6.3. In sentencing an offender or carrying out any other function relating to the sentencing of offenders, a court (including an appeal court) must “have regard to” any sentencing guidelines which are applicable in relation to the case. If the court decides not to follow the guidelines, it must state the reasons for its decision (section 7 (1) and (2)). Where the High Court of Justiciary passes a sentence in an appeal, and in doing so decides not to follow any relevant guidelines or concludes the guidelines do not deal, or deal adequately, with a significant issue raised by the appeal, it may refer the sentencing guidelines to the Sentencing Council and ask it to review them, giving reasons for its decision or conclusion. The Sentencing Council must then review the guidelines and have regard to the High Court's reasons (section 9).
6.4. Of the total membership of the Sentencing Council the judiciary members (including the chairing member) are in the minority (five out of twelve).

6.5. Among the objectives of the Sentencing Council are to “to promote consistency in sentencing practice” and to “promote greater awareness and understanding of sentencing policy and practice” (section 4(a) and (c)). In this connection we note that the Policy Memorandum states that the policy objectives of the proposals are:

“To help ensure greater consistency, fairness and transparency in sentencing and thereby increase public confidence in the integrity of the Scottish criminal justice system”.

7. The following are our comments on these proposals, which we set out by reference to the numbered sub-paragraphs above (6.1. – 6.5.):

7.1. We consider that the purpose of the Sentencing Council is open to grave objection on constitutional grounds. Sentencing policy is, and should remain, a matter for the Parliament on the one hand and the Appeal Court on the other, following, we may say, a public hearing. It is fundamentally wrong that sentencing policy should be determined by a Sentencing Council, for which it appears that the executive have disproportionate influence on the procedure for appointment of members (See paragraphs 1 and 2 of Schedule 1). It is also a constitutional principle that the interpretation of legislation is a matter for the judiciary and not the executive. It would be fundamentally wrong for the proposed Sentencing Council to lay down guidelines as to how statutory rules should be interpreted. That is pre-eminently a matter for the Appeal Court.

7.1.1. We would add that the Policy Memorandum states:

“The provisions create a Scottish Sentencing Council to provide a new sentencing guidelines regime for Scotland. This proposal originated in recommendations by the judicially-led Sentencing Commission, which examined the issue of consistency in sentencing”.

However, examination of the Report¹ of the Sentencing Commission shows that it recommended in favour of a sentencing advisory body and against a sentencing guidelines council (paragraphs 9.14 et seq). Neither the Policy Memorandum nor the consultation paper contains an acknowledgement of this fact, let alone any justification for the decision that there should instead be a Sentencing Council.

7.2. It would be unconstitutional and wholly inappropriate for the executive to have any influence on the formulation of sentencing guidelines. The Parliament can pass laws which the courts must then follow and apply, but Ministers, the executive arm of the Government, have no right to tell the courts what to do in individual cases, and must not be seen to be doing so. It also has long been recognised in Scotland that the Lord Advocate and the prosecution service have no role in the determining of sentence. It would be wholly inappropriate and unconstitutional for the Scottish Ministers or the Lord Advocate to be seen to be influencing the way in which sentences are imposed.

7.3. It is wrong that in reaching its decisions any court should be subject to the determinations of a lay body such as the Sentencing Council. This would be a gross derogation from the independence of the judiciary and entirely unwarranted. Only recently the Parliament enacted a statutory commitment to judicial independence in section 1 of the Judiciary and Courts (Scotland) Act 2008\(^2\). It is nothing to the point that, as stated in section 7(2), it would be possible for a court to depart from a guideline in the circumstances of a particular case, since what is objectionable is that the court would have to justify departure from a guideline laid down by a body which was not made up, as to its majority, by judges. It would also be inappropriate for the Sentencing Council in advance to circumscribe the circumstances in which departure would be permitted (section 5(3)(d)). To do so would be to interfere with judicial independence. If there are to be sentencing guidelines, it should be for the Appeal Court ultimately to decide whether or not departure is justified.

7.3.1. While section 9 enables the Appeal Court to request the Sentencing Council to review its guidelines, this provision is in any event unsatisfactory. First, the Appeal Court cannot make such a request when it is refusing an appeal, and so is not passing another sentence. Secondly, it appears that if, after reviewing guidelines, the Sentencing Council determines that they should remain unchanged, there would be an impasse, with the Sentencing Council having the last word.

7.3.2. We should add that the proposals in regard to the Sentencing Council make no reference to the Appeal Court’s own power to issue guideline judgments under section 118(7) and 189(7) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. In particular they do not address the potential conflict between them and the guidelines of the Sentencing Council.

7.4. We see the composition of the Sentencing Council as extremely important, and do not consider the proposed membership of the Council, as set out in schedule 1, to be appropriate. There is a need for the membership of the Sentencing Council to enjoy the confidence of the judiciary and the public. As such, it should call for a preponderance of judges and other members who have direct experience of the courts and the range of issues with which they have to deal. The proposals contrast strongly with the Sentencing Guidelines Council in England, in which there are eight judicial members (including the chairing member) out of a total membership of twelve. The remaining members have experience of policing, criminal prosecution, criminal defence and the interests of victims.

7.4.1. We should add that we question the extent to which any useful contribution could be made by the two other members of the sentencing council, as referred to in paragraph 1(5)(b) of the schedule, unless they are to have knowledge and experience of the criminal justice system.

7.4.2. In response to the consultation paper we suggested the following membership which would be more suitable:

- The Lord Justice General
- The Lord Justice Clerk
- Three Lords Commissioner of Justiciary
- Two Sheriffs, one of which could come from an urban sheriff court district and the other from a more rural district to take account of court business in these different areas.
- One justice of the peace or stipendiary magistrate
- One nominee of ACPOS
- One nominee of the Faculty of Advocates
- One nominee of the Law Society of Scotland
- One representative of a victim’s organisation or specialist in victim’s issues
- One representative of social work services

7.5. As regards the objective of consistency, we remind the Committee, that, as is stated in paragraph 15 of the Policy Memorandum, the Sentencing Commission found that there was little empirical evidence of inconsistency in sentencing in Scotland. This consideration indicates that sentencing guidelines should, at most, be no more than advisory.

7.5.1. As to awareness and understanding of sentencing policy and practice, we note that paragraph 14 of the Policy Memorandum states that “it can be difficult for the public to properly understand the sentencing process”. However, we caution that it may well be even more difficult for the public to understand the process when there are sentencing guidelines in place. They will not supersede the need, or deny the opportunity, to refer to decisions of the Appeal Court, legislation, and textbooks. If the Bill’s proposals pass into law, future arguments in court will not only be concerned with the normal sentencing considerations but also the question whether a given sentence is or was in accordance with the relevant guideline or guidelines and, if not, whether there are or were good reasons why not.
7.5.2. We are also concerned that the public will assume that “transparency” means that there should be a “correct” sentence in any given case. Sentencing is not an exact science. It involves the exercise by a judge of his independent discretion in regard to the circumstances of the individual case. There is no such thing as the “correct” sentence for a given set of circumstances, and no sentencing guideline can provide for all circumstances, let alone the “correct” answer for any of them. It is, and will remain, entirely possible for two judges, in the proper exercise of their discretion, to reach different sentences in respect of the same set of circumstances. Both sentences would be justified.

We believe that all pornography, mainstream or illegal/extreme, has a negative effect on society. From our work with survivors, we believe it contributes directly to all sexual violence by influencing the erosion of values and attitudes of respect, therefore, allowing those who believe treating others as sexual objects to be used for their pleasure is acceptable. In light of this, we believe, ‘extreme pornography’ has hugely detrimental effects not least on the women, children (predominately) and men being used, consensually or otherwise, to depict these images, and should not be tolerated under any circumstances. Extreme pornography further encourages disrespectful attitudes, incites hatred and reinforces an individual’s violent fantasies by making them real. This reinforcement and implied acceptance of these fantasies only fuels people's imaginations – one fantasy is fulfilled and therefore they need more extreme and more violent depiction to satisfy their desires. This creates a cycle of more and more violent crime, continually pushing the limits and driving a black market trade in violent sexual crime limited only by people’s imaginations. This is an exceptionally dangerous situation, which can only get worse under current legislation. The ‘negative effects’ of pornography can be kidnap, slavery, torture, enforced drug abuse, rape, sexual assault, disease and murder of the people used in the images. Those who survive these experiences may be subjected to all manner of consequences including long term emotional and mental health problems, physical scarring or disability, blackmail, extortion, rejection and exclusion by family and community members, further physical and sexual abuse. This list is by no means exhaustive.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill
Written submission from the Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland

Introduction

The Mental Welfare Commission welcomes the opportunity to respond to Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. While we are happy to provide general comments on the overall Bill, our main comments are in relation to those offenders with recognised mental disorder.

General comments

Both of these reports contained proposals to cut short term prison sentences; promote early intervention to break the generational cycle of offending; address poor outcomes; improve offender management and re-shape community based disposals across the following 4 themes:

- Reparation and payback
- Rehabilitation and Integration
- Quality and Enforcement
- Community Engagement

Short custodial sentences (under 6 months) have been found to have no tangible impact on reducing the risk of re-offending. Many offenders who are sentenced to custody experience significant disruption to their lives: jeopardising family and partner relationships, present and future employment prospects and physical and mental health problems. In addition for those with a substance misuse problem a short custodial sentence offers limited opportunities to address their dependence, often the underlying problem to their offending. We welcome the proposal to replace short term custodial sentences with robust and meaningful community based alternatives.

Section 64 makes reference to Special Measures for child witnesses and vulnerable adults. We would hope that this includes those witnesses with learning disability and other recognised mental disorders.

In addition, public understanding and confidence in sentencing is a key issue, hence proposals to create a Scottish Sentencing Council to promote greater consistency and transparency in sentencing is also welcomed.

We are of the view that this Bill makes significant inroads in converting into legislation the positive proposals contained in the Scottish Government’s previous reports and that these will hopefully facilitate sentencers, Community Justice Authorities, Local Authorities and Health Boards in delivering ‘immediate, visible, effective, high quality, flexible and relevant justice’.

The caveat is that, if and when the Bill becomes legislation, the additional burden placed on Community Justice Authorities, Local Authority Criminal Justice Services and Health Boards can only be achieved if these are matched with additional funding to allow enhancing of resources.

Mentally Disordered Offenders.

We welcome Section 117 which introduces a new statutory defence to replace the common law defence of insanity and removes outdated and inappropriate terminology.

However, we note that the inserted section 51A (Subsection 2) of the 1995 Act excludes those with a psychopathic personality disorder alone and, while other personality disorders may give rise to the defence, we would ask that further advice on this be sought. The Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003 in Chapter 1 under section 37 Definition provides that a ‘mental disorder’ means any illness, personality disorder, or learning disability however caused or manifested’. We would urge caution on the ‘blanket statement in section 538 (Subsection 2).

A significant matter of concern is the lack of any recognition (in Sections 51A(1) and 51B(1)) that a mental disorder may not just impair an individual’s ability “to appreciate the nature or wrongfulness of the conduct”, but may also impair their ability to control their behaviour even though they may appreciate that their actions are wrong. For example, someone who commits an act in response to command hallucinations may be able to understand that what they did was wrong but not have been able to resist the compulsion of the hallucinations. Similarly, a person who kills their children whilst depressed may appreciate that their actions are wrong but believe that their actions are justified because of their view of life at that particular moment.

A further matter for concern is that the Bill makes little or no reference to those individuals appearing before the Court who have a learning disability or cognitive impairment, no matter to what extent this may be. Consequently their ability to understand and give informed consent to participate in community programmes may be limited and while they may give agreement, consequently they are almost certainly ‘set up to fail’. We believe further consideration should be given as to how individuals with a recognised learning disability/cognitive impairment appearing before the Courts may best have their needs met. This should be included in any future legislation.

Community Payback Orders

General Comments:

The impact of any order for compensation on an individual with mental disorder who may be already be having difficulty managing on benefits and who may be more vulnerable gives us cause for concern. We are not clear what the consequences might be for people who cannot or do not pay. While an SER might shed some helpful light on the relevant social circumstances, it might be worth considering whether a report on the individual’s social circumstances from a Mental Health Officer - a specialist social work practitioner with expertise in assessing and working with people with mental disorder - might be more useful to the court in considering such a disposal.

Section 227R.

The Commission have significant concerns about the impact of this section and how it will operate. It is not clear what status people subject to a “mental health requirement” will have in respect of their potential treatment in hospital or indeed their treatment as an outpatient. The following concerns are noted:

- There does not appear to be any requirement for a report from a Mental Officer or other report from social work in order to assist with decisions.
- Generally speaking, the Commission believes that wherever an individual with mental disorder receives treatment on a compulsory basis this should be done under civil provisions or existing provisions of the Criminal Procedures (Scotland) Act 1995
- There does not appear to be any consideration of the individual’s ability to consent to treatment, or what steps would be taken if they refused treatment.
- For those people who are subject to compulsion under either the Mental Health Act or Criminal Procedures Act, there are safeguards through either the Mental Health Tribunal or the Mental Welfare Commission. As the Commission has a clear responsibility in respect of all people with mental disorder we find it concerning that those subject to a “mental health requirement” would have no automatic recourse to independent or statutory review or to the safeguards that are available to people who are otherwise subject to compulsion in respect of mental disorder.
- If the person is admitted to hospital as part of the order and they are unwilling to stay and the medical practitioner responsible decides that they meet the criteria for detention in hospital, what is the impact of this on their order?
- Is it envisaged that an individual who is in hospital as a condition of their community payback order could be kept there and treated against their will without any additional authority? If so, what are the safeguards for the individual?

These matters require further consideration. At the very least there should be a requirement to notify the Commission if a community payback order with a mental health requirement is granted.

Section 227R is nevertheless helpful in specifying that a medical opinion is not required for out-patient treatment once the presence of mental disorder has been agreed.
It must be recognised that an initial pre-sentence assessment (28 working days) will not and cannot identify the full raft of issues which may impact upon a person’s behaviour.

It is only when treatment is underway that some or many of the issues underpinning a person’s behaviour and their ability to fully grasp treatment concepts becomes apparent. For example, Mr X is found guilty of severely assaulting his partner. A community payback order is given with the psychologist having initially recommended treatment with cognitive behavioural therapy for anger issues. However, during the course of treatment it becomes evident that Mr X’s problems are part of a wider spectrum of Emotionally Unstable Personality Disorder and the psychologist considers that a dialectical behaviour therapy approach may be more useful: this addressing both the propensity for violence and the wider issues. In such a scenario would the psychologist have to return to Court to register a change in treatment or is this considered part of the overall programme? Clarity regarding this matter would be helpful.

Written submission from Sacro

Part 1, Section 14 – Community payback orders

Sacro is in agreement with the objectives of this part of the Bill, i.e. to clarify and simplify, for the benefit of the public, the range of community penalties available to the courts. The notion of Community Payback is welcomed and Sacro are of the belief that there are a number of benefits to be derived from the new system. These include the facility for sentencers to have flexibility in relation to the nature and purpose of the Community Payback Order (CPO), and the facility to have it “tailored” to meet various requirements. There are also real benefits in “responsible officers” having the power to allocate the balance of hours between “unpaid work” and “other activity”, within the ratios specified in the Bill. It is perhaps this area of the Bill which is of primary interest to Sacro in terms of the potential to use hours designated “other activity” in as effective way as possible.

Sacro strongly agrees with the Scottish Government’s objective of reducing the use of short prison sentences. It is our experience that the current high use of short prison sentences, i.e. those under six months (three months served) combined with the lack of statutory throughcare for this group of prisoners results in outcomes which undermine the main objectives of criminal justice policy which is to reduce reoffending and to reduce victimization. Short periods in prison frequently weaken the very factors which are known to help reduce reoffending, i.e. having a job, a home and a family. Breaking such links counters any short term benefit of the respite which may be provided to victims or communities by removing the individual from society. Short prison sentences can thus make rehabilitation, and the job of criminal justice agencies, more difficult and it encourages the public to believe that prison is a short term fix for problems which are frequently entrenched and long standing and which can only properly be addressed by partnerships which address the underlying disadvantages – economic social and health-related – experienced by many offenders. The Scottish Parliament is already showing leadership in tackling our country’s twin problems of alcohol use and violence. The Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill now provides Scotland with the opportunity to build on this more reflective response by choosing to deal with the problem of crime in a more effective manner. It must be viewed as a long term project and one which requires to be properly resourced. But it offers a more cost-effective way to reduce reoffending than to continue with the very expensive prison building programme. These resources would be more effectively used in developing and supporting community sentences.

Sacro shares the view that CPOs should represent a major means of reducing the use of short prison sentences whilst responding to the harm done to victims, whether these be individuals or communities. To achieve this requires that these orders gain the confidence of sentencers and the public and do not lead people placed on them to fail to comply as a result of indiscriminate or inflexible use. To meet both objectives of maintaining confidence and ensuring maximum compliance requires a flexibility in approach and implementation which takes account of individual circumstances in each case, with particular attention being given to offenders’ capacities and motivation to participate.

This is particularly important in respect of the provision in the proposed order for ‘unpaid work or other activity requirement’. It is Sacro’s experience that Restorative Justice can provide an important and effective means of addressing this issue. The opportunity to learn first hand how their offence has affected individual victims or local communities can be a salutary experience which impacts positively on offenders’ motivation to make amends and on their attitudes to their offending behaviour. Such effects mean that Restorative Justice offers an important additional dimension to reparative work orders, particularly in respect of those offenders whose compliance is more difficult to ensure or for whom second or subsequent orders are considered as a result of further convictions following imposition of an initial order. Restorative Justice thereby offers a means of (a) maximizing compliance and reducing breaches of orders and (b) providing opportunity for a graduated tariff of payback orders to reduce the possibility of imprisonment being seen as the most appropriate option as a result of subsequent reconvictions.

Sacro believes that the Bill should provide an opportunity to give increased attention to the needs of victims of crime; both direct victims and the local communities in which crimes are committed – as appropriate to each case. A major part of any payback initiative should involve provision for offenders to make amends to those most directly affected by their offending behaviour. Restorative Justice interventions differ from more generalised reparative activities by involving victims in the process and in focussing reparation on activities that benefit victims. Sacro considers this as being of sufficient importance as to merit specific mention in the Bill as a recommended component of unpaid work or another activity.

The involvement of victims in the process would of course be voluntary and should be focussed primarily on meeting their needs rather than those of the offender or the supervising officer. Care needs to be taken to avoid any re-victimisation and it is considered essential that trained facilitators are deployed for such interventions. It is anticipated that the Bill itself could encourage the use of Restorative Justice interventions and approaches by making reference to Restorative Justice and the principles thereof. It may be that specific reference could be made within the Bill to ensuring that part of the “other activity” element of the CPO is focussed on the effect of the offence or offending on victims. This could take a variety of forms as assessed by the responsible officer.

At the present time in Scotland there is insufficient focus on the harm impact of offending and individual offences by offenders, and the Bill should take steps to ensure that this focus changes. It is apparent that the Bill favours the use of reparative tasks within the area of Community Payback. Sacro are also in favour of the use of reparative tasks, specific to either the type of offence which has been committed, and/or following consultation with the person or persons who have been harmed. In instances where this may be inappropriate or difficult to facilitate, the Community itself should be provided with the facility to steer tasks undertaken by offenders as part of Community Payback schemes. Sacro considers that omission of this specific provision in the Bill will miss an important opportunity to gain widespread support for a refocussing of the objectives of our Criminal Justice system to give increased attention to repairing the harm caused by offending together with reducing the likelihood of re-offending.

Written submission from the Equality Network

The Equality Network is a network of around one thousand lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender (LGBT) individuals and organisations in Scotland, working for LGBT equality. The Equality Network’s policy work is based on consultation with LGBT communities across Scotland, and reflects the concerns that LGBT people have raised with us.

We welcome the opportunity to submit evidence to the Justice Committee on the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. We wish to suggest a provision which we feel should be included in Part 2 (criminal law) of the bill, under the existing heading ‘sexual offences’.

The current Sexual Offences (Scotland) Bill removes gender and sexual orientation discrimination from sexual offences law. However, prostitution is outwith the scope of that bill, and is now the only remaining area of criminal law where some sexual orientation discrimination remains.

The Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill is the first general criminal justice bill to be considered by the Parliament for some years, and is therefore the first opportunity to deal with this discrimination. As a bill which makes general provision about criminal law, we assume that such a change would be within its scope.

Outline of the problem

The main legislative provisions on prostitution apply regardless of the gender of the prostitute or the gender of the person seeking to obtain the services of a prostitute. It is an offence for the prostitute or the person seeking their services to solicit in a public place.

However, for the case of a male prostitute offering services to a man, or a man seeking to obtain the services of a male prostitute, there is an additional offence which criminalises all soliciting or importuning, whether or not it is done in a public place. There have been no charges under that additional, gender and sexual orientation specific, offence for several years at least.

The Equality Network raised the issue of this discriminatory offence when the Prostitution (Public Places) (Scotland) Act 2007 was under consideration by the Parliament. The then Scottish Executive responded that the discriminatory offence could not be repealed by that bill, because the scope of the bill covered only public places, while the discriminatory offence applies also to soliciting and importuning in other places.

We believe that the opportunity should now be taken to remove this last sexual orientation discrimination from the criminal law.
More detailed explanation and suggested solution

Section 46 of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 criminalises loitering, soliciting and importuning, in a public place and for the purpose of prostitution, by a female or male prostitute.

Section 1 of the Prostitution (Public Places) (Scotland) Act 2007 criminalises soliciting and loitering, in a public place, for the purpose of obtaining the services of a prostitute. Again, this offence is gender-neutral.

Section 13 (‘homosexual offences’) of the Criminal Law (Consolidation) (Scotland) Act 1995 is largely repealed by the current Sexual Offences (Scotland) Bill. But the provisions in section 13 relating to prostitution are not amended by that bill. Some of those provisions extend the law on pimping and brothel-keeping to cover male prostitution, and are non-discriminatory in effect.

However, part of section 13(9) makes it an offence to solicit or importune any male person for the purpose of procuring the commission of a homosexual act. This criminalises both prostitutes and people seeking to obtain the services of a prostitute, wherever the soliciting or importuning takes place, in a public place or otherwise. Because it covers non-public places, the offence is wider in scope than the other prostitution offences. It discriminates on grounds of gender and sexual orientation, since it only applies where the prostitute and the person seeking to obtain their services are both men.

Parliamentary Question S3W-16008 asked: To ask the Scottish Executive how many charges brought under section 13(9) of the Criminal Law (Consolidation) (Scotland) Act 1995 have been (a) reported to procurators fiscal by police and (b) prosecuted in each year since 2003-04.

On September 17th 2008, the Solicitor General replied: The Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service has not received any reports containing charge(s) under Section 13(9) of the Criminal Law (Consolidation) (Scotland) Act 1995.

Our view is that the prostitution offences in the Civic Government (Scotland) Act and the Prostitution (Public Places) (Scotland) Act are sufficient to deal with male prostitution in just the same way as they deal with other prostitution. There is no reason to provide a separate, wider offence for male prostitution. The law should not discriminate on grounds of gender and sexual orientation unless there is good reason for it.

We recommend therefore that an amendment should be made to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill, along the lines suggested below.

This would repeal the soliciting / importuning offence in section 13(9) of the 1995 Act (and would consequentially repeal section 13(11), which is a time bar provision applying to that offence). It would leave the other provisions of section 13, on pimping and brothel-keeping, unchanged.
After section 34, insert–

<Amendment of offences relating to male prostitution

(1) Section 13 of the Criminal Law (Consolidation) (Scotland) Act 1995 (c.39) is amended as follows.

(2) In subsection (9), the words from “or” where it occurs for the second time to “above” are repealed.

(3) Subsection (11) is repealed.>

Written submission from the South Ayrshire Multi-Agency Partnership

About South Ayrshire MAP

The South Ayrshire MAP is pleased to have the opportunity to comment on this Bill. We are committed to addressing gender-based violence and to offering appropriate, high quality services to women and children, underpinned by a clear and unequivocal commitment to promote gender equality and inclusion across South Ayrshire. The partnership is made up of representatives from agencies working with women and children in South Ayrshire. The partnership aims to achieve positive outcomes for women & children experiencing gender-based violence by adopting the 3 P’s approach to tackling male violence – protection, provision and prevention. Specifically:

- To provide consistent and appropriate responses to women and children experiencing gender-based violence in South Ayrshire
- To raise public awareness of issues around violence against women and children
- To promote and support good practice within and between agencies

To this end, we have developed a website with information for women, children and young people and workers; produced information cards for members of the public; produced a directory of services for agencies to tackle violence against women; and, run a number of awareness raising campaigns. As with likeminded organisations, we take a keen interest in any legislative changes which impact on violence against women and this Bill in particular is of great interest.

Our views on this Bill

South Ayrshire MAP welcomes the government’s proposals to criminalise the possession of material that are considered to be extreme pornography. Legislating on this issue is an important part of publicly naming this material as totally unacceptable, indeed harmful, and we are pleased that this first step has been taken to address the nature and prevalence of these images.

The acts considered to be ‘extreme pornography’ in this bill are defined as such when they can be identified as obscene, pornographic and extreme.

These are defined as:

(a) Obscene
The test of “obscene” means that the material must be of such a nature that it would fall within the category of the material whose sale etc. is already prohibited under section 51 of the 1982 Act.

There is no definition of obscene, but courts apply a common law test of whether the material is ‘calculated to deprave or corrupt persons open to depraving or corrupting’.

(b) Pornographic

(3) An image is pornographic if it is of such a nature that it must reasonably be assumed to have been made solely or principally for the purpose of sexual arousal.

(c) Extreme
An image is extreme if it depicts, in an explicit and realistic way any of the following—
(a) an act which takes or threatens a person’s life,
(b) an act which results, or is likely to result, in a person’s severe injury,
(c) rape or other non-consensual penetrative sexual activity,
(d) sexual activity involving (directly or indirectly) a human corpse,
(e) an act, which involves sexual activity between a person and an animal (or the carcass of an animal).

Why is this legislation needed?

South Ayrshire MAP believes that this type of legislation is urgently needed in order to address the increasing volume of what is referred to in this bill as ‘extreme’ pornographic material, which exists in the context of the prevalence and normalisation in popular culture of all forms of pornographic material.

In everyday media women’s bodies are routinely portrayed as sexualised and available through the proliferation of homogenous images of the ‘ideal’ female form. This sexualised ‘ideal’ is at its most extreme in pornography and there is depth concern that these images are feeding directly into what young girls in particular, understand as expectations of how their bodies should be and what it means to be ‘sexual’. Men are also being sold a very narrow, prescriptive and extreme form of masculinity, where male dominance and control can be maintained through male sexuality, as depicted in pornography. We believe that this pressure and the expectations implied through the cultural prevalence of pornographic sexuality are harmful to men as well as women.

Our analysis of pornography is that it represents sex as domination, humiliation and as a way of pushing the female body to its physical limits.
Women in pornography are not represented as individuals or sentient beings—they exist anonymously, purely for male sexual gratification where the focus of the images is male sexuality. In pornography, sex is depicted through violence; in the acts themselves and in the language used to describe the acts. (See Robert Jensen ‘Pornography and the End of Masculinity’, 2007)

Pornography also celebrates under-age sex and sex with young ‘barely legal’ girls. Those women that are not especially young are portrayed as so, in schoolgirl outfits and through the language used to address them. For example, on one site: “innocent teen girls face their worst sex related

predominantly men who direct pornographic films, who view pornography and who make profit from pornography. As a cause and a consequence of wider gender inequality, we view all pornography as violence against women; not only in the acts that are played out on the bodies of individual women, but in terms of the effects the normalisation of this violence and degradation has on the unequal status of all women.

There is much evidence to demonstrate that many women who are involved in the sex industry, including in pornography, have personal histories of sexual and other abuse, poverty, social and economic deprivation and exclusion. We believe that society has a responsibility to protect vulnerable groups and individuals; in the sex industry we see the opposite – vulnerable women being groomed and exploited for the profits of big business.

In the contemporary social and political climate, where rape conviction rates are as low as 2.9% in Scotland, (Scottish Government figures for 2006/07) we have to ask what role pornography plays in feeding into a culture where sexual violence is normalised and even glamorised. Pornography perpetrates myths about rape, which can make it hard for sex offence victims to be believed or seen as credible, and makes it more difficult for them to come forward and be treated fairly.

