-making in the development, management and conservation of the marine environment. This framework has developed organically and is still developing.

A more regional approach to marine planning issues is now on the near horizon. The Marine (Scotland) Act gives Scottish Ministers powers to establish Regional Marine Planning Partnerships (RMPPs), but this is a work in progress and therefore the development would benefit from strategic join up with a community empowerment agenda. Efforts to ‘engage’ communities in policy-making via public consultations in recent years has been notable, but for the reasons set out in response to Question 1 below there is currently reduced scope for meaningful and genuinely community-led policy-making.

This response therefore focusses simply on two aspects of the Community Empowerment Bill:

1. Outcome Improvement processes
2. The future role of Regional Marine Planning Partnerships

(1) To what extent do you consider the Bill will empower communities, please give reasons for your answer?

We do not attempt to consider whether the Bill will empower communities generally. We also recognise that the Bill was not designed to empower communities in relation to marine planning. However, for many coastal communities decision-making around the use and development of the inshore marine area is of vital importance to the health of those communities. Participation in those processes is therefore a wider requirement of their empowerment. The development of Scottish Marine Regions (and their RMPPs) is understandably a work in progress – such a major administrative change cannot be effected overnight. The continuing lack of clarity around regional marine planning therefore remains a significant blind-spot in the community empowerment agenda. The Clyde and Shetland Scottish Marine Regions will likely develop as ‘pilot areas’ for the roll-out of regional marine planning. This is an approach we support, as both regions will identify a wide spectrum of different challenges owing to the fact that Shetland comprises just one local authority, whereas the Clyde encompasses seven local authority areas.

Section 12 of the Marine (Scotland) Act provides that Scottish Ministers may develop regional marine plans and delegate functions in relation to those RMPPs to a ‘delegate’ (or Regional Marine Planning Partnership). A commissioned report for the Scottish Coastal Forum suggested that the delegate be supported by a technical group; and consultative/advisory groups. The consultative and advisory groups would appear likely to be the only mechanism for community involvement in decision-making and there is no obvious recommendation that would ensure communities have a transparent procedure to proactively request participation in the work of the RMPP. “The Scottish Ministers’ direction should require the establishment of general, topic or geographically based advisory or consultative groups to assist in preparation of the Regional Marine Plan. The number, remit and administrative arrangements of such groups should be decided by the delegate.”

LINK MTF members therefore suggest that procedures for participation requests in outcome improvement processes outlined in sections 17-24 the CE Bill could be considered as a mechanism for giving communities a clear right to participate in regional marine planning. This would indeed contribute to the wider National Performance Framework. One of the 50 key indicators of the Scotland Performs framework (designed to track progress towards achieving Scotland’s National Outcomes) is “Improve the state of Scotland’s Marine Environment.”

(2) What will be the benefits and disadvantages for public sector organisations as a consequence of the provisions in the Bill

No comment

(3) Do you consider communities across Scotland have the capabilities to take advantage of the provisions of the Bill? If not what requires to be done to the Bill, or to assist communities, to ensure this happens?

No comment

(4) Are you content with the specific provisions in the Bill, if not what changes would you like to see, to which part of the Bill and why?

Section 16 & Schedule 2 set out the definition and list of “public service authorities” respectively. Regional Marine Planning Partnerships (because they do not yet exist) are not listed in Schedule 2. LINK members note that this list can be modified by Scottish Ministers in the future, but suggest that it would be a strategic time to consider how regional and national marine planning processes can be integrated with community planning processes more widely and whether this would have any implications for the draft Bill.

(5) What are your views on the assessment of equal rights, impacts on island communities and sustainable development as set out in the Policy memorandum?

Response from the Community Empowerment Unit, Scottish Government

On 23 October 2014, the Clerks wrote:

We have had a few queries regarding the position of certain organisations and the potential impact for them in using the legislation.

One such query concerned community councils and other similar unincorporated organisations’ ability to make use of the provisions in the Bill, particularly in acquiring assets and delivering services, although submission 56 from Fife community Safety Partnership make a similar point. It considered there is a danger that members of such organisations may be sued if something goes wrong and incur personal liability as not all activities can be fully covered through insurance. The correspondence also pointed to a report by the Scottish Law Commission a few years ago which covered the issue:

Some other written submissions have also raised points as to the status/treatment of various organisations i.e. Industrial & Provident Societies (see submission 94) and Community Interest Companies by their exclusion from the Bill’s provisions unlike SCIOs.

It would be helpful if you could clarify the position in the Bill regarding the treatment of unincorporated organisations and other legal entities

On 24 October 2014, the Scottish Government responded:

The only points in the Bill which stipulate that a community body must have a certain corporate structure are where the body is seeking to take ownership of a property, either under asset transfer (section 53) or under the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 (section 34 of that Act, amended by section 28 of the Bill, and new section 97D of that Act, inserted by section 48 of the Bill). In these cases the community body must be incorporated as a company or a SCIO. There is no requirement for the community body to be incorporated to make any other type of asset transfer request, or to make a participation request.

The issue raised about members of unincorporated associations being at risk of incurring personal liability is an important one, and a key reason for requiring a community body to be a company or a SCIO if it is seeking to take ownership of an asset. These structures also ensure the body has proper governance and financial management, regulated either by Companies House or by OSCR. There are many resources and model articles of association etc available, and becoming incorporated is not overly onerous in the context of the other responsibilities of owning land or buildings.

We do recognise that Community Councils are not corporate bodies. They can in some cases own property, but this is normally vested individually in the Chair, Secretary and Treasurer, in line with the Model Constitution provided by the Scottish Government, raising the issue of personal liability again. One solution is for the community to establish a development trust or similar incorporated body alongside the Community Council, where they want to take on property ownership. I know some communities have done this and the two bodies work closely together.

If an asset transfer request is made for lease, management or use of a property, it will be up to the relevant authority to satisfy itself that the community body has an appropriate structure to take on the responsibilities involved. For a 25 year lease it may be appropriate to require the body to be a company or SCIO; for a short lease or use agreement, an unincorporated association may be fine.

A participation request is simply a request for dialogue about how to improve an outcome, and therefore the legal structure of the body making the request should not be relevant. If it is decided that the way to improve the outcome is for the community participation body to take on or contribute to delivery of a service, again it would be for the public service authority to consider whether that body is appropriately constituted to meet the relevant responsibilities, as it would when placing any contract.

In relation to Industrial and Provident Societies, the legislation establishing these has recently been updated by the UK Government, in the Co-operative and Community Benefit Societies Act 2014, and we are considering how to respond to those changes in the Bill. As a general principle, we would normally expect community bodies to reinvest any profits to the benefit of the community rather than distributing them, so this would exclude co-operatives and Community Interest Companies, but it might be possible to include Community Benefit Companies (BenComs). It may, of course, be possible for other organisations to be designated as community transfer bodies for ownership if Ministers consider it appropriate.

It might be helpful in this context if I also mention the requirement for community-controlled bodies to have a written constitution, under section 14 of the Bill. Section 14 sets out a number of requirements to ensure that a body is truly controlled by the community it represents and has aims which include promoting a benefit for that community. A written constitution is simply necessary to record that the body meets those requirements and to help its members be aware of the body’s aims, rules and decision-making procedures. Again, there are many model constitutions available and this is not an onerous requirement.
Local Government and Regeneration Committee
Community round-table event, Dumfries, 27 October 2014
Notes of workshop sessions with community groups

MSP Chair – Mark McDonald MSP
Scribe – Allan Campbell

NB – these notes are not intended to be an exhaustive account of every aspect of the group’s discussion, but are an attempt to capture the main points which arose.

The main points from the group’s discussion were as follows—

Community Planning Partnerships

- Overall, area committees of the CPP seem to work well in Dumfries and Galloway, and have good community input and representation from the local area. But, consultation by the local authority is seen as patchy. In particular, participants were unsure how (if at all) results of consultations fed into council decisions, and often they were seen as “tick-box” exercises. Linked to this, it was suggested that a lot could be learned from what had previously worked well locally, and that often there was no need to “reinvent the wheel”.

• There was a view that there needs to be more emphasis on how to empower communities, and to move more to public bodies working with communities – this would require culture change across the public sector. And, that having the right to do something in legislation (like participation requests, asset transfer requests) was very different to being actually able to do something.

Marginalised Communities

• Following on from this, there was a detailed discussion of the opportunities for “marginalised” communities to take advantage of the powers in the Bill. Without resources and support, the group wondered whether the new powers could exacerbate inequalities, as those affluent communities could take advantage of many of the Bill’s opportunities while less affluent/able communities could possibly struggle. It was felt that there needed to be awareness-raising programmes on the Bill once in force, possibly on traditional/social media. Most important to helping marginalised communities use the powers was a clear, transparent process. Equally though, there needed to be management of expectations to go along with this, as it was recognised that not every project or request would be successful.

Community Councils

• Linked to this, there was some discussion of community councils, which while they were seen as generally working well, were very much populated by the “usual suspects”, often older, affluent people who were not representative of the population, although they tended to be very committed to the role.

Asset Transfer

• The group also talked about current difficulties with the community asset transfer process, including one case which had been going on for 15 months. There was a feeling that the current processes were not working well, and hope that the Bill could help. However, there was some recognition that councils need to be careful in disposing assets as communities could take on overly ambitious projects. There was a feeling that, in terms of assets, it was better for communities to take on buildings that only needed minor physical improvements, rather than those that needed significant, major improvements. It was also noted that, if councils do unload assets with too many complex issues on to community groups then councils should be prepared to take them back.

• The group also discussed the Sustrans project currently on-going in Dumfries town centre, and the positive impact of that project on the local community.
Public Body Budgeting

- The group moved on to discuss the impact of budget reductions on public services. It was recognised that councils had, while budgets were increasing, provided a wide range of non-statutory services that people had got used to and now expected to continue. It was felt that there needed to be a more imaginative approach to budget allocations and that it was crucial that local people felt they could influence these decisions and that their voices would be heard. They also felt that council officers should recognise that they didn’t always have the right answer.

Common Good

- There was also a detailed discussion of common good in the area, and the progress that had recently been made by one individual in driving through reform of the way in which the council dealt with common good issues.

- This led on to a discussion of the importance of committed people who were able to drive change and deal with council departments. However, without this, local people often felt frustrated and lost in trying to find the right person to speak to at the council about an issue. It was felt that generally a single point of contact would be useful, and the group was attracted to the Dundee system.

- Finally, the group also touched on allotments, and were keen to note the positive impact of allotments on physical and mental wellbeing in the community.
MSP Chair: Cameron Buchanan MSP

Scribe: Claire Menzies-Smith

NB – these notes are not intended to be an exhaustive account of every aspect of the group’s discussion, but are an attempt to capture the main points which arose.

The main points from the group’s discussion were as follows:

Asset transfers

- What is the position when an asset has been acquired but the membership of the body which acquired the asset dwindles – there should be some monitoring of the asset to ensure it is sustainable?

- There have been examples where a group has failed to ensure the viability of an asset and this has then been sold into private ownership for a nominal sum.

- It should be more transparent to the community which assets a public body holds. A publicly available register would help in this respect.

- Needs to be dedicated support (named person) from the outset to those wishing to take over assets. Any person providing support should have sufficient knowledge. Had to speak to 17 people to get information on a single matter.

Community Planning Partnerships (CPPs)

- CPPs aren’t the problem, it is engagement at local level. There is a disconnect with the middle management – they don’t know what is expected of them.

- Needs to be a commitment from the very top (Chief Executive/Council Leader) for community involvement in decision making.

- Insufficient resources could be a barrier to meaningful engagement.

- Better use of existing resources is the answer.

- Consultation is difficult; it always end up being same active members in the community or in other words the “perennials”.

- They are not engaging well, need to go to where people are e.g. supermarket, pubs.

- When consulting you have to manage the public’s expectations.

- Needs to be an outcome from any consultation and the outcome has to be communicated properly so that people understand why their views weren’t implemented.
• Council used to have monthly public forum meetings where people could put forward suggestions. Contributions were thoughtful and sensible. Now we have themed meetings so people cannot raise wider issues important to them.

• We want regular meetings where the public have an opportunity to address their councillors.

• Multi-member wards mitigate against local participation

• Community planning should be at local level and not strategic level.

• No easy explanation of how to engage with the council – meetings are publicised at the back of the paper in the public notices section – hard to find and not motivating.

Community participation

• Important to note that resource is not just about money, but people.

• “Need to find ways of keeping them fired up”.

• Apathy from the general public – “what’s the point it’s a fait accompli”.

• Activists need to be given support to provide peer support (possibly financial support to recompense for the time they spend away from their project).

• Take resources out of the council and into the community.

• Should be a duty on public bodies to provide support to participate

• Easy to engage primary schools, much harder to engage secondary pupils.

• Compared to the national volunteer rate of 29%, Dumfries has a higher volunteering rate – 36%.

• Number of small isolated communities who have to do things for themselves.

• Volunteering can’t be taken for granted need to be given help: skills; resources; training and information.

Participation requests

• Without a constitution the system could be open to abuse, particularly if the group is seeking funding for their activities.

• Could be argued that the community council should take forward any requests.

• The right to make a participation request has to be publicised and information provided in the simplest form possible.
• Shouldn’t need to be part of a group to make a participation request, as an individual - I should have a right to “lobby”.

• There should be an appeal process – there should be a right to respond.

• Any appeal process should be independent of the public body.

Community right to buy

• Clear information is needed on the buying of abandoned or neglected land – this could apply to some housing schemes.

MSP chair: Kevin Stewart

Scribe: Jon Orr

NB – these notes are not intended to be an exhaustive account of every aspect of the group’s discussion, but are an attempt to capture the main points which arose.

Main points from the group’s discussion were as follows:

• Bill presents tremendous opportunities if local authorities think differently and innovatively. They need to show leadership and take responsibility for improving community engagement.
• Should the work be process driven?

• LAs work differently to one another and adopt different approaches. How will it be possible to ensure consistency across the country, so that the bill’s aim to enhance community engagement is met?

• Past measures have included co-production and public private partnerships but what has happened to those approaches? Will the bill lead to further flash-in-the-pan measures?

• The regulations in place are a major stumbling block. They are interpreted differently, so different areas take different approaches. Some apply the regulations rigorously; others are more flexible in their interpretation.

• Some see the bill as an attempt to offload public services from councils to community or third sector organisations. That misconception needs to be tackled.

• Community groups are set requirements that are too rigorous. For example, a community group may lease part of a property and want to upgrade it and other parts of the property that are not in use, but it is not able to because it does not have ownership of the building.

• The community asset transfer process can be very lengthy – the timescales can be in years, but council personnel do not remain static. One group experienced a situation whereby the council contact changed each year. Although having a named person was welcome and valuable, time is invariably lost as the new person gets up to speed with the discussions. Therefore, the knowledge transfer process needs to be improved.

• DG One (A leisure and entertainment complex) is temporarily closed. Participants were unclear about whether the council had consulted let alone spoke to anyone on the matter; rather, it was thought that the matter was dealt with internally.

Improving community participation

• A need to change people’s mindset. Most people do not want to engage - the referendum is the obvious exception - and it is not known how to energise them. However, the view was also expressed that, on the back of the referendum, there was the opportunity to enhance and encourage community-level engagement. Indeed, there was a need to tap into that enthusiasm to the benefit of all.

• Two interrelated issues are at play: the perception that the provision of many services is a council duty; and the desire on the council’s parts to control the services. Indeed, it was considered that the council did not want to relinquish control as it considers that many of the services fall within its sphere of influence.
At the same time, the prevalent attitude among many was “I pay council tax, so why should I or another organisation get involved in providing that service?”

- There are high levels of fatigue among those who choose to participate, because they are not seeing the benefits of their work. That point must be recognised and dealt with.

- Loreburn hall was cited as an example of how community empowerment can work. People need to have the opportunity to engage and to have the confidence to ask questions and then pursue a course of action to its natural conclusions.

- Giving people a helping hand and providing them with the relevant knowledge and training was seen to be vital.

- There is a big mismatch between community groups. Some are very confident – for example, the members may have a professional background and/or have a wider experience; while others lack that and do not have similar skills or life experiences.

- An area’s demographics are important, because that may determine involvement.

- Some argued that having in place a formal process helps, particularly given the need to deal with formal bodies such as councils. However, there is a need to help people to take the initial step and inform them how to proceed.

Case study

- Young people wanted a skateboarding and BMX-ing park but had no idea how to progress the idea or what it involved. An initial group of 25 rapidly expanded to 245. With support, they learned, among other things, how to make presentations; they also designed their own website, and met an engineer to discuss their plans. Two and a half years and £180,000 later, the park was built.

- However, it took another group in Stewartry/Castle Douglas 10 years to achieve similar plans. Why? The levels of bureaucracy were completely different. Furthermore, given the area’s demographics, it is possible that older peoples’ views held greater sway, which led to delays.

Funding

- During the community learning and development review, groups were funded year on year, which is very disruptive – there is no ability to plan for the future. Furthermore, community involvement in the review was minimal, with only two and a half week consultation period, which took place over the October holidays.
Access to council information

- Groups need to know how to access council papers. They also need someone on the ground to explain the process and to help them to understand what questions they should ask.

Consultations

- Council consultations need to be full and honest. There is a feeling that only lip service is being paid by the council. Appropriate deadlines are also key. The driver for the council’s single outcome agreement consultation was seen to be the council’s need to set up the SOA by a specific time

- The local council asked residents where they should make cuts. However, that approach assumes knowledge of what services are provided. The reality is that people are, on the main, familiar only with those services that they access. Even so, it was considered that, post-consultation, the council was overproviding certain services. It was unknown what happened to people’s input. Demographics are important, too, because they can skew the results in favour of certain groups.

Single outcomes agreements

In addition to the above:

- Community’s/people’s priorities are either not or only slightly reflected in SOAs.

- Many seem related to HEAT targets.

- Police ward plans should be the building blocks for the SOAs

- The council has its head in the sand. Is it simply taking on the Scottish Government’s priorities or does it want to genuinely consult people? It needs to decide what approach to take and be honest about its decision.

- The SOAs may be, in part, relevant to the people, but they were not devised by the people.

- Example of council attitude: “The community will get a bucket of sand and like it.” The council has no desire to let the community decide for itself whether it wants that bucket of sand and, if it does, to allow the community to put out that bucket of sand.

General points on the bill

- An idiot’s guide on how to deliver the bill should be provided.
• Huge efforts may be required to get the help of someone (in the council, for example) who may not be that interested in what a community group wants. The bill should help to challenge that situation and make the process easier.

• The bill should shift the power balance away from councils to community groups etc and make councils more accountable to communities for the delivery of services. That would be a good thing, but a culture change is required to make that happen, and people need to be provided with the necessary skills to allow them to progress projects.

• Local council does not have a common goods registers, so the bill will be helpful in that regard.

Post-legislative scrutiny

• Only by carrying out this work will it be possible to determine whether the bill is having the desired effect. If authorities and/or councillors, for example, are not held to account, they will carry on as before and the historical lack of transparency and openness will continue.

The need to improve processes

• They are overly complicated.

• The profusion of committees. Committees are set up when none are needed – for example, to agree how to spend as little as £1,000. Where is the value for money? What cost benefit analysis has been carried out?

• Several committees dealing with the same issue. The example cited was that four committees deal with common good land. Not only is that wasteful, but it makes it extremely difficult for people to know who to talk to or to understand the subject.

Councils

• Council has an 80-page constitution. In what way is that accessible for the people?

• Councillors do not reflect the people in the community; they also seem to represent their own interests. For example, how budgets are devolved seems designed to make councillors popular in their areas, so the operating environment is one of pork barrel politics. In addition, some councillors appear to use budgets to fund their pet projects.

• Local authorities fund groups and third sector organisations. There is always a tension present and a fear about the consequences of rocking the funding boat. Groups need the confidence to be able not only to put in requests, but to do so without any fear of a backlash for making such requests.
Elected members’ responses to community groups and their ideas have included:

“The community doesn’t know what’s good for it”.

“We can’t let them try, because they will probably fail.”

“If we let them try, they might fly.”

The council and NHS are risk averse. A good example is the continuation of the belief – both by GPs and some members of the population – that general practitioners “know what is best for you.” The system remains patriarchal and some people devolve power to the GP.

Reform

- Concern expressed about the constant restructuring of services, which was not necessarily beneficial and certainly not driven by local communities.

Young people

- Two pupils were at the table. They said that they have a school council, but council members do not seek pupil’s views; rather, they have to approach the council. Therefore, there is much to do in the school environment to embed full and proper consultation.

- No work is under way to inform school pupils about the bill. That seems to be a missed opportunity. Given that many schools held referendum debates, perhaps pushing at an open door for the continued exploration of political issues. An idea would be to encourage debate on all major bills.

- It seems clear that early engagement would lead to a better understanding of community involvement and what can be achieved. The hope would be that pupils would take what they learn at school and be more actively interested in their community and participate in improving it.

Other points to note (and perhaps to research further)

- Dumfries and Galloway Council is working on a new lobbying council

- The Scottish Rural Parliament’s inaugural meeting in Oban is taking place in the w/c 3 November. Norman McAskill, SCVO is heavily involved. Perhaps worth checking on whatever flows from the meeting as many of the themes discussed at the community event will be raised there, too. Perhaps also worth alerting RACCE committee clerks to the event, although I imagine that they know about it.
Air weapons etc

- Very little discussion took place as the group’s interests lay in the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. One person, who had air weapons experience, commented on air weapons. He was supportive of the bill.

- One general question was raised about whether the bill was restrictive or would allow local authorities the ability to interpret it flexibly, to meet the needs of local circumstances.

NB – these notes are not intended to be an exhaustive account of every aspect of the group’s discussion, but are an attempt to capture the main points which arose.

The main points from the group’s discussion were as follows—

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

Some communities are more able to participate than others.

- It is important to support communities to build capacity.
- Outcomes should be policed.
- Third sector interfaces have an important role in the process.
- Culture change is needed.
There are five community councils in Dumfries, but how many of them are active?

“Every community council has to come into the 21st century.”

There has been more engagement in local politics since the referendum, which could represent a big change.

East Ayrshire Council looked at engagement with communities two years ago (not doing things to or for them), and it has seen a change in people’s interest.

It is important that community councils work together.

In the arts, participation, venues, getting people engaged and artist-led rather than council-led initiatives are important.

A concern about the bill is that bodies have to be incorporated. Perhaps its scope should be broader.

The public sector must get into organisations.

The council should have named persons in every community.

There are problems with a lack of resources and “volunteer burnout”.

Whether participation requests make a difference to communities will depend on councillors listening. Councils can cherry pick what they want to do.

Local authority budget consultation can be about where people would like them to cut less.

Are participation requests registered? It would be interesting to know how many are successful.

The bill should mean a cultural shift. A more open culture to learning and improvement is needed.

There are three allotment sites in Dumfries. People are interested in allotments, and there is a lot of spare land. Allotments bring many community benefits, such as local produce and clean air.

The importance of land being used for community projects, such as land art projects, was discussed, and the Summerhill land art project was referred to.

The bill should reach more widely, beyond allotments. It is too restrictive. It is up to communities what they want to do with land.

Burdens on local authorities should be reduced through meaningful and sustainable projects.

People who live in the centres of towns need access to land, and there are plenty gap sites.

The difficulties of converting agricultural land, which could be used for the community, were discussed.

On common good property, the point was made that consultation can be tokenistic, and there is the issue of accountability in large areas.

The possibility of community councils vetoing local authority decisions was discussed.

A register of who owns what is needed.

Community councils are the most directly accountable bodies for communities.

It is important to publicise proposals.

Hard decisions are ahead, and everybody must work together.

More open, efficient and streamlined common good processes are required.
• Councils have a duty of care for buildings.

Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

• It is estimated that there are half a million air weapons in Scotland.
• Respondents to the consultation tended to be those with an interest in opposing the proposals.
• Black cabs are expensive and are preferred in the NHS, for example. They have prestige and the service is skilled.
• In Edinburgh and Glasgow, black cab drivers must pass a knowledge test, but is that required?
• There are no wheelchair-accessible taxis in the area, which is a gap in the service.
• There are different taxi regimes across the country. The question whether there should be consistency was raised.
• Many cultural organisations in the area are not in traditional venues and there is a six-month turnaround for licences. Temporary and quick licences are needed.
• If six different events take place over a year—perhaps in the open air—it would be good to get an overarching licence for them.
• It is important to make Dumfries more vibrant by granting entertainment licences.
• A coherent approach to licensing is needed.
• In rural areas, many events go on “under the radar”. Processes should be as flexible, understandable and simple as possible.
• The question whether an entertainments licence should be attached to the venue or the organisation was raised.

NB – these notes are not intended to be an exhaustive account of every aspect of the group’s discussion, but are an attempt to capture the main points which arose.

The main points from the group’s discussion were as follows—

Community Planning and Community Councils

- Considering the role of community councils, the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill ("the Bill") doesn’t empower communities. If we want it to empower we should give Scottish Community Councils the same powers as English ones such as the power to raise their own money etc;

- On the reform of community planning in the Bill; there was concern that community councils are not really representative of their communities, in terms of age, gender, ethnic profile, social and employment status and minority groups;

- There are too many community councils. For example there are over 150 in Dumfries and Galloway ("D&G") of which only about 87 are active. Most are very poorly attended by the councillors and public;

- Part of the reason for this is that community council have such little power, no one is motivated to attend;

- There was concern that D&G Council doesn’t consult with community councils when its undertaking work which affects their communities and which they get complains about;

- The was a feeling community councils should focus on the major issues which affect their local communities such as care of the elderly, rural housing etc, not small village issues or parish pump politics;

- There is a lack on knowledge by community councils about their power or duties and how they are exercised. They also have too few resources to do their current role;

- One issue which hampers community councils is the fact that the media don’t address major policy issues which affect people (like care for the elderly, rural housing provision) in an accessible way. Instead they focus on small issues which are easy to report on, so that what is raised in the minds of the community and they focus on;

- There is a need to give some consideration to the introduction of a minimum ratio/size of population to practically support a community council. Often they are made up of older retired people as they are either the only ones with the time, or are over represented in certain communities;
• Another point was made about the fact that D&G may have the smallest ration of people to community councillors in Scotland this that many villages and communities in D&G are not covered by a community council at all;

• Younger people are especially underrepresented on community councils;

• The debate focusses too much on the structure of community councils and other bodies, when it should focus on how the community is engaged with;

• More creative ways need to be used to engage by community councils and the community, but also this needs to include development trusts and 3rd sector groups;

• There was a strong feeling the community councils need to be rebranded for the 21st century to attract a more representative cross-section of the community they serve. As they stand just now most people don’t see the point of community councils;

• One suggestion to make community councils more relevant to their communities was to reorganise them around school and educational districts;

The 3rd sector

• The wider 3rd sector community must move away from being grant dependent on funding from the public sector and become more socially enterprising and independent by generating their own revenue. This is especially relevant in taking on assets from the public sector;

• There was a lot of concerns to whether the Bill can facilitate the structures needed for the development of a more socially enterprising 3rd sector community base;

Community Planning Partnerships

• Most of the participants in the discussion stated that they did not know what Community Planning Partnerships (“CPPs”) did or who was on them;

• Following a description of D&G CPP, who was one it and how it worked, there was agreement that is was especially under representative of young people. One suggestion was that local members of the Scottish Youth Parliament should automatically be members of their local CPPs;

• The group discussed several examples of issues around right to buy land that have affected communities in D&G, such as the ownership of the harbour in Port Patrick by an absentee landlord. Dalry Community Council recently worked to prevent the sale of a community allotment to a housing developer, and were successful in this;
Community Right to Buy

- On right to buy provisions of the Bill, there was strong agreement that the existing right to buy legislation should be extended to urban Scotland and that the political and legislative focus for the last 15 years on this issue in ‘rural’ Scotland has been “quite unfair”;

- There was concern over the definitions set out in the Bill on abandoned and neglected land, vs. abandoned or neglected land. There was a view that the Bill will to clearly define what constitutes ‘abandoned’ land and what constitutes ‘neglected’ land and in what instances either or both of these criteria must be met before the power of the Bill can be utilised;

- There was also a strong view that definitions of ‘abandoned’ and ‘neglected’ land must be on the face of the Bill, and not in regulations as this is the only to ensure the get the level of public and parliamentary scrutiny which will be required for such contentious concepts. It was felt that Government consultations on regulations get very little attention and scrutiny either buy the Parliament or by the public in general;

- Concerns were raised about the level of second/holiday home ownership in rural communities in Scotland and their impact not just on house process and access to the housing market for first time buyers, but also on the provision of key services in the community such as school places etc. Some felt that there should be thresholds defined as to the level of second home ownership allowed in a community before certain community provisions could be activated to ensure that the level of second home ownership doesn’t have a disproportionate impact on the community. One suggestion was to have second homes reclassified under the Used Classes Order of land use planning system as a way of addressing the problem. (The chair said the clerks would bring this issue to the attention of the RACCE Committee as they were examining Part 4 of the Bill);

Participation Requests

- On the participation requests aspects of the Bill there was an acknowledgment that the 2007 single interface decision was very welcome but that this development now needed to be built on;

- The was agreement that if the Bill make it easier for communities and people to navigate the complexity of the local government system in terms of getting decisions made, or identifying who to engage with, would be very welcome. One participant described their experience of engaging with a local authority in terms of getting a decision on a community project as “like wading through treacle”;

- There was a feeling that more needed to be done to ensure that communities and the 3rd sector has more resources to engage with much clearer lines of communication with the public services;
• There was a hope expressed that participation requests may assist in bringing about the culture change which many of the community groups identified was necessary in the public service, and at local authority staff level in particular;

• There was, however, also an acknowledgment that community groups and the 3rd sector also need to undertake culture change in terms of the way its engages with the public sector, and what its expects the public sector to achieve for them;

• It was felt that community groups and the 3rd sector need clear understandable guidance to assist it in achieving culture change;

Asset Transfers

• On the asset transfers provisions of the Bill, there was an acknowledgment that local authorities are facing funding shortfalls and, as such, their ability to maintain and operate a host of buildings and other assets will be put under great strain;

• There was a concern that the asset transfer aspects of the Bill might be seen by some in local government of an opportunity to offload burdensome assets onto community groups and others, with all the negative implications that could have for such groups;

• Community council member outlined the current process they are engaged in in terms of trying to purchase a local community hall and summed up the experience as “painful”. Elaborating on this process one of the main issues was the continually shifting goalpost’s in the process. This was largely dependent on the succession of different council officers the community council has dealt. Some have presented contradictory information on the process of acquiring the hall, with ‘problems’ appearing and disappearing with the person in question.

• Also the estimated timescales for the process have expanded and contracted, again largely it would seem with the council officer in charge of the process. This overlying message was that the community council had to “fight all the time” to get anywhere;

Local Authority Services and Culture

• There was a clear acknowledgment from many in the group that there were many services and functions that D&G Council did very well. But in certain area, especially any area which have a commercial aspect to them, the processes of the council were described as “lethargic”;

• Having said this, however, the group did state that there was also a pressing onus on the 3rd sector and community groups to get their forms of governance and forward planning right in terms of taking on commercial entities and producing viable and sustainable plans for projects;

• One participant described the cultural mind set in local government as a “disabling” one (e.g. what your group needs to so as to allow this to happen is....) rather than an “enabling” one (e.g. we’ll make this happen and just need to find a solution to....);

- It was felt that part of the reason for this was that council officials often see council assets as ‘their’ assets, perhaps on which the perceive they job depends. So those seeking to take over such assets are an inherent threat, or at least a risk to be managed;

- There was a feeling that elected councillors on local authorities are often themselves disempowered in helping communities as they are dependent on the council bureaucracy for information and action to make things happen. And if the culture amongst the council officials is a hostile, stressed or disengaged one, the councillors can thwarted despite their best efforts;

Common Good Property

- In relation to common good property there was a strong feeling that much more clarify was needed on public sector owned/managed buildings and land, and whether it is common good property or not;

- There was universal agreement that a publically available common good register is vital to the success of the common good provisions of the Bill;

- One issue which needs to be addresses in the culture of certain communities which see common good property in their locality as exclusively for the use of ‘their’ local community, as opposed to the whole community of a local authority area;

- There was a strong feeling this was especially true in relation to the communities with access to assets which were inherited from the former Royal Burghs. Some of these assets were the subject of local debate as to ‘whose’ asset they were. The Bill needs to be clear that assets held by council for the common good are for the good of the entire community of the local authority in questions, not just a section of that community which may formerly have constituted a Royal Burgh;

Allotments

- Finally, on allotments, there was a feeling that while the provision of allotments was an important function which local authorities should provide to the community, there was a wider need to ensure the entire community has access to the ability to grow their own food;

- It was felt that this was especially important for vulnerable sections of the community, such as those of economically deprived backgrounds; people with health issues (such as mental health needs), immigrant and minority communities, people with disabilities and age-specific communities (such as young people or the elderly);
• It was agreed that, in terms of the provision of allotments or land for growing food, local authorities should look to give priority to such groups in terms of providing access to growing land.

MSP Chair: John Wilson MSP

NB – these notes are not intended to be an exhaustive account of every aspect of the group’s discussion, but are an attempt to capture the main points which arose.

The main points from the group’s discussion were as follows—

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

General

• Questions about what definitions of “community” and “empowerment” were being used in Bill. Noted that communities of both interest and geography were covered; empowerment could mean many things – what did participants feel would empower communities?

• Capacity building in communities essential for success of many provisions in the Bill – and this needs to be resourced. Also, need to recognise how much time needs to be allowed for proper community capacity building. Even with this, concern noted about the sustainability of community groups once key members cease to be involved.

- Concerns about decisions being made in name of a community without sufficient community engagement. But also noted the possibility of engagement raising expectations too much if views are then disregarded.

- People feel not being listened to by councils – opportunity for public to pose questions at start of council meetings?

- Communities will take on more responsibility if they own land/assets.

- Need to find new ways of organising community involvement – “clickicism” (examples in Australia?), that is, people using social media to engage in brief bursts. People don’t have time to attend meetings at certain times every week or to read lengthy consultation documents – but might have time to participate in shorter discussion on particular topic via social media, to share or like proposals, or consult a community noticeboard to see if they can volunteer for something at a time that suits them. Such approaches would engage young people much more.

Community planning

- Bill should allow more of a bottom-up approach to community planning. There was a successful community planning pilot in Dumfries in 2001 which involved lots of groups. This was prior to the creation of a community planning department within the council – now that there is such a department it was felt that there is not enough communication between different departments/groups at any level.

Asset transfer

- If assets are transferred, how will councils ensure that assets are operated properly (e.g. run safely with proper public liability insurance etc; run according to relevant restrictions if asset is a common good asset)? How will community groups access the funds the needed to manage assets – costs considerable in some cases?

- Public authorities shouldn’t be handing over problematic assets to community groups to run just because money is tight (and community groups may be able to access funding sources that public authorities can’t, especially for capital projects), especially if the community group involved is not yet properly prepared for the size of the task. Not transferring assets until community groups properly prepared to take them on protects community/asset in the longer term.

Common good

- Dumfries and Galloway Council already has fairly robust common good register. Even so, the status of some assets is not known (and establishing status where common good is in play is difficult and expensive). If such an asset was transferred to a community group, how would they deal with any legal challenges concerning the status of the asset?

Community councils

- Variety in community councils noted – some stretched because of large area covered, some areas have no active community council, some community councils not very representative of community (need for younger people). Little investment in or support for community councils. Need for more consultation on definition of community council areas. Perception that community councils don’t do anything (and lack of formal powers noted – statutory consultee on planning applications main formal role) – come up with a more defined description of community council role?

Air weapons

- Mixed views on licensing of air weapons. Agreement that should only introduce new licensing system if truly necessary. Is there existing legislation (e.g. on carrying of air weapons in public) that could be better enforced before resort to new licensing system or any alternatives (e.g. tracking weapons from manufacturer onwards)? Would licensing necessarily have prevented cases where people have been killed or injured by air weapons? And if perpetrators in such instances caught, what does licensing add?

- More specific concerns/questions about costs compared with shotgun or firearm licences, transitional arrangements for people who already own air weapons and on how police will apply “fit to be entrusted with air weapon” test.

Alcohol licensing

- Too easy for under-18s to drink in public places currently – but whether or not introduce further measures to try to reduce this, will still happen.

Taxis and private hire cars

- Greater use of private hire cars as opposed to taxis in rural areas. Concern, at certain times of week at least, is short supply rather than overprovision. Prices vary between private hire cars for same journey – should be greater consistency. In general, some support for idea that same regulations should apply regardless of whether the service is procured by hailing on street or pre-booking.

Metal dealers

- General support for proposals in light of problems, but concern about costs on small business and also about new rules making it difficult for people to get rid of small amounts of scrap metal (dealers won’t take things if costs of recording where it came from etc. are too high).

Public entertainment venues

- Support for local flexibility in licensing arrangements. Question about whether school plays covered?

Sexual entertainment venues

- Support for community consultation prior to sexual entertainment venue being established.
c26 – the timelines for asset transfers by Scottish Borders Council varies according to the complexity of the project. Sometimes it can take 2/3 months but it could extend to several years due the need to work with communities to ensure that they have robust and sustainable business plans which enable them to be ready to take on the asset.

c28 – there has been around 23 asset transfers since 2003, by Scottish Borders Council.

c34 - the power of well-being has not been explicitly used in relation to asset transfers.

c38- Scottish Borders Council has 86 individual plots in our allotments that we directly manage.
Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

Note from the Clerk

1. On Friday 31 October 2014, the Scottish Parliament hosted the 2014 plenary of the Scottish Older Peoples Assembly ("SOPA"). During the day, delegates undertook a series of workshops and panel discussions, as well as meeting in plenary session.

2. One of the six workshop groups for the day focussed on the topic of community empowerment and the issues which are especially relevant to older people.

3. As the Local Government and Regeneration Committee is currently scrutinising the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill at Stage 1 ("the Bill"), the Clerk and Assistant Clerk to the Committee facilitated this workshop. This allowed discussion of the Bill and its relevance to older people.

4. Attached is a clerk’s note summarising the discussion in the workshop and the three key issues reported back to the plenary session from the group.

Summary

The group was required to report three key action points back to the SOPA plenary in the Debating Chamber after their discussion. The following were the action points reported on community empowerment—

ACTION POINT 1 - ENGAGEMENT WITH THE COMMUNITY MUST BE CLEAR; IN A FORMAT PEOPLE CAN UNDERSTAND; ALLOW ENOUGH TIME FOR PEOPLE TO ENGAGE; AND HAVE MEANINGFUL ACTIONS WHICH ARE THEN REPORTED BACK TO THE COMMUNITY

ACTION POINT 2 - THE SCOPE AND WIDTH OF THE OPPORTUNITIES PROVIDED BY THE COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT BILL TO ALLOW COMMUNITIES TO EMPOWER THEMSELVES NEEDS TO BE CLEARLY COMMUNICATED TO ALL – ESPECIALLY THROUGH PARTICIPATION REQUESTS

ACTION POINT 3 - WHILE RECOGNISING THAT THERE ARE MANY DIFFERENT KINDS OF COMMUNITIES – BOTH OF PLACE AND OF INTEREST – THE COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT BILL MUST EXPLICITLY RECOGNISE COMMUNITIES OF AGE, SUCH AS OLDER PEOPLE, AND THE NEED TO EMPOWER THEM DIRECTLY.

NB – these notes are not intended to be an exhaustive account of every aspect of the group’s discussion, but are an attempt to capture the main points which arose. Summary of group discussion—

• Donald McLeod of the Highland Senior Citizens Network briefed the group on feedback from 12 SOPA engagement events conducted across Scotland between June and September this year. These meetings engaged with over 400 older people and discussed the issue of importance to them. It was noted that the second most frequent issue raised at these events was the subject of community empowerment, with 68 people raising the subject. SOPA participant’s responses were grouped into three key areas of community empowerment (a) access; (b) mindfulness and (c) resources. A copy of the feedback summary from these events is attached in the Annex to this paper.

- The group discussed the difficulty official documents like consultations from national and local government pose for older people, being full of acronyms and “official speak”. Older peoples groups can only meet on monthly bases - or less frequently as resources are scares, and are staffed by volunteers. Often the timescales for public consultations for these groups to respond are too tight. They have to discuss a consultation, draw up a response, and agree to the submission, which may take three meetings, by which time the deadline for consultation has passed. There is also a strong view that officials pay only “lip service” to consulting older peoples groups and they never get feedback on their input.

- Another delegate said that older people find ‘official’ language very hard to understand and confusing.

- This view was also supported by another delegate who told the group official consultation documents are too long for volunteers to read and understand. Older people from minority groups, whose first language is not English, were especially disadvantaged in this regard.

- Government needs to look at ways people can respond to consultations other than in writing.

- One delegate was very confused by the acronym TTIP,¹ which was referred to in plenary session and did not understand what this was. He pointed out that even at an SOPA meeting, ‘official speak’ was abundant and this turned people off.

- A delegate questioned how the Government and civil servants decide which groups to consult as he was unaware of ever having been consulted.

- Following a brief discussion on the public consultations on the Community Empowerment Bill (“the CE Bill”), a member of the Government’s Bill Team explained the two consultation processes held on the Bill (each 12 weeks in length). An easy read version of the Bill has not been produced.

¹ TTIP is the Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership also known as the Transatlantic Free Trade Agreement (TAFTA). This is a proposed free trade agreement between the European Union and the United States which is currently under negotiation: http://ec.europa.eu/trade/policy/in-focus/ttip/
One representative of a group stated that community empowerment meant the people should have easy access to government, however she said her groups had been refused a direct meeting with a Scottish Government minister.¹

The Chair informed the group of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee’s scrutiny of the Community Empowerment Bill and the problem it has with “gobbledygook”;

Another delegate stressed the need for community groups to have access to community education - especially older people in deprived areas. His local Further Education college has downgraded community education recently.

A delegate said it was easy to arrange meetings with MPs, MSPs and councillors and they listen to concerns. But people never seem to get outcomes from these meetings and rarely get feedback on information on action.

Liaison with public representatives and other public services, like GPs, the NHS, councils, is very hard for people who speak minority languages. Older people from these groups need careers with language skills to help with this.

Another delegate told of the difficulty older members of the LGBT community have in engaging with public services, especially when so much of the engagement seems to be aimed at people who live in a community, rather than people from a social group. Because of the CE Bill didn’t seem to have much relevance to people from the LGBT community.

Another delegate recognised the need for all communities (either of place or of interest/need) to be treated equally. However, given the breath of need of older people across all parts of society, she felt that the CE Bill should specifically make reference to empowerment for older people. For example, certain cost-saving decisions by councils to services which may seem to have a minimal community impact, have a disproportions impact on older people (e.g. access to public/accessible toilets for care and hygiene needs, access to public seating and park benches for rest etc.).

Also, another issue of concern was the need for access to space for socially activity older men, who are an especially isolated group (e.g. men’s shed movement etc.).

• The SG Bill team explained how the CE Bill could assist both older people in the LGBT community and older men (e.g. land/asset transfers for men’s sheds/meeting space etc.)

• Concerns were expressed over the lack of a published Equality Impact Assessment on the CE Bill. The issue of age discrimination was discussed and the fact that since 2012 this has been a defined category under the Equality Act. However, age discrimination is still widespread in society, especially in healthcare/NHS/GPs etc. The CE Bill needs to facilitate more community-based supervision of ‘the professions’ such as surgeons, doctors etc. Also governing/regulating bodies like the General Medical Council need more community input.

• There was discussion as to how the Government takes the view of many and condense them into one idea. How is the ‘minority’ voice included in the priorities of the majority.

• There was a call for clear and highly visible guidance to ordinary people on how to use the powers in the CE Bill. The SG official stated this was being developed.

• A delegate spoke about the difference between ‘engagement’ and ‘involvement’ when it comes to making decisions. The Government and Parliament may be good at engaging people, but not involving them. Devolution has now been around for 15 years, so it shouldn’t take a referendum to get this kind of improvement in the way the system works. Parliament and Government should be improving year-on-year on involving people in decision making.

• One delegate asked if there would be a time limit on participation requests made under the CE Bill once it become law? A member of the CE Bill team explained that once the ‘outcome’ to which the participation requests relates has been achieved by the action in question, then the process would come to an end.

• One delegate asked how individual people who are not members of a community or voluntary-based group could find out about such consultations and bills? If you don’t have access somehow, how can you know what’s going on?

• It was stated that all people who are SOPA delegates and have email addresses could be informed of such development. SOPA would look at this.

• Another delegate spoke of the public cynicism about engaging with officials and government, as often people don’t hear back on the input given. How can this issue be addressed? It makes it harder for community activists to get people interested and involved when this cynicism is so widespread.

- One participant spoke of older people living in remote and rural areas, being especially isolated compared to those living in towns. Low levels of access and knowledge to the electronic world makes emails and e-literature useless to them. They need face to face engagement. The Scottish Government need to work with all 32 local councils on this issue and “up its game” on engaging with isolated people.

- One delegate asked why all 32 local councils didn’t have an Older Persons Champion (“OPC”) to coordinate all these efforts? Also all other public agencies should have an OPC.

- A delegate expressed fears that funding pressures and cultural resistance will means council will “find excuses” to knock back a participation request from community groups. The agreement that “we don’t have the funds for this” is impossible to argue against if a council says no. The delegate asked about what sanctions the CE Bill will have to stop councils using ‘lack of funds’ as an excuse to get rid of participation requests.

- Discussion was held about the need to have access to more allotments and the ability of people to grow their own food and plants. Reference was made to the example of the Growing Your Own Community initiative in West Lothian and being a good example.

The meeting concluded at 2.35pm

Responses to the SOPA question: Community Empowerment
A summary of the highlighted points below.

This topic covers accountability of organisations, Government support, intergenerational work and the desire of many active older people for schemes to enable greater involvement as volunteers in sustainable projects. The latter would involve the reshaping of services. Inclusiveness and equal respect of all sectors and individuals within the older population is vital – for example, those in the Lesbian, Gay, Transsexual, Bisexual (LGBT) or ethnic communities who often remain hidden on the margins of society.

Access
☐ Financial support of older adults who wish to engage in further education

Mindset
☐ Use the life experience of older people to help younger people
☐ See the person as a unique individual, not solely defined by age
☐ Valuing seniors in the same way that younger people are valued
☐ Ensure that organisations representing the older population are accountable
☐ Fully and explicitly acknowledge the LGBT community and its older members
☐ Be treated with dignity and not as second-class citizens
☐ Encourage rights and responsibilities for all as part of the Human Rights agenda

Resources
☐ Ensure the needs of people of all ages are met equally with no discriminating services
☐ Government support for community development and empowering older citizens

Examples of Propositions
(Different subject matter and wording can be easily substituted.)

SOPA welcomes the Scottish Parliament’s wish for the Assembly to contribute ideas towards the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill and asks that the Act will explicitly benefit the older population and that funds will be allocated to support the legislation’s implementation.

SOPA calls on the Minister for Pensioners’ Rights to ensure that the energy and engagement of older people at local level is harnessed through supporting good quality local news media. This is important in terms of democratic engagement in the community as it provides a key pathway to recruiting volunteers, supporting local campaigns and maintaining momentum.

SOPA requests that the Scottish Parliament ensures that the Community Empowerment Bill (Scotland) encompasses Human Rights and Equalities legislation to create a new standard of democracy in Scotland which embraces the older population.

Fort William - community engagement event – 24 November 2014

Notes of workshop sessions with community groups

MSP Chair: John Wilson MSP

Scribe: Seán Wixted

NB – these notes are not intended to be an exhaustive account of every aspect of the group’s discussion, but are an attempt to capture the main points which arose.

The main points from the group’s discussion were as follows:

Community planning / participation requests (also Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill – Taxis)

CPPs

- The local community in Caol had a very bad experience of dealing with the planning application for the GaelScoil in Caol as Highland Council undertook very little consultation with the public. As a result the community had just established a new Community Council for the area as it didn’t have one.

- People don’t know who is involved in community planning. In Doura just now the Forestry Commission is objecting to a local farmer who has applied for planning permission for a visitor attraction around his farm business. This is widely supported by the local community. Forestry Commission forced him to change his plans as his farm was visible from Forestry Commission land. This was done under an SRDP bid. There was a lot of disagreement between the Forestry Commission, SNH and HIE on this and it caused a lot of local disagreement. So don’t know how this shows community planning is working.

- Need to ensure the right CPP representative are around the table as just now the local Third Sector Interface (TSI) representative may not be truly representative of a specific locale to a thematic group of interest. Reps may need to be plugged in as CPP sub-group level as that is these the strategic decisions are discussed in their impact on local development plans.

- More things should be localised as people in the community know what’s best and what’s need for their communities. The TSI representatives don’t engage with local people. Questions need to be asked as to how they engage with local people and how representative they are?

- It is very had for ordinary people to understand consultation document on plans and developments, especially in terms of getting a sense of the scale of a development from technical drawing and graphic images. This is especially true for older people. The GaelScoil has had a major impact on the homes of four elderly people. Highland Council should have gone to the lowest level possible to explain the proposals to them, instead of such sending them official consultation document.

- Highland Council is very Inverness-centric in its decision making and most of the critical planning and development decision for all of Highland is made in are around the Moray Firth. Because of the population base in Inverness, Moray Firth representatives are disproportionally over representative on the Council, especially on committees making critical decisions for other ward areas like Lochaber.

- There seems to be a CPP level missing at community council area which can feed up to area CPPs and then council-wide CPP.

Community right to buy

- Community right to but should be extended Scotland wide.

- If public bodies are proposing to sell land, they should at least be required to inform the local community – of not have a duty placed on them to offer first refusal to the local community to buy.

- Public land could be used for affordable housing land rather than selling it off to private interests with local community knowledge.

Participation requests

- How does a local community put in a participation request if they are unaware that a particular event or development is happening or a service changing?

- Participation requests under the Bill must be an effective system and not lead to “death by bureaucracy”. It must have a very streamlined process.

- Funding organisations are disconnected from local communities today much more so that they were, say 20 – 25 years ago. The LEADER programme is managed by business gateway and other finds are managed differently. So it is very hard for local communities and community groups to track where funding is coming from or from what it might be available.

- There used to be a local advice centre called ‘Lochaber Ltd’ which had all the information on all funding streams under one roof, e.g. Rural Development Fund, LEADER Fund etc. This was a great local resource but at some point the Council and (HIE we think?) got rid of it.

In response to this comment, John Wilson MSP gave an undertaking the Committee would highlight the complex and confusing nature of the funding landscape for local communities in our Stage 1 report on the Bill.

- It was also recognised that different public agencies can have different priorities for the same communities and often these priorities, and the funding and plans that go with them, can actually act in opposition to each other.
• Common Good

• The new GaelScoil in Caol was built on land which was part of the local Common Good fund and this caused “uproar” in the local community.

• Some common good land is so old that there is nobody alive locally who know anything about the terms on which the land came into the trust of the old burghs (now the council). So a public register of common good assets would be welcome.

Allotments

• A lot of people in Caol would like to have access to an allotment but there is not enough land available so public waiting lists for allotment applications would be good. This would show the level of demand.

• People don’t necessarily need a fixed size of plot; they should be given a starter size as a “taster”. However, there should be a standard plot size defined so that people could work up to a ‘full’ plot size and they developed.

• Local groups should be allowed to sell food and produce from their allotment sites via market stalls and the like. The allotment rules should be amended to allow allotment users to develop orchards and keep bees for honey and some animals/poultry as well. Allotment law doesn’t allow this just now.

• Groups spoke about the Skye Food Network. People were ¼ acre sites and this was very successful. There are very few local food producers in the Lochaber area and there is not enough growing. Highlands and Islands local food network should work to ensure that allotments and a stepping stone for local communities in the H+I to develop their own local networks into a food growing economy.

• The Lochaber area needs a food growing strategy which includes targets for people to grow food for themselves but also moved them up to food producer status.

Other issues

• The CE Bill need to ensure there are community action plans in place and this needs to be a “bottom up” approach in the Bill with local accountability for the plan build into the Bill.

• The Scottish Rural Parliament has just been established and hopefully this will help focus on a bottom up approach to these issues, especially in areas like the H+I.

• Where are strategies plans published? How can ‘Joe Punter’ be aware of what’s in his local community plans and how to influence it?

• The Independence referendum led to a huge upsurge in public meetings in the Lochaber area. Members of the group attended many meeting and were surprised at the level of interest amongst young people about what's happening in their local community and how to get involved.

- The issue of how active (or inactive) local community councils are needs to be addressed (maybe by the Bill)?

- Often people ate “informed” about what their local plan is (especially in terms of the Council's local development plans in the planning system). This is not good enough.

- Adverts should be put in local newspapers and local media to explain to people how local plans are drawn up and what’s in them and how people can find them.

- Years ago the old Highlands and Islands Forum has a great initiative of public engagement and consultation called 'Planning for Real' where they asked local communities what they wanted. But then Highland Council started its own version, also called 'Planning for Real' and this ruined the Highlands and Islands Forum initiative, because whereas the H+I Forum version was a true bottom up initiative run by volunteers, the Council version was totally top down and run by officials from Inverness. This ruined the level of public engagement and people lost interest. This left a void in real community-driven engagement. Hopefully the Scottish Rural Parliament will address this void?

- One size does not fit all for a rural area like Lochaber.

- There was a lot of discussion around care services, especially for the elderly. The overriding question asked was “who ultimately decided on care services for the elderly in Lochaber”?

- Care workers in Lochaber often only work as care workers during the winter months, as during the summer months there is more money to be earned in the local tourist industry. This is a big problems for the area.

- The local Lochaber area need more control of budgets at local community level, if the Bill delivers this then local communities will have more power to deliver their own local services.

Air Weapons and Licensing (S) Bill

- Having an air weapons licensing system for air weapons is a good thing as long as it is not too cumbersome a system

- One member of the groups has children in a pony club who do decathlons, which involve using air weapons, so they wondered how this would work under the bill?

- Given the nature of the Lochaber economy, and the number of police, if was felt it will be very hard for the police to enforce a licensing system for air weapons in the Lochaber area given the volumes of people using air weapons.

- The group did not feel there was a major issue with public safety and air weapons in the Lochaber area. One of the group was GP who had just retired, and in 20 years of practice in the Lochaber area he had only had to remove air gun pellets twice from patients.

- The group ran out of time to discuss any of the other provisions of the Bill.

MSP Chair – Anne McTaggart

Scribe – Allan Campbell

NB – these notes are not intended to be an exhaustive account of every aspect of the group’s discussion, but are an attempt to capture the main points which arose.

The main points from the group’s discussion were as follows—

- The success of a number of valuable local community projects, including “men’s sheds”, projects for disadvantaged children, and “nimble fingers”. The group also talked about a project involving experienced knitters learning to join together fibre optic cables as a good example of using the skills of the community to deal with local issues.

- The group had a long and detailed discussion about the role of community councils, especially given the wide coverage of the community councils in the Highland Council area compared to the rest of the country. It was suggested that the regional associations of community councils could be include as mandatory community planning partners in Part 2 of the Bill. However, some participants warned that this could lead to further burdens on already stretched volunteers. And, it was recognised that community councils were not as prevalent across the country.

- The group also highlighted perceived anomalies in the treatment of community councils – that they could not own assets nor apply for lottery funding. By giving them these powers, the group’s view was that community councils would become more interesting and relevant to the local community.

- Specific issues with the current consultation practices of Scottish Canals were raised. As with other consultations it was felt that the community was not listened to, despite three separate consultation exercises on the same topic.

- On a similar topic, the group also talked about Highland Council’s consultation practices, and noted that the current budget consultation was very poorly set up.
There was also the sense, as the Committee heard elsewhere, that Inverness was seen as a remote centre by those in the periphery of the council area.
NB – these notes are not intended to be an exhaustive account of every aspect of the group's discussion, but are an attempt to capture the main points which arose.

The main points from the group’s discussion were as follows:

Community planning / participation requests (also Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill – Taxis)

- Lochaber Action on Disability (LAD) was concerned to ensure members were aware as regards taxis “one size doesn't fit all” - taxis in rural areas were essential life lines. Representative disability organisation within the central belt did not always reflect this rural dimension in their submissions.

- Eligibility criteria for patient transport was having an impact on the service provided by LAD and community taxis. Many more people were being assessed as not requiring patient transport which increased reliance on public transport or community transport to get to hospital, for example, the journey from Mallaig to Raigmore Hospital in Inverness. There were not enough taxis to cope with the demand.

- Further complications were highlighted in respect of this particular journey: firstly lack of integration between the bus and rail timetables; inadequate accessibility for disabled people by public transport to the hospital.

- LAD explained buses from Mallaig to Fort William arrived 10 minutes after the train from Fort William to Inverness had left. On investigation, it was identified by LAD public transport operators were willing to amend their timetables but Highlands and Islands Regional Transport Partnership (HITRANS) would need to be involved. LAD had written to HITRANS seeking better integration of the route but had had no response.

- Other examples of transport issues were discussed including the lack of transport available afterschool in the Argyll and Bute Council area which meant children could not attend afterschool activities. Another was given of an 18 year old non-driver who lived in Plockton and worked in Applecross. There were no buses and so he was reliant on community transport, should this service be cut he would be unable to work.

- Each community taxi operates according to different criteria depending on the nature of the funding, so for instance some may only provide a service for older people or within a certain geographical area. If a community taxi was to take on a bigger role such as transporting non-emergency patients to hospital this would require more funding but it was considered in any event demand would exceed capacity.
• There was some discussion about whether community planning partnerships could play a greater role in planning services for communities. It was also suggested the new Participation Request powers in the Community Empowerment Bill might offer a solution. There was a concern public bodies were not accountable, and a myriad of legislation already exists but not enforced, e.g. the Blue Badges Scheme.

• The inclusion of Skill Development Scotland (SDS) as a statutory partner on Community Planning Partnerships (CPPs) was welcomed as currently SDS were only represented on around 20 of the 32 CPP's.

• Accessibility of public transport was discussed. It was suggested operators were using the definition of “accessibility” as set out the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 rather than the Equality Act 2010 in order to delay updating the facilities available to disabled people, including toilet facilities.

• Taxi apps were discussed briefly and whether it was considered these would affect the Highland area. It was believed Inverness could face an issue as there was already increased numbers of unlicensed taxis during festivals i.e. Rockness.

• It was also highlighted that taxi drivers were already finding it difficult to make a living, as those who had day jobs would work at night as part-time drivers making it more difficult for full-time taxi drivers to make a living.

COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL

I look forward to giving evidence to the Committee on the Bill on 12 November. I thought it might be helpful if I outline before our meeting some areas in which the Scottish Government plans to bring forward amendments at Stage 2. I hope this will assist the Committee in its scrutiny.

In accordance with the commitment made by the Cabinet Secretary for Culture and External Affairs, we propose that Historic Environment Scotland should be added to the list of community planning partners set out in Schedule 1.

We will bring forward amendments to include Community Benefit Companies (BenComs) as a type of body which can make an asset transfer request for ownership of land, under section 53. BenComs are now defined under the Co-operative and Community Benefit Societies Act 2014.

We will put in place an appeal process for asset transfer requests made to the Scottish Ministers, in line with the provisions already included for requests made to local authorities or other relevant authorities.

I believe there is benefit in requiring relevant authorities to publish their registers of assets, to help community bodies understand what land or buildings may be available for asset transfer. My officials are considering how such a requirement might be constructed.
As noted in the letter from the Minister for Parliamentary Business to you and the Convener of the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment (RACCE) Committee, we propose to use the Community Empowerment Bill to make changes to Part 3 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003, on crofting community right to buy. A “Call for Evidence” to consult stakeholders on the proposed changes was issued on 13 October and is available on the Scottish Government website at http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Topics/farmingrural/Rural/rural-land/right-to-buy/crofting.

We will also be seeking to make further amendments to Parts 2 and 3A of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003, although the detail of these is still under discussion.

I and my Ministerial colleagues will also, of course, pay close attention to the views of your Committee, the RACCE Committee and the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee when you report on the Bill, and consider what further amendments might be brought forward to improve the Bill.

I am copying this letter to the Convener of the RACCE Committee for their interest in Part 4 of the Bill.

Yours,

DEREK MACKAY
2 December 2014

Dear Kevin,

COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL

When my predecessor, Derek Mackay, gave evidence to the Committee on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill on 12 November, some questions were raised about timescales for asset transfers. Members of the Committee have heard that some local authorities are currently not dealing with requests timeously, which can cause problems for community groups, particularly in relation to funding.

The previous Minister said at the Committee meeting that there is provision in the Bill to set timescales in secondary legislation, if that is felt necessary. We thought it might be helpful to provide more detail of those powers in writing.

- Section 55(7) and (8) state that the relevant authority’s decision on a request must be set out in a decision notice which must be issued within a period prescribed in regulations, or such longer period as may be agreed between the relevant authority and the community transfer body.
- If a decision notice is not issued within the prescribed period, the community transfer body may bring an appeal or seek a review to have a decision made, under section 58(1)(c) or 59(1)(b)(iii).
- If the request is agreed, section 56(3) requires the relevant authority to give the community transfer body at least 6 months to submit an offer for the property in response to the decision notice.
- Section 56(5) and (7) allow a further 6 months for a contract to be concluded. This period can be extended, either by agreement between the relevant authority and the community transfer body, or at the direction of Scottish Ministers at the request of the community transfer body (for example to allow time for fundraising).
- Ministers will also have powers to make regulations specifying the procedures to be followed in relation to asset transfer requests, under section 54(2)(b), and in relation to appeals (s.58(3)) and review (s.59(3)). These regulations could also include time limits for different parts of the procedures.

I should also emphasise that the Bill will, for the first time, introduce a statutory right for community bodies to make asset transfer requests, and a duty for public authorities to respond to requests reasonably and transparently. It will no longer be a discretionary issue for local authorities, and that will make a difference to the approach they take.

Dear Kevin,

COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL

Thank you for your letter of 9 December regarding the timescales pertaining to asset transfer requests. You asked for clarification on section 56(5) and the requirements on a relevant authority to conclude a contract within 6 months.

The scenario you outline in your letter is that a relevant authority has agreed to an asset transfer request, given notice of its decision to the community body, specified the terms of the transfer, lease or other arrangement and has received an offer from the community body. The relevant authority then deliberately delays the conclusion of the contract so that the process ends and is treated as if the asset transfer had not been agreed.

While I believe that this scenario is unlikely to happen in practice it is useful to outline how the provisions in the bill as it stands could deal with such an event. As set out in sections 56(5) and 56(7) the period for concluding a contract is 6 months, or a longer period which is agreed between the relevant authority and the community transfer body. If the relevant authority does not agree to extend the period, the bill allows the community transfer body to apply to the Scottish Ministers under 56(8) to direct that the period should be extended. This can be done more than once. This would allow the period to be extended should there be any delay in concluding the contract – arising either from the relevant authority or the community transfer body – so that the offer would not lapse. It is also worth noting that section 57(2) would apply so that the authority could not dispose of the land to which the request relates to any person other than the community transfer body during the period from the decision notice being issued to the day the period specified in a direction expires.

Victoria Quay, Edinburgh  EH6 6QQ
www.scotland.gov.uk
We have no plans to amend these provisions. Property transactions can be complex, and issues may arise which take time to work out, or which ultimately make the transfer unachievable, despite the best intentions of both parties. While I am always ready to listen to any views and look at new proposals if they improve the Bill, I am not sure that it would be practicable to introduce a timescale for relevant authorities to adhere to, with sanctions, which could be applied in all cases. That is why the Bill provides the flexibility of Ministerial direction in these circumstances.

Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee

Report on Part 4 of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

The Committee reports to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee as follows—

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

1. The Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee considered Part 4 of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill and reports to the lead committee as follows.

2. The Committee considers that a Bill is required to remedy the defects of the Land Reform (Scotland) 2003 Act and achieve the aim of extending the community right-to-buy. The Committee recognises that land reform is an on-going and complex process and the Part 4 provisions of the Bill address some of the issues of the land reform agenda. The Committee considers that these provisions could have been incorporated within the forthcoming land reform legislation but recognises the desire of many stakeholders and of the Scottish Government to resolve the identified shortcomings in the Land Reform (Scotland) 2003 Act speedily and, on that basis, the Committee is content that the Part 4 provisions have been included in the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

3. The Committee is aware of the concerns of many stakeholders in relation to the drafting of the Bill and in relation to what is included and what is to be left to further regulation and guidance. The Committee shares some of those concerns and comments on this in further detail within the report.

4. The Committee is concerned about the level of detail provided in the Policy Memorandum and in the Financial Memorandum. The Committee believes that the significance and complexity of the provisions within Part 4 of the Bill would have merited further explanation and clarification within the Policy Memorandum. The Policy Memorandum could also have provided further consideration of sustainable development and human rights could have been brought into the wider context of the Bill which may have assisted, and might still assist, in establishing an environment which would facilitate a more constructive dialogue between landowners and communities.
5. Whilst the Committee understands that community right-to-buy will be demand-led, the costs for communities and landowners and the costs to public bodies of providing support to communities are unclear and the Committee is of the view that the Financial Memorandum ought to have given greater consideration to this. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government monitor the cost implications of the Part 4 provisions closely over the coming years, in terms of both the direct costs to communities and landowners and the indirect costs to public bodies and keep the funding requirements under review.

6. The Committee recognises the overwhelming support of stakeholders to extending the community right-to-buy to the whole of Scotland. The Committee considers that parity of opportunity should be available to all communities and welcomes the provisions in section 27 of the Bill extending the community right-to-buy Scotland wide.

7. The Committee heard the views of those who would prefer the Bill to define the characteristics of an eligible community body rather than specify the eligible legal structure. However at this time the Committee remains unconvinced of this approach. The Committee welcomes the commitment of the Cabinet Secretary to consider potential amendments at stage 2 to extend the list of eligible community bodies and recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments to include Community Benefit Societies and Community Interest Companies.

8. The Committee heard evidence suggesting that the definition of community should include communities of interest as well as those of geographic place. The Committee is also aware of the dispersed nature of some rural communities, and of many communities of interest within those areas. The Committee had some sympathy with those who sought to include communities of interest in the Bill, however agrees with the Cabinet Secretary on the importance of communities maintaining a sense of place, and being rooted in place.

9. The Committee was interested to hear the views of stakeholders on the requirement on communities to register an interest in land. The Committee understands that many communities only start to take an interest in land acquisition when land comes on the market and many stakeholders support the removal of the registration requirement. On balance, the Committee considers that there are benefits in encouraging communities to pro-actively engage in community development and, where possible, to identify the assets they may need to deliver their objectives. The Committee is also concerned that there can be difficulties in supporting community bodies at short notice. On that basis the Committee is, in principle, supportive of the requirement to register an interest in land.

10. However, the Committee considers that the Scottish Government should take account of the recommendations of the Land Reform Review Group with respect to the ‘right lite’ for registration, i.e. providing communities with a right to register an interest and to be notified when land was coming on to the market or ownership was changing, that would trigger the process of the ‘heavier’ right of registering a right of pre-emption.

11. Notwithstanding that, the Committee considers that the registration process requires considerable simplification. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government give consideration to a simplified registration process that would also include the option to register ‘a purpose’.

12. The Committee is aware that for many communities and applications late registration will continue to be the norm. The Committee considers that the process for late registration should reflect the practical reality for communities and should be redesigned to accommodate this. The Committee remains unconvinced, where there is a late application, of the need to impose a requirement on communities to show either good reason or demonstrate relevant work.

13. The Committee recommends that the re-registration process should also be simplified and there should be a presumption in favour of re-registration unless there has been a material change of circumstance. Whilst the Committee has some sympathy with those stakeholders who proposed an extension of the re-registration period from five to ten years, the Committee considers that circumstances can change over time and, if the re-registration process is substantially simplified, a requirement to re-register every five years is appropriate.

14. The Committee agrees with stakeholders that the power to extend the community right to buy where there is no willing seller should be a power of last resort, to be exercised only when other methods and negotiations had failed. However, the Committee has concerns that this new right, as the provisions are currently drafted, may be almost impossible to exercise, with too many obstacles and opportunities for avoidance on the part of landowners. Notwithstanding this, the Committee believes that the existence of this power is likely to play an important role in incentivising negotiation.

15. The Committee questions the need to restrict the definition of eligible land to that which is considered to be wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected. The Committee is concerned that these provisions, as drafted, may fail to further sustainable development.

16. The Committee also questions why the Scottish Government considers that a definition is needed at all, as the parallel tests for crofting land purchases do not require this.

17. The Committee considers that there are convincing arguments that the tests of ‘furthering sustainable development’ and of being ‘in the public interest’ are capable of testing all requirements. On that basis, the Committee recommends that the Scottish Government reconsider the requirement that eligible land be restricted to land which is wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected and recommends that the Scottish Government consider a definition that relates to the wider circumstances which can be a barrier to sustainable development, such as the lack of achievement of the use and/or development of land that could deliver greater public benefit.¹

18. In the absence of an unambiguous and acceptable definition² of abandoned or neglected land produced by the Scottish Government which both removes the barrier that the present proposal is likely to erect, and which avoids the problems of interpretation giving the existing legal concept of abandoned land, then the Committee is likely to ask the Scottish Government to remove the term ‘abandoned or neglected land’ and bring forward a proposal which will allow the widest possible opportunity for community purchase. The Committee reserves the right to take evidence on this issue at stage 2.

19. Should the Scottish Government wish to retain this provision, the Committee recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments at stage 2 to the following effect—

- the term “abandoned” is sub-optimal and should be removed entirely, leaving the legislation to relate to “wholly or mainly neglected land;

- the definition of neglected should relate to the sustainable development of the land and not solely to a description of its physical condition and there should be a clear justification for the inclusion of the term;

- if prescribed matters in relation to eligible land are to be set out in regulation these regulations should be laid under the affirmative procedure; and

- owners and communities are entitled to know, prior to the Bill becoming law, what is meant by the separate terms. The Committee considers it is not appropriate to deal with the transfer of fundamental property rights through secondary legislation. The Committee recommends that any definition of terms be set out on the face of the Bill.

20. The Committee considers that there may be a differentiation in urban and rural circumstances and there could be challenges in measuring neglect and abandonment in rural areas. Should this provision remain the Committee considers that it should apply uniformly outwith crofting land. However, further consideration to the criteria for determining neglect or abandonment is necessary and should be set out on the face of the Bill. The Committee considers that land which is classified as agricultural land should be exempt from this provision unless it is determined that it fails to meet ‘good agricultural and environmental condition’. The Committee is also concerned about the possibility that land that is under a low intensity/zero management regime for a valid reason (e.g. natural regeneration for biodiversity or natural flood protection) could be considered ‘wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected’. The Committee considers that land which is intended for recognised conservation or environmental purposes should be exempt from the provision.

21. The Committee shares the concerns of the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee in relation to the power of prescription, which would allow land on which there is a building or other structure which is an individual's home, to be considered as eligible land. The Committee is unconvinced of the case for including this power and urges the Scottish Government to reconsider the provision and remove the power of prescription.

22. The Committee recognises that there can be very real practical difficulties in identifying land owners and considers that there ought to be a mechanism in this Bill, similar to the existing provisions in the Land Reform (Scotland) 2003 Act, providing for communities to be able to register an interest in land without knowing who the owner is.

23. The Committee agrees with those stakeholders who consider that the mapping requirements for community right-to-buy are excessive and strongly believes that there is a need to streamline the mapping process, simplify the information requirements and align the eligibility criteria with those for Parts 2 and 3A of the amended Act.

24. The Committee considers that the provision requiring proof that if ownership of land remains with its current owner it would be inconsistent with furthering the achievement of sustainable development in relation to the land is unnecessary, because, in its application the community would have to demonstrate that the community purchase furthered the achievement of sustainable development.

25. The Committee also considered best value, best public benefit, and the approach taken by local authorities and other public sector bodies. The Committee asks the Cabinet Secretary to reflect on this issue and consider what further guidance and amendment is required to address the concerns.

26. The Committee recognises the difficulties faced by communities in seeking to exercise their right-to-buy and is keen to ensure that appropriate support and funding is available to all communities across Scotland to facilitate meeting their aspirations. The Committee considers that public sector bodies have an important role in that regard and welcomes the Scottish Government’s commitment to establish a community land unit to provide support and advice to communities.

27. The Committee understands that the Scottish Government intends to bring forward amendments at stage 2 to include provision for crofting community right-to-buy. The Committee considers that it would have been preferable had consultation on the crofting community right-to-buy been undertaken alongside consultation on the existing part 4 provisions, and that amendments to the crofting community right-to-buy had been included in the Bill as introduced, rather than at stage 2. The Committee considers that the introduction of significant new provisions by way of amendments at stage 2 is undesirable in terms of effective parliamentary scrutiny, as the time available at stage 2 to consider new evidence is limited.

INTRODUCTION

Parliamentary scrutiny

28. The Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill was introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 11 June 2014. The Bill was accompanied by Explanatory Notes, which include a Financial Memorandum, and by a Policy Memorandum, as required by the Parliament’s Standing Orders.

29. Under Rule 9.6 of Standing Orders, on 18 June 2014 the Parliamentary Bureau referred the Bill to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee as lead committee, to consider and report on the general principles.

30. On 21 August 2014, Joe FitzPatrick MSP, Minister for Parliamentary Business wrote to the Conveners of the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment (RACCE) Committee and the Local Government and Regeneration (LGR) Committee. The letter stated that following discussions with the Conveners of those Committees—

“[the Government is now keen to improve the crofting community right-to-buy legislation in line with the amendments to Part 2 of the 2003 Act and intend to take this forward in the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. […] we discussed and agreed that while the Local Government and Regeneration Committee was still best placed to lead on the overall Bill, there would be merit in the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee taking the lead on consideration of the community right to buy provisions of Part 4 of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill at Stage 1 and reporting its findings to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee. We also thought there would be merit in having any relevant amendments on community right to buy referred to the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee at stage 2. I am happy to confirm that this is the Scottish Government’s preferred way forward.”

31. At its meeting on 1 October 2014 the RACCE Committee agreed to consider Part 4 of the Bill and to report its findings to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee.

32. Part 4 of the Bill makes amendments to the community right-to-buy provided for under part 2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 (“the 2003 Act”). The Bill also inserts a new Part 3A into the 2003 Act which provides a framework for community bodies representing communities across Scotland to purchase abandoned or neglected land without a willing seller, in order to further the achievement of sustainable development of land.

33. The LGR Committee considered and agreed its initial approach to the Bill on 25 June 2014. It launched a call for evidence on 26 June 2014 with a closing date for receipt of written evidence of 5 September 2014. 162 written submissions were received by that Committee and made available to the RACCE Committee. The LGR Committee took evidence from stakeholders and those with an interest in the Bill between September and November 2014. The LGR Committee agreed that as the RACCE Committee had undertaken to consider Part 4 of the Bill the LGR Committee would exclude consideration of evidence on the issues raised in Part 4.

34. The Scottish Parliament Information Centre (SPICe) published a briefing on the Bill which proved very helpful to the Committee during its scrutiny.

Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee’s approach and call for views

35. The RACCE Committee agreed its approach to consideration of the Bill at Stage 1 at its meeting on 8 October 2014. The Committee decided not to issue an additional call for evidence, but agreed to utilise the evidence received by the LGR Committee, and offered those giving oral evidence, and anyone else who wished to, the opportunity to submit additional evidence in advance of the oral evidence sessions. The Committee received four additional written submissions.

Witnesses

36. The Committee took oral evidence from the Scottish Government’s Bill Team on 19 November 2014, and then from stakeholders on 26 November 2014 and 3 December 2014. The Committee’s oral evidence-taking concluded with a session with the Cabinet Secretary for Rural Affairs, Food and the Environment, Richard Lochhead MSP on 10 December 2014.

37. Extracts from the minutes of all the meetings at which the Bill was considered are attached at Annexe A. Where written submissions were made in support of evidence given at meetings, these are linked, together with links to the Official Report of the relevant meetings, at Annexe B. A link to all other written submissions, including supplementary written evidence, can be found at Annexe C.

38. The Committee extends its thanks to all those who gave evidence on the Part 4 of the Bill within a very tight timeframe. The cooperation of all involved was very much appreciated.

BACKGROUND TO AND PURPOSE OF THE BILL

Legislative background

“Part 2 of the 2003 Act provides bodies representing rural communities with rights to register an interest in land with which the community has a connection. These bodies have a right to purchase that land if the owner is willing to sell it. Part 2 of the 2003 [Land Reform] Act sets out the land in respect of which an interest can be registered, and the procedure for registering an interest. It also sets out the circumstances in which the right to buy the land in respect of which an interest arises and the procedures for exercising it (including procedures for valuation of the land, for appeals, and for compensation).

40. The Committee understands that post-legislative scrutiny of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003, a summary of evidence and a recent review of options for further land reform have informed the development of the Bill.

Contents/purpose of the Bill

41. The Explanatory Notes that accompany the Bill state that—

“... the Bill reflects the policy principles of subsidiarity, community empowerment and improving outcomes and provides a framework which will – empower community bodies through the ownership of land and buildings and strengthening their voices in the decisions that matter to them; and support an increase in the pace and scale of public service reform by cementing the focus of achieving outcomes and improving the process of community planning”.

42. The Committee understands that the Bill is a result of a number of consultations and other preparatory work and is set within the Scottish Government’s wider programme of public service reform.

43. The Bill is in a number of parts—

- Part 1 aims to provide a statutory basis for the issue of ‘National Outcomes’;
Part 2 contains a number of reforms to the system of community planning;
Part 3 provides for a process to allow community bodies to become involved in the delivery of public services;
Part 4 makes a range of changes to the community right to buy land;
Part 5 provides for a process to allow community bodies to take on assets from the public sector;
Part 6 makes a number of reforms to the system of common good Part 7 is concerned with allotments; and Part 8 allows local authorities to set their own reliefs for business rates.

Part 4 Community Right to Buy

44. Part 4 of the Bill proposes a number of amendments and additions to the 2003 Act. At present the right-to-buy provisions in Part 2 of the 2003 Act apply only to community bodies representing rural areas.

45. Section 27 of the Bill amends the definition of ‘registrable land’ and the power of the Scottish Ministers to define ‘excluded land’, so that the community right-to-buy applies across Scotland.

46. Section 28 of the Bill extends the types of body which may be community bodies under Part 2 of the 2003 Act and gives Ministers a power to make regulations which prescribe other types of area by which a community may define itself.

47. Sections 29 to 47 make a number of changes to the detailed procedures and requirements of the community right-to-buy process.

48. Section 48 of the Bill inserts a new Part 3A into the 2003 Act to give community bodies a right to acquire land in certain circumstances without a willing seller and sets out the processes and procedures involved. Eligible land is that, which in the opinion of Ministers, is wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected.

49. The Financial Memorandum states that Ministers do not anticipate that modifications to Part 2 of the 2003 Act should impose any significant additional costs on the Scottish Government.

Scottish Government consultation

50. The Scottish Government issued a consultation on a proposed Community Empowerment and Renewal Bill on 7 June 2012. This was followed by a further consultation between 6 November 2013 and 24 January 2014. A draft Bill was not included in the consultation document.

51. The Committee explored the effectiveness of the consultation process on the Bill with stakeholders. Many stakeholders who had been actively involved in the issue of land reform; who had engaged with consultations issued by the Land Reform Review Group; who had participated in consultations on the Bill and; who were also used to dealing with legislation, stated that they were reasonably satisfied with the level of information that was provided. However, the Committee heard that some who were perhaps less used to dealing with legislation found it confusing and would have welcomed further information. Some stakeholders who had been engaged with the land reform agenda considered that there could have been further consultation on some elements of the Bill. In oral evidence to the Committee, Sarah-Jane Laing of Scottish Land and Estates stated—

“We would probably have liked more consultation on the definitions of abandoned land and neglected land, which I am sure we will talk about later”.

52. The Committee understands that the majority of stakeholders were content with the level of consultation on the issues contained in the Bill. However, the Committee considers that often the ‘devil is in the detail’ and, given the concerns of stakeholders in respect of many of the provisions in the Bill, the Committee is of the view that it would have been helpful to stakeholders and to this Committee, and may have resulted in fewer recommendations for amendment, if a Scottish Government consultation had taken place on a draft Bill.

GENERAL ISSUES CONSIDERED BY THE COMMITTEE

53. Before the Committee comments on the specific sections of Part 4 of the Bill, and examines other issues which were drawn to its attention, it addresses three central questions—

- Is Part 4 of the Bill required, and/or was there a better way of achieving the policy aims?
- Has Part 4 of the Bill been appropriately drafted?; and
- Will Part 4 of the Bill solve the problem?

Is a Bill required, and/or was there a better way of achieving the policy aims?

54. There was general agreement amongst stakeholders that revision to the 2003 Act was necessary and legislation was required to remedy the defects of the 2003 Act and to enact the necessary changes. In written submissions, and in the provision of oral evidence, stakeholders welcomed Part 4 of the Bill, extending the community right-to-buy to all of Scotland, and welcomed the proposed simplifications to Part 2 of the 2003 Act. However, the Committee heard that, as drafted, Part 4 of the Bill contained significant omissions, and many stakeholders considered that further clarification and additional measures were needed to strengthen this part of the Bill if it was to be effective.

55. The majority of stakeholders appeared to be content that the Community Empowerment Bill was the appropriate vehicle for the provisions as set out in Part 4 of the Bill. However, the Committee heard limited evidence that the provisions in Part 4 may sit better within the forthcoming land reform legislation. Sarah-Jane Laing of Scottish Land and Estates commented on land reform as a process and stated—

“It is not necessary for all land reform measures to be in one bill: land reform is affected by various pieces of legislation. However, we need to ensure that people have clarity about what is happening. Simon Fraser referred to how changes impact on other changes; I worry that there might be some confusion if we have parallel pieces of legislation dealing with the same issue”.

56. The Committee questioned Richard Lochhead, the Cabinet Secretary for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, on the decision to use the Community Empowerment Bill as a vehicle for the Part 4 provisions. The Committee heard from the Cabinet Secretary that land reform as a whole was undergoing huge change and, in oral evidence to the Committee, he stated—

“We have used the last 10 years’ experience of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 to ensure that the new Act will be easier to use and will give communities greater flexibility. As a whole the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill creates new rights for community bodies and new duties on public authorities, providing a legal framework that will promote and encourage community empowerment and participation…”

57. The Cabinet Secretary stated that the process of land reform incorporated a wide programme with various elements of activity, including this Bill, the agricultural holdings review and the forthcoming land reform bill. He told the Committee that as the Scottish Government wished to make changes to the Land Reform (Scotland) 2003 Act quickly, the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill was considered to be an appropriate vehicle.

58. The Committee considers that a Bill is required to remedy the defects of the 2003 Act and achieve the aim of extending the community right-to-buy. The Committee recognises that land reform is an ongoing and complex process and the Part 4 provisions of the Bill address some of the issues of the land reform agenda. The Committee considers that the Part 4 provisions could have been incorporated within the forthcoming land reform legislation but recognises the desire of many stakeholders and of the Scottish Government to resolve the identified shortcomings in the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 speedily and, on that basis, the Committee is content that the Part 4 provisions have been included in the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

Has the Bill been appropriately drafted?

59. The Law Society of Scotland welcomed the policy intent of the Bill, but expressed concern in relation to its complexity. In terms of Part 4 of the Bill the Law Society of Scotland stated—

“There are multiple amendments to certain sections of the 2003 Act which are rather difficult to follow and this does not seem to sit well with the aim of empowering communities. The Society suggests that it would be simpler to repeal and re-enact part 2 of the 2003 Act...The Society also notes that a lot of the detail will be set out in subsequent regulation and also guidance and this makes it difficult at this stage to anticipate the overall effect of these provisions.”

60. The concerns of the Law Society of Scotland in relation to the drafting of the provisions contained in Part 4 of the Bill and its concerns with respect to the provisions that are to be left to subsequent regulation were echoed by a number of stakeholders. Many stakeholders commented on the omission of a definition of the terms wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected on the face of the Bill and many, including the Community Land Fund, Community Land Scotland, the Community Woodland Trust, the Development Trusts Association Scotland, the Community Land Advisory Service and Scottish Land and Estates also highlighted concerns with respect of a number of the detailed provisions.

61. The Committee is aware of the concerns of many stakeholders in relation to the drafting of the Bill and in relation to what is included and what is to be left to further regulation and guidance. The Committee shares some of those concerns and comments on this in further detail throughout the report.

Will the Bill solve the problem?

62. The Committee understands that almost 500,000 acres of land is now in community ownership. The Development Trusts Association Scotland’s survey of 2012 notes that “the vast majority of this area (95%) comprises 17 large rural estates under community ownership”. Almost 60,000 acres of land has been purchased by 16 communities under Part 2 of the 2003 Act and there are currently 171 Community Bodies with an interest in local assets across Scotland. The Scottish Government’s target for community ownership is 1 million acres by 2020. The Policy Memorandum from the 2003 Bill states that—

“The objective of land reform is to remove the land-based barriers to the sustainable development of rural communities. To achieve this there needs to be: Increased diversity in the way land is owned and used: in other words, more variety in ownership and management arrangements (Private, public, partnership, community, not for profit) which will decrease the concentration of ownership and management in a limited number of hands, particularly at local level, as the best way of encouraging sustainable rural development; and increased community involvement in the way land is owned and used, so that local people are not excluded from decisions which affect their lives and the lives of their communities.”

63. Oral evidence to the Committee suggested that the 2003 Act could be viewed as enabling legislation, the benefits of which were challenging to quantify. However, there was broad consensus that community confidence and cohesion in rural Scotland had been transformed in the last 10 years. Jon Hollingdale, of the Community Woodlands Association, stated—

“The number of successful acquisitions under the 2003 Act is pretty low; I think that there have been about 16 in 10 years, which does not seem a hugely positive track record, although the Act has a wider symbolic value. The Act sets a framework, and it has been easier to negotiate settlements for other transfers to community ownership because the Act is there. In that respect, the Act has had a very positive effect. Nevertheless, it is probably fair to say that there has not been a step change in the rate of community ownership. .. It has definitely helped, but perhaps not to the extent that we had hoped it would.”

64. This view was echoed by a number of stakeholders in the oral evidence sessions including Malcolm Combe15, Rory Dutton of the Development Trusts Association Scotland and Sarah-Jane Laing.

65. However, the Community Woodlands Association noted that “the complexities and hurdles contained within the Act have severely limited its use on the ground” and Jon Hollingdale stated—

“… the Bill has not addressed some of the fundamental structural problems with part 2 of the 2003 Act and the ways in which it does or does not work.... Questions such as whether we need a two-step registration process that is very much at the seller’s whim are far bigger and more fundamental than what form of community body is sitting there, waiting for the land or whatever to become available.”

66. Despite the concerns detailed above and those considered in more detail later in this report, there seemed to be broad agreement across stakeholders regarding the policy intention of Part 4 of the Bill. Whilst many stakeholders considered the Bill could have gone further, a significant majority, including Community Land Scotland, the Development Trusts Association Scotland and the Community Woodland Association welcomed the Scottish Government’s commitment to revise Part 2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 and considered that a number of amendments should improve the usability of the legislation.

67. The Committee recognises the enabling effect of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 but is also aware that for many communities wishing to acquire land, some of the provisions of that Act may have created complexities and limited its use on the ground. The Committee is of the view that while the provisions of the Bill could have gone further, this Bill is part of a wider process of land reform and the Committee considers that, once amended as recommended by the Committee, the Bill should resolve many of the problems of the 2003 Act.

SUPPORTING DOCUMENTATION

Policy Memorandum

68. In June 2014, the Convener of the LGR Committee wrote to the Minister for Local Government and Planning, seeking clarification on a number of issues relating to the Policy Memorandum stating that it was “little more than a superficial overview” that did not provide “sufficient material to allow for this Part to be scrutinised in a timely manner as part of the Stage 1 process”.17

69. The Scottish Government’s response was received on 1 August 2014. This provided some further detail, and the accompanying letter from the Minister states that the Government aimed to “provide a succinct and broad overview of the policy underlying the Bill as a whole and each Part individually”, adding that “people can be put off by lengthy documents with a great deal of detail”, and that the Policy Memorandum is “only one of the suite of documents that accompany the Bill”.18

70. The Policy Memorandum devotes less than three pages to Part 4 of the Bill, at one point summarising 20 sections in seven bullet points. The Committee explored with stakeholders whether they were content that they had been provided with the necessary information to fully explain the purpose, policy choices and provisions of the Bill.

71. In oral evidence to the Committee, Sarah-Jane Laing stated—

“I am not sure we have had enough information. I have come to the conclusion having discussed elements of the Bill, because we have different people saying provisions mean different things. That means that, somewhere along the line, the explanatory notes and the policy memorandum are not providing enough information”.19

72. This view was echoed by Jon Hollingdale who stated—

“What was missing—we will probably pick up this later—is how certain provisions are expected to deliver the outcomes in the Policy Memorandum. On a line-by-line basis, there are gaps. Although the Government wants to achieve X, it is saying Y. That does not appear to work for us”.20

73. John Mundell, Chief Executive of Inverclyde Council, stated—

“The brevity of the Policy Memorandum probably does not help, bearing in mind the complexity of the issues that are addressed in the Bill….I work in the community environment and try to make sure that we liaise and serve our communities in the right way. The Bill is very complex. I am not sure that we have managed to simplify the issues enough so that normal members of the public who are not, as we are, immersed in the issues can understand what the Government is trying to achieve”.21

74. Wendy Reid of the Development Trusts Association Scotland was of the view that the Policy Memorandum set out “quite well the policy context in relation to community empowerment, what is meant by that and the purposes of the bill…” although she continued “…we were also disappointed that the word “renewal” was dropped from the Bill title, because we thought that that contextualised the Bill as being about renewal and regeneration, as well as community empowerment. Community empowerment must be for a purpose: that purpose is renewal and regeneration.”22 This view was supported by Dr Coleen Rowan, of the West of Scotland Forum of Housing Associations.

75. The Committee questioned the Cabinet Secretary on how best to strike a balance between encouraging public dialogue and participation and providing sufficiently detailed information. The Cabinet Secretary responded by outlining the importance of presenting the high level and broad policy objectives and striking the balance between these.23

76. The Committee considers that Policy Memorandum should strike a balance between presenting the high level and broad policy objectives and providing sufficiently detailed information to clearly explain the provisions of the Bill and enable effective scrutiny. On balance the Committee believes that the significance and complexity of the provisions within Part 4 of the Bill would have merited further explanation and clarification within the Policy Memorandum.

Sustainable development
77. Argyll and Bute Council raised concerns in relation to sustainable development stating “There is limited consideration of the Bill on the various elements of Scotland’s sustainable development (e.g. land use/environment) and it would be useful if a more comprehensive assessment of the impact was provided”. The Scottish Environment Protection Agency suggested that the Policy Memorandum provides a “light touch” assessment of the sustainable development aspects of the Bill stating “…the Bill has the potential to make a positive contribution to sustainable development and there may be an opportunity for Government to provide regulations and/or guidance to help all parties maximise these opportunities.”

78. The Committee considers that the Part 4 provisions of the Bill have the potential to contribute significantly to sustainable development but agrees with the Scottish Environment Protection Agency which suggested that the Policy Memorandum provides a ‘light touch’ assessment of the sustainable development aspects of the Bill. The Committee considers that the Policy Memorandum could have provided further consideration of sustainable development. The Committee would welcome information from the Scottish Government on its plans to produce further regulation and guidance on this matter.

Human rights and equalities
79. The Policy Memorandum states that the “Scottish Government is satisfied that the provisions of the Bill are compatible with the European Convention on Human Rights”, and acknowledges the role of ECHR Article 1, Protocol 1 (A1P1) in certain sections of the Bill, including section 48 (abandoned and neglected land). However, evidence suggested that there is a lack of detail in the Policy Memorandum in relation to human rights, and this makes engagement in a broader discussion about the role that community right-to-buy has to play in human rights difficult.

80. The right to property is recognised in the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ECHR); that right being expressed in Article 1, Protocol 1 (A1P1). The Committee understands that A1P1 does not mean that private ownership is sacrosanct in all circumstances. A landowner can be divested of ownership when it is in the public interest for that to happen. In written evidence, Malcolm Combe stated—

“The yin that is the apparently retarding force of A1P1 is balanced against the yang of Article 11 of the UN Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, which guarantees certain rights such as sanitation, food and housing. Scottish legislation must not be in breach of the ECHR, in terms of the Scotland Act 1998, but the Committee should be aware that human rights do not begin and end at Strasbourg (where the European Court of Human Rights sits.)”

81. The Committee heard a range of evidence in relation to the Bill’s proposals and ECHR, and there appears to be a general agreement that the provisions are ECHR compliant. However, some evidence has suggested that it goes much further than would be required in order to achieve a “fair balance” required by ECHR A1P1, particularly in relation to section 97H. In written evidence, Community Land Scotland stated—

“This appears to be a very high and most probably impossible hurdle to be overcome and unnecessary to meet ECHR requirements; it implies that, even if a community was able to show that the land was mainly neglected for the purpose of its sustainable development, and this was not in the public interest, if that owner could show that, none the less, their continuing ownership was not “inconsistent” with some level of sustainable development then the community’s application must be refused”. 26

82. Professor Alan Miller, Chair of the Scottish Human Rights Commission, said he did not think that human rights had been brought in to the wider context of the Bill to a great enough extent. He said it would have been better to concentrate on the wider human rights aspects of the legislation and he felt that the debate had become too narrow and could have been wider in focus. Professor Miller stated—

“If human rights is seen in the wider context that I have set out, there will be a realisation that it drives us not towards courts and lawyers but towards having an environment in which there is more constructive dialogue between landowners and communities”. 27

83. Professor Miller went on to state—

“If we are talking about community empowerment, we really have to understand what the community’s rights are, and we should not let the debate be polarised by the notion of an absolute right-to-buy, which does not exist. Communities cannot be given that. There has to be a public interest, so it is a qualified right and not an absolute right-to-buy”. 28

84. The Equalities and Human Rights Commission commented on the delay in publication of the Equality Impact Assessment for the Bill, stating—

“We note the reference to the centrality of equality and human rights to the Bill’s aims as set out in the Policy Memorandum (para 6) and look forward to the publication of the Equality Impact Assessment for the Bill. Given the centrality of equality principles, law and policy to the Bill’s proposals, it would have been helpful to see the Equality Impact Assessment earlier in Stage 1:
at the time of writing (late August) it is still not available”. 29

85. When questioned on the issues of human rights in relation to the Bill and the Part 4 provisions, the Cabinet Secretary talked about the need to strike a balance between property rights and the public interest, he stated “…we must have at the forefront of our mind the rights of communities and the wider public interest as much as the rights of landowners or property owners”. 30 He noted sympathy with Professor Miller’s comments and undertook to reflect on the points made by Professor Miller and others in relation to human rights issues.

86. The Committee was interested to hear the views of Professor Alan Miller, Chair of the Scottish Human Rights Commission, and considers that human rights could have been brought into the wider context of the Bill. The Committee believes that a wider consideration may have assisted, and might still assist, in establishing an environment which would facilitate a more constructive dialogue between landowners and communities.

87. The Committee welcomes the commitment of the Cabinet Secretary to reflect on the points made in relation to human rights issues, both in respect of this Bill and in respect of the forthcoming land reform legislation. The Committee was, however, disappointed that the Equality Impact Assessment was not made available at the time of the publication of the Bill and is concerned that this delay may have had an impact on the effective scrutiny of the Bill.

Financial Memorandum

88. The Financial Memorandum states that Ministers do not anticipate that modifications to Part 2 of the 2003 Land Reform Act (sections 27 to 47), or the new Part 3A (section 48) “should impose any significant additional costs on the Scottish Government. (...) All additional costs would be met from existing resources.”

89. In terms of communities and landowners, the Financial Memorandum states that there is a “large degree of uncertainty on the level of costs” that might be incurred as it will be up to individual bodies how to use and respond to the provisions. Notwithstanding the costs of acquisition it would appear to the Committee that, with respect to the Part 4 provisions, the legal costs arising from appeals may be the largest areas of potential cost for communities and landowners. However the Financial Memorandum does not provide a range of costs, as would be expected. The Committee understands that there are various funding schemes that communities can apply to, but an increase in applications could put pressure on those funds. Evidence indicates that the Bill is likely to generate significantly more community right-to-buy applications, and that there are associated difficulties in estimating demand and cost, not least for local authorities.

90. Highlands and Islands Enterprise’s written evidence to the Finance Committee states that—

“… there are difficulties in estimating demand in the first three years of operation of the new community right-to-buy, and that a reasonable estimate has been made to capture the costs, however the Bill is: […] likely to generate significantly more community right-to-buy applications. We agree it is difficult to quantify the increased demand and consider an increase of between 5 and 10 per year to be on the conservative side. There are around 15 applications / year to register an interest at present. Extending these provisions to urban communities (with 80% of the population) is, in our view, likely to generate more applications than anticipated which will generate additional costs for Scottish Government”.

91. The importance of adequately resourcing and supporting communities, particularly urban communities, was highlighted by David Cruickshank of the Lambhill Stables Community Development Trust who, in oral evidence, stated—

92. The Committee understands that there are also likely to be cost implications for public bodies, particularly for local authorities. In its written submission, Glasgow City Council considered that the provisions in Part 4 would potentially allow the Council to work with community bodies to take over surplus assets and undertake community owned and backed projects or deliver services not currently provided in a community but, in relation to Part 3A, the Council considered that there were financial implications of putting a process in place and of utilising resource from a range of services in order to enable a response to be made within a very short timescale—

“…In addition the financial implications for Glasgow may be significant in the circumstance where the proposed acquisition may deal with a short term issue but is not aligned to the Council’s longer term strategy…. (and)…in the circumstance where a registered interest has a negative impact on potential investment in the city.”.

93. The Finance Committee, in its report on the Bill, invited the RACCE Committee to “seek clarification of how the Community Land Fund’s budget was arrived at and to consider what parallels can be drawn between it and funding for community right to buy in the context of the Bill”.

94. The Committee explored the costs and funding of the Part 4 provisions with the Cabinet Secretary, specifically: what costs the Scottish Government anticipate for urban and for rural communities and landowners; what costs public bodies may have to bear; and what additional support is likely to be required to meet the anticipated increase in applications, particularly in an urban context.

95. The Cabinet Secretary confirmed the demand-led nature of community acquisitions and the difficulties in estimating what that demand may be, with the resultant degree of uncertainty in the Financial Memorandum. He noted the increase in the Land Fund to £10m from 2016 and a further £10m for the Empowering Communities Fund that will be available from 2015. He confirmed that the Scottish Government’s commitment to meeting costs related to community right-to-buy (such as balloting costs) would have to be met from within the Government’s budget and stated “Primarily the budgets will be used for communities as opposed to public bodies. If there are costs for public bodies, we will have to take them into account. However, the primary focus of the funds is helping communities.” The Committee heard that funds for the Registers of Scotland to support the registration of all land in Scotland would be made available from Government. The Cabinet Secretary stated that “a number of public agencies and bodies will have to take the burden of this agenda as we move forward.” 35 He also confirmed that the available funds would need to be kept under review in future years.

96. The Committee understands that community right-to-buy will be demand-led. However, the Committee considers that the Scottish Government should have provided further clarification of how the Community Land Fund’s budget was arrived at and should have considered what parallels could be drawn between it and funding for community right-to-buy in the context of the Bill. The Committee is of the view that the Financial Memorandum ought to have given greater consideration to this.

97. The Committee is also concerned that the costs for communities and landowners (e.g. legal costs arising from appeals, costs to communities in preparing and developing proposals and bids) and the costs to public bodies of providing support to communities are unclear. The Committee is of the view that the Financial Memorandum should have better reflected this.

98. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government monitor the cost implications of the Part 4 provisions closely over the coming years, in terms of both the direct costs to communities and landowners and the indirect costs to public bodies and keep the funding requirements under review.

Rules relating to lottery funding
99. The Committee understands that the Finance Committee received evidence from Sport Scotland, relating to concerns about the duties of public bodies that award lottery funding, which stated—

“We would not wish to see liabilities handed to community groups who then need to seek financial or other support from national organisations such as ours which funding rules do not allow us to give. As a distributor of National Lottery resources…..we are required to ensure the additionality principle…”36

100. The Committee sought clarity from the Cabinet Secretary on how the rules relating to lottery funding might impact on the community right-to-buy. The Cabinet

Secretary responded saying “…our initial view is that there is not a conflict and it should not present a problem.”

101. The Committee welcomes confirmation from the Cabinet Secretary that the initial view that the rules relating to lottery funding would not have any impact on the right-to-buy. However, the Committee encourages the Scottish Government to clarify this initial view and advise the Committee of any change in that position.

SPECIFIC ISSUES CONSIDERED IN PART 4

Nature of land in which community interest may be registered (section 27)

102. At present, the right-to-buy provisions in Part 2 of the 2003 Land Reform Act (and secondary legislation) apply only to community bodies representing rural areas (i.e. with a population of less than 10,000). Section 27 of the Bill amends the definition of ‘registrable land’ and the power of Scottish Ministers to define ‘excluded land’, so that the community right-to-buy applies across Scotland, irrespective of the size of the settlement. This section also provides for a community interest to be registered in salmon fishing and mineral rights which are owned separately from the land to which those interests relate.

103. Extending the community right-to-buy to the whole of Scotland was welcomed by the majority of stakeholders who considered that parity of opportunity should be extended to all and saw no reason why urban communities and those in settlements of over 10,000 people should not enjoy the same rights as those in smaller rural communities. Nourish Scotland highlighted the importance that small urban sites can have for a high number of people and believe that these sites can have a considerable impact on the surrounding community even though many do not contribute significantly to the acreage target.

104. Duncan Burd, of the Law Society of Scotland, raised a concern in oral evidence and in the Society’s written submission that was echoed by some other stakeholders, in relation to the possibility of development blight in urban areas. The Society stated—

“… a small community in an urban environment might be interested in a particular asset that is part of a larger asset that is capable of development. In such a case, the development could become blighted and there could be a scenario of competing interests. It is important […] to include a safeguard to balance out the greater development good to the Community.”

105. Evidence from Community Land Scotland in relation to rural areas differed. Peter Peacock, Policy Director of Community Land Scotland, stated—

38 Written submission. Nourish Scotland.
“[…] the blight that we experience in the areas that have bought their land in rural Scotland is not being caused by the community purchase; rather the community bought the land to get round the blight that it felt was there, because the land was not being developed to its full potential by the current ownership structure. The Communities that Sandra Homes and John Watt help, through their roles, are interested in developing their assets, because they feel that that has not happened in the past. I am sure that the technical points that Mr Burd raised are worth considering, but it would be wrong to characterise the communities as causing blight, because that is not necessarily the case.”

106. The Committee asked the Cabinet Secretary if he shared the concerns of the Law Society of Scotland in relation to potential development blight and questioned whether it was the intention of the Scottish Government to bring forward amendments to address those concerns at stage 2. The Cabinet Secretary confirmed that in applying the public interest and sustainable development tests the issue of blight would be taken into account and stated—

“The Law Society describes a scenario that would be taken into account as part of the process. Ministers would not want to create a blight because blight is negative. That would be taken into account in the context of sustainable development.”

107. The Committee recognises the overwhelming support of stakeholders to extending the community right-to-buy to the whole of Scotland. The Committee considers that parity of opportunity should be available to all communities and welcomes the provisions in section 27 of the Bill extending the community right-to-buy Scotland wide.

108. The Committee understands the concerns of the Law Society of Scotland and others in relation to potential blight in urban areas. However, the Committee is re-assured by the response of the Cabinet Secretary that consideration of this would be taken into account in the process of assessing an application and in applying the public interest and sustainable development tests.

109. The Law Society of Scotland also raised concerns in relation to the possible unintended consequences of extending the right-to-buy to urban areas where, in its view, land may be subject to redevelopment proposals and the potential uncertainty that applications could create, adversely impacting on investment decisions. In its written submission it suggests that clear rules are needed on how Ministers will deal with an application where there are active development proposals and suggests “…that land subject to an active planning permission will, for a period of time, not be subject to registration under Part 4 of the Bill”. It suggests that primary legislation should offer—

“... greater certainty in the circumstances in which the community right to buy would operate in relation to active development proposals. In particular, the Society suggests that consideration is given to allowing for a mechanism to obtain a certificate exempting a site from community right-to-buy for a certain amount of time. This would allow investment decisions to be made with a degree of certainty but would also retain the community right to buy in the event that the development did not proceed as envisaged.”

110. The Committee understands the concerns of stakeholders in respect of areas subject to an active planning consent. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government give further consideration as to whether amendment at stage 2 is required to provide a mechanism to exempt such sites, for a period of time, to offer greater certainty to the investment and development market.

111. The Community Land Advisory Service questioned whether specific mention of salmon fishings and mineral rights may create an implication that the right-to-buy is not exercisable in relation to other separate tenements and, in its written submission, states—

“... the right-to-buy should also be available for rights to gather oysters and mussels, rights of port and ferry, and also sporting rights separate tenements created under section 65A of Abolition of Feudal Tenure (Scotland) Act 2000”.

112. It is not clear to the Committee whether specific mention of salmon fishings and mineral rights implies that the right-to-buy is not exercisable in relation to other tenements. The Committee would welcome clarification from the Scottish Government as to whether that is indeed the case.

113. Section 34 of the 2003 Act provides that the only type of legal entity that can apply to register a community interest in land is a company limited by guarantee. It also provides for the use of postcode units in order to define a community that a community body can represent. Section 28 of the Bill extends the types of body which may be community bodies under Part 2 of the 2003 Act to include Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisations (SCIOs) and any other type of body which Ministers specify in regulations. This is subject to certain provisions e.g. that the SCIO must have not fewer than 20 members, that the majority must be members of the community, and that provision must be made for proper financial management. This section also gives Ministers a power to make regulations which prescribe other types of area by which a community may define itself. According to the Policy Memorandum, the Bill makes it easier for communities to define themselves in a greater variety of ways than by postcode.

114. Oral evidence broadly supported the amendments to extend the type of bodies that can be considered to be a community body and to provide greater flexibility in the definition of community. However stakeholders expressed concerns in relation to the way in which community bodies were defined and some stakeholders suggested that the Bill should specify the characteristics of a community body rather than list the types of legal entity that can apply to register. Opinion was divided on the focus on geographic communities and on the inclusion of communities of interest. Some stakeholders considered that their inclusion could be ‘a good deal more complex’, and others considered that a way had to be found to put the emphasis on people rather than place.

115. There was support amongst stakeholders for the inclusion of Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisations in the definition of an appropriate community body. In their written submission, the Development Trusts Association Scotland highlighted the use amongst community bodies of Community Benefit Societies (Bencoms) and stated—

“In our experience many community organisations using a Bencom structure can meet the ‘prescribed requirements’ of an appropriate community body, and given the increasing use of community shares to fund the acquisition and development of assets, the omission of Bencoms from the legislation seems perplexing.”

116. In written evidence, the Scottish Federation of Housing Associations call for the Bill to be amended to specifically list housing associations and co-operatives as community bodies. Similarly, the Church of Scotland Trustees proposed that the definition of community body be widened to include charities such as them.

117. In its written submission to the Committee, Brodies LLP highlighted six different type of community body provided by the Bill and questioned the necessity for this and what it considered to be the “lack of consistency for the requirements of different bodies.” It suggested that clear guidance on the constitution and powers of each should be provided.

118. Some stakeholders proposed an alternative approach to defining community bodies, focussing on the criteria and characteristics of bodies, rather than listing types of legal entity. The Forest Policy Group considered that the meaning of community as defined in the Bill was too narrow and should be defined by eligibility criteria, rather than specific organisational types. It continued, stating—

“Further, we feel it is inconsistent to include SCIOs as eligible community bodies but not other types of community organisation for example a community benefit society. In Section 28(2) of the Bill, Ministers will be able to make orders allowing other organisational types of community bodies to be eligible. Our concern with this level of non-specificity is that there is no certainty as to when this might happen or what the mechanism for making an allowance order is. Clarification on these points is welcomed.\textsuperscript{49}

119. The Plunket Foundation also suggested it would be better for legislation to simply define the characteristics of a democratically accountable community body and not restrict the choice of legal structure to the two options currently proposed. It raised particular concerns about the exclusion of Registered Societies (Formerly known as Industrial and Provident Societies) and the inability within the 2003 Act to use community shares to fund the acquisition of the assets, stating—

“We cannot predict now what legal structures communities will need in the future to take advantage of the opportunities presented by the Bill, so cannot see any reason to restrict them unnecessarily? If Ministers are uncomfortable with the proposal that the exact type of legal structure for an eligible community body is left open, eligibility in principle should at the very least be extended to include Community Benefit Societies and Community Interest Companies as well as SCIOs”.\textsuperscript{50}

120. The Committee explored the definition of eligible community bodies with the Cabinet Secretary. He confirmed that the Bill would relax the definition of community to include companies limited by guarantee and SCIOs. The Cabinet Secretary also confirmed that the Scottish Government was considering potential stage 2 amendments to extend the list of community bodies.

121. The Committee heard the views of those who would prefer the Bill to define the characteristics of an eligible community body rather than specify the eligible legal structure. However at this time the Committee remains unconvinced of this approach. The Committee understands that new forms of legal entities that could be eligible may emerge over time but the Committee is comfortable that provision exists to define those entities in secondary legislation. The Committee recommends that any such legislation be brought forward under the affirmative procedure.

122. The Committee welcomes the inclusion of Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisations in the Bill. The Committee listened carefully to the evidence on the impact of restricting the choice of legal entity to two options and, on reflection, considers that the Bill should extend the eligibility of legal entities to include Community Benefit Societies and Community Interest Companies. The Committee welcomes the commitment of the Cabinet Secretary to consider potential amendments at stage 2 to extend the list of eligible community bodies and recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments to include Community Benefit Societies and Community Interest Companies.

123. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government also give consideration to the proposals of the Scottish Federation of Housing Associations and the Church of Scotland that the Bill should mention housing associations and co-operatives, and charities such as the Church of Scotland, as community bodies.

Membership requirement for Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisations (SCIO’s)
124. John Mundell, Chief Executive of Inverclyde Council, commented on the membership requirement for SCIO’s. He stated that—

“The Bill says that a SCIO must not have “fewer than 20 members”. That is particularly restrictive. We have a couple of SCIOs that are working very well, one of which has eight members and the other has 10. Are we now saying that, even though we know what the SCIO wants to achieve and we are doing everything that we can to support it, because someone in an ivory tower has said that the SCIO must have 20 members, it cannot continue? It does not have 20 members, but it is an active and progressive community and wants to make things happen, but it cannot, because it is barred. That issue needs to be addressed. Does the bill have to be prescriptive about having a minimum of 20 members on a SCIO?”

125. The Committee is concerned that the requirement for Scottish Incorporated Charitable Organisations (SCIO’s) to have a minimum of 20 members will, in practice, mean that a number of existing SCIOs would be excluded from the definition of an eligible community body and would therefore be unable to apply to register a community interest in land. The Committee considers that the requirement for SCIOs to have a minimum of 20 members is overly prescriptive and strongly recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward relevant amendments at stage 2.

Communities of place and communities of interest
126. The current provisions in the Bill are based on a geographic community but some stakeholders considered that the Bill might be more enabling and accommodating of future needs if it also included the option for communities of interest to be included.

127. The Committee explored the possibility of including communities of interest within the Bill with stakeholders in the oral evidence sessions and with Cabinet Secretary.

128. In oral evidence to the Committee, Sandra Holmes, of Highlands and Islands Enterprise, stated—

“Communities of interest have a legitimate role but, under the existing structure, the definition of “community” is centred on a geographic community. Currently, the geographic community has to be described using postcodes—although that might change—and the membership of the community has to be established to demonstrate that a majority of them are in favour. It is difficult to get a constituency of voters for a community of interest—how do we determine where the community of interest is and who would get a vote in a ballot?”

129. In its written submission, Helensburgh Community Woodland Group raised concerns about the definition of community where, in its view, individual projects in urban areas may only concern part of an area and a minority of those who live within it and questioned whether it would be appropriate to use a single council election ward for a specific area as the interested community rather than the settlement as a whole. It stated that its preferred option would be that of defining the community by people who would be directly affected or would directly benefit from the facility.

130. The Committee discussed extending the definition of community to include communities of interest with the Cabinet Secretary. In response, the Cabinet Secretary stated—

“...In theory a community of interest could be an organisation that is based far away from the community. It might have some local members and it might have an interest in the community but that is not really a community. It does not have a sense of place and it is not rooted in a place”. He continued to say“...it is important that the community that defines itself as a “community” is actually the community. The idea that we should allow a community of interest to be included in the definition of “community” gives us some concerns. Therefore we are not proposing to include it in the definition because it is quite clear that a body could be set up that has an interest in the community but is not the community itself. We want to maintain the sense of place and ensure that we are genuinely dealing with the community.”

131. The Committee welcomes the provision in the Bill that enables communities to define themselves in a greater variety of ways than by postcode.

132. The Committee heard evidence suggesting that the definition of community should include communities of interest as well as those of geographic place. The Committee is also aware of the dispersed nature of some rural communities, and of many communities of interest within those areas. The Committee had some sympathy with those who sought to include communities of interest in the Bill, however agrees with the Cabinet Secretary on the importance of communities maintaining a sense of place, and being rooted in place.

Provision of Minutes upon request (section 28(3)(c) and (4)(1A)(g))

133. Some stakeholders who have been active in community land acquisitions highlighted a number of practical concerns in relation to the provision of minutes upon request. The Highland Council and Community Land Scotland sought clarity on a number of points: whether the minutes relate to all meetings – Board meetings, members meetings, sub committees; and whether these provisions relate only to ‘approved minutes’. Community Land Scotland had concerns that this provision would apply retrospectively to existing community bodies (not to a Part 3A or Part 3 body) which would have to convene special meetings to make alterations to their Articles and failure to do so could then result in a termination of interest or trigger consideration of compulsory purchase by Ministers. Community Land Scotland suggested that the same policy could be affected by a requirement for community bodies to enact bylaws or rules.

134. The Committee listened to the concerns of stakeholders in relation to the provisions of minutes upon request and recommends that the Scottish Government give consideration to this provision and the need for further clarification and reflect on the impact of this provision on existing community bodies. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government consider whether there are other means to affect the policy objective such as a requirement for community bodies to enact relevant bylaws or rules, and bring forward relevant amendments at stage 2.

135. The Scottish Government’s letter of 1 August\(^56\) states that sections 29 to 47 of the Bill make a number of changes to “the detailed procedures and requirements of the community right-to-buy process, including streamlining and increasing flexibility."

136. Evidence to the Committee indicated some areas of concern in relation to the detailed procedures. In written evidence, John Randall\(^57\) noted a need to simplify procedures so that “genuine and strong applications cannot be thwarted by legal action on technical issues contrary to the wishes of Parliament when they passed the legislation”\(^58\).

137. The issues raised in evidence are highlighted in the following sections. The Committee only comments on those sections on which it has a view.

Period for indicating approval under section 28 of the 2003 Act (section 30)

138. Section 30 amends section 38 of the 2003 Act, which sets out the criteria which must be met before an application to register a community interest in land is approved by Ministers and inserts a subsection that precludes Ministers considering any community support that is dated earlier than six months before the date on which an application to register a community interest in land is received.

139. Community Land Scotland\(^59\) and the Community Woodlands Association\(^60\) raised practical concerns in relation to the proposal for a six-month limit precluding

Ministers considering any community support that is dated earlier than six months before the date an application to register a community interest in land is received. They both stated that registration of a community body can take in excess of 6 months itself in certain circumstances and feasibility and other studies may date back before that period. These bodies believe that Ministers should be free to take account of anything they consider relevant in indicating approval.

140. The Committee recognises the practical issues for communities in considering an interest in land and agrees that Ministers should not be artificially restricted by a six-month time limit in considering any relevant material. The Committee would welcome further consideration of this section by Ministers.

Procedure for late applications (section 31)

141. Section 31 amends section 39 of the 2003 Act relating to the procedure for late applications. The Policy Memorandum states that it replaces “the “good reasons” test for “late” applications with one which sets out clear requirements to be met by community bodies when submitting a “late” application”.

142. An application is deemed to be “late” when it is received by Ministers after the owner of the land has taken action to transfer the land, but before missives are concluded or an option to acquire is granted. Key amendments include—

- allowing Ministers to request further information from the current owner (or a creditor in a standard security), to be provided within seven days of receipt of the request, to ensure that Ministers have the necessary evidence to determine whether an application is “late”;

- where further information is requested, extending the time that Ministers have to make a decision on whether an application is “late” from 30 days to 44 days;

- removing the requirement to show “good reasons” for not submitting an application before land came on the market and replacing it with a requirement that such relevant work as Ministers consider reasonable was carried out by a person, or such relevant steps as Ministers consider reasonable were taken by a person. Section 31(9) inserts a new subsection (6) into section 39 of the 2003 Act to define relevant work and relevant steps;

- setting out the timescales in which the relevant work or steps must have been taken. Allowing Ministers to request further information from any relevant party within the relevant timescale;

- providing that where missives have been concluded or an option conferred in respect of the land Ministers must decline to consider the application; and

- land in respect of which the relevant work or steps have been carried out does not need to be the same land as that to which the application relates.
143. Many stakeholders commented on the registration process and the need for a process at all and/or the need for simplification of this. The Committee also received considerable comment on the process for late registration. Evidence noted that whilst many communities only start to take an interest in land acquisition when land comes on to the market, there was also a need to encourage a degree of proactivity because of the difficulties in supporting community bodies at short notice. Difficulties have also been noted with the need to re-register every five years. The Committee considers the need to register; the registration process, including pre-registration; late registration and re-registration in paragraphs 144 to171.

The requirement to register

144. The requirement to register an interest in land was considered by many stakeholders in written and oral evidence. The comments of Wendy Reid, from the Development Trusts Association Scotland, on the need for simplification of the registration process, reflected the views of a number of stakeholders. She stated—

“I am in two minds about the registration process. The need to register is a prompt for communities to think about how they would like their communities to develop and what opportunities they would like to have to influence how things develop. However, the process is onerous, as is the reregistration process. There is something to be said for having an easier process for registering interest if a piece of land comes up for sale that the community had never anticipated would come up for sale, because things happen that no one could have predicted. As the Bill stands, it will be extraordinarily difficult for communities to do anything about such situations, which might involve the loss of a service or whatever. I am not sure about getting rid of registration altogether, although I can see that that would have advantages. What is useful about having to register is that it gets community organisations to think about why they might want assets and what they might want to do with them. We might not want to lose that prompt if we were to go down the route of not having early registration of interest”.

145. Jon Hollingdale, of the Community Woodlands Trust, stated—

“As I understand it, the idea behind pre-registration is to encourage communities to be proactive, and I think that we will agree that being proactive and thinking ahead are generally better than simply being reactive to opportunities. However, having been encouraged to be proactive and make these registrations, communities are then not rewarded for doing that… If I were designing things from scratch, I would have a system in which communities…would carry out community development planning and identify the sort of land and buildings assets that they need to deliver the things that their community wants…. A specification would be laid down and when land came on to the market, communities would have the possibility of pre-emption if that land fitted their previously announced specification. 62

146. The option of registering land for a purpose which would take account of the preparatory work undertaken by communities was supported by Community Land Scotland.

147. In oral evidence to the Committee, John Watt reminded the Committee that the Land Reform Review Group, of which he was a member, produced a menu of rights for communities. He stated—

“...The first right that we suggested was a “right lite” whereby a community could simply register an interest. Under the 2003 act, there is a right of pre-emption. However, if there was a right to register an interest and to be notified when land was coming on to the market or ownership was changing, that would trigger the process of the “heavier” right of registering a right of pre-emption. We thought that that might be a way of getting round everything becoming a late registration”. 63

148. This proposal was supported by the Community Woodland Association, which also suggested that there could be a requirement for a landowner to give notice to an established community body prior to any sale, which would mean that the community received notice before land went on the market.

149. The Committee explored the issues in the registration process with the Cabinet Secretary and asked why there was a need for registration at all. The Cabinet Secretary stated—

“The Government has to balance people’s right to sell their assets with the rights of the community” and he suggested that a community which is preparing and thinking about the future and is already defined would need to be in place. He also stressed his concerns that otherwise there would be a disadvantage to an owner who would have to wait for some time for the community to be formed and the process concluded and this would interfere with the rights of the owner wishing to sell.” 64

150. The Committee was interested to hear the views of stakeholders on the requirement on communities to register an interest in land. While the Committee understands that many communities only start to take an interest in land acquisition when land comes on the market and many stakeholders support the removal of the registration requirement, on balance the Committee considers there are benefits in encouraging communities to proactively engage in community development and, where possible, to identify the assets they may need to deliver their objectives. The Committee is also concerned that there can be difficulties in supporting community bodies at short notice. On that basis the Committee is, in principle, supportive of the requirement to register an interest in land.

151. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government should take into account the recommendations of the Land Reform Review Group with respect to the ‘right lite’ for registration, i.e. providing communities with a right to register an interest and to be notified when land was coming on to the market or ownership was changing, that would trigger the process of the ‘heavier’ right of registering a right of pre-emption.

152. Notwithstanding that, the Committee considers that the registration process requires considerable simplification. The Committee was also interested to hear the proposals from stakeholders to allow communities to register a purpose. The Committee considers that there may be scope for a dual registration process to enable registration for specified areas of land or buildings and to enable registration for a purpose which could potentially be met by a range of assets. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government give consideration to a simplified registration process that would also include the option to register ‘a purpose’ and bring forward amendments to that effect at stage 2.

Registration for late applications
153. Many stakeholders raised concerns with respect to the proposals for consideration of late applications to register an interest in land. This was considered to be an issue of great significance to the future prospects of community ownership. Many considered that the process of late applications should be considered as the norm, stressing that communities are often reactive. However, some stakeholders considered that the legitimacy of the process is undermined when late applications become the norm.

154. In written evidence to the Committee, Community Land Scotland stated—

“For a variety of legitimate reasons, communities do not think of or register an interest in land as an abstract exercise. For all communities to protect the potential interests of the community though timeous registrations of interest in land may require registrations of interest in a significant number of areas of land, with little or no prospect that they may ever come on the market. There are considerable administrative implications for a community and for government from any process of ‘mass registration’ of interests in land by communities, yet the current LRA rather founds on that broad assumption. Experience shows communities are also very reluctant to register and interest in land if they feel that might be interpreted as a hostile act by an owner”.

155. This view was supported by the Scottish Community Alliance which stated—

“In an ideal world a community body would survey all local land and assets, agree amongst themselves which assets are of strategic long term importance to the community and then set about making a multiple set of applications, thereby registering interest in all these key assets. But the real world is not the ideal world. Communities are reactive not proactive by nature, and are galvanised into action usually only when something is threatened. But even if they had the inclination to think forward to the day that any of these strategic assets were to be put on the market it is unlikely they would wish to asset their rights due to the potential for ill feeling that this might arouse from the potential seller who will perceive this as a constraint on their freedom to access the best market price possible. The additional hurdles associated with a late registration also appear to be too burdensome. We would therefore support the position of Community Land Scotland in respect of this aspect of the Bill”.

156. Community Land Scotland suggested that the new provision which replaces the need for a community to show “good reasons” why it did not apply timeously with a provision to show they had undertaken sufficiently well in advance “such relevant work as Ministers consider reasonable was carried out”...may well make the opportunity for a late registration more difficult than it already is. It suggests that “this would not assist any objective of greater community ownership that was in the public interest.”

157. Highland Council stated that applications for late registration were becoming the norm, adding that—

“Given the likelihood that the number of late registrations will increase, it is considered that existing hurdles regarding the requirement to demonstrate additional community support and that the registration would be strongly in the public interest are of themselves sufficient without the new requirements suggested in the Bill.”

158. Community Land Scotland suggested that it would be best to accept late registration as the likely norm and that it, of itself, need not be justified by any prior action or lack of action, and instead could rest on the other existing tests for late registration. It also suggested that it might be possible to make provisions that where Ministers were notified by a land owner that they had an interest in selling their land, Ministers would take steps to seek to establish if a community had an interest in buying the land.

159. This evidence was supported by Highlands and Islands Enterprise (HIE), which suggested it would be helpful if communities could progress a late registration if they had considered purchase of an asset (specific or general) as detailed in a local development plan and stressed the importance of communities taking a strategic and holistic approach to their development through the establishment of whole community plans. HIE believes that community plans should be considered as appropriate evidence under the proposed ‘taking relevant work’ provision. It also suggested that guidance to clarify eligible work/steps would be beneficial. Based on their experience of working with communities, where often initial work was undertaken by a community council or working group with the intention that another body would pursue the community right to buy application, it suggests that consideration be given to de-coupling the requirements for relevant steps/relevant work and the practical application being made by the same community body.\textsuperscript{70}

160. Contrary to these views, the Historic Houses Association for Scotland\textsuperscript{71} and Scottish Land and Estates\textsuperscript{72} considered that the legitimacy of the process is undermined where late applications become almost standard. These organisations suggested that the late application procedure could be improved if a landowner could obtain exemption from a late application by giving forward notification (of six months) of a potential sale of land by advertisement in a local newspaper, giving the community body four months to organise itself and register an interest in the land, after which time Ministers would not consider a late application. They also suggested that they would welcome the introduction of a monitoring system into delays in the process for (Ministerial) consideration of applications.

161. Brodies LLP was of the view that community bodies should be obliged to explain why an application was not submitted prior to the land being put on the market and raised concerns that removing the good reasons test could make some landowners wary of putting land on the market for fear of “triggering” community interest.\textsuperscript{73}

162. The Committee is keen to ensure that the provisions in Part 4 of the Bill simplify the provisions of the 2003 Act and effectively support communities in their aspirations to acquire land and deliver wider public and sustainable development benefits, whilst balancing this with the need to protect the rights of land owners. The Committee is aware that whilst encouragement and support should be given to communities in registering an early interest in land it is likely that for many communities and applications late registration will continue to be the norm. The Committee considers that the process for late registration should reflect the practical reality for communities and should be redesigned to accommodate this.

163. The Committee has concerns about the ‘good reasons’ test but is also concerned that removal of the ‘good reasons’ test and replacement of this with the need to show ‘relevant work’ may make the process more restrictive and more onerous. The Committee remains unconvinced, where there is a late application, of the need to impose a requirement on communities to show either good reason or demonstrate relevant work and recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments at stage 2 to remove this requirement.

164. If the Scottish Government decides not to amend the Bill to remove the requirement on communities to demonstrate relevant work/steps, the Committee urges the Scottish Government to de-couple the requirement for the work and application to be made by the same community body.

Re-registration
165. Many stakeholders expressed concerns with regard to the process and timescale for re-registering an interest in land. Community Land Scotland, the Community Woodland Association, the Development Trusts Association Scotland, Highland Council, and many others, suggested that the five-year timescale is too short and consideration should be given to extending this to ten years. The Committee understands that this view is supported by the Land Reform Review Group in its final report (section 17.1-9 &10).

166. Many stakeholders considered that it was important to retain the ability to test the will of the community on their continuing interest in purchase, while reducing the burden on communities and were concerned that the proposed re-registration provisions would require replicating the original registration demands. Stakeholders suggested that there was considerable scope to simplify the process. Sarah-Jane Laing said—

“...I think that all that is necessary is for it to be asked at the point of reregistration is whether there have been material changes. If the answer is yes, those involved would go down one route, and if it is no, they would go down another. I do not think that it would be a problem to have a dual process for reregistration…a material change such as a huge swell of opinion in the community, which could have different views and different needs, must be taken into consideration, but it would be possible to have a dual registration process”

167. Highland Council suggested that the requirement to re-register should be extended to ten years, in line with the recommendations of the Land Reform Review Group. The Scottish Community Alliance stated that—

“Given the procedural burden placed on communities to re-register their interest after five years have lapsed, and given the assumption that late applications are viewed generally as the exception rather than the rule (and therefore the assumption that multiple applications should be being made by community bodies) we would support the proposition that the re-registration should be required after ten years rather than five”.

168. The Committee explored the re-registration process with the Cabinet Secretary, who stated—“...Things can change in ten years. You can imagine a community defining itself, imagining its future, putting together its ideas and carrying out its registration but then finding that, ten years later, things were quite different.

76 Written submission. Highland Council.
77 Written submission. Scottish Community Alliance.
We do not think that ten years would be a wise approach. The five year period was our judgement of a good timescale. 78

169. The Committee heard a range of views on the appropriate timescale for the re-registration of an interest in land. The Committee considers the most significant requirement is the need to simplify the registration process to one of a presumption in favour of re-registration unless there has been a material change of circumstance. The Committee believes that this should substantially reduce the burden on community bodies, particularly if those community bodies have multiple registrations. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments to that effect at stage 2.

170. Whilst the Committee has some sympathy with those stakeholders who proposed an extension of the re-registration period from five to ten years, the Committee considers that circumstances can change over time and, if the re-registration process is substantially simplified, a requirement to re-register every five years is appropriate.

171. The Committee raised the issue of the inability of applications to be amended once submitted with the Cabinet Secretary and recommends that amendments be brought forward by the Scottish Government at stage 2 to enable applications to be amended once submitted.

Concluded missives, option agreements and registering interests (sections 32 – 35)

172. Sections 32 – 35 relate to evidence and notification of concluded missives or option agreements and notifying Ministers of certain changes to information relating to registered interests.

173. The 2003 Land Reform Act (section 51(2)(a)) provides that at least half of the members of the community must have voted or, if half of the members have not voted, the proportion which voted is sufficient in the circumstances to justify the community body buying the land.

174. Scottish Land and Estates, 79 the Historic Houses Association for Scotland 80 and the Community Land Advisory Service 81 comment on section 33, which introduces a requirement for an owner to inform Ministers within 28 days of an exempt transfer being made of this taking place. They considered this to be at odds with the transfer being “exempt” and suggest that as the Registers of Scotland maintain both the Land and Sasine Property Registers and the Register of Community Interests in Land, it would be sufficient to include a declaration in the disposition detailing the exemption rather than placing what they consider to be an unnecessary additional burden on the owner to notify.

79 Written submission. Scottish Land and Estates.
80 Written submission. Historic Houses Association for Scotland.

175. The Committee questions the rationale for the requirement for an owner to inform Ministers of an exempt transfer being made and considers that it should be sufficient to include a declaration in the disposition. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government reflect on this and consider whether amendment to this provision is required at stage 2.

176. The issue of prior options relates to the scenario where, at the date Ministers receive an application for registration of a community interest, the landowner has already entered into a binding option agreement with a third party, under which that party may elect, at some future point, to buy the land.

177. The Community Land Advisory Service highlighted contradictions in the 2003 Act which it considered appear to be resolved by the Bill which, in its view, puts beyond any question that a prior option “trumps” a community interest application. In its written submission it states—

“. .. this is the wrong policy choice; … it should be possible for Ministers to consider whether, in the given circumstances, a community interest may be registered over land subject to a prior option.”

178. Other stakeholders raised concerns with respect to the possibility of landowners granting option agreement in order to thwart a potential community purchase. Helensburgh Community Woodland Group stated—

“we are concerned that there are still too many opportunities within the Bill in its current form that enables landowners/property owners to avoid the community’s ability to register/lease or buy. For example, there exists and option for owners to grant a ten year option to purchase to their siblings, children or other family members. If this type of loophole is not removed it will only frustrate the community right to buy process and ultimately lead to the Bill having to be amended.”

179. Other stakeholders took a different view on the issue of options. The Scottish Property Federation welcomed the inclusion of consideration of option agreements within the Bill but stated “we believe that other pre-agreed rights over the land that may be extant between the landowner and a third party should also be considered by Ministers.”

84

180. The Committee would be concerned if landowners were found to be seeking to thwart legitimate applications from communities. The Committee considers that the existence of an option to purchase should not automatically exclude a community application and recommends that the Scottish Government consider this provision and bring forward amendments at stage 2 to ensure that land and buildings under option are not excluded from eligible land for registration or purchase.

181. Section 36 removes the reference to at least half of the members of the community voting and provides that the requirement is met if the proportion of the members of the community who voted is sufficient to justify the community body proceeding to buy the land.

182. The Committee welcomes the provisions within section 36 which provide greater flexibility by removing the requirement that half the members of the community must vote on an application. The Committee asks the Scottish Government to clarify what considerations and criteria will be taken into account in assessing whether a sufficient proportion of the community has voted. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government issue guidance on this matter.

Appointment of person to conduct ballot on proposal to buy land (section 37)

183. Section 37 inserts a new section 51A into the 2003 Act. It provides for an independent balloter to undertake the community ballot. The Policy Memorandum states that—

“Scottish Ministers [will] arrange for this to be conducted by an independent third party, and [...] meet the cost of this, making the community right-to-buy process easier for community bodies.”85

184. Requirements on Ministers include providing the balloter with a copy of the application and other information as prescribed in regulations. This must be done within 28 days of the valuer being appointed. The community body is also required to provide the balloter with wording for the proposition that they buy the land, together with other information as set out in the regulations within seven days of receiving notification of the value of the land.

185. HIE suggested that, as much of the information will already have been submitted to Ministers as part of the application process and as Ministers supply background information to the balloter, it did not see merits in this subsection and stated it was “... not persuaded of the need for a balloter to hold this information as the balloter’s role is solely to undertake the ballot.”86

186. The Committee questions whether there is any practical merit in the Minister and the community body providing background information to the balloter, given that the balloter’s role is solely to undertake the ballot. The Committee asks the Scottish Government to re-consider the necessity of this provision with a view to bringing forward amendments at stage 2 to delete that requirement.

187. The Community Land Advisory Service suggested that, in relation to section 37(4)(b)—

85 Policy Memorandum. Paragraph 63.
86 Written submission. Highlands and Islands Enterprise.
“Given the Bill intends to make it clear that the right to buy can be exercised in relation to separate tenements, I think that the requirement to affix a notice to the land needs to be relaxed for those cases…”

188. The Committee also questions the requirement of the provision in section 37(4)(b) on fixing notices to the land in relation to right-to-buy applications for separate tenements and asks the Scottish Government to consider whether that requirement could be relaxed for those cases, and, if necessary, bring forward amendments at stage 2.

Approval of right-to-buy application, ballot and payment (sections 38 – 42)

189. Sections 38 – 42 relate to the information Ministers must take into account when deciding whether to approve a community body’s exercise of the right-to-buy and relates to the provision of information and evidence relating to ballot results; Ministerial powers to review whether ballots have been properly conducted; the timescale for the conduct of the ballot; and the timescale for payment by the community body.

190. Both Scottish Land and Estates\(^88\) and the Historic Houses Association Scotland\(^89\) suggest that as the ballot is at the initiation of the community body, the community body should meet the expenses of this rather than the public purse.

191. The Committee considers that, given the significance of the policy objectives of land reform and the Part 4 provisions of this Bill, and the very real difficulties many communities face in building capacity and in securing resources, should Ministers consider the application meets the public interest and sustainable development tests, then it is appropriate that the cost of the ballot be met from the public purse.

192. Section 43 amends section 60 of the 2003 Act, which requires the valuer to invite the landowner and the community body to comment on issues that may have an impact on the valuation. This inserts a new subsection (1A) into section 60 of the 2003 Act, which requires the valuer to pass on any written representations about the value of the land (whether by the landowner of the community body) to the other party and invite counter representations from that party. These views must then be considered while undertaking the valuation. It is believed that this process will increase confidence in the valuation.

193. The Policy Memorandum states that the Bill gives Ministers discretion to allow them to recover the cost of the independent valuation from the landowner where the landowner has withdrawn the land from sale after the valuer has been appointed, thus deterring landowners from allowing the process to proceed where land is not genuinely being offered for sale.

194. The Committee considers that the requirement on the valuer to consider the views of both parties when undertaking the valuation should increase confidence in the process.

Circumstances where expenses of valuation are to be met by the owner of the land (section 44)

195. Section 44 inserts a new section 60A into the 2003 Act. It provides for certain circumstances where Ministers may require the landowner to pay the expenses of Ministers in connection with the valuation. This also provides landowners with a right of appeal.

196. The Historic Houses Association for Scotland\(^{91}\) and Scottish Land and Estates\(^{92}\) raised concerns in relation to section 44. In particular, they highlighted that under community right-to-buy an owner has a right to withdraw his or her land from a sale to a community body after the right-to-buy has been activated, provided the appropriate notification has been given. They sought comfort that this section would not be used arbitrarily to penalise a landowner who, for a variety of reasons (such as where family or financial circumstances of the landowner change or where the land is held in trust, not all of the trustees being made aware of the sale) decide not to proceed with the sale. They sought further clarification on the criteria that would form the basis for Ministers’ decisions on recovery of expenses. They suggested, as did Brodies in its written submission,\(^{93}\) that Ministers should exercise their discretion with care.

197. Some stakeholders, including the Community Land Advisory Service, raised concerns in relation to the basis of the Minister’s decision. Specifically, stakeholders sought further clarification on the criteria which would form the basis of that decision and highlighted the potentially adverse effects on land owners, who might be pursuing long term development proposals.\(^{94}\)

198. While the Committee is concerned to ensure that landowners do not thwart the legitimate proposals of communities, the Committee recognises that there will be cases where landowners, for legitimate reasons (e.g. where family or financial circumstances change) decide to withdraw land from sale after a right-to-buy has been activated. The Committee is of the view that there should be Ministerial discretion on this matter. The Committee considers that further clarification, by way of regulation, will be required to set out the criteria which would form the basis of the Ministerial decision.

Rights of appeal, calculation of time periods and provision of Information (sections 45 – 47)

199. Sections 45 – 47 relate to rights of appeal to the sheriff; calculating certain time periods in relation to community right to buy; and the provision of information to Ministers to enable monitoring and evaluation of any impacts that the right-to-buy under Part 2 of the 2003 Act has had or may have.

200. The Community Land Advisory Service\(^95\) commented on section 47 (the proposed new section 67A of the 2003 Act) highlighting that some periods specified in the revised 2003 Act would include public and local holidays and some would not and this could potentially cause confusion and lead to mistakes.

201. The Committee welcomes the provisions that support effective monitoring and evaluation of the impact of the community right-to-buy provisions.

202. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government give further consideration to the requirement for consistency in the 2003 Act on the treatment of public and local holidays and bring forward amendments at stage 2 to ensure this.

Community right to buy abandoned and neglected land (section 48)

203. The existing community right to buy provisions under Part 2 of the 2003 Act allow a rural community to register an interest in land at any time. However a community body can only buy the land if the owner willingly decides to sell. As outlined in paragraph 102, section 27 removes the restriction on rural land and communities. The Policy Memorandum states—

> “Land that is neglected or abandoned can be a barrier to the sustainable development of land. In some cases it may prevent the community from developing or improving facilities. There are also cases where derelict or neglected sites become a blight on the surrounding area, and the community could bring the land back into productive use. The Scottish Government considers that in such circumstances, where all other options fail to achieve improvement, communities should be able to acquire the land without having to wait for it to be put on the market.”\(^96\)

204. Section 48 of the Bill inserts a new Part 3A into the 2003 Act to give communities a right to buy land that is wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected, for the purposes of the sustainable development of that land, where there is no willing seller. Where Ministers approve the application, the owner will be required to transfer the land to the community body, which will be required to pay the market value for the land. The procedure for Part 3A is based on the procedure in Part 3 of the 2003 Land Reform Act, which gives crofting communities an absolute right to buy and is not dependent on there being a willing seller. The provisions in the proposed Part 3A as inserted by section 48 are summarised below.

Meaning of Land (Section 97B)

205. The new section 97B of the 2003 Act defines “land” as including “bridges and other structures built on or over land, inland waters, canals and the foreshore” (i.e. land between the high and low water marks of ordinary spring tides). The definition does not include salmon and mineral rights.

Eligible land (Section 97C)

- “The new section 97C of the 2003 Act defines eligible land as land which is, in the opinion of Ministers, “Wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected”. Factors which Ministers must have regard to when deciding whether land is eligible will be set out in regulations. Land which is not eligible includes –

  - land on which there is an individual’s home, though this can be subject to exceptions set out in regulations;
  - land pertaining to an individual’s home as may be set out in regulations;
  - eligible croft land (as defined in section 68 of the 2003 Act) or croft land which is occupied or worked by its owner or members of their family;
  - certain land that is owned by the Crown (because no owner or heir to the previous owner exists or can be identified); or
  - land of such other descriptions that Ministers may set out in regulations.

206. The Policy Memorandum suggests that matters which could be considered in relation to whether land is abandoned or neglected include—

“The physical condition of the land or building; its current use (or non-use); any detrimental economic or environmental impact on the local area; and any failure by the landowner to comply with regulatory requirements. Ministers would also need to consider any environmental, planning or historic designations affecting the land and buildings, for example if there are any restrictions on its use or development relating to conservation purposes.”

207. Many stakeholders supported the introduction of the new power extending the community right-to-buy where there is no willing seller, but the majority who commented on this provision viewed it as a power of last resort, to be exercised when other methods and negotiations had failed. They considered that the existence of the power would, however, have an important role in incentivising negotiation. Stakeholders such as the Community Woodland Association98 and Community Land Scotland99 suggested that this proposal responds to a weakness in the 2003 Act, that is, even if it were in the public interest, there is no means by which a community can acquire land unless it comes on the open market. In their view, the new provision means that the matter can now be considered.

208. Whilst stakeholders were broadly supportive of the introduction of this power in principle, many questioned whether the provisions, as drafted, effectively meet the policy objectives. Many also highlighted significant concerns with respect to the definition of abandonment and neglect and the additional requirements resulting from the definition; the scope of eligible land; and the provision for exceptions in relation to an individual’s home. Many stakeholders raised practical concerns in relation to the operation of the provisions. Community Land Scotland\textsuperscript{100} and the Community Woodland Association\textsuperscript{101} stated that, in their view, the significant qualifications on the new right would probably make it impossible to exercise in practice. The Community Woodland Association stated—

“The bar is being set too high, there are too many obstacles in the way and there are clear opportunities for avoidance on the part of landowners. We are concerned that this requirement is overly limiting and whilst it may be possible to demonstrate this requirement is met for buildings we do not believe it will be workable in practice with respect to woodlands and other extensive land holdings.”\textsuperscript{102}

209. Highland Council shared those concerns, suggesting that section 48 appears to introduce a significantly higher barrier to community ownership than currently exists. It had particular concerns that the requirement for an interested community to demonstrate that land had been abandoned, particularly in a rural setting, would be very challenging indeed.\textsuperscript{103}

210. Community Land Scotland also stated that it did not believe that there was a clear and fundamental difference between the sustainable development of crofting land (as required by the crofting community right-to-buy in the 2003 Act) and the sustainable development of other land which necessitates the additional requirements of abandonment or neglect in order for it to be eligible for the potential exercise of these new powers.\textsuperscript{104}

211. John Watt told the Committee that he would prefer the Bill to mention “fulfilling the greatest potential for sustainable development”, rather than including a requirement that land should be proven to be “abandoned or neglected.”\textsuperscript{105}

212. Some also questioned, given the stated policy intention, whether section 97C should include a further provision to the effect that eligible land would be land which, if sold to a community body, would contribute to the achievement of greater diversity of ownership of land in Scotland.

The public interest and sustainability tests
213. The Committee explored the views of stakeholders on the public interest and sustainable development tests. The Committee heard evidence about the operation of the community right-to-buy to date and concerns that tying the Part 3A route to community ownership of land solely to the concept of abandonment or neglect is too limiting as community ownership of land is principally motivated by communities considering barriers to sustainable development of their place. There was discussion that, had these provisions existed at the time of the Eigg case, the community might not have been able to successfully argue a case for community ownership.

214. In oral evidence, Peter Peacock stated—

“Sustainable development is defined in three ways. That is the problem at the heart of the definition of “abandoned and neglected”: it deals with one of the three definitions of sustainable development but not necessarily with the other two...The difficulty with sticking to a definition of abandonment and neglect is that it appears to relate to the physical construct of the land rather than to sustainable development. The whole policy purpose of the bill, and of the original 2003 act, is about furthering sustainable development. There is a bit of a trap here, given the way in which sustainable development is currently defined. The issue can be sorted—for example, it would be possible to have a third criterion. If the aim of the requirement for a building to be proven to be “abandoned and neglected”...the bill could specify that a building can also be proven to be in need of sustainable or sustained development. That would allow the social and economic considerations to be taken into account”.

215. The Committee agrees with stakeholders that the power to extend the community right-to-buy where there is no willing seller should be a power of last resort, to be exercised only when other methods and negotiations had failed. However, the Committee has concerns that this new right, as the provisions are currently drafted, may be almost impossible to exercise, with too many obstacles and opportunities for avoidance on the part of landowners. Notwithstanding this, the Committee believes that the existence of this power is likely to play an important role in incentivising negotiation.

216. The Committee questions the need to restrict the definition of eligible land to that which is considered to be wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected. The Committee is concerned that these provisions, as drafted, may fail to further sustainable development.

217. The Committee also questions why the Scottish Government considers that a definition is needed at all, as the parallel tests for crofting land purchases do not require this.

218. The Committee considers that there are convincing arguments that the tests of ‘furthering sustainable development’ and of being ‘in the public interest’ are capable of testing all requirements. On that basis, the Committee recommends that the Scottish Government reconsider the requirement that eligible land be restricted to land which is wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected and recommends that the Scottish Government consider a definition that relates to the wider circumstances which can be a barrier to sustainable development, such as the lack of achievement of the use and/or development of land that could deliver greater public benefit.

219. In the absence of an unambiguous and acceptable definition\textsuperscript{108} of abandoned or neglected land produced by the Scottish Government which both removes the barrier that the present proposal is likely to erect, and which avoids the problems of interpretation giving the existing legal concept of abandoned land, then the Committee is likely to ask the Scottish Government to remove the term ‘abandoned or neglected land’ and bring forward a proposal which will allow the widest possible opportunity for community purchase. The Committee reserves the right to take evidence on this issue at stage 2.

220. The Committee sets out its detailed consideration of the evidence in relation to definitions of abandonment and neglect in the following paragraphs.

Definitions of abandonment and neglect

221. Many stakeholders, including Scottish Environment Protection Agency (SEPA); the Law Society of Scotland; Community Land Scotland; Scottish Land and Estates; the Community Land Advisory Service; Brodies LLP; the National Farmers Union Scotland; and West Dunbartonshire Council, raised significant concerns in relation to how land would be identified as being abandoned or neglected.

222. The Law Society of Scotland stated—

“The lack of a definition for abandoned or neglected land gives rise to considerable uncertainty in relation to what land would be within the scope of section 97C. The Society believes that there should be a proper definition of abandoned or neglected land”.\textsuperscript{109}

223. Scottish Land and Estates\textsuperscript{110} considered that an owner is entitled to know, prior to the Bill becoming law, what is meant by the separate terms “abandoned” and “neglected”. This concern was shared by the Scottish Community Alliance which stated—

“…We would also support the view that more clarity is needed to determine what is meant by abandoned and neglected land….Given that these provisions could result in an asset owner being deprived of his/her property against their wishes, it is very important that there is absolute clarity around the circumstances in which this would be permissible”.\textsuperscript{111}

224. Community Land Advisory Service raised the question of fairness to landowners and, in its written submission, stated—

\textsuperscript{108} Sarah Boyack MSP and Claudia Beamish MSP dissent from paragraph 220 on the basis of the evidence to the Committee which suggested that the requirement on communities to demonstrate that land is neglected or abandoned is likely to present a barrier which would undermine the aims of the Bill.

“that more consultation and discussion is needed on the sorts of land susceptible to the proposed right to buy. This should include consideration of (1) land land-banked for future development, (2) farmland left fallow as a matter of good agricultural practice and (3) spaces deliberately allowed to go wild for good environmental reasons”.\textsuperscript{112}

225. Malcolm Combe stated that the word “abandoned” is “sub-optimal, because it has a very specific meaning in Scots private law” i.e. it is used in a situation where an owner has actively sought to walk away from an item of property. “Whilst land cannot be cast away in quite the same manner, an owner may seek to disclaim land. This was most recently witnessed in the case SEPA v Joint Liquidators of Scottish Coal (2014 SLT 259)”.

226. Mr Combe discussed whether an appropriate synonym for “abandoned” could be found and concluded that—

“The Committee should consider carefully whether “abandoned” is appropriate. One drastic solution might be to remove “abandoned” entirely, leaving the legislation to relate to “wholly or mainly neglected land”.”\textsuperscript{113}

227. This concern was shared by other stakeholders, including the Historic Houses Association for Scotland, who suggested that “mainly abandoned” did not appear to be a legally competent term.\textsuperscript{114}

228. The submission from the Community Land Advisory Service raised concerns that the definition of abandoned and neglected land was to be defined by future statutory instrument, subject to the negative procedure. It also raised concerns in relation to potential disputes that might arise should the definition be left to a later date and set out in subordinate legislation, highlighting possible adverse consequences for the land market.

229. The Church of Scotland General Trustees stated—

“…While there are clear difficulties in setting out criteria to define “abandoned or neglected”, it appears to the Trustees that the definition of these terms is at the heart of this element of the proposals. Without statutory definition of these terms, Parliament is being asked to approve a concept, rather than scrutinise the specific terms and application of the legislation with the danger of unintended consequences. The Trustees submit that the terms “abandoned or neglected” should be defined within the primary legislation and should take into account: a property owner’s right to peaceful enjoyment of his or her possessions…”\textsuperscript{115}

230. Scottish Land and Estates commented on the human rights issues associated with these provisions and stated—

“In terms of the process set out in the Bill, we believe that deprivation of ownership is not the appropriate final outcome and it is questionable in ECHR terms whether this is in fact a proportionate response. Where there is “abandoned and neglected” land, the key issue the Bill requires to address is land use, not land ownership.”

231. In providing oral evidence to the Committee, Dave Thomson, from the Scottish Government Bill Team, said that he agreed that the definition should be on the face of the Bill, adding that—

“I think that matters that the Minister would have to consider in deciding whether that definition applies will be followed up within regulation rather than in the Bill, but you are right that the definition should be in the Bill itself. We are still actively considering exactly what the definition should be, to ensure that we get it right.”

232. In response to the discussion of the Committee’s concerns in relation to abandoned and neglected land, the Cabinet Secretary said he would reflect on the issues raised with the Committee and consider whether there is a need for further clarity.

233. Notwithstanding the Committee’s recommendation in paragraph 220, with respect to the terms wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected land, which takes precedence, should the Scottish Government wish to retain this provision, the Committee recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments at stage 2 to the following effect—

- the term “abandoned” is sub-optimal and should be removed entirely, leaving the legislation to relate to “wholly or mainly neglected land;”
- the definition of neglected should relate to the sustainable development of the land and not solely to a description of its physical condition and there should be a clear justification for the inclusion of the term;
- if prescribed matters in relation to eligible land are to be set out in regulation these regulations should be laid under the affirmative procedure; and
- owners and communities are entitled to know, prior to the Bill becoming law, what is meant by the separate terms. The Committee considers it is not appropriate to deal with the transfer of fundamental property rights through secondary legislation. The Committee recommends that any definition of terms be set out on the face of the Bill.

Impact of the provisions in urban and rural areas

234. The Committee heard from stakeholders that there may be a differentiation in the circumstances of urban and rural areas.

235. Some stakeholders including Scottish Land and Estates\(^{120}\) and the Historic Houses Association Scotland\(^{121}\) raised the question as to whether the provisions relating to abandoned and neglected land should apply only in an urban context if the focus was on small parcels of land which prevent sustainable development or cause blight.

236. The Committee considers that, whilst there may be a differentiation in urban and rural circumstances and there could be challenges in measuring neglect and abandonment in rural areas, should this provision remain, the Committee is of the view that it should apply uniformly outwith crofting land. However, further consideration to the criteria for determining neglect and abandonment is necessary and should be set out on the face of the Bill.

237. The National Farmers Union of Scotland (NFUS) was concerned that some agricultural land may be out of “regular” use for periods of time and may, as a result, be subject to these provisions. It considered that where land is classified as agricultural land it should be exempt from this provision unless it is proven that it fails to meet “good agricultural and environmental condition”.\(^{122}\)

238. The Committee shares the concerns of the National Farmers Union of Scotland (NFUS) in relation to the possible impact of the provisions on agricultural land that may be out of regular use for periods of time. The Committee considers that land which is classified as agricultural land should be exempt from this provision unless it is determined that it fails to meet “good agricultural and environmental condition”. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments to that effect at stage 2.

Timescales

239. Some stakeholders, including the NFUS and Community Land Scotland suggested that consideration be given to the timescales in which land would be considered to be abandoned or neglected and proposed that a minimum timescale be set out.\(^{123}\)\(^{124}\)

240. The Committee recommends that, should the provision relating to abandoned or neglected remain, the Scottish Government give consideration to the issue of appropriate timescales in which land could be

Other potential impacts of the provisions

241. Brodies LLP suggested that safeguards would be required to ensure that the provisions are not used to obstruct the development plans of competitors.

242. The Scottish Property Federation\textsuperscript{125} highlighted significant concerns in relation to land that may be part of a complex development process (possibly comprising several small plots or buildings) and the impact of potential uncertainty on investor decisions. It also raised concerns in relation to land owned by an entity in administration or other insolvency process connected with the land and suggested that there was a need for appropriate and clear policy in relation to this issue.

243. The Committee considers that the information to be provided as part of the application process should enable Ministers to consider the potential impacts of an application. The Committee is aware of the concerns raised in relation to land owned by an entity in administration or insolvency process and recommends that the Scottish Government reflect on that and consider the need for further regulation or relevant guidance, and if necessary bring forward amendments at stage 2.

244. Stakeholders sought clarification as to whether, in cases where some parts of a land holding could be considered to be either wholly or mainly (significantly) abandoned or neglected, whether the provisions would apply to those parts only or to the whole land holding. This issue was also raised in relation to the rural context and with respect to large estates.

245. The Committee recommends that should the provision relating to abandoned or neglected remain, the Scottish Government provide clarification as to whether the provisions in relation to abandoned or neglected land would apply only to those parts of a land holding that were considered to be wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected or would apply to the whole land holding. The Committee asks that the Scottish Government reflect on this and consider the need for further regulation or guidance to provide clarity on this matter.

Management of land

246. The Committee received written evidence and heard oral evidence from Holmehill Community Buyout, which stated that—

“… we are concerned that the concept as presented in the Bill will be of limited value in many cases. There may be cases where it will be of real use to communities so we are not suggesting that it is removed, rather that it is strengthened. The key issue is not that the land is un-managed, but how it is managed…consequently we consider that the Community Empowerment Bill should include the ability for the local community to take ownership of land that is not being used in line with the defined planning designation and where there is a clear community need.”

247. Scottish Land and Estates and the Historic Houses Association for Scotland also raised concerns in relation to the importance of land use rather than land ownership. They raised the issue facing owners of land under agricultural tenancies, both stating in their written submission that (they)—

“...may have very limited control over the utilisation of the leased land and short of going through time consuming and potentially costly court processes may be unable to rectify this. It would seem inequitable for land to be compulsorily acquired, where the owner is not actually responsible for the perceived absence of activity or poor management.”

248. The Committee recognises that, in some cases, control over the management of land will lie primarily with the tenant rather than with the landowner. The Committee considers that the Bill as currently drafted does not appear to provide for situations where the owner is not responsible for the absence of activity or for poor management. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government reflect on this and consider whether relevant amendments are required to clarify this at stage 2.

249. Concerns in relation to land that is intended for conservation purposes were raised by Scottish Natural Heritage, the National Trust for Scotland, the Scottish Wildlife Trust and others.

250. Scottish Natural Heritage, referred to paragraph 73 of the Consultation on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill 2013 which stated that “land which is intended for recognised conservation purposes would not be considered to be neglected or abandoned”. It suggests that this does not seem to be reflected in Section 48 of the Bill, and states—

“In our response to the consultation we commented that the term neglected or abandoned land should be defined so as to exclude land that is delivering wider public goods in the form of ecosystem services despite it not being “actively” managed. The absence of active management is not necessarily a sign of “abandonment” or “neglect”. For example, areas of peat-land might be helping to deliver carbon capture which is part of the Scottish Government’s response to climate change. Owning and managing land for nature conservation is an important land use. We would welcome the legislation reflecting the statement made in the consultation on the draft Bill”.

251. Similarly, the National Trust for Scotland highlighted its concerns that although the Policy Memorandum refers to land or buildings held for conservation—

“...there is nothing in the Bill which would suggest that land or buildings held for conservation could not be considered to be abandoned or neglected. The Scottish Wildlife Trust\(^{131}\) and the National Trust for Scotland would like all land held for conservation to be excluded from the statutory provisions. In addition the National Trust for Scotland requested that the Trust’s inalienable land should be deemed to be held for conservation. “Should this not be accepted by the Committee, we would suggest that the Scottish Ministers should have the power to reject an application where land is held for conservation and the Trust’s inalienable land should be presumed or (preferably) deemed to be held for conservation. If the Trust’s inalienable land is not absolutely excluded from the statutory provisions, then we would seek a special parliamentary process to be built into the legislation to allow the Trust to appeal any compulsory sale order (in the same form as in the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) (Scotland) Act 1947 and the Crofters Acts...”\(^{132}\)

252. SEPA also noted that there could be cases where abandoned or neglected land could have a high value in terms of the ecosystem services it offers such as supporting biodiversity and flood risk management. It highlighted the importance of having a robust evidence base to inform decision making and suggested that both the land valuation and processes of determining requests for transfer of land should take account of ecosystem value in a systematic way. SEPA also suggests that there may be cases where abandoned or neglected land is partly or wholly contaminated and may not be suited to the use that the community would like to see. SEPA suggested that there was a need for appropriate mechanisms to ensure that communities had access to expert advice and support.\(^{133}\)

253. The Historic Houses Association for Scotland stated that—

“...the absence of active management is not necessarily a sign of either “abandonment” or “neglect”. Land may be delivering wider public good in the form of ecosystem services despite not being actively managed. Active management of itself can therefore not be properly used as a term in defining abandonment and neglect. Biodiversity, carbon capture, recreation and cultural value may all be components of different sites and the Bill as drafted does not take into account such circumstances”.\(^{134}\)

254. The Committee was concerned about the possibility that land that is under a low intensity/zero management regime for a valid reason (e.g. natural regeneration for biodiversity or natural flood protection) could be considered “wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected” and recognises that in practice there appears to have been a presumption in favour of development rather than public amenity and nature conservation (e.g. at Holmehill).

256. The Committee is aware that vacant or derelict land may be contaminated. The Committee believes that it is unlikely that communities will have the skills or resources to deal with such situations and agrees with the Scottish Environment Protection Agency that there is a need for appropriate mechanisms to ensure that communities have access to expert advice and support. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government addresses these concerns and ensures that appropriate guidance, advice and support is provided to communities.

Eligible land – provisions with respect to an individual’s home

257. The Delegated Powers and Law Reform (DPLR) Committee reported on the Delegated Powers Memorandum and made a number of specific comments in relation to this, as well as some general observations about the quality of responses received from Scottish Government officials and the detail of the Bill. One of the DPLR Committee’s main concerns relates to the new section 97c(3)(a) on eligible abandoned or neglected land, which states—

“Eligible land does not include land on which there is a building or other structure which is an individual’s home unless the building or structure falls within such classes as may be prescribed”. In its report the DPLR Committee stated that it “[…] remains in a position, having considered both written and oral evidence, whereby it is unable to form a view as to how this power is intended to be used. The Government has not provided an explanation for taking this power beyond a need to retain flexibility within the Bill. The Committee considers that explanation to be inadequate in light of the significance of this power and what it appears to permit. The Committee further finds it concerning that the thinking behind a power of such significance to the scope and application of the Bill appears still to be in the early stages of development”. 135

258. Brodies LLP136 and the Community Land Advisory Service137 also raised concerns in relation to the exclusion of an individual’s home and, in its written evidence, Brodies stated “We are however wary that this exclusion is also subject to further regulation”.

259. The Committee raised the concerns of the DPLR Committee directly with the Cabinet Secretary; sought information on the thinking behind the power; asked for examples that demonstrate how the power might be used in practice; and questioned how the power was intended to be used.

136 Written submission. Brodies LLP.
137 Written submission. Community Land Advisory Service.
260. No detailed information on the thinking behind the power or examples of how it might be used in practice or how it was intended to be used were offered. The Cabinet Secretary stated that he was aware of concerns in relation to the power and undertook to review those concerns but stated “We will still have to have the power to exclude homes…”

261. The Committee shares the concerns of the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee in relation to the new section 97C(3)(a) on eligible abandoned or neglected land, which states “Eligible land does not include land on which there is a building or other structure which is an individual’s home unless the building or structure falls within such classes as may be prescribed”. The Committee is also concerned that the thinking behind this significant power is in the early stages of development.

262. Given the lack of detail provided in response to its questions on the thinking behind the power the Committee remains unconvinced of the case for its necessity. The Committee urges the Scottish Government to reconsider the provision that grants Ministers the power to include an individual’s home in the definition of eligible land for the purpose of section 97C(3)(a) and recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments at stage 2 to remove this power of prescription.

263. Some stakeholders sought clarity on why bona vacantia land is excluded from eligible land, particularly when related to the need to identify ownership of the land, which may not always be possible. Clarity was also sought on why Crown land was excluded.

264. The Committee asks the Scottish Government to provide further information on the decision to exclude bona vacantia and Crown land from the definition of eligible land. The Committee further recommends that the Scottish Government reflect on this and the potential for amendment at stage 2 to include such land as eligible.

Queen’s and Lord Treasurers Remembrancer (QLTR)

265. The Community Land Advisory Service questioned the proposed new section 97C(3) of the 2003 Act, which states that land administered by the Queen’s and Lord Treasurers Remembrancer (QLTR) is an exception to the general rule.

266. The Committee would be interested to know why it is proposed that land which is under the Queen’s and Lord Treasurers Remembrancer power of disposal should be treated differently from any other land and asks the Scottish Government to provide further information on the decision to treat land which is under the power of the Queen’s and Lord Treasurers Remembrancer differently. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government...

Government reflect on this and, if appropriate, bring forward amendments at stage 2 to remove this power of exception.

Part 3A community bodies (section 97D)

267. The new section 97D outlines the requirements which must be met by a body to be eligible to purchase land under Part 3A of the 2003 Act.

268. Subsection (1) specifies that a Part 3A community body must be a company limited by guarantee. It also lists the requirements which must be included in the company’s articles of association. In terms of subsection (2) Ministers have discretion over the minimum number of members a Part 3A community body must have. Ministers must also be satisfied that the body’s main purpose is consistent with furthering the achievement of sustainable development.

269. Subsection (5)(a) sets out that the articles of association must define the community to which it relates by reference to a postcode unit (or units) and/or a type of area which Ministers set out in regulation. The community includes people who are resident in that postcode unit or in one of the postcode units or other areas set out by Ministers in regulation. In addition to being resident, members of the community must also be entitled to vote at local government elections in a polling district that encompasses that postcode unit or postcode units or the alternative areas set out by Ministers in regulations.

270. There are additional supplementary provisions to section 97D – a Part 3A community body cannot change its memorandum or articles of association without prior written consent from Ministers, while the land purchased under Part 3A of the 2003 Act remains in its ownership. Ministers would have the power to acquire land should the community body no longer be entitled to buy the land, should it continue to be considered to be wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected.

271. The Community Land Advisory Service states that—

“The types of body permitted to acquire a Part 3A right to buy should be the same as those permitted to acquire a Part 2 right to buy under Part 2 as proposed to be amended by the Bill. Accordingly this provision should be amended to permit SCIOs and other bodies prescribed by statutory instrument to be Part 3A community bodies”.

272. Both Scottish Land and Estates and the Historic Houses Association for Scotland stated that they were unclear (in terms of the proposed Section 97D) why the community body for this part of the Act effectively required to be a company limited by guarantee and suggested that there should be parity with the new provisions for “normal community right-to-buy”.

273. The Committee considers that there should be consistency in the Bill and in subsequent regulation with respect to the definition of an eligible community body for the purposes of all community right-to-buy provisions.

The Committee therefore recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments at stage 2 to address the current inconsistency.

Section 97E(1) of the 2003 Act

274. Some stakeholders, including the Community Land Advisory Service, suggested that this provision be amended to refer to constitutions as well as to memoranda and articles.

275. The Committee notes this apparent omission and recommends that the Scottish Government brings forward amendments at stage 2 to this provision to refer to constitutions as well as to memoranda and articles.

Register of community interests in abandoned or neglected land (section 97F)

276. The new section 97F of the 2003 Act provides for the creation of a Register of Community Interests in Abandoned or Neglected land, to be set up and maintained by the Registers of Scotland.

277. The Community Land Advisory Service suggested that such a register would be unnecessary, as in its view, the proposed Part 3A right to buy is absolute and not pre-emptive. When the Land Registration etc (Scotland) Act 2012 has been fully commenced, it argued, the Keeper of the Registers of Scotland will be empowered to unilaterally register any unregistered parcel and relevant information would be disclosed in routine conveyancing searches.\(^{144}\)

278. The Committee questions the necessity for, and the benefit of, the creation of a register of community interests in abandoned or neglected land and recommends that the Scottish Government re-consider the value of this provision and consider the requirement for amendment at stage 2.

Right to buy: application for consent – Section 97G

279. The new section 97G relates to the process of applying to exercise the right to buy land under Part 3A, and provides that this can—

- only be exercised by a Part 3A community body;
- only be exercised with Ministers’ consent following a written application by the community body; and
- be exercised on multiple holdings, providing that separate applications have been made for each holding.

280. An application must set out whom the owner of the land is and any creditor in a standard security with a right to sell the land or any part of it. The required form of the application and accompanying information will be specified in regulations.

281. A Part 3A community body must also list in the application why it believes that its proposed purchase is in the public interest, how it is compatible with furthering the achievement of sustainable development of land, and the reasons why it considers the land to be wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected. This application must also be sent to the land owner and any creditor. On the invitation of Ministers, owners and creditors would then have a 60 day period to provide written comments on the application. There is also a 60 day period for public notice and for receipt of the comments from the community body which is provided with all views received by the Minister.

282. In considering whether or not to give consent to the application, Ministers must have regard to all views received in relation to the application and must decline to consider an application that does not comply with the requirements of the new section 97G, is incomplete, or where Ministers are otherwise bound to reject it.

Identification of the owner
283. Many stakeholders expressed concerns in relation to the provision requiring community bodies to identify the landowner. Jon Hollingdale stated—

“As the 2003 act stands, the current community right-to-buy provides for communities to be able to put a registration on land without knowing who the owner is, although they have to demonstrate, and the Minister has to accept, that they have taken reasonable steps to find out who the owner is. If it is not possible to find out, a registration can still stand. At the very least, there ought to be a similar mechanism in the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. It strikes against the whole abandonment issue. If the land is abandoned, that suggests that we would not know who the owner was because they had run away.”

284. Concerns were also expressed by the Community Land Advisory Service and others in relation to the practical difficulties of tracing owners, as ownership records may not provide information on the identity and contact details of a current owner, making it difficult or impossible to trace or to make contact with them. The Community Land Advisory Service referred to their experience stating it would find it difficult to comply with the requirements of this provision. It also raised concerns that in a situation where the owner can be identified but may be an adult with incapacity or a lapsed trust with no surviving trustees capable of acting.

285. In oral evidence to the Committee, members of the Bill team discussed the absolute requirement to identify the owner and suggested that there was an alternative procedure whereby if the owner could not be found and the land were declared bona vacantia, the Queen’s and Lord Treasurer’s Remembrancer could be approached to purchase the land.

286. The Committee recognises that there can be very real practical difficulties in identifying land owners and anticipates that the Land Registration (Scotland) Act 2014 will, over time, have a positive effect on the availability and accessibility of information on ownership.

146 Written submission. Community Land Advisory Service.
287. However, the Committee remains unconvinced that the provision requiring community bodies to identify ownership, rather than a requiring community bodies to demonstrate they have taken all reasonable steps to identify ownership, is appropriate. The Committee considers that there ought to be a mechanism in this Bill, similar to the existing provisions in the Land Reform (Scotland) 2003 Act, providing for communities to be able to register an interest in land without knowing who the owner is. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government reconsider its position on this and bring forward amendments to that effect at stage 2.

288. In relation to the proposed section 97 G (10) some stakeholders considered that the information to be provided by the owner should include information about the effect on the owner’s funder and/or the existence of any leases or other contractual commitments which bind the owner in relation to the land and sought further clarity on this, particularly as such contracts can be rendered void by section 57 (5).

289. In its written submission, Brodies LLP proposed—

“In terms of Section 97G(11) Bill the community body is to receive copies of all views submitted to the Ministers. The landowner should also be entitled to see these views and make counter representations if necessary.”

290. The Committee considers that all parties should be treated fairly and in this regard recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward the necessary amendments at stage 2 to allow landowners sight of all views submitted and to ensure that the process allows the opportunity for Ministerial consideration of counter views.

Crichel Down rules
291. Where land is acquired by, or is under the threat of, compulsory purchase, a non-statutory arrangement known as the Crichel Down Rules provide that surplus land should be offered back to former owners and their successors. Some stakeholders considered that the equivalent to Crichel Down Rules should apply where land acquired under the amended 2003 Act is not used for the purpose for which it was acquired. It was suggested that the former owner or their successors should be entitled to first refusal if the land is no longer used by the community for the intended purpose. Others commented that the Bill was silent on this issue and suggested that it would be helpful to have some clarity on this aspect of the community right to buy process.

292. The question as to what happens to a community body asset (including liabilities and responsibilities) where the body ceases to exist or is unable to continue to function was raised by stakeholders, including the Scottish Property Federation. Stakeholders questioned whether this would fall to Scottish Ministers.

293. The Finance Committee also invited the RACCE Committee to seek clarification of how the expansion of community right-to-buy might interact with the Crichel Down Rules.\textsuperscript{152}

294. The Committee raised the question of the Crichel Down Rules with the Cabinet Secretary, who stated that—

“...it will depend on what is in the public interest. The rules do not preclude a community having the right to buy, but it would be considered on a case by case basis whether what the community proposes is in the public interest.”\textsuperscript{153}

295. The Committee welcomes the clarification from the Cabinet Secretary that, as the Crichel Down Rules are not statutory, they do not preclude a community having the right-to-buy. The Committee understands that these rules apply only to land bought during the Second World War; however, the Committee would welcome further detail from the Scottish Government on the application of the rules in relation to the land that they do and do not apply to.

296. The Committee also asks the Scottish Government to provide clarification on what it envisages in a situation where there is an approved application but the purpose for which the application was approved is not pursued. The Committee also asks the Scottish Government’s view of what would happen in a situation where the community body has bought the land but ceases to exist. If the Scottish Government considers that the previous owner should be offered first right of refusal to buy back the land then the Committee recommends that the Scottish Government reflects on the requirement for the introduction of relevant provisions within the Bill.

297. Many stakeholders such as the Community Woodlands Association and Community Land Scotland raised concerns in relation to the mapping requirements for community right-to-buy, which, in their view, are widely considered to be excessive. They suggested that there was a need to address streamlining the mapping process and aligning the eligibility criteria with those for Parts 2 and 3A of the amended Act.\textsuperscript{154 155}

298. John Randall suggested that there was a need to simplify the information requirements where land or a lease was to be acquired. Highland Council shared this view and highlighted that this issue was considered by the Land Reform Review Group. John Randall stated—

“there seems no logical or functional rationale for being required to provide the following details: a map and written description showing not only the boundary of the land or lease to be acquired, but also all sewers, pipes, lines, watercourses or other conduits, and fences, dykes, ditches or other boundaries. This goes far beyond what is required in other land or lease transactions and there seems no functional reason to require this information. It is particularly onerous when the area to be purchased extends to several thousand hectares. Yet similar detailed requirements are proposed in Section 48 of the Bill (Clause 7G(6)(d) and (f) for the new proposed Part 3A”.

299. He also had concerns in relation to the requirement for inclusion of all postcodes and OS 1km grid squares to be included in the land or lease area to be published, particularly where the area extended to several thousand acres and highlighted the possibilities for technical challenge due to inadvertent omissions. He stated that in his view—

“...in relation to the mapping requirements, the new Part 3A is modelled on the Part 3 of the 2003 Act, and this “goes far beyond what is required in other land or lease transactions, and there seems no functional reason to require this information…””

300. The Committee agrees with those stakeholders who consider that the mapping requirements for community right-to-buy are excessive and strongly believes that there is a need to streamline the mapping process, simplify the information requirements and align the eligibility criteria with those for Parts 2 and 3A of the amended Act. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments to this effect at stage 2.

Criteria for consent (section 97H)

301. The new section 97H sets out various criteria for consent. Ministers must be satisfied that applications meet the criteria. These are as follows—

- that the land a part 3A community body is proposing to buy is land which is eligible under the new section 97C of the 2003 Act;
- that the exercise of the right to buy by a Part 3A community body is in the public interest and that its plans for the land are compatible with furthering the achievement of sustainable development of the land;
- that, if continuing ownership of the eligible land by the current owner would be inconsistent with furthering the achievement of sustainable development of the land;
- that the owner of the land is not prevented from selling the land or Is not under an obligation to sell the land to someone other than the Part 3A community body (Other than an obligation which is suspended by the regulations which are to be made by Ministers under the new section 97N(3));

156 Written submission. John Randall.
that a Part 3A community body meets the requirements in section 97D;

that a significant number of the members of the community which the Part 3A community body represents have a connection with the land or the land is sufficiently near to land to which those members of the community have a connection; that the community which the Part 3A community body represents has approved the proposal to exercise the right to buy under Part 3A; and that the Part 3A community body has tried and failed to buy the land, other than by making an application under Part 3A.

Ownership inconsistent with the achievement of sustainable development

302. Some stakeholders raised concerns in relation to the requirement under section 97H; that Ministers must not consent to an application to buy by a community body unless they are satisfied “that, if the owner of the land were to remain as its owner, that ownership would be inconsistent with furthering the achievement of sustainable development in relation to the land”. Many considered that it would be difficult to prove this “as it requires proof of a negative as distinct from proof of a possibility” and that it goes much further than would be required in order to achieve a “fair balance” required by ECHR A1P1.

303. In its written submission, Community Land Scotland stated that this “appears a very high and most probably impossible hurdle to overcome and unnecessary to meet ECHR requirements”. It was of the view that the tests under the provisions that Ministers have to satisfy themselves that the land is eligible, that is that purchase by the community body is in the public interest and would be consistent with the achievement of sustainable development in relation to the land, were sufficient. Community Land Scotland highlighted that there was no equivalent of this requirement in Part 3 of the 2003 Act and in their view this further requirement was unnecessary.\(^\text{157}\) This view was echoed by the Community Woodland Association\(^\text{158}\). In oral evidence, Peter Peacock referred to this as “a killer clause.”\(^\text{159}\)

304. Evidence to the Committee suggested that, given that Ministers already have to satisfy themselves that the land is eligible land (i.e. abandoned or neglected) and that purchase by the community body is both in the public interest and compatible with furthering the achievement of sustainable development in relation to the land, this further test is either an unnecessary duplication or sets impossibly high hurdles. Stakeholders suggested that it would be difficult to see how the above requirement could ever be met. Stakeholders considered it implies that even if a community were able to show that the land was mainly neglected for the purpose of its sustainable development, and this was not in the public interest, if that owner could show that their continuing ownership was not of itself

“inconsistent” with some level of sustainable development, the community’s application would require to be refused.

305. When questioned on the double test, the Cabinet Secretary stated he considered the approach of the double test to be sensible and continued to say—

“on the second part of the test – whether continuing ownership under the current arrangements from the existing owner will further sustainable development – I offer the reassurance that ministers will want evidence and proof from the existing owner...They will want evidence that things are happening, investments are being made, a plan is in the pipeline and people have been commissioned to bring the land out of neglect or abandonment.”

306. Notwithstanding the points made by the Cabinet Secretary, the Committee is concerned that the Bill as currently drafted appears to suggest that the onus will be on the applicant, rather than on the owner, to show that the current ownership would be inconsistent with sustainable development.

307. The Committee considers that this additional provision is unnecessary because the community would have to demonstrate, in its application, that the purchase furthered the achievement of sustainable development. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments at stage 2 to delete the provision that currently states that, should the ownership of the land to remain with its current owner, that ownership would be inconsistent with furthering the achievement of sustainable development in relation to the land.

Community demonstration of trying and failing to purchase land

308. Some stakeholders considered that 97H(j) might benefit from clarification in guidance as to the circumstances under which it would be considered that a community had tried and failed to buy the land, for example to have made an offer.

309. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government provide guidance for communities setting out the basis of the required evidence to prove that a community had tried and failed to purchase the land.

310. Concerns were also raised in relation to the potential for landowners who, if minded to obstruct the process, could obfuscate ownership by selling or giving options on some or all of the land or by carrying out the bare minimum of management activity required to counter the abandoned or neglected criterion. This issue has been dealt with in paragraphs 176-180.

Ballot to indicate approval for the purposes of section 97H (section 97J)

311. The new section 97J sets out the requirements for a ballot to establish that a right to buy application by a Part 3A community body has the support of its

A proposal to exercise a community right to buy will be deemed to have been approved by the relevant community if—

- the ballot takes place within the six-month period immediately preceding the date of the right to buy application;
- at least half of the community voted in the ballot or, where fewer than half of the members of the community voted, the proportion is sufficient to justify the community body proceeding to purchase the land; and
- the majority of the votes cast were in favour of making the application.

Further requirements are also set out, including that a Part 3 community body is responsible for the expense of conducting the ballot and that it must be conducted as set out by Ministers in regulations. These regulations should include calculating and publishing the number of eligible voters, turnout, and the number of votes cast for and against the proposition. Thereafter, the Part 3A community body has 21 days in which to notify Ministers of the result (in some circumstances this can be included with the application). Should the ballot not be conducted in accordance with regulations, the Part 3A community body’s right-to-buy is extinguished.

Stakeholders raised concerns with regard to the timing of the valuation in relation to the ballot, specifically that under the current 2003 Act the community body is aware of the valuation at the time at which the ballot takes place. Stakeholders were concerned that, under the proposed provisions, at the time of the ballot communities will not have this information and therefore will not have complete information on the option on which they are voting and the valuation may subsequently turn out to be significantly higher than had been anticipated.

The Committee recognises that it may be helpful for communities to have information on the valuation at the time of the ballot and that such information may inform their views. The Committee recommends the Scottish Government give further consideration to this prior to stage 2 and consider the possible benefit of amendments to that effect.

Under the provisions of Part 3 of the 2003 Act, the Scottish Government is responsible for the expense of conducting the ballot. The new provisions propose to make the community body responsible for that cost. There was concern amongst stakeholders that this could cause issues for many communities, particularly for those more disadvantaged communities, which, in the absence of adequate financial support, might find it difficult to source the necessary funds to conduct the ballot.

The Community Land Advisory Service suggested that this provision should be modified in the same way as the equivalent provision in Part 2, in order to provide that the ballot is to be conducted by an independent balloter appointed and paid for by Ministers.\textsuperscript{163}

162 Written submission. Anonymous.

317. The Committee is concerned that communities should have equivalent access to the right-to-buy provisions of part 2 and part 3 and agrees with the view of stakeholders who suggested that the independent balloter should be appointed and paid for by Scottish Ministers. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments to this effect at stage 2.

318. Fife Community Partnership commented on the 50% threshold, stating—

“Groups wishing to undertake the Community Right-to-Buy only have access to the edited register whereby up to 30% of the electorate may not be included. This makes the initial 50% threshold difficult to achieve.”\textsuperscript{164}

319. The Committee understands the concerns of stakeholders with respect to the edited register and the initial 50% threshold, however, the Committee considers that this needs to be balanced against the provision which could deprive an owner of their asset. Given the significance of this provision, the Committee considers that the proposed threshold is appropriate. However, the Committee recommends that the Scottish Government keeps this under review.

Detailed procedural matters (Sections 97K – R)

320. The new sections 97K – R relate to detailed procedural matters. The Committee only comments on those sections where it has a view.

321. The new section 97K provides for the situation where more than one Part 3A community body submits an application seeking to buy the same land. Where this occurs, Ministers will decide which application should be allowed to proceed, once they have considered all views and responses related to each application.

322. The Committee considers that Ministers should have the discretion to determine which application should proceed and recommends that the criteria to be considered in coming to a decision should be set out in regulations.

323. Section 97L enables Ministers to impose conditions on the consent to an application.

324. The National Trust for Scotland considered that this section should be explicit in stating that the conditions set could include the application of Conservation

\textsuperscript{164} Written submission. Fife Community Safety Partnership.
Agreements or Conservation Burdens with a provision relating to conservation agreements similar to those in the Crofters (Scotland) Act 1993 (p.5). 165

325. The Committee understands the concerns of the National Trust for Scotland. However, the Committee is of the view that there could be many and varied conditions that could apply to each consented application and that each application and the relevant conditions should be considered on a case by case basis. In that regard, the Committee is not persuaded of the need to specify the range of possible conditions on the face of the Bill or by way of a definitive list in subsequent regulation and considers that this is rightly a matter for Ministerial discretion.

326. This section gives Ministers powers to make regulations prohibiting certain persons from transferring or otherwise dealing with the land in respect of which an application under section 97G has been made. It also provides that Ministers may make regulations to suspend rights over land in respect of which a Part 3A application has been made.

327. The Committee would welcome further information from the Scottish Government on the circumstances under which Ministers envisage suspending rights over land in respect of which a Part 3A application had been made.

Completion of purchase (Section 97Q)

328. The new section 97Q of the 2003 Act deals with conveyancing practicalities relevant to the transfer of land following Ministers giving consent to a Part 3A community body to buy land.

329. The Law Society of Scotland noted that, in its view, this provides an opportunity for Ministers to impose statutory burdens and sought clarity as to what was envisaged. For example, what types of burdens and claw-back provisions should be put in place should the plans of the community body not be implemented? 166 Similarly, the Scottish Property Federation questioned what would happen were a community body to fail to deliver the proposed benefit within a reasonable period of time. 167

330. The Committee would welcome further information from the Scottish Government on what is envisaged in terms of burdens and claw-back provisions should the plans of a community body not be implemented. The Committee would also welcome further information on whether the Scottish Government has considered applying a time requirement for implementation of community bodies’ plans and how this would work in practice.

Assessment of the value of land (Section 97S)

165 Written submission. National Trust for Scotland.
166 Written submission. Law Society of Scotland.
167 Written submission. Scottish Property Federation.
331. The new section 97S sets out the procedure for valuation of the land that a Part 3A community body wishes to buy. Ministers must, within seven days, appoint and pay for a qualified, independent, knowledgeable and experienced valuer, who will assess the market value of the land at that point, as well as take into account the views of the Part 3A community body and owner. This must be done within eight weeks of being appointed (unless Ministers specify otherwise).

332. However, unlike the new amendments to section 60 of the 2003 Act, where both the owner and the community body have rights to make comments on the other party’s representations, there appears to be no such right in this case.

333. The Committee received a written submission highlighting that there may be situations in which the valuation has been agreed between the parties but the valuer may not arrive at the same valuation. The submission suggests that this may be an issue should the figure agreed be higher than the valuer’s assessment and public money is being used to finance the acquisition.

334. The Committee understands that market value is defined as the sum of the open market value if the sale were between a willing seller and willing buyer, compensation for any depreciation in the value of other land, and interests belonging to the seller as a result of the forced sale. The Committee heard that, in deciding the value of the land, the valuer may take account of the known existence of other potential purchasers with a special interest in the property.

335. The Big Lottery Fund suggested that it would be useful for the community body to have the valuation early, as it could provide the basis for a negotiated settlement with the owner. It would also give an early indication of the amount of funding needed and provide an opportunity for the community body to make early contact with potential funders to gauge the likelihood of funding being made available.

336. The Committee considers that the valuation procedure should ensure that both parties are treated fairly by giving each the opportunity to comment on issues raised in the other’s representations and draw attention to anything inaccurate or potentially misleading. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments at stage 2 to provide both the owner and the community body the right to comment on the valuation and other party’s representations.

337. The Committee agrees with the Big Lottery Fund’s suggestion that it would be useful, for a number of reasons, for the community body to have the valuation early and recommends that the Scottish Government reflect on this and the merit of amending the Bill to this effect at stage 2.

Compensation and grants towards Part 3A community bodies’ liabilities to pay compensation (Sections 97T and 97U)
338. The new sections 97T and 97U are consequential to the main policy in section 97S and relate to further regulations setting out amounts of compensation payable, who is liable, and how this may be claimed. These sections also provide that Ministers may, in certain restricted circumstances, pay a grant to a Part 3A community body to assist it in meeting the compensation it is required to pay. Ministers are, however, not bound to pay a grant even when all the circumstances specified arise.

339. The Development Trusts Association Scotland raised concerns about this section, which provides owners with a right of compensation from the community body stating that this should be limited to situations where the application is approved.\textsuperscript{176}

340. The Community Land Advisory Service raised a question in the context of the Part 3 right-to-buy—

"...what is to happen where the absolute right-to-buy causes the owner a capital gains tax or corporation tax liability on the price which could have been avoided or reduced had the owner had control over the timing of the sale. I certainly do not think that the community should bear this cost, but equally do not think the owner is being properly compensated for the deprivation if they are left in this position."\textsuperscript{171}

341. The Committee concurs with the view of the Development Trusts Association Scotland that the right of compensation should be limited to situations where the application is approved, and recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments at stage 2 to clarify the provision in this respect.

342. The Committee shares the concerns of the Community Land Advisory Service in relation to owners’ tax liabilities and the timing of the sale and agrees that the community should not bear this cost. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government reflect on this and clarify the appropriate source of compensation for this deprivation by way of amendment at stage 2.

Appeals (Sections 97V, 97W, 97X, 97Y, 97Z)

343. The new sections 97V, 97W and 97X set out the rights of appeal to the sheriff and the Lands Tribunal, and the right of reference to the Lands Tribunal in relation to decisions made by Ministers, valuations and questions relating to Part 3A applications.

344. Section 97V provides that the landowner, a member of the community to which a Part 3A community body relates and a creditor in a standard security may appeal against the Ministers’ decision to consent to the application. Subsection (2) allows the Part 3A community body to appeal against a decision to refuse an application and, where there is more than one community body wishing to purchase the land, subsection (3) provides that Ministers’ decision on which body’s application will proceed is final and cannot be appealed.

345. Section 97W sets out the rights of appeal to the Lands Tribunal in connection with the valuation under the new section 97S. The new section 97X sets out rights of appeal to the Lands Tribunal on a question relating to a Part 3A application. The new Section 97Y provides that parties to a Part 3A application are not prevented from settling or agreeing on a matter which is subject to an appeal under sections 97V or 97W between them. The new section 97Z clarifies some matters of interpretation.

346. The Committee has no specific comment to make in relation to appeals. However, the Committee considers that a process of mediation should have been built into the Bill to ensure that effective discussion between a landowner and a community is facilitated. The Committee considers that Ministers should have the powers to facilitate negotiation, and where necessary appoint, and provide financial resources to support, a mediator. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government give consideration to an appropriate mediation process and include provision for this within the Bill by way of bringing forward amendments at stage 2.

Other issues considered by the Committee

Community use of land
347. The Community Land Advisory Service commented on communities which may have more of an interest in securing the use of land rather than securing ownership at a future date. The Royal Town Planning Institute Scotland suggested that the Bill should consider not only the right-to-buy, but the right to manage as part of the community rights, and provide detail on how this might be facilitated.

348. Brodies LLP suggested that communities could be given the chance to lease property in the first instance to establish whether they could make the property work to pass the test of sustainable development.

349. The Committee was interested to hear the views of stakeholders in relation to land use and the right to manage land and recommends that the Scottish Government consider the scope to include provisions in relation to management rights in this Bill by way of amendment at stage 2 and/or in the forthcoming land reform legislation.

Best value and best public benefit
350. The Committee heard oral evidence that suggested that some local authorities’ interpretation of “best value” (under the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003) might hinder a number of aspects of the proposed legislation.

172 Written submission. Community Land Advisory Service.
173 Written submission. Royal Town Planning Institute.
174 Written submission. Brodies LLP.
351. John Mundell, Chief Executive of Inverclyde Council, stated—

“...If we are disposing of assets, we are always required to obtain best value, and that normally means market value, whether we use the district valuer or another mechanism to value assets. That is a key issue, but it is not one that the Bill addresses.” 176

352. The Royal Town Planning Institute Scotland suggested that there was a need for clarity in the definition of ‘best value’ and ‘best public benefit’ in terms of the disposal of public land. It stated that this should not only be about financial value, but should also take into consideration social, community and environmental aspects, particularly in terms of the transfer of land to community or voluntary organisations. 177

353. Wendy Reid, of the Development Trusts Association Scotland, stated—

“There is a reason why there has been less movement of other public sector assets into community ownership. According to the Scottish public finance manual, those other public sector bodies have to get the best financial return from assets, whereas local authorities have a bit of dispensation, in that they can dispose of assets at less than market value under the Disposal of Land by Local Authorities (Scotland) Regulations 2010. Communities are very interested in other assets, but up until now, it has been easier to negotiate transfers of local authority assets, because of that flexibility for local authorities to dispose of land at less than best consideration. It would be interesting to see whether the Scottish public finance manual will be reviewed to allow other public sector bodies the same flexibility.” 178

354. The Committee was concerned to hear in oral evidence that Glasgow City Council had bonded some of its land to Barclays Bank which may mean that it would be difficult to release that land for communities. The Committee was concerned that the same situation might exist in other local authority areas.

355. The Committee explored the issue of best value with the Cabinet Secretary and questioned whether some local authorities might consider the best value of the land they hold to be the financial value that they can obtain rather than value to the community being the number one priority. The Committee notes that if that were to be the case it could be a potential hindrance to some communities that might wish to access local authority land or the land of other public bodies. The Cabinet Secretary stated that as local authorities had the power to dispose of land at lower than market value and could treat the public interest as having a value, the issue should not be an obstacle. The Committee subsequently agreed to write to all local authorities in Scotland to ask for confirmation of their policy and practice in relation to the holding and disposal of their land-holdings. The Committee awaits receipt of all the responses from the local authorities in relation to their policy and practice in relation to the holding and disposal of their land holdings and their approach to best value.179 Responses received to date180 are available on the Committee’s website. The Committee will review the responses received and consider what further action it wishes to take.

356. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government give consideration to what more can be done to address the issue of best value, best public benefit and, the approach taken by local authorities and other public sector bodies. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government identify further measures to address this issue, through a review of the public finance manual, by the inclusion of related provisions within the proposed land reform bill and by the provision of further guidance to local authorities in relation to their assets, their considerations of best value, and supporting communities to acquire land.

357. The Committee also recommends that the Scottish Government give consideration to an appropriate mechanism, such as the proposed land commission, to adjudicate in cases where there are suggestions that local authorities may be seeking to frustrate local communities. The Committee asks the Cabinet Secretary to reflect on this issue and consider what further amendments could be brought forward at stage 2 to address the issue of best value, best public benefit and the practical impact of the approach taken by local authorities and other public sector bodies.

Provision of support to communities

358. The Committee heard evidence about the importance of providing ongoing support to communities to enable them to take full advantage of the community right to buy provisions. Many stakeholders expressed concerns in relation to those communities most likely to benefit from the provisions (the most affluent) and suggested that more disadvantaged or more marginalised communities could be left behind without investment (including financial support; support to strengthen skills and confidence; knowledge and training; and access to professional advice and support). Many stressed the need for capacity building. The Committee also heard from Susan Carr of the Community Alliance Trust who stated—

359. The Plunkett Foundation echoed the views of many when it stated—

180 Correspondence from local authorities regarding best value. Available at: http://www.scottish.parliament.uk/parliamentarybusiness/CurrentCommittees/82153.aspx.

“It is critical that communities are properly supported to take advantage of opportunities the Bill presents… Outwith this area (the highlands and islands), in lowland and southern rural Scotland, the support is much more fragmented, and communities face a patchy landscape of advice and signposting. Marginalised and disadvantaged communities will need a lot more support in capacity building and confidence raising to realise the potential opportunities.”

360. The Children’s Wood referred to its experience and suggested that mechanisms should be established to monitor and report on levels of community engagement and report on any difficulties.

361. The Committee understands that the broader issues in relation to empowering communities and capacity building are being considered by the LGR Committee and, on that basis, has sought to limit comment to the difficulties faced by communities and the need for support in relation to the provisions in Part 4 of the Bill.

362. The Committee raised concerns about the difficulties communities encounter when faced with issues such as state aid rules, public finance regulations and a range of other matters with the Cabinet Secretary and sought further information on what steps the Scottish Government is taking to put the necessary support in place.

363. The Cabinet Secretary responded by stating—

“... your point about equipping communities with more information about and understanding of the issues is a good one. We have to give much more thought to that. The Land Reform Review Group recommended that we set up a community land agency, and we responded by saying that we will set up a unit in Government, which will look at the issues and work with communities, giving much better advice and operating as a huge support mechanism that facilitates community buyouts. An important function of that new unit will be to explain state aid and the pathway....and I will ensure that it does that.”

364. The Committee questioned the Cabinet Secretary on HIE’s social and land remit and whether the Scottish Government had plans to extend the remit of Scottish Enterprise. The Cabinet Secretary responded by stating that all agencies, including Scottish Enterprise and HIE, must play a role in taking the agenda forward. The Cabinet Secretary also suggested that the Scottish Government should give further thought as to how the social remit should be taken forward outwith the Highlands and Islands.

183 Written submission. The Children’s Wood.
365. The Committee recognises the difficulties faced by communities in seeking to exercise their right-to-buy and is keen to ensure that appropriate support and funding is available to all communities across Scotland to facilitate meeting their aspirations. The Committee agrees that public sector bodies have an important role in that regard.

366. The Committee is familiar with the role of Highlands and Islands Enterprise in supporting communities to acquire land to date and requests further information on the role that the Scottish Government envisages for Highlands and Islands Enterprise and for Scottish Enterprise in taking the land reform agenda forward. The Committee also asks for the Scottish Government's view on how best to take forward the social remit outwith the Highlands and Islands.

367. The Committee welcomes the Scottish Government’s commitment to establish a community land unit to provide support and advice to communities. The Committee seeks information on how the Scottish Government anticipates the new community land unit will utilise the expertise and interact with the existing unit within Highlands and Islands Enterprise.

368. The Committee also requests that further information be provided on the remit and resourcing of the unit; the timescale for its establishment; the location of the unit; the ways in which the unit will work with, and practically support, communities at a local level; and how the work of the unit will be monitored and evaluated.

369. The Committee welcomes confirmation that fresh guidance which takes a more relaxed view of state aid issues has been issued and recommends that the Scottish Government actively promote this guidance to local authorities across Scotland.

Relationship between applications under Part 4 and the Part 5 asset transfer provisions

370. The Community Woodland Association stated that the interaction of Part 3 of the 2003 Act and the asset transfer provision contained in Part 5 of the Bill require to be addressed. Specifically, it questioned whether communities, having failed with an asset transfer request, can then attempt a Part 3A acquisition and, if so, sought clarification as to what the decision-making process would be in cases where Scottish Ministers are the landowner.\(^{186}\)

371. Having considered the Bill, it does not appear to the Committee that there is any restriction on communities seeking to use the provisions within Part 3 and Part 3A of the 2003 Act, and the part 5 provisions of the Bill; however, the Committee would welcome clarification from the Scottish Government that this is indeed the case. The Committee would also welcome further information from the Scottish Government on the decision-making process where Scottish Ministers or Scottish Government agencies are the landowner.

ISSUES NOT INCLUDED IN THE BILL

Crofting Community Right to Buy (Part 3)

372. Many stakeholders expressed concern in relation to the apparent omission in the Bill of any measures amending Part 3 of the 2003 Act. They stated that they welcomed the correspondence from the Scottish Government responding to the concerns of the LGR Committee and providing notification of its intention to use the Bill to simplify Part 3 of the 2003 Act.

373. The Committee questioned stakeholders on the consultation on the crofting community right-to-buy. Simon Fraser, of Anderson MacArthur, stated—

“The consultation on the crofting community right-to-buy was fine. The suggested changes to part 3 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 have come along pretty late in the day, and it will be essential to ensure that the enhanced community right-to-buy—which, in a way, mirrors the current crofting community right-to-buy—is brought into line with whatever is done to the crofting community right-to-buy as a consequence of the new measures.”187

374. The Committee considers that it would have been preferable had consultation on the crofting community right-to-buy been undertaken alongside consultation on the existing part 4 provisions and that the amendments to the crofting community right-to-buy had been included in the Bill as introduced, rather than at stage 2. The Committee considers that the introduction of significant new provisions by way of amendments at stage 2 is undesirable in terms of effective parliamentary scrutiny, as the time available at stage 2 to consider new evidence is limited. The Committee would welcome the opportunity of early sight of the proposed Scottish Government draft amendments.

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener: Under agenda item 5, the committee will take evidence on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill from the bill team. We welcome Dave Thomson, who is head of the land reform policy team, Ian Turner, who is community empowerment team leader, and Rachel Rayner, who is a Scottish Government lawyer. I refer members to the relevant papers.

I will kick off with a question. Land reform is a specific policy area, many aspects of which sit outside the public sector reform agenda, so is the bill team satisfied that the dialogue and consultation with stakeholders on community right to buy and crofting community right to buy has been timely, sufficient and proportionate?

Dave Thomson (Scottish Government): I think that Ian Turner would be best placed to comment on the consultation process, having been involved with the bill team as a whole.

Ian Turner (Scottish Government): As regards consultation on the bill and community right to buy as it was originally set out, an exploratory consultation was held in 2012. A paper was produced and the minister and officials went on a series of visits, conferences and road shows, which were done in collaboration with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities and involved a range of people and organisations. The consultation was not just on the community right to buy—it was on community empowerment as a whole, in which the community right to buy has been timely, sufficient and proportionate?

Dave Thomson (Scottish Government): I think that Ian Turner would be best placed to comment on the consultation process, having been involved with the bill team as a whole.

Ian Turner (Scottish Government): As regards consultation on the bill and community right to buy as it was originally set out, an exploratory consultation was held in 2012. A paper was produced and the minister and officials went on a series of visits, conferences and road shows, which were done in collaboration with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities and involved a range of people and organisations. The consultation was not just on the community right to buy—it was on community empowerment as a whole, in which the community right to buy was included. We received 447 responses and the analysis was published in 2013.

Following that, a second more specific consultation was done in late 2013 on the topics for inclusion in the bill. Those included improvements to the community right to buy process, extension of the right to all Scotland and the potential to include provisions on abandoned or neglected land. Again, a series of meetings and events were held throughout that consultation, and 424 responses were received overall. An independent analysis was commissioned and was published on 12 June 2014. The majority of the responses in that consultation were in favour of the community right to buy elements being taken forward in legislation. We got to the introduction of the bill at that stage.

We gave evidence to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee in September and we provided further details to the clerk in a letter to that committee following our evidence session. I am not sure whether this committee has seen that letter; I am more than happy to provide a copy of it, as well, if you would like more details.

The Convener: That would be very helpful. The draft bill did not contain any sections on the community right to buy, which we are discussing in respect of part 4 now.

Ian Turner: The consultation included questions on the community right to buy. The draft bill did not have that element.

The Convener: When you said that a majority were in favour, what size was the majority and what sort of detail is there?

Ian Turner: Ninety-three per cent of responses were in favour of extending the community right to buy to all Scotland and 83 per cent agreed that there should be a right to acquire land without a willing seller. There was a set of questions about improvements. The majority were in favour of all the improvements to the bill.

The Convener: Was it a large majority?

Ian Turner: The majority varied, depending on the question, but there was a large majority for most of them.

The Convener: In that case, because it sits more generally in the land reform agenda, why are the part 4 provisions not being included in land reform legislation?

Dave Thomson: In the initial phase, there was a commitment to include the changes in the then proposed community empowerment bill. The changes were included because there is a very clear connection between community empowerment and the right to buy. Various studies have provided examples of where it works. It was included in the bill largely because, over the 10 years of using what were parts 3 and 2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003, various areas that need improvement had been highlighted and it was felt that it would be better to take action to improve those now, while we have this chance, than to wait until some potential future chance arrived. The community right to buy fits in very nicely with community empowerment as a whole, as a theme.

The Convener: Okay. That is fine for a start.

Alex Fergusson: I have a wee supplementary on one specific aspect that Mr Turner mentioned: the percentage of respondents who said that they approved of the community right to buy without a willing seller. Did that refer to the terms and conditions that are detailed in the bill, or was it just a general statement?
Ian Turner: It was a general statement in response to a question rather than to specific provisions.

Alex Fergusson: Right. So because there was no detail—

Ian Turner: There was no draft bill at that point, so the answer was just in those terms.

Alex Fergusson: The respondents were not aware of the provisions.

Ian Turner: No.

Alex Fergusson: That question was answered not in relation to the bill, but purely as a general question.

Ian Turner: Yes, that is correct.

Alex Fergusson: I just wanted that to be clarified.

Our job is to scrutinise part 4 of the bill effectively. Last June, the convener of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee wrote to the minister in fairly critical terms about the policy memorandum, stating that it was “little more than a superficial overview.”

Some more detail has since been provided.

On part 4, the policy memorandum contains only three pages in which a large amount of detail is précised in just seven bullet points. Do you feel that enough information has now been provided to explain fully the bill’s purpose and intentions in order to allow us properly to scrutinise part 4?

Dave Thomson: The short answer is yes.

Alex Fergusson: I thought that you might say that.

Dave Thomson: Given the additional information that has come through the Finance Committee, the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee and the Local Government and Regeneration Committee, and through continued engagement with stakeholders, we have expanded on what was originally in the policy memorandum to allow this committee to undertake a high level of scrutiny.

Alex Fergusson: How do you strike a balance between encouraging public dialogue and participation—which has been a buzzword lately—by making the information simple enough for people to engage with, and providing enough detail to make the intentions clear?

Dave Thomson: Along with the policy memorandum, the bill team produced an easy-read guide.

Ian Turner: We produced an easy-read guide that works alongside the policy memorandum and covers all parts of the bill. It has been broadly welcomed by stakeholders as representing, alongside the accompanying documents, an easy way into the bill.

Jim Hume: The financial memorandum states that “there is a large degree of uncertainty on the level of costs”.

What is anticipated as the largest potential cost area for communities and landowners? Why does the financial memorandum not provide a range of potential costs in different areas?

Dave Thomson: The overall gist is that the bill as a whole will introduce a much wider range of options for communities. As Derek Mackay told the Finance Committee, the fact that there is such a wide range—the options are not endless, but they are numerous—makes it very hard to say that there will be X instances of one type of community action and Y instances of another type.

On the specific right-to-buy element, we have included an estimate for the additional number of cases that we think will come through. It is only an estimate—it suggests that there will be five to 10 cases a year. The costs of those cases will obviously vary depending on what the community is wishing to purchase. We have based the costs for that particular part of the bill on the previous year’s experience of cases coming through. For example, there is a range of costs for a ballot of between £1,000 and £5,000, but the actual cost would vary depending on how many people were balloted.

Through adding up all the elements, which are all just ranges, it is hard to put a cost on the provisions. Ian Turner may be able to go into more detail on the process for the bill as a whole.

Ian Turner: That is right. Part 4 contains a demand-driven element, much like the participation requests in part 3 and the asset transfer element in part 5. There is a right for communities, but it depends on what they want to do and how they want to proceed, and which assets they want to acquire in that way.

Local circumstances will dictate how far the legislation will be used. The extension into the urban arena will no doubt lead to a rise in the number of right-to-buy cases, but we do not know what the rise might be, or what the common features might be with regard to asset transfer, which involves acquiring public assets in that way.

The financial memorandum tries to put a unit cost on the various elements, and those costs will apply in each case, but we will not know an overall cost because of the demand-driven elements.
Jim Hume: Obviously, we are always concerned about the unintended consequences of any legislation. What funding schemes are available to help communities with that work? Do you think that an increase in applications may have the unintended consequence of eating into another budget, if there is one?

Dave Thomson: There are a number of funding openings for community bodies through the likes of Highlands and Islands Enterprise, Community Land Scotland and the Scottish land fund. A commitment to extend the land fund was made at the Community Land Scotland conference this year. We are actively looking at how and to what extent that might be done. Obviously, the community right to buy’s move into the urban situation brings various funding streams that were not available through the community right to buy’s being rural only. There are various options out there, so we are ensuring that, as we actively monitor demand and the types of requests that are coming through, we tailor the funding to suit them.

It is not just about funding; there is also support for and advice to communities to ensure that they take the right options in the first place. It is not necessarily about ownership; other options will be available through the bill. Support and funding for them are actively being looked at, and they will continue to be monitored.

Jim Hume: Okay.

I want to consider the costs for public bodies. Obviously, there will be some resource issues for them. Do you have a good estimate of what potential costs there could be for public bodies? What support might there be if demand exceeds expectations?

Dave Thomson: That issue was raised through the Finance Committee, as well. We do not have clear estimates because we do not know what demand will be or what types of action communities will take. For the same reason, we cannot estimate what additional resource will be required from local authorities. Ian Turner will correct me if I am wrong, but they could not estimate that in their submissions, either, if I remember rightly.

Ian Turner: No. The local authorities generally could not provide individual figures, which was part of the difficulty in costing the bill as a whole. COSLA has said that individual elements of the bill will not be overly onerous for local authorities.

Jim Hume: Section 72 says that local authorities “must take reasonable steps to ensure that the number of persons entered in the list” for allotments is provided for. Have there been any thoughts on going a little bit further and putting a limit on the time that local authorities have in which to provide an allotment? I believe that, currently, it can take up to three years to get an allotment and that the Scottish Allotments and Gardens Society is interested in making it a duty that the maximum wait be three years.

Dave Thomson: I am afraid that the allotments part of the bill is not particularly my strong point. Ian Turner may be able to give some detail on that.

The Convener: To be fair, I say that it is the Local Government and Regeneration Committee that is looking at that.

Ian Turner: Yes. Allotments are in part 7 of the bill. We will get back to you properly in writing to ensure that we get the answer right.

The Convener: Okay. Thank you. We will move on to the delegated powers memorandum.

Cara Hilton: Good morning. The Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee has raised concerns that proposed new section 97C(3)(a) of the 2003 act, which is on eligible abandoned or neglected land, is very vague in respect of how the power will be used. It also said that the Government’s explanation was “inadequate in light of the significance of this power and what it appears to permit.”

I would be interested to hear more about what the thinking behind that power is and, in particular, examples that demonstrate how the power might be used in practice and how ministers intend to use it.

Dave Thomson: The range of powers in that proposed new section is quite wide. We are still actively discussing them with stakeholders to ensure that we cover all the nuances. I am sure that everybody can come up with ideas on what should or should not be included at certain points; views will differ and more will emerge as we go on. At the moment, we are ensuring that we can cover such areas as much as possible.

Rachel Rayner is better placed than I am to comment on what specific powers cover in a legal sense.

Rachel Rayner (Scottish Government): Proposed new section 97C(3)(a), which the bill will insert into the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003, states that land on which there is a building that is someone’s home is not eligible land, and there is a power to make exceptions to that. Whether there is a need for that is a question that is being actively considered; it is the power about which there was most concern.
Other powers concerning eligible land will be set out in regulations pertaining to land that is someone’s home. That could include private gardens or outbuildings, and we have some examples of how we intend to use that power, but whether it is still appropriate to take the power in section 97C(3)(a) is still under active consideration.

The Convener: When will we get more detail about that? I sense that you are saying that we might well get more detail, since the matter is under discussion.

Rachel Rayner: The Government needs to respond to the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee’s report at the beginning of December.

The Convener: We will bear that in mind.

Claudia Beamish: Ian Turner has already touched briefly on the nature of the land in which an interest may be registered. At present, as I understand it, the right-to-buy provisions in part 2 of the 2003 act apply only to community bodies that represent rural areas that have a population of less than 10,000. Section 27 of the bill will amend the definition of registrable land and the power of Scottish ministers to define excluded land, which has been mentioned in relation to housing, but there may be other categories as well, so the community right to buy would now apply across Scotland.

I would like to explore further with the bill team how community confidence, cohesion and sustainability will be affected by extending the community right to buy, and what evidence demonstrates that. Although the 2013 consultation demonstrated widespread support, as has been highlighted, for extension of the community right to buy, what evidence is there that the new right to buy will be used? That is a neutral question.

Dave Thomson: I will hand over to Ian Turner to comment on what emerged during the consultation process. In general, submissions on the bill that have been sent to the Government or through the likes of the land reform review group give us the overwhelming feeling that the power is exactly the kind of thing that communities would like in order to—to use a buzzword—empower themselves. Essentially, it will give them the right to decide what they want to do with their future and the means to effect that. Ian Turner will be able to comment more specifically on what was found during the consultation.

Ian Turner: It is a difficult question to answer with evidence, because it depends on what communities themselves want to do with the power. Community empowerment as a whole is about devolving as much power as possible to communities so that they can take the decisions that they want to take. However they want to do it, we want to ensure that it is for them, and not for authorities or other people, to set their agenda. In general, the community right to buy in the 2003 act has been seen as a success for rural Scotland, so it could also be a success for the rest of Scotland. During the consultation and discussion with stakeholders, it felt as if people see it very much in that way. As for actual evidence of whether that will happen, we will see that in practice only when the legislation is in use.

Claudia Beamish: I have two brief supplementary questions. First, are there any practical problems with extending the community right to buy to urban areas? For example, how will ministers differentiate between conflicting applications for the same piece of land or building?

Dave Thomson: The more obvious practical issues are that there will be more people in an urban situation than there might be in a rural one, so more people will need to be balloted, and there is more likely to be more than one owner in a block of offices or whatever. Practical difficulties such as that may occur, but they are recognised and they are by no means insurmountable.

The bill allows for duplicate applications to be dealt with, essentially by putting the two applications that come in side by side, comparing them and seeing which will produce the better public interest and, at the same time, benefit the community. Such overlap may well occur more often in urban areas than it would in rural areas, simply because there are allotment societies, toddler groups, local councils, village councils and whatever else. We cannot say for sure that it will happen, but the bill allows for it to be dealt with through side-by-side consideration of the two applications.

Rachel Rayner: I can add a little more detail. In new part 3A of the 2003 act, on the right to buy neglected and abandoned land, new section 97K sets out what will happen where two bodies have applied to buy the same land. It requires ministers not to decide on one application until they have considered all the views that they have had on both. They then have to make a decision and tell both bodies what they have decided. As Dave Thomson said, the process is reflected in the bill.

Claudia Beamish: That clarification is helpful. Thank you.

My other question is about the time within which community bodies must re-register. The land reform review group suggests in its written evidence that re-registration be required every 10 years rather than every five years. Do you have any comments on adopting that longer timeframe? Are there any other ways in which we might make re-registration of land less onerous, bearing in mind that we are talking about community groups?

Dave Thomson: We are certainly taking steps to make the re-registration process less onerous, which might involve simplifying the form somewhat. On the timescale, however, we feel that five years is about the right length of time for us to take account of any changes in what the community needs and how it wants to take things forward. Ten years might be too long, as there might be too many changes. If we were sticking with what the community agreed 10 years ago, we would need to ask whether the position was the same 10 years on.

We feel that the five-year timescale is adequate, but we are still taking stakeholder opinions on that. Some say that it should be five years, some that it should be 10 years and some that it should be less. We are considering it, but at the moment we are sticking with the five-year timescale.

Claudia Beamish: So it is still under consideration.

Dave Thomson: Yes.

Claudia Beamish: Thank you.

The Convener: It seems appropriate for us to move on to questions on the meaning of “community”. Angus MacDonald will lead on that.

Angus MacDonald: Good morning, panel. We know from our briefing that section 34 of the 2003 act provides that the only type of legal entity that can apply to register a community interest in land is a company limited by guarantee. The 2003 act also provides for the use of postcode units in order to define the community that a community body can represent. Section 28 of the bill allows for Scottish charitable incorporated organisations—or SCIOs—to be included, stipulating that they must have no fewer than 20 members.

What are the practical implications of the extension to include SCIOs? What other types of bodies might ministers specify by regulation?

Dave Thomson: First and foremost among the practical implications of the extension to SCIOs is that community bodies will be given flexibility in how they wish to go about the business of setting themselves up. There are considerations in relation to the protection of individuals on a community body in ensuring that assets are dealt with appropriately should that body be dissolved, for example.

We have sought the opinion of stakeholders on the additional bodies that could be included. Those that have been suggested include bencoms—community benefit societies—and community interest companies. We are considering what other bodies could be included but, as you said, there are provisions that allow bodies to be added. If there is a strong desire for specific bodies to be added, we can look at that again. Apart from SCIOs, bencoms are the other main type of organisation that has been put forward for consideration.

Angus MacDonald: Is the use of postcode units too general or too restrictive a way of defining a community, particularly in light of the proposed extension of the community right to buy to urban Scotland?

Dave Thomson: That is certainly the opinion that we have been hearing. We propose to allow other options, such as settlements or locations as defined by the General Register Office for Scotland. We are talking about not a more general term but an alternative to identifying all the postcodes. For example, a village is a location or settlement. The same is true of urban areas—parts of the city of Glasgow are settlements or locations in their own right and can be identified in that way.

Essentially, the idea is to give communities some flexibility in how they define themselves. There is provision in the 2003 act for a community to use some other means, but a community must let us know what means it is using and why, and that will have to receive ministerial approval.

In relation to the requirement that a body must have a minimum of 20 members, there is provision, in particular circumstances, to have a smaller number of members, but the body would have to explain why that was the case. That is probably more relevant to a rural body than it is to an urban one.

Rachel Rayner: Those changes will be made to section 34 of the 2003 act. As Dave Thomson said, ministers will have more flexibility to make regulations that prescribe a type of area. The fact that that does not have to be done by postcode will provide more flexibility. However, it will still be done by area.

Angus MacDonald: I want to explore the definition of “community” a bit further. Are there other methods by which a community might be defined? I am thinking of arts organisations, for example. An arts organisation in my constituency is a keen supporter of the bill. Charities and ethnic groups are other examples of communities of interest. I think that you have already mentioned allotment societies, and I would be interested to hear your view on the inclusion of community councils or common grazings committees, which might have some abandoned land nearby.
Dave Thomson: Rachel Rayner is probably better placed to answer on what is and what is not allowed.

Rachel Rayner: At the moment, new part 3A of the 2003 act just provides for a community body to be a company limited by guarantee. It is always an option for an existing group to form a specific company. As Dave Thomson said, we are considering what other bodies could be added. As has been mentioned, there is a power for ministers to make regulations that set out other bodies, should that be considered appropriate. In addition, that power allows ministers to set out the requirements that a body needs to meet to ensure that it is an appropriate community body to own land.

Dave Thomson: At this stage, the definition is still based on a geographic community, rather than a community of interest.

Angus MacDonald: Should the definition that is acceptable to ministers be in the bill?

Dave Thomson: Do you mean a definition of “community” in general?

Angus MacDonald: Yes, and the specific organisations that would be acceptable.

Dave Thomson: Some element of that would be acceptable in the bill, but it would depend on how many organisations would be listed, because the length of the list could be significant. If ministers were minded to do that, it might be more relevant to list the acceptable characteristics. We are not considering doing that at this point, but as more and more bodies are added to the list the issue might come back.

Rachel Rayner: Flexibility is useful. A few years ago, SCIOs did not exist. We need flexibility to deal with changes and types of entity that will exist in future.

The Convener: I know of communities that have attempted to buy land and found several chapters in the approach that required them to change their constitutions to meet the funding criteria. Can that be addressed in this context? Have you taken the issue into account?

Dave Thomson: The terms that a community body must meet are largely dictated by the type of entity under which it chooses to function. For example, a company limited by guarantee will have a different set of regulations from a SCIO or a community benefit company—or bencom. Equally, different funders will have different requirements that must be met if funding from them is to be obtained. I do not think that that is something that we can try to cover across the board in the bill.

We are changing one element in relation to the rules on the memorandum and articles of association, for bodies that are not actively involved in an application. Currently, if a body changes its articles of association during the period between approval of registration and the point at which the right to buy under part 2 of the 2003 act is triggered—during which period, in essence, registration is there but not active—it has to inform the minister, and we have to approve every change. We are removing that element. There is therefore some movement to allow bodies to change their articles of association in that period, as long as they are not actively taking forward an application.

The Convener: It would be interesting to know whether the time that it takes to purchase land has increased significantly because community bodies have been required to change their constitutions by the bodies from which they have sought funding. I can think of at least three changes in constitutions in a 10-year period, in Evanton in Ross-shire, where I live.

Dave Thomson: I can certainly find out about specific cases. You mentioned three, so if you pass them on, that would be great. I can take that forward.

The Convener: It would be handy if you knew of some, too.

Dave Thomson: I do not, off the top of my head. I will ask the community right to buy team for examples that they have. They have been dealing with the issue day in and day out for the past 10 years, so if there are examples they will know about them.

The Convener: Okay. We move on to late applications.

Dave Thomson: I want to pick up on two or three points. First, will the panel explain what the reasoning is behind the requirement to register in the first place? Would it not simplify things a great deal if communities did not have to register early and could just get involved when they became aware that land was available, which often happens quite late in the process? Why do we need a registration process at all?

Dave Thomson: The main thrust is to do with interference in the land market and the individual’s right to sell land. There are European convention on human rights considerations in that regard.

Rachel Rayner might know exactly where the rights and obligations lie in terms of the ability to pause or freeze the process of selling land and at what stage that is appropriate and balanced.

The application allows us to consider whether the community has a valid—for want of a better word—plan, so that the registration is not simply being used as a blocking measure, for example. If the application is valid, it will proceed. It is, in essence, a way for us to gauge whether the registration is not just a knee-jerk reaction but a viable prospect.

Dave Thompson: There is lots of land all over the place—hundreds and thousands of hectares of buildings and land—and communities will often think that a particular piece of land will never come on to the market because it has not done so for 500 years and there seems to be no likelihood of it coming on to the market in the next 500 years. There might be some obvious examples of a community being able to anticipate a bit of land or property coming on to the market, but there must be numerous situations in which communities would have no legal reason to believe that that would happen. Therefore, why would a community spend a great deal of time putting together a registration and planning what it would do with the land if, in 99 per cent of the cases, there is no real chance of that land coming on to the market?

You mentioned blocking. People could block with a pre-emptive registration just as easily as they could with a reactive, knee-jerk registration. That is not a strong argument. I want to tease out why we need early registration. Why not allow communities to register an interest once they see that land has come on to the market? That might spark in their minds the thought, “Oh my goodness, we never thought that that bit of land...” You have actually done some work on something that might not have actively started the application. After all, although the community might not have actively started the application process, it might have undertaken relevant work—for example, it might have identified a need for land but not exactly which land, or it might have sounded out funders on whether there is potential in an application. Some element of work will still be required, but it is right that the focus will move away from having started the application process to having started relevant work.

Ian Turner: Yes.

Dave Thompson: We are expanding it slightly, but there is a point at which we have to balance the owner’s right to sell the land and the community’s aspirations to obtain it.

Rachel, are you any better placed to comment?

Rachel Rayner: No, I do not have anything to add.

Dave Thompson: That neatly moves us on. I hope that ministers and you will think about whether the bill could be simplified by taking out the need to register early but, if it is felt that there is good reason for it, it is needed and it should stay there, we can talk about that later on.

You mentioned the need for a community to show that it has done earlier work—that “such relevant work as Ministers consider reasonable” has been carried out—before it makes a late application. You propose to remove the good-reasons test, which is in the current legislation.

It strikes me that it might be awful onerous to show that you have carried out “such relevant work as Ministers consider reasonable”. How has the good-reasons test been used in the past, and why do you feel that we need to change things and move to what looks like a more onerous test that might prevent communities from being able to buy land?

Dave Thompson: Our intention is certainly not to make things more onerous; in fact, it is exactly the opposite. It might be that in guidance and further regulations we can clarify our exact intention, but the idea is not by any manner or means to make things more onerous.

On why we are moving away from the good-reasons test, I point out that it has been used in quite a few applications—off the top of my head, I think that a third or 50 per cent of applications are late ones—and we certainly recognise that the system needs to be more reactive in its application. After all, although the community might not have actively started the application process, it might have undertaken relevant work that would lead up to that stage, and that is something that we can take into consideration. However, that does not address the kind of light-bulb moment that you have referred to, and we are still talking to stakeholders about what they feel on that issue.

Dave Thompson: I do not know how the good-reasons test has been applied up to now, but surely one of those good reasons might be that the community just did not know and had no reason to expect that a particular property was going to come on the market. Having to show that you have actually done some work on something that you had never expected to happen will basically be impossible.

Dave Thomson: If it would be helpful, I could provide examples of cases involving late applications that were either accepted or rejected. That might clarify our thinking behind our approach to the good-reasons test.

Dave Thomson: That would be helpful, but the general principle of the effect of such a move is important.

The section in question also refers to identifying the owner of the land in question. That, again, might be impossible in certain circumstances, because there could be all sorts of ways in which an owner might not be identifiable. It makes me wonder whether we need earlier registration at all, and it strikes me that, compared with, for example, the provisions that have been in place for some time now for crofting communities, things will be made more difficult for communities.

Dave Thomson: That is certainly not our intention. With regard to the crofting community right to buy, we are actively talking to stakeholders; in fact, we will be in Inverness tomorrow and in Harris and Skye next Monday and Tuesday talking to particular stakeholders about the changes that they feel could or should be made to that element of the bill. The good-reason and relevant work provisions will be developed and refined as the bill progresses and as we talk more and more to stakeholders about difficulties, issues and, indeed, opportunities that can be taken.

Dave Thomson: Finally on the issue of late applications, is the timescale for communities complying sufficient for them to be able to put together a coherent and reasonable bid for land if, up until then, they have done only the absolute minimum of the relevant work—whatever that means—that is required under the act?

Dave Thomson: Obviously we think so, but we can look to change that as we monitor how the provisions are used; indeed, we are already extending the valuation period from six to eight weeks. Even now, we are monitoring whether the time periods in the bill are sufficient.

We think that we have allowed enough time based on the previous 10 years’ experience of what communities can and do, but we will monitor that as we go. At the moment we think that it is sufficient.

The Convener: Cara Hilton has a supplementary question on that point, and then we will go to Claudia Beamish.

Cara Hilton: What would happen to an application to register or buy land if, despite its best efforts, a local community could not find the landowner? Would that kill off the application, or might there be a way of allowing it to proceed if the community could show that it has taken all reasonable steps to identify the owner?

Rachel Rayner: A community would need to identify the owner so that their views could be taken into account and to ensure that the land could be transferred. There are other ways of trying to find owners. I do not know whether the team has come across that problem in practice.

Dave Thomson: I do not recall any specific examples of not finding the owner at all, but I can double-check that.

Cara Hilton: It would be interesting if you could check that. The ownership of some areas of land in my area is in dispute so it would be helpful to have that feedback.

The Convener: That would indeed be helpful. We do not know who owns some large areas of land—even some of the largest landholdings in Scotland—so the question of ownership is pretty important.

Claudia Beamish wanted to ask a supplementary earlier but I forgot.

Claudia Beamish: I want to go back to the definitions of community bodies that can apply. Have you looked at groups that come under the Equality Act 2010? For instance, have you looked at ethnic minority groups who have a wider geographical spread? Has there been any discussion of that sort of issue?

Dave Thomson: In general terms, yes. What I call interest groups or communities of interest have certainly come up in discussion. At the moment, however, we still require a geographic element in the definition of a community.

Claudia Beamish: I am aware that it has been an issue for other things such as the climate challenge fund.

Dave Thomson: Yes.

The Convener: We will move on to talk about abandoned or neglected land.

Nigel Don: I would like to start with those words “abandoned or neglected”. As I understand it, those terms are not defined in the bill. Presumably they have some kind of legal usage or possibly even a definition. Could you clarify that and confirm why it is appropriate not to define them in the bill?

Dave Thomson: Although the approach is to be finalised, we have two things to consider when deciding whether to use “abandoned” or “neglected”. It is whether the land has been cared for and what the effect of that care or lack thereof has had on the land’s condition. That is the issue in the broadest terms. We want to make sure that we get that right and that we do not include or exclude completely inappropriate areas of land.

It might be better to give you some examples of what we think might be covered. Let us take the example of someone who owns land on an island, which has a slipway that has deteriorated to the point at which it cannot be used. If the landowner is not willing or able to address that issue but the community can—either because it has the resources or volunteers to do so or because it has access to a different funding stream—it should be allowed the right to do that. If it means buying and developing the area that includes the slipway, so be it.

Another example might be an open area of land that is overgrown and full of broken glass. These might be extreme examples, but I just want to give the committee an idea of where we are going. Such land is a blight on the communities that surround or are adjacent to it. If all it needs is the grass cut, the glass cleared up and some improvements made, and the owner is not willing or able to do so while the community has made the case that it can make that land into something much more sustainable, we think that it should be able to do so.

We are aware that some circumstances should not be considered to be neglect. There is the case of biodiversity, for example: just because something is not actively being done to a piece of land, that does not necessarily mean that it is abandoned or neglected. There are reasons for not cutting grass or not seeding particular areas. Equally, we are not asking conservation heritage sites to rebuild a ruined castle all of a sudden because the castle is abandoned or neglected. It is a heritage building and it should be kept in an appropriate state. We also need to look carefully at land being held or assembled for future development, for example.

There are various nuances in the definition; that is why we are taking time to make sure that we get all the representations and get it right as much as possible.

Nigel Don: Thank you—that confirms that there is an issue here. It suggests that there is a definition to come but it is not there yet. Is that a fair interpretation? Otherwise, the lawyers are going to have some fun with this.

Dave Thomson: Rachel, do you want to comment, as a lawyer?

Rachel Rayner: The words have a meaning. The issue is more, as Dave Thomson said, that we are considering whether any refinement would be appropriate or whether what is in the bill is sufficient.
land that has fallen to the Crown because there is not a known owner. Not all Crown land is excluded.

Nigel Don: Again, if I have understood correctly—I also do not want to go into the Latin—either it is land that is of unknown provenance or we have no idea who should own it, due to failure of succession, so it falls to the Crown. I still come back to the question: why can the community not buy it?

Rachel Rayner: There are alternative ways of dealing with land that falls to the Crown, so that issue does not need to be included in the bill.

Nigel Don: In that case, I will push on.

One of the areas of interest is that a community might do exactly what Mr Thomson alluded to earlier, which is to take over an area of land and do nothing with it, apart from cleaning it up. In other words, as far as the community is concerned development might simply be conservation and keeping an area in a natural state. Is that sustainable development? It does not sound like development to me.

Dave Thomson: I suppose that it would depend on the state of the land beforehand. However, there is a balance to be struck. What we are not trying to do is compare uses, as in “My use is better than your use.” The issue is the sustainable development of the land.

The World Commission on Environment and Development defined sustainable development as “development that meets the needs of the present without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs.”

That seems to summarise it. Land that is just sitting there but is, for example, overgrown or concreted over and has broken glass on it is not meeting the needs of the present. Those needs could be met if, for example, the grass was cut, some benches with a lick of new paint appeared or a nice path to walk on was provided. There is also a health and wellbeing aspect to a community having a nice space that is no longer a blight.

Nigel Don: Forgive me, but can I stop you there? I can credit putting in a path or a bench being regarded as development, even though it might be minute. However, a community could decide that it wanted, in effect, wild land—I do not want to define that—so a space could be cleared up but nothing more would be done to it and any paths would be made only by people walking through. Would that be sustainable development? I suspect that in the context of what we are trying to do it ought to be, but I am not sure that the words in the bill have that meaning.

Dave Thomson: Probably the best answer is that it could be. It would have to be decided on a case-by-case basis. I do not know what the legal or dictionary definition of “sustainable development” would be, but to my mind it means an improvement, even if it is not sustainable. That might not cover particular cases—I do not know.

Nigel Don: I suggest to Rachel Rayner that policy is one thing but that the challenge legally is that the bill has validity only if sustainable development has a clear meaning.

Rachel Rayner: The sustainable development of land was considered in the Pairc case with regard to the crofting community right to buy, and the court was confident that sustainable development had a clear meaning.

You gave the example of a community only building a path or putting a bench on a piece of land. The community right to buy being compatible with “furthering the achievement of sustainable development” in relation to land is only one test, because it also has to be in the public interest. There are a number of tests that have to be satisfied. It is not the case that showing just that what will be done with land will “further ... sustainable development” will be enough to get a group over the threshold so that ownership of the land is transferred; there are additional tests that have to be satisfied.

Nigel Don: Yes, there are. Okay, I need to—

The Convener: Can we come back to that point in a minute, as Dave Thompson has a supplementary question?

Nigel Don: Of course.

Dave Thomson: The Pairc decision is very interesting because the community was told initially that it was not complying with sustainable development requirements for the crofting right to buy, but eventually the minister said that it was doing so. There was a list of reasons why the minister agreed that that was the case, including that “there was a credible sustainable plan ... new activities ... potential to diversify”

and

“power to negotiate”.

Following the Pairc case, therefore, there is a model of what constitutes sustainable development, which is a very good guide for us as we move forward.

Having mentioned the crofting right to buy, I want to pick up on the reasons why we need changes. With that right to buy, only two tests apply: it must further the achievement of sustainable development and it must be in the public interest. The bill states that another test is that the land must be “wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected.”

Another test is added on as well. It has to be shown that,

“If the owner of the land were to remain as its owner, that ownership would be inconsistent with furthering the achievement of sustainable development in relation to the land.”

Therefore, not only must the land be “wholly or mainly abandoned”—and we have had all the discussion about that definition—communities have to show that the current owner would not improve the land. It strikes me that those additional tests, which do not apply to the crofting right to buy, are very onerous and might make it almost impossible for communities to buy.

My worry is that, if this bill goes through in its current form, it could affect the crofting right to buy. I am not a lawyer, but it would be reasonable for folk to say that, if in order to comply with the European convention on human rights we need to put in the bill two tests on top of those that are in the crofting right to buy legislation, maybe the crofting right to buy legislation is not sound in ECHR terms and those same tests need to be added to it. That is my worry if we go down this road. It seems to me to be way over the top.

Rachel Rayner mentioned the Pairc case. The Government won that case; it challenged the decision in court on the basis of the two simple tests that the purchase of the land must further the achievement of sustainable development and must be in the public interest. I fail to see why we have to make the hurdles so high and add in extra tests for the general community right to buy. I worry that, if we do that, it will be an acceptance that we did not really win the Pairc case and that we might need to revisit the crofting legislation. I have a number of concerns around that.

Rachel Rayner: We are content that the crofting community right to buy works and that the current test is appropriate. As you pointed out, the court has upheld that.

Proposed new part 3A of the 2003 act, on neglected and abandoned land, is about deciding the appropriate test for the problem that you are seeking to address. In part 3A, the concern is that neglected and abandoned land can in certain cases be a blight or a problem. It is about deciding what the appropriate mechanism is and when it is appropriate for ministers to decide that that land should be sold without the consent of the owner. It is about making each of the rights to buy fit for purpose for the particular issues that they are dealing with.

I do not think that the test in new part 3A will have any crossover to the crofting community right to buy. The tests for that legislation are thought to be sufficiently robust for that issue.

Dave Thompson: I am glad that we have that reassurance. However, will the panel comment on the ownership test, which it seems to me would be very difficult to apply in practice? Communities would have to prove that, if the owner of the land were to remain as its owner, that ownership would be inconsistent with the sustainable development of the land. How would they do that? It seems bizarre and almost unproveable.

Dave Thomson: I will give you an example of what that element of the bill is trying to address.

If the owner currently has a plan in place or on track for a piece of land—a plan that may have been made only recently—and they are waiting for funding, the approval of a planning application or whatever when the community application comes in, that element allows the owner to say, “This is what I am trying to do with the land and here is the proof of that.” It is about saying that the land cannot be taken out of their hands just because there is a delay in planning or funding.

Of course, everything is relative. If the plan was put in place five minutes before the community application came in, it would be considered as part of the application; if the plan was put in place five years ago and it could be shown that planning permission was being sought but had continually been blocked, that would show that the owner was trying to develop the land sustainably.

It is a matter of allowing the owner to put the case that they have been trying to do something with the land or that they are planning to do something with it, as long as they are not just paying lip service to that and can provide sufficient proof that that has been taking place.

Nigel Don: Forgive me, Mr Thomson, but I think that I understood the opposite of what you intended. It seems to me that a landlord putting in an application for something that he is never going to get planning permission for is a wonderful way of securing the land and ensuring that it is never bought out by the community. A landlord applying to do something else for which he will not get planning permission could be part of the very process of not allowing sustainable development.

I wonder what on earth the proposed new section 97C is doing. I still do not think that I have heard a reason why it is there. I understand the logic of why it might be there, but I have not heard a practical reason why you would want it there. The reason that you have just given actually works against the intention.
Dave Thomson: It is not intended to do so. I suppose that it is a case of looking at the plan and its viability. I hope that it would be obvious if, as you say, a landlord put in a planning application for something that was never going to work, and the issue would then be whether that planning application was put in five minutes before the community application came in.

It is a matter of deciding whether the ownership by the current owner is "inconsistent with" sustainable development. As you say, the fact that a planning application has gone in for something that will never happen does not point to the sustainable development of the land. Proposed new section 97C allows us the time to consider that, as much as anything else.

Nigel Don: I seriously suggest that you might like to reflect on what the proposed new section is really trying to achieve. I could take you to the middle of my constituency and show you the land that is involved in the longest-standing planning application in Aberdeenshire Council's history. It is a large area of land that the owners reasonably want to develop in a way that would probably prevent the local communities from doing anything—i.e. it is not an unreasonable planning application. I think that the provision is going to give us problems.

Dave Thomson: We welcome that view.

The Convener: We have explored the issue quite a bit.

Claudia Beamish: I have a brief question on the same subject. The witness talked about the land being held for future development by an owner. As we know, land can sometimes be held as an investment to be sold rather than for future development. Will any timescales be set or considered for how long land can be kept that is not being developed but which might fall into other categories, which would enable communities to buy it? How long can the situation that I have described go on? I know of cases that have gone on for decades.

Dave Thomson: We will have to consider carefully whether that type of land being held for development would be excluded under the definition. The point that you make is a good one. At the moment, we are not thinking of specifying timescales, as what would be reasonable varies quite widely from case to case and from location to location. However, it is something that would be taken into account in deciding whether an application should be allowed for an area of land. As you say, if the land has been held for 10 years and is not moving or being actively marketed, that is a completely different scenario from that of a piece of land that has been on and off the market for five years, with the price being reduced over those five years in an attempt to sell it. We want the opportunity to consider such matters on a case-by-case basis.

The Convener: On the other hand, it would give the community time to register an interest to buy.

The Convener: We move on to the meaning of community. We need to clarify whether the amendment to section 53 to include community benefit companies will be extended to legal entities that can use the provisions on community right to buy in part 4 of the bill.

Dave Thomson: In addition to the inclusion of SCIOs, that is one of the most frequent suggestions for inclusion that is made to us. We are certainly looking at that.

The Convener: So that would be development groups, for example.

Dave Thomson: I do not know, off the top of my head, whether they are included—that is just my ignorance of what a bencom is or is not.

Rachel Rayner: In the same way that the articles of companies limited by guarantee have to meet certain requirements, the constitution of a SCIO has to meet certain requirements if it is to be a community body, and if bencoms were to be added, consideration would need to be given to what would be the appropriate requirements of a bencom.

The Convener: Okay. We will see where that goes.

Given the importance that the land reform review group placed on amending part 3 of the 2003 act, on crofting, why was there not a full consultation on that? Is the bill team satisfied that the dialogue with stakeholders has been sufficient and proportionate? Would it not have been more helpful to introduce these amendments in the forthcoming land reform bill?

Dave Thomson: The reason why the changes to part 3 of the 2003 act, on the crofting community right to buy, were not included in the initial phase of this bill was largely because all available resources were focused on improving the community right to buy in part 2 of the act and developing provisions for neglected or abandoned land. As the pace of land reform in Scotland increased, with the likes of the land reform review group, it became more and more clear, in conversations with stakeholders, that the changes to part 3 should be included in this bill rather than in any land reform bill that may come along in future. We thought that it was best dealt with now.
The need for consultation is one of the reasons why we have written to stakeholders on the changes that we are considering to part 3. As I said, we met stakeholders last week in Edinburgh, and we are meeting them tomorrow in Inverness and next week on Harris and Skye.

The land reform review group took evidence that we have looked at; for example, Simon Fraser had some very good points to make. We are speaking to Simon next week to get his thoughts on our proposals. Although the changes to part 3 were not part of the first phase of the bill, we are actively pushing that now and getting stakeholder opinions on the issue.

The Convener: As there are no further comments on that, we move to amendments to parts 2 and 3.

Dave Thomson: The letter from the Minister for Local Government and Planning to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee states that he “will also be seeking to make further amendments to Parts 2 and 3A of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003”.

Given that the land reform review group and others have identified flaws in part 3 of the 2003 act, why is the proposed new part 3A based on it?

Dave Thomson: Based on what?

Dave Thomson: On part 3 of the 2003 act. There has been criticism of that. The minister has said that amendments will come along. Have those already been taken into account? If so, why is the minister, in his letter to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee on 6 November, saying that further amendments are coming? I am a bit confused by that.

Dave Thomson: The simple issue is one of timing, as much as anything else. Part 3A was based on part 3 in the first place because of the compulsory element of the purchase. It was felt that the process for the crofting community right to buy was a much better template than the process under part 2, which is pre-emption, so we used that template.

Because the changes to part 3 of the 2003 act are coming in after stage 1 of the bill, yet the proposed new part 3A of the act is in the bill at stage 1, it will be necessary to tie up the two elements where a change is made to part 3. We will need to balance part 3A up to mirror that change, where relevant. It is really an issue of timing—it is almost a catch-22 situation. If you change one, you need to make sure that an equal and relevant change is made in the other. There will be changes, and it will depend on what changes to part 3 are approved.

The Convener: I think that I follow.
(Scotland) Bill and then consider its letter to the Scottish Government on the wildlife crime 2013 annual report.

Meeting continued in private until 13:08.
On resuming—

The Convener: Agenda item 5 is evidence from stakeholders on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. I welcome the panel: Peter Peacock, policy director for Community Land Scotland; Sandra Holmes, head of community assets, Highlands and Islands Enterprise; David Prescott, chair of the board, Holmehill Community Buyout; Duncan Burd, rural affairs sub-committee, Law Society of Scotland; and John Watt, specialist in community land ownership. Welcome to you all.

The sound system is operated by the sound technician, so you do not need to press any buttons. I will indicate whom I am asking to speak; if you want to speak on a particular area, please indicate to me. We look forward to gaining the benefit of your wide experience in these matters.

I will kick off by asking about how the dialogue and consultation on the community right to buy and the crofting community right to buy have been conducted. We are told that there have been various elements to the consultation but, as far as we know, the provisions in part 4 have not been consulted on in the same way that provisions in other parts of the bill have been. Has the consultation on the part 4 provisions been suitable?

Peter Peacock (Community Land Scotland): Community Land Scotland has been making submissions about part 3—the crofting community right to buy—since 2012, when the first consultation on what was to become the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill took place. We made representations on the need to undertake work on part 3, which was followed up by our representations in the more formal consultations. We have actively made the case for change for about two and a half years, and we have had dialogue with officials and the Government on that.

As you will be aware, the Scottish Government has published a short consultation paper on part 3. We have made written submissions and I know that others have, too. A series of meetings have been taking place—Sandra Holmes was probably at one in the past week. There was one in Inverness and there was one in Harris earlier this week.

That consultation has been happening and we are not unhappy about it at all. We are very pleased that the matter has been picked up in the bill, because it requires attention. The consultation is well targeted and what is proposed seems pretty spot on, although one or two things need to be tidied up.

The Convener: I point out that you are talking about part 3 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003.

Peter Peacock: Yes, that is what I am talking about.

The Convener: I know that you are, but I am explaining that for the benefit of my members, since we are dealing part 4 of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. That is why it is necessary for us to have a copy of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 beside us.

Does anyone else want to comment on the process so far?

Sandra Holmes (Highlands and Islands Enterprise): Since the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill was first talked about and before it was drafted, Highlands and Islands Enterprise has engaged strongly and actively in the process. I have lost count of all the submissions that we have made at various stages. We very much welcome the bill and, like Community Land Scotland, we welcome the recent proposals to include amendments to the crofting community right to buy at stage 2. Last week, along with civil servants from the Scottish Government, I took part in a discussion on those proposals that was hosted by Highland Council. We have submitted written evidence on the crofting community right to buy amendments. We think that it makes a lot of sense to pull everything together, particularly given that parts of the community right to buy in proposed new part 3A of the 2003 act are based on the existing crofting community right to buy.

The Convener: Very good. That opens up the question whether those provisions should be part of the proposed land reform legislation, but Sandra Holmes says that they are naturally part of the bill. Are we agreed?

Peter Peacock: Yes—absolutely.

The Convener: In that case, we can move on to the policy memorandum.

Alex Fergusson: This is really just a background question. Back in June, the convener of the Scottish Parliament’s Local Government and Regeneration Committee wrote to the Minister for Local Government and Planning to seek clarification on some points relating to the policy memorandum. In what could be seen as fairly critical language, he said that the policy memorandum appeared to be little more than a “superficial overview” that did not supply sufficient material to allow for part 4 to be properly scrutinised. Correspondence took place and further detail was provided, but at the end of the day the policy memorandum devotes fewer than three pages to part 4 and at one point summarises 20 sections of the bill in just seven bullet points. Are you truly content that you have been provided with enough information to fully explain the purpose and policy aims of the bill? My guess is that you will say yes.

Peter Peacock: As I said to the convener, there has been dialogue on the issue since 2012. To be frank, I was quite surprised by that letter from the Local Government and Regeneration Committee to the Government. That was principally a surprise to me in the sense that, although I can understand why the Local Government and Regeneration Committee might have been less sighted on the matter than this committee, as Mr Fergusson knows, in a past life I sat roughly where he is now, and the then Rural Affairs and Environment Committee carried out an independent inquiry into the workings of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003. In effect, the debate has been going on since 2010-11.

Community Land Scotland was not unhappy with the policy memorandum. It gave us enough to work on and it clearly reiterated the purpose of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003, which is to further the achievement of sustainable development and to remove barriers to it. That is the core concept. Once we get that, all the provisions in the bill make sense. Therefore, we were not unhappy with the policy memorandum at all in that sense.

Alex Fergusson: Some members obviously felt that a case could be made that there were not enough details but, basically, you guys in the field were content with what came your way.

Peter Peacock: Absolutely.

Alex Fergusson: That is fine—thank you.

Sandra Holmes: It is complex to look through the proposed changes and the existing act, as that involves cross-referencing and looking at lots of documents. However, we are satisfied that there is a lot of good stuff in the proposals and we are keen for them to progress. After going through the details of what is in, what is out and the proposed changes, we see the outcomes as helpful and enabling and we are keen for them to be taken forward on the proposed timetable.

The Convener: In that case, we will move on to the financial memorandum.

Jim Hume: There seems to be a degree of uncertainty regarding the financial memorandum. Highlands and Islands Enterprise has stated that it agrees that there are difficulties in estimating demand, for example. Bearing that in mind, what specific costs does the panel anticipate for communities and landowners, and what costs might public bodies have to bear?

John Watt: I will wear my hat as the chair of the Scottish land fund committee. The committee has the responsibility of managing the Government’s Scottish land fund, and many of the cases of communities wanting to acquire property and land assets come to us.

Prior to this meeting, I submitted information about where we are and the number of cases that have come to the land fund that have gone through the community right to buy process to date. I included the national forest land scheme, which is a kind of community right to buy of a public asset.

The detail is in my paper, but I can tell you that we have £9 million over three years—the last tranche being £3 million for the next financial year. There is pressure on the budget, but we are managing that at the moment. Some of the changes that will happen if the bill is enacted might increase the pressure. For example, the extension of the community right to buy to urban areas will have an impact.

However, at the moment we are projecting that we will manage the pressure on the budget. We are careful about assessing the outcomes that each case will bring in relation to sustainable development and resilient rural communities, and we will continue to do that.

Jim Hume: Committee members have your paper, which gives a broad outline of what the budget is, but I want to bore down into where the budget goes. I want to know what types of costs—rather than the overall budget, which we appreciate—public bodies, community bodies and landowners face.

John Watt: Do you mean the applicants or the landowners?

Jim Hume: I mean applicants, landowners and public bodies. My question is for the whole panel.

John Watt: I will stick to the land fund for the moment. A team of public sector officials assists communities in the development of good projects. Sandra Holmes heads up the team. There are obviously costs to the public sector in relation to the development and application process—Sandra might comment on that.

Sandra Holmes: We put in a submission to the Finance Committee on HIE’s corporate perspective on the part 4 provisions on the community right to buy. We see no significant direct costs coming to HIE. We will update some of our guidance and there will be a modest one-off impact on the organisation.

We support communities in their aspirations to own and manage assets, and that is where the bulk of our efforts go. We are already doing that, and most of the support that we offer goes to communities that are not planning to use the legislation because they have other routes to ownership.

John Watt mentioned that we support the Scottish land fund. That is a Scottish Government programme, which we deliver on the Government’s behalf in partnership with the Big Lottery Fund. The Scottish land fund currently applies only to rural areas—that is, communities with a population of up to 10,000.

The bill will extend the application of the community right to buy to all communities, so it will take in communities with a significantly higher population. Our sense is that there will be a rise in interest in using the community right to buy, with a knock-on effect on demand. Some of the difficulties in trying to articulate the overall cost lie in the fact that the system is so demand led.

The key thing is to put the issue in perspective. The Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 was enacted in 2004, so we have had its provisions for a decade. I believe that there have been about 18—fewer than 20—applications under the provisions but, from my rough calculations, I think that there have been 110 acquisitions in Scotland on top of that. The 2003 act is enabling and it creates a positive environment, but most stuff happens outwith its provisions.

However, the extension from rural communities to urban communities is a key change, and it is pretty challenging to quantify the demand that is likely. If communities require public funds to enable acquisitions to progress, that will be a limiting factor. The right to buy is one thing; communities must then secure funding.

Since the Scottish land fund came on stream in 2012, there has been, as John Watt said, a very healthy pipeline. That is the enabling factor that instigates communities to be proactive and to see a route and a means to generate the finances that are required to enable a purchase. Within that, private financing is featuring to an increasing extent. Communities are getting commercial borrowing to make up the funding packages.

Peter Peacock: In previous evidence, we have said that we want to see all of this advance but, as John Watt and Sandra Holmes indicated, urban communities will come into the equation under what is proposed, which will mean that the potential demand on the land fund will grow. We are under no illusions, because we know that that must be cash limited at some point—that is a budget matter for Governments over time. We are not arguing for an open-ended chequebook, because we recognise that there are public expenditure constraints. Although we might argue for the budget to be nudged up, we recognise that it competes against other things.

Jim Hume: That is useful.

The Convener: As no one else wants to comment on that, we will move on to Cara Hilton, who has a question about the 2003 act.

Cara Hilton: Good morning, panel. Given that the primary objective of land reform is to remove land-based barriers to the sustainable development of rural communities, how well has the 2003 act worked in practice? Have aspects of rural Scotland changed as a result of the act? Have the experiences of the 2003 act and land reform to date informed the drafting of the bill?

David Prescott (Holmehill Community Buyout): We tried to buy land, but the legislation did not work for us. However, it made us form a group, which was a huge positive. We will celebrate our 10th anniversary in January with a ceilidh—we are not giving up yet.

The legislation did not work for us for a variety of reasons, which I can go into but which are well documented on our website and which there is a bit about in our submission. I am no expert but, as far as I can tell, the changes that the bill proposes seem to deal with some of the problems that we had when we failed to secure our registration.

I admit that some of the things that have come out subsequently have made me worry about how we will go forward. We are continuing to go forward positively but, unless we can secure ownership of the land, we will have no community control over it at all—I can go into that in more detail. However, we have been through the planning process and have retained the original designation of the land as public open space in case somebody wants to try to buy it for its development value. The valuation is a big concern financially.

We have secured the land in the local plan as public open space, defeated one planning application and had another one withdrawn, as we had the support of Stirling Council’s planning department. However, we have not been able to move forward and use the land, which we would like to do for the community. We would like to engage with the community and have a dialogue about how it can best deal with the land. We have ideas, but there will be lots of other ideas.

The bill is a good start, and the group and I are really pleased that the committee invited us to the meeting, although it is a bit frightening. However, we would like to work with the committee on the basis of our experience and help if we can.

The Convener: Will you briefly tell the committee about the couple of things that got in the way of the legislation working for you?

David Prescott: The first one was that we were refused in the first instance because we were not timeous and did not register beforehand. The land was in the local plan as public open space and it was always treated as that. However, the owner sold it as land with development potential and somebody bought it for that. He thought that he was on about a 5-1 win, but he had to overcome a group. Our first failure, though, was not securing the use of the land. As you probably know, we used the appeal process, but it was pretty hairy and did not take us very far forward.

In fairness, we were encouraged to reregister. I would not say that the process was easy—I did not do most of it—but we managed it. What killed it for us was that the owner had sold an option. We saw a piece of paper with “Option” on the top and practically everything else redacted, apart from the solicitor's name. We know not to whom that was sold, for what value, when that happened or whether the option is still extant. As a result, we have taken the view that we will not seek to reregister until we are in a position to know that we will not end up in the same situation. The stuff that has to be done—going out to the community, going through all the support processes and writing the document—is a big exercise. It is not a good idea to go to the community too often. People should really go to the community only when they have to.

Those are the two big issues that our experience has identified. I believe that the bill seeks to address them, but I am not qualified to say whether it will be successful in how it is framed.

The Convener: Your evidence is extremely valuable.

Peter Peacock: Cara Hilton asked about three points: whether the 2003 act has worked, whether it has changed rural Scotland and whether the bill has been informed by that. My experience of community land owning goes back to a past life, when I was involved with the Assynt crofters in the buyouts of Knoydart and Eigg before the 2003 act was passed. As you know, I got diverted into other things.

I have come back to the issue 15 years later, and I can honestly say that the landscape—in the broadest sense—has been transformed from the position at the time of the Assynt crofters buyout. In certain places, community confidence is much higher than it used to be. People are doing the most remarkable things that, frankly, I would never have believed were possible back then.

That has happened partly because the 2003 act gave consent to communities to own their land and gave them a legal framework to do so. In a sense, through the act, Parliament and Government said, “We want you to do this and here’s the law to help you do it.” From that point of view, the act has been transformational. Notwithstanding that a lot of people do not use it, it has changed the environment in which such matters are dealt with, which has been excellent.

However, we know from experience that the 2003 act is hugely cumbersome, difficult and bureaucratic in a variety of ways, to the extent that communities find it almost impossible to deal with. That is why we now have a bill to revise it. For the most part, the bill is well targeted and picks up on the issues that communities have expressed concern about over time.

I have quite strong reservations about aspects of proposed new part 3A of the 2003 act, which might not be as helpful as they could be. We will undoubtedly come on to that. Part 3 of the act purports to provide an absolute right to buy. It is not actually an absolute right to buy, but it gives a community a chance to buy land that is not for sale.

The crofting community right to buy has completely changed the environment in the Western Isles. We have moved on from communities thinking about exercising their rights to compulsorily buy land and going through the process, which is horrendously complex. The mapping requirements in particular are horrendously complex; the committee might want to come back to that.

Nonetheless, one community took forward its case and another one started to take forward its case. That has led to a complete change in the environment. Now, landowners and communities in the Western Isles negotiate the future; they do not use the act, but they would not be negotiating but for the act. It has become hugely important as a backstop to allow negotiation to continue. I can pick up other points of detail, but that is the context.

The Convener: We will come to some of the detail very soon.

Before I bring in John Watt, Dave Thompson wants to ask a quick supplementary.

Dave Thompson: My question relates to Peter Peacock’s references to complexity. I noticed that, in its submission, the Law Society of Scotland said:

“There are multiple amendments to certain sections of the 2003 Act of the Bill which are rather difficult to follow and this does not seem to sit well with the aim of empowering communities. The Society suggests that it would be simpler to repeal and re-enact part 2 of the 2003 Act.”

It is slightly concerning if the Law Society finds the provisions difficult to follow.

Duncan Burd (Law Society of Scotland): I do not think that Law Society members find the provisions difficult to follow, but we have tried to put ourselves in the position of the common man in Scotland. When he sits down to look at such a cumbersome piece of legislation that cross-references different acts, that becomes difficult. We encourage the Parliament to make the legislation as simple as possible so that the man or lady in the street can pick it up. If the legislation for a bureaucratic process is heavy and cumbersome, it will frighten off a lot of people and you really do not want to do that.

Dave Thompson: Do you stand by the suggestion or recommendation that the 2003 act should be repealed and re-enacted rather than amended?

Duncan Burd: I recently attended the WS Society and crofting law group conference in Lochmaddy, at which we looked at the problems caused by the Crofting Reform (Scotland) Act 2010. When layers and layers of amendments are made to legislation, it eventually breaks down and becomes a money-making exercise for my profession. I take it that you do not want that.

The Convener: Most certainly not.

John Watt: Peter Peacock has said almost everything that I was going to say. I am almost as old as him, so I remember the Assynt crofters process.

The Convener: So am I. We should have an Assynt fest.

John Watt: When the 2003 act came in, the process was soon found to be difficult. My colleague Sandra Holmes has helped a lot of communities through the process, especially under part 3. Many of the big projects did not even attempt to use the act but, as Peter Peacock said, it was a useful piece of legislation to have in the background as a backstop if other things did not work.

I do not have the exact statistics in front of me but, under the first Scottish land fund, which was established in the early noughties, very few projects went through the community right-to-buy process. Most were negotiated settlements or sales. As the committee can see from the figures for the more recent Scottish land fund, only four or five out of 28 projects have gone through the process. It was useful to know that it was there, but it was complicated to use and it is good that some of the difficulties with it are being addressed.

The Convener: Indeed. I suspect that we will have to talk about that in more detail.

Alex Fergusson: I thank any of you who have found something positive to say about the 2003 act, as I was convener of this committee’s predecessor when the act was passed. I assure you that any impediments were not placed there on purpose. That is just a light-hearted comment.

What Duncan Burd just said highlighted that it might have been better to introduce the proposed provision as a separate piece of land reform legislation rather than to tack it on to the bill.

Duncan Burd: The bill’s overall aim is such that it is the appropriate place for the provision. It does not need another piece of legislation that will simply frighten people away.

Alex Fergusson: Correct me if I am wrong, but you said that we are adding amendment on amendment to existing legislation and that that is not very satisfactory.

Duncan Burd: That is not ideal. From my experience of acting in a lot of buyouts, I know that people are incredibly nervous of the explanations that we lawyers give, whether it be to the landowner or to the prospective community group.

Alex Fergusson: That is fine. I just wanted you to clarify that.

The Convener: Let us move on to more detailed issues about land in which interests may be registered.

Angus MacDonald: The panel will be aware that the right-to-buy provision in part 2 of the 2003 act applies only to community bodies that represent rural areas. Section 27 of the bill will amend the definition of registrable land and the power of Scottish ministers to define excluded land to allow the community right to buy to apply throughout Scotland.

Duncan Burd might wish to expand on the written evidence from the Law Society of Scotland, which states that there are “marked differences between a right to buy exercised in rural Scotland and one now to be exercised with regard to land in an urban setting which may well have a higher acquisition and development consequent cost.”

Furthermore, there is a requirement to “restrict the application of community right to buy in urban areas where there is an active development proposal. If such provision is not made then an unrestricted community right to buy could have unintended but significant adverse effects on investment decisions.”

How will community confidence, cohesion and sustainability be affected by extending the community right to buy? Could there be different issues in an urban context?

Duncan Burd: The Law Society’s membership includes landowners from across the rural and urban spectrum. The concern is that a small community in an urban environment might be interested in a particular asset that is part of a larger asset that is capable of development. In such a case, the development could become blighted and there could be a scenario of competing interests. It is important for the committee, as legislators, to include a safeguard to balance out the greater development good to the community. We have suggested one or two technical measures that could be added to give developers comfort. Development projects can take time to reach fruition; in the commercial world, time is important.

Angus MacDonald: That is clear.

Sandra Holmes: Highlands and Islands Enterprise would like parity of opportunity to be extended to all—communities are communities, whether they are rural or urban. It seems right that the opportunities should be open to all communities. We welcome the proposed amendments, which offer more flexibility in the structures to extend the opportunities even further.

It could be argued that land and building costs in an urban area might be at a premium in comparison with those in a rural area, but that is a secondary issue. We are talking about giving communities their rightful opportunity to engage, become empowered and, where they can, take control of assets to add to their empowerment.

Peter Peacock: The community right to buy seems to be working in many rural areas and, if that is so, why should the same opportunity not be available more generally? I see no reason in principle why it should not be available to all, and I see a reason in principle why it should be.

The community right to buy is almost certain to play out differently in an urban context. The situation is more complex, as it is more difficult to define the boundaries of an urban community and we are probably talking about much smaller landholdings and about sites that might be abandoned, neglected or in need of further development. I am sure that we will come back to this point, but I am thinking of individual buildings or gap sites that might fall into that category. The right will play out differently but, in principle, there is no reason why it might not play out properly in an urban context.

Blight is an interesting issue. When I spoke at a conference last week, a question about it was put to me. I answered in this way: the blight that we experience in the areas that have bought their land in rural Scotland is not being caused by the community purchase; rather, the community bought the land to get round the blight that it felt was there, because the land was not being developed to its full potential by the current ownership structure. The communities that Sandra Holmes and John Watt help, through their roles, are interested in developing their assets, because they feel that that has not happened in the past. I am sure that the technical points that Mr Burd raised are worth considering, but it would be wrong to characterise the communities as causing blight, because that is not necessarily the case.

David Prescott: I will follow up on the point about blight. The land that we sought to buy, along with certain other sites in Dunblane, has been blighted by inactivity by the owners, in some cases over many years. I am thinking of sites in the High Street that have been left completely empty for the 17 years that I have lived in Dunblane. That is a key issue.

On the rural-urban split, we are considered to be a rural community—I think that we have just under 9,000 inhabitants—although I do not think that we thought of ourselves as a rural community until we engaged with the 2003 act. Certainly, the population is not substantially involved in rural activities. We were fortunate; a slightly bigger community would not have been in the same position, although I cannot see why such a community should not have had the same role. The fact that the issue is addressed in the bill tells us why the provision should be there: it is a means of enabling communities to empower themselves.

The planning process governs the value of a site. In our case, we think that the value has reduced. I would perhaps like to explore at some point how value is reflected, against planning provision, given that a gamble by a developer can inflate the price.

We are talking about ensuring that the community engages in the wider process of managing its community. In all fairness, a number of us who have become involved in the process have done that and are continuing to do so, including in the context of aspects of built development around the site in which we have an interest. We are trying to work with the developer—a housing association—to secure the best outcome for all parties. The process has become much more inclusive.

The Convener: It will be interesting to hear more about that in response to subsequent questions.

John Watt: I am wearing another hat now as a member of the Scottish committee of the Big Lottery Fund. The fund’s growing community assets programme assists communities to acquire properties in urban contexts, through negotiated purchases. We are seeing that that approach has significant benefits in communities. The properties are usually small—sometimes they are even single buildings—but the community thinks that they can be put to a more positive purpose than is currently the case.

I agree with Peter Peacock that defining the community is more challenging in urban areas. We need structures that are broadly representative of the community, and acquisitions must be in the public interest—they must be for a positive community purpose. The cases that we process through the Big Lottery Fund are assessed on public interest and positive community benefit. If communities are given more rights to register an interest in properties in urban areas, it will be interesting to see whether there is a significant increase in demand.

Angus MacDonald: You said that defining communities in urban areas is a challenge. Do you foresee unintended consequences—if such things can be foreseen—or practical problems as a result of extending the community right to buy?

John Watt: One always has to deal with a legal entity in such situations, and there are basic rules about the nature of the legal entity, which bodies must and do follow. For example, there are rules to do with having open membership, having democratic control, not bringing about personal gain, not distributing profits to one another and the like. Such principles have to be there.

Communities in urban areas can begin to define their boundaries, as they do in rural areas, although doing so is more challenging because there are a lot more people in urban communities. I suppose that minority interest groups might try to usurp the process, but we can build safeguards into the system, in relation to who can apply and the structures that they use to apply, to overcome that particular unintended consequence.

Angus MacDonald: Can you give examples of safeguards?

John Watt: I meant in the type of legal structure that the applicant must have: open membership, democratic control, non-profit distributing—those kinds of principles.

The Convener: We might continue in that vein with Claudia Beamish.

Claudia Beamish: Thank you, convener, and good morning to the panel. The definition of community is a very complex issue, and it would be helpful for our discussions if we explored it.

I will build on what John Watt said. The panel will know that section 34 of the 2003 act provides... that the only type of legal entity that can apply to register a community interest in land is a company limited by guarantee. What type of entity should the bill enable to register a community interest in land? What are the practical implications of extending the bill to Scottish charitable incorporated organisations? What other types of bodies should be included by regulation or specified in the bill?

After the panel has answered those questions, I would like to move to issues of the extension or limitation of postcodes.

Sandra Holmes: We welcome the proposals to include SCIOs, because the SCIO structure can exhibit the characteristics that are exhibited by existing communities. As John Watt mentioned, a key tenet of companies limited by guarantee is their open membership.

We have been advocating that two-tier SCIOs should be included. There are two kinds of SCIO and a two-tier SCIO has a wider membership, which elects the board of directors for the day-today running of the organisation. That approach parallels companies limited by guarantee.

We are aware that there have been discussions about including bencoms—community benefit societies. We are definitely seeing more community groups considering becoming a bencom. We have not fully thought through the issue, but we will do if including bencoms is discussed at stage 2. We welcome in principle the extension of the provisions where that is appropriate and where there are safeguards of democratic and community control.

A benefit of a bencom is that it can generate private finance for its members. Currently, communities are looking to raise funding to develop the funding packages that are required for their purchases. A significant local benefit of funding from bencom structures is that they build in loyalty and give people a stake in the overall success of the business. People feel connected to and part of something when they have contributed to it.

Although we have not looked at the suggestion in detail, we welcome it in principle. We will give it further consideration if it appears at stage 2.

Claudia Beamish: Perhaps it will make the discussion easier if I highlight a couple of the other definitions of community, such as communities of interest, or wider definitions in relation to geographic area, equalities groups such as ethnic groups, or definitions of place such as allotment societies or community councils. Should those definitions be considered for use in the bill? How do they compare to postcode definitions that have been used in the past?

It is important for us all to understand how we can empower communities. I throw that comment in at this stage.

David Prescott: We have a company, and I am the chairman of the board. We are also registered as a charity. Our main fundraising is to pay the accountants to do the accounts for the company and the charity. We looked at becoming a SCIO and we concluded that, given our position, it was not worth us changing.

We have managed with the current system. It casted us a few problems; we had to change the memorandum and articles of association at one stage to meet one requirement, and for people who are not routinely involved in the bureaucratic processes that can be quite hard work.

On the definition of community, we took Dunblane as the community because the land that we have sought is right in the heart of the town. It was not easy to translate that into postcodes.
Achieving 10 per cent of the people on the open register—we were not allowed to include people who had taken themselves off the register—was, in itself, a major task. Several people spent quite a long time in the library going through the electoral roll knocking out people who had signed who were not eligible under the definitions.

I believe that you should try to define the community in a more free-form fashion. It might be entirely acceptable to use postcodes, but perhaps it could also be defined by community council wards, for example.

This all comes back to something that I think important. I declare a slight interest: I am an honorary member of the Association of Community Rail Partnerships, which will tell you a little about where I come from. You have to leave the community to define the community interest.
You then have to say whether it is the right definition and whether it represents vested interests or something inappropriate—I will not try to define that in any way.

You should set a much more diverse framework rather than say that the community has to tick certain boxes. It should enable people to understand that they must be inclusive, follow equality legislation and have open membership but also enable them to define their community by the need that they perceive and the way in which they would progress matters.

I will not try to be clever and say how that should be done; I leave that to others. However, if anybody wishes to develop any of those ideas and there is a dialogue about it, we would be happy to participate. It is a matter of coming up from the bottom and not down from the top. The bill should be entirely enabling legislation. I genuinely think that the bill is groundbreaking, which is why I have spent quite a lot of time trying to contribute to it.

Claudia Beamish: That is helpful.

Peter Peacock: I echo everything that has just been said about helping communities to define their own place. The bill seeks to address the criticism that the postcode definition is too restrictive, open up more possibilities and give ministers power and flexibility to consider other things for which a community might argue. That is right and helpful.

On SCIOs and bencoms, SCIOs did not exist when Alex Fergusson dealt with the matter as convener on the Rural Development Committee. They now exist and it is right that the bill recognises that. However, it is equally right that other forms evolve. The sector is dynamic, and who knows what will emerge in the next wee while? Again, ministers are rightly giving themselves powers to update the legislation on that constantly.

The question on communities of interest is a good deal more complex. The bill comes from a concept of place and how we develop it; it is not about interest. However, within a place—in particular but not only in an urban context—if a local dramatic society or whatever wanted to purchase a piece of land to develop something or a building to convert it, it would be able to try to move that through the processes that are being developed. There would be no inhibition to that, but ministers would ultimately have to define whether such a registration of interest in the land was in the public interest.

Communities of interest are not excluded, but the bill comes from a different perspective: it is about place, not interests.

John Watt: The structure of the bodies that can apply for funding and use the right has evolved over time. For a long time, it was almost exclusively companies limited by guarantee. That was in a period in which public funding was perhaps more available. Some of the changes to bencoms, for example, are designed to allow such companies to raise private capital as well as to apply for public funding, which we all welcome given the difficulties with public funding. There are ways of achieving both flexibility in capital-raising ability and the community and public interest, and the challenge is to find them.

The bencom model is evolving. Again wearing my lottery hat, we have recently funded the community shares Scotland service, which advises communities on how to raise community shares for a variety of activities. You will probably see various prospectuses from community organisations that are raising money through that mechanism for projects. In many cases, there is a remarkable degree of success.

I ask Sandra Holmes to keep me right if I am wandering, but I recently came across one case in which the company that raised the shares was a bencom—it was an industrial and provident society—but it had built into its memorandum and articles of association the objective of transferring its surplus profits to a community-based charitable organisation. That link between a trading activity, which could be based on owning a land asset, and a community benefit charity is important. There are more complex models than those that have been seen in the past, but we have to look at them carefully, and the legislation should enable that to happen.

Sandra Holmes: There is nothing at all to correct.

As time has moved on and communities have become more innovative, we need more sophisticated approaches. It is difficult to be prescriptive in primary legislation about entity types. We have advocated that, rather than limiting the provision to companies limited by guarantee, SCIOs and bencoms, the bill should set out the required characteristics. If we get the characteristics right, it will then be up to each applicant to demonstrate that its structure fits with the characteristics that are detailed in the legislation.

That approach would be more enabling and would accommodate future developments that we cannot anticipate at this stage. It would also allow communities to see clearly what is needed and it might help to take into account communities of interest.

Communities of interest have a legitimate role but, under the existing structure, the definition of “community” is centred on a geographic community. Currently, the geographic community has to be described using postcodes—although that might change—and the membership of the community has to be established to demonstrate that a majority of them are in favour. It is difficult to get a constituency of voters for a community of interest—how do we determine where the community of interest is and who would get a vote in a ballot?

The current provisions are based on a geographic community, but it might be more enabling and accommodating of future needs if the bill referred to the characteristics.

Claudia Beamish: To follow up on the issue of bencoms, would the bill have to be amended to enable the transfer of assets if something came to a different organisation, such as a charitable organisation, as Mr Watt described?

On Sandra Holmes’s point about a community of interest, I can give an example from my region, where there is a choral society in one town and people travel a considerable distance to it because of its reputation. If the society was to consider purchasing a building to be a venue for an arts hub, we would not want to restrict it. Therefore, Sandra Holmes’s description of a way forward is useful.

John Watt: Some of my colleagues have probably read the bill more carefully than I have—

Claudia Beamish: They have certainly read it more carefully than I have.

John Watt: I think that it contains a provision that gives ministers flexibility on other legal structures, which we should welcome.

David Prescott: The emphasis should be on the people rather than the geographic place. The real community is the people, and the place that they live in is secondary, although I hate to say that and I do not mean it like that. The guiding principle should be to look after the people, and the rest will follow.

The Convener: I have a point that follows on from something that David Prescott said earlier. We have the kinds of constitution that are demanded of different sorts of organisations, and we have the kinds of constitution that are acceptable to the Big Lottery Fund. For example, a body in Evanton, where I live, had to change its constitution three times in order to access the funds that it finally got. Our discussion has not touched on that issue, but I wonder whether the bill will make the process involved simpler and whether we can recommend ways to make it simpler.

Peter Peacock: That is a very challenging question. I have two thoughts about it, one of which is that the issue could be dealt with by administrative means in the sense of getting together the Big Lottery Fund, Government officials and the Scottish land fund and ensuring that they are all asking for broadly the same thing.

Secondly, the flexibility that, as I understand it, ministers will have to add to the bill’s proposed list should not be used sparingly when there is a need, as it would help to avoid the need for people to have to do very cumbersome and difficult things. In fact, one part of the bill that we might come to implies that people have to do more of those things in order to comply with the bill’s requirements, which will take up a lot of energy and effort. However, I think that flexibilities are emerging that will help.

John Watt: I am on slightly dangerous ground defending the Big Lottery Fund.

The Convener: Definitely.

John Watt: However, we have always attempted to ensure that our programmes are aligned with the legislation. Therefore, if the legislation changed and constitutional models that were more flexible were to be used, I am sure that the Big Lottery Fund would be enthusiastic in entering into dialogue about alignment.

The Convener: That would be very helpful indeed.

Sandra Holmes: We hold template articles for communities. HIE set up that facility and manages it—we update the articles if there are any changes to company law. We went to some lengths to consult the Scottish Government to ensure that our template articles fitted with the community right to buy provisions. We also checked them with the Office of the Scottish Charity Regulator because of certain provisions in charity law.

We have a template on our website that anybody can access. If people do not deviate significantly from the template, it will meet the community right to buy provisions and should get an organisation a long way towards getting charitable status if it believes that that is appropriate for it. If any changes come through from the process of this bill, we will update the template accordingly. We can do quite a lot of enabling activity outwith the legislation. Clearly, we are all looking to smooth the path as much as we can.

The Convener: Thank you. That is a helpful point that we will bear in mind as we go along. Have you finished your questions, Claudia?

Claudia Beamish: Yes.

The Convener: We have a question from Dave Thompson on detailed procedures and requirements.

Dave Thompson: A number of the witnesses mentioned in their submissions issues to do with registration. Holmehill Community Buyout said that “The requirement to pre-register for a right to buy is unrealistic” and HIE stated that

“late registrations are very much the rule rather than the exception.”

Community Land Scotland said that

“It would be best to accept late registration as the likely norm and of itself need not be justified by any prior action or lack of action”.

I am interested in all of that because I wonder whether we should have early registration at all.
Should we not just have a registration system that kicks in when a community is made aware that land might be available, rather than communities having to do an awful lot of work beforehand in trying to identify what land might be available in the future, which would be pretty difficult? I would like to hear your views on whether we need early registration. I think we should still have quite tough rules on registration. Perhaps they should be even tougher—which, I think, Community Land Scotland recommended in its submission.

Peter Peacock: It is a hugely important issue, because what is emerging—Sandra Holmes will be able to comment on this much more than I can, because she has seen an awful lot more cases—is that communities do not approach the world by thinking about the land around them in the abstract. They do not think, “Is there anything that we need to think about here?” or, “What land do we have to register an interest in?” That would be quite cumbersome for the reasons that we have heard, and it is not the real world of communities. Experience shows that. It seems to me that the norm will increasingly be that communities will pay attention to such things only the minute that the land comes on the market. We should accept that as the norm. Therefore, the challenge is in finding the right tests and hurdles while not ruling out that situation.

I was interested in the dialogue that went on last week between Dave Thompson MSP and the bill team’s Dave Thomson—it became a bit confusing. Dave Thompson MSP asked why early registration is necessary. I went back and read the policy memorandum to the 2003 act, and it became clear to me that there were two things at work in requiring early registration. First, at the time when the policy memorandum was written, there was real concern that having a free and open right to buy without people having to register would have a universal impact on property rights and the property market. The logic of having people register was that the right to buy would apply only to those who had registered—it would not be a universal right. Secondly, it is bureaucratically tidy to know in advance what land is likely to have to go through the process. I think that those are the two reasons for that requirement.

The other thing that was interesting in the dialogue between Dave Thompson and Dave Thomson was that the bill team’s Dave Thomson made it clear that the situation that Dave Thompson MSP was referring to—which I think you called a “light-bulb moment”, when people suddenly think, “We’re going to have to do something about this”—is not provided for in the bill. The key question is, how do we provide for that situation? Also during the dialogue last week, I was struck by the thought that what is now proposed—that a community must show that it has taken prior steps or done prior work sufficiently in advance of the land coming on the market—is potentially difficult and damaging because that requirement will be impossible to meet. I think that the bill team has constructed a mechanism simply to deal with situations in which a community has taken prior steps and done prior work, which makes it easier for that community to get registered. However, the key question is this: what about communities that have not done that? They will be the norm.

In my view, late registration must be allowed to happen in that situation, but there must be suitable tests to make sure that it does not just happen automatically. The challenge is in finding the right tests. Two of them are in place already: an application has to show both greater community support than would be required for a normal registration, and that the proposal would be in the public interest and would further sustainable development. Another test could be added, as we have suggested. It is a very important issue. If we do not get it right, communities will automatically be excluded from using the provisions in the 2003 act.

Alex Fergusson: I was going to raise this issue later, but Mr Peacock has raised it just now. Community Land Scotland has suggested that the 2003 act could be amended to state that “eligible land would be land, the sale of which to a community body, would contribute to the achievement of a greater diversity of ownership of land in Scotland.”

I assume that that is the additional test that he just referred to.

Peter Peacock: No. That would be further on in the process.

Alex Fergusson: In that case, I will leave my question until later. I am sorry—I thought that that was what you were referring to.

Peter Peacock: I am glad that we have got advance warning of that question.

David Prescott: The light-bulb moment for Holmehill was when the “For Sale” sign went up on a piece of land that was in the planning process and that we had free rein to wander over. Everybody regarded the land as being ours—that is, as belonging to the community. When the land suddenly went up for sale with development potential—whatever the term is—we thought, “Hang on a minute—that’s not what we’ve got.” However, there is no way that the community would have found a way to register, particularly as it needed to get a petition, membership and voting numbers. Also, it would need to register again every five years, with everything that goes with that. Ours was a typical experience.

I am quite sure that many communities, if we expand the provision to urban environments, will start to have those light-bulb moments, as community facilities that they have enjoyed for many years are suddenly turned off or shut. I can think of a few examples—I am sure that all of you can, too—in which something has been provided to the community by the private sector and suddenly the private sector stops providing it. It might be of community value and the community might wish to retain it, but it cannot register somebody else’s property. People do not go out registering somebody else’s property on the off-chance that such a thing might happen.

I think that you are going to see an awful lot more such responses. If a community is going to be empowered to look after itself and develop itself and therefore to become much more financially, emotionally and generally sustainable, you genuinely want those facilities to be taken into a form of ownership that may be able to survive when the private sector has not been able to survive because that form of ownership uses a different form of provision of labour through volunteering, and all the things that go with that.

Sandra Holmes: I can offer a slightly different take on things. We would certainly support communities being proactive and putting steps in place in advance of something coming on to the market. That is how things have been in relation to the 2003 act. The reality, as has been borne out, is that communities respond to opportunities. That is partly because the process of timely registration is quite onerous; it means forming a company and getting support from 10 per cent of the community. Also, the application pertains only to one asset—it could be one building or one bit of land—when it might need multiple assets. If the community just wanted to get a couple of acres of land, it would have to do multiple applications. It is a lot of work to go through when the community is not guaranteed success in the process.

The difficulty with a late registration is that when a community applies late, it has at the moment to satisfy the good reasons test. My understanding is that the good reasons test was put in to enable the 2003 act to work in the earlier stages of the process. Good reasons were used later that had perhaps not been envisaged. We welcome the removal of the good reasons test, but we are a bit concerned about the proposed replacement provision, which talks about “relevant work” and “relevant steps” being needed to show that a community is being proactive.

We envisage that there could be a bit of a hybrid. If a community is being proactive—if it can demonstrate in community council minutes or through a development plan that it has aspirations to own a building or a development plot and it can articulate that—later on, if that asset comes up for sale, the community has put that marker down. That would hopefully enable the community to demonstrate that it has taken relevant steps and carried out relevant work because the process of responding to a late application is quite challenging. Within a very short period, the community would potentially have to form a company and get members of that company. It would also have to get signatures from more than 10 per cent of the community, because it would be a late registration, and then the community would have to make an application.

Assuming that a late registration application is accepted, the community is then straight into having to raise the funds for the purchase. That is where the current part 2 of the 2003 act gets quite a lot of bad press because that is a very onerous process. I think that something can be done to change that. We can still ask communities to be proactive but from a more general, strategic point of view. Those “relevant works” and “relevant steps” requirements could fit in with that approach, so the community could have that marker down. That would open up greater opportunities. I think that approach would be more workable for communities—as well as for the supporting agencies, because it is quite difficult for us to be able to respond very quickly when something is going through a late procedure. At the moment, there is a good chance that late procedures will not be successful.

Peter Peacock: I want to come back on that and to answer Mr Fergusson’s question that I did not answer. The issue is sortable; indeed, it is not too difficult to sort. Sorting it would require— notwithstanding what Sandra Holmes said, which would be the preferable position—that when a community has not registered its interest it should nonetheless be allowed to make its case to the minister, and there should be criteria against which the minister can judge such cases. For example—I know about this because I attended a meeting about it—we had phone calls from people in Blairgowrie when suddenly, overnight, the Co-op’s farms came on the market. No one would have expected that, so why would they have registered an interest? As soon as the farms came on the market, people thought that they should do something about it.

I also had an email from someone in Donside who said that a piece of land that was central to the community had suddenly come on the market. They had never in their wildest imagination expected that to happen and they were now thinking about what they could do about the situation.
All that we are arguing for is an opportunity for such matters to be properly considered, and for there not to be just a simple test. To look at the matter from a landowner’s point of view, they may have done a lot of work to prepare the ground for a farm to come on the market, so they would want the sale to be expedited. There must be some pressure to do that.

We suggested to the bill team an extra test that might be put in the bill to cover such circumstances. Applications have to satisfy a requirement for high support in the community and must be strongly indicative that they are in the public interest, in the current basic test. We also wanted something to be included about there being a reasonable likelihood that the community could conclude the deal. The last thing we want is for a community to go through a process in which there is no reasonable likelihood that it will be able to raise the money, or whatever. That test would be another little hurdle that we think would be fair. We can find a workable answer, which is the important thing. We have not got that yet.

John Watt: I want to table an idea. As you know, the land reform review group of which I was a member produced a menu of rights for communities. The first right that we suggested was a “right lite” whereby a community could simply register an interest. Under the 2003 act, there is a right of pre-emption. However, if there was a right to register an interest and to be notified when land was coming on to the market or ownership was changing, that would trigger the process of the “heavier” right of registering a right of pre-emption. We thought that that might be a way of getting round everything becoming a late registration.

The Convener: We will be taking quite a bit of evidence on that matter, but it is important to get views on it now as we are getting suggestions for amendments. It is a good idea to get those in at an early stage for the committee to consider before it reports.

Claudia Beamish: I understand that the land reform review group’s written evidence recommended that re-registration of an interest in land should be needed only every 10 years rather than every five years, given how onerous registration is and the complexities for communities. Does the panel have any comments on that?

John Watt: I reiterate that the process of re-registration every five years is onerous and that 10 years would be a more appropriate timescale.

David Prescott: Holmehill Community Buyout looked at the issue, too. With re-registration communities must, in effect, do the same thing again, so there is a risk of registration fatigue. An issue that we have not perhaps understood properly is refreshing—which is how I would prefer to describe it—of registrations rather than redoing them. In doing that, we would need to ensure that we had obvious community support. It would not necessarily be about finding another 10 per cent of the community who were prepared to sign things, and completely redoing the documentation. In Holmehill’s case, for example, I would expect that to include support from the community council, as elected representatives. If they did not support the case, we would have more difficulty. There is also the general issue of what reflects community support and what reflects community opposition, both of which are equally valid. I see the need to refresh registrations and to make sure that people are still supportive, because of the impacts on someone’s private property, but the measure needs to be proportionate.

Peter Peacock: I agree entirely with that. CLS argued in our submission for a 10-year period before re-registration, too. I noticed that, last week, the members of the bill team signalled that they plan to simplify the form and the process. That will be welcome, but that does not negate the point that there should be a longer period. It might be that there should be an honourable compromise.

Dave Thompson: Another thing in the same area is the bill’s requirement for a community to identify ownership. In some cases, that will be extremely difficult for the community to do. Does the panel have any comments on that?

Sandra Holmes: I agree that identification can be challenging. We would seek a modification to the requirement: the community should be required to try to achieve identification of the rightful owner but, if that cannot be done, it should be sufficient for it to demonstrate the steps that it has gone through to try to identify the rightful owner. That should be deemed to be reasonable.

The Convener: The issue relates to wider issues in the land reform agenda. It will be interesting if that point is made later today or in detail.

Peter Peacock: I agree with that entirely. My understanding—I stand to be corrected—is that, with regard to compulsory purchase orders, there is a procedure that allows a local authority to proceed with a compulsory purchase even if the owner cannot be identified, as long as all reasonable steps to identify the owner have been taken. Clearly, however, it is best to identify the owner.

Last week, the members of the bill team talked about an absolute requirement to identify the owner. In response to that, I direct them to the argument that I have just made. However, they also suggested that there is an alternative procedure. I think that they were referring to the Queen’s and Lord Treasurer’s Remembrancer, to whom bona vacantia land falls. The suggestion was that if the owner could not be found and the land were declared bona vacantia, you could approach the Queen’s and Lord Treasurer’s Remembrancer to purchase the land. However, I do not know whether that would work—perhaps it would, but that would have to be checked out. I would prefer it if we sorted out the arrangements in the bill.

David Prescott: Subsequent to Holmehill trying to deal with the registration and so on, I happened to be in Edinburgh, so I went to Registers of Scotland. The system there worked extremely well and was extremely user friendly, and I got all the information that was held there. That information does not necessarily correspond with the owner’s claimed ownership, but my view is that a reasonable test of reasonableness for a community body should involve whatever is on the public record and that, if people want to hide their land ownership, that should not be a way of avoiding being part of the community.

I know that people can get professionals to access the land register if they cannot get to Edinburgh, which costs a little more, but it struck me that that was an extremely good way of moving forward. I was genuinely quite impressed and feel that Registers of Scotland is one of the places where options should be registered. That would mean that options would be held on the public record even if—as I accept might happen—they were redacted in the interests of safeguarding confidential information.

Alex Fergusson: It might be a bit unfair to ask for a lot of detail on the Queen’s and Lord Treasurer’s Remembrancer, but I have a question with regard to a constituency issue that I very much hope will become the subject of proceedings under the community right to buy. My understanding is that, since the establishment of the Scottish Parliament in 1999, land that falls to the ownership of the QLTR effectively falls to the Scottish Government, as Scottish ministers now have control—if that is the right word—of the QLTR. Am I wrong about that?

Peter Peacock: I simply do not know the detail of that. If it is being suggested that you must know who the owner of the land is or go through the QLTR route, I think that you would have to check out all the details around taking the QLTR route in order to confirm that that would be robust. On the face of it, if the QLTR owned the land, it could perhaps give a first right of refusal to the community, which might satisfy the matter. I do not know whether that is possible.

The Convener: We will take that on board.

Alex Fergusson: I am sure that we will explore the matter in due course.

Dave Thompson: Peter Peacock, you mentioned this point; I think is also in your submission. When we get through this process, there will be an act and that is fine. However, you said that a lot of negotiation is going on, with the bill in the background. My point is that, rather than have people go through strict legal processes and procedures, which would make a lot of money for lawyers and take longer, we should facilitate mediation. There are a lot of good mediation organisations in Scotland. Last week, I was at an excellent event, run by John Sturrock with American mediator Ken Cloke, here in the Parliament. We should build mediation into the bill to enable HIE or whoever to facilitate discussion between a landowner and a community so that they are not at legal loggerheads.

Peter Peacock: I absolutely agree. It is striking that, where a landowner and a community can sit and work things out, that is by far the best way of doing things. However, there are examples where that is really difficult. I will not labour this, but a case has been running for a long time that, ultimately, has been sorted out—I hope it has been sorted out—by bringing the parties together with a trusted third party. That has been done purely on an ad hoc basis, though. The third party happened to live locally to the two other parties and it seems to have worked—or it has certainly added to the process. We have to be much more deliberate.

My understanding is that, although HIE and the Scottish Government team that deals with these things will recommend to a community that it is better that it negotiates, they do not have powers to do anything about that. I would have thought that a simple power to enable a minister to facilitate negotiation would help enormously. That could be by ensuring that a mediator was appointed, or whatever.

The Convener: There is the Arbitration (Scotland) Act 2010 and the organisation that has been set up to arbitrate in business. That might be something that we can take on board in our report—we could see how that organisation fits in with the concept of mediation in a more formal sense.

Sandra Holmes, you talked about demonstrating reasonable behaviour. There are issues to do with periods of activity, interest, time limits, the appointment of balloters and so on. We have detailed evidence from you on that. Do you want to make any other points on the procedures and requirements?
Sandra Holmes: I have got one point. It is in our evidence, but I would like to raise it briefly. It is to do with section 31(4)(aa)(iii), which I will put into plainspeak. When communities look at taking forward a project, the starting point might be a community council or a group of individuals. It is sometimes later on before the entity—the community body—is set up. Section 31(4)(aa)(iii) says that any work that was done would have had to be done in the name or under the guise of a community body that had not yet been set up. We would really welcome that being decoupled, because it is common for a sub-group of a community council, or interested people who come together, to do the foundation work and the initial feasibility study. That often happens for projects outwith the legislation, but it is tried and tested practice.

We support organisations in those formative stages and our sense is that the work of that organisation or that group of individuals coming together on behalf of the community is no less valid than had it been done under the community body that might be formed later on. There is a time and a place to form the community body, but there will always be preparatory work. It is a minor issue, but it could have quite significant consequences if it stays in the bill.

The Convener: Thank you for that. We move on to abandoned and neglected land.

Nigel Don: We have heard a lot of talk about processes and aspirations, but I would like to look at the text. For the record, I am on page 29 of the bill, which is section 48. However, numbers such as 97C refer to the section that the bill will put into the 2003 act. I hope that anybody reading the Official Report will have a clue about what we are doing.

New section 97C(1) of the 2003 act states:

In light of the discussion that we have had and the discussion that we had last week, it is still not obvious to me why those criteria should be in the bill. First, can anybody explain or justify the rationale behind them? Secondly, what on earth do they mean anyway?

Peter Peacock: I will kick off. We very much welcome the principle of part 4. We welcome section 48, because it fills a gap in the current provisions, which is that the public interest in ownership of land cannot be tested other than with crofting land. It is therefore an important principle and we welcome it. We see it very much as a power of last resort, rather than one of first use.

However, as you suggest, the devil is in the detail and we have some serious reservations. I am not clear why the “abandoned or neglected” provision has been introduced. There was a dialogue about that last week between Mr Thompson, Mr Thomson and the solicitor who was at the meeting. I have thought further about it, and there are probably two potential reasons for the provision. One is that it is there for a European convention on human rights reason—to try to ensure that what is, in effect, an interference in a property right is less challengeable under the ECHR than would otherwise be the case.

If that is the case—and I am not clear that it is—I am not clear that the provision is required, because it seems to me to be a substantially greater hurdle than is required, for example, by the crofting right to buy under part 3 of the 2003 act, which is simply founded on whether further sustainable development is in the public interest.

The other reason is an innocent one, if I can put it in that way—not that the other one is sinister. It is simply that the provision is there only to provide for what is abandoned or neglected land. If that is the case, it is not unreasonable. The problem is that, because it is the only definition in the bill, it could lead to the unintended consequence that land that is not “wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected” but is nonetheless in need of sustained development is ruled out of consideration. That is the big trap in the bill.

It is important to clarify precisely why the provision is there. I do not think that it is impossible to work through it, but at present it is not entirely clear why it is there.

David Prescott: Until June last year, we could well have defined our land as neglected by the landowner, who had done absolutely nothing for several years. When he came up and chopped down all the trees and suchlike, that was not neglect. What he did was pretty awful. It was illegal and various other things, but it would not fall into the “neglected” definition, and the land was certainly not abandoned, because he did know his property rights.

I agree with Peter Peacock. This is a small and specific example, but my concern is that, in our case, the land is not able to be used in the way in which the planning designation and the community at large have defined that it should be used. The community has set out its stall, but the value of the land is being damaged.

This is an entirely personal view, but I have an issue with the ECHR. There are property rights, but property owners also have responsibilities to their communities, and rights and responsibilities need to be somewhat balanced. I know that this sounds terribly bold. I am not saying that we should be able to take over everybody’s land, but if someone is part of a community, they have a responsibility to try to live and work with it—all of us do. There has to be some kind of balance there, rather than property rights exclusively swamping everything else.

The Convener: Indeed. Thank you. John Watt wants to comment.

John Watt: I, too, was surprised to see such a restriction of potential rights. I would prefer to have something in the bill about fulfilling the greatest potential for sustainable development, rather than a requirement that land should be proven to be “abandoned or neglected”.

As Peter Peacock said, the ECHR may have been in the back of the minds of those who drafted the bill. I suspect that they may also have been thinking about the urban situation, in which abandonment and neglect can be identified more easily than it can in a rural situation, especially for larger tracts of land.

The Convener: So we are talking about gap sites. The provision was probably written when the drafters were considering extending the bill to cover urban buildings.

Nigel Don: I have jumped on to the new section 97G(6)(ii) to be inserted in the 2003 act. I wonder whether the comments that have been made so far also suggest that sustainable development ought to include leaving land wild. There may be areas where one might want a meadow and other things around it to be left alone. Could that be part of the current definition of sustainable development?

Peter Peacock: Sustainable development is defined in three ways. That is the problem at the heart of the definition of “abandoned and neglected”: it deals with one of the three definitions of sustainable development but not necessarily with the other two.

As the committee will know better than I do, given that it deals with sustainable development all the time, the concept relates not only to the environmental component that Nigel Don has just described, but to economic and social development.

The difficulty with sticking to a definition of abandonment and neglect is that it appears to relate to the physical construct of the land rather than to sustainable development. The whole policy purpose of the bill, and of the original 2003 act, is about furthering sustainable development.

There is a bit of a trap here, given the way in which sustainable development is currently defined. The issue can be sorted—for example, it would be possible to have a third criterion. If the aim of the requirement for a building to be proven to be “abandoned and neglected” is as the convener described—which I can readily see that it is—the bill could specify that a building can also be proven to be in need of sustainable or sustained development. That would allow the social and economic considerations to be taken into account.

There is another way to do it. The bill as it is currently drafted seeks to define some of the factors to which ministers must have regard in relation to “abandoned and neglected” buildings. However, there is a problem, because the phrase “abandoned and neglected” suggests only the physical element and not the wider parameters that I have just described. A third criterion could be added, or abandonment and neglect could be defined in the text of the bill.

Such a definition would allow us to consider economic and social development as well as the physical attributes of the land. There are problems with the definition as it stands, but I think that it can be sorted. The members of the bill team, in their discussion with Nigel Don at committee last week, seemed to say that they were looking at how some of those elements are defined in the text of the bill. The situation will depend on where that consideration takes us, I guess.

Nigel Don: I hope that others may have some comments on that aspect. I read the meaning of my discussion with the bill team in the same way as Peter Peacock did, but I think that the team probably needs a bit of help. To be honest, my interpretation—which came up in that discussion—is exactly what we have just discussed.

If there is a gap site in a town, we think that we know what it looks like. It may in fact be an old coal yard or something similar, with a wooded area behind it. It has not been abandoned: that is just the way it has aye been. One can see how, although such a definition would work in many environments, it might have absolutely nothing to do with other environments.

We need to expand the definition, and I guess the bill team would like some help on that. Does anyone else have any comments as to where the team might go?

David Prescott: The view that was presented to us when we started was that development is all about steel, concrete, tarmac, bricks and all the rest of it. That was an issue, because our view was that development is about environmental and social benefit and providing a facility for the community.

We did not intend to leave the land to go wild—in fact, our aim was quite the opposite. We recognise that most of the trees will, in time, need to be cut down because they are reaching the end of their 200 to 250-year lifespan. Therefore, we need to develop, in as much as we need to change and move on and try to maintain and improve the environment.

We had this very real problem: sustainable development is what we wish to do and we believe that is what we should achieve, but unfortunately we cannot get it through the current planning process. Although we have land that is public open space, the only protection that we can secure is a tree protection order. That does not do anything to address the other issues—it just stops the trees being chopped down without informing the council. There is no development capability.

We have a long history of this issue and trying to improve the land and I could explain it in detail if you wish, but now is probably not the time.

The Convener: Indeed, this is a long and involved process as it is.

Nigel Don: May I move on?

The Convener: Dave Thompson has a supplementary question to ask before we move on.

Dave Thompson: I want to raise a related point about the ownership of the land. I am referring to new section 97H(c) of the 2003 act:

“that, if the owner of the land were to remain as its owner, that ownership would be inconsistent with furthering the achievement of sustainable development in relation to the land”.

That will be almost impossible to prove. Given that we now have the Pairc judgment in relation to crofting and the minister has approved the criteria laid out to define sustainable development, do we need the section at all?

The Convener: Rapid comments, please.

Peter Peacock: Frankly, this is a killer clause. It is a matter of interpretation, but on the face of it, one could demonstrate that a piece of land, in current terms, was “wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected”. yet it could also be found that, in itself, the ownership of the land by the current owner was not inconsistent with furthering sustainable development and therefore the minister would be bound to reject the application. That is why it is potentially a killer clause.

I do not understand, although it probably can be explained, why the test is necessary if there is already a series of criteria that the minister must use—such as agreement that it is abandoned or neglected land—to judge whether it is in the public interest to further sustainable development. Would it be wise to leave open a situation where it has been proved that land is abandoned or neglected, but the application could still be rejected because the current ownership was not, of itself, inconsistent with furthering sustainable development?

The two tests seem to be in opposition to one another. There is some tricky stuff in that.

Roderick Campbell: The Law Society of Scotland draws a parallel with the procedure for compulsory purchase. Can you expand on that point and tell us whether there is any guidance on compulsory purchase that might help us in dealing with the question of abandoned or neglected land?

Duncan Burd: If you are unable to identify the true owner of the land, compulsory purchase involves an advertising mechanism. Something as open and transparent as that mechanism might help under community right to buy.

Roderick Campbell: That would not specifically address the point about abandoned or neglected land, per se, as it relates only to ownership.

Duncan Burd: It would in effect identify the owner through advertisements in The Edinburgh Gazette and local newspapers.

Roderick Campbell: Yes, but it does not help us with the definitional aspect of “abandoned or neglected”.

Duncan Burd: No, and I do not think that the Law Society of Scotland wants to comment more fully on those definitions at this time because it is a minefield.

Roderick Campbell: Okay.

Duncan Burd: If the committee is willing to grasp the nettle and provide a definition then we will comment on it at that stage.

Nigel Don: That is fascinating. We give you minefields, although not intentionally.

New section 97G(5)(b)(i) requires us to specify “the owner of the land”. In the light of what has just been said, is that not a problem in itself?

Peter Peacock: That goes back to the point that we made earlier about identifying the owner. It runs through part 32 and new part 3A. If I understand what Mr Burd said, as long as the community makes every possible effort and follows all the procedures to identify the owner but cannot, that should not be an impediment to the community getting permission to pursue the purchase of the land. It is in the bill.

Nigel Don: We have already discussed section 97C(3)(e). I do not want to try the law in Latin. Why should land that falls to the Crown because the owner cannot be identified or because it falls in succession and there is no successor be exempt? Can anybody explain that to me? The answer I got to that question last week was that it is about process, but I do not really buy that. It might be about process, but surely it should be open to the community to have access to that land.

Peter Peacock: That is my view, but it is in the bill because, by definition, the owner cannot be defined, so the land falls to the Crown. That is why bona vacantia is mentioned. The land is excluded because nobody can identify the owner and if the owner cannot be identified, the land is excluded. The point would be whether a community can exercise any rights over land if it is in the ownership of the Queen's and Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer.

Nigel Don: Forgive me, but that is the policy point that I want to address. We tend to leave out the Crown. Almost the first lesson we learn in law is that the Crown will be excluded. Why? Why on earth should it matter that the land is known to be in the possession or occupation of the Crown? Can anyone rationalise why that should be the case? No? Thank you. Okay, I will push on.

New section 97G(6)(d) requires us to say that we know about all the rights and all the interests in the land—I am glad that there is a lawyer here—and to say anything we know about the "sewers, pipes, lines, watercourses" and other stuff that is under the ground. Why is that a good idea? Why is it in the bill? Can anybody convince me that it is not a daft idea because it is almost impossible to know what is under the land until it has been dug up, which is a stupid thing to do?

Peter Peacock: I do not understand it. In our written submission, we made the point that that requires clarification, and that such land should be eligible rather than not eligible.

Nigel Don: I am sorry; I am rather feeding you the words, but I am hoping that people will disagree with me.

The Law Society’s submission talks about clean title under a compulsory purchase order and suggests that a community would not get clean title under the bill. Do you have any further thoughts on whether a community should get clean title if it has gone through the proposed process?

Duncan Burd: It would guarantee that the title was immune to subsequent challenge.

Nigel Don: Apart from the obvious opportunity of business for lawyers, is there any real downside to that?

Duncan Burd: No.

Alex Fergusson: If we remove all the criteria that we have been talking about, how do we ensure that this is the policy of last resort that Mr Peacock referred to in his opening remarks?

Peter Peacock: We are not arguing that we should remove all these criteria. Mr Thompson made a particular point about one part and having to demonstrate that keeping the land in its current ownership would be inconsistent with sustainable development. It is just not possible to prove that.

Our hope is, and the bill specifies, that the community would also have to show that it had tried all other means to get the land before it made the application. Other means would be things like seeking to negotiate or discuss matters with the landowner, making an offer for the land and so on. Those are entirely appropriate tests. That puts this test at the end of the queue. If the community could not show that it had tried to get the land by other means, it would not be able to progress with the application under the new section 3A. That makes it very much a fallback power. Nonetheless, it is that power that focuses people’s minds and, as we saw in the context of the crofting right to buy, gives rise to the climate in which debate and discussion about negotiated land purchases can proceed. I hope that that answers your question.

The Convener: We move on to the interpretation of “sustainable development”, which might offer an escape tunnel to get us away from this debate. Nigel Don will kick off questions on that.

Nigel Don: We have probably covered everything that I thought that we needed to cover. I was particularly concerned about wild land meeting the sustainable development test, which I think might be the case in some places.

The Convener: If no one wants to comment on that, Dave Thompson wants to come in.

Dave Thompson: I just wanted to reiterate the point that the crofting legislation and the Pairc judgment give us a clear steer on the issue.

Duncan Burd: I declare an interest, because I have been involved in Pairc—I have dragged it out for 11 years. [Laughter.] It is still in court, so it is sub judice. The 2012 ruling was simply a sideshow to a sheriff court action that is still on-going.

The Convener: Right. We will not get involved in Pairc—

Duncan Burd: I think that that is proof in itself that the 2003 act is full of pitfalls.

The Convener: Yes.
We have teased out issues to do with sustainable development quite well, but it strikes me that we still need to know whether the panel thinks that if ministers are going to find it difficult to satisfy the sustainable development test in relation to land, that will be inconsistent with the aim of furthering sustainable development. Should we put something in the bill about how land is defined in that regard? In the past, there has been a sense that we have not been talking about development of the sort that we discussed in relation to Dunblane. We have to be clear about what we are talking about. There is a much wider approach to defining land that should be in community ownership.

Peter Peacock: This is really difficult legal territory. The whole technical of the 2003 act was to promote and remove obstacles to sustainable development. Notwithstanding what Mr Burd said, in the Pairc case the judges commented that sustainable development is a well understood term, which relates to "the use and development of land."

I suppose that what it comes down to is how we describe the use and development of land. What ministers thought about that is openly revealed in the early decision letters about Pairc, both when they refused an application and explained why it did not meet the sustainable development test, and later when they approved the application and showed why it did meet that test.

There is quite a lot of case law—I mean that in the general rather than the technical sense—about what sustainable development means. In that sense, the issue is not too difficult. The key thing is to allow a community to make the case that what it proposes would advance or further sustainable development. The problem with the current definitions around abandoned and neglected land is that it appears that such a case cannot be made. However, that can be dealt with.

David Prescott: I feel, having been through it all, that the planning process sets out a framework for the development concepts in a physical community—whether it is truly sustainable development, I will not try to argue. However, certainly in the urban environment the issue is whether the use of the land is in line with the planning designations on the land, which are democratically derived and fully consulted on and picked over, and whether a community’s proposed changes recognise that the current usage is no longer the right one and a second stage is sought—that is probably a bit complicated to work through.

The planning process has a lot to offer in urban areas. I will be quite honest: if the land that we wanted to buy had already been designated as land for building, I would not have expected us to have got the right to buy, and we would not have started. I freely admit that. The land was designated as open space, and that is what we wanted it to be, for the community to use.

There are interesting cases of planning applications for developments that in effect would blight the land, which will keep being rerun—for ever. Such things need to be thought through. The planning process is an extremely strong place from which to start in a more urban environment.

The Convener: That is a good point for us to take on board. We rely on the planning process to get things right, having taken on board the community’s views. We all know that sometimes planners use wider criteria to override what communities want. I can think of examples of appeals in that regard.

I think that we agree, in general, that the agreed local plans are materially helpful and can back up what ministers have to do when they must make a decision.

I do not know whether we will see all the witnesses again. It is entirely possible that we will do, at another stage in the process. A point that I want to make is that the bill will amend part 3 of the 2003 act with regard to crofting, and I hope that the changes at stage 2 are not so major that they affect the proposed use of part 3 in relation to the community right to buy.

Peter Peacock: We have seen what the Scottish Government proposed in its consultation, and I know from meetings that have taken place over the course of the past week or two that a pretty clear consensus is emerging across all the interested parties. I hope that I can reassure the committee that it need not worry too much about the issue, which looks like it is heading in the right direction. The Scottish Government is dealing with the matter entirely appropriately, by the looks of things.

The Convener: Thank you.

We have had a long session, which I will bring to a close, because the committee has other business to deal with.

At our next meeting, on 3 December, the committee will take evidence from the minister on a draft affirmative Scottish statutory instrument—the Public Water Supplies (Scotland) Regulations 2014—and will take evidence on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill from two panels of stakeholders.

On resuming—

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener: The next agenda item is evidence on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill from two panels of stakeholders. With the first panel we will focus on the rural context of the bill, and with the second we will focus on the urban context and European convention on human rights issues.

I welcome the first panel, which consists of Jon Hollingdale, who is the chief executive of the Community Woodlands Association; Simon Fraser, who is a solicitor from Anderson MacArthur Ltd; Malcolm Combe, who is a lecturer in law in the school of law at the University of Aberdeen; Rory Dutton, who is a development officer for the Development Trusts Association Scotland; and Sarah-Jane Laing, who is director of policy and parliamentary affairs for Scottish Land & Estates.

I refer members to the papers. We open questions with Graeme Dey.

Graeme Dey: Good morning. My questions are more scene-setting questions than anything else. Are panel members satisfied with the extent of the dialogue and consultation on both the community right to buy and the crofting community right to buy? Would it have been more appropriate if the part 4 provisions had been included in separate land reform legislation?

The Convener: The microphones are controlled centrally, so the panel need not switch them on and off. You can just indicate to me that you want to speak, and I will bring you in. Who wants to kick off?

Jon Hollingdale (Community Woodlands Association): In general, we were happy with the extensive consultation process. We concentrated more on part 2 of the bill than on the crofting community right to buy—we did not respond on that.

On which bit of the legislation should go in which bill, a year or two ago, when it became apparent that there was a double stream—the land reform review group and the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill—several of us asked whether the community right to buy would be better in the land reform work. At that time, we did not know that a new land reform bill would be coming, so we were happy that something was being done on some of the issues with the community right to buy. If the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill was to be the vehicle to make that happen, we were happy with that. With the benefit of hindsight, I can say that it might perhaps be better in the proposed land reform bill, but we did not know about that at the time.

Simon Fraser (Anderson MacArthur): The consultation on the crofting community right to buy was fine. The suggested changes to part 3 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 have come along pretty late in the day, and it will be essential to ensure that the enhanced community right to buy—which, in a way, mirrors the current crofting community right to buy—is brought into line with whatever is done to the crofting community right to buy as a consequence of the new measures.

Malcolm Combe (University of Aberdeen): There was an exploratory consultation and a follow-up consultation, so there has been plenty of chance to get involved.

On the positioning of measures within a bill that might be headed “land reform”, we might hark back to the passage of the 2003 act, when some people thought that the access provisions should not have been in part 1 of that act but in an access act. However, to some extent, as long as the law is on the statute book, it is fine. It would be optimal if the bill had a better and clearer title, but as Jon Hollingdale mentioned, because of the way in which things have developed, we can see why it has ended up under the heading of community empowerment as opposed to land reform.

Rory Dutton (Development Trusts Association Scotland): We are happy with the consultation. We were interested primarily in the other elements of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill in its early stages. Perhaps, with hindsight, part 4 of the bill could have been part of the broader land reform agenda, but we have no complaints so far.

Sarah-Jane Laing (Scottish Land & Estates): On the crofting community right to buy, we are more than happy with the consultation that is taking place throughout the country at the moment; the discussions on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill have been lengthy and extensive. We would probably have liked more consultation on the definitions of abandoned land and neglected land, which I am sure we will talk about later.

On where the community right to buy should be placed, we have all agreed that land reform is a process. It is not necessary for all land reform measures to be in one bill: land reform is affected by various pieces of legislation. However, we need to ensure that people have clarity about what is happening. Simon Fraser referred to how changes impact on other changes; I worry that there might be some confusion if we have parallel pieces of legislation dealing with the same issue.

The Convener: Part 3 of the 2003 act, on the crofting community right to buy, is almost a live issue in terms of court proceedings, so it is important that changes to that, which we will investigate further and debate at stage 2, be dealt with before amendments are made to the community right to buy so that we are at that stage up to date with what the regulations will say. It might address Simon Fraser’s point if things are dealt with in that order. If we are agreed about that, it is something to note for the future.

Alex Fergusson (Galloway and West Dumfries) (Con): Good morning, panel. This question, too, is a bit of a scene setter. Back in June, the convener of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee wrote to the Minister for Local Government and Planning expressing a few concerns about the information that was provided in the policy memorandum. In fact, he described it as “little more than a superficial overview”, which is quite a criticism. Correspondence went back and forth and a few things were clarified.

However, at the end of the day, the policy memorandum devotes fewer than three pages to part 4 of the bill. At one point, it summarises 20 sections in a mere seven bullet points. My question is simple: does anyone feel that they were not provided with enough information to explain the bill’s aims, policy choices and provisions fully, or were you satisfied that enough information was provided?

Sarah-Jane Laing: As a Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill stakeholder, Scottish Land & Estates got quite a lot of information, but that information was not fully reflected in the policy memorandum. The Scottish Government did a great job in developing the plain English guide, which was very useful. However, I am not sure that we have had enough information. I have come to that conclusion having discussed elements of the bill, because we have different people saying provisions mean different things. That means that, somewhere along the line, the explanatory notes and the policy memorandum are not providing enough information on what is to be delivered.

Jon Hollingdale: I would largely echo that. On a policy level people who are involved regularly in the subject all understood what was meant and probably what was intended. What was missing—we will probably pick up this later—is how certain provisions are expected to deliver the outcomes in the policy memorandum. On a line-by-line basis, there are gaps. Although the Government wants to achieve X, it is saying Y. That does not appear to work for us.
Malcolm Combe: I start from a slightly different position from most people because I am really interested in such matters and I engage regularly with legislation. I do not find the approach to be too problematic, but I appreciate that my starting point is perhaps a little bit different. I thought that there was a fair amount of explanation that allowed me to understand the bill.

Alex Fergusson: By the sound of it, the differences will come out in further discussion.

The Convener: I think that they will.

Alex Fergusson: I am happy to leave it at that for now.

Jim Hume: Good morning, panel. On part 4 of the bill, the financial memorandum states:

“It is not anticipated that the provisions should impose any significant additional costs on the Scottish Government.”

However, it also goes on to state that “there is a large degree of uncertainty on the level of costs that may be incurred” by communities and landowners. What costs do panel members anticipate will come from the legislation for rural communities, landowners and public bodies?

Rory Dutton: I point out that you need to view the cost of part 4 in the wider context in which the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill sits. If there is to be significant community empowerment and more transfers of assets and land ownership, greater support will be needed for community anchor organisations in capacity building, training support and financial support. You cannot look at the cost of that measure alone or look at the bill’s financial implications in isolation because they are part of a wider community empowerment agenda.

Sarah-Jane Laing: Many of the provisions are demand driven, so it is very hard to gauge the costs to the Scottish Government—especially if it is to take on the costs of running ballots and other elements. We do not know what demand will be for use of the provisions, especially if they are extended to urban Scotland. It is very hard to pinpoint the exact costs.

Jim Hume: To develop the issue, could we look at some of the related costs, such as legal costs and the cost of setting up plans? It would be useful for us to know about the specific costs.

Simon Fraser: In general, the costs that fall on the community—if I can look at the issue from that end—will tend to be met if not from public funds, then from lottery funds and other such sources. In the early stages, there may be a bit of pump priming from Highlands and Islands Enterprise, but that will not be a vast amount.

Inevitably, costs will have to be met. The average community seeking to take on a project will not necessarily have the funds to do so itself, even in the initial stages. In the past, HIE was able to assist substantially, but such assistance seems in the main to have been moved to the Scottish land fund purse. However, there will be a cost that must be met from some source.

Jon Hollingdale: The biggest cost, overwhelming everything else, is acquisition of assets at the end of the process. If we have a Scottish land fund of £10 million a year, then there is £10 million of Government money at the moment going towards acquisition. I am sure that that money would be spent, but it is very difficult to predict what proportion of those acquisitions would come through the new provisions. Even if there were no community right to buy, or it did not work at all, it is still quite likely that there would be £10 million-worth of community acquisitions coming through the national forest land scheme, local authority asset transfers or private sales. Picking out the impact of the provision is hard: the community right to buy purchases so far have been a relatively small proportion of the overall big picture. It is difficult to give clear numbers.

The other direct costs are those on whichever branch of the Scottish Government ends up administering the scheme—on-going staff costs, ballot costs and so on. Even if there were 100 ballots a year, which seems to be highly unlikely, at £3,000, £4,000 or £5,000 each, that is still equal only to the cost of one acquisition of 100 hectares. Those costs are relatively small, but are demand driven and difficult to pick out exactly.

Jim Hume: We do not have a crystal ball, but we have to try and think about these things. Will we need additional support for applications, especially if there is an increase in applications, and if so, what form of additional support?

Jon Hollingdale: Yes—additional support will possibly be needed. Rory Dutton and I both work for organisations that provide such support to our members. If, as a result of the legislation, the floodgates open, we would be swamped by demand. However, I do not think that that is very likely: we expect a gradual increase in demand, although we might need some help to meet that. It is not a vast task, and it is not likely to be an extra vast task for HIE or whichever part of the Government is supporting and administering the scheme.

Malcolm Combe: Some support already exists. A community might have to incorporate as a company limited by guarantee: that already had to be done under the 2003 act, so it can look to the... sources of help that already exist. It is just a case of beefing up the available support.

An analogy might be the recent introduction of the crofting register, which obviously has some administration costs, but—to quote a phrase—you cannot make an omelette without breaking eggs. There will be costs somewhere, but if the policy aim is to be met, the costs will have to be met.

Claudia Beamish (South Scotland) (Lab): I have a quick supplementary. One or two panel members have mentioned HIE. I wonder about support beyond the Highlands and Islands in relation to communities and costs, especially in view of the fact that the land reform review group has made recommendations about the different bodies that might be set up. Of course, that might not happen, despite the announcements about the consultation, but we should not to pre-empt the new land reform bill. Do you have comments on support for communities beyond the Highlands?

Rory Dutton: The Scottish Government is funding a strengthening communities programme, which we are helping to deliver in partnership, for a relatively small number of communities outwith the HIE area—about 25 groups that are already established. That sort of capacity building is very welcome and we would like to see it rolled out further.

There are also small grants schemes—for example, investing in ideas, which is funded by the Big Lottery Fund. I concur that where there is opportunity but no established group, there is a deficit in support to get an organisation up and running in order for it to then be able to take advantage of the legislation. It is a lengthy process.

Jon Hollingdale: There is a distinction to be made between financial support and the support of helpful folk in talking people through the application process. To some extent, the latter is less of an issue because there are organisations such as ours and DTAS to do that across Scotland, and if there is less of that support outside the HIE area that is less of a problem. The big issue is that HIE has also been able to support the development of community groups financially in a way that Scottish Enterprise has not—or in a way that has not happened in the Scottish Enterprise area. That is a gap that the CWA and DTAS are not in a position to fill. A long-standing issue has been whether Scottish Enterprise, or whatever body works outside the HIE area, should have a strengthening communities remit, but that has not come yet.

The Convener: Yes—what Scottish Enterprise does in that respect is a long-standing issue that has been raised in committee after committee. We take that point on board.

Let us move on to the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 and the removal of land-based barriers.

Cara Hilton (Dunfermline) (Lab): Good morning. An objective of the 2003 act was to remove land-based barriers to the sustainable development of rural communities. How well has that worked in practice, and how has rural Scotland changed as a result? In its written submission, the Community Woodlands Association states that “the complexities and hurdles contained within the act have severely limited its use on the ground”.

Does the panel agree with that statement?

Jon Hollingdale: The number of successful acquisitions under the 2003 act is pretty low; I think that there have been about 16 in 10 years, which does not seem a hugely positive track record, although the act has a wider symbolic value. The act sets a framework, and it has been easier to negotiate settlements for other transfers to community ownership because the act is there. In that respect, the act has had a very positive effect.

Nevertheless, it is probably fair to say that there has not been a step change in the rate of community ownership. Our membership is roughly 150 organisations, and the median date of establishment is 2002 to 2003—in other words, half of them were around before the 2003 act was passed. A lot of the big, iconic buyouts predate the 2003 act, so it did not completely change the practical delivery or extent of community ownership in a radical way. It has definitely helped, but perhaps not to the extent that we had hoped it would.

Malcolm Combe: I echo a lot of what Jon Hollingdale said. I checked the register of community interests in land yesterday, and it currently contains 175 registered interests. Some of them have been deleted and a few have been activated, and 40 of them relate to Fife. There were a lot of registrations around Kinghorn loch, where there was individual ownership, so some of the registered interests can be discounted because five applications could represent one community, if you know what I mean.

As Jon Hollingdale said, the 2003 act has maybe not had a marked effect. Symbolically, it has some value but, bureaucratically, not many changes have been effected because of it. For example, there were a lot of attempts to take on the old Krystal Klear bottling factory in Lochwinnoch, but nothing really happened. The 2003 act may not have been effective in that particular instance, but whether it has been effective overall is a more difficult question to answer.
Rory Dutton: As Jon Hollingdale said, it is important that the 2003 act is in the background even if things do not appear in the statistics. For example, local authorities are aware that a community might register to buy a property under the community right to buy if things do not start to move.

The absolute numbers are low, but the bottom line is that it is not a right to buy so much as a right of pre-emption if a property comes on the market. Tied to that is the fact that registration expires after five years. Volunteer organisations already find the registration process quite onerous, and the question is whether they can go through it every five years. For me, the bottom line is that this is a right of pre-emption, and a lot of assets that communities will be interested in simply do not come on to the market.

Sarah-Jane Laing: I do not disagree with anything that has been said so far. As Jon Hollingdale pointed out, the transfers that have happened through the 2003 act are only one part of the picture, but I think that everyone will agree that the act itself has probably not delivered on the aspirations that many people had when it was introduced.

Cara Hilton: As a wee supplementary to that, how have the experiences to date informed the bill as currently drafted?

Sarah-Jane Laing: One of the things that come through in the bill is that ownership is only one aspect of empowering communities. The bill takes into consideration the need to understand how community planning works, what a community’s needs are and whether ownership will actually meet those needs, and it starts to look at community ownership in the round of an effective local decision-making and community planning framework.

I do not think that the bill goes far enough, but it is a start. A lot of the problems about relationships and communication and other barriers to development have been drawn out because of the problems that people had with the 2003 act, and they have been recognised in the bill.