This legislation takes the first step in addressing the most extreme forms of pornography; specifically, those depicting rape and acts that are viewed as being without question, totally degrading and unacceptable to society. We view the existence of this material as being enabled and supported by all other pornography, which is in itself characteristically violent. We understand ‘violent’ in terms of the full meaning of the word; often physical violence, but also as violation; violation of the integrity and dignity of wider society, in the way pornography compromises wider gender equality, as well as violation of the individuals appearing in the images themselves.

Our objections are not based on a moralistic, religious, prudish or anti-sex perspective; they are focused on harm; and we would urge the committee to keep harm at the centre of its discussion on these provisions.

Specific comments

As well as drawing attention to the existence of such material, an important part of this legislation is turning the burden of responsibility onto those people who demand, consume and possess the material. There is already legislation in place which criminalises the display, publishing, selling and distribution of this type of material, and possession with a view to onward sale or distribution, but these new provisions will send a message that individual possession of such material is harmful, damaging and unacceptable.

We believe that this makes a clear connection between those who use extreme pornography and the actual acts perpetrated within the material. This recognises that demand for such material increases its production but also, that the very consumption and viewing of such material is fundamentally harmful to society as a whole, in its celebration of the inhuman and violent treatment of women.
We welcome the specific reference to rape and other non-consensual penetrative sexual activity within the definition of extreme pornography. Unlike similar legislation in England & Wales, the bill does not make a distinction between ‘violent’ rape, and rape in general, a distinction which is extremely unhelpful and which we are glad to see is being rejected in Scotland. All rape is violent.

Along with similar organisations we believe that consideration of the following amendments to the bill would strengthen the legislation and make it more effective in tackling the type of material it seeks to control.

(1) Amendment to definition of extreme
Change wording to:

(b) an act which results, or threatens to result, in a person’s severe injury.

The use of “threatens to” instead of “likely to” would increase the proposals’ scope to cover all acts of rape, which could all be said to threaten severe injury but not all are likely to result in severe injury.

(2) Broaden the scope of material covered to include non-photographic visual depictions of extreme pornography

As the bill is currently written, to meet the definition of ‘extreme’, the material in questions must be explicit and realistic. The terms “explicit” and “realistic” require that the act depicted in the image must be clearly seen, lifelike and convincing and appear to a reasonable person to be real. It is not required that the act itself is real.

There is a strong feeling that there is a missed opportunity in not including non-photographic representations of extreme acts in the bill. This means for example that the provision in the bill will not cover depictions of extreme pornography on virtual worlds such as Second Life, where the pornography is violent, extreme and interactive, but where the images are not photographic. Similarly, we would like to emphasise that there is still a need to enact similar legislation in relation to child pornography, as proposed by the Scottish Executive in early 2007.

(3) Broaden the definition of extreme to include depictions of incest

Although the legislation will cover depictions of rape and non-consensual penetrative sexual activity, which fit the definition of obscene and pornographic, this will not necessarily cover pornography which glorifies incest, unless it is clear that the young woman depicted is not of an age to consent. For example, one pornography website is headed ‘Welcome to Daddy’s Whore’ and other similar sites are easily found through search engines. This type of content is unlikely to be covered by the legislation because these sites usually state that the young women featured are over 18. We believe serious consideration must be given to extending the definition of extreme to include depictions of incest, which is an illegal activity, to ensure these types of materials are covered by the legislation.
(4) Ensure a clear definition of possession
Clarity is required as to what “possession” covers. Will it cover those people who access pornography without downloading files? Although the bill does not criminalise accidental or single viewing, we believe it must cover repeated viewings of this type of material, whether or not the material was actually downloaded.

South Ayrshire MAP believes that this piece of legislation is a very important step in what we hope will be the beginning of a process to address the harm caused by pornography. It is a sad reality that many of our young people are getting their first pieces of information and experience on sex and sexuality from internet pornography. This has substantial implications on both their self-esteem and their understanding of the nature of sex and sexuality. Most worrying is the message it gives to young people about the normative roles men and women act out during sex, men dominant and women passive; men violent and brutal, women aroused by violence and brutality.

Sex in pornography is portrayed through testing the physical boundaries of the female body and dressing this up as erotic and sexual; it is never about human relationships or intimacy. We believe there is a real case to be made for government’s attention to this, in terms of the consequences pornography is having on society as a whole, but particularly the next generation, the largest users of pornography and whose access to this material is virtually unchecked.

We also urge the Committee to consider the need for public education. This includes public education on the introduction of the proposed legislation to ensure people understand the new onus on tackling demand; but also a broader public education campaign on the realities of pornography. We understand that many parents/carers are completely unaware of the type of material that young people can very easily gain access to, and that they are horrified once they know the reality of how easily available extreme pornography is and what it contains.

Written submission from Turning Point Scotland

Turning Point Scotland provides person centred support to adults with a range of complex needs. We learn from services and service users and seek to influence social policy. We provide services to substance misusers who find themselves in the criminal justice system, including a number of arrest referral services for people whose offending may be linked to drug misuse, as well as more general substance misuse services. We also offer a variety of support to people who experience mental health issues, including social enterprises providing employment opportunities, supported living housing support, one to one and group work based activities.

We have focused our evidence on Part 1 of the Bill, specifically on the Community Payback Orders. We broadly welcome the Orders, and make the following comments.

1. Partnership working

Turning Point Scotland feels that Community Planning Partnerships, Community Justice Authorities, and in particular the (often) voluntary organisations working directly with individuals, have a role to play in the development and delivery of Community Payback Orders. This applies to the design as well as the delivery of the necessary services.

The Road to Recovery, the Scottish Government's framework for tackling drug misuse, establishes the principle that treatment services must engage effectively with wider generic services to address the full needs of the individual, not just their addiction. We feel that this principle should apply to the design of the range of services that will be required under Community Payback Orders.

Community Planning Partnerships clearly have a role to play in this service design, as do Community Justice Authorities and independent organisations working directly with individuals. We are concerned that this section of the Bill makes no mention of partnership working.

CPPs can provide an opportunity for the involvement of voluntary organisations, who are often delivering public services on behalf of statutory bodies. The level of involvement will vary from area to area, as will the effectiveness of CPPs in promoting interagency collaboration, but it is precisely the joint working that they promote that is necessary in order to design the right infrastructure of services.

In terms of service delivery, the Bill concentrates on the responsibilities of the local authority, which will make recommendations as to the individual’s suitability for a Community Payback Order, decide on the treatment they are to receive, and monitor their compliance with the requirements set out in the Order.

It is our experience that the best results are achieved when statutory authorities work in partnership with the organisations delivering services. Our knowledge and expertise will be invaluable to local authorities in meeting their responsibilities under this Bill. While it would be good practice to seek the input of experts in particular areas, involving organisations such as Turning Point Scotland when working with an offender affected by substance misuse for example, this Bill does not echo the requirement for collaborative working set out in the Local Government in Scotland Act.

2. Need for resources

It is clear that Community Payback Orders have a number of objectives to achieve. They must meet the needs of the court, providing the appropriate balance between punishment and rehabilitation. The public must have confidence in them as a quality and effective disposal, and they must also be effective in addressing the problems and behaviour that has resulted in the commission of the offence.

While Turning Point Scotland welcomes the focus on addressing the causes of behaviour, we will be unable to achieve the desired outcomes unless adequate resources are in place. We have not had sight of the Financial Memorandum to the Bill, but understand from the evidence taken by the Finance Committee that £10 million made available nationally for the delivery of Community Payback Orders. In our view this would not be adequate.

Turning Point Scotland’s experience of working in criminal justice, mental health and substance misuse services across Scotland is that the provision of these services varies dramatically. With the presumption against short term prison sentences and the aim of reducing the prison population, we can assume that the more offenders will be subject to Community Payback Orders than are subject to the current community disposals. Existing services are unlikely to have the capacity to absorb this increased demand, and the £10 million referred to by the Finance Committee would not be sufficient to address this.

The Road to Recovery sets the goal of a range of treatment and rehabilitation services being made available at a local level, as different people in different circumstances will take different roads to recovery. The same is true for individuals ‘recovering from’ offending behaviour. Each person will have specific needs that will need to be addressed if we are to truly tackle the causes of their offending, whatever they may be.

There is the additional concern that this increased burden will make these services even less accessible to people who are not currently involved in the criminal justice system. Having been found guilty of the theft of £67 worth of meat, Derek Nicholson requested a prison term of longer than six months so that he would be eligible for the prison drug programme. This case, reported in the Courier & Advertiser on the 7th April, highlights the current demand for drug treatment services, and our experience shows that it is reflected, to a greater or lesser extent, across Scotland. The same can be said for alcohol treatment and mental health services.

The Community Payback Orders would not help Mr. Nicholson in this case, as his offence was not serious enough. It is also true that the increased demands that the Orders will make on the already stretched services may make it even less likely that Mr. Nicholson would be able to access the services he requires.

When a Community Payback Order is made, and an offender is subject to its requirement, it is clear that the appropriate services must be in place if the goals of the Order are to be achieved. When they are not, or when the offender is forced into the wrong services, it is far more likely that they will be unable to address their issues, or even comply with the requirements. In this case they would be seen as having failed to meet the requirements under the order, when in reality the system has failed them.

The Bill assumes that these services will be in place, but consideration must be given to how the Government can ensure that this is the case if the goals are to be achieved.

3. Programme Requirement

We welcome the inclusion of a Programme Requirement. Turning Point Scotland’s Turnaround service works with male offenders in Paisley, Irvine, Greenock, Dumbarton, Kilmarnock, and our 218 service works with female offenders in Glasgow, whose offending is persistent, high volume, low tariff and who are failing in other community-based alternatives, or who have had multiple remand or short-term prison sentences. We give priority to those affected by substance misuse, mental health issues or homelessness.

We hope that the inclusion of this Requirement will be an opportunity to highlight this way of working and promote the outcomes that could be achieved across Scotland. These programmes often rely on local authorities to commission them, but also on the criminal justice system to use them. There is great disparity in current provision and take-up.

4. Mental Health Treatment Requirement (MHTR)

We note that the Mental Health Treatment Requirement set out in the Bill focuses on medical and psychological treatment to enable an individual to improve their mental health condition, which we do not dispute.

An example of Turning Point Scotland’s work in this area is our STABLE service in Aberdeen, where we provide support for people on Compulsory Treatment Orders as part of a package of support overseen by doctors and psychologists. We try and form a partnership with the individual so that the feeling of compulsion is minimized, which we find is more effective at achieving outcomes.

To really achieve the goal of improving an individual’s mental health medical, psychological and social support services must work together to address their holistic needs. The social support that we provide is plays an important role in enabling that person to not only overcome their mental health condition, but to integrate themselves into their community. We do not believe that one approach can fully deliver without the other, and feel that recognition needs to be given to the holistic needs of the offender, if the Mental Health Treatment Requirement is to deliver their hoped for outcomes.

5. Drug Treatment Requirement (DTR)

Again, it is important that a holistic approach to supporting an offender to overcome their dependency on or propensity to misuse drugs is applied. Making further reference to Government’s framework, recovery should be the explicit aim of all services providing treatment and rehabilitation to problem drug users, and their wider circumstances that may contribute to their drug misuse must be recognised and included. We feel that the implementation of this Bill must be in line with the ethos of The Road to Recovery. There are a number of community rehabilitation services across Scotland, attendance at which could be considered part of this requirement.

We repeat our call that the expertise of all relevant organisations are called upon when the decision is being made as to the type of treatment to be required, and included in the design and planning of the treatment. It is only by including the people who work directly with an individual that we are able to gain a full insight into an individual’s circumstances, and identify the most appropriate treatment.

6. Alcohol Treatment Requirement (ATR)

We echo our comments made above, on the need for decision makers to work with people delivering front line services.

An issue that we would like to highlight is the difference between the Drug Treatment Requirement and the Alcohol Treatment Requirement. The Drug Treatment Requirement refers to reducing or eliminating the offender’s dependency on or propensity to misuse drugs, where as the Alcohol Treatment Requirement refers only to reducing a dependency on alcohol, and makes no mention of the propensity to misuse alcohol.

There are clear links between the propensity to misuse alcohol and criminal behaviour. We are concerned that an opportunity is being missed in this Bill to consider the inclusion of alcohol awareness courses or equivalent, with a view to reducing the misuse of alcohol.
Justice Committee
Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Action for Children Scotland

Action for Children Scotland welcomes the opportunity to submit evidence to the Scottish Parliament’s Justice Committee’s Stage 1 consideration of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (“the Bill”). Our evidence draws upon our strong track record of successfully engaging young people in robust community based alternatives to custody, which have significantly reduced the likelihood of re-offending. As part of this process, Action for Scotland projects in the Inverclyde and Inverness areas deliver Constructs, which is an accredited 26 session programme for young males aged 18+ at risk of re-offending. The programme supports the young people to address their offending behaviour, and to turn their lives around. Action for Children Scotland also works with families who have been affected by the imprisonment of family members.

The Scottish Sentencing Council (Sections 3 – 13, and Schedule 1)

Action for Children Scotland generally welcomes the Scottish Government’s proposals to establish the Scottish Sentencing Council, and to introduce sentencing guidelines. This body can help to promote greater consistency and transparency in sentencing across Scotland. The proposed council can also make a significant contribution to progressing the Scottish Government’s commitment to encourage the greater use of community sentences as an alternative to custody for the less serious offences. Action for Children Scotland takes the view that we need to see more disposals by courts that keep people out of the prison system for the less serious offences, and instead focus on rehabilitation. This is based on our experience of working with young people who have offended, which has proven that intensive community based interventions focusing on the causes of how the young people got involved in crime can prevent re-offending.

Schedule 1(1) of the Bill outlines the proposed membership of the Scottish Sentencing Council. We believe that the council’s work would benefit from the inclusion in its membership of a representative from an agency working directly in the rehabilitation of offenders, and that this should be specified in Schedule 1(1).

Sentencing Guidelines (Section 5)

We note that the main function of the Scottish Sentencing Council is to “prepare and publish guidelines relating to the sentencing of offenders”. Action for Children Scotland recommends that the sentencing guidelines should include a clear statement that children under 18 will be dealt with by the Children’s Hearings system, except for the most serious offences.
Action for Children Scotland also believes it is vital that the sentencing guidelines should include a strong focus on community sentences for the less serious offences, given the presumption against short sentences in Sections 16-19 of the Bill, and the high level of prison overcrowding highlighted in the Chief Inspector of Prisons’ recent annual report.

Action for Children Scotland recommends that the sentencing guidelines produced by the proposed Scottish Sentencing Council should highlight the impact of custodial sentences upon the lives of prisoners’ children. A report published by Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People, Not Seen. Not Heard. Not Guilty: The Rights and Status of the Children of Prisoners in Scotland, outlines the negative impacts on children where a parent (or other principal carer) is detained or imprisoned. Against this background, Action for Children Scotland believes that these negative impacts should be reflected in the sentencing guidelines, particularly for the less serious offences where a community based sentence could be appropriate. We believe this would be beneficial for both male and female offenders who are parents or carers. It would, for example, help more young fathers to retain contact with their children and families. Given the fact that being part of a family is one of the key factors causing offenders to stop offending, we consider this could have a positive outcome for many families affected by imprisonment.

Action for Children Scotland also notes that the HM Chief Inspector of Prisons for Scotland’s Annual Report states that the number of women in prison “are rising more quickly than the numbers of any other sector in the prison population”. Against this background, Action for Children Scotland believes a much more consistent approach should be taken by the courts to the sentencing of male and female offenders who have committed the same, or similar, offences. Action for Children Scotland recommends that this issue should be reflected in the sentencing guidelines which will be developed by the proposed Scottish Sentencing Council. This factor, and the Scottish Government’s commitment to replace short term sentences with the greater use of community sentences, can help both to reduce the number of women who end up in prison, and to improve the levels of rehabilitation amongst women in the criminal justice system. Community based sentences could, for example, assist female prisoners to meet their child care responsibilities while fulfilling the conditions of their community sentence, and to draw upon positive influences within their network of family and friends.

Community Payback Orders (Section 14)

We note from the Financial Memorandum accompanying the Bill it is anticipated that the proposed Community Payback Orders ("CPOs"), and the presumption against short sentences, will have a “significant financial impact”. Action for Children Scotland believes that the provisions relating to CPOs must be adequately resourced if they are to be successful. In this respect, it would be helpful if the Scottish Government could clarify the funding which will be available to fund the management and implementation of the CPOs across Scotland.

Requirement to avoid conflict with religious beliefs, work etc.

Action for Children Scotland welcomes the provisions in the Bill that courts must ensure, as far as practicable, that any requirement imposed by a CPO avoids conflict with the offender’s religious beliefs and work. We also take the view it is essential that the implementation of the CPOs must be flexible, given the importance of employment in helping to break the cycle of offending and of re-offending. This flexibility is particularly vital in situations where offenders secure full-time employment during the course of a CPO programme. In these circumstances we believe it is important that the appropriate court should act promptly to take into account the offender’s changing circumstances, and to consider any changes which may be necessary to vary or revoke or discharge the CPO.

Drug and alcohol treatment requirements

With regard to the drug treatment requirement, we believe it is important that a consistent approach should be taken across Scotland. Our concern, however, is that not all offenders will be able to access local drugs rehabilitation services. It would, therefore, be helpful if the Justice Committee could clarify the number of people who offend, or are at risk of re-offending, whom the Scottish Government estimates will be able to access, as part of their compliance with a CPO, local drugs rehabilitation services under the recently announced reforms to the delivery of drugs and alcohol treatment.

Breach of Community payback order

We believe that the Bill should include a clear statement that courts, in determining whether or not an offender has breached an order, must take into account all of the relevant circumstances to enable them to fully evaluate the progress made by the offender in complying with an order. Action for Children Scotland considers that such a statement is particularly necessary where an offender has been subject to a number of requirements under a CPO. In addition, the sentencing guidelines relating to CPOs should include clear guidance to the courts about what circumstances would amount to a breach of a CPO.

Short Sentences (Sections 16 – 18)

Action for Children Scotland welcomes the provisions in Sections 16 – 18 which will introduce a presumption against short sentences, and promote the greater use of community sentences. We believe these measures can make an important contribution to breaking the cycle of offending and of re-offending, and to increase the level of rehabilitation amongst offenders. This cycle has given rise to a ‘revolving door’ syndrome through which many offenders, particularly young people, return to prison soon after leaving custody. To break this cycle we believe it is essential that the transitional support available to young people upon leaving custody must be significantly increased, and a more consistent approach taken, across Scotland.

Action for Children Scotland and our partners, including the Robertson Trust, Fairbridge and Youthlink, are helping to provide young people with such support in the Renfrewshire area through the Moving On Renfrewshire project. We help young males aged 16-21 who are in custody or have recently been liberated from HMYOI Polmont, HMP Greenock, or HMP Friarton. The young people engage voluntarily in the project, which aims to reduce the risk of re-offending, and to minimise the likelihood of the young people returning to custody. We provide a wide range of support services tailored to meet the young people’s individual needs to assist them make positive changes in their lives. Action for Children Scotland and our partners help the young people to deal with personal problems, and issues around housing, benefits, substance misuse, and relationships. This flexible approach helps to promote more positive outcomes for young people, with the long term plan to move them into education, employment or training.

Supporting offenders into sustainable employment is another key area which needs to be considered as part of the process of breaking the cycle of offending and of re-offending. Significantly, HM Chief Inspector of Prisons for Scotland’s Annual Report highlighted that “unchanging poverty, social exclusion and inequality” are the most powerful factors inhibiting the rehabilitation and transformation of prisoners. The often insurmountable difficulties faced by prisoners in securing employment remain at the heart of this cycle. Drawing upon the experience of our Youthbuild programme, Action for Children Scotland takes the view that employment opportunities are central to rehabilitation, and to preventing re-offending. Such opportunities are vital if prisoners are to acquire the necessary skills and experience to make something of their lives, and Youthbuild has demonstrated that real jobs offer real protection against further involvement in crime.

Action for Children Scotland’s Youthbuild is a pre-vocational programme, which provides training and employment opportunities in the construction industry for disadvantaged young people aged 16 - 24, including those who have been in custody. There are currently three Youthbuild projects within the programme, with others planned for development. Action for Children Scotland is looking at the potential for developing a modern apprenticeship scheme within the organisation, which will lead to the development of further social care opportunities. The three existing Youthbuild projects work with a range of partner agencies to give young people work experience on local sites where they are building homes. These partners have included large construction companies, various housing associations such as Oak Tree, Cloch, Milnbank, and Govanhill, Glasgow City Council, Inverclyde Council, the European Social Fund and Scottish Enterprise.
In December 2007, an independent evaluation of the Youthbuild programme was commissioned. The evaluation confirmed that the Youthbuild programme had a 70-80% success rate across the three projects for helping young people move into employment following their involvement in the programme. Action for Children Scotland believes that the type of training provided by our Youthbuild projects should also be provided as part of community based disposals. Locking people up and failing to provide them with access to work and training opportunities, is denying many the opportunity to embrace rehabilitation. It is setting them up to re-offend. Introducing sentencing guidelines with a strong emphasis upon the need for more community based interventions can help to break the cycle of re-offending, and to address prison overcrowding which is undermining attempts at rehabilitating many prisoners. Action for Children Scotland would be willing to arrange a reporting visit by members of the Justice Committee to one of our Youthbuild projects if it would assist the Committee’s Stage 1 consideration of the Bill. We also attach further information about the Youthbuild project.

Action for Children Scotland welcomes the provisions in Section 38 of the Bill which will raise the age of criminal responsibility in Scotland to 12, and ensure that only the Children’s Hearings System will be able to deal with children under the age of 12 who have committed offences. The big challenge is for the Scottish Government, local authorities, the police, the voluntary sector and other key agencies to continue working together to break the cycle through which neglected children end up as the next generation of criminals. Action for Scotland believes it is vital that there should be a continuing focus on the care and welfare needs of children through the Children’s Hearings system, of which offending behaviour is often symptomatic. We consider that raising the age of criminal responsibility is one of the key steps necessary to deal with these issues on a more positive footing, the others being early intervention and intensive support to assist those who offend, or are at risk of offending, to address their behaviour, and to turn their lives around.

Action for Children Scotland strongly believes that children under 16 should only be remanded as a last resort. The provisions in the Bill are, therefore, a step in the right direction. Section 47 will ensure that children under 16, if not released on bail or ordained to appear, will be remanded to the local authority to be detained in secure accommodation or “a suitable place of safety”.

In terms of “suitable places of safety”, Action for Children Scotland operates a remand fostering service for young people who have offended, or are at risk of re-offending. Action for Children Scotland’s North Lanarkshire Youth Justice Fostering Service offers accommodation and support to young people by providing a short, structured and supported placement in a stable family environment as a positive alternative to being remanded in custody or in secure accommodation. The service has a proven track record in diverting vulnerable young people from crime, and from becoming more deeply entrenched in the criminal justice system. Against this background, Action for Children Scotland recommends that the Scottish Government and local authorities should give further consideration to the case for increasing the funding for, and availability of, remand foster placements to help reduce the number of young people in secure accommodation.

Written submission from the Scottish Centre for Crime and Justice Research

We are submitting this response as academics in law, criminology and philosophy, focusing on those aspects of the Bill where the evidence and approaches of these disciplines can offer insight. This response has been coordinated by the Scottish Centre for Crime and Justice Research, but has involved consultation and collaboration with other academic colleagues. We have commented on areas where we have knowledge and expertise but if time allowed would have covered more sections in greater depth. We would be happy to provide further evidence to the Committee if helpful.

We first present highlights summarising the main points of the commentary and organised by general topic. This is then followed by detailed comments on provisions in the Bill, section by section. Comments cover Parts 1, 2 and 3.

KEY POINTS

Sentencing
- Rational, principled and consistent sentencing provides the strongest ground for achieving penal aims of deterrence, rehabilitation and retribution, and so we support the Bill’s aspiration to create such a framework in Scotland.
- Achieving this aspiration would be assisted by organising the list of sentencing purposes under an overarching value. Examples of substantive values that might guide efforts include enhancing safety and promoting justice. An example of a procedural value is parsimony which would ensure against non-proportional sentencing and excessive punishment.
- The Sentencing Council has the potential to make sentencing practice more consistent and just, but this depends on its powers and how it is organised. Evidence around the world shows that if organised and run well, sentencing councils bring improvements and control to punishment, but if organised badly they can be worse than doing nothing at all by locking in a trend of penal expansion.

Community Payback
- The ability to reduce unnecessary use of prison will be directly tied to the credibility and effectiveness of non-prison punishments. Hence, community payback, as an organising concept and a specific disposal, plays a crucial role in the achievement of the Government’s plan to reform criminal justice.
- As a concept, the Bill should make the meaning of ‘payback’ more explicit to clarify that it can encompass reparative, rehabilitative and retributive aims. This will make it less susceptible to becoming an ineffective and stigmatising means of seeking revenge or of shaming individuals.

- As a disposal, its effectiveness will be improved by acting on the research evidence about how to increase both public support for community penalties and behavioural change in offenders. The two key factors are clarity (as to what a community punishment is) and speed (with which the order is made and fulfilled). This evidence suggests careful consideration and some re-drafting is required of provisions on conditions (to prevent ‘condition loading’), progress reviews, the role of Responsible Officers, and continuing to have separate community orders (like RLOs and DTTOs).

Use of Imprisonment

- The Bill’s aspiration to reduce the use of prison for short periods of detention is in keeping with everything the international and UK research tells us about short stays in prison; they consistently fail to achieve penal aims of deterrence and rehabilitation, and are more likely to increase crime than reduce it. An emerging body of evidence tells us that the safety of communities is better secured by low prison populations than by high ones.

- Scotland’s use of prison is characterised by many people serving numerous short sentences over the course of their lifetimes. Changing this pattern will be important for community safety and justice goals, but also amounts to a major change in penal culture.

- We have concerns about the ability of the Bill’s provisions to secure this important change. Judges need only to provide a list of reasons to deviate from the presumption against short sentences, and this is likely to provide an insufficient stimulus to change current practices.

Custodial Sentences and Weapons Act

- There is no research to support the case that CSaW’s implementation in its original or revised forms would reduce crime by released prisoners or enhance community safety. Implementation is certain, however, to entail significant amounts of money, staff time and prison space.

- The Scottish Prisons Commission considered CSaW thoroughly after looking at all the evidence and recommended that if implemented, it should apply only to sentences of two years or more. There has been no explanation or evidence to support the subsequent provision that it would be implemented for sentences of one year or more.

- The potential of this provision to contribute to growing prison numbers and to absorb resources better spent in the community means it would be prudent to tie its implementation, again as recommended by the Scottish Prisons Commission, to implementation and evidence of achievement of the Bill’s other recommendations on sentencing and imprisonment.
Serious and Organised Crime

- We welcome the focus on the most serious and high level participants in organised crime networks.
- The definition of ‘serious organised crime’ is set too broadly, however, which could lead to both over- and under-enforcement problems. The proposed definition does not capture either what is serious or what is organised about serious organised crime but rather would apply to crime that is comparatively organised.
- By not clearly defining the target of the legislation, law enforcement may be encouraged to focus on easy wins, thus going after less serious or strategic targets.
- We are also concerned that the definition of ‘involvement in serious crime’ does not actually require involvement and therefore raises a risk of over-inclusiveness.

Bail

- Remand is a main driver of penal expansion in Scotland, and reducing its use is a prerequisite to tackling high prison populations generally.
- Unfortunately, the Bill’s targeting of breaches of bail and police undertakings risks adding to both remand and short sentence prison populations.
- These provisions may have emerged from a welcome interest in improving the credibility of the criminal justice system and respect for the law, but they are not based on the research evidence establishing that breaches of bail are not typically the result of wilful disrespect for law but of limiting economic circumstances and highly disorganised lives.

Children and Young People

- Increasing the age of criminal responsibility and repeal of unruly certificates bring Scotland into line with European countries with demonstrated commitment to human rights.
- This measure accords with the research we have on the harms and criminogenic effects of institutionalising young people but there is scope to raise this further and fully decriminalise prosecution of children under 12.

Sexual Offences

- There has long been a lack of clarity in the law regarding sexual offending, and the Bill goes some way to clarifying the issues.
- The provisions relating to possession of extreme pornography raise concerns about definitions. In particular, there needs to be specific and detailed definitions of ‘possession’ and ‘extreme’.
- As with the definitional problems of the serious organised crime provisions, the lack of specificity can lead to an unclear focus for enforcement.
PART 1: SENTENCING

In addition to comments made below, we are aware of and in broad agreement with the submissions of Professor Neil Hutton of the University of Strathclyde, and the Scottish Consortium on Crime and Criminal Justice.

Section 1 Purposes and principles of sentencing

S1 (1) We welcome the clarification offered concerning the purposes of sentencing. However, the Bill could go further than it does. For example, the Bill’s provisions should make explicit that each of the stated purposes of sentencing should serve a larger purpose; i.e. the production of a more just and safer society for all of its citizens. This is important because it provides some basis on which to consider and determine the relationships between the purposes and principles listed at (a)-(e) and some means for choosing between them where they conflict. More generally, given the focus in other parts of this Bill on the importance of offenders’ paying back to victims and communities, explicit reference to the role for restorative justice and restorative practices here would strengthen the concept of community payback.

We concur fully with Prof Hutton's argument that, given the very qualified claims that justice systems can make in terms of their capacities to reduce crime, to deter, to rehabilitate and to protect, the principle of doing justice should be paramount; in this respect the notion of ‘limiting retributivism’ to which Prof Hutton alludes is key. Whatever its form and intent, the measures imposed on the offender must never exceed that which is justified by their offence. It may be for this reason, that the Prisons Commission separated sentencing into two stages: the level of penalty would be set at stage 1, and the form of the penalty would be set at stage 2. The Bill lacks similar clarity about this process, and ‘having regard’ to seriousness (under subsection 3(a)) is neither a sufficiently strong statement of the proper limits of punishment nor much of a barrier to disproportionate sentencing practices.

A much stronger and more explicit commitment to the principle of parsimony in the punishment of offenders seems to us to be a necessary addition to this crucial section of the Bill. The deprivations of liberty inherent in punishment represent the state’s most serious potential intrusions on the rights of its citizens. Though this may be a necessary evil, the recognition in liberal democracies that such intrusions are an evil entails a commitment to a parsimonious approach to punishment. This principle could be inserted between the current sections 1(1) and 1(2) and might be worded as follows:

‘A court, in sentencing an offender in respect of an offence, must impose the least burdensome sentence that is consistent with the purposes of sentencing in section 1(1).’
S1 (2) The court should be required or encouraged to state which principle(s) are most important in any given sentence. Otherwise, this subsection simply provides a menu.

S1 (5) Subsection 1(5) under Part I lists a number of circumstances when the purposes and principles can be ignored, including when the person was under 18 at the time of the offence and where the penalty is fixed in law. These exclusions are unnecessary because the statement of sentence purposes should apply to the sentencing of young people being prosecuted through the adult criminal justice system as well as to fixed penalty punishments, which are, after all, motivated by particular penal aims.

Sections 2-13 The Scottish Sentencing Council
We are in full agreement with Prof Hutton’s submission on these sections. In particular, we agree that comprehensive guidelines should be developed and published by the Council at its outset and not left to develop incrementally. The Bill’s aspiration to reduce unnecessary use of prison can only achieve so much through provision of new sentences; it relies as much on the coordination of the judiciary. Given this, the organisation and authority of the Sentencing Council is crucial to the realisation of the aims expressed in Part One of the Bill.

S7 (2) The Prison Commission was explicit on the need for any Sentencing Council to prioritise the clarification of the importance of several of its recommendations – most notably those relating to the use of imprisonment as a sanction and, more specifically, the use of sentences of six months and less. As presently drafted, at subsection 7(2), the Bill is not sufficiently explicit on the key question of when it is justified (or unjustified) for a judge to impose custodial sentences in general and to impose short sentences in particular. Without such clarity the presumption against (short) custodial sentences is aspirational at best and meaningless at worst.

Section 14 Community Payback Orders
The term ‘community payback’, introduced in the Prison Commission’s report, is a potentially useful one – but it carries some dangers too. The Commission was careful to define payback in constructive terms, perhaps being wary of developments in England and Wales where the same term has been used to refer to quite different developments that stress the visibly punishing aspects of community penalties rather than their positive potential. In order to avoid what some see as the punitive and vindictive connotations of the term ‘payback’, in our view the Bill would be enhanced by a more explicit adoption of the definition of the term provided by the Commission (Scottish Prison Commission 2008).

Such clarity would also help with a second problem which relates to public misunderstanding of the nature of payback. At present, the notion of offender’s paying back in the community is most closely associated with community service. There is a risk that the reform proposed in the Bill might mislead the public into thinking that all community payback orders involve unpaid work whereas in fact many of them may not include such conditions.

A single community sentence has appeal in being able to communicate more effectively with sentencers and with the public. However, realisation of this goal will be undermined by the decision to retain as separate orders both DTTOs and RLOs. It is not clear why these specific community penalties should not be subsumed as particular conditions or combinations of conditions within the community payback order. We know from research on public perceptions of community sanctions that one factor explaining low public (and possibly also judicial) support for such sanctions is the lack of understanding about what a community punishment actually entails (Maruna and King 2008). Multiplicity in the types and combinations of community sanctions contributes to confusion.

There is a danger of ‘condition-loading’, where judges offered a wide range of mix and match conditions for a generic community sentence tend to impose more conditions. The danger with this approach is that it may violate the principle of proportionality – exposing offenders to more onerous forms of payback than are merited by their crimes, thus potentially increasing the risks of default. For this reason, subsection 227A(3) should be amended to read:

‘In imposing a community payback order, a court must not impose conditions which, taken together, constitute a more burdensome penalty than is warranted by the seriousness of the offence.’

S14 Community Payback Order: Further Provision (section 227B(5) of 1995 Act)

We welcome the provisions under S227B(5) to retain the principle of the necessity of the offender’s consent to paying back in the community, although we note that in the Prison Commission’s report, this principle was limited to the rehabilitative elements of payback.

S14 Community Payback Order: Responsible Officer (section 227C(3) of 1995 Act)

We recognise the importance, as articulated in 227C(3), of the supervising officer’s duty to (actively) promote compliance. In order to further reflect the constructive character of payback, however, we would suggest that the officer should also be obliged ‘to provide such advice and assistance as may be required to support the offender’s rehabilitation, where such support is necessary’. It may be that such a duty is particularly relevant where a supervision requirement is imposed. This builds on the growing research on desistance, showing that supportive activities have a powerful effect.
on a person’s withdrawal from criminal activity (Scottish Prisons Commission 2008).

S14  Fine Defaulters (section S227M of 1995 Act)
We strongly support the provision requiring the court to use community payback as an alternative to custody for fine default.

S14  Programme Requirement (section 227P of 1995 Act)
Some reference should be made to the duty of the local authority in which the offender resides to ensure that programmes are in place for those sentenced to such requirements, or it should specify that such requirements can only be imposed where such provision exists. Otherwise there is a risk of offenders defaulting on court-imposed conditions through no fault of their own.

S14  Periodic Review of Community Payback Orders (section 227W of 1995 Act)
Under section 227W the provisions allow for the use of ‘progress reviews’. However, the use of the progress review is optional rather than mandatory, and the functions appear to rest within existing court structures. In our view this represents a missed opportunity. The Prisons Commission, based on clear evidence, highlighted that because the business of desisting from crime (and complying with both community supervision and the law in general) is complex and challenging for offenders, the management of that process might be better remitted to a court in which specially trained judges and court social workers could better support it. In our view, removing that function from already busy generic criminal courts and placing it within a more specialised progress court made considerable sense and merits re-examination.

S14  Breach of community payback order (section 227ZB of the 1995 Act)
Given the increasing weight of evidence that the process of desistance from offending typically involves lapses and setbacks, and the related widespread recognition of the need to manage compliance realistically and constructively, there may be merit in amending 227ZB(5). We know from the experience of the drug courts in this and other jurisdictions that in many cases the mere fact of being held to account in court before a judge for non-compliance is enough in itself to secure future compliance. There would therefore be merit in inserting a new section 227ZB(5)a that allowed the courts to warn the offender but allow the order to continue un-amended. In line the principle of parsimony, this is the first option that is considered. Also, in line with that principle, the section option would be varying the order but allowing it continue (currently 227ZB(5)c); the third option might be imposing a fine but allowing the order to continue (currently 227ZB(5)a); the final option would be discharging the order and imposing a new sentence (currently 227ZB(5)b). This re-ordering of the section would send a clearer and stronger message to the courts about the importance of seeking to manage compliance constructively.

Section 16 Short periods of detention
We support this provision which is consistent with the Bill’s general ambition to reduce the ineffective and costly use of prison for very short sentences.

Section 17 Presumption against short periods of detention or imprisonment
We strongly support the presumption against short periods of detention or imprisonment. The evidence is clear that short stays in prison are not effective for delivering programmes and facilitating behavioural change. It is also a very expensive way of punishing people for short periods of time, and limits the ability to direct resources more effectively. Evaluations of what works for offenders indicates very short sentences allow no opportunity for positive change while in prison and make it more likely the offender will have more, and more serious, problems within the criminal justice system and in the community (Maguire 1995, Gendreau 1999). Such sentences are also the key pressure towards overcrowding in Scotland (Scottish Prisons Commission 2008, Audit Scotland 2008).

It is difficult to know whether the Bill’s provisions will realise the aims expressed in this section. A major concern is whether it is enough simply to require that a judge lists reasons in the record for allowing a six month or shorter sentence. It may be over optimistic to expect that having to make a list is an adequate mechanism for encouraging individual sentencers to move away from a deeply entrenched culture of short prison sentences. Nor is making a list much of a burden to discourage this practice, and in any case there are many ways to get around the requirement, for example by issuing a custodial sentence of seven months.

Section 18 Custodial Sentences and Weapons Act (CSaW)
We have great reservations about CSaW being implemented at all, and could only begin to consider support for it if the minimum sentence was raised to two years (as recommended by the Scottish Prisons Commission). The financial memorandum to the Bill notes that implementing the bill with the one-year floor as proposed would increase the cost of the criminal justice system by £45.75 million annually.¹ Implementing the bill with a two-year floor would reduce this by over £13 million annually.

It is not simply the enormous costs of implementation that raise concern, but also the minimal return likely to be gained from its application. We are aware of no research in Scotland or internationally which supports the case for blanket pre-release risk assessment policies. On the other hand, there is a substantial research literature on the limited reliability and constraints of risk assessment, and there is plausible evidence, as submitted by the various agencies during the original consideration of these provisions, that implementation would significantly increase prison populations, costs and associated workloads.

The provisions of CSaW will tend to target less serious offenders, based on the shorter sentences they are serving, which reduces the capacity to focus on the most serious offenders. In this way, CSaW may have the effect of worsening current reoffending rates and community safety.

To limit the bill’s potentially disastrous consequences on criminal justice services, we urge that legislators consider:

- Dropping this provision entirely from the bill, or at the very least raising the minimum sentence to which it applies to two years, recognising the lack of research evidence on the effectiveness for community safety of these kinds of measures; AND,

- Create statutory provision that its implementation can only proceed once there has been an observable trend in reduced use of prison for short sentence prisoners.

PART 2: CRIMINAL LAW

Section 25-28 Serious organised crime

We broadly welcome these provisions in so far as they attempt to get to ‘backroom’ players who have traditionally evaded law enforcement by distancing themselves from frontline criminality. However, the effectiveness and fairness of these provisions will depend on them being targeted appropriately at key specialists and nominals who are involved at the top end of the seriousness scale. We are concerned that the definition of ‘serious organised crime’ is set too broadly and that we therefore run the risk of targeting the powers inappropriately and unjustly subjecting individuals to punishment. An equal danger would be that the breadth of the proposed powers discredits the legislation in the eyes of the public and the legal profession, leading to its under-utilisation.

If these provisions are to be effective, and appropriately targeted, then it is important that this definition is clear and sufficiently precise. In this connection we want to raise a number of issues:

i) The definition of ‘serious organised crime’ sets a very low threshold for what might constitute serious organised crime. Much of what would be captured by the definition given here is ‘crime that is comparatively organised’ not serious organised crime. This over-inclusive definition could potentially inflate the impression that there is a lot of serious organised crime. There is no standard UK definition of organised crime but there are various informal working definitions in use. Whilst such definitions may be appropriate in the context of policing, it is not appropriate for a statutory definition. Given the lack of a standard definition it seems inadvisable to frame legislation that introduces one that is so over-inclusive.
ii) The proposed definition does not capture either what is serious or what is organised about serious organised crime. The definition of seriousness is both over- and under-inclusive. Many indictable offences may be committed for material benefit without being part of organised crime as it is conventionally understood; and serious crimes might be committed by or within a criminal organisation without the intention of securing a material benefit for any person. The definition of organised (‘involving two or more persons’) would again capture a large amount of ‘normal’ criminal activity, without specifically targeting organised crime.

iii) It is not clear whether these new sections really add anything to existing offences such as conspiracy or incitement, or simply constitute a rather muddy overlap and ‘legislative creep’. To the extent that, for example, incitement or conspiracy may already be prosecuted under the common law, new provisions are not required unless they are going to reach behaviour which is beyond the reach of the existing criminal law (e.g. those who distance themselves from frontline criminality or direct criminal enterprises). By defining serious organised crime so broadly there is too much overlap with the common law, so it is hard to see what is gained by the new offences, unless it is to allow target setting – but then this opens up the dangers alluded to above.

iv) We would argue that it would be more appropriate to adopt a ‘high end’ definition of seriousness that creates clear water between ‘everyday’ criminality and ‘serious organised crime’. It would be preferable to reword the legislation to describe ‘involvement in the organisation of serious crime’.

v) The risk is that if organised crime is defined too widely this legislation will facilitate a repeat of what has happened in many areas of England and Wales under asset recovery legislation, where law enforcement in pursuit of asset recovery targets and cashback incentives have gone after easy wins, principally cash seizures from low level drug dealers. The targeting of these powers should be strategically steered through existing arrangements for assessing the threat posed by organised crime groups and prioritising law enforcement action towards those groups ranked as representing the greatest threat. Any performance measurement of national agencies or individual forces should continue to focus on their overall effectiveness to disrupt these prioritised groups and the nominals within them (which may partly be achieved through the use of these legislative powers).

S25 There is a mismatch here between the headnote (‘Involvement’) and the offence definition (‘a person who agrees to become involved’). While involvement in serious organised crime may be a serious offence, agreement to become involved is not the same as involvement. These should be recognised as two different types and levels of offence. If the latter is to be criminalised at all, it would be more appropriate to make this a lesser offence than involvement (and with a much lower penalty), to deter those who are thinking about involvement but who might yet be dissuaded. To define the offence in terms of agreement, moreover, is very inchoate and the person may not yet have committed any directly criminal actions, or may indeed change their mind. The offence is very similar to common law conspiracy, and is open to the same sort of criticisms.

This may be an appropriate aggravation to recognise in law, but the broad definition of ‘serious organised crime’ means that the aggravation can be too easily applied or proved – particularly given the proposal in s.26(4) to relax the requirement of corroboration in relation to proof of the aggravation. In fact, given the potential severity of the penalty it is not clear why this requirement is being relaxed, or that the relaxation is justified.

S27

We accept that there may be a problem in prosecuting individuals at the top of criminal networks who use others to commit criminal acts on their behalf (s.27(1) & (2)). The definition of ‘directing’ in s.27(3) contains appropriate safeguards. It is appropriate that some actions on the part of the accused person must be proven (though this may make it hard to prove the involvement of the ‘high level’ actors the provision is aimed at. It should also be clear that subsections a) to c) are cumulative i.e. that the Crown must prove a) that the person has done something, and b) that they intended this to persuade a person to commit an offence, and c) that they intended it to result in the commission of a crime or to enable the commission of a crime.

S28

We have serious reservations about the provisions of this section, which seem unworkable and disproportionate. We would argue that they are unworkable because the requirement to report a suspicion is simply too broad and vague. Many people may have a suspicion about the criminal activities of others but may be scared to report such suspicions to the police. Alternatively it is not obvious how clear or certain a suspicion should be before it gives rise to the duty to report. The approach taken here exposes people to the risk of prosecution. This risk may be limited to the extent that the section is aimed at those with specific relationships with professional criminals, however there may still be problems. It is not clear how close a ‘close personal relationship’ should be before it gives rise to the duty or what kind of material benefit should have been derived – or even if the person need be aware of the material benefit. In the case of professional relationships it may be more expedient to work with the various professional standards bodies to tighten up the existing codes on the reporting of suspicious client activity with resort to criminal law only as a last resort. The section is disproportionate because the burden to report has a heavy penalty attached. Either a person is complicit in some way, in which case they should be prosecuted as such, or they are not. If we must have failure to report provisions, they should be a much more minor offence.

SCCJR generally welcomes the introduction of these provisions which formulate an offence of possession of extreme pornographic material.

The formulation of the s.34 offence of possession of extreme pornography avoids some of the inconsistencies contained in the offence legislated in the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 (s.63), while adopting a broadly similar legal regime.

We particularly welcome the extension of the definition of extreme pornography to cover images of rape and other non-consensual penetrative sexual activity. We also welcome the fact that Scotland has chosen not to follow the route adopted similar legislation in England & Wales, which makes a distinction between ‘violent’ rape and rape in general.

S34 (1) Extreme Pornography (section 51 of 1982 Act)

For reasons of clarity, we feel it would be better if the provisions were to clearly define the meaning of possession. Since, as is acknowledged in the policy memorandum, this is aimed at material produced and distributed in electronic form, it is important to be specific about what amounts to possession in these circumstances. Viewing an image online means that it is downloaded and (usually) stored on the hard drive of the computer of the viewer. Does possession extend to all images cached on the computer hard-drive? Would this require that the person have a subjective understanding that such images are stored? Should possession extend to cases where an individual has deleted the image, though it may still be recovered with specialist software (if the person possesses the requisite capability)? Alternatively is it intended that the possession should extend to all images stored on a computer, even if the accused person is unaware of this?

Will it cover those people who access pornography without downloading files? Although the provisions do not criminalise accidental or single viewing, should it not also cover repeated viewings of this type of material, whether or not the material was actually downloaded?

S34(2) Extreme Pornography (section 51A of 1982 Act)

Our concerns about the definition of ‘extreme’ are based on the following observations:

a) An act which threatens a person’s life. This may include sadomasochistic activity such as asphyxiation, where the intention of those involved is not to threaten or endanger life. It may, on this basis, be too broad;
b) The term ‘severe injury’ is left undefined, and is accordingly vague.

Consideration should be given to amending it to:

‘an act which results, or threatens to result, in a person’s severe injury.’

The use of ‘threatens to’ instead of ‘likely to’ would increase the proposal’s scope to cover all acts of rape which could all be said to threaten severe injury but may not result in severe injury.

Serious consideration should be given to extending the definition of extreme to include depictions of incest (which may not be covered by depictions of rape and non consensual penetrative sexual activity which fit the definition of obscene and pornographic).

As the Bill is currently written, to meet the requirement of ‘extreme’, the material in question must be explicit and realistic. The terms ‘explicit’ and ‘realistic’ require that the act depicted in the image must be clearly seen, lifelike and convincing and appear to a reasonable person to be real. It is not required that the act itself is real.

There is a missed opportunity in not including non-photographic representations of extreme acts. It means, for example, that the provisions as they stand will not cover depictions of extreme pornography on virtual worlds such as Second Life, where the pornography is violent, extreme and interactive, but where the images are not photographic.

S34(2) Extreme Pornography (section 51A of 1982 Act)

In terms of the Act, extreme pornographic material must be all of the following:

(a) obscene
(b) pornographic
(c) extreme

It is not clear why images should need to be both obscene and pornographic. The second would surely include the first. Moreover, only the term ‘pornographic’ is defined in the Act (i.e. ‘if it is of such a nature that it must reasonably be assumed to have been made solely or principally for the purpose of sexual arousal’).

Presumably the intention is that the existing law will be followed on the meaning of ‘obscene’. There is no definition of obscene, but courts apply a common law test of whether the material is ‘calculated to deprave or corrupt persons open to depraving or corrupting’. The test of ‘obscene’ means that the material must be of such a nature that it would fall within the category of the material whose sale etc. is already prohibited under s51 of the 1982 Act, but given that this controls the sale and distribution (and visibility) of certain materials it is surely not relevant to the definition here.

S34 (2)  Extreme Pornography: Defences (section 51C of 1982 Act)
It is a defence that the person did not keep the material for a unreasonable time, but this depends on the meaning of possession, which is not defined. If the broad definition is followed (unknowingly storing), then this defence would become meaningless in many instances.

PART 3: CRIMINAL PROCEDURE

Section 38 Prosecution of Children (section 41A of 1995 Act)
Currently, Scotland has one of the lowest ages (8 years) of criminal responsibility in Europe. The law as it currently stands allows children from the age of 8 to 16 to be prosecuted in the criminal justice system. This is considered by many to be too low and contrary to international standards. The Bill proposes to raise the age at which children can be prosecuted in the adult courts from eight to 12, whilst retaining the existing rule that children under 8 are presumed not to be guilty of any offence. We generally welcome the Bill’s intention to raise the age at which children can be prosecuted, although there is scope to raise it still further.

The provisions in the Bill are an attempt to demonstrate adherence to international principles and standards and will bring Scots law more into line with jurisdictions across Europe. The UNCRC (1989) states that signatory states shall seek to promote “the establishment of a minimum age below which children shall be presumed not to have the capacity to infringe the penal law.” In 2007, the UN Committee monitoring compliance with the UNCRC published a General Comment that the minimum acceptable age at which children should be held accountable for their actions before full (adult) criminal justice proceedings should not be lower than twelve in any member state. The Beijing Rules - the United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Administration of Juvenile Justice (1985) – state that the age should not be too low, taking account of emotional, mental and intellectual maturity. They stress the well-being of the young person as paramount in decision-making as well as the importance of the independence of prosecutors in promoting diversion from criminal proceedings for those under 18 years. Their official commentary indicates that there should be a close relationship between the age of criminal responsibility and the ages at which young people acquire other civil and marital status. The Tokyo Rules (1990) set standards for non-custodial measures for young people, and; the Vienna Guidelines (1997) stress the rights of the child in criminal justice and endorse the development of child-focused youth justice.

The introduction of the restriction on prosecution of children under 12 implements the main recommendations of the Scottish Law
Commission’s report (Report on Age of Criminal Responsibility 2002), yet falls short of the recommendation to abolish the existing conclusive presumption in relation to under 8 year olds. The age of criminal responsibility requires not to be set so low that children who do not have the necessary understandings are routinely criminalised. The Bill proposes that 8 years would be retained as the age below which children are incapable of committing crime; 12 would be introduced as the age below which children can no longer be prosecuted and 16 would remain as the (usual) age of automatic referral to the adult system. The only difference, then, is the inability to prosecute those children aged eight, nine, ten and eleven.

The provisions propose that, whatever the offence committed, a child under the age of 12 can only be dealt with by the Children’s Hearings System (CHS), a more age-appropriate system. The CHS can, in principle, decriminalise young people whilst simultaneously dealing with their offences under compulsory measures. The CHS has a commitment to the paramountcy principle up to 16 years; thereafter young people aged 16 and 17 are routinely dealt with in the adult criminal justice system.

Currently, although Scots law allows for the prosecution of children under 12, no child can be prosecuted without the explicit guidance of the Lord Advocate, whose policy is not to prosecute children where it can be avoided. Yet, it is claimed that around 20 young people under the age of 13 have been prosecuted in criminal courts over the past five years (Whyte, 2009: 202). As long as Scots law allows for the prosecution of children under the age of 12, it will remain a possibility which will continue to contravene international standards.

The Bill would also allow samples (e.g. fingerprints, mouth swabs) obtained from children to be retained, in certain circumstances, where the offence ground is established at a Children’s Hearing. Children aged eight and over could still be referred to the CHS on the offence ground. The immunity from prosecution thus conferred is not quite the same as decriminalisation.

Section 41 Breach of an undertaking
This creates a new offence of ‘breach of an undertaking’ for which it will be possible to receive a sentence of imprisonment.

We strongly object to Section 41 and believe it would be mistaken to think that it is a minor change which has the limited aim of providing a parallel offence to breach of bail. It requires much more careful scrutiny because it:

i) Has not been exposed to a consultative process. The Policy Memorandum to the Bill states incorrectly that this provision was included in proposals presented by the Revitalising Justice Report, and that no responses to this consultation were received. Revitalising Justice contains no reference to criminalising breaches of undertakings, and the Bill itself appears to be the first time this proposal appears.

ii) Removes the rationale for having a system of undertaking in the first place. Police liberation on an undertaking allows for the more efficient use of criminal justice time and resources by allowing police to divert less serious incidents out of the formal bail process. Creating the offence of breach of an undertaking makes it more formal, providing for more serious consequences, thus eliminating the conceptual distinction between bail and undertaking approaches. If consistency is the most important value, it would be more consistent to eliminate undertakings and require all arrests to be processed through the standard bail procedure. This implication emphasises the need of also valuing parsimony and proportionality.

iii) Has a dangerous and costly net-widening potential. The provision may have been motivated by a desire to keep arrestees out of the bail (and remand) system, but by hardening what happens at the softer end of the criminal justice system is ‘uptariffing’ arrestees and increasing the chances of their future long-term criminal justice entrenchment by creating more ways to lengthen criminal histories. This will make it more likely they will be treated harshly in future contacts with the system, being more likely to be remanded into custody and to receive custodial sentences. The more contact a person has with the criminal justice system, the more likely they are to have long-term contact with the system. As we have learned with Scotland’s current excessive use of short sentences, this carries major costs to Government and taxpayers, in addition to its harmful effects on integrated and safe communities.

iv) Is not supported by the evidence of what we know works. Government commissioned research on the use of powers to aggravate sentences for those whose offences were committed on bail shows some troubling results. Brown et al. (2004) found that this option was taken up in widely inconsistent ways by different courts and even by different judges in the same court, and was never used for sentences of probation (non-custodial sentences being most likely for the kinds of offences for which a suspect is liberated on an undertaking).

v) Undermines the Bill’s overall aim of reducing the use of prison for people serving very short sentences. The permissibility of a sentence of imprisonment (inserted section 22ZA(2)(b)) for a person who has breached an undertaking directly goes against the Bill’s larger aspiration to reduce the use of short sentences in Scotland. How would the enforcement of this provision fit with the presumption against short sentences? Allowing short sentences of imprisonment for people convicted of this offence would create yet another exception to the rule, undermining the vision to end Scotland’s use of prison for less serious offenders.

While the section deals with a technical issue, allowing for the streamlined amendment of complaints to include a failure to appear, it goes to the larger issue of policing breaches of bail in ways that increase the numbers of people falling into the criminal justice system’s ‘nets’. Breach of bail has become the central focus for those concerned about respect for criminal justice agencies. While further offending committed while on bail now can result in an aggravated offence charge, ‘technical’ violations of bail conditions can be prosecuted as separate offences. Along with Section 41, we urge careful consideration of how such provisions might be expected to (a) improve compliance with bail conditions, or (b) increase respect by accused for the courts and other justice agencies.

There is no research suggesting that either of these aims has or is likely to be achieved in practice. The Government’s own commissioned research (Brown et al. 2004) found highly inconsistent use of the power to aggravate offences committed while on bail, showing ambivalence among those whose position the law is designed to support.

Of equal concern is the growing number of ways that there is criminalisation by status exemplified by breach offences: in other words, we are seeing the criminalisation of behaviour based primarily on who you are, rather than what you do. An accused can go to prison for failing to make a telephone call, a behaviour which is perfectly legal for anyone else.

The Bill covers a diverse range of issues, and in the technical detail of sections such as this, we observe an emerging patchiness where the overarching ambition to reform Scotland’s criminal justice system and link it more explicitly to a notion of a just society is being subtly undermined by a range of provisions that ostensibly are meant to be ‘tidying’ changes to the law.

Section 47 Remand and committal of children and young persons
These provisions will end the system of ‘unruly certificates’ under which accused children can be kept in adult prisons. The number of ‘unruly certificates’ received have been increasing in recent years (e.g. in 2006/07 there were 33 compared with 28 in 2005/06). In 2006/07, 15 year olds made up the majority of children held on unruly certificates. But close attention needs to be paid to the potential implications of these changes and, in particular the provision of suitable accommodation for children within local authorities. However, we fully welcome the policy objectives of trying to ensure that children do not suffer the adverse effects of being remanded in adult prisons. There is strong evidence that young people who enter the adult criminal justice system at an early stage get sucked into a repeat cycle of conviction and quickly become ‘uptariffed’ by sentencers who get frustrated by the lack of alternative options (Edinburgh Study of Youth Transitions and Crime 2009). In the most recent Edinburgh Study findings, it was found that young people who were convicted to a period of detention below the age of 22 had been sentenced to – on average – 4.4 separate periods of custody each (with one individual serving 21 separate custodial sentences).