The Convener: But it still does not go far enough.

Sarah-Jane Laing: No.

The Convener: Please explain.

Sarah-Jane Laing: You cannot legislate for all aspects of community planning and local decision making. I would have liked the bill to include something about the role of community councils and the effective part that communities play in local decision making by local authorities and other agencies. For me, the community planning aspect seems like it will be just be the same agencies around the table; it does not feel like a bottom-up approach that involves communities of geography and communities of interest. We have made the same comments about the community planning parts of the bill to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee but I think that the framework within which community ownership sits is very important, especially from a rural point of view, and the community planning partnerships will need to be working effectively.

The Convener: Indeed.

Jon Hollingdale: First, I agree with Sarah-Jane Laing that ownership is not the only means by which communities can achieve their objectives, and the fact that the community right to buy has been put into the bill’s broader scope is a useful recognition of that. After all, many other bits of the bill support community aspirations without the need for ownership.

Although the bill contains a lot of positive amendments to the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003, they are at some level a bit cosmetic and do not address certain structural problems in the legislation. They will undoubtedly smooth the process and ease matters, but it is a bit like putting airbags and a catalytic converter into a car with only one gear at a time when petrol is being rationed. It is not going to go very much better, and to my mind it is a bit of an issue that the bill has not addressed some of the fundamental structural problems with part 2 of the 2003 act and the ways in which it does or does not work.

The Convener: Such as?

Jon Hollingdale: The good things include allowing Scottish charitable incorporated organisations to be community bodies. However, even if your community body is an SCIO or a company limited by guarantee, that will not change the fact that you will still have to go through the registration process, sit there for five years and then reregister endlessly until the landowner decides to sell, if they ever do. Questions such as whether we need a two-step registration process that is very much at the seller’s whim are far bigger and more fundamental than what form of community body is sitting there, waiting for the land or whatever to become available.

The Convener: We will come back to the issue of registration in a bit more detail.

Jon Hollingdale: The other week, I made a point of looking at the register to get the up-to-date statistics, and I found that of the 175 or so registrations that had been listed, 124 were deleted. We are not talking about 124 separate communities—as we have said, a single community can make multiple registrations—but we are still talking about 124 out of 175 instances in which the community has done a lot of work to get to a certain stage in what is not an easy process, and it just has not happened. Another 30 or so are sitting there waiting for the land to come up, and in another 16 cases, the registration has gone through. If the majority of communities are not able to progress through the scheme, that suggests that there is a structural issue to deal with.

The Convener: Did you want to come in here, Dave?

Dave Thompson (Skye, Lochaber and Badenoch) (SNP): I was going to pick up on a general issue. I am happy to deal with it just now, if you would like.

The Convener: Well, it might be an idea, since we are talking about registration.

Dave Thompson: Okay.

Good morning, panel. I am interested in your views on whether pre-registration is needed at all. A lot of the evidence that we have taken indicates that a great number of registrations have been what might be called “late”—I put that in inverted commas—what with the work that communities have to do to register an interest. They also have to anticipate what is in the minds of the landowners, which is basically impossible. How is a community to know whether a particular piece of land that has been under one ownership for hundreds of years is suddenly going to come up? Why would a community register an interest in property that has not been on the market for a long time? Should we just simplify the process and, as the norm, allow communities not to have to pre-register or register early, which would mean that they would not need to reregister?

Moreover, if reregistration is required, I think that five years seems like a very short time. Perhaps the period should be extended, with a much simpler process in which people simply say something like, “I want to reregister.” I want to hear your views on the matter, because I wonder whether there is any need to register early.

Rory Dutton: I agree that we need to take a good look at the issue. After all, registering in the first place is a big job, and some people get scuppered and give up at that stage. You are also right to suggest that five years soon pass, and then people have to think about reregistration. It would be great if we could extend the period to 10 years or whatever, or if we could consider options for doing away with the process altogether.

I do not have any stats for late registrations, but in a lot of those that we get involved with and speak to people about—as you said, people cannot anticipate what land will come up, and there are probably several different assets that could make a key difference to their community—the question is whether they register interest in all the assets just in case one of them comes up. Moreover, there might be several different ownerships involved, and I think that greater emphasis on what are now being called late applications would certainly help.

As for pre-registration, I can see why it exists, but I think that options for doing away with it are definitely worth exploring.

Jon Hollingdale: As I understand it, the idea behind pre-registration is to encourage communities to be proactive, and I think that we will agree that being proactive and thinking ahead are generally better than simply being reactive to opportunities. However, having been encouraged to be proactive and make those registrations, communities are then not rewarded for doing that. As you suggested, once we get past the individual iconic sites—this particular lighthouse, say, or that disused military base, which the vast majority of communities do not have—the process becomes much more generic.

If I were designing things from scratch, I would have a system in which communities, however they might be structured or defined—whether, for example, they had community anchor organisations or whatever—would carry out community development planning and identify the sort of land and buildings assets that they needed to deliver the things that their community wanted, whether that be land for allotments, affordable housing, a children’s play park or a community woodland. If they had specified that they needed land for affordable housing, clearly certain types of land would fit that specification; after all, the 1,000 hectares out on the moor would not be useful in that respect. A specification would be laid down and when land came on to the market, communities would have the possibility of pre-emption if that land fitted their previously announced specification.

France has a system—you will be pleased to hear that I will not give you the French name—for land development and rural settlement associations that has standard pre-emption on land when it comes on the market. When someone sells land in rural France—I do not know where they draw the line around rural France—those 20 or so organisations that are run on a regional basis decide whether they want to pre-empt, to buy in and then sell on if it is in the public interest to do so. I do not know how public interest and sustainable development are framed, but if it is for the good of the community, those organisations will buy and then sell to the local farmer or whatever.
I do not see why we cannot have a similar system that has an automatic right of pre-emption so that someone can at least have a look at the sale and decide whether it fits with an existing community development plan; if it does, the community can be given the option and if it does not, the open market sale can go on. That does not breach European human rights rules, otherwise the system would not have run like that for 40 years in France.

The Convener: But it makes a difference when you have got local government and regional government to focus on the plans that you are talking about.

Jon Hollingdale: Yes. It is a whole different structure, but the principle would be workable.

Malcolm Combe: One of the purposes of registration has been alluded to. It focuses the community, singles out an asset and programmes what the community will do. The second role of registration is publicity for the landowner, who has the legitimate expectation that they should know what is happening to their land. Registration puts the landowner on notice that the community is interested and that is fine.

However, to a certain extent, publicity could be achieved in another way. A comparison has just been made with France, but in Scotland you could look at part 3 of the 2003 act on the crofting community right to buy. Under that, there is no need to register because the publicity relates to the fact that the land is under crofting tenure, is part of the common grazings or is certain eligible additional land. Whether an owner of rural land should just be on notice that any land that they own could be susceptible to a right of pre-emption, whatever right that might be, is a policy question.

Doing away with registration would do away with the focal point of getting the community mobilised and might do away with some publicity aspects, but that is not necessarily a bad thing in and of itself. There are other models.

On the point about late applications, the first big bit of litigation under part 2 of the 2003 act was to do with Holmehill near Dunblane. When the community saw the “For sale” signs, it realised that the hotel development was suddenly happening and it tried to go through the section 39 late applications route, which has bigger hurdles in the form of sustainable development and public interest tests.

The Convener: We have heard evidence on that case.

Malcolm Combe: I will gloss over it; that will have told you more than I can.

My third point is about the five-yearly renewal. Having a from-scratch five-yearly renewal is probably an unnecessary administrative burden. It should be a quick question about whether the community still wants to have a registered interest. Assuming that the register is to stay, it could be a lot simpler and the renewal system could be part of that. A fast-track system would certainly help.

Sarah-Jane Laing: The driver for registration should be the community’s needs. Whether the landowner is likely to put the land on the market at any time in the future should not be irrelevant, but it should be a secondary driver. We have talked about rural housing and rural buses and how you do not stand in the road if there are no buses coming. That does not mean that there is no need for a bus. It is the same with registering an interest. A community that registers its interest is indicating that it has a need that it feels will be met by that piece of land. That is quite a positive step.

Malcolm Combe talked about the owner being put on notice. In some cases, registration has been the first step in a dialogue with owners that has often led to asset transfers outwith the terms of the 2003 act. I agree that if we are going to look at reregistration, there is no reason why it should not be simplified.

The Convener: A couple of members have supplementary questions.

Dave Thompson: May I just come back on that, convener? I understand what is being said, but the Holmehill example is interesting in that it was a public area, to all intents and purposes. The local people thought that it was public and they had used it for decades or more. Why would they ever think that they would have to register an interest in something that they thought was theirs anyway, although legally it was not? The legislation caused them problems; the evidence that we heard last week was that the conditions about late applications and all the rest of it made it virtually impossible for local people to get in there and do anything about it. There are obviously serious problems and issues.

Convener, can I ask a question about the good reasons test and what is replacing it, or would you rather take the supplementaries?

The Convener: I will take the supplementaries from Alex Fergusson and Graeme Dey, and then you can move on to that.

Dave Thompson: Okay.

Alex Fergusson: I will be as brief as possible. Sarah-Jane Laing has just put much more eloquently than I would have done some of the point that I was going to make. Personally, I am inclined to the view that some sort of process is necessary, albeit a simplified one—I am very open to that argument, particularly when it comes to reregistration. A process of some sort would help to underline and strengthen a commitment by the community and alert the owner to the possibilities that might exist through a right to buy.

My question is for Jon Hollingdale. You said that, having gone through the process, people would have to hang around and wait for the land to come on to the market, or words to that effect. Forgive me if I have put words into your mouth. I would be interested to know what your answer to that is, because it seems to me that, if people are not going to hang around and wait for the land to come on to the market, we are talking about an absolute right to buy as opposed to a pre-emptive one. Will you expand on that? Is that what you are advocating?

The Convener: Just before Jon Hollingdale answers, Graeme Dey has a supplementary to the supplementary.

Graeme Dey: It very much fits in with Alex Fergusson’s point. Malcolm Combe commented that, instead of a full, five-year reregistration process, we could simply go back and say, “Do you still have an interest?”, but “you” might be a different entity. I have a planning application in my constituency that, if it is granted, would see a community’s housing footprint increase from 100 homes to 300 homes within four to five years, so the nature of that community could fundamentally change.

The Convener: I ask Jon Hollingdale to respond to those two points.

Jon Hollingdale: On Alex Fergusson’s point, we agree in principle that there should be an absolute right to buy, but I suspect that we will talk about the part 3A bits. My concern is more about why communities do not use the part 2 registration process as part of proactive planning.

As you say, as the bill is constructed, there is no mechanism to make anything happen once people have achieved their registration. If a landowner suddenly becomes aware that there are community interests and aspirations, they can either say, “Let’s go through the process”—that has happened with a few landowners where the right to buy has worked—or they can say, “Let’s come to a negotiated settlement.” However, if they are not interested, there is nothing that people can do.

The reality of community bodies is that they are set up to do a range of things and to deliver community aspirations, and they will choose the routes that appear to achieve things for them. A community body is not going to sit there with existing registrations and nothing happening. It will focus its attention. If it has five ways to try to achieve the multiple things that it wants to do—few communities come up with a single issue—it will focus on the things that look achievable. It will say, “We know how to do that. We can go to the lottery and get a grant.”

Communities that have gone into and through the registration process tend to be those with a single, iconic, stand-alone project that is an obvious thing to fix. For example, I think that the process has been gone through for two lighthouses and military bases. Those were one-off things in particular communities. There was enough value in those single sites for the community to register an interest. In general, communities have not used the process for run-of-the-mill developments such as affordable housing and allotments. Communities either try to achieve that in other ways, or they give up and say that they will do it when the opportunity arises.

The way in which the 2003 act is structured makes it difficult to register an interest in multiple sites. The community in a small town might want affordable housing and there might be 20, 30 or 40 available gap sites, but the community will have no idea which one will come up first. Should it register an interest in all of them? It would be much more sensible to have a system in which a community that wants affordable housing, allotments or whatever can say that it would like a right of pre-emption on any piece of appropriate land that comes up in its area, and it can then pick the first one that comes up. As part of that process, one of the landowners might well step forward and say, “Actually, you know what—this bit here would work,” so the community would not have to go through the process at all.

That would be my way of trying to broaden the scope of the way in which communities can use the 2003 act. If they can register an interest in any bit of land that fits—obviously, someone would have to run the rule over that—that would be a much better approach than their having to specify a particular site and go through the process with each separate landowner, with a very uncertain outcome.

The Convener: We will put that question to the urban panel that comes next.

Simon Fraser: I do not have any particular expertise on part 2 of the 2003 act, but I have a general comment. I was involved professionally in the acquisition of a number of large holdings, particularly prior to 2003, I have to say. I also have to say that the 2003 act provisions would not have assisted with any one of them; in fact, those provisions probably would have acted as a major barrier to progress in every single one.

I can well understand how part 2 might be of assistance for those who want to acquire the odd surplus lighthouse or something like that but, if the whole estate that a community lives on suddenly comes on the market, the current provisions are practically useless in relation to being able to intervene at the required level, scale and time. A community might not realise that the whole estate and people’s whole personal world is going to come on the market. The community might have an aspiration to acquire something but, when the whole thing comes on the market, that is an entirely different ball game. My view is certainly that the act as it stands would be of no avail to them whatsoever.

Malcolm Combe: After that rather seismic comment from Simon Fraser, I move to matters more mundane. On who is “you” and whether “you” still have an interest, the question would be: who is “you” now? To an extent, that is answered by saying that an immortal body—a company limited by guarantee—has been set up. The office-holders might have changed, but the “you” is the company limited by guarantee. In that regard, registration focuses who the “you” is. If we moved to a situation in which there was no registration, there might be different questions as to how to identify the community if it did not have to take that pre-step.

In the present scheme, there is provision for overlapping registrations, and that has happened in Assynt. Therefore, it is possible that there could be two “yous”, and it would then be for the Scottish ministers to decide which one to go for. The question about who is “you” is shrewd, but it can, I hope, be answered.

To respond to the point about putting the landowner on notice, I agree that it can be a good thing to give a signal, but I am aware of some communities that have been in dialogue and which think that registering an interest might be seen as inflammatory. If they were to register an interest, that might lock the landowner into a process that might not be as good as a consensus-driven approach. Obviously, those are just two things in a dialectic—there is one thing about the registration process that could be good and one that could be bad. Some people think that registering an interest might change the dynamic of what could have been a consensual negotiation by making it a bit more legal. I am not sure that there is an answer to that; I just mention it as a counterpoint.

Sarah-Jane Laing: I have a quick and simple response to Graeme Dey’s question about changing circumstances. I think that all that is necessary is for it to be asked at the point of reregistration whether there have been material changes. If the answer is yes, those involved would go down one route, and if it is no, they would go down another. I do not think that it would be a problem to have a dual process for reregistration. Graeme Dey is right—a material change such as a huge swell of opinion in the community, which could have different views and different needs, must be taken into consideration, but it would be possible to have a dual registration process.

To pick up on what Malcolm Combe and Jon Hollingdale said, I feel as if I am banging on about community planning, but a lot of this is about that. A registration is often viewed as inflammatory in circumstances in which there is no community planning process, no dialogue and no engagement, so it feels as if it is a case of, “We want that off you,” but the reality is that there have never been any discussions about what “that” is, what it would be used for and whether the landowner would consider giving it to the community in the first place. The situation becomes adversarial.

In our submission, we suggested that, rather than looking at pre-emption, consideration should be given to proactivity on the part of the landowner. All of us feel that there is a need for greater proactivity on the part of landowners in engaging with communities. We also suggested that there could be a requirement for a landowner to give notice to an established community body prior to any sale, which would mean that the community got notice before land went on the market and that people would not find out only when they drove down the road and saw the “Estate for sale” signs. I feel that that would put the onus very much on engagement and having a positive relationship rather than on a right of pre-emption, which always feels adversarial.

Rory Dutton: There are quite a lot of balls in the air at the moment. I make the point that we should bear in mind at all times the fact that, in many cases, we are dealing with volunteers. Going through the process puts a huge demand on volunteers, and people get burned out and organisations lose their steam. If, for example, the assets are withdrawn from the market at the last minute, that has a devastating impact on the morale of the community. We are talking about volunteers’ time and very precious human resources, which can easily be wasted.

I go back to whether the bill has addressed the main issues and whether it will result in a transformational change. The committee will discuss the urban context later in the meeting. The provisions that relate to urban areas could well make a big difference. Many proposals have been made to ease the process. The other big issue is that of abandoned or neglected land, on which the bill provides a right to buy rather than a pre-emption right. In the interests of efficient use of community volunteer time, we would like the bill to make it possible—whether through a planning route or through an absolute right to buy that was based more on sustainable development than on abandoned or neglected land—for far more effective use to be made of what is a very scarce and precious resource in communities to make things happen and to help those communities to move forward.

The Convener: We will discuss abandoned or neglected land quite soon.

Dave Thompson will now pursue the issue of registration.

Dave Thompson: What the witnesses have said is all very interesting. It strikes me that, as I think Jon Hollingdale mentioned, a much simplified registration process, which could involve some kind of general registration for a purpose rather than the identification of a piece of land, might be desirable. The purpose for a community might be the creation of more general community land, housing land or whatever, and it could put in a general interest in any land that came up that it could use for that purpose. That might be one way forward. The community could do that at an early stage or it could do it once a piece of land came up—although, up until now, such registrations have been called late registrations.

I was also interested to hear that communities can be devastated if after they go through the process the land is withdrawn. Perhaps we should consider a provision that says that once land has gone on the market and the community has shown an interest in it, that land cannot be withdrawn. I would be interested to know whether that could be added, as it would prevent a landowner from putting land on the market and then withdrawing it again to usurp the community.

I am sorry to go on for so long, convener, but there are a lot of issues to address. For example, I note that, with regard to late registrations, the good reasons provision has been withdrawn. As I have said, I am not keen on this talk about early and late registration; I think that the registration system should allow different people to come into the process at different times.

With regard to the proposed new sections on late registration, we have heard evidence from Community Land Scotland about how the phrase “such relevant work as Ministers consider reasonable was carried out” might be interpreted. Given that such work has to be done sufficiently in advance, how easy would it be for a community to prove that it had undertaken it earlier? It brings us back to the question of why we need early registration. Why can we not just have registration along the lines that I have suggested?

Jon Hollingdale: Precisely that point was made in our evidence. The interpretation of “such relevant work as the ministers decide is very unclear to us. According to the bill, “the relevant work was carried out ... in respect of land with a view to the land being used for purposes that are the same as those proposed for the land”, which could be interpreted as meaning that the community will have defined that it wants to register land for specific purposes or that it will have identified specific purposes for which it wishes to acquire land. If that is understood as meaning that, once a bit of land that fits that specification and which is fit for those purposes comes on to the market, ministers will accept that it meets that test, we will be very happy. However, it is not clear to us that that is understood, and I am not sure whether the phrasing in the bill or in the guidance that will come behind it locks in that interpretation. There is certainly a possibility that that might happen, but it is not clear to us that that is exactly what the bill team were thinking of when they wrote those lines.

The Convener: We will reflect on that for sure.

I do not think that we need say anything more on this matter, so we will move on to Claudia Beamish and the meaning of “community”.

Claudia Beamish: Jon Hollingdale has already touched on the complex issue of the meaning of “community” in relation to SCIOs, and such definitions are very much in the air. I am not going to go into the detail of section 34 of the 2003 act, with which the panel will be familiar, but I am happy to cover that if needed. I will do my best, anyway.

It is important that we consider the ways in which the definition of “community” can be widened in the bill. For example, I am interested to know how the panel—beyond Jon—view SCIOs. Last week, for example, the Development Trusts Association Scotland questioned why community benefit societies had been excluded.

Perhaps if I cover the main points, we can then have the discussion—I hope that that will be useful. Other issues that we could consider include the question whether postcode units are too restrictive; how we can define rural communities, if not through their postcode; and defining communities of interest, such as arts organisations, charities, ethnic groups and so on. In that respect, I saw something earlier in the week about sports organisations such as those with responsibility for golf courses. Moreover, last week’s panel referred to communities of place.

It would be very helpful if the panel could comment on that, as they feel appropriate.

Rory Dutton: I should confirm that in our submission we asked why, if SCIOs were being brought on board, community benefit societies were not being brought on board as well, particularly with the resurgence of interest in them and the way in which they raise finance through community share issues. In fact, lottery funding has recently been awarded to our consortium to promote that option. I understand that ministerial regulations might extend the definition beyond SCIOs and companies limited by guarantee, but we would ask why community benefit societies have not just been included from the outset.

Another point is whether the legislation has to specify particular legal structures. Why could it not just specify the criteria that any such structure must meet? That leads us on to the issue of complexity and how prescriptive we want to be about articles of association and constitutions. For example, how often would a society have to hold a general meeting if it had to change the articles to keep the Scottish Government happy? We welcome the broadening of the definition, which is long overdue, but I wonder why community benefit societies have not been included.

I absolutely agree that the postcode unit is an issue. Some postcode areas in the Highlands are very large, and it is difficult to keep to the area that you want to define because you end up straying into other areas. The proposal to allow the discretion to define areas in another way is very welcome.

However, there are still issues in that regard. As I understand it, the area that is served by a community body is the same as the area that would be balloted on a particular community asset. That would mean that if a community body served a large area, a ballot would pertain to that whole area, even if the interest in a community asset were quite local. That is another issue that brings us back to the question of what we mean by community. If a very effective community anchor organisation served a wide area, could a ballot be held in a smaller area instead of the whole membership of the wider area being balloted?

My final point is about the inclusion of communities of interest. That is a community regeneration tool, and it relates to Sarah-Jane Laing’s point about planning and what is best for an area. If it fitted with the local priorities for an area that had been agreed by the local people, and if it made a difference to the area, a community of interest might be the best vehicle. Again, the actual body would carry that forward.

Malcolm Combe: With regard to the form that an organisation needs to take, which I touch on in my submission, another way of approaching the issue might be to make it clear that, whatever the organisation, the important elements are the rules by which the organisation abides and its constitution. A comparator jurisdiction in that respect is South Africa, which in the 1990s introduced a system of what are called communal property associations, which have to register their constitution. Obviously, whatever the registration process might be—and I am afraid to mention the term “registration” in this discussion—an organisation would not be able to get its constitution registered; however, it would still act as a repository to enable those community organisations to see what the rules are, and irrespective of whether an organisation was a SCIO, a bencom—community benefit society—or a company limited by guarantee, it would comply with those rules. The stipulations would be there, and an organisation would not be hamstrung by its not being a company limited by guarantee. That might be another way to do it.

The Convener: On that point, Sandra Holmes suggested last week that HIE’s community land unit, or whatever it is called now, had a stock constitution. Are you suggesting that we try to adopt some particular basic off-the-shelf constitution?

Malcolm Combe: I suspect that any stock constitution would be for a company limited by guarantee, so one would want to carve out the bits of it that pertained specifically to a company limited by guarantee and leave in the things that related to the community asset. That could be the way forward, provided that the community was able to form whichever vehicle it chose as most suitable. In some cases, it might even involve a local charity with a similar interest, such as the John Muir Trust or the RSPB, coming on board.

This is an emotive issue, because at present the definition of a community is limited to a postcode unit. I am not saying that we would want to open things up in this way, but if the underlying community, in whatever form it took, was able to say, “We have these rules, we can comply with them and they are on record”, that might be a more flexible approach.

Sarah-Jane Laing: I do not have anything to add to the comments that have been made about community bodies, but I want to pick up on the definition of a community as a community of geography rather than a community of interest. A community of geography should include a number of communities of interest. When we look at a community’s needs, we should be able to weigh up the needs of the different communities of interest and take a holistic view.

Of course, the problem with going down the community of interest route is that each will have a different interest and will have the sole purpose of furthering the interests of its community. That is what leads to lots of tensions. To go back to the issue of community planning, I think that if everyone, no matter whether they be sports clubs, environmentalists or those with housing needs, has a seat and an equal voice, everything will be looked at in the round. That is what a community of geography or place does, and I therefore support the retention of the community of geography as the definition of “community” with regard to the community right to buy.

Claudia Beamish: Are you arguing that a community of interest should not be part of the definition in the bill?

Sarah-Jane Laing: Yes. I do not think that a community of interest should have the same right to buy as a community of geography.

Rory Dutton: With regard to Malcolm Combe’s point, the legislation needs to set out only the criteria required to safeguard the public investment or benefit. We can quickly rattle up model articles of association or constitutions for community right to buy or not community right to buy, as the case might be; like Highlands and Islands Enterprise and the Community Woodlands Association, we already have them. We also have a model SCIO constitution and no doubt we will have a model SCIO constitution for community right to buy. Given that we can quickly rattle up those model constitutions, we do not need that aspect in the legislation; instead, we need the criteria that must be built into governing documents.

The Convener: Thank you, Jon Hollingdale wants to comment.

Jon Hollingdale: I cast my vote, too, for a fundamental look at the characteristics that we want in a community body. Obviously, it will need to be incorporated, open and non-profit distributing, have appropriate wind-up or dissolution clauses and so on. Those characteristics are well understood and models are available for different forms of company. The problem is that as soon as the legislation changes, the existing model constitutions need to be amended again, and that is what would happen with the provisions in the bill as it stands.

With regard to communities of interest, it is dangerous for me to say this because I am sitting next to two eminent lawyers who might contradict me but as far as I can see, the existing legislative provisions do not exclude what I would consider local communities of interest from using them. Clearly, national bodies such as the RSPB and the Scottish mountain biking association, if there is such a thing, are ruled out. However, an organisation such as the Thurso amateur dramatic society—again, I have no idea whether that exists—would not be ruled out. It seems to me that, if it rented its local playhouse from a private landowner and it became concerned that the building was going to be sold, the organisation could register an interest. It would have to demonstrate that the use of the land fitted with its objectives, which I think it would have no trouble doing, and make the case that its taking ownership would be compatible with sustainable development.

Those of us who write such applications would be quite happy to write that the society would, say, do some theatre drama work with a local school; after all, it would be a brave person who stepped in and said that local cultural development was not compatible with sustainable development. Perhaps the biggest issue facing such a body is that if the property that it rented came on the market, it would have to ballot the whole town. There are about 8,000 people in Thurso, which means that there is an electorate of about 6,500. The society would therefore need to get a significant number of people in the town to turn out to vote for it, but I do not think that that would be insurmountable.

I believe that there is a mechanism to allow that scenario to happen, but it has not been picked up. I also suspect that things would get much more difficult if we tried to scale it up to a bigger urban setting. Again, I do not know whether there is such an organisation, but I would imagine that the membership of the Glasgow Muslim women’s cultural centre, say, would be a fairly small proportion of Glasgow’s population. If it were expected to ballot the whole of Glasgow, that would not work.

However, as far as the legislation sits with relatively local communities of interest, I think that their registrations of interest could go through. Indeed, some existing registrations are, to an extent, examples of what I have described. In Forres, a town of almost 10,000 people, there is a registration for the football pitch; however, the registration is not in the name of Forres Mechanics, the team that plays there, but in the name of Mosset Park Protection Company Ltd. It is fundamentally a sports interest with a community development bit stuck on.

Claudia Beamish: Would it be more appropriate to have such a definition on the face of the bill or in secondary legislation?

Malcolm Combe: My own preference would be for the definition to be in primary legislation rather than buried in regulations.

The Convener: We will move on to a point about procedures and requirements. We did not cover the question of mapping when Dave Thompson was asking about registration. Mapping was a problem in some cases under the 2003 act. Do panel members have any views about the detail of the mapping? The registration of croft land requires virtually the same detail of mapping as for sales of house plots or whatever, but does it need to be so precise? We have seen problems with that in terms of the interpretation of part 3 of the 2003 act, on the crofting community right to buy—in the Pairc case, for example.

Malcolm Combe: I have a quick comment on one bit of litigation that happened in Kirkcaldy sheriff court—the Hazle case involving Kinghorn Community Land Association. There was an issue with the land association’s application, which did not quite comply with the mapping requirements. Even though there was a grid reference in the application form, it was not written on the plan—or something like that—so it did not quite meet the requirement in the legislation. In the end, the application was bounced. Therefore, it was a case of, “Community, go away.” That is one of the deleted interests in Fife. That does not seem satisfactory to me. There were other issues in that litigation; it was not solely on that point. However, that is something to think about. Fundamentally, assuming that registration is a good thing as it gets everything on notice, we need to know what bit of land it relates to. However, at a time when a community and volunteers are expending a lot of energy to comply with a lot of different things, a degree of relaxation and/or discretion over strict mapping requirements might help.

Simon Fraser: I take it that we are still talking about part 2.

The Convener: Yes.

Simon Fraser: The lesson has been learned from part 3 of the 2003 act that it is pretty much impossible to comply with the mapping requirement. In fact, for the two major applications on the island of Lewis—Pairc and Galson—they decided to map only the common grazing element, not the element with all the houses and people and everything else on, simply because that would have been utterly impossible. Even mapping the common grazing proved extremely difficult, with a requirement to map every fence, watercourse, ditch, and goodness knows what. That is certainly an issue.

I also encourage the committee to consider Malcolm Combe’s point. One of the difficulties that crofting communities came up against was the sudden-death element if they made any mistakes—there was an inability to rectify mistakes. In my submission, I go into how that difficulty could be addressed. We certainly want to allow communities to be able to amend the application in the event of something inadvertently being missed out that would otherwise kill off the application.

Jon Hollingdale: I second the point about the part 3 crofting mapping being seen widely as completely over the top and impossible to deliver perfectly the first time round given the scale of these estates. On part 2, it is noticeable that if you look through the documents on the register of community interests you see that there is not a standard specification for how these maps are pulled up. They all look a bit different, different base maps are being used and they are demarcated in different ways. That is because no one has said, “This is how we want maps presented. This is how you would map an area of 1,000 hectares and this is how you would map an area of 0.01 hectares.” The smallest area that someone has gone through the registration process for is probably about the size of this committee room. Not having a standard model means that people are very much in the dark and wondering, “Is this going to be good enough?” and “Is this what they need?” Even having a standard specification setting out what you need to do to satisfy the requirements would be really helpful.

The Convener: We will explore that with ministers in due course. We will move on to the subject of abandoned and neglected land.

Michael Russell: A common theme among all the submissions has been abandoned and neglected land. Certainly the submissions that I have had a chance to read so far have expressed views on that. Malcolm Combe described the term as “suboptimal”. I would be interested in your reflections on what would be an optimal term to describe such land. The “wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected” definition is not included in the 2003 act on the crofting right to buy. What is the motivation for including it in the bill? I would welcome some reflections on the difficulty of defining such land in circumstances where it does not penalise owners, tenants or others who might have different views on how to operate their land. I am simply interested in hearing those views, to help the committee come to some mind on it.

Malcolm Combe: I did say that the term “abandoned” is sub-optimal, but there are four key words: “wholly”, “mainly”, “abandoned” and “neglected”. My use of the word “sub-optimal” was specifically in relation to the technical meaning of the word “abandoned” in Scots law. When an owner abandons something, that means that they are surrendering any right to it. It is most easily visualised in the case of a corporeal moveable object. If I was to discard my jacket after this session in a fit of rage, I would lose title to it. Under the rules of Scots law, such abandoned property would go to the Crown.
Abandoned land is an issue at the moment. Obviously you cannot throw away land in the way that you could throw away a moveable item. There was a recent case in which the liquidators of a Scottish coal company tried to walk away from certain liabilities linked to the land. The question whether you can leave land abandoned with a non-owner or whether the Crown would step in via the Queen’s and Lord Treasurer’s Remembrancer is difficult. I am not going to give you a seminar on that just now. However, the very fact that “abandoned” might have a technical meaning to Scots property lawyers in that context means that using it in legislation immediately leads to a little bit of ambiguity. I would ask for careful consideration of whether you need to explain what you mean by “abandoned” or whether you need to use a different word. The terms “unused” or “underused” introduce different subjective tests, but at least they do not have the ambiguity factor. Do I have an optimal word? I was careful not to offer one in my submission.

There is then the issue of the phrase “wholly or mainly”. I suspect that the “wholly” category is easier to identify than the “mainly” one. It seems to me that there is a spectrum, with “wholly” at one side and “mainly” being a little bit less than “wholly”. We do not want to say that the provision is a charter for lawyers, but we can imagine people having fun arguing about it.

“Neglected” is an interesting word, too. If a landowner says that they intend to create some kind of wilderness wildlife haven and it is his or her conscious choice to let the land go back to its native state, can we say that the land is neglected?

It is difficult to propose an optimal word—it is always easier to heckle. However, I think that the term “abandoned” needs to be carefully considered and that the other words need to be talked about.

Sarah-Jane Laing: A lot of our comments were made prior to the discussions that we have now had with the Scottish Government about how “abandoned” and “neglected” might be defined. I think that the Government plans to include definitions in the primary legislation, rather than in subordinate legislation.

Like Malcolm Combe, we had concerns about “abandoned”, because we thought that it referred to abandonment of ownership. My understanding is that we are talking about abandonment of the original use. For example, if someone says that they intend to create allotments, but the land is still a wildflower meadow after five years, they have abandoned the original use, although they have not neglected the land, because it has been managed as a wildflower meadow. The provision says “abandoned or neglected”, not “abandoned and neglected”, so a lot of confusion remains about the circumstances in which it will be used.

When we talked to community empowerment stakeholders, we talked a lot about blight sites. I think that we all agreed that there are blight sites throughout Scotland, which must be addressed. Those are sites that are derelict and which have a significant detrimental impact on the environment and community safety, so they are quite easy to identify.

I was talking to a small-scale farmer from the Borders recently, who runs a tiny wee flock of sheep on a very large field—just enough to meet his good agricultural and environmental condition requirements, if I am honest. His community has told him that it thinks that he neglects the land. The community would like the field to be ploughed up to the margins, so that people can see that the farmer is actively managing the land. He is actively managing the land; he runs pedigree Jacobs. However, people see a scrubby field and a few sheep.

We are talking about a very significant provision, and I am concerned that we have not had time to work out exactly what it means in detail. We talked about the policy memorandum. We can think that we know what we are getting with a provision but, when we start to pull it apart, it seems to indicate something entirely different.

Jon Hollingdale: We welcome proposed new part 3A on the absolute community right to buy, but I think that everyone agrees that these are provisions that will be used very sparingly. They are not there to be the run-of-the-mill approach; they are the backstop. Ideally they are strong enough and credible enough that they will facilitate negotiation and compromise, so that settlements happen in that way rather than through forced sales. For that to happen, people need to think that it is in everyone’s interest to negotiate; if the provisions are not credible and appear to give too much wiggle room, no one will take them seriously.

It is fair to say that part 3, on the crofting right to buy, has not been a huge success. It sets two tests for communities, which must demonstrate that what they want to do is in the public interest and furthers sustainable development. Part 3A will add two more tests: the land must be abandoned or neglected; and the current ownership must be inconsistent with sustainable development. We struggle to see what kind of evidence would be needed on the latter test.

On the “abandoned or neglected” test, I think that “abandoned” is the one word in the bill with which everyone to whom I have spoken has a real issue. It is very difficult to see how the provision would work. I am not convinced that the test is necessary; most issues can be dealt with under the sustainable development test.

I think that everybody agrees that non-intervention or very limited intervention in land management for nature conservation purposes is, in appropriate circumstances, completely compatible with sustainable development. If it is not, we need to have a word with Scottish Natural Heritage, because it is certainly working under that understanding.

If a landowner genuinely sets aside land, which is not managed because he wants it to be wilderness or for nature conservation purposes, we would assume that that could be assessed with a sustainable development test by reference to whether it is a designated site and whether he has any kind of agreement or even dialogue with SNH about the management or non-management of the site. It seems to me that that could happen under the test that we already have, which fits with parts 2 and 3 of the 2003 Act. The issue is whether the community proposals for the land would be in the interests of sustainable development if it has already been agreed that sustainable development on the site involves non-management or very limited management because it is deep peat or a precious wildflower meadow. The community proposal would then not make any progress at all; it would stop at that point.

It strikes me that there is another big issue with the word “neglected”. You are not dealing with the majority of private landowners at proposed part 3A; you are dealing with a very small minority element of landowners who are entirely refractory and will not compromise or negotiate. The community might wish to acquire 100m² to extend the village graveyard, because it is full. Does the community have to demonstrate that the landowner, who owns 10,000 hectares—everything around the village—is abandoning or neglecting the entirety of that estate in order to get that area, as the landowner simply refuses to sell a tiny plot of land at any price? Most of us would probably say that it is in the interests of sustainable development and certainly in the interests of the community that that happens, but it is very difficult to see how the “abandoned or neglected” approach could be made to work in any circumstances.

Rory Dutton: Jon Hollingdale has stolen most of my thunder. Basically, our question is whether the approach is really workable. We can see how, in an urban context, which you are talking about later on, the neglect may be more evident, but we are struggling to see how the approach can possibly be workable in a rural situation.

I was going to suggest what Jon Hollingdale has already suggested. If you moved the basis in rural areas away from abandoned or neglected land to land where the sale of perhaps a small area would have compelling rural development benefits relative to the impact that there would be on the owner’s greater landholding, that would be a far more useful mechanism than trying to define “neglected”, “abandoned” or anything like that.

Simon Fraser: I, too, find it difficult to understand how this could be applied to the rural context. In the crofting community right to buy, the test is, of course, the sustainable development test. That was tested in court, and I am sure that the committee is aware of Lord Gill’s judgment. In essence, the community was able to meet the sustainable development test as applied to a very extensive area, not a very small area. On the one occasion when that has been tested in court, the case was able to be made. I cannot begin to imagine how the case could be made with the additional hurdle of abandonment or neglect.

Sarah-Jane Laing: I think that we have said before when we have talked about rural and land issues that we do not always need a one-size-fits-all approach. If we all agree that an approach works in urban areas but not in rural areas, perhaps we should look at having a different approach in urban and rural areas to deal with the specific issue.

Michael Russell: Thank you. That has been very helpful. You have raised the question, even if you do not have the answer to it, and that is a useful step forward.

On neglect and operation, one issue that concerns me most greatly is land that is held by the public—by ministers and a variety of non-departmental public bodies and local authorities. Local authorities are bound by best-value requirements. They have no obligation to maintain buildings, but they have an obligation to try and get best value from them. We have seen some celebrated cases of that, for example at Castle Toward in Argyll. It is a neglected building, and it costs a lot of money, but Argyll and Bute Council seems to have adopted a dog-in-the-manger attitude towards it.

It strikes me as important to address the concept of who owns such buildings, and the question of how they might be transferred to community or other ownership without paying a full purchase price to the public purse—allowing money to circulate within the public realm—if we are to enable more communities to take control. It is difficult to see how that fits into the current legislation, but the issue will have to be confronted. Do any of you have any thoughts about how we might confront that point? It seems to be the biggest barrier for many communities.
Rory Dutton: We do quite a lot of work with local authorities on asset transfers to communities. We try to present such transfers as being on a different scale of public ownership. As you are probably aware, there are regulations from 2010 that allow local authorities to dispose of assets for less than the full consideration, in the light of the wider value that they bring to the public or to communities. We would like that to be expanded to other owners.

That said, it is becoming increasingly hard for us to persuade local authorities that that is indeed the way forward. More and more local authorities have been seeking something more like full market consideration for the products concerned, particularly since the Scottish land fund came back on board.

Community asset transfer, according to the Scottish Government’s definition, is transfer from the public sector to the community sector at less than full market value. We would not like the emphasis on that to be lost, as it is starting to be even in the wider community asset transfer scene.

The Convener: Sarah-Jane?

Sarah-Jane Laing: I have nothing to add—I was going to make the same points as Rory Dutton.

Simon Fraser: On the big difficulty with transfers from Government—public finance money—I understand that they have recently been overhauled. However, I am not aware of the details and I am not sure how far that has gone.

Mr Russell still bears the scars of west Harris and the attempt to pass across the assets there from agriculture to the local community. We could probably do with something in the primary legislation. In that instance, public ownership was inimical to sustainable development, yet the community still had to pay full value to get the assets. The hurdles in that case were the public finance manual and the ogre of state aid. If those factors can somehow be squared with the policy purpose and covered in the primary legislation, that might offer a way through.

Malcolm Combe: Simon Fraser has covered everything that I was planning to say. I was going to make that point about state aid.

Jon Hollingdale: In the Community Woodlands Association, we are very familiar with the operation of the national forest land scheme, which in some ways mirrors, but also goes beyond, what is available under the community right to buy, with communities attempting to acquire from the Forestry Commission. As that scheme is voluntary, it has been possible to shape and change it over the eight years of its operation to make it more fit for purpose, rather than having to worry about primary legislation not allowing people to do things.

However, the scheme has always run up against money issues in the end. The Forestry Commission’s expectation was that full market value would be paid. That has become increasingly difficult as forestry land has appreciated in value, which is partly as a consequence of the economic difficulties in 2008. That is a huge issue.

I know that this comment takes us into the parts of the bill that this committee is not considering, but the asset transfer provisions are pretty silent. One of the Forestry Commission’s issues with those parts of the bill is that they do not really explain how land will be valued, whether it will be at full market value and whether its value will take cognisance of what the community intends to do. In other words, we have to ask whether there is a credit for the additional public benefit that all communities have to demonstrate that they will deliver when they are going through community right to buy and whether that can somehow be factored into the price. There are some big issues there.

The other point that I wanted to make about the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 is that, to date, the majority of the acquisitions that have happened using community right to buy provisions have been from public bodies. I think that the figure is nine out of 16, and a number of the registrations that are still sitting waiting to be activated are also on public bodies, such as Argyll and Bute Council, Moray Council, Scottish Water and the Northern Lighthouse Board. I am not sure how many of those registrations will be covered by the asset transfer part of the bill. Schedule 3 of the bill gives a list of some public bodies that will now be subject to the asset transfer provisions, but I imagine that some of them, particularly United Kingdom bodies, will stay within community right to buy.

We need to tease out how the bill will operate with respect to public bodies, who goes where and whether the part 3A rules will also apply to public bodies, because that is not clear. A community can start by attempting an asset transfer process under part 5 of the bill, and if they are rebuffed by a local authority that says, “No, we aren’t neglecting the land,” it is not clear whether there is a mechanism or transfer process that means that they can then use part 3A.

Dave Thompson: It is not only the various criteria that have already been mentioned that will give difficulty. I would like the panel’s opinion on proposed new section 97H(d), which states that the applications must also show “that the owner of the land is accurately identified in the application”.

Do you see any difficulties there? Trusts can be set up and there may well be other methods of hiding who the owner is, so does that need to be changed or looked at again?

Jon Hollingdale: As the 2003 act stands, the current community right to buy provides for communities to be able to put a registration on land without knowing who the owner is, although they have to demonstrate, and the minister has to accept, that they have taken reasonable steps to find out who the owner is. If it is not possible to find out, a registration can still stand.

At the very least, there ought to be a similar mechanism in the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. It strikes against the whole abandonment issue. If the land is abandoned, that suggests that we would not know who the owner was because they had run away.

That is one thing that reveals a procedural problem in the way that the bill was constructed, as most of the provisions in part 3A seem to have been borrowed wholesale from part 3 of the 2003 act. In crofting communities, I assume that it is taken for granted that people know who the landowner is. That may not be the case, but it seems to me that part 3 of the act has been taken and transferred across to the new bill. There should be an answer in part 2, which is that the community needs to demonstrate to the minister’s satisfaction that reasonable steps have been taken to discover who the landowner is.

Malcolm Combe: I have a few points to make in response to what John Hollingdale has just said.

If I were an advocate running an argument about whether or not the land was abandoned and I did not know who the landowner was and could not find that person, that would be a useful aid to my argument, whether the word used was “abandoned” or something else.

The point about finding out who the landowner is also has to be set in the context of the current land registration reforms that are going through at the same time. On 8 December, the new rules for the land register will become operational, and there is a 10-year target for the transparency of the land register, which we hope will assist in working out exactly who owns what.

I also note in the programme for government the idea that an owner has to be a European Union entity. That is something that the land reform review group proposed, so maybe the concern could be mitigated in future years, dependent on completion of the land register.

Sarah-Jane Laing: To echo what Malcolm Combe said, a lot of steps are being taken to improve identification of landowners across Scotland. Similar to the point on mapping, it is not fair to a community for its application to be thrown out because it listed the owner as Mr J Smith, when in fact it is Mrs S Smith. It must be taken into consideration that there should be some ability to rectify a situation in which the wrong member of the family has been identified, but the community knows that the land belongs to that particular family.

My understanding, after having spoken to Registers of Scotland about the issue, is that that will be more of a problem in urban areas than in rural ones. There are issues in rural areas about identifying owners, as we are all aware, but many of the inquiries that Registers of Scotland receive relate to what it calls fag ends of land in urban areas, where companies have either been wound up or subsumed into a bigger company, and no one is sure who currently owns the piece of land. Those cases will be very problematic.

Rory Dutton: A lot of the communities do not employ staff; they just have volunteers. I can think of an example that was about access to a block of forestry land where we ended up going transnationally to Asia to try to find out who on earth owned the land. The community group was established in 2009 to undertake that asset transfer, but it is only happening this year.

Where there are multiple owners, or owners who live abroad, it can be very challenging to find out exactly who they are. I am not familiar enough with the detail of the forthcoming legislation to know whether the problem of identifying owners will all be addressed, but it can be a major issue.

Simon Fraser: To give a brief example, I had an experience of successfully acquiring land from a Panamanian trust. That is the kind of thing we are up against. If a company chooses not to respond to inquiries, there is nothing to be done—it would be hard to prove that the company had even been contacted.

There could be a longstop provision, to enable some form of edict or citation to be made, or some notice posted on the land if all else fails. That is the kind of thing that is used in other circumstances.

Sarah-Jane Laing: There are lots of precedents set in other legislation, which comes under “all reasonable steps”. I see no reason why a similar provision cannot be inserted into the bill.
The Convener: Okay. We move on to our final set of questions, which is about the interpretation of sustainable development.

The double approach of using public interest and furthering the achievement of sustainable development is being built into the plans. The inclusion of that double requirement for community bodies requires careful handling. Ministers have to be satisfied that some activities might take place if ownership were to remain in the same hands, but that could make it difficult for community bodies to further the achievement of sustainable development in relation to the land. Do you think that there is jeopardy in the way in which the bill is currently framed? Community bodies could find themselves caught up in a situation in which an owner says that they are about to make some sustainable development.

Malcolm Combe: It is an interesting question. I refer back to Holmehill briefly—in that case, I understand that planning permission had been granted and the landowner was able to say that his plans were in the public interest because they had received planning permission. Of course there is a difference between an individual planning application and the wide offsetting within the land but, yes, the idea that a counter development might be sustainable could be an issue.

It is a situation that can never be shut down, because someone else might have a valid sustainable development plan, and that would be fine—we should not be discouraging someone else from putting that up as a counter argument. In fact, it would be great if we encouraged people sufficiently that they were putting sustainable development up as a counter argument. In part it could be a problem but, at the other extreme, if it were to encourage people to engage with things on their land in a way that heretofore they had not been doing, it could be a good thing.

Sarah-Jane Laing: I suppose that the question is what the driver is. If the driver is sustainable development in the public interest, the question of who does it is secondary. If the driver is sustainable development by a community, that is entirely different.

The provisions, as drafted at the moment, give the owner a chance to agree that they have not done enough for the land and that they will bring it back into use for allotments. I think that that is positive, because it gives private owners the chance to consider improving the productive use of their land.

Where there will be a real impact is in the area of what we have called meanwhile use. Someone might have a 10-year development plan, but what are they going to do with that land meanwhile? In relation to such sites, landowners might be quite keen to work with communities for sustainable development in the public interest. However, there would certainly be no reason for the transfer of ownership to happen.

The Convener: But we are talking about communities having an idea that they perhaps need housing, whereas the landowner might think that sustainable development means building holiday homes to bring in value to the estate. Surely the question about what sustainable development is would be difficult for ministers to interpret and might be used as an excuse for not making land available to the community.

Sarah-Jane Laing: In that regard, we go back to discussions that we had on the planning application. If the planning department of the local authority decided that there was a need for tourism accommodation and business use on that site and had granted the planning application on that basis, the landowner would then be delivering the public interest. If the planning department had carried out a housing land audit and identified a need for housing, and the landowner was not delivering housing on that site, that would be a different matter.

If you are going to weigh up the need between tourism, business and housing on the same site, you are talking about competing sustainable development uses, rather than sustainable development versus the non-development of a site.

The Convener: It is a matter of interpretation, I guess.

Rory Dutton: Community and development trusts are there to make things happen for their communities. Local businesses and lairds are part of that community, too. If a laird is prepared to do something that will push forward sustainable development in that area, that is great, as it means that the community does not have to do it.

The issue goes back to the question of whether the agenda is one of the regeneration of an area or one of land reform. We take the view that it should be a regeneration agenda. If the landowner is not regenerating the area and the community can do it, that is the way it should go. However, if existing players can do it effectively, that should be welcomed.

Jon Hollingdale: The context of what we are talking about is part 3A, so we are talking about a minority of recalcitrant and refractory landowners, not the majority of landowners.

As the bill is drafted, communities would be expected to demonstrate that current land ownership is incompatible with sustainable development, which is an impossible test to pass. Even in terms of the landowners’ plans, you have to be aware that landowners will see part 3A applications coming a long way off, because the process involves the community previously having attempted to buy the land. The bill does not detail what that means, but we assume that it does not mean simply phoning the landowner and saying, “We’ll give you a tenner for it”, it would have to be a properly valued process.

Following that, the community would have had to go through a ballot. All of that means that the landowner will have quite a window of time in which they will be aware that something is happening. Clearly, given that we are talking about a minority of recalcitrant landowners, they have an opportunity to invent a scheme out of thin air. It is therefore important that ministers have the ability to assess the credibility of the landowners’ plans.

It might be that, as has been said, a landowner has serious and sensible plans that they are either getting on with or awaiting finance for. Those are good reasons for a community’s request to be refused. However, it is important to ensure that it does not simply give a recalcitrant landowner the ability to frustrate the community’s objectives by pulling something off the shelf or having a plan that is not at all that credible.

The Convener: Indeed. Thank you for exploring the complexities of this matter with us. That has been helpful, because we are going to be considering the urban context and ECHR issues. After we reflect on matters, we might come back to you for some clarification of some of the points that you have made.

We will suspend to allow a comfort break of about five minutes.

Meeting suspended.

11:40

On resuming—

The Convener: We will continue with agenda item 6, which is evidence on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

Our second panel will focus on the urban context and the European convention on human rights. I welcome Wendy Reid, who is the development manager with the Development Trusts Association Scotland; John Mundell, who is the chief executive of Inverclyde Council; Dr Colleen Rowan, who is membership and policy officer for the Glasgow and West of Scotland Forum of Housing Associations; David Cruickshank, who is executive director of the Lambhill Stables Development Trust; Susan Carr of the Community Alliance Trust; and Professor Alan Miller, who is the chair of the Scottish Human Rights Commission.

We have a range of questions to put to you. The microphones are handled centrally, so you do not need to switch them on and off. We will kick off on aspects of the structure of the bill.

Graeme Dey: Good morning—I think that it still is morning. Are the panel satisfied with the extent of the dialogue and consultation that have taken place on the community right to buy? Do you believe that the extension of the community right to buy to urban areas sits appropriately in the context of the bill?

Wendy Reid (Development Trusts Association Scotland): DTA Scotland is happy with the level of consultation. There have been numerous opportunities to contribute, and not just for the organisation but for our members. We found the process to be very accessible.

On whether the bill is the right place for the extension of the right to buy to urban areas, as colleagues on the earlier panel mentioned, when the bill was suggested, there was no obvious other opportunity to address the issue. In that context, it seemed to fit well to allow, through the bill, communities in urban areas the same rights as communities in rural areas have had for numerous years. The bill will empower urban communities to the extent that rural communities are already empowered.

The Convener: No one else wishes to comment on that, so we move on to the policy memorandum.

Alex Fergusson: This is a scene-setting question that I also put to the previous panel. Last June, the convener of the Parliament’s Local Government and Regeneration Committee wrote to the Minister for Local Government and Planning seeking clarification on the policy memorandum. In a way, he was fairly critical, as he described the policy memorandum as “little more than a superficial overview.”

There was then a bit of correspondence and a bit more detail was provided.

My question is very simple. Given that the policy memorandum devotes fewer than three pages to the whole of part 4 and at one point summarises 20 sections in, I think, seven bullet points, does it contain enough content and detail to explain satisfactorily the policy choices and the purpose and aims of the bill? I was particularly taken by a comment from a previous panellist, who said that someone might think that they understand the policy memorandum, but when they pick at it and try to drill down into it, they suddenly discover that it has a different meaning. Does anybody have any comment on that?

Professor Alan Miller (Scottish Human Rights Commission): The Scottish Human Rights Commission has had limited and modest engagement with this whole area—I sat in on the previous session to educate myself. I have no doubt that others have much more experience of, and insight into, a lot of the issues.

On the broader policy setting and the landscape, having listened to the previous panel I am struck by how narrowly framed the debate has been. I am a little embarrassed that the way in which human rights has been interpreted is contributing to there being quite narrow parameters around debate about land reform and community empowerment. I will just make a couple of points about the perception of human rights and its relevance to the committee’s consideration of the bill, because I am sure that others have more value to add.

The language that is being used—I heard the term “absolute right to buy” being used again this morning—is very unhelpful, although I understand why people are using it. The European convention on human rights is not understood as providing a framework in which the legitimate rights of landowners and the public interest are reconciled and a balance is struck, with compensation being paid to the landowner if necessary. The right to buy is a qualified right: there has to be a competing public interest to override the right to peaceful enjoyment by the person who owns the land. Therefore, language such as “right to buy” or “absolute right” polarises the debate in an unhelpful way and does not reflect a clear understanding of what the ECHR contributes to the debate.

The bigger frustration that I have with the policy framework is this: human rights does not begin and end at the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg; there is a much broader framework of international human rights that are relevant to the Government and the Parliament, but which are largely invisible.

The Scotland Act 1998 calls on the Scottish ministers to observe and implement international obligations, of which one—but only one—is the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, which places a duty on the Scottish ministers to use the maximum available resources to ensure progressive realisation of the right to housing, employment, food and so on—that is, it sees land as a national asset, which is to be used for the progressive realisation of what we might call sustainable development.

Therefore, what human rights provides is a broader impetus for land reform, rather than an inhibition, as is suggested in the way that the issue is currently couched—that is, in questions about whether a landowner has a red card that can be used with reference to the ECHR to stifle discussion about different use of the land. That is what is missing from the policy framework.

Another thing that I find striking is that next year—this will become real for Scotland the year after—we will have sustainable development goals at United Nations level, and all member states will be required to develop national plans. That will come to Scotland in due course. If we look at the bigger picture, having a proactive plan for using the national asset and resource of land to achieve sustainable development is where things will be in two or three years.

We are not currently benefiting from that broader framework, and as a result the debate is suffering from being quite confined and narrow. It might be that the forthcoming legislation on land reform will begin to address the issue. I certainly hope so. Currently, the way in which human rights has been perceived has narrowed the parameters of the debate and somewhat robbed us of the benefits of the wider framework.

If human rights is seen in the wider context that I have set out, there will be a realisation that it drives us not towards courts and lawyers but towards having an environment in which there is more constructive dialogue between landowners and communities, because landowners will know that there is a legal framework to which communities will have recourse as a last resort, if that is in the public interest.

It will also lead to more responsible use of land, whether by existing landowners or by the public and communities, if they take ownership of the land. I think that we are being deprived of the full benefits of an informed human rights framework by the somewhat narrowly framed bill and debate.

Michael Russell: That is exceptionally interesting, but if we are going to move from what is a somewhat archaic and old-fashioned view of the individual rights of land ownership to a much more informed and illuminated view of the interrelationship between land, the rights of those who live there and the responsibilities of positive use, how do we construct a dialogue that allows us to do that?

Legislation can sometimes get in the way of having the types of debate that we are having, but there is a commitment—I think correctly—to a series of legislative actions that will take us from here to a better place. What can we do that will allow the process to be more productive and more helpful to everybody involved, and to have an outcome in which there is a possibility of reconciling the different points of view, for positive change in development? That seems to me to be the human rights challenge. You have experience of that type of dialogue elsewhere. How do we establish it?

Professor Miller: Where we start from is important. The bill and, to go back to Alex Fergusson’s question, the policy memorandum have made it difficult at this stage to embrace that broader view of the positive benefit of seeing how human rights plays out in these dimensions. In so far as it does play into this somewhat narrow field, I think that it is in the public interest. Human rights is in the provisions on sustainable development and how that is interpreted, applied and implemented, but it is being shoehorned in.

It may be that further legislation that looks at a broader canvas will be more appropriate. I hope the starting point of that legislation would be broader than what we have just now. It is like the person in Ireland asking for directions and being told, “Well, I wouldn’t start from where you are now, sir.”

Michael Russell: A famous book about Irish politics has the title “Phrases Make History Here”, which was a remark of Maffey, the UK ambassador to Ireland during the second world war. Are you going to be actively involved in the consultation on the land reform legislation, which was published yesterday, and will you make those points to the Scottish Government? It seems to me that they should be made.

Professor Miller: We will repeat the points on the bill that we have made to the Scottish Government; at the outset, we said to the Scottish Government that it is far too narrowly framed. If we are talking about community empowerment, we really have to understand what the community’s rights are, and we should not let the debate be polarised by the notion of an absolute right to buy, which does not exist. Communities cannot be given that. There has to be a public interest, so it is a qualified right and not an absolute right to buy.

However, we were not successful in persuading the Government to take a broader perspective. I do not know whether we will be more successful next time, but there are some quite positive indications that we might get a better reception.

The Convener: I think that it is correct to say that the land reform review group report in May made a big difference to how the Government is looking at the matter. I hope that you agree.

Professor Miller: I think that that is true. We have moved on significantly over the past year or two, and not just because of that report. Other bodies seem now to be more interested in the broader canvas than they were before, so I am quite optimistic that we are going somewhere.

The Convener: Okay. Nobody else wants to pick up on the points that Alex Fergusson asked about.

Alex Fergusson: Yes, they do.

The Convener: Oh. Wendy Reid does.

Wendy Reid: I just want to feed in our thoughts on the policy memorandum. Barring the things that have just been said, we are quite comfortable with it; it sets out quite well the policy context in relation to community empowerment, what is meant by that and the purposes of the bill. We think that it is quite ambitious.

I suppose that our question is about whether the bill enables those policy aspirations to be delivered. I guess that the statutory guidance and the detail that comes with it will determine whether we achieve what the policy memorandum claims.

We were also disappointed that the word “renewal” was dropped from the bill title, because we thought that that contextualised the bill as being about renewal and regeneration, as well as community empowerment. Community empowerment must be for a purpose: that purpose is renewal and regeneration. Although dropping “renewal” from the title did not necessarily weaken the bill, neither did it necessarily provide a useful context on community empowerment. It left people asking, “What’s that all about?”

Dr Colleen Rowan (Glasgow and West of Scotland Forum of Housing Associations): I echo that, and our response to the bill consultation made the same point. The bill is a missed opportunity. As far as our members are concerned and in their experience in communities, community empowerment and regeneration go hand in hand, so to separate them is to miss an opportunity.

John Mundell (Inverclyde Council): Any attempt to explain or contextualise the issues is a good thing. The brevity of the policy memorandum probably does not help, bearing in mind the complexity of the issues that are addressed in the bill.

One matter that has struck a chord through all the discussions—I have been at committee to discuss the bill two or three times—is that we are being asked to consult and liaise with community bodies. Obviously, they represent only a restricted number of the population. How are we to communicate or consult the wider population? Have we cracked that nut yet? Have we done enough to make people understand the bill?

I work in the community environment and try to make sure that we liaise and serve our communities in the right way. The bill is very complex. I am not sure that we have managed to simplify the issues enough so that normal members of the public who are not, as we are, immersed in the issues can understand what the Government is trying to achieve.

The Convener: We will ask specific questions about that soon.

Jim Hume: Good morning, everyone. The financial memorandum states that the part 4 provisions would not “impose any significant additional costs on the Scottish Government.”

However, it is uncertain on the costs for urban communities and landowners. What costs might urban communities and landowners incur?

David Cruickshank (Lambhill Stables Development Trust): That is a deep question. I can answer it only with a broad-brush response, without going into the technical details in the bill.

The simple fact is that, in urban communities, there is not only significant deprivation but significant lack of resource. There is no point in floating the possibility of ownership without resourcing that with capital and on-going revenue. There is no magic wand that will allow deprived communities suddenly to have the confidence and experience to own and manage resources; there must be resources coming in that would make that feasible.

That can be evidenced in several different ways. First, landowners in deprived communities are not necessarily willing to hand over what they perceive as a potential asset—even though it is, in reality, probably a liability—without achieving full market value, as they perceive it. For example, Glasgow City Council has mortgaged all its redundant land to Barclays at a given market rate and will not release the land unless it achieves that value. It says that that is because it must honour its bond or promise to Barclays and cannot be released by communities unless they pay the full market value.

Michael Russell: I know that I am a new boy on the committee, but I find it very strange. Are you telling us that Glasgow City Council has a deal with Barclays that means that, if there is redundant land, it is incumbent on them to pay Barclays the full market value?

David Cruickshank: The position is not quite as cut and dried as that. There are several steps along the way, including the fact that the land is handed from Glasgow City Council to an arm’s-length external organisation called City Property, which in turn engages a private maintenance management team called Ryden, so we are dealing with a string of different pressures.

I stress that, as a representative of a community development trust, it is not a good idea for me to alienate my potential partners, so I am not going to—

Michael Russell: Fortunately, I have no such qualms. Is that a common arrangement across local authorities?

John Mundell: Not that I am aware of. Such an arrangement would, dare I say it, cause some discomfort—at least the thought of it. I would have to understand it in greater detail.
Michael Russell: The arrangement might be considered an inhibition to some of the bill’s ambitions were it to be replicated in any other places. I have had enough difficulties with Argyll and Bute Council’s attitude, which I shall discuss later. The arrangement seems odd.

John Mundell: I cannot comment because I do not know the details. It would be unfair of me to comment on the situation elsewhere. We are being charged with the responsibility of being innovative in how we deal with assets and the services that we provide, and that arrangement sounds innovative to me, although I am not so sure whether it works appropriately for the bill.

Michael Russell: Is that a non-positive definition of “innovative”? John Mundell: As I said, it would not be appropriate for me to comment on my colleagues’ ideas without more detail.

Wendy Reid: I cannot say that I know all the details, but our understanding of the arrangement is that, a number of years ago, Glasgow City Council identified several unused land assets and entered into an agreement. The council set up an ALEO and identified the land and property as being of potential use in the market. It went into a partnership agreement with a company and took out a mortgage against the value of that land and property.

The idea was that the council would get a lump sum up front and, as the company with which the ALEO went into partnership—Ryden—is a specialist land agent, the benefit from selling the assets would be maximised. In that way, the ALEO could achieve a greater value for the assets than the value that the council got from Barclays in the first place, so there would be profits on both sides.

What that means for communities is that any building or land that was identified and transferred into City Property is unavailable for communities to acquire, unless they can pay what is perceived as the market value for the land, because the council has to get that money back in order to repay the mortgage or loan that it took out against the suite of assets.

There will be nuances that we have not really understood, but that is my understanding of the principle of what happened. Some assets were identified a number of years ago; I do not know whether new assets are still being put into the portfolio. I have heard that the arrangement is being reviewed, so we cannot say where the current situation sits entirely.

The arrangement has made things extraordinarily difficult for communities in areas in which there were unused buildings such as schools that communities had an interest in acquiring. Those communities were told categorically that those buildings would not be available for asset transfer purposes because they sat within City Property.

The Convener: Maybe the news will leak out from the committee that there is considerable interest in that.

Graeme Dey: I will develop that with Wendy Reid. I understand that John Mundell is in a difficult position and does not want to comment on other local authorities, but is it Ms Reid’s experience that other local authorities in Scotland have entered into similar arrangements?

Wendy Reid: We have not come across that, to be honest. There might have been different arrangements, but there has been nothing like that and nothing that has so explicitly said that assets are outwith the council’s control.

Glasgow City Council basically said that it could not take any decisions on the future of the assets because it was no longer in full control of them. Technically, the council still owned them, as we found out, but it was extraordinarily difficult to get to the bottom of the situation, because a number of organisations and companies were involved in the arrangement. That meant that communities could not access any of the assets, which was not obvious to begin with.

It was difficult for a community to find out whether an asset that it was interested in was under the management of City Property or of Glasgow City Council. There did not appear to be an obvious place to go to for that information; registers of assets, as proposed in the bill, would have been useful in showing exactly where ownership of assets sat. Although the council technically still owned the assets, it was not in control of their disposal.

Susan Carr (Community Alliance Trust): I agree with what David Cruckshank said about development trusts trying to get on to the first rung. That is incredibly difficult without funding. I work in Craigmillar, which is five minutes along the road from here. We have a similar arrangement about who controls the land. Craigmillar has been identified as a regeneration area and the City of Edinburgh Council has set up an arm’s-length company for that regeneration. The original business plan was profit led and was meant to generate income for building new houses.

PARC Craigmillar, the regeneration company, has first call on an area, defined in the Craigmillar urban design framework by a red line that goes around most of the area, in which the buildings have been demolished or lying empty for a while. PARC has first call on the land, which precludes us from accessing it. PARC does not own it—it is still owned by the City of Edinburgh Council—but any development there goes to PARC.

However, the original business plan did not work. When the property development sector crashed, so did the business plan. We have a development trust now because Alex Neil, when he was the communities minister, said that that might be one of the only ways in which we could influence any future decisions for Craigmillar.

We have recently taken over the lease of the White House, which used to be a notorious pub but is now a delightful art deco building that serves lovely food as a social enterprise. The point is that we want to find ways of developing and generating our ability to fund things. However, the journey that we had to make to take over that lease was unbelievable. For a small area such as Craigmillar, which has such great need, the journey was really difficult. We had to go through all the tendering and legals that an ordinary developer with loads of money would have to go through.

I would like to see whether there is an alternative to communities having the right to buy. Buying is such a far-off dream—we will never have that ability, unless funding is made available. We might have the aspiration, but we will never have the ability to buy. However, there are loads of opportunities for us to have the right to occupy buildings that are lying empty, such as buildings that contribute to an area in Craigmillar that will supposedly be our new town centre. At the moment, that is mostly derelict land, with some shopfronts that are lying empty.

A part of the shopfront—quite a sizeable building—is owned by the city council, which hopes to let it at an affordable price for developers. It is not affordable, however. For a community group, a price of £90,000 for a property that needs a lot of work is unattainable. I suspect that most people will not want to look at the building anyway. It is lying there and is contributing to the decay and the current situation in Craigmillar. People walk through it or pass it, but they do not look at it, and it is never open. It looks a disgrace. We could find a use for the premises, but we could not find £90,000 to fund it.

The Convener: The discussion about local government taxation and the way in which gap sites and neglected sites are taxed might well force some changes. However, that is up to another body, not this one.

Professor Miller: I am interested in the Glasgow City Council arrangement, which could be instructive. We would all need to know more information to understand the significance of the matter. I certainly understand John Mundell’s inhibition from being critical of fellow local authorities.

I am in a different position, but I have a lot of sympathy for local authorities. The issue that we have discussed resonates with other examples where authorities find themselves between a rock and a hard place. If it is local authorities’ view that the determinant decision-making criterion is best value, that makes it difficult for them to make decisions that serve a broader public purpose of sustainable development or whatever. That is not dissimilar to the procurement regime, where local authorities feel quite inhibited. If they are putting out to tender services that impact on the quality of lives of individuals and communities, and if best value is perceived as the primary way in which they are accountable, that often frustrates what they would otherwise like to do. We come back to this body—the Parliament—and to the Government to ensure that local authorities do not feel that they have to enter into agreements that do not serve the public interest.

Wendy Reid: Before I return to the initial question about financial implications, I will talk about best value. Our understanding is that best value is not necessarily about achieving best financial value. Other aspects make up best value and other considerations can be taken into account.

Achieving best value does not always mean getting the highest financial return on the disposal of an asset. We have always understood that to be the case, but whether that is taken into account in a lot of cases is another matter, given that local authorities are increasingly experiencing financial difficulty. We can see why best value is often seen as meaning the best financial return.

It is—partly—hard to tell what the bill’s other financial implications will be. They will all be demand driven, as I am sure the committee has heard before. One question from an urban context is to do with the fact that, at the moment, rural communities can access the land fund to get help with acquiring assets. Will that land fund be expanded to cover urban areas as well as rural areas? I know that the land fund’s value is going up, but will the criteria under which communities are eligible change?

Another point is that there is a difference between the financial implications of providing enough support and advice to organisations and those of enabling them to acquire the resources to purchase assets. Some things that are in place should not change. For instance, the Government is supporting the community ownership support service, which supports any community organisation that is looking to acquire an asset, whether in an urban or a rural context.
Some things are in place, but it is difficult to know how much extra business there will be from the changes as a result of the bill and to know what the financial implications will be. Evidence suggests that the bill will not necessarily lead immediately to a massive increase in the number of assets that go into community ownership. Within the first few years, the bill is more likely to lay down a marker than to lead to significant increases in property transfers.

Michael Russell: I will tease out the issue of best value, because it also relates to the topic of abandoned and derelict land, which we will come on to. Undoubtedly, councils will have bought some land and property for a development or whatever, and nobody would expect them to dispose of such assets at a loss. However, councils own substantial assets that they did not have to pay for because they were inherited for a variety of reasons from a variety of people. There needs to be a definition of types of land—it will be interesting to see whether we can arrive at such a definition—and the costs to local authorities. There is a legislative opportunity for local authorities to dispense with assets not for best value if there is another definition, and community interest is such a definition.

Have councils the will to do that? I am not asking John Mundell to speak for every council in Scotland, but do local authorities have the will to encourage the transfer of assets to communities? How can that be done with the wasting assets that Susan Carr referred to? It costs a local authority money to maintain and guard such property, to ensure that it does not deteriorate, but local authorities are generally not doing that, so the assets are deteriorating.

I do not want to disagree with Alan Miller—I rarely do so—but the issue is much more complicated than just saying that a council must look after such assets. There are council properties that have not been purchased and which are often not well looked after. There is a great opportunity for communities to make more of such property and benefit from it, which would also benefit the local authority area. Do local authorities have the stomach for that or is it too complex or difficult for them?

The Convener: David Cruickshank and Colleen Rowan can respond first.

David Cruickshank: As the question was to local authorities, it would perhaps be fair to let John Mundell respond. My point is about the resource that is available to achieve overall sustainable development and about moving away from the strict definition of value being price. I will hold back and let John Mundell respond to Mr Russell.

The Convener: Okay—maybe we should do it that way round. Does Colleen Rowan feel the same?

Dr Rowan: Yes.

The Convener: Right—I call John Mundell.

John Mundell: Thank you. I am glad that the point has been well made that best value is about more than just money. However, to my mind the issue is balance. For example, if we have an asset that is worth £1 million and has been acquired by whatever means—common good, inheritance or whatever—members will appreciate that elements of the community would challenge a council if it was to release that property for, say, £50,000 in order to have a significant community benefit. That decision would have to go through the political decision-making process and there would have to be a robust argument for it.

On whether councils have the stomach to transfer assets to communities, I can speak for my council—that is why I am here, as far as I am concerned—in saying that we absolutely do have the stomach for that. We are heavily involved in working with community groups and so on to help them to build capacity and have the required skills. We do the hand holding to help them to acquire assets.

Mr Russell made an important point when he referred to wasting assets or assets that have failed. As chief executive of Inverclyde Council, I am concerned that quite often in these austere times we look to transfer assets that perhaps have failed. Why are they failing? Because the community does not see the asset as a huge benefit. Perhaps the community has neither the capacity nor the interest to deal with the asset.

We had an asset in Port Glasgow that worked very well for quite a long time and was a valuable asset in the community. However, the people involved in running it moved on or chose not to continue. The funder of last resort, which is the council, was then asked what it would do about the asset. That asset had, in essence, been transferred, but the facility that had been operating has now been shut. What are we to do in such scenarios?

David Cruickshank made an important point about development trusts, which play a key role in communities. Inverclyde Community Development Trust is an important partner in Inverclyde and has a big part to play. I have sympathy with development trusts that are trying to access cash, and we have to take on board the point that David Cruickshank made about the capital cost, the ongoing revenues and the whole-life costs of a property. What is important is not just the property as a physical asset but supporting the services that are provided in a facility. In the current climate, it is difficult to achieve that balancing act, as cash is getting tighter and tighter.

Without appropriate funds being made available, councils do not have the money at the moment. We have heard about bureaucracy and about the legal processes that we have to go through for procurement and best value, but those are just a couple of examples. There is a huge amount to consider. I have to employ a team of lawyers to ensure that I go through the process and that I reduce the risk for our council and, more important, for our community. I do that to ensure that our council is run appropriately, as my peers do up and down the country. There is a lot to take into account and it is very complicated.

Graeme Dey: I have an observation. We are focusing on local authorities, which was inevitable after David Cruickshanks's comment, but I suspect that we could also be talking about the national health service, as we see a move away from old, traditional hospital buildings and towards centralisation or building new facilities. Perhaps Police Scotland will also find itself in the same situation as it closes small or old police stations. It is not just local authorities that we are dealing with.

John Mundell: My council's headquarters are in a building that was built in the mid-1800s. I always find it amusing when we are told to bring all our services together, because that building was the police headquarters and is now the Strathclyde Fire and Rescue Service museum, as well as having been the council headquarters and the court for places as far afield as Eaglesham and Govan. We moved away from that—we unpicked it, but now we are trying to bring it all back together again. Obviously, things go in cycles.

We integrated health and social care back in 2010, before the latest initiative, but there is still more to do to implement the changes that are due under the impending legislation. We are already looking at jointly procuring general practitioner practices and trying to get rid of bed blocking in local hospitals, and we are much more joined up now, which is a positive thing: we can reduce the property portfolios of each of the agencies involved and make our operations much more efficient through cohabitation within facilities. There is a long way to go yet, but that might release some of the cash that we need to help communities.

The Convener: I see that David Cruickshank, Colleen Rowan and Wendy Reid all want to comment. We have quite a lot of the detail in part 4 to deal with, so please keep your remarks as brief as possible.

David Cruickshank: I agree with the observation that there is more to community empowerment than local authorities. The NHS, Scottish Water and a whole range of public agencies are in the same boat. I do not know what questions are yet to come, but I would like to make a point that I hope will be explored in further questions. There are other ways of deploying existing resources that will make it possible for communities to become empowered economically, environmentally and socially. Sustainable development—the triple bottom line, if you like—is the key to the resolution of some of those issues. I shall leave it at that for the time being.

The Convener: We will indeed deal with some of those issues.

Dr Rowan: I return to the Glasgow context. From our members' perspective, the picture is mixed. Some of our members work well with Glasgow City Council and have taken over properties in their communities. We also work a lot with other third sector organisations in the city, and again the picture is mixed.

To return to Susan Carr's point about the right to occupy, sometimes the ALEOs work well with local organisations and sometimes they do not. We hear stories all the time about organisations being asked to take on prohibitive leases that they cannot afford and to take over on-going repairs and general maintenance. Those are obstacles and barriers. We work closely with community development trusts, which John Mundell talked about, but the general community anchors are the key mechanism that connects a lot of the activity around what the council is doing and what communities want. We made that point in our submission.

Wendy Reid: I have a very brief comment about other public sector assets. There is a reason why there has been less movement of other public sector assets into community ownership. According to the Scottish public finance manual, those other public sector bodies have to get the best financial return from assets, whereas local authorities have a bit of dispensation, in that they can dispose of assets at less than market value under the Disposal of Land by Local Authorities (Scotland) Regulations 2010. Communities are very interested in other assets, but up until now, it has been easier to negotiate transfers of local authority assets, because of that flexibility for local authorities to dispose of land at less than best consideration. It would be interesting to see whether the Scottish public finance manual will be reviewed to allow other public sector bodies the same flexibility.

Jim Hume: This is more of a comment than a question. We have opened up a can of worms, to put it mildly. We have heard that there is a mixed picture of how different public bodies interpret best value. I am sure that we will want to explore further whether that is just a Glasgow situation or whether the picture is similar across other local authorities in relation to how they and other public bodies interpret best value and whether it is interpreted purely as best value in financial accounting terms or as best value for the community.

I think we can move on now, convener.

The Convener: We can indeed.

Angus MacDonald: Just before we move on, I want to pick up Colleen Rowan’s point. I agree that not all ALEOs benefit the local communities that they are supposed to represent.

I will stick with the financial memorandum temporarily. If demand on the Scottish land fund grows following the extension of the community right to buy to urban Scotland, which public bodies are likely to be most affected? Do those public bodies have the expertise and support to advise urban communities? What costs do you envisage those bodies having to bear?

David Cruickshank: I refer you to the Development Trusts Association Scotland, of which we are a member—I am also a board member—which was set up specifically to deal with such issues. I will leave Wendy Reid to specify more exactly the role that development trusts can play.

On the ability to resource and sustain community initiatives—presumably we are talking about community empowerment and renewal in the context of land reform—one opportunity that is opening up will open up another can of worms, particularly in deprived communities where people are dependent on benefits that are currently administered through the Department for Work and Pensions. Presumably, that resource could be redeployed in a way that could serve as a foundation for employment opportunities for people in those communities, which could be built on in such a way that people were not afraid of losing their basic human rights in terms of housing, money for food and so on. There is an opportunity in cultivating communities, which is about renewal, regeneration and using that resource far more positively than it is used currently.

The Convener: That is an interesting point.

Wendy Reid: The question about which public sector bodies are likely to be affected is a hard one. Looking at the experience so far of rural communities acquiring assets by utilising the right to buy—or even acquiring assets but not using the right to buy—you can see that the main difference between the support that rural communities and urban communities can access is that rural communities in the Highlands and Islands area can access support and extra resource from HIE, whereas urban communities outside that area struggle to find a similar avenue of support.

There are various bits and pieces of support available to communities all over Scotland—people will say, "You could get this or you could get that." However, on the additional finances that are required to support urban communities, we need something akin to the level and detail of support that rural communities are able to acquire through HIE, particularly for aspects such as business planning, and the additional finances that HIE can give asset acquisition projects. Urban communities in particular are not able to access that support at the minute.

Angus MacDonald: As we have heard from a number of contributors today, finance is an issue. Are you aware of any funding schemes that are available to urban communities? What additional support is likely to be required to meet the anticipated increase in applications?

Wendy Reid: We could never put a figure on that. However, all communities are able to access Big Lottery Fund money if they are looking to acquire an asset. Although that funding is available now, the programmes are up for review and we do not know whether there will still be a growing community assets fund this time next year. We would all be surprised if on-going lottery funds did not contain some strand of funding that enabled communities to acquire, develop and manage assets, but no one knows what that will look like and what sums will be available.

Urban communities are not able to access LEADER funding, which is for rural communities, and they have less opportunity to acquire money specifically for asset acquisition than rural communities have. If the Scottish land fund is to be broadened to enable urban communities to utilise it, that will answer part of the question. I am not sure whether that will happen; there may have been a statement about it that I am unaware of. Sometimes local authorities have bits of money that communities can acquire, but there is nothing specifically for urban communities that rural communities cannot access, whereas the opposite is true at the moment.

The Convener: The reintroduction of rates—or the removal of the non-domestic rates exemption—for shooting estates is being discussed. We are looking to top up the land fund from that.

Wendy Reid: The question is whether urban communities will be able to apply to the land fund. Up until now, the fund has been, by definition, something for rural communities, not urban communities.

The Convener: We will check that out.

Susan Carr: To apply for Big Lottery funding, a community has to have in place a lease of at least 25 years, and to negotiate the lease the community needs funding to get the support of lawyers. It is a chicken-and-egg problem.

Our community, Craigmillar, is a deprived community. For years and years, people have made decisions for us—they still do. People need to be supported to make decisions for themselves. Frankly, the idea of taking on a 25-year lease and finding the funding to do that is a bit overwhelming for some communities, which do not know where to start. Until they are given a first step up the ladder, it will be very difficult for people in deprived areas to accept that they have the ability to do that.

I hear about capacity building all the time, but quite frankly this is not about building capacity; it is about releasing it. That is what really needs to happen. The capacity is there; it is just not released. There are too many barriers for people to get past.

The Convener: Thank you.

We move on to the nature of land.

Cara Hilton: Good afternoon, panel. I am keen to hear more about how the community right to buy will empower and make a real difference to communities in urban areas. How will that help community confidence, cohesion and sustainability?

Susan Carr and Wendy Reid have already talked about the funding challenges that urban communities face, but are there any other issues that particularly affect urban communities? Do you foresee any practical problems? How likely are community bodies in urban areas to use the new right to register interest in land that is already subject to a development proposal as a way of blocking development? Do you agree that one of the unintended consequences of the bill could be an increase in inequalities between communities?

I am sorry that that was rather long.

The Convener: That is all right.

John Mundell: There are significant inequalities in our communities already. There are impoverished areas, and I see it as a primary part of my job to ensure that we try to balance the scales for people who are the most disadvantaged.

There are positives in the bill, but there are technical changes that need to be made to help us address inequalities—I have included them in my written submission. Such things need to be taken on board.

Up in Kilmalcolm, which is one of the most well-heeled areas in Scotland and lies within the Inverclyde Council area, capacity was released—I take on board the point that has been made about that—and the skills in the community were there already, so the level of intervention that the council had to make was limited. Yes, we went through a whole process and, yes, there were power struggles in the community group, but things have settled down and the project has been highly successful. It involved an asset that the council had not managed to continue, but an investment has been made through a cocktail of funding and a bid process, and it has been highly successful.

However, in other areas, where people are more disadvantaged—I recognise that there is a lot of enthusiasm and pride in such communities—more support is needed, because the skills do not necessarily exist in the local area and a greater level of intervention by councils is required.

Anything in the bill that helps us to tackle such issues is positive. However, as I have said, there are various technical issues that need to be addressed. I have pointed those out in my written submission and I would like to see them dealt with.

Susan Carr: I want to go back to sustainability. One of the problems in deprived areas is that we are often subject to someone’s great idea of what will solve our problems—those ideas very rarely come from people within the community. We have a long history in Craigmillar of someone having a brilliant idea, coming along and setting up a project that has a certain lifespan and then the funding is removed, so we start all over again.

Community engagement is crucial. In an area such as Craigmillar, people have been consulted to death. They could tell the Parliament about consultation. However, very little of what is said during a consultation is put into realising people's aspirations. It nearly always gets twisted. It is like the funding that we can apply for: we have to apply for the funding that people are prepared to give us for the activities that they want us to do. I would argue that if we empowered people to come up with their own ideas for solutions, we would have a much better, sustainable future for the community.

In Craigmillar, more than half the houses have been demolished but because the prices have dropped for house building, no developer is prepared to go in there. Where we once had a community of almost 25,000 people, we now have a community of about 7,000 or 8,000—at one point it went down to 5,000. The problem is that the opportunity for people to have a say is being reduced because the community is now dismissed.
as being too small to be able to reflect what the area needs. However, people will be there long after the regeneration process is completed.

There is a need to consider how we can empower people to have a say in what is needed in their own area. The committee may be surprised to find that that often concurs with what the local authority wants; it is just a different way of doing it. People want new housing, good facilities and equality in life. It is not rocket science. Nobody wants dog fouling and litter, but they are consequences, perhaps of bad design and the fact that during the consultation process no one listened to people telling the local authority about what would work in their area.

There is an issue around allowing people in deprived areas the funding and the time that it takes to take on issues themselves.

Dr Rowan: I feel that I need to come in here to say that our members’ model of community-based housing associations is predicated on local people leading and making decisions at the micro, neighbourhood level about what is needed in their own communities. I am certainly not suggesting that community-controlled housing associations are a universal panacea or a silver bullet that will solve all the problems. In fact, most of our members operate in deprived communities, and the inequalities—the health and socioeconomic inequalities—between those neighbourhoods and the rest of Scotland have grown. However, by releasing or tapping into what is already on the ground, our model works.

Most of our members are celebrating their 40th year this year—some on the peripheral estates have been around for 25 years—and it amazes us that their work is not lauded and put out there as an example of the resource that is already in communities and which could be tapped into. We have just put out a new publication, “Community Controlled Housing Associations—Still Transforming Local Communities”. We are willing to talk to councils and health boards about health and social care integration, because that offers our members and local people opportunities to be involved in those big decisions and processes as we go forward.

Claudia Beamish: To move the discussion forward, I would like to delve as deeply and as broadly as we can into the meaning of “community”, which is complex and difficult and which relates to place and interest. I will not go back to section 34 of the 2003 act, because what the committee would value is the panel’s perceptions, experience and knowledge of where they think the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill should be going. I would like to address the comments that have already been made about SCIOs in the context of the bill, as well as comments about bencoms and the issues with the complexities of geographical definitions and postcodes in an urban context, and also methods of defining communities of interest such as arts organisations, charities, ethnic groups and communities more broadly—the list is as never-ending as one’s imagination, but there are also challenging issues around finding land to grow things on, as allotments societies and community councils know.

I am putting all that on the table and asking whether our panel can give any thoughts about whether definitions have to relate to specific legal entities or whether there might be other ways of defining community that would be helpful in taking forward the regeneration issues that we have been discussing.

The Convener: Who wants to start?

John Mundell: That is a very challenging question. In the simplest terms, the meaning of community is about people who live together and the relationships that exist between people in that community—how they interact and live in the area and how they make their environment habitable and pleasant for all who are there.

I cannot remember all the parts of your question, but I would like to comment on SCIOs. The bill says that a SCIO must not have “fewer than 20 members”. That is particularly restrictive. We have a couple of SCIOs that are working very well, one of which has eight members and the other has 10. Are we now saying that, even though we know what the SCIO wants to achieve and we are doing everything that we can to support it, because someone in an ivory tower has said that the SCIO must have 20 members, it cannot continue? It does not have 20 members, but it is an active and progressive community and wants to make things happen, but it cannot, because it is barred. That issue needs to be addressed. Does the bill have to be prescriptive about having a minimum of 20 members on a SCIO?

Claudia Beamish: That is in the 2003 act, as I understand it. Looking forward, we are listening to your comments.

John Mundell: Well, this is an opportunity to change it.

Wendy Reid: There are many aspects to your question.

We have always looked at community in the same way that John Mundell does. We come at this from a community-led regeneration perspective and we are interested in people who live in a place being proactive together to make positive change to that place. Our definition has always come from a geographical perspective. It is about community of place, rather than community of interest. I am not really able to comment on the community of interest side, because that is not something that we have ever got involved with.

If we are talking about community ownership, the whole thing about having a broad membership is that, whatever structure you put in place for a community-led organisation, the democratic control of that organisation is important in terms of being able to say that that organisation is accountable to the wider community through its membership. That is why we have always advocated that community anchor organisations, whether they are development trusts or not—not all anchor organisations are—should have as broad a membership as possible, because it is that membership that reflects the views of the wider community to the organisation, which then acts on their behalf.

There are a number of ways to do that: through a company limited by guarantee; through a SCIO structure; and through a community benefits society. In all those structures, the values of democratic accountability, membership and voting are represented. The other thing about being community led, from our point of view, is that the members should be able to get elected on to the governing body of the organisation, so that there is true ownership of the organisation from within the community. As I say, that can be achieved through a number of different structures.

We have always argued that decisions should not be made in legislation about one structure being better than another, because there are several factors that will influence which structure a community thinks is most appropriate for the things that it wants to achieve. For example, the reason that people may choose a community benefit society is that they may want to go down the route of raising finance through a community share issue. The only way that can be done is if the organisation is set up as a community benefit society. However, the membership of a community benefit society can be as broad as the membership of a company limited by guarantee or a SCIO.

As long as the values are built into the structure, which can be done, we do not think that the structure should be the limiting factor. It must be the structure that works best for the things that the community wants to achieve.

The Convener: It was suggested last week that new structures are being invented all the time and therefore there should be a broader definition of what the structure should embrace. Do you agree?

Wendy Reid: I think so. We can set out the values that we want the structure to adhere to and the principles to which it should operate and then see how that translates into several different structures. People often ask us what a development trust is and we say that it is not a physical thing but a way of working and a concept that demonstrates a certain set of values and approaches to how you are going to achieve the end result.

Communities are often ahead of the curve. The things that they want to do, and the aspirations that they have and the creative ways that they are thinking about how they can achieve their aims and objectives, are often limited by the legal structures that are available to them.

Having a degree of flexibility is really helpful, although my understanding is that that is there in the bill, because it says that any other structure that may come along could be added at a later stage. We would not like anything that currently exists to be excluded, but we would also want flexibility to add new structures in the future.

The Convener: John Mundell has to leave us at 1 o’clock and I wanted to bring him in on another matter.

Claudia Beamish: I do not need to come back to the panel, I am just interested in hearing their views.

The Convener: Let us hear from Susan Carr and then David Cruickshank. I want to put a question to John Mundell after that.

Susan Carr: Claudia Beamish’s question was very complex. My experience has been that communities define themselves and they evolve. They become almost redundant. Our community development trust came from an umbrella organisation that we set up for neighbourhood associations across the greater Craigmillar area. We first set up neighbourhood associations instead of tenants and residents groups because we believed that people identify themselves by where they live, not by who owns their house. We decided that we needed to bring those together, so we set up an umbrella organisation, called the community regeneration forum, which became much more strategic in its approach. We then discovered, when we met Alex Neil, that we really needed a community development trust. All that evolved over time.

It takes time for people to buy into these things. When we first spoke about a community development trust people just did not get it, because it was a new concept. You can get people to buy into these things only if they succeed. We had to get a few things under our belt before we got to the point at which people wanted to join. We started off with maybe 100 people wanting to join, but now our memorandum and articles of association say that every person who lives in our defined area is a member, so every person has the opportunity to have a say on how we are governed. It is something that evolves.

David Cruickshank: I will give a practical answer to the question of how you define a community. The Big Lottery Fund wants you to define yourself when you apply for growing community assets funding, and the only solution that we found was to use the community planning partnership definition: in our case, we used Maryhill, Kelvin and Canal community planning partnership. The community was so nebulous and there were so many different communities in that interest group that it was difficult to define. It is very difficult to define a community scientifically, but you have to come up with some answer.

That leads to the whole issue of community planning partnerships, which we are not going to go into now—convener, I can see you saying, “Help!” In theory—although not in working practice—that is a significant area, and it needs a thorough overhaul and fresh input.

The other point to make is that there can be an inherent assumption that community is always a positive thing. It is not necessarily. You get communities of drug culture and communities of fear of asylum seekers. You get communities of all kind of territorial negativity at gang level, in which young men from one side of the street are prepared to kill people from the other side of the street, because they see that they have a territorial imperative to make their name by standing up for their side of the street.

There are communities that need intervention, but that raises a whole other issue. That is my tuppencworth at this stage.

The Convener: Before we ask a couple of questions on procedures and requirements, I want to touch on definitions of “abandoned” and “neglected” land before John Mundell has to leave us in a few minutes, because the issue is particularly interesting from a local government perspective.

Dave Thompson: Good afternoon, panel. I would appreciate your views on the definition—or lack of one—of “abandoned or neglected land” and the fact that, unlike the crofting legislation, under which crofters who want to purchase land just have to show that the purchase would be in the public interest and would be for the good of sustainable development, the bill has an additional “abandoned or neglected” test.

There is another test on top of that. It has to be shown that “if the owner of the land were to remain as its owner, that ownership would be inconsistent with furthering the achievement of sustainable development in relation to the land”.

Do you agree with me that those tests, taken together—we have heard evidence on this before—would make it almost impossible for a community in an urban setting to purchase the land that it wished to sustainably develop?

Susan Carr: Craigmillar is a very deprived area and we have always been quite frightened by the fact that there is a lot of derelict land because there was so much demolition. The owner of the land is the local authority and, because we are based in Edinburgh, it would be nigh on impossible for us to come up with funding that would meet the local authority’s requirements for best value, so we are going right back to a situation where it comes down to funding.

I do not know about other local authorities but, in Edinburgh, land has such a high value—even if it is not as high as it might be at the moment—that people will not release it. We have been strong in our desire to make sure that none of the land is bought and land banked. In some respects, the fact that we have a regeneration company that has that red line has probably prevented land banking from happening, which is quite important.

How you would define the land very much depends on where it is. However, we can certainly identify buildings and so on that are just going to lie there until somebody thinks that there is enough value in the price to change things. I do not think that in bigger authorities such as Edinburgh we are ever going to be able to aspire to purchasing that land.

John Mundell: This is a very difficult issue. We have been spending tens of millions of pounds on regenerating our area, as most councils do anyway, and we have been transforming our area. I will give you an example of the difficulties involved. There is one site that is owned by an absent owner who is, I think, from the south of England. In fact, my most recent understanding is that he may well have passed on— I might be wrong on that.

Under the circumstances, there are all sorts of issues associated with that site. Strategically, from a planning perspective and from a regeneration perspective, it is a fantastic location. It is a site that the council and our community planning partners believe would be a benefit for the area. However, even with all the power and expertise that we and our partners have at our disposal, it is nigh on impossible to move that site on, so the site is blocked. That is the situation for us as a council.

I use that as an example and, in my mind’s eye, I try to put myself in the shoes of a community group that wants to access a particular site—we are talking about abandoned or derelict land. Obviously, Inverclyde, south of the Clyde, was a major shipbuilding area in the past. We have developed a lot of the riverside already and we still have a way to go. However, some of that land might look great but is heavily contaminated with heavy metals and all sorts of chemicals and pollution, and it costs millions of pounds to decontaminate sites and make them developable. There are all those abnormal costs for those sites—it is a high-risk issue.

I doubt very much that that issue exists in Susan Carr’s area to the same degree. Obviously, the sites in Craigmillar were predominantly housing and there is a lot of open space now where the sites have been cleared. However, there will still be an element of contamination. Bearing in mind when they were built, those houses could have had asbestos in them and all the rest of it. That is what can make the cost of developing those sites so prohibitive.

We have to be very careful about what we do. It comes back to the money again. It is about proper assessment of the sites, options appraisals, and coming up with the sources of funds. Who is going to pay? From our point of view, there is the land that is owned by us and the land that is owned by Peel Holdings or Clydeport, where we are in partnership with them through our urban regeneration company. From a professional point of view, the money involved for some of those derelict areas is mind blowing.

That said, trying to develop brownfield sites in urban areas is absolutely the right thing to do, because they are a blight. There is no doubt about that. They have to be brought into effective use for the community and for the urban areas in which they exist.

The Convener: Mike Russell has a supplementary. Perhaps it is for John Mundell.

Michael Russell: It is. It is always possible to find reasons not to do things. I understand the contamination question and such things, but let us take other examples of buildings. Local authorities will hold and own a substantial number of buildings, many of which they will attempt to sell but face difficulty in so doing because of the state of the market or the nature of the building. The authority will be spending substantial sums on making those buildings wind and watertight, which is often not possible to do properly, and secure.

Where does the balance lie in ensuring that buildings that the council does not want and which it cannot sell over a period of time can be utilised by communities for their own purposes? What active work is done on that? Sometimes it seems to me—certainly from my own local experience—that the council’s attitude is that the only difference between it and a property developer with a land bank is that it is just not very good at it. The council leaves stuff in a bad state that constantly gets worse, and the building is eventually bulldozed.

John Mundell: In Inverclyde, we have replaced every secondary school, and I know that other councils are doing the same kind of thing. We have completely rationalised our schools estate over the past seven or eight years. We still have a way to go but, nonetheless, that leaves a number of rationalised properties or properties that are no longer in current use.

The funding model for our schools is quite complex. Inverclyde has done the majority of that itself through reducing the number of schools and getting better numbers in schools, for example. Part of the funding model is the capital receipts that we were due to get when we first set up our schools estate management plan away back prior to the recession. We have factored in the values that were available at that time for the sale of those assets, which are no longer available. We took a conscious decision as a council—at least, the members took the decision, obviously—to say, “Right, we’re going to stop selling those assets at the moment until the market gets back up to an appropriate level, but we need that cash to service our funding model.” That was all part of the business plan for the schools estate.

Michael Russell: What if you never get the cash? That regularly happens.

John Mundell: I will come on to the issues.

I absolutely agree that there are appropriate types of assets that we could transfer. I say that the assets should be “appropriate” because, if they are a burden to the council in keeping them wind and watertight, they will be a burden to a community group. Who will provide the funding?

That goes back to what I said. It is the old drum that we all beat. There is not enough money. I know that there is more that goes beyond that but, nonetheless, if there is a wasting asset that is in poor condition and we believe that we must come up with a reduced footprint over our whole estate to provide services—in other words, we must bring its size in and operate from fewer buildings in a more efficient way—the most inefficient part is left.

If I am genuinely trying to help communities and community groups, I will not be comfortable transferring assets that are a burden. I would rather come up with a way of helping a community group or community groups to come up with a new asset. Perhaps we can raze the building to the ground and use the land that is available—if the building is an old primary school, it will be right in the heart of a community anyway. If the group is going to exist for 40 or 50 years or longer than that, it is appropriate that it, too, should have modern and efficient assets to operate from.

Michael Russell: There are many circumstances in which communities will want to have those assets. They will believe that they have viable plans for them, and they may be assisted by bodies from which you cannot get assistance. For example, in the Highlands and Islands, HIE may assist communities to develop and take forward assets that the council could not get money for. In those circumstances, might the council facilitate communities developing their strength and ability to regenerate themselves, rather than simply judging them with the criteria that it uses and saying, “We don’t think you’re up to this, so we’ll just demolish the building”?

John Mundell: You have perhaps misunderstood what I said earlier. We are proactively involved with community groups now. I mentioned a couple of SCIOs, for example. We are working very closely with them. Officers go to regular meetings in the evenings to try to develop plans and, indeed, to help people to come up with appropriate funding plans. We are well advanced in building a new facility in Inverkip; it is going through the planning stage and there are one or two issues with it at the moment. We do that anyway; it is not new. If we can get another organisation involved—or if Highlands and Islands Enterprise can cast its net wider and it is called by a different name—that is fair enough.

However, it comes down to the funding, predominantly, and the will—the political will and the will of people like me to make sure that we understand that we are here to serve the people out there and to help them to get the right answer.

Graeme Dey: Before John Mundell has to go, I have a brief supplementary to help us to get a feel for the issue.

In the evidence that we have taken previously, we have looked at the issue of not being able to identify who the landowner is. Perhaps you can help us to understand that issue in an urban context, given your experience as chief executive of a council. If we consider blight sites in your area, to what extent would there be an issue in identifying who owns them?

John Mundell: There are other areas that we are being consulted on in terms of the land register and so on. The philosophy behind completing the land register is absolutely bang on the button, but the aspiration to get it done within a five-year timeframe is overly optimistic; I think that it will take about 10 years. It is not a priority for us at the moment, given everything else that we are wrestling with, but it is absolutely the right thing to do. If we complete the register so that we know who owns all the bits of land across the whole of Scotland, that will make life an awful lot easier.

I include common good in that as well. There are areas in which there are shades of grey and it takes time to wrestle with the legal issues, including the transferring of assets to community groups, which is what we are here to talk about. That makes it quite difficult. The completion of the land register is a great thing to do—my professional association, the Society of Local Authority Chief Executives and Senior Managers, certainly believes that it is a great thing to do—but the timing is not on our side and the resources to deal with it are not available at the moment.

Graeme Dey: To be clear, if the provisions in the bill were introduced right now, do you anticipate that there would be substantial issues in identifying the ownership of some of the sites that people might want to take over?

John Mundell: Yes. The issue of ownership comes up in the redevelopment work that we do now. A recent example involved Peel Holdings. I think that all the land right down along the waterfront—all the shipbuilding area—was transferred for £1 many years ago; at least, that is what some of the members tell me. We are paying millions of pounds through partnership to get such sites developed. At one site, we had a boundary fence around one of my operational depots, and we were challenged by Peel Holdings, which said that that was not where the boundary was. It cost a lot of money just to sort out one boundary fence—we are talking about a couple of metres’ difference on a site in an industrialised area that was heavily contaminated. It was a lot of cash, and that is a simple example.

Anything that can help us to simplify the process—or, indeed, clear the boards and make sure that we can start afresh with a full, detailed register that shows who owns what—has to be a good thing.

The Convener: You may notice in the Official Report other points that are made after you have left. Thank you very much for your evidence.

John Mundell: I apologise for having to leave.

The Convener: Dave Thompson has questions on detailed procedures and requirements.

Dave Thompson: I will ask about the registration process and what the panel feels about communities having to register. In some instances, it might be very clear that there is a bit of land that the community wants, and an early registration would be something that it could anticipate and deal with. Often, however, pieces of land will come on the market suddenly. Last week, Holmehill Community Buyout gave us an example in which an area that everybody thought was a public park suddenly had a “For Sale” sign put up on it. There are places in relation to which people would never have thought about registering an interest in a community purchase.

At the moment, many applications are late registrations—they are almost becoming the norm. I would like to get the panel’s views on whether we need any kind of early registration or whether communities should just be able to register an interest once a building or land comes on the market.

Also, should communities be able to register a general interest for a purpose, rather than in relation to a particular piece of land or building? That would mean that, if a community wanted to develop some housing or a park area or whatever, it could form a group to register an interest in that purpose rather than in specific pieces of land that may never come on the market.

David Cruickshank: I will backtrack briefly and give a case example that bridges to the registering proposal. In our community, we have a piece of land of 9.25 acres that was previously allotment land. It deteriorated in the late 1960s and was used for the kennelling of greyhound dogs for the local greyhound track. The area further deteriorated into a serious antisocial and criminal base where dogs were kept for dog fighting and guarding class A drugs. That situation perpetuated for 20 years until it was finally addressed through pressure from the local community council to get agencies such as the police, the council and the Scottish Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals on board to support the move to take back the land.

The legal reality of the situation is that the land is owned by a trust. All the trustees are dead but their legal representatives are still negotiating, allegedly on behalf of a benefactor of the trustees of Possil estate. It is a complete nightmare to try to get to the bottom of the situation. There is no recognition of the damage that allowing that land to be a base for antisocial and criminal behaviour has done in the past 20 years. The idea that people should be responsible—publicly responsible—for the land that they own is a completely necessary prerequisite.

I simply say yes to Dave Thompson’s idea about registering. If a community says that it wants something, there should be a way in which it can make that known and then be supported to achieve that in the face of all the other players who have their agendas and who are usually much more powerful and better resourced than the local community group.

Wendy Reid: Dave Thompson raises a number of issues. The process of registration is quite onerous for community organisations. In rural areas, the 2003 act has opened communities’ eyes to the fact that they potentially have an ability to acquire land. Although not much has been acquired through the act itself—because it is actually fairly difficult to go through that process—the act laid down a marker for communities that acquiring land is a reasonable aspiration for them to have, that they have a right to own land and say that they are interested in it, and that they should be offered the opportunity to acquire it.

As the committee knows, for a community to register an interest, a body has to be set up in a certain way and there must be a certain level of support from the wider community in the registration of interest. In a small rural community, it might not be that difficult to gather that level of interest, but it might be harder in urban communities because, depending on how a community decides to define itself, there could be thousands of people in the area and they will often not be particularly engaged in democratic processes. For us, there is an issue about how a community organisation can get over that first hurdle that is put in the way, which is that 10 per cent of the community need to demonstrate support.

Secondly, once the registration is approved, the body will have to reregister the interest five years later and go through the whole process again. That puts people off. However, having to do it makes communities assess what assets they have and why they might want to register an interest in land. That encourages communities to start being proactive about the type of community that they want to live in and the things that they would like to be able to achieve as a result of owning assets.

The issue with late registration is a timing issue. If something comes up unexpectedly and a community has not thought about it in advance, it is difficult for the community to go through the process of gathering interest to support the first stage of registration and so on.

I am in two minds about the registration process. The need to register is a prompt for communities to think about how they would like their communities to develop and what opportunities they would like to have to influence how things develop. However, the process is onerous, as is the reregistration process. There is something to be said for having an easier process for registering interest if a piece of land comes up for sale that the community had never anticipated would come up for sale, because things happen that no one could have predicted. As the bill stands, it will be extraordinarily difficult for communities to do anything about such situations, which might involve the loss of a service or whatever.

I am not sure about getting rid of registration altogether, although I can see that that would have advantages. What is useful about having to register is that it gets community organisations to think about why they might want assets and what they might want to do with them. We might not want to lose that prompt if we were to go down the route of not having early registration of interest.

Dave Thompson: You think that the process should be greatly simplified.

Wendy Reid: I absolutely do.

Susan Carr: I agree with Wendy Reid. I can give the committee two examples of something that happened in our area, just down the road. When the library moved, we expressed an interest in renting the building—we knew that we could not buy it, because there is a red line, in that the area is designated a development area. We had to go through the whole process, but we lost out for the sake of £150 a year because no consideration was given to why we wanted the library—we wanted it for a youth zone. Another bidder bid £150 more than we bid. We could have afforded to pay £150 more, but there was no acknowledgement that what we were proposing was advantageous for the whole area.

We lost out in the same way with another council-owned building a bit further along the road. I would like communities to be able to register their aspirations for the use of buildings. The two buildings that I am talking about have been taken over by private tenants and are closed for six out of the seven days of the week. Their being taken over has done little to enhance the quality of life in our area and we have missed two opportunities because we were not able to register the use to which we wanted to put the buildings.

The Convener: We will move on to the hoops that communities have to jump through. You have given one example, in the context of trying to rent a property.

There is a double requirement in the bill, in that community bodies must show that they are “furthering the achievement of sustainable development”, and ministers must be satisfied that continuation of the current ownership “would be inconsistent with furthering the achievement of sustainable development in relation to the land”.

Are those two tests fair? Do you foresee difficulties for communities in meeting the public interest and sustainable development tests?

Susan Carr: An awful lot of that will come down to interpretation. As a community worker who has worked in the voluntary sector for 25 years, I can say that what we hear from the Parliament and the Government is often quite exciting, and we think, “Yahoo! They have listened; it is going to happen,” but, unfortunately, when the local authority interprets provisions, it somehow fits things into a little box whose sides cannot be moved. I do not want to sound too critical of the local authority, because it pays my wages, but there is no flexibility.

It will depend on how the local authority officers interpret the provision and how much that matches our interpretation. There are certain difficulties and I suspect that those are different for each local authority.

Wendy Reid: I would have thought that it will be easier for communities to demonstrate that their proposals pass the first test, because community organisations are mostly concerned with improving the areas where they live. It is very rare for a community organisation to try to acquire an asset to do something that people do not think is a good idea or that is not about improving general quality of life. The second test is more difficult, because how can a community prove that somebody else is not also trying to achieve the same thing? The second test would be much harder to meet than the first.

The Convener: It has been described as a “killer clause”. Do you think that that is the case?

Wendy Reid: Yes.

The Convener: The issue of duplicate applications arises where the Government or whichever body is responsible must consider different proposals. One application could be positive and the other could appear to be positive but could in fact be designed to stymie the first proposal. Have you had any experience of that in an urban context? Will that be a complication in the development of proposals?

Wendy Reid: I am looking to my colleagues who operate in urban areas to see whether they have any examples of that.

Susan Carr: Some communities are very active in their own right. We have tried hard—but by and large we have succeeded—to get cohesion in what we do, so that the process is open and local people are involved in decisions and the direction that we take. However, some people do not like change and sometimes it is difficult for people to buy into the process.

In our community, people have had years and years of others telling them, “Now you do this and then you do that. This is the money you’ll get and this is how we’ll do it.” Then things change in the next funding round and they are told, “Oh no, we’ve changed our minds; we’re doing it this way instead.” It is difficult for people not to be drawn to what gives the easiest access to funds, but the easiest funding option does not always mean doing what the community wants.

I have been working in a voluntary sector organisation for 25 years, and I have done everything from community engagement to employment and health—I am now working under a health grant. That is because we have to fit into what people are prepared to fund, rather than what we want to do. That is the difficulty. Also, we are often driven by targets that have been defined by someone else. We end up having to contort ourselves into the shape that will access the funds and benefit the community. In my case, we are funded to do A, B and C, but we also do X, Y and Z, because that is what the community wants. We have to do the first bit in order to do the second bit.

It is very difficult for communities to direct the funding. It is usually the other way round, with the tail wagging the dog.

The Convener: Should there be specific mechanisms for dealing with different approaches? Say that there are two applications, there needs to be some means to weigh one up against the other.

Wendy Reid: As always, we cannot avoid competition and we cannot legislate for that. There must be a mechanism for judging two applications against the same criteria and working out which will be more in the public interest. People will always come back and dispute such a decision. That happens all the time and is not something that we can avoid. However, we should not use that as an excuse not to do things.

Some communities have not previously had the opportunity to register interest and put in an application to acquire assets or land. The process will allow them to express their aspirations. Our experience has been that the fact that people are able to do it means that things are often worked out at community level first. There have not been many cases in which there were disputes over the same thing, although that might happen more in urban areas than it has in rural areas. When it comes down to it, if we are talking about achieving sustainable development, we need to consider what that means and who sets the definitions. The test can then be how competing applications contribute to achieving that definition of sustainable development in a particular place.

The Convener: Does Alan Miller think that everyone should be given a copy of the United Nations International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, and classes on how to interpret it? It sounds to me as though empowering people at a local level, under that broader definition in relation to sanitation, food and housing, would be very valuable indeed.

Professor Miller: What I have learned from this evidence session and the previous one is that communities do not need much encouragement to empower themselves. It is the decision makers in authority who need to be more aware of their duties under those obligations. That greater awareness at the Government and parliamentary level would be much more helpful. Some of the experiences are about not so much capacity building as capacity releasing, and for me that says it all. Too often, decision makers make decisions with the best of intentions on behalf of those for whom they are making decisions. That has to be turned on its head, and we do not need international obligations or treaties to do that. It is just common sense, or it should be.

Dr Rowan: I refer back to community planning partnerships, which are relevant in that there are three levels at which policies and strategies operate—on the ground with local people leading, at the local authority level and at the Scottish Government level, where policies are formulated. For our members and other third-sector organisations, where the system falls down is in the community planning partnership structure, because it bears little relation to what people define as their communities. There is a mismatch between the geographic interpretation of what the community is and the community’s view, and our members often do things despite what is happening in the community planning partnerships. In other cases, we work alongside CPPs. For example, in Glasgow, in relation to the single outcome agreement, we are working on the vulnerable people group and the homelessness and housing need group, and some good outcomes have been achieved.

That is a well-rehearsed discourse, and I know that those points have been made many times, but that part of the system really does not work. That is where it falls down a lot of the time.

The Convener: We are happy enough to take those ideas forward.

David Cruickshank: Convener, you asked whether there had been any examples of competing interest for a given site. Funnily enough, the one example that I could come up with from our community was a case where a housing association wanted to build residential homes—that is what housing associations do—and the community wanted facilities for young people. There was no doubt about who the winner was, because the housing associations are equipped to move and deliver. I am not criticising housing associations, by the way, but you asked for an example and that is one.

The Convener: Indeed—thank you.

We have covered a wide range of issues today. It is fascinating for us to get as many practical examples as possible. I thank the members of the panel for all their input. If you feel that you have any further points to make, you are at liberty to write to us afterwards. Thank you for answering a wide range of questions.

At our next meeting, on 10 December, the committee will take evidence from the cabinet secretary on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill and will consider petition PE1519, on saving Scotland’s seals, as well as the committee’s report to the Finance Committee on the draft budget, the latter part of that item being taken in private.

We have a wide and varied interest in community empowerment, and our interest in urban development has extended the scope of the committee considerably, but today’s session has been most useful.

Meeting closed at 13:29.

Supporting arguments on the need for amendments to strengthen the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill:

The question of removing barriers to sustainable development; what can constitute sustainable development and the public interest; and related ECHR considerations.

This paper builds on evidence submitted by CLS to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee in relation to the CEB, and is consequent upon close examination of Scottish Ministers decision letters in relation to the Pairc Trust application to purchase land. (relevant extracts of the CLS evidence is attached at Appendix 1)

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

The CEB seeks to amend the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 (LRA) by simplifying or streamlining various procedures and by extending the community right to buy land.

The policy aim of Part 3 of the LRA, which gave crofting communities a `compulsory' right to buy, was to remove barriers to sustainable rural development.(See Policy Memorandum to 2003 Act)

The terms of the LRA require that any application to use these powers must be approved by Scottish Ministers who must be satisfied, inter alia, that the application:

- furthers the achievement sustainable development, and
- is in the public interest

The only decision by Ministers in this regard has been in relation to the Pairc Trust. That decision was challenged in the Courts and withstood that challenge. (See Pairc Crofters Ltd and Another v Scottish Ministers 2012 CSIH 96)

The new Part 4 Section 48 of the CEB, which creates a new Part 3A in the LRA, seeks to provide a similar right to that given to crofting communities, (ie, to purchase land `compulsorily') to all communities in Scotland, is in pursuit of a policy aim stated as being a general public interest in removing barriers to sustainable development. (See Policy memorandum to CEB)
Within the CEB provisions, Ministers must be satisfied, inter alia, that in approving an application to purchase 'compulsorily' by a community, the land in question is 'eligible land', ie, land which is defined as:

- Wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected (CEB Section 48, 97C), and

That the application (97H), inter alia:

- furthers the achievement sustainable development
- is in the public interest

The CEB therefore introduces a new concept of 'abandoned or neglected' land, something that was not considered necessary in analogous provisions within the LRA for crofting land, where the relevant tests were kept to only whether the application furthered the achievement of sustainable development, and was in the public interest.

This approach suggests that 'abandonment or neglect' of land are considered to be the barriers to sustainable development, the removal of which are set out in the Policy Memoranda as the objectives for this part of the CEB. These barriers could be removed through the exercise of the proposed new provisions to permit 'compulsory purchase'.

It is appreciated that, if land can be said to be abandoned or neglected by the owner, it may be easier to justify its expropriation for the purposes of enabling it to be sustainably developed by a community body. However, expropriation can be justified in other circumstances. What seems to be to be important in the first place is to ascertain what is regarded to be the general interest to be achieved by the expropriation.

Given there is a shared policy purpose to remove barriers to sustainable development to both the LRA and now the CEB, it is worth exploring whether abandonment or neglect of land are the only barriers to sustainable development, and what other barriers there may be.

Revealed within decision letters on behalf of Scottish Ministers in relation to the Pairc Trust, there is a significant account of what Ministers regarded to be both sustainable development and what was in the public interest in that case. The reasoning in the decision letters extends the concept of what would be a barrier to sustainable development significantly beyond the concept of only 'abandoned or neglected' land.

The reasoning in support of the decisions is particularly helpful in that it sets out why an early application by the Pairc Trust was refused, on the grounds that it did not further sustainable development and was not in the public interest, and a later application then approved as meeting these requirements.
Furthering the achievement of sustainable development

In refusing the early application Ministers made clear the application did not satisfy them in relation to the question of furthering the achievement of sustainable development as it, inter alia:

- proposed to deliver activities which were largely already being delivered by the current owner
- did not provide significant additional activities
- did not provide any clear benefit to the community
- offered only limited income generating opportunities which would therefore not provide significant benefit to the community

(Pairc decision letters dated 21 March 2011 at Appendix 2)

In light of this it was considered that the application was not compatible with furthering the achievement of sustainable development.

Central to this reasoning is the potential for the furthering of sustainable development delivered through the achievement of greater outcomes, the delivery of more activity, and of securing community benefit.

The reasons set out for why a subsequent Pairc Trust application was approved and why Ministers considered it did further the achievement of sustainable development, included, inter alia:

- that there was a credible sustainable plan for the development of the land, and
- the plan would introduce new activities

Those activities would:

- have the potential to diversify the economy
- give power to negotiate and carry out developments
- create employment
- improve local services and infrastructure
- provide for social housing and the sale of house plots
- deliver improved visitor services
- generate revenues for investment for the benefit of the community
- facilitated wider developments

That ownership by the community body and the above listed potential uses and developments would, in consort with others' actions, contribute to:

- fostering population growth
- increasing community capacity
- economic participation

In short, and in terms of the policy aim to remove barriers to sustainable development, it can be seen that the approval of the application providing for purchase by the community body would facilitate the potential achievement of all of the above matters, and further the achievement of sustainable development.

It seems clear the reasoning for Ministers decisions, set out in such detail, was to build defences to potential legal challenge under ECHR and more widely by being explicit in what Ministers regarded would not, and what would, further sustainable development. In the Court decision on a subsequent challenge it was held that, “the expression sustainable development is in common parlance in matters relating to the use and development of land.” (our emphasis) (see Annex 3)

It would therefore seem reasonable and justifiable that the provisions of the CEB should be amended (potentially at 97C) to provide in an appropriate way to allow for considerations by Ministers, in addition to any considerations of abandonment or neglect of land, matters of use and development of land if purchased by a community body and of the sort set out in the decision letters referred to and which would permit the furthering of sustainable development.

The Public Interest

Such a provision would also be capable of meeting what was in the public interest.

The decision letters in relation to the Pairc application also set out reasoning on what was in public interest, which included:

- the area had previously inadequate social and economic development opportunities
- ownership by the community would allow the development of a number of economic developments, such as housing, etc
- ownership would address long term decline, a shortage of available housing sites
- the creation of local services
- the development of income streams
- bring in more visitors
- greater employment and environmental benefits

Taken together, the decision letter set out this provided, “greater opportunities overall to achieve sustainable development”.

The benefits in this instance were considered to outweigh any disadvantages and were not disproportionate to the degree of any harm to any private interests, a matter central to ECHR considerations.

Conclusion

The Court judgement on the Pairc case would not appear to cut across in any way what is suggested above by way of strengthening and improvement to the CEB as introduced. Indeed, the judgement might be held to strengthen the case for such improvement, and provide some comfort in thinking ahead to any question of future challenge to provisions within the CEB.
When considering the policy aim of removing barriers to sustainable development the concept of ‘abandoned or neglected’ land is too limited as there are wider circumstances which can be a barrier to sustainable development, such as the lack of achievement of the use and development that would deliver “greater opportunities” for sustainable development.

The conditions that must be satisfied within the CEB for non-crofting land to be ‘compulsorily’ purchased by requiring that the land be ‘abandoned or neglected’ appear in themselves greater than would be necessary to meet ECHR requirements, particularly when viewed in light of the Pairc judgement.

It is not clear there is such a fundamental difference between the objective of the sustainable development of land in crofting tenure and the sustainable development of land more generally to necessitate the additional requirements of that land being abandoned or neglected for it to be eligible land for the potential exercise of the new provisions.

If a requirement to show land is abandoned or neglected is to remain, given the evidence above on what would constitute “greater opportunities” relevant to the achievement of sustainable development, the policy objective of the various provisions, then it would appear there is a strong justification for an amendment to the CEB, to provide Ministers with the opportunity to also consider wider matters of use and development of that land in determining what land could be eligible land.

Submission of evidence to Scottish Government regarding proposed revisions to Part 3 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 via the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

Community Land Scotland is pleased to be able to respond to the consultation questions on the above consultation in the following terms.

Community Land Scotland (CLS) strongly advocates the need for changes to Part 3 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 in order to make its use simpler and fairer, while maintaining appropriate rigour to test what is in the public interest and furthers sustainable development.

CLS is conscious that others have insights into the challenges of the current Part 3. In particular Highlands and Islands Enterprise, but also experienced advisors to community owners, such as Simon Fraser. CLS is aware that Simon Fraser submitted evidence to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee on Part 3 and we commend his analysis of the issues and urge it is taken most seriously. In addition, John Randall, of Pairc Trust who have unrivalled experience of the practical issues, also submitted evidence in a personal capacity, and again we commend that evidence.

CLS has gained particular insights into the Pairc case and how the final reconciliation of positions represented in the level of agreement now reached between owner and community was achieved. Though yet to be finally concluded, the advanced stage of agreement now achieved was only reached by a process of voluntary mediation between the parties. While on this occasion that was possible, partly because of the physical location of the parties and the ‘mediator’, it is not appropriate to leave such matters to chance and it would be helpful if this facility was available to all communities and owners in future, should the need arise. This points to a simple power being given to Ministers to be able make suitable arrangements for such mediation, if requested to do so. That power currently does not exist and would be a helpful addition to wider simplification measures around Part 3 as set out in the Appendices to this submission (this could have application to part 2 as well).

CLS will be happy to provide such further additional information or clarifications as may be requested.

Responses to consultation questions

Question 1. The Scottish Government proposes to allow SCIOs and BenComs to be crofting community bodies in addition to companies limited by guarantee. Do you agree with this proposal? Are there any other types of body which you think should be permitted to be a crofting community body?

Agree with proposal, with Ministers having a power to add such other types of body as they may see fit to give future flexibility.

Question 2. The Scottish Government proposes removing the requirement for the auditing of accounts to be included in a company limited by guarantee’s articles of association in order for it to be a crofting community body. This proposal would bring Part 3 of the Act in line with proposed amendments to Part 2 of the Act. Do you agree with this proposal?

Agree.

Question 3. The Scottish Government proposes expanding the definition of a crofting community. Do you agree with the proposal? Do you think that this is a more accurate description of a crofting community?

Generally agree. However, very few crofts will be registered on the new register for some time to come. Instead, or in combination, the Commission’s existing Register should be used.

A further potentially complicating circumstance that should be considered is where the number of crofting tenants or owner occupiers registered outweigh those actually resident within the immediate area. It is not clear whether this circumstance may arise, but it potentially could.

Question 4. The Scottish Government proposes amending the existing mapping requirements which must be included in a Crofting Community Body’s application. Do you agree with this proposal?

Agree, although it will be important to see the final and specific proposed wording of the change.

Question 5. The crofting community body’s right to buy application must be advertised by Ministers by placing a public notice in a newspaper circulating in the area where the land or interests are located, and in the Edinburgh Gazette. The Scottish Government proposes that public notice of the crofting community body’s right to buy application continues to be given by Ministers by advertisement, but that the form of this advertisement be set out in regulations. What is your view on this proposal?

Agree.

Question 6. The Scottish Government proposes that the owner, tenant, person entitled to sporting interests, (depending on the nature of land or interests that the application relates to) and any creditor in a standard security in relation to that land or interests are correctly identified in the application form in order for Ministers to consent to the crofting community body’s application. What are your comments on the proposal?

It does not seem an unreasonable proposition for a community to use all its best endeavours to accurately identify owner, person, etc…. However, the question arises of what would happen if the owner, person, etc … could not, even after all reasonable steps had been taken by the community, be identified. This could arise by virtue of some of the complex and potentially overseas arrangements that can be put in place to hide ownership and beneficial interest, or simply by the passage of time, complex and dispersed ownership arrangements that can follow from one time changes in ownership.
The same comment can be made about the Section 3A, which this proposal is designed to align with, and which Parliament has yet to consider. It is not clear why this change is necessary either for Part 3A or for this proposed section. This proposal would only be acceptable if accompanied by a provision to allow Ministers to, notwithstanding this provision, grant consent when they are satisfied that the community has taken all reasonable steps to identify the owner, person, etc …, but have been unable to do so.

Question 7. The Scottish Government proposes Ministers having a specific power to make regulations setting out the information that the crofting community body is required to provide to Ministers about the ballot, or any consultation that the crofting community body may have held with the community about their application. The crofting community body already are responsible for paying for the cost of the ballot.
The Scottish Government proposes to expressly state in the Act that the crofting community body is liable for meeting the expense of conducting the ballot. What are your comments on the proposals?

The proposals in the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill regarding Part
2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 makes provision for the Scottish Government to in future take responsibility for the balloting arrangements and pay for such. As a matter of principle, this proposal was not seen as one of simply making it easier for the community body, it was also seen as a proposal which could ensure the proper conduct of any such ballot and which therefore provided re-assurance to the parties concerned and for the wider public interest. These latter reasons would apply equally and might even be seen to be more important to the conduct of ballots in the crofting community and in circumstances where there was not a willing seller. There is therefore a case for the same provisions as it is proposed will apply to Part 2 (through revisions in CEB) to apply to this part. If the concern was simply one that in such circumstances Government would be funding a ballot on what was a `compulsory' sale, this could be readily justified as being appropriate to ensure proper conduct and public confidence in the conduct of such a ballot.

Question 8. The Scottish Government proposes that, when an application is extinguished under section 76, Ministers should be required to notify each person invited to give views on the application. This proposal aligns Part 3 with the proposed Part 3A of the Act. What is your view on this proposal?

Agreed.

Question 9. The Scottish Government proposes clarifying the certain persons listed in section 81(1) of the Act who may refer a question to the Land Court at any time before Ministers reach a decision on an application made under Part 3. What is your view on this proposal?

This does not seem unreasonable.

Question 10. The Scottish Government proposes increasing the timescale in which the valuer must notify the value of the land from 6 weeks to 8 weeks. Do you agree with this proposal?

Agreed.

Question 11. The Scottish Government proposes requiring the valuer to seek counter-representations when representations regarding the valuation of the land are received from the land owner, tenant, person entitled to sporting interests, as the case may be, or the crofting community body. Do you agree with this proposal?

Agreed.

Question 12. Section 89 of the Act allows compensation to be paid in respect of a loss or expense incurred in connection with a crofting community right to buy application. Ministers are already required to set out the procedure for claiming compensation by way of order. The Scottish Government proposes amending this order so that Ministers may, via an order, specify the amounts payable in respect of compensation and who is liable to pay these amounts. What are your views on the proposal?

This does not seem unreasonable.

Question 13. The Land Court is required to give its decision in writing within 4 weeks of the date of the hearing. The Scottish Government proposes removing the 4 week time limit, and remove the provision requiring the reasons to be provided in writing. What is your view of this proposal?

It is not clear why this is necessary or helpful to the parties involved. Having reasons in writing seem appropriate, as does having a reasonably short timescale for these matters being concluded.
Written evidence from the Glasgow and West of Scotland Forum of Housing Associations

Introduction

The Glasgow and West of Scotland Forum of Housing Associations (GWSF) is the leading membership and campaigning body for local community-controlled housing associations and co-operatives (CCHAs) in the west of Scotland. The Forum represents 63 members who together own around 75,000 homes. As well as providing decent, affordable housing for nearly 75,000 households in west central Scotland CCHAs also deliver factoring services to around 13,000 owners in mixed tenure housing blocks. For almost forty years CCHAs have been at the vanguard of strategies which have helped to improve the environmental, social and economic well-being of their communities.

The Forum’s key objectives are: to promote the values and achievements of the community-controlled housing movement; and to make the case for housing and regeneration policies that support our members’ work in their communities.

We welcome the opportunity to contribute to the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee’s call for written evidence on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. We also look forward to giving oral evidence at the Committee’s session on 3rd December.

Our response has been developed by members of the Forum and reflects their experiences of working alongside local people in their communities for the past four decades. It draws upon our response to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee’s call for evidence on the Bill earlier this year and on our previous consultation responses to the Bill.

The Role of Community Anchors

The overall policy aims of the Bill in relation to community empowerment, including supporting subsidiarity and local decision making and taking an assets-based approach, echo the core values of the Community Controlled Housing Association Movement. Consequently, we are extremely happy to endorse them.

Sir Harry Burns, Professor of Global Public Health at the University of Strathclyde (and formerly Chief Medical Officer for Scotland) wrote the foreword for our most recent publication. In it he summed up the contribution that Community Controlled Housing Associations (governed by local people) have made, and indeed, continue to make in their local neighbourhoods. He said.

“Local residents in CCHAs took control of local assets long before we all started talking about asset based approaches, The Christie Commission, co-production and community empowerment. But there can be no doubt that they demonstrate the characteristics that we now aspire to in Scotland and have been doing this successfully since the early 1970s.”

1Glasgow & West of Scotland Forum of Housing Associations (November 2014) “Community Controlled Housing Associations – Still Transforming Local Communities”
In the urban context in Scotland we strongly believe that true community empowerment can only be achieved as a result of action taking place at local level with local people leading, supported by trusted community anchor organisations. As the community controlled housing model demonstrates, when community empowerment happens in this way it leads to sustainable and enduring physical and social regeneration within communities. We are therefore delighted that the Bill highlights the important role of community anchor organisations, and community controlled housing associations specifically.

However, as stated in our previous consultation responses, we believe that the Bill does not develop thinking about how to support the role of CCHAs and other equally important community anchors (e.g. Community Development Trusts). We would like to see the Scottish Government more clearly setting out the key characteristics of community anchors, and to use this as a platform for promoting innovative and collaborative approaches to public service planning and delivery in our most disadvantaged neighbourhoods. GWSF’s working definition of a community anchor is an organisation that:

- Operates within a particular neighbourhood;
- Has the interests of the community in that neighbourhood at the core of its purpose and activities;
- Operates at a local level and is both trustworthy and stable;
- Has a governance structure based on control by local residents and accountability to them.

The potential savings to public sector budgets of the early prevention and intervention activities which Community Controlled Housing Associations, and other community anchors, are involved in are huge. Our model is based on real community empowerment which has stood the test of time over the last 40 years. Therefore, we believe that there is a real opportunity for the Bill to set out a framework that could progress this model.

Community Empowerment

We are pleased that the Bill highlights the fact that “community empowerment means different things for different communities.” As our members know from years of experience all communities are unique, and all are equipped with distinctive assets and often face distinctive obstacles.

Subsequently, we believe that there is no ‘one size fits all’ approach to community empowerment. Different approaches will work in different communities and some aspects of the Bill will be more relevant for particular types of communities.

Furthermore, some communities will be better equipped to take advantage of the provisions in the Bill since they are already farther down the road to empowerment and have more assets and skills at their disposal which will enable them to potentially benefit more. Consequently, an unintended outcome of the Bill might be increased inequalities between communities.

Most of our members operate in the most deprived communities in Scotland – and the achievement of real community empowerment in these areas has been an enormous influence in increasing confidence and self-esteem for individuals and communities in these areas.

We would like to have seen the Bill directly draw upon this experience and set out a coherent and explicit strategy for community capacity building with the community anchor model at its core. Although, we do welcome the Bill’s intention to ‘build on existing guidance and the experience of communities themselves in becoming more empowered, as well as those who have been working over the years to support communities.’

We welcome the Scottish Government’s establishment of the Community Capacity and Resilience Fund and we are pleased to be members of the stakeholder group who are considering how the fund will be most effectively delivered to support communities.

Community Regeneration

As we have stated in our previous responses to consultation on the Bill, we are also disappointed that the explicit link between community empowerment and community-led regeneration has disappeared. We passionately believe that the two operate in tandem to deliver tangible results. This has been demonstrated time and time again through community-led physical and social regeneration initiatives in our neighbourhoods.

Dr Kim McKee\(^2\) (2011) highlighted this success stating “the success of localised interventions is nonetheless dependent on engaging the community in regeneration, so initiatives can be sustainable and genuinely reflect the vision of residents.”

As representative sector bodies both GWSF and the SFHA agree that the opportunity that this Bill afforded in terms of effectively making the links and establishing a frame-work between community empowerment and community-led regeneration may not be as obvious now as once was hoped.

Community Planning Partnerships

In our members’ experience community planning has been (and is likely to continue to be) a mechanism for improving the way that public sector organisations work together to achieve agreed objectives. It has generally operated at a local authority level, and we believe is likely to continue. The current proposals do not challenge this ‘top down’ view of community planning.

There has been a serious disconnect between the (valid) objective of public sector organisations agreeing common and shared outcomes and the need to effectively engage communities in the decisions that affect them.

The most effective community engagement takes place at a neighbourhood level or within particular communities of interest. So there is currently a serious mismatch between the scale of community planning and the scale at which community engagement is likely to be effective.

Community planning partners have (on occasion) tried to bridge this gap by encouraging community activists rooted in particular geographic or thematic communities to ‘represent’ the community at a local authority wide level. This has led to frustration (on both sides) and to community engagement in community planning being ineffective.

In our view, there is a real need to redesign community planning from a neighbourhood level up, to allow effective community engagement and empowerment. This would make sure that the outcomes for community planning were directly relevant to the communities which were affected and that there was a direct interest in the planning, resourcing and integration of services. We see no way that this can be achieved at a local authority wide level.

We believe that community anchor organisations (suitably supported by resources from community planning partners) should have a key role in co-ordinating community planning at a sub-local authority level. This approach is being encouraged in Glasgow where New Gorbals Housing Association has been spearheading the new Thriving Place approach outlined in the Glasgow SOA, and Govanhill Housing Association has hosted the Hub – an operational joint tasking approach across all the main agencies operating in the area.

The views we have expressed in this response reflect the community controlled housing movement perspective on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. We hope that they are of value to the Rural Affairs, climate Change and Environment Committee in its evidence gathering process. If the Committee wishes to follow up on any of the issues we have discussed we will be happy to provide further information.
Written submission from Holmehill (Dunblane) Community Buyout Group

The purpose of this written submission

This submission has been written to set out the experiences of the Holmehill Community Buyout Group in their quest to purchase Holmehill in Dunblane.

Key points:

Positive

- The Land Reform Act was extremely important for the Holmehill group. Without the catalyst of the, then recent, Act it is unlikely that the Group would have been formed at all.
- Once the Group was formed, it sought to buy Holmehill, but on failing to achieve that, it has since, so far successfully, engaged with the planning process to protect Holmehill against inappropriate development. This involvement with the community has led to much greater dialogue and involvement in the wider planning processes in Dunblane.

Points to consider for change

- The requirement to pre-register for a right to buy is unrealistic in most circumstances, as the community needs are often generated by unexpected change, such as land being advertised for sale
- The requirement in terms of the effort required to renew every five years is unrealistic in most communities.
- There does not appear to be a viable appeal process
- The use of an “Option to sell” effectively negates the aim of the “Right to Buy” legislation, if the owner wishes to frustrate the registration
- If the “Option” is to remain valid there needs to be transparency on the nature of the options (The Scottish Executive only provided a very heavily redacted version, removing the identity of the third party.) and whether it continues to exist. This might be resolved by a requirement to record Options on the Land Register.
- Planning enforcement needs to be much stronger to give confidence that the community’s interests are being protected and that developers and land owners cannot just run roughshod over land that is important to the community.
- The planning process needs revisiting as it is stacked against the community and in favour of developers, who only need to win once, whilst communities often have to react to serial planning applications.

David Prescott  Chair, Holmehill Community Buyout Group  November 2014

Background Information

Holmehill is a 13 acre green space in the centre of Dunblane, which overlooks the 12th century Cathedral, and is within the Dunblane Conservation area.
The site currently supports mature policy woodlands, as well as open areas of grassland and scrub. A well-used path (now designated and signed as a Core Path) runs through the site and links the community on the east of Dunblane with the town centre. The trees, and the hill on which they sit, are a prominent and important landscape feature of the town, providing an important sense of place with a number of large mature trees dating from the construction of Holmehill House in 1820. The diverse habitats on the hill support a wide range of bird species as well as other wildlife.

Holmehill has been owned by the Templeton family and then by Mrs Donaldson of the shipping line family, who gave part of the site (not that subject to the buyout) to the children of Dunblane in the 1940s.

Built in the 1820s, Holmehill House was the Donaldson family home (ship-owners and proprietors of The Donaldson Line) before being sold in 1962 to Stakis PLC, the then owners of the Dunblane Hydro Hotel, which is across the Perth Road from Holmehill.

Holmehill House was demolished in 1980 and the whole site was sold to Hilton Hotels in 1999. So for some 30 years the hill remained untouched apart from the building of Holmehill Court (privately owned sheltered housing) and individual houses on the west side of Smithy Loan in the 1990s (a total of 43 dwellings). A Section 75 Agreement was agreed between Stakis Ltd and Stirling Council accepting no further development on the remaining 13 acres, except possibly on the site of the demolished Holmehill House.

Thus Holmehill became established as public open space, a status acknowledged in the 1999 Local Plan. Most Dunblane residents understood it was a preserved green space, and that no further development could take place. It was, and still is, used regularly by local primary and nursery schools, as well as the wider public.

In December 2004 notices were erected on Holmehill advertising it for sale as a potential development site, taking the whole community by surprise. Hilton Hotels sold the Hydro hotel to the Stardon Group in 2005.

Getting Started

A public meeting was held in Scottish Churches House on 3rd January 2005 and was attended by over 100 people. It was resolved to seek to register a community interest in Holmehill under the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003, with the aim of buying the hill for the benefit of the local community. Holmehill Ltd was formed in February 2005, as required by the legislation. It is a company registered in Scotland No 279947 and also a Scottish charity No SC036988.

Application for a Right to Buy Registration

Our first application was submitted in March 2005. This application was a considerable task. The Group had and still has a number of ideas for proposed use; including local food production, a spiritual dimension, linked to Dunblane’s significant ecumenical role as well as providing space for wildlife and quiet open space for all to enjoy. The ideas were developed through community consultation.
The Application was quickly refused, in spite of securing the signatures of more than 10% of the Dunblane electoral roll population on the supporting petition.

Rejection Decision

Our first application was deemed to be a ‘late application’ because it was submitted after the land was put on the market. In order for a successful registration in these circumstances, applicants have to satisfy three additional tests to those of a timeous application (that is one received before the land is put up for sale). These tests are contained in Section 39 of the Act and are (paraphrased):

(a) that there were good reasons why the applicant did not secure a timeous application
(b) that there exists significantly greater support for the application among the community (compared to a timeous application)
(c) that the application is even more in the public interest (compared to a timeous application).

Scottish Ministers refused Holmehill’s application on the grounds that the reasons given in (a) were not good reasons and because they asserted that the applicant was using the Act to ‘thwart the planning process’ and thus the test at (c) was not satisfied. This was the first rejection of a “late application”, although not the first “late application” to be submitted by other buyout groups.

Using the Appeal process

Holmehill appealed the decision to the Sheriff Court on the basis that the reasons at (a) were indeed good ones and that at (c) it was in the public interest since, among many things, the site was already designated as green space in the Stirling Local Plan 1999 and that in any event, a registration under the Act cannot ‘thwart the planning process’.

The appeal process involved going to Court, a daunting process at the best of times, and even more so to find we were facing three adversaries: Scottish Ministers, Hilton Hotels and Stirling Council, although the latter took no part in the proceedings.

Sheriff McSherry refused the appeal and awarded costs against Holmehill Ltd. The appeal was refused not because of the merits or otherwise of the decision that Scottish Ministers had taken, but because the Sheriff concluded (based on precedents in other cases) that he should not interfere with the decisions of Scottish Ministers. As the decision was made by officials, in the name of Ministers, this suggests that there is no realistic appeal process, and thus no way in which decisions can be challenged.

In Court Holmehill members were surprised when it emerged that officers making this decision had not consulted the Stirling Local Plan to determine the planning status of Holmehill.

The award of costs was stressful, and many members of the Buyout Group had to fulfil financial pledges that they had made at the start of the Appeal process. Hilton Hotels waived their £20,000 legal bill, and Scottish Minister recovered only about a quarter of their legal costs, leaving the Buyout Group with a very small sum to ensure that they survived.

Second Application for a Right to Buy Registration

The Scottish Executive encouraged us to reapply after the sale to Allanwater Developments was concluded. This revised application was lodged in March 2007, after a second set of signatures had been collected. This second application had cleared all the procedural hurdles when we were advised that it had to be refused.

Option and rejection

The grounds for refusal were that the new owners, Allanwater Developments Ltd, had taken out an Option Agreement with a third party and, according to the Scottish Executive, ‘section S39(5) of the Act applies’.

Subsequent Applications for a “Right to buy Registration”

The group took a decision not to attempt any further applications, because:

- a) It is not possible to find out if the “option” still exists, or if there is another Option in place
- b) Even if there was no Option in place Allanwater Developments could quickly create another one.

This ended our practical interest in the Land Reform legislation and we sought to protect Holmehill in other ways.

Both of our applications and the associated correspondence and decision letters can be viewed on the Scottish Executives RCIL website.

Subsequent Campaign History

Allanwater Developments have lodged two separate Planning Applications for different parts of Holmehill. The Buyout Group was active in opposing both applications, which were contrary to the Stirling Local Plan 1999.

The first application (11/00788/FUL) was withdrawn, whilst the second (12/00788/FUL) was refused. Both were the subject of a significant number of local objections.

Immediately after the refusal of the second application Ian and David Stirling, (respectively former and current Managing Directors of Allanwater Developments) cut down all the naturally regenerating trees on the top of Holmehill in a single day at the end of June 2013. This was without any prior notification and contrary to the Conservation Order, which is understood to treat all trees in the Conservation area as if they are protected by a Tree Preservation Order. These trees were also one of the reasons why the planning application 12/00788/FUL was refused.

Community action by Holmehill members and supporters has forced the Council into some actions, including the belated introduction of a Tree Preservation Order for the whole of Holmehill. A Tree Replanting Order, which has been significantly watered down from the original tree replanting plan agreed with Allanwater Developments in response to their illegal actions, has been enforced, and planting was finally completed in early November 2014.

Temporary Heras fencing has been in place for over a year, restricting public access. A lot of site clearance has taken place, which looks suspiciously like the preparation for construction activity, and may have damaged any archaeology that exists on this site above the Cathedral.

The Holmehill Group are bracing themselves for another planning application, possibly for one or two large houses on the top of Holmehill.

Dunblane Community Council and some Dunblane councillors have been supportive of our efforts.

Local Planning Processes

In parallel to these planning applications the Holmehill Group has actively engaged in the Stirling Local Planning process. We have succeeded in maintaining the “public open space” designation for the whole of Holmehill in the face of Allanwater Development’s pressure to secure a designation for housing. The Government Reporter’s decision strengthens the designation as it weighed up the merits of housing against open space and came down in favour of the open space.

The Group were unsuccessful in preventing the designation in the Local Plan of a small corner plot adjacent to Holmehill, which was gifted by Mrs Donaldson to the children of Dunblane in the 1940s, and where there was once a Scout hut, as suitable for social housing.

However the Holmehill Group are now actively participating in a design programme for a small group of houses for elderly or disabled Dunblane residents to be built on this site. They are to be built by Forth Housing Association using charitable funds which are required to aid the elderly and disadvantaged of Dunblane.

The future

The Holmehill Group is celebrating its tenth anniversary on 3 January 2015. It will continue to pursue options that could secure community ownership of this important green space in the heart of Dunblane.

In summary, of the total number of SLF cases approved and anticipated in the first 3 years of operation, approximately 17% have gone through the CRTB process and the same proportion through the NFLS, amounting to 22% and 35% of the total budget respectively.

Background information on SLF and CRTB/NFLS

Scottish Land Fund (SLF), Community Right to Buy (CRTB) and National Forest Land Scheme (NFLS)

Year one (2012 – 2013)

The first year of the SLF had £1m available. A total of 4 projects were grant funded amounting to £788,000 of SLF assistance. Of this total, there were 3 CRTB and NFLS cases using £773,700 funding, as outlined below:

Year two (2013 – 2014)

Year two of the SLF had £2m available. During the year, a total of 15 projects were awarded funding amounting to £2,231,118. Of these, there were 3 CRTB/NFLS cases using £658,937 of funding.

It should also be noted that at the time of application to the SLF, Kinghorn Community Land Association (£103,390 awarded – 4.36ha) were intending to use the CRTB process; however the acquisition was concluded outwith the Land Reform Act.

The Pairc Trust were also awarded funding by the SLF in December 2013 (£230,000 awarded – 10,835 ha). The Trust used the Crofting Community Right to Buy as part of the process towards acquiring the Estate. At the time of writing however, the acquisition has not concluded. It now appears likely that this will go ahead via an amicable purchase without resort to the legislation, using SLF funding to help negotiate the deal.

Year three (2014 – 2015) to date

A total of 9 projects have been funded to date, amounting to £2,224,830 of SLF funding. Please note that these include projects approved at the SLF Committee meeting on 13 November which have not been publically announced, and these included 1 CRTB and 2 NFLS cases.

Prospective cases for remainder of 2014-15

We anticipate that the SLF Committee will consider a total of 7 cases (amounting to c. £2,500,000) in January 2015, including 1 CRTB and 3 NFLS cases.

Year four (2015 – 16)

There is currently a very healthy pipeline of cases for next financial year with roughly the same proportion of cases enabled by CRTB and NFLS as this year. It is difficult to give exact figures for the pipeline cases as they are at various stages of development, from ones that are advanced to those still speculative.

Dear Lynn

COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL – PART 4 – OFFICIALS’ EVIDENCE

At the Committee’s meeting on 19 November 2014, officials giving evidence on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill undertook to provide additional information after the meeting. That information is provided in the attached document. I believe we have covered everything that was requested, but please let me know if we can provide anything further to assist the Committee in their scrutiny of the Bill.

Yours sincerely

DAVE THOMSON
COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL – PART 4 – ADDITIONAL INFORMATION FOLLOWING OFFICIALS’ EVIDENCE GIVEN ON 19 NOVEMBER 2014.

Consultation

We offered to provide information given to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee which included more detail on the consultation activity undertaken. This is attached separately.

Allotments

Jim Hume asked a question relating to allotments and putting a limit on the time that local authorities have in which to provide an allotment.

The Bill places a duty on local authorities to hold and maintain waiting lists for allotments, and to take reasonable steps to provide more allotments if the waiting list exceeds certain trigger points with the waiting list not exceeding 50% of the current number of allotments owned or leased by the local authority. This addresses a key concern about the level of demand for allotments and the length of time people may be on a waiting list. During the consultation on the Bill we explored different options for the target under which local authorities should keep their allotment waiting lists and in discussions with local authorities they indicated that linking the duty to a specified timeframe would be unrealistic and onerous and that provision of an allotment should be linked to a clear, sustained demand, ie. the number waiting for an allotment.

Community Bodies and Changing Constitutions

The Convener asked whether the time that it takes to purchase land has increased significantly because community bodies have been required to change their constitutions by the bodies from which they have sought funding.

All community bodies seeking to use the community right to buy provisions must be compliant with section 34(1) of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 at the time they apply to use the provisions and must continue to comply even after they have purchased land through the provisions.

We ask that where community bodies seek to make changes to their Articles of Association that they pass the proposed changes (by means of a special resolution) to Scottish Ministers to check that they are still in compliance with the Act. A community body seeking to make changes must call an general meeting, giving 14 days notification to its company members. Following this change, the community body registers is special resolution with Companies House. Such a process should therefore not unduly increase the length of time that a community takes to purchase land. The process to change articles is set out in the Companies Acts.

We are not aware of any community bodies going through the community right to buy provisions that have been required to change their Articles of Association. As noted, any proposed changes would need to be checked by Ministers to ensure that they complied with the community right to buy provisions.

Funders require communities to have a specific type of structure (eg company limited by guarantee, SCIO) that also meet certain eligibility criteria, such as social purpose, open membership, community control and non-profit distributing). Purposes are usually very broad, and it may be the case that a change is required to ensure that they fully reflect the purpose to which the grant is to be used.

Late Applications – Good Reasons Test

Dave Thompson asked how the good-reasons test has been applied up to now and officials undertook to provide examples of cases involving late applications that were either accepted or rejected.

The late application process whereby a community body can submit an application to register an interest in land after steps have been taken to market or dispose of the land is intended to be used on an exceptional basis, as this is not the policy preferred method. The intention is that communities take a planned approach to community ownership of land. Therefore, it is important that a community body in demonstrating “exceptional” circumstances has good reasons for the application being late or serious intent to purchase land. This idea of “serious intent” would seem to be keeping with the “plan ahead” approach. The approach to the legislation is that the community right to buy is transparent and predictable for all involved and that only land in which a registered interest exists should be affected by the right to buy provisions, unless exceptional circumstances where a late application may be accepted.

The Scottish Government has not provided a checklist of acceptable reasons which a community body wishing to submit a “late” application could use as a “good reason” to justify a late application. Likewise, section 39(3)(a) of the Act does not define good reason. Cases are judged on their own facts and on a case to case basis.

Ministers would normally consider actions taken prior to the land being marketed as supportive of a late application. It is important that the community body shows serious intent to secure a timeous application. Applications should not be purely reactive to a proposed sale of land, and as such this could not be considered a “good” reason. Reasons for an application must address why the application is made after the land has gone on the market.

Community bodies demonstrate the steps they have already taken towards submitting timeous application prior to having knowledge of the landowner’s wish to dispose of the land. This can include information on public meetings, evidence of gathering support etc, steps taken to identify the landowner, contact and discussions with the Scottish Government to submit an application etc.

Ministers consider that “good reasons” would not include: a community body was undertaking other work; a community body only recently became aware of the legislation; the community thought that while the land was owned by a particular owner that it would be safeguarded for the use of the community; a community body was not in existence at the time the land was advertised for sale.
There is legal discussions on the “good reasons” in the judgment for Holmehill Ltd v The Scottish Ministers, Stakis Limited, and Stirling Council at:
http://www.scotcourts.gov.uk/opinions/b255_05.html

In their decisions on applications to register a community interest in land, Ministers provide a view on the “good reasons” test. All of the “late” applications are recorded in the Register of Community Interests in Land: http://www.ros.gov.uk/rcil/. In particular, the late applications, together with the decision on them are:

Identification of a Landowner

Cara Hilton asked a question on what would happen to an application to register or buy land if, despite its best efforts, a local community could not find the landowner and officials undertook to provide examples from the current community right to buy process.

There is currently provision in the current community right to buy guidance to deal with such circumstances:

The documentation to help identify the landowner is at schedule 2 of The Community Right to Buy (Prescribed Form of Application and Notices) (Scotland) Regulations 2009:

There have been two applications where the landowner was “unknown”; there have been 175 applications on the Register of Community Interests in Land. The two cases where the landowner could not be identified related to two applications from Kinghorn Community Land Association. These are cases CB00052 and CB00066 on the Register of Community Interest in Land. Both applications were “approved” by Scottish Ministers and entered into the Register of Community Interests in Land. Both applications have since expired.

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill – Part 4 Community Right to Buy

Thank you for the constructive exploratory discussion to look at the merits of having the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee lead on consideration of the community right to buy elements of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill on which the Local Government and Regeneration Committee has been formally designated as the lead committee.

The First Minister made a clear commitment at the Community Land Scotland Conference on Skye in 2013 to include community right to buy in the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill because of the natural synergies between the community empowerment agenda and community right to buy legislation. At that stage changes to the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003: Part 3 Crofting Community Right to Buy was not considered, largely because all available resources were focused on improving the Community Right to Buy and developing provisions for neglected or abandoned land. However, as the pace of land reform in Scotland is increasing the Government is now keen to improve the crofting community right to buy legislation in line with the amendments to Part 2 of the 2003 Act and intend to take this forward in the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. There is also sense in addressing all parts where communities are able to exercise a right to buy, addressed in the same bill to ensure consistency between the various parts.

We recognise that this would increase the workload quite significantly on the Local Government and Regeneration Committee for what is already a challenging bill and timetable and would take that specific aspect of the Bill further away from the core remit of the committee. For those reasons we discussed and agreed that while the Local Government and Regeneration Committee was still best placed to lead on the overall Bill, there would be merit in the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee taking the lead on consideration of the community right to buy provisions of Part 4 of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill at Stage 1 and reporting its findings to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee. We also thought there would be merit in having any relevant amendments on community right to buy referred to the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee at Stage 2. I am happy to confirm that is the Scottish Government's preferred way forward.

Officials are ready to engage with the clerks to discuss the practical implications and can provide briefing and further information as required.

Yours for Scotland

JOE FITZPATRICK

Dear Kevin

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill Part 4 Community Right to Buy

As you know, the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment (RACCE) Committee received a letter from the Minister for Parliamentary Business, dated 21 August 2014, suggesting that there would be merit in the Committee taking the lead on the community right to buy provisions of Part 4 of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill at Stage One.

The Committee considered this letter at its meeting on 1 October 2014 and discussed and agreed its approach to consideration of Part 4 of the Bill at Stage One at its meeting of 8 October. I can confirm that the Committee agreed to consider and report on the Part 4 of the Bill at Stage One and report by 23 January 2015. We have agreed a series of stakeholder meetings and have asked our clerks to liaise with your clerks to ensure that we avoid unnecessary duplication and overlap in our oral evidence sessions. I intend to issue a press release later this week, on behalf of the Committee, to advise that the RACCE Committee will be scrutinising and reporting on Part 4 of the Bill at Stage One.

Yours sincerely

Dear Rob,

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill Part 4 Community Right to Buy

Thank you for your letter today advising that the Committee Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee (RACCE) has discussed and agreed its approach to consideration of Part 4 of the Bill at Stage One.

I note that your Committee intends to consider and report on Part 4 of the Bill at Stage One by 23 January 2015. Local Government and Regeneration Committee also intend to report by 23 January 2015.

I therefore suggest, in addition to our respective clerks liaising to avoid unnecessary duplication and overlap in our oral evidence sessions, that the clerks also co-ordinate the publication of the Committee reports to further minimise any confusion to stakeholders.
I have also asked the clerks to alert our stakeholders that RACCE Committee will be scrutinising and reporting on Part 4 of the Bill at Stage One once your press release has been issued.

Yours sincerely,

Kevin Stewart MSP

COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL

I look forward to giving evidence to the Committee on the Bill on 12 November. I thought it might be helpful if I outline before our meeting some areas in which the Scottish Government plans to bring forward amendments at Stage 2. I hope this will assist the Committee in its scrutiny.

In accordance with the commitment made by the Cabinet Secretary for Culture and External Affairs, we propose that Historic Environment Scotland should be added to the list of community planning partners set out in Schedule 1.

We will bring forward amendments to include Community Benefit Companies (BenComs) as a type of body which can make an asset transfer request for ownership of land, under section 53. BenComs are now defined under the Co-operative and Community Benefit Societies Act 2014.

We will put in place an appeal process for asset transfer requests made to the Scottish Ministers, in line with the provisions already included for requests made to local authorities or other relevant authorities.

I believe there is benefit in requiring relevant authorities to publish their registers of assets, to help community bodies understand what land or buildings may be available for asset transfer. My officials are considering how such a requirement might be constructed.
As noted in the letter from the Minister for Parliamentary Business to you and the Convener of the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment (RACCE) Committee, we propose to use the Community Empowerment Bill to make changes to Part 3 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003, on crofting community right to buy. A “Call for Evidence” to consult stakeholders on the proposed changes was issued on 13 October and is available on the Scottish Government website at http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Topics/farmingrural/Rural/rural-land/right-to-buy/crofting.

We will also be seeking to make further amendments to Parts 2 and 3A of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003, although the detail of these is still under discussion.

I and my Ministerial colleagues will also, of course, pay close attention to the views of your Committee, the RACCE Committee and the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee when you report on the Bill, and consider what further amendments might be brought forward to improve the Bill.

I am copying this letter to the Convener of the RACCE Committee for their interest in Part 4 of the Bill.

Dear Nigel

COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL

I write in response to the Report of the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee on the Scottish Government's Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. I would like to thank the Committee for the time and effort you have put into producing this report.

National Outcomes

34. The Committee considers that it would be appropriate for the setting and review of the national outcomes to be subject to the scrutiny of Parliament, possibly through scrutiny of regulations subject to the affirmative procedure. A more active scrutiny role for the Parliament appears to be justified having regard to the significance of the national outcomes, the discretion afforded to the Scottish Ministers in deciding how the outcomes are presented and measured, and the fact that all public bodies and other persons carrying out functions of a public nature as described in section 1(1) would require to have regard to the outcomes.

We note the Committee recommendation that the setting and review of the national outcomes should be subject to the scrutiny of Parliament, possibly through scrutiny of regulations subject to the affirmative procedure.

We agree with the Committee’s recommendation that Parliament should have a more active scrutiny role in relation to national outcomes, but do not consider that regulations would be appropriate in this context. Instead we propose to bring forward amendments to require Scottish Ministers to consult the Parliament, using the procedure provided for under rule 17.5 of the Standing Orders.

Powers to add or remove bodies

43. The Committee calls on the Scottish Government to amend the Bill at Stage 2 so as to make the powers in sections 4(6) and 8(3) subject to the affirmative procedure when exercised so as to add bodies to the lists in schedule 1 or section 8(2) respectively. The Committee also recommends that the powers in sections 16(3) and 51(3) be made subject to the affirmative procedure.

We note the Committee recommendation to amend the Bill at Stage 2 so as to make the powers in sections 4(6), 8(3), 16(3) and 51(3) subject to the affirmative procedure. We agree with the Committee recommendation and will bring forward amendments at Stage 2.

Power to issue guidance

53. The Bill also makes no provision for an enforcement mechanism, to enforce compliance with the guidance. The guidance must cover matters “about the carrying out of functions conferred on community planning partners and partnerships under Part 2 of the Bill”. This is a broad requirement and the Bill makes no provision for a scrutiny or review mechanism, to review whether any automatically binding matters which may be specified in the guidance are properly included, because they concern the carrying out of functions conferred in Part 2 of the Bill.

54. These concerns would not apply if, in a similar way to the existing provision for guidance in section 18 of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003, there was provision that community planning partners and partnerships would “have regard to” the guidance.

We note the Committee concerns with section 10 and the recommendation that these concerns would not apply if there was provision that community planning partners and partnerships would “have regard to” the guidance rather than have to comply with the guidance. We agree with the Committee recommendation and will bring forward an appropriate amendment at Stage 2 to replace “comply with” with “have regard to”.

Eligible Land

66. The Committee draws the power in the new section 97C(3)(a) of the 2003 Act to the attention of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee on the basis that it has concerns about the scope of the power and its intended use.

We note the Committee concerns with section 97C(3)(a). On 10 December the Cabinet Secretary for Rural Affairs, Food and Environment gave evidence on the Bill to the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee. Regarding this provision the Cabinet Secretary commented that he was reviewing the power and reflecting on the comments that the committee had received and made it clear that if the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee has specific views on the delegated power and how it should be used he would welcome that.

80. The Committee considers that if the use of the word “prescribed” in section 97N is not intended to confer separate and free-standing powers to make subordinate legislation, the Bill should be clarified for Stage 2 so as to remove the scope for doubt over the interpretation of the section and the powers it confers by re-drafting the provision so as to remove the references to “prescribed”.

We note the Committee concerns on the use of the word “prescribed” in section 97N. We are looking at how we might redraft this section to remove the scope for doubt over the interpretation of the section.

I trust this is helpful and remain very grateful to you and the members of your Committee for their work on this Bill. I am copying this letter to Kevin Stewart MSP and Rob Gibson MSP as Conveners of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee and Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee respectively.

MARCO BIAGI
Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

Dear Rob

At its meeting today the Committee considered the Scottish Government’s response to its stage 1 report on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

In so doing the Committee welcomed the Scottish Government’s commitment to amend the Bill in a number of respects.

However, the Committee remains concerned by the power in the new section 97C(3)(a) of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 and continues to find the explanations provided in justification of what is a very significant power to be unsatisfactory.

As you know, section 97C(3)(a) provides that eligible land for the purposes of acquisition does not include land on which there is a building or structure which is an individual’s home, unless the building or structure falls within such class or classes as may be prescribed. The word ‘prescribed’ adopts the definition set out in section 98(1) of the 2003 Act, meaning “prescribed in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers”. The effect of section 97C(3)(a), therefore, is that Ministers may make regulations prescribing buildings or structures which are eligible for acquisition by a Part 3A community body.
The Committee was concerned, and remains concerned, that this power permits the Scottish Ministers to make regulations prescribing buildings or structures which are eligible for acquisition by a Part 3A community body notwithstanding the fact that such buildings or structures may be described as an individual’s home.

In its stage 1 report the Committee noted that neither the DPM nor the Scottish Government’s responses to the Committee’s questions, both written and oral, offered a clear explanation as to the reasons for taking this power, or how the power is intended to be exercised. Furthermore, the Scottish Government did not provide the Committee with any examples of the kinds of building or structure that may be prescribed in regulations made in exercise of this power.

In our view the uncertainty around this power and its exercise has not in any way been assuaged either in the evidence given by the Cabinet Secretary for Rural Affairs, Food and Environment to your Committee or in the Scottish Government’s response to our stage 1 report on the Bill.

In the Cabinet Secretary’s evidence to your Committee he explained that the purpose of the power in section 97C(3)(a) is to give Ministers the opportunity to exclude land from the right to buy, and that the obvious case in point would be a person’s home.

The Committee considers, however, that the power in section 97C(3)(a) is not a power to exclude certain land from the scope of the new Part 3A, but rather enables Ministers to make regulations the effect of which is to include land on which there is an individual’s home within the scope of land which could be deemed to be eligible for acquisition by a Part 3A community body. In the Committee’s view, the power enables the general exemption for land comprising individuals’ homes to be disapplied for the particular categories or descriptions of land which may be prescribed using this power.

The Committee maintains that it is unsatisfactory that the Parliament is being asked to confer a power of this significance upon the Scottish Government in the absence of a detailed explanation as to why it is necessary or what it is for and in circumstances where the thinking underpinning the power appears to be in the early stages of development.

The Committee appreciates the efforts of your Committee to pursue this matter. The Committee re-emphasises its concerns about the power and asks that you continue to pursue them with the Scottish Government.

Please note that we also intend to write to the Scottish Government reiterating our substantial concerns about this power and again inviting it to reflect on the scope and use of this power.

If I or the Committee can be of any assistance to you in your deliberations on this power, we would be very willing to assist.

Dear Chief Executive

Disposal of Local Authority Assets

As you may be aware the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee has been taking evidence on Part 4 of the draft Community Empowerment Bill, which makes a range of changes to the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 in relation to the community right to buy land.

In discussing this with local authorities and development trusts the issue of the disposal of local authority assets arose. I would be grateful if, on behalf of your local authority, you could provide the Committee with the following information:

- Does your authority have arrangements in place to hold some or all local authority assets in a separate land holding?
- When disposing of, or transferring assets how are those assets valued. To what degree is this purely a financial valuation?
- What is the attitude of the authority to the disposal of assets? Does your authority have a policy to encourage the disposal of assets to community groups?
- What is your experience of disposal and what difficulties has the authority encountered?
As the Committee will be concluding its Stage One consideration of the draft Bill and reporting the Local Government and Regeneration Committee in January it would be helpful to have your response by 12 January 2015.

Yours sincerely

1. Does your authority have arrangements in place to hold some or all local authority assets in a separate land holding?

Aberdeen City Council holds property assets under three accounts, our General Services Account, Common Good or Housing Revenue Account.

Aberdeen City Council has no specific property development vehicle under which assets are held.

Some previously operational assets are now operated by arms length companies notable some former social works properties, sports and some community and cultural assets. All these property types are occupied under lease or license arrangements, some with service level agreements also.

2. When disposing of, or transferring assets how are those assets valued. To what degree is this purely a financial valuation?

Assets are generally valued at market value reflecting the RICS Valuation Standards.

When considering offers a number of issues are considered including but not restricted to:

- Timing of receipt.
- Level of receipt.
- Planning deliverability.
- Financial deliverability.
- Any impact of service delivery costs where appropriate.

3. What is the attitude of the authority to the disposal of assets? Does your authority have a policy to encourage the disposal of assets to community groups?

Aberdeen City Council have an active programme of property proposals and unlike many other local authority areas the demand for property assets over the last 5 years has been strong on the open market.

Whilst the Council has no formal policy in place we have a governance mechanism to consider requests for community asset transfer and are working towards having a policy in place. We anticipate this being influenced by the Community Empowerment bill. I attach a link to our most recent committee report on the subject.

4. What is your experience of disposal and what difficulties has the authority encountered?

As previously noted the council has to date only transferred properties through leasehold arrangements and as such we have only limited experience to call upon.

Notwithstanding a positive approach having been taken by members in the principle of transferring assets to communities we would need comfort in relation to:

- Future funding and viability
- Community capacity and capability
- Child protection issues
- Succession planning
- Clawback/ alternative development (particularly in strong markets).
- Ongoing repair and maintenance issues
- Balancing competing interests from different community groups

There are additional problems in relation to all proposals particularly in relation to the time between assets becoming surplus and a new use being undertaken in the property. Such problems include holding costs, vacant rates costs, vandalism, asset stripping etc. This is not necessarily a problem restricted to community transfer, for example sites sold subject to planning can create delays in the sale process. Any elongation of timescale to consider community approaches does add additional risks.
Written submission from Aberdeenshire Council

1. Does your authority have arrangements in place to hold some or all local authority assets in a separate land holding?

No.

2. When disposing of, or transferring assets how are those assets valued. To what degree is this purely a financial valuation?

To comply with the disposal of land regulations, the market value of the asset is established in the first instance. The Council then attributes a value to the anticipated social, community and economic development benefits that will derive from the transfer to establish a discounted transfer price that is still considered to achieve best value.

3. What is the attitude of the authority to the disposal of assets? Does your authority have a policy to encourage the disposal of assets to community groups?

The Council has both a Surplus Property Policy and a Community Asset Transfer Policy. Together these policies encourage the disposal of appropriate assets to Community Groups. The Council has published guidance to Community Groups to guide them through the applications process and to clarify the criteria against which applications will be considered and the information Community Groups are expected to provide at each stage.

4. What is your experience of disposal and what difficulties has the authority encountered?

It is acknowledged there is, at times, a tension between the need to ensure the Council obtains capital receipts to fund future investment and meeting the aspirations of communities. The Council has been proactive in Community Asset Transfer and has transferred a number of assets over recent years.

The Council is going through a period of significant investment in new assets at this stage, which follows on to disinvestment in redundant assets. There is a need to be mindful that given the financial position the Council needs to ensure there is an optimum number of assets for both public and community use whether this is delivered through the Council, other public bodies or community groups. There are also occasions whereby the representation by the community is by an individual group which does not contain a high number of members and may not always be representative of the whole community. That being said, the Council fully recognise that there are benefits from transferring assets to the community and I can provide some examples where this has worked well in Aberdeenshire.
Written submission from Angus Council

The authority does not have any arrangements in place to hold some or all local authority assets in a separate land holding. We hold all our titles to land in the name of the Council. Some can be trust or common good assets which are identified separately in the Council’s accounts, but the title is in the name of the Council as owner.

When disposing of assets the Council declares the asset surplus to requirements and places the asset on the open market. A valuation is placed on the asset by Council registered valuers or external advisers. However, assets are sold at Open Market Value except when Community Asset transfer Policy applies. Determining if an asset can be used for something else is an exercise undertaken by the Council and its partners prior to an asset being declared surplus. In some instances assets have been reused for housing development and in others for community asset transfer.

Angus Council has an active policy on Community Asset Transfer (https://archive.angus.gov.uk/ccmeetings/reports-committee2013/NeighbourhoodServices/525App1.pdf). Many projects are underway ranging from new and innovative uses for an asset through to communities taking on a village hall or Bowling Green. The policy takes account of the community benefit of transferring an asset to a community group in determining the value.

We have no real difficulties with disposals in our area but the size and age of the asset e.g. former school which has listed building status can also be a factor influencing the value.
Written submission from Argyll and Bute Council

Please find undernoted your questions with answers as applicable to Argyll and Bute Council;

1. Does your authority have arrangements in place to hold some or all local authority assets in a separate land holding?

If by separate arrangements to hold land it is meant that such vehicles as a Limited Liability Partnership, Trust, etc. are utilised then I can advise that Argyll and Bute Council has no specific arrangements in place. The possibility of utilising such vehicles would be examined if it would be an appropriate option to consider in relation to a specific project and each would be considered on its own merits. The Council does internally hold property under different accounts. Additionally the Council manages those assets held for common good.

2. When disposing of, or transferring assets how are those assets valued. To what degree is this purely a financial valuation?

With regard to the transfer of assets outwith the current Community Right to Buy legislation Argyll and Bute Council utilises the services of the District Valuer to place an impartial open market value on the asset. The valuation is then used as part of a business case assessment which will be undertaken by the department which has responsibility for the asset. The business case will first consider whether the asset is or can be made surplus to the Council’s requirements. If the asset is or can be declared surplus the business case will look at both the financial and non-financial implications of a potential sale of the asset and relate these to national and Council policy/strategies and in particular to the Community Plan and Single Outcome Agreement. If relevant to a particular project an assessment may also be made on whether there is scope to consider a less than market value or even nominal sale price. The assessment is therefore not purely financial but the Council is always mindful of the requirements under the Local Government etc. (S) Acts of the requirement to achieve the best consideration reasonably obtainable. The assessment criteria as contained in the Disposal of Land by Local Authorities (S) Regulations 2010 is also utilised by the Council to assess any request for a less than market value or nominal price.

3. What is the attitude of the authority to the disposal of assets? Does your authority have a policy to encourage the disposal of assets to community groups?

Argyll and Bute Council has an approved third sector asset disposal policy and accompanying procedures in place. This includes an application form and guidance which has been developed in consultation with the Scottish Government’s Community Right to Buy Team, the Big Lottery Fund, Highland and Islands Enterprise and DTAS. Additionally a dedicated web site has been set up where assets will be advertised. The website also contains the application form which can be downloaded, guidance, leaflets and video presentations from the Council’s launch of the third sector asset transfer process which includes presentations from John Swinney MSP and a range of funders, support organisations and Council officers.
Where a third sector group is an existing occupier and requests a transfer the authority considers the request in the usual manner but will in such cases deal directly with the occupying group rather than advertising.

Within the Council’s Economic Development Service there is a Social Enterprise Team which works with community groups seeking to obtain assets. Currently there are four potential assets sales to the third sector being progressed.

4. What is your experience of disposal and what difficulties has the authority encountered?

As advised above Argyll and Bute Council is currently in the process of dealing with a number of potential sales to the third sector. Recently the Campbeltown Town Hall transferred to the South Kintyre Development Trust and is good example of the Council’s commitment to working with the community and third sector to deliver a sustainable solution.

From the experience to date it is clear that for both the Council and the third sector groups there is a considerable amount of work and cost involved to clarify proposals, prepare business cases, seek valuations, obtain cost information, etc. The Council has assessed that third sector asset disposal costs could be as high as £20,000 for each party. There is also a significant resource implication for the Council to then analysis the business case to ensure the proposal is economically viable & sustainable and to assess the merits of any sale proposed for less than market value.

The expectations of communities and community organisations in relation to the community buy out process often doesn’t reflect the statutory duties of local authorities in disposing of assets (particularly at less than market value) or the risks associated with state aid regulations where a commercial activity is involved.

A community organisation registering an interest in a community buy out, can extend the period during which the local authority incurs security or maintenance costs which can be in six figure terms. This is often unbudgeted additional expenditure and is not reflected in the asset valuation.

The process can by necessity be quite lengthy and in the case of the Campbeltown Town Hall discussions first commenced in December 2010. The Council is looking to refine the process with the benefit of experience but complicated projects are always going to require quite significant input from Council officers.
Written submission from City of Edinburgh Council

I refer to your letter of 16 December 2014 requesting information in relation to the disposal of local authority assets. I trust the following information will be of some assistance to the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee.

1. The City of Edinburgh Council does not have an arrangement to hold any of its assets in a separate land holding. However, there is a formal process for declaring assets surplus and available for disposal whereby a property that is no longer required by the service user is put to a Property Strategy Group. This group comprises representatives from all service areas to consider if the use of the asset would add value or create potential savings to service delivery. If no service area can make a business case for use then the asset is put to a Corporate Asset Management Group to declare surplus and available for disposal. In addition the Council is the ultimate holding organisation of EDI Group Ltd, the principal activities of which are property development and investment and it undertakes specific development activities for the Council in certain circumstances.

2. Land and property assets are valued at Market Value and are purely financial valuations at present. However, a community benefit value may be considered as part of the Council’s proposed Asset Transfer policy.

3. The City of Edinburgh Council has a current “concessionary lets” policy which it is reviewing, and is working on the production of an Asset Transfer policy to take into account the provisions of the Community Empowerment Bill. The current policy is that concessionary lets, other than certain community food growing schemes, will only be granted in exceptional circumstances, unless there is a sponsoring Council Department. The Council generally advertises properties at market value but does consider applications from the Third Sector at less than market value and, from time to time, has marketed properties for Third Sector tenants only, depending on the proposed use and location.

4. Some disposals to the third sector have been successful and have been of benefit to the Council and the City, others less so. The difficulties encountered are:

   a) The tension between obtaining a full (or any) capital receipt/rental value against the aspiration to support the third sector

   b) The time required for the third sector to carry out feasibility studies, prepare business plans and obtain funding. In the meantime, the Council incurs substantial holding costs (but this has been avoided in a recent instance when the third sector have been granted a lease for a year while they obtain funding)

   c) The time delay in b) can result in an alternative sale/lease at maximum value being lost

   d) Uncertainty in capital planning
e) Some disposals involve a significant amount of staff time across a number of different Service Areas and also require Committee time. Staff time is lost if the sale/lease is eventually aborted.

f) Some disposals to the third sector may require ongoing financial and other commitments on behalf of the Council.
I refer to your letter of 16 December 2014 requesting information in relation to Comhairle nan Eilean Siar’s asset disposal procedures with reference to the Community Empowerment Bill.

- Does your authority have arrangements in place to hold some or all local authority assets in a separate land holding?
  No

- When disposing of, or transferring assets how are those assets valued. To what degree is this purely a financial valuation?
  The assets are generally valued by District Valuer Services (DVS) and occasionally by an Estate Agent. This is predominantly a financial valuation and a guideline of what could be obtained on the open market which is used as an element of the Comhairle’s decision making in the disposal of assets.

- What is the attitude of the authority to the disposal of assets? Does your authority have a policy to encourage the disposal of assets to community groups?
  The Comhairle has adopted a procedure whereby there is a staged approach to the disposal of assets:

  Stage 1 - Declare as surplus only on checking that Internal Departments have no interest in retaining for Comhairle Use.

  Stage 2 - Check whether the local Registered Social Landlords have an interest in acquiring for development as affordable housing. If there is interest then terms for transfer are agreed.

  Stage 3 - Advertise seeking interest from Community Groups. If there is interest then dates are set for the submission of a Business Plan which would be evaluated for compliance with the Disposal of Land by Local Authorities (Scotland) Regulations 2010. Offers in the order of 10% of the valuation have been accepted for surplus building assets.

  Stage 4 - If there is no community interest then the asset is advertised on the open market.

  I believe this procedure demonstrates a positive attitude by the Comhairle towards disposal to community groups.

- What is your experience of disposal and what difficulties has the authority encountered?
  Comhairle nan Eilean Siar has successfully disposed of a number of assets at every stage of this procedure over the past 4 years.
One of the main difficulties encountered is the time taken by community groups to compile viable business plans and funding packages. This time, usually in excess of 12 months, sometimes considerably more, means that the Comhairle is retaining the revenue costs, and the assets tend to deteriorate in condition when not occupied.

In some cases the community's desire to own the asset is more through social ties (often in the case of former school buildings) rather than a direct need. This means that community groups are looking for uses for the asset rather than having established uses which require an asset to deliver them. We have found that by offering communities the opportunity to lease the asset for a short term (1 to 2 years), at a reduced rate, the group can trial their business model and gain a direct experience of managing the asset without a commitment to purchase. The other benefit to the Comhairle is that the building is being occupied and maintained for this period. To date each of the community groups that have leased an asset have later proceeded with purchase.

In some cases there may be competing groups within one community wishing to acquire the asset. The Comhairle actively encourages groups to collaborate and submit one application to acquire the asset. To date this practice has been successful and has encouraged community collaboration and avoided the situation where multiple community applications are being evaluated against each other.

The Comhairle has adopted the procedure of offering the asset to community groups prior to advertising on the open market in the knowledge that the achievable receipt is likely to be reduced. Consideration was given to advertising on the open market and to community groups simultaneously in order to evaluate the most advantageous offer to the Comhairle, however difficulties were perceived in matching timescales as private offers would have to wait for the submission of community business plans.

Where possible the Comhairle starts the process as soon as the asset is known to become surplus to requirements rather than waiting until it is vacated. This reduces the time that the asset is vacant.

Other timescale difficulties relate to historical title issues particularly in relation to resumption from crofting tenure which may not have been completed. Concluding matters between the Crofting Commission, Landlord and Tenant can delay disposals for lengthy periods.
Written submission from Dumfries and Galloway Council

Dumfries and Galloway Council’s responses to the four questions from the Committee are as follows:

1. Does your authority have arrangements in place to hold some or all local authority assets in a separate land holding?

Response: No

Response: Where an asset is surplus to Council requirements, it is valued on the basis it will be sold on the open market. The valuation is carried out by RICS Registered Valuers, based on comparable sales evidence in accordance with the RICS “Red Book”. When the asset is actually disposed of, the agreed sale price will depend upon a number of factors, such as: offers received, interest (if any) from community group and the business case put forward from the group for the asset. Where the asset has been marketed and no community interest registered, the disposal price will generally be the highest offer received.

There are also instances where assets are transferred to community groups, where there were no plans to market the asset for disposal; the Council has transferred various assets in the last few years, and these are noted on the enclosed document. Sometimes, when an asset has been, or is about to be, marketed for disposal, a community group expresses an interest to acquire the property at less than best consideration; in such circumstances, the Council’s Disposal Policy allows that the property be taken off the market for 18 months to allow the group to develop a business case. Where properties are disposed of or transferred to a community group, it is rare that the consideration would be financial, but the criteria set out in the Disposal of Land by Local Authorities (Scotland) Regulations 2010, in terms of contributing to any of the purposes of: economic development or regeneration, health, social well-being, or environmental well-being, in respect of the whole or any part of the area of the local authority or any persons resident or present in that area are considered by the Council. (References to “well-being” are to be construed as for the purposes of section 20 of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003(2).)

3. What is the attitude of the authority to the disposal of assets? Does your authority have a policy to encourage the disposal of assets to community groups?

Response: Dumfries and Galloway Council has a Disposal Policy and a Community Asset Transfer process to encourage the disposal of assets to Community Groups. The Council’s priority to “be an inclusive Council” includes a specific objective “to empower our communities to make the most of their assets.”
I enclose a copy of the Council’s Community Asset Transfer process together with a summary of recent community asset transfers and disposal of assets at less than best consideration.

The funding of the Council’s Capital Investment Strategy also includes generating receipts from the sale of surplus assets. Previously, the target to be generated each year was £750K; however, from 2015/16, this is reduced to £500k per annum. There is therefore a balance which the Council has to strike between disposal of assets to community groups and generation of capital receipts on surplus assets. However, not all assets are of interest to community groups and, presently, it is possible to reasonably maintain this balance.

Response: Many properties which are marketed for disposal can be very difficult to sell, and some do sit on the open market for a considerable period of time with limited interest; the marketing price is therefore reconsidered periodically. This has been particularly true in recent years, with a general downturn in the market and also, many of the Council’s more valuable and saleable surplus assets having already been disposed of.

In terms of disposals or transfers to community groups, it can sometimes be the case that groups are interested in “saving” a building, without necessarily having a business case developed or considered for viable sustainable use of the asset in question. Where this situation arises, and consistent with our Council’s priority to be an Inclusive Council, all reasonable steps are taken to assist Community groups bring forward a sustainable business case. Likewise, as noted, the Council allows interested community groups up to 18 months to develop a business case for transfer of the asset; whilst this can be extended by the Council, the Council does not wish to see valuable assets deteriorate through long periods of vacancy.

In terms of land assets specifically, it has not generally been the case that there is community group interest in obtaining greenfield or brownfield land from the Council; community group interest is predominantly in built assets.

I trust you find the foregoing responses and the enclosures to be of help to the Committee in concluding its Stage One consideration of the draft Bill.

Annex 1

Recent Community Asset Transfers

As part of the Community Facilities Review process for 2013/14 and 2014/15 the following are community facilities which have been transferred or are due to transfer to community groups. There are also many properties which are run by management committees on older leases (particularly in the Nithsdale area).

Pre-2013:

- St Ninian Hall, Isle of Whithorn; Isle Futures, Asset Transfer 2013/14 (all transferred via the standardised agreement – lease):

- Hutton Hall
- Noblehill Community Centre (Dumfries Town Hand Community Hall)
- Stakeford Community Centre (Glenaros Church)
- Glenkens Community Centre
- Kirkcudbright Community Centre
- Whauphill Hall (Whauphill Community Association)

2014/15:

- Canonbie Hall, Annandale & Eskdale – Full cost Lease

At the moment the Council is in the process of agreeing the transfer of the following via a standardised agreement:

- Ecclefechan Hall
- Nelson House
- Annan Community Facility
- Sanquhar Community Centre
- Thornhill Community Centre
- Glenlochar Community Centre
- New Galloway Town Hall
- New Luce Village Hall
- Portpatrick Hall – Standardised agreement, then asset transfer

The Council is also seeking to asset transfer the following properties for less than best consideration:

- Stakeford Community Centre (Glenaros Church)
- Noblehill Community Centre (Dumfries Town Band Community Hall)
- Waverley Hall, Creetown (Creetown Initiative)
- Portpatrick Hall (Portpatrick Trust)
The following properties which the Council considers to be surplus to its requirements are not yet being marketed for sale due to community interest and may ultimately be disposed of at less than best consideration:

- Drummore Hall (Mull of Galloway Trust)
- Glenkens Community Centre
- Dryfe Road Offices, Dryfe Road Lockerbie
- Former Johnston Primary School, St Mary’s St, Kirkcudbirght

The Council’s disposal policy permits that a community group has up to 18 months to develop a business case for asset transfer; this period may be extended at the Council’s discretion.

Unless stated otherwise, all transfers have been to the specific facility’s Management Committee.

There are no instances of the Council having refused to enter into agreement, or seeking to refuse consideration of an asset transfer.

The Council approved a Community Asset Transfer Process in July 2014, a copy of which is enclosed.

Power of Well-Being

Recent examples (since January 2013) where the Council has considered well-being when considering disposal of a property at less than best consideration are:

- 22 January 2013 (item 10) and 18 March 2014 (item 10): Disposal of land to the Rear of Dumfries Academy.

  The Council agreed to dispose of 1,400m² and 590m² of land to the Peter Pan Moat Brae Trust for nominal consideration. The Committee decisions and the reports can be found at:

  and

- 19 March 2013 (item 16): Former Dumfries Academy Dining Hall

  The Council agreed to lease the former Dumfries Academy Dining Hall, Academy St/Lovers Walk Dumfries to the Inspired Community Enterprise Trust Ltd, at a nominal rent, subject to appropriate terms and conditions. The committee decision and the report can be found at:
• 18 June 2014 (item 12): Disposal of High Cemetery Lodge, Craigs Road, Dumfries

The Council noted the two offers received by the closing date set and agreed to accept the higher offer received. Well-being was considered in reaching this decision, although the Council accepted the higher offer. The Committee decision and the report can be found at: http://egenda.dumgal.gov.uk/aksdumgal/users/public/admin/kab12.pl?cmte=PRC&meet=36&arc=71

The Council agreed to grant a lease for up to 20 years for use as a Men’s Shed at a nominal rent. The Agenda and the report can be found at item 13 of:

Annex 2

Dumfries & Galloway Council Community Asset Transfer Process

1. Background

On 19 March 2013 the Policy and Resources Committee agreed a Disposal Policy for Dumfries & Galloway Council. This includes the option for ‘complex disposal at less than best consideration’ whereby ownership of a property is transferred to another body for, usually, a nominal sum.

Whilst the Policy provides for the legal aspects, this process provides guidance for officers and community groups to ensure a consistent approach with due diligence and transparent decision making hence the need for an agreed Community Asset Transfer Process. Furthermore, the Policy provides a maximum 18 month timescale for groups to demonstrate significant progress from expression of interest towards transfer of ownership. This process provides clear steps to allow projects to move through the requisite steps within that time frame.

It is recognised that Council properties which are deemed surplus to requirements for service delivery can continue to play a key role in communities. However, this potential must be matched by viable community groups with suitable skills and a sustainable business plan that is not dependent on ongoing Council revenue funding.

2. Purpose of Community Asset Transfer

The selling of a public asset to a community group for a nominal sum is governed by the Disposal of Land by Local Authorities (Scotland) Regulations 2010. These Regulations, provide that “where the Capital Value of the land is greater than £10,000, but the proposal is to dispose of the land for less than 75% of the Capital Value (this includes Disposal by lease), the Council should:

- appraise and compare the costs, other dis-benefits and benefits of the proposal;
- be satisfied that the disposal for that consideration is reasonable;
- and agree that the disposal is likely to contribute to any of the purposes of economic development or regeneration; health; social well-being; or environmental well-being; in respect of the whole or any part of the area of the local authority or any persons resident or present in that area. (references to “well-being” are to be construed as for the purposes of section 20 of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003(2).

It is considered that community empowerment, resilience and capacity building can all be encompassed within social well-being. Although the legislation refers to ‘land’ the provisions apply to buildings as well.

3. The Community Asset Transfer Process

The Process for Community Asset Transfer (CAT) is outline below and summarised in Appendix 1 which also sets out roles and who makes decisions. This both guides community groups though their own development, where needed, whilst also ensuring that due consideration of the regulatory requirements can be evidenced.

It should also be noted that the timescales are indicative. It is necessary that organisations are able to demonstrate significant active progress since, where this is not evident, then the Council may explore other disposal routes.

3.1 Preliminary Activity

The success of a Stage 1 application will be determined during this phase. Although the Stage 1 application only requires an outline business plan, having a clear vision and refined business plan will help to ensure the success of suitable applications.

Community

- Groups can be galvanised around various visions. However, to satisfy the wellbeing requirements, it would not be sufficient for a group to be motivated to ‘save’ an asset. A viable and sustainable vision, supported by a robust business plan, is also needed. These take time to develop and be refined. An outline business plan should be prepared to support a Stage 1 application.
Guidance on the content expected from a full business plan is contained in the support notes for a Stage 2 application.

- Where a group is newly formed, it may be prudent for it to consider managing the asset through a short term management agreement in order to develop organisational capacity, refine the vision and test the business plan prior to taking on the financial risks of ownership. This short term arrangement should be reviewed annually for evidence of significant progress.

- Where grant funding will be a core element of a business plan, such as with a development project, it is essential that groups engage with potential funders at this early stage. Funder requirements can have a significant influence on the shape and structure of a project.

Council

Council support will be provided through Community and Customer Services. Officers will:

- provide information, advice and support to community groups considering CAT whilst clearly explaining the decision making process. This will include clarity on the support available from the Council during the process and the timescales that must be adhered to by both parties.

- confirm if the asset has already been declared surplus to CCS or Council needs.

- liaise with the Estates team to confirm the status of the property in terms of Title Deeds.

- provide accurate running costs for the building.

- assist in building the capacity of community groups, where that is requested. This may include the establishment of a constituted group, developing or enhancing partnership working with local groups and organisations, or a skills / training assessment to ensure that the organisation is ready and prepared to manage the asset in the future.

- give advice on developing a vision for the asset (with reference to Section 2 above), the scope of any projects and potential funding routes. This could include providing support to identify how the asset meets the organisations objectives, its ability to meet the needs of the wider community now and in the future, how viable the project is and how sustainable the asset will be.

- advise groups on consultation methods to provide sufficient evidence of community support for the proposals. This may include an introduction to the National Standards for Community Engagement, support to plan and deliver a community meeting, assistance to develop an online survey or advice on how to gather letters of support.
• provide information on the condition of the asset, such as existing condition surveys, asbestos registers or legionella test records. If necessary, provide up to date condition surveys to support funding bids.

3.2 Stage 1 – Suitability

The first stage in the process results in a decision on whether to proceed to the more detailed assessment at Stage 2. The first stage allows the community group to submit its proposals in outline. The application requirements and assessment criteria are shown in Appendix 2.

1. Community group submits initial application. If more than one group is interested then notification of a closing date for applications may be considered. Any decision will also consider which application presents the greatest potential community benefit in addition to other factors.

2. On receipt of application, the Officers will:

a. check that the application is competent

b. confirm if the property has already been declared surplus

c. confirm that clear title exists

d. review the most recent condition survey, identify any significant issues and liaise with other Departments if that is necessary. Preference will be given to organisations able to lever external funding to improve the condition.

e. confirm whether TUPE rights apply where a member of Council staff is employed in relation to an asset

Where these checks reveal any issues that could prohibit or prevent asset transfer then they need to be resolved before the application can be considered further.

3. Views of Area Committee Chair and Ward Members will be sought on the application.

4. The Head of Resource Planning and Community Services will review information in support of the application and the viability of the organisation before making an assessment on the suitability of the asset for transfer, the strength of the outline proposal (particularly potential community benefit), and the standing of the organisation. The possible outcomes are detailed below and the reasoning for the decision will be clearly communicated to the applicant:

a. application suitable to proceed to Stage 2

b. application suitable to proceed to Stage 2, subject to the property being formally declared ‘surplus with complex disposal at less than best consideration’,

c. recommendation that the organisation consider an annual management agreement years before re-submitting a Stage 1 application
d. reject the request.

5. Area Committee Chair and Ward members will be advised of the decision.

3.3 Stage 2 – Detailed Assessment (6 to 12 weeks from Stage 1 decision)

The organisation has the opportunity to submit a detailed application based on a “sound” business plan. The application requirements and assessment criteria are shown in Appendix 2.

1. Community group submits Stage 2 application. If more than one group is interested then notification of a closing date for applications may be considered. Any decision will also consider which application present the greatest potential community benefit in addition to other factors.

2. Application assessed with officers from other Departments where that is appropriate. Applicants should use the Stage 2 application form with reference to the detailed Guidance Notes:

- Section A: Pass/Fail
- Section B/C: consideration of benefits/dis-benefits of proposals with regard to evidenced community wellbeing, viability and sustainability, particularly financial sustainability.

3. It may also be that viable disposal options other than for less than best consideration exist. Should this be the case then the preferred Stage 2 application will be reviewed against other options by the Strategic Asset Board to assess which option presents the greatest community benefit. Recommendations from the Group will be included in any report to the Policy and Resources Committee.

4. Head of Resource Planning and Community Services confirms the assessment and recommendation.

5. Report to relevant Area Committee to seek a recommendation prior submitting to Policy and Resources Committee

6. Report to the Policy and Resources Committee for decision. This will contain a summary of the application, assessment and officer recommendation. The possible outcomes are detailed below:

a. Approval of transfer to applicant at less than best consideration.

b. Conditional approval of transfer to applicant at less than best consideration. (Where a business case is contingent upon the securing of external funding. Conditional approval will be time limited, subject to the likely time frame for funding applications.)

c. Reject the application with the reasons and outcome officially minuted. The organisation will be formally written to confirm the reasons for the decision detailing the timescales for the group being able to re-apply.
Note: where a Stage 2 application is rejected, the organisation may not reapply against the same asset within a period of 12 months. It is essential that organisations work closely with Council Officers in the Preliminary and Stage 1 period to ensure that a quality application is produced. Re-applications within 12 months may be considered where there has been a material change which would significantly alter the original application.

3.4 Stage 3 – Implementation (4 to 8 weeks from the Stage 2 decision)

1. Organisation commences implementation of business plan, including the making of funding applications (where relevant).

2. Council finalises legal aspects of transfer, including TUPE arrangements where appropriate.

3. Organisation provides evidence that any conditions have been met in full.

4. Final report to Policy and Resources Committee, where required.

5. Transfer implemented.

3.5 Stage 4 - Handover

Organisation commences operations. Any ongoing support required from Council officers can be covered by an SLA.

4. Glossary Term | Definition
--- | ---
Clear Title | That the Council has the right to dispose of an asset and that the asset is free of any encumbrances which would restrict or prohibit this.
Community Asset Transfer | Legal ownership of an asset is transferred from a public body, such as a council, to another organisation for 'less than best consideration'. This is permitted under the Disposal of Land by Local Authorities (Scotland) Regulations 2010 as long as the proposals pass tests of reasonableness and community benefit.
Community Group | The formality of a group may change as a vision develops into a business plan. Initially, a group may be nothing more than a community of interest. However, by the time a Stage 1 application is submitted, it should be formally constituted as a voluntary organisation. The final form of a group can be influenced by the business plan and intended funding route, however it needs to be a “legal entity” which is able to own Property.

<td>Community groups will need to generate income to sustain their activities and be able to maintain an asset into the future. <td>The Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations (TUPE) protects employees’ terms and conditions of employment when a business is transferred from one owner to another. It’s as if their employment contracts had originally been made with the new employer. Their continuity of service and any other rights are all preserved.</td>

Wellbeing

Wellbeing is a subjective evaluation of how we feel about and experience our lives. Wellbeing, positive mental health and mental wellbeing are often used interchangeably, although ‘wellbeing’ is also used in a broader sense to include physical health.

Community wellbeing includes characteristics familiar from the literature on social capital e.g. trust, tolerance, participation, influence, mutual aid, social networks and social support. Other indicators of collective wellbeing are ‘collective efficacy’ i.e. coming together to solve problems or improve things, intergenerational solidarity and informal social control e.g. neighbourhoods where adults keep an eye on children and young people.

Less than best consideration

Assets have a value: the price they could sell for on the open market. However, it is recognised that outright purchase of an asset, such as a community building, is beyond the reach of many voluntary organisations. Regulations allow ownership to be transferred for less than the market value and this can be done for a nominal sum such as £1.

Written submission from Dundee City Council

Disposal of Local Authority Assets

Thank you for your letter of 16 December 2014 regarding the above and respond to your questions as follows.

- Does your authority have arrangements in place to hold some or all local authority asset in a separate land holding?

No, Dundee City Council holds the asset until it is transferred through the Community Asset Transfer process.

- When disposing of, or transferring assets how are those assets valued. To what degree is this purely a financial valuation?

When an asset is deemed suitable for Community Asset Transfer, a market value of the asset will be calculated. If the Voluntary and Community Organisation (VCO) seeking transfer of the asset can demonstrate to the Council how the transfer is likely to contribute to the local community, how the transfer may help to promote or improve the economic, social or environmental wellbeing of the area and how it relates to health and regeneration then a reduced price may be acceptable. In order to allow transfers to take place at a lower price the Council has to be satisfied that these terms can be appropriately met. In such cases, and subject to the Disposal of Land by Local Authorities (Scotland) Regulations 2010, the level of discount to be applied will be determined by a range of factors including the costs to the Council of holding the asset, the strength of the VCO’s business case, the potential benefits to the community, access to funding and the risks involved. This is assessed during the Community Asset Transfer application process.

- What is the attitude of the authority to the disposal of assets? Does your authority have a policy to encourage the disposal of assets to community groups?

Dundee City Council’s Community Asset Transfer Strategy was approved at the Policy and Resources Committee on 19th August 2013. The aim of the strategy is to set out a transparent, positive and proactive framework that enables and manages the transfer of assets from Dundee City Council to VCO’s in order to bring about long term social, economic and environmental benefits to the community.

- What is your experience of disposal and what difficulties has the authority encountered?

There can be challenges regarding the support levels that are required to help groups to evidence need and consult within their communities, and the support role of others to help them go through the process, acquire an asset and sustain it.
Written submission from East Ayrshire Council

In reply to your letter regarding the Disposal of Local Authority Assets on 16th December 2014, I have completed the following information on behalf of East Ayrshire Council for the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee:

1. Does your authority have arrangements in place to hold some or all local authority assets in a separate land holding?

   No. Land and buildings remain on either the General Service Account or Housing Revenue Account as appropriate.

2. When disposing of, or transferring assets how are those assets valued. To what degree is this purely a financial valuation?

   As per the Council’s Community Asset Transfer policy the assets will be valued at 10% of the proposed use value (whether rental or sale) unless another discount is considered appropriate dependant on the asset being transferred and the nature of the proposal. The difference between the value and the rent/price payable will be recorded as being the level the Council’s “in-kind” support to a project.

3. What is the attitude of the authority to the disposal of assets? Does your authority have a policy to encourage the disposal of assets to community groups?

   As per the Council’s Community Asset Transfer policy, the Council has in the past generally pursued long lease arrangements but a disposal at less the market value would be considered:

   (a) Where it is necessary to comply with the funding criteria of the proposed project; or

   (b) For the sustainability of the project i.e. the project is predominantly capital funded or long-term in nature.

   Clawbacks are inserted in order to protect the interest of the Council in the event that they deviate from the approved community use or sell on for alternative use in the future. This was following advice from Audit regarding protecting the public pound.

4. What is your experience of disposal and what difficulties had the authority encountered?

   The majority of the Council’s asset transfers have been by way of lease unless they are for example a new build facility when they are acquiring a price of land. Many groups particularly newly established ones prefer the option to lease as the Council retain responsibility for statutory compliance and, there is a fall-back in the event the project is unsuccessful.

   We have had issues internally between balancing community wish to acquire of at less than market value and corporate objectives to follow the public pound. It is hoped that clawbacks will protect this but some community groups seem reticent to accept these.

We had particular issue with an existing tenant who wished to purchase their property. The view of Legal Services was that the interpretation of the Disposal of Land Regulations did not allow for this as there was no additional benefits it felt that this would be contrary to the Disposal of Land Regulations. Perhaps clarity could be provided on this.

It is felt that there is still a conflict between the Disposal of Land Regulations and the obligation on local authorities to follow the Public Pound.

I have enclosed a copy of East Ayrshire Council’s Community Asset Transfer policy for your information.

Annex 1

EAST AYRSHIRE COUNCIL

COMMUNITY ASSET TRANSFER POLICY

1 INTRODUCTION

1.1 The aim of this policy is to set out a transparent and enabling framework to manage the transfer of assets from the Council to Voluntary and Community Organisations (VCOs).

1.2 The overall aim of this policy is to empower local communities, recognising at the same time, optimising the use of all of our assets including land, property and equipment.

2 COUNCIL COMMITMENT

2.1 The Council is committed to Community Asset Transfer where it will bring benefits to the local community and contribute towards the Council aims and objectives.

2.2 The Council recognises that Community Asset Transfer can be a valuable tool in empowering communities, building the capacity of local citizens and to inspire others to create locally responsive solutions to community needs.

2.3 Community Asset Transfer will become integrated within Council practice and the Council will put in place a transparent process for Community Asset Transfer.

2.4 The Council will provide designated support staff to assist VCO’s wishing to consider the transfer of a community asset. The staff will support communities to build their capacity and skills to manage facilities and assist with the application process.

2.5 The Council also recognises that some assets must remain within Council ownership and management to support delivery of essential services, provide an income stream or may have restrictive covenants on their future use.
making them unsuitable for transfer or impact on the timescales for transfer e.g. being held in the Common Good. The Council will consider as part of the initial assessment whether the asset should be retained by the Council or whether a transfer could be possible.

3 NATIONAL POLICY CONTEXT

3.1 The Scottish Government launched the “Promoting Asset Transfer” programme in 2009 to increase levels of awareness and interest within local authorities in asset transfer as a means of increasing community ownership of assets and together with COSLA they jointly launched a Community Empowerment Action Plan. This described their commitment to community empowerment with community ownership seen as one aspect that can help build capacity to deliver empowerment.

3.2 The Disposal of Land by Local Authorities (Scotland) Regulations 2010 came into effect on 1st June 2010 and these regulations removed the previous requirement in terms of section 74 (2) of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973 to seek Scottish Ministers’ consent to dispose of land/property at less than the best value consideration subject to certain conditions.

4 LOCAL POLICY CONTEXT AND LINKS TO OTHER STRATEGIES

4.1 The Community Asset Transfer will require to make a clear contribution to the Council’s priorities as set out in the following documents:

- Community Plan - 4 themes
  - Promoting Lifelong Learning
  - Delivering Community Regeneration
  - Improving Community Safety
  - Improving Health and Wellbeing

- Single Outcome Agreement

4.2 Cabinet on 18 April 2012 agreed the values, guiding principles and planned outcomes of a new approach to Transforming Our Relationship with the Communities We Serve.

The guiding principles which have been agreed are detailed below:

- taking a community development approach to our activity – working with rather than for communities;
- listening to our communities and valuing their knowledge, skills and experience;
- empowering communities and building their resilience;
- focusing on reducing inequalities in our most deprived communities;
- prioritising prevention and early intervention approaches; and
- building sustainability into all activity.

5 COMMUNITY ASSET TRANSFER DESCRIPTION

5.1 Community Asset Transfer involves the transfer of the responsibility for an asset from the Council to a VCO through either a transfer of management responsibility, short or long term lease or through the transfer of outright ownership. Consideration will also be given to a phased transfer of responsibility dependent on the nature of the proposal.

5.2 The Council has in the past generally pursued long lease arrangements but a disposal at less than market value would be considered:

(a) where it is necessary to comply with the funding criteria of the proposed project; or

6 ELIGIBLE ORGANISATIONS

6.1 Organisations eligible to seek community asset transfer are voluntary and community organisations (VCOs) who are providing, maintaining or promoting cultural, social, welfare, recreation or sporting activities, or be involved in community based projects which are in the interests of local communities and/or are meeting the objectives of the Council’s Community Plan. Licensed clubs etc will not be eligible for an asset transfer.

6.2 VCOs generally have the following characteristics:

- Are formally constituted;
- Have sound long-term management and governance arrangements;
- Have their own decision-making system and accountability to independent trustees or its own members or constituents;
- Are non-political;
- Have an element of involvement of volunteers;
- Is not for private profit i.e. it does not distribute any surplus to owners or members but applies it to serving its basic purposes

6.3 Newly formed groups may also be considered suitable for asset transfer if they can demonstrate that they have the necessary expertise and experience to manage the asset and have a sound business plan in place. The Council will provide designated support staff to assist groups through the process.

6.4 VCOs meeting the above description but wishing to use the premises/sites for ancillary commercial purposes will require to demonstrate that they require the social enterprise for a recurring income stream in order to make the project sustainable. The income received from the social enterprise will require to be reinvested in the activities of the project.

6.5 In order to be eligible for a disposal at less than market value the VCOs proposal must contribute, in respect of the local authority’s area, or part of it, or the residents, to one of the purposes set out at Para 4(2) of the Disposal of Land by Local Authorities (Scotland) Regulations 2010 regulations being:

(a) economic development or regeneration;
(b) health;

7 TERMS OF TRANSFER OF LAND / PREMISES

7.1 Where a lease is to be granted, a discounted rental of 10% of the market rental will be payable unless another discount is considered appropriate dependant on the asset being transferred and the nature of the proposal. The difference between the market rental and the rent payable is recorded as being the level of the Council’s “in-kind” support to the projects.

7.2 Where there is to be a disposal of an asset, the purchase price will be 10% of the proposed use value unless another discount is considered appropriate dependant on the asset being transferred and the nature of the proposal. Likewise, the difference between the market value and the purchase price payable will be recorded as being the level of the Council’s “in-kind” support to a project.

7.3 Where a lease is to be granted, any premises will be let on a full repairing and insuring basis whereby the VCO is responsible for the cost of any repairs to the property which may arise throughout the duration of the lease, both internal and external. Other repairing covenants will be considered taking into the particular circumstance associated with each asset transfer.

7.4 Where a lease is to be granted, the Council will insure the structure of the premises against fire and special perils, with the insurance premium being recovered from the tenant who will be responsible for all other insurances, e.g. contents, third party liability, etc. The VCO will also be responsible for all excesses payable in the event of each and every claim.

7.5 All running costs and outlays associated with the occupancy of the premises will be payable by the VCO, e.g. electricity, gas, etc. The VCO will be responsible for payment of all rates and water/ sewerage charges which may be levied on the premises/sites. Organisations that are charitable or of social benefit but non-profit making or recreational or sporting members clubs, which are not established for profit, may qualify for Rates Relief and, the Council’s designated support staff will assist to determine the extent of liability for non-domestic rates.

7.6 All leases will be for a fixed term and contain a termination date linked to the funding available and proposed terms of the project. Leases with terms in excess of 5 years will include a Rent Review at the end of every fifth year.

7.7 It will be a pre-requisite of any disposal for less than market value for an economic development burden to be inserted into the title restricting the use of the land/property to that provided in terms of the approved project. In the event of the approved use ceasing i.e. the grant of planning consent for an alternative use the Council would seek an additional payment based on the current market value to reflect the change of use.
8 ASSESSMENT PROCESS

8.1 The Council will have a clear and transparent process for asset transfer including a clear first point of contact. Once the Council considers an asset to be suitable for transfer there will be a 2 staged process. The initial stage will be an Expression of Interest where the Council will consider the outline proposal and the VCO seeking transfer. If there is greater than one interest expressed by a VCO in an asset, the VCO’s will be encouraged to work together to seek a joint transfer.

8.2 Thereafter, the second stage will involve a detailed application and submission. Any VCO requesting an asset transfer must be able to:

i. Provide a well-prepared business plan. This document is crucial to the assessment process and assistance will be provided to ensure it contains the relevant information.

ii. Demonstrate a clear community/social demand for the transfer.

iii. Demonstrate they have the capacity to manage the asset and have directors or management committee members who have the necessary skills and experience.

iv. Show they have good governance and robust financial systems in place along with all necessary policies expected of a community group such as health and safety policies, compliance with relevant legislation etc.

v. Show how their project objectives contribute to the Council’s corporate and strategic objectives.

vi. Prove that the proposed project compliments activities, services or facilities already provided in the local community.

vii. The Council will assist VCO’s to build their capacity and provide the necessary information and experience to assist in the Community Asset Transfer process through the provision of designated support staff.

8.3 The following table set out the process with indicative timescales. Appendix 1 sets out the process in a flowchart.

Written submission from East Lothian Council

Disposal of Local Authority Assets

Does your authority have arrangements in place to hold some or all local authority assets in a separate land holding?

The majority of land and property assets are held by and are under the direct control of the Council.

However, some assets are held as Common Good and some by two companies that are wholly owned by the Council: East Lothian Land Ltd and Enjoy Leisure Ltd.

East Lothian Land Ltd's remit is to promote, support and/or effect the development of land and property within the area served by East Lothian Council, with a view to stimulating economic development and regeneration and so to assist in the creation of employment opportunities.

Enjoy Leisure Ltd manages and delivers leisure services on behalf of the Council.

Lastly, a very small number of assets are held on Trusts which are administered by the Council.

When disposing of, or transferring assets how are those assets valued? To what degree is this purely a financial valuation?

The Council is bound by statute to achieve best value and, in the current financial climate, is particularly mindful of the need to maximise financial returns from surplus assets. The financial valuation of assets for disposal is therefore necessary and is obtained from the District Valuer or undertaken by the Council’s estates surveyors who have RICS Registered Valuer status. However, value to the community is also considered and opportunities for disposal or transfer to partner organisations to achieve particular outcomes, for example, day centre or residential care provision, are explored where appropriate.

What is the attitude of the authority to the disposal of assets? Does your authority have a policy to encourage the disposal of assets to community groups?

Where appropriate, the council has facilitated community use of some buildings by way of the grant of long leases (99 years) to community groups. The Council is currently developing a policy in relation to this area.

What is your experience of disposal and what difficulties has the authority encountered?

a. The Council has transferred the title of Dunbar Harbour to a Dunbar Harbour Trust. It would be fair to say that the experience was a lengthy and protracted process, although this may have been inevitable given the nature of the transfer and the liabilities the harbour community were taking on. We are working to transfer ownership of North Berwick Harbour in a similar way.
b. The Council encountered delay in accepting an offer during a recent sale of a town centre asset when a community group made an offer for the property at the closing date but could not confirm that they could secure funding for the purchase within a timescale acceptable to the Council in terms of acting fairly to the other bidders.

c. The Council recently made significant investment in a long lease of a community facility to a local group. The group secured money from external funders to improve the facility. However they subsequently decided to hand the building back to the Council. One of the issues they encountered was grant conditions from an external funder which they did not feel able to accept. It can be difficult to ensure that local volunteers truly understand and are well prepared for the extent of the liabilities and responsibilities they are taking on.

d. Having to return a facility is bound to cause disappointment locally, and can dent a community’s self-confidence and appetite for further ventures.

e. The examples that have worked well for the Council in the past are where council staff are actively involved in running the facility, and the Trustees assist with programming details, raise funds and work on joint projects.

f. As the Council has said in its various responses to consultation on community empowerment, community capacity is a real issue in ensuring the sustainable control of public assets.
Written submission from East Renfrewshire Council

1. Does your authority have arrangements in place to hold some or all local authority assets in a separate land holding?

If this question is asking if the council holds potentially surplus assets separately from other assets, then the answer is no. The council does however identify properties potentially suitable for disposal under its “Property Asset Disposal Framework”. The only assets defined as surplus within the council’s assets register are those where sale is imminent and certain. The majority of properties identified for sale are therefore excluded, even when on the market. This is as disposal cannot be guaranteed within a 12 month period. The definition of a surplus asset within the council’s asset register is one being actively marketed which will be sold within the forthcoming 12 month period and this practice reflects CIPFA Code paragraph 4.9.2.13.

2. When disposing of, or transferring assets how are those assets valued. To what degree is this purely a financial valuation?

Valuations are financially based with disposal usually being by sale on the open market. This is unless an enhanced consideration would be achieved by disposal to an adjoining owner by realization of “marriage value” or where transfer to another public authority is proposed. In transferring property, the District Valuer would normally be appointed to independently determine its value. However, in relation to asset disposals to community groups some flexibility might be offered, although this would be subject to best value considerations and a report to the Council’s Cabinet under the current scheme of Administration.

3. What is the attitude of the authority to the disposal of assets? Does your authority have a policy to encourage the disposal of assets to community groups?

The Council has an asset disposal framework in place which includes provision for community disposals. This is attached for information.

4. What is your experience of disposal and what difficulties has the authority encountered?

To date, there have been no community disposals via sale. Whilst some outline interest has been expressed, none has yet resulted in a property or land (sale) disposal to a community group. The biggest issue encountered to date has been the ability of Community Groups to evidence robust governance arrangements and evidencing a deliverable and sustainable business plan which allows the group to take over an asset and its future liabilities. There have been a small number of land/property assets transferred to community groups under a lease however, following Cabinet approval. These have been for various purposes including a multi faith education centre (lease agreed following payment of a grassum) and a land disposal for the purposes of creating an allotment site (lease at peppercorn rent).

EAST RENFREWSHIRE COUNCIL

Report by Director of Environment

PROPERTY ASSET DISPOSAL FRAMEWORK

PURPOSE OF REPORT

1. To seek Cabinet approval to the terms of a proposed land and property asset disposal framework.

RECOMMENDATIONS

2. Cabinet is asked to approve the terms of the land and property asset disposal framework, and endorse the approach proposed to engage with local communities regarding asset management.

BACKGROUND

4. In this report, it was noted that "as time progresses and as effective asset management arrangements embed themselves within the Council, it is likely that other property and land assets will be identified as being surplus in the future. In order to ensure that all such future asset disposal decisions are carefully considered, an asset disposal framework is currently being prepared. Such a framework will follow to Cabinet shortly, and will require that rigorous appraisals be undertaken to consider the range of options available for any future land or property asset disposal".

REPORT

5. The land and property asset disposal framework has now been finalised and wide consultation has taken place between relevant officers within the Council.

6. The terms of the proposed framework are set out in appendices 1 to 3 to this report. Appendix 4 provides a list of site locations which may be able to be identified to be surplus and against which, subject to Cabinet approval, the terms of the framework will then be applied.

7. Cabinet should note that, notwithstanding the terms of this framework, the sale of any Council owned land or property asset can only be implemented following Cabinet approval.
FINANCE AND EFFICIENCY

8. As referred to in previous reports, the implementation of effective asset management across the Council brings with it opportunities to generate significant financial and efficiency savings, along with the opportunity to generate capital receipts on an ongoing basis in the future.

9. In order to ensure best value is achieved, it is important that a consistent approach is taken in relation to the identification and disposal of surplus land and property assets. This framework is intended to support officers to reach such consistent and informed decisions in relation to future asset disposals.

CONSULTATION AND PARTNERSHIP WORKING

10. Consultation in relation to this framework has taken place across the range of Council Services.

11. In parallel with the implementation of this framework, it is intended that the Council’s Community Engagement Team undertake a series of awareness raising sessions with local communities in Autumn 2011. The main purpose of this exercise will be to raise awareness of asset management arrangements across the Council generally, to test the appetite within communities for more direct involvement by them in asset management and to start a process of building capacity within communities, allowing them to more effectively contribute towards the management of property assets within their communities.

IMPLICATIONS OF THE PROPOSALS

12. There are no wider implications directly associated with the proposals contained within this report.

CONCLUSIONS

13. In order to ensure effective asset management, a consistent approach needs to be taken in relation to the identification of and arrangements for the disposal of surplus land and property assets. The proposed land and property asset disposal framework is intended to provide guidance to officers in relation to the steps which need to be taken when identifying and disposing of such assets.

RECOMMENDATIONS

14. Cabinet is asked to approve the terms of the proposed land and property asset disposal framework, and endorse the approach proposed to engage with local communities regarding asset management.

Introduction

At a time when the Council faces increasing demands of more stringent governance and the need to cut costs it is important that it is in a position to make business decisions in the complete knowledge of its heritable property portfolio. CIFPA Scotland has commented that, “(Council) assets are integral to the services delivered to the people of Scotland and the manner in which they are managed impacts on the ability of Councils to meet their aims and objectives”.

The extent of Council land and property assets is significant and whilst this can be seen as a tremendous resource it can, if underperforming, become a major burden. It is therefore vital that the Council delivers proactive management of Council land and property assets through the introduction of new procedures for the appraisal of assets and assessment of appropriateness for other uses, including for community use, or disposal.

This framework aims to formalise the basis for the identification of Council surplus land and property and the means of its disposal.

Context

The disposal of the Council’s property is subject to the provisions of section 74 of the Local Government Scotland Act 1973 as amended by section 11 of the Local Government Scotland Act 2003 and other statutory requirements. This legislation places a duty on the Council to achieve the best consideration and to ensure transparency and consistency in the disposal of land and property assets. The Council is also under a duty to achieve best value. The Council’s statutory duties must accordingly be borne in mind in the management of the Council’s estate.
As at 2011 East Renfrewshire Council had 133 non-housing properties for the delivery of its services with annual maintenance costs of some £12m and a maintenance backlog of approximately £23m.

In addition, some 130 areas of land in Council ownership have been identified by Council services that make little or no contribution to Council service delivery. Many of these are small areas of amenity open space that whilst contributing to the urban landscape present an ongoing cost to the Council and could potentially be used for other purposes. This figure excludes recognised Council parks and play areas.

To make sure that its properties are used efficiently, the Council must keep its property holdings under review. This is to ensure that property holdings are focused towards service delivery and the Council’s corporate objective of continuous improvement in its efficiency. In the current economic circumstances the importance of achieving this is greater than ever. In short, the imperative is to secure efficiencies through the rationalisation of the Council’s heritable estate.

Asset management is critical to achieving this outcome by holding the minimum number of properties necessary for service delivery. To be effective a sound understanding of assets currently held by the Council is required. The Council uses ‘Tribal’ asset management software to record property related data including running costs, level of use, suitability, condition and maintenance requirements. In addition, consultation takes place with holding departments on the implications of retaining and operating properties taking into account factors including the impact upon community organisations or other service provision. By collating this information, informed decisions can be made on the best properties to be retained to minimise service delivery costs. Through their asset management plans, Council services will be required to identify assets that positively contribute towards service delivery and those that do not.

Opportunities to reduce property maintenance costs by retaining only accommodation best suited to meeting the Council’s future needs and disposing of that not required will reduce running costs and improve the Council’s financial position.

In addition to the Tribal management system, the Council has a database of land in its ownership. This ranges from former lock-up sites to amenity open space to large landholdings like Springfield Road.

Land and property disposals by the Council will create opportunities for housing, business and leisure development by others. The Council will seek to ensure that in disposing of land and property the proposed end use is viable and sustainable and where appropriate, there is recognition of the ongoing financial responsibilities associated with maintaining a property.

Until now, the Council has not operated a formal procedure to identify potentially surplus properties. Although a number of surplus properties have been sold by the Council since its inception these have not been part of a strategic programme. Consequently previous asset disposal has been ad-hoc or reactive to the need for a capital receipt to fund a specific project. The result is that many of the Council’s most valuable surplus land and property assets have now been sold. To make the most of the potential of the remaining opportunities a more structured and proactive approach within an agreed strategy is required to assist in future capital planning.

To maximise the benefit from the disposal of surplus assets, close consultation across Council departments and with Community Planning Partners is required. This is to ensure a coordinated approach in the identification and timing of potential disposal opportunities and will require open discussion and the full disclosure of information to remove uncertainty, avoid delays and address concerns before sites are marketed.

Whilst in the medium to long term the benefits of asset rationalisation will bring savings, in the short term there may be costs associated with managing service changes.

Until an asset is disposed of, the holding service will continue to be responsible for the costs of securing and maintaining an asset. The Director of Environment, through Property and Technical Services, will manage the property on behalf of the holding service but all costs will be recharged to the holding service. As this can be expensive, it is in the interests of holding services to identify and cooperate with the disposal of surplus assets as quickly as possible.

The amount of capital receipt that can be expected from asset disposal will be subject to

- Agreement on identifying surplus properties/sites
- Site conditions
- Potential uses
- Interest from Community Planning Partners and community organisations
- Market conditions

As such, it is impossible to be prescriptive on what can reasonably be achieved from assets identified for disposal. However it is proposed to develop, in partnership with the Director of Finance, a realistic and realisable annual programme of disposals to support the capital plan.

Acknowledging the Scottish Government and COSLA’s commitment to community empowerment, there may be a small number of opportunities for community organisations to acquire surplus Council assets to deliver community services or engage in social enterprise. The Council, through the Deputy Chief Executive, will support any legitimate community organisation that expresses such an interest. However the Council must be realistic in what is required of any organisation taking on an asset and will require a significant level of detail and evidence of financial and personal commitment. The key factors to be considered are whether there will be measurable benefits to the community by disposing of the asset and the capacity of the organisation to sustain use of the asset.
To supplement this strategy and to provide the necessary detail to asset disposal, two policy documents are included with the framework, these are:

- An asset appraisal framework and disposal procedures policy that sets out the considerations for identifying assets for possible future disposal. This includes a full option appraisal, consultation procedures within the Council, with partner organisations and community organisations, and the identification of potential alternatives uses and users. The policy also provides guidance on procedures for the marketing of assets including the preparation of planning guidance. These procedures are particularly crucial to ensure compliance with audit requirements.

- A policy for the disposal of assets to community organisations. This sets out the rigorous requirements of the Council to ensure that the community organisation has the capacity to take on the asset and can deliver measurable community benefits.

Contribution to Single Outcome Agreement

The purpose of this document is to provide a framework within which the Council can proactively manage its estate and where appropriate dispose of underperforming assets to generate savings and income to the Council. The outcome will be to realise additional funding for the Council’s capital programme which will contribute to maintaining and improving services and projects across the Council. In that sense, this strategy will contribute to all of the SOA.

Vision

We are working to proactively manage the Council’s assets in an effective and efficient way to eliminate surplus and maximise opportunities. In identifying and disposing of underperforming assets, other community needs can benefit.

Outcomes and Intermediate Outcomes

Because of the overarching nature of this framework it will relate and positively contribute to a range of outcomes. The following intermediate outcomes will be used to help monitor the progress of the work being undertaken towards achieving the long term SOA outcomes.

Single Outcome Agreement Outcomes

SOA 9 Our local people live in an attractive natural and built environment that is sustainable and enhanced for future generations.

Intermediate outcome 02 East Renfrewshire has cleaner streets and improved parks and greenspaces.

SOA 10 There are high quality and affordable housing opportunities for our residents. Intermediate Outcome Residents are able to live in good quality and affordable housing which is well managed.
SOA 11 Our communities are more active and have influence over service design and delivery.

Intermediate Outcome 01 Our residents and communities have the skills, confidence, knowledge and opportunity to influence service design and delivery.

Intermediate Outcome 02 All residents, including those from vulnerable, disadvantaged and minority groups are encouraged and supported to be more active in the community.

Customer, Efficiency and People Outcomes

2 Efficiency

Intermediate Outcome 02 Our assets are used more effectively and efficiently

Environment Department Service Delivery Plan 2011/12

The Strategic Land and Asset Disposal framework (SDP-PAT7) – to identify opportunities to improve the Council’s use of property and identify opportunities for the disposal of surplus property and land.

Activities

- To develop a comprehensive database of Council land and property assets to allow the Council to manage its assets more effectively and efficiently
- To identify land and property that is no longer positively contributing to Council outcomes
- To implement an appraisal framework against which Council assets can be objectively assessed to determine need, condition and suitability of other uses, including community use.
- To implement asset disposal criteria to ensure best value is achieved
- To dispose of surplus assets to achieve the most positive outcomes for the Council whether financial or contributing to the delivery of other SOA outcomes
- To deliver in partnership with the Director of Finance a programme of disposals to sustain the Council’s capital programme.
- Through the disposal of less efficient assets, we will be able to invest in remaining assets and in doing so contribute to SOA Outcomes 5 (healthier, more active)
- Through continuous review of Council assets we will ensure active management and strategic portfolio planning
Where appropriate, we will seek to acquire property that will positively contribute to the SOA. In addition, we will actively consider joint working/ownership/occupation of property with our Community Planning Partners.

We will review options for Community Facilities by means of a corporate approach to asset management

We will provide opportunities for community empowerment through the disposal of assets to community organisations

Indicators, Targets

- No. of sites successfully marketed (new)
- £’s Income generated for the Council/ £’s savings achieved (new)
- Additional units being brought into affordable housing supply
- Number of hectares of greenspace in East Renfrewshire improved
- Percentage of operational (Council owned or leased) accommodation which is in a satisfactory condition
- Percentage of operational (Council owned or leased) accommodation which is in a suitable condition for its current use
- £ per m2 in property maintenance
- The proportion of operational accommodation that is in a satisfactory condition
- The proportion of operational accommodation that is suitable for its current use

Additional Information

Consultation

This framework has been developed in partnership with Departments and Services of the Council including Chief Executives, Finance, Property and Technical, Planning, Housing, Economic Development, Legal, Environmental Services and Roads. Discussion has also taken place with the Development Trusts Association Scotland and Voluntary Action (East Renfrewshire) with regards asset transfer to community organisations.

The framework will be taken forward by the Director of Environment through the Corporate Asset Management Group and new sub group arrangements. This group will be supported by officers from across the Council who will undertake the detailed work around the option appraisals, investigative works and supporting marketing information. The Deputy Chief Executive will lead on consultation and support for local community organisations interested in the community ownership of assets.
Environmental Sustainability

The key environmental impacts directly attributable to the Council will be

- Reduced energy consumption leading to a reduction in Council controlled carbon emissions
- Increased investment in greenspaces leading to improved biodiversity and measures to mitigate against the effects of climate change
- Reduced travel for Council staff
- The disposal of assets will be supplemented where appropriate by planning guidance on sustainable urban drainage, protecting or enhancement biodiversity and energy efficient design.

Equalities

An Equality Impact Assessment (EIA) has been undertaken and no adverse impacts have been identified that would prevent this framework being implemented. It is possible that at a property-specific level impacts may be identified and where relevant these will be assessed through an EIA as part of the option appraisal exercise.

Finance and Efficiency

Implementation of the framework will be carried out by existing staff. The disposal of underperforming or vacant land and property assets will generate capital income to the Council and reduce maintenance, running costs and security costs which can be reinvested to improve service delivery.

Efficiencies can be created by having more staff working from fewer locations facilitating more cross-service working.

Supporting the capital programme through asset disposal will reduce the Council's borrowing requirements and associated interest charges.

The Council will require to spend money up-front to bring sites to the market. This would cover any requirement for ground condition surveys, legal costs, small scale site acquisition, marketing costs, etc. An annual revenue allocation will be required to support this process. Any site disposal requiring a greater level of investment would be reported to Cabinet for specific approval. Similarly, any proposed acquisition of property would require Cabinet approval.

Partnership Working

No external partnership working has taken place to date however there may be opportunities to work with partner organisations to combine assets to bring to the market. This could include working with private landowners and developers to maximise the potential of assets.
As part of good management of the wider public estate, the option appraisal exercise will include, where appropriate, consulting with Community Planning Partners to find out if they have any interest in acquiring surplus Council assets.

With support from the Development Trusts Association Scotland, the Council will carry out a programme of community engagement activity around the subject of asset management.

Risk

There are a number of risks associated with this framework. The main risk is that due to market conditions and suppressed levels of developer demand the Council may not be able to achieve a realistic receipt from disposal of an asset that has been declared surplus. In such circumstances a decision will be required on whether to retain the unsustainably asset and incur further costs in terms of maintenance, security, etc, or to accept a lower value for early disposal.

Other risks, such as poor ground conditions or title issues, can be mitigated through provision of a budget to facilitate asset disposal.

In the absence of an approved framework there is a risk that asset disposal and acquisition decisions may be taken without full knowledge of the property and in unfavourable market conditions. This can result in delays, under achieving on asset disposals or acquiring liabilities.

Annex 3

Appendix 2 - Policy on the Land and Property Asset Appraisal Framework and Disposal Procedures

Introduction
The identification of surplus assets will require the cooperation of all Council services. There are clear benefits to the Council to reduce its portfolio of properties and therefore a rigorous examination of assets is required.

This policy sets out a clear methodology for assessing whether a land or property asset is surplus to Council requirements, what alternative purpose the asset might have and how this should be taken forward. The policy includes an Asset Appraisal Framework against which all Council property can be considered and identifies the various methods and procedures for disposal of assets to other parties. This methodology can also be applied where the Council is considering the acquisition of land or property.

Property Costs

The principal objective of this exercise is to reduce the cost to the Council of holding property. Information on property condition, suitability in its existing use and the extent of any outstanding maintenance backlog is held on the Council’s ‘Tribal’ asset management system and is used to inform strategic property decisions.

Vacant and surplus properties continue to cost the Council money through building security and basic maintenance. It is therefore important that once a property is declared surplus its future use is determined in a timely manner to minimise ongoing cost to the Council. Until the formal transfer of a property to another department has been completed or the property has been disposed of by the Council, the former holding service will continue to be responsible for the property and all associated costs.

Identification of Potentially Surplus Assets

Property may be identified as being potentially surplus to Council requirements as a result of the following.

1. The holding service determining it no longer has a requirement for its property due to changes in its operational requirements.

2. As a consequence of a wider strategic review of Council property holdings leading to the rationalisation of these to optimise efficient use of the Council’s heritable assets.

3. Ongoing review of assets by the Corporate Asset Management Group (CAMG)

Assets identified as a result of the above will be considered by the CAMG and an option appraisal and consultation exercise undertaken.

Option Appraisal Framework

The option appraisal will seek to identify the most appropriate future use of land or property. The priority is to generate capital receipts for the Council and therefore the underlying preference will be that the asset will be disposed of on the open market.
however this will be informed by the option appraisal which will consider the following:

- A description of the property, a summary of its history and details of its current or most recent use.
- A review of the land or property title to determine the existence of any restrictions regarding use or disposal.
- Information, in so far as available, on the building running costs and any income derived, if any, from it current use. Consideration of repair costs.
- Whether there is scope to improve the viability of the existing use by reducing running costs and increasing revenue generation.
- Whether the asset may have potential for use by a community organisation. (If interest is expressed the procedures detailed in The Disposal of Assets to Community Organisations Appendix 3 will apply).
- A review of any potential future uses for which planning permission could reasonably be expected and identification of any planning requirements.
- Whether additional value could be realised by the property being combined with another interest to realise ‘marriage value’.
- Whether there would be benefit to be derived from undertaking site and soil investigations or advance infrastructure works to encourage market interest by reducing developer risk.
- Where appropriate, the outcome of an Equality Impact Assessment on potential alternatives.
- Proposals to relocate users of the property to alternative sites. This would include existing staff and those using/hiring the property.
- A summary of financial implications associated with each potential alternative future use of the property. This would ordinarily be expected to include estimates of the anticipated cost of conversion, refurbishment, running costs, rental expectations and revenue generating potential. This information is of importance in assessing the likely viability of the various alternative uses that may be under consideration.

Following completion of the option appraisal an informed decision based on the financial implications from each of the possible future scenarios can be made. This would, at its simplest, be likely to result in one of the following outcomes.

- Retain the existing use in the absence of any financial benefit being achievable from any realistic alternative use.
• Identify the potential for an alternative more viable public authority use

• Transfer by either lease or sale to an appropriate community organisation.

• Lease or sell on the open market to achieve a capital receipt and achieve revenue savings from no longer having responsibility for the upkeep of the property.

Asset Disposal Costs

It is anticipated that most asset disposals will be offered for sale on the open market. In these instances the following costs would be expected

- Legal costs
- Marketing/ advertising costs
- Costs of staff decant from property
- Costs of mothballing and securing property whilst awaiting future use
- Costs of upgrading properties that will take displaced staff or groups with long-standing lets

An asset disposal revenue budget will need to be established for these costs.

In some circumstances, due to the history of the site, it will be in the Council’s interests to undertake site investigations, and possibly remediation works. This would allow the Council to be more specific about the range of possible uses for the property and to be able to take a more informed view on its value.

There may be other instances where in order to create or enhance the development potential of an asset, there is the need to undertake infrastructure or other works. This could include site access, servicing works and environmental accommodation works. Additionally, there may be benefits in acquiring adjacent property, or disposing of a combined site in partnership with another party to maximise its potential.

In all instances an option appraisal will be required to determine whether spend incurred in bringing an asset to the market will be recouped by its sale. There may be instances where the costs involved in bringing an asset to the market outweigh any expected return however there may be other benefits to be gained by this action, for instance, in revenue savings.

In exceptional circumstances where the costs of bringing a site to the market cannot be accommodated within the asset disposal budget, a report will be brought to Cabinet requesting additional funds. Financial assistance to help meet one-off costs designed to enhance a receipt value would form part of a business case, with the Spend to Save Reserve being utilised to help meet these.

Consultation
Informed by the option appraisal, the Corporate Asset Management Group (CAMG) will consult with other Council departments to determine if there is a continuing need for the Council to retain the asset.

If a Council department expresses an interest in retaining the asset, a clear business case including recognition of the ongoing financial responsibilities will require to be developed to justify retention.

If there is no clear business case for the Council to continue to use the asset, the CAMG will consult with Community Planning Partners to find out if they have a requirement for the property.

Where appropriate, the CAMG will advise the Depute Chief Executive of a property that may be of interest to community organisations.

The CAMG will also consider the likely interest if the asset is offered to the open market.

These steps are to demonstrate and evidence that full consideration has been given to the potential to retain the asset in the public sector. This exercise may therefore culminate in an alternative Council or Community Planning Partner use being identified, disposal to a community organisation, the lease of the property where the Council wishes to retain a long term interest, demolition of the property or the property’s outright sale on the open market.

Report on Disposal Options

If the outcome of the option appraisal is that the property is no longer required by the current holding service but that another Council service has identified a requirement and has demonstrated a business case justifying its retention, then there will be a formal transfer of the property out of the holding service to the new service holder. This would be agreed between the relevant departments in consultation with the Director of Finance.

Where the option appraisal has identified that the asset is no longer required by the Council and that some form of disposal is proposed, a report will be presented to Cabinet advising on the outcome of the option appraisal and will recommend the next steps to resolve the property’s future in one of the following ways:

- A Community Planning Partner has demonstrated a requirement for the property and Cabinet approval is sought on the basis of a transfer at market value determined independently by the District Valuer. (The lease of property to a Community Planning Partner would not ordinarily be considered to avoid it reverting to the Council if the organisation subsequently ceased to have a requirement for it or face future funding difficulties).

- The option appraisal has identified that there may be merit in community use of the property and that the availability of the property should be notified to community organisations by the Depute Chief Executive.
• That the property is no longer required by the holding service, any other Council department or any Community Planning Partners and it is not appropriate to offer for community use and as such it should be advertised for disposal on the open market either for sale or where more appropriate by its lease.

Whilst there is an overall preference for sale of surplus assets, there may be occasions where it would be appropriate for the Council to retain long term control over a property’s future and therefore each circumstance will be carefully considered on its merits.

Disposal Procedures

Following the Cabinet’s decision the Director of Environment will implement the approved course of action.

• Where Cabinet approves the property’s disposal on the open market marketing particulars will be prepared with terms and conditions of sale and, where appropriate, planning guidance. An advertisement will be placed in appropriate journals or depending on the nature of the property disposal by public auction seeking offers.

• Where the decision is to dispose of the asset to a Community Planning Partner, the District Valuer will be instructed.

• Where a property has been identified as appropriate for disposal to a community organisation this will be pursued with reference to the general requirements set out in Appendix 3.

Once the terms and conditions of the proposed sale or lease of the property have been agreed in principle these will be reported back to Cabinet to secure authority to conclude the transaction and instruct Legal Services as necessary.

Annex 4

Appendix 3 - Procedure for the Disposal of Land and Property Assets to Community Organisations

Introduction

The Scottish Government and COSLA’s Community Empowerment Action Plan promotes the empowerment of communities through the ownership of assets (land and buildings).
The disposal of assets from local authorities and other public sector organisations is recognised as an important means of supporting communities to own assets. The Scottish Government is examining how to increase the flow of assets into community ownership and aims to do this by encouraging and supporting local authorities and community organisations both to gain a wider appreciation of the benefits and risks associated with asset transfer and by developing an understanding of the processes involved. In this context asset transfer can range from disposal at full market price or for a nominal amount and can also include long leases.

It is recognised that the ownership of assets will not be the answer for all communities but in the right circumstances it can:

- Generate long term sustainable revenue streams for community organisations
- Instil a heightened sense of civic pride and responsibility
- Provide local people with a meaningful stake in the future development of the place in which they live and / or work
- Contribute to more effective and more intensive use of local resources
- Be used as leverage to draw in new finance and expand the level of community activity
- Improve the quality of the relationship between the citizen, the community and the local authority
- Provide new opportunities for local learning and community capacity building

Community ownership of assets can make an important contribution to the range of innovative, bottom up solutions which community organisations can develop to address local needs. These solutions can not only meet the needs of local people but also contribute to the delivery of both East Renfrewshire Council’s Single Outcome Agreement and national government outcomes. The Council does however recognise that the community ownership of land and property assets is a major commitment and it has a duty to ensure that it supports this only where the business case has been proven.

Local Authority Assets: Wider Context

Disposal of the Council’s property is subject to the provisions of s.74 of the Local Government Scotland Act 1973 as amended by s.11 of the Local Government Scotland Act 2003 and the Disposal of Land by Local Authorities (Scotland) Regulations 2010. Any proposed disposal of land by the Council will require to have regard to this legislation. Furthermore, to ensure that public money is used properly and achieves value for money, it must be possible to trace funds from the Council to where they are ultimately spent – to ‘follow the public pound’ across organisational boundaries. In relation to asset transfers, Councils are required to ensure transparency and consistency in the disposal of land and property assets. There should be measureable links to Council service delivery objectives to underpin good asset management.
Community Asset Disposal Procedures

The Asset Disposal Strategy sets the context and circumstances for the disposal of assets by the Council. As part of the procedure for declaring an asset ‘surplus’ to Council requirements, the Council will consider offering the asset to community, voluntary and other third sector agencies for community use. Most of the assets declared surplus by the Council will be disposed of on the open market however there will be a limited number of assets that will have the potential for continuing use by the community. In these instances the Depute Chief Executive will notify community organisations of the opportunity and organisations will be given time to register their interest in the asset.

In deciding whether to offer an asset to the community, the Council must consider the requirements of the capital programme and ongoing service delivery and the potential financial implications of disposal to a community organisation against disposal on the open market.

The terms and conditions of disposal – whether sale or lease, at market or below market value, will be determined by the Council on a site by site basis taking into account prevailing market conditions, funding conditions and the sustainability of projects.

Key Policy Criteria

Before the Council will begin to consider disposal of an asset to a community organisation it requires assurance on the following:

1. There will be measurable benefits to the local community by disposing of the asset

2. The community organisation has the ability to sustain the use of the asset

This is partly to ensure that the community continues to benefit from (former) publicly-owned assets and that community organisations are not burdened by taking on assets that become liabilities.

In relation to the first key policy criteria the policy requires all community proposals to meet the following before consideration is given to disposal off-market.

- The proposed use of an asset reflects the outcomes and objectives in the Single Outcome Agreement and other relevant plans and strategies

- The proposed use of the asset is genuinely for the benefit of the community, and would offer real opportunities for successful and independent community or third sector organisations to become more sustainable in the long term

- The proposed use of the asset would be non-discriminatory, inclusive and open to all.
• The use of the asset is environmentally sustainable. Any future refurbishment plans will be encouraged to make full use of energy conservation techniques and use sustainable building materials.

• That the community organisation would have greater security and independence, and would be better able to meet the needs of the communities it serves.

• That uses would enable communities to have improved access to facilities and/or opportunities that respond to their local needs.

Under the second key policy criteria, the Council needs to assess the risks carefully to ensure that organisations and future community management of the assets are appropriate and sustainable in the long term.

As it is likely that many of the community organisations applying to the Council for the transfer of assets would have limited financial history or facilities management experience it is important that a robust business case is put forward in support of any proposal. This allows the Council to both assess the authenticity and capabilities of the organisation and also allows the organisation to understand the extent of the responsibility they are seeking to take on. The policy therefore sets out the following requirements that need to be demonstrated by organisations for them to be able to be considered suitable to acquire Council assets:

• Financial viability of the transfer – the organisation needs to show at least a five year cash flow and budget forecast that demonstrates that the project is sustainable. Information on all funding sources over this period will be required. Provision will require to be made for the ongoing maintenance and upkeep of the asset, including a contingency fund for emergency repairs. Where the property is to be leased, conditions will be imposed on the required level of maintenance, appropriate insurance cover, the allocation of rates, utility charges, etc. (This is essential to minimise the risk of a property reverting to the Council in a deteriorated condition as a result of the community organisation having insufficient funds for the proper upkeep of the property).

• Experience of, and/or commitment to, partnership working – demonstrate that the asset would be put to a variety of uses to benefit the community.

• Management capacity - the organisation and key individuals have appropriate skills, knowledge and expertise and that there is a sufficient pool of volunteers to sustain the project in the long term.

• Sound governance and clarity of decision making processes – the project has clearly defined structures and that the roles and responsibilities within the organisation are appropriate to deliver the project, whether voluntary and/or paid. The project has an acceptable constitution and sound financial and management controls in place.
- Clarity of aims and objectives and that these meet the Single Outcome Agreement objectives.

- All legislation and regulatory controls are in place – meeting equality standards, child protection, health and safety, licensing requirements, employment and volunteers policies, etc.

- Local community support – the project must demonstrate that it has consulted with and has the support of the local community, that it can demonstrate local need and that the project is not aligned only with a single interest group.

- Monitoring and evaluation processes are in place to demonstrate the successful delivery of objectives and targets over the life of the project.

Process for Assessing Asset Disposal Proposals

The assessment of proposals from community organisations will be undertaken by the Corporate Asset Management Group or a sub group, reporting to the Director of Environment. Any community interest will be reported to Cabinet for approval at the following stages:

- Notification of interest
- Stage one application – in principle decision
- Stage two application – final decision

Assessment Process

The assessment of proposals put forward by community organisations involves a two stage process. Following an initial registration of interest, organisations are required to submit an outline business plan for a Stage 1 assessment at which time the Council will decide ‘in principle’ if the organisation is a proper body to acquire the asset and if the organisation has the potential to develop a project that would deliver sustainable community benefit.

If the application is approved, the organisation would be invited to submit a Stage 2 application when much more detailed information is required.

Stage One

When an asset has been identified as surplus to Council requirements and it is considered appropriate to offer to community organisations, the Depute Chief Executive will undertake appropriate consultation. At this stage, organisations can register their interest in acquiring the asset for community use by writing to the Depute Chief Executive. From the point of advertising the asset, organisations have three months in which to submit a Stage One application.

At Stage One, organisations will be asked to outline their proposal for consideration by the Corporate Asset Management Group. (It is not expected that detailed management or financial information will be provided at this stage only sufficient detail to allow the CAMG to assess if the interest has merit and would be worth supporting). The information required should briefly outline:

- What the project is and why the asset is required.
- How the project fits against the priorities in the Single Outcome Agreement and other relevant plans or strategies.
- The level of local community support for the project. This should include the numbers of actual and potential supporters and the results of any initial consultation undertaken.
- Who and how local people would benefit from the project.
- Previous experience of the group or evidence of supporting organisations.
- Why the project is needed.
- Proposed acquisition terms i.e. sale, lease (including number of years)

The CAMG will assess the application and report to Cabinet within three months. If the application is refused, reasons for refusal will be given. If successful the organisation will be invited to submit a full Stage Two application within 12 months – this timescale will not be extended unless there is good reason. (This is on the basis that the Council will continue to incur costs for the security and maintenance of the property).

Stage Two

At Stage two a full business plan and delivery plan is required. This submission is expected to fully address the following:

Business Plan and Governance Documentation

- Outcomes, aims, objectives and targets the proposal will deliver including how these will be monitored and evaluated over the life of the project.
- The nature of the organisation delivering the project
- The capacity of the organisation detailing decision making structures and management / staff structures indicating whether these are voluntary or paid, levels of experience and/ or what training provision is in place.
- A strategy for succession planning
- Identify all outcomes from the project including links to the Single Outcome Agreement and other relevant plans or strategies.

- A five year financial business plan indicating all expenditure and income – both capital and revenue, including all anticipated grant funding identifying the status of this funding i.e. secured, current application, and any other income expected.

- Relationships with any other partners on the project.

- Confirmation that all statutory permissions or licences have or will be secured.

- Copies of existing (or proposed) policies in relation to child protection, health and safety, equal opportunities, environmental sustainability.

- The expected audience or catchment area for the project.

- Detailed acquisition terms

- Proposals for refurbishment or alteration of the buildings or land.

- A risk analysis of the proposals.

Delivery Plan

- Project programme from inception to operation

- Description of any proposed development.

- Detailed breakdown of programme and costs for any proposed building works or refurbishment proposals and how these will be funded.

The Stage Two application will be assessed by the Corporate Asset Management Group and a recommendation reported to the Cabinet within six months. (If more time is needed to reach a decision the Council will write to the organisation detailing the reasons why).

If the application is approved, final disposal details will be completed within a timescale to be agreed between both parties.

Written submission from Falkirk Council

The Council does not have any arrangements in place to hold local authority assets in a separate land holding.

When disposing of assets, the Council has regard to its best value obligations. In disposing of assets other than in a competitive open market situation, the valuation would normally be carried out on the basis of market value unless there was a prior decision taken by elected members on policy grounds to proceed otherwise.

In relation to the attitude of the Council to disposal of assets, each request received is considered on its own individual merits. In relation to non-operational property assets [ie those properties leased out by the Council on commercial terms] the consequences of potential loss of revenue income from property rentals requires to be balanced against the benefits of the prospective capital receipt accruing. This situation is particularly relevant at a time when the Council is requiring to make significant revenue budget savings.

Whilst the Council does not currently have a specific policy in place in relation to encouraging asset disposals to community groups, as noted above, any such requests are considered on their own individual merits and the Council works constructively with local groups to consider such requests and the capacity for these to be progressed.

Key issues to be considered in this respect would be the need for the group to be formally constituted and sufficiently robust financially as to enable it to participate in property transactions; that the group’s intended activities are consistent with the Council’s Corporate Plan and Strategic Community Plan; and that the facility to be transferred will remain available for potential use and open to all members of a local community.

In addition it will be important for any such organisation to be able to demonstrate availability of any third party funding and/or continuity of membership etc enabling it to operate and maintain the facility for its agreed purpose over a given period of time eg for the duration of any lease.
1. Does your authority have arrangements in place to hold some or all local authority assets in a separate land holding?

All Glasgow City Council assets are in the Council Asset Register.

2. When disposing of, or transferring assets how are those assets valued. To what degree is this purely a financial valuation?

Assets are valued to Market Value as defined by the RICS. However, where there is a particular reason for disposal at less than Market Value, if the particular circumstances merit it, this has to be justified to the Council’s Executive Committee – i.e. valuation foregone as a contribution to funding a particular project etc.

3. What is the attitude of the authority to the disposal of assets? Does your authority have a policy to encourage the disposal of assets to community groups?

Glasgow City Council approved its policy for transfer of control of assets to the community in December 2012. The principal objective of the policy is to support residents who wish to constitute themselves as a group and to manage a local community facility. It is anticipated that the policy will bring improvements in local services, enhance community capacity, improve value for money and create a more sustainable community and third sector. The Council has also committed to supporting residents who want to establish and manage their local community facilities.

4. What is your experience of disposal and what difficulties has the authority encountered?

Experience

Glasgow City Council has experience of this area before and since the above policy was approved. This experience informed our consultation response to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill and evidence provided to the Scottish Parliament’s Local Government and Regeneration Committee.

It is clear that all parties involved need to be explicit about assumptions they are making not least in relation to the timeframes and costs involved for concluding any transfer of an asset. The engagement of professional advisers adds cost and delay and, in some instances, it could be questioned whether advisers are always acting in a timely manner and in the best interests of their client.

Difficulties

The costs associated both direct and indirect and for both the applicant organisations and local authorities in getting to a stage where they are ready to proceed should not be under-estimated. Such costs (some of which may be abortive) will require to be borne by the applicant organisation and the local authority with no re-imbursement to either party.
Local authorities may incur costs in getting assets into a state where they are transferable only for the transfer not to go ahead.

If organisations take over assets but did not wish to TUPE staff or use maintenance services previously provided then this could create difficulties.

If an organisation purchased an asset from Glasgow City Council and then, for whatever reason, the organisation failed or ceased to exist, then GCC may, for wider public interest, be compelled to buy the asset back.

Significant additional support and time may also be required to bring organisations (particularly community based organisations) to the point where they are able to effectively manage buildings.

Positives

The transfer of assets to organisations which are then able to secure funding to develop the asset and breathe new life into it could provide longer term savings for local authorities and more effective services targeted at local communities.

There could be longer term social and economic return on investment benefits as well as short-term capacity building and resilience for community organisations.

The transfer of community assets particularly where the assets will be used or operated to provide enhanced community facilities, has the potential to make a small but significant contribution to local community economies – for example through the provision of employment and the provision of community services.
Written submission from Highland Council

Further to the request of the 16 December from the Convener of the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee, please see below the response from The Highland Council.

1. Does your authority have arrangements in place to hold some or all local authority assets in a separate land holding?

Highland Council does hold records relating to its land and property assets within its fixed asset register and its property database.

2. When disposing of, or transferring assets how are those assets valued. To what degree is this purely a financial valuation?

The Council’s surplus operational land and property assets are valued at open market value based upon Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors (RICS) Valuation - Professional Standards (Red Book) – this is essentially a financial valuation. It is a measure of what the market could be expected to realise in value. Within this context it is not possible to put a ‘value’ on ownership by the community and what that might mean in society or common good terms.

This Council would welcome clear and supplemental advice/guidance to be issued by the Scottish Government in support of Part 5 of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill regarding the valuing of: Economic Development; Regeneration; Public Health; Social Wellbeing, and/or Environmental Wellbeing, in assessing any below open market value ATR.

The following responses, relating to this, were included within the evidence submitted to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee as part of their consideration of the Community Empowerment Bill.

Section 52 (4) (d) – Asset transfer requests

In considering any ATR, the relevant authority must take into account whether the transfer will promote or improve: (as section 55(3)(c))

(i) Economic development

(ii) Regeneration

(iii) Public Health

(iv) Social Wellbeing, or

(v) Environmental wellbeing

It is therefore recommended that this requirement should also be applied at 52 (4) (d) and that any community transfer body should specify and evidence within its ATR how its proposal will promote or improve and deliver the five requirements outlined above. The ATR should evidence how the proposal and each of the above criteria will promote, improve and deliver the benefits to the community, and how these link in with the Aims and Objectives of the Relevant Authority. Ideally such evidence should be SMARTA (ie. Specific; Measurable; Attainable; Results-Orientated; Timebound; Agreed).

Section 55 (3) (c) – Asset transfer requests - decisions

As outlined at (s52(4)(d)), the Community Transfer Body Request should specify in its request how its proposal will promote or improve and deliver:

(i) Economic development

(ii) Regeneration

(iii) Public Health

(iv) Social Wellbeing, or

(v) Environmental wellbeing

The ATR should evidence how the proposal and each of the above criteria will promote, improve and deliver the benefits, and how these link in with the Aims and Objectives of the Relevant Authority. Such evidence should be SMARTA (ie. Specific; Measurable; Attainable; Results-Orientated; Timebound; Agreed). This will assist the relevant authority to appropriately and fairly assess any ATR.

3. What is the attitude of the authority to the disposal of assets? Does your authority have a policy to encourage the disposal of assets to community groups?

The Highland Council area leads in terms of community owned assets, with 22.4% of the Scottish total. The Council has transferred over 20 assets to communities. HIE provides considerable support to community groups pre, during and post asset transfer.

The Council has had a policy in place to deal with Community Asset Transfer Requests at below market value since June 2012. Included within this policy is:

- Communities expressing interest in the transfer (through ownership/lease) of Council owned vacant and surplus land and property are invited to prepare a business case to support their proposals, and to demonstrate that their proposals are viable and sustainable as well as how their proposals support the Council’s Aims and Objectives.

- Communities interested are supported in developing and bringing forward their business case by the outgoing occupying Service (if that Service has an interest in supporting a particular community proposal) or, if not, by the relevant Ward Manager.

The Council has also recently created a post of Community and Democratic Engagement Manager to support and further develop the Council’s policy in this area in light of the Community Empowerment Bill. In addition the Highland Community Planning Partnership Board agreed in November 2014 that it would work in partnership by sharing staff time and resources to support the ambitions of the Bill including the sections relating to asset transfers.

It is important to note that at times, the need to realise a capital receipt can be a conflict to asset transfer but in general this is not the case where there is a real demonstrable opportunity for community groups. However, the Council’s evidence to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee did note that the ATR process as outlined in the Bill in essence removes the discretion of the (local) Authority to seek a Best Value outcome to a property disposal, and thereby potentially foregoing a capital receipt that could be reinvested/recycled through its capital programme to deliver improved public services. It has been requested that clarity is provide on whether other aspects of legislation require to be repealed to reflect this.

4. What is your experience of disposal and what difficulties has the authority encountered?

Experience to date shows that sometimes when a group approaches the Council for a property they may have interest but not capacity to take it on and this can delay the asset transfer process. This highlights the need for communities to be supported better through the process and good practice identifies the need for support pre, during and post transfer. For some communities, leasing may be a route to ownership in the longer term. The new partnership action agreed in the CPP will enable more groups to be supported through the process.

There are recent examples of community groups/bodies taking, not untypically, 12-24 months from their ‘initial expression of interest’, to getting constituted, developing their business case (their ‘request) for a land/property asset transfer proposal. The Bill, whilst ensuring the rights of communities are not restricted, needs to foster this ‘developmental’ process.

Local Example - Village Hall Transfer

The transfer of 10 Council-owned halls to community groups resulted from a Council decision to equalise its support for village halls. This was partly driven by:-

- The belief that communities could become more engaged and empowered through the ownership and management of assets
- A desire to address significant historic anomalies in support
- The need to ensure that the Council had a consistent policy and approach to halls
- A requirement to make budget savings

From the outset the Council recognised that because each community was different, had different capacities and were starting from different development points the timescales to achieve the transfers would also be different for each hall. Accordingly, although most halls had transferred within eighteen months to two years, the final hall did not transfer until some three years after the process started. Flexibility in the process was critical.
Written submission from Midlothian Council

On behalf of Midlothian Council I would respond as follows to the questions raised:

1. Does your authority have arrangements in place to hold some or all local authority assets in a separate land holding?

   Response: No the authority does not currently hold any assets in a separate landholding interest.

2. When disposing of, or transferring assets how are those assets valued. To what degree is this purely a financial valuation?

   Response: Assets are valued at market value for their existing use, or if appropriate alternative use. Actual transfer value may be agreed at less than this – subject to Ministerial approval. The value of the transfer is taken into account in terms of the support the Council is providing to a voluntary group and is linked to the basis that the proposed community use for the building will deliver/provide continuity/provision of services in support of the Community Plan objectives.

3. What is the attitude of the authority to the disposal of assets? Does your authority have a policy to encourage the disposal of assets to community groups?

   Response: Midlothian are prepared to consider disposal of surplus assets where they are not included in any existing planned capital programme. Assets which a vacant, are not subject to a wider programme would be available for transfer.

   Council officers are reviewing a previously presented but not approved Community Asset Transfer Policy proposal; the draft policy encourages non-profit distributing local voluntary groups to seek to transfer of appropriate Council assets.

   The policy is linked to other Council approved policies on co production and community engagement and is aimed at providing positive support to genuine community voluntary groups to deliver a longer term sustainable community service and effective asset transfer. In this regard the draft policy seeks to ensure that organisations seeking asset transfer have a robust and financially sound and sustainable business case, and that the membership of the organisation have the appropriate skills and experience to run both the services to be provided and the maintain and manage the asset being transferred.

   What is your experience of disposal and what difficulties has the authority encountered?

   Midlothian have transferred site to community organisations and have also transferred developer contribution funds to further support organisations develop new facilities on those sites. In addition considerable officer time has been spent on supporting organisations develop.

   On occasions the Council has come into difficulties in dealing with Communities, particularly where there are 2 or 3 different ‘community groups’ seeking to bid for the same asset. This gives rise to conflict with in the community, difficulties for the Council in dealing with individual bodies. These issues are difficult to manage and it is hoped that the Community Asset Transfer Policy currently being drafted will assist in this process. However the evaluation of bids, which can be a combination of financial and non-financial issues, is difficult to quantify to enable effective fair and open comparison between groups.
Response from Moray Council

- Does your authority have arrangements in place to hold some or all local authority assets in a separate land holding?

Yes, once assets are declared surplus they are managed corporately and all capital receipts are credited to a single council account.

- When disposing of, or transferring assets how are those assets valued. To what degree is this purely a financial valuation?

Properties that are disposed of or transferred are mostly valued by the Council’s Estates Surveyors. In some cases external agents are employed – usually the District Valuer. Valuations are purely financially based. However the Council does dispose of properties at less than best consideration in accordance with the Disposal of Land by Local Authorities (Scotland) Regulations 2010 where the disposal would contribute to the purposes specified in the Regulations. Such discounted disposals are mainly Community Asset Transfers.

- What is the attitude of the authority to the disposal of assets? Does your authority have a policy to encourage the disposal of assets to community groups?

The disposal of property assets surplus to requirements minimises ongoing running costs, generates capital receipts and supports the Council’s main priority of economic development, as well as other community benefits. The Council has a specific Community Asset Transfer Policy which has been publicised and the Council has run awareness briefings for community groups. As part of the council’s response to a public consultation exercise on the budget in 2010 the council agreed to establish and promote arrangements for Community Asset Transfer. This was first formalised as a strategy by the council’s Policy and Resources Committee on 12 April 2011. Since that time a working group of officers has been established to support community groups with CAT applications and a policy has been developed. The latest version of the policy was approved by the Policy and Resources Committee on 7 October 2014 and the web links to the report and policy document are provided below.

http://www.moray.gov.uk/minutes/data/PR20141007/Item%204%20Appendix-with%20track%20changes-PR.pdf

- What is your experience of disposal and what difficulties has the authority encountered?

Since 2008 the main difficulty in relation to property disposals has been the depressed local property market. Although the local property market is now showing signs of improvement developers are still encountering difficulties securing development finance.

Regarding CATs there have been numerous challenges and the level of support required by community groups can be quite extensive. A continuing issue is groups forming with a focus on simply wanting to take control of buildings as opposed to identifying the local services that would benefit from the use of particular buildings.
Written submission from North Ayrshire Council

Disposal of Local Authority Assets

Please find below our responses to the questions you have raised. North Ayrshire Council would be pleased to continue to engage in this discussion where appropriate.

1. Does your authority have arrangements in place to hold some or all local authority assets in a separate land holding?

The Council holds property in three different accounts: General Fund Property, HRA and Common Good Accounts. Each Council asset will be held in one of these three accounts depending on the asset's designation and in accordance with operational procedures and legislation established by Scottish/UK Government.

2. When disposing of, or transferring assets how are those assets valued. To what degree is this purely a financial valuation?

The valuation of assets to be disposed of or transferred will be valued by qualified internal valuers and/or independent valuation, usually undertaken by the District Valuer. This process seeks to determine what the 'best value' could be in any competitive situation as a result of marketing the property and it is financially driven. The extent to which any disposal of an asset is financially driven, following the valuation of that asset, will be on a case by case basis; the income received from the disposal of a 'high value' asset may be earmarked to make a contribution towards offsetting any capital project where a replacement asset is being developed to improve service delivery and thereby provide 'best value'. Where a 'lower value' asset is being disposed of 'best value' may be obtained through an asset transfer which potentially secures/retains jobs in the local area, provides additionality in service provision and/or creates further business development opportunities in the local area.

The decision will take into account local circumstances, identified need and the Council’s priorities.

The Council has a Community Asset Transfer Policy which seeks to undertake community asset transfer where it will bring benefits to communities and contribute towards achieving council aims and objectives.

3. What is the attitude of the authority to the disposal of assets? Does your authority have a policy to encourage the disposal of assets to community groups?

The Council has had an active disposals programme over the past 2 years which has been relatively successful bearing in mind the current market conditions set against the global economic downturn. Local economic conditions have dictated that certain types of assets are more favourably received when marketed leading to alternative disposal strategies being considered to achieve successful disposals.
In addition the council has concluded a number of community asset transfers with further potential community transfers in various stages of discussion with community groups/organisations.

The Council takes a proactive role in working with local organisations to encourage community asset transfer. North Ayrshire Council is committed to community empowerment and builds partnerships and capacity within its communities to ensure that asset transfer is a constructive feature of community development.

The following information is also available on the Council’s website http://www.north-ayrshire.gov.uk/resident/your-community/community-asset-transfer.aspx and the documents references below are included in the response:

North Ayrshire Council

What is community asset transfer?

Community asset transfer involves the transfer of responsibility for an asset from the Council to any suitably qualified community, voluntary or social enterprise group.

What community Assets are suitable for transfer?

Suitable assets may include:

- public halls
- town halls
- community centres
- bowling greens
- public conveniences
- parks
- play areas
- small museums

There are some assets that must remain under Council ownership in order to support the delivery of essential services or to support economic activity in an area. Other assets may have restrictive covenants attached which would restrict their use to a specifically defined purpose.

What is the Council's policy on community asset transfer?

North Ayrshire Council is committed to community asset transfer where that will bring benefits to communities and contribute towards achieving the Council’s aims and objectives.
The Council recognises that community asset transfer can be a valuable part of supporting and sustaining local communities in North Ayrshire and it wishes to ensure Council assets can be owned and managed by local people, where appropriate.

Read the [Community Asset Transfer policy](PDF, 359kb) for further information.

How to apply for an asset

We have prepared a [Community Asset Transfer guidance pack](Word, 353kb) to assist community associations interested in taking responsibility of a Council asset. The pack contains step by step guidance, an application form and useful additional material.

The application process consists of five stages:

Stage 1
Initial application (3 months)

Stage 2
Detailed application (3-5 months)

Stage 3
Cabinet decision (1 month)

Stage 4
Implementation (3 months)

Stage 5
Handover of the asset

Who to contact?

If you would like further information and/or guidance please contact the Community Asset Transfer Team.

4. What is your experience of disposal and what difficulties has the authority encountered?

A range of services within the Council – including Legal, Estates, Finance and Connected Communities - all have different professional experience on Community Asset transfer. We work together through a standing working group to assess and support applications. Each case is assessed on a "localised" basis i.e. how the property or land would benefit that particular community. We are considering joint training sessions across services to reinforce the principles of Community Development and Economic Development and to understand the real value of assets. to communities beyond the economic asset value, in order that decisions can be taken in light of this.

The process is also, by necessity, fairly lengthy and complicated, both to protect community groups’ future sustainability and to protect the Council’s financial responsibilities. This can be frustrating for applicants.

The nurture and support required by many organisations also requires to be resourced; and this is a major challenge. The project management of the components of the process often falls to the Council; and the support to, or funding of, various stages in the process often also has to be addressed or funded by the local authority.

In relation to community asset transfer the challenge for the authority is managing the expectations of the community group in relation to the transfer ‘value’ of the particular asset and to ensure that in working with the community group a suitable business case is prepared to outline how the asset will be paid for, operated and managed to ensure that there is no financial liability falling to the Council in the future to step in and undertake maintenance of the transferred asset.

In all of the above, appropriate resourcing to support and build the capacity of communities to successfully achieve and sustain asset transfers is crucial.
Written submission from North Lanarkshire Council

I can confirm the following in relation to each of the information requested as follows

I can confirm that the vast majority of the council’s assets are held directly in the Council’s ownership. These assets will be held in the General Account or in the Housing Revenue Account. The council has transferred a number of properties to some of its Arms Length Organisations. Eg the bulk of commercial property portfolio was transferred to North Lanarkshire Properties LLP.

In addition long term leases have been granted to Culture NL Trust and North Lanarkshire Leisure Trust to facilitate effective operation of the various sports centres and community centres etc.

If you require any detailed information relating to this point then please let me know.

2. When disposing of, or transferring assets how are those assets valued. To what degree is this purely a financial valuation?

When a property is being sold the properties are valued by the Council’s property Valuers, the valuation is undertaken in accordance with the current edition of the RICS Valuation – Professional Standards. Valuations are carried out by an RICS Registered Valuer who has the appropriate knowledge, skills and understanding to undertake the valuation competently.

The main basis of valuation adopted is Market Value which is “the estimated amount for which an asset or liability should exchange on the valuation date between a willing buyer and a willing seller in an arm’s-length transaction after proper marketing wherein the parties had each acted knowledgably, prudently and without compulsion”.

Disposals are undertaken in accordance with the Council’s policy for Land and Property Sales. This reflects the statutory obligations in accordance with the terms of Section 74 of the Local Government Scotland Act 1973, and updated by the Scottish Government via the Disposal of Land by Local Authorities (Scotland ) Regulations 2010.

3. What is the attitude of the authority to the disposal of assets? Does your authority have a policy to encourage the disposal of assets to community groups?

In February 2014 council approved a draft Community Asset Transfer (CAT) policy for consultation and agreed to select three CAT pilot projects which would inform the final draft Policy. Three projects were confirmed via a selection process for participation in the pilot in August 2014.
The vision for this new CAT policy is about developing plans and processes to further deliver community regeneration and unlock potential for local projects and services via the council’s assets. The policy requires to be delivered in accordance with the current legislation framework including Local Government (Scotland) Act 2003 (LGSA) and the subsequent Disposal of Land by Local Authorities (Scotland) Regulations 2010.

To inform and consult communities on the policy development, and call for pilot projects; information about the policy was published on the council website with a link to an on-line survey. An email was sent out to members of the Citizen’s Panel including information about the policy and a link to an on-line survey. A total of 90 on-line survey forms were completed (80 individuals and 10 third sector organisations).

The Council recognises that community asset transfer can contribute towards stronger, cohesive and sustainable communities as set out in our Economic Regeneration Strategy and Community Plan / Single Outcome Agreement.

4. What is your experience of disposal and what difficulties has the authority encountered?

As a large local authority the Council has sold a significant amount of surplus land and property since 1996. However only a few sales have involved community groups. The Council’s experience is that the groups find it very challenging to find a path through funding and having expertise in project delivery. In some cases they are often very knowledgeable in the service they deliver, but find it challenging to secure the skills, knowledge and expertise to move the project forward.
Written submission from Orkney Islands Council

1. Does your authority have arrangements in place to hold some or all local authority assets in a separate land holding?

No, this is not done by Orkney Islands Council.

2. When disposing of, or transferring assets how are those assets valued. To what degree is this purely a financial valuation?

Assets are valued on the Market Value. If there is a decision to dispose of an asset under the Market Value this is taken by the Council rather than officers.

3. What is the attitude of the authority to the disposal of assets? Does your authority have a policy to encourage the disposal of assets to community groups?

At the moment we have no policy to encourage the disposal of assets to community groups. In Orkney, the Council has a lengthy history of agreeing leases for properties below market value for registered charities including community groups.

4. What is your experience of disposal and what difficulties has the authority encountered?

The Council has no experience of actual disposal as indicated in the preceding response.
Written submission from Renfrewshire Council

Disposal of Local Authority Assets

I refer to your letter of 16 December 2014, addressed to the Chief Executive, seeking additional information as part of the evidence call on Part 4 of the draft Community Empowerment Bill, which makes changes to the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003.

Please find detailed below my answer to the questions raised:-

1. Does your authority have arrangements in place to hold some or all local authority assets in a separate land holding?

   • Renfrewshire Council currently has a Single Asset Register for all of its property holdings. While stating this it is aware of which assets are held on the three main accounts, General Services, Housing Revenue and its Common Good Accounts for Paisley, Renfrew & Johnstone.

2. When disposing of, or transferring assets how are those assets valued?

   • When disposing of an asset this is primarily undertaken by advertising the surplus assets availability on the open market and seeking bids, via the Council's website, via web hosting sites, Co-star and Nova Loca, advertisement via the local and national press and the installation of advertising boards upon the property to be sold. The size of the property to be sold will determine whether any press advertisement is required. In addition, officers seek to contact parties/companies and individuals, who have expressed a particular interest on being advised of a properties availability in the past, by analysing the Council's own property enquiry database. The asking price is not always quoted, however when quoted, it is determined by the Council's in house Asset & Estates team, who comply with the legislative requirements to seek the best price possible. In terms of the Disposal Strategy, any adjoining owner, can seek to acquire the property lying immediately adjacent to their property interest, should it be surplus to the Council's operational requirements and this will be valued by the Council's in house valuation surveyors, who are members of the Royal Institute of Chartered Surveyors (RICS) and are Registered Valuers.

   • When transferring a property between holding accounts, the valuation is undertaken by the in house valuation surveyors who as stated are members of the Royal Institute of Chartered Surveyors and Registered Valuers. They would determine the appropriate market value to be met from one holding account to the other.

   • I can advise that a recent change to our Disposal Strategy will require officers within the Asset & Estates team to contact the local area committees when a property is declared surplus within their particular area, in order that the Community is fully aware of the properties availability, prior to any public advertisement taking place.
2(a) To what degree is this purely a financial valuation?

- In answer to the second part of the question is this a financial valuation? Yes. However, when seeking to dispose of an asset below market value to a Community Group, officers will comply with the Disposal of Land By Local Authorities (Scotland) Regulations 2010, and take account of any of the purposes set out in paragraph 4(2) of the legislation;

  (a) economic development or regeneration;
  (b) health;
  (c) social well-being; or
  (d) environmental well being.

3. What is the attitude of the authority to the disposal of assets?

Renfrewshire Council is like any other local authority, keen to dispose of any assets which are surplus to operational requirements to ensure that it can provide a leaner fitter Council for the community and at the same time seek to generate capital receipts to assist the Council to meet its aims. While stating this, since the property crash of 2007/08, Renfrewshire Council has adopted a cautious approach to the marketing of surplus property as it awaits the market recovery.

3.(a) Does your authority have a policy to encourage the disposal of assets to community groups?

- Renfrewshire Council has an approved Community Asset Transfer Policy which was prepared with the support of the Development Trust Association Scotland (DTAS) and Engage Renfrewshire. This policy considers all forms of transfer, lease, long and short term and or outright disposal. At this time any group which has come forward has sought to take a lease. In addition the Council originally set aside a budget of £1.5m to promote community ownership and participation in respect of its community halls and facilities. This budget has recently been boosted by a further £1.5m. This fund is to be used as match funding to assist Community groups to take a greater control in the management/ownership of its community halls and facilities. Officers will be looking to assist Community groups in this process.

4. What is your experience of disposal and what difficulties has the authority encountered?

- Primarily when speaking of disposal to community groups this can be broken down into 3 potential problem areas:

  (a) Capacity
  (b) Funding
Taking each section in isolation

(a) Capacity :- Often find that the Community Group coming forward do not have all of the necessary skill sets to fully appreciate the actual requirements to prepare an outline and formal business submission to the Council to enable the Council to evaluate their proposal. In addition, the group while having positive members, keen to progress a particular project, may not have looked at its own constitution or articles of association to confirm it has the power to take on a lease or ownership of a property. They do not fully appreciate the risks, statutory, public liability etc in running a facility, and often still require or anticipate the Council will provide continuing support.

(b) Funding: - While Renfrewshire Council has set aside £3m of match funding to assist the process, quite often groups do not know where exactly they can get funding from and the steps needed to secure the funding. Often the funding is a one of capital injection at the start of a project, but groups find in later years that they do not have sufficient funding and are scrambling along looking for additional support often from the Council.

(c) Sustainability :- As per the comments on funding, the groups can find they have overestimated their likely income stream or underestimated their running costs and find they have a funding shortfall. Furthermore, the excitement of achieving a project could result in a drop in volunteers/members, people feeling they have done their bit and the facility is left with one or two stalwarts who are the bedrock of the facility. However, what has been noted within Renfrewshire is the age profile of those at the forefront of Community groups and do not see many of the younger generation coming forward to take a project on or to succeed in later years.

As a Council to resolve the 3 potential problem areas we have encouraged groups to speak with officers at an early date and with Engage Renfrewshire, a Community support agency funded by the Council. In part this is to hopefully inform the Community groups of the Council's Asset Transfer Policy, assist the groups to bring forward their outline and detailed business plans, provide guidance on funding streams and to manage expectations. The Council has also undertaken, at a significant cost to the Council, site and soil tests for one group in order that the Council can determine whether the land in question was suitable for development and has shared this information with the community group in order that it can take account of the technical information when bringing forward their proposal.
Written submission from Scottish Borders Council

I refer to your letter of the 16 December 2014 requesting information relating to the above. Below is the response of Scottish Borders Council to the bullet points in your letter. For ease of understanding I have included the wording of your bullet points:-

- Does your authority have arrangements in place to hold some or all local authority assets in a separate land holding?

  Answer - No – to date there has been no reason for Scottish Borders Council to do so.

  The Council however has entered into an NHT partnership with SFT to develop mid-market housing for rent, to help address the housing crisis. This housing is held in the NHT partnership.

  Common Good fund property is held in the accounts of the relevant common good fund and managed separately.

- When disposing of, or transferring assets how are those assets valued. To what degree is this purely a financial valuation?

  Answer - For sales of property to raise capital receipts to help support the Council’s capital programme, properties are sold at market value. In these instances market value is the basis of valuation. These are an important source of finance for the Council and the imperative is to raise money to help fund public works and infrastructure such as schools, care facilities, affordable housing, roads, flood protection schemes and bridges.

  For lets of the commercial estate the lettings are all at market value on the basis that all tenants are treated as commercial tenants. EU State Aids legislation prevents concessionary rents being given to commercial tenants, because to do so would be considered as illegal state aid. The commercial estate also generates around £1.3M per annum in income which the Council uses for public services.

  For the transfer of properties for community asset transfer purposes, the usual basis is at a nominal sum of £1 or £1 per annum if demanded. Properties subject to community asset transfers usually don’t have any commercial or residential market value and are suitable primarily for community use, hence the willingness of the Council to accept a nominal sum. The Council prefers to lease because it can retain the asset value in its accounts, which helps with its borrowing capacity.

  For outright community asset transfers of property with potential development value, a claw back clause is usually agreed enabling the Council to recover the development value in the event that the community organisation ceases to operate and sells the property on at market value. With such clauses, there is usually a roll over provision whereby if the community group wishes to continue operating and sell the property for re-investment into a replacement premises, the claw back would attach to their replacement premises instead of them having to pay the development value. In this way, any development value is retained by the public for re-investment into public works.
For sales and lettings of properties held in the Common Good funds, these are managed separately through the relevant Common Good Fund Sub-Committee. For their commercial, residential and agricultural holdings, sales and rentals are usually at market value. Sales are very rare but open market lets are routine because historically one of the main roles of this property is to raise revenue to help fund community activity in the relevant towns.

Common Good facilities used for community purposes (such as parks) are sometimes subject to deeds of dedication in favour of community groups to enable them to undertake works and associated community activities that benefit the public, such as the creation of play parks and sports pitches. In these instances no consideration is sought, except sometimes for consideration in kind such as in the form of pitch maintenance.

For common good properties used by the Council to deliver public services, there is an agreed protocol which is attached. The protocol also sets out the principles to be followed for disposals, transfers, rental income and capital expenditure on common good properties.

- What is the attitude of the authority to the disposal of assets? Does your authority have a policy to encourage the disposal of assets to community groups?

Answer - Scottish Borders Council has a proactive property disposals policy and disposals fall into the following categories:-

a) Market sales – These comprise properties with commercial and/or residential use or development value. The proceeds are an important source of funding for the Council’s capital programme which in turn funds public works as explained above.

   For larger development sites the opportunity is taken (within commercial parameters) to negotiate for the development of affordable housing. Some of this housing is bought by the Council for its NHT housing partnership.

   The Council (within commercial parameters) also seeks to require developers to incorporate key commercial uses important for the economic development of the respective town within their schemes, such as for example the development of a hotel.

b) Commercial leases – The Council has an estate of around 330 commercial properties let to commercial tenants as part of its economic development strategy. The occupancy rate runs at around 90% which is very high and indicates that Scottish Borders Council is providing key business infrastructure. The commercial estate comprises units at the affordable end of the market which are ideal for small businesses, which in turn form the life-blood of the Borders economy and a substantial level of local employment. It is very important for Scottish Borders Council to be able to continue with these commercial lets unhindered because it is the main provider of small commercial premises in the Borders. If these lets were to be frustrated through having to give community groups first option to lease in preference to businesses, then substantial damage could be done to the fragile Borders economy.

c) Community Asset Transfers – The Council has a portfolio of properties used primarily for community purposes or which don’t have a readily realisable development value. In many cases these properties are already being used by the community. These include town halls, public halls, community centres, sports facilities (most sports activity is not commercially sustainable in the Borders), parks, open spaces and allotments.

The Council is very willing to enter into discussions with community groups for them to take on the running and management of the premises. In this respect the Council has a community asset transfer policy which it developed in partnership with the Development Trusts Association Scotland, a copy of which is attached.

In negotiating such transfers the Council is usually willing to agree to a rental of £1 per annum if demanded or a sale price of £1 if asked for. As explained before, the Council prefers to lease because this enables the Council to retain the asset value, which in turn helps its borrowing capacity. However if the occasion were to arise that a key non-Council funder of the community group were to insist upon an outright transfer, the Council would give this sympathetic consideration.

Generally, the vast majority of interest from community groups has been in this portfolio of property with the Council having transferred village halls, an arts centre, sports pitches, a community centre, a former gym and land for allotments, with a number of transfers currently in discussion.

For Common Good properties falling within this portfolio, the premises are usually inalienable – that is, it is unlawful to sell or lease them.

The “work around” is to grant deeds of dedication allowing community groups to proceed with developments that benefit the public, with the group having the benefit of block bookings of the facility at no charge. In some cases the group also assume liability for the maintenance of the facility. This has allowed the development of play parks and fully drained sports pitches.

- What is your experience of disposal and what difficulties has the authority encountered.

Answer – Disposals for community asset transfers form one of the Council’s key pillars of its property disposals strategy. More importantly they are considered to be a key part of developing community resilience and Borders localities.

However a balance has to be struck between those properties that lend themselves well for community asset transfers and those that would be better sold off at market value, with the proceeds re-invested into public works such as schools, care facilities, affordable housing, roads, bridges and flood protection works. Furthermore, consideration needs to be had for commercial properties let to commercial tenants who are very important to the local economy for the creation of employment and prosperity. This factor is all the more important given the fragile nature of the Borders economy.

Generally the community asset transfers that have taken place have all worked out well mainly because considerable effort was put in by all parties to ensure that each transfer has good long-term prospects of success.

Difficulties faced by the Council in negotiating transfers include:-

- Groups focusing on the property solution prematurely, making them ineligible for most sources of non-Council funding.
- Groups not heeding Council advice relating to 1, creating delays for their project.
- Ensuring groups undertake appropriate public consultation for their project.
- Groups developing viable business cases that create a credible source of income to cover premises running costs.
- Groups not having the skills and/or capacity to undertake their project both in the short-term and into the longer term.
- A shortage of specialist Council staff resources to assist community groups to develop their projects.
- All parties under-estimating the time required to put together a successful project and obtain all the necessary funder, Council and statutory approvals.
- For some projects, under-estimating the opposition to a proposed transfer, particularly at the planning permission stage.

However any difficulty is more than outweighed with the creation of a successful community asset transfer.

ANNEX 1

Community Asset Transfer

Guidance for Community Organisations 2011

Produced in partnership with the Development Trusts Association (Scotland)

INTRODUCTION

1. Community Asset Transfer is a process which results in communities taking on and managing their own assets – usually buildings and land. The process is built on a partnership between the Council and local communities where the Council agrees to the transfer of these assets from their management into local community management. That transfer can be made either through a leasing arrangement or outright with ownership going over to the community organisation. Community organisations come in different forms such as Trusts, Charities, Not For Profit organisations and social enterprises.

2. The Scottish Government has made a specific commitment to community ownership of assets. It says:

‘Communities owning their own land and buildings can have a huge impact on their empowerment. Asset ownership can have key impacts. It can provide revenue for community organisations, making them more sustainable in the long term. It can give local people a renewed sense of pride in their communities, a real sense of a stake in the future of the places they live and work. For some community organisations, working towards asset ownership can be a fantastic catalyst for the group growing and maturing.'

3. Scottish Borders Council is similarly committed to community management of assets. We have produced this guidance to start a Community Asset Transfer programme. We are committed to Community Asset Transfer because we believe that this approach will help us achieve key outcomes – particularly our commitment to develop strong, resilient and supportive communities and improve the provision and accountability of services within communities. We believe that Community Asset Transfer can safeguard the network of buildings and facilities in local communities at a time when there is severe pressure on Council budgets and little opportunity to invest in growing services.

4. This guidance has been produced with the help of the Development Trusts Association Scotland which has been funded by the Scottish Government to promote a programme of Community Asset Transfer across Scotland.

5. The guidance is for community organisations that are investigating leasing or taking ownership of Council assets. We have started our Community Asset Transfer programme with a set of pilot projects involving Public Halls and Community Centres, where we know there is local interest in taking them on and running them under community management. But this guidance is a good start point for community organisations that might be interested in any of our assets, not just buildings and but also land.

THE PROCESS

Stage 1 (no less than three months)

1. We recommend that you make contact with us at the earliest stage, at the point where you have just begun to explore the possibility of taking a Council asset into community management. You can contact the Council’s Asset Transfer Team:

   - by email assettransfer@scotborders.gov.uk
   - by phone 01835 8*****
   - via our website www.scotborders.gov.uk/assettransfer

   We will assign someone from our Asset Transfer Team to work with you.

2. Once we have confirmed that the building you have targeted is one of our assets and within the asset transfer programme, we will provide you with the background information you need to determine whether the building is suitable for your needs:

   - condition data and assessments
   - building plans and layout
   - title information and appraisal
   - usage data (raw and analysed)
• running costs including support costs and lifecycle costs

3. We can also provide you with demographic, social, economic and planning data to help you build up a community profile and demonstrate local community need for your proposal.

4. At the end of this exploratory stage we will support you to produce a business case for your proposal. In the business case we expect you to present the reason for transfer, based on your assessment of community needs. An options appraisal should be included, which demonstrates why transfer of the targeted building is the best of the available options; how it will achieve your organisation’s aims and objectives. The business case should also include an initial assessment of financial viability. We think it is particularly important at this stage, especially if you want to bid for funding to support your project, that you demonstrate community need and demand in the business case.

5. In exceptional circumstances, other community organisations may express an interest in the building you have targeted. Where there is conflicting demand, we will make our decision about which project to support based on how well the business case demonstrates the viability of the project and the community benefits it will deliver.

Stage 2 no less than six months

1. When we reach agreement that the business case is made, we will proceed with you to produce a full business plan for the transfer.

2. The business plan will include an operational plan, which demonstrates how you will manage the building and deliver your project, and a financial plan which shows what your running costs will be and how you will meet them, along with any investment proposals you have for the building.

3. We will draft a management agreement or lease for you, or, if we have agreed that outright transfer is a better option, we will prepare the documentation for transfer. Where our caretaking staff become part of the transfer will manage this process with you.

4. Where we believe that the transfer is particularly complex or contentious we may initiate a public consultation to ensure that there is a public consensus for the preferred way ahead.

5. When we have agreed a business plan and management agreement or lease or outright transfer with you and all documentation is in place, we will seek approval for the transfer. We will either go direct to the Council’s Executive for approval, or, if the building is held as Common Good or in Trust, we will first approach the local Common Good Working Group or trust representatives for their support and then go to the Council (acting as trustees) for approval.

6. With Executive or Council (acting as trustees) approval, we will complete the transfer of the building to you.
ANNEX 2

SCOTTISH BORDERS COUNCIL ITEM 9

29 SEPTEMBER 2011

REPORT BY DIRECTOR OF RESOURCES

MANAGEMENT OF COUNCIL OCCUPIED COMMON GOOD ASSETS

1 PURPOSE OF REPORT

1.1 To establish principles which should apply in respect of Council occupation of common good heritable (land and buildings) assets and associated financial issues arising from the ongoing review of these assets.

2 BACKGROUND AND HISTORY

2.1 The history and legal position relating to Common Good is set out in Appendix 1 to this report.

3 COMMON GOOD HERITABLE ASSETS

3.1 In view of the current review of Common Good heritable assets, it is necessary to establish a number of principles which should apply in respect of their management and use by the Council, to reflect current legal requirements and accounting principles.

3.2 The Council is required, in terms of these accounting principles, to maintain a list of all Common Good assets and it is the heritable list which is currently being reviewed through examination of all the assets of each of the former Burghs in the Borders, with the work scheduled to complete in the spring of 2012.

3.3 Common Good heritable assets can be regarded, for operational purposes, as falling into any of the following four categories:-

1. ‘Dignity of the Burgh’ property, which is a property necessary for the administration of the burgh or for the convenience of its inhabitants.

2. Properties used for local authority services.

3. Property used to generate income directly for the relevant Common Good fund.

4. Other Common Good property.
‘DIGNITY OF THE BURGH’ ASSETS

4.1 These break down into three categories:

4.1.1. Common Good Assets Irrevocably Dedicated to Specific Local Authority Services – Examples may include public parks, public halls and administrative offices.

4.1.2. Historical Assets Held On The Common Good Account – These comprise historical buildings held on the common good account that the Council deliver services from, in which the history of the premises is a key part of that service. Examples may include houses, former court rooms and jails from which museum services are delivered in which the buildings themselves have a significant relevance to the service.

4.1.3. Ceremonial Assets Held On The Common Good Account – These comprise common good heritable assets that are primarily used for ceremonial occasions and which also form part of the cultural fabric of the town. Examples include town clocks, war memorials, council chambers used for formal ceremonial occasions, provost’s offices and marriage rooms.

4.2 The basis of the Council’s use of ‘dignity of the Burgh’ assets for the delivery of local authority services is detailed in Appendix 2.

5 COMMON GOOD PROPERTIES USED FOR LOCAL AUTHORITY SERVICES

5.1 These comprise properties held in a common good fund that are not necessary to sustain the ‘dignity of the Burgh’ but which are occupied by the Council to deliver local authority services.

5.2 The basis of the Council’s use of such properties for the delivery of local authority services is detailed in Appendix 2.

6 COMMON GOOD PROPERTIES USED TO GENERATE INCOME

6.1 These comprise properties held on the common good which are not required to sustain the ‘dignity of the Burgh’, and which are available to lease to third parties.

6.2 The management arrangements for such property are outwith the scope of this report.

7 OTHER COMMON GOOD PROPERTY

7.1 This comprises residual vacant pockets of land held on the common good account that do not require to be separately identified as assets for accounting purposes.
7.2 The management arrangements for such properties are outwith the scope of this report.

8 DISPOSALS, TRANSFERS, RENTAL INCOME, AND CAPITAL EXPENDITURE

8.1 While the Council has a wide discretion in its administration of the common good assets, there is one area in which the law is more restrictive than that applying to other Council-owned properties (in that some common good assets may not be freely sold or leased) – as explained in Appendix 1 paragraphs 2.5 and 2.6.

8.2 The principles to be adopted for transfers, disposals rental income and capital expenditure for common good properties, including the treatment of adjustments between general fund and common good funds in relation to properties discovered to be common good assets which had not been previously known as such, are set out in Appendix 3.

9 INSURANCE ARRANGEMENTS

9.1 All heritable property in the Council’s portfolio, including all common good properties, is insured under the Council’s block insurance policy. The costs of insuring common good properties are recharged pro-rata to the relevant common good funds.

10 FINANCIAL IMPLICATIONS

10.1 This report sets out the principles for the accounting treatment of common good assets and the Council’s use of them. However, it is not possible to determine the full financial implications until the ongoing review of common good heritable properties is complete. Once complete a full analysis of the financial implications will be undertaken and the outcome together with recommendations on the way forward financially will be brought forward in a future report to Council.

10.2 The revenue costs of each common good property used by the Council for service/administration delivery will have to be recorded individually to ensure that income and expenditure is correctly accounted for between the respective common good funds and the general fund.

10.3 All adjustments made between the general fund and common good funds would be reflected in their respective balance sheets.

11 CONSULTATION

11.1 Finance, the Heads of Audit & Risk, Legal & Democratic Services and Property & Facilities Management, and the Clerk to the Council were consulted and their comments are incorporated into the report.

11.2 External Audit was consulted and their comments are incorporated into this report.
12  EQUALITY

12.1 It is anticipated there will be no adverse impact due to race, disability, gender, age, sexual orientation or religion/belief arising from the proposals contained in this report.

13  ENVIRONMENT

13.1 There are no environmental issues directly associated with this report.

14  RISK COMMENTARY

14.1 There is a financial and legal risk to the general fund and the common good fund if common good property and its use by the Council for delivering local authority services is not correctly accounted for. The adoption of the principles above will assist in mitigating that risk.

15  SUMMARY

15.1 This report establishes principles which will apply in respect of Council occupation of common good heritable (land and buildings) assets and their use by the Council to establish principles which should apply in respect of Council occupation of common good heritable (land and buildings) assets and associated issues arising from the ongoing review of these assets.

16  RECOMMENDATIONS

16.1 It is recommended that Council:-

(a) Adopts the principles for the future management of the common good heritable assets and the Council’s use of them as detailed in Sections 4 to 7 (inclusive) and Appendix 2.

(b) Adopts the principles for the treatment of adjustments between general fund and common good funds in relation to properties discovered to be common good assets which had not previously been known to be such together with the treatment of future capital expenditure set out in Appendix 3.

(c) Agrees that the Director of Resources provides a further report to Council once the review of common good premises has been completed, detailing the financial implications and the recommended way forward in light of them.

APPENDIX 1

COMMON GOOD PROPERTIES – BACKGROUND, HISTORY AND LEGAL POSITION OF THE COUNCIL AND COUNCILLORS

1 BACKGROUND AND HISTORY

1.1 The history of Common Good can be traced back to the 12th Century when in an effort to develop Scotland economically, the Crown or local feudal barons granted lands to Burghs, to enable the Burghs to generate income and capital. Monies raised through renting or selling the land off in small parcels were added to tolls and market fees etc recovered by the Burghs, and used primarily for the payment of taxes. Any surpluses were customarily redeployed for the general benefit of the burghs, hence the expression for the “common good” of their inhabitants.

1.2 Regulation and reform of municipal authorities and the way in which they operated began in earnest in the early to mid 19th century and with statutory discretions and obligations created in tandem, came the right to levy rates. This meant that, for the first time, money came from a non traditional route, in the form of taxes payable by inhabitants of the burghs simply by virtue of their residence as opposed to income and capital derived from the burgh’s land holdings alone. This new stream of income was not regarded as part of the common good as it had to be spent on the provision of the particular services for which it was assessed rather than being used for the general purposes of the burgh (which was the essence of common good).

1.3 Over time, as the town councils’ statutory obligations and powers increased, a greater and greater proportion of the burghs’ income was derived from rates (and more latterly from the rates support grant provided by central government). This income had to be spent on statutory local authority services and their supporting assets and consequently had to be accounted for separately from the common good income and assets.

1.4 While the town councils remained in existence, the ratepayers and the inhabitants of the burghs were essentially one and the same. This led, in some cases, to some blurring of the lines. A town council’s powers in the administration and deployment of the common good funds were much less restrictive than in relation to the statutory local authority funds and it was (and remains) competent for common good monies to be utilised in the provision of a statutory local authority service, provided it was done in the general interests of the town’s inhabitants. So, for example, when the rates monies available for maintenance of a public library were insufficient (at one time the library rate was subject to a statutory cap of 1d in the pound), they could be topped up with funds from the common good. Similarly, properties being bought to fulfil a statutory local authority function could be paid for from common good funds. Notwithstanding this however, the common good funds and the general rates funds still had to be kept apart and separately accounted for.

1.5 At local government re-organisation in 1975, the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973 provided for the transfer of property which was held as part of the Common Good to island or district councils and in administering that Common Good property, these Councils were to “have regard to the interest of the inhabitants of the area to which the Common Good formally related”.

1.6 The Local Government etc. (Scotland) Act 1994 in turn transferred and vested Common Good property in the new Unitary Authorities, including Scottish Borders Council.

2 LEGAL POSITION OF THE COUNCIL AND COUNCILLORS

2.1 The title to all common good properties rest with the Council though they are legally deemed to be held on the behalf of the relevant communities.

2.2 There is a misconception that the question of whether or not a property is part of the common good should be determined by reference to the title deeds alone. In fact, the answer can only be found after considering other evidence, such as that available from burgh records.

2.3 The key issues, in the case of property which had been owned by a burgh council are as to whether the property is held under a “special trust”, or whether it has been acquired through statutory powers. If the answer to both of these questions is no, then that will indicate the property is common good. However, it needs to be borne in mind that the way in which the case law has developed suggests that property may in certain circumstances be deemed to be held under a ‘special trust’ in the context of determining whether or not it forms part of the common good, even although all of the normal legal requirements for constitution of a trust may not have been met.

2.4 In addition, the acquisition of property ‘under statutory powers’ need not always mean property appropriated by, or under threat of, compulsory purchase procedures. Rather, this can include any property acquired for the delivery of a local authority service for which rates could be levied - including, in some cases, properties gifted for such purposes.

2.5 One facet which sets certain common good properties apart from the rest of the assets in the Council’s portfolio is that some common good properties are deemed inalienable and thus may not be sold or leased without the approval of the court (which will generally only be granted when the Council has demonstrated that the disposal is appropriate and of benefit to the inhabitants of the relevant town).

2.6 This concept of inalienability arises by operation of law and exists purely to protect underlying rights of the inhabitants of the former burghs to have and use certain properties for certain purposes. These rights either arise from the terms of the original grants of land to the burghs or have been established by usage of land as of right for a particular purpose (or for general purposes) ‘from time immemorial’. The inalienable properties are therefore generally restricted to:

- Places of customary public resort (recreation grounds, market places etc) normally held under the ancient titles.

- Original administrative buildings/places necessary to sustain the ‘Dignity of the Burgh’ (public halls, clock towers etc).

However, any such inalienable property will become alienable if a suitable replacement facility is provided, or if the need for the property to be used for a particular function has otherwise now disappeared. In these circumstances court approval is not required.

2.7 The relationship between the Councillors (acting as a whole), the common good and the residents of the relevant towns is not dissimilar in many respects to that which exists between trustees, trust estates and beneficiaries but is not identical, not least because the “trustees” and the “beneficiaries” in the common good context were considered to be one and the same (i.e. the inhabitants of the burgh), which cannot be the case under a proper trust. The Council therefore holds the assets not as trustees in the full legal sense, meaning that the Trusts (Scotland) Acts do not apply, but as custodians for the benefit of residents in the former burghs.

2.8 The duties of Councillors in their dealings with each of the common good funds are less exacting than that of trustees in formal trusts because there are no clearly defined trust purposes or objectives. Instead S.15 (4) of the Local Government etc (Scotland) Act 1994 simply provides that the Council in its dealings with any common good fund must “have regard to the interests of the inhabitants” of the relevant former burgh.

2.9 However, each town’s common good holding must be treated separately, though the Councillors acting as a whole has overall responsibility for each common good fund. In the Scottish Borders each town with a common good fund has a common good working group comprising the local Councillors, acting under the Scheme of Administration.
APPENDIX 2

COMMON GOOD PROPERTIES – USE FOR THE DELIVERY OF LOCAL AUTHORITY SERVICES

1 INTRODUCTION

1.1 This appendix sets out the basis for the use of common good property for the delivery of local authority services.

1.2 Each former burgh’s common good fund must be treated separately. The Council, acting as a whole, has overall responsibility for each common good fund. The Funds may comprise heritable properties (land and buildings) and/or moveable items, including money and investments. In the Scottish Borders each former burgh with a common good fund has a common good working group comprising the local Councillors, and governed by the Scheme of Administration.

1.3 It should be borne in mind that common good assets are held in the individual common good funds for each of the former Burgh districts, and that local authority services are funded from the general fund. As a matter of law, all property is vested in the Council. Consequently, it is not legally possible for one fund to lease property to the other, because it would amount to the Council leasing property to itself, which is not legally possible in Scot’s law.

1.4 Therefore, it is proposed that the Council now regularises the financial basis for its use of common good assets to deliver local authority services as set out in this document.

2 BASIS OF OCCUPATION BY THE COUNCIL

2.1 ‘Dignity of the Burgh’ Properties.

2.1.1 Maintenance – The costs of day-to-day maintenance, which comprises all works that would not be treated as capital expenditure are met from the general fund. So for example, this would include replacement of slipped and missing slates, but not the replacement of whole roof coverings, boiler repairs but not the replacement of the boiler itself, wiring repairs but not the complete replacement of the wiring system. Maintenance would also exclude capital investment required to tackle obsolescence such as the complete replacement of toilets and kitchens which have reached the end of their useful lives or are otherwise no longer compliant with current regulations for new facilities. The Council acting under the War Memorials (Local Authorities Powers) Act 1923 as extended by S.133 (3) of the Local Government Act 1948 often undertakes the day to day maintenance of war memorials through the general fund.

2.1.2 Energy/Utility Usage – The costs of all energy/utility usage including electricity, gas, water, phone and oil would be paid from the general fund.
2.1.3 Rates – All rates arising out of the Council’s occupation and use of the premises would be paid from the general fund.

2.1.4 Income – For premises used for the provision of services that generate an income, such as public halls for example, the income goes firstly to help offset the running costs of the premises and if there is a surplus after running costs have been deducted, the surplus is credited to the relevant common good fund at or following the end of the financial year.

2.1.5 Staffing and other service delivery costs – The costs of all staffing and other service delivery costs such as provision of books, stationery, IT equipment, furniture etc. would be paid from the general fund.

2.1.6 Capital Works – Where the relevant common good working group and the Council acting as a whole are in agreement to the provision of local authority services from a common good asset for a period of 20 years or more, the Council may invest general fund capital into the asset to make it fit for purpose to deliver the general fund services. Any capital spend by the general fund would be made through the normal general fund budgetary approval process.

Where the Council is likely to use the premises for less than 20 years the common good fund would bear the cost of any capital works to the premises. If the Council then occupies the property for a period, it will make an annual contribution (in arrears) to the relevant common good fund for each year that it does so, equivalent to the extent to which the relative capital expenditure by the common good fund is written down in that same year.

2.1.7 Termination - Should the relevant common good working group not wish the Council to deliver the local authority services from a dignity of the burgh common good property, they could formally ask the Council to cease doing so. In such cases provided there is agreement by the Council acting as a whole the Council would work with the relevant common good working group to either hand the premises over to a new management arrangement or alternatively cease delivering the services altogether, to enable the premises to be put to an alternative use or disposed of for the benefit of the common good. In these circumstances, the common good fund would pay suitable compensation to the general fund to cover the cost of capital expenditure previously incurred by the general fund on the premises.

Should the Council wish to cease delivering the local authority services from a dignity of the burgh common good premises it would formally notify the relevant common good working group. In such case the Council would either work with the relevant common good working group to hand the premises and services delivered from them over to a new management arrangement should this prove viable, or alternatively vacate the premises to enable the premises to be put to an alternative use or be disposed of for the benefit of the common good. In this circumstance, the relevant common good fund would not be expected to pay any compensation to cover previous capital expenditure from the general fund.
Should a common good fund incur capital expenditure on the basis that the Council remains in occupation for an agreed period to deliver local authority services and the Council terminates the arrangement before the agreed period has expired, the relevant common good fund would be suitably compensated from the general fund to ensure the relevant common good fund is not disadvantaged. Compensation however would not be payable from the general fund if the relevant common good working group initiates the termination of the arrangement.

2.2 Common Good Properties Used for Local Authority Services – Long-term occupation (20 years plus)

2.2.1 Rent – The relevant common good fund would be credited annually in arrears, from the general fund, with a rent for the premises based upon the market rent for the premises for its existing use and condition, less rentalised capital charges for any general fund capital expenditure that would otherwise have been the liability of the common good fund (i.e. but for the fact that the property was occupied for the provision of a local authority service). For properties where such rentalised capital charges exceed the market rent the rental shall be nil.

2.2.2 Maintenance – The costs of day-to-day maintenance, which comprises works that would not be treated as capital expenditure, would be paid for from the general fund. So for example, this would include replacement of slipped and missing slates, but not the replacement of whole roof coverings, boiler repairs but not the replacement of the boiler itself, wiring repairs but not the complete replacement of the wiring system. Maintenance in this context would also exclude capital investment required to tackle obsolescence such as the complete replacement of obsolete toilets and kitchens with new facilities.

2.2.3 Energy/Utility Usage – The costs of all energy/utility usage by the Council including electricity, gas, water, phone and oil would be paid from the general fund.

2.2.4 Rates – All rates arising out of the Council’s occupation and use of the premises would be paid from the general fund.

2.2.5 Capital Works – The Council may invest general fund capital into the asset to make it fit for purpose to deliver local authority services. Any capital spend from the general fund would be made through the normal general fund budgetary approval process.

2.2.6 Termination - Should the relevant common good working group wish to take the premises back for an alternative use and the Council as a whole agree to that; the Council should be given a reasonable period in which to find suitable alternative accommodation and vacate the common good premises. In these circumstances, the common good fund would pay suitable compensation to the general fund to cover the cost of capital expenditure previously incurred by the general fund on the premises.
Should the Council no longer wish to continue occupying the common good premises for the delivery of local authority services, it should give the relevant common good working group a reasonable period of notice prior to vacating the property. In this circumstance, the common good fund would not be expected to pay any compensation to the general fund to cover previous capital expenditure by the general fund.

Should the relevant common good fund incur capital expenditure on the basis that the Council remains in occupation to deliver local authority services for an agreed period that is more than 20 years and the Council terminates the arrangement before the agreed period has expired, suitable compensation would be paid from the general fund to the common good fund to ensure the relevant common good fund is not disadvantaged. Compensation however would not be payable from the general fund if the relevant common good working group initiates the termination of the arrangement.

Short-term Occupation (less than 20 years)

2.2.7. General – The basis of short-term occupation would be the same as for long-term occupation except for the terms below.

2.2.8 Rent - The relevant common good fund would be credited from the general fund, annually in arrears with a rent for the premises based upon the greater of the market rent for the premises for its existing use and condition or the rentalised capital charges for any capital expenditure incurred by the common good on the premises.

2.2.9 Capital Works – Where the Council is likely to use the premises to deliver local authority services for less than 20 years the relevant common good fund would bear the cost of any capital works to the premises.

2.2.10 Termination - Should the relevant common good working group wish to take the premises back for an alternative use and the Council acting as a whole agree to that; the Council should be given a reasonable period in which to find suitable alternative accommodation and vacate the common good premises.

Should the Council no longer wish to continue occupying the common good premises for the delivery of local authority services, the Council should give the relevant common good working group a reasonable period of notice prior to vacating the property.

Should the relevant common good fund incur capital expenditure on the basis that the Council remains in occupation to deliver local authority services for an agreed period that is less than 20 years and the Council terminates the arrangement before the agreed period has expired, suitable compensation would be paid to the relevant common good fund to ensure the relevant common good fund is not disadvantaged. Compensation however would not be payable to the relevant common good fund if the relevant common good working group initiates the termination of the arrangement.
APPENDIX 3

COMMON GOOD PROPERTIES - DISPOSALS, TRANSFERS, RENTAL INCOME AND CAPITAL EXPENDITURE

1 INTRODUCTION

1.1 This appendix sets out the principles to be adopted for disposals, transfers, rental income and capital expenditure affecting common good property, including adjustments between the general fund and common good funds in relation to properties discovered to be common good assets which have not been previously known to be such.

2 DISPOSALS, TRANSFERS AND RENTAL INCOME

2.1 When a common good asset is sold the net proceeds should be credited to the relevant common good fund.

2.2 Where it is discovered that in the past the sale proceeds of a heritable common good asset have been credited to the general fund, then arrangements would be made to credit the net proceeds of that sale to the relevant common good fund, along with interest at appropriate rates such that the common good fund is not disadvantaged.

2.3 In determining the net sale proceeds the general fund’s costs of management and landlord’s obligations would be deducted.

2.4 Where it is discovered that rental from a common good asset, previously not recognised as such, has been credited to the general fund then following deduction of costs incurred by the general fund in:-

(a) making the property fit for letting,

(b) management of the property and fulfilment of landlord obligations, arrangements would be made to credit the appropriate common good fund net rental plus interest at appropriate rates such that the common good fund is not disadvantaged and vice versa.

2.5 For clarity, any adjustments between the general fund and common good fund required in terms of this Section 2 would also take account of any restitution appropriate in terms of Section 3 below and this would be reflected in their respective balance sheets.

3 CAPITAL EXPENDITURE

3.1 Capital expenditure comprises investment in major works for renewals, refurbishments, replacements and extensions that go beyond the usual day-to-day maintenance and repair costs. For accounting purposes, because common good and general fund expenditure must be kept separate, the general fund should not normally be used to fund capital works on common good assets, with the result that each common good fund has to fund its capital expenditure from its own resources.
3.2 This is an onerous liability for the common good funds because many of their properties comprise old buildings in which major components such as roof coverings, electrical installations, toilet and kitchen facilities and heating systems are nearing the end of their working life with substantial capital works required to renew them. In addition many properties may be at risk of becoming functionally obsolete. Substantial capital works may be required to bring them up to modern standards.

3.3 In some cases, the general fund has been used to fund capital works to common good properties in good faith (in the belief, at the time, that they were not common good assets) in support of the local authority services that the Council delivers from them. This has often occurred where the Council has inherited services from a district council delivered from a common good property, but has been unaware that the property is common good because of an insufficiency of records and subsequent local government reorganisations. According to accounting principles, capital expenditure by the general fund should be treated as donations to the relevant common good fund.

3.4 However, the accounting principles proceed on the assumption that the ‘ownership’ of the asset is known at the time the decision to incur the expenditure is made. In these instances, where the fact that a particular property is a common good asset was not known at the time the expenditure was incurred, it is considered appropriate where practicable to offset any capital expenditure incurred by the general fund against any sums due to the relevant common good fund in terms of Section 2 above.

3.5 For example, Rosebank Quarry at Selkirk was believed to be a general fund property when it was sold in 2005 for £83,000. It was also believed that Victoria Hall, Selkirk was a general fund property and since 2007 £178,000 of general fund capital money has been spent on the property. However, as part of the ongoing review of the common good estate it came to light that both properties are part of the common good. Consequently both the £83,000 capital receipt and the £178,000 of capital expenditure should have been attributed to the common good fund and the £178,000 should be offset against the £83,000, potentially putting the common good fund into a deficit position. However, in this example, because it would be counter-productive to put a common good fund into a deficit position because it too was unaware of the status of the property when the decision to incur the expenditure was made, any capital expenditure above £83,000 would be treated as a donation to the fund.

3.6 To summarise the assets transferring from general fund to common good fund would do so at current book value, which would reflect any capital expenditure and asset sales. There would be no compensation for asset sales unless they exceeded the value of capital work.

3.7 In future, where common good properties need capital investment the general fund should not normally be used and instead, the relevant common good fund should look to its own resources to carry out the required works.
3.8 However, in future, where the Council is delivering local authority services from a common good property and capital investment is required to make the premises fit for delivering the services then, provided there is a reasonable prospect of the premises being required and available for the delivery of the local authority services for the medium to long term (20 years plus), the Council may use general fund capital expenditure for such works. As part of the arrangements, it would need to be agreed that the Council would be entitled to continue with delivery of the local authority services from the premises for a minimum of 20 years, or until the Council no longer needs the premises. This is reflected in Appendix 2. Any capital spend using the general fund would be made through the normal general fund budgetary approval process.
Written submission from South Ayrshire Council

I refer to your letter of 16 December 2014 and your call for evidence on Part 4 of the draft Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

In response to the queries raised, I respond as follows:

1. The Council has no arrangements in place to hold our assets in a separate land holding.

2. When disposing of assets they are valued internally or in certain cases externally by RICS registered valuer. Valuations are carried out in accordance with the RICS Valuation Standards and are based on the market value of the existing use, taking account of any higher alternative value. The valuation is financial although any community benefits will be considered within the Council’s process with regard to disposals.

3. The Council encourages community asset transfer, and a draft policy is currently being prepared. The Council’s Community Development team assist in building capacity within Community Groups.

4. The Council has no experience of disposing of land and property assets to the Community. Notwithstanding, the primary difficulties that we could envisage encountering would relate to a lack of awareness of legislative and statutory requirements for the property on the part of community groups, and also the need to provide a sustainable business plan to provide a sustainable future income stream. We could also imagine issues around needing to bring properties up to a certain standard prior to transfer, particularly if the Council is proposing to transfer the property below the market value. Please do let me know if there is anything further I can assist the Committee with in connection with the scrutiny of this Bill.
Written submission from South Lanarkshire Council

I refer to your letter of 16 December 2014 seeking evidence in connection with Part 4 of the draft Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill and the proposed changes to the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 in relation to community right to buy.

I would provide the following comments in response to the points raised:-

1. Does your authority have arrangements in place to hold some or all local authority assets in a separate land holding account?

All assets are held by South Lanarkshire Council. There is a separation within the Council’s records in respect of those held as General Services and Housing Revenue as well as a record of those defined as Common Good.

South Lanarkshire Leisure and Culture Limited, operate and manage some of the Council’s assets under the terms of leases and operation and management agreements, but do not own any land assets.

2. When disposing of, or transferring assets how are those assets valued? To what degree is this purely a financial valuation?

Assets are valued either by the Council’s in house Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors’ registered valuers and surveyors, or the District Valuer, depending upon the specific circumstances of the transaction. The valuation takes account not only of the existing use, but also the development potential of an asset for sale. This valuation is used as a benchmark for the assessment of offers and, in terms of community asset transfer requests, a basis for explaining the value of any discount arising from community benefit being offered to community organisations, as required by the Disposal of Land by Local Authorities (Scotland) Regulations 2010.

3. What is the attitude of the authority to the disposal of assets? Does your authority have a policy to encourage the disposal of assets to community groups?

The Council has a well-established asset disposal procedure, which has been adapted to respond to applications for Community Asset Transfer. This procedure commences with an assessment of the development and market potential of an asset, along with possible other public sector uses through the marketing/negotiation sales of terms, to reporting of recommendations. The Council’s process fully includes elected members in that the general principle of any Community Asset Transfer is approved by the Council’s Executive Committee, with the details of the terms and conditions of any transfer being considered by the Council’s Housing and Technical Resources Committee.

The Council has been actively involved in Community Asset Transfer since 2011, however, has never received an application under Community Right to Buy.

4. What is your experience of disposal and what difficulties has the authority encountered?

The Council has no experience of disposal under Community Right to Buy.
Having completed a number of Community Asset Transfers through sale and lease in the past 3 years, the Council anticipate that the difficulties under Community Right to Buy will be similar, namely:

- Organisations are generally not well prepared when they make their initial approach for a property. Often the organisations require assistance in respect of their constitution, establishing their community representativeness and in developing a sustainable project plan. As the Council has limited resources to assist with this development, it tends to enlist the assistance of the Development Trust Association, the voluntary sector and Business Gateway, to ensure community organisations receive appropriate assistance and support.

- Organisations sometimes react to a facility closure, submitting an application as a form of protest over changes to service delivery rather than because there is a viable project. This results in abortive work and can lead to tension in communities.

- Development of the organisation and the project plan can take years, making it difficult for the Council to commit to retaining a specific property. The decision to retain a property has to take into account the uniqueness of the property to the community, the security, health and safety and insurance risks, as well as the likely deterioration of the property condition if it remains vacant.

Of particular concern is the concept that organisations may in the future be able to make application to purchase authority assets under both Parts 4 and 5 of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill, effectively having the right to make two applications. This will require further consideration.

I trust that the above information clarifies the Council’s position with regard to this matter.
Written submission from Stirling Council

Thank you for your letter dated 18th November, please find below answers to your questions:

1. Does your authority have arrangements in place to hold some or all local authority assets in a separate land holding?

   Stirling Council does have a number of arms-length companies which hold non-operational properties.

2. When disposing of, or transferring assets how are those assets valued. To what degree is this purely a financial valuation?

   Values are determined on the basis of market value, in accordance with RICS Valuation Standards but the Council does have a procedure for disposals to communities – at less than the market value. This requires the approval of the whole Council.

3. What is the attitude of the authority to the disposal of assets? Does your authority have a policy to encourage the disposal of assets to community groups?

   Stirling Council enthusiastically supports the transfer of assets to communities provided that there is a sound business case showing how both the community and the asset will substantially benefit from the transfer. The work that the Council is currently doing on settlement planning, and on community halls encourages communities to take responsibility for facilities in their localities.

4. What is your experience of disposal and what difficulties has the authority encountered?

   Communities can find it challenging satisfying the Council that they have a viable and sustainable business case for taking on assets. Smaller communities can find it difficult to find willing volunteers with relevant business experience within their community; or even to put together a grant application form and to produce a business plan.

   Even once they have completed the business plan – they can find it difficult to raise funds to run the facility, and to fund repairs and investment – the Big Lottery tends to be the only source of these funds.

   Because of this, Stirling Council has agreed temporary leases (for a couple of years) with groups in order to allow them to establish whether their project is viable.

   Community councils would be best placed to take on assets transferred, but they are not constituted to hold heritable property, therefore other bodies have to be used to hold these assets.

   Stirling Council’s experience has been that the whole process of transferring assets to Communities is very demanding of officer time, and our stretched resources have meant that we have only been able to support a limited number of transfer to date.
Written submission from West Lothian Council

West Lothian Council’s position is as follows:

1. Does your authority have arrangements in place to hold some or all local authority assets in a separate land holding?

All West Lothian Council’s property assets remain in the ownership of the Council.

2. When disposing of, or transferring assets how are those assets valued. To what degree is this purely a financial valuation?

All disposals of assets, by sale or lease, are at market value, unless covered by the council’s policy for Asset Transfer, in which case the disposal may be subject to a reduction in value in accordance with the Disposal of Land by Local Authorities (Scotland) Regulations 2010. Only in these circumstances are the terms for disposal not on a financial basis.

3. What is the attitude of the authority to the disposal of assets? Does your authority have a policy to encourage the disposal of assets to community groups?

Property assets may be sold or leased once they have been declared surplus to the council’s requirements. The approved procedures for surplus properties include an options appraisal that will consider the potential interest in Asset Transfer to Community Groups, in which event an asset may be pro-actively offered for transfer. The council is also open to requests for asset transfer, if they are in accordance with council policy. Full details of the Asset Transfer policy can be found on our website at http://www.westlothian.gov.uk/article/4429/Community-Asset-Transfer.

4. What is your experience of disposal and what difficulties has the authority encountered?

I assume this question refers to asset transfer and not to mainstream sale or lease. Our experience of asset transfer is limited. However, a number of difficulties are apparent.

1. The absence of a suitable and proportionate mechanism for calculating community benefit, to enable a reduction in the market value in accordance with the Disposal of Land Regulations. Social Return on Investment is the most relevant model but is over-complicated.

2. The capacity of local voluntary organisations. Many appear to be willing to consider transfer, but do not have the skills to take forward the process.

3. Resource availability for community groups – both to develop a proposal for transfer, and to carry through any proposals for conversion or redevelopment of an asset.
Dear Richard,

BEST VALUE IN THE DISPOSAL OF LOCAL AUTHORITY ASSETS

During the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee’s consideration of Part 4 of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill the Committee heard from stakeholders on the issue of best value in the disposal of Local Authority assets. As these issues affect matters in the portfolio of the Cabinet Secretary for Finance, Employment and Sustainable Growth and matters in the portfolio of the Cabinet Secretary for Social Justice, Communities and Pensioners’ Rights, I have also written to Alex Neil MSP and to John Swinney MSP.

The Committee received oral evidence that suggested that in the disposal of assets local authorities are always required to obtain best value (under the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003) and that normally means market value. The Committee heard concerns that some local authorities’ interpretation of best value might hinder a number of aspects of the proposed legislation.

The Committee explored the activity of other public sector bodies and heard that there has been less movement of other public sector assets into community ownership than was hoped, and less movement in comparison with the activity of local authorities, as, according to the Scottish public finance manual, other public sector bodies have to achieve the best financial return from their assets.

The Committee also heard that Glasgow City Council had bonded some of its land to Barclays Bank, which may mean that it would be difficult to release that land for communities. The Committee was concerned that the same situation might exist in other local authority areas and we wrote to all local authorities in Scotland to ask for confirmation of their policy and practice in relation to the holding and disposal of their land-holdings and their approach to best value. We received 25 responses.

The Committee understands that local authorities can dispose of assets at less than market value under the Disposal of Land by Local Authorities (Scotland) Regulations 2010. We also understand that local authorities can treat the public interest as having a value, and theoretically the issue should not be an obstacle. However, from our review of the local authority responses, it is clear that many of them consider the best value of the land they hold to be the financial value that can be obtained rather than the wider value to the community. The Committee is concerned that this approach might hinder some communities that may wish to access land held by local authorities and other public bodies.

In written evidence to the Committee, the Royal Town Planning Institute Scotland suggested that clarity was needed in the definition of best value and best public benefit in terms of the disposal of public land. It stated that this should not only be about financial value, but should also take into consideration social, community and environmental aspects, particularly in terms of the transfer of land to community or voluntary organisations.

In the Committee's report on Part 4 of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill, we recommended that the Scottish Government give consideration to what more can be done to address the issue of best value, best public benefit and, the approach taken by local authorities and other public sector bodies. It appears to the Committee that there is a requirement to change the mind-set of many local authorities and public sector bodies on these issues to reflect the fact that their role is that of custodian, holding assets on behalf of the public.

We would welcome your urgent consideration of what further could be done by way of amendments to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill at stage 2 to address the issue of best value, best public benefit and the practical impact of the approach taken by local authorities and other public sector bodies and to extend the provisions of the Disposal of Land by Local Authorities (Scotland) Regulations 2010, to ensure that there is a pre-disposition that sales of publicly owned land to communities will be at less than market value.

than market value. There may also be merit in including related provisions within the proposed land reform bill.

The Committee also suggested that the Scottish Government consider reviewing the Scottish public finance manual and we would welcome your view on this. In addition we would welcome a commitment from you to provide further guidance to local authorities and to other public sector bodies in relation to their assets, their consideration of best value, and the related support to communities seeking to acquire public land. In particular there is a need to provide both specific guidance on discounting the value of assets and to establish a presumption in favour of sales to communities at a nominal price. The Committee considers that there is also a requirement for clear additional guidance in relation to valuation where a disposal to a community is likely to contribute to the promotion or improvement of: economic development or regeneration; health; social well-being or environmental well-being.

In our report on Part 4 of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill we also recommended that the Scottish Government give consideration to an appropriate mechanism to adjudicate in cases where there are suggestions that local authorities and other public sector bodies may be seeking to frustrate local communities and we would welcome your view on this.

BEST VALUE IN THE DISPOSAL OF LOCAL AUTHORITY ASSETS

Thank you for your letter dated 18 February, which was also sent to the Cabinet Secretary for Social Justice, Communities and Pensioners’ Rights and the Cabinet Secretary for Rural Affairs, Food and the Environment. This response is on behalf of us all.

I agree it is disappointing that local authorities and other public bodies are perhaps not making as much use as they could of the powers they have to dispose of assets at less than market value, where there are other public benefits to be gained. However, I believe the Community Empowerment Bill will make a significant difference in this area.

It is important to recognise that the experiences you have heard about in oral evidence, and the responses received from local authorities, are set in the current context in which there is no requirement for local authorities or public bodies to have asset transfer arrangements in place. Hence some authorities have no policy for or experience of transferring assets, and where policies are in place there is substantial variation between them.

The Bill will mark a complete change in that position, by introducing a statutory scheme for asset transfer. Although to date some community bodies have sought to acquire public sector land through the community right to buy provisions in the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003, in future we expect that all such requests will be through the asset transfer provisions, as this will be a simpler process.
Local authorities and public bodies will have to deal with requests they receive in line with the statutory procedures and timescales, and will be required to agree to the request unless they have reasonable grounds for refusal, which they must set out in the decision notice. This will significantly strengthen the position of community bodies making requests.

In addition, there is provision for community bodies to seek an appeal or review if their request is refused, or if it is agreed but the terms and conditions offered, including the price, are significantly different from those proposed by the community body. In the case of requests to public bodies, this appeal will be to Ministers. In the case of local authorities, it will be an internal review, but will ensure that the final decision is made by elected members, not just officers.