Written submission from the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency

I refer to correspondence dated 13 March 2009 in connection with the above subject from Mr Andrew Proudfoot, Scottish Parliament, Justice Committee and would make the following comments. My observations are restricted to those parts of the Bill which I consider to have the most significant relevance to the SCDEA and for ease of reference those comments are outlined below. I am aware that the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland (ACPOS) have also been invited to make comment in respect of the Bill's provisions.

You may also wish to be aware that previous submissions, dated 12 February 2009 in connection with the provisions of the Bill, relating to RIPA and RIP(S)A, was forwarded to your colleague Mr Graham Waugh. A copy of that correspondence is attached for your consideration.

Part 1 – Sentencing – Drug Treatment requirement – amendments to the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 section 227

Part 1 – Sentencing – Alcohol Treatment requirement – amendments to Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 section 227

The provisions proposed in connection with both Drug Treatment and Alcohol Treatment are supported and we have no further comment to make.

The introduction of the offences in connection with serious organised crime, under Part 2 of the Bill, are welcomed, however the following observations in regards to each of the individual sections is intended to seek clarity on the intentions outlined.

Section 25 (1) introduces the offence that ‘A person who agrees with at least one other person to become involved in serious organised crime commits an offence’. It is unclear as to how such an agreement between two or more people will be proved to the satisfaction of the court.

Guidance on the standard of evidence or information required establishing such an agreement, including what will in itself provide evidence of or at least an inference of agreement between the accused to be involved in serious organised crime, would be welcomed.

Were an accused to state, in defence of their activity that their ‘agreement’ was secured under duress or coercion then this would provide an opportunity for the offence to be incomplete, even where such duress or coercion had not in actual fact occurred.
Where an accused’s actions provide evidence of complicity in the commission of a serious offence this factor should be taken into account when establishing the extent of ‘agreement’ between the accused and thereby refuting any possible defence. Perhaps the word ‘agrees’ is too limiting when establishing the intended conduct of the accused and should be reconsidered with perhaps a phrase such as ‘…allows themselves to become involved in…’ would be more appropriate.

The subsection should also perhaps make clear whether or not it is a necessary element of the offence that at least two persons need to be identified as parties to the agreement before the offence itself is complete. What, for instance, will constitute ‘involvement’ and will the extent of that ‘involvement’ have a bearing on whether an accused is proceeded against on indictment or on summary procedure?

Whilst it may be possible for evidence relating to the lifestyle of one or more individuals to be presented to show that an accused’s standard of living is not commensurate with their established legitimate income, this in itself may be insufficient to establish involvement in serious organised crime, but should be a contributing factor to be considered when examination of the accused’s activities is undertaken.

Section 25(2) introduces definitions for the terms ‘serious organised crime’ and ‘serious offence’ Section 25(2) (a) provides that one of two conditions must be met before a serious offence is committed. It would be preferable if the term ‘serious offence’ applied to any crime capable of being indicted which would enable instances of minor crime, motivated by serious organised crime, to be dealt with more effectively and provide the mechanisms through which those involved in pursuing their activity through acts of violence and intimidation can be brought to justice.

Section 25(2) (b) introduces the reference to ‘…an act of serious violence…’ It is unclear what would constitute an act of serious violence. As alluded to earlier those involved in organised crime may achieve their objectives through fear and intimidation without necessarily resorting to serious violence, albeit it is acknowledged that violence may well occur. The use of the term appears to be unnecessarily restrictive and should be widened to include any behaviour which is used to further the activity of organised crime.

Section 26 introduces offences aggravated by connection with serious organised crime and these provisions are generally welcomed.

Section 27 – 28 introduce offences of both directing serious organised crime (section 27) and failing to report serious organised crime (section 28). Whilst acknowledging the privileges of client confidentiality and the right of a suspect to seek legal advice when potentially facing charges connected to serious organised crime, it appears that the offences created under section 1 subsections (1) and (2), are ineffective in those circumstances where an organised crime group employs the services of a solicitor or other legal adviser to further its own criminal activity or indeed in some other way attempt to legitimise its activity through legal instruments. By virtue of the defence afforded under subsections (4) and / or (5) a legal adviser could continuously evade prosecution.

It would be of greater effect if this subsection also contained provision to make it an offence on the part of the legal adviser to withhold information of a type that would reasonably cause the legal adviser to suspect that the provision of the information or advice was to enable an individual or group to evade detection from committing a serious offence or to conceal their involvement in serious organised crime.

This subsection should also make it clear that to aid or abet the commission of serious organised crime would be an indictable offence, punishable by a significant period of imprisonment.

It is recognised that the provisions provide for the evidence of single witnesses (or equivalent) to be taken into account collectively to help establish a prima facie case e.g. evidence against an accused spread across violence, drug trafficking, money laundering, etc, albeit insufficient to secure a conviction for any individual component crime may be sufficient to prove the new offences and this is welcomed.

In particular, as greater understanding of the scale and extent of serious organised crime is achieved through the Scottish Serious Organised Crime Mapping Project these provisions would have most impact if they were capable of being applied retrospectively in a similar fashion to provisions under the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002, albeit it would be entirely appropriate that a limit on how far, in retrospect, such offences would be considered, would apply.

Taking into account the need for reasonableness and proportionality, the legislation would be much more impactful if it empowered investigators to identify and consider retrospective evidence, otherwise, we will need to watch and wait for the criminals to reoffend

Part 2 – Criminal Law – Articles Banned in Prison – section 29

This provision is fully supported and the classification of mobile phones as banned articles within the prison environment is acknowledged as a very positive step against those who continue to be criminally active whilst serving a custodial sentence or on remand.

Part 2 – Criminal Law – Indecent Images of Children – sections 33 – 34

Members of the SCDEA Crime Unit have had the opportunity to contribute to earlier debate on the provisions proposed under sections 33 – 34 of the Bill. Section 34 inserts into the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 sections 51A, 51B and 51C which relate to Extreme Pornography and the offence of possession of extreme pornography.
The definition of an ‘extreme image’ presents practical difficulties. The use of the terminology “depicts, in an explicit and realistic way” would seem to include all images where such acts are depicted but are subsequently shown to have been staged or acted out. For example a realistic depiction of a rape or sexual murder, which is undoubtedly pornographic but where the “victim” is shown to have suffered no harm and to have been a willing participant in actions depicted, would appear to be included in the definition.

Thus for a forensic examiner or investigating officer the question is not whether the acts depicted, actually resulted in any physical harm to any individual, or whether rape, sexual activity with a corpse or bestiality has actually taken place, but whether the depiction is pornographic, explicit and realistic.

Furthermore, and again from a practical point of view, it is easier to see how such determinations may be possible from viewing moving images but it would be far more difficult and perhaps impossible in some cases, to reach competent conclusions based on this legislation where single images of the relevant activities are depicted.

Finally, the effect upon officers and professionals who are required to view indecent material involving children is starting to be documented and understood. Staff welfare measures are in place but the effect on staff having to view, what are, by definition, explicit extreme pornographic images can only be estimated, and perhaps early discussions with and involvement of relevant health professionals during such enquiries with a view to mitigating potential problems in this area should be catered for within the legislation.

In addition there may be too many opportunities for uncertainty as to whether or not a particular image may fall into the definition, given both the nature of the offence and the potential defences available under sections 51B and 51C.

The inclusion of a ‘tracing’ of a photograph or pseudo in the definition of an indecent photograph is a reasonable extension to existing legislation and assists in clarifying previous confusion around the definition of a pseudo-photograph.

Part 2 – Criminal Law – People Trafficking – section 35

The proposed amendments to the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003 and the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc) Act 2004, as introduced by Section 35, are seen as very positive measures which strengthen the existing provisions and are welcomed.

Part 3 – Criminal procedure – Disclosure – section 52

Comments in regard to the disclosure generally are outlined later in this response.

Section 66 introduces into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, witness anonymity orders under section 271N – 271Y. These provisions are generally welcomed. The ability to protect the identity of witnesses who play a key role in the administration of justice, from both ends of the spectrum whether it involves undercover police officers or general members of the public, helps to provide an increased confidence in the justice system and foster public reassurance that there is a safer and stronger Scotland.

However there are a number of issues associated with these provisions which cause concern and are highlighted below for further consideration.

Section 271N Witness anonymity orders

The introduction of witness anonymity orders is supported however it would appear that where the court have considered an appropriate application (section 271P), which satisfies the conditions for making an order (section 271Q), the terms of section 271N subsection (5) could potentially expose a witness, who satisfies the foregoing criteria, but who stands before a jury constituted by local residents to be identified because in respect of section 271N the court is not authorised to require that the witness is screened from the jury or indeed an interpreter. This is unlikely to ensure that the witness is sufficiently satisfied that their identity will not be revealed either during the trial or at a later stage and may defeat the object of seeking the order in the first place.

Under subsection (5) (a) (i) the witness may be seen by ‘the judge or other members of the court’. This presumably will include the defence agent representing the accused and whilst it is recognised that in the majority of occasions this would not in itself present any issue, there may be occasions where the very fact that the witness can be identified by the legal team defending the accused, may compromise the safety of the witness and necessary provision requires to be taken of such potential. Furthermore there appear to be no provision for the protection of the witness from an accused who conducts his or her own defence.

It would be preferable that the section stipulate that where the court, having considered the application and granted the order, ensures that the witness benefits from the facility of giving evidence from within a screened area, perhaps visible only to the trial judge.

Section 271Q Conditions for making orders

This section specifies the conditions which must be present before the court may consider making witness anonymity order. The conditions are outlined in subsections (3) to (6) with further matters which may be taken into account by the court outlined in subsection (7).
It appears that all the conditions must be met before the court may give the application consideration. Furthermore the court is entitled to take Relevant Considerations, as outlined in section 271R into account. Is it the case therefore, that if any or part of a condition is not met, the fact that the remaining conditions are met would be irrelevant, by virtue of the wording of section 271Q (2)? If this is the case then it may have significant repercussions for the Crown, in some cases to proceed.

Furthermore the Bill states that the court may make an order only if it is satisfied that Conditions A to D are met. Condition D states that

(a) the witness would not testify if the proposed order were not made, or

(b) there would be real harm to the public interest if the witness were to testify without the proposed order being made.

It would appear however, from the way in which this condition is framed, that it may present a barrier to those willing witnesses who may be denied anonymity only because they are willing to testify. The following scenario is presented by way of an example.

A member of the public, who has no connection to the crime or accused, observes the commission of a serious crime. This crime is committed by a known member of an Organised Crime Group. The witness however, is prepared to testify but given the previous knowledge of the suspect or those with whom the suspect is criminally connected, the police are of the opinion that it would be in the interests of the safety of the witness that their identity was concealed to the suspect.

It would appear that an application for a witness anonymity order would be unavailable to the police or the Crown because of the wording of this condition. The only avenue available may be for such a witness to go into Level 1 protection. This leads to their complete relocation, change of job, minimal family contact and severing of ties with friends. Such a restriction may ultimately lose the cooperation of the witness, unduly influence the standard of the evidence subsequently presented to the court and ultimately lead to the ends of justice being defeated.

In such circumstances it is submitted that there may be a disproportionate effect on the witness’s Article 8 rights and that their interests could be better served by anonymity? Therefore, is the condition outlined at paragraph (a) too high a test to be satisfied for the order to be granted?

In terms of paragraph (b), it is unclear what would be considered 'real harm to the public interest' and would the circumstances outlined above, where a willing witness is not afforded anonymity in the appropriate circumstances, potentially lead to such real harm occurring.

Under the provisions of section 271Q (7), the court in determining whether the measures to be specified in the order are necessary for the purpose mentioned in subsection (3)(a), the court must have regard in particular to any reasonable fear on the part of the witness—

(a) that the witness or another person would suffer death or injury, or
(b) that there would be serious damage to property,

What may be a reasonable fear on the part of one witness may not be on the part of another witness in the same circumstances therefore without any definition of what may be considered reasonable there may be considerable differences applied by the courts.

The reported case R (A) others v Lord Saville of Newdigate (Widgery Soldiers) 2002/WLR/1249, 1261 reflected that the courts should consider the subjective fears of the witness balanced with the objective assessment of the threat. Subsequent decisions have also reflected on the courts responsibility to consider the potential effect on the witness’s health. Such issues have to be balanced with the level of threat; this threat has to approach the threshold of impacting on witness’s rights under Article 2 of the European Convention on Human Rights

Consequently clarification and guidance on what is ‘reasonable’ would be valuable. Whilst it is recognised that decisions of the courts in England and Wales may only be persuasive and therefore not binding on Scottish courts, they may provide a suitable point from which appropriate guidance could be provided to enable relevant information to be provided for the court’s consideration.

Section 271Q (7) (b) requires the court to have regard to any reasonable fear on the part of the witness that there may be ‘…serious damage to property’ if the witness were identified.

Whilst the rationale for inclusion of this subsection is understood it is more likely that the courts would consider the potential impact on an accused’s rights under Article 6 in granting an witness anonymity order and where the potential justification for granting the order may rest on the witness’s reasonable fear of serious damage to property (his or anyone else’s) it is likely that the court would favour the accused right to a fair trial over the likely damage to property.

Section 271R Relevant Considerations

Subsection 2(f) provides that the court must have regard to whether it would be reasonably practicable to protect the witness’s identity by any means other than by making a witness anonymity order specifying the measures that are under consideration by the court.

This would apply to Level 1 protection and it is submitted that the considerations outlined under 271Q can be equally applied.

A concern would have to be that the courts consider that witness anonymity is the final option and only contemplated where all others have been exhausted.

In the example given above, the witness’s Article 8 rights would need to be considered with equal weight to the accused’s rights under Article 6. If this was favourably assessed by the courts, anonymity would prevent an entire family being relocated.

In the 6 month trial of the emergency legislation in England and Wales 346 witnesses from 137 cases were referred to the Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) by the police for consideration of witness anonymity orders.

The CPS subsequently applied for orders for 135 witnesses of which 129 were granted with only 6 refused. Such figures would tend to support the genuine need for the legislation.

The concept of Investigation Anonymity Orders is also worthy of consideration due to the growing intrusive nature of journalism serving the public’s insatiable appetite for “gangster” stories. In “gangland” murders involving Organised Crime Groups (OCG’s) witnesses can often be exposed through the efforts of investigative journalists. Such reporting can act as a strong deterrent for potential witnesses who would otherwise engage with the police. If an Investigative Anonymity Order was put in place this would safeguard the interests of witnesses prior to proceedings becoming “live.”

A parallel can be drawn with the provisions of s 86 of Serious Organised Crime and Policing Act 2005, which makes a specific offence of revealing details of a witness involved in a witness protection programme

Part 5 – Criminal Justice – Part 2A – Data Matching – section 26B + C (RIPA provisions)

The provisions outlined in this part of the Bill are fully supported and we have no further comment to make

Part 5 – Criminal Justice – Grant of authorisations for directed and intrusive surveillance – sections 77 - 79

The provisions of the Bill outlined within sections 77 – 79 are acknowledged as meeting the needs of the SCDEA in respect of authorising activity within joint operations in Scotland and are welcomed. In affording the Deputy Director General the same level of authority as that currently held by the Director General with regard to applications made under Part III of the Police Act 1997 and Intrusive Surveillance within RIP(S)A, the provisions recognise the importance of the need for resilience at Senior Authorising Officer level within the SCDEA and are welcomed.
Part 5 Criminal Justice – Sharing information with anti-fraud organisations - Section 71 and 83

The provisions outlined in Section 71 amend the Serious Crime Act 2007 sections 68, 69 and 71 which had previously led to Scottish specific legislation being outwith the scope of the 2007 Act. These amendments are welcomed.

Section 83 addresses the issue of providing clarity as to who can actually apply for a Financial Reporting Order. In the original legislation, this was silent which caused some confusion as to whether the prosecutor could make a request, or if it had to come from the Court. This amendment is fully supported.

Part 6 – Disclosure – sections 85 – 116 and Schedule 3

The introduction of the provisions relating to disclosure present some significant challenges for the SCDEA and the wider Scottish police service.

The steering group, comprising representatives of the Scottish police forces, Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal’s Service (COPFS), Her Majesty’s Revenue and Customs (HMRC), the Serious Organised Crime Agency (SOCA) and Scottish Government was established to progress those recommendations including creation of a manual of guidance regarding disclosure.

In relation to criminal investigations the disclosure of relevant material to COPFS will be implemented in advance of the introduction of the legislation itself. The SCDEA, in partnership with COPFS has already begun to identify resources to lead on matters such as compliance and training.

Whilst it is acknowledged that until the legislation is completely introduced the full impact is difficult to quantify, it is of serious concern that the demand brought about by the provisions will put a significant strain on the already stretched resources of the SCDEA.

An initial assessment of the number of persons who would perform the role of Revelation/Disclosure Officer was set at 10. This would provide a spread of experience and support to the various business units across geographic locations within the SCDEA. Preferably this role would be performed by suitably trained members of police staff, as this would have a cost saving when compared to the employment of Police Officers. However, from further research with similar law enforcement partners, such as SOCA and given the complexity and prolonged nature of SCDEA investigations, where large enquiries would require more than 1 Disclosure Officer for resilience purposes, it is considered that as many as 15 persons may be required to fulfil organisational legislative requirements.

Were it necessary to fund police officers to fulfil this requirement it is estimated that annual costs would amount to approximately £975,000 (based on average annual on costs of £65,000 per officer), or if police staff were to be employed to fulfil the role then the indicative annual costs would amount to £525,000, based upon average annual on cost of £35,000 per person).

Either way it is likely that these resources would need to be found from within the existing establishment and budget which would have a detrimental impact upon front line operational activity.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs

I write on behalf of Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs (HMRC) to offer our views on the stated purposes of the Criminal Justice & Licensing (Scotland) Bill and on the extent to which improvements can be expected from the Bill’s proposed measures.

Many of the provisions, in streamlining criminal procedure or improving the criminal justice system generally, will offer benefits to HMRC law enforcement.

Two parts of the Bill will impact most directly on HMRC: Part 2, Serious and Organised Crime and Part 6, Disclosure. Below, we draw your attention to the specific issues in respect of which HMRC Criminal Investigation wish to comment.

Part 2 – Serious Organised Crime

We welcome these provisions which will enhance HMRC’s ability to target serious organised criminals. We are satisfied that the definition of “serious crime” includes the principal types of offending with which HMRC is concerned in relation to serious organised crime.

We note that clause 28(7) has not extended the definition of “constable” in clause 28(3) to an officer of HMRC where the serious organised crime concerned relates to a matter in respect of which HMRC has functions. We think it should, as the obvious route for reporting tax-related offending in particular would be to HMRC directly. It would seem to us to be wrong in such cases for a person to be criminalised for reporting to HMRC instead of the police.

Part 6 – Disclosure

We welcome the creation of a statutory framework for disclosure. Disclosure can be a challenging issue for HMRC because of the size and complexity of many of the criminal cases we deal with, as well as the size and variety of functions HMRC performs. We believe a statutory scheme will lend clarity and focus to this complex area of our duties.

We note that the requirement to submit schedules will extend to HMRC only when the Scottish Ministers so prescribe in terms of clause 86(9)(b). Likewise, the code of practice to be issued by the Lord Advocate in terms of clause 114 would require to be applied specifically to HMRC. Provided HMRC can been allowed to contribute meaningfully to the development of the code of practice, and that full account is taken of any concerns and comments HMRC raises during the drafting process, we would not anticipate any difficulty in HMRC agreeing to have regard to the code.

We consider that there could be advantage to including the requirement to submit schedules in the code of practice rather than in primary legislation, as currently proposed. This would allow greater flexibility by enabling the Lord Advocate to respond quickly to changing requirements and circumstances.

From HMRC’s perspective the distinction drawn in the Bill between “sensitive” and “highly sensitive” for the purposes of schedule preparation is neither necessary nor helpful. However, if the distinction is to remain, we note that the Bill does not define what is meant by ‘highly sensitive’ in clause 86(6). We believe this risks confusion and inconsistent application.

We hope this is helpful. HMRC would like to contribute to the progression of the Bill and would welcome the opportunity to remain engaged in consultation as the Bill advances.

Chris Harrison
Deputy Director
Criminal Investigation Scotland & East
I refer to your letter of 2 April 2009 enclosing a revised call for written evidence in relation to the above Bill and would now provide the following response on behalf of Renfrewshire Council.

I would confirm that the comments are submitted primarily in relation to those aspects of the Bill relating to activities licensed under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982. We offer no comment as regards the criminal provisions of the Bill.

In relation to Part 9 of the Bill which deals with liquor licensing, we would offer the view that the provisions set out in the Bill reflect a number of issues identified as requiring attention during the transitional period of operation of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 and the proposals contained within the Bill for amending the provisions of the said Act will assist with addressing those issues.

As indicated previously, our particular comments are in relation to those provisions relating to the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982. In general we welcome these provisions and confirm that we support the modernising of the terms if the Act which have been recognised by local authorities as requiring updating since completion of the COSLA Review of Civic Government licensing several years ago. We do consider that the widening of specific provisions of the Act to increase the number of persons/organisations requiring public entertainment, late hours catering and market operators licenses will require, in particular, an increase in the enforcement activity carried out by councils as licensing authorities. This will accordingly impact upon already limited operational resources and cognisance of this should be taken by the Committee.

Finally, we would also draw attention to the requirements of the EU Service Directive which we understand will have a direct impact upon Civic Government licensing regimes in Scotland. A specific requirement of the Directive is that applications must be able to be completed and submitted electronically to licensing authorities. We would therefore specifically request that the procedural provisions of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 be amended to allow for the completion and submission of applications by electronic transmission.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from North Ayrshire Council

My comments on the effect of the proposed amendments are as follows:

S.121 a good proposal – this removes the automatic grant of a licence with no conditions to an applicant if a decision to grant/refuse has not been made within the permitted time.

S.122 does not affect local authorities.

S.123 This relates to licensing of metal dealers – the local authority has to determine the sum (if any) when an exemption warrant is to be granted (would need to be decided by Committee, but no guidance issued re criteria to be considered).

S.124 a good proposal – clarifies a grey area of law – applicants for taxi/private hire driver licences must hold a driving licence for the whole period of 12 months prior to the application being submitted.

S.125 will have major effect if agreed – will mean that all markets/car boot sales where pitches are sold/leased will require to be licensed (includes events like church fairs, charity fundraisers which do not require licences at present).

S.126 will have major effect if agreed – will mean that all events where entertainment is being provided (free or at a cost) will require to be licensed. At present only events “on payment of money or money’s worth” require to be licensed, so Marymass, and other events such as free fireworks displays, etc. will require to be licensed.

S.127 This relates to late Hours Catering – will have major effect if agreed. Definition of “food” to be amended. Will increase workload of Environmental Health Department. Any premises open after 11pm, where food, sweets, crisps, lemonade etc are sold or provided will require to be licensed (includes 24 hour supermarkets, petrol filling stations, etc.).

S.128 a good proposal to standardise time limits for objections and notice of hearings.
Notes on Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill 2009 (as introduced)

Part 9 (Alcohol Licensing [129-139]) and Schedule 4 (Further modifications of 2005 Act)

[130(2)] is a good amendment - the existing procedure is sufficient, in that it informs interested parties that an Application has been made, leaving it to them to attend the Board office and ask to view the documents.

[132] both the existing enactment and the proposed amendment do not address fundamental flaws of Anti-Social Behaviour Reports.

(a) The Board needs to be able to assess the weight to be given to the ASB report. It therefore needs, for each incident, details of the incident, its date and time, and details of any prosecution or other action, including the name and address of any person proceeded against and the eventual disposal.

At present, if the Police give an ASB report at all (and in NA, this has only been rare, in response to a request by the Clerk, as opposed to an initiative taken by the Police) the ASB report consists of a statement that in the previous year there were X assaults, Y vandalism offences etc. in or within a specified distance of the Premises.

(i) any incident outside Premises is of doubtful relevance. How can the Board know that the incident has any relevance to how these Premises are run? It would be unremarkable to record numerous crimes in a busy town centre, but that does not indicate that they are attributable to any particular establishment. There might be two premises in close proximity: one is well-run, while the other is not. A simple 'vicinity' report would risk tarring the innocent with the same brush;

(ii) an incident recorded in an ASB report might have nothing at all to do with the Premises, e.g. an assault by A on B in the street in the 'vicinity', where neither A nor B have recently been customers, or an incident in a nearby dwelling-house (since off-sales might well be in densely-populated residential areas, the value of 'vicinity' information is doubtful). Say a person is drunk and not able to care for himself or a child, and thus commits an offence under [50] Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 - why should this offence be relevant just because he happened to be 'near' premises when stopped by Police? Suppose a responsible manager ejects a drunk person and calls the Police, who arrive while the person is nearby - is the manager to be criticised, whereas if he had been less diligent the Police might well never have known and the ASB Report would be clear?

(iii) even offences within Premises do not necessarily show fault on the part of the Premises Manager. An incident may happen within well-run Premises and the Manager might act promptly to eject the antagonists and call the Police. Is he to be blamed when the incident, which he did not cause, appears on Police statistics? Would he be better advised to follow the pattern of his less diligent neighbour, and neither intervene in the incident nor call the Police? If an 'agent' buys drink for an under-18 at a bar, and commits an offence there, should even the blameless licensee answer for it? Why should these offences be relevant if there was no prosecution of the licensee or a 'due diligence' defence either succeeded or in fact was never needed because the Police recognised that there was no case against the Premises?

Since the ASB report does not specify the date, time and place of the incident, the Applicant may be unable to ascertain whether the incident was relevant - possibly the use of the ASB Report in the current form permits a 'natural justice' appeal. Contrast the form with the Suspension Report under [31] 1976, which typically specifies each incident in detail; if the Applicant is faced with an ASB Report which says simply 'there were 50 incidents at or near the premises in 12 months', how can he begin to investigate and prepare a response?

(b) The definition of "relevant period" should be altered to one year beginning with the date the Police were notified of the Application. In practice ASB reports do not identify the date of receipt of the request although the existing provision has been pointed out.

[133] No comment.

[134] The power to deal with Occasional Licences quickly is welcome, but the amendment is rendered unworkable by the addition of [134(5)] - neither the Clerk nor any member of staff, even if legally-qualified, is empowered to determine applications quickly. Applications for funerals may well arise at short notice, when it is impracticable to convene the full Board in time. It is pointless allowing the Board to determine the application 'quickly' if the event which was to be catered for has already passed. It is suggested that it should be sufficient for a Board to authorise an officer to exercise delegated powers to determine any Application for OL whether it is 'quick' or not.

[135] No comment.

Suggested amendments

1. Copying

Notwithstanding anything in copyright law, a Licensing Board may:

(a) make available copies of the Application, Operating Plan and Layout Plan for inspection at any place within its area, and

(b) allow any person to make copies of such documents on request;
(c) issue to any person copies of such documents on payment of the Board's reasonable charges;

It might be objected that the surveyor or architect who drew the Layout Plan has copyright, and indeed the LP may contain an express prohibition of copying. However, the public at large already has the right to view the Application and supporting documents. Given that 'any person' can make an objection or representation, any person can already come to the Board office and view the documents.

(a) is appropriate where the Board area is widespread and travel to the Board office is difficult. For example, North Ayrshire includes the Isles of Arran and Cumbrae; it has already happened that neighbours, having received notification of an Application, ask to see the documents at the Council office in Lamlash or Brodick (commenting that travel from Arran may be time-consuming and expensive). The Board does not have any office outside Irvine, and they are told that viewing is only possible at the Board's offices in Irvine. Sending a plan to another office would involve making a fax or photocopy.

2. Variation

The definition of 'minor variation' in [29(6)] should be extended to an amendment of the Operating Plan which is limited to a variation of hours, where the hours requested are consistent with the LPS. At present, such a variation is not 'minor', and therefore requires intimation, publication, the possibility of objections and representations and a Board Hearing when, since the proposal was consistent with the LPS, the application would be very likely granted.