The criteria which a relevant authority is to consider in making its decision on an asset transfer request include whether agreeing to the request is likely to promote or improve economic development or regeneration, public health, social well-being or environmental well-being. These are the same criteria that a local authority is required to take into account in considering whether a disposal at less than best consideration is permitted, under the Disposal of Land by Local Authorities (Scotland) Regulations 2010. There is therefore a clear read-across between agreement to an asset transfer request and benefits that could justify a discounted price.

In relation to other public bodies, I amended the Scottish Public Finance Manual in October 2014 to highlight the need to take account of wider public benefits in the disposal of assets. This states:

"Where there are wider public benefits, consistent with the principles of Best Value, to be gained from a transaction, disposing bodies should consider disposal of assets at less than Market Value. This includes supporting the acquisition of assets by community bodies, where appropriate."

The Community Ownership Support Service (COSS) is funded by the Scottish Government to support both community bodies and local authorities (and other bodies) in the transfer of assets to communities. In August 2013, COSS together with the Association of Chief Estates Surveyors, representing local authority property managers, issued guidance, "Asset Transfer from Policy to Practice", which includes advice on evaluating the benefits of community proposals and appropriate discount.

I am happy to make a firm commitment that the Scottish Government will update and provide further guidance to local authorities and public bodies in connection with the introduction of the asset transfer provisions in the Bill, which will include guidance on valuation of assets and the assessment of wider benefits in the consideration of best value and discounting. This has always been our intention, and will be taken forward in collaboration with community bodies and support organisations, as well as local authorities and public bodies.

1 http://www.gov.scot/Topics/Government/Finance/spfm/PropertyManagement
I do not believe it is appropriate to introduce a statutory presumption in favour of sales to communities at a nominal price. It is essential that public sector bodies are transparent in their financial dealings and can be held responsible for their stewardship of taxpayers' money. Market Value is embedded in International Accounting Standards and International Valuation Standards for this purpose. While in many cases transferring an asset to a community body has benefits that justify a discount, each case should be assessed on its own merits. Local authorities and public bodies must take account of the interests of all the people they serve, and consider the impact that income foregone, in the shape of a discount, may have on other services and planned investments. A statutory presumption would presumably have to indicate the degree to which the value of an asset should be discounted, and I doubt this could be sufficiently sensitive to account for all the factors that should be taken into consideration. I believe that statutory guidance is the best way to provide for that necessary level of discrimination.

There may also be a risk that selling a public asset at a reduced price might constitute State aid and will have to comply with State aid rules. This is an issue which any public authority must consider in its transactions. State aid rules take precedence over national laws, and would therefore over-ride any statutory presumption of discount. In the event that the European Commission were to investigate and find the aid illegal, the full aid amount and compound interest would be required to be repaid by the recipient to the funding body.

You also recommend introducing a mechanism to adjudicate in cases where there are suggestions that local authorities and other public sector bodies may be seeking to frustrate local communities. As I have said, I believe these situations will be less likely to occur once a statutory asset transfer scheme is in place. However, as part of the Short Life Working Group looking at the target of 1m acres in community ownership by 2020, we will be considering the remit of a Community Land Agency, and such a mediation or adjudication role could potentially be given to that body.

I am grateful to the Committee for its consideration of this issue, and I look forward to the progress of the Community Empowerment Bill at Stage 2.

The Committee reports to the Parliament as follows—

1. At its meetings on 19 August, 30 September, 28 October and 4 November the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee considered the delegated powers provisions in the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill ("the Bill") at Stage 1\(^1\). The Committee submits this report to the lead committee for the Bill under Rule 9.6.2 of Standing Orders.

OVERVIEW OF BILL

2. This Government Bill was introduced by John Swinney MSP on 11 June 2014. The lead Committee is the Local Government and Regeneration Committee. The Bill makes wide-ranging provision in relation to various types of community body and their rights. It is divided into 9 parts.

3. Part 1 places a duty on the Scottish Ministers to develop, consult on and publish a set of national outcomes for Scotland, to be reviewed every 5 years. Public authorities are to have regard to the national outcomes in carrying out their functions, as are all persons carrying out functions of a public nature. The Scottish Ministers are obliged to prepare and publish reports about the extent to which the national outcomes have been achieved.

4. Part 2 concerns community planning. Section 4(1) provides that local authorities, the bodies listed in schedule 1 of the Bill and community bodies must participate with each other in community planning. ‘Community planning’ is defined as planning that is carried out with a view to improving the achievement of outcomes in relation to the area of a local authority resulting from, or contributed to by, the provision of services delivered by or on behalf of the local authority or the persons listed in schedule 1 to the Bill. Schedule 1 lists bodies such as National Park authorities, Scottish Enterprise and the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service.

5. Part 2 of the Bill also makes provision in relation to local outcomes improvement plans. These are plans prepared and published by community planning partnerships setting out local outcomes to which the partnership must give priority with a view to improving the achievement of the outcome, as well as a description of the proposed improvement action and the time period within which the improvement is to be achieved. The local outcomes improvement plan is to be kept under review by the community planning partnership.

6. Part 3 of the Bill relates to participation requests. A participation request is a request made by a community controlled body to a public authority to permit the body to participate in an outcome improvement process. In making a request, the community body must set out details of any knowledge, expertise and experience the body has in relation to the specified outcome. The Bill also sets out the process to be followed by an authority where it receives a participation request.

7. Part 4 of the Bill does two things. Firstly, sections 27-47 make amendments to Part 2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 ("the 2003 Act"). The principal amendment is an extension of the community right to buy (currently available in respect of rural land only) to all land in Scotland. Sections 27-47 of the Bill also make various other changes to Part 2 of the 2003 Act so as to improve the working of those provisions.

8. Secondly, Part 4 creates a new community right to buy in respect of abandoned or neglected land. Section 48 of the Bill introduces a new Part 3A into the 2003 Act. The provisions set up a process whereby community bodies may apply to the Scottish Ministers to exercise their right to buy land which is abandoned or neglected. The new right to buy differs from the existing rights in Part 2 of the 2003 Act in one important respect, which is that the right to buy abandoned or neglected land may be exercised in circumstances where the owner of the land does not wish to sell.

9. Part 5 of the Bill relates to asset transfer requests. An asset transfer request is a request made by a community controlled body to a 'relevant authority' which seeks permission to buy, lease or otherwise acquire rights in respect of property owned by that relevant authority. A 'relevant authority' is a body listed in schedule 3 to the Bill, and includes local authorities, the Scottish Ministers, SEPA and the Scottish Court Service. Part 5 sets out the requirements to be met by a community body before it can make a request, the process to be followed in making a request and the rights of appeal that are available in the event that a request is refused.

10. Part 6 of the Bill relates to common good property. "Common good" refers to assets originally acquired from former burghs to which local authorities have taken title. The Bill requires each local authority to establish and maintain a common good register which must be available to members of the public for inspection. The Bill also imposes requirements on local authorities to publish details of any decision it proposes to take to dispose of common good assets or to change their use. The authority is required to have regard to any representations it receives in relation to the proposed disposal of common good assets.
11. Part 7 of the Bill concerns allotments. It replaces the provisions of the Allotments (Scotland) Acts of 1892, 1922 and 1950 which are repealed in their entirety. The Bill also repeals some provisions of the Land Settlement (Scotland) Act 1919. The Bill creates a new definition of 'allotment' and 'allotment site', and it places a duty on local authorities to hold and maintain waiting lists for allotments and to take reasonable steps to provide more allotments if the waiting list exceeds key trigger points. The Bill creates compensation rights in favour of tenants of allotments for disturbance, deterioration of an allotment site or loss of crops.

12. Part 8 concerns non-domestic rates. It amends the Local Government (Financial Provisions etc.) (Scotland) Act 1962 and the Local Government Finance Act 1992. The effect of the amendments is that local authorities are given power to grant localised relief from business rates. Any relief granted is to form part of a relief scheme which is funded by the authority. Before creating such a scheme, the authority is required to have regard to the interests of persons liable to pay council tax which is set by that authority.

DELEGATED POWERS

14. The Scottish Government provided the Parliament with a memorandum on the delegated powers provisions in the Bill ("the DPM")\(^2\). Due to the volume of powers in the Bill the Committee adopted a staged approach to its scrutiny. At its first consideration of the Bill, the Committee delegated authority to its legal advisers to ask written questions of the Scottish Government. The questions issued and the responses received from the Scottish Government are included in this report at Annex B.

15. At its meeting on 30 September, the Committee took oral evidence from Scottish Government officials on a number of powers in the Bill following receipt of the Scottish Government’s answers to the written questions.

16. The Committee makes no recommendation in respect of the powers listed at Annex A to this report. These powers are divided into powers with which the Committee was initially content; powers with which the Committee was content following written evidence from the Scottish Government; and powers with which the Committee was content following both written and oral evidence from the Scottish Government.

17. The Committee’s comments and recommendations on the remaining delegated powers in the Bill are detailed below. Before considering the individual powers, the Committee makes the following general observations:

i. The reasons advanced in the DPM for taking many powers in the Bill were not sufficiently detailed so as to enable the Committee to reach a view on whether those powers were acceptable in principle. With regard to several powers, the necessary information was only obtained following both written and oral evidence.

ii. The quality of some of the written answers provided by the Scottish Government in response to the Committee’s questions was inadequate, requiring the Committee to explore a number of issues further with Scottish Government officials in oral evidence. In relation to some key powers in the Bill, for example the power in the new section 97C(3)(a) of the 2003 Act, the answers given by the officials in oral evidence failed to provide the information sought by the Committee.

iii. In relation to the power in the new section 97C(3)(a) of the 2003 Act, the Committee remains in a position, having considered both written and oral evidence, whereby it is unable to form a view as to how this power is intended to be used. The Government has not provided an explanation for taking this power beyond a need to retain flexibility within the Bill. The Committee considers that explanation to be inadequate in light of the significance of this power and what it appears to permit. The Committee further finds it concerning that the thinking behind a power of such significance to the scope and application of the Bill appears still to be in the early stages of development. The Scottish Government may wish to reflect on its reasons for taking this power as the Bill progresses through the Parliament and the lead Committee may wish to explore the power further when it takes oral evidence from the Minister for Local Government and Planning.

iv. More generally, the Committee finds it unsatisfactory that the Parliament is being asked to confer certain wide-ranging powers on the Scottish Ministers in circumstances where the Scottish Government has not informed the Parliament in sufficient detail of its plans for using those powers or of the reasons for taking a particular approach to the framing of certain powers. The Committee considers that there is a clear need for delegated powers to be fully explained, their terms appropriately framed and their scope clearly delineated.

v. The points made above are concerning to the Committee given the significance of many of the powers in this Bill. The quality of delegated powers memoranda in particular is an issue that the Committee is monitoring on an ongoing basis, and will continue to raise in its annual and quarterly reports and, as appropriate, with the Minister for Parliamentary Business.

Scrutiny procedure for setting and review of national outcomes

18. Section 1(1) of the Bill places a duty on the Scottish Ministers to determine national outcomes in relation to Scotland that result from, or are contributed to by, the carrying out of functions of Scottish public authorities, cross-border public authorities, and other persons carrying out functions of a public nature. Such bodies are required to have regard to the national outcomes in carrying out their functions.

19. Section 1(2) of the Bill places a requirement on the Scottish Ministers to consult on the national outcomes and section 1(3) requires Ministers to publish the outcomes. There is no provision for Parliamentary scrutiny of the outcomes prior to their publication, or for the outcomes to be laid before Parliament once published. The Committee sought written explanation as to why it is considered appropriate for the power to decide on national outcomes to be exercisable by informal published determination as opposed to by, for example, Scottish statutory instrument.

20. The Scottish Government's written response to the Committee indicated that Parliamentary scrutiny will focus on progress toward the national outcomes, not the setting of the outcomes. The response also indicated that it may be that the Parliament would wish to debate the outcomes set out by Ministers, and that the arrangements put forward by the Bill do not prevent that.

21. The Committee explored these issues further with the Scottish Government officials at its meeting on September 30th. Anne-Marie Conlong of the Scottish Government’s Performance Unit explained that—

22. Furthermore, officials indicated that they were—

3 Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee, Official Report, 30 September 2014, Col.3
“...more than happy to take back for further consideration with Ministers the Committee’s views on the respective roles of the Parliament and the Government in setting the outcomes.”

23. There is recent comparable provision for national outcomes to be set out in subordinate legislation. Section 3(2) of the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Act 2014 requires that a local authority and a health board must, in preparing an integration plan, have regard to the national health and wellbeing outcomes in section 5 (and the integration planning principles in section 4). Section 5(1) enables the Scottish Ministers to prescribe the national health and wellbeing outcomes by regulations which are subject to the affirmative procedure.

24. In the DPM for the 2014 Bill, the Scottish Government explained why it was considered appropriate that the health and wellbeing outcomes should be prescribed by regulations subject to the affirmative procedure: “By allowing Ministers to set national outcomes, it provides for a consistent focus nationally. It is appropriate that outcomes are set by regulations as this requires a process of consultation to be followed, contemporaneously with integration plans being prepared, to inform the outcomes. It also provides flexibility for the Scottish Ministers to amend outcomes in the future, in response to innovation locally and changing circumstances, and in order to support continuous improvement.... This is subject to affirmative procedure as the national outcomes are fundamental to health and social care integration in that they express its practical purpose. Whilst this level of scrutiny involves more parliamentary time, it is considered that the national outcomes are sufficiently important to justify this, and it is not anticipated that they will be regularly amended.”

25. The Committee considers that there is a clear comparison to be drawn between the health and wellbeing outcomes for Scotland as provided for by the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Act 2014, and the national outcomes under this Bill. The Committee also observes that the national outcomes set under the Bill will be applicable to a wider range of bodies than the health and wellbeing outcomes therefore the requirement for Parliament to have a role in the process of setting or reviewing the outcomes is, in the Committee’s view, greater.

26. The Committee acknowledges, however, that there are alternative ways to afford the Parliament an opportunity to scrutinise the national outcomes. By way of example, the Committee notes the provision in section 16 of the Judiciary and Courts (Scotland) Act 2008. Section 16 relates to guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers or the Lord President as to the manner of exercise by the Judicial Appointments Board for Scotland of its functions. Section 16 provides that before issuing guidance, the Scottish Ministers or, as the case may be, the Lord President, must lay a draft of the proposed guidance before the Parliament. The guidance must not be issued until 21 days after it has been laid before Parliament, and the Parliament may by resolution make recommendations in relation to the draft guidance to which the Government or the Lord President must have regard. The Parliament does not, however, have power to prevent the guidance from being issued.

27. While the Committee acknowledges that the Parliament would not be prevented from debating such outcomes as are set by the Scottish Government, the Committee considers that a more active scrutiny role for the Parliament in relation to the outcomes would be appropriate and should be set out on the face of the Bill. One clear way to enable Parliament to scrutinise the outcomes would be for the outcomes to be prescribed in regulations subject to scrutiny by the affirmative procedure, although as noted above, the Committee acknowledges that there may be alternative ways in which the Parliament could be afforded a role in considering the outcomes and that the formulation of such a role is ultimately a matter for the Scottish Government.

Consultation on the national outcomes
28. Sections 1(2) and 2(5) of the Bill provide that before determining or revising the outcomes, the Scottish Ministers must consult such persons as they consider appropriate. The Committee explored in the oral evidence session why, in principle, the provision does not specify any persons or bodies which (at a minimum) the Scottish Ministers would need to consult.

29. It was explained in the oral evidence session that the intention is to leave the potential scope for consultation as broad as possible, which has been favoured by stakeholders. In some cases consultation would be very wide, but in other cases focussed. The intention is not to limit or narrow the scope of the persons who may be consulted. It was indicated that if the Committee was of the view that the Bill should include a minimum list of bodies that suggestion would be considered further, however the Scottish Government would not want to limit the scope of potential consultation in any future review.

30. Sections 1(2) and 2(5) provide that the consultation on the national outcomes will be with such persons as (subjectively, at the particular time) the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate. The Committee accepts that this approach keeps the scope for consultation as broad as possible, but observes that, equally, it does not offer any guarantee of consultation at a minimum level, where the outcomes are to be set or revised.

31. The Committee also notes that, by comparison, section 5 of the Public Bodies (Joint Working) (Scotland) Act 2014 specifies a minimum level of required consultation before the national health and wellbeing outcomes are prescribed by regulations. Ministers must consult in advance local authorities, Health Boards, each integration joint board at the time established, and in respect of various groups set out in section 5(4) involved in health and social care provision, such persons appearing to be representative of the group as the Ministers think fit.

32. The Committee considers that a list of persons or bodies that, at a minimum, the Scottish Ministers must consult when national outcomes are set or reviewed should be adopted in the Bill. Such an approach could be tailored to ensure a minimum base for consultation while leaving it open to Ministers to consult such other bodies as they think fit in the particular circumstances, having regard to the nature of the outcomes being set or revised.
33. The Committee has concerns that the process for setting and reviewing national outcomes under Part 1 of the Bill leaves no role for the Parliament to scrutinise the outcomes that are proposed to be set or, as the case may be, revised, before they are published.

34. The Committee considers that it would be appropriate for the setting and review of the national outcomes to be subject to the scrutiny of Parliament, possibly through scrutiny of regulations subject to the affirmative procedure. A more active scrutiny role for the Parliament appears to be justified having regard to the significance of the national outcomes, the discretion afforded to the Scottish Ministers in deciding how the outcomes are presented and measured, and the fact that all public bodies and other persons carrying out functions of a public nature as described in section 1(1) would require to have regard to the outcomes.

35. Sections 1(2) and 2(5) provide that before exercising the power to determine or revise the national outcomes, the Scottish Ministers must consult such persons as they consider appropriate. The Committee recognises that the determination of which bodies and persons ought to be consulted is a policy matter. The Committee draws to the attention of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee however that sections 1(2) and 2(5) keep the scope for consultation as broad as possible, but equally they do not guarantee any minimum level of consultation that might be suitable, depending on whether it is proposed to set or change the outcomes generally or to have a more focussed review.

Sections 4(6), 8(3), 16(2) and 51(3) – power to add or remove bodies

Powers conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Powers exercisable by: regulations (sections 4(6) and 8(3)); order (sections 16(2) and (3) and 51(2) and (3))
Parliamentary procedure: negative

36. Section 4(6) allows Ministers to modify schedule 1 of the Bill to expand the list of community planning partners to which Part 2 of the Bill applies. The power also enables Ministers to remove bodies from the list, thereby reducing the scope of Part 2 of the Bill. Section 8(3) provides a similar power in respect of the list of community planning partners which have governance requirements in relation to community planning as set out in section 8(2).

37. Sections 16(2) and (3) provide powers to expand or reduce the list of public service authorities to which a participation request may be made in terms of Part 3 of the Bill (the list is contained in schedule 2). Sections 51(2) and (3) create similar powers in respect of the list of relevant authorities to whom an asset transfer request may be made under Part 5 (the list of relevant authorities is set out in schedule 3).

38. These powers are subject to the negative procedure. The Committee sought explanation from the Scottish Government as to why that was considered appropriate as opposed to the affirmative procedure, which would afford the Parliament a greater measure of scrutiny over the exercise of these powers which not only permit the modification of primary legislation, but which could also have a considerable impact on the scope and application of Parts 2, 3 and 5 of the Bill.

39. In response, the Scottish Government explained that the negative procedure was considered appropriate for the exercise of these powers, as adding or removing bodies from a list in one of the schedules to the Bill is unlikely to be controversial. The response also drew a parallel with section 4(1) of the Freedom of Information (Scotland) Act 2002 (“the 2002 Act”) where a power to amend a list of bodies is subject to the negative procedure. In oral evidence, the officials explained that these powers provide flexibility to make changes to the relevant lists should that be considered necessary.

40. The Committee considers that the exercise of these powers is capable of having a considerable impact on the scope and applicability of some of the key provisions in the Bill. For example, the power in section 4(6) could in theory be used to considerably expand the application of Part 2 of the Bill by adding large numbers of bodies to the list of community planning partners contained in schedule 1. Conversely, it could also be used to reduce the application of Part 2 of the Bill by removing bodies from the schedule 1 list.

41. The Scottish Government draws a parallel with section 4(1) of the Freedom of Information (Scotland) Act 2002 as a similar provision to add or remove bodies to or from a list which is also subject to the negative procedure. The Committee observes, however, that more recent powers to make amendments to lists of bodies have adopted a different procedural approach. For instance, section 25 of the Public Services Reform (Scotland) Act 2010 provides that an order which adds a body to the list in schedule 5 is subject to the affirmative procedure, but to the negative procedure where a body is removed from the list. A similar example pertains in section 7 of the Regulatory Reform (Scotland) Act 2014 (power to modify the list of regulators).

42. These examples, which post-date the 2002 Act, suggest that where bodies are added to lists, the powers should be subject to the affirmative procedure. Conversely, where the application of the Bill is shrunk and bodies are removed from lists, the negative procedure may be appropriate. Standing the absence of reasons why the present Bill should not follow these more recent examples, the Committee recommends that the Scottish Government amend the Bill at Stage 2 so as to require these powers to be subject to the affirmative procedure where they add bodies to the lists, but to the negative procedure where they are exercised so as to remove bodies from the lists.

43. The Committee calls on the Scottish Government to amend the Bill at Stage 2 so as to make the powers in sections 4(6) and 8(3) subject to the affirmative procedure when exercised so as to add bodies to the lists in schedule 1 or section 8(2) respectively. The Committee also recommends that the powers in sections 16(3) and 51(3) be made subject to the affirmative procedure.

Section 10 – Power to issue guidance
Power conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: guidance (published)
Parliamentary procedure: none

44. Section 10(1) provides that each community planning partnership must comply with any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers about the carrying out of functions conferred on the partnership by Part 2 of the Bill. Section 10(2) provides that each community planning partner must comply with any guidance issued by the Ministers about the carrying out of functions conferred on the partner by Part 2. Before issuing either set of guidance, the Ministers must consult such persons as they think fit. Section 95 provides that the guidance will be published on issue, in such manner as the Scottish Ministers think fit.

45. The Committee explored two aspects of the power to issue guidance in the oral evidence session: a) why the guidance is proposed to be binding on community planning partnerships and partners, rather than there being a requirement that they will have regard to it; and b) why there is no provision for any Parliamentary procedure to apply to the guidance or for it to be laid before Parliament.

46. As to a), the proposed automatically binding nature of the guidance is a change to the provision in section 18 of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003. That section provides that every person initiating, maintaining, facilitating or participating in community planning shall, in doing so, have regard to any guidance provided by the Scottish Ministers about community planning. The consultation requirement in section 10(3) is similar to that already in section 18(2) of the 2003 Act.

47. The Committee explored in oral evidence the considerations underlying the proposal that the guidance should be binding. A key aspect as outlined by the Scottish Government officials was that the policy intention is that there should be local discretion and local innovation in how community planning is approached and dealt with, but there may be some matters that the Scottish Government feels are fundamental enough to apply on a national level, where the guidance could specify binding requirements on community planning partnerships and partners.

48. In reply to the question how it is foreseen that this power of binding guidance would be utilised, the officials responded—

“It is hard to know at the moment…the guidance will be subject to quite a lot of consultation before we put it out…It is hard to say what particular provisions will be used for, but that will emerge from the process.”

49. The Committee considers that a power to issue guidance which is automatically binding according to its terms is highly unusual, and might be expected to require particular explanation as to why the power is needed. A binding requirement in such guidance would in law be binding in the same way as if the provision was contained in a statutory instrument or in an Act. The Bill

appears to put no enforcement mechanism in place for compliance with the guidance. The guidance must cover matters “about the carrying out of functions conferred on community planning partners and partnerships under part 2 of the Bill.” But this is a broad requirement, and there is no enforcement or scrutiny mechanism proposed in the Bill to review whether matters required by the guidance are properly covered as concerning the various functions conferred in Part 2.

50. It was explained to the Committee in evidence that the policy intention is that some matters covered by the guidance should be matters which would be binding on a national level, while others would permit local discretion. However, the scope of the power in section 10 makes no such distinction, for instance by specifying a range of matters or requirements which possibly could be included as binding.

51. The Committee accordingly draws to the attention of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee that it has concerns, in principle, as to the proposal that the guidance should be binding on community planning partnerships and partners. This concern has a number of factors, and a power of this nature is unusual.

52. The Scottish Government officials were not clear in their oral evidence to the Committee as to the reasons why this power was being taken and how it could be exercised. It was indicated that there is a policy intention that some matters would be fundamental enough to be binding on a national level, while others would not and could permit local discretion and innovation. This distinction, however, is not provided for in section 10.

53. The Bill also makes no provision for an enforcement mechanism, to enforce compliance with the guidance. The guidance must cover matters “about the carrying out of functions conferred on community planning partners and partnerships under Part 2 of the Bill”. This is a broad requirement and the Bill makes no provision for a scrutiny or review mechanism, to review whether any automatically binding matters which may be specified in the guidance are properly included, because they concern the carrying out of functions conferred in Part 2 of the Bill.

54. These concerns would not apply if, in a similar way to the existing provision for guidance in section 18 of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003, there was provision that community planning partners and partnerships would “have regard to” the guidance.

Section 48 inserting section 97C(3)(a) into the 2003 Act – Eligible land

55. The new Part 3A of the 2003 Act as inserted by Part 4 of the Bill will apply only in respect of “eligible land”. Eligible land is defined in the new section 97C(1) of the 2003 Act as land which the Scottish Ministers consider is wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected. The remainder of the new section 97C provides further detail as to the meaning of eligible land.

56. Section 97C(3)(a) provides that eligible land does not include land on which there is a building or structure which is an individual’s home, unless the building or structure falls within such class or classes as may be prescribed. The word ‘prescribed’ adopts the definition set out in section 98(1) of the 2003 Act, meaning “prescribed in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers”. The effect of section 97C(3)(a), therefore, is that Ministers may make regulations prescribing buildings or structures which are eligible for acquisition by a Part 3A community body notwithstanding the fact that such buildings or structures may constitute an individual’s home.

57. The DPM states that the policy intention is that eligible land should not include an individual’s home. It also states that this power will enable there to be flexibility as to exactly what buildings or structures constitute an individual’s home. The power is subject to the affirmative procedure and the DPM states that this is considered appropriate, given that what constitutes “eligible land” is fundamental to the scope and application of the new Part 3A.

58. While the Committee agrees that this power is fundamental to the scope and application of the new Part 3A of the 2003 Act, it does not consider that the DPM provides a sufficiently detailed explanation as to how it is intended to be used. The Committee accordingly sought written clarification from the Scottish Government as to what this power enables the Scottish Ministers to do and how it is intended that the power will be used.

59. In its written answer, the Scottish Government confirmed that section 97C(3)(a) enables Ministers to add prescribed classes of building back into the pool of eligible land to which the new Part 3A applies. The Government explained that it was unable to provide examples of the kinds of building or structure which may be prescribed using this power, but that the power “allows for flexibility”. The Government also stated in its written answer that it would be happy to consider changes to the provision should the Committee be of the view that that would be of benefit to the Bill.

60. At the oral evidence session on 30 September, Members sought further information from the Scottish Government officials as to why this power was being taken, standing the lack of detailed explanation in the Government’s written response and the DPM. Members also asked what factors – other than flexibility – were taken into account in framing this power.

61. In oral evidence Dave Thomson from the Scottish Government’s Land Reform and Tenancy Unit repeated that the power was required to allow for flexibility—

The flexibility on those powers is the key part at the moment. The policy intent is not to take people’s homes away in any circumstances, but still to allow community bodies to take control of assets. Essentially, the powers that we are looking to take on through that provision are simply to allow that flexibility to set out in detail the types of buildings or assets that can be included or excluded. At the moment, we do not have specific examples, hence the current need for flexibility in those powers.”

Rachel Rayner of the Scottish Government Legal Directorate also commented on this power:

“[A]ny regulations made by Ministers would have to comply with the European Convention on Human Rights. As you will be aware, Article 8 of the ECHR provides a right to respect for private and family life, which would include respect for a person’s home, and that would have to be taken into account were the power to be used.”

The Committee finds it concerning that the taking of a power as significant as that proposed in section 97C(3)(a) of the 2003 Act has not been justified by the Scottish Government, either in written or oral evidence, beyond the apparent need for flexibility. While the Committee accepts that some flexibility in the available powers could be appropriate to ensure that the scheme envisaged by the new Part 3A of the 2003 Act is capable of operating effectively in practice, it considers that flexibility is not in and of itself sufficient explanation for the taking of such an important power. The Committee also observes that any regulations made by the Scottish Ministers in exercise of this power - or indeed any power - require to be ECHR-compatible.

In oral evidence, the Scottish Government officials explained that the policy intent underpinning these provisions is not to take individuals’ homes away in any circumstances. The power appears, however, to directly contemplate making buildings and structures available for compulsory acquisition by community bodies despite the fact that those buildings and structures are an individual’s home. If it is not the Government’s intention to make homes available for acquisition by Part 3A community bodies as the officials explained in oral evidence, the Committee finds it difficult to decide what this power is intended to do.

The Committee further finds it unsatisfactory that the Parliament is being asked to confer this power upon the Scottish Ministers without having received satisfactory answers to questions asked about its intended use. When asked to give examples to demonstrate how the power might be used in practice, the Scottish Government did not do so either in written or in oral evidence. The Committee considers it unsatisfactory that the Parliament is being asked to approve powers where the thinking behind them appears still to be in the early stages of development and where officials are unable to offer a detailed explanation of the circumstances in which it is planned that they will be used.

7 Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee, Official Report, 30 September 2014, Col.12
66. The Committee draws the power in the new section 97C(3)(a) of the 2003 Act to the attention of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee on the basis that it has concerns about the scope of the power and its intended use.

67. The power permits the Scottish Ministers to make regulations prescribing buildings or structures which are eligible for acquisition by a Part 3A community body notwithstanding the fact that such buildings or structures may be described as an individual’s home. The Committee’s questions of the Scottish Government, both written and oral, did not elicit a clear explanation from the Scottish Government as to its reasons for taking this power, or how the power is intended to be exercised. The Scottish Government also did not provide the Committee with any examples of the kinds of building or structure that may be prescribed in regulations made in exercise of this power.

68. The Committee finds it unsatisfactory that the Parliament is being asked to confer a power of this significance upon the Scottish Government in the absence of a detailed explanation as to why it is necessary or what it is for and in circumstances where the thinking underpinning the power appears to be in the early stages of development. Together with the lack of examples of the kinds of building or structure which may be prescribed using this power, the Committee finds it difficult to reach a view as to whether the power is acceptable in principle and recommends that the lead Committee explore the power further as part of its further consideration of the Bill.

69. The Scottish Government may wish to reflect on its reasons for taking this power as the Bill progresses through the Parliament and the lead Committee may wish to explore the power further when it takes oral evidence from the Minister for Local Government and Planning.

Section 97N(1) and (3) – Effect of Ministers’ decision on right to buy

Powers conferred on: the Scottish Ministers
Powers exercisable by: regulations
Parliamentary procedure: affirmative

70. New section 97N(1) of the 2003 Act provides that Ministers may, by regulations, make provision for or in connection with prohibiting prescribed persons from transferring or otherwise dealing with land which is the subject of an application under Part 3A during the prescribed period. Section 97N(2) provides that those regulations may in particular include provision prescribing transfers or dealings which are not prohibited; requiring or enabling prescribed persons to register prescribed notices in the Register of Community Interests in Abandoned or Neglected land; and in prescribed circumstances, requiring information to be incorporated into prescribed deeds relating to the land.
71. Section 97N(3) provides that Ministers may, by regulations, make provision for or in connection with suspending, during the prescribed period, such rights in or over land in respect of which a Part 3A community body has made an application as may be prescribed. Section 97N(4) provides that such regulations may in particular include provision specifying rights to which the regulations do not apply, and rights to which the regulations do not apply in prescribed circumstances.

72. The Committee considers that it may be appropriate for the Scottish Ministers to make regulations for the purpose of suspending rights in or over land for the duration of the period within which Ministers are considering a Part 3A community body’s application. The Committee also considers it appropriate that these powers are subject to the higher level of scrutiny afforded by the affirmative procedure. Despite these conclusions, the Committee considers that there are issues of clarity with the drafting of these powers. The Committee explored these issues with the Scottish Government both in written and oral evidence.

73. Section 97N uses the word “prescribed” a number of times. “Prescribed” has a specific definition in section 98(1) of the 2003 Act, meaning “prescribed in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers”. The Committee wrote to the Scottish Government to ask whether the word “prescribed” as used multiple times in section 97N is intended to attract the definition of that term set out in section 98(1) with the effect that section 97N in fact creates a new power to make subordinate legislation each time that word is used, in addition to the two free-standing powers conferred by sections 97N(1) and (3).

74. In its written response, the Scottish Government confirmed that the use of the word “prescribed” in section 97N is intended to attract the definition of that term set out in section 98(1). The Government also stated, however, that its view is that section 97N confers only two powers to make subordinate legislation: the power in section 97N(1) and that in section 97N(3). Sections 97N(2) and (4) are intended to provide further detail of the matters which regulations made under subsections (1) and (3) may cover, and the use of the word “prescribed” in those subsections does not have the effect of conferring separate powers to make subordinate legislation.

75. The Committee considers that if the word “prescribed” as used in section 97N is intended to adopt the definition in section 98(1) of the 2003 Act, it seems clear that multiple powers are being conferred. The existence of the definition means that wherever the word “prescribed” appears in the 2003 Act, including where it appears as a result of amendments made to that Act by this Bill, it is an instruction to the reader to construe the word as conferring a power upon the Scottish Ministers to make regulations unless contrary provision is made.

76. The Committee therefore asked the Scottish Government officials for further explanation of the power when it took oral evidence on 30 September. The Scottish Government officials reiterated their position, which is that section 97N confers only two powers to make subordinate legislation. The officials offered to write to the Committee following the meeting to explain further their position. A letter dated 8 October 2014 is attached at Annex C.
77. This is a technical drafting point. The Committee does not object to the powers in sections 97N in principle, not to the selection of the affirmative procedure as the appropriate level of Parliamentary scrutiny over the powers. Nevertheless, the Committee finds that the use of the word “prescribed” in section 97N is apt to cause confusion when construed in accordance with section 98(1), and, as such, draws the conclusion that the Bill should be clarified at Stage 2.

78. The Scottish Government’s intention is that section 97N confers only two powers to make subordinate legislation: the power to make regulations prohibiting the transfer of land pending a decision on a Part 3A application in section 97N(1); and the similar power to suspend other rights e.g. rights of pre-emption or redemption that is set out in section 97N(3). The Committee considers, however, that this intention is not readily compatible with the use of the word “prescribed” in section 97N and its definition in section 98(1) of the 2003 Act. Other provisions in the Bill use the word “prescribed” and rely on the definition of that term in section 98(1) to create a free-standing power to make subordinate legislation. It is not clear from the evidence received from the Scottish Government why that same reliance does not apply in the case of the word as used in section 97N.

79. The Committee calls on the Scottish Government to clarify the new section 97N of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 as inserted by section 48 of the Bill. Section 97N makes repeated use of the word “prescribed”, and the Scottish Government has explained to the Committee, both in written and oral evidence, that while the use of the word “prescribed” in section 97N is intended to adopt the definition of that term in section 98(1) of the 2003 Act meaning “prescribed in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers”, section 97N is considered to confer only two powers to make subordinate legislation: the power in section 97N(1) and the power in section 97N(3).

80. The Committee considers that if the use of the word “prescribed” in section 97N is not intended to confer separate and free-standing powers to make subordinate legislation, the Bill should be clarified for Stage 2 so as to remove the scope for doubt over the interpretation of the section and the powers it confers by re-drafting the provision so as to remove the references to “prescribed”.

Annex B – Written Correspondence

Part 1 – National Outcomes

1. Sections 1-3 – publication of national outcomes

a) Sections 1(3), 2(4) and 3(1) provide for the publication of the national outcomes that are determined by the Scottish Ministers, and reports about the extent to which they have been achieved. The Scottish Government is asked to explain why it has been considered appropriate that the power to decide on the national outcomes should be exercisable by informal published determination, and not by Scottish statutory instrument which could be subject to Parliamentary scrutiny and procedure.

The decision was taken not to use Statutory Instruments as we envisage the primary role of Parliament to be scrutiny of progress towards the national outcomes. It may well be that the Scottish Parliament may wish to debate on the national outcomes set by the Scottish Ministers and the arrangements proposed do not prevent that.

b) Section 1(2) states that before determining the national outcomes, the Ministers must consult such persons as they consider appropriate. The Scottish Government is asked to explain why this provision does not specify any persons or bodies which (as a minimum requirement) the Ministers would consult.

The intention here is to leave the potential scope for consultation as broad as possible. In some cases, e.g. where a review is of a technical nature and focuses on specialist or statistical issues, it may be more appropriate to limit the scope of consultation to those who have expertise and experience in that area. In other cases, the review may be of a more general nature and in those cases, it would appropriate to consult more widely. Consultation with appropriate people would also include consultation with the public as a whole if appropriate.

Part 2 – Community Planning

2. Section 4(6) – power to modify schedule 1

The power in section 4(6) is capable of being used to considerably expand the list of community planning partners to which Part 2 of the Bill applies, or alternatively to considerably reduce the scope by removing bodies that are listed in schedule 1.

The Scottish Government is asked to explain therefore why it is considered more suitable that any regulations made under section 4(6) should be scrutinised by the negative procedure - rather than by the affirmative procedure where regulations add or remove persons from the schedule 1 list, and the negative procedure for regulations which amend an entry (which could adjust an entry on a change of name of a body).
This power provides flexibility to make future changes to the list of community planning partners in schedule 1. The power to amend the primary legislation is restricted to amending the list of public bodies who are members of a community planning partnership. Adding a body to, or removing it from, the list is unlikely to generate controversy. An example of a power to amend a list of public bodies in a schedule to primary legislation which is subject to negative procedure can be found in section 4(1) of the Freedom of Information (Scotland) Act 2000. In these circumstances it is considered that subjecting the exercise of the power to negative procedure is appropriate.

3. Section 8(3) – power to modify section 8(2)

The power in subsection (3) of section 8 is capable of being used to considerably expand the list of community planning partners in subsection (2) which have governance requirements in relation to community planning, or alternatively to considerably reduce the scope by removing bodies from that list.

The Scottish Government is asked to explain therefore why it is considered more suitable that any regulations made under section 8(3) should be scrutinised by the negative procedure - rather than by the affirmative procedure where regulations add or remove persons from the schedule 1 list, and the negative procedure for regulations which amend an entry (which could adjust an entry on a change of name of a body).

The power relates to making changes that may be required as the nature and practice of community planning evolves and the provisions of this part of the Bill take effect. It is restricted to allowing the Scottish Ministers to amend a list of public bodies who are partners in a community planning partnership so that they are also subject to a governance role. As with the power in section 4(6), it is not considered that the exercise of this power would generate controversy. It is considered that the negative procedure offers an appropriate level of parliamentary scrutiny.

4. Section 10 – power to issue guidance

The Scottish Government is asked to explain why the powers to issue guidance in section 10 are appropriate, and how the powers could be used. In particular an explanation is sought as to-

a) why the guidance is proposed to be binding on community planning partnerships and partners, rather than there being a requirement that they will have regard to it; and

b) why there is no provision for any Parliamentary procedure to apply to the guidance or for it to be laid before Parliament.

With regard to the request for an explanation as to why the powers to issue guidance are appropriate, the Scottish Ministers have inherent power to issue guidance and the Bill does not confer express powers to that effect. The purpose of section 10 is to confer a status on any guidance Ministers may issue regarding the carrying out of functions by the Community Planning Partnership. Section 10(3) requires that any guidance must be the subject of consultation before it is issued.

a) The Scottish Government believes that this section will help to enable the dissemination of best practice in community planning across Scotland and is necessary to support the process by which public bodies work together and with community bodies to plan for, resource and provide services which improve local outcomes in the area. With regard to the obligation to comply with guidance, we would of course be happy to consider amending this to an obligation to have regard to the guidance if the Committee feel it would be of benefit to the Bill.

b) There is currently no provision for any Parliamentary procedure to apply to the guidance or for it to be laid before Parliament as it was considered that the guidance would deal with a range of issues in some detail, including administrative issues as necessary and that this was not a necessary or appropriate use of valuable Parliamentary time and resources.

5. Section 12 – power to establish bodies corporate

a) The Scottish Government is asked to explain why the wide power to specify any other matters in section 12(3)(h) is required, and how this power could be used.

b) What additional matters would this power enable, beyond the ancillary powers to make incidental, supplementary or consequential provisions contained in sections 96(1) and 97?

Section 12(3)(h) is in the same terms as, and replaces, section 19(3)(h) of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003. The inclusion of 12(3)(h) provides the necessary flexibility to deal with any new development which may need to be addressed when exercising the power in section 12(1). It also makes it clear that the provision that can be included in the regulations made under section 12(1) is not restricted to the matters listed in section 12(3)(a) to (g).

Part 3 – Participation Requests

6. Section 16 – meaning of “public service authority”

a) The powers in section 16(2) and (3) are capable of being used to considerably expand the list of “public service authorities” to which participation requirements could be made in accordance with Part 3 of the Bill, or alternatively to considerably reduce the scope by removing bodies (or types of body) from the list in schedule 2.

The Scottish Government is asked to explain therefore why it is considered more suitable that any order made under sections 16(2) and (3) should be scrutinised by the negative procedure - rather than by the affirmative procedure where the order proposes to remove persons from the schedule 2 list and/or designate more persons or classes of person as “public service authorities” and the negative procedure for an order which amends an entry in schedule 2 (which could adjust an entry on a change of name of a body).

b) The Delegated Powers Memorandum (“DPM”) states in relation to section 16(2) that the Scottish Ministers are included in schedule 2, but this is not the case. Clarification is sought as to whether there is any intention to include the Ministers in the schedule.

a) These powers provide flexibility to make future changes to the list of public service authorities in schedule 2. The power to amend the primary legislation is restricted to amending the list of public bodies to whom a community participation body may make a participation request. Adding a body to, or removing it from, the list is unlikely to generate controversy. An example of a power to amend a list of public bodies in a schedule to primary legislation which is subject to negative procedure can be found in section 4(1) of the Freedom of Information (Scotland) Act 2000. In these circumstances it is considered that subjecting the exercise of the power to negative procedure is appropriate.

b) The reference to the Scottish Ministers in the Delegated Powers Memorandum in relation to section 16(2) was an error.

Part 4 – Community Right to Buy Land

7. Section 28(6) – duty to provide information about community right to buy

The power in the new section 34(4B) of the 2003 Act, as inserted by section 28(6) of the Bill, appears to be subject to the negative procedure while the DPM refers to the power being subject to the affirmative procedure. Section 98(5) of the 2003 Act, as amended by paragraph 4 of schedule 4 to the Bill, provides that regulations made under the new section 34(4A) will be subject to the affirmative procedure, but there is no reference to regulations made under the new section 34(4B), the effect of which would appear to be to leave such regulations to take the negative procedure.

Can the Scottish Government explain whether this is an error or, if the Scottish Government intends the power to be subject to the negative procedure, can it explain why this is considered appropriate?

The Scottish Government agree that the new section 34(4B) of the 2003 Act, as inserted by section 28(6) of the Bill, is subject to the negative procedure but that it would be appropriate for this power to be subjective to affirmative procedure, as stated in the DPM.

8. New section 97C of the 2003 Act – eligible land

a) Can the Scottish Government provide more information as to how it envisages using the power in the new section 97C(2) of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 (“the 2003 Act”)? The DPM refers only to the power being used to prescribe matters which are “too detailed to include in the primary legislation”. Can the Scottish Government provide any examples of matters which it is intended will be prescribed in regulations made in exercise of this power so as to inform the Committee’s consideration of the power?

b) The Scottish Government is asked for a fuller explanation as to the relationship between the powers in the new section 97C(3)(a), 97C(3)(b) and 97C(4) of the 2003 Act, as inserted by section 48 of the Bill. How is it considered that these powers will interact?

c) Does the Scottish Government agree that the power in section 97C(3)(a) enables Ministers to add prescribed classes of building back into the ‘pool’ of eligible land to which the new Part 3A applies despite the fact that such buildings may constitute an individual’s home? Can the Scottish Government provide any examples of classes of building or structure which it intends to prescribe in regulations made in exercise of this power?

(a) The matters that Ministers should take account of in considering whether land is wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected is currently under discussion with stakeholders. Some examples of matters might include the physical condition of land, environmental or historic designations affecting the land and the extent to which the land is having a detrimental effect on the local environment, where environment can be physical or social.

(b) The relationship between the various powers is that that section 97C(3)(a) provides that land on which there is an individual’s home is not eligible land but this doesn’t apply to classes or descriptions of land set out in regulations. This will enable exceptions to be made should this be considered appropriate in the future. Section 97C(3)(b) will enable regulations to provide that land associated with an individual’s home such as private gardens and land forming the curtilage of the home will not be eligible land, and section 97C(4) allows regulations to be made treating buildings or structures as homes and so the land which these are situated on will not be eligible land. For example a house that is used just for holidays and which doesn’t constitute an individual’s home could be treated as a home and so the land which it is on would not be eligible land.

(c) Section 97C(3)(a) enables Ministers to add prescribed classes of building back into the ‘pool’ of eligible land to which the new Part 3A applies. At this point in time, we are not able to give specific examples, but this power allows for flexibility. We would of course be happy to consider changes if the Committee feel it would be of benefit to the Bill.

9. Section 97E(4) - power to make an order relating to matters connected with the acquisition of the land

Can the Scottish Government explain how the power in the new section 97E(4) is intended to be exercised and why it requires to be drawn in such wide terms? Can the Government provide any examples of the kinds of modifications to primary legislation that the Scottish Government anticipates making in exercise of this power as permitted by the provision in section 97E(5)?

The underlying reason behind the power in section 97E(4) is to ensure that the process for buying back land from a community body is open and transparent as well as robust. There are examples of similar powers e.g. sections 1 and 2 of the Transport and Works (Scotland) Act 2007.

10. Section 97F(6) – power to modify the information and documents that are to be contained in the Register of Community Interests in Abandoned or Neglected Land

The Scottish Government is asked to explain further its reasons for taking the power to modify new sections 97F(3) and (4) of the 2003 Act as inserted by section 48 of the Bill. In particular, can the Government explain the circumstances in which it considers that it may be appropriate to modify those subsections given that they exempt, in circumstances where a Part 3A community body requires it, any information or documents relating to the raising or expenditure of money by that body from being entered in the Register of Community Interests in Abandoned or Neglected Land?

There is already a similar power in respect of the Register of Community Interests in Land in Part 2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 (section 36(6)) so the power in section 97F(6) ensure that Parts 2 and 3A are consistent. It is allows the Register to be kept relevant should there be any changes to the requirements of community bodies, or the information that they are required, by law, to provide.

11. Section 97G(5)(c) – power to prescribe information in an application form for Ministers to consent to a Part 3A community body’s right to buy a) The Scottish Government is asked to justify the power in section 97G(5)(c) as distinct from the power in section 97G(5)(a). The DPM provides the same information in respect of both powers, however the power in section 97G(5)(a) is a power to prescribe the form of an application under Part 3A of the 2003 Act, whereas the power in section 97G(5)(c) is a power to prescribe kinds of information to be included in such a form, or to accompany such a form.

b) Can the Scottish Government explain why this power is necessary, and can it provide examples of the types of information it intends to prescribe in regulations made in exercise of this power?

These powers allow the style of the form, and the information contained in that form, to be set out in regulations. These are two separate things, hence the need for the two powers. There are examples of the sort of form (both in terms of style and content) anticipated in The Community Right to Buy (Prescribed Form of Application and Notices) (Scotland) Regulations 2009.
12. Sections 97N(1) and 97N(3) – effect of Ministers’ decision on right to buy a) The Scottish Government is asked whether the word “prescribed”, as used multiple times in the drafting of the new section 97N of the 2003 Act is intended to capture the definition of that term as set out in section 98(1) of the 2003 Act with the effect that new section 97N confers multiple powers to make subordinate legislation, or whether the matters which may be “prescribed” as referred to in that new section are intended to form specific aspects of the two standalone powers expressly conferred by sections 97N(1) and 97N(3).

b) If the Scottish Government does not intend for the word “prescribed” to adopt the definition in section 98(1) of the 2003 Act when it is used in section 97N, can it explain how the Bill prevents this?

Section 98(1) of the 2003 Act defines “prescribed” for the Act and provides that it means “prescribed by regulations made by Ministers”. We agree that the use of “prescribed” in section 97N attracts that definition. Each time the expression is used in section 97N it effectively confers power to specify something in regulations. These powers operate in the context of the powers in section 97N(1) and (3). For example, in section 97N(1) “prescribed period” means the period set out in regulations made by Ministers prohibiting the transfer or other dealing in certain land.

Part 5 – Asset Transfer Requests

13. Section 51(2) – power to modify schedule 3

The Scottish Government is asked whether, given that the power in section 51(2) of the Bill permits the modification of primary legislation, this power should be subject to the affirmative procedure.

This power provides flexibility to make future changes to the list of relevant authorities in schedule 3. The power to amend the primary legislation is restricted to amending the list of public bodies to whom a community transfer body may make an asset transfer request. Adding a body to, or removing it from, the list is unlikely to generate controversy. An example of a power to amend a list of public bodies in a schedule to primary legislation which is subject to negative procedure can be found in section 4(1) of the Freedom of Information (Scotland) Act 2000. In these circumstances it is considered that subjecting the exercise of the power to negative procedure is appropriate.

14. Section 54(1) – power to make further provision about asset transfer requests

The Scottish Government is asked why this power requires to be drawn in such wide terms. The specification of particular matters about which regulations may be made in exercise of this power does not appear to restrict the overall width of the power, and consequently the power would appear to be capable of being used to make different provision, subject only to the requirement that that provision be “about asset transfer requests”. The Government is invited to explain why such a wide power is considered to be necessary.

Section 54(2) sets out some of the general scope of the matters which it is envisaged that the regulations relating to asset transfer requests will deal with and the wording of section 54(1) is to ensure flexibility so that other matters which it may be appropriate to include could be included if necessary. As the Committee point out the power is limited by the requirement that the regulations only enable provisions to be made in relation to asset transfer requests and, as the Delegated Powers Memorandum states, the further provision that may be required regarding process and procedure is a largely administrative matter.

15. Section 58(3) and 59(3) – power to prescribe asset transfer request appeal and review procedures, time limits and the manner in which appeals and reviews are to be conducted

a) The Scottish Government is asked for further explanation of the meaning of sections 58(4) and 59(4) of the Bill, which provide that the provision that may be made by virtue of the powers in section 58(3) or 59(3) to prescribe the procedure to be followed in an appeal against or a review of a decision on an asset transfer request includes provision that the manner in which an appeal or review, or any stage of an appeal or review, is to be conducted is to be at the discretion of, respectively, the Scottish Ministers or the local authority.

b) The Scottish Government is asked to explain what aspects of an appeal or review it considers might be made subject to the discretion of the Scottish Ministers or the local authority in exercise of these powers, and why the Government considers that that would be appropriate, as opposed to specifying the appeals procedure in the subordinate legislation that is made under sections 58(3) or 59(3).

Section 58(4) and 59(4) follow the approach taken in relation to appeal processes in planning (see section 267(1C) of the Town and Country Planning (Scotland) Act 1997). The intention is that the regulations setting out appeal processes would enable the choice of appeal procedure to be flexible and selected in particular cases to meet the needs of that case. It is envisaged, as with planning appeals, that the selection of the appropriate process for conducting the appeal, for example, by written submission or a form of hearing, or mix of procedures would be determined by the Scottish Ministers in the light of the circumstances of each case.

Part 7 – Allotments

16. Section 73(1) – Allotment site regulations: additional provision

Can the Scottish Government explain why the power in section 73(1) is proposed to be exercised by the local authority by way of regulations rather than, for example, by way of byelaws subject to confirmation by the Scottish Ministers (as under section 202 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973)? If it is considered appropriate for the power to be exercised by the local authority by regulations, can the Scottish Government explain why there are no proposals for the regulations to be confirmed by the Scottish Ministers or laid before Parliament, or otherwise to be subject to scrutiny?

The Scottish Government does not consider that the power in section 73(1) falls within the scope of byelaws. Section 201 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973 (“the 1973 Act”) confers power on local authorities to make byelaws, “for the good rule and government of the whole or any part of their area, and for the prevention and suppression of nuisances therein”. Contravention of byelaws is generally dealt with by summary prosecution. The current approach has been taken since the Regulations are not principally intended to address nuisance and as such carry no criminal sanctions. The sanctions are that the lease holder would be given notice to quit the allotment.

The Scottish Government does not consider it necessary for the regulations proposed under section 73(1) to be confirmed by the Scottish Ministers, laid before Parliament, or otherwise subject to scrutiny. The Scottish Government notes that byelaws made under the 1973 Act have no effect until confirmed (section 202(3)), however contravention of byelaws will generally carry criminal sanctions. Management rules under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 (to which the Scottish Government considers the proposed regulations more similar) are not subject to confirmation or other scrutiny. In line with the procedure for making management rules, section 74 of the Bill requires local authorities to consult interested persons and provides for a period of notice with an opportunity for representations before regulations under section 73(1) are made. Given the relatively narrow purpose of such regulations and the absence of offences relating to their contravention, the Scottish Government does not consider scrutiny by the Scottish Ministers or Parliament to be required.

17. Section 80(7) – power to remove unauthorised buildings from allotment sites

Can the Scottish Government explain further the intended purpose of the power in section 80(7) and in particular what further provision, standing the procedural requirements already contained in section 80(5) and (6), the power in section 80(7) might be used to make?

Section 80(7) permits, but does not require, the Scottish Ministers to expand upon the detail of the procedure set down in sections 80(5) and 80(6). At this point in time, we are unable to give specific examples of what further provision this power might be used to make, but the power allows for flexibility. We would of course be happy to consider changes if the Committee feel it would be of benefit to the Bill.
Annex C – Letter from the Scottish Government:

Section 97N(1) and (3) of new Part 3A of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 ("2003 Act") (to be inserted by section 48 of the Bill) confers powers on the Scottish Ministers to make regulations. Section 98(1) of the 2003 Act defines "prescribed" for the purposes of the 2003 Act and provides that it means "prescribed by regulations made by [the Scottish] Ministers". The use of "prescribed" in section 97N has, and is intended to have, the meaning given in section 98(1) of the 2003 Act.

Regulations made under section 97N(1) and (3) will be subject to the affirmative procedure (see paragraph 2(5)(a)(ii) of schedule 4 to the Bill which will amend section 98(5) of the 2003 Act).

Section 97N(1) confers powers on the Scottish Ministers to make regulations prohibiting the transfer of land or otherwise dealing with land if a Part 3A community body has made an application under section 97G for consent from the Scottish Ministers to exercise the right to buy that land. Subsection (1) further provides that those regulations can specify: (a) the period of the prohibition; and (b) the persons who are prohibited from transferring or otherwise dealing with the land during that period.

Subsection (2) sets out particular matters that may be included in any regulations made under subsection (1). Subsection (2) is not a free-standing power. It provides some detail of the provision that may be made in regulations made under section 97N(1).

So for example, the power conferred by section 97N(1) would enable the Scottish Ministers to make regulations setting out that, from when the landowner has received notice of an application made by a Part 3A community body until the Scottish Ministers have determined the application, the landowner is prohibited from transferring or otherwise dealing in the land that is the subject of the application. The regulations could also make provision for exceptions to this prohibition. The regulations would be made under section 97N(1) and would specify the period of the prohibition and also specify the persons to whom the prohibition applies. In making exceptions to the prohibition, the Scottish Ministers would still be making use of the power in subsection (1) as further described in subsection (2).

Section 97N(3) confers power on the Scottish Ministers to make regulations making provision for suspending rights in or over land in respect of which a Part 3A community has made an application under section 97G. This subsection further provides that the regulations may specify: (a) the period during which the rights are to be suspended; and (2) the rights that are to be suspended during that period. Subsection (4) provides that any regulations made under subsection (3) may include provision specifying any rights that are not to be suspended and any rights to which the regulations do not apply in certain circumstances. These are examples of the kind of provision that may be made in regulations made under subsection (3). Subsection (4) is not a free-standing power. It provides some detail of the provision that may be made in regulations made under section 97N(3).

Decisions on Taking Business in Private

The Convener (Nigel Don): I welcome members to the 27th meeting in 2014 of the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee. I ask everyone to make sure that they have turned off their mobile phones.

The first agenda item is to take decisions on taking business in private. It is proposed that we take items 9 and 11 in private. Item 9 will be further consideration of the oral evidence on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill that we will hear today. It is also suggested that we take future stage 1 consideration of the bill in private. Item 11 is consideration of a draft report on instruments that were considered by the committee in 2013-14. Does the committee agree to take items 9 and 11 in private?

Members indicated agreement.

The Convener: Does the committee also agree to take in private further stage 1 consideration of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill?

Members indicated agreement.

The Convener: Members should also note that, in line with a previous decision of the committee, item 10 will also be held in private.

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

10:02

The Convener: Agenda item 2 is oral evidence on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. This allows the committee to follow up on matters in relation to the bill that it previously raised in writing with the Scottish Government.

I welcome the first panel of a cast of thousands: Ian Turner is the bill team leader, Norman Macleod and Rachel Rayner are from the Scottish Government legal directorate, Dave Thomson is from the land reform and tenancy unit, Dr Amanda Fox is food and drink policy leader and Anne-Marie Conlong is from the performance unit. Good morning one and all. We will test you a great deal this morning, but I hope that it will not take forever because we also have to hear from lots of lawyers later on.

Stewart Stevenson (Banffshire and Buchan Coast) (SNP): I want to start by looking at how the legislation provides for determining the national outcomes, and the role of Parliament in seeing whether those are met. Before I ask my questions I want to go back to the progenitor of Scotland performs, which is, of course, the Virginia performs model. In particular, I want to explore, perhaps with Mr Turner and Ms Conlong, the extent to which the Virginia performs model has been examined. That model differs in certain ways from how our bill is constructed, in that the council on Virginia’s future, which essentially determines the targets, is not simply a Government body, but requires the inclusion of the majority and minority leaders from each house—they are part of the body that sets the targets. In that context, there is a role for a more widely based, rather than simply Government-driven, setting of the targets.

To what extent have officials and ministers looked at the Virginia performs model and the council on Virginia’s future in deciding how to take the bill forward?

Anne-Marie Conlong (Scottish Government): I am happy to take that question. Back in 2007—and before that, when Scotland performs was being developed—there was a huge amount of research and liaison with the people who were involved in Virginia performs. A lot of what happened there informed and led across to Scotland performs. Stewart Stevenson is absolutely right that the key difference is around the council on Virginia’s future; that leads me to the difference between that approach and what we propose in the bill.
The Scottish Government believes that what we have set out in the provisions reflects the current separation of powers between the Scottish Government and the Parliament. It would be for the Scottish ministers to co-ordinate Government business and to set out the strategic direction for Government—within its overall accountability to the Parliament, of course—and the Parliament would exercise a scrutiny function, holding ministers to account on progress towards the national outcomes and objectives. Of course, the Scottish Parliament may wish to debate the national outcomes as set by Scottish ministers, and the arrangements that are proposed would not prevent that in any way.

I will pick up on your point about the widely based element of the outcomes in Virginia performs. Part of the work that we are doing under Mr Swinney and the round table that is chaired by him—which is quite a diverse group of stakeholders as it includes cross-party support from the Parliament, and key civic organisations in Scotland such as the Carnegie Trust and Oxfam Scotland, as well as some academics—involves working together to develop an improved Scotland performs. In fact, that is where the impetus to put provisions in the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill came from. The national outcomes will therefore be widely consulted on. In the provisions, we have left the basis for that consultation as open as possible so that as many people as possible, including the whole of the public of Scotland, where that is appropriate, can be consulted. That is a broad base for setting the national outcomes.

The fundamental difference from what we propose in the bill is that, as Stewart Stevenson said, the council on Virginia's future is quite separate. We are more than happy to take back for further consideration with ministers the committee’s views on the respective roles of the Scottish Parliament and the Scottish Government in setting the outcomes.

Stewart Stevenson: This committee’s role is restricted and is not to look at the broader policy issues. It simply relates to whether the construction in the bill that is before us is appropriate. The policy committee will perhaps pick up some of the points that you make.

I am simply trying to explore the process to ensure that what we have in the bill properly reflects the policy outcome. I note that the Virginia performs framework and the council on Virginia’s future were established not by ministerial fiat but by the governing legislation that was passed in Virginia. I just want to be clear that that is forming part of the consideration. From the answer that I have had, I think that we as a committee should properly conclude that that is the case, even if there might be different views elsewhere, in respect of policy.

I note that the bill makes no specific provisions on persons or bodies that should be consulted about national outcomes. It seems that you would be able to identify particular bodies that you would consult. Is there any particular reason why we do not see a list in the bill?

Anne-Marie Conlong: The intention is to leave the potential scope for consultation as broad as possible. That is something that our stakeholders have been very keen on. In some cases, a review of the national outcomes might focus on a specialised or specific issue, in which case only certain bodies or persons would be consulted, because that would be the most appropriate thing to do. In other cases, the consultation might be much wider because the review of the outcomes is of a much more general nature.

The intention behind not listing bodies was not to limit or narrow in any way the scope of the bodies and people who can be consulted. However, if the committee thinks that the bill should include a minimum list of bodies, we can consider doing that, but we would be clear that we do not want to limit the scope of potential consultation in any future review.

Stewart Stevenson: It would not be for this committee to suggest who should be on such a list. That would be a policy matter.

The point on which I want to be clear is whether consideration has properly been given to the possibility of involving some people or bodies in looking at the whole thing, while ensuring that the bill does not restrict consultation. I assume that consultation has taken place on exactly that point. I see that you are nodding.

Anne-Marie Conlong: Yes.

Stewart Stevenson: Right. I will move on.

The bill makes no provision for regular periods of reporting, unless I have misread it. Is there a reason for that?

Anne-Marie Conlong: Again, the intention was to keep some flexibility. Currently, the Scotland performs website is the reporting tool for the national outcomes. The approach is unique, in that the website is constantly updated, as soon as new data become available. This might also be a policy matter, but we have debated with our colleagues around the table whether a report that is static would be helpful and whether such a report would add to the existing reporting process. How we might maintain the constant dynamic reporting of Scotland performs while providing regular reports, if there is an appetite for them, is still under consideration.
Stewart Stevenson: In the context of formulating policy, the bill provides that public bodies beyond Government will have a duty to “have regard to” the outcomes that are set, while not placing such a duty on the Government itself. Was there a reason for that? Let me characterise the position in the most extreme way: the Government gets to choose the questions for the exam sheet and then answers them, but that is not the case for other public bodies.

Anne-Marie Conlong: I assume that the Scottish Parliament’s scrutiny role is to hold the Government to account on the national outcomes. If the outcomes are set based on broad public and civic consultation, there is a collective view of what they should be and progress against them would be tested on a wide consultative basis.

Stewart Stevenson: I will ask one more question. The Government has brought together a group, which includes Opposition representatives, but there is no direct parliamentary input. We have a range of bodies and individuals, who represent a range of political views, but there is no process in the bill for the Parliament to be part of that. Is that correct?

Anne-Marie Conlong: That is correct, as the bill stands.

Stewart Stevenson: Okay. It is important to get that on the record, so that we understand the position.

The Convener: I will pursue that issue. If we are talking about the outcomes providing a framework to which other people must have regard—I take the comment about things being subject to parliamentary scrutiny, as we would expect in a parliamentary democracy—it seems strange that there is no mechanism for the Government to bring to Parliament an affirmative statutory instrument setting out the principles, which we could consider and then reject or approve. I am struggling to understand why there will be no such process.

Anne-Marie Conlong: As I said, the position until now has been that the provisions reflect the Scottish Government view of the separation of powers between scrutiny and the setting of the strategic direction of Government. That has been the thinking up to now, but we welcome the committee’s views and can consider the matter further with ministers.

The Convener: I argue that we will always scrutinise such things, but we must find them before we can do so. If the Government does not set out its approach in a form into which a parliamentary committee can get its teeth, there will be only peripheral scrutiny, which is not a good process.

Anne-Marie Conlong: At the moment, Scotland performs is set out publicly—all the information is publicly available. In fact, both last year and this year, we have assisted parliamentary committees with scrutiny of the draft budget by producing performance score cards for each of the committees. There are processes available, albeit that they are not laid out formally in statute. Scotland performs information is publicly available and has been well used by Parliament to scrutinise performance.

The Convener: At the risk of pursuing the issue too far, I make the point that, if a set of things to which public bodies must have regard is set out in law, they ought, I suggest, to be laid out in such a way that a parliamentary committee—ours or another—could scrutinise those things instead of having to work its way round and generate some debate about the general principles that we think we have. There seems to be a process point there, which I think is what worries us.

Anne-Marie Conlong: I am certainly happy to take that point away.

The Convener: Thank you. That completes that line of questioning, unless other members have questions on it.

We move on to question 5, which will be asked by John Scott.

John Scott (Ayr) (Con): Sections 4(6), 8(3), 16(2), 16(3) and 51(2) are all broadly concerned with the procedure to be applied to powers that enable bodies to be added to or removed from the lists in the schedules to the bill. In the bill, the power to add or remove a body is subject to negative procedure. In that regard, you draw a parallel with the Freedom of Information (Scotland) Act 2002.

However, a different approach has been taken in more recent acts, with the power to add a body being subject to affirmative procedure and the power to remove a body being subject to negative procedure. That approach has been taken in the Public Services Reform (Scotland) Act 2010 and the Regulatory Reform (Scotland) Act 2014. Why have you not adopted that more recent approach? In particular, why have you chosen to apply negative and not affirmative procedure to the power to add a body to a list?

Ian Turner (Scottish Government): The powers provide the flexibility to make changes, should that be necessary. Across the bill, the powers in the relevant provisions are limited to amending the list of public bodies that can be involved.
We believe that such regulations would be unlikely to generate any controversy, so because there is unlikely to be an issue at that stage, negative procedure would be the more appropriate procedure to use.

John Scott: Right.

Ian Turner: I appreciate the point that you made about more recent acts, and we would be happy to consider the views of the committee.

John Scott: I think that our view would be to ask why there should be a sudden reduction of standards, as it were. I am happy to have made the point; I will leave it at that and leave it for others to say more.

The Convener: The point is well made, but I suspect that the problem is that, without knowing the circumstances that are being referred to, it is not obvious which process it would be desirable to use. I suppose that we would tend to give the Government the benefit of the doubt and assume that it would consult on things that needed to be consulted on, and would not lay a negative instrument if it had not consulted the appropriate people.

Ian Turner: Absolutely.

The Convener: In practice, therefore, the procedures might be almost the same.

Ian Turner: Yes, I think that that is our view. The bill has gone through a hugely consultative process, with individual consultations being followed by more detailed consultation on the draft bill. That is what we intend to do with regulations in the future.

The Convener: I suspect that making the point is all that we can do for the moment.

John Scott: As parliamentarians, we do not want to see a reduction in parliamentary scrutiny, and the answers that have been given suggest that there will be a reduction in parliamentary scrutiny, which is a departure from what we have been used to. Is that a fair comment?

Ian Turner: Negative procedure would still be used. That certainly represents a reduction in scrutiny compared with the use of affirmative procedure, but we believe that the use of negative procedure is appropriate in relation to the powers as they stand.

Stuart McMillan (West Scotland) (SNP): Good morning, panel.

I have some questions about section 10 of the bill. There is a possibility that they may stray into policy matters, in which case I understand that you would not be able to answer them, but I will pose them and we will take it from there.

Section 10 provides that community planning partnerships and partners must carry out their functions in relation to community planning in accordance with any relevant guidance that is issued by the Scottish ministers. Why is it proposed that the guidance under section 10 will be binding on community planning partnerships and partners, rather than that they will be required to have regard to it?

Ian Turner: That became an important point during the process of developing the bill. The intention is that section 10 will be used for community planning partnerships, which have been in place for a number of years, although we are putting them on a statutory footing under the bill. The section should ensure a consistency of approach to community planning throughout Scotland. We want local discretion and local innovation in how community planning is approached and dealt with, but there might be some matters that we feel are fundamental enough to apply on a national level, hence the reason to comply with national guidance.

Stuart McMillan: You are aware that I also sit on the Local Government and Regeneration Committee, as we met last week.

Ian Turner: Yes.

Stuart McMillan: Over the past few years, much of the work that has been undertaken by that committee has highlighted that point regarding community planning partnerships. Much of the community-facing work that we have undertaken has highlighted the stark differences in the public understanding and knowledge of community planning partnerships.

At the same time, one key issue that has been raised time and again has been the perception of a top-down approach, with the Government—of whatever hue—imposing restrictions on local government and community planning partnerships. What was the thinking, not so much behind putting community planning partnerships into statute, but behind what is proposed in section 10 in relation to guidance?

Ian Turner: The community planning part of the bill feels a bit top down, because it places duties on the statutory partners. It is not possible to place duties on voluntary or community bodies in that way. The proposed statute has the feeling of a top-down approach, but we are trying to use those duties to ensure that community bodies participate and resource the process properly.

There might be processes within that involving emerging best practice that we wish to be actively promoted and encouraged. As you heard at the Local Government and Regeneration Committee last week, that involves a culture change within the public sector, to some extent. The issue is how to engaging community bodies and how to get them to participate. We think that the guidance can help with that process of culture change.

Stuart McMillan: Could some of that culture change and some of those methods not happen through other routes, such as the benchmarking tool that the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities has recently established?

Ian Turner: Absolutely. Those routes are not ruled out; the guidance is in addition to those.

Stuart McMillan: How do you foresee the power in section 10 being utilised?

Ian Turner: It is hard to know at the moment. As I was saying in response to a previous question, the guidance will be subject to quite a lot of consultation before we put it out. There will be consultation with public sector and community bodies, and with all the interested partners that we have had throughout the bill process. It is hard to say what particular provisions will be used for, but that will emerge from the process.

Stuart McMillan: Is there an opportunity for Parliament to be involved in that consultative process and for it to discuss any guidance?

Ian Turner: There is always an opportunity for Parliament to discuss it. There is no specific provision on that in section 10, and we are aware of that. If the committee would wish to include such a provision, I am certainly happy to consider that.

Stuart McMillan: Would you consider it an appropriate use of parliamentary time to consider the use of guidance or scrutiny?

Ian Turner: It would sometimes depend on the guidance, which might go into a lot of detail. You might not necessarily want a negative or affirmative procedure; you might just want the guidance to be laid before you, and you might not require to use any further processes.

Mike MacKenzie (Highlands and Islands) (SNP): New section 97C(3)(a) of the 2003 act, in new part 3A, provides that other than buildings or structures that may be set out in regulations by ministers. It appears, therefore, that ministers may make regulations that have the effect of applying the provisions of the new part 3A to buildings or structures that constitute an individual’s home. Can you explain in more detail why you have taken that power? In your response to written questions on the matter, you suggest that it is to allow for flexibility. What other factors did you take into account when taking that power?

Dave Thomson (Scottish Government): The flexibility on those powers is the key part at the moment. The policy intent is not to take people’s homes away in any circumstances, but still to allow community bodies to take control of assets. Essentially, the powers that we are looking to take on through that provision are simply to allow that flexibility to set out in detail the types of buildings or assets that can be included or excluded. At the moment, we do not have specific examples, hence the current need for flexibility in the powers.

Mike MacKenzie: I am sure that you appreciate the need to get that right, though. There will be lawyers across the country scratching their heads and hanging on every word, I suspect. It is a wee bit disappointing that you have not got to a stage in your thinking where you are able to provide more detail.

I will move on. When previously asked to justify the width of the power in new section 97E(4) of the 2003 act, the Government cited examples of similar powers in sections 1 and 2 of the Transport and Works (Scotland) Act 2007. However, the connection between those powers and the powers in section 97E(4) is not wholly apparent to the committee. Can you shed light on that?

Dave Thomson: The connection between the two is largely to do with process. Rachel Rayner may be better at explaining the legal connections.

Rachel Rayner (Scottish Government): I can take you quickly through the power in the Transport and Works (Scotland) Act 2007, section 1 of which gives ministers a power to make an order relating to, or to matters connected with, construction of transport systems or inland waterways. Section 2 goes on to set out matters about which provision can be made in such an order, and the schedule makes it clear that that includes compulsory acquisition of land. Section 2 goes on to provide that the order that ministers can make can apply, modify or exclude enactments relating to those matters.

That is used as an example because the power that we are proposing in new section 97E of the 2003 act would enable ministers to make a process for acquiring land, and that could be done by modifying existing processes for compulsory acquisition, if that was thought to be an appropriate way of achieving what was wanted. The aim of taking the power is to ensure that, where ministers have the power to compulsorily acquire land, there is a fair, robust, open and transparent process for doing that. The detail that you are asking about is just a means of making that happen. Rather than writing out a process longhand, you could apply existing legislation but modify it to suit the particular purpose.
Mike MacKenzie: I am glad that you are talking about modification, because I am quite sure that you are aware that the existing provisions are not without their problems. How can you justify the width of the power in new section 97E(4)? I understand that it apparently makes sense to use something that works reasonably well in practice, but how can you justify the width of the power?

Rachel Rayner: It is so that the power is wide enough to ensure that the process that would need to be put in place should that happen is fair, transparent and robust. If you have concerns about the power, I would be happy to consider them.

John Scott: Is it subject to parliamentary scrutiny?

Rachel Rayner: Yes, it is subject to the affirmative procedure.

Mike MacKenzie: Why has the power in new section 97E(4) been drawn in such wide terms, and have you considered restricting it?

10:30

Rachel Rayner: We would be happy to take away any particular concerns and consider them further. I should point out, though, that this power for ministers to acquire such land compulsorily can be used only in limited circumstances. What the regulations will set out is not when ministers can acquire the land but the process for exercising the power, to ensure that the process is transparent and fair and includes the appropriate detail.

Mike MacKenzie: Do you have any examples of the kinds of modifications to primary legislation that the Scottish Government expects to make in the exercise of this power as permitted by the provision in proposed new section 97E(5) of the 2003 act?

Rachel Rayner: I cannot give you any such examples at the moment, although the power would give us the opportunity to modify and apply existing compulsory acquisition schemes, if that was thought to be the most appropriate approach.

Mike MacKenzie: I am sure that you appreciate that some of this is going to be quite contentious. Although that is a policy matter, there is nevertheless an interlinking between policy and this committee’s work that is quite crucial to the successful operation of this bill—or the act, when it becomes an act. Thank you very much for your responses.

John Scott: Going back to a previous question that I think is linked to this issue, I am disappointed to hear that, despite the massive powers that you are assuming, you have no idea of the sorts of assets that you would be considering as eligible for compulsory purchase. Can you try a little harder to give us some idea? I should of course declare an interest as a landowner and farmer, which means that the issue is of specific interest to me and certainly to many others.

Dave Thomson: Going back to the issue of flexibility, I said at the beginning of the session that this provision will allow us to ensure that a person’s home, for example, or the land that they use is not taken off them. As for the width of the powers, one of the changes made by the bill is that the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 will now apply to urban as well as rural situations. That means that a whole different set of issues needs to be taken into consideration, and we are considering some way of ensuring that what we put in the bill covers both urban and rural areas. As you will appreciate, they are two completely different beasts as far as assets are concerned, and the bottom line is that we want to get things right.

We need flexibility at this stage until we manage to narrow down the sorts of buildings, land and other assets that we would like to include or exclude from this provision. At the moment, we are certainly not talking about homes or land that is being used constructively. The whole basis of the provision is to ensure the sustainable development of land; we want to include community purchases of assets or land that help us in that aim, and we are not interested in simply having some means of acquiring assets that do not result in the sustainable development of land. That is why we are still considering the issue and why, I am afraid to say, I cannot give you any more specific examples.

Rachel Rayner: Obviously any regulations made by ministers would have to comply with the European convention on human rights. As you will be aware, article 8 of the ECHR provides a right to respect for private and family life, which would include respect for a person’s home, and that would have to be taken into account were the power to be used.

John Scott: My next question was actually going to be about whether the provision was ECHR compliant. The committee has, in its recent history, dealt with a problem with the legislation relating to 1991 tenancies. You have constantly referred to a transparent and fair process, but in that example there was a judgment by, I think, the Supreme Court that turned on the fact that the legislation was not fair to both parties. I trust, therefore, that this legislation will endeavour to be fair to all sides; otherwise we will be back in the position of making legislation that is subsequently knocked down.
The Convener: Thank you for your answers. Again, we are looking at a fairly wide-ranging piece of legislation that has fairly wide powers. Officials such as you come along, absolutely rightly, and in perfectly good faith, tell us that there is no intention of doing this, this, this and this. We understand that, and it is undoubtedly what the Government wants.

However, once upon a time, there was a principle that we only legislated for what we wanted and the man in the street was defended against the misuse of power because the Government was never given that power. Increasingly, we seem to be looking at legislation that gives Government very wide powers and Parliament is having to trust the Government not to abuse those powers, which is not difficult to do. I am conscious that the specific purpose of everything is in the top line of the bill and we could not use any of the powers in the bill for a purpose that was not within the purpose of the bill. Nonetheless, I get the impression that we are increasingly looking at bills that are just widening the scope of what the Government has within its discretion, and there is part of me, as a parliamentarian, that is slightly worried about that trend. However, as officials, that is not your problem of course.

I am grateful to you for your answers. We now go to a point of detail from Stewart Stevenson.

Stewart Stevenson: Thank you, convener. I want to explore the use of the word “prescribed” in the new section 97N that will be inserted in the 2003 act by section 48 of the bill. Section 98 of the 2003 act says:

“prescribed” means prescribed by regulations made by Ministers.

However, the new section 97N uses the word “prescribed” on a number of occasions, particularly in section 97N(1), which says:

“Ministers may by regulations make provision for or in connection with prohibiting, during the prescribed period, prescribed persons from transferring” and so on. It is not clear in the written answers that we have got that “prescribed period” and “prescribed persons” are subject to the definition in section 98 of the 2003 act and it will therefore have to be made clear through secondary legislation what the “prescribed period” and the “prescribed persons” are.

Rachel Rayner: Perhaps I can help you with that. We agree that “prescribed” will mean “prescribed by regulations made by Ministers” and that is what is intended in new section 97N. The use of the term “prescribed” that you have given will definitely be in regulations. The provision that you read out is a regulation power. Ministers may make regulations and those regulations may set out the period for which the restriction on a transfer of land may apply, and they may set out who can be restricted from transferring land. Those matters will be in regulations under section 97N(1) or 97N(3), both of which attract the affirmative procedure.

Stewart Stevenson: New section 97N(2)(b) mentions “prescribed persons” and “prescribed circumstances”, section 97N(2)(c) mentions “prescribed circumstances” and “prescribed information”, section 97N(3) mentions “prescribed period”, and section 97N(4) mentions “prescribed circumstances”. You are therefore confirming that, in each and every instance in new section 97N, the use of the word “prescribed” is as described in section 98.

Rachel Rayner: Yes. For example, new section 97N(2) sets out further detail of the regulations that may be made under section 97N(1). The same applies for section 97N(4), which has details about the provisions that may be made in regulations under section 97N(3). I can confirm that those examples you give will be matters in regulations.

Stewart Stevenson: Section 97N(3) uses the word “prescribed” without making backwards reference to section 97N(1).

Rachel Rayner: Section 97N(3) is a separate power. Section 97N(1) is about a power to make provision about restricting transfers of land during an application process. Section 97N(3) is about suspending rights over land such as, for example, possible rights to buy or pre-emption rights. That is a separate power in section 97N(3) and section 97N(4) provides further detail about that.

Stewart Stevenson: Right—I understand that. Let me test our mutual understanding of the issue by asking how many powers you think new section 97N creates for ministers to provide secondary legislation.

Rachel Rayner: In practice, I think that it provides two powers, because although the details about the prescribed period and the prescribed persons will have to be set out in regulations, they will all fall within regulations that are made under subsections (1) or (3).

Stewart Stevenson: What about “prescribed circumstances”, which is mentioned in subsection (4)?

Rachel Rayner: That is the same, because it relates back to regulations that are made under subsection (3). I would be happy to put the matter in writing if that would be of assistance.

Stewart Stevenson: It would be of assistance to me; the convener will decide whether it is of assistance to the committee. It is right to flag up the issue. It is technical, but we will have to be satisfied that we understand what we have been told today and what you subsequently write to us. At present, until we discuss the issue, we probably remain a little uncertain as to the effect of the use of the word “prescribed”.

The Convener: If you are able to set that down in writing, Ms Rayner, that would be helpful, not least because it would absolutely guarantee to you and your colleagues that you really have got it. I do not doubt you.

Rachel Rayner: Certainly—I am happy to do so.

Stuart McMillan: Section 54(1) gives the Scottish ministers a power to make further provision by regulation about asset transfer requests. The Government has explained that the power has been drawn relatively widely to allow for flexibility in the making of regulations relating to asset transfer requests. However, the committee still seeks clarity on the power. For example, could the power be used to make any further provision as long as it is about asset transfer requests?

Ian Turner: I think that that is for me again.

You are correct that the power has been deliberately drawn widely to deal with asset transfer requests—it is wide in the sense that it deals with that part of the bill. The detail that is set out in section 54(2) provides an indication of the areas in which we think the provision will mostly be used: the manner of requests; the procedures to be followed; and the information to be included on requests. However, section 54(2) does not provide an exhaustive list and issues might emerge during consultation on the regulations or during practice and in the light of experience. Potential problems or issues might arise that require regulations to do with asset transfer requests as a whole, which is why we think that the power might be useful. It is to ensure flexibility of approach.

Stuart McMillan: Has consideration been given to restricting the power in a way that still allows a degree of flexibility?

Ian Turner: Not at the moment, although we are happy to consider any improvements that could be made to the bill. Because asset transfers happen at the moment and we are putting in place a statutory framework for what they can do, issues might arise in the way in which the provisions are used by community transfer bodies or public sector organisations. We want to ensure that, without having to return to the bill as a whole, we can deal with some of those problems, if they arise, through regulations.

Stuart McMillan: Scotland is made up of a wide variety of communities. My take on what you have said is that the flexibility is to allow for, say, an island community to go through an asset transfer request process that might be somewhat different from the process in the likes of Glasgow, Edinburgh or Dundee. Is that correct?

Ian Turner: That is potentially the case. We want the process to be as consistent across Scotland as possible, but there might be instances in which communities require different things to get their transfer application going and into the procedure as defined by the bill. Often, such issues are about the pre-transfer process, and are to do with setting out the business case, how the community wants to use the asset, how it will maintain the asset and the income streams that there might be. That is probably not the sort of thing that we are talking about in the bill; it is probably to do with other guidance and funds that might be available to community transfer bodies.

Stuart McMillan: Is “probably” an accurate word to use, or should it be “definitely”?

Ian Turner: The word is probably “probably” at this stage.

Richard Baker (North East Scotland) (Lab): My questions relate to sections 58(4) and 59(4), which concern the powers that are laid out in sections 58(3) and 59(3). We asked you in correspondence about those powers and about why it is deemed appropriate for appeal procedures to be left to the discretion of the Scottish ministers or local authorities. Will you explain further which aspects of appeals or reviews the Government considers might be subject to the discretion of the Scottish ministers or local authorities?

Norman Macleod (Scottish Government): What exactly the regulations will contain has yet to be formulated, but there are powers to make regulations in connection with procedure. The provisions in the bill mirror closely the provisions that apply to appeals under planning legislation. Parallels with that can be drawn: the processes will be set out in the regulations under the bill, and the discretionary element will be up to the decision maker, who will decide in each case which of the processes should apply and how they will apply within the flexibility that the regulations allow. The model that is being used works in exactly the same terms for all appeals under planning and listed buildings legislation.

Richard Baker: Is that why the Scottish Government believes that it is adequate to leave the appeal procedures to the discretion of ministers or local authorities rather than to specify them in subordinate legislation?
Norman Macleod: I will give a more concrete example. The purpose is to allow the decision maker who is faced with determining the appeal or review to choose the process that they consider is best suited to enabling them to have in front of them the information that they need to reach a decision. Typically, that might involve a choice between using a written submissions procedure, which is likely to be set out in the regulations, or a hearings procedure, for which a process will be set out in the regulations.

Richard Baker: Why is the negative procedure considered appropriate, given that aspects of appeals and reviews will be left to the discretion of ministers or local authorities? Did you consider using the affirmative procedure?

Norman Macleod: The negative procedure is fairly standard for such procedural regulations. All the regulations on planning appeals are subject to negative resolution.

Ian Turner: We want the process to be as transparent, effective and efficient as possible. We have talked about having a fair process for all parties; that applies to the appeal procedures, too.

The Convener: Are we clear that the appeal process will be sufficiently disconnected from the Government to satisfy the requirement of being fair? When one party—the Government or a public organisation—is in any sense involved in the appeal process, it is always a worry that the process might be perceived to be biased in that body’s direction. Are we clear that the process will be adequately independent?

Ian Turner: The bill does not change much, as the decision maker is the authority in the end. The appeal process reviews the process that the authority followed. The bill does not change who makes the decision.

The Convener: I take it that the Government’s lawyers are confident that the process will be ECHR compliant.

Norman Macleod: Yes—certainly. We are confident of that. I make the general observation that somebody must be the appellate body. ECHR compliance in such contexts relies on the courts’ oversight. Ultimately, the courts have the power to consider how decisions were made, which makes any such administrative decisions ECHR compliant.

John Scott: Throughout the bill, there is a far greater assumption of powers by the Scottish ministers. Usually the sort of appeals that we are talking about are decided by the Scottish ministers. Unless I am missing the point, there is an inherent contradiction in there.

Norman Macleod: I do not see the contradiction. It might be helpful to draw a comparison with planning appeals. Ministers are the final port of call for planning appeals. There is judicial authority for these powers all being compliant with the ECHR. The reason for that is that the courts have the oversight necessary to ensure that the powers are exercised in accordance with law and through fair and transparent processes.

The Convener: But the potential difference in this case is that, whereas a planning appeal would only allow somebody to use land on the presumption that they owned it by the time that they wanted to use it, we are talking here about the ability to expropriate people’s land, are we not?

Ian Turner: No, not in the asset transfer provisions.

The Convener: Okay.

John Scott: Would it be fair to say that there is a significant assumption of extra powers by the Scottish ministers throughout the bill, without apparent justification—such as in respect of asset transfer and the power of compulsory purchase—along with an apparently reduced level of parliamentary scrutiny? Would that be a fair summary?

Ian Turner: I do not think that that is true in relation to asset transfers. Asset transfers can happen at the moment, and they often do.

John Scott: I mean in the generality. Things that were previously looked at under the affirmative procedure are now to be looked at under the negative procedure. There seems to be a great deal of movement towards that. I am certainly no expert—I am the first to admit that—but it appears to me that the level of parliamentary scrutiny is reducing. Is that a fair comment?

Norman Macleod: It is not, in the context of the question that we were originally asked on section 58.

John Scott: I am sorry—I was widening it out to the generality, rather than asking about the particular. I was perhaps too early in my summary of the points.

Ian Turner: We do not think that there is a general reduction in parliamentary scrutiny. In fact, including a statutory process for things such as asset transfer requests means that there is an increased amount of scrutiny in the process generally.

Richard Baker: I have a final quick question regarding the process and the appeal of decisions. You talked about ECHR compliance, which ultimately would be determined by the courts. It does not strengthen the hand of ministers and local authorities if the process is laid out more clearly in primary legislation and there is therefore a standard process to follow, rather than what seems to be a potentially quite ad hoc arrangement.

Norman Macleod: There is a power to make regulations to set out processes and how appeals and reviews will be conducted. Those will be set out and transparent. The discretionary element that will not be set out is really a matter of choice in relation to processes, including choices within those processes. There needs to be that flexibility for the system to work efficiently.

Stewart Stevenson: I seek officials’ confirmation about the difference between affirmative and negative instruments. It seems to me that the opportunity for scrutiny is the same for both. What is different is that a negative instrument can have immediate effect, whereas an affirmative instrument requires the consent of Parliament before it has effect. In fact, the distinction between the two lies in when they take effect and the process by which they may be undone, rather than the parliamentary process around scrutiny. Do I have the wrong end of the stick or the right end of the stick?

Norman Macleod: You are absolutely correct. A negative instrument could come into force immediately. Obviously there are rules—for example, there should be a 28-day period before it comes into force—which are normally adhered to. An affirmative order would have to have the Parliament’s approval before it could come into force. How quickly that could happen would be a matter of parliamentary process. No doubt it could happen quickly, and could indeed happen faster than some negative instruments that allow 40 days or more before they come into force. You are quite correct in your understanding.

Stewart Stevenson: In essence, there is no difference in the opportunity for scrutiny.

Norman Macleod: A negative instrument is laid before Parliament, parliamentary committees consider it and it is for members of Parliament to choose whether to have a debate on whether or not it should stand.

Margaret McCulloch (Central Scotland) (Lab): The Scottish Government has explained that the power in section 80(7), which will allow ministers to make further provision in relation to the removal of unauthorised buildings from allotment sites, as provided for in section 80(2), is required in order to allow for flexibility. Can you give more detail on the intended purpose of the power in section 80(7)? In particular, can you provide examples of the types of further provision that the power in section 80(7) may be used to make?

Dr Amanda Fox (Scottish Government): Section 80(7) will permit, but not require, Scottish ministers to expand on the detail in the procedure that is cited in sections 80(5) and 80(6).

On flexibility, the current procedure provides for local authorities to give a period of notice to the tenant and details the tenant’s right to make representations and the local authority’s duty to take account of those representations and inform the tenant of the outcome. The provisions also give the tenant the right of appeal through the sheriff court.

The additional power could be used to add timeframes to those areas that do not already have specified timeframes. For example, it could be used to detail a timeframe in which the local authority might take account of representations. It might also be used to detail the methods through which tenants might make representations. We would expect the power to cover that type of thing.

Margaret McCulloch: When the committee wrote to you to ask that question, why did you not provide that level of detail when you wrote back?

Dr Fox: I do not know why we failed to provide that level of detail. I can only apologise for that.

Margaret McCulloch: Can anybody else answer that question?

The Convener: I think that a point has been made there.

We have covered everything that the committee wants to consider at this stage. I thank the team for its extensive answers and its patience with us.

I suspend the meeting to enable everybody to change places.

Dear Nigel

COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL

I write in response to the Report of the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee on the Scottish Government's Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. I would like to thank the Committee for the time and effort you have put into producing this report.

National Outcomes

34. The Committee considers that it would be appropriate for the setting and review of the national outcomes to be subject to the scrutiny of Parliament, possibly through scrutiny of regulations subject to the affirmative procedure. A more active scrutiny role for the Parliament appears to be justified having regard to the significance of the national outcomes, the discretion afforded to the Scottish Ministers in deciding how the outcomes are presented and measured, and the fact that all public bodies and other persons carrying out functions of a public nature as described in section 1(1) would require to have regard to the outcomes.

We note the Committee recommendation that the setting and review of the national outcomes should be subject to the scrutiny of Parliament, possibly through scrutiny of regulations subject to the affirmative procedure.

We agree with the Committee's recommendation that Parliament should have a more active scrutiny role in relation to national outcomes, but do not consider that regulations would be appropriate in this context. Instead we propose to bring forward amendments to require Scottish Ministers to consult the Parliament, using the procedure provided for under rule 17.5 of the Standing Orders.

Powers to add or remove bodies

43. The Committee calls on the Scottish Government to amend the Bill at Stage 2 so as to make the powers in sections 4(6) and 8(3) subject to the affirmative procedure when exercised so as to add bodies to the lists in schedule 1 or section 8(2) respectively. The Committee also recommends that the powers in sections 16(3) and 51(3) be made subject to the affirmative procedure.

We note the Committee recommendation to amend the Bill at Stage 2 so as to make the powers in sections 4(6), 8(3), 16(3) and 51(3) subject to the affirmative procedure. We agree with the Committee recommendation and will bring forward amendments at Stage 2.

Power to issue guidance

53. The Bill also makes no provision for an enforcement mechanism, to enforce compliance with the guidance. The guidance must cover matters “about the carrying out of functions conferred on community planning partners and partnerships under Part 2 of the Bill”. This is a broad requirement and the Bill makes no provision for a scrutiny or review mechanism, to review whether any automatically binding matters which may be specified in the guidance are properly included, because they concern the carrying out of functions conferred in Part 2 of the Bill.

54. These concerns would not apply if, in a similar way to the existing provision for guidance in section 18 of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003, there was provision that community planning partners and partnerships would “have regard to” the guidance.

We note the Committee concerns with section 10 and the recommendation that these concerns would not apply if there was provision that community planning partners and partnerships would “have regard to” the guidance rather than have to comply with the guidance. We agree with the Committee recommendation and will bring forward an appropriate amendment at Stage 2 to replace “comply with” with “have regard to”.

Eligible Land

66. The Committee draws the power in the new section 97C(3)(a) of the 2003 Act to the attention of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee on the basis that it has concerns about the scope of the power and its intended use.

We note the Committee concerns with section 97C(3)(a). On 10 December the Cabinet Secretary for Rural Affairs, Food and Environment gave evidence on the Bill to the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee. Regarding this provision the Cabinet Secretary commented that he was reviewing the power and reflecting on the comments that the committee had received and made it clear that if the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee has specific views on the delegated power and how it should be used he would welcome that.

80. The Committee considers that if the use of the word “prescribed” in section 97N is not intended to confer separate and free-standing powers to make subordinate legislation, the Bill should be clarified for Stage 2 so as to remove the scope for doubt over the interpretation of the section and the powers it confers by re-drafting the provision so as to remove the references to “prescribed”.

We note the Committee concerns on the use of the word “prescribed” in section 97N. We are looking at how we might redraft this section to remove the scope for doubt over the interpretation of the section.

I trust this is helpful and remain very grateful to you and the members of your Committee for their work on this Bill. I am copying this letter to Kevin Stewart MSP and Rob Gibson MSP as Conveners of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee and Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee respectively.

MARCO BIAGI
Dear Rob

At its meeting today the Committee considered the Scottish Government’s response to its stage 1 report on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

In so doing the Committee welcomed the Scottish Government’s commitment to amend the Bill in a number of respects.

However, the Committee remains concerned by the power in the new section 97C(3)(a) of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 and continues to find the explanations provided in justification of what is a very significant power to be unsatisfactory.

As you know, section 97C(3)(a) provides that eligible land for the purposes of acquisition does not include land on which there is a building or structure which is an individual’s home, unless the building or structure falls within such class or classes as may be prescribed. The word ‘prescribed’ adopts the definition set out in section 98(1) of the 2003 Act, meaning “prescribed in regulations made by the Scottish Ministers”. The effect of section 97C(3)(a), therefore, is that Ministers may make regulations prescribing buildings or structures which are eligible for acquisition by a Part 3A community body.
The Committee was concerned, and remains concerned, that this power permits the Scottish Ministers to make regulations prescribing buildings or structures which are eligible for acquisition by a Part 3A community body notwithstanding the fact that such buildings or structures may be described as an individual’s home.

In its stage 1 report the Committee noted that neither the DPM nor the Scottish Government’s responses to the Committee’s questions, both written and oral, offered a clear explanation as to the reasons for taking this power, or how the power is intended to be exercised. Furthermore, the Scottish Government did not provide the Committee with any examples of the kinds of building or structure that may be prescribed in regulations made in exercise of this power.

In our view the uncertainty around this power and its exercise has not in any way been assuaged either in the evidence given by the Cabinet Secretary for Rural Affairs, Food and Environment to your Committee or in the Scottish Government’s response to our stage 1 report on the Bill.

In the Cabinet Secretary’s evidence to your Committee he explained that the purpose of the power in section 97C(3)(a) is to give Ministers the opportunity to exclude land from the right to buy, and that the obvious case in point would be a person’s home.

The Committee considers, however, that the power in section 97C(3)(a) is not a power to exclude certain land from the scope of the new Part 3A, but rather enables Ministers to make regulations the effect of which is to include land on which there is an individual’s home within the scope of land which could be deemed to be eligible for acquisition by a Part 3A community body. In the Committee’s view, the power enables the general exemption for land comprising individuals’ homes to be disapplied for the particular categories or descriptions of land which may be prescribed using this power.

The Committee maintains that it is unsatisfactory that the Parliament is being asked to confer a power of this significance upon the Scottish Government in the absence of a detailed explanation as to why it is necessary or what it is for and in circumstances where the thinking underpinning the power appears to be in the early stages of development.

The Committee appreciates the efforts of your Committee to pursue this matter. The Committee re-emphasises its concerns about the power and asks that you continue to pursue them with the Scottish Government.

Please note that we also intend to write to the Scottish Government reiterating our substantial concerns about this power and again inviting it to reflect on the scope and use of this power.

If I or the Committee can be of any assistance to you in your deliberations on this power, we would be very willing to assist.

INTRODUCTION

1. The Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill (“the Bill”) was introduced on 11 June 2014 by the Scottish Government (“the Government”). As with all bills, it was accompanied by a Financial Memorandum (FM) (page 51 of the Explanatory Notes) which set out the estimated financial implications of the Bill’s provisions.

2. Under Standing Orders Rule 9.6, the lead committee at Stage 1 is required, among other things, to consider and report on the Bill’s FM. In doing so, it is required to consider any views submitted to it by the Finance Committee (“the Committee”).

THE BILL

3. The FM states that the Bill “reflects the policy principles of subsidiarity, community empowerment and improving outcomes” and provides a framework which will—

   - empower community bodies through the ownership of land and buildings and strengthening their voices in the decisions that matter to them; and
   - support an increase in the pace and scale of public service reform by cementing the focus on achieving outcomes and improving the process of community planning.”

4. The FM states that it sets out the costs associated with the following parts of the Bill—

   - Part 1 places a duty on the Scottish Ministers to develop, consult on and publish a set of national outcomes for Scotland, which builds on the Government’s internationally acclaimed “Scotland Performs” framework.
   - Part 2 places community planning partnerships (CPPs) on a statutory footing and imposes duties on them around the planning and delivery of local outcomes.
   - Part 3 provides a mechanism for communities to have a more proactive role in having their voices heard in how services are planned and delivered.
   - Part 4 amends Part 2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003, extending the community right to buy to all of Scotland, and introduces a new Part 3A to that Act to make provision for community bodies to purchase neglected and abandoned land where the owner is not willing to sell that land.
   - Part 5 provides community bodies a right to request to purchase, lease, manage or use land and buildings belonging to local authorities, Scottish public bodies or the Scottish Ministers.
   - Part 6 places a statutory duty on local authorities to establish and maintain a register of all property held by them for the common good and requires local authorities to publish their proposals and consult community bodies before disposing of or changing the use of common good assets.

- Part 7 updates and simplifies legislation on allotments. It requires local authorities to take reasonable steps to provide more allotments if waiting lists exceed certain trigger points and ensures appropriate protection for local authorities and plot holders.

- Part 8 provides for a new power which will allow councils to create and fund their own localised business rate relief schemes to better reflect local needs and support communities.

5. A table summarising the additional costs expected to arise as a result of the Bill's provisions is provided on pages 52 to 60 of the FM.

EVIDENCE

6. The Committee received 16 responses to its call for evidence on the FM, around half of which were from local authorities. Responses were also received from organisations including COSLA, Highlands and Islands Enterprise (HIE), NHS Lothian, The Office of the Scottish Charities Regulator (OSCR), the Scottish Environmental Protection Agency (SEPA), the Scottish Property Federation (SPF) and SportScotland. All written evidence is available on the Committee’s website.

7. The Committee also received a letter dated 3 October 2014 \(^1\) from the Minister for Local Government and Planning (“the Minister”) which provided further financial information with regard to forecasting the use of participation requests and asset transfer requests.

8. The letter highlighted the difficulties the Government and stakeholders had faced in estimating the financial impacts of the Bill, but provided “examples based on current practice to show the level of resource and costs that may be involved in both participation requests and asset transfer requests.”

Issues highlighted in evidence

10. A number of written comments were received in respect of specific aspects of the Bill and their estimated financial impacts as set out in the FM. The Committee then raised a number of these points in its oral evidence session with the Bill Team.

11. However, several respondents also commented on the possible financial implications of the Bill as a whole and expressed concerns regarding its overall impact on their budgets. Given that some of the Bill’s costs are expected to be demand driven, the Committee notes that the FM does not fully quantify the total estimated financial implications of the Bill.

\(^1\) Letter to Convener from Minister for Local Government and Planning dated 3 October 2014

General Comments

12. A number of general comments about the FM were received with several respondents acknowledging the difficulty in predicting demand. HIE for example, stated that—

“The FM makes a good ‘estimate’ of ‘unit costs’ for aspects of the Bill’s delivery, in many cases providing ranges where those are informative, however, the inability to profile demand take up makes it impractical for the FM to estimate the total costs that might be expected in say the first three years of operation.”

13. Several local authorities, however, foresaw difficulties in meeting the costs of the Bill and called for additional resources from central government. East Lothian Council for example, stated that—

“Local government will incur extra cost as a result of these provisions (which constitute a new legislative burden) and it is not possible to allocate money to these costs from within our budgets without taking it from other activities. We would expect central Government to add to our settlement any money necessary to fulfil the provisions of the Bill.”

14. Glasgow City Council echoed this view stating that likely additional costs on local authorities were not quantified to any reliable extent in the FM due to difficulties in predicting demand and activity. However, it stated “that the costs will be significant and that local authorities will find it challenging to meet these costs from existing resources.”

15. Inverclyde Council also stated that there was “no evidence” to support the FM’s assertion that costs, in many cases, would be minimal and able to be contained within existing budgets. In its view, this was “not the case” and there was no additional fund within the Council to absorb any demand.

16. Similar suggestions that additional resources would be required to implement the Bill’s provisions were made by other respondents including North Lanarkshire Council and North Ayrshire Council which stated that—

“Where costs have been included in the narrative the ranges are sufficiently wide to accommodate a huge amount of uncertainty. However in other sections there is no mention of costs but it does mention there will be additional costs incurred. The implication is that the additional costs will be minimal but there is uncertainty that is not addressed in the bill.\textsuperscript{6}

17. However, North Ayrshire Council also stated that “in the main the council was in agreement with the financial implications contained in the Bill.”

18. COSLA also acknowledged the difficulties in quantifying demand—

“it is difficult to anticipate the uptake and demand that will be placed upon Local Authorities. This makes it very difficult to quantify the financial cost that will be placed upon local government in complying with the legislation and indeed the Financial Memorandum makes no attempt to quantify a cost for these areas of the proposed legislation...

COSLA seeks reassurance that further work be undertaken to better quantify these costs before the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill is passed.”\textsuperscript{7}

19. When asked about the work it had undertaken to attempt to anticipate demand and to ensure local authorities are adequately resourced to effectively deliver the Bill’s measures, the Bill Team explained that work had been undertaken prior to publication of the Bill. However, it stated that “little financial information and cost information was provided by others” in response to its consultations and it had “found it difficult to amass information on how the legislation might be used” meaning that “it was difficult to consider what demand might be.”\textsuperscript{8}

20. The Bill Team explained that, as communities are not homogenous and will have different priorities and needs which could not be amalgamated into a single demand profile, it “will be hard to predict what communities will do.” It further pointed out that “no one else has been able to do it either.”\textsuperscript{9}

21. In response to concerns expressed by the Committee that the Bill might raise expectations where there was insufficient support available to meet them, the Bill Team explained that, the Government had a general convention that it would provide additional funding where new costs had arisen from legislation. However—

“The difficulty with the bill is that we cannot quantify that funding at the moment. That additional funding would need to be demonstrated and quantified through practice. That would happen through the normal processes and the funding would be provided in that way.”\textsuperscript{10}

\textsuperscript{10} Scottish Parliament Finance Committee, \textit{Official Report, 8 October 2014, Col 49}
22. When questioned about how the funding mechanism would work, given the impossibility of estimating figures, the Bill Team replied—

“We cannot say at this time. If local authorities can demonstrate and quantify what the new duties in the bill have cost them, that will be part of the ongoing process of local authority settlements.”

23. Given that the Bill was expected to take effect during financial year 2015-16 and the draft budget for that year was expected to be published imminently, the Committee asked how much would be set aside to cover the costs of the Bill’s provisions. In response the Bill Team stated—

“We are not anticipating any particular financial burden in 2015-16. COSLA is right to say that it will not be overly onerous and therefore could be encapsulated within current resources. However, we recognise that additional funding might be required in the future.”

24. When it was pointed out that COSLA’s position appeared to be that whilst the costs of the Bill’s individual elements might not be overly onerous, overall costs had the potential to be so, the Bill Team acknowledged this point but stated that it did not agree that overall costs had the potential to be significant. It confirmed that it believed that—

“the cost can be managed within current resources, with some addition if the demand is more than local authorities can cope with.”

25. In the event that costs did turn out to be greater than expected as a direct consequence of the Bill, The Bill Team confirmed that—

“That would be part of the normal discussions with local authorities through the annual budgeting process. Local authorities would have to demonstrate and quantify what was involved and then go into discussions with the Scottish Government.”

26. However, the Bill Team further stated that it would be for the Minister for Local Government and Planning to respond more fully to this question.

27. The Committee invites the lead committee to seek clarity from the Minister regarding whether and by what mechanism additional funding will be made available for local authorities should they incur significant additional costs as a result of the Bill.

28. With particular regard to Parts 3 and 5 of the Bill, the lead committee may wish to explore the issue of how the Government can be confident that any additional costs can be managed within current resources, given that costs are expected to be demand driven.

29. In response to questions from the Committee about whether there was a risk that, had the FM presented more concrete estimates of potential demand and costs, these might have been seen as “an upper limit for how much could be done”, the Bill Team agreed—

“Absolutely: demand will be led by communities, so we cannot work in that way. If we set a limit, that will confine the process and box it in.”

30. Expanding on this point, the Bill Team explained that it did not wish to set a benchmark as “we want the legislation to be successful and we want as many communities as possible to use it—it is for the communities to use and not for us to tell them to use it.”

31. Towards the end of the evidence session, the Committee drew attention to Standing Orders rule 9.3.2 which states that—

“A Bill shall on introduction be accompanied by a Financial Memorandum which shall set out the best estimates of the administrative, compliance and other costs to which the provisions of the Bill would give rise, best estimates of the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise, and an indication of the margins of uncertainty in such estimates.”

32. When asked whether the FM met these criteria, The Bill Team explained—

“We attempted to include costs in the financial memorandum in a number of places where we believed that we could actually indicate what the costs will be. In some areas, we know that the costs under the current provisions are fairly low, for example, and we therefore have an idea of what the costs may be in the future.

We express a caveat a number of times about the margins of uncertainty, because to attempt to state what the bill might cost in future would be unreasonable and potentially misleading.”

33. Following the oral evidence session the Convener wrote to the Minister seeking an explanation of how the FM met the requirements of Standing Orders and also of the Scottish Government’s own guidance on Financial Memoranda (SG 2009/1).\textsuperscript{20}

34. The Committee received a letter from the Minister dated 24 October\textsuperscript{21} which confirmed his view that the FM did meet the requirements of Standing Orders and had been conducted in line with the Government’s guidance.

35. The letter highlighted the work that had been undertaken with stakeholders in order to estimate unit costs and noted that the FM had provided examples of costs arising from similar processes—

“Thus the FM and the additional information supplied contains the full range of financial information that can be made available with certainty in relation to this Bill.”

36. However, the letter also stated that “the FM cannot estimate the level of demand for asset transfer or participation requests, and consequently does not provide ranges for the total potential costs of these provisions.” This, the Minister explained, was intended to avoid giving a flawed figure as the variables inherent to the Bill in terms of “the number of requests, their complexity and their distribution over time” “would make a specific figure or range far too questionable.”

37. Therefore, the letter concluded—

“the information provided is clearly the best estimate that can be provided of the administrative, compliance and other costs to which the provisions of the Bill would give rise, the best estimate of the timescales over which such costs would arise and has given a very clear indication of the margins of uncertainty in such estimates.”

38. The Committee acknowledges the difficulties faced in quantifying potential future costs arising from services that will be demand driven. However, the Committee remains concerned that, despite the requirements of Standing Orders, best estimates have not been fully provided.

39. The Committee invites the lead committee to ask the Minister what plans are in place to ensure that any costs arising from the Bill will be monitored on an ongoing basis. It also invites the lead committee to seek clarity regarding the funding mechanism by which resources will be made available to local authorities in the event that such costs prove to be significant.

Part 2: Community Planning

40. The FM states that the Bill seeks to strengthen CPPs by placing new duties on public sector partners “to play a full and active role in community planning and the resourcing and delivery of local priority outcomes.” It explains that some of these bodies are already statutory community planning partners, whilst others are not, although in practice they “frequently participate in community planning.”

41. The FM states that “for those public bodies which are complying with national and local action already underway at policy level to strengthen community planning it is anticipated that the provisions will impose either no or minor costs” (such as costs relating to travel or staff time).

42. Similarly, the FM states that “for those local authorities which are complying with national and local action already underway at policy level to strengthen community planning, it is anticipated that the provisions will impose either no or minor additional indirect costs, in terms of commitment by senior officers and elected members.”

43. COSLA’s written submission agreed that any additional costs arising from this part of the Bill “would appear to be minimal.”

44. SEPA expressed surprise that it had been designated as a public body for community planning and expressed concerns about “false expectations that SEPA will fully engage with all CPPs in Scotland” stating that this would be “highly resource intensive and not cost neutral”, especially if it did not “have the flexibility to tailor our engagement with different CPPs, and to deploy our limited resource where we can add the most value.”

45. The Bill Team confirmed that SEPA would be a partner to the 32 CPPs across Scotland, but pointed out that the Bill did not stipulate what the level of engagement with each CPP should be. Therefore, “how SEPA engages will be flexible and will be decided in collaboration with CPP partners, so we do not necessarily see the same resource issues as SEPA does.”

Part 3: Participation Requests

46. The FM states that the Bill will enable community bodies to seek to participate, along with a public body, in a process to improve the outcome of a service delivered by that public body. Public bodies will only be able to decline a request for dialogue where there are “reasonable grounds” to do so and will be required to publish a report at the end of the process.

24 Scottish Parliament Finance Committee, Official Report, 8 October 2014, Col 50
47. The FM acknowledges that public bodies (including local authorities) are likely to incur costs in responding to participation requests. However, it provides no estimates of what these potential costs might be, stating that “the costs will depend on how often community participation bodies use the provisions and at this stage it is difficult to forecast use across Scotland.”

48. Expanding on this point in oral evidence, the Bill Team gave the example of one local authority area where demand for participation requests might be very low as the public authorities were already excelling in public engagement and participation as opposed to another area which might have low demand as a result of lack of capacity in the community. This scenario, it suggested, highlighted the difficulties in attempting to estimate the demand profile across Scotland.

49. The Bill Team also suggested that demand might increase over time as communities became increasingly aware of their new rights—

“When people see such requests being used, they might catch on. If people see them having an impact in their local area, demand may increase from that. It all depends on what communities want to do and how they want to use the provisions.”

50. In response to questioning as to why other FMs previously scrutinised by the Committee where costs were also expected to be demand driven had set out approximate upper and lower limits, albeit with appropriate caveats, yet this one did not, the Bill Team explained that any such ranges would “be too large to be considered worthwhile.” Levels of demand, it stated, would only be seen when the Bill took effect.

51. Expanding on this, the Bill Team continued—

“There are too many variables to factor into what would be a reasonable demand profile, or a reasonable idea of how many requests could come forward. We have gone back to what the unit cost might be and, as COSLA says, it is not overly onerous.”

52. When asked to give an example of a piece of previous legislation for which the costs had been similarly unquantifiable the Bill Team confirmed that it had looked but had been unable to find a similar example.

53. The letter from the Minister dated 24 October explained that “there is no existing community-led mechanism comparable to participation requests on which to

---

27 Scottish Parliament Finance Committee, Official Report, 8 October 2014, Col 54
base estimates of demand” and highlighted the uncertainties over uptake of participation requests and the work required to respond to them. 28

54. The Committee acknowledges the difficulty in providing concrete estimates of services that will be demand driven but emphasises that Standing Orders require FMs to provide best estimates of costs, their timescales and margins of uncertainty.

55. The FM also states that public bodies (including local authorities) will incur costs in relation to the provision of an outcome improvement process, although again, no estimates are provided. Two examples of the costs incurred by a local authority in relation to community engagement events (ranging from £1,100 to £41,000) are provided with the FM stating that they mainly related to staffing costs.

56. HIE agreed that there were “inevitable uncertainties” associated with the extent to which communities would seek to utilise the opportunities presented by the Bill, but anticipated that communities in its area would wish to engage strongly and utilise the new powers conferred by it. However, with regard to participation requests it expected that it would be able to absorb them “to a large extent within the costs of staff time currently devoted to on-going business improvement activities.” 29

57. COSLA’s submission drew parallels between the potential impact of participation requests and that of the existing Freedom of Information laws and expressed concerns about the associated administrative burden. However, the Bill Team stated that the Bill was not directly comparable to the Freedom of Information Act 2000 as it applied to everyone whilst participation requests would only apply to community bodies which met the criteria set out by the Bill. Furthermore, any such requests would then be assessed against certain criteria meaning that demand would be more limited.

Capacity Building

58. A number of respondents raised the topic of “capacity building” in community bodies with NHS Lothian, for example, suggesting that the FM’s costs were “arguably understated” and noting that its original consultation response had stated that—

“community bodies may not possess the relevant skills, experience or knowledge to allow them to be meaningfully or effectively involved. Public service authorities would therefore need to consider how they could provide support for capacity building. This could add pressure to public service authorities from an already under-resourced position,… There does not seem to be consideration in the bill that addresses the inevitable financial and capacity implications of participation for community bodies in the improvement process."\textsuperscript{30}

59. NHS Lothian also drew attention to the impact of the Bill in terms of tackling inequalities in Scotland, stating that—

“there needs to be specific regard made to what support infrastructures are in place to empower our less equipped communities, if not, the bill will further increase the inequalities gap between communities, some of whom are well equipped and able to articulate their needs while some will struggle to be heard/access this empowerment opportunity.

Without appropriate support and investment in community empowerment the key components of the Bill will not be fairly accessible to communities (both geographic or communities of interest).”\textsuperscript{31}

60. East Lothian Council stated that, in order to assist community groups to develop the capacity to take on the opportunities and challenges represented by the Bill, appropriate consideration should be given to the provision of adequate resources nationally “rather than assuming that local authorities will be able to find the resources from current spending allocations.”\textsuperscript{32}

61. This view was echoed by South Lanarkshire Council, which suggested that additional resource was required to establish appropriate structures and to support CPPs in maximising the Bill’s impact.

62. However, the Bill Team stated in oral evidence, that whilst it agreed that “communities are not necessarily on a level playing field”, it did not believe that this was a matter for the Bill. Whilst the Bill provided a legal framework for such requests, support for capacity building in community bodies was provided through different avenues such as the Strengthening Communities Fund announced in April.\textsuperscript{33}

63. South Lanarkshire Council also sought clarification of the definition of a community body, questioning whether such bodies were “restricted locally” or whether national organisations were also covered by the provisions. In the event that the latter was the case, it suggested it could be left open to “vast quantities of requests” leading to substantial costs which it was not resourced to deal with. It also expressed concerns that it could face further substantial costs if the outcome of the improvement process was that it had to “markedly change the way in which it sets its priorities and delivers services.”\textsuperscript{34}

64. The Explanatory Notes state that—

“There are no restrictions on how a community may be defined for this purpose: it may be based, for example, on geographical boundaries, common interests, or shared characteristics of its members (such as ethnic background, disability, religion, etc.).

65. The lead committee may wish to invite the Minister to respond to the concerns raised by South Lanarkshire Council regarding the definition of a community body.

66. Fife Council also suggested that consideration might need to be given to levels of staffing needed to take on the organisation, assessment, and administration of additional requests from community groups. Whilst acknowledging that any investment in additional staffing might not be significant in terms of its overall budget, it noted that specific services such as Community Learning and Development were already under pressure as a result of having to respond to requests from local groups.

67. The letter from the Minister dated 3 October provided examples showing that the overall costs for participation and engagement events could vary depending on the issues being looked at. It suggested that this was also likely to be the case with regard to participation requests and on this basis, estimated that costs per request could range between £1,000 and £7,500 “in most cases”. Therefore, should there be 100 participation requests across Scotland, the total cost could be expected to be between £100,000 and £750,000.

Part 4: Community Right to Buy Land

68. The FM states that the Bill makes changes to community right to buy (CRTB) in order “to make the process easier and more flexible for communities while continuing to strike a fair balance between the rights of communities and landowners.” The FM further states that the Bill extends the right to buy to all of Scotland and removes the power of Ministers to designate “excluded land”.

69. Whilst the FM acknowledges that these changes could be expected to lead to more communities taking up the right to buy, it states that “it is not possible at this stage to accurately estimate the demand and how many new applications may be received.”

70. HIE agreed that it was difficult to quantify the likely increase in demand, but suggested that the extension of the right was “likely to generate significantly more CRTB applications” than anticipated with the attendant increase in costs to the Government. Whilst the FM does not make concrete predictions of the likely increase in CRTB applications, it provides examples on the basis of increases of five and ten

35 Fife Council, written submission
36 Letter to Convener from Minister for Local Government and Planning dated 3 October 2014
additional applications per year which HIE suggests is “on the conservative side”, particularly given the extension of the provisions to urban communities. This point was echoed by the SPF which questioned whether this assumption could “remain credible.”

71. The Bill Team agreed that HIE could expect more work as a result of the Bill, but stated that it would have “a certain amount of flexibility” in how it assisted communities. When communities come to HIE, it suggested that —

“the process will not be about engagement and consultation through HIE’s mechanisms; it will be about what the communities want to do.”

72. The Committee acknowledges that bodies such as HIE will have some flexibility in how they deal with increased volumes of CRTB applications. However, the lead committee may wish to seek further clarity over what support might be put in place for such bodies in the event that demand exceeds expectations.

73. Glasgow City Council stated that the FM “wrongly suggests that there are no financial implications for local authorities in relation to right to buy.” It expected costs to arise as a result of the council “putting a process in place and of utilising resource from a range of services in order to enable a response to be made within a very short timescale” where the request relates to its land or that of an Arms Length External Organisation. It also raised the issue of possible financial implications “in the circumstance where the proposed acquisition may deal with a short term issue but is not aligned to the Council’s longer term strategy.”

74. The SPF also suggested that the Bill might result in costs relating to events that did not happen or were delayed as a result of CRTB, for example where funding or investment was available for a limited time only and financial losses might be incurred as a result of delays resulting from CRTB applications.

75. Expanding on this point the SPF stated that its main concern was —

“that the enhanced scope of CRTB and by extension asset transfer may inhibit larger scale and complicated investment in development land in a manner that has not hitherto been an issue under the existing CRTB rights.”

76. However, the Bill Team rejected this suggestion, explaining that similar concerns had been expressed during the passage of the Land Reform (Scotland) Bill, but they had not come to fruition. It further explained that in the event that community applications were made with the intention of inhibiting large-scale projects, it was unlikely that they would meet the public interest case set out in the Bill.

77. When asked whether it was correct that “the community land fund was established with a finger in the air to make a judgment, because nobody knew how many communities would apply or register interest in land” the Bill Team confirmed that it understood that to have been the case, although it did not know how the figure was arrived at.41

78. The Committee invites the lead committee to seek clarification of how the community land fund’s budget was arrived at and to consider what parallels can be drawn between it and funding for CRTB in the context of the Bill.

79. A further point raised by the SPF was the lack of a clear explanation of how the expansion of CRTB inter-relates with the Government’s guidance on what is known as “the Crichel Down rules” and the potential for costs in the event of a challenge under them. It explained that—

“This is where land has been compulsorily purchased by a public authority but is then surplus and subject to disposal by the public authority in question. In these circumstances it is government policy for the previous owner to have right of first refusal. We do not see any assessment of the costs of ensuring this guidance is followed or indeed, provision made for where challenges might be made by former owners to the (erroneous) sale of properties to CRTB.”42

80. The lead committee may wish to seek clarification of how the expansion of CRTB might interact with “the Crichel Down Rules”.

81. The SPF also questioned whether NDPBs such as Historic Environment Scotland would “no longer have the same level of protection under the Bill as had been previously envisaged when they were an Agency of Government”, suggesting that were this to be the case, there could be significant financial implications for its estate and for those of other public bodies.

82. A final point raised by the SPF related to what might happen in the event that a community body—

“successfully purchases via CRTB from, for example, a public sector authority but then two or three years later finds it is unable to continue to hold the property and needs to sell the asset on but is unable to. A public authority may well be obliged to resume ownership and we do not see that this has been factored into the financial implications of CRTB or asset transfer.”43

41 Scottish Parliament Finance Committee, Official Report, 8 October 2014, Col 56
42 Scottish Property Federation, written submission
43 Scottish Property Federation, written submission
83. SportScotland expressed concerns in the context of its duties under funding rules stating—

84. The lead committee may wish to seek clarification of how rules relating to lottery funding might impact on CRTB.

Part 5: Asset Transfer Requests

85. The FM states that the Bill seeks to increase the amount of asset transfers from public bodies to community bodies by allowing such bodies to identify for themselves what they wish to achieve and the assets that they wish to acquire. It notes that the service which supports asset transfers was involved in 38 asset transfers from 2011 to 2014 but states that it cannot accurately predict future demand post-implementation.

86. The FM also states that the Government and/or local authority may decide to transfer an asset at lower than its market value following a full cost/benefit analysis which would include predicted future savings.

87. In respect of the Scottish administration and public bodies, the FM states that “the costs of these provisions will depend on the arrangements put in place and any additional costs will be met from existing resources.”

88. The FM provides no estimate of the financial impact of these provisions on local authorities stating that they “were not able to provide monetary estimates for any costs and savings that may arise.” It explains that this was in part due to the difficulty of predicting the number and variety of requests as well as the “complexity in predicting savings associated with better service provision.”

89. As with participation requests, the Bill Team explained that there were too many variables in terms of potential demand to quantify the potential volumes of asset transfers—

44 SportScotland written submission
"As we go forward, we will see what the bill involves, but we cannot give the committee a definite figure for how much it might be used."45

90. East Lothian Council estimated that it would require an additional full-time post costing around £40,000 per annum due to increased workloads arising from asset transfer requests. This additional work would include dealing with enquiries, the provision of detailed information, responding to and processing asset requests, preparing reports and valuations, responding to appeals, and providing plans and information. District Valuer valuations were also estimated to lead to fees of around £5,000 per annum.

91. East Lothian Council also estimated that its legal team could incur costs of between £400 and £1,200 per transaction and that it could spend around £500 each year in dealing with reviews (estimated at four per year).46

92. The letter from the Minister dated 3 October provided further information on the possible costs of dealing with asset transfer requests. In addition to the estimates provided by East Lothian Council, the letter also highlights figures from the Forestry Commission Scotland which indicate that it currently incurs costs of between £7,500 and £12,500 per asset transfer under its National Forest Land Scheme which enables communities to buy or lease Forestry Commission land.

93. The letter also provided a breakdown of the potential costs to community bodies undertaking an asset transfer. This states that “the estimate for community transfer bodies to obtain agreement to transfer is between £13,480 and £25,040.47

94. With regard to overall costs, the Minister’s letter dated 24 October explained that “any estimate or range would be inherently flawed” as a result of uncertainties relating to the complexity of requests and demand over time.48

95. East Lothian Council also drew attention to councils’ duty to secure best value in their activities and to maximise the use of their assets. It pointed out that—

“It may not necessarily be in the best interests of the community as a whole to transfer a surplus building to a community group on request. The community as a whole may be better-served by attracting an economic use of such a building. In other words, there might be both economic and community wellbeing justification in seeking interest from the market to see if we could attract an economic use which would increase footfall and employment in the local area.”49

96. Fife Council agreed that it was “difficult to estimate savings, especially if assets are being disposed at less than market value (as has been the case in transfers to community organisations).” With regard to potential costs it stated that—

“Local Councils may need to develop a cross Service team with a suitable skill mix to fully implement and manage any programme of transfer of assets. There is also an unknown potential cost to Councils as they will require to be reactive to communities’ aspirations. In addition to suitable community work expertise to engage with local organisations, legal, financial and property management skills may be required.”

97. However, Fife Council did confirm that it did not expect these costs to be prohibitive in terms of implementing the Bill.

98. South Lanarkshire Council also noted that it could incur costs relating to asset transfers where it had to retain a property off market while the process was ongoing. These could include costs in relation to empty property rates, insurance, security, utility bills, repairs and maintenance. Noting that it could also lose income where the community body sought a reduction in price or rent (which it stated could be expected “in most cases”), it also drew attention to its responsibility to ensure that any such reduction was “clearly set against community benefits.”

99. NHS Lothian echoed these concerns stating—

“The longer and more complex the disposal process becomes, the greater the cost to the public sector body. Non-domestic rates will be incurred, security costs will have to be paid and the potential for deterioration and vandalism increases.”

52

100. In addition to these costs, NHS Lothian shared the views of East Lothian Council, suggesting that “the increased complexity and more onerous process may necessitate additional staff resources and a greater demand for consultancy services” as well as costs relating to legal fees and the valuation of assets.

101. In terms of potential savings, South Lanarkshire Council acknowledged that these were more difficult to identify as they would depend on the specific proposal. It stated that savings could be made if the alternative to asset transfer was demolition or if maintenance and operational costs were to be borne by the community organisation. However, it also pointed out that these savings could also be achieved through a sale or lease on the open market.

102. COSLA’s submission stated—

“Very little information on the potential cost savings have been outlined, as again this will be demand driven and COSLA is concerned that these savings may have been overstated. COSLA would welcome clarity around this area of the Financial Memorandum.”

103. The Committee invites the lead committee to ask the Minister to respond to COSLA’s request for further clarity in this area.

104. NHS Lothian drew attention to anecdotal evidence that local authorities might regard the transfer of assets to community groups as a cost saving exercise and expressed concerns that such groups might not have “the funds nor the capacity to maintain these areas once a lease has been drawn up.”

105. It also expressed concerns that public bodies could incur losses as a result of the Bill—

“There may be potential costs to public service bodies as a result of land not necessarily being disposed of at true market value. Public bodies may bear a cost if they are not properly financially compensated for any asset transfers under Part 5 of the Bill. The Bill does not appear to require public bodies to be compensated for asset transfers.”

Part 6 – Common Good Property

106. The FM states that as of 31 March 2011, local authorities managed common good assets valued at £219 million. It explains that the Bill seeks to improve transparency around such assets and to increase community involvement in decisions regarding their identification, use and disposal.

107. To this end, the Bill will require local authorities to establish and maintain a register of common good assets and to invite community groups to comment on it in draft form.

108. Fife Council pointed out that the Bill does not amend the law of common good to allow local authorities to use certain categories of common good land for other purposes such as building new schools. It went on to suggest that this might have unintended financial consequences for local authorities as it would reduce their options for using their land. This, it suggested, could force councils to “acquire land from third parties at cost rather than making best use of existing resources.”

54 COSLA, written submission
55 NHS Lothian, written submission
56 Fife Council, written submission
Part 7 – Allotments

109. The Bill replaces existing legislation relating to allotments, “updating and clarifying” the requirements on local authorities.

110. Local authorities will be required to provide more allotments when certain trigger points are reached in relation to numbers on a waiting list.

111. The FM states that local authority costs “will be dependent on how much provision is required to meet their targets, how much provision is actually possible due to land availability and costs, and factors such as the local cost of land and whether road access, toilets etc. need to be created.” It also states that estimates provided by some local authorities indicate a cost ranging from £1,900 to £6,250 per plot and from £21,000 to £150,000 for a whole site. The FM states that demand is variable, with some local authorities facing substantial demand whilst others would need no more plots to meet this target.

112. North Ayrshire Council, however, stated that its response to a recent COSLA consultation had indicated an upper limit of £250,000 for a whole site.\(^{57}\)

113. South Lanarkshire Council drew attention to the right of the Scottish Ministers to prescribe the size of allotments, which it stated would—

“clearly impact on the cost to the Council since a prescribed size will mean that the Council will have to consider this when acquiring land. Clearly, the larger an allotment is the greater the cost to the Council.”\(^{58}\)

114. Whilst Glasgow City Council pointed out that—

“Specific costs are noted for the aspects of the Bill relating to allotments but this focuses on the administrative costs as opposed to the capital investment costs. The council believes that the capital investment costs would be significant.”\(^{59}\)

115. COSLA also suggested that significant financial implications could arise for local authorities as a result of the development of new allotments, “in particular, where this includes the provision of roads for access and facilities such as toilets and access to water on site” and expressed concerns that the costs of site maintenance and utility bills had not been considered in the FM.\(^{60}\)

116. In oral evidence, the Bill Team agreed that costs in relation to allotments would be “dependent on existing provision and demand” but explained that the FM’s figures were based on information provided by “the 15 out of 32 local authorities that responded” to its consultation.\(^{61}\)

\(^{60}\) COSLA, written submission

117. The Minister’s letter dated 24 October confirmed that—

“the costs associated with the allotments provisions will depend on the amount of provision already in place compared with any unmet demand, as well as the local cost and availability of land.”\(^{62}\)

118. However, it went on to state that “the figures provided by local authorities provide some examples but do not allow robust national estimates to be constructed.”

119. The Committee invites the lead committee to seek clarification as to whether additional resources will be made available to any local authorities which incur significant additional costs as a result of the duty to provide additional allotments.

Part 8 – Non-Domestic Rates

120. The FM states that, in effect, this provision allows local authorities “to create localised relief schemes to respond to local needs and demands.” Any such discretionary reliefs awarded by a local authority must be funded from within that authority’s existing resources and not at the expense of the [Government’s central NDRI] pool.”

121. The Bill does not give local authorities equivalent powers to levy any additional rates.

122. Fife Council stated that “in effect it proposes the establishment of localised relief schemes which could be used to help incentivise development and investment in areas deemed appropriate by the local authority.”\(^{63}\)

123. However, Fife Council also noted that whilst this could create opportunity, it could also lead to additional costs in terms of administration costs and the loss of income arising from the reliefs themselves. It further pointed out that the Bill explicitly prevented local authorities from raising NDR in other areas to compensate for any loss of income.

124. East Lothian Council stated that any reliefs would have to be funded by savings elsewhere and would ultimately be borne by council tax payers. It further suggested that the Bill could be expected to lead to a marked increase in applications for NDR relief and related disputes and in their complexity which would inevitably impact on its workload. This additional work, it suggested, could lead to a reduction in the collection of NDR as the absorbing of the additional workload could leave its Business Rates Team with fewer resources to target poor payers.

125. East Lothian Council did acknowledge that longer-term financial benefits could result from the targeted use of reliefs to stimulate economic growth in certain areas, but stated that in the short-term, it would “be costly in a time of monetary constraint as we would be funding any reduction.”

126. North Lanarkshire Council also suggested that “the new localised relief scheme has the potential to benefit larger/Council Tax rich local authorities at the expense of other local authorities.”

127. The SPF raised the issue of whether local authorities might seek to spread the costs of NDR relief among local landlords and expressed the hope that central government would provide some financial support for the policy.

CONCLUSION

128. The lead committee is invited to consider this report as part of its scrutiny of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill’s FM.

FINANCE COMMITTEE

EXTRACT FROM THE MINUTES

25th Meeting, 2014 (Session 4)

WEDNESDAY 8 OCTOBER 2014

Present:

Cameron Buchanan
Jamie Hepburn
Michael McMahon

Kenneth Gibson (Convener)
John Mason (Deputy Convener)
Jean Urquhart

Apologies were received from Malcolm Chisholm.

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on the Financial Memorandum from—

Dr Amanda Fox, Food and Drink Policy, Heather Holmes, Head of Community Assets Branch, and Ian Turner, Bill Team Leader, Scottish Government.
On resuming—

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill: Financial Memorandum

The Convener: Our fourth item of business is evidence from the Scottish Government bill team on the financial memorandum to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. I welcome to the meeting Dr Amanda Fox, Heather Holmes and Ian Turner. Members have copies of the financial memorandum and written submissions that were received in response to our call for evidence.

I see that Amanda Fox wants to say a few words.

Dr Amanda Fox (Scottish Government): I just want to apologise for wearing sunglasses. I am recovering from a migraine and my eyes are still exceptionally sensitive to light. Please bear with me.

The Convener: That is okay. I assumed that you had some sort of photophobia, so I did not comment. I did not think that you had just flown in from a beach.

Dr Fox: If only.

The Convener: You might have been running late and had to leave halfway through your sunbed treatment, or something. In any case, thank you for the explanation.

As the witnesses will probably know, the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities has raised a number of concerns with the committee. In its letter to all members of the committee on 6 October, it mentioned the number of new burdens on local government, and said that “While individually, these are not overly onerous, they have the potential to combine to create a significant increase in work for councils.”

COSLA goes on to say that its main concern centres on the difficulty of anticipating demand for the measures in the bill and, in turn, quantifying the cost that will be incurred by local authorities. What work have you done to try to anticipate demand and to ensure that there is a realistic budget to go to local authorities to ensure that they can effectively deliver the measures in the bill?

Ian Turner (Scottish Government): A lot of work was done during the consultation leading up to publication of the bill. There was an exploratory consultation and then a consultation on a draft bill. During those periods, we asked questions about how the provisions might be used and what the costs behind them might be. At that time, little financial information and cost information was provided by others. We found it difficult to amass information on how the legislation might be used, which meant that it was difficult to consider what demand might be.

We agree with COSLA that the effect of the new legislation will not be overly onerous, and we agree that the demand element is the element that could change the cost profile. However, because the bill is about community empowerment, it will be up to communities—not authorities—to decide what they want to do, in particular in terms of participation requests, community right to buy and asset transfer requests. It will be hard to predict what communities will do, because communities in different places will want different things, and their decisions will be based on local priorities. Amalgamating everything into a demand profile is hard to do, as we found out. No one else has been able to do it, either.

Dr Fox: Part 7 of the bill relates to allotments. As well as the wider consultation exercises, we wrote to the 32 local authorities in December 2013, specifically asking for their views on what the additional costs of the new duties on allotments might be. As Ian Turner rightly points out, the costs in relation to allotments will be dependent on existing provision and demand. The figures in the financial memorandum are based on the information that we received from the 15 out of 32 local authorities that responded.

The Convener: I understand the points that you are making. The Minister for Local Government and Planning, Derek Mackay, wrote to us just before COSLA did. He said:

“despite ongoing discussions with stakeholders they have not been able to provide monetary estimates for costs or savings making it difficult to provide accurate ranges.”

That makes it difficult for the Finance Committee to scrutinise the bill. What safeguards will be in place should the financial burdens on local authorities be significantly higher than is anticipated?

COSLA said that the bill is “reliant on council support and provision of community capacity building assistance, which can be very resource intensive and continues for an undefined period of time ... there no reference in the Financial Memorandum of the impact on reductions to a local authority’s asset base.”

It said that the bill

“could adversely affect Local Authorities’ ability to take out loans.”

On common good property, COSLA said that

“some additional costs for Local Authorities are anticipated,” but that they were not quantified. You touched on allotments, which COSLA also mentioned. What cushioning will there be for local authorities if demand greatly exceeds the resources that have been set aside for the bill?

Ian Turner: Demand for participation requests, which are new, and asset transfer requests will be limited—I use that word in a broad sense—by the provisions of the bill. COSLA tried to use the analogy of the Freedom of Information Act 2000, but the bill is not like that act. The 2000 act allows individuals to make requests for information, and that is what they do. The bill will allow community-controlled bodies, as defined by the bill—they must meet certain criteria, such as having a written constitution—to submit participation requests or asset transfer requests, which will also have to meet criteria in the bill. There will then be a cost-benefit procedure, in which the authority will consider the benefit in doing the process and will align that against possible costs. That process will, to a degree, limit demand.

You are absolutely right about the capacity of communities, because communities are not necessarily on a level playing field. However, we do not believe that that is a matter for the bill. The bill provides the legal framework to allow community bodies to do these things; capacity comes from other funds and other places. For example, the £3 million strengthening communities fund was announced in April, with the purpose of helping community organisations in disadvantaged areas to increase their capacity. However, that fund does not say that such organisations must do an asset transfer or a participation request: it is for them to decide what they want to do, on their terms.

The Convener: My concern is that expectations will be raised and that there will not, even allowing for that £3 million, be enough resources to meet expectations, so the bill will not be able to deliver what is promised. That is why I asked what cushioning would be available. Would the Scottish Government be willing to consider providing additional funding for local authorities, to ensure that the bill is delivered smoothly?

Ian Turner: As it has for most new duties that come from legislation, the Government has a general convention that we will provide extra funding. The difficulty with the bill is that we cannot quantify that funding at the moment. That additional funding would need to be demonstrated and quantified through practice. That would happen through the normal processes and the funding would be provided in that way.

The Convener: I will ask a couple more questions before I open up the discussion to the myriad members who are queuing up to ask questions.

The Scottish Property Federation has stated that its main concern is “that the enhanced scope of CRTB and by extension asset transfer may inhibit larger scale and complicated investment in development land in a manner that has not hitherto been an issue under the existing CRTB rights.” Do you see that being an issue?

Heather Holmes (Scottish Government): I do not. Such issues were brought up around the time when the Land Reform (Scotland) Bill was going through Parliament. Since then, in the operation of the community right to buy for the past 10 years, we have not seen what the SPLF described and we have not seen community applications that are trying to blight big developments. If we got applications that were blightly—if I can use that word—the chances are that they would not meet the public interest test. We have checks and balances on our side, so I do not think that that is going to be a big issue, especially in the context of urban land coming within the scope of the community right to buy.

The Convener: Okay. Before we move on, let me give you three brief quotations. The Scottish Environment Protection Agency says that there are “false expectations that SEPA will fully engage with all CPPs in Scotland”, which would be highly resource intensive and not cost neutral. With regard to participation requests, Highlands and Islands Enterprise says that it “would expect to be able to absorb that to a large extent within the costs of staff time currently devoted to on-going business improvement activities.”

NHS Lothian has said: “Without appropriate support and investment in community empowerment the key components of the Bill will not be fairly accessible to communities”.

Given those concerns, do you not feel that the Scottish Government has been too cautious in respect of the amount of resource that it feels will be required to implement the bill? From the evidence that we are receiving, it appears that that is the case.

Ian Turner: SEPA is talking particularly about community planning, because it will be a partner in the 32 CPPs throughout Scotland. The bill does not say what the level of engagement in each of those CPPs should be. The fact that SEPA should be involved goes alongside what their outcomes are intended to deliver. How SEPA engages will be flexible and will be decided in collaboration with CPP partners, so we do not necessarily see the same resource issues as SEPA does.
The Convener: What about the comments of HIE and NHS Lothian?

Heather Holmes: We work with HIE on the likes of the land fund and cases in which communities want to exercise the community right to buy, but also to keep open the option of going through negotiated sales. HIE’s work to assist communities is very much like the work that is undertaken by our community right to buy branch, and there is a certain amount of flexibility, given the number of cases that have to be dealt with. We build flexibility into our work planning and manage it in that way. As you say, HIE expects more work. Likewise, the Scottish Government expects to have a bit more work through the community right to buy, and we reckon that we will have to be flexible in our ways of working.

Jamie Hepburn: If I have taken anything from the experience of my political activity over the past few months, it is a sense that the people out there want to have a greater say in the factors that determine their lives. The bill is, therefore, hugely welcome if it can do anything to achieve that aim.

I have some sympathy with what the bill team is saying. If any bill was going to present us with a financial memorandum that found it hard to cost the proposals, it is this one. We are talking about empowering people, but we do not know how they are going to respond, so it must be difficult to quantify the exact costs.

I was taken with a turn of phrase that Ian Turner used. You talked about it being difficult to establish a demand profile. If you had said what the demand would be and what the bill would cost, could there have been a danger that that would have been viewed as an upper limit for how much could be done, which might have been viewed as being the opposite of empowerment?

Ian Turner: Yes. In trying to do a demand profile, we would have to guess at what might be low demand or high demand. It is not easy to work out what those might be with respect to the number of rights that we are giving communities. For example, an area might not use participation requests at all because the public authorities in that area are very good at participation and engagement and are doing the job already, so demand would be low. However, in another area, demand might be low because there is no capacity in the community. How would we assess those two different communities when there could be different parts and profiles?

Fife Council, I think, said in its evidence to the committee that there will be peaks and troughs as things work through the system and as public organisations change. I took HIE’s comments about improving its business as meaning that it will need to change to ensure that the bill works.

When communities come to HIE, the process will not be about engagement and consultation through HIE’s mechanisms; it will be about what the communities want to do.

Jamie Hepburn: Those are some of the difficulties. My point was more that, even if you attempt to come up with a set of figures, whether they show low demand, high demand or something in between, the danger is that people will think that that is what they have to work with. However, the process cannot really work that way, because if it is to be in the hands of people out there, they sort of lead, do they not?

Ian Turner: Absolutely: demand will be led by communities, so we cannot work in that way. If we set a limit, that will confine the process and box it in. That is why community capacity is so important throughout the process.

Heather Holmes: I agree with Ian Turner. When the bill that introduced the community right to buy was going through Parliament, there was an attempt to work out what demand would be. I think that it was predicted that there would be 15 cases in the first year and five cases a year thereafter. However, things have worked out quite different; we get an average of 15 cases a year. We have to work flexibly with the communities and the demand. When I work with my branch, I do not always know what the next case will be and when it will come in. We utilise the resource well and we work flexibly. We want the legislation to be successful and we want as many communities as possible to use it—it is for the communities to use and not for us to tell them to use it. We do not have a benchmark that says that if we have only 14 cases in a year, the legislation is not successful. Communities lead the process and make it successful.

Jamie Hepburn: So, the number is not a measure of success: 15 cases in a year is not an upper limit and does not mean that other communities will have to come back next year. The community right to buy is a good parallel, as it is led at community level, I presume.

Heather Holmes: Yes.

Jamie Hepburn: I return to the COSLA submission, which has a degree of criticism in relation to quantifying costs. However, at the end, COSLA echoes Mr Turner’s point when it states: “it is difficult to anticipate the uptake and demand that will be placed upon Local Authorities. This makes it very difficult to quantify the financial cost that will be placed upon local government in complying with the legislation”.

In essence, that is the same as the point that Mr Turner made. It is interesting that, despite the criticism in the COSLA submission, COSLA has not made an attempt to say what the bill will cost. Has COSLA provided any figures to you?
Ian Turner: It has not done so separately. The information that we have is the information in the financial memorandum and the additional information that the minister provided last week.

Gavin Brown: Quite a lot of areas of public policy are demand driven, as are many of the bills that come before the committee. Generally, the sponsoring bill team or minister does their best to get an approximate amount, although they add caveats on what might be the upper or lower reality, so that we have a best estimate. Why is that possible in other demand-driven areas of policy but impossible here?

Ian Turner: To some extent, it is because the range would be too large to be considered worth while. We do not know what the demand profile will be so we cannot put a range on it. We have estimated that participation requests, for example, could cost between £1,000 and £7,500 each, depending on what the request is for and what area it covers. If there are 100 across Scotland, that will be between £100,000 and £750,000. It is a range. You could say, “Well, it could be 1,000 or more,” but that only gets you so far. We cannot really go into any more detail at this stage about which is more reasonable. It will only be in practice that we see the level of demand.

Gavin Brown: So you have no idea how many participation requests there will be. There could be a million.

Ian Turner: I very much doubt that there will be a million participation requests. The bill makes provision on who can make requests—community participation bodies—and what requests they can make. To an extent, it will be limited by the costs and benefits of going through the process. In making participation requests, community participation bodies need to say what experience they have in the process and the benefits—the outcomes—that the process will bring to them. It is for the public authority to assess the request on that basis and to go through the process.

Gavin Brown: So it definitely could not be a million. Could there be 10,000 participation requests?

Ian Turner: I could not say at this time. I doubt it. That would be at the very high end. The risk profile for that would be high impact but very low likelihood.

Gavin Brown: My point is that you seem to able to quantify the situation slightly better now than you have done in the memorandum. You must have some idea of what you think the likely range will be.

Ian Turner: We do not, because it is for the communities themselves. It is not just geographic communities; it is potentially communities of interest, too. Different groups might want to do different things in different ways, and it will depend on local circumstances. There are too many variables to factor into what would be a reasonable demand profile, or a reasonable idea of how many requests could come forward. We have gone back to what the unit cost might be and, as COSLA says, it is not overly onerous.

Gavin Brown: So the Government position is that it is impossible to quantify participation requests and costs. Would you make the same comments in relation to asset transfer requests and costs?

Ian Turner: Yes. Again, that would be limited by the issues that we have been discussing. However, because asset transfer in the bill is not just about ownership—it can be about leasing, managing or using an asset—there is a range of things that a community might want to do within the provisions of the bill. Asset transfer already exists—the community ownership support service did 38 over three years. That provides an idea, but it is certainly not the range across Scotland because the support service is not involved in all the transfers and its funding is limited so it can get involved in only a certain number. As we go forward, we will see what the bill involves, but we cannot give the committee a definite figure for how much it might be used.

Gavin Brown: The Government says that it is impossible to give figures on any of these aspects. How, then, will the funding mechanism work?

Ian Turner: We cannot say at this time. If local authorities can demonstrate and quantify what the new duties in the bill have cost them, that will be part of the on-going process of local authority settlements.

Gavin Brown: Let us assume that the bill is passed, which I am sure it will be. When does it take effect? Is it the financial year 2015-16?

Ian Turner: It will probably be 2015-16 that we start to implement the provisions in the bill.

Gavin Brown: That is what I thought. Tomorrow, we will be given the draft budget for the year 2015-16. Amounts will be allocated to every department, non-departmental public body and council. Given that you will somehow have to quantify it tomorrow, how much is being given to local authorities in the draft budget to cover the obligations in the bill?

Ian Turner: It comes within the current remit of local authorities. No particular additional work has been done because, at this point, we cannot quantify or demonstrate what the additional burdens might be.

Ian Turner: Asset transfers are not new, so local authorities already do community capacity work and participation engagement with communities, which is one of the reasons why it is difficult to extrapolate how much additional cost the bill may bring to the process. Asset transfers already happen across Scotland.

We are not anticipating any particular financial burden in 2015-16. COSLA is right to say that it will not be overly onerous and therefore could be encapsulated within current resources. However, we recognise that additional funding might be required in the future.

Gavin Brown: My reading of COSLA’s position was that, although the individual elements were not overly onerous, the totality had the potential to be so. Is that not what COSLA said?

Ian Turner: Yes, but we do not agree that the cost has the potential to become significant. We think that the individual elements are not overly onerous and will not be overly onerous in total. We believe that the cost can be managed within current resources, with some addition if the demand is more than local authorities can cope with.

Gavin Brown: As far as you are aware, as the bill stands, local authorities are not getting any additional resources. What if COSLA turns out to be right and it is onerous and there is a huge upsurge in demand? How concrete is the guarantee from the Scottish Government to underwrite the costs that councils will face?

Ian Turner: That would be part of the normal discussions with local authorities through the annual budgeting process. Local authorities would have to demonstrate and quantify what was involved and then go into discussions with the Scottish Government.

Gavin Brown: This may be a question for the Minister for Local Government and Planning—I do not know whether he is giving evidence to the committee so perhaps I will have to write to him. Let us just say that there is a huge upsurge in demand, which costs councils—for the sake of argument—several million pounds more than they had budgeted for. If they can demonstrate that the upsurge is a direct consequence of the bill, is it your understanding that the Government will pay councils that money, or would that have to be negotiated?

Ian Turner: That is something that would have to go through the normal processes of negotiation with local authorities. I do not think that there is a particular guarantee. That is probably a question for the minister, rather than for me.

Michael McMahon: You have established that the figures in the financial memorandum are not quantifiable and you have explained why they are unquantifiable. I accept your explanation, although I have some concerns about—as Gavin Brown said—where that leaves the overall budget for local authorities. Can you give us an example of previous legislation where the financial memorandum was in a similar position to this one, in which the potential costs are unquantifiable? Was anything established in that legislation to take account of the potential for the budgets to come under pressure?

Ian Turner: I have looked, but I have not found a similar example.

Jean Urquhart: Even without the bill, a growing number of community groups are already looking to take over local authority assets for community purposes, for example in the Highlands and Islands. You mentioned Highlands and Islands Enterprise. Will Scottish Enterprise have a similar role? It has never had the community role that Highlands and Islands Enterprise has had and, if the bill is successful, I imagine that it might have a role to play. Do you see that as the case?

Ian Turner: Scottish Enterprise could have a role to play. Highlands and Islands Enterprise is often a funder—it provides money to make the asset transfers—and I do not know whether Scottish Enterprise will be in that position. It will be involved in the community planning partnerships, so it will be involved in setting the local outcome improvement plans, which we hope will set in context how some of this might work within local areas.

Scottish Enterprise gave evidence to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee last week and talked about being an opportunity-led organisation, seeking opportunities and gaining the maximum benefits from those. An asset transfer in the Highlands and Islands could be such an opportunity if Scottish Enterprise sees that it has a role to play there.

Jean Urquhart: On the point about trying to fix a budget, I would guess that the community land fund was established with a finger in the air to make a judgment, because nobody knew how many communities would apply or register interest in land. Would that be right?

Ian Turner: Yes, as I understand it.

Heather Holmes: I think that a sum was allocated, but I do not know what calculations were done to arrive at the figure.
Jean Urquhart: Finally, there are a number of critics of the bill, who are saying that it does not go far enough and is quite tame. Which more radical issues from the consultation were left out of the bill?

Ian Turner: It is hard for me to comment on what was radical and what was not. In the bill, we set up a process whereby, if someone seeks an asset transfer, it is still for the authority to decide whether it takes place, and the bill ensures that the process for that decision is transparent and open. I think that some community groups would want more of an absolute position whereby, if someone asks for it, they get it. The same applies to the community right to buy, particularly for abandoned or neglected land, and people may see that opening up beyond such land. However, the bill does not provide for that.

The Convener: That concludes questions from committee members, but I have one or two further questions.

Do you envisage that the bill will have an immediate impact? Will there be a rush to involvement or will demand rise steadily? Has there been any analysis of that?

Ian Turner: It depends on who you speak to. We have talked to a lot of community organisations and stakeholders. Some of them say that there is pent-up demand in their areas and that people may use the provisions—there is always a “may”, because it depends on what communities want to do and how they might use the provisions. Others say that it will take time for communities to adapt and to develop capacity to use the provisions.

The bill is in legal language because it is a bill, and a participation request looks like quite a process. It will have to be covered in guidance so that people can understand it and see how it might be used. When people see such requests being used, they might catch on. If people see them having an impact in their local area, demand may increase from that. It all depends on what communities want to do and how they want to use the provisions.

The Convener: The financial memorandum does not provide specific cost estimates for many aspects of the bill, in some cases because costs are expected to be demand driven. However, rule 9.3.2 of standing orders states:

“A Bill shall on introduction be accompanied by a Financial Memorandum which shall set out the best estimates of the administrative, compliance and other costs to which the provisions of the Bill would give rise, best estimates of the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise, and an indication of the margins of uncertainty in such estimates.”

In what regard does this financial memorandum meet those criteria?

Ian Turner: We attempted to include costs in the financial memorandum in a number of places where we believed that we could actually indicate what the costs will be. In some areas, we know that the costs under the current provisions are fairly low, for example, and we therefore have an idea of what the costs may be in the future.

We express a caveat a number of times about the margins of uncertainty, because to attempt to state what the bill might cost in future would be unreasonable and potentially misleading. We indicate a timescale—

The Convener: Standing orders make it clear that there should be best estimates. The committee has been down this road before when a bill team has come in and has not been able to give us figures. It is frustrating from our point of view. We are supposed to be scrutinising legislation from a financial perspective, but it is difficult when we are not given much to get our teeth into, so to speak.

Ian Turner: I absolutely know what you mean. There is frustration on our side as well when it is difficult to quantify the costs.

The Convener: Are you saying that it is impossible to meet the criteria or are you arguing that they are actually met?

Ian Turner: I would argue that they are met, because it was accepted.

The Convener: Thank you. Are there any further points that you would like to make?

Ian Turner: No.

The Convener: I thank you very much for your evidence and I thank colleagues for their questions.

We now move into private session, as was agreed earlier.

Meeting continued in private until 12:46.
EXTRACT FROM THE MINUTES OF PROCEEDINGS

Parliamentary Year 4, No. 75 Session 4

Meeting of the Parliament

Thursday 3 February 2015

Note: (DT) signifies a decision taken at Decision Time.

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill: The Minister for Local Government and Community Empowerment (Marco Biagi) moved S4M-12220—That the Parliament agrees to the general principles of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

After debate, the motion was agreed to (DT).

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill: Financial Resolution: The Cabinet Secretary for Finance, Constitution and Economy (John Swinney) moved S4M-12113—That the Parliament, for the purposes of any Act of the Scottish Parliament resulting from the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill, agrees to any expenditure of a kind referred to in Rule 9.12.3(b) of the Parliament’s Standing Orders arising in consequence of the Act.

After debate, the motion was agreed to ((DT) by division: For 76, Against 31, Abstentions 0).
Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Presiding Officer (Tricia Marwick): The next item of business is a debate on motion S4M-12220, in the name of Marco Biagi, on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. Mr Biagi, you have 14 minutes.

The Minister for Local Government and Community Empowerment (Marco Biagi): Thank you, Presiding Officer—and I begin this stage 1 debate by thanking a lot of other people, too. Although “stage 1” suggests that we are at the first stage, all parliamentarians will know how much work has gone into the bill before this stage, as is the case with all bills.

My colleague and predecessor Derek Mackay took what began as a scattered set of suggestions in the Scottish National Party manifesto, tended the proposals through two consultations and 40 engagement events and helped them to spring forth in the bill that we consider today. All I can say is that he took much better care of the proposals than he took of the plant in what is now my office in Victoria Quay.

I thank the Finance Committee and the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee for their consideration of the bill. Most of all, I thank the two subject committees: I thank Kevin Stewart and the members of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee; and I thank Rob Gibson and the members of the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee, who looked at part 4, on the community right to buy, in particular.

The two subject committees produced a ream of recommendations—I mean “ream”; the paper in front of me runs to 44 pages. The Government will consider all the recommendations closely in advance of stage 2. In the spirit of producing the best possible bill, we will also consider ideas that members put forward today.

The committees were no doubt helped by their efforts to take evidence from an unusually wide range of organisations and individuals. Meetings took place in Fort William and Dumfries, and there was innovative use of social media and online video to help explain aspects of the bill. It is heartening to see colleagues making it easy for people to participate in the development of a bill that should be all about participation.

Thanks are also due to everyone who took the time to offer their views and experiences to the committees or the Scottish Government. Time and time again, I have been encouraged to hear organisations and individuals express confidence that the bill will make a real difference in helping to make public bodies and agencies look at community empowerment in a different way.

I come to the debate to present the bill and endorse its aims, and to ask members of all parties to join together to back it. We all know that communities can do great things when they are empowered to achieve their own goals, given the freedom to choose their own path, given responsibility for their surroundings and trusted to take their own decisions.

In places such as Craigmillar, Inverness, Govanhill, Irvine and Kilmarnock, I have met grass-roots groups that are doing remarkable things in their communities, in their own way and on their own terms. There is so much talent out there—it just needs a bit of self-belief, some encouragement and the taking away of unnecessary obstacles.

That is what the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill sets out to do. By creating new rights for community bodies and conferring new duties on a range of public authorities, it will provide a new legal framework and, I hope, stimulate the growth of a new mindset—we can never legislate for that—which will promote and encourage community empowerment and participation.

Since the bill’s introduction in June, the demand for participation and empowerment has grown. Our historic referendum proved, if proof were needed, that people will get involved when they know the issues that are at stake and that they can make a difference to them.

Members across the chamber believe in more powers for this Parliament, because that, too, is a form of bringing control over decision making closer to the people whom decisions affect.

We now need to build on that new sense of what can be achieved. The bill contributes to the spirit of democratic renewal. It does so tangibly, in ways that can instantly be recognised—even if I accept the Local Government and Regeneration Committee’s point that things can sometimes be hidden by a bit of gobbledegook. We have done our best to produce an easy-read policy memorandum and we will put our guidance in plain English—more than anything else, we accept that recommendation.

Part 1 will put into statute the national outcomes approach, which is currently represented by Scotland performs, and will place duties on the Scottish Government to develop, consult on, publish, review and report on a set of indicators for the kind of Scotland that we want to see. For the community of the whole nation, that has to be, and will be, an empowering process.
Part 2 puts community planning partnerships into statute, and we will develop the role and performance of CPPs, not least by ensuring that public bodies work together in CPPs and with the public.

Through the participation requests in part 3, the bill will give communities a new power to enter into dialogue with public authorities to ensure that their voices are always heard. That simple power will remind everyone that communities should always be around the table when decisions that affect them are being taken.

The provisions in part 4, on which my colleague the Minister for Environment, Climate Change and Land Reform will lead, deal with the community right to buy that exists in the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003. Part 4 will simplify the process and make it more flexible, and it will extend the type of community bodies that are able to access the right to buy. Crucially, it will expand the extent of the communities that can take forward such a right: the community right to buy will be extended from rural Scotland to all of Scotland.

The community right to buy will also be extended through the introduction of a right to buy neglected or abandoned land, even where there is no willing seller. We recognise that committees and stakeholders have all asked for clarification of the type of land that is covered by that provision. We have sought stakeholders’ views and have discussed with them what would be required. My colleague the Minister for Environment, Climate Change and Land Reform will therefore provide draft regulations in advance of stage 2 that will detail the matters that must be considered when the question whether land is neglected or abandoned is determined. Those matters could include the physical condition of the land and the use, or lack of use, to which it is being put and the effect that that has on the surrounding land.

Part 5 will make it easier for communities to take control of a public asset. Whether it is a community centre, a patch of public land or whatever, the sky is the limit for what can be achieved by the ingenuity and local knowledge released by community participation.

The common good asset registers in part 6 will mean more transparency over common good assets as well as increased community involvement in the decisions that are taken about them.

Part 7 will create a new duty on local authorities to keep a waiting list of those who want an allotment, which will be paired with a duty to “take reasonable steps” to ensure that those waiting lists do not grow too long. Let me be clear: that will mean more allotments.

Bruce Crawford (Stirling) (SNP): On allotments, I think that all members have received a piece of lobbying from the Scottish Allotments and Gardens Society. For whatever reason, the society feels threatened by the bill, but I am not sure whether the threat is perceived or real; indeed, I am not sure what the real issue is for the society.