3. Occasional Licence

(a) [58] (Objections and representations) should be amended to limit O/R to Police and LSO where the officer is satisfied that it is appropriate to deal with the OL application quickly;

(b) the period for the LSO's response to an OL application in [57(3)] should be 10 days, not 21, consistent with [69(3)];

4. Extended Hours

[69(3)] should be amended to entitle, not oblige, the LSO to report on an Extended Hours Application.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill
Written submission from the Women’s Support Project

Criminal Justice and Licensing Bill—Section 34 extreme pornography.

The Women’s Support Project (WSP) broadly support the Scottish Government’s introduction in the Criminal Justice & Licensing (Scotland) Bill for provisions to criminalise the possession of material that is considered to be extreme pornography.

Section 34 of the bill will make it illegal to possess extreme pornographic material. For material to fit this definition it must be all of the following:

(a) obscene,
(b) pornographic,
(c) extreme.

(a) Obscene
The test of “obscene” means that the material must be of such a nature that it would fall within the category of the material whose sale etc. is already prohibited under section 51 of the 1982 Act. There is no definition of obscene, but courts apply a common law test of whether the material is ‘calculated to deprave or corrupt persons open to depraving or corrupting’.

The WSP believes that the inclusion of “obscene” in the criteria for extreme pornography dilutes the focus of the new proposals, retains a “moral” judgement and suggests that the intention behind the proposals is to prevent depravity or corruption. The WSP believes that the Scottish Govt should not rely on the 1982 Act for a definition of obscenity but develop a definition based on an understanding of the broad cultural harm to which pornography contributes.

(b) Pornographic
An image is deemed pornographic if it is of such a nature that it must reasonably be assumed to have been made solely or principally for the purpose of sexual arousal.

(c) Extreme
An image is extreme if it depicts, in an explicit and realistic way any of the following:

(a) an act which takes or threatens a person’s life,
(b) an act which results, or is likely to result, in a person’s severe injury,
(c) rape or other non-consensual penetrative sexual activity,
(d) sexual activity involving (directly or indirectly) a human corpse,
(e) an act, which involves sexual activity between a person and an animal (or the carcass of an animal).

Possession

The bill will not criminalise:

- Single / accidental viewings
- Situations where someone has a legitimate purpose for possessing the material
- Material which has received a classification from the British Board of Film Classification
- Situations where the person possessing the image directly participated in its creation, where the act depicted did not actually take or threaten someone’s life or result in severe injury or involve sexual activity with a corpse or animal

The WSP supports the proposed maximum sentence of 3 years imprisonment for possession of this type of material.

There is already legislation in place, which criminalises the display, publishing, selling and distribution of this type of material, and possession with a view to onward sale or distribution. Until now there has been no legislation, which makes it an offence simply to possess extreme pornography. The proposed legislation sends a clear message to both pornography users and the wider public that accessing this material is unacceptable and is certainly not harmless. Extreme pornography contributes to negative attitudes against women and therefore must be limited, regulated and subject to restrictions to mitigate its effects.

We believe that this legislation is needed to reduce the potential for broad cultural harm and address the demand for extreme pornography, which has led to the proliferation of rape pornography, in particular across the internet. These are sites with descriptions such as "innocent teen girls face their worst sex related nightmares", "these girls say no but we say yes", "here you will find only REAL rape pictures" and "it is time to become Tough Guys, Right now". These sites are easily accessible for anyone - including young people - to find. They glorify rape and in doing so contribute to a culture where rape is condoned and validated, and as such, must be dealt with.

Our objections to extreme pornography are based on cultural harm and its abusive and degrading portrayal of females and female sexuality and not simply on its sexual content or explicitness. In extreme pornography, sex is presented as abusive and violent towards women and sexualises their abuse, systematically exploits and portrays them as objects to be abused, degraded and bought. It perpetuates the myths that women are sexually available, can be persuaded or forced to have sex and are subordinate to men. WSP endorses the view that:

“The bigotry and contempt it produces with the acts of aggression it justifies, harms women’s opportunities for equality and rights of all kinds.” (Scottish Women against Pornography SWAP 2004).

Pornography’s presentation of violence and sexual abuse can support an environment in which the perpetrators of rape are rarely convicted (according to Scottish Government figures for 2006/07 only 2.9% of rapes recorded by the police led to a conviction). Pornography perpetuates myths about rape which can make it hard for sex offence victims to be believed or seen as credible and makes it more difficult for them to come forward and be treated with fairness.

We welcome the specific reference to rape and other non-consensual penetrative sexual activity within the definition of extreme pornography. Unlike similar legislation in England & Wales, the bill does not make a distinction between ‘violent’ rape, and rape in general, a distinction which is extremely unhelpful and which we are glad to see is being rejected in Scotland.

Specific comments for amendments to the proposals

WSP believe that consideration should be given to the following changes / additions to the bill, which we believe would make it stronger and more effective in tackling the proliferation of this type of material:

(1) Rationale for the Bill
The Scottish Government introduced the Bill to “help ensure the public are protected from exposure to extreme pornography that depicts horrific images of violence” and that it “will discourage interest in extreme pornographic material by breaking the demand/supply cycle.” The WSP supports the principle of putting new focus on the demand for extreme pornographic materials and to address the issue of individuals mainly through new media accessing pornography that it is prohibited to sell or distribute. However the WSP believes the introduction of the Bill should be on the basis of reducing cultural harm and the impacts of pornography on views and attitudes towards women.

(2) Amendment to definition of extreme
Change wording to:

The use of “threatens to “ instead of “likely to” would increase the proposals scope to cover all acts of rape, which could all be said to threaten severe injury but not all are likely to result in severe injury.
(3) Broaden the scope of material covered to include non-photographic visual depictions of extreme pornography
As the bill is currently written, to meet the definition of ‘extreme’, the material in questions must be explicit and realistic. The terms “explicit” and “realistic” require that the act depicted in the image must be clearly seen, lifelike and convincing and appear to a reasonable person to be real. It is not required that the act itself is real.

There is a strong feeling that there is a missed opportunity in not including non-photographic representations of extreme acts in the bill. This means for example that the provision in the bill will not cover depictions of extreme pornography on virtual worlds such as Second Life, where the pornography is violent, extreme and interactive, but where the images are not photographic. Similarly, we would like to emphasis that there is still a need to enact similar legislation in relation to child pornography, as proposed by the Scottish Executive in early 2007.

(4) Broaden the definition of extreme to include depictions of incest
Although the legislation will cover depictions of rape and non-consensual penetrative sexual activity, which fit the definition of obscene and pornographic, this will not necessarily cover pornography which glorifies incest, unless it is clear that the young woman depicted is not of an age to consent. For example, one pornography website is headed ‘Welcome to Daddy’s Whore’, and sub-titled ‘there is no stronger feelings than father’s love to his daughter’. This is unlikely to be caught by the legislation because there is a note on the website that the young women featured are ‘18 year old daughters’. We believe serious consideration must be given to extending the definition of extreme to include depictions of incest, which is an illegal activity to ensure these types of materials are covered by the legislation.

(5) Ensure a clear definition of possession
Clarity is required as to what “possession” covers. Will it cover those people who access extreme pornography without downloading files? Although the bill does not criminalise accidental or single viewing, we believe it must cover repeated viewings of this type of material, whether or not the material was actually downloaded.

(6) Further reforms
While WSP welcome the provisions in the bill, which we believe are much needed, we are firmly of the view that this must be only a starting point for action to address the harm caused by pornography. Further reform is needed and we will be interested to see future approaches addressing the sexualisation and portrayal of incest. Pornography is in and of itself is a form of violence against women and has the potential to cause serious harm in distorting people’s views of sexuality, and contributes to what has been called a ‘rape culture’.
(7) Public education and awareness raising
An additional important issue to be addressed is public education. This includes public education on the introduction of the proposed legislation but also a broader public education campaign on the realities of accessing internet pornography. Our sense is that many people in Scotland are completely unaware of the extreme types of pornographic material that is easily accessible and available via new media. Through awareness raising events, the WSP has identified strong concerns amongst attendees on the growing demand for pornography and the impacts of this on gender equality and cultural norms.

Written submission from Fife Council

The amendments to the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 contained in the Bill are generally welcomed.

It would be helpful, however, if an amendment could be made to Section 9 of the 1982 Act. Section 9, subsections (2), (8) and (9) make provision for a nine month lead in time for new resolutions and variations to a resolution which have a neutral effect on its scope or increase its scope. While clearly a suitable period of notice for any changes to a resolution is necessary, the period of nine months set out in Section 9(2) is not always appropriate. It is suggested that the, “day” specified in the resolution in subsection (2) be determined by the licensing authority so as to give reasonable and sufficient notice of the resolution or variation to the resolution.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Fife Licensing Board

1.0 Introduction

1.1 The Board generally welcomes the liquor licensing proposals in the Bill. Specifically, the following comments are submitted for consideration.

2.0 Responses

2.1 In relation to Clause 130 and the amendment to subsection (2)(a) of Section 21 of the 2005 Act the word, “copy” perhaps requires further definition. Both the electronic administration and the electronic processing of applications will be done more effectively if the word “copy” is understood to mean the transference of the information contained in application forms and other documents, formatted appropriately, but not necessarily in replication of the application form.

2.2 In Clause 136 which relates to personal licences, the proposed amendments in sub-clause (2)(a) include a requirement that, “the applicant” has signed the application. As, “applicant” is defined as the person making the application, presumably a solicitor acting on behalf of the applicant or an employee of the applicant could make the application, on behalf of the applicant.

3.0 Notwithstanding the above, however, the requirement for a signature of any kind does not assist Boards in their electronic administration of applications and the move towards the electronic processing of applications. The requirement for signatures is generally absent from the provisions relating to other documents - notices, objections, licences, etc and it is not clear why signatures, facsimile or otherwise, are necessary on personal licence applications. For purposes of data security, signatures are usually redacted when sending or publishing electronically applications.

4.0 This point is raised in relation to paragraph 14 of Schedule 4 to the Bill which relates to the applicant’s duty to notify the Licensing Board of convictions. Section 71 of the Act defines, “personal licence” as a licence which has been issued to the individual by the Board. Consequently, a personal licenceholder is someone who holds a personal licence that has been granted and issued. Section 75 imposes a duty on applicants to notify convictions beginning with the making of the application and ending with its determination. Paragraph 23 of the Transitional and Saving Provisions Order makes 1st September, 2009 the deemed issue date of personal licences issued during the transitional period. Beyond then there is a 28 day period in which to issue a personal licence which has been granted. In each/each case, there is a gap or potentially a gap, between the granting of the licence and its issue during which a licenceholder is under no duty (under Section 82) to notify the Board of convictions.

Similarly, the holder of a personal licence would not be able to apply for an occasional licence under Section 56 until 1st September. It may well be the case that personal licence holders may wish to lodge applications for occasionals prior to that date.

A premises licence is also defined as one that has been issued although Boards have a discretion to set the date when it comes into effect.

Electronic administration of the licensing system should, after September, 2009, allow licences to be issued on the day that these are granted. During the transitional period, however, it would be helpful if personal licenceholders were deemed to be such when the licence is granted rather than issued, in order to close the convictions gap and allow applications for occasional licences to be made by personal licenceholders.

5.0 Along with colleagues elsewhere, I am also of the view that the somewhat time consuming appeal arrangements under the 2005 Act would be better repealed and replaced by a summary cause appeal process similar, but not necessarily identical, to that in the 1976 Act.
Stated cases deal in facts and while in liquor licensing cases there are indeed findings in fact by the Board, a considerable amount of what they do is founded on possibilities and probabilities.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from the Faculty of Advocates

1. The Faculty of Advocates welcomes the opportunity to comment in this submission on the Licensing provisions in the Bill. It is not proposed to discuss every provision but confine our observations to those which merit comment from a legal perspective.

Part 8 - Licensing Under Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982

2. Section 121- Conditions

The proposals (in section 121(2) and (6)(a) (i)) to do away with the unconditional grant or renewal of a licence are welcomed.

The introduction of mandatory licensing conditions prescribed by Scottish Ministers under section 121(3) does represent a radical departure from the current approach which is to leave the attachment of specific conditions to licensing authorities. The proposal would enable Ministers to impose conditions in respect of all licensed activities including those which are categorised as optional. By their very nature such conditions will not be capable of variation or relaxation by licensing authorities in the light of local or particular circumstances. The reason for such a change of approach is not explained. The terms of any prescribed conditions in statutory instruments may shed some light. It is appreciated that mandatory conditions are being introduced under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 although that is in the context of Licensing Objectives which underpin the legislation. This is a significant change to the licensing regime under the 1982 Act, the reason for which is obscure.

The proposal that standard conditions or variations thereof have no effect so far as they are inconsistent with any mandatory condition, while inevitable in the context of mandatory conditions, does introduce the potential for issues to arise in particular cases as to whether a particular condition is indeed inconsistent with a mandatory one with consequent uncertainty. Ultimately the issue will be one for the court to determine in a particular case. That is only likely to arise if the licence holder challenges the condition by appeal. It may also arise where a licensing authority seeks to found on the particular condition or its breach in relation to a proposed suspension. Apart from these cases, the matter may not arise because the holder of a licence may simply do nothing about the condition and not comply with it on the basis that in his view the inconsistency means that it has no effect and may be ignored.
3. Section 122 – Powers of entry and inspection

Significant powers are granted under section 5 of the 1982 Act. These are conferred not only on constables but on authorised officers of the licensing authority which is responsible for administering and enforcing the licensing regime. With the availability of such officers and of police officers in appropriate case, it is not clear why it is sought to extend the powers to civilian employees of the police authority.

4. Section 127 – Licensing of late night catering

The substitution of “food” as defined in section 1 of the Food Safety Act 1990 for “meals and refreshment” will, of course, extend the coverage of section 42 of the 1982 Act.

5. Section 128 – Applications

The amendment of paragraph 8 of Schedule 1 to the 1982 Act by the addition of sub-paragraph (5A) is welcomed.

Part 9 – Alcohol Licensing

6. Section 129(4) – power of Board to vary premises licence conditions

It is submitted that a right of appeal should be given to the premises licence holder against such a variation. Given that in the case of an application by the holder to vary the premises licence under section 29 of the 2005 Act there is an appeal against refusal (schedule 5), it would be appropriate that a right of appeal also be granted in respect of a Board variation.

7. Section 132(2) – premises licence applications: anti social behaviour reports

In the proposed section 22(2A) of the 2005 Act in both sub-sections (a) and (b) there should be added a reference to the extent to which such anti social behaviour in the vicinity is considered to be attributable to customers of the premises. This is frequently an issue in respect of applications and it is anticipated that this will be the case in respect of the content of such reports. For that reason, it is submitted that it would be helpful if it could be addressed in any report.

8. Section 140 – Licensed premises: social responsibility levy

It is noted that the levy is in respect of expenditure incurred by any local authority falling within subsection (3). It is nothing to do with the relevant licensing board or expenditure incurred by it. Where licence holders may be subject to the imposition of the levy where the local authority consider it necessary or desirable with a view to remedying or mitigating adverse impacts on licensing objectives attributable to the operation of licensed premises in their area, regardless of whether any of these impacts can be attributed in any way to specific premises, the levy may reasonably be viewed as a form of taxation imposed on all relevant licence holders. It will be payable regardless of how well managed particular premises are in relation to achievement of the licensing objectives.

The imposition of such a levy would be a somewhat drastic and, to an extent, a penal measure. How exemptions or remissions from charges may operate is left entirely to Regulations. It is essentially a source of funding for unspecified measures to address general adverse effects. There is, in the proposed legislation, no detail of such measures or any specific indication of how the expenditure shall be utilised beyond the general terms of the subsection. The authority is given a very wide discretion. All of this assumes that the expenditure is in respect of action which the authority has power to take.

It is also worthy of note that while holders of licences under sections 39, 41 and 42 of the 1982 Act will be subject to the levy, the licensing regime under the 1982 Act is not subject to any overarching licensing objectives. While one can understand the thinking behind grouping these activities with licences under the 2005 Act, albeit they are not concerned with the sale of alcohol, it may be perceived as inappropriate to subject them to a levy which relates to an impact on objectives which have no express application to these activities.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from the Gender-based Violence Programme Team, Healthcare, Strategy and Policy Directorate, Scottish Government

Section 34 of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill: Provisions for criminalizing the possession of extreme pornography.

1. Background to GBV Programme

In line with a Chief Executives Letter (CEL) 41, the National GBV Programme Team has a role to support Health Boards to meet their responsibilities in responding to gender-based violence. Gender-based violence encompasses the spectrum of abuse aimed at individuals and groups based on their specific gender role in society. It is both a cause and consequence of gender inequality and is experienced disproportionately by women and perpetrated predominantly by men.

We have recently produced National Guidance for health workers, covering all forms of GBV, including but not limited to, domestic abuse, child sexual abuse, rape & sexual assault, harmful traditional practices such as female genital mutilation, forced marriage and so-called honour crimes, sexual harassment, stalking and commercial sexual exploitation.

The guidance cites that commercial sexual exploitation involves a wide range of often interconnected activities, including pornography, prostitution, lap dancing, trafficking etc. We recognise the exploitation of women and children through pornography as inextricably linked to gender inequality and sexual violence and are concerned that the current proliferation of pornography, especially through the internet, serves to create a distorted culture that normalises and glamorises the abuse and sexual exploitation of women and girls.

2. Response to the Bill

We broadly welcome the proposed provisions in Section 34 of the above bill, which aims to criminalize the possession of extreme pornography. We perceive the introduction of these legal provisions as a first step in addressing the harm caused by pornography per se and hope that in future, these can be built on to establish a more robust, harm based legal definition of this form of gender-based violence. In the meantime, it is our view that the current legal context and proposed criteria for possession of extreme pornography pose some limitations i.e. neither the proposed definition of pornography nor current obscenity legislation takes account of the fact that fundamentally, pornography is a gendered issue, premised on unequal power relations (between men and women and men and children of both sexes). Given that we define pornography as sexual violence, it is our view that the primary purpose of producing pornography is to sexualise... inequality through the objectification and abuse of women and children, not merely to induce sexual arousal. For example, adult erotic literature premised on mutuality and respect may arouse sexual desire but this would not constitute pornography. Similarly, existing obscenity legislation is open to subjective interpretation in relation to whether or not material is ‘calculated to deprave or corrupt...’ It does not take account of the abuse and harm caused to women and children in the making of pornography or the perpetuation of harm when the images are used over and over again to inflict further abuse.

Despite the perceived limitations of the criteria, we welcome the fact that as with child pornography, it would be an offence to possess extreme pornography. We believe that this could send a clear signal to men using pornography and also the wider public that this material is harmful and that possession is unacceptable and illegal.

We think that this message is needed to counter the normalisation of sexual violence in pornography and the demand from men for extreme pornography, including rape pornography, which is widely available on the internet and easily accessible to anyone, including young people. Pornography censors and silences the reality of women’s experience of sexual violence and perpetuates myths about rape i.e. when women say no they mean yes. This misrepresentation of women’s sexuality serves to undermine the credibility of survivors of sexual offences within the criminal justice system and such myths are reinforced by the low conviction rate for rape as reflected in the Scottish Government figures for 2006/07 when only 2.9% of rapes recorded by the Police led to a conviction.

3. Recommendations for amendments to the proposed provisions

Amendment to the definition of extreme

Change wording to:

b) an act which results, or threatens to result, in a person’s severe injury.

The use of ‘threatens to’ instead of ‘likely to’ would increase the scope to cover all acts of rape, which could all be said to threaten severe injury, but not all are likely to result in severe injury.

Broaden the definition of extreme to include depictions of incest

Although the legislation will cover depictions of rape and non-consensual penetrative sexual activity which fit the criteria of obscene and pornographic, this will not necessarily cover pornography which depicts and promotes incest, unless it is clear that the young women depicted are not of an age to consent. Some websites that show graphic images of incest claim that the young women featured are ‘18 year old daughters’. We advocate that the definition of ‘extreme’ needs to include such depictions of incest, which is a serious sexual offence.
Broaden the scope of material covered

As the bill is currently written, to meet the definition of ‘extreme’, the material in question must be explicit and realistic. This requires that the act depicted in the image is clearly seen, lifelike and convincing and appears to a reasonable person to be real. It is not required that the act itself is real.

Given this, it is unfortunate that the proposed bill does not extend to non-photographic representations of extreme acts e.g. it does not cover depictions of extreme pornography on virtual worlds such as ‘Second Life’, where rape pornography is violent and interactive but the images are not photographic.

Establish a clear definition of ‘possession’

There is a need to clarify what ‘possession’ covers. Although the bill does not criminalize accidental or single viewing, it is unclear whether it would cover repeated viewings of extreme pornography, whether or not the material was actually downloaded?

4. Public Education

In the short term, it would be helpful to have a public launch of the proposed legislation on extreme pornography and in the longer term, we think it would be important to devise a comprehensive public education campaign to raise awareness of the harmful nature of internet pornography. We feel it is highly likely that the vast majority of the general public and parents/carers in particular will be unaware of the violent, abusive and extreme nature of the material that can be easily accessed via the internet by young people and others.

Written submission from the Wise Group

Introduction

The Wise Group has direct experience of the capacity for offenders to develop positive lifestyles, resist pressures to commit further offences and become constructive members of society through the Routes out of Prison project (RooP). We welcome the opportunity to respond to the proposed Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (hereafter ‘the Bill’) as a social enterprise that undertakes a range of projects that seek to improve the lives of disadvantaged communities and contribute to robust and cohesive communities.

The Bill draws on recommendations made by the Scottish Prisons Commission, headed by Henry McLeish, Scotland’s Choice (2008) that recommends reducing the prison population to an average of 5,000. ¹ The Commission visited the RooP project as part of its research, and our submission similarly draws on the lessons from RooP. RooP, an example of the notion of in-community support in practice, has been evaluated by the Criminal Justice Social Work Development Centre for Scotland based at the University of Edinburgh. RooP has enabled The Wise Group to garner considerable expertise in the area of offender rehabilitation, and we would be happy to expand on our comments should the Committee require additional information. Contact details are provided at the end of this submission.

Community Payback

This submission is focused on the concept of community based sentences, ‘community payback sentences’ to use the terminology of the McLeish report. The report defines payback as:

finding constructive ways to compensate or repair harms caused by crime. It involves making good to the victim and/or the community whether by unpaid work, engaging in rehabilitative work that benefits both victims and the community by reducing reoffending, or some combination of these and other approaches.²

The Wise Group shares the Bill’s ambition to reduce Scotland’s prison population, and specifically we support efforts to reduce the use of imprisonment

through increased use of short sentences. Imprisonment is detrimental to individuals as well as families and communities:

- Individuals: time in prison can have dramatic and negative effects on individuals, in terms of their family life and mental and physical health. As Hosking writes ‘the collateral damage of imprisonment is considerable – a third of prisoners lose their home while in prison, two thirds lose their job, over a fifth face increased financial problems and more than two-fifths lose contact with their family’. Imprisonment also increases the chances of children going into care and reduces life expectancy; increasing the need for state benefits. It also interrupts education, training or employment and can lead to the development of relationships that are not conducive to crime-free lives. A sequence of short sentences can lead to individuals who were hitherto troubling offenders becoming serious offenders. Moreover, it is our experience that the stigma associated with having spent time in prison, even if all the negative effects on individuals just outlined are somehow avoided, will present barriers to employment and perhaps future relationships.

- Families and communities: community life is fragmented by individuals moving in and out of prisons, compounded by the negative impact of time in prison on individuals involved. Those families where one parent is in prison have a higher likelihood of other family members engaging in criminal activity, going to prison, relying on benefits, being placed in care and having high levels of emotional distress. Social inequalities are therefore deepened by high rates of imprisonment, while undermining efforts to support those communities which are most in need.

The Wise Group believes that expanding the use of community payback as an alternative to prison has the potential to avoid such deleterious impacts of prison. Community based payback schemes have proven capacity to reduce re-offending, with additional benefits of reduced expenditure on prisons and the delivery of necessary work in communities. Moreover, victims and the wider public will have a sense that something positive is being contributed by offenders.

If the Scottish Government (and indeed the Scottish community) is serious about reducing reoffending and changing the life courses of individuals who otherwise might face ‘life by instalments’ – that is, a series of short periods in prison – there is a need to address a suite of disadvantages invariably experienced by the majority of the short term prison population.\textsuperscript{10} In particular, The Wise Group believes that this means addressing in a holistic way the offender’s health needs (mental and physical), education and skill deficits and supporting positive relationships with families where possible. Our experience of delivering a range of support to our clients who face complex disadvantages suggests that this is most effectively and efficiently done in supportive and constructive programmes in communities. There is evidence from Scotland that reconvictions are lower for those involved in non-custodial sentences than those who serve prison sentences.\textsuperscript{11} Programmes to support offenders are better provided in the community than when provided in the prison.\textsuperscript{12} This implies there needs to be parallel emphasis on rehabilitation, not simply payback.

We also note the warning from Houchin (2005) regarding a focus on the offending behaviour of individuals which can be counter-productive because it ‘emphasises the non-affiliation of the client group to the norms to which it is hoped they will come to ascribe...Imprisonment makes membership of the dominant culture more tenuous and confirms the excluded identity’.\textsuperscript{13} Instead, The Wise Group supports Houchin’s call for encouraging individuals to participate in their communities to engender an affiliation and commitment to communities. This is vital in ‘[emphasising] their normality, their standing as members of the community’.\textsuperscript{14}

Concerted support within the community can turn an individual’s life around. This is a clear lesson from the RooP project. The RooP Life Coaches proactively link ex-offenders with relevant agencies and families (as appropriate). Assistance can take the form of attending interviews with clients, making appointments with housing authorities and liaising with employment support services. Effectively, the Life Coaches help ex-offenders get their life back on track after a period in prison, with expected significant reductions in re-offending rates. RooP experience thus supports the observation of the Scottish Prisons Commission that rather than a single punishment leading to desistance from crime, a process

\textsuperscript{10} Houchin (2005) found that there is a ‘systemic link between social deprivation’. One in nine young men from the most deprived areas of Scotland will spend time in prison when they are 23 (Houchin 2005). Prisoners are 13 times more likely to have been in care as a child and unemployed than the general population and ten times more likely to have regularly been absent from school. Four in five prisoners have the writing skills of an 11 year old and 65% have the numeracy skills of an 11 year old. Seven in ten prisoners in Scotland suffer from at least two mental disorders (Scottish Prisons Commission 2008). Those born in the most deprived parts of Scotland have a greater probability of spending time in prison (Houchin, 2005).

We therefore envisage utilising community payback as a mechanism to deliver a suite of individualised assistance while individuals are actively contributing to their community. Proactive use of the opportunity presented by community payback sentences is the best way to give offenders this chance and support positive choices. The Wise Group feels this is a positive and constructive use of an unfortunate juncture in an individual’s life.

An equally important lesson from The Wise Group’s RooP project is the genuine desire of the majority of ex-offenders to desist from crime and contribute to society in a positive way. Many of the Life Coaches are ex-offenders themselves, which not only gives them a unique ability to engage with individuals leaving prison (the ‘peer effect’), but also illustrates the capacity and willingness of former offenders to change their lives. In turn, communities need to give ex-prisoners a chance and a fresh start to life through reintegration.

Enabling greater numbers of offenders to follow this lead through structured payback sentences that combine constructive atonement for the crime committed through useful community work with support in addressing challenges would, we believe, go a substantial way to achieving the goal of strong resilient communities from which all individuals can reach their greatest potential.

Lessons from Intermediate Labour Markets

Community sentences will be most effective when they impart skills and qualifications that lead to opportunities for work that represent a real alternative to crime. The Wise Group has a strong track record of delivering community activities that enhance localities. For example, one of our Intermediate Labour Market programmes (ILMs) delivered the following impacts for individuals involved:

- Increased training and employability opportunities
- Movement into the local labour market
- Alleviating poverty through increased income to participants
- Increased access to support services

A study into our Cadder Housing Association Project that involved long term unemployed individuals in carrying out regeneration work found that the majority of participants reported an increased sense of self-respect and pride in their accomplishments. There was a strong sense of belonging to a group and working with that group to achieve something worthwhile, which would also be of benefit to the community.

The ILMs show that work experience in a supportive environment can help participants address barriers to work (such as low education, a history of unemployment, mental and physical health problems, drug misuse and homelessness). We therefore call for the design of community payback schemes to incorporate mechanisms that address barriers to work in order for participants to emerge with greater employability.