Could the way forward be for the minister to indicate that he would be prepared to support the exploration of grandfather rights for individuals who already have allotments and who could keep those rights for the future? We could enshrine that in law, with any new allotments that were created falling under the bill. That potential solution may help everyone through a difficulty.

Marco Biagi: On Friday, I spoke to Ian Welsh of the Scottish Allotments and Gardens Society. I committed to consulting on the use of one of the powers that the bill will create with the aim of addressing concerns about size, while allowing flexibility to ensure that those who want differently sized plots also have their needs met. However, that focuses on people who get an allotment for the first time. It is clear that anyone who has a lease or agreement with a local authority under existing legislation will come up against a lot of contract and rental law. We could certainly look at that issue. I do not believe that the changes would lead to there being significant impacts on existing contracts, although councils have the ability to review rents—that applies to any council rental contract.

There is a possibility that we could look at the additional rights that are coming in and examine whether to have transitional arrangements or, indeed, to continue existing arrangements if that approach would be disadvantageous. The bill takes areas that have not been legislated on for, in some cases, 123 years and creates additional rights in relation to allotments in every area that I have looked at, as far as I can tell. However, there is on-going dialogue, and I will continue to speak to the Scottish Allotments and Gardens Society so that we understand each other and can reach an agreement.

After what I have just said, perhaps I should say “last, but not least” as I turn to part 8 of the bill. Part 8 will allow councils to support and encourage businesses in target areas through local business rates relief schemes.

Each part of the bill individually provides new measures; taken together, we hope that they will help to change the culture around community empowerment to make such local approaches routine. We recognise, however, that if all our communities are to be empowered, some will require support. The Local Government and Regeneration Committee was right to highlight that. We want all communities to be able to keep up in the race to take advantage of the new powers.

We will therefore not stand still at stage 2. While we have been considering the evidence to the committee, we have already been discussing and debating with partners and stakeholders how we might improve the bill, which was introduced to Parliament seven months ago. We propose to lodge amendments on appeal procedures for asset transfer requests and the publication of asset registers, but the central change has to be an even greater focus on reducing inequalities.

The bill stands alongside the whole range of existing duties and policies that target inequalities, and we believe that by empowering communities, inequalities are reduced and that, where communities lead their own regeneration and control their own future, they will take the right steps forward. We will, however, lodge amendments to ensure that the national outcomes and approaches to community planning are aligned to the aim of reducing inequalities.

We also intend to require public bodies to make inequality a material concern in decisions on key participation requests and asset transfer mechanisms. We want to see the communities that have been most excluded take their well-deserved seats at the table and those that have been most disempowered take control of their surroundings. The cabinet secretary therefore announced today an extra £5.6 million for the people and communities fund. That will be part of the overall empowering communities pot, which now stands at £19.4 million of support.

With the aim of empowering those communities, we have been particularly impressed by participatory budgeting, where funding decisions are taken directly by the people who are affected. Scottish Government-funded PB training events in recent months have drawn crowds from public bodies and local authorities, and we have received a great deal of interest in our offer to new PB projects. We know of about two dozen that have taken place in the past decade, including the well-established annual Leith decides project, which will go ahead this weekend. Together with the cabinet secretary, I have consulted the participatory budgeting working group and I am considering options, including legislative ones, to ensure that the agenda moves forward.

Participatory budgeting is a relatively new form of community engagement, but public bodies have been doing—or have known how to do—community engagement well for many years. The national standards for community engagement have been the basis for that, and I intend to use them as the foundation of the guidance on community participation that will go to community planning partnerships under the new statutory guidance powers.

CPPs must be the forum where high-level decisions are taken for entire authority areas, but there is much to commend the taking of similar partnership approaches more locally, where grassroots community groups in all their diversity can more easily input directly.

Ken Macintosh (Eastwood) (Lab): Will the minister take an intervention?

Marco Biagi: I am afraid that I am in my final minute.

On Saturday, I will visit a charrette hosted by the Glasgow canal regeneration partnership, where the community will be able to come together in just such a way with facilitators and designers and, over a few days, develop an image or set of options for the design of their community. Charrettes are a participatory approach to planning. They have been supported by the Scottish Government for four years and they are just one of the countless examples that are already out there of people coming together to play their part in their own future.

I do not want to say that we need to up our game because it is clear that there are already so many great examples of excellence out there, but with the bill we have a unique opportunity to ensure that our greatest asset—the people who live and work in Scotland—are even better able to make decisions about their future on their terms. We believe, will believe and always have believed that, if they come together in that way, the decisions will be better. The bill is an opportunity that we must come together today to seize.

I move,

That the Parliament agrees to the general principles of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

The Deputy Presiding Officer (Elaine Smith): At this stage of the debate, we have a little time in hand if members wish to take interventions.

I call Kevin Stewart to speak on behalf of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee.

Kevin Stewart (Aberdeen Central) (SNP): I am pleased to speak in this debate on behalf of my colleagues in the Local Government and Regeneration Committee. I thank the current and past members of the committee for the work that they have undertaken, not only in scrutinising the bill but on the wider topic of community empowerment. The committee has been examining community empowerment in one form or another for the past three years. I will elaborate on that later.
I extend my thanks to all the witnesses who provided written and oral evidence to the committee as well as to the hundreds of people from all over Scotland who took part in various community engagement events with us. Thanks are also due to all the people who helped to facilitate the committee’s various fact-finding visits across Scotland over the past three years. They proved to be invaluable preparation for our scrutiny of the bill.

I thank our colleagues in the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee and the Finance Committee for their scrutiny of the bill and, in particular, I thank the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee, under the convenership of Rob Gibson, for its consideration of part 4, on the community right to buy. I know that that work proved to be a big ask for a committee with a very full programme of work, but my colleagues and I greatly appreciated the knowledge and expertise that its members brought to the examination of the community right to buy. We have accepted its recommendations to us in full. I am sure that members of that committee will say more about that during the debate.

I thank the former Minister for Local Government and Planning, Derek Mackay, and all the Scottish Government officials who have worked to bring the legislation to fruition. I hope that we can work in tandem with the current minister to ensure that we make the bill the best that it possibly can be.

Ernest Hemingway once said:

“The best way to find out if you can trust somebody is to trust them.”

That piece of advice neatly sums up the core philosophy at the heart of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. At first glance, it may be difficult to see a unifying theme to the bill, as it seems to cover so many different areas, but, in truth, trust is the unifying theme at the heart of it: trust that communities all over Scotland know what is best for them and have the desire and ability to help to bring their ambitions to reality; trust that, despite all the challenges that our public services have faced and will continue to face, they can work together to empower communities and deliver the outcomes that they need; trust that communities can make better use of public assets such as buildings or land than local authorities or the wider public sector can; and trust that CPP partners will help to facilitate public trust by being able to work in partnership with communities.

The bill is not about imposing a framework or compelling various public bodies to undertake various actions that we wish them to undertake; rather, it is about providing communities across Scotland with the tools that they need to take decisions for themselves and about trusting them to use those tools wisely. In short, it is about putting the power in community empowerment.

Joan McAlpine (South Scotland) (SNP): On compelling organisations to do things, Kevin Stewart will be aware that the Scottish Woodlot Association has expressed concerns about the Forestry Act 1967, which prevents community groups from taking Forestry Commission land for woodland projects. What is the committee’s view on that?

Kevin Stewart: Andy Brown of the Scottish Woodlot Association was in touch with the committee on Sunday and yesterday. He is pleased that we have recommended that Forestry Commission Scotland should be able to lease state forest land to not-for-profit co-operatives. I hope that that helps the Scottish Woodlot Association with what it is trying to achieve.

I have mentioned trust. With all trust comes a degree of risk; indeed, risk is at the very heart of what it means to trust. As we heard during our evidence taking on the bill, many public sector stakeholders are keenly aware of potential risks that may arise as a result of the change that the bill will help to foster. However, from the widespread community engagement that we undertook as a committee, we feel confident that the legislation will benefit not only communities, but the wider public service.

In our scrutiny of the bill, we have made great efforts to engage with the people whom the bill will affect. First, since early 2012, we have sought to use our entire work programme to take opportunities to examine community empowerment and inform ourselves of how it has developed as a mechanism for delivering change over the past decade or more. Over the past three years, the Local Government and Regeneration Committee has taken advantage of seven major pieces of work to examine the issue of community empowerment: our scrutiny of the Local Government Finance (Unoccupied Properties etc) (Scotland) Bill; our three-strand inquiry on public services reform, in which we undertook three interlinked inquiries over 18 months; our scrutiny of the 2013-14 draft budget; our scrutiny of the third national planning framework; and, most recently, our inquiry into the delivery of regeneration in Scotland.

Secondly, we have taken every opportunity to communicate with real people and communities the length and breadth of Scotland, and to do so in as clear a manner as possible. We undertook 10 fact-finding visits and held four full meetings of the committee outside Edinburgh. We visited places as diverse as Kelso, Cumbernauld, Paisley, Maybole, Stornoway, Dumfries and Fort William. During those visits, we held round-table discussions with local people and community groups about community empowerment. The clerks have estimated that more than 600 people attended the engagement sessions in person, with more joining in via social media.

Thirdly, the committee has very much taken to heart the reform agenda set forth by the Presiding Officer to engage with the people of Scotland as widely as possible using modern technology. To this end, we made widespread use of both Twitter and Facebook to engage with people and garner their views on the bill. We also recently established the first-ever Scottish Parliament committee Instagram account to make use of the visual evidence that we have collated.

During our visit to Stornoway, we held a live interactive Twitter discussion in both English and Gaelic with people in all three island areas. The discussion focused on what those communities felt they needed to empower themselves.

We also had some YouTube videos made, and I invite members to have a look at them. We have already made differences to people’s lives in the course of dealing with the bill. We visited Dumfries, and our video highlights the excellent work of a community group there called the Usual Place and the vital services that it provides in the Dumfries and Galloway area, such as a changing places toilet. I am happy to say that the committee was able to play a small role in helping that worthy organisation to secure a lease with Dumfries and Galloway Council on a property for its use. That is a good example of community empowerment at its best. I give thanks to the Parliament’s media team for allowing us the opportunity to participate in those videos.

The minister mentioned gobbledegook and officialspeak, which are a great turn-off for many folks who want to become involved. I am glad that the minister raised that point today, and I hope that he will continue to follow the committee’s line that we must eradicate them, to allow for the maximum possible amount of participation.

Let us now consider the committee’s findings and recommendations. Part 1 of the bill addresses national outcomes. Given the focus on scrutiny of outcomes, we consider that the Scottish Government should report annually on the extent to which national outcomes have been achieved. That would inform the Parliament’s budget scrutiny process. Such reports should be available before the publication of the draft Scottish budget each year.

Part 2 relates to community planning. The committee is concerned that local communities are not sufficiently and directly involved with community planning partnerships. We recommend that the Government amends the bill to require CPPs to seek involvement from a level below that of community representative, as well as to set out how that involvement will be assessed. There should be an explicit requirement on all CPPs to include community capacity building in local plans and to report on progress in every annual report.

Part 3 deals with participation requests. There can be no doubt that the bill is generally a welcome boost towards putting power in the hands of communities. However, the committee was struck by the fact that, although the bill is designed to empower, it contains a requirement that only groups with a written constitution may submit a participation request. That seems to be out of step with the whole ethos of the bill. In the words of Jeanie Mackenzie, who responded to our video on participation requests:

“Sometimes an individual has a very good idea for improving public services, but lacks the time or opportunity to find others and form a constituted group.”

We therefore recommend that the bill be amended to allow individuals to submit participation requests.

Given the need to legislate in this area, it is vital that progress on participation requests is closely monitored. We therefore also recommend that the bill requires all public service authorities to produce periodic public reports. That is covered in paragraphs 261 to 270 of our report, which sets out our recommendations for the areas to be covered by that process.

As I have already stated, part 4, on the community right to buy, was considered by the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee, so I will leave members of that committee to speak about that issue.

Part 5 deals with asset transfers. Some of our recommendations in that area are directed at the changes that are required to public bodies to ensure that the bill’s intention is achieved in practice. That, too, will require close monitoring.

Part 6 relates to the management of common good assets. Given the approach that the minister outlined in oral evidence, we see no difficulty with the bill specifying a maximum timescale for the compilation of common good registers.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: I am afraid that I must ask you to come to a close.

Kevin Stewart: Part 7 relates to allotments. We have already heard a little about that from members. We have made recommendations on that, too.

Part 8 deals with non-domestic rates, which I may come back to if I have a chance to intervene.
I go back to the first principle, which is that all of this is about trust. It is about time that we trusted our communities, and I hope that we will do so.

I commend our stage 1 report on the bill.

14:45

Alex Rowley (Cowdenbeath) (Lab): Lyndon Johnson said:

“You do not examine legislation in the light of the benefits it will convey if properly administered, but in the light of the wrongs it would do and the harms it would cause if improperly administered.”

For me, that is a good starting point on the bill. I welcome the fact that the minister has said today, and the Cabinet Secretary for Social Justice, Communities and Pensioners’ Rights has said previously, that they want to have more discussions and are willing to consider addressing some of the issues in the bill at stage 2. The Labour Party certainly supports the principle of the bill, but we see a need for greater clarity, and I hope to go through a few of them. I will highlight one. On participation requests, I say that if there is no right to appeal—there is uncertainty on that, in some senses—what is the point?

The bill needs teeth and more strength. Marco Biagi said that “inequalities are reduced” when we empower communities, and I do not disagree with that, but I am not sure that the bill will do that, particularly if we are aiming at the least empowered communities. A real worry about that comes through in the evidence to the committee. Therefore, the bill needs more strength and more teeth if we are serious about community empowerment. I am not sure that it actually goes there.

There is a great need for improvement in the bill, which is why I commend Kevin Stewart and the Local Government and Regeneration Committee for the exhaustive work that they have carried out. They have produced a report that contains a range of detailed recommendations. That demonstrates not only that the committee has been active in taking evidence but that it has listened to that evidence. I am sure that the committee’s recommendations will form the basis of discussions with the Government, as we move forward.

I draw attention to the Finance Committee’s report. We cannot go past today without highlighting that, although that committee “acknowledges the difficulties faced in quantifying potential future costs arising from services that will be demand driven”, it “remains concerned that, despite the requirements of Standing Orders, best estimates have not been fully provided.”

A number of local authorities gave evidence to the Finance Committee and the Local Government and Regeneration Committee, and highlighted many concerns. For instance, East Lothian Council said:

“Local government will incur extra cost as a result of these provisions (which constitute a new legislative burden) and it is not possible to allocate money to these”.

There were submissions from Inverclyde Council, Glasgow City Council, North Ayrshire Council and North Lanarkshire Council, all of which raised legitimate concerns. The bill team confirmed that “That would be part of the normal discussions with local authorities through the annual budgeting process” and that “Local authorities would have to demonstrate and quantify what was involved and then go into discussions with the Scottish Government.”

As we know, local authorities the length and breadth of Scotland—regardless of their political colour—are currently cutting front-line services.

Kevin Stewart: Will Alex Rowley give way?

Alex Rowley: I will not, at this stage.

I raise that point not to highlight concerns about local government finance, but to argue that if the moneys are not available, the cost and the fear of cost could become a barrier to ensuring that public organisations progress the legislation in the intended spirit.

The Finance Committee and Kevin Stewart’s committee have flagged up those points, and it is important that we flag them up today. The Local Government and Regeneration Committee believes that finance is such a major concern that it draws attention to the issue in the report that is before Parliament today.

Kevin Stewart: The committee was divided on that point, but it would be fair to say that there are some concerns.

The Scottish Community Alliance director, Angus Hardie, said:

“while recognising the validity of the concerns highlighted by the ... Committee with regard to the Financial Memorandum, the Scottish Community Alliance would urge MSPs to support the passage of the Bill to the next Stage.”

Does Mr Rowley agree with that?

Alex Rowley: I have said that the Scottish Labour Party absolutely supports the principle of community empowerment. However, there are serious questions around finance that should be raised in Parliament. That is a fact.
Anne McTaggart (Glasgow) (Lab): Alex Rowley referred in his opening comments to poor legislation and the challenges in the bill. Does he agree with the latest statement from the Scottish Allotments and Gardens Society, which asks for section 7 to be removed from the bill and passed as separate legislation?

Alex Rowley: I should probably declare an interest as a very keen allotment grower. There needs to be further discussion with the Scottish Allotments and Gardens Society, which has raised a number of issues that I note—with the greatest respect—the minister did not address in his response to Kevin Stewart’s intervention.

Marco Biagi: On the point about discussion with the Scottish Allotments and Gardens Society, I have been out and visited an allotment, and met the society to discuss the five points that it put forward. I also spoke to the society’s president on the phone on Friday. There has been continuing dialogue, which will go on. It is important to identify what the society is looking for, because that is the sticking point right now with regard to what the legislation needs to do. My door is open, and my phone is on.

Alex Rowley: I agree with the minister that the five points that the society makes will form the basis of a discussion.

The letter that the society has submitted highlights a missed opportunity to link the bill to the food strategy and to health and wellbeing through the community planning partnerships, and to build its aims into local community plans. We should be able to have those discussions, and I am happy to join the minister in engaging in them. As I said, I am a very keen allotment grower and I would like to see allotments expand.

I will quickly highlight a few other issues. Inclusion Scotland states that “in absence of genuine and meaningful community capacity building and engagement, the opportunities created by the Bill will not be” equally distributed. It goes on to state that under part 3 of the bill “Communities which are the most marginalised, fractured and impoverished are likely to benefit least whilst communities already rich in resources and human assets are likely to benefit most through their acquisition of new assets”.

The Local Government and Regeneration Committee highlights the same points, which are genuine and need to be taken on board.

Inclusion Scotland’s briefing also highlights the issue of how “community” is defined. I was quite surprised to see that, because I thought that the Government was looking at the definition more widely. However, I discovered from reading the cabinet secretary’s evidence in committee that that was not what was said, so we need to take on board Inclusion Scotland’s point.

To go back to the point that I made at the start and that the minister made in his opening speech, if we are serious about tackling inequalities and poverty, we must recognise that empowerment is one part of that and getting community planning right is another. In a previous role, I met the Cabinet Secretary for Finance, Employment and Sustainable Growth and had a discussion about that. I am absolutely committed to community planning, but we must recognise the points that Inclusion Scotland makes, including that it believes “that the requirement placed on community groups to request participation disempowers rather than empowers communities, as it leaves the power with the public bodies, which should instead have a duty to ... engage with communities.”

There are some serious points in that that we must pick up and consider if we are serious about the principles of the bill. They are all highlighted in the evidence to the committee.

This morning, I read another briefing that came from Barnardo’s, Oxfam and others. I note that they talk about participatory budgeting. The minister has said that he is interested in that, and some pots of money have been made available.

I am a big believer in the idea that there is in Scotland a fourth tier of government—community councils. As we discussed in the committee, many people criticise them because they often tell us what they are against rather than what they are for. In my constituency, three community councils had elections only a few months ago. The turnout was 22 or 23 per cent, which is not bad when we consider that it was 27 per cent in the by-election in Kirkcaldy, which I thought was good for a by-election. That means that 20-odd per cent of the communities in Kelty, Cardenden and Lumphinnans turned out to elect local community councillors.

If we go back to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee’s previous report on empowerment and voting patterns, we see the argument that, if councils are perceived to have more powers, more people are likely to come out and vote. It is likewise with the fourth tier of government in Scotland. It is worth exploring passing budgets down through participatory budgeting to local level to empower communities to take local action.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: You need to draw to a close, please.

Alex Rowley: I will draw to a close.
We must reconsider the right to request to participate, because we cannot have it without a proper appeals system.

Scottish Labour is absolutely committed to empowering communities. We need a progressive agenda that not only puts far more power into this Parliament from Westminster but ensures that it goes from Parliament to communities. That is the way ahead.

The bill needs a lot more work, and we are certainly up for working with the Government and partners to move things forward.

Cameron Buchanan (Lothian) (Con): The bill contains some provisions with which I agree and some with which I do not. I welcome the principle of community empowerment, but I am not sure that the bill will truly empower communities in the most appropriate way.

Although there have been areas of broad agreement, I will raise a number of concerns that remain, in the hope that further discussion will help to resolve the issues. It is vital that key terms in the bill be defined properly, which unfortunately does not appear to be the case. In addition, it is a fundamental point that bills must be costed before they are put to Parliament for approval. As yet, that has not happened. I welcome the general provisions regarding allotments, but wish for greater clarity on them as the bill progresses.

Before I elaborate on the aspects of the bill on which some work is needed, I reiterate my agreement with the principle of enabling communities to have a greater say in their areas. However, I am not sure that the bill would empower communities in the most appropriate way.

Furthermore, it is vital that definitions of when a community's right to buy can be enforced be set out very clearly. An absolute right to buy without strict and obvious conditions would set a very damaging precedent that would be neither fair nor in Scotland's best interests. My colleague Alex Fergusson will elaborate on those points.

One of the key aspects of the bill that is to be assessed as it passes through the Parliament is the estimate of the costs that will arise as a result of its provisions. In its report, the committee expresses its concern that best estimates of costs arising from all provisions have not been provided, despite the requirements of standing orders, as Mr Rowley said. I feel the need to reiterate those concerns in the strongest terms, because that omission in particular, regarding asset transfer or participation requests, is a serious matter that must be addressed before the bill goes to stage 2.

Members of Parliament should not be expected to debate accurately the merits of the bill without proper costings; we cannot be expected to sign a blank cheque. We may hear the excuse that there are difficulties in quantifying future costs arising from provisions that will depend on the amount of demand, but that is no excuse, since the committee and Parliament expect estimates within ranges. I am sure that many members share my concerns in that regard; I expect that the concerns will be addressed as soon as possible.

I welcome the bill's aims to make clear provisions regarding allotments. They are valuable to many people and it is important to explore how we can help. Accordingly, I agree with a number of the provisions. However, I would like to raise two particular aspects that I believe should be considered. The first concerns provisions regarding the size of an allotment plot. The committee heard points regarding traditional plot sizes. People were right to highlight the need for plots to be of sufficient size, but it is perhaps unwise to assume that all allotment holders wish to use them for the same reasons and for the same purpose. For example, some people use allotments purely as a hobby, rather than as a means to feed a family.

Furthermore, different areas will have varying local demands and differences regarding available space, as we heard in connection with Fort William. The point that I am trying to underline is that a balance must be struck. Allotment holders deserve a reasonable sized plot, but local authorities need flexibility to adapt to local circumstances and local demand. With that in mind, as we have heard, the Scottish Allotments and Gardens Society suggested that a particular size could be a reference standard that could be halved or quartered, rather than being an obligatory standard. That is worth detailed consideration. However, it remains sensible for local authorities to have the flexibility to offer plot sizes that are most suitable locally.

The second point that I would like to make on allotments is that, in the interests of fairness, no supplier of grown produce should be excluded through legislation from selling the produce locally in markets or shops. It is only fair that new producers are able to establish themselves without undue boundaries, and local consumers should be able to decide for themselves what they want to buy.

Before I conclude my remarks, I would like to return to what I see as being one of the most important points to be made about the bill, which is that it lacks clear and unambiguous definitions in many areas. For example, I welcome the duty that the bill places on local authorities to establish and maintain a register of all property and assets that are held by them for the common good. That duty will, amongst other things, help to increase transparency. However, the definition of “common good” is not set out clearly, which might result in confusion during the bill’s implementation, as well as opportunities for provisions to be either extended or avoided.

I hope that today’s debate shows a degree of agreement around some aspects of the bill, even though pressing concerns remain over many provisions.

Alex Rowley: Does Cameron Buchanan agree that it is therefore crucial that we have some kind of financial estimates of the costs that could be incurred, if we are serious about taking this bill forward and wanting it to work in communities?

Cameron Buchanan: It is essential that we have estimates of costs, or the bill cannot proceed. We have not had those estimates.

It is important that, in the provisions on allotments, the correct balance be struck between protecting allotment holders’ interests and allowing local authorities the flexibility that they need to operate efficiently. After all, community empowerment should be about allowing decisions to be made locally. Furthermore, it is vital that clear definitions be provided for each aspect that remains ambiguous. If they are not, the interpretation and reach of the bill could be extended beyond its remit, with controversial consequences.

I would like to finish on a positive note, by highlighting my sincere concern about the lack of financial information that has been provided and reiterating my expectation that that omission will be rectified.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: We come to the open debate. Speeches should be of six minutes, please.

Rob Gibson (Caithness, Sutherland and Ross) (SNP): The Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee considered part 4 of the bill and reported our views to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee.

Land reform is an on-going and complex process. The provisions in part 4 address some of the issues on that agenda. Once amended, the provisions should resolve the identified shortcomings of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 and extend the community right to buy across Scotland, which we welcome. However, we agreed with some concerns about the drafting of the bill, with regard to what is included and what is to be left needing regulation and guidance later on.

The committee believes that the complexity of aspects within part 4 merits further explanation in the financial and explanatory memoranda. Further consideration of sustainable development and human rights could have facilitated a more constructive dialogue between landowners and communities. We understand that the community right to buy will be demand led, so the costs for communities, landowners and public bodies are unclear. The financial memorandum omits to monitor the cost implications of the part 4 provisions closely and the funding requirements will have to be kept under review—the figure is as long as a piece of a string.

Stakeholders overwhelmingly support extending the community right to buy to the whole of Scotland. The committee agrees, and we welcome the provisions in section 27 to do so. We also welcome the cabinet secretary’s potential amendments at stage 2 to extend the list of eligible community bodies, and we recommend that that includes community benefit societies and community interest companies.

We heard some suggest that the definition of communities should include communities of interest as well as those of geographic place, for example in dispersed rural communities. However, the committee recognises the importance of communities being rooted in place, and we are content with the definition in the bill.

Registration of an interest in land was explored in great detail. As many communities start to take an interest in land acquisition only when land comes on to the market, it is right to have that. Communities benefit from proactive engagement in community development and trying to identify assets that they may need to deliver their objectives. In principle, we are supportive of the requirement to register an interest in land, but re-registration processes must be simplified and should include the option to register for a purpose.

Communities should have a right to register an interest and to be notified when land is coming onto the market or ownership is changing and that should trigger the process of registering a right of pre-emption, which is a new way forward. The process for late registration should reflect the practical reality for communities and should be redesigned to accommodate that.

A presumption in favour of re-registration should be agreed unless there is some material change of circumstances. If the re-registration process is substantially simplified, a requirement to re-register every five years is appropriate.

The committee agrees that mapping requirements for the community right to buy are excessive. Communities need a simplified system to align the eligibility criteria with those for parts 2 and 3A of the amended Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003.

The power to extend the community right to buy where there is no willing seller should be a power of last resort. That power could play a key role to hasten negotiation. We are concerned that this new right, as currently drafted, may be almost impossible to exercise. Too many obstacles and opportunities for avoidance on the part of landowners occur to us.

Why should the definition of eligible land be restricted to that which is considered to be “wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected”?
The committee believes the draft bill may fail to further sustainable development. Why is a definition needed at all, as the parallel tests for crofting land purchases do not require that? Most committee members support tests of furthering sustainable development and being in the public interest, which meet the requirements.

The majority of the committee recommended that the Scottish Government consider a definition that avoids the wider circumstances that are barriers to sustainable development, and we look forward to the minister providing guidelines before stage 2. If no unambiguous and acceptable definition of abandoned or neglected land appears on the face of the bill, avoiding the existing legal concept of abandoned land, the committee will ask the Scottish Government to remove the term “abandoned or neglected land”. We think it is an urban concept that has little place in rural land use.

The difficulties faced by communities in seeking to exercise their right to buy prompt us to seek assurance that appropriate support and funding is available. Public sector bodies, such as the Forestry Commission, must be proactive, so we welcome the Scottish Government’s proposal to establish a community land unit to provide support and advice. That may help many communities to make progress.

The committee understands that the Scottish Government intends to lodge amendments at stage 2 to include provisions for the crofting community right to buy. We would have preferred the consultation on the crofting community right to buy to have been undertaken alongside the consultation on the existing part 4 provisions, and amendments to the crofting community right to buy to have been included in the bill rather than being introduced at stage 2.

The committee wrote more than 70 pages of report on part 4. That suggests that the bill is a huge bill with huge intent and that community empowerment is central to all our interests. To make it all the more effective, we hope that the Government will take on board the committee’s views.

Sarah Boyack (Lothian) (Lab): There is strong support across the chamber for extending land reform to urban communities. Part of the process has to be about learning from the lessons of the implementation of our historic land reform legislation in the early years of the Parliament. It is important to bear that in mind as we look at the details and the principles of the bill. We have to make sure that the legislation that Parliament passes is capable of working as intended and that communities will be able to use it, and there are key concerns about that.

I thank the committees for their work. I have recently joined the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee. I particularly thank the many stakeholders for the detailed work that they have done on their comments to enable us to process their concerns at stage 1.

I put on the record the fact that Labour wants to work with those who want to be radical on land reform. A couple of years ago, we made it clear that we want to see new community rights to purchase land even when there is no willing seller. We are very pleased to see those ambitions in the bill and we strongly support them in principle.

For us, the key challenge is to make sure that the proposals are workable. We need more than the rhetoric of land reform and of being radical; the detail has to match the rhetoric. That remains a key challenge as we move towards stage 2 of the bill process. The stakeholders who have given us evidence and are listening to the debate today do not believe that the bill’s proposals are sufficiently clear or workable.

The proposals appear to give new rights with one hand but, on the other hand, they might make it impossible to exercise those rights in practice because of the specific wording used in the bill. The committee report makes that clear.

That takes me to the central purpose of the bill and the question of land that is to be eligible for potential purchase even when there is not a willing seller. The policy memorandums for the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 and for this part of the bill make it clear that the policy purpose of the provisions is to further sustainable development and to remove barriers to it. As currently drafted, the bill refers to such impediments to sustainable development on land that is “wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected”.

That seems to be too narrow a definition that implies that what is under consideration is solely the physical characteristics of the land. To us, sustainable development is about both physical and environmental matters and social and economic matters. The social and economic development of communities can be neglected as well as their land being environmentally or physically neglected. The bill must be absolutely clear about that.

The Scottish Government appears to be reluctant to do what the committee wants to do by defining abandoned or neglected land in the bill. When the committee debated the issue, it emerged that the Scottish Government was having further consultation on the issue on the very same day. We have not seen the outcome of those discussions. Claudia Beamish and I dissented from that one part of what is an extensive and very strong report to signal how important it is to us that the matter is resolved. We reserve the right to have abandoned or neglected land defined in the bill, even if the committee is tempted to follow the Government’s preferred route.

Paragraph 219 of the bill concludes:

“The Committee reserves the right to take evidence on this issue at stage 2.”

That is the part we strongly support.

I do not know whether the environment minister is speaking today, although I am glad that she is in the chamber to hear the evidence. Our report shows that the Law Society, Scottish Land & Estates, Community Land Scotland, the Church of Scotland and other respected organisations have looked at the bill and strongly criticised how it might be implemented.

We think that there must be a clear definition. If that is not there, stakeholders have given us fair warning that in any court challenge there will be a real danger that the court may decide, when considering the prescribed matters, that “the linkage between those concepts was not sufficiently warranted or reasonably envisaged by the statutory provisions, or was stretching the normal interpretation of the primary tests” —which would be the dictionary meaning of the words “abandoned” or “neglected”. We have been clearly warned about the dangers of the current approach and we are in danger of giving a new and powerful right with one hand but removing it in practice with the other because the detailed words in the bill are wrong.

There is another trap in the bill, which is the clause that requires ministers to be satisfied that it would be inconsistent with sustainable development if the current owner of the land was to remain the owner. We have had evidence that that would be impossible to demonstrate and could automatically mean that any community application would be bound to be refused. That is why the committee wants that provision to be deleted.

The bill is hugely important and we share communities’ ambitions for the sustainable use of their land, but we need to ensure that communities can exercise that power. The bill as drafted will not let them do that. As our convener Rob Gibson said, the devil is in the detail.

We do not yet know when ministers will respond to the committee; that will be absolutely crucial. We have a very short timescale. In just a couple of weeks we will take extra evidence on the community right to buy and in a month we are scheduled to look at the bill in detail for stage 2. We very much need detailed information from the Scottish ministers. When the minister sums up, I would like to know when we will get that information, because we will want to look at it in detail with stakeholders as we decide on which amendments—including those that the Scottish Government might lodge—we think are appropriate.

The bill is hugely important and I am concerned about the timescales. If we do not get the detail right, the bill will not do what we all want it to do. That cannot be allowed to happen.

Michael Russell (Argyll and Bute) (SNP): The bill is very welcome. It is useful to state at the outset, as minister did, that this is about mindsets more than minutiae. We cannot empower communities by fiat; communities need to take power to themselves.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Mr Russell, could you check your microphone? I am not hearing you very clearly.

Michael Russell: Sorry, Presiding Officer. I was just hiding away.

The job of legislators is to create the framework to allow that to happen, encourage those who want it to happen, remove the barriers to it happening and ensure that those who do not want it to happen are not successful in their aim. I will touch on all those issues in a moment, but first I will make three other points.

First, although the word “sustainability” is on everybody’s lips, there is no practical assistance to communities and others who want to understand what that means to their buyout. It should be possible to give Scottish Natural Heritage, for example, a statutory duty to help those who take on assets and advise them how to manage them sustainably.

I agree with Rob Gibson and Sarah Boyack about the difficulty of the words
"wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected."

They need to be defined in the bill and all of us regret that that has not happened yet. If it is not done at stage 2, the words will have to be removed, because they present an enormous barrier to the successful operation of the bill.

Consideration is also needed of a requirement in the bill for ministers to have regard to the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights when determining an application. Ministers are already bound to have regard to the European convention on human rights. It is important that we recognise the wider human rights considerations that land reform presents.

As we are all born-again diggers, I refer to the allotments issue. There are very clear and simple requests from allotment owners. The Scottish Allotments and Gardens Society wants a definition of standard plot and a public sector duty. Those are reasonable demands that would contribute to the Scottish Government's health, environmental and food policies.

The biggest issue in the bill for me, and for many, is the transfer of assets to local communities. In that regard, the task that I have outlined—to create the framework, stimulate the demand, remove the barriers and ensure that those against do not succeed—is very clear. It needs to be judged against two things: the present legislation on community buyout and the actual practice for those who try to buy properties.

Members in the chamber will not be surprised that I want to use an example from my constituency: the proposed buyout of Castle Toward. Castle Toward is a large, decaying mansion house set in parkland that overlooks the Clyde. It was built in 1820 by Kirkman Finlay, the lord provost of Glasgow and the MP for Glasgow. It was owned by the Coats family, and during the second world war it was commissioned as HMS Brontosaurus—perhaps that is rather appropriate, given the dinosaur-like attitude of Argyll and Bute Council—and was used as a training centre for the D-day landings. It was purchased by the Corporation of Glasgow in 1948 and became a celebrated outdoor centre.

When local government was reorganised, Castle Toward passed to Argyll and Bute Council at no cost. Up until 2013, it had a tenant who had a very poor relationship with the council. The community tried and failed to buy it in 2011, and a commercial bid failed in 2013. A second community purchase bid has been made, which was backed by the overwhelming majority of the community in a ballot. The bid has received the maximum funding from the Scottish land fund and it is supported by Highlands and Islands Enterprise. Just last week, the Scottish Government made a helpful intervention via the cabinet secretary. Up to 100 jobs could be created. An anchor tenant is in existence. A new valuation that the community had carried out supports the purchase price offer of £850,000.

The community is desperate to get hold of the asset but, for some reason, the council will not sell. A 10,000-signature petition demands that the council sell the property, but it makes no difference. Chimeras such as difficulties with state aid and the business plan have come and gone. There remains an intransigence on the part of the council. Indeed, it is worse than an intransigence—there is a pretence that the council wants to sell. A £1 million loan has been offered to the community, but the business plan shows that that cannot be supported. The council has even said to the community that it should just take the loan, default on it and hand the property back in three years’ time. We might describe such action as being more appropriate to the Cosa Nostra than to the Costa Clyde.

The reality is that the building remains in the possession of the council. If it was a private individual who was involved, we would pillory them the length and breadth of Scotland. Such poor landlordism is not unique in Scotland; it is not unique even among local authorities. There is a public mindset—to use the word that the minister used—that property is retained by the public sector and that access to it is very rarely given by anyone else.

That is particularly true in Argyll and Bute. This morning, I spoke to MacLeod Construction, which is a big building firm in Argyll that is desperate to build a factory unit in Lochgilphead. The community wishes to have part of the land for community use, but it is being obstructed by the local authority. There are many examples across my constituency of extraordinarily poor stewardship of public assets, which the community cannot get hold of.

When we apply the tests that I have outlined, we find that the legislation is not doing enough to force the issue. A framework exists, but it is not working well enough. The bill can change that. Demand exists—in many areas, that demand is growing all the time—but there are still too many barriers that local authorities and public agencies can put in the way of communities, and there are still far too many ways in which bodies can obstruct community purchase.

Whether in south Cowal on Mull, where the community council wanted to buy the local toilet from Argyll and Bute Council and was told that it would be no problem—it would cost £30,000 and would take a year to process—in Oban, where Rockfield school is for sale and the community wants to set up an arts centre, or in Lochgilphead, throughout Argyll and Scotland as a whole communities want to buy and use assets. They would use them in better ways than those of us who stand as stewards of them do, including the councils. We must get the bill right so that that can happen. We will do that through the process of amendment. I hope that the minister will be sympathetic to that aim.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: I advise members that we are eating into what little extra time we had.

Tavish Scott (Shetland Islands) (LD): I welcome the minister to the bill. I hope that he does not spend all his time over the next few years with his lawyers but, on the basis of today’s proceedings, it sounds as if that is reasonably likely.

Liberal Democrats support the bill. It would be difficult to be against community empowerment. I believe that many of the remarks that have been made in the debate, not least those that Kevin Stewart made about the principle of trust, have struck a reasonable tone on the best way to achieve what is sought from the bill.

There are a couple of other important principles that have not been touched on, one of which is devolution within Scotland. I know that the minister will not agree, but I want to see a reversal of centralisation within Scotland and a return to decentralisation. We have spent an awful lot of time arguing about the principle of what should flow from one part of the United Kingdom to another. However, it is important in our deliberations that we, at times, reflect on what more could be done around Scotland in our different communities, towns, villages and islands were some of that decentralisation to happen.

Marco Biagi: In the spirit of returning to that decentralised era when the member was a minister, does Tavish Scott support the return of ring-fenced funding in local government?

Tavish Scott: I am just coming on to the ring fencing that the minister still has in place. The idea that he has got rid of all the ring fencing is far from the truth.

I am very grateful to the minister for raising the issue. I will come on to the other centralisations that he has voted for so convincingly over the last number of years. I was hoping to debate in a much broader spirit, but if he wants to play the politics, believe me, I will be all too happy to do that, too.

I return to the laudable objectives in the bill to encourage local people to design, initiate and decide on the services that they want and to use the assets that Mike Russell mentioned briefly. We should have a role in encouraging local government, too. Mr Russell made a very strenuous and passionate case about the failures of the council in his area on a particular project, and I am sure that he is entirely justified in making that case. However, I worry slightly at times because when we are considering community empowerment, it would occasionally be important to recognise that local government can play a positive role in that. Far from believing that local government is a threat to Holyrood rules, which appears to be the view on some of the nationalist benches, we should take a rather more positive approach.

I see in some of the submissions that we have had that the same approach could be applied to community councils. I was a bit taken aback by reading the minister’s remarks about community councils in his evidence to the committee.

The Government minister rightly asked for ideas and proposals. I strongly believe that one way to empower communities is by giving more local government financial responsibility at a local level. That is not just about participative budgeting. Many submissions talked strongly and persuasively not only about that, but about local government finance. The minister is blessed with a majority in the Parliament. He could reform local government finance. He could introduce local income tax. He would have no impediment from my party; indeed, on that issue, he would have our support. More to the point, he has the numbers to get it through. Sadly, the policy is going nowhere; it appears to be utterly lost in the long grass of the Government’s thinking.

Marco Biagi: There is an outstanding invitation to the Liberal Democrats to nominate a member to join the commission on local tax reform. Perhaps if you return the letter, we can get on with creating the commission.

Tavish Scott: The minister could just pass legislation to introduce local income tax. That is the policy that I believe in and I thought that you believed in, too, Marco, so why do you not just get on and do it rather than set up yet another commission?

The Deputy Presiding Officer: I ask members to speak through the chair, please.

Chic Brodie (South Scotland) (SNP): Why did the Lib Dems not do that earlier?

Tavish Scott: If Mr Brodie wants to intervene, I will happily take that intervention. However, if he does not have anything to say, why does he not just stay where he is?

We must reverse the centralisation. If the bill begins to do that, that would be welcome indeed. Over the past seven years, we have seen many changes that, far from empowering communities, have taken powers away from them.

I agreed with the minister when, in his opening remarks, he said:

“communities should always be around the table when decisions that affect them are being taken.”

I entirely endorse that sentiment and that principled approach. However, the approach should also have applied to the police and fire services, to the courts closures and to the other closures that we have seen over the past number of years when communities’ views on those subjects were very much ignored by this Government. I could mention a number of other examples, but it seems to me that, if we are to move forward, there needs to be a little understanding from the Government that the one-size-fits-all approach that tends to come from Edinburgh does not mean flexible and responsible local services or assets being used in the right way. That needs to change.

I also want to reflect on a series of particularly helpful submissions for the debate from different organisations, not least of which is the submission from the Scottish Council for Voluntary Organisations. It said:

“Successful community empowerment cannot be driven by a top-down approach, it must be encouraged to develop from the grassroots up.”

I am sure that most of us would agree very strongly with that sentiment.

Scottish Community Alliance has been mentioned. It noted:

“the Bill is a missed opportunity to address at least some of the long standing challenges faced by the country’s most localised tier of democracy”— community councils. I commend that approach to the minister. I hope that he might give that further thought.

Voluntary Action Scotland noted:

“The bill does not go far enough to force this joint working between statutory bodies”.

I hope that the minister accepts that there is a lot to do.

Rob Gibson rightly spoke about the amendments on the crofting community right to buy that the Government plans to lodge at stage 2. We raised the same concerns in connection with the Aquaculture and Fisheries (Scotland) Bill just a year or so ago. Mr Gibson—quite fairly—made that point, as did Mr Fergusson and Ms Beamish. I hope that the Government will not make the same mistake as it made with that bill, which was to introduce big stage 2 amendments without any consultation. That is a parliamentary point for you, Presiding Officer, as much as for anyone else.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: I ask members to keep within their 6 minutes, please.

Mark McDonald (Aberdeen Donside) (SNP): I was a member of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee throughout the stage 1 consideration of the bill, although I left the committee before it drafted its report. Having looked at the weighty tome that was produced, I have a feeling that I may have had a lucky escape at that point. I pay tribute to the committee clerks, who did a fantastic job during the consideration of the bill in supporting the committee’s work and ensuring that we were able to hear from a wide range of interested parties, be they local authorities, other public bodies or—most important—community groups and organisations here in Edinburgh and, crucially, out there in the communities.

I have been enthusiastic about the bill’s potential for some time and I remain so. However, I will cover only a couple of the areas within it because there are a lot of sections and my colleagues have covered some of the other areas in detail. I will address the areas that I focused on during my consideration of the bill in committee and will flesh out my comments a bit.

Participation requests are extremely important. All too often, I see an approach to service delivery that supports design from the top down rather than from the bottom up, although we are now seeing some improvement in how local authorities consult communities, whether on the design of services, the delivery of services or the formation of their budgets. When I arrived in local government in 2007, the budget process was a closed shop. Back-bench council members received their budget papers a couple of weeks before the budget and communities had very little input into how the budget was formed. In Aberdeen City Council, we took the approach of reforming the process so that the public face of the budgeting process started much earlier, which allowed much more community feed-in and involvement. I see participation requests as an opportunity for that kind of approach to be taken not just in how local authorities set their budgets, but in how they design and deliver services. That will result in the meaningful involvement of communities rather than the tick-box consultation exercises that politicians hear complaints about all too often.

On asset transfers, my colleague Mike Russell made a passionate case on some of the issues that affect his local community. He highlighted the fact that there can, all too often, be blockages. I have seen that in my constituency as well. There are good examples out there of communities and community organisations having taken on assets or land from local authorities or other bodies and having delivered real opportunities or good work in communities. I am thinking of, for example, the Dyce development and amenities committee, in my constituency, which operates the old Carnegie library—the Carnegie hall, as it is known in Dyce—which a range of community groups is able to use. It also operates the community garden, which has provided some green space and an opportunity for people in the community to enjoy that area.

Yet, just a couple of miles down the road, in the community of Bucksburn, there has been a long-standing and protracted attempt to gain access to green space next to the Cloverleaf hotel. The land, which is known as the Cloverfield park area, was transferred to the local authority in exchange for green space that was taken up during the development of the new secondary school. The land requires work, and there is interest from within the community in developing it as a community garden or community green space; it is recognised that there is a lack of green space for the people of Bucksburn to use. However, it has proved extremely difficult to get the local authority to come to the table and have meaningful discussion and dialogue with the community to advance the issue. As a result of a housing development, there might be an opportunity to develop the land, but what ought to have been a simple process has taken far too long.

Another, recent example is Victoria road school, in Maureen Watt’s constituency. The community in Torry wanted to take on the former primary school and operate the building for the benefit of the wider community, but the council has rejected the approach and elected to demolish the building. The council’s decision is unfortunate and flies in the face of what we are trying to achieve with the bill, which is to allow communities to have much more say in and ownership over what goes on in their areas.

I recognise the importance of allotments. There are a number of allotment plots in my constituency. I highlight an issue that came up in committee discussions: there is a requirement on local authorities in relation to allotments, but many other public bodies and organisations have land that might be suitable for allotments. Will the minister reflect on that as he considers how the bill might be amended at stage 2?

Bob Doris (Glasgow) (SNP): I am glad that I am following Mark McDonald, because in this important debate I thought for a while that members were speaking in abstract and technical terms and were not making the issues real for the communities that we represent, as I want to do.

A few months ago, I led a debate in the Parliament about helping community-led regeneration in Royston. Royston, or the Garn gad, as most locals call it, does not have its challenges to seek. However, it has many inspiring individuals and organisations who daily make a difference to many people’s lives. I am thinking of organisations such as Blochairn Housing Association, Spire View Housing Association, Copperworks Housing Co-operative, Royston Youth Action and Rosemount Development Trust, and individuals such as Charlie Lunn, Tilly and Liz McIlroy and Joan Reuston, who champion community empowerment in everything that they do. There are many more groups and individuals who do much in the Garn gad, and I am sorry that I cannot mention them all.

I firmly believe that if the bill had become law several years ago, the community in the Garn gad could have benefited greatly. The test of the bill is whether it can make a significant difference to that community and others that I represent.

I am privileged to have worked with key community stakeholders, on a cross-party basis, to help to develop a community regeneration strategy and get a forum up and running in that regard. In particular, I thank Rosemount Development Trust and Kevin Murray Associates, who have brought us to a stage at which we have a fully fledged and community designed, consulted on and led regeneration strategy.

Whether we are talking about plans for a sports hub and more sports facilities, better connectivity with other areas, better shopping facilities, particularly around Roystonhill, bringing healthcare into the community, providing local amenities such as improved recreation and meeting space, or better housing provision and mix, everything has to tie together and the community must lead the strategy.

An issue is that in the middle of the community there is a significant piece of land, over which the community has had no control for many years. The land was sold to a group called Focus Urban several years ago, which made a commitment to put affordable housing on it, but—to be frank—that never came to a hill of beans. It could be argued that at the time the local authority did not take a joined-up approach to considering whether that was the best place to build houses anyway.

In recent months, that company went bankrupt and the land was to be disposed of by the Bank of Ireland, which had control over the situation. As political representatives and community stakeholders, we all made strenuous efforts to get in contact with someone to see whether the community could get control over a key piece of land in order to bring about a fully fledged, bigger-picture regeneration of the wider local community, but I am afraid to say that we had no joy. The land was sold to an offshore company, but it does not matter whether it is such a company, a domestic private concern or, indeed, a local public authority interest that owns the land, because the bottom line is that the community has a plan for Royston, or the Garn gad.

We will push forward that plan as best we can, but it would have been much better if we had had control over all the community assets. Much of the talk in the debate this afternoon has been around what terminology such as “abandoned land” and “neglected land” means. I concur with the view that if land is not part of a sustainable community regeneration strategy but is an asset that is lying fallow, it is neglected land. Such land in the Garn gad has to fit into the bigger picture of wider public interest and public communication about what people in the Garn gad want.

If the minister wants to see for himself what living, breathing, community empowerment legislation will look like in action, he should come to the Garn gad and see what we have done and also see the land in our community that we no longer have control of. I urge the minister to take up that invitation.

I say “our community”, but I do not stay in the Garn gad. I stay in an area of Glasgow called Summerston, and I will also speak about a community asset in that area. The minister need not worry, because I will not invite him to see the asset. However, I will certainly make him aware of it.

There are very few community facilities in Summerston, which has grown exponentially in recent years—I stay in one of the new-build houses—but without community assets being brought in to support that growth. However, there used to be a community asset facility in Summerston that was a day centre for adults with learning disabilities. I will not rehearse the arguments about whether the centre should have stayed open, although I supported its retention. However, I will certainly make him aware of it.

However, there used to be a community asset facility in Summerston that was a day centre for adults with learning disabilities. I will not rehearse the arguments about whether the centre should have stayed open, although I supported its retention. However, I was a key community asset in a key community location that is now sitting boarded up and empty and which is being vandalised and going to rack and ruin because of the lack of a joined-up strategy. If only the bill had become an act earlier, it would have been possible to marshall the many community views on the building and its site and make them the real heart of community regeneration in Summerston.

To return to the story that I told about Royston, I hope that the minister will come and see the area for himself. Colleagues have spoken about technical aspects in relation to how we can improve the bill, but at the end of the day the bill has to do what it says on the tin for the communities that we represent. Whether it is in Royston or Summerston, or in urban or rural areas, we must ensure that the bill delivers. I am delighted to support the bill at stage 1, but if it needs to be improved, the Parliament should come together to do that.

Claudia Beamish (South Scotland) (Lab): I am delighted to speak in this debate on the furtherance of fairer distribution of land and assets throughout urban and rural Scotland. Although ownership is only one way for communities to carve out a positive future, I am clear that land reform must continue to be the robust way forward in Scotland and that the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill makes a significant contribution to that.

I intend to focus on part 4, which was scrutinised by, as our convener Rob Gibson highlighted, the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee, of which I am a member. Like others, I am a born-again digger, so I will also make a quick reference to allotments.

As a member for South Scotland, I am keenly aware that the majority of community purchase in rural Scotland has been in the Highlands and Islands. Some argue that there is no interest in community purchase in the rest of Scotland, including in my region of South Scotland, but I strongly disagree. There are examples of community success across the south, from the Mull of Galloway Trust to Corehead farm, which is owned by the Borders Forest Trust. They have community interest in regeneration and sustainable development—in the true sense of that term—at their heart. There is also interest in community purchase for the future from other groups, such as in the village of Leadhills.

However, it is essential that support is in place to enable communities to identify opportunities, build capacity and understand how to take forward the process. Thus, the Scottish Government’s commitment to new bodies such as the community land fund, as highlighted in the land reform review group’s report, is fundamental to the way forward. It would also be helpful if the minister could confirm today whether the Scottish Government is considering a review of Scottish Enterprise’s remit to enable it to provide the sort of robust support that is offered by Highlands and Islands Enterprise.

With regard specifically to the bill, as a community activist and as a community councillor in the past, I have spent much time pondering the definition of “community” and, to be frank, I have not always come up with very clear definitions. It is a difficult issue, although the committee’s support for bencoms—community benefit societies—is an important step forward. In the context of the bill, I believe that our committee was, on balance, right to rule out communities of interest and to keep the focus on communities of place. However, as Rob Gibson stressed, rurality is an issue, and I continue to seek reassurance on the matter from both the Minister for Local Government and Community Empowerment and the Minister for Environment, Climate Change and Land Reform. Groups such as the Strathaven choral society have members from as far away as 20 miles, and in the Highlands there must be societies whose members come from even further away. We have moved away from the postcode issue, but we need to be careful and we might need to look at the issue again at stage 2.

Sarah Boyack focused on concerns about the definition of abandoned and neglected land and on sustainable development—I will not rehearse what she said. Rob Gibson mentioned registration issues, and I want to highlight that simplicity is the key. That said, I am convinced that the committee made the correct decision to recommend a re-registration period of five years and not 10, the reason being that so much can change in a community, especially if it is in the process of regeneration and more people are coming in, because things can be fluid. If things are simple, a five-year period should be acceptable.

In this year of food and drink, I want to highlight the issue of allotments, even though it is not in part 4. I know that many members have an interest in ensuring that we have local, accessible, fresh food, and one aspect of that is people having the opportunity to grow their own, especially in these shameful days of food banks. No one can argue against the benefits that people growing their own food can bring.

As an organic gardener, I can vouch for the sense of straightforward delight that the commitment brings, from the first spade cut to the taste of one’s own perpetual spinach soup. Of course, the health benefits of digging one’s own allotment are widely known, as are the mental health benefits of being outside in the fresh air, even if it is pretty nippy at times.

Allotments also allow a sense of community from people sharing seeds and selling surplus produce together. In principle, I believe that anyone who wants to grow vegetables should have a little patch of earth to do that on, romantic though I may sound. However, we are a long way from that. In the view of SAGS, the identity and unique role of allotments have not been recognised and all the diverse food growing organisations and communities are being amalgamated into a homogeneous unit.

New models of devolved management and community control of local allotments are arising and they should be part of the dialogue about the food growing strategy. I respect the fact that the minister said today that he will look at the matter again, but I would be concerned if it ended up going into the long grass because of the confusion that has developed. Allotments are only a small aspect of the bill, but it is an important one.

Finally, I turn to human rights, which have already been touched on by our convener, Rob Gibson. Section 48 in part 4 is vital if we are to change the nature of discussions between communities and landowners, and there is a prize to be won. There are credible and tough backstop powers for the times when they are needed, but we all hope that, in their shadow, constructive dialogue and debate that lead towards more voluntary purchase of land can take place.

I hope that, at stage 2, we will be able to take the debate about the human rights aspects further. For too long, human rights have been mentioned only by reference to owners’ rights under the ECHR. There are many more human rights obligations than are in the ECHR and they require to be brought to the forefront of our considerations to ensure that they are reflected as fully as possible in the bill. In that regard, I highlight the evidence of Professor Alan Miller, chair of the Scottish Human Rights Commission, which I found compelling.

There are indeed concerns about the process and about how issues have been brought through so far, but I am an optimist and I believe that, if we work together, we will reach a fair conclusion in the bill.

Labour will support the passage of the bill, but a great deal remains to be done on its detail. I look forward to working with my committee colleagues to play our part in ensuring that it is the best bill possible for the communities of Scotland.

The Deputy Presiding Officer (John Scott): I call Chic Brodie.

Chic Brodie (South Scotland) (SNP): I suppose that, as I am an avowed devolutionist and strong supporter of personal, community and country independence, an inevitable expectation is that I will support the bill. Centralism and collectivism have no place in my personal lexicon. In general, I support the bill, but I am not so blinded by it to imagine that our governmental structures are perfect, or else why would I seek a wholly different structure from that of the current national Government of these islands? I continue to subscribe to the view that our local authorities and community groups are an integral part of overall governance, alongside our national Government at Holyrood, but change is inevitable, and I hold the view that, at the end of the day, political power is a bottom-up process and that we have an obligation to ensure that the bill embraces that objective.

Although the bill’s general intent is welcome, some of the objectives and tenets in its current construction may need further review. I believe, of course, that they can be addressed.

The Christie commission recommended that the bill should seek to strengthen communities’ voices in shaping the services that affect them. As the bill’s policy memorandum states:

“Empowerment is a core pillar of the human rights approach.”

In enacting the bill, we have to ensure that we secure greater engagement and greater participation of communities in decisions that affect them so that they can determine what happens in building the community.

Although Christie was right to focus on outcomes, not targets, democratic involvement, decision making and engagement at the community level are currently very poor, despite the laudable election turnout in Fife. In some areas, particularly in relation to decisions that affect wind farms, for example, it is perceived in a few isolated cases that support or objections allegedly come down to a very few elected or, indeed, in some cases, appointed individuals who discuss community benefits and the like.

Alex Rowley: Will the member give way?

Chic Brodie: No. I am sorry.

My contention is that more emphasis must be put on local community democracy and ownership, and that we must avoid what the policy memorandum states. It says that communities might “have difficulty in understanding the ... draft legislation”.

The Local Government and Regeneration Committee stated in its report last February that the current experience of community empowerment in action across Scotland is mixed. Democracy, better understanding of the bill, a focus on outcomes, not targets—I repeat that—and continuous improvement, and, above all, responsibility and accountability for communities are critical.

The vehicle to support the core public service reforms rests with the current community planning process. The partnerships are key conduits of change to full community empowerment.

Yesterday, I met very senior representatives of the police and fire services in Ayrshire. They play a key role not just in managing their services, but in helping to empower communities through understanding objectives in their areas and beyond through the planning process.

Apart from the role of community partnerships in the development of a local participative hierarchy, the transfer of public assets, land and buildings to communities is paramount. Notwithstanding the challenges—there will be challenges—appropriate fiscal management and recording and the increased responsibility of communities to own public capital assets and improve their utilisation will, if they are done effectively, stimulate productive activity in the communities.

Alex Rowley: The member has mentioned wind farms. Does he agree that, in Germany and other European countries, more than 50 per cent of wind farms are controlled through community or public ownership? Is that not something that we should be striving for in Scotland, working with all communities?

Chic Brodie: Mr Rowley will find that, in any discussions that I have had on that subject, my main tenet has been community ownership.

Protecting or improving local facilities can lead to profitable enterprise. It behaves local authorities to pursue landlords who neglect the care of their properties—some properties are in a deplorable state, as the Presiding Officer will know from the case of the Bobby Jones building in Ayr—and to transfer those properties to communities for the purposes of community enterprise and income.

Let us not be afraid to place an emphasis—a bias, even—to ensure that new allotments are allocated to young people in the community. I support Bruce Crawford’s case for grandfather rights, but young people can be encouraged to get involved.

Let us encourage the social enterprise and third sectors to provide services through public procurement, not just to their own communities but to neighbouring communities, if they can.

In my opinion, the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill is one of the most significant bills, if not the most significant bill, to come before the Parliament. I look forward to its successful passage and, once amended, its enactment.

15:56

John Wilson (Central Scotland) (Ind): I draw members’ attention to my entry in the register of members’ interests: I currently serve as the chair of a community organisation that is in negotiation with the local authority regarding the asset transfer of a community centre in the village where I live, Glenboig. That has been a lesson in endurance for many people in the community. The first offer for the community centre was made seven years ago, but, because of the hurdles some council departments put in place, the community had to walk away at the time. Then, more than a year ago, we were re-offered the community centre via an asset transfer.

That case has highlighted many of the problems that are faced not just by the community in Glenboig but by many communities throughout Scotland. In its inquiry, the Local Government and Regeneration Committee found from the evidence that was taken from community representatives in particular that communities were facing obstacles that were not real obstacles.

Michael Russell referred to the situation at Castle Toward, where a community came up with plans and presented them to the local authority. It was keen to take those plans forward, only to find that the local authority was the major stumbling block to doing so.

For the committee, the issue as we examined the bill was to make sure that we get the legislation right. We need to ensure that all the partners in community planning partnerships and other organisations understand what we mean by community empowerment. We do not just mean community engagement; we mean passing real power to communities so that they can participate fully in decision making and the delivery of services.

Too many organisations view communities as an obstacle to delivering what they think should be done to those communities. To them, it is not about what communities require or identify as their real needs.

The committee spent almost three years taking evidence on a number of issues. I pay tribute to the many community organisations that came forward and were candid about the issues that they faced in pursuing what they wanted to happen in their communities. The committee report highlights that “There should be an explicit requirement on all CPPs to include community capacity building in local plans and to report on progress along with setting out future plans in every annual report.”

We hope that the minister will take that on board and get the message out clearly to community planning partners, including local authorities and other agencies, that we are looking for real engagement with and empowerment of communities.

The issue of community partnership and working with communities reminds me of the work that I did in Castlemilk in 1988, when the new life for urban Scotland programme was introduced in four regions in Scotland. We found that the community partnership was very much a partnership of agencies that did not engage with communities. I hope that the bill will result in a sea change in the attitude of many officials.

Claudia Beamish and others have referred to Scottish Enterprise. I, too, would like its remit to be adjusted slightly to include the social element, in the same way as Highlands and Islands Enterprise’s remit does. HIE has shown clearly what it can do in working with communities in its area. If that was replicated in the central belt, there would be a major benefit for many communities, which could engage in not only social aspects but economic aspects that they want to engage in.

On the registration of community organisations, the minister highlighted the issue of SCIOs. For the many people who might not know what they are, I point out that they are Scottish charitable incorporated organisations. A number has been attached to them. I would like the minister to seriously consider reducing the required number of members from 20 to a lower number or to a number that is appropriate for the organisation. When we talk about community empowerment, we are talking about not just geographical communities but communities of interest, and some communities of interest might be smaller than that requirement in the bill.

I look forward to the response from the Government and to the amendments at stage 2. I hope that we end up with legislation that can take forward Scotland and its communities together.

George Adam (Paisley) (SNP): Although I am not a member of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee, I was there to welcome its members when they came to Paisley to see what is happening in communities in the town. It is interesting to see what the varied groups offer and the work that they are trying to do. There are many challenges in our community. It is absolutely no surprise to me that my colleague and friend Derek Mackay was the minister when we first started talking about the bill, because he saw the challenges that communities in towns such as Paisley have, and he knew that a bill could empower local people to make a difference.

One major problem that we have is in dealing with buildings that fall into disuse because of a change in public services. That is a problem throughout the country. Recently, NHS Greater Glasgow and Clyde changed its services and moved out of the Russell Institute in Paisley. As a local MSP, when the Paisley Development Trust came to me looking for a project for the future, I said that the Russell Institute was the perfect building to try to get access to and to bring back into use in the community. After a long time, in which the trust has gone through the difficulties that members have mentioned community groups have when they get involved in such projects, the result is that Skills Development Scotland will be working from the building. That shows what can be achieved. The trust was lucky, because it had support, but other groups are not so lucky. We have to use the bill to ensure that we can make a difference and get assets back online.

We have in Paisley a selection of large places of worship that no longer have sufficient congregations to sustain them. How should we deal with those buildings? Some of them are significant for Paisley and some, such as Paisley abbey, are of national significance. We have to look at how we deal with such buildings when they can no longer be sustained by the organisations that currently run them. They are of importance to the local community.

I welcome the First Minister’s announcement in her programme for government of the new £10 million empowering communities fund. The fund will allow community groups to get the finance to develop programmes such as the ones that I have described.

One interesting project in my area is run by a local businessman called Gary Kerr. In short, Gary’s view of Paisley is similar to my own. He is committed to and ambitious for the town, and he sees that there are buildings that have been left unused following the end of their previous function, and which the community could be using.

Gary Kerr has set up the Paisley 2021 Community Trust, which is working towards the creation of a community cinema and theatre. The project will fit perfectly with the bill once it is passed, and the bill would give Gary Kerr an opportunity because he has had difficulty in dealing with red tape in local government. Let us not kid ourselves: local government can make it very difficult for community groups—not necessarily or always by design—to get through the process. The Paisley 2021 Community Trust project aims to have a community-based theatre and cinema in the town. There is a demographic of older people who do not want to go to the multiplexes or to other areas, and who would prefer to go to a more traditional venue that accords with what they regard as a cinema.

That brings me to some of the other issues in dealing with historic buildings in the area. The SCVO mentioned in its submission that it “supports the transfer of assets to communities, provided that the community has an active desire to take ownership of them.”

That issue comes up quite often in dealing with authorities. As a former councillor, I can tell members that local authorities’ idea of community engagement and involvement often involves trying to force a community to take a building that the council no longer wishes to use and that it just wants to get off the balance sheet as a small part of the budget.

As the SCVO states, that is not the way to do things. We must ensure that communities are empowered in such a way that they can take on board all the issues and work with the buildings and the services that they want to work with.

During my time as a councillor, I became involved with the Renfrewshire access panel. In all honesty, I think that I was asked mainly because people thought that because my wife is a wheelchair user, I would know what an access panel was. Being the type of person I am, I got involved and started working with the panel. It is important that we acknowledge the work of access panels throughout Scotland in trying to engage with local authorities to give something back to disabled people with all types of disabilities. In my area, the Renfrewshire access panel is working with Glasgow airport to ensure that when people with disabilities go on holiday, there is a process to enable them to get on the plane and go back and forth across the campus with no problems.

The same is true for other areas. In Inverness, the access panel has been working with NHS Highland on improvements to Raigmore hospital. In other areas, access panels are working to ensure that new capital projects, such as a town hall refurbishment or a new school, are fully accessible.

Alex Rowley: Will George Adam give way?

George Adam: I am just finishing—I have only about 20 seconds left.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: The member should draw to a close, please.

George Adam: Those access issues are extremely important.

In dealing with community empowerment, we should remember that Scotland’s people are our greatest asset. Our communities want to make a difference in that respect, and I believe that the bill can empower them. We have to ensure that we make it work.

Malcolm Chisholm (Edinburgh Northern and Leith) (Lab): I congratulate the Local Government and Regeneration Committee on an outstanding report, and the Finance Committee on emphasising in its report the fact that the lack of financial estimates breaches standing orders, which—as Alex Rowley pointed out—could become an obstacle to implementing the bill.
As Alex Rowley also said, Labour supports the principles of the bill, but we believe that it requires greater clarity and more teeth, and needs more explicitly to abandon the top-down approach for one that is based on co-production and which empowers local communities. In the first instance, those elements should be reflected in part 2 of the bill. I welcome the fact that community planning partnerships will at least have a statutory underpinning. They have been around for a long time; I do not know where they started. I was certainly talking about community planning when I was a UK minister for local government in 1997 and, as it developed, I became worried about the extent to which it was becoming a top-down process, so the committee is right to say that the Government needs “to be more prescriptive in relation to local involvement” to “ensure the necessary ‘paradigm shift’ from a top down approach”.

That is a loose quotation from the committee’s recommendations.

I welcome the fact that the national standards for community engagement will be put into legislation. I am reminded that I launched them 10 years ago, but I think that they have improved since then, although that will not be enough.

My final point on part 2 is that we need to listen to what Voluntary Action Scotland says about further involvement of the third sector.

I agree that part 3, which concerns participation requests, is too prescriptive about participation bodies requiring written constitutions, so I hope that the Government will accept the committee’s recommendation on that.

I am disappointed that, although the definition of participation bodies includes community councils, there is little in the bill that reinforces the importance of community councils.

Later today, I will go to West Pilton and West Granton community council. It is one of several excellent community councils in my constituency, which is probably why I have a particularly positive view of them. I expect that the community councillors will ask me about the bill and how the debate went because they have been interested in its progress. In fact, some of them have been particularly interested in part 5, which is on asset transfer. I think that they contacted and possibly even had a meeting with Marco Biagi about that. I will have a meeting with them and regeneration officials in three or four weeks.

On asset transfers, community groups hope that when such groups wish to acquire public land, the bill will make a difference. However, my fundamental question is this: what happens if the local authority just says no? The fear is that the bill will make no difference if a public body is determined to realise the highest possible receipt from selling off the land.

There is also no clarity in part 6 about whether or how local authorities could dispose of common good land through asset transfer. In fact, there are many questions about part 6 in general. Although everyone has welcomed the transparency of having registers of common good land, there is still a lack of clarity about the statutory definition.

I apologise to members, but I am trying to get through all the parts in the short time that is available.

Under part 4, the right to buy land will be substantially extended. I am sure that that is widely welcomed, and I particularly welcome the compulsory right to buy, which gives communities the right to acquire land without its being put on the market. However, the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee did some sterling work pointing out some of the problems with the definition of abandoned and neglected land—apart from anything else, it is a bit of a legal quagmire—and I am sure that the Government will look carefully at that committee’s recommendation that it should “consider a definition that relates to the wider circumstances which can be a barrier to sustainable development”.

Part 7 concerns allotments. As Alex Rowley said, we need further discussion with the Scottish Allotments and Gardens Society. We also need to link the work on allotments with food, in particular, and with health and wellbeing more generally.

Part 8, which is on non-domestic rates relief, is linked to other financial concerns that I mentioned earlier.

I broadly welcome section 1, not least as a member of the Finance Committee, which has been emphasising the importance of outcomes and outcome-based budgeting for a long time.

I conclude with a quotation from the commission on strengthening local democracy. It published “Effective Democracy: Reconnecting with Communities” last year, and it is important for wider devolution arguments as well. It says:

“Scotland cannot deliver on’ improved democratic participation

“without radical new thinking. There now appears to be agreement that Scotland should have substantially more powers. But simply repositioning control nationally in Edinburgh or London will not tackle the complex opportunities and challenges that communities face. The shift needs to be decisive and far-reaching, not a trickle of power to councils, then to communities, all controlled from above.”

In that context, “above” could refer to councils as well as to the Scottish Parliament and Scottish Government. We need genuine power to be put into local communities.

16:14

Graeme Dey (Angus South) (SNP): The problem with speaking this far into a debate is that we tend to find that most of the bases have been covered by the time we are able to contribute to it. However, so wide ranging was the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee’s contribution to the stage 1 report that there are some angles that are either still to be visited or which are worthy of being expanded on. I will focus my speech on those.

As we have heard, the major issue with the bill from that committee’s perspective is abandoned and neglected land and the need for an unambiguous definition of those terms. However, several other areas that were covered by our report are, although less significant, nonetheless important.

The first one that I will deal with is human rights—there is a lack of detail in the policy memorandum on human rights. However, in evidence an interesting perspective emerged on the role that human rights play in community purchases of land or property. As Claudia Beamish said, the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee understands that the ECHR does not mean that private ownership must be protected in all circumstances; a landowner can be required to cede ownership when it is in the public interest to do so, and that can be done in a way that ensures that no human rights are breached.

In a thought-provoking piece of evidence, Professor Alan Miller, who is the chair of the Scottish Human Rights Commission, made the point that we need to concentrate on the wider human rights aspects of the legislation, and I have to agree with him. As Professor Miller explained, the community right to buy does not exist in order for the community to purchase a property or land for the sake of it. The purchase needs to be in the public interest; it is therefore a qualified right to buy. Further, as he observed, “If human rights is seen in the wider context … there will be a realisation that it drives us not towards courts and lawyers but towards having an environment in which there is more constructive dialogue between landowners and communities.”—[Official Report, Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee, 3 December 2014; c 46.]

Richard Lochhead, the Cabinet Secretary for Rural Affairs, Food and Environment, acknowledged that “we must have at the forefront of our mind the rights of communities and the wider public interest as much as the rights of landowners and property owners.”—[Official Report, Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee, 10 December 2014; c 6.]

Could the minister therefore outline in closing how the Government has reflected on Professor Miller’s points, which the cabinet secretary undertook to ensure would be done?

The committee also examined membership numbers and the make-up of a community. We took a good deal of evidence on the registration process, and the requirements for registration. The committee expressed considerable concern over the minimum number of members that is required of Scottish charitable incorporated organisations. If SCIos are to have no fewer than 20 members, as the bill proposes, the reality is that a number of current SCIos will not be able to register a community interest in land, because they would not be eligible community bodies. There are large and small communities across Scotland, and there will be times when a well-functioning SCIO has fewer than 20 members. The committee heard of examples in Inverclyde where SCIos of eight and 10 members are working well. As John Wilson suggested, the requirement seems to be unnecessarily prescriptive.

The requirement to register was another area that the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee covered. Much of the evidence that we heard called for simplification of the registration process. However, there was also much discussion over the requirement to register in relation to communities reacting to land becoming available rather than being proactive in that registration. Although I can understand that communities are, unless prompted, perhaps more likely to be reactive than proactive in that regard, I think that registration would greatly encourage the latter tendency and therefore lead to possibly more considered decisions to acquire property or land for the community.

However, that is not to say that registration should be conducted as it is outlined currently in the bill. The committee feels that a simplified registration process would not only encourage a proactive approach from communities but would ensure that those communities can empower themselves, rather than being caught up in a lengthy and complex registration process. If we are to entice as many as communities as possible into the process, we need to be mindful that expertise and capacity are likely to be less pronounced among less-affluent communities.
Reregistration was another area that was considered in some detail. As we have heard, the bill outlines a need for reregistration after five years, requiring that the same potentially complex process be gone through again. Many stakeholders had concerns over the timeframe and the need for the same process to be completed for a second time. However, there seems to be a more straightforward answer to all of that, as outlined in the RACCE Committee’s report, which is to stick with the five-year timeframe that is proposed in the bill, but with a simplified process that leans toward a presumption in favour of reregistration.

If we retain the provisions relating to abandoned or neglected land—I share other committee members’ concerns over that, unless clear and unambiguous definitions are to come forward—we require some clarity on a number of areas. Will the provisions apply only to the parts of a landholding that are considered to be wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected, or to the entire landholding? What happens where it is a tenant rather than the landowner who is responsible for lack of activity or poor management? Will there be an exclusion for land that is being utilised for recognised conservation or environmental purposes, such as natural regeneration for biodiversity or flood prevention?

I think that there is unanimity across the chamber—indeed, across Scotland—in support of the policy intent of the bill. There are differences of opinion on how best, in practical terms, to deliver on that intent, but we are as one with regard to the potential for good that the bill contains, and I think that we are resolved on working towards making the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill—as the minister said in opening—the best that it can be.

Alison Johnstone (Lothian) (Green): I thank all those who have contributed to getting the bill to this stage. I would have liked to have seen a braver bill, but there is still time to make it so and there is still much in it that Greens can welcome. We will, of course, be voting in favour of the general principles this afternoon.

People from many different groups and communities had big expectations of the bill. Today, I will concentrate on empowering the community of football fans who want to buy their football clubs. As a first step, we welcome the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee’s recommendation that the list of eligible bodies be expanded to include community benefit societies and community interest companies. That is an important foundation for fan ownership, given the way that so many fans trusts are organised.

However, the bill as it stands brings us no nearer to a proper fans’ right to buy. I therefore intend to lodge amendments on that issue. I will address a number of key questions. I urge the minister in closing to agree to look again at what the Scottish Government can do for football fans in this area.

Is there a serious problem with how Scottish football is currently owned and run? I am sure that members would agree that there is, even those who do not support Hearts, Rangers, Dunfermline Athletic, Livingston or Gretna. Of course not all privately owned clubs are operated irresponsibly, but when they are, and when they go into administration or are traded like any other asset, fans are still all too often shut out of the process. We should also have a clear process to ensure that there is a clear exit strategy for responsible owners who decide, for whatever reason, to call time on their period as custodian of a club.

Was there not just a review that decided not to make the case for fan ownership? No. Stephen Morrow is a great expert, but as his report says: "the desirability or otherwise of supporter ownership was not discussed within the Working Group."

That is a shame, but that was the remit given to it by ministers.

Can fan ownership really work? The evidence from Scotland and around the world is that it can. Members across the chamber appear to agree. I know that Kenny MacAskill is helping Hibs fans as they try to take control of their club. Ian Murray MP has worked with Hearts and I know that Bruce Crawford played a key role in the efforts of Stirling Albion fans to buy their club. Many other members will know their local fans trusts, which are keen, smart and determined groups that have their clubs’ best interests at heart.

Would a right to buy drive out good owners of Scottish clubs? Hardly. If a club is thriving on and off the pitch there will not be an appetite to change that. However, good owners come and go, and when they go, fans should have first right of refusal to take over. Is that too radical? No, it is not.

Chic Brodie: In the case of one particular club that one might say is in trouble, I was asked to submit an idea, which I did, but then found that because there are seven supporters trusts that could not agree with each other, there was no hope of the club becoming a community-based soccer club.

Alison Johnstone: All groups of fans trusts would have to be openly and democratically constituted. Ministers, under advice, would have to sign them off. If a small group passed that test, it would obviously have to meet with the approval of the larger group of fans.

The idea is not too radical. Parliament has decided that tens of thousands of acres should be available to communities to buy in this way through a brave piece of legislation, which the Pairc case confirmed is within European law. If large areas of Scotland’s land should be available to local people, clubs should be available to their fans.

Is legislation necessary? What is stopping fans from just buying their clubs already? As we have seen all too often in recent times, it takes a great deal of time to raise the money. A period such as is set out in the bill in which the fans are automatically the preferred bidder would make the process far more straightforward.

The committee’s report quotes the minister as saying:

“The driving force behind the bill is that we can unlock much of Scotland’s potential through community empowerment.”—[Official Report, Local Government and Regeneration Committee, 5 March 2014; c 3167.]

Of course that is true. It is also true that we can unlock much of Scotland’s football potential through fan empowerment in exactly the same way. We need to see fans as a community and football clubs as their assets. Before we consider the bill again, I urge members to talk to their local fans and see what they think. If their club is being sold, or worse, would they want the option of first refusal?

My view is that, in 30 years, Scottish football could be entirely transformed. We will wonder why clubs were ever owned by anyone but their fans, and we might be enjoying a much stronger national game by then, too.

I will talk briefly about common good and participatory budgeting. The common good registers will increase consistency across local authorities, but we need more than a bare spreadsheet that lists assets. Perhaps the bill could require councils to demonstrate how they have managed the assets on the register to meet best value and responsible stewardship. I would also like to see a requirement on councils to set out how they have valued the assets, and to publish a periodic plan on long-term management of the common good on behalf of the people. I agree with the committee’s recommendation for a timescale for completion of the registers.

Finally, the bill has been described by the Government as the “biggest transfer of powers since devolution”, but real empowerment and decentralisation can be achieved only if financial power goes alongside new duties and rights. The minister spoke positively about the impact of participatory budgeting schemes. There was support for PB in the original bill consultation, and it has worked well in Leith, for example, where packed public meetings have reached consensus on local spending priorities. I urge the minister to consider legislative options and I ask what specific support the Government might give to expanding on the report.

Finally, it is exceptionally important that the issues that have been raised about allotments be resolved.

Willie Coffey (Kilmarnock and Irvine Valley) (SNP): Although I did not join the committee until the beginning of December, like many of my colleagues who were serving local councillors for many years, I find the proposals in the bill to be familiar territory.

There are big messages in the bill about outcomes and what success might actually look like, about putting our community planning partnerships on a statutory footing for the first time, and about real empowerment for local people and representative organisations and about being more than simply engaged in a process but helping to define what the future will look like at a local level. If we achieve those aims, we will certainly have taken a great stride towards delivering real community empowerment.

As our committee convener said a few weeks ago during his speech on flexibility and autonomy in local government,

“If communities are to be empowered those powers must be passed down through the tiers of government.”—[Official Report, 11 December 2014; c 40.]

That is not happening at the moment. The bill gives us that golden opportunity to move forward to the next stage.

What I like about the committee’s report is the breadth of different views that were taken during evidence sessions and the plain and simple language that is used in the many recommendations to the Government that will hopefully help to strengthen the bill as it makes its journey to stage 3.

On setting national outcomes, it is correct that there is an obligation on ministers to develop, publish and review a set of national outcomes for Scotland, but it is equally important that local communities have the power to define what those might actually be. Many of those who gave evidence asked for that and offered the view that it would really empower communities from the bottom up. That could be as demanding as it is rewarding. On the one hand, as Audit Scotland commented, we might wish to set national outcomes to assess national progress on health inequalities, life expectancy or educational attainment, for example, but national indicators can often mask significant local variations in performance. As I mentioned earlier, success might look quite different from one community to another. There is a big challenge there but it is important to work to get the balance right.

The section on community planning certainly got some robust feedback, probably as a result of varying levels of satisfaction with the community planning partnerships over the past decade. Some felt that hitherto, the process has been too top-down: a collection of public bodies coming together to map out a community’s future. In some cases, that could hardly pass as engagement. According to the Scottish Council for Voluntary Organisations, if the process is to work, local people must have the opportunity to articulate the societal changes that they wish to see so that the CPPs can take them up on their behalf. That is real empowerment.

We should not shy away from that process.

Margaret McDougall (West Scotland) (Lab): Will the member take an intervention?

Willie Coffey: In a moment.

As Kay Gilmour from East Ayrshire Council said:

“If we have a culture of improvement, we do not get anxious if communities, individuals in the community or community groups make suggestions about how to innovate or do things differently and better.” —[Official Report, Local Government and Regeneration Committee, 27 October 2014; c 40.]

I give way to Margaret McDougall.

Margaret McDougall: Community empowerment is largely dependent on volunteers. Very often the same volunteers are relied upon in communities for the provision of many community facilities. It is likely that community buyouts will enlist the same volunteers—we are reliant on those volunteers all the time. I ask Willie Coffey and the minister what consideration has been given to the capacity of volunteers and to sustaining the number of volunteers required for community buyouts, given that only 18 per cent of adults volunteer.

Willie Coffey: Margaret McDougall makes a good point. I have certainly seen a passage in the bill on building community capacity to make that kind of process much more possible.

There are signs that the Government’s proposals are taking us in the right direction. Section 5 will allow individuals and community bodies who would not normally be part of the formal process to be involved in shaping the local outcome improvement plans. That process will not exclude community councils, which have a key part to play. However, the committee made clear its view that engagement is not the same as empowerment—John Wilson made that point earlier—and that the Government should be absolutely clear about how it intends to empower local people in that crucial community planning process.

Perhaps one of the more exciting elements of the bill is the proposal that communities will be able to seek to take control of council-owned buildings and land, not as a result of council disposals, but as a proactive and positive move that helps the community to achieve its aims. That will be a fundamental shift in how Scotland’s land and building assets are managed and will present communities right across Scotland with the opportunity to lead and drive that process for themselves. Quite a few asset transfer processes are already in place in Scotland, but the difference in the bill is that communities will be able to instigate requests themselves, which is a welcome and positive change from the current situation and is consistent with the Christie commission findings.

The bill offers people across Scotland real powers to shape and develop their local communities and to do that very much from the bottom up. It will not be an easy process for councils, officials or even elected members, but if all of us embrace the principles behind the bill, Scotland will surely be the better place for it.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: Many thanks. Before we move to closing speeches I will say that several members who spoke in the debate have not been in the chamber for some time. I would remind them that they should be here for the closing speeches.

Alex Fergusson (Galloway and West Dumfries) (Con): I am tempted to start by saying that if Mike Russell’s speech represented him in hiding, as he said, heaven help us all if he ever decides to come out of hiding, but I will resist that temptation.

No one in their right mind could disagree with the overall aims of the bill that we have discussed this afternoon, although some of the detail might be a different matter—members such as Alex Rowley, Rob Gibson and Tavish Scott and others have highlighted that. However, any measure, legislative or otherwise, that seeks to strengthen community participation, unlock enterprising community development and renew our communities must be worthy of support, and we on the Conservative benches will support the general principles of the bill at decision time.
As a member of the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee, my involvement with the bill has been limited to part 4, and I will focus on my reservations about that part shortly. However, it is clear from the many briefings that we have received from outside organisations that I am by no means alone in having some reservations and concerns about various aspects of the bill.

One of those centres on the definition of community: a topic on which the committee spent quite a lot of time. I am drawn towards defining communities by place or location rather than by interest. However, Inclusion Scotland's concerns—which Alex Rowley referred to—which highlight what it calls "a missed opportunity" to give disabled, disadvantaged and marginalised people the ability to participate in community planning, have made me sit up and think. If any groups deserve to be further empowered when it comes to the delivery of local services, it must surely be those groups. I hope that the Government will look seriously at that aspect when it comes to stage 2.

I listened carefully to the minister's comments on equalities. The fact that Inclusion Scotland and others have suggested that the bill as drafted runs the risk of further disempowering disadvantaged and marginalised groups must surely ensure that that concern is taken seriously.

I do not often agree with Joan McAlpine, but I am delighted to say that today's debate is an occasion on which I do. I, too, was interested in the point that the Scottish Woodlot Association made. I strongly support the association, particularly as Scotland's first woodlot was established in my constituency. It has stated that for woodlot licences to reach their full potential in Scotland, they need to be established on state land as well as on private land. I agree with that whole-heartedly, and I hope that the Government will agree with recommendation 347 of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee's report, which seeks a review of the legislation that currently prevents the Forestry Commission from leasing land to communities for forestry purposes. It is surely logical that, just as the commission now plays an important role in bringing new entrants into agriculture through the development of starter farms, it could do the same with foresters.

Planning Aid for Scotland makes the important point that community planning, as a local authority function that sits alongside the planning system, needs to involve more effective engagement with local communities. I strongly agree with that point, because I know that most of the communities that I represent view community planning as the ultimate in talking shops. They see it as something that the council does somewhat remotely without much local input or impact. Community planning is not understood by communities the length and breadth of the country. Given the heightened role that it is to play in delivering the aims of the bill, that must be corrected.

In the time that remains to me, I want to talk about part 4. Although I did not comment on the first sentence of the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee's report when we discussed it, I am more than a little taken aback by the wording that "a Bill is required to remedy the defects of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003".

I might be being a little oversensitive about this, but as the convener of the Rural Development Committee that led on consideration of the Land Reform (Scotland) Bill, I might have preferred wording along the lines of, "a Bill is needed to build on the successes of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003".

I was interested to hear in the evidence that the committee took that not many community purchases had taken place using the 2003 act, but it was clear that many communities have engaged in the right-to-buy process because of the act's very existence. In other words, the act has acted as a catalyst to empower communities in ways that would almost certainly not have been possible without its existence. I think that that points to the 2003 act being quite a successful piece of legislation, rather than one that is full of defects. Nonetheless, the time is right to extend the 2003 act's provisions, particularly into urban areas, and we very much welcome the principle of doing so.

Where I have dissented from the recommendations of the RACCE committee's report is on the power to extend the community right to buy when there is no willing seller. The Government's position is that that should apply only as a last resort when other measures and negotiations have failed. I could accept that, as the committee does, but the majority of the committee went on to question the need to restrict the definition of eligible land to that which is "wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected" and to ask why a definition is needed at all. They believed that the tests of furthering sustainable development and of being in the public interest are capable of testing all requirements. In my view, those criteria also require greater definition if we are really to understand where we are going with the bill.

I find myself endorsing the Government's position on the matter as laid out in the policy memorandum. In my view, the committee's majority recommendation would open the door to a virtual absolute right to buy for communities. The Government has, in effect, ruled that out in relation to agricultural holdings, and I hope that it will hold fast to its original intentions for the bill.

What has been highlighted, above all, throughout the debate by Mike Russell, Sarah Boyack and many others is the urgent need for the Government to provide clear definitions in the bill as we move forward to stage 2. If the Government does so, I feel certain that the bill, which in many ways bears a welcome resemblance to the Localism Act 2011, which was brought in by the current United Kingdom Government, will eventually receive unanimous cross-party support. I very much hope that that will be possible, because our communities deserve no less from their Parliament.

Ken Macintosh (Eastwood) (Lab): What an excellent debate this has been, with good will expressed from all parties in support of the bill. Graeme Dey described it as welcome “unanimity”—although I am not sure that we quite had unanimity—and Alison Johnstone said that we should be slightly “braver”. There was friendly criticism, but we definitely welcome the bill and the direction of travel outlined in it. We will be supporting it at decision time.

The bill attempts to build not only on the Christie commission’s recommendations but on the whole devolution agenda and the creation of the Scottish Parliament itself—the idea of subsidiarity and of each of us at a local and personal level exercising as much control and influence as possible over the forces that affect our lives and the services that support us.

Just as I am pleased that the Government has finally introduced the bill—it had a bit of a stuttering start—I am especially grateful for the work of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee and the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee. I thank members of both committees, who have highlighted not only the strengths but the many weaknesses of the bill and the concerns that exist about it.

I am not sure that the minister deserved to have his hard work dismissed as mere “gobbledygook” by the usually assiduously loyal convener of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee. However, there are tensions and even paradoxes around community empowerment that must be addressed if the bill is to be effective. It remains slightly woolly and vague on whether that will be the case.

I particularly welcome Tavish Scott’s thoughtful but quite spiky contribution. Mr Scott warned that, if we are not careful, the bill could be a lawyers’ charter.

There are outstanding questions, such as how to ensure robust and democratic accountability when it comes to utilising public resources, how to reconcile local control and therefore local variation with national demands for equity and fairness and, perhaps most important, how to ensure that, rather than narrowing inequality, the bill does not make it worse. That dilemma was raised repeatedly in evidence as well as in debate. The Local Government and Regeneration Committee, in its report, quoted the Poverty Alliance, which said:

“the most important aspect of this Bill is around empowering Scotland’s most disadvantaged communities, and narrowing inequalities between those communities which are already empowered and those which will require more support.”

It added:

“There is a danger that the Bill, in its current form, will most benefit those communities which are already empowered and able to take advantage of the provisions in the Bill.”

Mark McDonald: I hear what the member is saying, but empowerment does not just naturally follow affluence. Indeed, many of the deprived communities that I represent have flourishing community organisations, with delivery of services in the community by the community. There are good examples in some of the more deprived areas of communities taking charge of what is going on.

Ken Macintosh: There are, indeed, good examples but, as Oxfam pointed out, participation requests run the risk of “becoming the privilege of already empowered communities”.

I suggest that that is a problem that most MSPs have encountered in our work. At its most basic, the issue is about ensuring that resources are distributed fairly and not according to those who shout the loudest.

At the beginning of the debate, we had a battle of quotes between Kevin Stewart and my colleague, Alex Rowley. Kevin Stewart suggested that we listen to Ernest Hemingway and that we trust each other, whereas Alex Rowley suggested that we would be wiser to listen to Lyndon Johnson and to ask ourselves what harm it would do were the powers to be wrongly administered.

I have no doubt whatever that the minister and most members in the chamber share my intention and that of my Labour colleagues to use the bill to give a voice to the powerless and to enfranchise those who feel marginalised, but we must be careful that, inadvertently or otherwise, the bill does not simply give more power to the middle classes. I look forward to the minister lodging amendments to address that genuine anxiety.
There is a parallel concern that, despite all the new powers for communities to deliver public services or to control public assets, the processes established in the bill could simply reinforce the dominance of the public sector—be that the council, the health board or the enterprise agency—and the hierarchy of power and empowerment. That concern about a top-down approach was flagged up by the SCVO and the Royal Society of Edinburgh.

What emerged strongly from the bill consultation was the need to invest in building community capacity and resilience, a point that Margaret McDougall highlighted near the end of the debate; yet, when we speak to the third sector, it highlights the fact that programmes that support community capacity are the very ones that are under threat in the current financial climate.

That brings me neatly to finance. There are major question marks over the funding of the bill—or, rather, the lack of clear funding. That issue has been flagged up by both the LGR committee and the Finance Committee. For many people, the problem is not just the lack of reasonable estimates but the fact that the bill will not make any funding happen. Rob Gibson, the convener of the RACCE committee, acknowledged that when he said that funding requirements will need to be kept under review. The minister himself spoke of the benefits for communities of participatory budgeting. I suggest that, if it is good enough for local groups, surely it is good enough for the Parliament. I agree entirely with Angus Hardie of the Scottish Community Alliance, who was quoted earlier, that we should not allow the issue to derail the bill. Nevertheless, it would be wrong—indeed, it would be a failing on the Government’s part—if the Government did not face up to the issue and offer clarity.

Undoubtedly, the fact that the bill tries to update the legislation on allotments is to be welcomed. Allotments play a more vital role than ever by allowing people access to the natural environment, enabling people to grow their own healthy food and contributing to a more sustainable way of life here in Scotland. The trouble is that the minister does not seem to have won the confidence of the allotment holders themselves. In his opening remarks, Mr Biagi revealed the death of his office aspidistra and bemoaned his predecessor Mr Mackay’s lack of green fingers, but I worry that the new minister has inherited that trait. The Scottish Allotments and Gardens Society has been calling for five substantial amendments to the relevant section of the bill; however, since the minister’s intervention, meetings and phone call, it is now calling for that section of the bill to be dropped altogether. [Laughter.] I am not sure whether to encourage the minister or to ask him to lay off. I echo Claudia Beamish’s possibly intentional but very appropriate metaphor in saying that the minister must avoid kicking the issue into the long grass.

I welcome the points that Alison Johnstone made on fan ownership of football clubs and indicate Labour’s sympathy and, I hope, practical support for those proposals when we see the amendments. Supporters Direct has made huge progress in recent years, and several clubs, which Alison Johnstone listed, have made the move. It is impossible to look at Scottish football at the moment and not recognise the problems that are created by the wrong kind of ownership model. Fans and the local community put the interests of their local club first, and there has never been a better time to promote the right to buy for football supporters.

In concluding, I turn to perhaps the most important issue: land reform. I welcome the many contributions to the debate that have been made across the chamber. It was the subject that was most focused on, and those who addressed it included Mark McDonald, Bob Doris and John Wilson. Members have spoken of the move to extend the powers of land reform to urban areas, pointing out the pitfalls and advantages of trying to exercise control over community assets. Rob Gibson and Mike Russell agreed on the weakness of the bill in not defining “abandoned or neglected land”. I am grateful to Mike Russell for enlightening me on the fate of my old school, Rockfield primary school, which is possibly to become an art gallery. I assure members that that is not based on any contribution to art that I made when I was at the school.

Ken Macintosh: Mr Russell was also particularly forceful in describing the enormous barrier that the lack of a definition of “abandoned or neglected land” in the bill would pose. I am, therefore, surprised that the RACCE committee seemed to leave the door open on the issue, with only Sarah Boyack and Claudia Beamish following the logic of the evidence that was heard and insisting that the phrase either has to be defined or has to go.

John Wilson and several Labour colleagues highlighted the need for social and economic development, not just environmental issues, to be taken into consideration, and Sarah Boyack reminded us of the need to learn from past experience. I will conclude on that point.

Thank you, Presiding Officer. I thought that I had an extra minute, but I will conclude now.

Ken Macintosh: Sorry, Presiding Officer. I thought that I had an extra minute, but I will conclude now.
The Neilston Development Trust, in my area of East Renfrewshire, is one of the best examples that I know of a community using the existing land reform legislation to take control of an asset—the former Clydesdale bank, in our case. However, the legislation did not enable the trust; it was almost a hurdle, because of poor definitions and there being too many obstacles in the way, despite the good intentions.

The Deputy Presiding Officer: You must close, please.

Ken Macintosh: I urge the minister not to make the same mistake with this bill but to empower Scotland’s communities to take control.

16:49

Marco Biagi: I am tempted to join in the exchange of quotations. The one that comes to mind is:

“Laws, like sausages, cease to inspire respect in proportion as we know how they are made.”

The quotation is sometimes attributed to Bismarck, but apparently it was John Godfrey Saxe who said it.

This has been an experience in seeing laws made. This afternoon we heard a lot of examples of areas in which members have considered the same evidence, approaches, opinions and situations but responded slightly differently, depending on our political perspective and personal experience. That is to be expected—it is why the Parliament exists and why everything is not simply put through without debate. However, ultimately there is unity on the bill’s general principles.

I gently suggest that, if there is an ability to look at the same evidence and come to different conclusions, the flipside invites the question whether, if the Government had come to a different conclusion on some matters, the Opposition would have been just as strong in highlighting alternative approaches.

An issue on which we continue to have a difference of view, which Alex Rowley raised first but other members mentioned, is the finances in relation to the bill. As we have said, we think that the financial information that has been provided to the Parliament is the best estimate of the administrative, compliance and other costs to which the bill could give rise. It is also the best estimate of the timescales over which costs would arise.

We have been up front throughout the bill process in saying that elements that the bill provides for—participation requests, the community right to buy, asset transfer requests and allotments—will be driven by the demand from communities, and we cannot predict with any degree of certainty what that demand will be. We know that from the consultation. To have plucked a figure from the air could have produced something that was misleading, confusing and false and would have led to just as much criticism. Let us simply accept that we have put forward the best estimates that we can put forward.

Another area that has generated a lot of debate is the approach to allotments. The Government comes to the issue with a principle on which I hope that we all agree: allotments are a good thing and there should be more of them. We share and are working with that principle.

On the Scottish Allotments and Gardens Society’s five-point proposition, the first proposal is that a standard plot be defined as being normally 250m². We intend to have powers to deal with the size of plots. At the moment there is no restriction on a local authority, so plot sizes vary. I visited allotments and found some plots that were described as full plots and others that were described as half plots. The bill would increase powers to set a minimum size, and I have made the offer to SAGS to initiate such powers straight after the bill is enacted.

SAGS expressed concern about fair rent, which I think led to Bruce Crawford’s suggestion. The current fair rent provision is undefined, and the substantial rent increases that have given rise to controversy in Edinburgh are happening under the current legislation. I think that we can agree that kicking the issue into the long grass will help no one. We want additional protections in the law now, such as the requirement to create a waiting list, which would generate nearly 1,000 new allotments. It is important that that is implemented. I would rather fix the issue at stage 2 and continue our dialogue than remove the provisions on allotments entirely.

I note the interesting issues that were raised about the common good. For example, members asked why the common good has not been defined. The common good is a particular and interesting aspect of the Scottish public policy, legal and historical landscape, which will be addressed in forthcoming land reform work. The bill presents an opportunity to take steps pretty quickly on which people can agree, such as ensuring that a common good register comes into effect within five years and ensuring that communities, including community councils, are consulted on the disposal of common good land.

The wider issue will be dealt with in future legislation. I suggest to Alison Johnstone that, if she wants to tell councils what to do about common good land rather than take the Scottish Government’s approach of ensuring that communities are consulted, that creates a tension—if we had taken her route, we would have been criticised as centralists.

On the wider issue of land reform, Sarah Boyack asked whether I could state in my closing speech when the further information that the committee requested is coming. I can do that by referring to what I said in my opening speech, which was that the Minister for Environment, Climate Change and Land Reform will provide draft regulations in advance of stage 2 that will detail the matters that must be considered when determining whether land is neglected or abandoned.

Sarah Boyack: The information is critical because, although the committee will start to take evidence in a month’s time, we have the community right to buy to consider. We would therefore like to see the ministerial response to the whole committee report and not just to one issue.

Marco Biagi: Reports will come, but the commitment on providing the draft regulations is already there. Instead of jumping to the conclusion that everybody will get it wrong, let us have faith that the regulations may well turn out to be right.

Claudia Beamish: I highlight to the minister that it is not a case of jumping to conclusions but of having taken a substantial amount of evidence and not being convinced.

Marco Biagi: I am sure that the Minister for Environment, Climate Change and Land Reform will reflect on the matter and come to members in advance of stage 2 on it.

Another issue that Claudia Beamish raised earlier was locality. There has been debate on that issue, and I can shed some light on it. Essentially, we have two similar but rather different mechanisms in asset transfer and land reform. The approach that was developed in 2003 and which has been taken to land reform buyouts is area based, whereas under asset transfer—which involves a transfer from the public sector to the community sector rather than a transfer from the private sector to the community sector—there is a difference in the thresholds of justification and the ways of doing it, so it is appropriate to open that up to communities of interest.

We are not being prescriptive so, when it comes to participation requests, community councils will be able to join in as much as anybody else through asset transfer. There are many examples of community councils that have set up community development trusts, which help to insure them against financial risks and allow them to play a greater role. I intend to return to that, because I recognise a lot of the concerns that have been raised. However, I draw people’s attention to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee’s view that a great deal of devolved decision making can happen already.

Community planning is going to need greater engagement. We must differentiate between the community planning partnership that covers an entire local authority area and where a third sector interface is the best way in which to participate, and what we might call genuine community planning partnerships, which are the groups that councils convene at local levels that can make decisions at those levels and really involve local neighbourhood associations and residents associations in making decisions. We want that to be improved.

When I looked up the national standards for community engagement on appointment to my role, I saw Malcolm Chisholm’s face smiling out at me. They were passed in 2005, when there was no such thing as social media. The ways in which we have to engage with communities and allow them to participate have changed massively. The committee was right to note the difference between empowerment and engagement, but I draw attention, too, to the difference between participation and consultation.

Alex Fergusson: Will the minister take an intervention?

Marco Biagi: I am afraid that I do not have time and must conclude.

My final message is that we must remember that we came into this to empower communities, which is what the bill’s general principles are for. I said in my opening speech that communities need a bit more help and fewer obstacles.

Let us imagine what the bill’s principles will do. We will have a Scotland where neglected and abandoned buildings that are a blight on streets and towns can be bought out by the community and renovated; where councils are empowered to help businesses to regenerate town centres; where everybody knows what the common good assets are and is guaranteed involvement in decisions about what is held in their name; where every part of Scotland has a partnership between all the bodies delivering for people, with participation and tackling inequality at the heart of that; and where the country as a whole, which we hardly mentioned in the debate, will have a clear mission for the kind of nation that we want to create and will not be afraid of letting public assets be owned and managed by the communities that they serve.

That would be a Scotland where participation by the authentic voices of community know-how and experience was welcomed and where they were invited to participate whenever any decision was being taken. Those are the general principles of the bill and I hope that we will endorse them in just a moment.

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill

Scottish Government Response
Stage 1 Report

February 2015
INTRODUCTION

I would like to thank the Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Finance Committee and Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee for their consideration of this legislation at Stage 1, and the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee for their scrutiny of Part 4 of the Bill. I welcome the report and I thank everyone who took the time to give evidence to shape the Bill and the Committees’ recommendations.

This Government is committed to creating a fairer and more prosperous country, and we believe we can only do that when everyone feels they can contribute and have their voices heard. It is clear that people want to be involved when they know they can make a difference. The Bill will place new duties on a range of public authorities and create new rights for community bodies, helping them to take control of land and buildings and to participate and have their voices heard in the planning and delivery of public services. It will ensure that all public services are shaped by a focus on outcomes, with local priorities to the fore. It will also encourage and support the shift in mindset we want to see, so that community empowerment and participation becomes everyday practice in all public services.

Responses to all the recommendations and key points made in the Stage 1 Report are set out below, using the paragraph numbering from your report. Part 4 of the Bill, Annexe A of your report, is dealt with separately.

I welcomed the debate on the general principles of the Bill and both I and the Minister for the Environment, Climate Change and Land Reform look forward to continuing to work with the Committees and stakeholders on the detail as the Bill progresses through its further Parliamentary stages.

Marco Biagi MSP
Minister for Local Government and Community Empowerment
RESPONSE TO STAGE 1 REPORT KEY POINTS

Introduction

34. We were pleased to hear the Minister go some way to meeting these concerns [about ineffective forms of consultation] when he indicated he will lodge an amendment at stage 2 to strengthen accountability in community planning partnerships by making reference to the national standards of engagement. We will expect that amendment to apply widely and cover all instances of engagement under the Bill.

The Bill changes the purpose of community planning from a process for planning local public services to planning that is carried out to improve local outcomes. In doing so the Bill strengthens community participation so it is about more than just consultation, and Community Planning Partnerships must secure and enable that participation (including by contributing resources). We have considered the evidence received and the discussions within the Committee and we will amend the Bill to further increase the accountability of CPPs to their communities.

The Bill requires public authorities to have regard to guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers in carrying out their functions in relation to community planning, participation requests and common good. The relevant guidance will include the National Standards for Community Engagement, which following the passage of the Bill will be refreshed, updated and promoted to local authorities and public bodies for use in all their engagement activities.

47. The Minister stated “…there will be a requirement in legislation to produce the information that is needed to understand the nature of the assets and buildings [subject to an asset transfer request].” We consider the same position should apply to all parts of the Bill and to all the public bodies subject to provisions. We recommend the Bill, or regulations or guidance should set out requirements in this regard on such bodies to provide up-front support with the necessary expertise to support applicants.

These requirements will be set out in different ways for different parts of the Bill. For example:

- In relation to community planning, section 4(5) requires the community planning partnership to “make all reasonable efforts to secure the participation” of community bodies and to “take such steps as are reasonable to enable the community bodies to participate in community planning”, and section 9(3) requires each community planning partner to “contribute such funds, staff and other resources as the community planning partnership considers appropriate…for the purpose of securing the participation of the community bodies mentioned in section 4(5)(a) in community planning”. Guidance, including the National Standards for Community Engagement, will provide more detail on how this should be done.
In relation to participation requests and asset transfer requests, the Scottish Ministers may make regulations about the procedure to be followed by public service authorities and relevant authorities in relation to requests, in addition to the power in section 54(3) to make regulations about information to be provided about land in respect of which a community transfer body proposes to make an asset transfer request. Further to these regulations, guidance will provide advice on promoting the provisions of the Bill and supporting bodies which may want to make a request.

Support will not only come from the body to which a request may be made. The Scottish Government and its agencies provide and fund a range of support for community bodies which will, in future, include support to take advantage of the provisions of the Bill. This includes Highlands and Islands Enterprise’s Strengthening Communities Work, the Community Ownership Support Service which works with both community bodies and local authorities to promote asset transfer, and the work of the Coalfields Regeneration Trust, amongst others. A Third Sector Interface is funded by the Scottish Government in each local authority area to support and develop a strong third sector and build their relationship with community planning.

48. We look forward to the views of the government in relation to the funding of capacity building recognising the long term aim must be to build capacity directly into communities. We expect the Government to state the current amount spent on community capacity building and the extent to which that will increase as the Bill is implemented.

265. The importance of anchor organisations and the third sector in delivering support to communities and in bridging knowledge and skill gaps is widely accepted. Accordingly we would like the Scottish Government to state its approach to building this capacity and how it is to be funded, thereby allowing Parts 3 and 5 to be accessible to all.

As part of the Public Service Reform agenda, all public bodies and local authorities are expected to engage communities in the design and delivery of services, and to consider the need for capacity building and support to allow all communities to participate in those processes.

The Scottish Government has issued the Strategic Guidance on Community Learning and Development (CLD), which includes capacity building, and the CLD Regulations, requiring education authorities to plan CLD on the basis of identifying those communities which are most likely to benefit from CLD and assessing their needs and barriers to access. Funding for this activity and for local community-led regeneration is provide by central government to local authorities within the general local government settlement, and is not ring-fenced.

The Scottish Government’s Empowering Communities Fund, totalling £19.4m in 2015-16, funds a range of programmes to support community bodies and the development of participatory approaches. This includes the Strengthening Communities Programme which is directly intended to build capacity in local community organisations, particularly in areas suffering disadvantage and inequality.
Capacity in communities arises from many sources. When people are engaged and supported to participate in one area of their lives, they develop greater confidence and skills to seek participation in other areas. This could be through any activity: community gardening, involvement in community-controlled housing or a tenants association, patient-led healthcare initiatives, sport and exercise, environmental projects, are just a few examples.

The Scottish Government also recognises the critical role the Third Sector plays in addressing issues of inequality and the needs of disadvantaged communities, and helping to build the capacity and confidence of people and communities to take control of decisions about what goes on in their local areas. It is at the heart of transforming lives and public service reform in Scotland, working directly with individuals and communities to co-produce solutions and approaches that support resilience and wellbeing.

The Scottish Government invests significantly in the third sector as a key social partner, with third sector funding of £24.5m maintained in the 2015/16 budget. We are working closely with the sector to consider what approach might be taken in the period ahead to continue to secure a buoyant and sustainable third sector.

In 2015-16 to maximise the contribution of the third sector, we will:
- recognise the role of the third sector as a social and economic partner, continuing to invest in the national infrastructure, and in local third sector interfaces to support the third sector’s local role and as key partners in community planning;
- invest £2.5 million over 2014-15 and 2015-16, to build the capacity and resilience of communities and local third sector organisations, particularly helping them to respond to the worst effects of welfare reform; and
- aim to maximise the impact of the third sector in public service reform and prevention, growing community capacity, empowerment and initiative, tackling poverty and social exclusion, and developing enterprising and innovative solutions to the challenges facing communities.

Capacity building is therefore spread across many budgets and organisations and it is not possible to define a single figure for the amount spent on it, particularly as increasing capacity may be only one element of wider activities.

49. We agree with the submission of South Lanarkshire Council there should be a specific duty on CPP partners to reduce inequality and focus on early intervention and prevention. We look forward to the Scottish Government stating how this will be taken forward.

The Scottish Government and the National Community Planning Group agree that community planning should include a particular focus on prevention and reducing inequalities. This is made clear in a letter which the Chair of the NCPG issued to CPP Chairs in July 2014\textsuperscript{1}, which highlighted a set of key principles on how CPPs can continue to maximise their impact. These include that the themes of prevention, joint resourcing and community engagement and co-production are intrinsically inter-connected; that CPPs should focus their collective energy on where their efforts can add most value for their communities, with particular emphasis on reducing inequalities; and that, since multiple negative outcomes tend to befall the same communities with inequalities most stark when disaggregated to small neighbourhood level, there is real value in targeting and customising services to particular communities and in building community capacity.

In line with this, we intend to introduce an amendment to the Bill which ensures that the statutory purpose of community planning should be to reduce inequalities of outcome among communities in the area, as well as to improve local outcomes. How CPPs fulfil these expectations will be for them to decide, based on their participation with community bodies and their understanding of local needs and circumstances. Statutory guidance can set out approaches which CPPs and their partners should deploy or consider, with preventative approaches likely to be prominent in such guidance. While preventative approaches are not ends in themselves, we would expect CPPs to pursue these vigorously as a matter of policy.

67. We therefore draw to Parliament’s attention when considering the financial resolution on this Bill the concerns of the Finance Committee that, despite the requirements of Standing Orders, best estimates have not been provided.

Annexe A 98. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government monitor the cost implications of the Part 4 provisions closely over the coming years, in terms of both the direct cost to communities and landowners and the indirect costs to public bodies and keep the funding requirements under review.

These issues were highlighted during the Stage 1 debate on 3 February 2015. The Government’s position remains the same that best estimates have been provided of the administrative, compliance and other costs to which the provisions of the Bill would give rise. We also provided the best estimate of the timescales over which such costs would arise and we have given a very clear indication of the margins of uncertainty in our estimates. The Parliament voted in favour of the motion in respect of the Financial Resolution following the Stage 1 debate.

The Scottish Government will monitor and review the cost implications of the Bill in respect of the cost implications for public authorities, communities and landowners.

79. For our part we found it necessary to seek substantial additional detail to supplement that supplied in the Policy Memorandum. We observe the legislative requirements of Parliament are made for a purpose, not only to inform members but also crucially, to allow the wider public to meaningfully contribute. We have also commented in this regard to the delay in publishing the EQIA until a point in time when the majority of our evidence have been taken.

\textsuperscript{1} http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Resource/0045/00457528.docx

Annexe A 76. The Committee considers that Policy Memorandum should strike a balance between presenting the high level and broad policy and providing sufficiently detailed information to clearly explain the provisions of the Bill and enable effective scrutiny. On balance the Committee believes that the significance and complexity of the provisions within Part 4 of the Bill would have merited further explanation and clarification within the Policy Memorandum.

Annex A 87. The Committee welcomes the commitment of the Cabinet Secretary to reflect on the points made in relation to human rights issues, both in respect of this Bill and in respect of the forthcoming land reform legislation. The Committee was, however, disappointed that the Equality Impact Assessment was not made available at the time of the publication of the Bill and is concerned that this delay may have had an impact on the effective scrutiny of the Bill.

The comments of both the Local Government and Regeneration Committee and the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee in respect of the Policy Memorandum and EQIA have been noted.

The information to be included within the Policy Memorandum is a matter of balance between providing information on the policy underlying the major proposals and changes of the Bill without overwhelming the reader with too much detail on the provisions themselves. The Explanatory Notes are intended to provide detail of individual sections. An easy read version of the Policy Memorandum was also produced to help people get to grips with the proposals contained within the Bill and this was well received.

Regarding the EQIA, the Government put together five different EQIAs and a summary document to reflect the different policy areas of the Bill. They were not ready for publication on the introduction of the Bill and unfortunately they were published later in Stage 1 than we would have wanted due to administrative problems in getting the documents published on the website.

186. We retain concerns about the terminology and language used throughout the Bill and ask the Scottish Government to amend accordingly to ensure the language used is not a barrier to community involvement.

The Scottish Government is committed to drafting legislation in plain language and all Bills are drafted in accordance with this commitment. Guidance and support materials will be produced to help communities to use the provisions of the Bill, and we will work with partners to further promote and explain it.
Part 1 – National Outcomes

107. We agree with the Minister that communities must be empowered. Given this fundamental principle we expect to see the Scottish Government leading by example. In relation to consultation and engagement with those who are affected, i.e. communities, provision should be enshrined in this Part of the Bill by means of a suitable amendment to Part 1.

We would anticipate that all governments would want to consult widely and inclusively on the national outcomes as a whole and consider this is best achieved by a broad provision which does not limit the scope of the consultation in any way.

If a review related only to individual outcomes or particular topics, it might be more appropriate to have a more focused consultation with particular sectors or individuals. The current wording allows flexibility for the consultation process to be appropriate to different situations.

We have taken on board the views of the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee that there should be a formal role for the Scottish Parliament in the process of determining the national outcomes. Therefore, we propose to bring forward amendments to require Scottish Ministers to consult the Parliament, using the procedure provided for under rule 17.5 of the Standing Orders. That could also provide an opportunity for the Parliament to comment on the consultation process that has taken place.

108. Given the focus placed on scrutiny of outcomes we consider the Scottish Government, not least to inform budget scrutiny by the Scottish Parliament, should report annually on the extent to which national outcomes have been achieved. The report should be available before the annual draft Scottish budget is published.

The Bill provides that the Scottish Ministers must regularly and publicly report progress towards the National Outcomes. This is currently done through the Scotland Performs website, which provides an up to the minute picture of progress towards the national outcomes. Updates are continually made as soon as the latest data becomes available.

This Government provides a Scotland Performs Update to support the draft budget scrutiny process, including performance scorecards and narrative to show performance against national outcomes.

For future governments, the format and timing of the reporting should be for the then Scottish Ministers to decide, allowing for further innovative approaches to be developed.
Part 2 – Community Planning

172. We would like to see some of the various engagement requirements under this Part translated into empowerment. It is important that powers are exercised at the lowest possible level. We look forward to seeing the promised amendments from the Government at Stage 2.

The then Minister for Local Government and Planning told the Committee that we are happy to give consideration to amendments that strengthen the accountability of CPPs to their communities\(^2\). We propose an amendment to make it explicit in the Bill that CPPs must publicly report on their progress each year to their communities. The detail of what this reporting should include would be for guidance, which we anticipate will be shaped by the views shared by the communities that they are effectively participating with throughout community planning.

The Bill is intended to ensure participation with communities lies at the heart of community planning. Section 4(5) already requires CPPs to make all reasonable efforts to secure the participation of any community bodies which they consider are likely to be able to contribute to community planning, and take reasonable steps to enable these bodies to participate where they wish to. We are considering whether further amendments can further reinforce the expectation that community bodies should be able to participate throughout the community planning process.

173. The Bill should require CPPs to seek involvement and input from a level below that of community representatives. It is for the Scottish Government to suggest how this be done, and as importantly, how it will be assessed.

We agree that, for participation to be effective, it should be at a level closest to those it seeks to support. Section 4(8) provides a definition for community bodies which is purposefully wide. These bodies do not need to be formally constituted. They may represent geographic communities or communities of interest (e.g. vulnerable adults or children). They may be resident in the area or otherwise present (e.g. the business community).

None of this prevents CPPs from engaging directly with full communities or sections of the local community. However, we expect community participation to apply throughout the community planning cycle (including understanding needs, circumstances and opportunities; identifying local outcome priorities; working through how to respond to these local outcomes; reviewing progress made on these local outcomes; revising approaches where necessary). For community planning to be dynamic and effective throughout this cycle, the most effective community involvement will often come from representative bodies.

174. There should be an explicit requirement on all CPPs to include community capacity building in local plans and to report on progress along with setting out future plans in every annual report.

Section 4(5) already places duties upon CPPs to make all reasonable efforts to secure the participation of community bodies that can contribute to community planning. Section 9(3) places duties on partners to contribute such funds, staff and other resources for the purpose of securing the participation of community bodies to the extent that those bodies wish to do so.

We are considering an amendment to the Bill, to require CPPs to account for the quality of their participation with community bodies as part of their annual reporting. Guidance could set out what CPPs should cover in fulfilling this duty. Similarly, guidance can set out what CPPs should include in their local outcome improvement plans.

175. As a minimum we would expect the Bill to require annual reports from CPPs to comment on community involvement across the area, including setting out the steps taken to consult with and involve individual communities, and to report on successes in this area. CPPs should also be required to report on how they have developed contacts with local communities over the previous year and the steps they are planning to take to extend and increase involvement of local communities in the coming period.

As stated above, we are considering an amendment to the Bill, which would place a duty on CPPs to account for the quality of their participation with community bodies as part of their published annual progress report. Guidance could provide further detail of how CPPs should fulfill this duty.

176. Overall we are not convinced this Bill goes far enough to move CPPs from their current top-down approach and recommend further statutory provision is made to ensure this is both clearer and measurable.

The Bill reflects a model for community planning that attracted substantial support from respondents to the Scottish Government's second consultation paper (November 2013). It is a model which is both strategic, and responsive to the diversity of needs and circumstances that face different communities within a CPP area.

The strategic aspect to community planning is critical. CPPs are expected to prioritise local outcomes for their area in their local outcome improvement plan, based on their understanding of local needs and circumstances and the input of communities. As stated at para 49 above, the National Community Planning Group is encouraging CPPs to focus efforts on a small number of priorities where they can make the biggest positive difference for their communities, including to tackle multi-faceted disadvantage. In their report "Improving Community Planning in Scotland", the Accounts Commission and Auditor General highlighted this development as an example of improving leadership by the NCPG.

3 Page 4 and para 21
At the same time, CPPs need to be clear about the diverse nature of needs, circumstances and opportunities for different communities in their area (both geographic communities and communities of interest). They should reflect these in setting their priorities for improving local outcomes and reducing inequalities, and in how they act on these priorities.

While the recommendation focuses on the need for specific statutory provision, our general position is that there is an important place for both that and statutory guidance. In particular, guidance can add real value to new arrangements in ways that statutory provisions alone cannot, because it can be shaped with stakeholders around their needs. We will continue the open and inclusive approach we took to the development of the Bill in creating that guidance, and in drawing up the secondary legislation. We can expect to establish groups of stakeholders to develop guidance on each topic, building on our engagement at earlier stages of the process, and to consult publically and widely on the drafts produced in this way. We will ensure a balance is obtained between the various interested sectors in the Bill, in particular between the public and community and voluntary sectors. We intend to create straightforward guidance so that everyone can understand the rights and duties created by the Bill and take advantage of the opportunities it offers. That will include Easy Read versions where appropriate. We will also build on the good practice and advice already available and ensure we get the benefit of the experience and understanding of all our stakeholders.

177. The Bill should be clearer as to the expectations in relation to leadership, governance and audit arrangements that apply to CPPs.

Section 8 of the Bill provides clarity about governance duties and provides a basis for shared leadership among the governing partners listed in section 8(2). It makes it clear that it is the governing partners who are responsible for facilitating community planning and ensuring that the partnership carries out its functions efficiently and effectively.

Guidance can set out in more detail how CPPs and partner bodies should exercise effective leadership and governance, similar to how Best Value guidance sets out leadership and governance expectations for local authorities and public bodies).

CPPs are already subject to audit without statutory provision and we welcome the stimulus that external audit has provided to support on-going improvement in community planning.

178. We remain unclear how the Scottish Government, who supply most of the funding spent by CPPs, intend to measure and hold to account each CPP on their achievement of outcomes and value for money. We consider the Bill must explicitly include this, building on The Statement of Ambition.

179. The above applies equally to individual CPP partners on their involvement, the Bill should be clear about their accountability for the performance of the CPP.
Within the CPP, the Bill establishes clear duties for partner bodies on how they contribute to community planning, review progress and provide effective overarching governance. The lines of accountability for community planning partners are unaffected by the introduction of the Bill and remain the same. e.g. NHS to Scottish Ministers, Local Authorities to their electorate. We intend to take steps to ensure that, for those public bodies that are listed in Schedule 1 to the Bill, their contribution to community planning is reflected more consistently as part of how they are held to account for their performance.

181. We do not consider the Bill, as currently drafted, makes it clear that priority must be given to CPP initiatives over those of individual partner organisations. This Bill requires to be clearer around the provisions requiring the sharing of budgets by all CPP partners.

We disagree that the Bill should isolate CPP activity from their broader responsibilities or “give priority” to one over the other. What is important is that partners contribute positively to community planning and, having agreed what they do to support local outcomes, all partners provide the resources agreed within the CPP (section 9(3) refers).

The duties of joint resourcing for community planning partners have less to do with sharing budget information, and more to do with providing and aligning funds, staff and other resources towards shared priority local outcomes. We agree with Douglas Sinclair, Chair of the Accounts Commission, who told the Public Audit Committee: “the challenge for CPPs is not to argue about mainstream budgets but to get into budget areas that overlap and where they can make a difference to reduce inequalities and their particular priorities”.4

182. Annual reports should be both backward and forward looking. As well as reporting under section 7(2), on whether there has been any improvement in the achievement of each local outcome set out in the local outcomes improvement plan, CPPs should be statutorily required to report intended actions and activities.

We disagree that legislation should specify that an annual report must include both backward and forward looking dimensions. Sections 5 and 6 already set out arrangements for the development, review and revision of local outcomes improvement plans. Separate arrangements in section 7 cover the preparation of annual reports on progress made.

We are happy to consider whether CPPs should be expected to produce additional material on their future plans, as part of statutory guidance. However, we would not expect that this should be set out within a published annual report. To be valuable, any statement of future plans would need to be published in advance of the reporting year in question; while any report on progress could not be produced until the reporting year in question had ended. So we are not clear how a single report could set out both a progress report for one reporting year, and planned activities for the following year.

183. A deadline for reporting should be specified. We recommend no later than 6 months after the end of the period in question.

We agree that a deadline should apply to the publication of annual reports. The currency of reporting has an impact on the usefulness of the information contained within the report. We consider that guidance will provide an opportunity to address specific timing and will engage with stakeholders to determine a suitable timeframe.

184. If Scottish Enterprise are to be included as partners their remit requires to be amended to include community support along the lines of that of Highland and Island Enterprise. Equally they must be required to comply with all requirements, including budget sharing, to avoid any perception that engagement by partners is optional.

Scottish Enterprise is an important community planning partner with its current remit. Changing its remit would require substantive changes to the Enterprise and New Towns (Scotland) Act 1990, and we do not consider the case for such significant change has been made.

Scottish Enterprise will be subject to the same duties as are placed on other partners listed in Schedule 1 to the Bill, including the duty in section 9(3) to contribute such funds, staff and other resources as the CPP considers appropriate with a view to improving local outcomes and for the purpose of securing participation by community bodies. This should not be confused with “budget sharing”. As the then Minister for Local Government and Planning explained to the Committee on 12 November 2014:

> “I can guarantee to Mr McDonald and to the Committee that Scottish Enterprise is very mindful of our obligations on community planning, as was reinforced during my recent visit. Lena Wilson, the chief executive, is very clear that, although Scottish Enterprise might not be bringing its budget to the table, it should be bringing its expertise, support, networks and contacts to the table. That is the kind of support that a community planning partnership would want.

> The bill deals with what is agreed at community planning partnership level. Scottish Enterprise can bring its business expertise. Economy is one of the key themes in community planning, and Scottish Enterprise is of course well placed in that regard.”

185. The third sector and housing bodies should be given a more prominent role, short of becoming a partner at the partnership board of CPPs.

We have taken steps throughout the Bill to ensure the effective participation of community bodies, which can include the third sector and housing bodies, is secured.

5 Columns 25, 26
and acted upon. However, we do not consider that it would be appropriate to place statutory duties on third sector and housing bodies. We are happy to consider providing further detail about their role in statutory guidance.

186. The bill should explicitly encourage the involvement and participation of the private sector and local business with CPPs.

The Bill already reflects this. As described above, duties are placed on partners to secure participation of community bodies and such other persons as it considers appropriate. The definition of “community bodies” in section 4(8) extends to communities not resident but otherwise present in the area of the local authority, which can include local businesses.

187. We do not consider sportscotland should be included as partners in CPPs.

We understand that sportscotland have written to the Committee to clarify their position. Their inclusion in Schedule 1 to the Bill is in line with the terms of their response to the Scottish Government’s second consultation on the Bill proposals, as they recognised the potential contribution they have to make to work with others in community planning. As with other statutory community planning partners, the extent of their involvement and where within the community planning process they get involved may vary from one CPP to another, as it currently does. This is addressed in the Bill, with section 9(1) providing that a CPP may agree that a particular partner need not comply with a duty or need only comply to such an extent as agreed by the partnership.

188. Provision should be made in the Bill for other public bodies to be full CPP partners as appropriate, based on local circumstances and need. We have in mind for example DWP and transport partnerships.

Those bodies which are community planning partners are listed in Schedule 1 to the Bill and Scottish Ministers by regulations will be able to add, remove or amend this list. The Committee may wish to note that transport partnerships are already listed in Schedule 1. Individual CPPs may agree to participate with other public bodies not included on the list as they agree between themselves. The Bill does not prohibit participation with other public bodies.

However the Department of Work and Pensions is a reserved body, and therefore cannot have duties placed on it by Scottish legislation.

190. The Bill must make clear the linkage between local improvement plans and single outcome agreements.

We have attempted to do make this clear previously in the policy memorandum which confirms that Local Outcome Improvement Plans are the equivalent of Single Outcome Improvement Plans.

---

Outcome Agreements – we have used the new wording in legislation to more clearly articulate what their purpose is.

Part 3 – Participation Requests

260 – 264, 268. Given the need for this Bill follows the failure of voluntary arrangements we consider it vital progress is closely monitored. To allow that to happen we recommend the Bill require all public service authorities to produce periodic public reports. This would include:

- The arrangements made by each body to support communities to utilise the provisions (instead of requiring a named officer)
- The methods used to encourage community participation, and comment on how successful they have been.
- The steps taken to underpin the community focused provisions in the Bill (Parts 3 and 5). It should also identify those communities which have been supported along with a summary of the support provided and details of how successful this has been.
- How they have built capacity in communities which has allowed them to take advantage of participation requests and asset transfer requests. In addition it should set out measures taken to address inequalities between communities in their area.
- Steps taken to provide information to communities, including publicity, and how successful this has been in making the participation request process open to all.

270. Finally, we recommend information be included in the reports on public service authorities’ willingness to allow community participation; the number of participation requests made; the number refused; and an explanation of organisational initiatives which encourage community participation in shaping of and the delivery of services.

The same recommendations are applicable in relation to Part 5 (paragraphs 339-341)

We recognise the need to monitor the progress of public service authorities and relevant authorities in implementing the provisions of the Bill. We will bring forward an amendment to require public service authorities and relevant authorities to provide an annual report. We would require that the annual report covers the number of requests received, the results of those requests, together with narrative information about the measures taken by each authority to promote the provisions of the Bill and support community bodies in making requests.

267. We recommend the removal of the need for an application to be by a group and in the event of an application under this Part by a group for the requirement for any written constitution along with any other restrictions which could dilute the community accessing these provisions. For any that are to remain we expect to hear compelling reasons for their inclusion otherwise as the process, which is designed also to assist public service authorities in improving services, should be open to all.

Public authorities should use a range of engagement and participation approaches to allow all members of our communities to be involved in the design and delivery of services, including individuals. Participation Requests are a specific mechanism designed to enable proposals to be brought forward by groups with a common interest and purpose. The structure of the provisions (requirement to establish an outcome improvement process and report on the outcome of that process) would be disproportionate if it were applied to suggestions from individuals with no wider support.

The requirement for a written constitution is intended to ensure that the group is open, inclusive and representative, controlled by the members of the community which it claims to represent. This addresses concerns raised in consultation that the provisions could be used by individuals or closed groups to further their own interests, or without effectively seeking the views of those the proposals are intended to benefit. Model constitutions will be provided, as is done for community bodies under the community right to buy scheme, to ensure that it is as easy as possible for any group to agree a suitable constitution.

269. We recommend complaints concerning the handling of participation requests made to the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman (SPSO) are separately identifiable in their records and shown in annual reports. This will enable implementation and effectiveness of the new process to be monitored.

The SPSO publishes statistical information on all complaints on its website, and highlights the main trends and top categories in its annual report and individual sectoral reports each year. Almost all individual decisions made by the SPSO are also published either in a public interest report or in a shorter summary report. These can be searched by keyword as well as subject on the website.

The SPSO seeks to ensure that the categories used in its statistics and analysis are meaningful and allow for comparison across authorities. If there are too many categories they may overlap or there may be too few cases in each category to allow meaningful analysis. Categories are reviewed as necessary to reflect changes in legislation or in the nature of complaints being brought.

The SPSO’s annual report is laid before Parliament each year. Under section 17(3) of the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman Act 2002, the SPCB can provide directions as to the content and form of the report.
Part 5 – Asset Transfer

339 – 341. Given this Bill has been found to be necessary we consider it vital progress is closely monitored. To allow that to happen we recommend the Bill require all public bodies to produce periodic reports.

Our recommendations in Part 3 (paragraphs 261-265) in relation to capacity of communities also applies to Part 5.

We recommend information be included on relevant authorities' willingness to respond to asset transfer reports: the number of asset transfer requests made; the number refused; and an explanation of organisational initiatives which encourage transfer of assets to communities.

Please see the response under Part 3.

342-344. The Bill should stipulate a 6 month maximum time limit following receipt of community transfer body's offer within which relevant authorities must conclude contracts unless otherwise agreed by all parties.

Any delay beyond the above period must be reported to the Chief Executive of the relevant authority setting out the reasons why an asset transfer has not been concluded.

Any breaches of the period must be reported in the report.

The Minister set out in his letter to the Committee, dated 17 December 2014, how the provisions in the Bill would work in this situation. If no agreement is reached within 6 months, the transfer will fall and any agreement will be of no further effect. However, the community transfer body and the relevant authority can agree an extension to the period, or failing that the community transfer body can apply to the Scottish Ministers to direct that the period should be extended, so that negotiations can continue. This puts the community body in control of the situation if they consider that the relevant authority is delaying agreement. The Scottish Ministers can direct the period to be extended more than once. The relevant authority cannot dispose of the property to any other person until after any extended period expires.

It is not clear how the situation would be resolved under the Committee's proposal if the time limit is breached, only that the matter must be reported to the Chief Executive of the relevant authority. We consider that this provides less benefit to the community body than the recourse to Scottish Ministers currently provided by the Bill.

We are happy to agree that the annual report proposed in paragraph 341 should include information on any requests where the contract has not been concluded within the 6 month period.

345. To enable groups to assess the funding options available to them we recommend the Bill should stipulate that as a minimum the information listed at paragraph 345 (price, running costs etc) be included in subordinate legislation [on information to be provided to the community transfer body].

The Bill provides for Ministers to make regulations about information which a community transfer body may request from the relevant authority in advance of making an asset transfer request, and how the relevant authority is to respond. The aim of placing this information in subordinate legislation is to provide for flexibility. We will consult separately on the detail of those regulations, taking into account the views expressed in consultation on the Bill and in the evidence provided to the Committee.

346. We welcome the Scottish Government’s commitment to require all relevant authorities subject to Part 5 of the Bill to provide a publically available asset register.

We agree this will be helpful to enable community bodies to understand the range of assets that may be available for transfer.

347. In addition we recommend the Scottish Government gives consideration to the various pieces of legislation which prevent the Forestry Commission from leasing land to communities for forestry purposes, and in particular, the leasing to not-for profit industrial provident societies to enable greater use by communities of their land.

We propose to bring forward amendments at Stage 2 to extend the range of community organisations that can lease land for forestry purposes, to ensure it aligns with the policy aims of the Bill and the amended Land Reform (Scotland) Act.

348. The Minister’s commitment to put in place an appeal process for refusals of asset transfers by the Scottish Ministers is welcome. We look forward to hearing detail of the framework.

The framework is expected to be similar to that for local authority review of their decisions. The current provision for appeals and reviews, under section 58 and 59, allows for detailed procedures to be set out in regulations. We will work with stakeholders to develop appropriate procedures for appeal and review by the Scottish Ministers.

349. We recommend the Bill detail how the appeal process for relevant authorities, local authorities and Scottish Ministers will apply to the valuation of an asset and the conditions attached to the transfer.

The current provisions allow the appeal and review processes to consider, and if necessary alter, any terms and conditions attached to the transfer. We consider that the amount set for purchase or rent would also be a term or condition in this context and could therefore be considered in any appeal or review.

350. The Scottish Government should specify which organisational structures it deems appropriate for ownership of assets.
Section 53 sets out the criteria for community transfer bodies that may request transfer of ownership of land. At present this includes companies and Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisations (SCIOs), as well as bodies that may be designated by the Scottish Ministers as eligible to request transfer of ownership. We intend to bring forward amendments to add Community Benefit Societies registered under the Co-operative and Community Benefit Societies Act 2014.

All community transfer bodies (other than those designated by the Scottish Ministers) must meet the criteria for community-controlled bodies set out in section 14, including the requirement that all surplus funds or assets of the body are to be applied for the benefit of the community to which the body relates. Co-operatives and Community Interest Companies are therefore excluded from the legal forms eligible to request transfer of ownership, because they are able to distribute profits to members.

Part 6 – Common Good

397. We recommend the Bill be clarified to make it clear to local authorities and communities that no conflicts exist in relation to the transfer of common good assets under Part 5 of the Bill.

Any restrictions on the disposal or use of property, whether as a result of common good status, title conditions or other restrictions, will apply in the case of asset transfer as they would to any other sale or lease. This will be clarified in guidance. However, common good status would not prevent a community body from leasing, managing or using the property, provided this was in line with the purposes for which the property was originally intended.

398. Given the approach outlined by the Minister we see no difficulty in the Bill specifying a maximum timescale for the compilation and production of Common Good Registers which we recommend be no later than 5 years from Royal assent. Such timescales would also include the requirements on local authorities to report at specified intervals.

Since they must have sufficient information to account for the value of their common good fund, we would expect authorities to be able to publish their proposed lists of common good property relatively quickly once the detailed requirements are agreed. As has previously been confirmed, it will not be necessary for authorities to confirm the status of every item in their own lists or suggested by representations before placing it on the register. Some items may need to be marked as unconfirmed until such time as detailed investigations, and if necessary legal proceedings, are carried out. We therefore consider that it should take no more than 3 years for authorities to establish their common good registers, although not all items on the register will have their status confirmed within that time. The requirement to begin the process of establishing a register will come into force as soon as the relevant sections of the Bill are commenced.
Local authorities are required to maintain their registers once established. This will entail updating the status of any items formerly under investigation, and adding any proposed through consultation. It is not clear what additional information would be provided through periodical reporting.

399. We note evidence on the impracticalities of being required to consult all community councils within a local authority area on specific common good assets, especially geographically larger councils. The Bill should be amended to permit regulations to allow for a necessary degree of flexibility.

We recognise the issue for larger local authorities which may have separate common good funds deriving from different burghs. We will bring forward amendments to address this.

Part 7 – Allotments

459. On issues such as the size and number of allotments, we agree with the Minister that setting a defined standard plot size on the face of the Bill would not be helpful. This would remove local flexibility from councils, however we would like to see guidance covering this matter.

Whilst we do not intend to include on the face of the Bill any provision prescribing a standard plot size, we are considering further amendments in this area.

460. While we expect Local Authorities to take the lead in making land available for allotments etc, we expect other public bodies to look closely at their land holdings and respond positively to demand from communities. We recommend the Bill widen the responsibility to include the CPP to ensure the other partners are engaged.

We agree public bodies should “look closely at their land holdings and respond positively to demand from communities”. This could include asset transfer requests made under Part 5 of the Bill. The Scottish Government has supported a number of initiatives to develop growing spaces in different public sector scenarios including; the transformation of vacant City Council land in the Toryglen area of Glasgow for community growing, and the establishment of growing space at the Royal Edinburgh Hospital (NHS Estate) amongst others.

However, we do not accept the Bill should place a statutory duty on CPPs to ensure other public sector bodies make land available for allotments, etc. Any such duties would fall on each partner body individually. As with other duties placed on partner bodies, they should be answerable through pre-existing lines of accountability (e.g. NHS boards to Scottish Ministers).

Similarly, while we recognise that community planning can be a vehicle in which public bodies consider joint approaches to asset management, decisions about whether and how to pursue these approaches should be for CPPs themselves, where they consider this can provide a valuable contribution to their work.
461. We recognise local authorities are the appropriate public sector organisations to draw up local food growing strategies. However, confining this duty simply to local authorities would be a missed opportunity. We recommend that food-growing strategies be made a CPP duty, so that all CPP partners will have an obligation to contribute to meeting the objectives of the strategy through the Single Outcome Agreement. This should be developed in such a way as to support the forthcoming United Nations Sustainable Development Goals from 2016 onwards.

462. The Scottish Government should indicate how it will ensure CPPs are required to engage private and commercial sector land owners to assist in supporting food growing and allotments.

463. CPPs should be required to support the delivery of access to food-growing activity as an objective. This could be achieved by providing access to publicly-owned land held by public sector agencies or by providing other resources such as funding the development of growing skills, or utilising existing programme or skills within the public sector (for example on decontamination of land etc.). We recommend guidance make this duty clear along with a requirement to report on how it is being achieved.

Recommendations 461 to 463 cut across a fundamental principle of the strengthened community planning arrangements in Part 2 of this Bill. The Bill does not stipulate any themes or policy issues that CPPs are required to prioritise within their Local Outcomes Improvement Plans. It is for CPPs to determine their own local outcome priorities, reflecting their understanding of local needs and circumstances and in light of community participation. As a matter of policy, and as the Accounts Commission and Auditor General highlighted as an example of improved national leadership in their report "Improving Community Planning in Scotland", the National Community Planning Group has advised that CPPs should focus their collective energy on where their efforts can add most value for their communities, with a particular focus on tackling multiple inequalities. Indeed the audit report praised Glasgow CPP for narrowing their focus towards three specific priorities for their area that reflect its greatest challenges, with associated outcomes.

Against these backdrop, we do not agree that there should be any mandatory themes or outcome areas which all CPPs must include in their Local Outcome Improvement Plans. We also do not agree that food-growing strategies should, uniquely, be such a mandatory element, when there are no others. To impose such a “top-down” statutory duty on CPPs runs against both Scottish Government policy and the Committee’s own stated “bottom-up” intentions for Part 2 of the Bill.

In further response to Recommendation 462, the Committee may wish to be aware that, to encourage landowners, both private and public, to make sites available for growing food, Scottish Government supported the production of a ‘Guide for Landowners’, that was produced by the Community Land Advisory Service in 2013. This Guide provides comprehensive information, suggestions and background.

details to equip landowners to play their part in making more land available for local communities to grow food.

464. Local authorities should work to ensure their food-growing strategies are inclusive of the need to develop horticultural skills, especially amongst children.

Curriculum for Excellence (CfE) is the national approach to learning and teaching for young people aged 3-18 in Scotland and is the result of wide-ranging and ongoing engagement and consultation with parents, teachers, educationalists and other key stakeholders since 2002. CfE enables young people to develop four capacities - successful learners, confident individuals, effective contributors and responsible citizens. It provides learners with a range of personalised learning experiences and qualifications that meet their individual needs and aspirations. It also frees teachers from prescription, providing a framework for learning through a set of experiences and outcomes in eight curricular areas.

Guidance produced for local authorities by the Scottish Government last year – ‘Better Eating, Better Learning’ – is clear that within Curriculum for Excellence the development of practical food skills is a key area of learning for children and young people and would include horticultural skills. The Guidance states that, “With careful planning outdoor settings can be accessible to all and are being used effectively to teach children and young people how to plant and grow food, cook over open fires and produce meals from seasonal foods sourced locally.”

The Guidance recognises that the benefits gained as a result of involvement in practical food growing projects includes enhanced community relations and creating partnerships between schools and food businesses. Scottish Government and Education Scotland provide an extensive list of resources on organisations able to support schools in this area.

Furthermore, there is a range of quality assured, accredited and relevant vocational training courses and qualifications in horticulture available in Scotland. These range from entry level to more advanced levels as well as a Modern Apprenticeship framework.

Many of Scotland’s local authorities already work in active partnership with training providers (eg colleges) to deliver high quality horticultural learning and training. Most of these focus on parks, gardens, cemeteries and landscaping (ie amenity horticulture) but there is flexibility to focus on local food production eg the Loch Lomond & the Trossachs Skills Partnership is helping to pilot a related ‘Shared Apprenticeship’ on kitchen gardens, and there are other examples of relevant initiatives (Glasgow City Council is one). Approximately 45 secondary schools already include land-based delivery in their curriculum (some again in active partnership with their local college).

465. We recommend the community-based allotment and food growing sector be encouraged to become part of a viable empowering food economy while also ensuring the land available to them is not taken advantage of by the larger scale commercial food production industry. We look forward to an appropriate amendment loosening the restrictions in section 87 to make this clear.

The Government is proposing to loosen the provisions relating to the sale of surplus produce by removing the need for Scottish Ministers to prescribe what produce may be sold.

Should the provisions be broadened to enable food produced on allotments to be part of the wider food economy this could have the unintended consequence of bringing allotment holders within the scope of the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act 1991 since such production would fall within the definition of agricultural land which includes land being used for the purposes of a trade or business.

Part 8 – Non-domestic rates

500. We are content to have variability in the way this power is used across Scotland and indeed within and across local authority areas, we view the power as one providing increased flexibility to local authorities that can be used to support the creation of new businesses and to sustain existing businesses.

501. We have no concerns about the suggestions of a “race to the bottom”, viewing this power as but one tool for local use principally to incentivise and regenerate local areas. The power can only be utilised within the uniform business rates scheme.

502. We request the Scottish Government to consider ways in which they can promote the use of this power to prioritise regeneration activities within disadvantaged areas.

503. We would be concerned if landlords were to target rent increases on properties receiving relief under this power and encourage the Scottish Government to consider ways in which this could be prevented.

We note the Committee’s points regarding local business rates relief. We would also note the existing scope for local discretion that councils have with regard to some national rate reliefs. Whilst we would not fetter councils’ discretion as to whether or how they use the proposed new power, we will continue to promote regeneration activities in active partnership with councils, drawing on the range of available powers, and note that this new power may afford corresponding opportunities. Any changes to business rates may have implications for rents, and, whilst we will endeavour to observe the effects of any new measures, the responsibility for considering impacts and implications of any local rate relief will rest with the respective council.
Annexe A – Part 4, Community right to buy land

Responses to paragraphs 76, 87 and 98 are included with responses to the general points made at the beginning of the report.

78. The Committee considers that the Part 4 provisions of the Bill have the potential to contribute significantly to sustainable development but agrees with the Scottish Environment Protection Agency which suggested that the Policy Memorandum provides a ‘light touch’ assessment of the sustainable development aspects of the Bill. The Committee considers that the Policy Memorandum could have provided further consideration of sustainable development. The Committee would welcome information from the Scottish Government on its plans to produce further regulation and guidance on this matter.

The sustainable development element of any community right to buy is taken into account when considering each application. The impact will vary widely across the spectrum of cases and the Scottish Government will, of course, ensure that clarification is provided wherever it is required, both through regulation and guidance, and in consultation with stakeholders.

86. The Committee was interested to hear the views of Professor Alan Miller, Chair of the Scottish Human Rights Commission, and considers that human rights could have been brought into the wider context of the Bill. The Committee believes that a wider consideration may have assisted, and might still assist, in establishing an environment which would facilitate a more constructive dialogue between landowners and communities.

Human rights is part of the consideration of any community right to buy. When assessing the community body’s application, Ministers must take account of all facts and assess applications on a case by case basis.

96. The Committee understands that community right-to-buy will be demand-led. However, the Committee considers that the Scottish Government should have provided further clarification of how the Community Land Fund’s budget was arrived at and should have considered what parallels could be drawn between it and funding for community right-to-buy in the context of the Bill. The Committee is of the view that the Financial Memorandum ought to have given greater consideration to this.

The SLF has been increased to £10 million from 2016-20 to meet demand, as announced in November 2014. The Scottish Government will certainly monitor the costs associated with the Community Right to Buy as it progresses over the next few years and will continue to keep its funding for this and other community-led activity under review.

97. The Committee is also concerned that the costs for communities and landowners (e.g. legal costs arising from appeals, costs to communities in preparing and developing proposals and bids) and the costs to public bodies of providing support to communities are unclear. The Committee is of the view that the Financial Memorandum should have better reflected this.

The Financial Memorandum included unit costs for the key elements of the right to buy process, such as valuations, ballots and appeals. The cost to each community body is not collected by the Scottish Government, and varies widely depending on just how each community approached the right to buy. In the Bill as introduced, under Section 47, we have included a duty to provide information about community right to buy, for the purposes of monitoring and evaluating impact.

101. The Committee welcomes confirmation from the Cabinet Secretary that the initial view that the rules relating to lottery funding would not have any impact on the right-to-buy. However, the Committee encourages the Scottish Government to clarify this initial view and advise the Committee of any change in that position.

We believe the sportscotland submission to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee, that gives rise to these concerns, relates more to asset transfer (part 5 of the Bill), than to community right to buy. We agree that communities should not be encouraged to take on liabilities that they cannot support, and recognise that lottery funding may not be available where a property is bought from the public sector. It is essential that every proposal for community ownership is based on a viable business plan with a clear view of how the project will be sustainable in the long term, identifying future funding sources with appropriate eligibility criteria where necessary.

Assets that have been improved/bought with lottery funding cannot be sold without first informing the distributor of the funding, who must be satisfied that full market value is being sought. Since Community Right to Buy is always valued at market value, this is not a concern for this Part of the Bill.

110. The Committee understands the concerns of stakeholders in respect of areas subject to an active planning consent. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government give further consideration as to whether amendment at stage 2 is required to provide a mechanism to exempt such sites, for a period of time, to offer greater certainty to the investment and development market.

The Law Society of Scotland raised suggestions that consideration is given to allowing for a mechanism to obtain a certificate exempting a site from community right-to-buy for a certain amount of time. This would be where, in its view, land may be subject to redevelopment proposals and the potential uncertainty that applications could create, adversely impacting on investment decisions.

At the moment, any current development plans or active planning permissions are already taken into account in deciding whether it is in the public interest for the community application to be accepted. In order to keep the uncertainly to a minimum, there is a maximum of 63 days between receipt of an application and a decision on whether or not it should registered.
As a result, the Scottish Government does not intend to make any amendment to the Bill in this area.

112. It is not clear to the Committee whether specific mention of salmon fishings and mineral rights implies that the right-to-buy is not exercisable in relation to other tenements. The Committee would welcome clarification from the Scottish Government as to whether that is indeed the case.

The Scottish Government appreciates the need for clarity and therefore intends to bring forward amendments at Stage 2 to clarify whether the right to buy is exercisable in relation to other tenements.

121. The Committee heard the views of those who would prefer the Bill to define the characteristics of an eligible community body rather than specify the eligible legal structure. However at this time the Committee remains unconvinced of this approach. The Committee understands that new forms of legal entities that could be eligible may emerge over time but the Committee is comfortable that provision exists to define those entities in secondary legislation. The Committee recommends that any such legislation be brought forward under the affirmative procedure.

The Scottish Government agrees with the views of the Committee and it is intended that any regulations made by Ministers to extend the range of legal entities that can be community bodies will be subject to the affirmative procedure.

122. The Committee welcomes the inclusion of Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisations in the Bill. The Committee listened carefully to the evidence on the impact of restricting the choice of legal entity to two options and, on reflection, considers that the Bill should extend the eligibility of legal entities to include Community Benefit Societies and Community Interest Companies. The Committee welcomes the commitment of the Cabinet Secretary to consider potential amendments at stage 2 to extend the list of eligible community bodies and recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments to include Community Benefit Societies and Community Interest Companies.

One of the key considerations in whether or not a particular type of community body should be eligible is that all funds raised should be used to benefit the community. In particular that;

\[ s34(1)(g) - \text{provision that any surplus funds or assets of the company are to be applied for the benefit of the community}\]

Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisations (SCIOs) will also have this requirement within the legislation. Whilst both Community Benefit Societies (BenComs) and Community Interest Companies (CICs) certainly have a community focus, the main difference is that CICs with shares can distribute dividends to individual shareholders. This is not something that is desirable at this moment in time, therefore it is proposed to extend the range of bodies that can be valid... community bodies to BenComs alongside SCIOs and Company Limited by Guarantee but not to CICs at this stage.

Ministers will have the power to make regulations to add additional types of organisational structures at a later date, and therefore if in the future it is considered that CICs would be suitable community bodies that change could be made at that time.

123. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government also give consideration to the proposals of the Scottish Federation of Housing Associations and the Church of Scotland that the Bill should mention housing associations and co-operatives, and charities such as the Church of Scotland, as community bodies.

The addition of housing associations and charities such as the Church of Scotland to the types of community body would introduce bodies that did not necessarily have a community focus, nor would they be obliged to ensure that all funds are retained within the community. These types of organisation can have a wider, even national, remit and there is a desire to keep a much more local focus. As a result, there are no plans to allow these additional types of community body at this time. However, as mentioned above, Ministers will have the power to make regulations to extend the range of entities that can be a community body if the position changes.

125. The Committee is concerned that the requirement for Scottish Incorporated Charitable Organisations (SCIO’s) to have a minimum of 20 members will, in practice, mean that a number of existing SCIOs would be excluded from the definition of an eligible community body and would therefore be unable to apply to register a community interest in land. The Committee considers that the requirement for SCIOs to have a minimum of 20 members is overly prescriptive and strongly recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward relevant amendments at stage 2.

The Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 already provides that Ministers may disapply the requirement for community bodies to have twenty members, and this Ministerial power will apply to all types of community bodies in Parts 2, 3 and 3A of the 2003 Act.

However, in light of the Committee’s concerns, the Scottish Government will bring forward amendments to reduce this limit to 10 members, to ensure that smaller communities are not disadvantaged.

134. The Committee listened to the concerns of stakeholders in relation to the provisions of minutes upon request and recommends that the Scottish Government give consideration to this provision and the need for further clarification and reflect on the impact of this provision on existing community bodies. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government consider whether there are other means to affect the policy objective such as a requirement for community bodies to enact relevant bylaws or rules, and bring forward relevant amendments at stage 2.
The policy aim of this requirement is to encourage transparency and openness in the right to buy process. In response to the Committee’s concerns the Scottish Government is giving consideration to whether it should qualify the application of this requirement, in relation to the types of minutes it applies to and whether it applies to minutes of meetings that took place prior to commencement of the Bill. Any qualification would be brought forward by way of an amendment to the Bill at Stage 2. At this stage it is considered that the current qualification that the community body must only respond to requests for minutes that are reasonable provides sufficient security to community bodies that they will not be placed under an overly onerous burden.

140. The Committee recognises the practical issues for communities in considering an interest in land and agrees that Ministers should not be artificially restricted by a six-month time limit in considering any relevant material. The Committee would welcome further consideration of this section by Ministers.

One of the factors that is taken into account in a community body’s application for a right to buy is the level of community support that they have received. At the moment, it is considered that 6 months is a reasonable timescale within which evidence of support should be received. In the evidence received by the Committee, some of the issues raised were that it could take longer than 6 months to form a community body, or that feasibility or other studies could date back before that period. To date, all applications received have demonstrated evidence of community support within the 6 month deadline, and therefore there is no intention to amend the 6 month timescale on the face of the Bill at this stage. However it is intended to take a regulation-making power so that Ministers can amend the time limit in the future, should a problem become more apparent.

151. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government should take into account the recommendations of the Land Reform Review Group with respect to the “right lite” for registration, i.e. providing communities with a right to register an interest and to be notified when land was coming on to the market or ownership was changing, that would trigger the process of the “heavier” right of registering a right of pre-emption.

There are practical issues surrounding registration that would make this difficult in practice. First of all, a community body would still have to be created, in order to register the interest in the first place. If the “heavier” right was then triggered, this body would still have to be compliant with the Act. For the right to be triggered, an area of land would have to be identified for Registers of Scotland to “flag”, otherwise, how would they know that it had been part of a registration of interest? By default, because there was no prohibition, the fact that it was put up for sale, automatically means that it is considered to be a late application. The easiest solution would seem to be to register an interest as part of the existing Part 2 application.
Current changes within the Bill, as part of the late application process, could allow work undertaken as part of identifying that interest to be considered as “relevant steps”.

152. Notwithstanding that, the Committee considers that the registration process requires considerable simplification. The Committee was also interested to hear the proposals from stakeholders to allow communities to register a purpose. The Committee considers that there may be scope for a dual registration process to enable registration for specified areas of land or buildings and to enable registration for a purpose which could potentially be met by a range of assets. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government give consideration to a simplified registration process that would also include the option to register “a purpose” and bring forward amendments to that effect at stage 2.

Current changes to the late application process mean that work undertaken to identify a community’s needs, and requirement for land for a particular purpose, could be taken into consideration as examples of relevant steps, which it could not in the original legislation. This means that, should a community be actively considering options, it is not penalised simply because land is put on the market whilst that process is underway.

162. The Committee is keen to ensure that the provisions in Part 4 of the Bill simplify the provisions of the 2003 Act and effectively support communities in their aspirations to acquire land and deliver wider public and sustainable development benefits, whilst balancing this with the need to protect the rights of land owners. The Committee is aware that whilst encouragement and support should be given to communities in registering an early interest in land it is likely that for many communities and applications late registration will continue to be the norm. The Committee considers that the process for late registration should reflect the practical reality for communities and should be redesigned to accommodate this.

163. The Committee has concerns about the ‘good reasons’ test but is also concerned that removal of the ‘good reasons’ test and replacement of this with the need to show ‘relevant work’ may make the process more restrictive and more onerous. The Committee remains unconvinced, where there is a late application, of the need to impose a requirement on communities to show either good reason or demonstrate relevant work and recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments at stage 2 to remove this requirement.

164. If the Scottish Government decides not to amend the Bill to remove the requirement on communities to demonstrate relevant work/steps, the Committee urges the Scottish Government to de-couple the requirement for the work and application to be made by the same community body.

The existing provisions of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 provide that for a late application a community body is required to show there were good reasons why the community body did not secure the receipt of an application before the land went on the market. This means that it is the community body which must have tried to secure receipt of an application. The Bill amends this so that if such relevant work or steps as Ministers consider reasonable was carried out by a person, and such work or steps were taken sufficiently in advance of the land being put on the market, and the work or steps related to the same purpose as is proposed in the application, and that it was carried out by the community body, or by another person with a view to an application being made by the community body, then Ministers may approve a late application.

This means that first of all, there does not need to have been an attempt to secure receipt of an application, only that relevant work or steps have been taken and are considered reasonable. As noted in the responses to earlier recommendations, this could be things such as identifying a need within the community, or undertaking work to identify suitable land for a specific purpose.

Secondly, it allows for this work to have been done by a person other than the community body, as long as it was with a view to an application being made by a community body. This means that the work could have been undertaken prior to the community body being formed, which removes another obstacle in relation to late applications.

169. The Committee heard a range of views on the appropriate timescale for the re-registration of an interest in land. The Committee considers the most significant requirement is the need to simplify the registration process to one of a presumption in favour of re-registration unless there has been a material change of circumstance. The Committee believes that this should substantially reduce the burden on community bodies, particularly if those community bodies have multiple registrations. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments to that effect at stage 2.

Ministers already have the power to prescribe a separate form to be used for re-registration that could be simpler than the original registration form. The Scottish Government’s intention, through introducing a simpler re-registration form, would be to reduce the burden on community bodies when submitting their re-registration application. The main criteria that would be likely to be shown is that there is continued community support, the business plans have not changed, and that the land identified has not changed.

This would not, however, create a presumption in favour of re-registration as it is considered important for Ministers to ensure continued public support for the continued registration. It is intended to use current Ministerial regulation making powers to prescribe a simpler form for the purposes of re-registration and therefore ease the burden on community bodies.

171. The Committee raised the issue of the inability of applications to be amended once submitted with the Cabinet Secretary and recommends that amendments be brought forward by the Scottish Government at stage 2 to enable applications to be amended once submitted.
The Scottish Government does not intend to bring forward amendments at Stage 2 to allow applications to be amended following receipt by Ministers due to the overall effect this would have on the time of the application process.

If a process was introduced to allow the amending of applications an additional time period would need to be introduced allowing for the other parties to reconsider the amended application and make any representations on that amended application. It would also open up the potential for applications to be appealed if they have been changed to any large extent.

As part of the current process, the existing right to buy team provide advice and guidance to communities to ensure that there are no technical errors in their applications, to allow the application to be judged solely on its merits.

175. The Committee questions the rationale for the requirement for an owner to inform Ministers of an exempt transfer being made and considers that it should be sufficient to include a declaration in the disposition. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government reflect on this and consider whether amendment to this provision is required at stage 2.

It is the Scottish Government’s view that it is important that a land owner notifies Ministers of an exempt transfer being made, in order for the register of interest to remain accurate and up to date, and that the community body’s application names the correct owner of the land in question.

This will also ensure that, by being notified of a change of ownership, it will save time and effort should the land come on the market at a later date, and will ensure that the community body and Ministers contact the new owner of the land.

180. The Committee would be concerned if landowners were found to be seeking to thwart legitimate applications from communities. The Committee considers that the existence of an option to purchase should not automatically exclude a community application and recommends that the Scottish Government consider this provision and bring forward amendments at stage 2 to ensure that land and buildings under option are not excluded from eligible land for registration or purchase.

It is the Scottish Government’s view that a valid option agreement should be allowed to stand. A valid option agreement is the equivalent of missives being concluded in a transaction, therefore Ministers must decline the application.

182. The Committee welcomes the provisions within section 36 which provide greater flexibility by removing the requirement that half the members of the community must vote on an application. The Committee asks the Scottish Government to clarify what considerations and criteria will be taken into account in assessing whether a sufficient proportion of the community has voted. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government issue guidance on this matter.
Current guidance already asks that communities should provide good reasons why community support is less than 50%, why it is in the public interest to allow an application to proceed in these circumstances (which should be exceptional) and why this is considered to be sufficient support for the purchase to proceed. These are considered on a case by case basis.

To attempt to identify particular criteria would make this less flexible, however the Scottish Government will ensure that the guidance is strengthened in this regard.

186. The Committee questions whether there is any practical merit in the Minister and the community body providing background information to the ballotter, given that the ballotter’s role is solely to undertake the ballot. The Committee asks the Scottish Government to re-consider the necessity of this provision with a view to bringing forward amendments at stage 2 to delete that requirement.