ILMs also deliver tangible benefits for communities:

- Improved amenity of the area
- Reduced maintenance costs of the improved areas
- Improved sustainability of community regeneration programmes
- Improved resident satisfaction
- Reduced vandalism by youths and damage by refuse collectors
- Reduced anti-social behaviour and crime

Additional Comments

Finally, The Wise Group feels that that Local Authorities are best placed to manage contracts for community payback schemes. For the rehabilitative and community benefit elements of community payback to be maximised, understanding of local communities – their challenges, priorities and affiliations – are fundamental in programme design. We have a long history of positive collaboration with Local Authorities which underpins our view that they are best placed to identify worthy areas of work. Clearly, areas and tasks selected for community payback projects need to be cognisant to avoid any displacement of work that would have been undertaken by other organisations or individuals. For example, community payback should not carry out work that would have been carried out by other individuals who are seeking work.

Written submission from East Renfrewshire Community Health and Care Partnership

Within East Renfrewshire we have actively progressed our local ‘partnership’ commitment to addressing alcohol issues, through working in collaboration with health and the wide range of our key partners. We welcome the Scottish Government announcement to introduce a health bill to take forward provisions on a range of alcohol measures, and feel that this will support local work around alcohol in relation to our Joint Alcohol Policy Statement. In light of the proposed health bill and the amendments to the above bill, our general view is supportive particularly in relation to the role of the Licensing Board, and the duties and powers available to the Boards to ensure support for the health agenda in working towards creating an environment conductive to the safe use of alcohol.

We further welcome the opportunity to comment on the general principles of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill, and note the three main purposes of the Bill’s provision, and note the Bill’s policy memorandum stating that the amendments to the Bill will seek to ‘improve the operation of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 as well as ensuring that Licensing Boards receive sufficient information on which to base their decisions concerning licensing to sell alcohol. Ensuring that the health agenda is taken into account in relation to decisions made, is vital, and would want to ensure this is maintained. We would like to reiterate our views in relation to the public health concerns around alcohol consumption, and support that the minimum age for off-sales purchases being raised to 21 in Scotland. The minimum age of purchase is a crucial component of a comprehensive alcohol strategy and there is a strong evidence base to support the increase of the legal drinking age from 18 to 21 in terms of substantial effects on youth drinking and alcohol related harm. Effective enforcement of the legislation is of vital importance, notably under age drinking and the sale of alcohol to intoxicated individuals.

The no proof no sale approach for Scotland for all licensed premises is welcome and consideration should also be given to asking the population up to the age of 30 for ID, adopted successfully in other countries, where asking for ID becomes part of the ‘norm’.

We trust that the above views and comment made are considered helpful in relation to the principles of the bill, in particular the duties placed on licensing boards.

1 Changing Scotland’s Relationship with Alcohol: A Framework for Action, Scottish Government 2009
Introduction

1. In September 2006, the Nuffield Council on Bioethics appointed a Working Group, which was chaired by Professor Sir Bob Hepple QC and included members with expertise in law, genetics, philosophy and social science, to consider the ethical issues raised by the forensic use of bioinformation. As part of the inquiry, the Group held a public consultation, which elicited over 135 responses.

2. In September 2007 the Council published a report, The forensic use of bioinformation: the ethical issues. This response is drawn primarily from the conclusions and recommendations made in that report. The report can be downloaded at: www.nuffieldbioethics.org/forensic.

3. We put forward our own views and recommendations on these issues, not as the end of the debate, but hopefully as a contribution to the development of well-informed public engagement. We suggested means by which the public interest in crime control can be balanced in a proportionate way with other values such as liberty and autonomy, privacy, consent and equal treatment, and the legal protection of human rights and civil liberties.

Section 58 – Retention of samples etc.

Extract from Policy Memorandum:

301. This section authorises the retention of fingerprints and any other forensic data already taken from persons proceeded against but not convicted of a serious sexual or violent offence. Data does not have to be destroyed for at least 3 years, and the relevant chief constable would have discretion to apply to a sheriff for extensions of up to 2 years at a time. This would bring the law on the retention of fingerprints and other forensic data into line with current law on DNA retention.

4. In its report, the Council supported the current approach taken in Scotland to the retention of DNA for forensic purposes. The Council recommended that fingerprints, DNA profiles and subject biological samples should be retained indefinitely only for those convicted of a recordable offence. In all other cases, samples should be destroyed and the resulting profiles deleted from the database. Retention of samples and profiles should be allowed, for three years, from those charged with serious violent or sexual offences, even if there is no conviction. Thereafter the samples and profiles should be destroyed unless a Chief Constable applies to a court for a two-year extension, showing reasonable grounds for the extension [paragraphs 4.53-4.55]. These proposals are compatible with a recent ruling of the European Court of Human Rights in the case of S and Marper v UK. The Court referred to the Council’s report extensively in its judgment document. The Council therefore supports the proposal to bring the law in Scotland on the retention of fingerprints and other forensic data into line with current Scottish law on DNA retention.

Extract from Policy Memorandum:

302. This section authorises the retention for three years forensic data taken under existing powers where a child accepts or is found by a Sheriff to have committed one of certain serious violent and sexual offences, with discretion for the chief constable to apply to a sheriff for extensions of up to 2 years at a time to provide a means of managing high risk cases. This would align with current arrangements under section 18A of the 1995 Act for retention of DNA from individuals proceeded against for violent and sexual offences, but not convicted and aims to strike a balance between the need to manage risk and protect the public with regard to offending behaviour; and maintaining the core ethos of the Children’s Hearings System – to address the needs of the child.

5. The Council does not have any specific comments to make on the Scottish Government’s proposals regarding children’s hearings, except to point out that the policy of permanently retaining the bioinformation of minors is particularly sensitive in the United Kingdom, where the age of criminal responsibility is low (at age ten years in England and Wales and eight in Scotland) compared with many other countries.

6. There is a separate youth justice system, in recognition of the special protections that should be afforded to children and young persons. The European Convention on Human Rights recognises the special case of children in the criminal justice system. The UN Convention on the Rights of the Child requires special attention to be given to the treatment of children by legal systems, to protect them from stigma, and that if they have offended, opportunities for rehabilitation to be maximised. The destruction of relevant criminal justice records and accompanying body samples could comprise one element in such a rehabilitative process. The Supreme Court of Canada, while acknowledging the strong public interest in crime detection, has held that it was contrary to principles of the youth justice system to treat juveniles in the same way as adults, and that juvenile immaturity was a factor which militated against inclusion on the database. Parental consent for sampling would not, in our view, negate concerns surrounding the retention of samples and profiles of minors.

7. When considering requests for the removal of profiles from the NDNAD and the destruction of biological samples taken from minors (including from adults who were minors when their DNA was taken), we recommend that there should be a presumption in favour of the removal of all records, fingerprints and DNA profiles, and the destruction of samples. In deciding whether or not the presumption has been rebutted, account should be taken of factors such as:

- the seriousness of the offence;
- previous arrests;
- the outcome of the arrest;
- the likelihood of this individual re-offending;
- the danger to the public; and
- any other special circumstances [paragraphs 4.71-4.72].

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from James Chalmers

I wish at this stage simply to express broad support for the general principles of the Bill and to make relatively minor comments on three aspects, as follows:

(1) Extreme pornography

I have some concerns about the breadth of section 34 of the Bill, which creates an offence of possession of an extreme pornographic image. The policy objective for this provision is expressed as being “[t]o help ensure that the public are protected from exposure to extreme pornography that depicts horrific images of violence” (para 153 of the Policy Memorandum). This is a strange suggestion: exposing the public to such material would already amount to a criminal offence. The lack of clarity as to what exactly this offence is expected to achieve makes it difficult to assess whether its scope is appropriate.

The consultation exercise which led to these proposals (carried out jointly by the Home Office and the Scottish Executive) proceeded from the outset on the assumption that there was no proposal to criminalise possession of depictions of non-consensual sexual material as such, but to use the criminal law only where “serious violence” was involved (along with cases involving animals or corpses). The Home Office summary of responses to the consultation clarified the reference to “serious violence”, stating that “by serious violence we mean appears to be life threatening or likely to result in serious, disabling injury” (Home Office, Consultation on the Possession of Extreme Pornographic Material: Summary of Responses and Next Steps (2006) para 16).

The consultation exercise seemed to give no indication of significant pressure to broaden the definition of “extreme pornography”, and this is reflected in the subsequent English legislation, which is in fact more restrictive that initially envisaged. It is limited (leaving aside animals and corpses) to instances of acts threatening a person’s life, or which result or are likely to result in serious injury to a person’s anus, breasts or genitals (Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 s 63(7)).

The Bill goes significantly beyond the English definition and anything canvassed in the prior consultation exercises, with the Policy Memorandum asserting merely that this definition is “insufficiently broad” but without explaining why. The Policy Memorandum observes that the English legislation does not cover rape per se, but this is hardly an accident of drafting: there was a clear desire to limit the legislation to extremely serious cases. No doubt it is undesirable that any person should possess material depicting rape or other non-consensual sexual activity, but the Government has at no stage explained its rationale for criminalising such possession. It can hardly be the simple fact that the activity depicted is criminal: murder is regularly depicted on terrestrial television without objection.

(2) Prosecution of children

While agreeing with the general thrust of section 38 of the Bill, there is one surprising omission here. In its Report on the Age of Criminal Responsibility (Scot Law Com No 185, 2002), the Scottish Law Commission recommended that – alongside the introduction of a rule that a child under the age of 12 could not be prosecuted for a criminal offence – the rule that no child under the age of 8 could commit a criminal offence should be repealed. This is because there might be circumstances in which a child under that age had committed a crime, ought therefore to be referred to a children’s hearing, and could not be referred on any other ground (as in Merrin v S 1987 SLT 193). The Commission noted that virtually all consultees who had responded to the proposals in their Discussion Paper on this point agreed with this proposal (Report, para 3.24).

The Bill, as introduced, would not implement this recommendation, and the Policy Memorandum states only that this recommendation “is not taken forward” (para 192), without offering any reason. The Commission’s original observation that it is “paradoxical that children who commit offences, and who might be thought to form the most suitable cases to come within the hearings system, are beyond the scope of both the criminal justice system and the hearings system solely because of their age” (Report, para 3.23) remains valid and – in the absence of good reason to the contrary – this recommendation should be implemented in the Bill.

(3) Mental disorder and unfitness for trial

I am pleased to see that the Bill will implement the Scottish Law Commission’s recommendations on the defences of insanity and diminished responsibility. I have, however, a minor concern about section 117(4), which provides that a defence of insanity “may be stated only by the person charged with the offence”, as recommended by the Commission. In my view it should be open to the Crown to raise this plea in some circumstances, for the following reasons:

First, an accused may put his mental state in issue by raising the defence of diminished responsibility or automatism. If he does so, it would seem essential that the Crown be permitted to argue that the accused’s mental state in fact amounted to insanity rather than one of the other defences. English law expressly permits the prosecution to allege insanity where the accused pleads diminished responsibility: Criminal Procedure (Insanity) Act 1964 s 6.

Secondly (and related to the first point), there are some conditions which fall on the borderline between automatism and insanity, such as physical illnesses which affect an accused’s ability to control his actions. These might be regarded by the courts as “mental disorders” within the terms of the statute... in appropriate cases, particularly if they are liable to recur and so potentially render the accused a danger to the public. If the accused pleads, on the basis of such a condition, that he should be acquitted on the ground of automatism, but the prosecution are not permitted to raise insanity as an issue, and the judge rules that the accused’s condition amounts to insanity rather than automatism, it would seem to follow that the accused must be convicted even if all concerned believe that he should be acquitted.

Thirdly, an accused cannot be convicted of any serious criminal offence unless he has the requisite mens rea (fault element, or mental state). Insanity may often involve a denial of mens rea. To take a very simplistic example: if an accused kills another person while under an insane delusion to the effect that he is attacking the devil or an animal, he lacks mens rea as he has no intention to harm another person, which is an essential element of the mens rea of murder (HM Advocate v Purcell 2008 JC 131). If the prosecution cannot allege insanity, it follows logically that the accused in such a case could simply deny mens rea and secure an unqualified acquittal. In R v Cottle [1958] NZLR 999, the New Zealand Court of Appeal avoided this problem by holding that the defendant had “in substance and in fact” pled insanity, but it would be difficult for the Scottish courts to take this course given that insanity is a special defence and subject to a requirement of pre-trial notification.

Written submission from Lesley Walker

I am writing to let you know that I very much welcome the provisions in the bill, which I believe are much needed, but am firmly of the view that this must be a starting point for further action to address the harm caused by pornography. I view pornography as seriously harmful and damaging to all women and men, not limited to those who participate in it or view it.

I am sure the Committee will receive many submissions from those who profit from this industry or who have extreme libertarian views that allow the promulgation of almost any materials, no matter how violent or degrading to women.

I would like to add my voice to the wide support for addressing the harms caused by this industry.

SCRA welcomes the opportunity to provide written evidence to the Committee on this important piece of legislation. The Bill contains a number of provisions which impact on the Children’s Hearings System and our submission deals with each in turn. Due to the significance of these proposals to the Children’s Hearings System, SCRA would welcome the opportunity to speak to this submission.

SCRA background
Established in 1996, the Scottish Children’s Reporter Administration (SCRA) assumed responsibility for the Children’s Reporter service across Scotland and operates as a Non-Departmental Public Body (NDPB), funded by the Scottish Government. While the Principal Reporter is independent in terms of his/her decision-making powers in relation to children referred, the organisation and Board of SCRA is responsible and accountable to Scottish Ministers.

In 2007-08, 50,314 children were referred to the Children’s Reporter. This figure represents 5.5% of all the children in Scotland. 40,204 of these children were referred on non-offence grounds, while 14,506 had allegedly committed an offence. 4,396 children were referred on both care and protection and offence grounds.

Section 14 – Community payback orders
Response
Section 14 of the Bill inserts a section (s.227G) into the 1995 Act which creates an order termed a “supervision requirement”, which is defined as follows:

- In this Act, a “supervision requirement” is, in relation to an offender, a requirement that, during the specified period, the offender must attend 5 appointments with the responsible officer or another person determined by the responsible officer, at such time and place as may be determined by the responsible officer, for the purpose of promoting the offender’s rehabilitation.

Committee members will be aware that “Supervision Requirement” is also the name given to an order made by a Children’s Hearing under s.70 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995. As it is possible that both types of Supervision Requirement might apply to an individual child or young person, SCRA suggests that another name is found for the order created under s.14 to avoid confusion.
Section 38 – Prosecution of children

Background and context
Section 38 of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill proposes to raise the threshold age at which children can be prosecuted from 8 to 12 years. We note that the Scottish Government’s proposals are based on some of the recommendations of the Scottish Law Commission’s report on the subject in 2002.

In effect, section 38 of the Bill would result in two distinct ages of criminal responsibility. The age of criminal capacity, below which no child is considered capable of formulating the mens rea of an offence, is set at 8, and the Scottish Government does not propose any change here. The age below which children are immune from criminal prosecution is also 8 at present, but the Bill proposes to raise that age to 12.

Summary of response
SCRA is supportive of the Scottish Government’s proposals, as we firmly believes that the Children’s Hearings System is the best way to deal with children who offend. Many of these children also come to the attention of the Reporter due to concerns about their welfare and the Hearings System is able to ensure they get the most appropriate form of intervention and support, while addressing concerning behaviour.

However, if the System is to deal with the small number of very serious offences committed by 8-12 year olds it must be properly resourced and interventions must be focused and effectively delivered.

Current system
Currently, s.42 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 states that: “no child under the age of 16 years shall be prosecuted for any offence, except on the instructions of the Lord Advocate”

The Lord Advocate’s Guidelines direct the police as to when cases involving children need to be reported both to the Procurator Fiscal (PF) and the Reporter. Where a case is jointly reported, the Procurator Fiscal and the Reporter will discuss the case and a decision will be made by the PF on whether to prosecute.

Various factors will be taken into account in reaching this decision – the seriousness of the offence, the current situation for the child and an assessment of evidence required to support the alleged offence.

Scottish Government and Crown Office figures suggest that there were less than five prosecutions of under-12s in the years 2002/03 to 2006/07.

It is important to bear in mind, that even where a child is prosecuted, the Sheriff may still remit the matter back to a Children’s Hearing for advice or disposal. Indeed, if the child is subject to a Supervision Requirement at the time of the offence, the Sheriff is obliged to ask a Hearing for advice.

Children’s Hearings System – key principles

It is important to understand the differences between the Children’s Hearings System and the criminal justice system.

The Children's Hearings System has been in operation since 1971 and is centred on the welfare of the child. The fundamental principles are that the needs of the child should be the key test; that children who offend and children who are in need of care and protection should be dealt with in the same system (as they are often the same children).

As each child is unique, Hearings make decisions on the basis of the needs and circumstances of the individual child who comes before them. As the Hearings System is designed to be relatively informal and child focused, it requires an individualised and more informed approach to the needs of the individual child in the family and community context.

We note that, as a result of the changes proposed in the Bill, the Children’s Hearings System might be required to deal with a very small number of children referred for committing very serious offences. The way in which it does so will be no different in practical terms to the way the System currently deals with children referred on offence grounds. In other words:

- The criminal standard of proof would apply
- Criminal rules of evidence would apply
- The Reporter and the Hearing would be concerned with the requirement for compulsory measures of supervision, rather than questions of guilt
- Acceptance or establishment of offence grounds for referral would not be a determination of a criminal charge

There are however questions around whether certain police powers, e.g to detain and arrest the child; carry out a formal interview of the child as a suspect; charge the child with an offence; and seize productions and obtain DNA and fingerprints where relevant are linked to the prospect of prosecution.

We believe that the Hearings System continues to be the best way to deal with children who offend, as it can ensure they get the most appropriate available form of intervention and support to address their behaviour and needs.

For example, one of the strengths of the Children’s Hearings System is that a Supervision Requirement made by a Children’s Hearing is subject to review at minimum once every 12 months in order to consider the child’s circumstances and the appropriateness of the measures in place. In addition, a review can be requested by the child or family as well as the local authority (no earlier than 3 months after the Hearing date), which allows the compulsory measures put in place for the child to be revisited regularly. It means that there can be an appropriate and timely response to any change in the child’s circumstances, behaviour and needs.

Resources and partnership working
SCRA notes that the kinds of interventions required by the small number of children to whom the provisions of section 38 apply are likely to be resource intensive. The ability of the Children’s Hearings System to respond effectively to children’s needs and behaviour and needs is dependent on fully resourced, focused and effectively delivered interventions. The Children’s Hearing can place a child on Supervision, with conditions that it considers will address his/her behaviour, but implementation of that Supervision Requirement is the statutory responsibility of the local authority. Indeed, some programmes for young offenders may be delivered by the voluntary sector, contracted by the local authority.

It will be important for good practice in this area to be identified and disseminated. The Scottish Government’s Preventing Offending by Young People Framework includes a strand, led jointly by SCRA and COPFS, which is focused on supporting the development of effective assessment and interventions for high risk young people and disseminating good practice on multi-agency responses. The work of this group will be important in ensuring that the Children’s Hearings System is able to respond appropriately to the particular challenges presented by this group of young people.

Section 47 – Remand and committal of children and young persons
Response
SCRA is supportive of the policy objectives of the provisions, which are defined in the Policy Memorandum accompanying the Bill as being: “…to ensure children (accused of offences) no longer suffer the adverse effects of being remanded in adult prisons alongside convicted adult criminals”.

We note that the recent report of the Securing Our Future Initiative (SOFI) recommended a planned reduction in the capacity of the secure estate from 124 beds to 118, but also suggested that the needs of some high risk young people could be met safely and cost-effectively in their communities using programmes such as the Intensive Support and Monitoring Services (ISMS) model. These recommendations will be important in ensuring that the most effective and appropriate interventions are provided for children and young people, whether that is within the secure estate or via a community-based programme.

In addition to those young people who present a risk to others, secure accommodation also offers a safe and secure environment to young people who are a risk to themselves (often the same young people). It will be important to ensure in implementing any changes to the legislation that the nature or purpose of secure accommodation does not change or shift focus away from the individual needs and welfare of each child placed there. The SOFI report was clear about the need to retain the welfare focus of secure accommodation, and made some recommendations around earlier, more effective care planning and better provision of services for children with particular needs which will help to ensure that this remains the case.

Section 59 - Retention of samples from children referred to children’s hearings

Response summary
SCRA recognises that there is a small group of children and young people who may pose a risk of serious harm to themselves or to others.

We also recognise that there may be some circumstances where children’s DNA and forensic evidence requires to be retained for a limited period of time in order to serve the needs of public protection. SCRA believes however, that while some of these children may present within the Children’s Hearings System due to their offending, it is not the appropriate place for a decision on the retention of DNA and forensic evidence to be taken as it might delay or inhibit the ability of the system to respond to the needs and behaviour of children who offend.

The Multi-Agency Public Protection Arrangements (MAPPA) set out in the Management of Offenders (Scotland) Act 2005 are an established means of identifying, risk-assessing and managing those children and young people who are prosecuted via the criminal justice system and are considered to pose a risk of serious harm. The Scottish Government’s best practice guidance ‘Getting it right for children and young people who pose a risk of serious harm’\(^1\) states that these principles should also be applied to children who are dealt with solely by the Hearings System. SCRA agrees with this approach.

If, as part of that assessment and management of risk it is considered necessary to retain DNA or forensic evidence from a child, SCRA believes that there should be a judicial process, separate from the Children’s Hearings System, which allows all parties, including the child, to be heard and which incorporates all necessary legal protections. Each case should be considered on its own merits and decisions should not be based solely on a specific offence or type of behaviour, although a list of offences might provide a trigger for consideration. Application to the court could be made by the police.

This would ensure that DNA and forensic evidence would only be retained where there was a clear and justifiable reason for doing so, based on sound and established risk management principles. It would also ensure that the ability of the Children’s Hearings System to respond to the needs and behaviour of children who offend is not compromised or inhibited.

Possible impacts on the Children’s Hearings System Children who offend are treated differently from adults who offend, because of their vulnerability, lack of maturity and experience, and other factors related to their youth. The child’s welfare is the paramount consideration [unless the risk of serious harm principle in section 16(5) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 applies].

The taking and retention of a DNA sample could be considered to constitute a serious intrusion on a person’s right to privacy. The UNCRC states the need to provide children with special legal protections. This is found in the Convention’s preamble, which states: “the child, by reason of his physical and mental immaturity, needs special safeguards and care, including appropriate legal protection.”

The operation of Scotland’s Children’s Hearings System is consistent with these principles. If children’s DNA or forensic evidence were to be retained via the Children’s Hearings system, there would be a need to extend the availability of legal representation to ensure appropriate safeguards were provided for children in terms of the consequences of admitting grounds at a Children’s Hearing.

It should be noted here that there has been a longstanding concern that the introduction of legal representation more widely within the Hearings System would lead to a more adversarial process and result in a system which placed less emphasis on the child’s participation, becoming less effective as a result.

SCRA has previously expressed concern\(^2\) that one of the unintended consequences of the Scottish Government’s proposals might be that more children and families choose or are advised not to accept grounds of referral due to the consequences of doing so. This would lead to more grounds requiring to go before the Sheriff for proof, consequent delays in the resolution of cases and in the provision of intervention and support for children and families.

When deciding whether to refer a child to a Hearing, the Reporter considers other factors as well as the referral and the sufficiency of evidence (e.g. the offence incident). Even where the Reporter has concluded that evidence is sufficient, there may not be a requirement for compulsory intervention, for example, because the incident is entirely out of character, there are no other significant concerns about the child and the parental response has been both appropriate and proportionate to the incident. In other circumstances, compulsion may not be needed because the child and family are accepting of the problem and are engaged in work with agencies such as restorative justice or social work.

In making the judgement on the need for compulsion, the Reporter will consider a range of factors which may be present in the child’s background, which might include issues such as parental substance misuse or exposure to domestic violence.

As a result, the establishment of a defined list of offences which automatically trigger the retention of DNA or forensic evidence if grounds are accepted or established does not represent an effective or proportionate method of identifying those children who may pose a risk of serious harm to themselves or others. In reality, the proposals are likely to result in the retention of the DNA or forensic evidence of the most vulnerable children, as the retention provisions could only be triggered for those children who go to a Hearing. Conversely, those children who commit a relevant offence but are dealt with on a voluntary basis will not be covered at all by the Bill’s proposals.

Providing for a separate judicial process, entirely outwith the Hearings system, whereby the police may apply to the Sheriff for the ability to retain DNA or forensic evidence allows any list of relevant offences to be used as a threshold for consideration, rather than as an automatic trigger for retention.

We note that s.59(6) of the Bill says:

“A relevant offence is such relevant sexual offence or relevant violent offence as the Scottish Ministers may by order made by statutory instrument prescribe”

However, s.59(10) says

’relevant sexual offence’ and ‘relevant violent offence’ have the same meanings as in section 19A(6) and include any attempt, conspiracy or incitement to commit such an offence.”

If such a list is to be produced, either as a starting point for a more detailed multi-agency risk assessment, or as an automatic trigger for DNA retention, we believe that it should be developed by an expert working group representing all interests, including those of children and young people themselves.
1. The Role of the Commissioner

1.1 The office of Commissioner was established by the Commissioner for Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2003. The general function of the Commissioner is to ‘promote and safeguard the rights of children and young people’.

1.2 In particular, the Commissioner must review law, policy and practice relating to the rights of children and young people with a view to assessing their adequacy and effectiveness, having particular regard to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC).

1.3 The Act puts a particular emphasis on the involvement of children and young people in the Commissioner’s work, particularly those groups of children and young people who do not have other adequate means by which they can make their views known.

2.1 The United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child was passed by the UN General Assembly in 1989 and ratified by the UK in 1991. Ratification commits the UK to bringing its law, policy and practice into line with the Convention and this represents a promise to the children and young people of Scotland to make life better for them by respecting and promoting their rights as set out in the UNCRC.

2.2 The UNCRC sets out the fundamental human rights that all children around the world, without discrimination, are entitled to. It sets out minimum standards for the rights for children, rather than “best practice”; state parties are thus encouraged to exceed the standards laid out in the Convention, but must not fall short of its basic requirements.

3. Relevant UNCRC Articles

3.1 The following articles of the UNCRC are particularly relevant to this Bill:

Article 3 – The best interest of the child must be a primary consideration
Article 12 – The child must be given a say in decisions that affect their lives
Article 16 – Right to privacy
Article 37 – Freedom from torture, inhuman and degrading treatment and punishment

Article 40 – Juvenile justice, especially 40 (3) on specific systems and procedures to deal with children who offend, outwith the criminal justice system, and 40 (3)(a) on the age of criminal responsibility.

Further, the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child, which oversees the implementation of the Convention by state parties, from time to time issues General Comments to facilitate best practice in UNCRC implementation. General Comment No. 10 (2007), *Children’s Rights in Juvenile Justice*¹ includes the Committee’s views on the age of criminal responsibility, including that an age of criminal responsibility lower than 12 is ‘not internationally acceptable’. It is referred to in more detail below.

3.2 Other relevant international law

Articles 3 (Prohibition of torture, inhuman and degrading treatment and punishment) and 6 (Right to a fair trial) of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) are also relevant. European Court of Human Rights jurisprudence further contributes to our understanding of the notion of the age of criminal responsibility.

In the virtually identical judgments in V v UK and T v UK (2000), the Court held that the child’s ability to understand and participate in the proceedings is the critical factor² in determining the Convention compliance of the criminal justice process and found a violation of article 6 (1) ECHR.

4. Introduction

4.1 We welcome the opportunity to comment on the important proposals in the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill and the opportunity to contribute to the Committee’s deliberations. The Bill is very wide-ranging and our comments will focus on only a few proposals contained within it, which are most pertinent to the rights of children and young people. Critically, the Bill provides a platform to address a number of important issues concerning children and young people’s rights: raising the age of criminal responsibility³, addressing the issue of DNA retention, the abolition of ‘unruly certificates’ to end (or, as the fact may be, further limit) detention of under-16s in adult prisons, and issues around sentencing of parents. We would be delighted if the Parliament and the Scottish Government would adopt the suggestions we make in our submission.