It is the Scottish Government’s view that, in order for the ballotter to undertake the ballot, they have to ensure that it is proceeding in a fair and equitable manner, that the ballot question is appropriate in the circumstances and fully covers the issues. It is therefore important for the ballotter to have background information in order to meet these criteria. Of course, much of that information is already contained in the community body’s application and can simply be referred to rather than having to repeat it.

188. The Committee also questions the requirement of the provision in section 37(4)(b) on fixing notices to the land in relation to right-to-buy applications for separate tenements and asks the Scottish Government to consider whether that requirement could be relaxed for those cases, and, if necessary, bring forward amendments at stage 2.

The Scottish Government will bring forward an amendment at Stage 2 which will require community bodies, who wish to acquire separate tenements where the land owner is not known, to give notice of the acquisition by advertisement in such manner as prescribed in regulations.

191. The Committee considers that, given the significance of the policy objectives of land reform and the Part 4 provisions of this Bill, and the very real difficulties many communities face in building capacity and in securing resources, should Ministers consider the application meets the public interest and sustainable development tests, then it is appropriate that the cost of the ballot be met from the public purse.

Section 51(A), inserted into Part 2 of the 2003 Act by section 37 of the Bill, requires Ministers to meet the cost of the ballot. The application, by this stage in the process, is considered to have already passed the public interest and sustainable development tests, and the community’s support for the application has already been indicated in the application.
For both Parts 3 and 3A, the ballot is the first indication of community support, and takes place prior to the receipt of the application by the Scottish Government, and it is felt appropriate that the Scottish Government should not offer to pay ballot costs in all cases, but the intention is that it could reimburse the cost of the ballot in certain circumstances, for example, where a ballot indicated community support.

The Scottish Government intends to introduce amendments at Stage 2, applicable to Part 3 and Part 3A, to include powers for the Minister to make regulations setting out the circumstances in which a crofting/Part 3A community body will be able to apply to the Ministers to have the cost of the ballot reimbursed.

198. While the Committee is concerned to ensure that landowners do not thwart the legitimate proposals of communities, the Committee recognises that there will be cases where landowners, for legitimate reasons (e.g. where family or financial circumstances change) decide to withdraw land from sale after a right-to-buy has been activated. The Committee is of the view that there should be Ministerial discretion on this matter. The Committee considers that further clarification, by way of regulation, will be required to set out the criteria which would form the basis of the Ministerial decision.

The Bill as introduced amends Part 2 by inserting section 60A which provides that Ministers may require the owner of the land to pay any expenses incurred by the valuation process. The Scottish Government will ensure that the criteria which Ministers will consider when making a decision as to whether valuation costs should be recovered are set out clearly in guidance. The guidance will take account of legitimate reasons a land owner may have for withdrawing the lands from sale.

202. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government give further consideration to the requirement for consistency in the 2003 Act on the treatment of public and local holidays and bring forward amendments at stage 2 to ensure this.

The Scottish Government’s view is that it would not be appropriate to take account of public or local holidays as they may differ from area to area, thereby potentially introducing uncertainty and a margin for error to the process. Including public and local holidays will provide absolute certainty in key areas such as timescales for payments dates, valuation dates and appeal dates, whilst allowing community’s some flexibility in others.

Community right to buy abandoned and neglected land (section 48)

216. The Committee agrees with stakeholders that the power to extend the community right-to-buy where there is no willing seller should be a power of last resort, to be exercised only when other methods and negotiations had failed. However, the Committee has concerns that this new right, as the provisions are currently drafted, may be almost impossible to exercise, with too many obstacles and opportunities for avoidance on the part of landowners. Notwithstanding this, the Committee believes that the existence of this power is likely to play an important role in incentivising negotiation.
217. The Committee questions the need to restrict the definition of eligible land to that which is considered to be wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected. The Committee is concerned that these provisions, as drafted, may fail to further sustainable development.

218. The Committee also questions why the Scottish Government considers that a definition is needed at all, as the parallel tests for crofting land purchases do not require this.

Comparisons to Crofting Right to Buy

Paragraph 211 of the Committee’s report highlighted the comments of Community Land Scotland - it did not believe that there was a clear and fundamental difference between the sustainable development of crofting land (as required by the crofting community right-to-buy in the 2003 Act) and the sustainable development of other land which necessitates the additional requirements of abandonment or neglect in order for it to be eligible for the potential exercise of the new powers under Part 3A.

The Scottish Government’s position is that the crofting community right to buy was developed on the basis of the specific issues relating to crofting areas, unlike the proposals for the right to buy abandoned or neglected land which relates only to areas of land that are a barrier to sustainable development because they are abandoned or neglected. The policy aim of the crofting community right to buy was to remove barriers to sustainable rural development by empowering crofting communities. Paragraphs 24, 25 and 26 of the Policy Memorandum to the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 are particularly useful in considering the policy aim of the crofting community right to buy. These paragraphs stated as follows:

“24. The proposals for a crofting community right to buy build upon existing right to buy arrangements for individual crofters and create rights for other crofting communities similar to those enjoyed by crofting communities whose landlord was the Secretary of State (now the Scottish Ministers). It might therefore be argued that new legislation is unnecessary. But, although it is theoretically possible for a crofting community to use the existing right to buy provisions for individual crofters in existing legislation as a means of achieving community control of croft land, this would be cumbersome, risky and costly, with no certainty of success. There is a great likelihood that such an approach would lead to an unsatisfactory solution suit neither the community nor the landowner. Hence the need for modern arrangements to enable crofting communities to buy their croft land in concert.

25. The crofting community right to buy is of course an unlimited right to buy. It can be exercised at any time, not just when the land comes up for sale. As indicated above, this means that the property market could be affected, and that suitable compensation arrangements are necessary in order to avoid significant ECHR difficulties. The effect on the property market, and the compensation costs, while potentially substantial, are both inherently constrained by the extent of crofting land, and the generally low value per hectare of that land. These two factors mean that the potential disruption and compensation costs of a crofting community right to buy are much less than the potential compensation costs of a general community right to buy. The Executive believes that giving crofting communities but not other communities an unlimited right to buy is justified by the greater need to support such crofting communities, which are located in the most fragile areas where the potential for a bad landlord to do real harm to the community is greatest.

26. It is not envisaged that the crofting community right to buy will be frequently exercised. It is very apparent that where crofting communities have a good relationship with their landlord there is little inclination on the part of the communities to take on the not inconsiderable burdens of ownership. The crofting community right to buy requires serious commitment from the crofting community to the ownership and management of land as a community asset and is likely to prove to be a costly and complex process. Without needing to be exercised it is expected that its very existence will achieve two important objectives. First, it is likely to create a climate in which landowners will willingly sell land to crofting communities by agreement. Secondly, it will encourage landowners who have monopoly ownership of land in crofting areas to work with and maintain good relations with that community.”

The following statements are particularly relevant:

“The Executive believes that giving crofting communities but not other communities an unlimited right to buy is justified by the greater need to support such crofting communities, which are located in the most fragile areas where the potential for a bad landlord to do real harm to the community is greatest.”

“Without needing to be exercised it is expected that its very existence will achieve two important objectives. First, it is likely to create a climate in which landowners will willingly sell land to crofting communities by agreement. Secondly, it will encourage landowners who have monopoly ownership of land in crofting areas to work with and maintain good relations with that community.”

It is clear from these paragraphs that the policy aims for the crofting community right to buy were different from the policy aims of the new Part 3A. The policy aim of Part 3A is usefully summarised at paragraph 65 of the Policy Memorandum to the Bill which states:

“Land that is neglected or abandoned can be a barrier to the sustainable development of land. In some cases it may prevent the community from developing or improving facilities. There are also cases where derelict or neglected sites become a blight on the surrounding area, and the community could bring the land back into productive use. The Scottish Government considers that, in such circumstances where all other options fail to achieve improvement, communities should be able to acquire the land without having to wait for it to be put on the market.”

This policy aim is different from the aims of the crofting community right to buy, which were the creation of a climate in which landowners willingly sell land to crofting communities by agreement and the encouragement of landowners who have monopoly ownership of land in crofting areas to work with and maintain good relations with that community, in the context of crofting communities having a greater need for support, being located in the most fragile areas where the potential for a landowner to do harm is greatest. The difference between the aims of both rights to buy is the reason why the tests for each right to buy are different – the tests have been developed in order to meet different policy objectives.

219. The Committee considers that there are convincing arguments that the tests of ‘furthering sustainable development’ and of being ‘in the public interest’ are capable of testing all requirements. On that basis, the Committee recommends that the Scottish Government reconsider the requirement that eligible land be restricted to land which is wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected and recommends that the Scottish Government consider a definition that relates to the wider circumstances which can be a barrier to sustainable development, such as the lack of achievement of the use and/or development of land that could deliver greater public benefit.

Definition of “abandoned” and “neglected”

There is no definition on the face of the Bill of the terms “abandoned” and “neglected” because it is intended that these terms are given their ordinary meaning. It is intended to use the words “abandoned” and “neglected” as descriptions of land that may be eligible land for the purposes of the exercise of the new compulsory right to buy as the words are capable of a broad meaning. This is because it is expected that the broad expressions may apply to a multiplicity of circumstances and should be understood generally.

By using broad expressions, Parliament would therefore be able to confer on Ministers a wide discretion, exercisable in many of circumstances, to consider whether particular land described in an application is eligible for the purposes of Part 3A. Although the exercise of that discretion is subject to judicial oversight, it would not be expected that the Court could read down “abandoned” or “neglected” in a narrow way.

Any attempt to define the expressions further is more likely than not to result in a situation where the words are given a narrower meaning than the broad meaning that would otherwise apply if they are not technically defined.

It is important that any proposal that is included in legislation has been fully considered by both the Scottish Government and stakeholders.

The consultation on the Community Empowerment Bill focussed on the specific issue of abandoned and neglected land, and not on the extent to which land should be used to meet the needs of the community. The former is seeking to provide a means of resolving the problems that can arise as a result of land being neglected and abandoned and it was this policy that was consulted on whereas the latter is a very different issue.

In addition, to ensuring that there is full consultation on proposals, the Scottish Government also has to ensure that legislation is robust, fit for purpose and within legislative competence.
The recent consultation on proposals for a Land Reform Bill explores the potential for powers for Ministers to intervene, where necessary, to overcome barriers to sustainable development. We are currently considering the responses to the land reform consultation and, in doing this, we will also take into account the views expressed during the Community Empowerment Bill.

Draft Regulations

The approach which Ministers would adopt in applying the test of whether the land in a particular application is neglected or abandoned would be determined having regard to guidance and to a multiplicity of different matters. Some of these matters would be mandatory for Ministers to have regard to and for that reason it is intended that the minimum categories of such matters should be prescribed in subordinate legislation. There is power to do so in section 97C(2) and the RACCE Committee have been provided with a draft of Regulations under that power which indicates the sorts of matters that we would suggest that Ministers must have regard to as a minimum.

The matters to which Ministers must have regard when deciding whether land is eligible land are set out in the draft Regulations and fall into three broad categories:

- the physical condition and its effect on the surrounding area, public safety and the environment;
- the use of the land, or lack of use as the case may be, including whether the land is a nature reserve, held for conservation purposes or used for public recreation;
- any designation or classification of the land, such as land which has been classed as contaminated land, or buildings which are listed buildings or scheduled monuments.

The specific matters as set out in the draft Regulations are as follows:

Condition of the land

1. Physical condition
   Regulation 2(2)(a) obliges Ministers to have regard to the physical condition of the land or any building or other structure on the land, and the length of time for which it has been in such a condition. This means that Ministers must take account of any physical signs of neglect or abandonment, such as the derelict nature of a building or overgrown weeds. This will be considered in the context of other matters as set out below, such as whether the building is derelict because it is a listed building, or whether a piece of land is overgrown with weeds because it is a nature reserve.

2. Amenity of adjacent land
   Regulation 2(2)(b) obliges Ministers to consider whether, and to what extent, the physical condition of the land or any building or other structure on it is detrimental to the amenity of the land which is adjacent to it. It is intended that “amenity” is given its ordinary meaning, being a desirable or useful feature or facility of a building or place. This might cover, for example, the situation where an a piece of land that appears to be abandoned by its owner is being used for criminal activity, thus discouraging the use of a neighbouring play park by children.

3. Public safety
   Regulation 2(2)(c) obliges Ministers to consider whether, and to what extent, the physical condition of the land is a risk to public safety. This could cover situations where derelict buildings are at risk of collapse, or where there are uncovered manholes or electricity wires.

4. Environmental harm
   Regulation 2(2)(d) obliges Ministers to consider whether the physical condition of the land or any building or other structure on the land is causing or is likely to cause environmental harm. “Environmental harm” is given the meaning that it has in section 17(2) of the Regulatory Reform (Scotland) Act 2014, which is:

   (a) harm to the health of human being or other living organism;
   (b) harm to the quality of the environment, including
       (i) harm to the quality of the environment as a whole,
       (ii) harm to the quality of air, water or land, and
       (iii) other impairment of, or interference with, ecosystems;
   (c) offence to the senses of human beings;
   (d) damage to property; or
   (e) impairment of, or interference with, amenities or other legitimate uses of the environment.

   This means that Ministers cannot simply look at the nature of the land in isolation – they must look at its impact on surrounding land and the health and senses of people in the community in which it is situated.

5. Agricultural land
   Regulation 2(2)(e) obliges Ministers to consider whether the physical condition of the land complies with the standards for good agricultural and environmental condition. The provisions of regulation 2(1) make clear that Ministers must only consider matters so far as applicable, so an urban landowner would not be at risk of a successful Part 3A application simply because they did not take into account of agricultural standards.

Use of the land

6. Use for particular purpose
   Regulation 2(3)(a) obliges Ministers to have regard to the purpose for which the land or any building or other structure is being used or has been used, and the length of time for which it has been so used. This may cover a wide range of scenarios, but would make clear, for example, that if a landowner had put the land to a specific purpose, and the land appeared to be either abandoned or neglected as a result of that purpose, Ministers must take this into account. An example of this may be where land is kept in its natural state deliberately, but is not necessarily classed as a nature reserve under section 15(1) of the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act 1949 (referred to in more detail below).

7. Lack of use
   Regulation 2(3)(b) obliges Ministers to have regard to the length of time for which land has not been used, if it appears to them that the land or any building or other structure on the land is not being used for any particular purpose. This may be relevant, for example, if the land has not been used since it was purchased because the owner is waiting for planning permission.

8. Public recreation
   Regulation 2(3)(c) obliges Ministers to consider whether, and to what extent, the land or any building or other structure on the land is being used for public recreation. This may be relevant, for example, where a piece of land has not been built upon or cultivated, but is regularly used by children to play football. It may be that the owner has deliberately not cultivated or built upon that land because he is aware of its use by children and is therefore confident that his land is not a blight to the environment.

9. National or historic interest
   Regulations 2(3)(d) and (e) oblige Ministers to consider whether, and to what extent, the land is being held for the purposes of permanent preservation for the benefit of historic or national interest and (i) for the preservation of its natural aspect and features and animal and plant life or (ii) for the preservation of its architectural or historical features so far as of national or historic interest. This may be relevant where buildings or land are not officially classed as “listed buildings”, “nature reserves” or “conservation areas”, but are nonetheless in a certain condition for the purposes of preserving certain aspects of the land for the preservation of national or historic interests.

Designations/classifications

10. Nature and conservation
   Regulation 2(4)(a) obliges Ministers to consider whether the land, or any part of the land, is or forms part of a nature reserve or conservation area. “Conservation area” means a conservation area for the purposes of section 61 of the Planning (Listed Buildings and Conservation Areas)(Scotland) Act 1997 and “nature reserve” means a nature reserve for the purposes of section 15(1) of the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act 1949. The rationale for inclusion of this matter as one to which Ministers must have regard is that it may not be consistent with furthering the achievement of sustainable development to allow for the compulsory purchase of land which is in a certain physical condition for conservation or natural purposes.

11. Contaminated land
   Regulation 2(4)(b) obliges Ministers to consider whether the land, or any part of the land, is designated a special site because it is contaminated land. “Special site” means a special site for the purposes of section 78C(1) of the Environmental Protection Act 1990. The rationale for inclusion of this matter is that contaminated land is already subject to a regulatory regime under the Environmental Protection Act 1990, and therefore any particular requirements on the landowner as a result of the designation of his land as a special site should be taken into account when deciding whether he has abandoned or neglected his land.

12. Listed buildings/scheduled monuments
   Regulations 2(4)(c) and (d) oblige Ministers to consider whether any building or structure on the land is a listed building or scheduled monument. “Listed building” means a listed building for the purposes of section 1 of the Planning (Listed Buildings and Conservation Areas)(Scotland) Act 1997. Scheduled monument” means a scheduled monument for the purposes of section 1 of the Ancient Monuments and Archaeological Areas Act 1979. These matters in case a building appears to be derelict but is actually in that condition because it is of historical or cultural interest.

Ministers may consider other matters not set out in the draft Regulations where these are relevant. The draft Regulations are a list of the matters to which Ministers must have regard as a minimum – in some cases Ministers may have to consider other matters which they deem relevant in order to have satisfied themselves that to approve an application is in the public interest and compatible with furthering the achievement of sustainable development.

220. In the absence of an unambiguous and acceptable definition of abandoned or neglected land produced by the Scottish Government which both removes the barrier that the present proposal is likely to erect, and which avoids the problems of interpretation giving the existing legal concept of abandoned land, then the Committee is likely to ask the Scottish Government to remove the term ‘abandoned or neglected land’ and bring forward a proposal which will allow the widest possible opportunity for community purchase. The Committee reserves the right to take evidence on this issue at stage 2.

It is the Scottish Government’s view that, through a combination of the broad dictionary definition of ‘abandoned’ and ‘neglected’, together with the requirement for Ministers to have regard to the matters set out in regulations made under section 97C(3) of the new Part 3A, the correct balance is struck between the need to provide communities with considerable scope to acquire land which is a barrier to sustainable development, whilst respecting the rights of land owners, giving them certainty as to whether their land is likely to be regarded as “eligible land” for the purposes of Part 3A.

We understand the Committee’s concerns and will actively consider whether we can extend the descriptions of land that the right to buy applies to, beyond neglected and abandoned land, to other land that is causing problems.
234. Notwithstanding the Committee’s recommendation in paragraph 220, with respect to the terms wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected land, which takes precedence, should the Scottish Government wish to retain this provision, the Committee recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments at stage 2 to the following effect—

- the term “abandoned” is sub-optimal and should be removed entirely, leaving the legislation to relate to “wholly or mainly neglected land;”

Paragraphs 227 and 228 of the Committee’s report highlight concerns from Malcolm Combe and the Historic Houses Association for Scotland about the use of the term “abandoned”. The meaning of abandoned in the context of Part 3A would be its ordinary meaning – not its meaning in Scots property law. The Scottish Government is concerned that to remove the term “abandoned” from the definition of eligible land may be restrictive, as it would exclude land which is a barrier to sustainable development that may not be in a poor physical condition, but may be unused for any purpose whatsoever (see regulation 2(2)(b) of the draft Regulations which obliges Ministers to have regard, if it appears to the Ministers that the land is not being used for any particular purpose, to the length of time for which it has not been so used). The Scottish Government’s intention is to refrain from any potential restriction to the application of the concept of “eligible land”, and therefore it is proposed to retain the reference to “abandoned” land in section 97C(1).

- the definition of neglected should relate to the sustainable development of the land and not solely to a description of its physical condition and there should be a clear justification for the inclusion of the term;

The draft Regulations set out a number of matters to which Ministers must have regard that, if agreed, will oblige Ministers to take account of the effect of the physical condition of the land, in addition to having regard to what that physical condition is. In particular, Ministers would have to consider whether, and to what extent, the physical condition of the land or any building or other structure on it is (1) detrimental to the amenity of land which is adjacent to it, (2) a risk to public safety and (3) causing or likely to cause environmental harm. The meaning of environmental harm for the purpose of the draft Regulations will be the meaning given to it in section 17(2) of the Regulatory Reform (Scotland) Act 2014, which is:

- harm to the health of human being or other living organism;
- harm to the quality of the environment, including
  (i) harm to the quality of the environment as a whole,
  (ii) harm to the quality of air, water or land, and
  (iii) other impairment of, or interference with, ecosystems;
- offence to the senses of human beings;
- damage to property; or
- impairment of, or interference with, amenities or other legitimate uses of the environment.
Therefore the draft Regulations will oblige Ministers to take account of matters that go beyond a simple assessment of the physical condition of the land.

- if prescribed matters in relation to eligible land are to be set out in regulation these regulations should be laid under the affirmative procedure;

It is intended that the draft Regulations will be laid under the affirmative procedure.

- owners and communities are entitled to know, prior to the Bill becoming law, what is meant by the separate terms. The Committee considers it is not appropriate to deal with the transfer of fundamental property rights through secondary legislation. The Committee recommends that any definition of terms be set out on the face of the Bill.

The terms “abandoned” and “neglected” have their ordinary meanings, and therefore the meaning of the terms are not being dealt with in secondary legislation. The draft Regulations set out the matters to which Ministers must have regard when applying those ordinary meanings to specific applications. The draft Regulations have already been made publically available, via the RACCE Committee website, and the Scottish Government is continuing to engage with key stakeholders throughout the process. As mentioned above, the draft Regulations will be laid under the affirmative procedure in order to allow for appropriate scrutiny of the matters to which Ministers must have regard when deciding whether land is eligible.

A benefit to setting out the matters to which Ministers must have regard in secondary legislation is that the Scottish Government will have more flexibility to add to the list of matters in the Regulations as policy in this area evolves, case history accrues and as Ministers analyse the evidence gathered as a result of any use of the Part 3A right to buy.

237. The Committee considers that, whilst there may be a differentiation in urban and rural circumstances and there could be challenges in measuring neglect and abandonment in rural areas, should this provision remain, the Committee is of the view that it should apply uniformly outwith crofting land. However, further consideration to the criteria for determining neglect and abandonment is necessary and should be set out on the face of the Bill.

It is our intention that the provisions will apply uniformly outwith crofting areas, across both urban and rural areas. As previously mentioned, it is expected that the draft Regulations, which outline the prescribed matters which Ministers must take into account when deciding if land is considered to be eligible land, provide enough of a range of factors to ensure that it can be equally applicable in both rural and urban situations. The Scottish Government would welcome any suggestions as to other matters which would be relevant to a decision as to whether both rural and urban land is abandoned or neglected.

239. The Committee shares the concerns of the National Farmers Union of Scotland (NFUS) in relation to the possible impact of the provisions on agricultural land that may be out of regular use for periods of time. The Committee considers that land which is classified as agricultural land should be exempt from this provision unless it is determined that it fails to meet “good agricultural and environmental condition”. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments to that effect at stage 2.

It is recognised that effective management of agricultural land may require it to be set aside and out of use for periods of time. Ministers will be obliged by virtue of section 97C(3) and regulation 2(2)(e) of the draft Regulations to consider whether land, where applicable, meets good agricultural and environmental condition before deciding whether the land is abandoned or neglected.

241. The Committee recommends that, should the provision relating to abandoned or neglected remain, the Scottish Government give consideration to the issue of appropriate timescales in which land could be determined to be abandoned and neglected and bring forward amendments to identify timescales in relation to this provision at stage 2.

Each instance of land considered to be abandoned or neglected, whether urban or rural land, must be taken on its merits. The Scottish Government would not wish to be prescriptive and place an arbitrary timescale on this, as the time land has been viewed as being abandoned or neglected will vary, and any timescale must be relevant to the particular land under consideration. The time for which land has been in a particular physical condition, for which it has been used for a particular purpose and for which it has remained unused are matters that are set out in the draft Regulations because it is intended that Ministers must have regard to these timescales when deciding on an application.

244. The Committee considers that the information to be provided as part of the application process should enable Ministers to consider the potential impacts of an application. The Committee is aware of the concerns raised in relation to land owned by an entity in administration or insolvency process and recommends that the Scottish Government reflect on that and consider the need for further regulation or relevant guidance, and if necessary bring forward amendments at stage 2.

Whilst there is nothing on the face of the Bill which explicitly addresses insolvency, the decision as to whether land is wholly or mainly neglected or abandoned under section 97C is one for Ministers, who have discretion to take in relevant factors, and indeed must take certain matters into regard as are set out in the draft Regulations made under section 97C(3). Therefore, it is open to Ministers to take into consideration the fact that the owner is going through an insolvency process when deciding whether the land is abandoned or neglected. Of particular relevance will be regulations (2)(2)(a), (3)(a) and (3)(b) which set out that the length of time that land has been in a certain condition, used for a particular purpose or has remained unused are matters to which the Ministers must have regard. If the time for which land has been in a certain condition, or has remained unused, relates to the existence of an insolvency procedure then it is expected that Ministers would take this into account.

In addition, section 97H sets out a list of things of which Ministers must be satisfied before they can approve an application. The following criteria are particularly relevant in the case of insolvency:

- s. 97H(b)(i) – public interest – the fact that an owner is going through an insolvency process will be something that should be taken into consideration by Ministers when deciding whether consent to the Part 3A application is in the public interest.

- s. 97H(c) – if the owner of the land were to remain as its owner, that ownership would be inconsistent with furthering the achievement of sustainable development in relation to land – if the owner is going through an insolvency process then this is relevant to the consistency of the current ownership with furthering the achievement of sustainable development of land. The continued ownership might be quite likely to be inconsistent given that it is highly likely that the land will be sold, for example if a liquidator has been appointed he will be attempting to sell the owner's assets in order to maximise returns for creditors. Without knowing to whom the land would be sold, it would be difficult for the Ministers to be satisfied that such a sale would be inconsistent with furthering the achievement of sustainable development.

- s. 97H(f) – owner is not prevented from selling the land or subject to any enforceable personal obligation to sell the land otherwise than to the Part 3A community body. The existence of an insolvency process is very likely to create enforceable personal obligations, or prevent the owner from selling the land. For example, if a receiver has been appointed, and a floating charge has attached to the land, this has the effect of prohibiting the owner from selling the land.

Section 97N gives Ministers a power to make regulations to either prohibit certain transfers of land taking place or suspend rights, and therefore the content of the Regulations under section 97N are likely to affect how the Part 3A process is to interact with insolvency procedures.

246. The Committee recommends that should the provision relating to abandoned or neglected remain, the Scottish Government provide clarification as to whether the provisions in relation to abandoned or neglected land would apply only to those parts of a land holding that were considered to be wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected or would apply to the whole land holding. The Committee asks that the Scottish Government reflect on this and consider the need for further regulation or guidance to provide clarity on this matter.

The provision relates only to those parts of the land holding that are part of the community body’s application. It is the land that is the subject of the application that must be wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected – not a larger holding of land of which the land in the application forms part.
249. The Committee recognises that, in some cases, control over the management of land will lie primarily with the tenant rather than with the landowner. The Committee considers that the Bill as currently drafted does not appear to provide for situations where the owner is not responsible for the absence of activity or for poor management. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government reflect on this and consider whether relevant amendments are required to clarify this at stage 2.

There are other means by which the owner is able to address issues with their tenant’s conduct. It is not the intention that this Bill is used as a vehicle to address tenant/landlord issues.

255. The Committee was concerned about the possibility that land that is under a low intensity/zero management regime for a valid reason (e.g. natural regeneration for biodiversity or natural flood protection) could be considered “wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected” and recognises that in practice there appears to have been a presumption in favour of development rather than public amenity and nature conservation (e.g. at Holmehill).

256. The Committee recommends that, should the definition of abandoned and neglected land remain in the Bill, land which is intended for recognised conservation or environmental purposes be specifically excluded from that definition. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments to that effect at stage 2.

Regulation (2)(4)(a) of the draft Regulations sets out that the Minister will be obliged to have regard to whether the land, or any part of the land, is or forms part of a nature reserve or conservation area.

257. The Committee is aware that vacant or derelict land may be contaminated. The Committee believes that it is unlikely that communities will have the skills or resources to deal with such situations and agrees with the Scottish Environment Protection Agency that there is a need for appropriate mechanisms to ensure that communities have access to expert advice and support. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government addresses these concerns and ensures that appropriate guidance, advice and support is provided to communities.

The Scottish Government already provides help to communities throughout the community right to buy process and officials will ensure that this is continued.

262. The Committee shares the concerns of the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee in relation to the new section 97C(3)(a) on eligible abandoned or neglected land, which states “Eligible land does not include land on which there is a building or other structure which is an individual’s home unless the building or structure falls within such classes as may be prescribed”. The Committee is also concerned that the thinking behind this significant power is in the early stages of development. Given the lack of detail provided in response to its questions on the thinking behind the power the Committee remains unconvinced of the case for its necessity. The Committee urges the Scottish Government to reconsider the provision that grants Ministers the power to include an individual’s home in the definition of eligible land for the purpose of section 97C(3)(a) and recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments at stage 2 to remove this power of prescription.

Ministers intend to bring forward a stage 2 amendment to remove the power for Ministers to make regulations including certain types of home within the definition of eligible land.

265. The Committee asks the Scottish Government to provide further information on the decision to exclude bona vacantia and Crown land from the definition of eligible land. The Committee further recommends that the Scottish Government reflect on this and the potential for amendment at stage 2 to include such land as eligible.

267. The Committee would be interested to know why it is proposed that land which is under the Queen’s and Lord Treasurers Remembrancer power of disposal should be treated differently from any other land and asks the Scottish Government to provide further information on the decision to treat land which is under the power of the Queen’s and Lord Treasurers Remembrancer differently. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government reflect on this and, if appropriate, bring forward amendments at stage 2 to remove this power of exception.

The policy behind the new Part 3A being inserted into the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 (by section 48 of the Bill) is to provide a last resort mechanism where an owner of the land is unwilling to sell. The purpose of the QLTR however is to seek to realise, for its value, any land falling to the Crown as bona vacantia or ultimus haeres. Unlike other owners therefore, the QLTR does not to seek to retain land - indeed it is not in the QLTR’s interest to do so as no disposal income would be generated and they are not resourced to manage such land on an ongoing or long-term basis. The QLTR also seeks to avoid retaining land because of the risks of liabilities arising in relation to it - and it follows from the sources of land falling to the Crown as bona vacantia that it can often be in a poor condition bringing with it the risk of future problems if the Crown interest in it is not resolved.

The QLTR accordingly seeks to resolve the Crown interest in such land by either a disposal, where there is interest in the land, or by a notice of disclaimer (for example where there is no reasonable prospect of a disposal proceeding).

Where the QLTR achieves a disposal, this serves the public interest in the following ways:

- the net surplus generated by the QLTR from dealing with property falling to the Crown as bona vacantia or as ultimus haeres is paid into the Scottish Consolidated Fund, and
• the effect of the disposal should enable land, which may otherwise have been sitting in a derelict condition, to be brought back into beneficial use.

It follows from the QLTR's functions that they are already directed at the mischief being addressed by the Bill, namely seeking to address derelict land which might be a barrier to sustainable development.

The Scottish Ministers already have power to direct the QLTR regarding the exercise and performance of her functions should Ministers consider that to be appropriate – section 2 of the Public Revenue (Scotland) Act 1833 as amended by the Scotland Act 1998 (Schedule 8, paragraph 1).

The QLTR has to operate within the legal framework applying in relation to bona vacantia. In particular, the property of a dissolved company vesting in the Crown as bona vacantia is subject to provisions in the companies legislation which impose time limits within which the QLTR can disclaim property. Consequently, whilst the QLTR will seek a disposal of such land, they have to be able to protect their own (and the Crown’s) positions, if appropriate, by resolving the Crown interest within those time limits. The discretion to disclaim ownerless property can potentially be lost after only 12 months (section 1013(4) of the Companies Act 2006). The QLTR's experience is that discussions even for a voluntary disposal can be protracted against that period. There would be obvious timing implications were the last resort mechanism to be applied to bona vacantia.

It is in the nature of this Crown land that the QLTR usually has no prior knowledge of it in advance of an approach to them. Once this land has been raised with the QLTR, the QLTR's experience is that if there is a delay or failure for a disposal to proceed in respect of land it is usually due to the absence of an interested purchaser, inadequate investigation to establish who is the owner of the land, competing interest in the land with potential local sensitivities, the character of the land being such that it should go to some form of community body (such as amenity land) but the only interest is from a private individual rather than a suitable community body, or an unwillingness to pay the professionally assessed value of the land (the QLTR uses the District Valuer). All of those reasons would also potentially arise pursuant to the last resort mechanism in the Bill even if it were to apply to such Crown land.

For the Committees information, if the QLTR were to disclaim property, anyone seeking thereafter to acquire the land might consider the prescriptive claimant provisions in sections 43-5 of the Land Registration etc (Scotland) Act 2012, or where the QLTR has disclaimed under the companies legislation, whether they might seek a vesting order under section 1021 of the 2006 Act.

274. The Committee considers that there should be consistency in the Bill and in subsequent regulation with respect to the definition of an eligible community body for the purposes of all community right-to-buy provisions. The Committee therefore recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments at stage 2 to address the current inconsistency.
Ministers will bring forward amendments at stage 2 to introduce Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisations (SCIO) and Community Benefit Companies (BenComs) as eligible forms of community body. Ministers also have powers to prescribe via regulations other legal entities which are considered eligible bodies, should that be required at a later date.

276. The Committee notes this apparent omission and recommends that the Scottish Government brings forward amendments at stage 2 to this provision to refer to constitutions as well as to memoranda and articles.

Stage 2 amendments will be brought forward to include constitutions.

279. The Committee questions the necessity for, and the benefit of, the creation of a register of community interests in abandoned or neglected land and recommends that the Scottish Government re-consider the value of this provision and consider the requirement for amendment at stage 2.

Whilst the Scottish Government is creating a new register of community interests, in practical terms, this will utilise the existing register to ensure that it is familiar to users. It is required to store documentation received in respect of applications, to ensure that they are available for public scrutiny, in the interest of transparency.

287. The Committee recognises that there can be very real practical difficulties in identifying land owners and anticipates that the Land Registration (Scotland) Act 2014 will, over time, have a positive effect on the availability and accessibility of information on ownership.

288. However, the Committee remains unconvinced that the provision requiring community bodies to identify ownership, rather than a requiring community bodies to demonstrate they have taken all reasonable steps to identify ownership, is appropriate. The Committee considers that there ought to be a mechanism in this Bill, similar to the existing provisions in the Land Reform (Scotland) 2003 Act, providing for communities to be able to register an interest in land without knowing who the owner is. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government reconsider its position on this and bring forward amendments to that effect at stage 2.

Land cannot be purchased compulsorily from unknown owners, regardless of how much effort had been undertaken by the Part 3A community body to establish who owned the land, because the mechanism for the transfer under Part 3A is that section 97Q(4)(b) obliges the owner to transfer the land to the Part 3A community body. If the owner refuses to transfer the land then by virtue of section 97Q(6) the Lands Tribunal may authorise its clerk to adjust, execute and deliver title deeds in order to effect the transfer as if it had been done by the owner. For this process to work, the owner has to have been identified.

This differs from Compulsory Purchase provisions where the land owner is unknown. In such situations, title is vested in the purchasing authority, generally the Local Authority, by way of a declaration which is registered in the Land Register, without the need for a transfer to be effected by the owner. If the land owner is identified at some future date within six years, compensation is payable to the land owner for the loss of their land at that point.

If no owner can be identified, the land in question can be referred to the QLTR, and a community body may be able to acquire the land from them as an alternative option.

291. The Committee considers that all parties should be treated fairly and in this regard recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward the necessary amendments at stage 2 to allow landowners sight of all views submitted and to ensure that the process allows the opportunity for Ministerial consideration of counter views.

It is the Scottish Government’s view that an additional counter-representation stage to seek the landowners’ views on the community body’s application should not be required as all parties to the application should make full representations at the appropriate opportunity in the knowledge that they have only one opportunity to make representations on the other party’s comments.

296. The Committee welcomes the clarification from the Cabinet Secretary that, as the Crichel Down Rules are not statutory, they do not preclude a community having the right-to-buy. The Committee understands that these rules apply only to land bought during the Second World War; however, the Committee would welcome further detail from the Scottish Government on the application of the rules in relation to the land that they do and do not apply to.

More detail about the rules is helpfully set out in “Planning Circular 5/2011: Disposal of Surplus Government Land - The Crichel Down Rules”. The Rules apply to all land acquired by any public authority, if it was acquired by or under threat of compulsion or to land acquired under the blight provisions: Part V of Town and Country Planning (Scotland) Act 1997.

Whether or not the land held by the public authority is offered back to the previous owner will depend on a number of factors, so it does not necessarily preclude a community having the right to buy.

297. The Committee also asks the Scottish Government to provide clarification on what it envisages in a situation where there is an approved application but the purpose for which the application was approved is not pursued. The Committee also asks the Scottish Government’s view of what would happen in a situation where the community body has bought the land but ceases to exist. If the Scottish Government considers that the previous owner should be offered first right of refusal to buy back the land then the Committee recommends that the Scottish Government reflects on the requirement for the introduction of relevant provisions within the Bill.

Scottish Government officials do not follow up on whether or not land is used for the purpose for which is was acquired. It is generally the funders who impose conditions on the provision of funding, therefore it would be the funders who may seek to recover monies where land was not used for the purpose for which it was acquired.
The disposal of assets when a community body ceases to exist is covered under the rules for whichever type of body it is. For example, a SCIO which is dissolved must confirm to OSCR that any surplus assets have been passed to the body (or bodies) named in the resolution of the SCIO’s members. The Scottish Government has no plans to introduce any further obligations.

301. The Committee agrees with those stakeholders who consider that the mapping requirements for community right-to-buy are excessive and strongly believes that there is a need to streamline the mapping process, simplify the information requirements and align the eligibility criteria with those for Parts 2 and 3A of the amended Act. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments to this effect at stage 2.

The Scottish Government agrees with the Committee that there is a need to streamline the mapping process, and therefore intends to bring forward amendments at Stage 2 to amend the mapping requirements.

307. Notwithstanding the points made by the Cabinet Secretary, the Committee is concerned that the Bill as currently drafted appears to suggest that the onus will be on the applicant, rather than on the owner, to show that the current ownership would be inconsistent with sustainable development.

308. The Committee considers that this additional provision is unnecessary because the community would have to demonstrate, in its application, that the purchase furthered the achievement of sustainable development. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments at stage 2 to delete the provision that currently states that, should the ownership of the land to remain with its current owner, that ownership would be inconsistent with furthering the achievement of sustainable development in relation to the land.

Section 97G(6) of the new Part 3A sets out the matters which must be specified in the application by the Part 3A community body. These matters are:

- the reasons why the Part 3A community body considers that its proposals for the land are in the public interest and compatible with further the achievement of sustainable development in relation to the land;
- the reasons why the Part 3A community body considers that the land is wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected;
- the location and boundaries of the land in the application;
- certain information about rights and interest in the land;
- the proposed use, development and management of the land and how it would affect any facilities on the land such as sewers or pipes.

Section 97G(6) does not state that the Part 3A community must demonstrate in its application that, if the land were to remain with its current owner, that ownership would be inconsistent with further the achievement of sustainable development in relation to the land. This is a matter of which Ministers must satisfy themselves under section 97H(c), rather than something which the Part 3A community body to demonstrate.

Of course, it is open to the Part 3A community body to demonstrate, in their application, that it is in the public interest for the application to be approved because the current ownership would not be consistent with the sustainable development of the land. Equally, it would be open for the landowner to make representations to the effect that his continued ownership would be consistent with the sustainable development of the land.

The Scottish Government will consider whether or not alternative wording would be preferable to avoid any confusion. However, in essence, the purpose of section 97H(c) is to ensure that the application is not approved in cases where the current owner has demonstrated that his continued ownership of the land would further the achievement of sustainable development of the land, because if this is the case, then the policy objectives of the Bill will already have been met.

310. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government provide guidance for communities setting out the basis of the required evidence to prove that a community had tried and failed to purchase the land.

If the provisions are passed the Scottish Government will ensure that the guidance is updated to include this.

315. The Committee recognises that it may be helpful for communities to have information on the valuation at the time of the ballot and that such information may inform their views. The Committee recommends the Scottish Government give further consideration to this prior to stage 2 and consider the possible benefit of amendments to that effect.

The appointment of an independent valuer is carried out within 7 days of approving an application. They then have 8 weeks to provide a valuation. The ballot must have taken place before the application is submitted so it is not possible for this valuation to be in place at the time. However, it is expected that there will be an indication of costs, obtained by the community body, as part of the ballot information even if this is not the final valuation used for the purchase itself.

318. The Committee is concerned that communities should have equivalent access to the right-to-buy provisions of part 2 and part 3 and agrees with the view of stakeholders who suggested that the independent balloter should be appointed and paid for by Scottish Ministers. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments to this effect at stage 2.

For both Parts 3 and 3A, the ballot is the first indication of community support which is different from applications under Part 2 where community support has already been demonstrated at the time of registration of the interest and prior to the ballot taking place. The Scottish Government does not intend to automatically pay ballot costs in all cases, but the intention is that it could reimburse the cost of the ballot in certain circumstances, for example, where a ballot indicated community support.
The Scottish Government intends to introduce amendments at Stage 2, applicable to Part 3 and Part 3A, to include powers for the Minister to make regulations setting out the circumstances in which a crofting/Part 3A community body will be able to apply to the Ministers to have the cost of the ballot reimbursed.

320. The Committee understands the concerns of stakeholders with respect to the edited register and the initial 50% threshold, however, the Committee considers that this needs to be balanced against the provision which could deprive an owner of their asset. Given the significance of this provision, the Committee considers that the proposed threshold is appropriate. However, the Committee recommends that the Scottish Government keeps this under review.

The Bill as introduced amends section 51 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 to remove the 50% threshold and require that the proportion of the community who voted is sufficient to justify the community body’s proceeding to buy the land. The requirement for the majority of those who voted to have voted in favour of the acquisition remains.

Part 3A of the Act (section 97J(1)(b)) provides that, for the purposes of the ballot in relation to a Part 3A application, either (i) at least half of the members of the community must have voted or (ii) fewer than half of the members of the community have voted but the proportion which voted is sufficient to justify the Part 3A/community body’s proceeding to buy the land.

323. The Committee considers that Ministers should have the discretion to determine which application should proceed and recommends that the criteria to be considered in coming to a decision should be set out in regulations.

Section 97K gives Ministers the discretion to decide which application is to proceed in circumstances where more than one Part 3A community body has applied under Part 3A to buy the land, and it is considered that putting the criteria into regulations would remove the element of flexibility. In relation to Parts 2 and 3 (sections 55 and 76) Ministers also have discretion to decide which community body may proceed with the application. In reaching a decision, cases would be considered against each other with regards to public interest, feasibility, cost and any other relevant factors, and Ministers are obliged to have regard to all views on each of the applications and the responses to those views which they have received in answer to invitations to comment on the applications.

326. The Committee understands the concerns of the National Trust for Scotland. However, the Committee is of the view that there could be many and varied conditions that could apply to each consented application and that each application and the relevant conditions should be considered on a case by case basis. In that regard, the Committee is not persuaded of the need to specify the range of possible conditions on the face of the Bill or by way of a definitive list in subsequent regulation and considers that this is rightly a matter for Ministerial discretion.
328. The Committee would welcome further information from the Scottish Government on the circumstances under which Ministers envisage suspending rights over land in respect of which a Part 3A application had been made.

Regulations under section 97N would be used to prevent an owner circumventing the Act by transferring the land in question before the process is complete. As a result, the Scottish Government intends to place a prohibition on transfers, except for those considered to be exempt, from the point at which Ministers approve the application. This is in line with the current Part 3 of the Act.

331. The Committee would welcome further information from the Scottish Government on what is envisaged in terms of burdens and claw-back provisions should the plans of a community body not be implemented. The Committee would also welcome further information on whether the Scottish Government has considered applying a time requirement for implementation of community bodies’ plans and how this would work in practice.

Then Scottish Government has no plans to introduce any form of intervention should community body plans not be implemented, nor any timescale. It is generally the funders who impose conditions on the provision of funding, therefore it would be the funders who may seek to recover monies where land was not used for the purpose for which it was acquired.

337. The Committee considers that the valuation procedure should ensure that both parties are treated fairly by giving each the opportunity to comment on issues raised in the other’s representations and draw attention to anything inaccurate or potentially misleading. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments at stage 2 to provide both the owner and the community body the right to comment on the valuation and other party’s representations.

The Scottish Government intends to bring forward amendments at Stage 2 to introduce a counter-representation stage in the valuation process. The land owner will be invited to make counter-representations on the community body’s representations and vice-versa in order for the valuer to reach an informed valuation for the land.

338. The Committee agrees with the Big Lottery Fund’s suggestion that it would be useful, for a number of reasons, for the community body to have the valuation early and recommends that the Scottish Government reflect on this and the merit of amending the Bill to this effect at stage 2.

The appointment of an independent valuer is carried out within 7 days of approving an application. They then have 8 weeks to provide a valuation. The ballot must have taken place before the application is submitted so it is not possible for this valuation to be in place at the time. However, it is expected that there would be an indication of costs, obtained by the community body, as part of the ballot information even if this is not the final valuation used for the purchase itself.

342. The Committee concurs with the view of the Development Trusts Association Scotland that the right of compensation should be limited to situations where the application is approved, and recommends that the Scottish Government bring forward amendments at stage 2 to clarify the provision in this respect.

It is not felt fair that, where a community application has failed, the owner, through having to comply with the Act, is out of pocket. In fact, by putting their own case forward convincingly, they can be impacting on their own case for compensation. As a result, there is no intention to bring forward amendments at stage 2 in relation to compensation in this regard.

343. The Committee shares the concerns of the Community Land Advisory Service in relation to owners’ tax liabilities and the timing of the sale and agrees that the community should not bear this cost. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government reflect on this and clarify the appropriate source of compensation for this deprivation by way of amendment at stage 2.

The owner should be compensated for any financial costs incurred in complying with the Act. Since it is the community body that has purchased the land, it is they who should pay compensation. In given circumstances, Ministers are empowered to make a grant towards the community body’s liability for compensation. To apply successfully for such a grant, the community body need to demonstrate that:

- after they have made payment of outstanding costs incurred by the purchase of the croft land, they have insufficient funds to pay the compensation required;
- they have already taken all reasonable steps to try and raise the compensation amount required; and
- it is in the public interest that Ministers pay the grant.

In relation to the crofting community right to buy, the process for applying for a grant towards compensation costs is set out in the Crofting Community Right to Buy (Grant Towards Compensation Liability) (Scotland) Regulations 2004. The equivalent provisions for the Part 3A right to buy are set out in section 97U, and it is intended that Ministers will prescribe the form and the procedure for the process by way of regulations made under section 97U(6).

347. The Committee has no specific comment to make in relation to appeals. However, the Committee considers that a process of mediation should have been built into the Bill to ensure that effective discussion between a landowner and a community is facilitated. The Committee considers that Ministers should have the powers to facilitate negotiation, and where necessary appoint, and provide financial resources to support, a mediator. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government give consideration to an appropriate mediation process and include provision for this within the Bill by way of bringing forward amendments at stage 2.

The Scottish Government does not plan to introduce any form of mediation into the Bill. However, it could well be a function of the dedicated resource for community land ownership that was announced in the Programme for Government, such as a Community Land Agency. If a mediation role were to be placed within the Land Reform Act, any mediation could only refer to Community Right to Buy case, rather than any wider situations that might benefit from the same approach. There will be a short life working group set up as part of the 1 million acre target work that will look into this.

Other issues considered by the Committee

350. The Committee was interested to hear the views of stakeholders in relation to land use and the right to manage land and recommends that the Scottish Government consider the scope to include provisions in relation to management rights in this Bill by way of amendment at stage 2 and/or in the forthcoming land reform legislation.

Where public sector land is concerned, leasing, management or use are provided for in addition to ownership under the asset transfer provisions in Part 5 of the Bill. In relation to privately owned land, a range of options is being considered in relation to the forthcoming Land Reform Bill.

357. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government give consideration to what more can be done to address the issue of best value, best public benefit and, the approach taken by local authorities and other public sector bodies. The Committee recommends that the Scottish Government identify further measures to address this issue, through a review of the public finance manual, by the inclusion of related provisions within the proposed land reform bill and by the provision of further guidance to local authorities in relation to their assets, their considerations of best value, and supporting communities to acquire land.

Local authorities have powers to dispose of assets at less than best consideration under the Disposal of Land by Local Authorities (Scotland) Regulations 2010, where they are satisfied that the disposal will contribute to the promotion or improvement of economic development or regeneration, health, social well-being or environmental well-being. The Scottish Public Finance Manual has also been amended to highlight the need for other public bodies to consider similar benefits, stating:

The Community Ownership Support Service and Association of Chief Estates Surveyors produced guidance in August 2013, “Asset Transfer From Policy to Practice”, which gives advice on evaluating benefits and discounts, and we will consider providing further guidance on these issues as the Bill is implemented.

358. The Committee also recommends that the Scottish Government give consideration to an appropriate mechanism, such as the proposed land commission, to adjudicate in cases where there are suggestions that local authorities may be seeking to frustrate local communities. The Committee asks the Cabinet Secretary to reflect on this issue and consider what further amendments could be brought forward at stage 2 to address the issue of best value, best public benefit and the practical impact of the approach taken by local authorities and other public sector bodies.

There is no intention to bring amendments to the Bill on this at stage 2. As part the paper “A Consultation on the Future of Land Reform in Scotland”, Proposal 1 asks about a potential Scottish Land Reform Commission and the structure and remit of such a body. The issues raised by the Committee could be dealt with by this body, if that were deemed appropriate.

366. The Committee recognises the difficulties faced by communities in seeking to exercise their right-to-buy and is keen to ensure that appropriate support and funding is available to all communities across Scotland to facilitate meeting their aspirations. The Committee agrees that public sector bodies have an important role in that regard.

367. The Committee is familiar with the role of Highlands and Islands Enterprise in supporting communities to acquire land to date and requests further information on the role that the Scottish Government envisages for Highlands and Islands Enterprise and for Scottish Enterprise in taking the land reform agenda forward. The Committee also asks for the Scottish Government’s view on how best to take forward the social remit outwith the Highlands and Islands.

As part of the work associated with the 1 million acre target, the functions and remit of HIE is actively being looked at, as well as options for other bodies that might take this forward outwith the HIE area.

368. The Committee welcomes the Scottish Government’s commitment to establish a community land unit to provide support and advice to communities. The Committee seeks information on how the Scottish Government anticipates the new community land unit will utilise the expertise and interact with the existing unit within Highlands and Islands Enterprise.

369. The Committee also requests that further information be provided on the remit and resourcing of the unit; the timescale for its establishment; the location of the unit; the ways in which the unit will work with, and practically support, communities at a local level; and how the work of the unit will be monitored and evaluated.
As part of the work associated with the 1 million acre target, the functions and remit of the dedicated resource announced is under development, and details will be released when they have been clarified further.

370. The Committee welcomes confirmation that fresh guidance which takes a more relaxed view of state aid issues has been issued and recommends that the Scottish Government actively promote this guidance to local authorities across Scotland.

The Scottish Government will ensure that the new guidance is promoted accordingly.

372. Having considered the Bill, it does not appear to the Committee that there is any restriction on communities seeking to use the provisions within Part 3 and Part 3A of the 2003 Act, and the part 5 provisions of the Bill; however, the Committee would welcome clarification from the Scottish Government that this is indeed the case. The Committee would also welcome further information from the Scottish Government on the decision-making process where Scottish Ministers or Scottish Government agencies are the landowner.

Communities are quite able to lodge applications under several parts of the 2003 Act, and under part 5 of this Bill. The decision making process would remain the same where the SG were the landowner. It is subject to appeal, should community groups feel that their application has not been assessed fairly, so there is a degree of scrutiny of decisions in these matters.

ISSUES NOT INCLUDED IN THE BILL

Crofting Community Right to Buy (Part 3)

375. The Committee considers that it would have been preferable had consultation on the crofting community right-to-buy been undertaken alongside consultation on the existing part 4 provisions and that the amendments to the crofting community right-to-buy had been included in the Bill as introduced, rather than at stage 2. The Committee considers that the introduction of significant new provisions by way of amendments at stage 2 is undesirable in terms of effective parliamentary scrutiny, as the time available at stage 2 to consider new evidence is limited. The Committee would welcome the opportunity of early sight of the proposed Scottish Government draft amendments.

The Scottish Government issued a call for evidence about its proposals as well as a series of face to face meetings with stakeholders across the crofting spectrum. There was broad agreement amongst stakeholders for the proposals. Scottish Government amendments have been lodged in order to provide early sight of proposals to allow the Committee to consider them as part of their stage 2 deliberations.
Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill: The Committee took evidence on stage 2 amendments 1-11 relating to the crofting community right-to-buy from—

Derek Flyn, Director, Scottish Crofting Federation;
Susan Walker, Convener, Crofting Commission;
Sandy Murray, Chairman, NFUS Crofting Highlands and Islands Committee;
Gordon Cumming, Land Manager, The North Harris Trust;
Peter Peacock, Policy Director, Community Land Scotland;
Duncan Burd, Rural Affairs Sub-Committee, Law Society of Scotland.
Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill: Stage 2

The Convener: Agenda item 4 is stage 2 of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. We will take evidence on the Government's amendments on the crofting community right to buy. We are joined by a variety of stakeholders. I ask everyone to introduce themselves.

Derek Flyn (Scottish Crofting Federation): I am a retired crofting lawyer. Recently, I have been the co-administrator of what we call the crofting law sump, collecting the problems of crofting law and trying to find solutions through the crofting law group.

Gordon Cumming (North Harris Trust): I am the land manager for the North Harris Trust.

Claudia Beamish: I am an MSP for South Scotland and shadow minister for environment and climate change.

Duncan Burd (Law Society of Scotland): I am a solicitor in private practice on the Isle of Skye. I am here to represent the Law of Society of Scotland, and I sit on its rural affairs committee.

Dave Thompson: I am the MSP for Skye, Lochaber and Badenoch.

Michael Russell: I am the MSP for Argyll and Bute.

Alex Fergusson: I am the MSP for Galloway and West Dumfries, and crofting law is a complete mystery to me.

Peter Peacock (Community Land Scotland): I do policy work for Community Land Scotland.

Jim Hume: I am an MSP for South Scotland.

Sandy Murray (NFU Scotland): I am a crofter from Sutherland and the chairman of the Highlands and Islands committee of NFU Scotland.

Angus MacDonald: I am the MSP for Falkirk East, which is well known for its lack of crofts.

The Convener: For the time being.

Susan Walker (Crofting Commission): I am the convener of the Crofting Commission, which is the regulator of crofting.

Graeme Dey: I am the MSP for Angus South.

The Convener: I am convener of the committee and the MSP for Caithness, Sutherland and Ross, where there is a lot of crofting of various intensities and kinds.
Thank you for coming to this morning’s meeting. We have many questions, but we do not need everyone to answer every question in order to allow us to reach the core of the matters under debate.

Have stakeholders been consulted enough about what is proposed? Are you satisfied that the consultation has been sufficient in terms of the amendments?

Peter Peacock: We are very satisfied. We take the view that the matter goes back to a predecessor committee to the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee that commissioned independent research on the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003. Out of that came the issues around the need for change that are now being consulted on.

It would have been better if the amendments to part 3 of the 2003 act had been part of the original Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill; that is not the case, but we are encouraged that the Government is trying to make the changes. I encourage the committee to be generally quite relaxed about the changes, because they are heading in the right direction.

Our members have been consulted by the Scottish Government through a written consultation and a series of meetings to which they were invited and at which they had the opportunity to have their say. In that sense, we are happy with what has happened.

Derek Flynn: I was involved in the post-legislative report, looking specifically at crofting matters. The matters that were raised are being dealt with.

The Convener: We have started with general approval for the level of consultation. Graeme Dey will ask about the amendments.

Graeme Dey: Just to tease this out a little bit, I want to be clear that the witnesses feel that the amendments fully and appropriately address the concerns that were raised during the consultation process. To what extent will the proposed changes allow more crofting communities to exercise their right to buy? Are further amendments needed—perhaps to create a mediation service, which has been mentioned?

The Convener: What about the experience in North Harris? You got the right to buy and have applied it.

Gordon Cumming: The North Harris Trust has been with the community since 2003. The purchase did not go through as a community right to buy; it was a voluntary effort.

We are, on the whole, happy with the amendments. We feel that they are fair and that the consultation has gone very well.

Peter Peacock: On the second point about mediation services, Community Land Scotland has been arguing for some time that it would be helpful to put it beyond doubt that Scottish ministers have the power to facilitate mediation between potential purchasers and owners. That is born of bitter experience of what has happened with a number of purchases. From conversations with some of the agencies that support community groups, we are aware that they feel that although they would like mediation to be facilitated, they do not have the legal power to do so. It is not clear to me whether Scottish ministers have that legal power, either. I hoped that the provisions would contain some simple power to enable ministers to facilitate mediation when it is requested by either party and both parties agree. That would be helpful because it would clarify the law.

We are anxious about the matter because we do not want communities to have to resort on every occasion to complex law. It would be much more satisfactory if there could be negotiated settlements around an aspiration to buy land. There is quite a lot of evidence supporting that approach, particularly in the Western Isles. We need a framework for that to happen. For a good number of months, our chairman has been involved in trying to resolve the Pairc situation by bringing the parties together at their request. Frankly, although that has been helpful in taking the process forward, we are not skilled in mediation techniques and it is too haphazard to leave it to chance that one individual will be acceptable to both parties. It would be far better to have some kind of clear power. That would help the whole situation.

On Graeme Dey’s first point about the scope of the amendments and whether there is anything else we want, I guess that there is always something else, but we are happy with what we have because it identifies the core issues. That said, once we get into the detail, the amendments contain quite a lot of implications that might be worth teasing out today. There is nothing specific that we are looking for at this stage, but there are fine details that we need to thrash out.

Sandy Murray: I support what Peter Peacock said on mediation. We need somebody who is able to mediate because in the long run it will save us from a lot of arguments.

I also agree that quite a few details in the amendments need to be teased out.

The Convener: Should the remit of the Scottish mediation service be looked at with regard to agricultural matters, or would that be too formalised a process?

Peter Peacock: I am not familiar with that service. However, as it happens, on Friday I met somebody in Edinburgh who is involved with what appears to be a kind of marketplace for mediation services. There are people who are highly skilled in that sort of thing.

If ministers had the power to facilitate mediation, they could bring in whatever services were appropriate. If bringing mediation skills to bear on a situation requires changing the terms or remit of an existing statutory mediation system, so be it.

Graeme Dey: You have made a good point. It is clear that mediation skills exist, but does the knowledge base to mediate in the crofting sphere exist?

Peter Peacock: It is said that only three people understand crofting law—one is mad, one is dead and nobody can remember who the third one is. Actually, to be fair, that was said of local government finance.

I am not sure about crofting mediation skills, but in any situation where there is a dispute between two parties, mediators can bring to bear their skills irrespective of the technical detail that is associated with the subject. No doubt, however, technical expertise could be brought in. I know that in the Pairc case there is a huge amount of technical detail and people have had to bring in lawyers and others to help with that. However, the key thing is actually to get the parties together and talking in order to resolve difficulties and create a satisfactory outcome.

Claudia Beamish: The witnesses will know this, but for the record I point out that at present a crofting community body must be a company limited by guarantee. The amendment to section 71 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 will broaden the base of legal organisations to include Scottish charitable incorporated organisations and community benefit companies, or bencoms, and any other body "as may be prescribed", subject to certain requirements.

The explanatory note on the amendments states that part 3 of the 2003 act will be brought "into alignment with proposed amendments to Part 2 (community right-to-buy)" and with proposed new part 3A, which is on the right to buy abandoned or neglected land without a willing seller. We are certainly getting into the detail here, but it is important to do so.

Do the amendments to the crofting community bodies section in the 2003 act—section 71—provide enough protection against personal liability for the trustees of such bodies? Will they provide reassurance for those who enter contracts with those bodies? More broadly, will the amendments provide flexibility for the situations that a crofting community body might experience?

Susan Walker: I have experience of being a member of a community trust that went through a registration of interest under part 2 of the 2003 act. The added flexibility will be useful. Different kinds of bodies are being created, such as community interest companies. It can take quite a long time to set up an SCIO, and a body cannot officially become one until the Office of the Scottish Charity Regulator has approved and registered it. Therefore, it is good to have that flexibility. Any director who takes on a position with a community trust must understand their responsibilities, but there is a good support system through, for example, Highlands and Islands Enterprise’s land unit, which advises people on their responsibilities. I think that the proposals look robust and have flexibility.

Sandy Murray: I agree that the proposals look fairly robust. We must ensure that, whatever type of bodies are set up, we maintain a majority of crofters’ representatives on the boards of those organisations.

The Convener: There are no further points on that, I hope. If there are, the witnesses should speak up now.

Peter Peacock: Are we on the specifics of SCIOs and bencoms? There is a point of detail that arises, so perhaps I could come on to that.

Peter Peacock: Please do.

Peter Peacock: There is an issue in the amendments about which crofters will count in all this related to whether they are on the crofting register.

Alex Fergusson: We will come on to that.

Peter Peacock: Fine. I will leave that for now.

Jim Hume: Proposed new section 71(3)(c) of the 2003 act, which will be inserted by one of the stage 2 amendments, will repeal the requirement for crofting community bodies to audit their accounts formally, but the explanatory note on the amendment says that they will still be required to “make proper arrangements for ... financial management”. Do the witnesses welcome the removal of the requirement for accounts to be audited?

Witnesses indicated agreement.

The Convener: I see Peter Peacock, Susan Walker and Gordon Cumming nodding, Jim, so we should take that as read.
Jim Hume: That is absolutely fine. As I have said, the explanatory note also makes it clear that bodies will be required to “make proper arrangements for ... financial management”.

I would be interested to find out how the witnesses think that transparency can be developed to ensure that any investment is being made properly and that there are adequate safeguards in that respect.

Susan Walker: Again, from the point of view of a body that was set up to be compliant with part 2 of the 2003 act, I point out that that act requires us to have our accounts independently scrutinised. Moreover, all registered charities must produce annual accounts. It seems, therefore, that it would be inconsistent to treat part 3 bodies differently from part 2 bodies; whatever is required for part 2 bodies should also be required for part 3 bodies. In that respect, I think that the amendment to which Jim Hume referred will equalise things.

Jim Hume: Okay.

The Convener: Thank you very much for that. Alex Fergusson has some questions about amending the definition of “crofting community”.

Alex Fergusson: I must apologise for interrupting Peter Peacock in full flow earlier, but I have spent two days trying to get my head round this question and I did not want my moment of glory to be taken away from me.

The Convener: We will find out now how well you have managed to get your head round it.

Alex Fergusson: You would have thought that to a mere lowlander like me the definition of a crofting community would be quite a simple matter. Clearly, however, it is not. My understanding—I think that this was the point that Peter Peacock was referring to—is that proposed new section 71(7) of the 2003 act will amend the definition to capture more crofters who are excluded from the existing legislation, and that it is recognised that the existing definition of “crofting community” might not include all those who consider themselves to be part of that community. I therefore understand the desire to amend the definition to bring in more people.

However, as Peter Peacock pointed out—and, again, as I understand it—some owner-occupier crofters are registered on Registers of Scotland’s crofting register and the amendment will not cover those on the Crofting Commission’s register of crofts. I do not want to get into the question of why on earth there are two registers, but various people have in evidence to the committee highlighted the difficulties that might be created in trying to bring the registers together or simplifying the terminology. My question for anyone who wishes to comment is whether you foresee problems arising from the sole use of Registers of Scotland’s crofting register and, if so, how they might be remedied.

The Convener: Derek Flynn?

Derek Flynn: Thank you. [Laughter.]

The term “crofting community” poses a number of problems. For a start, real conflict has emerged from its being defined differently in two pieces of legislation. We must look to resolve that situation, but I do not think that such a resolution will be found either in this bill or in the Crofters (Scotland) Act 1993.

The point that owner-occupier crofters are covered only if they have been entered in the crofting register but not in the register of crofts is, I think, false. Those who are on the register of crofts should also be covered, because in order to become an owner-occupier crofter one must intimate one’s position to the Crofting Commission. Having done so, a person would, in fact, be entered in the commission’s register of crofts as an owner-occupier crofter. The problem, however, is that the legislation does not actually say that.

Under the Crofters (Scotland) Act 1993, to become an owner-occupier crofter the person has to tell the Crofting Commission, which holds that information, and the one place that it would hold the information is in the register of crofts, so the bill should make reference not only to the crofting register but to the register of crofts.

Alex Fergusson: So you believe that a combination of registers is the right way to approach the issue, rather than the sole use of one register?

Derek Flynn: Yes, because putting something into the crofting register is still an unnecessary hurdle, and it would produce an unnecessary distinction between one set of owner-occupier crofters and another.

The Convener: Can I clarify something? Presumably, because we are moving to a map-based register, the Crofting Commission register as it is at the moment, which is just a list, will eventually become redundant.

Derek Flynn: I look forward to that. [Laughter.]

The Convener: Just for clarity.

Peter Peacock: We would strongly support the general point that Derek Flynn made. It does not seem clear at all why owner-occupiers who are in the register of crofts should not be counted for that purpose. There is probably some deep technicality here, because the implication in the explanatory notes is that ministers are taking a regulatory power and might change things in due course. Perhaps they can explain that. The outcome ought to be that both registers, for both tenants and owner-occupiers, ought to be in play.

Susan Walker: The Crofters (Scotland) Act 1993 says that the commission has a duty to keep a register of crofts, but it states that we have only to list tenants. No duty to keep a register of owner-occupier crofters has been added. As Derek Flyn said, those crofters have a duty to tell us, and we certainly do register them in the register of crofts. There are something like 800 crofters listed on the crofting register, but we have over 13,000 crofters, so if you used only the crofting register, you would be severely limiting the number of owner-occupier crofters who would ever be registered as crofters.

Peter Peacock: My recollection is that, when those matters were dealt with in the last crofting act, it was estimated that it could take up to 80 years for the crofting register to be complete. That is why you need the register of crofts as well.

The Convener: Hence Derek Flyn’s helpful remark. Alex Fergusson may continue.

Alex Fergusson: That is me. I am exhausted.

The Convener: All right. We move on to the lovely subject of croft land mapping.

Susan Walker: Before we move on, I have another point on the definition of the crofting community. The proposals appear to have removed the residency requirement and I wonder why that is the case and whether there could be situations in which absentee crofters influence the outcomes for their community, despite the fact that they do not live there. I do not understand well enough how the ballot works. Is there a ballot of all crofters, or do all crofters have to comply with the residency requirement that is general upon the whole community? If there is a ballot of all crofters, absentee crofters could influence the outcome for a community.

The Convener: Indeed. In the Crofting Commission’s submission to the consultation, you raised the question of the 32km rule. Are there particular words that you think should be amended in the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill to clarify that point about absentees?

Susan Walker: The 2003 act referred to a distance of more than 16km, but that was changed by the 2010 act. I wondered why that had been removed. As I say, I do not understand enough about the ballot arrangements, but if the arrangement is that all crofters are balloted, it is important that that element be reintroduced.

Derek Flyn: The point is that absentee crofters should not control what is happening on the land and we should bring the land reform measurement of 16km into line with the previous act’s limit of 32km.

The Convener: We can ask the minister about that and clarify the point.

We move on to the proposed amendments to section 73 of the 2003 act, on croft land mapping. Do you agree that the suggested removal of the detailed mapping requirements will make mapping simpler? There is a problem in balancing the mapping requirements with facilitating the crofting community right to buy. It is proposed to repeal the requirement to map dykes, ditches and that sort of thing.

The way I look at it is that, at the point at which someone is trying to buy something, we are talking about a cadastral map and not about the detailed map that is required for gaining ownership. Can we find a way to explain why only a simplified form of mapping is required in the first instance?

Derek Flyn: The transfer of ownership of a Highland crofting estate is a massive problem because it tends to be a jigsaw puzzle with lots of pieces removed. Under the sasine system, it was merely a transfer of a bundle of writs, but now it is all to be mapped. No Highland estate would transfer to another landlord showing every pipe, every dyke and so on, so it is quite improper that a community should be asked to map those things.

The requirement should be at the level required by Registers of Scotland to change ownership from one person to another. At that stage, it has to check that the sasines title is good enough to go on to the land register. If we can get a plan to that quality, it seems that that would be sufficient for a crofting community buyout.

Sandy Murray: I support what Derek Flyn said. To have an overcomplicated map and to have to work out in the first instance where all the dykes, watercourses and things were would be cumbersome for the community.

Peter Peacock: This is the single biggest prize of the proposed changes. We know from experience that the process is tortuous. It is virtually impossible to meet, and it leaves open all sorts of opportunities for challenge on fine technical detail, such as that someone did not get a dyke or a sewer exactly right, or whatever. The removal of the requirement is important and it is welcome. It will help to simplify matters.

However, other matters are proposed to be introduced to section 73, and you might want to move on to discuss those. There are other, equally onerous requirements in the form that has to be filled in.

The Convener: The submission from Scottish Land & Estates suggests that it is not unduly onerous to detail things such as pipes. I say for the record that, unfortunately, Scottish Land & Estates could not be with us on the panel today, but it believes that the provision should remain the same. It seems to me that the evidence from people here is that, at the stage of applying—

Peter Peacock: I do not know this, but I suspect that, originally, this was picked up from the set of arrangements for compulsory purchase that would apply to urban areas. If we are talking about a site that is the size of this room, it would be possible to identify sewers, drains and so on, but if we are talking about a 40,000 acre crofting estate where there is dispute that goes back for generations about where boundaries between crofts are and the topography has changed around dykes and so on, the requirements become virtually impossible to meet.

If we want to make progress, it is essential that we remove the requirements, and I am glad that that is what the Government is proposing.

The Convener: We need requirements to be set out in regulations in a way that ensures that a fair balance is struck between the rights of landowners and the rights of the crofting communities. On that basis, do you want to develop the other point that you made? I will then bring in Mike Russell.

Peter Peacock: I was referring to evidence that was submitted by John Randall from the Pairc Trust, who is the only human being who has been through all of this, so he understands it. He pointed to the requirement about sewers, pipes, drains and so on, which we have just discussed, but he also pointed out that the applicant has to fill in a prescribed form.

That form requires other things, such as the inclusion of a list of all postcodes within Ordnance Survey 1km grid squares and a full list of all those eligible to vote in the ballot, including distance from relevant townships and so on. That is contained in the regulation. I know that that is not strictly speaking a subject for your committee’s consideration, but if we are going to simplify this, we need to address those things in the regulation.

The Convener: We mentioned that issue in our stage 1 report. That is one thing that we have picked up already.

Michael Russell: I want to echo a point that Derek Flyn made, because it is something that we need to reflect on and use more widely across the consideration of the bill. There is a danger in the bill of constantly reinventing the wheel—of creating another way of doing things. If it is suitable for the registers to have the definition and mapping of the croft in such a way that the title can be transferred, we should not invent another way of doing it, because the two will be incompatible. It may produce great work for lawyers at various stages, but it will be incompatible with the ease with which we allow land to be transferred, which is what the bill is about. It is extremely important that we have a single standard, and if a standard exists then that is the standard by which we should continue to operate, unless there is a problem with it.

I have been involved in this issue over a long period and I remember a dispute in Benbecula, which is probably still going on, which originated from the fact that a line on the map was drawn with a pen that was too thick. Derek Flyn remembers the case, I can see; there are probably others. It is really important that we have simplicity in this.

The Convener: We have no other comments at the moment. Peter Peacock, do go on.

Peter Peacock: New requirements are being added, as well as deletions being made. Proposed section 73(5ZA) of the 2003 act will require the identification of "the owner of the land ... any creditor in a standard security over the land ... the tenant of any tenancy of land over which the tenant has an interest"

and

"the person entitled to any sporting interests".

That is a very onerous requirement and there is a real danger that although the bill will remove onerous requirements on mapping it will introduce others of a different kind. It is not clear to me why that requirement is needed. I do not think that it would be required in a private sale, so it is not clear to me why it should be required in a sale to a crofting community body. I want to flag that up to the committee.

This morning I received a couple of emails from members of Community Land Scotland who are in crofting communities and they reckon that the requirement would be very difficult to meet. I will pass those on to the committee so that you have that concern in writing. In several respects, we think that the requirement is very onerous and I wanted to alert the committee to that. We would rather not see that requirement; it is not clear why it is required now when it was not before.

The Convener: Obviously, we need to explore ministerial discretion or the exact reason why that requirement is there.

Michael Russell: Can I pursue that issue with other witnesses, to get further clarity on it? Peter Peacock’s point is very important: if it is not possible for those attempting a buy-out to identify a creditor in a standard security over the land, which I suspect could be difficult, or everybody who has sporting interests in the land, then the burden falls on those attempting the buy-out, as opposed to those who are selling. What are witnesses' views on that? It seems to be a major obstacle and one that could derail potential purchases.

Derek Flyn: This is knowledge that should be in the hands of the owner of the land. Identifying the owner of the land is one of the requirements, but in a normal system would you expect a purchaser to find out all about creditors and tenants? You would expect that information to be provided. At worst, you should leave the purchaser to find out only what is available on public registers.

Michael Russell: Could the burden not be put on the owner of the land to provide that information? That seems perfectly feasible.

Derek Flyn: That seems perfectly normal.

Peter Peacock: One of our members has this morning given me an example of a situation in which it was not possible to identify the owner to try to get that information. In the example that I have been given, four owners were listed but three of them were fictitious. It turned out that it was a front for a company laundering money, or something to that effect—they were unsavoury characters, if I can put it that way. You would fall at the first hurdle, because you could not identify the owner, let alone meet the other criteria.

We should not underestimate how difficult it is to meet the requirement. It could be made clear that, if the requirement were to remain that a community use their best endeavours to try to identify them, it should not prevent an application from proceeding if it could not find them. It is important to tease this out.

Michael Russell: So the provision requires amendment, either to put the burden on the owner and/or to create circumstances in which the best endeavour of the purchaser would be required, but there is acknowledgement that there might be circumstances in which it would not be possible to find the information. Is that what we are saying?

Peter Peacock: I think so.

Duncan Burd: You do not want to go with “best endeavours”; you want only “reasonable endeavours”. You may want to further refine the provision so that after “the owner of the land ... any creditor in a standard security over the land”

it continues “as may be disclosed in either the register of sasines or the land register of Scotland”, in order to lock down who should be within the public knowledge and avoid the fraudsters.

Michael Russell: I am always delighted to get free legal advice. That is splendid; thank you very much.

The Convener: That point has been well made.

Susan Walker: I have an additional point. I agree with everything that has been said, and our submission says that the provision should be “reasonable endeavours” and that it should cover only those things already on the public record. It is important not to underestimate the extent to which the requirement could create a loophole for a landlord, as they could set up a private arrangement with a relative and it could then be said that, as the community had failed to list that person in their application, their application should fail.

Derek Flyn: I will make one strong point. Crofting is different and crofting law is different. It is an area in which landlords do not have to do anything. Putting the duty on the landlord to produce information would mean that we would make no progress at all. We have to consider that the landlord might be a company registered in Andorra that never replies to any correspondence. If there is to be a duty to provide information, it can be only that which can be reasonably acquired and it must be from public registers. Those who have rights that are listed should have them registered somewhere. Otherwise, they cannot be identified.

The Convener: So, what Duncan Burd said about “reasonable endeavours” applies to what is on the public register. I think that that point is clear.

Angus MacDonald has questions on public notice of application, which is an interesting issue on the ground.

Angus MacDonald: I will briefly explore section 73 of the 2003 act on the public notice of application. The proposed new section 73(4) replaces the requirement to advertise an application in the Edinburgh Gazette and a local newspaper in the area. The explanatory note states that the “amendment provides greater flexibility and allows more appropriate forms of advertisement to be used according to the individual circumstances of the case.”

I presume that the provision is welcome, given the burden that—as we have already heard—exists on crofters with regard to various public notices. Is everyone content with the amendment? I see that you are all nodding.

The Convener: Let us move on to the identification of owner, tenants and certain creditors. Mike Russell has a question.
Michael Russell: Sorry. I have just asked my question.

The Convener: I think that we have probably covered the issue.

Michael Russell: Yes—I think that we have covered it.

Peter Peacock: It is the same point.

The Convener: If we are happy that there are no other aspects that we should ask about, we will move on to the ballot procedure. Sarah Boyack has some questions.

Sarah Boyack: I will explore the issues around section 75. The section lets ministers make regulations in relation to the conduct of the ballot, which it is anticipated will be undertaken by the crofting community body. The explanatory note sets out how that might work and includes the suggestion that "the crofting community body ... is liable for the cost of the ballot, and that ... in certain circumstances"

it might

"seek reimbursement of the cost of conducting the ballot"

from ministers, who will be given quite a degree of flexibility in the procedures. I have looked at responses to what is proposed and found a number of different views about the requirement to have a ballot: some are quite happy about it, but others are not. Is it strictly necessary to require a ballot? Malcolm Combe suggested in his evidence that it is not, given the “property” provision of the European convention on human rights. He suggests that that point was confirmed by Lord President Gill in the recent Pairc case. So, there is a question about the requirement to have a ballot. Malcolm Combe believes that the requirement for a ballot would make the act more bureaucratic and therefore make it harder for a community to benefit from the act’s provisions and he suggests that we should consider that point “very carefully”. I am keen to get the witnesses’ views on that.

Further, should the ballot provisions be different for other community groups that want to buy land? Is there a reason why the provisions need to be different and we need to have different legislation? I am really keen to get witnesses’ views on that, because we have had quite a range of views on the issue.

Peter Peacock: I will take first the question whether the ballot is necessary. We think that ballots are an important part of the process because they confirm that there is community assent to a proposition. Perhaps Malcolm Combe’s point is on whether a ballot is required legally. Pragmatically, it would be very difficult for a community not to have a ballot. How could they otherwise prove that there was assent to the proposition to purchase land? We think that the ballot is a necessary and important part of establishing that there is such assent.

Requiring a ballot means that there will have to be dialogue within a community to persuade people that the arguments for purchase are strong, the business case is strong and so on. We think that the ballot is an important aspect that we would not wish to see removed. That said, it is not clear to us why what is proposed in part 2, whereby the Scottish Government would now take responsibility for organising the ballot and paying for it, does not exist in part 3. It is not clear why there should be that distinction.

I accept that what the Scottish Government is proposing by way of allowing a crofting community to apply to have its costs met is a helpful flexibility compared with where we are at present, so to that extent I welcome what is proposed. However, that does not overtake the rather fundamental question why crofting communities should be different from others in that respect.

When we are getting into a part 3 purchase, we are talking about the potential of expropriating land against the wishes of the seller. It seems to me that in those circumstances it must be very clear that the conduct of any ballot that might help precipitate that action is seen to be above board. It therefore seems to me that the Government taking responsibility for organising that instead of the community would help to remove any potential dispute around the ballot not being conducted properly. I think that it is a question of conduct and propriety, and assuring people that the conduct is proper. However, there is also the question why part 2 would have a different set of arrangements from part 3—that does not seem right to me.

Sandy Murray: I fully support what Peter Peacock says. We, too, suggest that the ballot provision is brought into line with that for the community right to buy. A ballot shows that there is support is there for a buy-out when there is not a willing seller.

The Convener: Are there any further points?

Sarah Boyack: I want to tease things out a bit more. I accept that holding a ballot is a good, clear principle to demonstrate that there is genuine community support. However, I wonder why crofting communities would have to pay to conduct a ballot. The proposed amendment specifies that the crofting community group might seek reimbursement in some circumstances, and I am trying to think what those circumstances would be. It would be much clearer just to have the provision that a ballot should be properly conducted so that everyone would know that a standard and a good principle were being applied—I can see the point about propriety.

If the ministers do not want to change the amendment, I would like to tease out what the circumstances would be that would allow the ballot to be paid for for some groups but not for others. A new set of tests seems to be being introduced, and I cannot see why that would be done.

Peter Peacock: I agree with all that. It is not clear to me why people would be treated differently. When we are coming to some sort of democratic expression, it is important that the rules are applied consistently. Given that the Government is accepting responsibility for the ballots under part 2, I think that it should apply that responsibility equally to part 3. That would seem to me to have everything to commend it.

The Convener: That will be one of our questions for the minister next week, without a doubt.

We move on to the right to buy by only one crofting community body. Has there been conflict in crofting communities between more than one body so far?

Peter Peacock: Not in our experience.

Susan Walker: There has been in our experience.

The Convener: If there has been, has conflict been widespread?

Susan Walker: I believe that it was in Melness, or somewhere around that area; one body applied to buy and then another body came in with an overlapping application.

The Convener: It has happened, so perhaps somebody in the Government is alert to the potential that it could happen elsewhere.

Dave Thompson has a question on reference to the Land Court.

Dave Thompson: It is a small point concerning what the Law Society’s submission said about the list of persons who have a right to refer a question to the Land Court. The suggested amendments cover three of those persons: the owner entitled to sporting interests, the tenant and any other person entitled to sporting interests. The Law Society suggested that a “creditor in a standard security” in relation to the land should also have the right of reference.

When we took evidence from Malcolm Combe, he suggested that that might not always be a good thing. I am not sure when the Law Society made its submission, so I seek a bit of clarity from Duncan Burd on whether the society still feels strongly that creditors should have the right of reference. Everyone else seems to agree with the amendments, so I would appreciate hearing that point of view.

Duncan Burd: The Law Society is of the view that giving creditors the right of reference keeps the bill in accordance with other legislation in which the creditor in a standard security is notified of litigation and has the ability to enter appearance.

You may be familiar with the situation in which a couple are divorcing and there is an argument over the house. The heritable creditor must be told about the action. From a practical point of view, the creditor will never enter appearance, but the legislation states that they should be told about it because they have a perceived financial interest in the outcome of the case.

On a more technical basis, the suggestion ties in with proposed section 73(5ZA), which lists the same four categories that the society identified. Again, it brings continuity to the legislation.

The Convener: Sarah Boyack has a question about valuation.

Sarah Boyack: It is about the extension from six weeks to eight weeks. Scottish Land & Estates expressed concern in evidence that the process is already difficult, and that just adding another couple of weeks is not likely to help matters. Indeed, it could make the process more problematic when landlords are reluctant to sell and may be deliberately delaying.

Peter Peacock: We are generally in favour of extending such things to give that little bit more time. Whether two weeks would make a material difference is arguable—make it 12 weeks, if you wish. The general point is that it is moving in the right direction; rather than making the process more restrictive, it is making it more flexible. Ministers can further extend that time if it is required or shown to be necessary. We do not have a problem with the proposal.

Gordon Cumming: We felt that there was no problem with the extension. Again, if we are creating a system in which people can keep extending the period, that could create problems but, at the end of the day, if that administrative time is required, it is sensible for it to be available.

The Convener: Scottish Land & Estates took the opposite view, but I shall not make a judgment on that. The longer the delay, the greater the detriment in terms of finance and the relationship between the owner and the crofting community body. However, the balance of opinion seems to favour the opposite view.
Duncan Burd: I will go off piste here. As you know, I act in the Pairc case. The difficulty that the landlord had was in ensuring that information that he released to the valuer would be kept confidential if the buy-out did not go ahead. That has been a fundamental difficulty for valuers; they approach landlords who are not willing to release information. The Law Society would prefer 12 weeks, but from a personal perspective, it is clear to me that the valuers need that time. When you have been dealing with the Pairc case for 12 years, what is 12 weeks?

The Convener: That point is well made.

Graeme Dey has a question on compensation.

Graeme Dey: Scottish Land & Estates and NFUS have questioned whether it is appropriate for ministers to assess compensation levels, and SLE suggested that advice from experienced valuers should come into the process. Do the panel members have any concerns about the objectivity of ministers and their ability to determine appropriate levels of compensation in such cases?

The Convener: Be careful how you answer that question—it refers to any minister.

Peter Peacock: Ministers are estimable people of the highest quality and therefore their judgment should be trusted absolutely. [Laughter.]

Seriously, at the end of the day someone has to make a decision and, in a democracy, ministers have to take that responsibility. They will be given good advice by their officials and there is a valuation process behind it all, so I do not think that there is an issue.

The Convener: In that case, we move on to the appeal to the Land Court.

Angus MacDonald: Section 92 of the 2003 act allows the Land Court four weeks from the hearing date to give its reasons in respect of a valuation appeal. The proposed amendment will extend that period to eight weeks. Should that extended timescale not be sufficient, the Land Court is to notify all parties of the date on which it will provide a written decision. The explanatory note states that “this will provide assurance to all parties of when the decision will be received.”

Initially, the call for evidence suggested repealing the provision requiring the Land Court to provide its reasons in writing, and the majority of respondents focused on this amendment.

Is the panel content with the amendment as it stands? Does the Land Court have the flexibility to take a number of weeks before it rules on an appeal?

Derek Flyn: After 30 years of appearing before the Land Court, I would hesitate to fix time limits at all. It seems to me that it is for the court to decide on such limits and perhaps they should be contained in the rules of court. What sanction is available to parties if the Land Court does not do as instructed in the legislation? No sanction is included. If there is no result within the eight-week period and no information about when the written statement will be produced, should my friend the new chairman of the Land Court, Lord Minginish, be hung, drawn and quartered?

It seems highly inappropriate that the crofting community right to buy should be a preferred use of the Land Court. That is my personal opinion after 30 years as a practitioner appearances before the court. The court is always in control of what it does. Being told to do something in 28 days requires a punishment if it is not done within that time, so what is the sanction if the court does not abide by the eight-week limit?

The Convener: You put that on the table for us. Does anyone else want to comment?

Peter Peacock: I suppose that we would generally rather have a tighter timescale because we are trying to focus minds but, to be honest, whether it is four or eight weeks is not of the greatest importance, so we are happy to live with the amendment even though we think that it is headed in the wrong direction. As Derek Flyn says, the court is free not to meet the eight-week deadline, so the question is whether the time limit really matters.

Duncan Burd: The appeal relates to valuation, which is a fairly important part of the overall process, so it keeps certainty for the parties. If the Land Court overruns its eight-week limit and has not put its hand up for an extension, does that mean that the status quo applies and the entire procedure collapses? That might be a question for Lord Gill in the first appeal.

Derek Flyn: By adding a time limit, we put something in the law that is perhaps not required.

We have had recent experience of time difficulties. The Land Court issued a judgment just before Christmas on a Crofting Commission case and the commission had 28 days to appeal but there was no time over the Christmas period for it to do much about that. Its first meeting was after the 28-day period.

If the chairman of the Land Court and two members are off on a hearing in South Uist for four weeks, who will respond to an appeal? Should one of the clerks in the office get back and say that it will be done later? It is really strange to me to include a time limit in a bill requiring the court to do something.
Sandy Murray: We are generally of the view that there should be some time limit in the bill, but there should be an ability to apply for an extension to it. The important point is that the parties be kept aware of when the decision will be made.

The Convener: So, in a sense, it is an advisory limit that makes the point that a reasonable time needs to be taken. Can we have a section in the bill that sets a time limit without the additions that have been mentioned?

Derek Flyn: That problem appears in the crofters act where the Crofting Commission is told that it has to do certain things whereas there is a policy plan that has to be approved. That is where such matters should be laid. Likewise, how the Land Court goes about its business should be in its rules and regulations. If it is in the bill, nothing will be able to be done about it if it goes wrong. It will just cause a legal problem that will go into the courts and stay there.

The Convener: Sandy Murray suggests that, to put it in other words, the limit is to try to focus minds. We would assume that the Land Court would try to focus but, if it is in South Uist, how will it focus on a valuation appeal?

Derek Flyn: It will not focus.

The Convener: We will have to ask the minister about that as well.

I have two points about process and outcomes. We have had a short timescale in which to deal with the amendments but, because there has been a general consensus that they move in the right direction, we have been able to cope with that, although we wish that they had been consulted on at the beginning of the process.

I thank the witnesses for the efforts that they have made and the clarity that has been brought to the matters, which will enable us to pin down the minister on one or two points with the general recognition that, for once, “simplification” and “crofting” are two words that can be spoken in the same sentence. Is it likely that the amendments will encourage crofting communities to seek the right to buy and point more people in the direction of taking such action?

Susan Walker: I distinctly hope so. I suggest that all the buy-outs that have taken place in the Western Isles have taken place because of the existence of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003—it was only the coming into existence of that act that enabled that progress to be made. In our little township, we have managed to negotiate the purchase of a very small area of land for a community hub by virtue of the existence of the 2003 act. I think that it is an extremely important piece of legislation, and everyone should welcome any improvement that is made to it.

Peter Peacock: I would like to add something to that and to make a point about process.

If the amendments to part 3 of the 2003 act are agreed to—in general, we hope that they will be—proposed part 3A will have to be amended in line with those amendments, because it was drafted on the basis of the current part 3. That is a technical point, but I wanted to flag it up, because if that does not happen, we will end up with another anomaly.

I completely support what Susan Walker said about the proposed amendments encouraging people. It is very important that the law is credible. If it is believed to be credible by all parties, that will encourage more people to talk to one another in the way that people have been doing in the Western Isles. The proposed changes could make the law more credible in the eyes of communities, because currently the folklore surrounding part 3 is that it is impossible to use, so people should not even try to do so. That discourages communities. The amendments will make the process that bit easier, so communities will be prepared to think about using part 3, if necessary. In turn, that will encourage more discussion between communities and owners of the sort that is taking place regularly in the Western Isles.

The Convener: I thank the witnesses very much for their participation in what has been a comprehensive session on an area in which there is a wide degree of agreement.

The committee has another couple of items that we have to consider in private, so although it would be nice to talk to you all about the price of lamb in Harris et cetera, it would be a good idea if we could clear the room quickly.

The next meeting will be on 25 February, when we will hear from the Minister for Environment, Climate Change and Land Reform on the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. We will also take further evidence on the Government’s wild fisheries review from stakeholders.

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill: Stage 2

The Convener (Rob Gibson): Good morning, everybody, and welcome to the eighth meeting in 2015 of the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee. I remind everyone to switch off mobile phones as they interfere with the sound system. Committee members will, of course, be able to consult tablets, as will witnesses, in relation to the business of the meeting. We have apologies from Claudia Beamish.

Agenda item 1 is evidence on stage 2 amendments to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill on the crofting community right to buy and the draft regulations on abandoned and neglected land. I welcome Dr Aileen McLeod, the Minister for Environment, Climate Change and Land Reform, and her supporting Scottish Government officials: Stephen Pathirana, deputy director, land and tenancy reform; and Dave Thomson from the land reform and tenancy unit.

Welcome, minister. Do you want to make a short introductory statement?

Aileen McLeod: Yes, I do, convener, if that is okay. I was delighted to be invited to give evidence to the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee on my proposed stage 2 amendments to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill, which seek to amend the crofting community right to buy.

I thank the convener and members of the RACCE Committee for agreeing to take on this not inconsiderable part of the bill on behalf of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee. I also thank all the stakeholders who responded to the call for evidence on the proposed amendments and attended the meetings that my officials held in Edinburgh, Inverness, the Isle of Harris and the Kyle of Lochalsh in December. The evidence from those who participated has been instrumental in shaping the amendments.

I strongly believe that the crofting community right to buy is a tool that can be of great benefit to crofting communities, and it is therefore vital that the amendments, which introduce much-needed flexibility and simplification, are introduced at the earliest opportunity.

Only two crofting community bodies have made use of the crofting community right to buy legislation in more than 10 years. However, we heard at last week’s stakeholder evidence session that even the existence of the legislation has helped to change the culture by encouraging crofting communities to buy their croft land. The framework of the legislation acts as a useful backstop to encourage the parties to get round the table and open negotiations. Indeed, earlier this month, over 80 per cent of the community of Barvas on the Isle of Lewis voted in favour of a community buyout of the Barvas estate, which contains about 300 crofts.

That is why I strongly believe in the principles of the crofting community right to buy, which is designed to empower our crofting communities or to work as a backstop to allow them to negotiate a community acquisition outwith the framework of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003.

However, I recognise that there are elements of the legislation that could cause great difficulties for communities wishing to exercise their right to buy, not least the mapping requirements that communities must fulfil, which stakeholders have highlighted as being particularly onerous. I therefore want to make the legislation more flexible when necessary and more straightforward for community use. I have listened to what stakeholders have told me, and I am introducing a number of measures to address the flaws that have discouraged the use of the crofting community right to buy, including the mapping requirements and how the legislation is used to define a crofting community.

I am happy to answer questions that the committee may wish to ask in response to the amendments.

The Convener: Thank you. I assure you that we have quite a number of questions. To start with, the explanatory notes on the amendments state that they would make the crofting community right to buy "easier for crofting communities to use, while at the same time continuing to strike a fair balance between the rights of landowners and crofting communities."

Can you expand on that statement and indicate how many crofting communities you think might take advantage of the simplified process?

Aileen McLeod: The proposed changes will encourage more communities to access their right to buy by simplifying some parts of the 2003 act and opening up more options for communities and others. For example, we will simplify the mapping requirements, which have been a key area of concern for stakeholders. We will also increase the options for communities by expanding the types of organisation that community bodies can use under the act, which will include Scottish charitable incorporated organisations and community benefit companies. In addition, we will remove some of the burdens on communities by, for example, no longer requiring auditing of accounts and allowing ballotting expenses to be claimed under certain circumstances—at the moment, communities must fund their ballot themselves. I believe that the amendments as a whole will encourage communities to think about what they can do to take responsibility for their own futures.

As you will appreciate, it is difficult to estimate the number of communities that will take up the opportunity. However, as I said, even with the 2003 act as it stands, many communities use its existence to encourage dialogue with owners, which leads to purchases outwith the act. I hope that the amendments will encourage even more communities to follow that example.

The Convener: I understand the context, which is that the amendments will push out the envelope so that more people can consider the crofting community right to buy. However, we need to define what a crofting community is, so Alex Fergusson has a question about that.

Alex Fergusson (Galloway and West Dumfries) (Con): Good morning, minister. Amendment 1 would widen the definition of crofting community in section 71 of the 2003 act. However, as we learned last week in particular, amending the definition of crofting community in the way that is proposed would mean that owner-occupier crofters who are registered on Registers of Scotland’s crofting register would be included but those on the Crofting Commission’s register of crofts would not be.

To a complete outsider like me, that seems a very strange omission. Although we have been told that it is not easy to capture in legislative terms what a crofting community is, oral evidence that we took at last week’s meeting suggested that the proposed provision would produce a distinction between the two registers’ definitions of crofter. Why do you think that it is appropriate to go down that route?

Aileen McLeod: The proposed amendments would amend the definition of crofting community in section 71(5) of the 2003 act to address the issue of crofters being excluded by the existing legislation. Alex Fergusson is quite right to say that the proposed amendment would include in the definition of crofting community the owner-occupier crofters who are registered on Registers of Scotland’s crofting register but not those on the Crofting Commission’s register of crofts at this point in time.

The reason for that is that, although the Crofting Commission collects information on crofters, as Susan Walker from the Crofting Commission said at last week’s committee meeting, the commission has no duty to keep owner-occupier details. The Crofters (Scotland) Act 1993 sets out the information that must be on the register of crofts. At the moment, that does not include owner-occupier details.

The Scottish Government intends to work with the Crofting Commission, and we will consider introducing legislative changes to include owner-occupiers within the information that must be included. However, until that process has been completed, it is not possible, under the bill, to rely on the register of crofts for the owner-occupier information. That is why it is proposed that the Scottish ministers take a regulation-making power to expand the definition of crofting community at a later date. Such an expansion could include owner-occupier crofters who are registered in the register of crofts. At the moment, that needs to be carried out in a two-stage process, using the ministerial power to add the owner-occupier crofters who are recorded in the register of crofts at a later date, when a legal matter is addressed by the Crofting Commission.

Alex Fergusson: Thank you for that. I think that you have answered the second part of my question.

Is the purpose of the further powers that you propose to take to expand the definition of crofting to include later data, when it is more guaranteed to be correct?

Aileen McLeod: Yes.

Alex Fergusson: Thank you for answering that point.

Another issue that was raised with us by Susan Walker of the Crofting Commission was that the proposals appear to have removed the residency requirement. She raised the possibility that absentee crofters could influence the outcome of a community ballot, for instance. What are your thoughts on that?

Aileen McLeod: On the issue of residency, we have indeed removed the requirement that tenants must be resident within 16km of the crofting community. We have replaced that with a requirement that they be either tenants registered in the crofting register or the register of crofts, or owner-occupiers registered in the crofting register. There have been some issues with the distance and just where it is measured from—from the middle of a crofting community or from the edge, for instance. That is why we sought to simplify matters, in keeping with the rest of the changes.

As you rightly point out, Mr Fergusson, there are some concerns that the removal of the distance element could lead to an undue influence being exerted by absentee crofters, who would be defined as being part of the crofting community for the purposes of the eventual act.

Under the ballot rules, there are two elements to demonstrating that the community supports the proposals of the community body. First, the majority of those voting are in favour. They must be people of the crofting community. Secondly, the majority of tenants of crofts within the land that the crofting community has applied to buy are in favour. To the best of our knowledge, there are no crofting communities where the majority of the tenant crofters are absentees, which is the only situation where any undue influence could be asserted.

The Convener: I hope that I understand that.

There is a point that I wish to follow up. I suggested last week that, because we are moving to a map-based register, the Crofting Commission register as it is at the moment—just a list, I intend to include information from both the registers. We want to ensure that the Crofting Commission records the information on both the registers as a duty or obligation, rather than just to make the registers complete as they would like. That is where the regulation-making power comes in. Once the Crofting Commission is collecting all the data that we would like, we can ensure that those people are all included in the definition of a community.

The Convener: There is nothing like having an 80-year legacy ahead of you.

Alex Fergusson: That is job security.

The Convener: Yes.

Alex Fergusson: I want to come back on that. Again, I stress that I am a total outsider to crofting law and it is a complete mystery to me—every time I look at it, I am more confused. However, what Mr Thomson has just said suggests that it makes all the more sense to use both registers. As far as I can see, where somebody is registered in the Crofting Commission's register of crofts in a way that is safe and secure and we know that it is the correct information, the amendment will not take that ownership into account, and it seems strange not to do so. Perhaps I am being too simplistic.

Dave Thomson: No, you are correct. The difference is to do with the duty that the Crofting Commission has to collect the details of owner-occupiers. At present, the commission collects those details, but it is not under a duty to do so. Therefore, in theory, it could at any point stop doing so. If the bill relies on that as a measure of who is in a crofting community, we could be left in a situation in which we are asking for information that is not being collected any more. We want to impose a duty on the Crofting Commission to collect that information and then use the regulation-making power to include that as part of the definition.

Alex Fergusson: That helps.

The Convener: I am glad that we have got that cleared up.

Aileen McLeod: That is the work that we are keen to take forward with the Crofting Commission.

The Convener: We will move on to croft land mapping.

Angus MacDonald (Falkirk East) (SNP): Good morning, minister. In your opening remarks you briefly acknowledged the issue of croft land mapping requirements. The amendment that has been lodged with regard to croft land mapping will repeal some existing mapping requirements, such as those relating to sewers, pipes, lines and watercourses. The oral evidence that we heard last week broadly supported the amendment. Derek Flyn stated:

"The transfer of ownership of a Highland crofting estate is a massive problem because it tends to be a jigsaw puzzle with lots of pieces removed."—[Official Report, Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee, 18 February 2015; c 34.]
Peter Peacock of Community Land Scotland also warmly welcomed the proposed changes. However, as we might expect, Scottish Land & Estates said in written evidence that the change will affect “inter alia valuations and details of ownership.”

Are valuations and details of ownership likely to be affected by the amendment? Will you clarify how a fair balance between the rights of the landowner and those of crofting communities will be ensured?

Aileen McLeod: To start with your last question, we are maintaining the balance that is there. Obviously, we are improving the process and providing greater flexibility for community bodies. We are trying to streamline and simplify the crofting community right to buy process in line with feedback that we have received from stakeholders. Landowners will still have the opportunity to put their views across and they will still be entitled to compensation. The factors that protect landowners' interests will still be there.

Some feel that the current mapping requirements are not particularly onerous, as they refer to the fact that the information is that which is “known to the applicant body or the existence of which it is, on reasonably diligent inquiry, capable of ascertaining”.

Such information is easier to obtain for small areas of land, where there is less chance of making technical errors in producing maps, but that is certainly thought to be particularly difficult for large crofting estates. The complexity of the maps that are required when submitting a first application to Registers of Scotland is often cited as a reason for community bodies not engaging with the process in the first place. We are keen to remove the complexity of having to include the details of “sewers, pipes, lines, watercourses or other conduits and fences, dykes, ditches or other boundaries”.

However, the maps provided will still have to be sufficiently detailed to allow checks to be made against the ownership of the land in question and, later on, to allow the land to be valued, should the application be approved.

Angus MacDonald: I think that that covers my question. I should reiterate the point that the majority of those who have contributed evidence have broadly welcomed the amendments.

The Convener: We move on to questions about identification of owners, tenants and certain creditors.

Michael Russell (Argyll and Bute) (SNP): Although Scottish Land & Estates is broadly happy with these amendments, everyone else is somewhat unhappy with them, including in particular experts in crofting law.

At the beginning of the meeting, you correctly pointed out that the bill's purpose is not only to empower communities but to remove barriers to the transfer of assets that have beleaguered crofting for a long time now. However, I put it to you that the amendments contain quite a considerable barrier. The obvious change might have been to put the burden on the owner, but as Derek Flynn has rightly pointed out, crofting law essentially depends on the owner being expected to do virtually nothing and the tenant being expected to do virtually everything, and if you put the burden on owners, they might not respond to it.

Have you considered simplifying things further by, for example, requiring the crofting community body to use the best of its endeavours to find out the information, or ensuring that the provision relates only to material that is publicly available? Sometimes there are difficulties with estate ownership in that the beneficial owner of the estate resides a very long way away and they might not be accessible to a community body that is trying to find out about them.

Aileen McLeod: It is important to identify the owner and creditor. After all, we are talking about the purchase of land, and the community needs to purchase it from someone. As Mr Russell quite rightly pointed out, information is readily available from public sources, but in situations in which the owner cannot be identified, the community can refer the land to what is known as the Queen's and Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer for consideration and the community body can enter into discussions about purchasing the land from it. I also point out that the community body need only identify the owners of sporting interests and their tenants if they are purchasing the tenancies and sporting rights separately from the land.

Nevertheless, it is important to remember that, as this is a compulsory purchase of land, an owner must be identified, and that kind of information is readily available from public sources. As I said, though, where an owner cannot be identified, the community can refer the land to the QLTR.

Michael Russell: I want to press you on that point. The issue is not so much that an owner cannot be identified but that it can be pretty difficult to identify the actual ownership of, say, a Highland estate. The chain of ownership can be very complex, and it would help if you could insert some qualification—either into the bill or in guidance—to indicate that, as you have just indicated, best endeavour is expected to apply and that publicly available information is being sought. On the face of it, it seems a pretty tall order for a community body to find out about not only ownership but creditors of one sort or another if the chain of ownership happens to end up on an obscure island somewhere in the Caribbean or, indeed, in a Swiss bank vault.

Aileen McLeod: Do you want to take that, Dave?

Dave Thomson: Finding an owner can sometimes be a tortuous process, but we need to keep in mind that, because we are talking about compulsory purchase, an owner must be found if the land is to be purchased. In some cases, that will not be easy, but the bottom line is that it still has to be done.

On the point about strengthening the guidance, I note that, as far as locating sources of such information is concerned, the right-to-buy team is always there to help the community through the process at any point. The land reform review group recommended the establishment of a community land agency that could assist with that sort of thing as well, and that might happen. That aspect is still up for discussion and out for consultation.

Michael Russell: The issue applies not only to ownership but to standard securities over the land. If I am reading this correctly, you are saying that guidance could be issued that could deal with the issue so that the burden of the situation was understood more accurately by the crofting community and that, therefore, concepts such as “publicly available” or “best endeavours” could be considered.

Dave Thomson: To be honest, I am not sure how far we can go in terms of defining reasonable endeavours.

Michael Russell: The term is “best endeavours”. We were quite firmly warned off “reasonable endeavours” by Derek Flyn and, I think, the Law Society.

The Convener: To be clear, we were warned off “best endeavours” and it was suggested that we use “reasonable endeavours”. Duncan Burd suggested that we might also want to include the words “as may be disclosed in either the register of sasines or the land register of Scotland”. —[Official Report, Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee, 18 February 2015; c 37.]

That is okay, but the point is to lock down who should be within the public knowledge and to avoid the fraudsters. That means that “reasonable” would probably fit the bill. Is that going to be reflected in the bill or the regulations?

Aileen McLeod: We are happy to take that away and consider it.

Michael Russell: That would be helpful, because it would be an area for possible further amendment.

Aileen McLeod: The only other point that I would make is that Registers of Scotland has a commitment to get all the land on to the register within the next 10 years and we are looking at a full modernisation of the land register. That is not happening now, but it will happen in the long term.

We are happy to have a look at the point that has been raised and come back to the committee.

Michael Russell: Thank you—that would be helpful.

The Convener: Graeme Dey has a question about ballot procedures.

Graeme Dey (Angus South) (SNP): The proposed amendments would get us into a situation in which crofting community bodies could, in certain circumstances, seek reimbursement of the costs that are associated with conducting the ballot, but no such option is made available to a community body under part 2 of the 2003 act. Can you outline why we have that differential treatment?

Aileen McLeod: In a part 2 application, where the community body registers a pre-emption to buy, it has to demonstrate community support for the group’s plans by other means, such as a petition. However, when it comes to purchasing the land, a ballot must be held to confirm that the community wishes to go ahead with the purchase. As the crofting community right to buy involves a compulsory purchase, it goes straight into the purchasing stage of the process. It is therefore important that community support for the purchase is demonstrated. The requirements are the same as far as the ballot is concerned; it is just that there is no pre-emptive element or associated petition to demonstrate support.

The main difference is around the funding for the ballot. As part of the changes to the community right to buy, we are proposing that the running of the ballot and the cost of that is met by the Scottish ministers. With regard to the crofting community right to buy, we are proposing that the community should run and fund the ballot in certain circumstances, seek reimbursement of the costs that are associated with conducting the ballot, but no such option is made available to a community body under part 2 of the 2003 act. Can you outline why we have that differential treatment?

Aileen McLeod: The only other point that I would make is that Registers of Scotland has a commitment to get all the land on to the register within the next 10 years and we are looking at a full modernisation of the land register. That is not happening now, but it will happen in the long term.

We are happy to have a look at the point that has been raised and come back to the committee.

The Convener: Dave Thompson has a question about the Land Court.
Dave Thompson (Skye, Lochaber and Badenoch) (SNP): This is a relatively minor point that concerns an issue that was raised last week by the Law Commission. It is about the people who have a right to refer a question to the Land Court. The proposed amendment from the Scottish Government extends that. The Law Commission said—

The Convener: It was the Law Society of Scotland.

Dave Thompson: Sorry, convener. The Law Society said that creditors should also have the right to refer. In a submission, a member of Community Land Scotland made the following point:

“Creditors with a standard security and right to sell the land are irrelevant in a Part 3 situation, because land in crofting tenure is near valueless”.

However, no other witness seemed to be particularly exercised by that. Creditors are included in section 73 of the 2003 act, but they are not included in section 81. Is there any particular reason for that? Is there any merit in what the Law Society suggests?

Aileen McLeod: Section 81(1)(c) of the 2003 act refers to “any person who has any interest in the land … which is legally enforceable”, which would include creditors.

Dave Thompson: So that is the answer. They are included in that broader part of the legislation.

Aileen McLeod: Yes.

Dave Thompson: That is fine. Thank you.

The Convener: We move on to the outcome of an appeal to the Scottish Land Court.

Jim Hume (South Scotland) (LD): Good morning to you, minister, and your officials. The 2003 act allows the Land Court four weeks from a hearing date to give reasons regarding its decision on an evaluation appeal. The amendments to section 92 of the act would make that eight weeks and would allow the Land Court to report on why it was unable to achieve the eight-week target.

What is the rationale for saying that it is beneficial to double the time that the Land Court has and, therefore, the time that people have to wait? Surely, if the court is given double the time, it will take it.

Aileen McLeod: One of the amendments that we propose allows for cross-representations. At the moment, either party is entitled to submit representations to the valuer, and they must be taken into account. It is felt that, to ensure that all relevant information is taken into account, where one party has submitted representations, the other party should be entitled to submit cross-representations. We do not wish to extend the process unduly as a result, so we have imposed a short, two-week period—that is the extension from six to eight weeks—for the parties to consider the initial representations and then submit cross-representations should they wish to do so.

The Land Court requested that the four-week time limit be extended because it can often cause scheduling issues, particularly with complex cases, and it was felt that it was unlikely that a case that had been heard over a number of weeks could be written up in four. However, we also realise that community bodies and owners need clarity about when they might expect a decision. Therefore, although the time limit has been extended and the court has the ability to request that it be extended further, it must give a definite date by which a written decision will be provided.

Jim Hume: What sanctions are available if the Land Court does not achieve the eight-week target? How will you ensure that it reports within that time?

Aileen McLeod: Although there are no powers to impose sanctions should the court not adhere to the timescales, it is felt that it is still important to specify them to give all parties a degree of certainty about when they can reasonably expect a decision. It is not expected that the court will miss those deadlines except in extenuating circumstances.

Jim Hume: So there are no sanctions if the court does not meet the deadline.

Aileen McLeod: That is correct.

Graeme Dey: Do you have any figures for how many times you anticipate the Land Court would miss the target?

Aileen McLeod: I do not have that information with me, but I am happy to take that question away, ask officials to look into it and write to the committee with a response.

The Convener: Are there enough members of the bench of the Land Court to cope with the work in hand? The time that it takes the court to hear such cases might be tied up by, as has been suggested to us, a couple of members of the court being in South Uist to deal with a case there. Should we recommend that there be more members of the Land Court?

Dave Thomson: The change in the timescales was reached through discussion with the Land Court, which was happy with the extension from four to eight weeks and did not ask for a further extension. To be fair, we did not ask whether there was a need to increase the number of members on the bench of the Land Court. We asked it about its schedule and timetables and what it would reasonably expect to be able to comply with.

The Land Court has given us no indication that it is going to miss the eight-week limit. Up to now, as far as we are aware—we will go and check—it has by and large met the four-week limit, although in some cases that has been difficult. The extension will give the court a bit more time, but it still includes a degree of certainty for communities and owners as to when they can expect a decision—it will not just be “mañana”. There are no sanctions to enforce that, but at least it gives some sort of framework.

The Convener: Dave Thompson has a question on mediation.

Dave Thompson: I am sure that you are aware that Scotland is developing a strong reputation for mediation. There are many good mediation services out there and we should encourage them. I know that the Government has been involved in that.

Does the Government have the legal power to insist on mediation in relation to disputes under the legislation? We heard evidence from Community Land Scotland that a number of agencies that support community groups would like to be able to facilitate mediation but do not have the legal power to do so. That could speed up the resolution of disputes. I am not sure what the position of most lawyers would be—it might do them out of some work, but lawyers can get involved in mediation, too.

Mediation is something that we should be moving towards, generally, throughout all the legislation on everything that we do in Scotland. We should be encouraging mediation at every step. I would like a wee bit of clarification as to how you see mediation working in relation to the legislation? We heard evidence from Community Land Scotland that a number of agencies that support community groups would have the power to do so. That could speed up the resolution of disputes. I am not sure what the position of most lawyers would be—it might do them out of some work, but lawyers can get involved in mediation, too.

Aileen McLeod: It is recognised that the majority of crofting community purchases have taken place outwith the 2003 act, using a negotiated settlement between the parties. As we know, those negotiations can often be difficult and it is recognised that there may be a need for support.

The Scottish Government is forming a short-life working group as part of the work on achieving the target of 1 million acres in community ownership. That work will inform the potential functions and role of a community land agency, which was one of the recommendations of the LRRG, and one of the agency’s functions could be to assist with mediation. Mediation is voluntary and it is thought that investigating the options through that route would allow for much better consideration of the issues and the best solution.

On Mr Thompson’s point about legal powers, I will be honest and say that I am not sure what the answer is. We will check and get back to the committee on that point.

Dave Thompson: That was very helpful, minister. Mediation is voluntary, but it would help for it to be made clear in the legislation that it is favoured and that the community bodies that are assisting community groups will have the power to suggest it and push people towards it, instead of just leaving it as an ephemeral thing.

I appreciate your response, minister, and I look forward to hearing from you once you have checked the situation.

The Convener: Thank you. We will move on from crofting community bodies to general community empowerment in relation to abandoned and neglected land.

Sarah Boyack (Lothian) (Lab): Thank you for sending us the draft regulations for this part of the bill, minister. That has been incredibly helpful. I am sure that I will not be the last member to ask questions on this part, because the committee spent quite a lot of time discussing the issue before our stage 1 report. That was partly because of the weight of the evidence that we received from key stakeholders, but it was also because of the policy intent of the bill.

The policy memorandum is clear about the Government’s objective. It states:

“Land that is neglected or abandoned can be a barrier to the sustainable development of land” and that the bill’s objective is to enable communities to have the opportunity to buy that land when other routes to getting access to its better use have failed. We have concerns that the phrase “neglected and abandoned” is mentioned in the bill, but sustainable development is not.

I want to kick off on the definition of “neglected and abandoned”. In her response to us, the minister said that “neglected” and “abandoned” take “their ordinary meaning” and are not to be defined in the bill. To paraphrase, she basically said that it is obvious to everybody what the terms “neglected” and “abandoned” mean.

My worry is that the matter is not that straightforward, whether the area is urban or rural. Everybody says that it is obvious in an urban area but not so obvious in a rural area. I have represented an urban area for quite a while. Even in that context, illustrating whether land has been neglected or abandoned is not necessarily straightforward.
You have said that circumstances will be set out in the regulations, but if a community wanted to establish that something is neglected, for example, what would happen if minor works had taken place on the land? What about works just to make a building safe and secure but not necessarily used? What about the question of whether planning applications are regularly submitted? There are questions about the issues of abandonment and neglect and how bad something has to be before ministers would consider it.

It is a concern that “neglected” and “abandoned” are not defined in the bill and that the policy ambition is to achieve sustainable development but that does not appear in the bill. What do you think about the representations that we made in our committee report? Why have you not felt able to date to take them on board and to agree to putting a statutory definition in the bill and using the words “sustainable development”, as you did in the policy memorandum?

Aileen McLeod: Perhaps I can first make some general points on the draft regulations. At the moment, the draft regulations illustrate the sort of thing that could be put into the regulations. We are trying to bring clarity to neglected and abandoned land, and we have tried to take on board the committee’s concerns. If the committee has any suggestions or ideas about what else could be put into the regulations, I will be very happy for you to feed them into the Government at this stage.

The introduction of proposed part 3A of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003, which relates to the right of communities to buy land that is abandoned or neglected, even against the wishes of its current owner, is a very important step. It will allow land that is neglected or abandoned to be brought back into productive use while ensuring that it is developed in a sustainable way for the benefit of the community. I accept that that is not as big a step as some would hope for, but it is an important one, as it will allow communities with clear plans for neglected or abandoned land to make a case for community ownership.

There is the example of the Cuningar loop. That is not exactly the same thing, but it provides an example of the sort of opportunity there can be from the change that can be made to the land. The Forestry Commission has brought into use a derelict site at the heart of the Clyde gateway area, where it has created an inspiring and accessible riverside woodland park on the boundary between South Lanarkshire Council and Glasgow City Council.

As I said, that situation is not exactly the same, but it is an example of the kind of opportunity that communities could have to change land for the better by using the proposed power in relation to abandoned or neglected land. The proposal is not only a demonstration of the Government’s ambition to further community empowerment; it is another step in Scotland’s land reform agenda.

We have listened carefully to the committee’s concerns and those that have been raised by stakeholders. We have taken legal advice on whether amendments could be made to the bill to address the concerns that the committee raised in its stage 1 report. There are several aspects that we must take into account in deciding what appears in the bill. We must ensure that the amendments to the bill are within the competence of the Scottish Parliament. That includes ensuring that they comply with the European convention on human rights, which provides a right to peaceful enjoyment of possessions. We must also ensure that the right to buy will be compatible and concordant with the law in pursuing a legitimate aim in a proportionate way.

I want to be as helpful as I can in helping the committee to understand the legal context. We will actively consider whether amendments can be made to the definition of eligible land to include land that is not neglected or abandoned but which is still causing problems.

Sarah Boyack: Thank you very much. That was very helpful.

Quite a few stakeholders have raised an issue about the term “sustainable development”. I note what you said about legal force and legal understanding, but the term “sustainable development” regularly appears in Scottish Government bills. If the terms “neglected” and “abandoned” are used and the objective of ensuring sustainable development is seen in the use of the land, what could the legal objection be? “Sustainable development” is a term that is understood and is being used in the courts.

I very much welcome the fact that what is proposed is a step on the way to ensuring that land is used in a way that supports sustainable development and I support the Scottish Government’s intentions, but the worry is that, if clear definitions are not provided and the term “sustainable development” is not included in the bill, that might cut across the ambition that you have in the policy memorandum to make a difference in many of our communities.

Aileen McLeod: I will ask Stephen Pathirana to come in on that.

Stephen Pathirana (Scottish Government): Thank you, minister.

A lot depends on exactly what is changed in the drafting. The present proposals relate to neglected and abandoned land. Depending on what the committee recommends, if we were to remove the reference to neglected and abandoned land from the bill, that would represent a complete change in the scope of the proposal. It would mean that, rather than covering just neglected and abandoned land, it would cover all land. That is a completely different proposal.

When such a fundamental shift is made, it is necessary to think carefully about all the checks and balances that are in place that make legislation compliant. We would be dealing with a different and new proposal.

The proposal focuses on sustainable development in the context of what the community proposes to do with the land. When you talk about including the term “sustainable development” in the bill, if it is about what the community wants to do as opposed to the condition of the land, that is a fundamental shift in the scope of the proposal, and one that changes its meaning.

Sarah Boyack: If you were to be able to define the terms “neglected” and “abandoned” in the bill, would that not go some way to reassuring the communities that are worried that the test of whether land is neglected or abandoned might cut across what the Government hopes to do in giving land a use that supports sustainable development?

Stephen Pathirana: We have thought very hard—and we continue to do so—about the merits of defining “neglected” and “abandoned” in the legislation. Any attempt to define those terms would invariably narrow the definition. I think that the question that the committee is interested in is how broad the criteria for land that is eligible can be made.

As the minister said earlier, we are thinking about whether there is scope to go beyond abandoned and neglected land to other land with which there are problems. We need to look at whether we can introduce amendments that would take the scope further than it is at present but at the same time not extend it to all and any land in Scotland.

Although we are not including a definition in the bill, the idea is that we can introduce regulations that set out what issues ministers should consider. That will help to define what we mean by neglected and abandoned land. In a way, that has greater flexibility because, if it is found not to be working quite as well as Parliament wants, it can be amended. If we included a definition in the bill, it would be very hard to make changes to it.

Michael Russell: This is a very important discussion, and we are all trying to find the right solution. It might be helpful to step back for a moment and ask, “What is the right solution?”

The right solution is to enable communities to possess—to buy—land that they wish to use for purposes of sustainable development. If we get this wrong one way or the other, that will not happen. It will not happen because it will be frustrated by lawyers who want it not to happen and owners who do not want to sell. We need clarity in case the bill is challenged, because judicial review does happen and reference under ECHR could happen. If we do not get it right, this is the proposal that will prevent communities from participating in the right to buy.

The question is this: is it better to include a definition in the bill and have it challenged but at least be absolutely clear about the meaning, or is it better to leave the bill as giving the words what you have euphemistically called “their ordinary meaning”—though they are capable of many ordinary meanings—and another legal meaning?

That is really quite worrying, because there is a specific legal meaning to “abandoned and neglected land” that you are not applying here. In those circumstances, if you leave the bill as it is, will the challenges be successful because of the vagueness in the legislation? In the greater part—it was not unanimous—the committee believed that it was very important that we tied the definition down as clearly as possible so that communities could use the legislation effectively. That is what we are still struggling to do.

While I am pleased to see these fundamental and radical steps to change land ownership, there is an issue about whether they should be defined in secondary legislation or whether they should be defined clearly as a legislative intention of the Parliament in primary legislation. I do not think that we are there yet; although the regulations are helpful, it is important that we get a clearer definition in the bill.

What Sarah Boyack has been trying to do, quite correctly, is point to sustainable development as one possible area in which we could get a clearer definition. I think that amendments will be brought forward on the issue, and I would urge the Government to think about that, because we are all trying to help each other to get absolute clarity so that the intention for a radical step forward will be fulfilled in practice.

We know from the land reform legislation that many of the difficulties that existed, including some that I have been dealing with in recent weeks, are because the legislation is not as clear as it should be and there are difficulties in operating it. We have learned from that, so the question is: can we keep moving in this legal debate?

My contribution to that debate is that I think that we need a clear definition and we need the term “sustainable development”. Work that has been done by Community Land Scotland to suggest a way to frame the definition should be seriously considered by the Government’s lawyers. I think that there will be an amendment at stage 2. If that amendment were to be seriously considered by the Government’s lawyers, we might get ourselves to the stage at which we could all eventually agree.

Aileen McLeod: We appreciate the committee’s support and its work in the area, and we are actively considering what is possible from the Government’s side. The consultation on the draft land reform bill asks the question:

“Do you agree that there should be powers given to Scottish Ministers or another public body to direct private landowners to take action to overcome barriers to sustainable development in an area?”

The responses to the consultation are currently being analysed, but we are considering right now what other amendments could be lodged.

Michael Russell: That is helpful, minister. I am grateful for that. You are saying that the debate can continue and that you will look at possible amendments and keeping thinking about how we can make the proposal effective so that it does not present a difficulty but fulfils your policy intention, which is warmly endorsed by the majority of the committee.

Aileen McLeod: Yes.

Dave Thompson: It strikes me that the broader the definition, as outlined by Stephen Pathirana, the more room there is for challenge, but that is counter to what you have said. The people who are happy with the current proposal are the ones who do not want change in relation to a community’s right to buy land, and that is significant. We should look at the folk who support the change and look at the folk who are content with the current situation. That is just a comment to kick off with.

Minister, I would like a wee bit of clarity on what you said about the legal advice. You mentioned the competence of the Parliament and the ECHR. You said that, if the definition was on the face of the bill, there would be greater difficulties and problems for us. I do not understand—I am not a lawyer, so maybe Stephen Pathirana can help me with this—why you think that the definition would create problems if it were on the face of the bill but not if it appeared later in regulations. What is the difference between those two things? Why are you confident that you can put something in the regulations that you feel you cannot put in the bill?

Stephen Pathirana: First, I am not a lawyer either—let us get that clear.

Dave Thompson: My apologies.

Stephen Pathirana: Nevertheless, I will do my best to answer your question.

There is still some confusion about the different things that we are talking about in relation to the proposal. There is the issue of the type of land that we are talking about and how the words “neglected” and “abandoned” relate to the land. There is then the issue of whether the community has a proposal and a case for taking ownership of the land. Those are different things.

When we are talking about the type of land, the question is about what definition describes the land as it is now. My initial understanding is that the committee was suggesting that, if we removed the words “abandoned and neglected”, the provision would then mean all land. However, all land is very different from a specific class of land. Even when we are talking about crofting communities, we mean a specific type of land with specific rights that already apply in relation to it—it is different from other land. We need to be clear about what land we are talking about, and we are using the words “neglected” and “abandoned” to describe the land that we mean.

Although I accept that we are talking about the normal definition of “neglected” and “abandoned”, which ultimately—as with all groundbreaking legislation—will be defined by case law, we anticipate that that definition will probably be broader than any definition that we would articulate. Invariably, when you start trying to articulate things, you end up narrowing them down—that is the risk. We could define it down, but the definition would be narrower rather than wider.

It would be a substantive change in direction if the proposal were to make the sustainable development of communities the key factor in driving decisions about which land was eligible. That would be the communities deciding, which would be a huge change. In developing the current proposal, all the checks and balances in relation to “neglected or abandoned” land have been carefully thought through. Essentially, that would all have to be thought through again.

One could argue that, in the context of the consultation on land reform, the proposal for giving ministers the power to intervene where the actions of a landowner are detrimental to the sustainable development of communities—in which the committee is really interested—requires a lot of careful thought about how we design a mechanism that is compliant and that pays regard to landowners’ and communities’ interests. From a landowner’s point of view, such an intervention must be adequately foreseeable. They would have to understand what they must do to bring their land back into good use and make it sustainable. Making a shift like that would be a huge change at this stage in the process.

We can go away and look at the scope for bringing greater clarity to the provision on “neglected or abandoned” land and for extending it to other land with which there are problems. However, extending the provision to all land is a bigger step.

Dave Thompson: That is very helpful and useful. I apologise for calling Mr Pathirana a lawyer earlier.

Stephen Pathirana: I will take it.

Dave Thompson: As we have said, the committee has proposed that the provision be taken out altogether, but I can see that there might be arguments for leaving it in.

Let us assume that the provision—which keeps things tight and does not extend to all land; I fully understand that point—is kept in the bill. Does it not logically follow that, if the reference to “neglected or abandoned” land is on the face of the bill, having a definition in the bill would strengthen your hand even more, especially if that definition made it clear that the whole purpose of the provision was to do with sustainability and sustainable land?

Rather than just referring to “neglected or abandoned” land in the text of the bill—which in a sense clarifies that there is a tight definition—with the regulations following, it would strengthen the bill and make things very clear to everybody if we also included the sustainable development aspects in the text of the bill. That would mean that we were really defining the concept and being much more precise. Am I right about that?

Stephen Pathirana: Possibly. Putting a clear definition in the bill would certainly make the provision more precise, but it would invariably be narrower. It would have to relate to the sustainability and condition of the land as opposed to the sustainable aspirations of the community, and those are different things—there is a big difference.

There is scope in regulations to allow us greater flexibility to get the definition right over time in a way that putting a definition in the text of the bill would not. Including a definition might pin the concept down and offer less flexibility.

Dave Thompson: I take that point, but the whole purpose of the provision is to ensure that land is used to its best advantage, and that sustainable development of land is progressed so that land is not just lying there doing nothing and not benefiting anyone other than someone who has bought it as an investment.

I agree that the definition would have to relate to the sustainable development of the land, and that is fine, but that would be in the interests of the community. If there is a bit of land lying there doing nothing because someone has bought it as an investment to hedge against inflation or whatever, and the community would like more housing, business parks, hydro schemes or something like that, the community would be able to come in and argue that the land was not being used sustainably and that it had a way of ensuring that the land would be used in a sustainable way. The community could present a business plan and give all the detail—along the lines of the Pairc judgment, for instance.

I am quite comfortable with the definition being in the text of the bill to make it clear, because what I have described is what we are seeking to do. A lot of land in the Highlands is sterilised and is not being used to best effect, and we need to change that.

Stephen Pathirana: Can I come back on one small point, convener?

The Convener: Yes, briefly. It is a debate. Alex Fergusson and Mike Russell want to come in, and so do I.

Stephen Pathirana: The provisions that we are discussing do not apply to the crofting districts. In essence, the crofting community right to buy is a broader right than that which would apply in other areas. In all the situations in the Highlands that Dave Thompson mentioned, the crofting community right to buy is the vehicle that would be used.

Dave Thompson: Not all of the Highlands is under crofting tenure.

The Convener: Exactly—only some districts are.

Alex Fergusson can go next.

Alex Fergusson: First, I thank Mr Pathirana for confirming—I think—that the committee’s recommendations in the area that we are discussing would, in effect, introduce an absolute right to buy for all land, which is what is creating the difficulty—

The Convener: No.

Alex Fergusson: Well, Mr Pathirana said that the recommendations would open up the possibility of the right to buy covering all land. Is that right?

The Convener: That was a mistake on his part.

Stephen Pathirana: If we do not provide a definition of the land, we will, in effect, be talking about all land.

Alex Fergusson: If you did as the committee recommended, that would be the case. Is that what you are saying?
Stephen Pathirana: If we removed the definition of “neglected or abandoned” land.

Alex Fergusson: I thank you for that clarification, because that is why I dissented from that section of the committee’s report.

My question is to the minister. Can you confirm that it remains the Government’s intention that the power should be used only as a last resort when all other processes have failed?

Aileen McLeod: Yes.

Alex Fergusson: Thank you. That is all that I need to know.

Michael Russell: Perhaps I should have come in before Alex Fergusson, because I wanted to say to Stephen Pathirana that I do not think that the committee intended that the recommendation to remove the words should open up all land to purchase. I can see that that might be the logical inference, but it was not the committee’s intention. I think that I am right in saying that about the recommendation from the discussion that took place.

The committee’s intention was to ensure that the opportunity would exist to purchase land that was “abandoned or neglected”, but getting a definition of that land has proved to be very difficult. I do not think that there is any intention to open up all land for purchase. Some might argue that that would be the right thing to do, but that is another debate.

The committee’s intention is to fulfil the Government’s policy intention, and the debate is about whether further definition of those words is required in the bill in order to do so. That is what we should focus on. There is no intention to go wider and, if that was to become the debate, that would—as we have just seen—not help the Government to fulfil its intention. Criticising what the committee did is perhaps not the road to go down.

The Convener: I see that the minister takes that point.

I want to focus specifically on the fact that we are talking about “eligible land”, as has been mentioned. “Eligible land” excludes agricultural land that has been kept in good condition, low-intensity-use land that has been agreed and so on. The term “abandoned or neglected” therefore applies to a limited amount of land: it does not apply to all land. Can you confirm that, please?

Aileen McLeod: That is set out in the draft regulations, which list the matters to which we must have regard in deciding whether land is eligible. They fall into three broad categories. The first is “the physical condition of the land and its effect on the surrounding area, public safety and the environment”.

The second is “the use of the land, or lack of use as the case may be, including whether the land is a nature reserve, held for conservation purposes or used for public recreation”.

The third refers to “any designation or classification of the land, such as land which has been classed as contaminated land, or buildings which are listed buildings or scheduled monuments.”

The Convener: Thank you for that confirmation. It is a good explanation of areas in which there should be some discretion so that assessment can be made.

Minister, you should be aware that, whatever arrangements are finally agreed by the Parliament, those who have a landowning interest will cite the ECHR. In an article in this month’s Scottish Field—a 26-page assessment of land reform—the editor, Richard Bath, states that “it is almost inconceivable that any reform will not be challenged legally.”

We live in a world in which, whatever move is made, we can expect that some means will be found to challenge it in court—that is the reality. If that is true, we are moving into an area in which people will take entrenched positions because they are not prepared to accept the situation. Before the ECHR, the crofting right to buy was accepted, but it looks as though there will be a challenge to the community right to buy whatever happens.

When are you going to respond to our stage 1 report? We need to see that response. In the report, human rights and equalities are dealt with in the following way. The ECHR is set against article 11 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights. Malcolm Combe suggested that, when the two are put together, we are led to talk about matters that lead to thinking about property and the sustainable use of land. If we are going to fulfil the requirements for food, housing, sanitation and so on, we must see the land as being sustainable. We are trying to suggest that it would be a good idea to find a way in which to test the ECHR against the United Nations covenant. If a court is faced with a situation in which someone has challenged our decision on the basis that the ECHR has been breached, will you be prepared to push the covenant that the UK has been signed up to since the 1970s as overriding the ECHR?

The Scotland Act 1998 says that we are responsible for ECHR issues. Given that there will almost certainly be challenges in the courts, is it not time that we went back with something that overrides the ECHR?
Stephen Pathirana: We can get back to the committee with a further response to that question. In all cases, we have to find a way of articulating clearly the public interest and balancing it with the rights of individuals and communities in any process such as that involving the crofting community right to buy. The proposal on neglected land tries to do that.

The committee should reflect on the fact that those things are probably all possible, but we need to make sure that the checks and balances that are set out in a proposal achieve the outcome in a fair and balanced way. In what we have proposed so far on neglected land, we think that we have struck the right balance, subject to some further thinking about the definition of “neglected or abandoned” land. If we were to broaden the proposal out to other areas where we wanted to take action, we would need to think that through in a broader context. We are thinking about the issues in the context of the land reform consultation and where else the Government might choose to go.

Aileen McLeod: I reassure the committee that we are considering all of that right now to see how we can broaden the definition. The Government’s response to the committee’s stage 1 report was sent this morning, so the committee should have received it.

The Convener: Thank you for that. I am just suggesting that you should take seriously the context in which we are working. If we are to achieve something lasting, we will have to take into account the moving platform on which we work. The consultation document talks about land reform in Scotland being for the common good—it uses a phrase like that. That suggests that the common good overrides that of individual current landholders. It seems to me that, if that balance is to be reflected in the proposed amendments on the definition of “neglected or abandoned” land, you should take that on board.

Aileen McLeod: We are happy to do so.

The Convener: Do members have any further points to make? I hope not, because we have gone round the houses on the issue. I hope that this has been a constructive way of dealing with the matter.

Minister, I thank you and your colleagues for your evidence. I hope that the Government will be able to meet our wishes and that, when we read your response, some of it will become clearer.

We will have a short suspension because we have a big group of witnesses coming in and we need a wee break.

Explanatory Notes

Introduction

These notes have been prepared by the Scottish Government in order to assist the reader of the amendments and to help inform debate on them. They have not been endorsed by the Parliament. The notes should be read in conjunction with the amendments and the sections of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 which they propose to amend.

Policy aim of Part 4 amendments

The attached proposed amendments amend the Crofting Community Right to Buy provided for in Part 3 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003.

The proposed amendments are intended to provide greater flexibility for community bodies and streamline the crofting community right to buy process in line with feedback received from stakeholder groups.

Background

It is over 10 years since the introduction of the Crofting Community Right to Buy provided for in the Land Reform (Scotland) Act in 2003 (“2003 Act”).

During these 10 years, the Scottish Government have observed how the provisions have worked in practice and, with stakeholders’ assistance, have identified ways in which they can be improved. A range of proposed amendments are summarised below. The purpose of the proposed amendments is to make the Crofting Community Right to Buy easier for crofting communities to use, while at the same time continuing to strike a fair balance between the rights of landowners and crofting communities.

A Call for Evidence, published on 13/10/2014, sought views from key stakeholders on these proposed amendments. This was followed by a number of face-to-face meetings with key stakeholders which took place in Edinburgh, Inverness, Isle of Harris and Kyle of Lochalsh during December 2014.

SPECIFIC AMENDMENTS – PART 4 OF COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT BILL

Sections 71 and 72 - Legal structure of community body

The proposed amendments will broaden the range of legal organisations that can be a crofting community body (CCB). This is to include Scottish Charitable Incorporated Organisations (SCIOs) and Community Benefit Companies (BenComs) that meet certain requirements. Currently a CCB must be a company limited by guarantee that meets certain requirements.

This proposed amendment will provide greater flexibility for community bodies to adopt a legal entity which best suits their circumstances.

This proposed amendment will also bring Part 3 into alignment with proposed amendments to Part 2 (community right to buy) and Part 3A (the proposed new right to buy abandoned or neglected land without a willing seller) of the 2003 Act.

In addition, the proposed amendment will insert a section 71(A1)(b) which will give Ministers a regulation-making power to provide for different types of bodies to be eligible crofting community bodies.

Section 71 - Removal of provision for auditing of accounts

The proposed amendments remove the requirement that a company limited by guarantee can only be a CCB if its articles of association include provision for the auditing of accounts. Such a company will still be required to make proper arrangements for its financial management.

The reason for this proposed amendment is that it has been indicated by some community bodies that they believe they are required to have formal audits of accounts prepared in order to comply with the 2003 Act, which is not the case.

Section 71 - Amend definition of ‘crofting community’

The proposed amendments would amend the definition of a ‘crofting community’ in section 71(5) to capture more crofters who are excluded by the existing legislation. It is recognised that the existing definition of a crofting community may cause difficulties in a number of ways and may not include all those who would consider themselves to be members of the crofting community.

The proposed amendment includes owner-occupier crofters who are registered on Registers of Scotland’s Crofting Register within the definition of the crofting community, but does not include those on the Crofting Commission’s Register of Crofts at this point in time. The proposed amendment gives Ministers a regulation-making power to expand the definition of crofting community at a later date. Such expansion could include owner-occupier crofters who are registered in the Register of Crofts.
Section 73 - Croft land mapping

The proposed amendments simplify the mapping information that a CCB is required to provide about the land that it wishes to purchase. The existing mapping requirements are recognised as being particularly complex as a CCB is required to map areas including all sewers, pipes, lines, watercourses etc. In addition to the map, the CCB is also required to provide a written account of all such features on the land, and their locations.

The proposed amendment will simplify mapping requirements to a more reasonable level than current requirements, because it has been evident during stakeholder consultation that the current requirements are considered to be particularly complex. The required information to be on the application form will still be set out in Ministerial regulations, but these regulations are no longer obliged to specify that all rights and interests in the subjects of the application are identified – instead they must specify that all rights and interests in the subjects of the application that are known to the community body are specified. In addition the requirement that the required information must include sewers, pipes, lines, watercourses or other conduits and fences, dykes, ditches or other boundaries in or on the land will be removed.

Section 73 - Public notice of application

The proposed amendments will amend the way in which Ministers are required to give public notice of an application. Current provisions require Scottish Ministers to publish a public notice advertising the crofting community body’s right to buy application under Part 3 of the 2003 Act. The 2003 Act requires the advertisement to be placed in a newspaper circulating in the area where the land or interests the crofting community body wishes to acquire are located, and in the Edinburgh Gazette.

The intention is that Ministers should still be required to give public notice, by advertisement, of an application by a crofting community body under Part 3 of the Act. The proposed amendments provides that the form of the advertisement be set out in regulations made by Ministers.

This proposed amendment provides greater flexibility and allows more appropriate forms of advertisement to be used according to the individual circumstances of the case. It might be the case that advertising in the local church or village hall will reach a wider community audience than an advert placed in a newspaper circulating in the local area.

Sections 74(1) and 97B - Identification of owner, tenants and certain creditors

The proposed amendments add to the conditions set out in section 74(1) of the Act to provide that, in order to consent to an application under Part 3, Ministers must be satisfied that the owner, tenant, person entitled to sporting interests, or creditor in a standard security in relation to that land or interests, are correctly identified in the application submitted by the crofting community body.
This proposed amendment will ensure that all relevant parties to the application are correctly identified in order for the application to proceed. This will also ensure that all parties to the application are fully involved in the process and will be given the opportunity to comment on the application. This will ensure that Ministers will have received all available evidence on which to make a decision on the crofting community right to buy application.

Section 75 - Ballot procedure

(1) A ballot of the crofting community must be undertaken by the crofting community body in order to indicate where or not there is community support for the proposal to buy the land to be purchased under Part 3. Ministers already have power to make regulations setting out how the ballot is to be conducted.

The proposed amendments inserts a specific power for Ministers to make regulations setting out the information that the crofting community body is required to provide to Ministers about the ballot, or any consultation that the crofting community body may have held with the community about their application.

(2) The crofting community body are already responsible for paying for the cost of the ballot. The proposed amendment expressly states that the crofting community body is liable for meeting the expense of conducting the ballot.

(3) The proposed amendments also insert a power for Ministers to make regulations setting out circumstances in which the CCB may apply to Ministers to recover the cost of conducting the ballot.

The proposed amendments provide clarity and confirm that it is the crofting community body who is liable for the cost of the ballot, and that the CCB may, in certain circumstances, seek reimbursement of the cost of conducting the ballot.

The proposed amendments also give Ministers flexibility to request additional information in connection with the ballot, if Ministers feel that additional information would be helpful in the decision-making process.

Section 76 - Right to buy exercisable by only one crofting community body

When more than one CCB applies to purchase the same land, Ministers must decide which application is to proceed and the other applications are extinguished.

If an application is extinguished Ministers have to notify the owner of the land, person entitled to the sporting interests or tenant, as the case may be, and the CCB of this.

The proposed amendments provide that Ministers should also be required to notify each person who was invited to give views on the applications that have been extinguished.

This will ensure that all parties to the applications who were invited to comment on the applications are notified when an application is extinguished.
Section 81 - Reference to Land Court

Currently, the 2003 Act lists certain persons who have a right to refer a question to the Land Court at any time before Ministers reach a decision on an application.

The proposed amendment extends the list of certain persons who have a right to refer a question to the Land Court before Ministers reach a decision on an application.

The proposed amendment will ensure that all parties to an application have the right to refer a question to the Land Court.

Section 88 - Valuation

(1) In carrying out the valuation of land to be purchased by the CCB the valuer is required to invite the landowner, person entitled to the sporting interests in the land, or tenant as the case may be, and the CCB to make representations as to the value of the land.

Where such representations are made the proposed amendments provide that there should be an opportunity to make counter-representations.

(2) The proposed amendments provide that the timescale for valuation of the land to be purchased is increased from 6 weeks to 8 weeks (this can still be extended by Ministers) to provide the valuer with more time to complete the valuation and carry out the counter-representation step.

This will ensure that the valuer takes account of all parties’ views to the application, is furnished with all information relevant to the valuation, and has adequate time to complete the valuation process.

Section 89 - Compensation

The proposed amendments extend the power for Ministers to make an order about the compensation payable by a CCB in relation to an application to purchase land. Compensation is payable to those who have incurred loss or expense in connection with the crofting community right to buy application to recover the amount of that loss by way of compensation.

This will enable Ministers to make further provision, should it be considered appropriate, about the compensation payable.

The proposed amendment will enable Ministers to make further regulations, should they be required, to ensure those who have incurred loss or expense in connection with the crofting community right to buy application are properly compensated for the loss or expense.

Section 92 - Outcome of appeal to Land Court

Where there is an appeal to the Land Court in respect of the valuation, the Land Court is required to give their reasons in writing within 4 weeks of the hearing date. The proposed amendments change the 4 week time limit to 8 weeks.
In addition, the proposed amendments provide that, should the Land Court be unable to meet the 8 week time limit, the Land Court is to notify all parties of the date on which the Court will provide a written decision.

This proposed amendment eases the burden on the Land Court and gives the Land Court more flexibility when scheduling its caseload. In providing a date on which the Land Court will report should it be unable to report within 8 weeks, this will provide assurance to all parties of when the decision will be received.

The Crofting Community Right to Buy - February 2014

Further Evidence to the RACCE Committee in response to Scottish Government proposals to amend Part 3 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003.

Introduction

Community Land Scotland, among others, was consulted by the Scottish Government in November on their then proposals to amend Part 3 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003. This submission of evidence is that sent to the Scottish Government at that time.

Generally speaking, and while recognising concerns raised by the RACCE Committee in their Stage 1 Report about the process followed which give rise to consideration now about Part 3 of the Land reform Act, Community Land Scotland would want to re-assure the Committee that the Scottish Government consultation has been well received across the range of stakeholders and has provided ways forward which appear well targeted. We would not wish concerns about procedures to prevent the proposals for change the Committee is now having the opportunity to scrutinise, to prevent the welcome improvements that are being proposed.

1st November 2003 Evidence to Scottish Government

Community Land Scotland is pleased to be able to respond to the consultation questions on the above consultation in the following terms.

Community Land Scotland (CLS) strongly advocates the need for changes to Part 3 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 in order to make its use simpler and fairer, while maintaining appropriate rigour to test what is in the public interest and furthers sustainable development.

CLS is conscious that others have insights into the challenges of the current Part 3. In particular Highlands and Islands Enterprise, but also experienced advisors to community owners, such as Simon Fraser. CLS is aware that Simon Fraser submitted evidence to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee on Part 3 and we commend his analysis of the issues and urge it is taken most seriously. In addition, John Randall, of Pairc Trust who have unrivalled experience of the practical issues, also submitted evidence in a personal capacity, and again we commend that evidence.

CLS has gained particular insights into the Pairc case and how the final reconciliation of positions represented in the level of agreement now reached between owner and community was achieved. Though yet to be finally concluded, the advanced stage of agreement now achieved was only reached by a process of voluntary mediation between the parties. While on this occasion that was possible, partly because of the physical location of the parties and the `mediator’, it is not appropriate to leave such matters to chance and it would be helpful if this facility was available to all communities and owners in future, should the need arise. This points to a simple power being given to Ministers to be able make suitable arrangements for such mediation, if requested to do so. That power currently does not exist and would be a helpful addition to wider simplification measures around Part 3 as set out in the Appendices to this submission (this could have application to part 2 as well).

For completeness, we attach as Appendices previous evidence we have given on issues around Part 3, much of this is overtaken by the current proposals, but not all of which have been picked up by the questions in the consultation.

CLS will be happy to provide such further additional information or clarifications as may be requested.

Responses to consultation questions

Question 1. The Scottish Government proposes to allow SCIOs and BenComs to be crofting community bodies in addition to companies limited by guarantee. Do you agree with this proposal? Are there any other types of body which you think should be permitted to be a crofting community body?

Agree with proposal, with Ministers having a power to add such other types of body as they may see fit to give future flexibility.

Question 2. The Scottish Government proposes removing the requirement for the auditing of accounts to be included in a company limited by guarantee’s articles of association in order for it to be a crofting community body. This proposal would bring Part 3 of the Act in line with proposed amendments to Part 2 of the Act. Do you agree with this proposal?

Agree.

Question 3. The Scottish Government proposes expanding the definition of a crofting community. Do you agree with the proposal? Do you think this is a more accurate description of a crofting community?

Generally agree. However, very few crofts will be registered on the new register for some time to come. Instead, or in combination, the Commission’s existing Register should be used.

A further potentially complicating circumstance that should be considered is where the number of crofting tenants or owner occupiers registered outweigh those actually resident within the immediate area. It is not clear whether this circumstance may arise, but it potentially could.

Question 4. The Scottish Government proposes amending the existing mapping requirements which must be included in a Crofting Community Body’s application. Do you agree with this proposal?

Agree, although it will be important to see the final and specific proposed wording of the change.

Question 5. The crofting community body’s right to buy application must be advertised by Ministers by placing a public notice in a newspaper circulating in the area where the land or interests are located, and in the Edinburgh Gazette. The Scottish Government proposes that public notice of the crofting community body’s right to buy application continues to be given by Ministers by advertisement, but that the form of this advertisement be set out in regulations. What is your view on this proposal?

Agree.

Question 6. The Scottish Government proposes that the owner, tenant, person titled to sporting interests, (depending on the nature of land or interests that the application relates to) and any creditor in a standard security in relation to that land or interests are correctly identified in the application form in order for Ministers to consent to the crofting community body’s application. What are your comments on the proposal?

It does not seem an unreasonable proposition for a community to use all its best endeavours to accurately identify owner, person, etc…. However, the question arises of what would happen if the owner, person, etc … could not, even after all reasonable steps had been taken by the community, be identified. This could arise by virtue of some of the complex and potentially overseas arrangements that can be put in place to hide ownership and beneficial interest, or simply by the passage of time, complex and dispersed ownership arrangements that can follow from one time changes in ownership.
The same comment can be made about the Section 3A, which this proposal is designed to align with, and which Parliament has yet to consider. It is not clear why this change is necessary either for Part 3A or for this proposed section. This proposal would only be acceptable if accompanied by a provision to allow Ministers to, notwithstanding this provision, grant consent when they are satisfied that the community has taken all reasonable steps to identify the owner, person, etc …, but have been unable to do so.

Question 7. The Scottish Government proposes Ministers having a specific power to make regulations setting out the information that the crofting community body is required to provide to Ministers about the ballot, or any consultation that the crofting community body may have held with the community about their application. The crofting community body already are responsible for paying for the cost of the ballot.
The Scottish Government proposes to expressly state in the Act that the crofting community body is liable for meeting the expense of conducting the ballot. What are your comments on the proposals?

The proposals in the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill regarding Part
2 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 makes provision for the Scottish Government to in future take responsibility for the balloting arrangements and pay for such. As a matter of principle, this proposal was not seen as one of simply making it easier for the community body, it was also seen as a proposal which could ensure the proper conduct of any such ballot and which therefore provided re-assurance to the parties concerned and for the wider public interest. These latter reasons would apply equally and might even be seen to be more important to the conduct of ballots in the crofting community and in circumstances where there was not a willing seller. There is therefore a case for the same provisions as it is proposed will apply to Part 2 (through revisions in CEB) to apply to this part. If the concern was simply one that in such circumstances Government would be funding a ballot on what was a 'compulsory' sale, this could be readily justified as being appropriate to ensure proper conduct and public confidence in the conduct of such a ballot.

Question 8. The Scottish Government proposes that, when an application is extinguished under section 76, Ministers should be required to notify each person invited to give views on the application. This proposal aligns Part 3 with the proposed Part 3A of the Act. What is your view on this proposal?

Agreed.

Question 9. The Scottish Government proposes clarifying the certain persons listed in section 81(1) of the Act who may refer a question to the Land Court at any time before Ministers reach a decision on an application made under Part 3. What is your view on this proposal?

This does not seem unreasonable.

Question 10. The Scottish Government proposes increasing the timescale in which the valuer must notify the value of the land from 6 weeks to 8 weeks. Do you agree with this proposal?

Agreed.

Question 11. The Scottish Government proposes requiring the valuer to seek counter-representations when representations regarding the valuation of the land are received from the land owner, tenant, person entitled to sporting interests, as the case may be, or the crofting community body. Do you agree with this proposal?

Agreed.

Question 12. Section 89 of the Act allows compensation to be paid in respect of a loss or expense incurred in connection with a crofting community right to buy application. Ministers are already required to set out the procedure for claiming compensation by way of order. The Scottish Government proposes amending this order so that Ministers may, via an order, specify the amounts payable in respect of compensation and who is liable to pay these amounts. What are your views on the proposal?

This does not seem unreasonable.

Question 13. The Land Court is required to give its decision in writing within 4 weeks of the date of the hearing. The Scottish Government proposes removing the 4 week time limit, and remove the provision requiring the reasons to be provided in writing. What is your view of this proposal?

It is not clear why this is necessary or helpful to the parties involved. Having reasons in writing seem appropriate, as does having a reasonably short timescale for these matters being concluded.
Appendix 1
Submission to Land reform Review group first call for evidence – December 2012

Part 3 – The crofting community right to buy

The complexity of the requirements of Part 3 of the Act have become notorious and add such complexity to the requirements on communities that they are capable of being largely self-defeating to the principled intentions of Parliament. Some of the requirements have been described as Byzantine. Some of the detail exists in regulation, rather than primary legislation, though the primary legislation sets the tone for the detail in the regulations through provisions that are on the face of the Act.

The overwhelming need is to simplify procedures so that genuine and strong applications cannot be thwarted by legal action on technical grounds.

The procedures which have to be exercised by crofting community bodies under Part 3 in order to exercise their rights to purchase crofting land and related leases on behalf of their communities (i) are extremely complex and time-consuming; (ii) often appear to have no logical or functional rationale; and (iii) risk legal challenge on minor technical grounds.

The issues can best be understood by considering the application form for consent to buy eligible croft land (or the interest of the tenant in related tenanted land), which is prescribed by secondary legislation. It is accepted that a crofting community body should be required to demonstrate: (i) that they are properly constituted and represent the relevant crofting community; (ii) the boundaries of the land or lease they seek to buy; (iii) that the majority in the community (both crofters and the whole community) support the application; and (iv) that it is in the public interest that they should be given permission to buy the land or interest of the tenant.

However, there appears no logical or functional rationale for being required to provide the following:

- a map and written description showing not only the boundary of the land or lease to be acquired, but also all sewers, pipes, lines, watercourses or other conduits, and fences, dykes, ditches, or other boundaries (Question 4(d)). This goes far beyond what is required in other land or lease transactions, and there seems no functional reason to require this information. It is particularly absurd when the area to be purchased extends to several thousand hectares.

- a list of all postcodes and OS 1 Km grid squares included in the land or lease area to be purchased (Question 4(c)). Again there seems no reason for this if the boundary is properly defined on a map. If the area concerned extends to several thousand hectares, the list simply opens up scope for a technical challenge if particular postcodes or grid squares are inadvertently omitted.

- a full list of all those eligible to vote in the ballot, including distances away from the relevant township in the case of absentee crofters (Question 11)). The test should be evidence that a majority support the application, rather than providing...
detailed lists which open up the possibility of legal challenge if any error or inconsistency is made.

Community Land Scotland would wish to see such existing requirements being abolished.

In the event that any rationale might be found for retaining any such provisions, then a criterion of proportionality should be explicitly applied to all such provisions so that an application which meets the essential purposes of the Act are not at risk of refusal or legal challenge on minor technical details. For example, an error in one voter issued with a ballot paper should not invalidate the result if there is a large majority in favour, and an error in the listing of one postcode or grid square should not invalidate an application if the boundary of the land or lease to be acquired is clear.

Time limits should be imposed on all stages of the process of application, comment, decision, and appeal, so that a landlord cannot unreasonably delay a decision on an application, or indefinitely hold up implementation of an approved application. The overall timescale should not be dissimilar, overall, to that applying to Part 2, from inception to completion of the process.

Appendix 2

Submission made in response to consultation on Community Empowerment Bill – January 2013

Part 3 – Further Issues

The Crofting Community Right to Buy

The same points as are at Appendix 1 were repeated in this submission (above) plus

Crofting Community Definition [Probably now overtaken by current proposals]

The definition of a crofting community is complex and is centred on the location of residents in relation to the land to be acquired and also includes certain crofting tenants of the land but who reside outwith the boundary of the land in question. Maps in detail need to be prepared to establish who is a member of the crofting community.

The definition of a crofting community in the Crofting Acts is different from that of a crofting community in the Act. The former is a community of crofters which excludes non-crofters, and the latter is a community in a crofting area which includes non-crofters.

The Crofting Community Right to Buy should be amended to allow the crofting community body to determine its own boundaries. We do not see any benefit in crofting community members being defined by their property having a contiguous boundary with the land to be acquired.

The Act might usefully rename a ‘crofting community’ to a ‘crofting area community’ to distinguish it from the ‘crofting community’.
Generic issues common to both Part 2 and Part 3

Serving notice on landowner

Serving the notice on the landowner if the registration reaches the stage where the intention to register is to be served on the landowner can be problematic. The property that the registration refers to is not adequate service if that property is not the landowners principal residence, even if it is occupied by his paid employees when he is not in residence. It is incumbent on the applicant to trace the landowner(s) main residence so that Scottish Government can serve the document there. Simplify this requirement would be helpful.

Community Definition – Choice to utilise Part 2 or Part 3

It is not possible for a single community body to be established to use both Part 2 and Part 3 of the Act. This is due to the different definition of community in these parts. If a crofting community body is to remain as an entity that is distinct from a community body then the relevant provisions should enable crofting community bodies to be eligible applicants under the Part 2 provisions. There could be times where a crofting community would prefer to register an interest in land rather than seek to acquire it under Part 3. At present a crofting community would have to opt to establish either a Part 2 compliant company or one that satisfies the requirements of Part 3. The crofting community cannot benefit from both of the LRA’s right to buy provisions unless it establishes two community companies. This is unhelpful and unnecessary in our view.

The Act should be amended to allow crofting community bodies as defined under Part 3 to be able to register an interest in land under the Part 2 provisions.

Identifying the landowner

It can be difficult to identify the legal owner of land. Where a community body has taken all reasonable steps to do so a community's aspirations to register an interest or acquire an asset are should not be thwarted by virtue of not being able to identify the legal owner.

Provision should be made for this requirement to be set aside provided it can be shown all reasonable steps that could be taken have been taken.

Access to the Voters Role

Community bodies are not entitled to a copy of the voters roll.

The proposal that the Scottish Government might take responsibility for the organisation of the ballot may overcome this difficulty but this notwithstanding Community bodies should be given a right to the full Voters Roll for the purpose of any ballot they may organise in compliance with the requirements of the Act.
Other

It should be noted that the very act of having to secure a 10% threshold can have the effect of alerting the landowner of an interest in the land, potentially in some circumstances, precipitating the land being put on to the market, at which point the threshold for approval to submit an interest rises under the provision for late registration, if these are maintained.

In such circumstances a helpful change to current provisions would make it clear that the timeline for rules for a timeous registration should apply when the process for securing the 10% approval started when the land had not been advertised as being on the open market, even if it is on the market when the registration application is submitted.

Timeous and late registration - The criteria for late registration of an interest to buy are more onerous than for a timeous application. In practise, most recent purchases that have proceeded have been from late registrations.

It is not clear why a late registration should have more onerous conditions than a timeous one. This could have been conceived as a mechanism simply to encourage timeous applications, which are easier to achieve. However, given that the underlying intention of a timeous and late registration remain the same, to register an interest in land, and given the genuine reluctance of some communities to register an interest (for reasons set out elsewhere in this submission) it does not seem reasonable that the registration requirements should be so different, particularly given the ultimate ballot requirements for a right to buy purchase to be able to proceed.

Community Land Scotland believes it is important to continue to have late registration procedures, but that it should have the same 10% threshold requirements as the timeous registration requirements.

The 30 day confirmation period - Once a piece of land comes on to the market and the registered interest is triggered, the community has 30 days to confirm their intention to exercise their right to buy.

There has been some experience that such a period may fall during important holiday periods, and this can prove challenging. It is considered that making this requirement 30 working days would suitable relax the period.

Turnout and majority in ballot - In order to proceed to purchase the community body must be able to demonstrate that at least half the members of the community have voted in a ballot on the question and the majority of those voting have voted in favour. There are some circumstances where less than 50% have voted in the ballot, but the majority of those voting having voted in favour of purchase can be regarded by Ministers as sufficient.

Given the element of discretion available to Ministers there appears no need to change current requirements.
Some questions have been raised about the ability of an approved community body being entitled to access to registers of electors. Given the requirements of the Act it should be a matter put beyond doubt that Electoral Registrations Officers are required to give such properly constituted bodies access to current registers for the purposes of conducting ballots under the terms of the Act.

Buying the company owning the land

A number of communities for reasons associated with achieving practical progress and to suit the land owner concerned have bought the company that owns the land, together with its assets and liabilities, as the means to acquire land. It is likely this will require happen again.

It will be important to ensure that there are no provisions with the Act that would prevent progress under the Act being made when a community thought it right or expedient to purchase the Company that owns the land as the means to acquire the land itself.
NFU SCOTLAND RESPONSE - CROFTING COMMUNITY RIGHT TO BUY - AMENDMENTS WITHIN COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT BILL

Introduction

1. NFU Scotland (NFUS) is Scotland’s premier farming lobby, representing around 8,500 members across Scotland, of whom 750 are crofters. Our dedicated Crofting Highlands and Islands Committee meets on a regular basis to represent crofting interests at local, regional and national levels.

2. NFUS understands that the Scottish Government has submitted amendments to the Community Empowerment Bill at Stage 2 relating to community right-to-buy. NFUS has engaged with this piece of legislation throughout the process, submitting evidence on the initial government consultation in January 2014 and again to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee in their examination of the Bill as introduced in September 2014. A submission was also issued to the Scottish Government’s Agriculture, Food and Rural Communities Directorate in November 2014 relating specifically to the proposals for amendments to Crofting Community Right to Buy. This response is primarily based upon the points raised in these original submissions.

3. Primarily, NFUS is encouraged by the Bill, and considers that encouraging partnership-working with communities has wide-ranging benefits for the rural economy.

4. However, NFUS repeats concerns that there is not a concrete definition for what constitutes ‘wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected’ in the context of land. Parcels of land may be out of regular ‘use’ for periods of time when they are involved in an agricultural enterprise.

Crofting Community Right to Buy

5. NFUS recognises that the Bill’s explanatory notes outline the purpose of the proposed amendments is to make the Crofting Community Right to Buy easier for crofting communities to use, while at the same time continuing to strike a fair balance between the rights of landowners and crofting communities. We are supportive in principle of these purposes and aims, however remain conscious that each crofting community buy-out must be required to put in place a long-term plan to ensure the economic sustainability of the scheme. Further detail on areas of concern are outlined in further detail below.

Section 71 – Community Bodies

6. In particular, in terms of the removal of provision for the auditing of accounts, NFUS suggests that whilst this will remove unnecessary burdens from community bodies, a structured auditing process should also be put in place to ensure that community bodies reinvest any income received in to the crofting community.

7. Regarding the provisions for community bodies that would be eligible to apply for a community buy-out, NFUS welcomes the extension of organisations defined as Crofting Community Bodies (CCB) however advises that advisory services from non-government bodies such as HIE and SAOS are employed.

8. NFU Scotland welcomes that the amendments recognise the current confusion in the definition of ‘crofting communities’. However, again, we urge caution on who this definition is extended to. Whilst this amendment simply gives Ministers the regulation-making power to expand the definition of crofting community, we repeat concerns that use of the Crofting Register as a means of defining those included in the definition of ‘crofting communities’ is unwise. The Crofting Register is incomplete and it will be some time before it is sufficiently populated that it could be used in such a way. NFUS encourages Ministers to expand the uptake of the Crofting Register in the first instance.

Section 73 – Crofting land mapping and public notice of application

9. NFUS agrees that the mapping requirements should be simplified as much as possible. It is important to consider the scale at which the mapping is required and this will relate to the total size of croft land being purchased. However, at some stage it is important that all servitude rights and burdens are mapped and detailed in order for the community to know exactly what they are purchasing.

10. NFUS also agrees that greater flexibility is required in the placing of public notices in order to inform of the intention to purchase land. Clearly, it will be necessary for the community to demonstrate, as part of the application, that they have done their best to inform all members of the community, owners and adjacent landowners of the crofting community buy-out.

Section 75 – Ballot procedure

11. NFUS disagrees with the amendment’s proposal to make CCBs liable for the cost of conducting a ballot, but welcomes the provision that allows the CCB to apply to Scottish Ministers to recover the costs, depending on specific circumstances.

Section 76 – Section 88

12. NFUS is satisfied with these proposals.

Section 89 - Compensation

13. NFUS agrees that there needs to be some mechanism to specify the amounts payable in respect of compensation and who is liable to pay these amounts, however we have some reservations as to whether this should be done by the Minister. We would prefer that it was done by an independent body or person.

Section 92 - Outcome of appeal to Land Court

14. NFU Scotland understands that the Land Court’s own regulations require them to set out in writing any decision they make. Therefore, to have this requirement duplicated in this legislation would seem unnecessary. NFU Scotland, however, believe it is still necessary to have a set time limit by which point the Land Court have to respond by. We agree that in some very complex cases a 4 week time limit could be difficult to meet. We would therefore suggest that when necessary the Land Court could apply to Scottish Government/the Minister to extend this time limit where the Land Court can demonstrate that they need extra time to consider the case.
Written submission from Highlands and Islands Enterprise

INTRODUCTION

HIE’s understanding of purpose and what the amendments seek to achieve.

Highlands and Islands Enterprise (HIE), as the Scottish Governments economic and community development agency for the Highlands and Islands, welcome the legislative framework being developed through the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

We are supportive of the amendments to Part 3 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003, therein.

In line with Government Economic Strategy (GES), our purpose is to generate sustainable economic growth in every part of the Highlands and Islands.

Our Operating Plan 2014-17 sets out our four priorities:

- Supporting businesses and social enterprises to shape and realise their growth aspirations
- Strengthen communities and fragile areas
- Developing growth sectors, particularly distinctive regional opportunities
- Creating the conditions for a competitive and low carbon region

Our work to support community ownership is an integral part of our approach to deliver on all of the above organisational priorities, recognising the contribution community asset ownership makes directly to the economy and society of our region, and to Scotland.

We are grateful to the Committee for enabling a further short input through this submission, in relation to the amendments now proposed. We would be pleased to provide further input if this is helpful to the Committee in due course.

Within the previous submissions we have made through the legislation development process, we outlined our experience over many years in regard to the complexity of Part 3 of the LRSA 2003 and hopefully this has highlighted the complex barriers faced by communities in implementing the spirit of the Act.

The amendments now proposed are very welcome, making substantial changes to the legislation and it’s enabling provisions. We offer the following comment on each amendment.

Sections 71 and 72 Legal structure of community body.

This amendment is supported by HIE.

Section 71 – Removal of provision for auditing accounts.
This amendment is supported by HIE.

Section 71 – Amend definition of “crofting community”.

An increasingly inclusive definition is welcome.

We would note that the Registers of Scotland Crofting Register (RoSCR) may not presently be sufficiently robust as a source from which to determine active and engaged crofting members however.

The recognition of owner occupiers and the subsequent legislative changes to the Crofters (Scotland ) Act 1993 is welcomed yet this leads to a possible area of concern. Due to previous processes involving means testing, many active current croft owner occupiers are classified as absent and in turn, the relevant croft data held on the Crofting Commission register can be classified as vacant. We consider that the completeness of any data source leant on as primary data to underpin a legislative matter is of great importance.

We welcome the development and scrutiny of the current legislation proposals and we note that the amendment does include a power for Ministers to expand on the RoSCR.

We also note the ongoing work of the Crofting Commission in regard to the current census data gathering exercise, a practical but important consideration connected to this legislation and we recognise the importance of effective dissemination of the census data in order to achieve the outcomes the legislation seeks to enable.

Section 73 – Croft land mapping.

This amendment is supported by HIE. We consider this a key amendment which will make a material and enabling change.

Section 73 – Public notice of application.

This amendment is supported by HIE.

Section 74(1) and 97B – Identification of owner, tenants and creditors.

This amendment is supported by HIE.

Section 75 – Ballot procedure.

The principle of this amendment is supported by HIE. In our earlier evidence submission we outlined some of the difficulties faced by communities in obtaining often multi layered information relating to land ownership. We would reiterate that a further amendment might be worded around the principle of “best endeavours demonstrated”. These endeavours could be itemised and logged chronologically. HIE is pleased to note the opportunity for communities to work with Ministers and officials to minimise costs and that where these cost might escalate outwith the capacity of a community organisation then recourse is available to seek assistance from Ministers.
Section 89 – Compensation.

The principle of this amendment is supported by HIE, and whilst supportive we would encourage consideration be given the most effective, objective mechanism which can be brought to bear to service this issue.

Section 92 – Outcome of appeal to the Land Court.

This amendment is supported by HIE.

Crofting Community Right to Buy - Evidence on proposed Scottish Government amendments to Part 3 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003

Introduction

Community Land Scotland has long argued the need for changes to Part 3 of the Land Reform Scotland Act 2003 and welcomes the fact that the Scottish Government proposes to make important simplifications now using the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

In particular it is very welcome to see the repeal of the most tortuous mapping requirements within Section 73 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act.

There are a number of other welcome changes to definitions and administrative arrangements.

Unless otherwise stated, Community Land Scotland either accepts or welcomes the changes set out by the Scottish Government.

Detailed observations on some amendments

Crofting community bodies

The provisions for bodies other than Companies Limited by Guarantee represent a welcome new flexibility.

In (4)(1A)(g) and in (1B)(g) there is the provision for the declaration of minutes upon request of “a” meeting of the community body. This is fine in principle, and as a matter of openness, however the provision is not clear as to whether this is any meeting, including sub-committee or working group, or only full meetings of the Board, or the AGM, or special meetings. Further, any request could not necessarily be met within the time-frame set out unless this was meant to apply to approved minutes. Greater clarity in the provisions would be necessary or could be set out in guidance or regulation to ensure clarity of what is intended.

In 1 (7) (b) (iii) (iii) it is proposed not to allow owner-occupier crofters registered in the Register of Crofts, as distinct from the Crofting Register, to be recognized. This distinguishes this particular group by reference to their registration at this time only in the Register of Crofts, and it is not clear why this is the case.

While there is provision for Ministers to alter this by regulation, and it is hinted that this could be used to subsequently include this group, no policy rationale is given for not including this group now.

Application: information about rights and interests in land

The repeal of the mapping requirements at Section 73 of the 2003 Act subsection (5)(b)(ii) and (f) is very welcome.
The inclusion of new provisions 3 (3) (5ZA) which require the identification of a range of persons is not currently required and this is not referred to, or the policy rationale explained, in the Explanatory Notes. The danger is that one set of onerous requirements (mapping) may be being replaced with another set of onerous requirements. It is not clear to what extent the information sought is readily within the reach of the crofting community body. It would appear that failure to be able to comply would have the effect of invalidating an application and it may be wise to allow for when a crofting community body has used all reasonable endeavors to ascertain the information, but this cannot be finally obtained, this should not invalidate an application.

The greater flexibility in the means of giving public notice by potentially adding to advertising in a local newspaper is welcome - 3(4).

Criteria for consent by Ministers

The proposal is to introduce a series of new requirements to Section 74 which seeks to accurately identify persons. This is a new requirement and, as at Section 73 referred to above, it is not clear to what extent the information sought is readily within the reach of the crofting community body. Failure to be able to comply would have the effect of invalidating an application and it may be wise to allow for when a crofting community body has used all reasonable endeavors to ascertain the information, but this cannot be finally obtained, this should not invalidate an application.

Ballot: Information and expenses

The onus is on the crofting community body to arrange and pay for the required ballot.

This new provision to allow the crofting community body to apply to have the costs of the ballot met by Ministers under conditions to be established in regulation would, on the face of it, represent a welcome additional flexibility.

However, this would leave the ballot arrangements between Part 2 of the Land Reform Act, by virtue of provisions proposed through Part 4 of the Community Empowerment Bill (yet to be agreed) and Part 3 of the Land Reform Act. Under the proposals for Part 2 of the LRA, Ministers would take responsibility for the organization, conduct and cost of the ballot, and this is welcome.

It is not clear why there should be a difference between Part 2 and Part 3 in this regard. There is everything to be said for consistency between the two parts. This is particularly so when it comes to a Part 3 application as the degree of controversy associated with such a purchase could be greater than a Part 2 purchase and where the correctness of the processes and procedures around the ballot could be of particular importance to the integrity of the process as a whole. This would be significantly assisted and help put any questions beyond doubt if arranged by Ministers.

Ministers should, as in Part 2, accept responsibility for ballot arrangements also under Part 3.
Other matters

If and when the proposals for amending Part 3 are approved, these need to apply equally to the new Part 3A or significant anomalies would arise between the different Parts of the Land Reform Act. The current Part 3A was drafted, based on the current Part 3 and now itself being reformed by the welcome amendments submitted to the Committee. This ought to be a technical and straightforward process, largely repeating the amendments suggested to Part 3. It is, however, vitally important, otherwise, for example, the tortuous mapping requirements about to be repealed for Part 3 would remain for Part 3A.

This is only raised as it is not referred to in the Explanatory Notes.

Written submission from Community Land Scotland

Draft Regulations on the question of ‘abandoned or neglected’ land provided to RACCE Committee by Scottish Government to aid considerations at Stage 2 – February 2015 - Further evidence by Community Land Scotland.

Introduction

The RACCE Committee in its Stage 1 Report raised a number of pertinent concerns about the clarity of the terms “abandoned or neglected” land, introduced by the new Part 3A of the Community Empowerment Bill to the Land Reform Act by Part 4 (Section 48) of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill.

The Scottish Government has sought to meet the Committees concerns, not by amending the proposals on the face on the Bill as sought by the Committee, but through showing what draft regulations on these issues might say, and to provide reassurance to the Committee their concerns will be adequately addressed in this way. The Minister has written to the Committee giving explanations of the Scottish Government’s intentions.

Community Land Scotland can see that the Draft Regulations could be very helpful in the urban context, where physical signs of neglect may be much more obvious. Wider neglect arising from use or lack of use of land is more complex in the rural land setting.

Discussion (when thinking about the rural context in particular)

Having examined the letter from the Minister and the Draft Regulations, Community Land Scotland remains significantly concerned that the draft regulations do not provide the necessary reassurances as they stand.

The draft Regulations do not appear to provide explicitly or even implicitly that the need for, or the lack of, sustainable development of the land is a matter to which Ministers are to have regard when determining whether land is wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected.

It may be argued that Regulation 2(3) would allow Ministers to do so but it appears that the most that Regulation does is to require Ministers to have regard to the purpose for which the land is or has been used or to consider whether it has not been used for any particular purpose. It does not require Ministers to consider, in either case, whether that use or lack of use has furthered or hindered any purpose, such as that of sustainable development.

Community Land Scotland remains of the view the matters are best resolved by making some change on the face of the Bill, as the Committee has suggested.

If, the Scottish Government is not prepared to accede to the Committees preferred approach at achieving clarity, even by potentially dropping the terms “abandoned or neglected”, it would be possible to make it explicitly clear on the face of the bill that eligible land could be land which, in addition to it being either “abandoned or neglected”, could also be land “in substantial need of sustainable development”.

Regulations could then support these definitions, but the primary matters of eligible land being potentially land in need of sustainable development would be clear.

The proposed primary legislation at new Part 3A and the draft regulations appear to studiously avoid using the term sustainable development for reasons that are not at all clear, given the policy purpose of the Bill, and that these are terms in regular use and have a meaning capable of embracing all the Committees and many stakeholders concerns.

Lord Gill in the Judgment on the Pairc Crofters case said of the terms “sustainable development”:

[55] “...I should first deal with a preliminary objection raised by counsel for the appellants to the effect that the terms sustainable development and public interest are to [sic] vague to have legal force and are therefore, as counsel put it, “not law.”

[56] “In my view, the expression sustainable development is in common parlance in matters relating to the use and development of land. It is an expression that would be readily understood by the legislators, the Ministers and the Land Court.”

Viewed from the outside it seems that the Draft Regulations display a very clear concept of the physical aspects of land and land use, but the wider concept of sustainable development consequent on use or lack of use of land does not appear so well recognised.

It is only within the draft regulations at 2.(3)(a) and (b) that they get close to the wider idea of sustainable development, but even then it is not at all clear that as drafted they would in any way help a future Eigg to secure status as eligible land. It is also not clear that the community which sought to acquire a small piece of land to enable their sustainable development, when the owner was refusing to engage or assist, would be capable of making a case by virtue of the regulations as drafted. The scope for interpretation here is wide, and that runs both ways, to be helpful, or specifically not helpful.

The Draft Regulations cite what Ministers would be bound to consider when any land was not being used for a “specific purpose” [2. (3) (b)]. It is difficult to imagine circumstances where land could not be said to be being used for a “specific purpose”, even if that “specific purpose” was not conducive to furthering the achievement of sustainable development, as might have been said in the case of Eigg, for example. Further, 2.(3)(b) is strictly not about the non-use of the land, but the length of time for which the land has not been used.

Greater clarity by way of specific reference to the concept of sustainable development would help and may alleviate some of the concerns felt with the current draft. There could be a number of potential approaches, for example:

- in (3)(a) adding at the end, “and whether that purpose or use furthered the achievement of sustainable development”
• in (3)(b) insert after “purpose” “to further the achievement of sustainable development” or

• add an additional requirement for Ministers to consider “such other matters as would in the opinion of Ministers further the achievement of sustainable development”

• or, Ministers could be required to have regard to “the aggregate of the social, economic and cultural conditions arising from the use or lack of use of the land.”

• or,” whether, and to what extent, [the land or any building or structure on it, needs, or lacks, sustainable development] or [there is a need for sustainable development of the land or any building or structure on it]”

The covering letter of the Minister indicates that Ministers have to be ultimately satisfied that approving any application is in the public interest and is compatible with furthering the achievement of sustainable development. However, that is at the stage in the process when Ministers are considering the granting of consent for an application for the right to purchase, and not when considering whether the land should be eligible land and on which an application can be made at all, which is the matter at hand in this part of the Bill.

The Minister’s letter seeks to re-assure the Committee that the terms “abandoned” or “neglected” are intended to have their ordinary meaning and these words are capable of a broad meaning. It is precisely because the terms are intended to have their ordinary meaning that is the concern of Community Land Scotland, as their ordinary meaning would not appear to embrace the wider concept of sustainable development, the policy the Bill seeks to promote.

The specific avoidance of the use of the well recognised term “sustainable development”, gives the impression this is because the intention is specifically not to embrace this concept. While the Minister’s letter is in a number of respects helpful in seeking to provide some reassurance on this, the letter is not law.

A further concern of Community Land Scotland, unless there is a link provided on the face of the Bill, is that the link between the ordinary meaning of the terms “abandoned or neglected” and any regulations would be open to challenge on the basis that the linkage between the concepts was not sufficiently warranted or reasonably envisaged by the statutory provisions, or was stretching the normal interpretation of the primary tests (ie, the ordinary meaning of the words “abandoned” or “neglected”).

Additionally, it is not clear what the implication would be of land, for example, being in good agricultural and environmental condition, but wider sustainable development not being furthered. This was the situation in Eigg at the time of purchase, no one said the farm tenants were not keeping their land in GEAC, but the island as a whole was in almost terminal decline. You might read the same for Gigha.
While the good intentions of the Scottish Government in providing this draft is not in doubt, the regulations have the status of being a draft, and a lot of water could flow under this particular bridge before the regulations were finally tabled. That is why capturing the principle of wider sustainable development on the face of the Bill remains important to Community Land Scotland in establishing this is what this part of the Bill is about, and establishing that there was a link between this concept and any detail then spelt out in regulation.

Written submission from North Harris Trust

Written submission to Scottish Government regarding proposed revisions to Part 3 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 via the Community Empowerment Bill

Background

The North Harris Trust is a community organisation and registered charity which now owns and manages 27,000 hectares of North Harris, Western Isles. It aims to:

- Increase employment and housing opportunities for our young people and reverse population decline
- To keep North Harris wild and beautiful by safeguarding and enhancing natural heritage
- To work with partners to meet the needs, hopes and aspirations of the community
- Promote enjoyment, understanding and appreciation of North Harris’ outstanding natural and cultural heritage

The community of approx. 700 people seized a unique opportunity when the 22,900ha. North Harris Estate was placed on the market in April 2002. After much hard work and effort, on the 21st March 2003 the North Harris Estate came into community ownership. Subsequently in February 2006 the Trust bought the adjoining 3,125ha. Seaforth Estate. In 2012 the residents of the adjacent Isle of Scalpay voted to join the North Harris Trust after they were offered free ownership of the 710ha. Island.

The Trust is now managed by a Board of 14 locally-elected volunteer Directors and employs 9 staff.

The community buy-out of the North Harris Estate was carried out prior to the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003, but the established Trust has provided a model for other buy-outs, with the Directors and staff continuing to advise and support other community groups.

For more information on the Trust and its activities visit:

Comments on Specific Amendments- Part 4 of Community Empowerment Bill

The North Harris Trust is grateful for the opportunity to provide written evidence and agrees with all of the amendments with only minor comments as detailed below.
Section 71 and 72- Legal structure of community body

The proposal to broaden the range of legal organisations that can be a crofting community body (CCB) and allowing Ministers to provide for further types of bodies to be eligible seems sensible and fair. Our only point would be that Ministers need to continue to show real diligence when appointing CB’s. As the range of eligible Community groups broadens, there must not be an opportunity for non-community landlords to abuse the system.

Section 71- Removal of provision for auditing of accounts

The NHT agrees with this amendment.

Section 71- Amend Definition of Crofting Community

The NHT agrees with this amendment.

Section 73- Croft Land Mapping

The NHT agrees with this proposed amendment. Whilst the CCB should make every effort to map the assets when registering its interest, providing the level of detail originally required could be a major task. As the buy-out proceeds, the burden needs to be on the landowner to provide full titles and not to conceal assets or liabilities associated with the property.

Section 73- Public Notice of Application

The NHT agrees with this amendment. Local newspapers often have a very limited readership which may be biased. Alternative forms of posting Public Notices should be acceptable with the approval of the Ministers and the interested stakeholders.

Section 74(1) and 97B- Identification of owner, tenants and certain creditors

The NHT agrees that it is important to identify the owner, tenant, person entitled to sporting interests, or creditors relating to the land interests involved in an application. However, as long as the CCB has made sensible efforts to identify these stakeholders, failure to provide a complete list should not prevent the Ministers from accepting an application.

Section 75- Ballot Procedure

The NHT agrees with this amendment.

Section 76- Right to buy exercisable by only one crofting community

The NHT agrees with this amendment.

Section 81- Reference to Land Court

The NHT agrees that this amendment seems fair.
Section 88- Valuation
The NHT agrees with these amendments.

Section 89 - Compensation
The NHT agrees with these amendments.

Section 92- Outcome of Appeal to Land Court
The NHT agrees with these amendments.
Introduction

The Law Society of Scotland aims to lead and support a successful and respected Scottish legal profession. Not only do we act in the interests of our solicitor members but we also have a clear responsibility to work in the public interest. That is why we actively engage and seek to assist in the legislative and public policy decision making process.

To help us do this, we use our various Society committees which are made up of solicitors and non-solicitors to ensure we benefit from the knowledge and expertise both within and out with the solicitor profession.

The Rural Affairs Sub-Committee (the “Committee”) welcomes the opportunity to provide oral evidence to the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee on 18th February 2015 on amendments to part 3 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 made through the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. The Committee has prepared the following brief comments in advance of the evidence session.

Legal Structure of Community Body

We agree that SCIOs and BenComs should be allowed to be crofting community bodies. However, we also believe the community interest companies should be permitted to be a crofting community bodies. A community interest company is a new type of company for people that want to be involved in a business that helps the community (the population as a whole or a specific group), rather than just the owners, managers or employees – a social enterprise.

Removal of Provision for Auditing of Accounts

We have no objection to the Scottish Government’s proposals and agree that that the crofting community right to buy requirements should be the same as those for the general community right to buy. In general, we suggest that some financial scrutiny should still be required in order to promote good financial management.

Definition of Crofting Community

We agree that the definition of a crofting community should be expanded to include tenants and owner occupiers. However, we do not agree with the definition proposed. The inclusion of tenants on either the Registers of Scotland or Crofting Community Registers but only of owner occupiers on the Registers of Scotland Register is unfair. This is especially so when a tenant exercising the right to buy does not trigger registration in the Registers of Scotland register. The vast majority of crofting land is not on the Crofting Register. We therefore suggest that the definition be amended to also include land registered with the Crofting Commission.

Crofting Land Mapping

The proposed Government amendments go some way to simplifying the mapping requirements although we do not think that they go far enough. Satisfying the current mapping requirements can be extremely difficult and complex. We believe that the proposed amendment would result in slightly less onerous application requirements but that problems would still remain.

We can see nothing to justify why the mapping requirements should be more onerous in a crofting context than in other contexts. We believe that the mapping requirements for the rural community right to buy should be no different to those required when submitting a first registration to Registers of Scotland.

Public Notice of Application

The explanatory notes provide that the amendments will lead to greater flexibility by providing that the form of advertisement is to be set out in regulations made by Ministers. However, it is difficult to comment on this until the regulations have been published. We do support measures aimed at increasing awareness of applications in the area to which the application relates. Advertising in the Edinburgh Gazette - and perhaps even by newspaper – is unlikely to generate the desired level of publicity. Additional means of publicity could include placing advertisements in shop windows in the locality. We therefore agree with the proposal in principle. However, further details on the form of advertising Ministers are proposing requires to be provided.

Identification of Owner, Tenants and Certain Creditors

We agree that the list of proposed persons should be properly identified in the application form. However, we anticipate that there may be some practical difficulties in identifying whether there is a sporting tenant. This information is unlikely to be available from the Land Register and therefore an applicant would have to ask the landlord for these details. The landlord would not be under any obligation to provide this information and even if he did then it would be difficult for the applicant to verify its validity. It would be undesirable if an application was rejected at the outset because of a failure to specify information that the applicant is unable to ascertain. We therefore suggest that a “reasonable endeavours” test should apply with respect to obtaining details of a person entitled to sporting interests.

The designation of the other proposed persons will be available from the Land Register or Companies House and therefore we do not foresee any difficulties in the application form requiring these parties to be correctly identified.

We suggest that floating charge holders (where the landlord is a UK limited company) is a further category that would be appropriate to identify on the application form. As these details would be available from Companies House, no difficulties in providing this information are foreseen.

Ballot Procedure

We have no objection to this proposal.

Reference to the Land Court

We believe that the right of reference should apply to:-
- The owner or person entitled to sporting interests in the land;
- The tenant, in the case of an application to purchase a tenant’s interest;
- The person entitled to sporting interests, depending on the nature of the land;
- A creditor in a standard security in relation to that land or those interests.

Furthermore, if the Scottish Government agrees with our proposal to include details of floating charge holders on the application form, as suggested above, then we believe that floating charge holders should also be listed in section 81(1).

Valuation

We agree that the timescale in which a valuer must notify the value of the land requires to be increased. However, we suggest that the increase should be to 12 weeks and not 8 weeks as proposed. The ability to extend the period on cause shown should be retained.

Parties regularly struggle to comply with the current 6 week time period and an extension of 2 weeks is unlikely to alleviate this problem. We acknowledge that an 8 week period would be analogous to that permitted under the wider community right to buy. However, the crofting community right to buy is utilised over a much bigger area of land. Often valuers will encounter difficulties obtaining accurate information from landlords because they are reluctant to sell. Therefore we believe that there are sound reasons why the permitted period should be longer in a crofting context.

We agree that provision should be made for counter-representations to be made. However, this should be limited to one opportunity for representations and counter-representations to be made. A requirement to obtain such representations would provide a further reason why we suggest that the permitted time period for the valuer to notify the value of the land should be 12 weeks and not 8 weeks as proposed.

Compensation

We do not object to the proposals.

Outcome of Appeal to Land Court

We accept that the existing 4 week time limit for the Land Court to give its decision is short. We therefore do not have any objection to this being removed and substituted for an 8 week period (or longer in exceptional circumstances where notification is given). However, it is in the interests of justice that decisions are provided as expeditiously as possible.
Written submission from the Crofting Commission

Proposed Amendments to Part 3 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003

Views of the Crofting Commission - Section 71 – Amend definition of ‘crofting community’.

The Crofting Commission has previously highlighted the anomalous situation which entails that two Acts with relevance to crofting provide different definitions of what constitutes a crofting community. The Crofters (Scotland) Act 1993 as amended defines the crofting community at Section 61(1) as “all the persons who (either or both) –

(a) occupy crofts within a township which consists of two or more crofts registered with the Crofting Commission;

(b) hold shares in a common grazing associated with that township;”

While the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 refers to a crofting community body, it would be helpful, as recommended by the Crofting Commission and other respondents, if the terminology offered greater clarity between this and a crofting community.

The Crofting Commission notes specifically the amendments to section 71(5) for the purpose of admitting “more crofters who are excluded by the existing legislation.” In particular we note the change to subsection (5)(a)(ii). This no longer mentions the stipulated distance of 16 kilometres which itself was changed by the Crofting Reform (Scotland) Act 2010. For consistency of approach, the cross-reference with revised crofting legislation should continue to be recognised within this sub-section. In particular, the revised distance of 32 kilometres should also be a qualifying factor in this legislation.

The Crofting Commission recommends that the revised subsection should read:

are tenants of crofts in the crofting township whose names are entered in the Crofting Register, or the Register of Crofts, as the tenants of such crofts, and are complying with the duty to be ordinarily resident on, or within 32 kilometres of their crofts.

While the Commission agrees with the proposal to extend eligibility to owner-occupier crofter category, we do not understand the variation in registration requirements between that of a crofting tenant and that of an owner-occupier crofter. The category of owner-occupier crofter was again introduced by the Crofting Reform (Scotland) Act 2010. It is proper that the category should be recognised within the revision of this legislation also. However, it appears to have been recognised from the responses to the Call for Evidence that confining tenant participation to the Crofting Register was counter-productive in terms of what the amending legislation is trying to achieve. The same logic extends to owner-occupier crofter category, and we can see no logical reason for it not to include those who are registered on the Commission’s Register of Crofts.
The Crofting Commission recommends that the proposed subsection (5)(a)(iii) should read:

are owner-occupier crofters of owner-occupied crofts in the crofting townships whose names are entered Crofting Register, or the Register of Crofts, as the owner occupier crofters of such crofts, and are complying with the duty to be ordinarily resident on, or within 32 kilometres of their crofts.

Section 74(1) and 97B – Identification of owner, tenants and certain creditors

The Crofting Commission and other respondents have previously expressed reservations about the addition of the categories for identification as proposed at section 74(1). In particular, it was considered that there were limitations to what a crofting community body could be reasonably expected to source and provide. Requiring such onerous conditions, without recognitions of all reasonable endeavour to secure identity, appears contrary to the general purpose of the amendments.

The Crofting Commission recommends in the proposed amendments to section 74(1)(o) – (r) that wording of the following nature be introduced:

Having made all reasonable endeavours to identify such owners, tenants, sporting tenants or creditors by making appropriate enquiries in the relevant registers, including the Land Register, Register of Sasines, Books of Council and Session, Crofting Register and Register of Crofts.

The requirement to identify tenants or sporting tenants should be restricted to tenants whose lease is registered in one of the public registers, namely the Land Register, Register of Sasines, Books of Council and Session, Crofting Register and Register of Crofts.

The obligation to identify creditors should be restricted to creditors who have a Standard Security registered in the Land Register and Register of Sasines.

Section 73 – Croft land mapping

The Crofting Commission is generally in agreement with or has no specific comment to make on other proposed amendments. However, we would wish to make reference to Section 73. We welcome the proposed modification in subsection (5)(b)(i) which references the rights and interests known to the crofting community body and also the removal of the subsequent sub-paragraph (ii).

The Provision for recognition of what is known to the crofting community body in this instance is what the Commission considers should also be recognised in what has been related previously in terms of section 74(1). In addition, we note the proposed inclusion in Section 73(5) of the need to list those mentioned in the new subsection (5ZA). This relates to identifying owners, tenants, creditors and sporting interests. We would again recommend that this should contain the proviso – known to the crofting community body.

In this overall context the Crofting Commission would recommend that the mapping requirements are no more onerous than the mapping requirements for anyone making a registration to the Land Register.
Written submission from Scottish Land and Estates

CALL FOR EVIDENCE FOR THE PROPOSED COMMUNITY EMPOWERMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL AT STAGE 2 – CROFTING COMMUNITY RIGHT TO BUY

Scottish Land & Estates is a membership organisation representing landowners, land managers and rural businesses across Scotland and has a dedicated internal crofting group as well as being an active participant in the Scottish Parliament’s cross-party group on crofting. We welcome this opportunity to provide written evidence and have been closely involved with the wider aims of this Bill from our initial participation in the Terms of Reference Group.

We have reviewed the amendments brought forward by the Minister and would comment as follows:-

1. As previously indicated we are relaxed about the extension of legal structures which may constitute crofting community bodies to include SCIOs and BenComs and the repeal of the auditing of accounts requirement for crofting community bodies. However, we would question why there is provision for the SCIO or BenCom to withhold information contained in minutes. We would suggest that data protection legislation would already cover certain disclosures and if there is a “commercial” confidentiality or sensitivity angle then this needs to be more explicit than currently expressed in 1A(h)(i) and (ii) and 1B(h)(i) and (ii). Transparency is important and vexatious or spurious reasons for withholding information require to be avoided. Further explanation is needed as to what these provisions seek to achieve.

2. It is important that crofting community bodies are appropriately constituted as now, in terms of Company Limited by Guarantee or as is proposed in terms of SCIOs or BenComs referred to above. However, the proposed amendment (A1)(b) widens this to other bodies as may be prescribed. While again there are requirements to meet, we feel that the category of community body should be a matter for primary legislation and that the extension to SCIOs and BenComs is sufficiently broad at present. If there are other particular types of structure which the Scottish Government has in mind in addition to SCIOs and BenComs then these should be stated now.

3. Information about rights and interest in land is as important for crofting as other landholdings in Scotland. The Scottish Government is, in the interests of consistency and accountability, currently pressing ahead with land registration targets of which we are in principle supportive. However, we suggest that the proposed amendments to section 73 of the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003 (“the 2003 Act”) by way of sections 47(2)(ii) and 47(2)(f) would be a retrograde step and go against this wider policy approach towards title and ownership in Scotland. The existing provisions specified in section 73(5)(b)(ii) are not unduly onerous, in that the details sought regarding pipes, fences and other boundary matters are simply where “known to the applicant body or the existence of which it is, on reasonably diligent inquiry, capable of ascertaining”. Generally in terms of registration and valuation as well as from a practical perspective we are opposed to the amendment repealing these two subsections. Communities want to know what they are purchasing and land acquired by a crofting community body is by and large not in isolation from adjoining land and any shared usage of facilities such as sewerage or water pipes where known should on a practical level be identified.

4. We agree to the proposals re Crofting Community Body paying for the ballot and the provisions for reimbursement in certain circumstances. However, we have concerns regarding the new (4A). In terms of (4A)(a) and(b), “Information” should only be to substantiate or supplement information already established and not additional information to circumvent due process. As we commented in our consultation response in relation to Part 2 Community Right to Buy there needs to be transparency, clarity and a tangible outcome and a ballot is the only way to legitimately demonstrate community support. Clarity is required as to what the Minister intends by this provision.

5. The amendment in relation to valuation requires to be re-visited. In our view the inclusion of counter representations is not required in this instance. Provided the valuer is appropriately qualified, properly experienced and has the ability to communicate effectively with both the owner of the land and the crofting community body seeking acquisition then (9A) is completely unnecessary and complicates the process which goes against the aims of this Bill.

6. A consequence of the proposed (9A) is that the right to buy process becomes more protracted as (9B) extends the period for determination of value from 6 weeks at present to 8 weeks. The longer the delay, the greater the detriment in both financial and potentially relationship terms between owner and crofting community body and we are opposed to (9B) unnecessarily lengthening the process. Should the Minister accept that (9A) is surplus to requirements then (9B) would naturally not be required.

7. As with valuation, the amendments proposed in relation to compensation do not in our view assist with the practical working of the crofting community right to buy process. The proposed new section 89(4) in the 2003 Act makes provision for the Minister to specify through secondary legislation amounts payable in compensation. While recognising that a mechanism is necessary, we would respectfully question whether the Minister is the appropriate assessor of the level of compensation. Clearly it is important that those owning land subject to compulsory acquisition are properly compensated and advice from qualified and experienced valuers should be expressly obtained. This would provide some welcome independence.

In terms of the proposed section 89(4)(d) the procedure under which claims are to be made is left to Ministerial Order as at present. While we accept that is the appropriate way to handle the detail of the procedure, we would affirm that in any consideration there needs to be parity between the level of detail sought in justifying a claim and the level of detail provided in determining the relative success or otherwise of a claim, as well as a clear time-limited period from receipt of a compensation claim to ultimate determination of that claim. Those who have suffered financial loss and delay require to be properly and timeously engaged with and have their claim progressed in a straightforward way.
8. We do not support the proposed amendment to section 92 of the 2003 Act. The period which the Land Court has to make determination has been doubled from 4 weeks to 8 weeks or potentially longer. While we would accept in exceptional and complex circumstances 4 weeks may not be a sufficiently long period, in those particular cases it should be for the Land Court to apply to Ministers for further time for consideration, demonstrating why the additional time is required, otherwise the 4 weeks period ought as a general rule to remain. As indicated previously, time limits are vital.

We understand that the Land Court’s own rules require decisions to be written and therefore think the references to written statements are superfluous. There would be an unfortunate inference drawn that the Land Court did not know what it was doing if it is unable to provide a written statement within a reasonable time period and the 4 weeks which operates to date is usually sufficient. We feel the provisions as drafted in the Minister’s amendment are too lax and that confidence in the Land Court will be undermined by this amendment as currently drafted.
Supplementary evidence from Community Land Scotland

Extract of email from Duncan Macpherson regarding proposals for Part 3 that communities must identify owners to land, people with standard securities over land, tenants, sporting interests.

a. Owner – I remember trying to find out who was the rightful owner of XXXXXXXXXX. It went through a series of transfers between related parties and finally to several named individuals; of whom all bar one were fictitious. We made our best guess regarding the likely owner and that was accepted for a part 2 registration. If you went for using ‘reasonable endeavours’ to find the owner that may also be difficult as it might be considered reasonable to go to court to have it decided who is the real owner. We are then back in a Pairc situation where funders will not pay for legal action and communities can’t afford to take it.

b. Creditors with a standard security and right to sell the land are irrelevant in a Part 3 situation, because land in crofting tenure is near valueless; hence the reason why no commercial lender will land in crofting tenure as security. I don’t see the need for such an exercise anyway as the creditor’s rights would be identified at due diligence in the sale process and dealt with then, as is normal in any transaction.

c. Every crofter is a tenant and there can be hundreds on some estates, including many absentees. In particular people may assume that one member of a family is the tenant when in fact it is another. This would be a nightmare. Tenants’ rights are clearly protected under crofting law so there is no effect upon their ability to croft by a change in landowner. It seems bizarre that at the moment an estate can be sold to anyone and the first thing that the tenants would know about it would be the change in name on the rent invoice. This presumably would not change but if the community wanted to purchase under Part 3 they would first have to identify every croft tenant.

d. The sporting interests would be unaffected as any lease would have to be complied with until the end of the term so there should be no need to identify the sporting tenants at point of registration. Once again this is a sale process issue.

Dear Rob

The Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill will insert Part 3A to the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2003, creating a right for communities to buy “eligible land” without a willing seller when certain criteria are met. Eligible land is defined in section 97C(1) of the 2003 Act (as inserted by the Bill) as land which, in the opinion of Ministers, is “wholly or mainly abandoned or neglected”. Concerns have been raised both in the Committee’s Stage 1 report, and by Committee members at the Stage 1 debate, that the concept of “abandoned or neglected” land does not have a clear definition. The Committee has also highlighted that it is has concerns that the concept of “abandoned or neglected” land will be applied in such a way that limits it to the land’s physical condition.

There is no definition on the face of the Bill of the terms “abandoned” and “neglected” because it is intended that these terms are given their ordinary meaning. It is intended to use the words “abandoned” and “neglected” as descriptions of land that may be eligible land for the purposes of the exercise of the new compulsory right to buy as the words are capable of a broad meaning. This is because it is expected that the broad expressions may apply to a multiplicity of circumstances and should be understood generally.

By using broad expressions, Parliament would therefore be able to confer on Ministers a wide discretion, exercisable in a multiplicity of circumstances, to consider whether particular land described in an application is eligible for the purposes of Part 3A. Although the exercise of that discretion is subject to judicial oversight, it would not be expected that the Court could read down “abandoned” or “neglected” in a narrow way.

I would also be concerned not to try and define the expressions any further because it appears to me that any attempt to do so is more likely than not to result in a situation where the words are given a narrower meaning than the broad meaning that would otherwise apply if they are not technically defined.
The approach which Ministers would adopt in applying the test whether the land in a particular application is neglected or abandoned would be determined having regard to guidance and to a multiplicity of different matters. It is understood that some of these matters would be mandatory for Ministers to have regard to and for that reason it is intended that the minimum categories of such matters should be prescribed in subordinate legislation. There is power to do so in Section 97C(2) and I have therefore attached for your consideration a draft of Regulations under that power which indicates the sorts of matters that we would suggest that Ministers must have regard to as a minimum.

The matters set out in the draft Regulations fall into three broad categories:

- the physical condition and its effect on the surrounding area, public safety and the environment;
- the use of the land, or lack of use as the case may be, including whether the land is a nature reserve, held for conservation purposes or used for public recreation;
- any designation or classification of the land, such as land which has been classed as contaminated land, or buildings which are listed buildings or scheduled monuments.

I would like to draw your attention to the matters referred to in regulations 2(2)(b) to (d) of the draft Regulations. For each of these matters, Ministers must have regard to the effect of such condition. In particular, regulation 2(2)(d) prescribes that Ministers must have regard to “whether the physical condition of the land or any building or other structure on the land is causing or is likely to cause environmental harm”. “Environmental harm” is given the meaning that it has in section 17(2) of the Regulatory Reform (Scotland) Act 2014, which is:

(a) harm to the health of human being or other living organism;
(b) harm to the quality of the environment, including (i) harm to the quality of the environment as a whole, (ii) harm to the quality of air, water or land, and (iii) other impairment of, or interference with, ecosystems;
(c) offence to the senses of human beings;
(d) damage to property; or
(e) impairment of, or interference with, amenities or other legitimate uses of the environment.

Regulation 2(1)(b) obliges the Minister to consider whether, and to what extent, the physical condition of the land or any building or other structure on it is detrimental to the amenity of the land which is adjacent to it. It is intended that “amenity” is given its ordinary meaning, being a desirable or useful feature or facility of a building or place.

I would also like to draw your attention to the matters referred to in regulations 2(3) and 2(4). The matters in regulation 2(3) all relate to the use, or lack of use, of the land, and the matters in regulation 2(4) relates to any particular designation of the land, for example, the land forms part of a nature reserve or conservation area is a matter that must be taken into account by Ministers.
The matters listed in the draft Regulations are matters that Ministers must have regard to so far as applicable to the land described in the particular application. For example, although one of the matters listed is whether the physical condition of the land complies with the standards for good agricultural condition, this would not require to be considered by Ministers in the case of land which is situated in a city centre. Also, I should highlight that Ministers may consider other matters not set out in the draft Regulations where these are relevant. The draft Regulations are a list of the matters to which Ministers must have regard as a minimum – in some cases Ministers may have to consider other matters which they deem relevant in order to have satisfied themselves that to approve an application is in the public interest and compatible with furthering the achievement of sustainable development.

I hope that the matters set out in the draft Regulations explains our approach to the interpretation of “abandoned” or “neglected” land.

Kind regards

The Committee ended consideration of the Bill for the day amendment 1069 having been disposed of.
The Convener: Agenda item 3 is consideration of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill at stage 2. This is day 1 of the process.

I welcome to the meeting Marco Biagi, Minister for Local Government and Community Empowerment, his officials and Drew Smith MSP.

Before we move to consideration of the amendments, it will be helpful if I set out the procedure for stage 2 consideration. Everyone should have with them a copy of the bill as introduced, the marshalled list of amendments, which was published on Monday, and the groupings of amendments, which set out the amendments in the order in which they will be debated.

There will be one debate on each group of amendments. I will call the member who lodged the first amendment in each group to speak to and move their amendment, and to speak to all the other amendments in the group. Members who have not lodged amendments in the group but who wish to speak should indicate that by catching my attention in the usual way.

If the minister has not already spoken on the group, I will invite him to contribute to the debate just before I move to the winding-up speech. The debate on each group will be concluded by me inviting the member who moved the first amendment in the group to wind up.

Following debate on each group, I will check whether the member who moved the first amendment in the group wishes to press their amendment to a vote or to withdraw it. If they wish to press it, I will put the question on that amendment. If a member wishes to withdraw their amendment after it has been moved, they must seek the committee's agreement to do so. If any committee member objects, the committee must immediately move to the vote on the amendment.

If any member does not want to move their amendment when I call it, they should say, “Not moved.” Please remember that any other MSP may move such an amendment. If no one moves the amendment, I will immediately call the next amendment on the marshalled list.

Only committee members are allowed to vote at stage 2. Voting in any division is by show of hands. It is important that members keep their hands clearly raised until the clerk has recorded the vote.

The committee is required to indicate formally that it has considered and agreed to each section of the bill, so I will put a question on each section at the appropriate point.

Section 1—National outcomes

The Convener: We come to the first group of amendments. Amendment 1043, in the name of Alex Rowley, is grouped with amendments 1044, 1003 to 1005, 1049, 1008 to 1012, 1050, 1014, 1051 to 1053 and 1071. If amendment 1044 is agreed to, I cannot call amendment 1003, and if amendment 1012 is agreed to, I cannot call amendment 1050.

Alex Rowley (Cowdenbeath) (Lab): The purposes of my amendments 1043, 1044, 1049, 1051 to 1053 and 1071 are to ensure that the national outcomes for Scotland are created through a participative process that involves the people of Scotland and that all people have the opportunity to have a say in the outputs, and to require the Scottish ministers to lay a report before the Scottish Parliament every two years outlining the progress that has been made towards achieving the national outcomes. That will be an important part of democratic focus in Scotland and will improve the involvement of local people in setting national outcomes. The amendments are needed to ensure that the national outcomes for Scotland are created through a participative process that involves the people of Scotland. That is important because of the known benefits of focusing delivery on the achievement of outcomes.

For the bill to be sufficiently strengthened, it must involve all communities across Scotland and encourage their participation in setting the national outcomes. That is particularly true for communities that are the most disadvantaged, which are often described as the hardest to reach. To ensure that ministers have involved all people who live and work in Scotland in the determination of the national outcomes, it is suggested that there should be a parliamentary mechanism for scrutiny.

The bill states that reports must be prepared and published

“at such times as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.”

I argue that there needs to be a greater duty on ministers to report on progress towards achieving the national outcomes.

Under my suggestion, the Scottish ministers would have to present,

“as soon as practicable after the end of each 2 year period”, a report to Parliament on the extent to which the national outcomes have been achieved. The preparation of the report must be a participative exercise, with ministers consulting a full range of communities. That would ensure that progress towards achieving the national outcomes is transparent, and it would involve the Parliament much more in the national outcomes process. It would create far greater transparency and accountability and far greater involvement of local people and communities across Scotland.

I move amendment 1043.

The Convener: I call the minister to speak to amendment 1003 and the other amendments in the group.

The Minister for Local Government and Community Empowerment (Marco Biagi): Thank you—it is a pleasure to be in front of the committee again. I hope that this goes as well as the last stage 2 that I attended at the committee.

Alex Rowley has set out his view on how Parliament should be involved, and we have the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee’s recommendation that the Scottish Parliament should have a more active scrutiny role in relation to national outcomes. I agree with both that the scrutiny role of the Scottish Parliament in the process should be strengthened. I believe that the way to do that is through consultation under rule 17.5 of the Scottish Parliament’s standing orders. That process best reflects the separation of powers between an Executive that is responsible for setting the strategic direction of Government and a Parliament that is responsible for holding the Government to account for its progress. Therefore, I do not think that the procedure that Alex Rowley proposes is the best one.

I will go through my amendments in detail but, in summary, they would require Scottish ministers to consult the Parliament when determining, and when reviewing, national outcomes.

The effect of amendment 1003 is that, having consulted

“such persons as they consider appropriate”

in order to determine the draft national outcomes, Scottish ministers must then consult the Scottish Parliament.

Amendment 1004 is in consequence of amendment 1003 and provides that the national outcomes cannot be published until the Scottish Parliament has been consulted. Amendment 1005 sets the period for parliamentary consultation at 40 days, beginning with the day the consultation document is laid before the Parliament or otherwise provided to the clerk.

The process set out at rule 17.5 of the Scottish Parliament’s standing orders will apply to the consultation. I do not propose to go into further detail on that, unless members would find that helpful.

Amendment 1008 provides that, in any review of the national outcomes,

“the Scottish Ministers must consult such persons as they consider appropriate.”

Amendment 1012 removes the previous, more restricted, provision on that point, which had limited the consultation to where revisions were to be made.

Amendment 1009 provides that the Scottish Parliament is to be consulted in any review of the national outcomes. If, after a review has taken place, revisions to the national outcomes are proposed, that amendment provides that the Scottish Parliament will also be consulted on those revisions. If, after a review has taken place, no revisions are proposed, the Scottish Parliament will still be consulted on the existing national outcomes.

Amendment 1014 specifies that the period for the parliamentary consultation is 40 days. The process set out at rule 17.5 of the Scottish Parliament’s standing orders would apply to the consultation. Amendments 1010 and 1011 provide that national outcomes may not be republished until after the 40-day period of consultation with the Scottish Parliament.

There are some concerns about Alex Rowley’s proposal for a list of consultees. By identifying certain individuals and groups, the scope of the consultation is unavoidably narrowed, with some persons given greater significance in statute than others. For example, the list gives prominence to some organisations, such as those that work for children and young people, but not organisations that work in other sectors, such as those that work for homeless people or equality organisations.

The current wording allows flexibility for the consultation process to be appropriate to different situations. For example, where a review focuses on a specialist issue, it may be more appropriate to limit the scope of consultation to those who have expertise, experience and interest in that area. On the other hand, we anticipate that all Governments would want to consult widely and inclusively on the national outcomes as a whole. The duty needs to be carried out reasonably and, as such, entails that anyone who could reasonably expect to be consulted will be consulted. We also propose amendments that extend the requirement for consultation when the national outcomes are reviewed. The amendments ensure that, in the course of any review of the national outcomes, Scottish ministers are required to consult.

Both Alex Rowley and Drew Smith propose legislating for the provision of a report on the consultation process. I agree with the principle behind that proposal, but I do not agree that it requires legislation. When the national outcomes are provided to the Parliament, we would, as a matter of good practice—as I believe any Government would—provide a note on the process and findings of the consultation. That would give the Parliament an opportunity to comment on the consultation process.

Finally, I turn to Alex Rowley's proposals for reporting on the national outcomes. I do not think that it is appropriate to legislate for how and when future Governments will report on the national outcomes, because the format and timing of the reporting should be for the Government of the day to decide. The way in which we communicate and receive information is moving at such a pace that we would rather allow for future innovative approaches to reporting.

There have been recent discussions in Parliament about the appropriateness of certain timescales for the reporting of data, and such a timescale should be something that can be adapted in the light of experience. For example, a case could be made for reporting on progress at any time of the year, at the beginning or end of the parliamentary session, before or alongside the draft budget, and so on. As such, I believe that it is best to leave the timescales flexible and subject to parliamentary scrutiny.

The Government reports through the Scotland performs website, which provides an up-to-the-minute picture of progress towards the national outcomes. Updates are continually made available as soon as the latest data is published, so Scotland performs always shows the most up-to-date information. We also provide a Scotland performs update to support the draft budget scrutiny process, including performance score cards and narrative to show performance against national outcomes. That is how we currently undertake our annual reporting.

We would rather not limit future Governments to an inflexible model by prescribing the format and timing of reporting. I do not think it is appropriate to ask that the Scottish ministers consult those listed in preparing any report on progress towards national outcomes. Any report on progress would be a factual statement based on evidence. Consultation on that does not seem appropriate in this context.

I therefore invite Alex Rowley to withdraw amendment 1043 and ask him and Drew Smith not to move their other amendments in the group. I ask the committee to support amendments 1003 to 1005, 1008 to 1012 and 1014.

The Convener: Thank you, minister. I call Drew Smith to speak to amendment 1045.

Drew Smith (Glasgow) (Lab): Thank you very much, convener, for the opportunity to take part in these stage 2 proceedings.

I note what the minister said and thank him for his agreement on the sentiment that we are exploring in my amendment 1045. The purpose of the amendment is to add greater consistency. The bill imposes a duty on community planning partnerships. The committee itself has previously concluded that the same standards of transparency and accountability should apply to others in the process. My argument is simply that the Scottish Government should lead by example in that respect.

Alex Rowley's amendments refer to reporting on progress towards achieving the national outcomes. The two additional points that my amendment would add are that the Government would set out how "the national outcomes have been improved following consultation"; and would demonstrate how

"the results of the consultation have influenced those improvements."

The committee referred to that in paragraph 107 of its stage 1 report, where it suggested that we would want to see the Scottish Government "leading by example" in relation to consultation and engagement.

I note that the minister said that he does not feel that legislating is the most appropriate way to ensure that such consultation happens, but the bill requires community planning partnerships to report in that way, so it does not seem to me to be too onerous to expect the Government to do the same.

Stewart Stevenson (Banffshire and Buchan Coast) (SNP): I want to address the content of Alex Rowley's amendment 1049, which I think raises some quite serious practical issues that are not adequately addressed in its drafting.

In particular, proposed subsection (3)(a) of the new section that the amendment would insert provides that the Scottish ministers must

"lay a copy of the proposed draft regulations before the Parliament."

That is fine, except that the amendment does not provide for the handcuffs that the Government has provided in its amendments, whereby the regulations cannot be withdrawn during the consultation period. Governments could find themselves in a position where they would wish to withdraw the regulations during the consultation, which would of course create considerable difficulties for the consultees. In that respect, the Government’s approach is much to be preferred, because it would provide stability during the consultation period. The way in which amendment 1049 is drafted means that it does not provide such stability.

I also want to talk about the reporting issue. It is deceptively attractive to prescribe when reporting may be done, but the construct of the amendment means that, in essence, reporting cannot be done at other times. This is a wide-ranging bill that covers a wide range of policy areas and subjects. The minister’s reference to Scotland performs appropriate, because of course a Government may wish to provide updates at the timely point. I can see members getting intensely frustrated as they rise to their feet to question ministers at oral questions if the minister says, “I’m not allowed to report under the amendment to the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill that was agreed to on 4 March 2015, which does not allow me to report to Parliament until the particular date that was set out.” It is far better that the Government has the ability to make such reports, updates and disclosures as are possible in a timely and appropriate way across a wide range of policy areas, and that we do not pass a bill that prevents and inhibits members from questioning and demanding answers from ministers, which the amendment carries the very real danger of doing.

Alex Rowley: I thank the minister, as Drew Smith did, for his comments on the sentiment that we are discussing in relation to the bill. I should add that my name is pronounced “Alec” with a C.

With regard to reporting on national outcomes every two years, and Stewart Stevenson’s point in that respect, it is right that there should be a requirement to report. At that point, we will, as a Parliament, be able to see what progress is being made on the national outcomes and to hold the Government to account. It should not be left to the Government to decide when is an appropriate time to measure how much progress has been made. The provision in my amendment brings greater accountability to the process.

Likewise, the minister said that he wants to see a greater role for the Parliament than that which is currently outlined in the bill. The amendments that have been lodged create a greater role for Parliament, but communities should also have a far greater role and input in setting national outcomes and holding the Government of the day to account for them.

I repeat that I believe that the amendments will bring about greater transparency, involvement and accountability in the whole process. I press my amendment 1043.
aware of that material and to have reasons for any departure from it.

I therefore invite Cameron Buchanan not to move his amendments 1006A and 1046 to 1048, and I ask the committee to support my amendments 1001, 1006, 1007 and 1013.

I move amendment 1001.

Cameron Buchanan (Lothian) (Con): I have lodged amendment 1006A because I wanted to weaken the provision. I think that “have regard to” is too strong and that “consider” is a less draconian term.

Stewart Stevenson: I wanted to invite the minister in his concluding remarks to expand on proposed new subsection (1C), in which he excludes functions where the Scottish Parliament or the Scottish Parliamentary Corporate Body are contributing to an outcome. Is that more restrictive than he intends? I can envisage circumstances in which it would be perfectly proper for the responsibility to lie with the minister, but for a contribution to be made by the Scottish Parliament or the SPCB. I would be interested to hear the minister’s views on that. He might want to think about adjusting the provision at stage 3 in light of my comments.

Marco Biagi: We have a difference of opinion as to how much consideration should be given to the national outcomes. I am clear that we should be quite strong on those but should allow public bodies and organisations to depart where they have good reason. As I said, I think that “have regard to” fits the precedent on that and strikes the right balance.

On the issue raised by Stewart Stevenson, there have been discussions about concerns raised by the chief executive. Negotiation in the drafting process has tried to cover all the concerns raised by the Scottish Parliament. I do not believe that it will lead to unintended consequences; I am happy to re-examine the section to check that. I am confident that the amendment captures the separation of Parliament and Government that we are trying to ensure is clear in the bill.

Amendment 1001 agreed to.

The Convener: Group 3 is on national outcomes: inequalities resulting from socioeconomic disadvantage. Amendment 1002, in the name of Marco Biagi, is the only amendment in the group.

Marco Biagi: We are committed to building a fairer Scotland and reducing inequalities and we wish to make that aim more explicit throughout the bill. Amendment 1002 requires that when determining the national outcomes, “Scottish Ministers must have regard to the reduction of inequalities of outcome which result from socio-economic disadvantage”.

I hope that the committee will support that.

Section 4—Community planning

The Convener: Group 4 is on the duty to carry out community planning: general. Amendment 1015, in the name of the minister, is grouped with amendments 1016 to 1020, 1026 to 1028, 1032 and 1037 to 1042.

Marco Biagi: I point out that officials will be moving around the table at this point, because we are moving from part 1 of the bill to part 2. I do not intend any disruption or disrespect.

The Convener: That is fine, minister.

Marco Biagi: Group 4 contains amendments that will mainly adjust the wording of the bill to bring it closer to our policy intentions and to provide consistency in the language in different sections.

The essence of community planning under the bill is that public sector bodies should work together and with communities in order to improve outcomes for those communities. The bill should place duties on community planning partnerships and on community planning partners, but not on community bodies themselves.

Section 4(1) places a duty on community planning partners and community bodies to "participate with each other in community planning", and "community planning" is defined in section 4(2). Amendments 1015 to 1018 will adjust the wording to avoid placing duties on community bodies. Amendment 1015 will replace section 4(1) with a provision that imposes a duty on community planning partners to carry out community planning "for the purpose mentioned in subsection (2)".

Amendment 1016 will amend section 4(2) to provide that the purpose of community planning "is improvement in the achievement of outcomes resulting from, or contributed to by, the provision of services delivered by or on behalf of the" community planning partners.

Amendment 1017 is consequential to amendments 1015 and 1016.

Amendment 1018 will place a duty on community planning partners, when "carrying out community planning," to "participate with each other, and ... participate with any community body" that wishes "to participate in community planning" in a way that enables those bodies to participate to the extent that they wish to do so. Unlike section 4 of the bill as introduced, amendment 1018 will impose no duty on community bodies to participate in community planning.

Amendments 1019 and 1020 will make minor drafting changes to the definitions of "community planning partnership" and "community planning partner" in section 4(4). They will have no substantive effect.

I turn to amendment 1026. Under the Historic Environment Scotland Act 2014, historic environment Scotland is established and "has the general function of investigating, caring for and promoting Scotland's historic environment."

Historic environment Scotland will become fully operational on 1 October 2015. It will be a valuable community planning partner; indeed, the 2014 act places a specific duty on historic environment Scotland, in exercising its functions, to "have regard ... as may be appropriate in the circumstances, to the interests of local communities."

Having the role of a community planning partner will be one important way in which that duty can be delivered. We therefore consider it appropriate to include historic environment Scotland in the list of community planning partners in schedule 1.

Amendment 1027 will replace section 5(2)(a) with a reworded provision. It is a minor amendment, and will have no substantive effect.

Amendment 1028 is consequential to amendment 1027.

Section 5(1) provides that "Each community planning partnership must prepare and publish a local outcomes improvement plan."

Section 5(2)(a) provides that this plan must set out “each local outcome to which the community planning partnership is to give priority with a view to improving the achievement of the outcome”.

Amendment 1032 is another amendment that seeks to simplify the language in the bill by adding consistency, so that we refer to “person” in both the first two subsections of section 8, which imposes governance duties in relation to the facilitation of community planning and the carrying out of community planning functions by community planning partnerships.

Section 8(1) refers to “each community planning partner”, whereas subsection (2) identifies “The persons” referred to as community planning partners in subsection (1).

Amendment 1037 is consequential to amendments 1015 and 1016, and reflects the fact that community planning will now be defined in section 4(1) rather than in section 4(2).

Amendment 1038 relates to section 4(6), which gives the Scottish ministers powers to make regulations modifying the list of persons in schedule 1 who are community planning partners to “add a person or a description of person,” or to remove or amend an entry.

That also relates to section 8(3), which gives the Scottish ministers powers to make regulations to “add a person or a description of person” to the list of community planning partners with governance duties, or to remove or amend an entry on the list. The bill currently proposes that the regulations on exercise of those powers will be subject to negative procedure. In my response, dated 19 December 2014, to the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee report, I indicated my agreement with its recommendations to change that to affirmative procedure. Amendment 1038 provides that regulations that modify the list of community planning partners or the list of governance partners will be subject to affirmative procedure and therefore to a higher level of scrutiny by the Scottish Parliament.

Amendments 1039, 1040 and 1041 will add to the list of consequential amendments to other legislation arising from schedule 4. To help the committee, I will briefly summarise what the amendments will do. Amendment 1039 will ensure that references to community planning duties in the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973 relate to duties under this bill, and not under the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003. Section 99 of the 1973 act places a set of general duties on local government auditors, one of which is for auditors to satisfy themselves that the local authority is complying with its community planning duties. Section 102 of the 1973 act provides for the controller of audit to make reports to the Accounts Commission on how a local authority has discharged its community planning duties—it is important to bring that up to date.

Amendment 1040 will alter section 57(2)(a) of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003, which allows ministers to in certain situations. One of those situations is where ministers consider that the enactment prevents local authorities from discharging their community planning functions under section 15(1) of the 2003 act. As the bill will repeal part 2 of the 2003 act, amendment 1040 will remove the redundant reference.

Amendment 1041 will update references to community planning in the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005 and the Police and Fire Reform (Scotland) Act 2012. In both acts, those references to community planning apply to two issues, the first of which is in relation to local plans where proposed new section 41E of the 2005 act will require the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service to produce a local fire and rescue plan for each local authority area. Similarly, the 2012 act will require the relevant local police commander to produce a local police plan for each local authority area. In both those cases, the plans must, among other things, set out how fire and rescue and policing priorities and objectives will contribute to delivery of any relevant local outcomes that have been identified by community planning. Amendment 1041 will update statutory references to community planning for those purposes.

Another issue arises in relation to delegation of functions. The 2005 act requires the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service to delegate certain functions, including community planning functions, to a local senior officer. Likewise, the 2012 act requires the chief constable of Police Scotland to delegate his or her community planning functions to the local commander for an area. Amendment 1041 will update statutory references to community planning for those purposes.

Amendment 1042 will repeal section 57(2)(b) of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003, which, under section 57(1), allows ministers to

in situations where ministers consider that the enactment prevents community planning partners from discharging their community planning functions under sections 15 and 16 of the 2003 act. The community planning provisions in the bill will replace those in the 2003 act; schedule 5 will repeal part 2 of the 2003 act, and as a result section 57(2)(b) of the 2003 act will become redundant. We consider that there is no need to replicate that provision for community planning duties in the bill; section 97 will provide ministers with the means to cover that situation through a general power to “by order make ... incidental, supplementary, consequential, transitional or transitory provision”.

Having gone through all that, I ask the committee to agree to the amendments.

I move amendment 1015.

Amendment 1015 agreed to.

Amendments 1016 to 1018 moved—[Marco Biagi]—and agreed to.

The Convener: Amendment 1054, in the name of Drew Smith, is on the relationship between national outcomes and local outcomes, and is in a group on its own.

Drew Smith: Amendment 1054 returns us to section 4(3), on community planning. In the bill, the requirement is that local outcomes “must be consistent with the national outcomes”. The purpose and effect of my amendment would be to change the requirement so that community planning partnerships, in setting the outcomes, “must have regard to” national outcomes as opposed to having to “be consistent with” national outcomes.

We had an debate earlier about consistent use of language. Mr Buchanan’s view is that “have regard to” is perhaps a stronger position than “consider”. I contend that “must be consistent with” is stronger still and could run the risk of creating a situation in which national outcomes and local outcomes are in conflict. Perhaps as a result of a participation request, a local outcome might be set, but if the bill as drafted was passed, there could be a danger that the national outcome might be seen to override the local outcome.

I believe that there is certainly a case to be made that local partners should “have regard to” the national outcomes. However, I think that it is going too far to expect all local outcomes to be completely “consistent with” national outcomes.

I move amendment 1054.

Stewart Stevenson: Amendment 1054 would introduce the term “community planning partnership” into the replacement section 4(3). I feel slightly uneasy that by specifying that, and that alone, the scope that is covered by the amendment is more limited than the scope of what it would delete, which makes no such specific reference to community planning partnerships.

I am genuinely unclear in regard to that, so I invite Drew Smith to help me to understand whether my fears are correct or whether that is a matter that he has considered, and, in particular, to say why he chose to introduce the very specific term “community planning partnership” in amendment 1054. It is a term that does not occur in the words that he is proposing to delete at page 3, line 16.

The Convener: As no other member wishes to enter the debate, I ask the minister to comment.

Marco Biagi: Amendment 1054 would impose a duty on community planning partnerships to “have regard to” national outcomes in setting outcomes, rather than—as proposed in section 4—the achievement of local outcomes, as improved by “community planning”, having to “be consistent with ... national outcomes”.

Those are two changes, as the member pointed out.

Amendment 1054 also assumes a duty on community planning partnerships to set outcomes. A statutory provision requiring a CPP to “have regard to” national outcomes will not ensure that local outcomes reflect national outcomes in the way that a duty to “be consistent” will. A duty to “have regard to” national outcomes requires that they should be considered, not that they should be followed.

A local outcome could have a recognisable impact in a variety of ways on many national outcomes. For example, local objectives to improve mental health might impact on what we currently have as national outcome 6, which is that “We live longer, healthier lives”, and national outcome 7, which is that “We have tackled the significant inequalities in Scottish society”.

If the national outcomes are created by a participative process—we have set that out already—they will be all-encompassing and can be effectively aligned with local priorities, as well. The terminology needs to be consistent with that aim. We feel that we need that stronger link in order to link local plans with national plans and local outcomes with national outcomes. Keeping the original wording will enable us to ensure that local outcomes, which are objectives for local areas, are aligned with the national outcomes.

There is no duty on CPPs to set outcomes; there is a duty only to identify those that are to be prioritised under section 5(2). The requirement for local outcomes to be consistent with national outcomes arises from the description of community planning in section 4(2) in combination with section 4(3). Amendment 1054 could therefore create difficulties and confusion around the purpose of CPPs in that regard, so I ask Drew Smith to seek to withdraw it.

Drew Smith: I listened carefully to the comments from Stewart Stevenson and the minister, and I understand the concerns that have been raised. However, I will press amendment 1054 because it is drafted to restrict its effect to community planning partnerships, which I believe have their own processes. Where it would be legitimate for CPPs to set their own local objectives, which should certainly have regard to national outcomes, I do not believe that those would be required to be completely consistent at all times. To require that they should be would go against the spirit of the bill. I therefore press amendment 1054.

The Convener: The result of the division is: For 3, Against 4, Abstentions 0.

Amendment 1054 disagreed to.

Amendments 1019 and 1020 moved—[Marco Biagi]—and agreed to.

The Convener: Group 6 is on effectiveness of community planning in involving communities, tackling inequality et cetera. Amendment 1021, in the name of the minister, is grouped with amendments 1022 to 1024, 1055, 1025, 1056 to 1061, 1029 to 1031 and 1062.

Marco Biagi: Amendment 1021 is a minor drafting amendment that has no substantive effect. It provides that duties for CPPs in section 4(5) apply to “Each” instead of “A” community planning partnership. Amendments 1023 and 1024 are likewise minor drafting amendments that have no substantive effect and simply replace “such” with “those”. Amendment 1030 is a minor technical amendment that provides spacing.

I turn to the substantive amendments in the group. Amendment 1022 relates to the focus on addressing inequalities. That theme was a feature of written submissions, and a recurrent subject of debate at stage 1 in committee evidence sessions.

We know that some communities are better placed than others to have their views considered and acted on. The Local Government and Regeneration Committee’s stage 1 report referred to the risk of empowering only the already empowered. Many organisations, including Barnardo’s Scotland, Oxfam and the Poverty Alliance, emphasised in their evidence that community planning partnerships need to ensure that they take account of those who are experiencing the disadvantages that are associated with socioeconomic inequalities.

Community planning partnerships are already addressing inequalities in their work, but we want them to do more. Amendment 1022 will make it explicit that community planning partnerships, in considering which community bodies are likely to contribute to community planning, must do so by “having regard in particular to which of those bodies represent the interests of persons who experience inequalities of outcome which result from socio-economic disadvantage.”

That will then trigger the requirement in the bill to make “all reasonable efforts to secure” their participation.

Amendment 1025 relates to the committee’s recommendation that “there should be a specific duty on CPP partners to reduce inequality and focus on ... prevention.”

10:30

The Scottish Government and our partners on the national community planning group agree that taking action to reduce inequalities should be at the heart of what community planning partnerships do. In fact, as we have shown from the outcomes, it should be at the heart of what the whole of government does. Amendment 1025 will introduce a general duty on community planning partnerships to “act with a view to reducing inequalities of outcome which result from socio-economic disadvantage”.

The duty will apply to the way in which community planning partnerships undertake all of their functions under part 2 of the bill, from securing participation by community bodies to the local outcomes that the CPPs prioritise in their local outcomes improvement plan. It also includes how community planning partnerships review progress on the continued suitability of their plans and how they report on progress each year to local communities.

The amendment includes a qualification that will allow a community planning partnership not to act with a view to reducing inequalities of outcome that result from socioeconomic disadvantage if it "considers that it would be inappropriate to do so."

The qualification recognises that, although a community planning partnership may undertake its general duties with a view to reducing inequalities, it may have certain important actions that do not in isolation contribute to that. For instance, a community planning partnership should be able to support the development of high-skilled, high-earning employment opportunities, even though that might not in the first step contribute to a reduction in inequalities.

Alex Rowley’s amendment 1055 would require local authorities to maintain a list of community bodies that might participate in community planning. Although I am interested in the proposal, community planning partnerships already have access to a Scotland-wide directory of third sector organisations via the get involved website. That is a database that provides identification of local community bodies by postal code and activity. The information is maintained by the local third sector interfaces, which, among other things, are funded to build in the third sector to community planning in their local areas.

The database includes details of community body location, website, main contact, charitable and legal status, the number of paid staff, committee members, geographical reach, aims and objectives, main areas of work and financial data. The fields are fairly extensive. It is therefore not clear what additional benefit there would be in requiring each local authority to maintain a list of community bodies in its area, nor what potential implications there could be for a body that, for whatever reason, did not end up on the list. We do not intend to require any form of registration for community bodies to be allowed to participate in community planning.

Amendment 1056 would require community planning partnerships to produce an assessment of the wellbeing of communities in their areas, and amendment 1059 would place a duty on CPPs to take account of “the most recently published” assessment of the wellbeing of communities in their area before publishing their local outcomes improvement plan. The bill already requires community planning partnerships to understand the needs and circumstances of persons who reside in their area. Section 5(4) requires community planning partnerships to take account of those needs and circumstances as well as any representations that are received in their consultation with community bodies and others before publishing their local outcomes improvement plan.

Another issue is that there is no requirement to update the provisions. Amendment 1059 refers to “the most recently published” assessment, but there is no duty to regularly publish such assessments. A Welsh provision in a parallel bill has such a requirement.

Furthermore, wellbeing has been purposefully left undefined in local government legislation, and particularly in the 2003 act, which sets out the general power for local authorities to advance wellbeing. The introduction of the definition of the term in the bill could potentially cause confusion.

I do not believe that there is any need for Mr Rowley’s amendments 1055, 1056 and 1059. All that they would do would be to impose a new burden on community planning partnerships.

Amendment 1058 would require CPPs to “make all reasonable efforts to secure representations” from persons who are identified in the assessment of wellbeing as particularly vulnerable or otherwise disadvantaged. However, our amendment 1022 goes further than that, as it will require community planning partnerships, when considering which community bodies are likely to be able to contribute to community planning, to have particular regard to community bodies that represent disadvantaged communities. As I said, the community planning partnerships must make all reasonable efforts to secure the participation of those bodies and take reasonable steps to enable community bodies that wish to participate to do so. Furthermore, under amendment 1018, community planning partnerships will also be under a duty to participate with community bodies that wish to participate.

Unlike amendment 1058, our amendment 1022 will apply those duties of participation with community bodies to all aspects of community planning—not just the finalisation of the local outcomes improvement plan but the review of progress against the plan, the review of the plan’s continued suitability and progress reporting. Those are much broader in their scope.

Amendment 1057 seeks to impose a more explicit duty on CPPs to consult on the local outcome improvement plan. The bill secures the participation of community bodies throughout the community planning process. That goes beyond preparing a plan to include the review of progress against the plan, the review of the plan’s continued suitability and progress reporting on it. That focus on continuing participation with community bodies, including third sector bodies, distinguishes community planning from the development of other plans for which consultation provides the main formal means of engagement with service users and stakeholders. It is about partnership.

In that context, the existing provision seeks not to be overly prescriptive. It is purposefully broad so that a local CPP can determine from its knowledge of local needs, circumstances and resources which community bodies and other persons it would be appropriate to consult. That broad provision is more effective than the narrow specification of bodies that Alex Rowley suggests. I also note that his amendment 1057 would have community planning partnerships consult their own partners, which seems a little unusual.

Amendments 1060 to 1062 represent an attempt to bring locality planning into the bill as part of community planning. I have very considerable sympathy for the intention behind the amendments. I am not sure that there are not other ways to achieve their aim, but I believe strongly in the value of neighbourhood planning. That level is where we really get the link between community planning, which can be quite strategic in its view, and the clearest example of people’s wellbeing in local places. It is also where we can often make the biggest difference in influencing priorities for public services and their delivery and contributing directly to the improvement of the community’s general wellbeing.

However, the community action plans that are described in amendments 1060 to 1062 would have a slightly more limited purpose. They would link the local outcomes in a community planning partnership’s local outcomes improvement plan with each community council area in the community planning area. The plans would set out the extent, if any, of improvement expected in that community council area for each of the local outcomes that are set out in the local outcomes improvement plan. I want the purpose of locality planning to be more ambitious, broader and high achieving. I want community planning partnerships to develop and apply neighbourhood-based approaches wherever they can offer the most value.

Amendments 1060 to 1062 have issues in that regard. To take the example of Fife, which Mr Rowley knows very well, they would require community planning partners to work with community councils and other community bodies to produce no fewer than 105 community action plans. That is the number of active and inactive community councils in Fife. That would be quite an immense bureaucracy to prescribe and would distract community planning partners and community bodies from efforts to improve outcomes where improvements were most needed, such as targeting additional work on more disadvantaged areas, or taking a more flexible approach to the definition of a neighbourhood than using the community council area.

We need to ensure that community planning can concentrate on where it can provide the most benefit—that is, improving the local outcomes and reducing inequalities on a set of priorities that is identified from the partnership’s planning and local understanding. That is the key principle of the CPP provisions in the bill. It reflects the recommendation in the Accounts Commission’s and Auditor General’s recent national audit report “Community planning: Turning ambition into action” that community planning partnerships should “set clearer improvement priorities focused on how they will add most value as a partnership, when updating their” single outcome agreements.

I wish to return to this in guidance, but I also think that there is potential to work with Mr Rowley to develop this to present more technically robust and perhaps more flexibly applied amendments that he could lodge at stage 3.

Amendment 1029 addresses the committee’s request in its stage 1 report for confirmation that the community planning partnership is required to publicly publish reports on progress. The amendment provides that community planning partnerships must publish their progress report for each reporting year. One of the principles for part 2 that has attracted universal support is the importance of community participation at the heart of community planning.

Amendment 1031 imposes a new duty on community planning partnerships to account for the participation by community bodies in community planning for the area. It requires that a community planning partnership’s annual report must report on the extent to which the partners have “participated with community bodies … during the reporting year” and the extent to which “that participation has been effective in enabling community bodies to participate in community planning”.

I commend the Government amendments in the group to the committee and I ask Alex Rowley not to move his amendments, although, as I have said, I am sympathetic to amendment 1058 in principle.

I move amendment 1021.

Alex Rowley: I am grateful to the minister because what he has said allows me to address some of the points that he picked up.

The Audit Scotland 2013 report, “Improving community planning in Scotland” states:

“Community planning takes account of a wide range of consultation activity, but there is a long way to go before services are truly designed around communities and the potential of local people to participate in, shape and improve local services is realised.”

That sums up where I am trying to go with my amendments. I am prepared to accept the minister’s point that he is committed to looking at the idea of local community plans within the framework of the high-level plan. He says that the way to do that is through guidance, but putting it on the face of the bill at stage 2 would give us the opportunity to work together before stage 3 to address any technical or other difficulties that he envisages. I certainly do not envisage the difficulties that he envisages.

On establishing a register at local level, which local authorities would maintain, I accept that, as the minister said, there is a register held by a third sector organisation at national level. However, I suspect that many of the community organisations and groups that we are trying to reach are not on any register. That is why I propose having a register at local authority level of all local community groups, which can range from community councils to tenants and residents groups to sport and leisure groups; it can cover a range of local groups that have an input into the community planning process and its outcomes.

Take for example a high-level outcome in relation to health and wellbeing. A lot of the community planning partnerships tick the boxes year in, year out in achieving outcomes, but having sat on a community planning partnership for seven or eight years and having chaired the Fife community planning partnership for more than two years, I know that sometimes it is difficult to see the impact that that has in communities. It is certainly very difficult to see how or whether communities have been engaged or involved. Indeed, if you asked the majority of community groups and organisations what the community plan is, or how the community plan is impacting on their area and whether they are involved in it, the answer would be no. I am sure that that is the case all over Scotland.

On health and wellbeing, I would argue that the local bowling club, running club, football club and the local kids activity club should all have an input into setting priorities at local level. The minister talked about there being 105 community action plans in Fife. I am not in any way put off by that. Indeed, I would argue that if we continue to use Fife as an example, we can see that it has seven local area committees, some of which are better than others at trying to get down to community level.

In my constituency, coming from the topside, Benarty community council area has the second highest level of deprivation in Fife. It is part of the Lochs ward, along with my home village of Kelty; both of them have distinct issues and would have similar, but different, priorities set locally. Coming down to the bottom side of the constituency, to Dalgety Bay, Inverkeithing and Aberdour, we find that Dalgety Bay and Hillend community council also has priorities, but those priorities would be different, given the levels of deprivation in terms of health and wellbeing, support and so on, in comparison with the topside of the constituency.

Why would you not be able to go to that level and take a bottom-up approach to setting local priorities for local people? For me, that is in line with exactly what Audit Scotland talks about. The role of community planning in creating joint working between public bodies should not be confused with the purpose of involving communities in planning their future and planning public services for their area.

Over a number of years, the Government’s aim in establishing community planning partners was to try to get public organisations to work together. You may ask how difficult that is, but as the minister—and former ministers—and his civil servants will know, it is often quite difficult to get organisations to work together. Even within a local authority, the departments and different parts of the authority can work in silos. We see that happening in Government and in the Parliament. It is difficult to pull those together.

To take the next step and achieve what the bill says on the tin—community empowerment—we should create those registers, so that all local groups can sign up and know that they will not be missed out because they have been registered and so will be involved and participate in decisions. We should allow communities, at that level, to start to shape their priorities and the services that they need, because those will differ between communities and, as many groups have pointed out, in the spirit of the Christie commission, this fundamental shift in priorities has to take place. If we are serious about prevention, following the Christie commission, the best way to achieve that is from a local level and by a bottom-up approach. That is what the amendments set out to do.

In terms of wellbeing in local communities, it is important that we see what the issues are. As I said, I can take you through the different communities in my constituency, all of which are covered by geographical community council areas, some of which have a plethora of local organisations that are working away and should be empowered, and some of which do not and will need additional support to grow such organisations. Producing information on the wellbeing of communities would be part of that.

I am happy to work with the minister and the Government to firm up on any of the proposals. I would not want any of them to be a threat to community engagement. I do not believe that the amendments are a threat—quite the reverse, I believe that they would enhance the bill. If there are specific issues, I am willing to work with the minister and the Government on them. I think that we should amend the bill and then work together to iron out any difficulties as we move towards stage 3.

Stewart Stevenson: I have several substantial difficulties with the proposals made by the amendments in Mr Rowley’s name. The wording of amendment 1055 reads:

“Each local authority must”— not can—

“for the purposes of subsection (5), maintain a list of all community bodies within its area”.

In his remarks on his amendments, Mr Rowley said that local groups “can” sign up. If local groups can sign up, I am unclear how each local authority “must” maintain a list, because they can maintain a list only if local groups sign up, or they can go on a search-and-destroy mission to try and find groups that did not even realise that they are groups.

I illustrate that by the committee’s visit to the Seaton backies project in Aberdeen, where a couple of members of the community decided that the grass between the buildings in their area was untidy and needed to be cut and tidied up and debris removed, so they started to do that. At some point, from that initial thought from those first two individuals to the position that we are in today, they acquired some funding—a small amount, if I recall, of around £500—and they may have opened a bank account. They started to consider who should be on the group, which grew and acquired a degree of formality. At what point did they become a group that each local authority must, for the purposes set out in the amendment, maintain a list of? I do not know, and I suspect that the council would not know. It is a successful example of a grass-roots—no pun intended—organisation that started with a little idea and developed into something that is delivering a lot. Incidentally, the group did not know what regeneration was, even though it was probably the best example of regeneration that the committee found as it went round the country.

I am unclear how a local community can, in effect, deliver on the “must” in amendment 1055. Alex Rowley specifically mentioned sport and leisure, so that could include local golf clubs or a skateboarding group that might be quite informal and fluid in its structure as it uses the local park. Is that caught by the proposal? It is a community body, but it does not have any formality. It may not be a group with an annual general meeting and it may not have clear office bearers. Sewing bees could be included; I just do not know where the line is. By requiring groups to be on the list, which is the implication of the amendment, we carry the risk of genuinely disempowering people who do not feel that they want to engage with the kind of formality of the amendment that says that a list of all community bodies in an area “must” be maintained, so I have serious difficulties with that.

Amendment 1056 would insert the following:

“A community planning partnership must prepare and publish an assessment of the state of wellbeing” of local communities. It goes on to talk about an assessment that must “include an analysis of the state of wellbeing of any category of persons in the area whom the community planning partnership considers to be vulnerable or otherwise disadvantaged”.

That is a laudable aim, but it has a practical difficulty. There are certain kinds of disadvantage that affect relatively small numbers of individuals or groups, perhaps a number below which we normally suppress statistical data, which is five. There may be a single person with a health condition that creates a serious disadvantage for them, and the drafting of the amendment would mean that that person’s disadvantage would have to be reported, so that person could be identified by means of that report. There is a genuine difficulty in how that is drafted.

I have a minor point on amendment 1057, which refers to people who are “normally resident” in an area. It is perfectly possible, in legal terms, for people to be resident in more than one place. Those of us who are MSPs and have accommodation in Edinburgh as well as in our constituency are examples of people who are resident in more than one place.

Amendment 1060 is, in many ways, even more substantial. It places obligations on “Each local authority ... in relation to each community council area within its area”.

The point is, of course, that although there are defined community council areas—my constituency has more than 30 of them—they do not all have community councils.

In many of the areas there is no community council, and no prospect of a community council. Paragraph (a) of subsection (2) of the proposed new section in amendment 1060 refers to “the community council for the community council area”.

Proposed subsection (5) makes clear that a community council area may be excluded only if the council considers that a community council is “unnecessary”. In a defined community council area that has no community council, the non-existent community council must nonetheless be consulted, given the way in which amendment 1060 is drafted.
We would be unwise to draw Alex Rowley’s amendments into the bill at this stage, however much sympathy we may have for the policy objectives that underlie them. Alex Rowley would be well advised to take full advantage of, and exploit, the offer of help from the minister and his officials in developing some of those ideas. I do not think that now is the time to incorporate these amendments, which appear to present—at least in my reading of them—substantial difficulties in certain respects.

Cameron Buchanan: I have considerable sympathy with that view, because I find that the definition of wellbeing in amendment 1056 is too restrictive. I am mindful of what the minister said about placing an administrative burden in this area, and I feel that the amendment would result in such a burden. For that reason, I am reluctant to support the amendment.

In addition, I am not keen on amendment 1025, as it places particular emphasis on the inequality of disadvantaged communities. I am all for addressing that issue, but the amendment puts too much emphasis on it.

Stewart Stevenson referred to the provisions on residency in amendment 1057. It would be very difficult to define what would constitute being “normally resident in the area”.

I am pleased to hear that the minister will consult on the issue again before lodging an amendment at stage 3, so I am reluctant to support amendment 1057.

John Wilson (Central Scotland) (Ind): On amendment 1055, which states that local authorities must maintain a list of groups in their areas, the minister made great play of the national register that is kept by third sector organisations. However, such organisations continually complain about not having enough funding, and the register can be maintained only if the third sector organisations in a local area have the resources to carry out the work to maintain it.

I take on board Stewart Stevenson’s comments regarding some of the groups that are not covered by the third sector register; he referred to the example of a sewing bee. Although such groups are not on the national register, they may, at a local level, provide a valuable service for elderly people and others who take advantage of the social interaction and activity that is generated by participating in the group.

In my village, there is a group of pensioners—only about a dozen—who come together once a week to play bingo. Their group may not be registered but, in my view, it plays a vital part in delivering elderly care services. The communication and interaction that take place in the group may be meaningful for them, but it would not be flagged up in a national register. Amendment 1055 calls on local authorities to maintain a register that would include that type of group, rather than a register that lists third sector or voluntary organisations that may get national or local funding and can be easily identified by third sector interfaces to ensure that they are on it.

With regard to the other issues around community council schemes, Stewart Stevenson is right once again, and I seek guidance from the minister. I understand that every local authority has a community council scheme in operation. Local authorities know and set the boundaries for those community councils. Unfortunately, some community council boundaries do not mirror the natural boundaries of communities; in that regard, Mr Rowley and Mr Stevenson gave examples of how communities view their local areas. Credence is given to community council boundaries because they are already set out by local authorities, but we may have to look at that to find out whether community councils naturally cover areas that are much larger than areas of multiple deprivation, to ensure that we are targeting resources through community planning partnerships at those areas.

11:00 I think that this is a work in progress and I welcome the minister’s statement that, for stage 3, he could work with Alex Rowley to ensure that we get something in legislation that encompasses what we are trying to achieve here. The bottom line for everybody around this table and in the Parliament is that we achieve the goal of ensuring that the policies, the practice and the delivery of community planning partnerships are best suited to the communities that need most help. Community planning partnerships have been around for over 30 years but, unfortunately, in many cases they are still struggling to get the necessary resources for the communities that are most in need. I hope that we can get a piece of legislation in place that can achieve the best outcomes for those communities and for the nation as a whole.

The Convener: Thank you. I recognise that this is the first stage 2 process that many members have undertaken, so I should say that you are able to intervene on other members during the course of their speeches at stage 2. It would not be the norm for me to bring back in members who have already spoken, but under the circumstances I will allow Cameron Buchanan and Mr Rowley to come back in briefly.

Cameron Buchanan: Thank you very much, convener. My point about amendment 1055 is on the use of “must” in “Each local authority must ... maintain a list of all community bodies within its area.”

I think that saying “must” rather than “should” would impose quite a burden. Mr Wilson and others made a point about bowling clubs and bingo groups. I think that it would be too restrictive.

Alex Rowley: I am grateful to you for allowing me to come back in, convener.

Stating that the local authority “must” maintain a register does not mean that the local sewing group or the local skateboarding group, for example, must sign up to the register. The point is that every local authority would maintain the register and organisations and groups would sign up to it so that they would be registered and guaranteed to be involved in the consultations that take place. If Mr Stevenson is right, the amendment would force local groups to sign up. I do not think that it does, but there could be a technical drafting issue that—

Stewart Stevenson: Will the member take an intervention?

Alex Rowley: Yes.

Stewart Stevenson: I am just trying to make the point that groups might feel that they should be registered. However, groups very often consist of free spirits who want nothing to do with the formal structures of government at any level. I wonder whether the member agrees that the phrasing that he has adopted in amendment 1055 appears to suggest that local authorities must list all groups regardless of whether they wish to be listed, because the amendment would put words to that effect in the bill.

Alex Rowley: If we establish the principle, any technical issue with the drafting can be picked up later. The principle is that local authorities hold the register. I would hope that local groups would be encouraged to register because more of them would want to be involved in setting the priorities in the local plans. The crucial point is that, in the next phase, local groups would be more involved in setting the local plans.

On Cameron Buchanan’s point about the administrative burden that would be placed on local authorities, I stress that all the information on wellbeing is available in every local authority in Scotland. The question is whether we make that information available for each local area and do it in such a way that it is transparent. That will influence the discussion and engage more people at a community level in setting out their priorities. I do not think that it would be an administrative burden, because the information is already there. Indeed, it could be argued that, if community planning partners were going about their business and setting their priorities for local communities in the correct way, they would be taking account of all that information in doing so. The amendment informs and empowers communities with the same level of information, so that they can start to make the case at a local level for what the priorities are for each community. That is its purpose.

John Wilson: I am sorry, convener—I was trying to intervene on Mr Rowley. Maybe the minister can help out with this.

I know what amendment 1055 says. I heard what Mr Rowley said about the fact that community organisations, if they so wished, could refuse to be on the register that is held by local authorities. I am slightly confused, because I would like local authorities to be aware of the existence of those community organisations—the bingo group, the sewing bee—so that they can consult them. I am concerned about community organisations being able to deregister from the council’s list. I am trying to get to a point where we—the Parliament, the Government, local authorities and communities—fully understand what organisations exist in an area and what services they deliver within that area, which may not be statutory services. What I am frightened of is the duplication that may take place when a health board or a local authority decides that it is going to provide social care services for the elderly that are already being delivered at a local level by a local community group. That is where I would agree with amendment 1055, but I am rather concerned now with Mr Rowley’s insistence that groups could deregister and not be on the list. I have a fear that we end up failing to understand what is happening at the local level and what is being delivered by communities at a local level, if groups are not on any list.

The Convener: I call the minister to wind up.

Marco Biagi: I have been patiently waiting rather than intervening because I knew that I would have this chance. I will go through the four issues that have broadly been the subject of debate.

The subject that was of least debate was Cameron Buchanan’s challenging of amendment 1025, but that amendment comes from the committee’s recommendation that there should be a specific duty on CPP partners to reduce inequality and focus on prevention. I know that in the past Cameron Buchanan has been skewered on what he has signed up to in committee, only to oppose it at a later date. I simply want to move on by saying that I believe that the committee will recognise the value of the amendment and endorse it.

The other issues are related to the amendments by Mr Rowley. On the register proposed in amendment 1055, there are technical issues but there is also an issue of principle. As for the technical issues, the amendment states that each local authority must maintain a list of all community bodies within its area. As well as placing a burden on local authorities, that suggests to me that it would not be possible to deregister. If a group fitted the definition of a community body, it would have to be on the list, and the local authority would be under a duty to try to make it register.

In practice, I also think that there would be a danger that, as the register was in statute, it would become an authoritative list, and anybody who for any reason was not on it could be excluded for not having participated in the list process.

It is also important to remember that we had amendments earlier that removed inadvertent duties that the bill had placed on community bodies, because the purpose of the bill is to place duties on statutory bodies and local authorities, rather than on the voluntary sector and, in particular, the informal voluntary sector that makes up so much of what happens at the grass-roots level and which we have been referring to as "sewing bees" and so on.

The difficulty of principle with amendment 1055 is that the list would be a duplication of something that already happens. The term “national register” has been used, but what we actually have is a network of local registers that covers the entire nation. That work is done through the third sector interfaces, and there is funding from the Scottish Government for it. The total number of organisations on the registers, collectively, is 35,000, and we know that 12,500 of them are not registered charities. I have not looked at that in great detail, but it strikes me that they will be the mother-and-toddler groups and so on—the small, informal groups.

John Wilson: Minister, you said that there are 35,000 organisations on the national register. I seek clarification. I stand to be corrected if I am wrong, but my understanding is that the SCVO claims to have a membership of 55,000. If that is the case and there are 35,000 organisations on the register, where are the other 20,000? I know that the register omits certain very active community organisations. How can we gather information on all the other community organisations that are working away day and daily to deliver services in their local communities but are not on the national register?

Marco Biagi: I cannot speak for the membership of the SCVO. We will look at that, but the real question is whether if there are such organisations out there—12,500 groups on the list are not formally registered charities, and they must be in the informal sector—the register will be more comprehensive if it is run by local authorities rather than by the third sector interfaces. I am not convinced that that is the case.

I also wonder what the justification is for moving the responsibility from the third sector interfaces—in Edinburgh, that involves the Edinburgh Voluntary Organisations Council and the Edinburgh Social Enterprise Network, which are grass-roots, bottom-up organisations that are supposed to be constituted for the whole range of organisations—to the local authority. I am not clear about the justification for moving what is being done by the third sector to local authorities rather than to CPPs, for example. They could be given the responsibility in statute rather than local authorities, and that would create a list that would flow through to all the partners.

Alex Rowley: Does the minister accept that the principle is to try to establish a much more localised list that encourages local organisations to get involved in the process of community planning, and particularly in setting priorities and outcomes at a very local level? Does he accept that that is not happening under the current community planning regime?

Marco Biagi: The third sector interfaces exist to be interfaces between the community planning partnership and the third sector in their areas, reaching all the way down to informal pensioners’ lunches and so on. I agree with the objective that we want all those organisations to be able to participate in community planning. I went along to a pensioners’ lunch and I found out new things about parking in the local area that I then took up with the council. That sort of daily action at the grass-roots level, with ordinary people with ordinary lives being consulted and therefore informing action, is the kind of thing that we want to encourage.

If there is an issue with the TSIs in reaching all those people, is the solution to move the responsibility to local authority control and create a duty there? I do not see that that is the answer to the question that is being asked. I also expect that, in the event of duplication, with TSIs being funded to deliver a network of local databases for their local authority area and councils gaining a statutory responsibility, the funding that we give to the third sector interfaces would come under pressure from local authorities, which would say, “Given that we now have the statutory responsibility, it’s appropriate that you fund us.”

These are big questions. We might have sympathy with the principle of involving the third sector, but putting what is proposed into the bill, even for subsequent amendment, is something that I would strongly resist.
Stewart Stevenson: Does the minister also recognise that community groups are quite indifferent to council boundaries and can straddle two or even three of them?

11:15

Marco Biagi: That is another good point and another reason why putting the responsibility on local authorities would not be appropriate in principle.

The next of the other two points of contention is the wellbeing assessment. Section 5(4)(b) already requires that "the community planning partnership must take account of ... the needs and circumstances of persons residing in the area of the local authority to which the plan relates."

It is pretty explicit that that provision requires community planning partnerships to assess and be aware of needs and circumstances. More importantly, it applies to everything that a CPP would do rather than being narrow.

I point out that the representations that will have to be secured from community bodies will also assist in that assessment. If community bodies have to be supported to make representations and the CPP has to understand the needs and circumstances, that means that an assessment is included in the bill—and it is much broader than what Alex Rowley proposes and it covers all the functions of CPPs.

I remain of the view that it is potentially difficult to introduce a definition of wellbeing into the bill when we have not introduced it into other legislation.

On localities, whenever I have gone around Scotland visiting local authorities, I have been impressed by what happens when we replicate a CPP at a lower level—when all the statutory bodies, voluntary groups and the council meet and plan at a more localised level—but I also notice that everybody does it slightly differently. Everybody has slightly different people around the table, has slightly different lines of accountability and deals with slightly different amounts of money at that level.

In Dundee, there are eight local ward-level decision-making bodies. Six of them have a budget of £125,000—two of them do not—because they are community regeneration forums in areas that need regeneration and a bit of extra effort.

I worry that the details of Alex Rowley’s proposals are prescriptive in that they focus on community council boundaries rather than other boundaries. If we require all community council areas to have local plans rather than provide the flexibility to have a ward-level plan and some additional top-up actions at local level, we might empower the already empowered, which is an issue that the committee has raised. As I said, however, I will speak only warmly about locality planning, which should be taken forward.

Alex Rowley: I am pleased that you seem to support the principle of locality planning, minister. Do you accept that I am not trying to create a large bureaucracy of Government officials or health officials sitting round tables in every locality coming up with their views? The problem with Government and community planning has been and is that the professionals tell the communities what is good for them. I am trying to change to the opposite of that—exactly what the bill says on the tin: community empowerment and community planning—so that communities set their priorities, set the agenda to which the public bodies and others have to work, and hold those public bodies to account to deliver on the outcomes and priorities that are set locally.

We must reverse the professionalism whereby the public services tell communities what is good for them. That is the principle that I was trying to establish with my amendments. I welcome the fact that you support it and I am sure that we can work together on it.

Marco Biagi: I did not disagree with a single word that Mr Rowley just said. That agreement in principle is a good foundation from which to proceed on the matter.

The Convener: That was a long debate on those amendments, but it was worth while.

Amendment 1021 agreed to.

Amendments 1022 to 1024 moved—[Marco Biagi]—and agreed to.

The Convener: I invite Alex Rowley to move or not move amendment 1055.

Section 9—Community planning partners: duties

The Convener: Group 7 is on the extent of the duty on community planning partners to contribute resources. Amendment 1063, in the name of Cameron Buchanan, is the only amendment in the group.

Cameron Buchanan: I would like to leave out the word “securing” and replace it with “inviting”, because that would be less restrictive and prescriptive.

I move amendment 1063.

Marco Biagi: That was a relatively sketchy endorsement of the amendment and the reasons behind it. The reason for the provision in the bill is that we are keen to ensure that community bodies that a CPP considers are likely to be able to contribute to community planning are supported to participate to the extent that they wish to.

Although section 9(3)(b) uses the word “securing”, it refers to an earlier section, which is clear that community planning partnerships must “consider which community bodies are likely to be able to contribute” and “make all reasonable efforts to secure the participation of such community bodies”.

I note that no attempt has been made to amend that earlier instance of the word “secure”. Further, “to the extent ... that such community bodies wish to participate in community planning,” CPPs will have to “take such steps as are reasonable to enable the community bodies to participate in community planning”.

That is the spirit of section 9(3)(b). Each community planning partner will have to contribute funds, staff and other resources that the CPP considers appropriate to assist in securing the participation of bodies that wish to participate in community planning. A duty simply to invite bodies to participate would not ensure that invited bodies were supported to participate. That is why we think that it is important to have a duty to contribute resources to secure participation.

I ask Cameron Buchanan to seek to withdraw amendment 1063.
Cameron Buchanan: In view of what the minister says, I seek to withdraw the amendment. Amendment 1063, by agreement, withdrawn.

Section 9 agreed to.

Section 10—Guidance

The Convener: Group 8 is on the status of guidance on community planning. Amendment 1033, in the name of the minister, is grouped with amendments 1064, 1065, 1034, 1066 and 1067. Amendments 1033 and 1064 are direct alternatives, as are amendments 1034 and 1066.

Marco Biagi: Sections 10(1) and 10(2) provide that community planning partnerships and partners “must comply with any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers”.

All the amendments in the group seek to adjust that wording slightly.

The Government amendments in my name address the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee’s concerns about the term “comply”. The committee queried why guidance should be binding in the absence of provision for parliamentary scrutiny. The Government responded to the committee’s report by noting that concern and undertaking to lodge amendments.

Amendments 1033 and 1034 provide that community planning partnerships and partners are under a duty to have regard to guidance rather than to comply with guidance. That reflects the usual wording that is used in legislation in relation to guidance, is consistent with references elsewhere in the bill and will keep the DPLR Committee happy.

More broadly, I recognise the concerns that committees have raised over complex legal language. I will have to prejudge what Cameron Buchanan intends to say but, if he is attempting to simplify the language of the bill, I will explain that we have used the phrase “have regard to” for the reasons that I set out before—because it is the term that is generally used, it is well understood by the courts and there is substantial case law setting out how it is to be interpreted. It requires a person to attach the appropriate weight to different kinds of guidance that are available. The minister’s attempt to deal with that by inserting the words “have regard to” addresses the issue and, given that I argued that “have regard to” was a better alternative earlier at stage 2, I am happy to indicate when appropriate that I will not move my amendments.

Amendments 1033 and 1034 provide that community planning partnerships and partners are under a duty to have regard to guidance rather than to comply with guidance. That reflects the usual wording that is used in legislation in relation to guidance, is consistent with references elsewhere in the bill and will keep the DPLR Committee happy.

More broadly, I recognise the concerns that committees have raised over complex legal language. I will have to prejudge what Cameron Buchanan intends to say but, if he is attempting to simplify the language of the bill, I will explain that we have used the phrase “have regard to” for the reasons that I set out before—because it is the term that is generally used, it is well understood by the courts and there is substantial case law setting out how it is to be interpreted. It requires a person not necessarily to follow guidance to the letter but to be aware of it and to have justifiable reasons for any departure from it. If we were to use the phrase “consider”, there would be uncertainty about its meaning and the duty that it imposed.

Drew Smith’s amendments 1065 and 1067 would change the wording to refer to statutory guidance. I have not heard from the member, but it is not usual practice to refer to guidance that is issued in pursuance of legislative provision as statutory guidance—certainly not in an act. Officials have run an initial electronic search of legislation and have found no references to “statutory guidance” as a term in primary legislation. Statutory guidance might well be what we call guidance that is mentioned in statute, but the term is not commonplace in primary legislation.

I therefore ask Cameron Buchanan and Drew Smith not to move their amendments and I ask members to back the Government amendments, which do much the same thing and will keep the DPLR Committee happy.

Cameron Buchanan: I refer to amendment 1006A, which had the same sort of wording as amendments 1064 and 1066. I really want less restrictive provisions, which is why I feel that “consider” is better than “comply”, so I will be moving amendment 1064.

Drew Smith: I think that there is a difference between statutory guidance and advisory guidance. I understand what the minister says about using the term “statutory” in the bill. I will just reflect that it is interesting that the Government uses precedent as an argument both for and against things from time to time.

Stewart Stevenson: Will the member take an intervention?

Drew Smith: I am speaking only briefly, Mr Stevenson. I will conclude by saying that there is a difference when it comes to allowing local partners to attach the appropriate weight to different kinds of guidance that are available. The minister’s attempt to deal with that by inserting the words “have regard to” addresses the issue and, given that I argued that “have regard to” was a better alternative earlier at stage 2, I am happy to indicate when appropriate that I will not move my amendments.

Stewart Stevenson: I invite the minister—if he can—to identify what instruments would be excluded by qualifying the word “guidance” with the insertion of the word “statutory” before it, which Drew Smith was seeking to introduce. Clearly, if a particular category that is statutory is described, that by definition excludes other categories. Is the minister in a position to describe what instruments would be excluded by using the word “statutory”?

The Convener: Minister, it is your turn to wind up. I wish you well in answering Mr Stevenson’s question.

Marco Biagi: It has to be said that amendments 1065 and 1067 led to a considerable collective scratching of heads, because the Scottish ministers have—by statute—a general guidance-making power, so we could argue that any guidance that we issue under the statute that... gives us that general power is statutory guidance. I am not clear that there is a distinction that would have much effect, but I welcome Drew Smith’s position that he will not move the amendments.

Stewart Stevenson: Will the minister take an intervention?

Marco Biagi: Yes, of course—always.

Stewart Stevenson: Nonetheless, adding an adjective before the noun would—if it has any effect—restrict what is described to only those things to which the adjective can apply and therefore exclude those to which that adjective cannot apply.

Marco Biagi: Yes, although one could say that the term “all” would not be in any way restrictive, even though that would be added as an adjective before the noun. In this case, that might be an appropriate parallel.

We agree that what matters is the importance that must be attached to the guidance. We have three options: what is in the bill unamended, which is “comply with”; the Government’s amendment, which is “have regard to”; and Cameron Buchanan’s suggestion of “consider”. I think that “have regard to” strikes the best balance and is in accord with the general expectations of the treatment of guidance in law.

Section 10, as amended, agreed to.

Section 11 agreed to.

Section 12—Establishment of corporate bodies

The Convener: Amendment 1035, in the name of the minister, is grouped with amendments 1036 and 1068.

Marco Biagi: The amendments relate to the establishment of a corporate body for community planning purposes. Under section 19 of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003, the Scottish ministers may “on the application of the local authority together with one or more of the bodies, office-holders and other persons participating in community planning ... by order establish a body corporate” for community planning purposes.

Section 12 also provides for the establishment of a body corporate for community planning purposes and has the same application requirements—an application must be made by the local authority for the area and at least one other community planning partner.

That application process, which reflects our responsibility for community planning, has applied until now, with the relevant local authority being under a statutory duty to initiate, facilitate and maintain community planning. That will no longer be the case under the bill. Section 8(1) places duties of governance to “facilitate community planning” and “take reasonable steps to ensure that the community planning partnership carries out its functions ... efficiently and effectively” on a number of community planning partners—not just local authorities—including the local health board, Scottish Enterprise, Highlands and Islands Enterprise, the chief constable of Police Scotland and the Scottish Fire and Rescue Service, as well as the local authority.

Amendment 1035 will provide that an application to establish a corporate body for community planning purposes is valid only if it is made jointly by all the governance partners that are listed in section 8(2). That reflects the fact that all those partners are collectively responsible for the effective governance of the CPP.

The original purpose of allowing corporate bodies to be formed was to enable them to co-ordinate or further community planning, not to substantially deliver services themselves. However, since the bill was introduced, we have noted representations, including the evidence from the chair of the Accounts Commission to the Public Audit Committee on 3 December 2014, that have suggested possible value in establishing a community planning partnership as a corporate body that delivers services directly.

We do not know of any CPP that wishes to establish itself as a corporate body, but amendment 1035 makes it clear that such incorporation could proceed for the purposes of delivering services. It is clear that, in any such scenario, a CPP that wished to establish itself as a corporate body would have to demonstrate the merits of the conversion before the Scottish ministers would lay draft regulations before Parliament and before the Parliament would approve the draft regulations to give effect to any such change.

Amendment 1036 will remove the words “including in particular its conduct and co-ordination” from section 12(1), with a view to clarifying that the community planning functions of a corporate body could be wider than that. Although there has been continued background interest in the possibility of establishing CPPs as incorporated bodies, there has to date never been a firm proposal, and we are not aware of any proposed applications for incorporation down the line.

Cameron Buchanan’s amendment 1068 would mean that another enactment or rule of law could prevent a body that was established by regulation from carrying out a function that is set out in the regulations. The bill acts as a safeguard to support the carrying out of functions by any new corporate body so that a new and yet-to-be-established corporate body could carry out community planning functions. If such an application were received, it would be subject to ministerial approval and parliamentary scrutiny, which would include consideration of all matters referred to in section 12, including which functions such a body would have.

It would not be helpful to restrict the operation of section 12 by removing subsection (4)(b). I therefore invite Cameron Buchanan not to move amendment 1068, and I ask the committee to support amendments 1035 and 1036.

I move amendment 1035.
body that might contain two or more partners and the community planning partnership? Does the minister envisage a potential conflict between the status of the corporate body and the status of the community planning partnership?

Marco Biagi: I should clarify that the existing power in the 2003 act refers to a local authority in partnership with another, so, in that respect, there would be two participants.

John Wilson: I am not disagreeing with you, but that does not make the 2003 act right.

Marco Biagi: I was going to point out that that was the power in the 2003 act, whereas the particular provision that we are discussing would require all to participate and jointly apply. It is not like the power in the 2003 act, which applies to two organisations, one of which is the local authority; this is a joint application by all community planning partnership governance partners. All would have to be content and collectively agree to such a move, which would remove the prospect of two partners creating something that would cause difficulties for others. With this approach, the option is left open for a CPP, collectively, to come together and make a case for corporate body status, subject to parliamentary scrutiny.

Amendment 1036 moved—[Marco Biagi]—and agreed to.

Amendment 1068 not moved.

Amendment 1037 moved—[Marco Biagi]—and agreed to.

Section 13, as amended, agreed to.

After section 13

The Convener: Amendment 1069, in the name of Alex Rowley, is grouped with amendment 1070.

Alex Rowley: Amendment 1069 seeks to ensure consistency in the application of community engagement standards across Scotland to take account of local circumstances, without compromising the development of standards. Although there is much good practice in the public sector with regard to consulting communities, the fact is that practice is not of a consistently high standard. If communities are to be genuinely involved in the design of public services, ensuring that they have high-quality involvement in local decision making must become second nature to public services and part of their everyday core purpose.

By seeking to put national standards for community engagement on a statutory basis, my amendments will ensure that, in the development of the national outcomes in part 1 of the bill and the local outcomes improvement plans in part 2, best practice in community engagement is adhered to.

Concern has been expressed that placing the national standards for community engagement in statute will limit the development of standards at the local level and that public bodies will be hampered in developing participative techniques to fit local structures. As they stand, the amendments would not have that effect.

It should be possible for public bodies to use a range of participative techniques, but, in certain circumstances, to be required to apply the national standards for community engagement. In particular, community planning partners should have to follow the standards for community engagement when engaging with communities in drawing up local outcomes improvement plans.

I ask the committee to support the amendments.

I move amendment 1069.

Stewart Stevenson: Right at the end of his remarks, Alex Rowley used the phrase “local outcomes improvement plans”. That goes to the very heart of the matter. We are focusing on processes that carry the real danger of removing—or, from the perspective of community bodies, appearing to remove—flexibility in how community bodies undertake their tasks, and of inhibiting the development of new and innovative ways of engaging with communities. At the end of the day, to communities, this is all just noises off; what actually matters are the outcomes and the sense of empowerment that communities gain from the passage of the bill and everything that flows from it.

I am uncomfortable with making this statutory and requiring everyone to step up to the mark; I would prefer to see local communities working out for themselves, and therefore having ownership of and commitment to, what they want to do. A standard that relates to outcomes is by all means welcome, but a standard that relates to processes gives me cause for doubt, even if the Government is in favour of it.

Marco Biagi: I agree with the intention behind amendment 1069 and I recognise that we all want to make the public sector engage efficiently and effectively with communities across Scotland. We know that local government and other public bodies are increasingly using an impressive range of community engagement activities to consult people and offer them opportunities to participate in activities, plans and service delivery. However, we also know that the range and degree of participation can vary considerably and that although the national standards for community engagement provide a good practice model for both formal and informal community engagement, its use over time has been patchy.

There are better ways to secure the objective that we share. A great deal of impact can be realised through the use of guidance, which is much more adaptable and flexible. For example, in the stage 1 debate, I highlighted the fact that the national standards for community engagement pre-date the mass use of social media in Scotland, which is very important for any kind of community outreach and engagement.

We know from our discussion on section 10, which we have just amended, that local authorities, community planning partners and public service authorities will be required to have regard to guidance in exercising their functions. I repeat the commitments made by my predecessor, Derek Mackay, that we will specify the national standards for community engagement as part of the guidance, and update and refresh them to reflect the new context.

If we were to lay regulations, as Amendment 1069 suggests, we would have to provide further supplementary guidance to exemplify what good practice would look like and how it should be applied. To borrow a phrase from the Local Government and Regeneration Committee’s earlier statements, we would have to take the gobbledygook out of the act and translate it into something that people working at the coalface would use. There would need to be guidance either way.

I would be concerned about embedding the term “community engagement” in the bill. Over the past few months, some stakeholders have suggested that “community participation” or “community empowerment” might be better terms for the refreshed standards. If we put “community engagement” into the statute, we will maintain one model.

The new context that we are trying to develop with stakeholder organisations and the public sector should not be underestimated. The bill will change in its entirety the landscape of participation and engagement. It will make clear—if clarity was needed—that community bodies have a right to participate in the decisions that affect them and that public authorities have a duty to respond to that. I expect public authorities to look for guidance to help them to do that and that, as good practice continues to evolve, the guidance that accompanies the bill will need to change and keep up. Secondary legislation is not the best way to do that.

I accept that there may well be space in the bill to improve it further to ensure greater participation by the public and by communities across Scotland in the activities of public bodies and local authorities. There could be a much broader power than the one that is specified to promote and facilitate participation across the board in all the activities of a very wide range of bodies. In order to have that broad impact, I expect—indeed, I intend—any such amendments to come later in the bill, rather than focusing on CPPs.

I note that Amendment 1069 refers only to the CPP partners that are engaged in governance under section 8, and not to all partners, as listed in Schedule 1. I expect the national standards to be considered by local authorities, for example, in their consultations on the common good.

As I said, I agree with the intention behind Amendment 1069, but I think that there is a better way to achieve its aims. I ask Mr Rowley to withdraw it and not to move Amendment 1070. If, after the conclusion of stage 2, he is still unsatisfied with where the bill is, I would be happy to speak to him to see whether he believes that still more needs to be done, and we can do that together. However, as I said, I expect further developments later in the bill that will cover the entirety of the bill, rather than focusing narrowly on CPPs.

Alex Rowley: I will come to Stewart Stevenson’s point first. He simply misunderstands what is intended. It is not about trying to tell communities how to consult; it is about putting the national guidelines into statute so that community planning partners in their consultations will abide by nationally recognised standards for community engagement.

I welcome the minister’s statement that the national standards have to be updated and refreshed. That needs to happen. I really cannot understand why, when that is being done, we would not set minimum standards for consultation by public bodies. That is a key point.

At this stage, I certainly do not have the same enthusiasm for the bill that the minister has in terms of how it will transform the engagement of communities, get a lot of public bodies to engage to the extent that they need to engage, and get communities to set their own agenda. I do not think that the bill as it stands will do that, but I want to work with the minister to try to improve it.

With the commitment that the minister has given, I am happy to withdraw Amendment 1069 so that we can discuss the matter further. If we both want to achieve the same thing—to have communities setting their agenda—let us work for that. Therefore, given the minister's commitment, I am happy to withdraw amendment 1069 at this stage.

Amendment 1069, by agreement, withdrawn.

The Convener: We will deal with amendment 1070 and a number of other amendments that we have discussed today at future meetings. That ends consideration of amendments for today.

I remind members that amendments to parts 3 and 5 of the bill should be lodged with the clerks to the legislation team by 12 noon this Friday.

I thank members for their participation and their patience with me. We move into private session.

Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill: Stage 2

The Convener (Kevin Stewart): Good morning and welcome to the ninth meeting in 2015 of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee. If anyone wishes to use tablets or mobile phones during the meeting, please switch them to flight mode, as they may affect the broadcasting system. Some committee members may consult tablets during the meeting; this is because we provide meeting papers in digital format.

We have received apologies from Cara Hilton. I welcome to the meeting Margaret McCulloch, who is substituting for Cara this morning.

Our first item of business is day 2 of our consideration of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill at stage 2.

I welcome back Marco Biagi, the Minister for Local Government and Community Empowerment. I also welcome Tavish Scott. Later in the proceedings, we will be joined by Michael Russell, who is currently debating amendments to the bill with our colleagues in the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee.

Members should have with them a copy of the bill as introduced, the latest marshalled list of amendments and the latest groupings of amendments, which sets out the amendments in the order in which they will be debated.

There will be one debate on each group of amendments. I will call the member who lodged the first amendment in each group to speak to and move their amendment and to speak to all the other amendments in the group. Members who have not lodged amendments in the group but who wish to speak should indicate that by catching my attention in the usual way. If the minister has not already spoken on the group, I will invite him to contribute to the debate just before I move to the winding-up speech. The debate on each group will be concluded by my inviting the member who moved the first amendment in the group to wind up.

Following the debate on each group, I will check whether the member who moved the first amendment in the group wishes to press their amendment to a vote or to withdraw it. If they wish to press ahead, I will put the question on that amendment.

If a member wishes to withdraw their amendment after it has been moved, they must seek the committee’s agreement to do so. If any committee member objects, the committee must immediately move to the vote on the amendment.

If any member does not want to move their amendment when I call it, they should say, “not moved.” Please remember that any other MSP may move such an amendment. If no one moves the amendment, I will immediately call the next amendment on the marshalled list.

Only committee members or their official substitutes are allowed to vote at stage 2. Voting in any division is by a show of hands. It is important that members keep their hands clearly raised until the clerk has recorded the vote.

The committee is required to indicate formally that it has considered and agreed to each section of the bill and so I will put a question on each section at the appropriate point.

We are now ready for the off.

After section 13

The Convener: Amendment 1091, in the name of Tavish Scott, is grouped with amendments 1092 to 1098, 1162 and 1163. I call Tavish Scott.

Tavish Scott (Shetland Islands) (LD): Thank you, convener. Having done this a number of times over the course of parliamentary sessions, I am always very envious of conveners who have to read out that great list of instructions that we all must follow.

The reason behind my amendments is to introduce a power of general competence for local authorities, putting it beyond doubt that they may do anything that is not expressly prohibited by law. Some of us who have been in the Parliament for some time might have reflected on the introduction in previous legislation of a power of wellbeing, and I recollect both the parliamentary processes that that provision went through and the thinking behind it.

Although the power of wellbeing has undoubtedly been of some assistance to local government across Scotland—I am sure that colleagues will be aware of examples of its use—there is no question but that it has some downsides. I admit that some of those downsides were pointed out by the official Opposition when I was part of the Administration that introduced the provision. I accept that some of the arguments made at the time by colleagues on the Scottish National Party benches were entirely fair and reasonable.
One of those arguments was that the term “wellbeing”, as currently set out in the legislation, is ambiguous. In practical terms, its restrictions, or the understandable concerns about them, mean that local authorities might not be doing all that they might wish to in serving people and communities to the best of their ability.

Before the introduction of a power of general competence in England and Wales, 10 councils in London were legally blocked from forming a mutual insurance firm—a service that I am sure most colleagues would consider to be beneficial to people in that part of the country. To my mind, that was a setback that deterred others from an innovative use of the power of wellbeing.

Today, I seek to introduce a power of general competence into what I think is a good bill. The minister should take credit for a lot of progressive, sensible ideas, but we can strengthen a particular aspect of the bill for local government.

In framing the amendments, I have sought to ensure that they give councils the capacity to do anything that an individual can do. Thus, they would not enable a local authority to introduce a new tax—I am sure that that will be of some relief to the Cabinet Secretary for Finance, Constitution and Economy and to the Government’s spending departments—as individuals are not able to do that either. Further, as the United Kingdom Department for Communities and Local Government put it in their impact assessment of similar proposals south of the border, the amendments would not "enable local councillors to wage thermonuclear war due to existing preventative legislation".

I was a bit taken aback by that, but, unbelievably, that was apparently what the DCLG argued. I would never have a sensible minister such as Mr Biagi use such extraordinary measures to knock down amendments, but there we have it—in another place, that is what happened.

In the past few months, there have been significant advances towards more powers for this Parliament. Indeed, another committee that I sit on is dealing with that matter tomorrow. I argue that devolution should not stop in this building; rather, we should ensure that local government and those who serve communities, representing all political parties and none, have the ability to use the power of general competence in the most sensible and constructive way for the people whom they serve.

In that spirit, I move amendment 1091.

The Minister for Local Government and Community Empowerment (Marco Biagi): The amendments in this group essentially seek to import into Scotland the English Localism Act 2011—the provisions are pretty much a copy of those that were introduced by the UK Government to the UK Parliament, and which were debated and scrutinised there.

The aim behind the amendments is to use those provisions to replace part of the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003, the bill for which, as has been alluded to, went through an extensive process of consultation, deliberation and scrutiny in the Scottish Parliament.

Our concern is that the power to advance wellbeing, as set out in the 2003 act, already gives Scottish councils a very similar wide-ranging power of first resort, enabling them to do anything that they consider is likely to promote or improve the wellbeing of their area and the people in it. That power was intended to do what the power of general competence—which was not introduced in England until 2011—was intended to do. The intention was also to signal our trust in local accountability.

I will quote from the debate in the chamber in October 2002:

"the power encapsulates the principle of subsidiarity, as it allows local government to take responsibilities that it should have and allows the Parliament to extend the devolution process beyond this chamber and ensure that that process continues down or up—depending on one’s perspective—to local government. The Parliament should applaud that important principle."—[Official Report, 2 October 2002; c 11292.]

Those wise words were from Tavish Scott.

It is fair to say that there were criticisms from the other side of the chamber—we are not in a complete political changeroo situation here. However, many of those criticisms about exemplification and understanding have been dealt with subsequently through statutory guidance and dialogue.

There is a purposeful intent to leaving wellbeing undefined, as in the 2003 act, so as not to constrain local government, and to ensure that local government can take a broad interpretation of actions that could improve wellbeing. In that respect, the provisions in the 2003 act are much broader than the provisions that the English Localism Act 2011 replaced. The previous wellbeing power south of the border was restricted to "economic, social and environmental well-being", which was defined. That may have led to some restrictions such as the London example that has been set out. Our power is already far beyond the power that was in place in England.

Alex Rowley (Cowdenbeath) (Lab): How has the wellbeing power operated in local government? Do local government lawyers often advise councillors to be tame, in terms of what they want to do, because there is not a clear definition?

Marco Biagi: Far be it from me to alienate the officials to my left and right, but there is always a debate to be had between elected members and officers of any body as to how far interpretations of statute can be stretched. The provisions that are set out in the amendments do not exemplify what could be done; they merely create a general competence.

The issue is not just that, as the previous wellbeing power south of the border was less extensive than the Scottish power, the Localism Act 2011, which went through the UK Parliament, was trying to come from behind, if you like. It is also the case that the Westminster Parliament, in conferring any powers on local government, will automatically be able to confer a broader range of powers than this Parliament can, because we can confer broader powers only in areas that are within the competence of the Scottish Parliament under the Scotland Act 1998.

I am aware that a tension has recently been expressed about the power to advance wellbeing with regard to social security and the bedroom tax. However, this Parliament cannot confer through a general power of competence a clear position on what local authorities can do to ameliorate a social security issue any more than it could do that through a power to advance wellbeing. We cannot give local authorities powers over things over which we do not have powers. The same is true for Westminster, but ultimately Westminster has power over pretty much everything, under parliamentary sovereignty.

The Convener: Is this something that the Government may look at again, as more powers, or whatever we end up getting, come through via Smith?

Marco Biagi: It would be very reasonable to look at the matter again once we know what powers we may be able to confer on local government and what powers would be captured in the term “general competence”. The question whether the power to advance wellbeing in the 2003 act applies only to the powers that could be applied in 2003 or whether it would apply to powers existing at any given moment is one for lawyers; I am not sure that I know the answer to that. We will need to come back to the matter when we have clarity on the exact powers that we can confer and what the term “general competence” might cover.

Tavish Scott’s amendments would introduce provisions that would prevent or restrict local authorities from exercising the general power. I recognise that that might be an attempt to prevent excesses. However, under the Local Government in Scotland Act 2003, Scottish ministers have powers to modify enactments to remove barriers to community planning, the power to advance wellbeing or the achievement of best value.

We are very open to having a debate about allowing councils to do something under secondary powers if they tell us that they want to do it but are not sure whether they can, or even if they tell us that they do not think that they can do it but think that they should be able to. However, we have not seen evidence that the power to advance wellbeing is limited. We have not been given examples of things that councils are unable to do under the existing power—and we have asked. It is not clear what additional powers, if any, the proposed new part would bring.

John Wilson (Central Scotland) (Ind): You mentioned that you have not been approached about the current power. Are you saying that neither the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities nor any local authority has approached you?

Marco Biagi: We have not been given examples of things that local authorities cannot do under the power. There have been question marks over the bedroom tax, for example, but that is a separate issue because we do not have the power to give local authorities power over social security.

In conversations, we have tried to explore the issue through things such as the city deal and so on, but we can give no concrete examples that we have not already given. If there is an understanding gap, there are other ways to address that gap.

The committee considered the legislative issues relating to local authorities in its inquiry into the flexibility and autonomy of local government, but it did not say in its report that there were substantial legislative barriers.

Finally, the amendments have not been consulted on. The proposal that they contain has been consulted on, scrutinised and debated in another Parliament—it has basically been copied into amendments that Tavish Scott aims to introduce at stage 2 into a bill that is largely about other things. We need to hear, through formal processes, from those who would use the powers. Fundamentally, I think that doing such direct importing sets a dangerous precedent.

In a briefing, the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities said that it thought that the proposal was a good thing. In the first sentence, it says that it “welcomes this amendment”. However, the following two paragraphs provide caveats, and the briefing ends up saying that, ultimately, “COSLA is of the view that it would be simpler and preferable to further the power of local government through the Bill by using this opportunity to embed the European Charter on Local Self-Governance in the Act.”

That is an alternative route that has been discussed, debated and considered, so it may well be the appropriate focus for debate and amendment in this area.

Tavish Scott has made his points. Given what I have just said and the fact that I believe that there is quite a degree of commonality between us with regard to what we want local authorities to be able to do, I ask him to withdraw amendment 1091 and to not move the other amendments in the group. If he presses amendment 1091, I hope that the committee will respect its own position and its right to scrutinise extensively any changes to local government and that it will reject the amendment, so that we can have a full process of examination in the Scottish Parliament rather than simply importing an act of the United Kingdom Government.

Tavish Scott: A lot of the minister’s remarks are fair but some of his observations are less so. I will deal with some of his points in reverse.

The minister is quite right about COSLA’s assessment of the proposal. If the Government’s view is that the bill could embed the European charter on local self-government, it could do that itself. If the Government’s objection to the proposal is an in-principle one, I can understand that. If it is to do with the detail, I point out that stage 2 is when the principle of issues is dealt with and that the detail can be tidied up at stage 3. His Government does that regularly, as did the Government of which I was part. It is a pretty accepted part of the Scottish Parliament’s conventions. Whether it is right is neither here nor there; we do not have a revising chamber, so that is the way in which we have to do our business.

I was not sure whether the minister was objecting to the proposition in principle or was objecting to the practicalities. If the problem involves the practicalities, I completely accept that some of the measures need to be tidied up, but that could be done by the Government at stage 3—he will have more advice than I could possibly have in that regard.

Marco Biagi: For clarity, let me say that I think that the amendments require more than a tidying-up exercise. The proposal would need a stage 1 call for evidence on the question whether a power of general competence is an appropriate replacement for a power to advance wellbeing. The full parliamentary process would need to be followed, because the proposal could end up bringing about a major change. It might not, of course, but we would need to consult on that, via the full process. We simply would not have time between now and stage 3 to consult everybody as we would want to.

Tavish Scott: That might or might not be a reasonable point. Of course, this Government has a bit of a track record of introducing pretty far-reaching changes to legislation at late stages in the bill process, without consultation. I think that the minister would have to accept that one of the measures that the Rural Affairs, Climate Change and Environment Committee is dealing with today has not had a heck of a lot of scrutiny in that context. If I may say so, the argument can cut both ways.

I was not terribly worried about the perspective on what happens south of the border. The minister is quite right with regard to the issue of finding wording to give effect to my desire to bring about a power of general competence.

However, if the minister wants to play a game about what is happening south of the border, I point out that the truth is that what is being considered to a significant extent south of the border—for instance, in Greater Manchester—is an extremely far-reaching transfer of powers to local government, which is not happening in Scotland. I welcome those developments. Very exciting things are happening for local government in particular parts of England. I wish that we were as brave north of the border, as I would like to see much of that happening here too. I counsel against running down what may be happening south of the border when there are, for those of us who strongly believe in local government, some genuinely positive developments under consideration for different parts of England.

My purpose is not to say what local government should do; that is not where I come from, philosophically, in politics. I do not believe in top-down government; the minister was quite right to read out my words from some years back, because I believe in the principle of giving local government the space and freedom, within the confines of the law and the exercise of power and law, to look at how best to serve its people in different ways.

Alex Rowley: I cannot resist commenting. Is it not the case that, in opposition, politicians want to give loads of powers to local government, but in power, as has been demonstrated, things are different?

Tavish Scott: Mr Rowley makes an eminently fair point, and I would be the first to accept it. I do not suppose that I was—indeed, I would go so far as to say that I am sure that I was not—the perfect minister when I had some of the responsibilities that Mr Biagi now has. I accept that point, but it does not alter my fundamental argument, which is that I do not seek to prescribe what local government should do and would rather allow things to develop and evolve in our 32 local authorities across Scotland.

If the minister seeks arguments with regard to local government looking for areas that it would wish to develop, I advise him to look no further than the our islands, our future campaign. Areas of Scotland are seeking to enhance their powers: they would, for example, take much of what Marine Scotland currently does as part of central Government and deal with it far more efficiently and effectively—in my view—at a local level.

Marco Biagi: That is why we have the island areas ministerial working group, which met just a few weeks ago. Along with Derek Mackay, the Minister for Transport and Islands, Fergus Ewing, the Minister for Business, Energy and Tourism, and the leaders of the three island areas councils, I discussed that issue and, together, we agreed a programme of work to take forward.

We are open to any specific approach in that respect, and we have certainly been involved in the city deals that are in place in Scotland. I would characterise our position as being interested in and positive towards facilitating local government to take on more responsibilities.

Tavish Scott: I agree with and welcome that, as it is very positive. I also think that it is entirely consistent with authorities having the power of general competence. I press amendment 1091.

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 1091 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.

Section 14—Meaning of “community-controlled body”

The Convener: Amendment 1099, in the name of John Wilson, is grouped with amendments 1100, 1102 to 1109, 1113, 1117 to 1126, 1128, 1131 to 1133, 1135, 1136, 1073A, 1138 and 1140. I draw members’ attention to the information on pre-emption that is shown on the groupings paper.

John Wilson: The reason for lodging the amendments is that I feel that the bill, as presented by the Government, is too restrictive with regard to participation requests. I understand, and I fully agree, that some conditions have to apply, and I think that the Government made a brave attempt to define the types of groups that would be able to make participation requests.

However, I am aware of a number of issues that have arisen recently when local authorities have made decisions and put them out to consultation. Examples that spring to mind include when an incinerator is proposed or fracking is proposed in an area where there is not an existing community body. Under the bill, people may be kept from making participation requests because they are not a formally constituted body or are not organised in the way that is described in section 14. A very ad hoc participation request might come forward.

Under the bill, the question is whether, in those circumstances, local authorities would treat such participation requests in the same way as they would treat a request from a community organisation that is constituted and has its membership within the community. Some of the groups that are being established may be established in reaction to decisions that are being made. Going back to Mr Scott’s earlier assessment and the committee’s discussion, the difficulty is that local authorities are risk averse. If a council is risk averse, it may just say, “We are just going to go as per the bill.” Therefore, any new group that is established and makes a participation request regarding, for example, an incinerator or fracking, would be denied the opportunity to participate because the group did not exist prior to the council making the decision on the issue at hand.

Amendment 1099 is trying to widen the bill’s scope to ensure that any community group, whether it is constituted or not, and any individual has the right to make a participation request.

There are a number of consequential amendments in the group. In terms of other sections, I have included a provision to make sure that the vexatious nature of any participation request can be dealt with by a local authority.

At present I feel that, in society, community groups are very fluid. The decisions that are being made can be made within a matter of months, and the inability of a group of people to become constituted and recognised as a representative body within that time by a local authority or other body may debar them from making participation requests to local authorities.
I move amendment 1099.

Clare Adamson (Central Scotland) (SNP): I thank John Wilson for explaining the rationale behind his amendments. I have sympathy for his position. However, by its nature, the bill should be about communities coming together to work together.

I have some concerns about the reference to “frivolous or vexatious” requests, because it would give local authorities additional powers to deem a request to be frivolous or vexatious. If an authority was minded to block a development, that provision would make it more difficult for communities to use the bill as intended.

Willie Coffey (Kilmarnock and Irvine Valley) (SNP): I will ask John Wilson to clarify one point. Is it your intention that individuals or groups could use the process?

John Wilson: My intention is to allow individuals to use the process, because they may form the backbone of any future community organisation that is established. The references in the bill to “constituted” community groups present a difficulty. If someone identifies an issue and wishes to make an initial request and form a group after that, the initial request would, under the bill, be refused by the local authority because the person was not part of a constituted group.

Willie Coffey: So, amendment 1099 would allow individual people to use the process to pursue their personal agendas.

The Convener: I think that that is what John Wilson is saying.

Alex Rowley: I understand completely what John Wilson is saying. I have seen situations in communities in which groups of people come together and want to organise because a specific issue has arisen in their community. The minister might want to touch on the question of how such a situation can be addressed. For local authorities simply to rule that only groups should use the process, and that people with an interest must come together, would be wrong, and I can see what would happen.

However, I would raise one concern with John Wilson. A number of organisations have suggested to me that there is a danger in what he proposes. If a commercial organisation or an individual came along, and they were not part of a constituted group, that would raise a legitimate concern. Although I support the principle behind the amendments, I wonder what Mr Wilson thinks about that concern.

The Convener: If John Wilson could deal with that point in summing up, that would be grand.

Marco Biagi: I meant to say earlier that in going through the amendments for today’s meeting I have been challenged in a lot of ways. There are in amendments that have been lodged by various members suggestions that I wish to support, and I want to put that on record.

I understand the intention behind the amendments in the group, given what John Wilson has said. The difficulty is that, on reflection, and having thought in particular about our discussions at last week’s meeting about sewing bees and pensioners’ lunches, and the ability of such groups to contribute to decision making and outcome improvement plans, I believe that the amendments would open up that process to individuals.

The bill was designed to allow participation requests for groups that come together with a common interest and a common purpose; I think that we completely agree on that. The issue here is the “constituted” nature of such groups. I do not think that a constitution is a massively onerous burden, but I recognise that for many groups that would have the scope to participate and would be able to do so positively, the requirement may prove to be quite legalistic. That might be the case only in people’s understanding rather than in reality, but it could pose a barrier to the kind of community participation that we want.

I am willing to come back at stage 3 with amendments that would be focused on groups that are not formally constituted and which would introduce some kind of test that would have to be applied so that a group that was not formally constituted would be much the same as one that was, in terms of the requirement for a constitution in the bill. That would mean that the process would be open to everyone in a community. You know such a group when you see it; I would leave it to the lawyers to define that, but it would be a group that could be recognised as an informal unconstituted group that has come together with a common interest and a common purpose and which has something to contribute.

I do, however, have serious issues with the amendments in the group as they are, because they would open the process up to individuals. We know from constituency experience that a lot of individuals would say, with regard to the test that was suggested, “I’m about to organise a group but I haven’t done it yet. Can I have a seat at the table?” If they got that seat at the table, they might then take a little while to form the group.

There is also the commercial aspect that was raised. Ultimately, the bill is about giving particular input routes to decision making for open, broad community action involving groups that are open, inclusive, representative and controlled by the community that they want to represent. There would be a risk to the reputation of participation requests if they were available to individuals to further their own agendas. The Scottish Community Development Centre and the Community Development Alliance Scotland express serious reservations about the changes in an email that has been sent round the committee.

The structure of part 3 will also require an outcome improvement process that would be quite disproportionate for individuals, so if we were to open up participation requests to individuals there could be serious resource implications because of the volume of such requests. In addition, there are issues with the power in respect of frivolous or vexatious requests, as it leaves a fair bit of discretion to a public service authority, which may—I do not intend to impugn the willingness of any public service authority—use the power to ensure it has an easy life. In drafting legislation, we should always think about what would happen if somebody wanted to go in the opposite direction.

The bill’s aim is to empower communities, and I am happy to take away the point that has been raised about informally organised communities that are still recognisable communities. I will lodge amendments at stage 3 that will capture such communities while excluding individuals who would fundamentally change the nature of participation requests and make an unhelpful contribution.

I thank John Wilson for lodging the amendments and, having given that undertaking, I hope that he is content to seek to withdraw amendment 1099 and not to move his other amendments.

John Wilson: On Alex Rowley’s point, there is always a danger that commercial interests will intervene in communities in a number of ways to try to influence community organisations. I have seen commercial organisations do that. We must all recognise that commercial interests can influence existing organisations—never mind the setting up of new organisations—in a number of ways.

I understand the SCDC’s arguments about protection of constituted groups. It has the right to do that; it also assists groups in becoming constituted. It can take time for a group to become constituted, depending on how the local authority deals with it. It can take up to 28 days to hold a public annual general meeting to elect office bearers and get a committee established, and within that timescale the shift can be made.

On requests from individuals who say that they want to represent the community and will work to set up a community organisation, local authorities can build in safeguards whereby they could say, “Fine. You can have a seat at the table”, but give the individual X days to prove that they are genuinely committed to establishing a community organisation to represent the issues that they have raised.

I fully understand the concerns in relation to frivolous and vexatious requests; the difficulty is in how we define such requests and how local authorities deal with them. I hope that the bill, when it becomes legislation, will give local authorities an assurance that the Scottish Government and others are keen to see the widest possible consultation and engagement with communities.

Marco Biagi: I have not been able to give details about this in the past, because we were still finalising it, but today we are lodging an amendment to introduce at the end of the bill a new part that will give very wide powers to promote, encourage and, indeed, require participation. That may well be the best route for individuals to participate in the decision-making processes. Those powers will be very broad and will apply widely across public service authorities, which may deal with the problem of individuals who wish to make requests, which I think are the key danger with the amendments in the group.

John Wilson: Based on the minister’s comments and the assurances that the committee has received today, I seek to withdraw amendment 1099 and will not move the other amendments in the group. However, I reserve the right to lodge amendments at stage 3 if the amendments that the Government lodges do not satisfy the intention of the amendments in the group.

Section 14 agreed to.

Section 15—Meaning of “community participation body”

Amendment 1100 not moved.
Section 15 agreed to.

Section 16—Meaning of “public service authority”

The Convener: Amendment 1101, in the name of Cameron Buchanan, is grouped with amendment 1141.

Cameron Buchanan (Lothian) (Con): Amendment 1101 is a probing amendment to find out not about the desirability of the bill’s aims, but its definitions. All I really want to know is whether the bill should be about empowering communities to set their own priorities and aims.
I move amendment 1101.

Marco Biagi: I am a little bit confused. Amendments 1101 and 1141 would remove Scottish ministers’ ability to remove or amend entries in the schedules that list public service authorities, in respect of participation requests, and relevant authorities, in respect of asset transfer requests. I assume that we are on the correct amendments here.

We must retain ministers’ flexibility to remove, amend and add to entries in the lists of authorities that will be covered by the bill. The committee will be aware that I have lodged amendments to ensure that any changes of that nature are made under affirmative procedure, in line with the recommendation by the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee. There will be parliamentary scrutiny of any changes to the schedules and the lists of organisations therein. A public body may be abolished, or its name or functions may be changed, so we need to be able to accommodate changes of that nature in the public sector landscape. It seems that the amendments would challenge that.

Cameron Buchanan: That is a very satisfactory explanation, so I wish to withdraw amendment 1101.

Amendment 1101, by agreement, withdrawn.

Section 16 agreed to.

Schedule 2 agreed to.

Section 17—Participation requests

Amendments 1102 to 1109 not moved.

The Convener: Amendment 1110, in the name of Tavish Scott is grouped with amendment 1111.

Tavish Scott: I am very tempted to take the Cameron Buchanan approach and say that my amendment is a probing amendment, and then leave it to the minister to do all the speaking. That is a commendable approach, which I must remember for future bills. However, let me try to help the minister by explaining what I am trying to achieve here, then he might be able to help me as to whether I have got it right.

The bill contains a provision that a community participation body—or, indeed, two or more bodies jointly—may make “a participation request ... to a public service authority.”

It has been suggested that that will lead to a slightly strange position in which two community groups can make a request to participate in a process to improve a service in relation only to one public authority. There will obviously be examples involving more than one public authority. I am sure that the minister and committee colleagues can think of such examples.

Therefore, amendment 1110 seeks to give effect to the ability of such a community group or groups to engage with more than one public authority where that is evidently necessary in a particular set of circumstances. I hope that, in that sense, it is a constructive measure that will make it easier to achieve what I am sure the minister and the Government are trying to deliver through the bill.

I move amendment 1110.

Marco Biagi: I thank Tavish Scott for his amendments. He has made a very reasonable case about a policy aim that I am happy to support, so I am happy to accept amendments 1110 and 1111.

We will probably look at the wording in advance of stage 3 to ensure that amendments 1110 and 1111 will add the flexibility that we want, and that they are covered and will fit with the rest of the bill. On that basis, I am very happy to ask members to support the amendments.

Tavish Scott: I am grateful to the minister for that. I am sure that the amendments could technically be better—indeed, I have been told that by the clerks—so I might leave it to the minister and his powers of persuasion to get that right. I am happy to see the amendments move forward.

Amendment 1110 agreed to.

Section 17, as amended, agreed to.

Section 18—Regulations

Amendment 1111 moved—[Tavish Scott]—and agreed to.

The Convener: Amendment 1112, in the name of Alex Rowley, is grouped with amendments 1073, 1073B, 1073C, 1074, 1081, 1081A, 1081B and 1082.

Alex Rowley: My amendments are designed to strengthen the provision in part 3 on the rights of communities and other bodies when making a participation request. I welcome the current provision, but there are gaps that, if they are not addressed, will leave community bodies and others at a significant disadvantage. That would be likely to affect communities that are vulnerable and already disadvantaged because of socioeconomic factors and other circumstances.

Amendment 1112, in my name, is designed to avoid that happening and to make sure that all communities that wish to make a request to participate can do so. The amendment would allow the regulations by the Scottish ministers to include provisions that require public service authorities to publish the fact that communities can make participation requests, to set out what support those authorities must make available to communities in relation to making and completing a request and to set out the types of communities that might require additional support.

I strongly believe that my amendments would redress the current imbalance in the bill whereby communities with the resources and the capacity will be most likely to make the most of the opportunity that participation requests offer. A significant gap in the bill is that, once a request has been made, whether to accept it will be up to the public service authority. I believe that amendment 1112 and the other amendments in my name would improve the bill and I hope that the minister and the committee will support the amendments.

I move amendment 1112.

Marco Biagi: I am happy to support Alex Rowley’s amendment 1112. As with all regulations under the bill, the regulations under section 18 will be developed in partnership, so that community bodies and public authorities can help to shape the detail and determine what is appropriate for legislation and what should be in guidance. As examples of what should be included in the regulations, the promotion of participation requests and support for communities seem important enough to be included in the bill.

Amendments 1073 and 1081, in my name, respond to recommendations made in the committee’s stage 1 report to provide for monitoring of the use of the bill’s provisions. They require each public service authority and each relevant authority to produce an annual report setting out how many requests they have received, how many have been agreed to or rejected and how many have resulted in change or the transfer of an asset. That is in addition to the report that must be produced on the outcome of each participation request.

For asset transfer requests, the report must include the number of requests for which a review or appeal has been requested and the outcomes. That will make clear whether authorities are making the right decisions first time.

As with Alex Rowley’s amendment 1112, we recognise the importance of authorities making communities aware of the potential to make requests and helping them to do so. Reports must therefore include information on the action that an authority has taken to promote the use of participation and asset transfer requests and to support communities directly in making such requests. I hope that the committee will support Alex Rowley’s amendment 1112 and my amendments 1073 and 1081.

John Wilson’s amendments would require a report to be published no later than the last working day of May, with a definition of what a working day means. That might throw up practical issues, but I am happy to return with a firm deadline for reports. If he wishes to press for those provisions at stage 2 and have them amended thereafter, following consultation with everybody to ascertain what would be practical, expected and reasonable, I encourage him to pursue that. However, he might wish not to move his amendments, to allow us to come back or offer him information about what has emerged from consultation, as appropriate, and he might then wish to lodge amendments at stage 3. I am neutral on the proposal, but I am content with the point about having such a timescale in the bill.

Amendments 1074 and 1082 will fill a gap by requiring public service authorities and relevant authorities to have regard to guidance issued by the Scottish ministers on participation requests and asset transfer requests. The bill provides a framework for those requests, and there are powers for ministers to make regulations in a number of areas to provide for procedures, deadlines and so on. However, regulations can get only to a certain level of detail; they cannot easily provide examples of best practice or a range of options to be used as appropriate.

We have every intention of issuing detailed guidance on those provisions, which, as the committee has discussed and as was emphasised in the stage 1 debate, will include the national standards for community engagement. For asset transfer, the guidance will cover issues relating to valuation and disposal at less than market value. The two amendments will ensure that authorities cannot ignore that guidance.

Amendments 1074 and 1082 will also require the Scottish ministers to consult before issuing guidance. We expect to develop the procedures and guidance relating to the bill through an inclusive process—it is, after all, a bill on community empowerment—with the participation of community organisations as well as the authorities to which the guidance is directed. I therefore ask the committee to support amendments 1074 and 1082, in my name.

John Wilson: I lodged amendments 1073B and 1073C to allow proper parliamentary scrutiny of participation requests because, although we are keen to engage with communities, as we have made clear during the committee’s scrutiny of the bill and in the engagement that we have had throughout Scotland, we feel that it is only right that a parliamentary committee has the opportunity to scrutinise what is happening with participation requests.

The reason for putting in a specific timetable is to allow us the opportunity to deal with the issues prior to the summer recess. That would allow the committee to timetable in the matter for June each year, which would provide us with an understanding of what is happening and would allow for consideration of any recommendations for change. We could advise the Government of any such issues when they were identified.

I am keen to ensure that the bill delivers on what it sets out to do. If we say that there should be more opportunity for participation requests, we must scrutinise that, and the only way in which we can do so—apart from the Government carrying out a due diligence process—is to allow a committee to undertake such scrutiny.

Alex Rowley: I press amendment 1112.

Amendment 1112 agreed to.

Section 18, as amended, agreed to.

Section 19—Participation requests: decisions

Amendment 1113 not moved.

The Convener: Amendment 1114, in the name of Cameron Buchanan, is grouped with amendments 1072, 1115, 1116, 1139, 1146, 1076, 1147, 1149 and 1161.

Cameron Buchanan: My amendments are about not the desirability of local aims but the purpose and limitations of the bill and what we are setting out to do. The bill should not set out what the local aims should be—it should empower communities to set their own priorities and aims. That is the reason for my amendments, which would remove specific criteria for refusing or agreeing to participation requests.

I move amendment 1114.

Marco Biagi: Group 6 relates to the sections that set out the issues that public service authorities and relevant authorities must consider in reaching their decisions on participation requests and asset transfer requests. Under the bill, the authority must consider whether agreeing to the request “would be likely to promote or improve—

(i) economic development,

(ii) regeneration,

(iii) public health,

(iv) social wellbeing, or

(v) environmental wellbeing”

and consider

“(d) any other benefits that might arise … and

(e) any other matter (whether or not included in or arising out of the request) that the authority considers relevant.”

That is not a prescriptive but an illustrative list of benefits, and the bill does not require every request to hit all those targets. The list simply indicates the benefits that we might expect to arise from community proposals.

One can argue for including in the bill a simple requirement to consider any benefits, but it is helpful to have a list—albeit not a prescriptive list—to which community bodies and authorities can refer. Indeed, rather than remove the list of issues to be considered, I want to add to it.

It is a priority of the Government to reduce inequalities and create a fairer Scotland. The bill is a part of that process, as we believe that empowering communities to take control of the decisions that affect them will help to reduce inequality and ensure a more participative economy and society.

I realise that many people have—at stage 1 in particular—expressed concern that the bill could empower communities that are already empowered, while other communities will continue to be left behind. However, we intend to empower all communities, and the provisions are there for everyone to use. I recognise that communities will need varying degrees of support to be able to take advantage of the bill’s provisions and, to that end, we are investing £19.4 million in the empowering communities fund, in addition to the support that we give the third sector. We also expect all public bodies and local authorities to engage communities in the design and delivery of services, and to support them to participate in those processes. As I have said, the national standards for community engagement will feature heavily in guidance on the bill, and the Government will introduce a further part to the bill that will—should the committee consent to it—promote greater participative democracy.

Amendments 1072 and 1076 will further ensure that the bill works to reduce inequalities. They add the need to reduce socioeconomic inequalities to the matters that are to be considered when a decision is made on a participation request or an asset transfer request. They make explicit the idea that reducing inequalities is something to be supported. If there are competing requests, the degree to which those requests would reduce inequalities could be the deciding factor.

It is essential that people who are experiencing socioeconomic disadvantage are involved in shaping the services that they use, because they know best what will work to tackle inequality. Therefore, amendment 1072, on participation requests, also requires authorities to consider whether agreeing to a request would not just improve the outcomes for disadvantaged people but increase their participation in the request process and, as a result of the request, more widely in the design and delivery of the service.

Cameron Buchanan's amendments would not allow us to place the additional focus on inequalities, and they would remove the requirement for authorities to reach their decisions in a manner that encourages equal opportunities. I appreciate that all authorities will be subject to the equal opportunity requirement under other statutes, but I think that it is important to be explicit. We all want the bill to have an impact on addressing socioeconomic inequalities and encouraging equal opportunities, and we should state clearly that proposals that help that should be supported.

I ask Cameron Buchanan to withdraw amendment 1114 and not to move his other amendments in the group, and I hope that the committee will support amendments 1072 and 1076.

I ask Cameron Buchanan to withdraw amendment 1114 and not to move his other amendments in the group, and I hope that the committee will support amendments 1072 and 1076.

Clare Adamson: I appreciate why the minister wants to open out this area to cover equal opportunities. I am concerned that Cameron Buchanan's amendment 1114 could narrow the criteria and that wellbeing and other community requirements could take second place if the criteria were defined in the way that he proposes.

Cameron Buchanan: I do not think that amendment 1114 would narrow the criteria at all. I think that section 19 is too prescriptive, which is why I wanted an explanation. I want the provisions to be as wide as possible. We should empower communities to set their own priorities, which is why we do not think that section 19(3)(c) is worth while. I press amendment 1114.

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 1114 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

requests that are just the same but are hoping for a different answer.

Cameron Buchanan’s amendments would remove the ability of authorities to decline repeat requests where they are made by a different body. That is quite a significant change, as people may belong to more than one group, and those who wish to bring the same request again might well move between groups or reconstitute their group under a different name in order to get round that provision. As I have already said, the authority is not required to decline repeat requests; the provisions just give them discretion to do so, and I think that we should allow them the discretion to judge whether a group is truly different or not.

The extensive reporting requirements that have now been placed on participation requests will help to ensure that there is transparency and adequate scope for scrutiny. I am sure that an organised group that is inappropriately declined from using the measures would be able to find extensive evidence showing that, and could illustrate it quite heavily in the local community discourse through the normal channels.

Amendments 1129 and 1159 seek to make it clear that a new request is to be treated as being “the same, or substantially the same” as a previous request where there are no significant differences between the two requests. I do not consider that it is necessary to add those words, as they have the ordinary meaning of the words that are already included in sections 22 and 61.

I ask Cameron Buchanan to withdraw amendment 1127 and not to move the other amendments in the group.

Cameron Buchanan: I do not think that bodies should be prevented from participating solely because another body also wants to participate. That is the whole point of my amendments. They would remove a statement that is irrelevant, whether a body is making a new request or whether the matter concerns a different body from the one that made the previous request. I therefore wish to press amendment 1127.

The Convener: Before I put the question on amendment 1127, I advise the committee that we have managed to skip the question on section 19, and I am scared that I might get a visit from the lawyers. I therefore now put the question, that section 19 be agreed to.

The Convener: Amendment 1134, in the name of Alex Rowley, is in a group on its own.

Alex Rowley: Amendment 1134 is important because it will allow communities to appeal to Scottish ministers when a public service authority refuses a participation request and when a participation request is agreed to but the community body objects to certain provisions in the decision notice.

The amendment would allow a community to appeal when it has significant concerns about how an outcome improvement process is being undertaken and how it will work. The amendment would leave it to Scottish ministers to design the appeals process and set out such things as the way in which appeals are made, how they are concluded and the timescales for making them.

Amendment 1134 would give considerable comfort to communities, which can often feel that although their views are listened to they are then dismissed, for reasons that are unclear. It is important that we give such assurances to communities. If it was possible for participation requests to be dismissed without a right to appeal, that would send out the wrong message. By agreeing to the amendment we would strengthen the bill, so I ask the committee and the minister to support it.

I move amendment 1134.
Marco Biagi: I thank the member for lodging the amendment. The issue has been a subject of discussion and debate in the past, and I know that at stage 1 the committee heard calls for appeal procedures for decisions on participation requests. The committee decided not to recommend such procedures in its stage 1 report. I was not privy to the discussions on that report, so I do not know why the committee reached that decision, but there are good reasons for that approach.

Participation requests are a new mechanism that is intended to support community groups to come forward proactively with ideas. We are putting that in statute, and public authorities will have a duty to set up a process to listen to those ideas. At section 19(5), public authorities must agree to a request to participate “unless there are reasonable grounds for refusing it.”

John Wilson: The definition of the phrase “reasonable grounds” can be used by lawyers to make lots of money. If a local authority said that it had reasonable grounds not to grant a participation request, who would be the arbiter who would decide whether that decision was reasonable?

Marco Biagi: The amendment has been useful in proactively throwing up the issue that that sits in the bill without broad guidance. As a result of amendments that have already been agreed to, we now have a power to make guidance in relation to participation requests and I envisage doing that to exemplify what reasonable requests are. We envisage fairly limited grounds for not granting a request—for example, if the body making the request is not an eligible body, or if the request would not lead to a service provided on behalf of the public service authority. Guidance underpinned by statute would help to clarify the situation and would mean that the matter would not go to judicial review, which is the current backstop and the ultimate course of appeal in the event of such a law being broken.

The problem that I have with any appeal mechanism—the difficulty that it poses—is that what we are talking about is different from asset transfer, in that asset transfer requires the movement of something physical whereas this is about something that is intangible; it is about dialogue, communicating and getting a place at the table. Any community group that went to an appeal to get to sit down and have a discussion with a public authority could not expect that to happen in a positive way, and I do not think that that would be a route to creating the kind of dialogue that we want.

Participation requests exist to make it absolutely clear to all public service authorities that they should be involving community groups that can express an interest and ideas about how to improve local outcomes. If we can do that only at the point of a ministerial appeal, the hope of fostering that relationship, changing the mindset and effecting a culture change is gone. You can imagine the situation as two groups walk tensely into a room, do not engage in any conversation, sit down, go through the motions and leave. I think that an appeal process would cause those community groups that were unhappy about having to use the process to have unnecessarily sour relationships. We cannot legislate to make people talk to each other—the bill is the closest thing that we have to that.

In addition, if we do not have a provision in local authorities for local authority review, which other amendments set out, any issue would go straight to ministers. That would not just annoy the local authority; it would cause wider issues for relationships and internal decision making.

John Wilson: Minister, we already do that in the planning process. We have a process for appeals against planning decisions that are made by local authorities, and the local authorities have the right to take matters to the Scottish ministers. I understand what you are saying about the need to get this right, but we must ensure that public bodies fully understand the intention of the Government, and the Parliament, to widen public participation as much as possible.

You mentioned judicial review. No community group would go to judicial review unless it had the financial resources to do that. To be honest, a ministerial appeal is cheaper than pursuing a judicial appeal or going to the Court of Session. Many community groups would tell you that the cost of taking planning decisions to judicial review is beyond their means. We want to ensure that groups are not penalised for not being financially able to go to judicial appeal.

Marco Biagi: In planning, there is a concrete—pardon the pun—physical result: a building either gets built or does not get built. In asset transfers, something changes hands. However, this is about dialogue, and dialogue that is introduced at the point of an appeal will not be positive and constructive. The bill is an attempt to create a culture change as broadly as we can. We want to ensure that any community group can point to a section in an act that says that it has the right to sit down at the table with a decision-making body, put its suggestions forward and be listened to. It is about a right to be listened to.

If an appeals process were to be introduced, that would simply result in the possibility that such listening would be perfunctory and not in keeping with the spirit of the bill. I would love it if there were a way to legislate to make public service bodies change the mindset with which they engage, so that we need only sign a bill into law and everybody would enter discussions in complete good faith. I do not believe that that can be done through legislation, but the bill makes absolutely clear the right that is there, without—I hope—facilitating the bad feeling, tension and resentment that getting there only by an appeal might provoke.

I understand that there will be community groups that will be disappointed and may want to appeal, but I do not see the material benefit to them of continuing a discussion that has been soured. As I said, the Government intends to introduce a new part to the bill that will be strong on participative powers. That will come at the end, and will perhaps offer an avenue for us to make even clearer to public service authorities that they should be as positive, whole-hearted and enthusiastic as possible about the process.

The Scottish Government is extending that agenda through our dialogue with those bodies; through the ministerial powers of the bully pulpit with those that report to us; and, more positively, through powers of dialogue in partnership with local authorities that have been verbally supportive of the principles behind the provisions in the bill.

I would hope that an appeals process would not be necessary. It would, if it were introduced, be counter-productive, and I ask Alex Rowley to withdraw amendment 1134.

Alex Rowley: Amendment 1134 is important if the bill is to have any teeth. The bill has come about in many senses because there is a view that legislation is needed to empower communities. The minister argues that this element of the bill is about a culture change and about talking, but a participation request is about more than dialogue. Local authorities and community groups may go to the trouble of working up participation requests, which in many cases will involve a significant piece of work if they wish the request to succeed, only to hear at the end the response, “Well, that was great—we had a dialogue with you. Thanks, but no thanks.”

John Wilson: Does Alex Rowley agree or disagree—it is up to him—that the amendment may actually encourage local authorities to be more open to dialogue, because they would know full well that if they were not, the communities could use the appeals process to pursue any grievances regarding the decision that is made by the local authority or public body?

Alex Rowley: Mr Wilson is absolutely correct on that. I have talked to people in various public organisations about the bill in general and about participation requests in particular, which are a significant element of the bill. The general response from those people has been, “Yeah, but we don’t have to agree to the request.” They are right when they say that they do not have to agree to a request, but if that is their view, I am not sure that, without some kind of appeals process in place, community organisations and groups would have the confidence that they are getting from the bill what it says on the tin. I strongly believe that.

Marco Biagi: I can easily visualise situations in which people would say, “Well, we do not have to agree to it.” What they are agreeing to do is permit a body to participate in an outcome improvement process. If a body were forced to agree to a request, the community body in question would be sitting down with people who were completely uninterested in them being there. That would waste a considerable amount of time and generate greater ill feeling. It is a legitimate problem to identify, but I do not believe that the amendment is the solution to it.

Alex Rowley: I would respond using Mr Wilson’s point. If we have a local outcome improvement process that is robust and fair from the beginning to the end, the likelihood of major appeals would be lessened by the very fact that an appeals process exists. That is why I have been careful to say that the amendment would leave it to Scottish ministers to design the appeals process. I assume that they would do so in consultation with public bodies and organisations.

I press amendment 1134, because I think that it is important in giving people confidence that we are serious about the participation request process in the first place. I am happy to work with the minister to strengthen the amendment as we proceed to stage 3, but I think that it is crucial that we get it on the face of the bill.

The Convener: The question is, that amendment 1134 be agreed to. Are we agreed?

Members: No.

The Convener: There will be a division.