³ We note that there are two concepts that are often used interchangeably; the age of criminal responsibility and the minimum age for prosecution. These two concepts are not the same (for a discussion of the differences see e.g. Gerry Maher (2005), ‘Age and Criminal Responsibility’, Ohio State Journal of Criminal Law, 493-505) and the proposal contained in Part 3 of the Bill is mainly concerned with the minimum age for prosecution, in the sense that it is about the legal system’s response to children who offend rather than the attribution of moral responsibility for children’s offending.

4.2 Our thinking and understanding of the complexities around the key issues of the age of criminal responsibility and the minimum age of prosecution is still developing and we are consulting with partners and stakeholders in advance of our oral evidence to the Committee on 26 May. Our comments below reflect our position at present and we trust they will stimulate the Committee’s debate on the four main issues in the Bill from a children’s rights perspective.

5. Section 38: Minimum Age for Prosecution and the Age of Criminal Responsibility

5.1 We are delighted to see the proposal to raise the minimum age for prosecution from 8 to 12 in this Bill. While the number of prosecutions of children under 12 has been negligible⁴, the very low age has been a dark spot on Scotland’s otherwise relatively strong record of UNCRC implementation for two decades. The UN Committee on the Rights of the Child urged the Government to raise the age in its Concluding Observations on the UK State Party report in 1995, 2002 and 2008⁵. Raising the age to 12 will bring Scotland in line with the absolute minimum acceptable standard set by the UN Committee.

5.2 It is worth noting that the Scottish Government’s approach to raising the age in the present Bill has departed significantly from that proposed by the Scottish Law Commission (SLC) in its report on the issue in 2002⁶. The SLC recommended raising the minimum age for prosecution to 12, and repealing s.41 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, thereby removing any lower age limit for referral to the Children’s Hearing on an offence ground. The Scottish Government’s proposal in the current Bill is to retain s.41 and therefore the minimum age for referral of a child to the Children’s Hearing System at eight. It further inserts a section (s.41A) into the 1995 Act, which raises the minimum age for prosecution to twelve. Finally, it retains s.42 of the Act to the effect that a child aged 12 to 15 may be prosecuted only on instruction of the Lord Advocate.

5.3 This is a rather complicated matter and indeed one where there is a degree of confusion about key concepts. It is SCCYP’s view that the Bill requires amendment if it is do what the Scottish Government intends it to do – the Policy Memorandum that accompanies the Bill states the policy objective as follows:

Policy objectives

188. To ensure Scotland meets international standards as regards the age at which children can be prosecuted.

It then goes on to explain how it is going to achieve that objective:

189. The provisions will raise the age of criminal responsibility by prohibiting the prosecution of children under 12 while still allowing them to be referred to a Children’s Hearing on offence grounds, whilst retaining the existing rule that children under 8 are conclusively presumed not to be guilty of any offence.

This would appear to conflate the two distinct, yet related issues of the age of criminal responsibility and the minimum age for prosecution. It is our view that the international requirement – while focusing on criminal law and procedure – includes criminal consequences as well. The paragraph above suggests that while criminal prosecution of 8-11 year-olds will be out of bounds, referral to the Children’s Hearing on an offence ground with criminal consequences will not be.

5.4 We believe that the Bill in its current form would continue to allow for children between 8 and 11 years of age to face ‘criminal’ consequences despite the new minimum age for prosecution set at 12. With s.41 retained in its present form, disposals of the welfare-based Children’s Hearing relating to this age group count as a conviction for the purposes of the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974. In other words, despite the fact that the child is not dealt with by the criminal justice system but by the welfare-based Children’s Hearing System, s.3 of the 1974 Act means that they will have a criminal record if they and their relevant adult accept an offence ground or an offence ground is established by a Sheriff.

5.5 If the Bill passes as it currently stands, questions would therefore remain as to whether the age of criminal responsibility has actually been raised – it could be argued that in terms of the criminal consequences for children who commit offences this remains at the unacceptably low level that is at present. We make suggestions as to how this dilemma could be resolved at the end of this section (5.10).

5.6 We would like to reiterate our support for the Scottish Government’s intention to raise the age of criminal responsibility in Scotland using this Bill. In determining what the new age of criminal responsibility should be, it is useful to consider the text of the international standards in more detail at this stage.
5.7 In its General Comment No 10, the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child states that ‘[t]he reports submitted by State parties show the existence of a wide range of minimum ages of criminal responsibility. They range from a very low level of age 7 or 8 to the commendable high level of age 14 or 16’. It concludes that ‘a minimum age of criminal responsibility below the age of 12 years is considered by the Committee not to be internationally acceptable’. Finally, the Committee formulates its expectation that the age should continue to be progressively increased and we call on the Parliament and the Scottish Government to aim closer to the ‘commendable high level’ called for by the UN Committee in its General Comment.

5.8 In our view the Parliament should not settle for the minimum internationally acceptable standard but aim higher for Scotland’s children. In the Children’s Hearing System Scotland has got a robust, welfare-based, specialist juvenile justice system that works well. The Children’s Hearing can impose compulsory measures to address offending as well as the underlying causes, and it can and does authorise detention of children and young people in secure accommodation for the protection of themselves and of others where this is necessary.

5.9 Finally, as a specialist system for children and young people, the Children’s Hearing System can deal with children and young people who offend in an appropriate way and enable them to participate in the process – a key element of their right to a fair trial or process according to European Court of Human Rights case law. It is important to ensure sufficient resourcing for the system and to maintain and increase public confidence in it by reinforcing the view that referral to the Hearing is not a ‘soft’ option or ‘letting off’ children and young people who commit offences.

SCCYP’s Suggestions on the Age of Criminal Responsibility

5.10 The following suggestions represent SCCYP’s current thinking around these issues and we will be delighted to discuss these further in our oral evidence in May.

5.10.1 Proceeding without repealing s.41 of the 1995 Act would mean the retention of the age of criminal responsibility at 8. We would suggest that s.41 be repealed subject to our further suggestion below (5.10.2).

5.10.2 A new non-offence ground should be introduced to allow for children under 12 to be referred to the Children’s Hearing so that their behaviour and their needs can be addressed without the prospect of ‘criminal’ consequences. We believe that it would be an abdication of responsibility towards children who offend, their victims and the wider public if the needs and behaviours of those children would not be addressed appropriately, including by means of compulsory measures where this is required.

This is not an entirely new idea; the creation of a new (non-offence) referral ground that catches behaviour that would otherwise be an offence if the child was 12 or over have previously been discussed in the context of the draft Children’s Services (Scotland) Bill. We would invite the Committee and the Scottish Government to revisit these proposals.

5.10.3 In summary, our proposals are:

- Minimum age for prosecution: we endorse the proposal in the Bill that prosecution of children under 12 (or, as is our preference, of a higher age) is not competent.
- The age of criminal responsibility (in the sense that children under that age do not face the force of the criminal law or its consequences) should be 12 (or, as is our preference, a higher age) as well – there should be no criminal consequences under the minimum age for prosecution.
- Children under the age of 12 who display behaviour that would otherwise be an offence if the child was 12 or over should be referred to the Children’s Reporter on a new non-offence ground. The referral or any disposal by the Hearing should have no criminal consequences under the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974.

6. Retention of DNA Samples from Children referred to the Children’s Hearing

6.1 We note that the number of children under the age of 16 who currently have their DNA profile stored on the Scottish DNA Database may be substantially higher than we would have anticipated. In response to a parliamentary question on 25 June 2007, the Cabinet Secretary for Justice stated that there were 2,386 profiles of under-16s on the database, the youngest of whom was 9 years and 4 months old at the time. In the absence of a power to retain the DNA profile of children dealt with by the Children’s Hearing System, and against the background of 474 children under 16 who were proceeded against in the courts between 2004/05 and 2006/07, we would be interested to hear how this high number of children under the age of 16 came to have their DNA profile retained on the database.

6.2 We recognise that in a significant share of offences committed by children and young people, the victim is another child or young person. As we pointed out in our recent response to the Consultation on the Acquisition and Retention of DNA and Fingerprint Data in Scotland, the UNCRC allows for the rights of others to be taken into account – the child’s best interest must be a primary consideration, but it is not focusing on the best interest of an individual child at all times and at all cost. The balancing act between competing rights must, however, be explicit and proportionate.

6.3 While we accept some of the premise for the proposal in s. 59, we consider that automatic retention of the DNA profile of children dealt with by the Children’s Hearing on offence grounds in the database would be disproportionate, even where this is limited to a list of specified offences. There are questions about how such a change could impact on the character of the Children’s Hearing System as a welfare-centred forum rather than one focused on establishing criminal guilt or otherwise; and about thresholds, for example in relation to assaults, and consensual under age sexual activity. Further questions remain with regards to children who are looked after in residential settings, where their behaviour is under much closer scrutiny and police involvement in incidents is much more likely, where these incidents might be resolved informally if the child had not been in care. Finally, the Scottish Children’s Reporter Administration (SCRA) makes an important point in its written submission regarding the decision-making process at the Children’s Hearing. Its concern is that the process that is proposed in s.59 of the Bill would lead to the most vulnerable children and young people having their DNA retained, not necessarily those who pose the most significant risk to the public.

6.4 For these reasons, we would suggest that the Bill be amended to the effect that the DNA profile of a child who is dealt with by the Children’s Hearing system can be retained only if the following conditions are met: (1) the child has been referred on an offence ground; (2) the offence is one of a list of ‘trigger offences’ to be specified in the Bill; these should be serious violent and sexual offences; (3) the child and their relevant adult have accepted the ground, or it has been established by a Sheriff; (4) the police or another relevant agency has made an application to the Sheriff for an order to retain the child’s DNA for a period of up to three years; and (5) the Sheriff makes a decision based on the risk that the child poses to public safety.

7. Remand and Committal of Children

7.1 We welcome the abolition of ‘unruly certificates’ in s.47 of the Bill and the resulting changes to the detention of children under 16 in adult prisons. We agree with the Cabinet Secretary for Justice that ‘Prison is no place for children’.

7.2 There is a further, related issue, regarding the detention of children aged 14 and over who have been convicted under s.205 or s.208 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. This retains the possibility of children being detained in adult prisons, which is entirely unacceptable. If ‘prison is no place for children’, it is no place for any child.

8. Sentencing

8.1 Last year, SCCYP published the report, ‘Not Seen. Not Heard. Not Guilty. The rights and status of the children of prisoners in Scotland’ 14, in which we argued that the children of prisoners are the invisible victims of crime and of our penal system. One of the report’s key recommendations is that when courts take sentencing decisions regarding a parent, the rights and interests of the children should be taken into account. At present, decisions to imprison a parent rarely take account of the potential impact on children.

8.2 SCCYP believes that this current approach to the sentencing of parents, seen from the point of view of the child, is contrary to the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) and the UNCRC. Children have the same rights as adults to respect for their private and family life under Article 8 of the ECHR. The imprisonment of a parent is a prima facie interference with that right. Such interference may, however, be justified if it is in accordance with the law, necessary in the pursuit of a legitimate aim (which includes the prevention of disorder or crime and public safety) and if the interference is proportionate to the aim sought. Applying article 8 to sentencing decisions involving parents would require courts to assess the impact of sentencing options on the rights of any children affected to ensure that any interference with their rights is proportionate. It is fair to say that, at present, this balancing of the children’s rights and the wider public interest is not carried out in all cases.

8.3 We therefore welcome the Bill’s statement of the purpose and principles of sentencing, in particular ss.1(3) and (4), which list matters to which a court must have regard in sentencing an offender. These matters include ‘the offender’s family circumstances’ (s.1(4)(c)). This section provides a further statutory basis for courts to take account of the impact of the sentence on an offender’s children when considering sentencing options. We also welcome the Bill’s establishment of a Scottish Sentencing Council and its ability to produce sentencing guidelines. We hope that such guidelines will reflect the rights of children and young people, either in the context of being sentenced themselves, or when they will be affected by decisions regarding an offending parent.

14 The report was laid before Parliament on 7 February 2008 (CCYP/2008/1) and is available from SPICe and online at http://sccyp.co.uk/admin/04policy/files/spo_061937Children%20of%20Prisoners%20Report.pdf.
Justice Committee
Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill
Written submission from Children in Scotland

Children in Scotland appreciates the opportunity to submit written evidence to the Justice Committee in respect of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. Children in Scotland represents over 450 statutory, voluntary and independent members promoting children’s wellbeing and best interests.

We are confining our comments to the aspects of the Bill relating specifically to children and to a broad outline of our position. Our Director of Research, Policy and Programmes (Dr Jonathan Sher) has been invited to appear before the Committee on 26 May. At that time, more detailed evidence will be offered.

We support the additional safeguards contained in the Bill for children who become involved, in various ways, with the criminal justice system. The ending of ‘unruly certificates’ and the requirement on courts to use detention for a child only in exceptional circumstances [Section 17 (3) and Section 47] are welcome.

We also agree with the Bill’s provision that the Court will be required to document its reasons for believing that no other option would be suitable. We believe that placing children in prison is both entirely inappropriate and detrimental to their future welfare. Children placed in adult prisons are frequently subject to assault and intimidation by adult prisoners, as well as being more likely to re-offend.

The extension of the circumstances in which indecent images of children constitutes grounds for prosecution [Section 33] is welcome. We hope that it will have a deterrent effect. It is critical that children who have been abused in this way will be dealt with through child protection procedures. An unambiguous connection needs to be made between criminal prosecution procedures and child protection systems.

We commend the measures proposed to deal with human trafficking [Section 35]. We are, however, particularly concerned about the trafficking of children, the inadequacy of the systems for investigation and support of such children, and the complications of prosecuting those responsible. Many unaccompanied children arrive in Scotland, some of whom have been trafficked and some of whom have been smuggled into the UK and abused en route. The Bill would be strengthened by specific reference to, and specific remedies for, this problem.

The policy intent of additional protection for child witnesses [Section 64] and of specified time limits for the retention and destruction of samples taken from children [Section 59] are heading in the right direction. Particularly, on the latter issue, there are further safeguards for children and young people that should be put in place.

Increasing the age of criminal responsibility [Section 38] is strongly endorsed. We continue to believe that the term ‘criminal responsibility’ is an unhelpful euphemism. The underlying issue is the age at which children become subject to criminal prosecution, criminal penalties, criminal status and criminal records. While many aspects of Scotland’s policy and law in relation to children and young people has been ground-breaking and progressive, notably the welfare-based Children’s Hearings system), allowing 8-year-olds to be regarded and treated as criminals has long been out of step.

Raising the age significantly will bring Scotland into line not only with its own general approach to the rights of children and young people, but also with the majority of European states. While the UN rapporteurs found many elements of Scottish policy for children commendable, they expressed deep concern over this question, and strongly recommended that the age be raised. The Scottish Government has publicly endorsed the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. Significantly raising the age through this Bill demonstrates a step toward the appropriate implementation of the UNCRC.

Introduction

CARE is a charity and has over 30,000 registered supporters from all Christian denominations throughout the UK. CARE’s Public Affairs Department acts as a think tank on ethical issues in biology and medicine, as well as in education and social issues. CARE also briefs supporters and Parliamentarians as relevant issues are considered in Westminster, Brussels and the devolved Parliaments and Assemblies.

CARE for Scotland has an office in Glasgow. CARE for Scotland has approximately 3,000 registered supporters drawn from across the main denominations in Scotland. Since 1999 CARE for Scotland has maintained a significant public policy presence with a parliamentary officer liaising with the Scottish Executive/Government and the Scottish Parliament. We have responded to many consultations and frequently given evidence to parliamentary committees.

CARE is supportive of the measures in the Bill. We limit our specific comments to Sections 34 and 35 of the Bill which deal with extreme pornography and people trafficking.

Extreme Pornography

CARE welcomes the proposal in Section 34 of the Bill to criminalise the possession of extreme pornography. We are conscious that this new offence is similar to that introduced by Section 63 of the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 which applies in England & Wales. Section 34 of the Bill largely replicates the relevant sections of the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act, 2008. However the Bill goes further that that Act and we are supportive of the Scottish Government’s aim to legislate also for an offence which will cover “all obscene pornographic images which realistically depict rape or other non-consensual penetrative sexual activity.”

However, there are a number of issues which the Committee may wish to consider in relation to section 34. Whilst the new offence is to be commended, the devil is in the detail with significant new definitions introduced in this clause. Specifically there are two thresholds to this offence – ‘pornographic’ and ‘extreme image’, defined by three rather complex sub-clauses.
Firstly section 34(2) defines a “pornographic” image if “it is of such a nature that it must reasonably be assumed to have been made solely or principally for the purpose of sexual arousal”. This section makes clear that if the image is one of a series it must be considered in context. If it is taken out of context and the rest of the images were not pornographic, then the single image is not considered pornographic. The significant points to note here are:

- The use of the word “pornography” has, in the past, been resisted as part of obscenity legislation. In particular, it does not feature in section 51 of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act, 1982. Moreover, the definition of pornography in the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 (and in this Bill) differs from the definition of pornography in section 51 of the Sexual Offences Act 2003 which applies in England & Wales, that is “a person is involved in pornography if an indecent image of that person is recorded; and similar expression and ‘pornography’ are to be interpreted accordingly.” At the time that the UK Government announced this new definition in August 2006, they acknowledged that the joint Home Office and Scottish Executive consultation had raised concerns about how to interpret the term “pornography”.¹

- It is up to the jury to determine whether an image is pornographic, but it is not clear how – will there be a question about the intent of the original publisher if they are not the person being prosecuted. In Lord Halsbury’s Obscenity Bill debated in the House of Lords on 18 Dec 1996, he used the term “in a manner which a reasonable person would regard as grossly offensive”. This suggestion was criticised by the Labour opposition of the day because of the difficulties of defining both a reasonable person or grossly offensive and the Government said that the “personal moral code of the individual concerned could fundamentally affect the judgement reached” and would therefore not provide the courts with any certainty. The definition in Section 34 of this Bill seems similar to that contained in Lord Halsbury’s Bill and the same concerns arise – will the judgement depend on how easily the jury are sexually aroused?!

- There is no power for the police to confiscate (forfeit) the material, so that even if a person is prosecuted the images can remain in circulation.

2. Secondly, section 34(2) defines an “extreme image” by use of a list approach, which in the past has been deemed unworkable by the Home Office². The images to be restricted are those that are realistic in their depiction of the activities contained in the list. The points to note on this sub-clause are:

² Note this was not the major criticism of Lord Halsbury’s Bill in the debate, but was expected to be because of previous Home Office statements.

- Images of sexual violence towards a live person where consent is involved and severe injury is not caused, or likely to be caused, are not prohibited.
- The question of realism is tricky. Does this definition this mean an image that is “photo-realistic” or could it cover extremely violent cartoon material or material derived from a photo?
- Films classified by the British Board of Film Classification under the Video Recordings Act 1984 are specifically excluded from the legislation, unless a part of a classified work has been extracted for the purpose of sexual arousal.

3. Thirdly, section 34(2) defines an “image” as a moving or still image, or data that can be converted into such an image. It is not clear if a series of images as described in clause 34(2) will be lead to more than one count of possession or not, ie is a film one image or a series of images?

Human Trafficking

We welcome Section 35 of the Bill, which tightens the law on human trafficking. However, we do feel that an opportunity has missed to really tackle one of the root causes of human trafficking.

Economic poverty, gender discrimination and social vulnerability are all root causes for human trafficking. In addition, the high level of profit to be made – due to the rising demand for prostitution - is a major pull factor for criminal gangs to engage. Until the root causes of sex trafficking and other forms of sexual exploitation through prostitution are sufficiently addressed, attempts to diminish the phenomenon will be limited.

We are encouraged that the Scottish Government, along with the UK Home Office, has ratified the Council of Europe Convention on Action against Trafficking in Human Beings, which came into force on 1st April 2009. Article 6 of the convention clearly indicates the necessity of tackling demand in order to reduce this type of exploitation. In Scotland’s commitment to tackle human trafficking, this must be a priority. Article 19 of the Convention stresses the importance of criminalising the use of services of a victim of trafficking.

It is important to note that this legislative move alone will not end exploitative prostitution. It is a complex issue which requires a multi-faceted approach including safe exit strategies and support, education, funding for local projects and awareness raising initiatives. Moreover, even when legislation exists it can be difficult to secure successful prosecutions as evidenced by the fact that there have been no successful prosecutions in Scotland under the offences introduced by the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003. However, criminalising the purchase of sexual services is a significant part of reducing exploitative prostitution and sex trafficking as it directly tackles the demand which cultivates the industry.

The UK Government has included in the Police and Crime Bill a proposal to outlaw the purchase of sexual services from someone controlled for another person’s gain. Whilst this is welcome, it does raise questions as to how it will be enforced. CARE is of the view that it would be more effective to simply outlaw the purchase of sexual services. Moreover, not to do so suggests that society is willing to condone male exploitation of women who are not trafficking victims and/or are not controlled for another person’s gain, but find themselves through drug addiction or other life circumstances driven into prostitution. This is the case in relation to off-street prostitution as the measures introduced to counter kerb-crawling by the Prostitution Public Places (Scotland) Act 2007 do not apply.

The Scottish Government are considering their position on these matters and are yet to indicate if they will bring forward legislation. This raises the prospect of more people being trafficked into Scotland, which ACPOS estimates already receives a disproportionate number of trafficked persons compared to the rest of the UK, if the UK Government legislates for England & Wales and the Scottish Government chooses not to legislate in this area. Even if a delay is involved before the legislative framework north and south of the border is brought into line, there is likely to be an increase in people trafficking for the purpose of sexual exploitation into Scotland.
Justice Committee

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from West Lothian Council

A separate response has been provided by the West Lothian Licensing Board in relation to liquor licensing. This response relates to those provisions in Part 8 of the Bill dealing with licensing under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982.

Time has not permitted formal discussion of these proposals by the Council. The views contained herein are therefore the views of officers within Legal Services and the Licensing Standards Officers.

The amendments to the 1982 Act set out in the Bill are welcomed and will assist the Council to exercise its statutory responsibilities.

I have the following additional comments –

(1) S 124(2) – Reference to “taxi and private hire car licences” should be changed to “taxi and private hire car driving licences”.

(2) The proposals contained in Section 128(3) (e) are of interest. Paragraph 9(3)(e) of Schedule 2 of the 1982 Act presently prohibits the grant of a Sex Shop licence to a person who has not been resident in the United Kingdom for the 6 months immediately preceding the date of their application. The Bill proposes to include residence in any member states of the European Community.

It is appreciated that there are European Community Treaty requirements to allow freedom of movement and the ability to work to all citizens within the European Community. We understand that reasonable restrictions can be imposed on the grounds of public policy, public security or public health. The restrictions on obtaining a Sex Shop licence would presumably be justifiable on the grounds of public safety so that persons operating such premises do not pose a threat to the public, particularly vulnerable groups, such as children.

We would ask that some thought be given to introducing a similar restriction on persons seeking to obtain taxi and private hire car driver licences. Taxis and private hire cars often carry children and vulnerable adults, mostly without incident. However, licensing authorities and the police wish to ensure that all drivers are subject to rigorous background and criminal checks. These checks cannot be carried out effectively on persons who reside out with the United Kingdom. The 1982 Act requires the local authority to have evidence as to whether a person is not a fit and proper person to hold a licence. The onus is not on the applicant to show that he is a fit and proper person. If the applicant has not resided in the in the United Kingdom for a reasonable period of time, the police would not be able to check their criminal records and the licensing authority would be bound to grant the licence.

It may be possible for licensing authorities to refuse to grant taxi or private hire car driver licences on the “other good reason” grounds set out in Paragraph 5(3) (d) of Schedule 1 to the 1982 Act. It would be preferable (to avoid legal challenge and to introduce uniformity across Scotland) if a specific provision could be entered into the Bill prohibiting the grant of taxi or private hire car driving licences to persons who have not resided continuously in the United Kingdom for the 5 years immediately preceding their application.

It is suggested that the period of 5 years would be sufficient to allow potential applicants to demonstrate a “clean record” and that they could safely be allowed to carry unaccompanied passengers. It is also suggested that only residence within the United Kingdom would be relevant, due to the present lack of comprehensive and uniform criminal record keeping system within the European Community.

It is suggested that the above provision would not be incompatible with the right of movement and employment within the European Community. Non UK resident applicants would only be being placed into the same position as those who had resided within the UK in the preceding 5 years and these would be reasonable restrictions designed to ensure protection of the public and wholly appropriate given the special nature of a taxi or private hire car driver’s duties.

It is appreciated that this would represent a significant change in taxi/private hire car driver licensing legislation. It may be considered more appropriate to consult further rather than include it in the present Bill. It is intended that a more detailed letter on this issue will be sent to the relevant ministers in due course. However, if it is considered appropriate to include such a provision in the present Bill, we would suggest the following amendment to S 124 of the Bill, by insertion after 124(2) –

(3) In section 13 (taxi and private hire car driving licences) insert the following subsection after subsection (3) –

“(3A) A licensing authority shall not grant a licence under this section to a person who is not resident in the United Kingdom or was not so resident throughout the period of five years immediately preceding the date when the application was made.”

(3) In relation to the changes proposed by Section 125 - market operators. There is a significant change suggested to the definition removing the exemption from requiring a licence for charitable, religious, youth, recreational, community, political or similar organisations running markets at which goods are offered for sale by more than one seller. This will impact on a number of community groups who run car boot sales or joint fundraising events and who rely on volunteers to fundraise. These groups are unlikely to have the benefit of legal advice and thus be unaware that they will now require to be licensed. This change in the law will require to be widely publicised and we would welcome national publicity in this regard (to supplement publicity organised by the Council) and a long enough lead in time to bring this to the attention of such organisations who would otherwise be difficult to reach out to.

Written submission from North Lanarkshire Council

In response to the Scottish Parliament Justice Committee call for evidence, this written submission sets out comments from North Lanarkshire Council Officers on provisions contained in the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill.

The development of a single reparative community penalty (between 20 - 300 hours) under the community service brand, combining the best elements of current community orders is generally welcomed and is in line with the authorities Action Plan and its move several years ago to establishing a Restorative Justice Approach to delivering community service. The reports “Reforming and Revitalising” published in November 2007 and “Protecting Scotland’s Communities - Fair, Fast and Flexible Justice” in 2008 set out the Government’s aspirations for immediacy and visibility and have given North Lanarkshire Council and the Lanarkshire Community Justice Authority the opportunity to consider and prepare for the changes in legislation.

A number of initiatives have been introduced and developed. Community engagement has been enhanced with links to North Lanarkshire Council Partnership Community Planning Structure and six local Community Safety Sub-Groups. This informs the work scheduling and ensures that it is meaningful to community safety and aesthetics. It also gives the offender a stakehold in the community and enhances their skills, work discipline and employability with the aim of reducing re-offending. The introduction of Mandatory Supervision Orders in September 2007 has resulted in Restorative Justice developing a range of expertise and a portfolio of placements and opportunities for the rehabilitative element in the new Community Payback Order.

The change in timescale of completion of an Order from twelve to six months poses the greatest challenge and is not as simplistic as doubling the capacity and budget. There are a number of practical difficulties, one example is that a service user in full time employment with a 300 hours order would require to work two days per week in addition to their paid employment to complete within six months and this would raise a significant number of difficulties. Despite these challenges, North Lanarkshire Council is currently exploring a range of initiatives and methods to effect this change in legislation but this may have a significant impact on resources. This impact will be especially felt by North Lanarkshire Council given that unlike other local authorities, North Lanarkshire Council services more than one court.

If the government goes ahead with this proposal there may be an unintended knock-on effect. If a case has such a significant sexual element that would allow the imposition of a SOPO, then the court would be mandated to give serious consideration to Paragraph 60 of Part II of the Sexual Offences Act 2003 - this may cause a degree of confusion about how long the subject requires to be subject to notification.

Sections 58 - 60

Use of DNA and Fingerprint Data

There remains a lack of clarity about the database which retains DNA information about convicted offenders. To extend this facility at this time to non-convicted persons would likely constitute a violation of their human rights - this would undermine public confidence in the justice system.

Section 63

The compelling of spouses to give evidence against a partner is more than likely to place the non-offending spouse in a situation where they are at greater risk from, for example, violent partners.

The vast majority of the currently ‘non-compelled’ witnesses are women experiencing domestic abuse. If the woman is then “compelled” to give evidence by statute and thereupon refuses to do so, she will be held in contempt of court, i.e. she will become an offender. This form of Hobson’s choice of a rock and a hard place has no locus in a modern justice system.

Section 71

As an agency that has empowerment at the heart of its core values, caution must be applied in terms of the wholesale support of this proposed change in law. Social Work will never seek to shy away from issues that involve criminal behaviour but it also must have confidence in the agencies to which it supplies any information – especially in relation to those members of the public (service users) who are marginalised and excluded. The function and role of any such ‘anti-fraud’ organisations would have to be clearly identified before Social Work could from such partnerships.

Section 38

The rise in the age of prosecution from 8 to 12 is a positive move. It is important to minimise contact with adult criminals and to address their needs as well as their offending.
PART 8 - LICENSING UNDER CIVIC GOVERNMENT (SCOTLAND) ACT 1982

With reference to Section 123 (licensing of Metal Dealers) Sub-section (3) of the Bill reference is made to Section 29 of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 (Metal Dealers’ exemption warrants) which states:-

(1) In Sub-section (1) - (iii) for the words from “£100,000” to the end substitute “such sum (including nil) as the Licensing Authority may determine”.

It is agreed that that the monetary sum (including nil) in respect of an “exemption warrant” should be a matter for the Licensing Authority to determine. Such an amendment to the present Act would allow objections to be received which are precluded under the terms of Section 29 - (1) of the existing Act, if the total amount received by the dealer as principal in the ordinary course of his business in respect of metal sold or supplied by him, without deduction being made, exceeded £100,000.

Apart from the above comments, the remainder of the amendments in Part 8 of the Bill relative to the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 are concurred with.

Section 129

Views on Raising the Age of Purchase of Alcohol to 21

62% of organisations who responded to the Scottish Government discussion paper “Changing Scotland’s Relationship with Alcohol” expressed opposition to the proposal to raise the minimum age for off-sales purchases to 21. While 52% of health organisations welcomed the proposal, less than 30% of local government organisations were in favour.

Arguments for raising the age

There are significant levels of health and social harm problems associated with young people drinking*:-

- Young people who begin drinking before age 15 are 4 times more likely to develop alcohol dependence than those who begin drinking at 21 years
- Drinking in adolescence is a factor in ischaemic strokes
- Increasing the age of purchase has had a positive impact on youth drunk driving
- The highest rate of drunk drive accidents are in the 17-19 age group followed by 20 to 24 age group
- 76% of young offenders reported that they were drunk at the time of their offence compared to 41% of older offenders
Alcohol was a factor in 669 attendances at emergency departments by young people
- 98% of these were aged 13-17 and 2% were aged 8 - 12
- The average amount consumed was 13 units
- 1,962 emergency admissions involved 15-19 year olds and 2,204 involved 20-24 year olds
- A significant number of presentations involve alcohol poisoning and there are 110 assaults requiring treatment every day of which 70% involved alcohol
- Those in the youngest age range (18-29) and in the oldest (65+) are the least likely to identify recommended drinking limits
- 60% of both men and women aged 16-24 years reported binge drinking
- Binge drinking in men and women decreased as the person got older
- Of the 50 million litres of pure alcohol sold in Scotland, 31.5 million was off sales and 18.2 million was on sales
- 10% of 13 year olds and 19% of 15 year olds had made an attempt at buying alcohol from a supermarket/off-license and more than 50% reported they were successful
- Attempts to buy at a bar or club was 5% for 13 year olds and 15% for 15 year olds
- 21 year olds may be less likely to purchase alcohol for under 18s
- The person would required to drink alcohol in a more controlled, regulated environment

Arguments against

- This could potentially criminalise more young people and put significant demands on the justice system
- The government should be focusing on other measures to reduce the harm associated with younger age groups drinking including:
  - Extend alcohol information to the over 18 i.e. further education establishments, places of work
  - Raise awareness of drink driving and potentially reduce the legal driving limit for newly qualified drivers or drivers under 21
  - Increased effort to ensure responsible practice in off-sales
  - Increased proof of purchase schemes, test purchasing
  - Enforcement of penalties if establishments breach this
  - Systematic evaluation of recent pilots or analysis of benefits in other countries i.e. some countries already have different age limits for on and off-sales, the strength of alcohol being purchased and if accompanied by a responsible adult
  - Support other measures such as minimum pricing
Views in relation to Overprovision Statements

In relation to overprovision which the Board are bound to assess, the amendments are cosmetic although it is noted that the Board is empowered at any time to review any over provision assessment. Allowing the Board to do this acknowledges that any determination made by the Board regarding over provision is subject to change/modification at any time.

Views on the Duty to Assess the Impact of off-sales to Persons under the Age of 21

In preparing a detrimental impact statement regarding the extent to which the Board considers that off sales to persons under that age has a detrimental impact in an area or locality, the Board are required to conduct consultations with designated persons. The only comment on this point is whether the Scottish Government would intend to provide a style questionnaire for Boards to utilise when conducting such consultations or whether Boards will be left with a total discretion as to the manner in which they make their enquiries. The request that the appropriate Chief Constable or relevant Council provide the Board with statistical information for the purpose of preparing a detrimental impact statement is useful and it is simply enquired as to whether the Government would intend by regulation stipulating any timescale for this. It is noted that there is a timescale imposed regarding the Board being bound to consider reviewing the detrimental impact statement at the request of either the Chief Constable or the Local Licensing Forum. The acknowledgement that it is for the Board to determine “a locality” for the purposes of preparing a detrimental impact statement acknowledges the Board’s expertise and local knowledge regarding localities in their area.

Views on Provisions regarding the Board being empowered to Vary Premises License conditions, the Various Procedural Requirements and the Board being Vested with Powers to Revoke any Variations

It is enquired whether there is an intention that any person whose licence may be the subject of any such variation will be afforded an opportunity of making representation regarding whether he/she feels the variation is appropriate in relation to the furtherance of the licensing objectives.

Section 130

The amendments made regarding notification requirements in relation to premises licence applications impose less onerous requirements on staff who service Licensing Boards. It is simply enquired whether such staff will be afforded total discretion as to what other persons apart from the Chief Constable will be given copies of any premises licence application.
Section 131

The provision allowing a Licensing Board to consider granting an application if a modification proposed by them were made to the operating plan or layout plan provides clarity and is welcome.

Section 132

The provisions regarding anti-social behaviour reports being provided gives a degree of flexibility since the legislation as originally drafted envisaged such reports having to be prepared and considered in every case when this may not always be necessary. Allowing the Chief Constable if he sees fit to produce such reports or the Board at any time prior to determining applications to request such reports from the Chief Constable will avoid any unnecessary work being undertaken regarding the preparation of such reports. Clearly the thinking has to be that such reports will only be prepared if it is thought helpful to the Board in their determination of applications.

Section 133

The provision of Section 133 of the Bill amending Section 63 makes it clear regarding alcohol being sold or taken away from licensed premises outwith licensed hours being, subject to certain exceptions, an offence.

Section 134

The proposed alterations regarding the processing of occasional licences allows, in certain circumstances, the expeditious processing of such applications and is to be welcomed. Clearly in the case of provision being made for events like funerals it would be impracticable to adhere to the timescales originally laid down in the legislation. It is enquired, however, as to why the function of deciding whether an occasional licence application can be fast tracked cannot be delegated to staff who service the Licensing Board since precluding this happening could, on occasion, cause unnecessary delay.

The provisions in the Bill regarding the Boards being empowered to vary conditions of extended hours applications are broadly welcomed but it is again enquired as to whether any licence holder will be afforded an opportunity of commenting on/making representations about any variation that he does not consider necessary or expedient for the purposes of any of the licensing objectives.

The provisions regarding personal licences are sound. The incentives of persons holding such licences being required to surrender them to the Board and the failure to do so constituting an offence are welcomed. This will help licensing staff maintain an accurate and up to date register of all extant personal licences.

With regard to the provisions on Emergency Closure Orders, it is helpful that the rank of the particular police officer be specified. In addition, it is useful that any police officer (rank of inspector or above) is vested with the power to extend any closure order for a further period not exceeding twenty four hours if the officer reasonably believes that the matters which led to the original order being imposed continue.

Section 138

The provision whereby persons knowingly make false statements in applications are deemed to have committed an offence is welcomed since this will be an incentive for applications to be completed honestly and accurately.

Section 139 and Schedule 4

The alterations to Section 23 of the Act in extending the grounds of refusal to include all licensing objectives and not just the crime prevention objective are welcomed. There was always a feeling that the Board’s powers were unnecessarily restricted in this area with the legislation as it was originally drafted. The extension of the Chief Constable’s powers to recommend refusal on the grounds that granting the application would be inconsistent with any licensing objective is also welcomed. The provisions regarding allowing a Licensing Board to grant an application (without a hearing) in the event of the Board not receiving the specified notice from the Chief Constable or any recommendation from the Chief Constable will allow for applications to be processed more expeditiously without arrangements having to be made for the applications to call before the full Board. On a similar theme in relation to personal licence applications and their determinations, the inclusion of all licensing objectives having significance is welcomed. The provisions regarding the Board not having to hold hearings in certain circumstances again are welcomed and will allow for the smoother operation of Licensing Board business.

The proposed new power of the Chief Constable to report conduct inconsistent with the licensing objectives will, of course, be welcomed by the police and it is a positive measure since it allows for the ongoing monitoring of the operation of premises and personal licences and is a clear indicator to those involved in the licensed trade that if the police in their monitoring of matters have concerns regarding anything inconsistent with any licensing objectives there is provision for them to refer the matter, as they see fit to the Licensing Board.

I trust you will find the foregoing comments to be of interest and relevance to Parliament when scrutinising this Bill.

Written submission from Children 1st

For 125 years CHILDREN 1ST, the Royal Scottish Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children, has been working to give every child in Scotland a safe and secure childhood. We support families under stress, protect children from harm and neglect, help them recover from abuse and promote children’s rights and interests. We provide over 40 local services as well as five national services including ParentLine Scotland which is the free, national telephone helpline for parents and carers and ChildLine in Scotland which is operated by CHILDREN 1ST on behalf of the NSPCC.

General comments

We welcome the opportunity to comment on this Bill. The provisions within these proposals will have a significant effect on the children and young people we work with. This includes victims and/or witnesses to crime, children referred to the hearings system and children who have been dealt with by the adult courts. The proposals on licensing have the potential to affect many young people in Scotland.

This is a wide-ranging bill and CHILDREN 1ST has been keen to consider the impact on children of its provisions. There are many aspects of the proposals that we welcome although there are areas where we feel the Scottish Government could take more radical action.

In particular, proposals to raise the age of criminal responsibility in Scotland are long overdue. We welcome an increase to twelve but do feel this is the bare minimum and still leaves Scotland with a low age in comparison to many other European states.

The Justice Committee has indicated that it wishes to hear views on the general principles of the bill. This submission highlights a number of areas that are of concern or interest to CHILDREN 1ST. As ever, we are happy to provide more detail on any of these issues.

Sentencing (section 32)

We recognise the need to ‘tidy up’ the law relating to offences relating to the sexual services of children and child pornography. We are content that these provisions allow the imposition of a fine as well as, or instead of, a custodial sentence but we also welcome the statement in the accompanying policy memorandum which states “custodial sentences are likely to be appropriate for most offenders”.

1 Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill, Policy memorandum, page 23, para 143
Indecent images of children (section 33)
We support this provision to clarify the law and close a gap in legislation which has emerged as technology has developed.

CHILDREN 1ST firmly believes that possession of any material where child sexual abuse may have taken place in order for the material to exist should be prohibited. This would include manipulated images where a photograph had been altered to create a drawing or cartoon and where material has been produced to look like a photograph.

Downloading, accessing or possessing such images is not a victimless crime. By contributing to demand, anyone who buys, downloads or distributes indecent images of children, whether these are photographs or manipulated images is directly contributing to child abuse.

CHILDREN 1ST believes that such images may fuel inappropriate feelings towards children and young people, and that they may be used to groom children. From its work with children and young people who have been abused, CHILDREN 1ST knows how devastating the effects of sexual abuse can be.

However, in order for the legislation not to inadvertently criminalise legitimate use of such images (medical text books for example), we believe that the purpose for which such images are created and/or used should be a key consideration in deciding whether or not their possession should be banned, or whether or not they should be confiscated.

Prosecution of Children (section 38)
The stated policy objective of this section is to “ensure Scotland meets international standards as regards the age at which children can be prosecuted”\(^2\)

It is therefore disappointing the Scottish Government has chosen the minimum interpretation of “international standards” and only propose to prohibit the prosecution of children under 12.

CHILDREN 1ST believe that children have the right to be treated first and foremost as children and that this should never include criminal prosecution and all of the consequences of this. We view children as being up 18 years of age.

We recognise that there are already a low number of criminal prosecutions of under 12s and most children over that age are referred to the Hearings System. However, we believe that the age of criminal responsibility sets an important principle of how we see children in law and in our society. At a time when we have raised the legal age to buy cigarettes to 18 and are discussing restrictions of off-sales to under 21s, it does seem incongruous that we are seeking to set the age of criminal responsibility so low.

The hearings system is internationally recognised as a model of balancing justice and welfare requirements when it comes to children. CHILDREN 1ST believe that children under 16 (and debatably under 18) should be dealt with by the Hearings System. In most cases, the hearings system has adequate disposals already but we would welcome discussion of any further powers that would be required to allow it to deal with more serious offences in these older age groups.

This reform would be more in keeping with the spirit of the international recommendations that have been made. This is clearly indicated in a recent report by the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child. They state:

"the Committee urges States parties not to lower their MACR <Minimum age of criminal responsibility> to the age of 12. A higher MACR, for instance 14 or 16 years of age, contributes to a juvenile justice system which, in accordance with article 40 (3) (b) of CRC, deals with children in conflict with the law, without resorting to judicial proceedings, providing that the child’s human rights and legal safeguards are fully respected.”

In addition, the UN’s consideration of the report submitted by the UK to the Committee on the Rights of the Child under article 44 of the Convention (a report to the UN on how states have progressed in implementing the rights in the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child) also highlights their “concern” at an age of consent of 8 in Scotland and re-iterates a need to raise this to 14 or 16.

Remand and committal of children and young persons (section 47)
An end to the provision for ‘unruly certificates’ to be used to detain children aged 14 or 15 in the prison system is welcome and long overdue. There is clear, long-standing research evidence to show the damaging effects of mixing adult prisoners with children. Moreover, it simply does not represent a 21st century justice system. CHILDREN 1ST welcome reform of the law to remove this provision and, where necessary, use secure accommodation or a suitable place of safety.

Retention and use of samples (sections 58-60)
CHILDREN 1ST has previously commented on the ‘Fraser Report on Retention of DNA and fingerprint data’ and we re-iterate some of our concerns below.

We share the view of the Scottish Government that the retention of DNA and fingerprints must strike a balance between protecting the rights of the individual and promoting effective law enforcement. In considering this issue, CHILDREN 1ST have attempted to explore the potential benefits and/or drawbacks for society of retaining DNA and fingerprint data, and any potential risks to children and childhood from doing so.

In our comments on the Fraser report, CHILDREN 1st concluded that it is not appropriate or necessary to retain any child’s DNA or fingerprints for any length of time.

The reasons for this position are:

- A child’s right to be treated as a child
In striking the balance between protecting the rights of the individual with the need for law enforcement, we emphasise that children are not the same as adults in law or in the rights that they hold. As more vulnerable members of society who have yet to fully develop and thus only have developing responsibilities, they have the right to special protection for their liberty and welfare. This principle is reflected in the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, and in Scots law through the Children’s Hearings system where children who commit criminal offences are treated differently from adults who commit criminal offences.

There is therefore, a very good case for striking a different balance between the protection of a child’s liberty and rights, and law enforcement, than applies to adults.

- Undermines the welfare basis of Children’s Hearings
We are concerned that the introduction of long term criminal consequences to Children’s Hearings that would follow a child into adult life would undermine the welfare-based, non-adversarial and child-centred nature of these proceedings. In particular we highlight that the standards of evidence in Children’s Hearings are less than those required in a sheriff court. Furthermore, when children agree to an offence-related ground for referral, they are agreeing to the issue being dealt with by the Children’s Hearings in its non-adversarial approach, and not to all the consequences of a criminal act.

- Effectiveness of treatment for child offenders
Treating children’s fingerprint and DNA data differently also makes sense in reality. Children who offend, even when they have committed sexual and violent assaults, are still developing and are far more likely than adults not to re-offend if they are given treatment, supervision and support. This is a key understanding underpinning the Children’s Hearings system. As children are still developing as individuals, they respond well to interventions targeted at developing empathy, conscience and ability to form healthy relationships. The increased risk to society and potential lost benefit for crime detection of not retaining their DNA or fingerprint data is therefore minimal given the

4 See Hutton, L. Children and Young People with harmful, Abusive or Offending Behaviours: A review of Literature, CJSW Development Centre for Scotland, for further discussion greater chances of children never re-offending in adulthood. This fact tips the balance towards the retention of DNA and fingerprint data being an unnecessary infringement of an individual child’s rights.

Where a child has committed serious violent or sexual offences there may be a case for reviewing their progress and rehabilitation before they leave the children’s system so that any continuing risk can be assessed.

We note that Section 59 allows for the retention of samples for three years from children referred to the children’s hearings system where a child accepts or is found to have committed one of “certain serious violent and sexual offences”. The list of these offences are still to be developed and prescribed in secondary legislation. While we welcome the commitment to consult on the list of applicable offences we regret that the list is not available now as it makes comment on the scope of this power difficult.

In summary, we advise a strong presumption against the retention of samples from children for the reasons outlined above.

Special measures for child witnesses and other vulnerable witnesses (section 64)
We welcome the further extension of the provisions for vulnerable witnesses to all hearings in criminal courts where a witness may be called to give evidence.

CHILDREN 1ST is a member of the Justice for Children Alliance and we would highlight that this group believe there is still work to be done to allow vulnerable witnesses, particularly children, to give their best evidence in court. We highlight our submission to the “Consultation on the use of intermediaries for vulnerable witnesses in Scotland” where we highlighted many aspects of court practice.

In summary, Justice for Children:

- Believes that there are still significant barriers to communicating effectively with vulnerable witnesses
- Believes that the problems posed by inappropriate questioning are endemic to the legal system and cannot be solved by training and guidance alone
- Believes that intermediaries should be introduced as a standard measure for all children required to give evidence in court

The barriers that exist include confusing language, confusing or repetitive forms of questioning, unrealistic demands on memory, distressing questioning and leading questions. Our experience also tells us that inappropriate questioning is still a problem.

Sexual offences prevention orders (section 73)
Foreign travel orders (section 74)
Risk of sexual harm orders (section 75)
We welcome these provisions as they implement key aspects of the Irving Report. In particular, the adjustments to the Sexual Offences Prevention Orders (SOPO) regime to allow the police to more easily check whether an offender is living in the same household as a child is an important reform.

Sale of alcohol to persons under 21 etc. (section 129)
CHILDREN 1st adopts a definition of a child as being anyone up to age 18 years old. We question whether introducing a significantly different age threshold for one specific aspect of alcohol purchasing would respect young adults’ rights, be workable or clear. Instead, could more be done to increase prosecution of those who buy alcohol for those under-age, noting that there were only 69 such prosecutions in Scotland in 2005-06.

The proposals allow for restrictions to be introduced in certain localities. We question whether this is the best approach to tackling problematic drinking in disadvantaged communities. It may actually have the effect of further marginalising already excluded young people.

Moreover, there is already a strong emphasis on ‘teen’ drinking in discussions about Scotland’s relationship with alcohol. In fact, the problematic use of alcohol exists across all age groups and, we would argue, is merely more hidden amongst older parts of the population as it happens at home or in licensed premises. We caution that singling out young people as having problems with alcohol further reduces the responsibility and actuality of alcohol consumption and misuse in the older population.

Written submission from the Scottish Licensed Trade Association

We refer to your request for written evidence on views on the general principles of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. The SLTA’s response will focus on matters relating to the operation of the new Licensing system in Scotland.

We note that opinions are no longer sought at this time on the matters of a social responsibility levy for the licensed trade and the off-sale transaction of alcohol to persons under the age of 21.

The Justice Committee’s amended request for views on how to improve the operation of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 in respect of reducing costs and shortening processing times is noted. However, there are a great deal of legal technical issues to be considered, which quietly frankly, those dealing in the legal process of applying for liquor and associated licences, i.e. lawyers, are far better informed and are more experienced, to make comment on. The SLTA is currently communicating with solicitors experienced in such matters and would respectfully ask that any additional response would be considered by the Committee.

The SLTA would, however, reiterate views previously expressed to the Scottish Government in general and directly to the Cabinet Secretary for Justice.

With regard to the costs imposed on the licensed trade for the basic licensing system An extract of The SLTA’s response to what was then the Draft Regulations on Licensing Fees was as follows:-

“The proposal to base fees on a Rateable Value system is not perfect, but in our experience no other alternative has been found which distributes the burdens of cost or fees on a more even basis. However, in this instance, we totally disagree that a “fair and equal distribution” of fees has been achieved. We will address this later in our response.

Whilst the proposed levels of fees, as indicated in the draft regulations, are not as excessive as was anticipated, the initial cost to the licensed trade is still a substantial amount, when the additional burden of solicitors fees and architect fees are added. It is our view and recommendation that licensees will require solicitors to act on their behalf with regard to applications for a premises licence due to the possible complexities of completing an accurate operating plan. We note in your research that under the new system, 82% of licensed premises would fall in line with the two lowest categories for licensed premises, either £400 or £550 for a premises licence. However, when legal and architectural fees are added and the first year’s Annual Fee is taken into account, we estimate, at best, the cost will be in the region of £2,000 to £2,500 – a substantial amount for any Small Medium Enterprise.

The Scottish Licensed Trade Association strenuously disagrees with the proposal that Registered Clubs, who have eventually been brought under the same regulatory body as licensed premises, are now to be given special treatment in covering the costs of maintaining that body. To suggest that the fees (category one) attached to Registered Club premises licences and annual fees are to be capped at a mere £100 and £90 respectively, is quite simply discriminatory to the genuine licensed trade. To give an example, it is rather ironic that the day after this consultation document was launched, the Wallyford Miners Club, which has a rateable value of £24,900, announced that the smoking ban had led to their bar takings falling by £100,000 to around £450,000 from January 2006 to January 2007.

What SME would still be in business if they experienced a similar reduction?

Yet Registered Clubs are expected to contribute, what is effectively a token gesture, to cover the costs of running the new licensing system. To suggest that Registered Clubs should be “automatically included in the lowest category of fees regardless of their rateable value” and then continue that such an approach “is considered proportionate and reasonable” displays extreme naivety by The Scottish Government of the financial benefits the sale of alcohol brings to Registered Clubs. We would also draw attention to the fact that, under the new licensing regime, Registered Clubs will be able to apply to open their doors to the public, up to a maximum of 56 days per year and legitimately compete with licensed premises. Considering the aforementioned, why should Registered Clubs not be treated on a level par with licensed premises when the issue of licensing fees is being considered.

We would now comment on the scale of fees and those to be levied at large off-sales premises, i.e. supermarkets. The Association finds it absolutely absurd that supermarkets will simply fall into Category 6 in the scale of fees and the costs levied at such premises, for a Premises Licence and subsequent Annual fees, will only be a token £1,000 and £450 respectively. It is our opinion that such premises should make a far greater financial contribution to the running of the new licensing regime. According to the Scottish Government’s own figures, there are 759 supermarkets in Scotland who sell alcohol. Recent figures also show that 61% of all alcohol sold, is sold through the off-sales sector and of these sales, the top five supermarkets are responsible for 73%. This sector of the market, which hugely benefits financially from the sale of alcohol, will only contribute a mere £759,000 in the first year of the new system. This equates to only 7.5% of the total running costs for the transitional period, yet these 759 premises sell over 61% of all wine, 56% of all spirits and in fact nearly 45% of all alcohol sold in Scotland.

In our view it is inherently unfair that the on-trade yet again is being targeted by the Scottish Government, in this case, to bare the greater burden of the cost to regulate the sale of alcohol. How can the Scottish Government justify levying a fee of only £1000 for a premises, such as Asda on the east side of Edinburgh, which has a rateable value in excess of £2,000,000, and expect the rest of the licensed trade to pay the average proposed charge of £460 based on rateable values of less than £35,000, if, as the Scottish Government suggests, using a system based on rateable values is “the most suited” as it “provides a measure of business size”. It is imperative that further consideration be given to the number of bands used to calculate fees to incorporate a level specifically for supermarkets in order that such premises shoulder a more “fair and equal distribution” of the costs involved. We would suggest their should be a Category 7 for Off-Sales premises with a total rateable value of over £1,000,000 and the fee should be, as in the words of the Scottish Government’s research on fees, “proportionate and reasonable”.

Following the Scottish Government’s consultation it then formally announced the details of what the new licensing fees would actually be. The SLTA communicated the following in response:-

“Dear Cabinet Secretary,

The Scottish Government’s recent announcement detailing the fees which will be levied at the licensed trade in Scotland, in respect of the new licensing regime, has been received with utter consternation by members of The Scottish Licensed Trade Association.

Despite our response to the original consultation on the issue of fees and our concerns that again the “small independent pub” seems to be targeted disproportionately in the scale of fees, you have chosen to simply ignore our pleas and tighten the noose currently around the small independent licensee’s neck.

For a political party supposed to represent, more than others, the interests of the Scottish people and Scotland’s commerce, your actions have penalised yet again a Scottish industry already reeling from the negative commercial effects of the smoking ban. In addition, the introduction of a licensing system, confused in the extreme with mountains of subordinate regulatory legislation is also proving to be detrimental to the future prosperity of this industry. Under the previous Holyrood administration the licensed on-trade sector was sick and tired of being blamed for all society’s ails and we believed that the current administration had adopted a more supportive attitude towards the “pub”.

However, bearing this in mind, how can you possibly justify setting these exorbitant maximum fee levels and allow Licensing Boards to independently determine what they will charge when consultants were contracted by the Scottish Government to “define a system” which would “allow for a full cost recovery, have the same scale of charges across Scotland as a whole and which would not be unfair to SME’s ……”. With Licensing Boards having the ability to set their own fees, this will lead to inconsistency and confusion throughout the country and you could in effect have two similar premises facing each other, but in different council areas, being charged different fees. This highlights again the problems with passing decision making to individual Licensing Boards.

The initial consultation document was obviously based on the research carried out and proposed a scale of fees which The SLTA considered were “not as excessive as was anticipated” and further comments were made in our original submission highlighting that we totally disagreed that a “fair and equal distribution” of fees had been achieved. (We attach a copy of our original submission for your information).

The Scottish Government’s consultation document highlighted that your consultants “carried out case studies involving a representative sample of 5 local authorities - using the proposed model it was established that 4 out of 5 (boards) would achieve cost recovery”. The consultation document then continued that “Nevertheless further consideration of the one case where there may potentially be less than full cost recovery shows that their unit costs per licence are likely to be less than the national average; and therefore that full cost recovery would be likely”. Considering the above conclusions, again we ask, how do you justify setting the new licensing fees (maximum) at such extortionate levels? Whilst we appreciate these levels are maximums, it is naive in the extreme to suggest that Licensing Boards will not charge the full amount when we continually hear how Councils are strapped for cash. We are quite convinced Licensing Boards will find some way to justify why the maximum fees are being applied”.

It is plainly obvious you have made the decision to completely ignore the findings of the research carried out by your consultants and it would be interesting to know how much this wasted research has cost Scottish Taxpayers, which of course includes licensees.

It is not often we envy our English neighbours, but for the 82% of licensed premises in Scotland who will now have to pay up to either £800 or £1100 for a premises licence and then an annual charge of either £220 or £280, such amounts are discriminatory in a UK context. Our fellow licensees in England and Wales, with similar rateable values are faced with a mere £100 or £190 for a premises licence and an annual charge of £70 or £180. In addition a personal licence in Scotland will be over 35% dearer than in England and Wales.

Again how can you justify the fees applicable in Scotland or is this, as many now believe, another stealth tax, aimed this time at Scottish licensees, to introduce your “polluter pays” policy, which we are sure you will remember your party opposed when in opposition and the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 was going through its parliamentary process.

In addition to the comments above, your complete lack of consideration to address the fees applicable to Registered Clubs and Supermarkets, as highlighted in our original submission, displays a complete disregard for the Scottish SME’s your party claims to support. You have stated that you are a “politician of conscience” and this has been demonstrated by your views on cheap drink promotions in Supermarkets. However, on the issue of fees, it would appear there has been a lapse of conscience and common sense.

We trust this letter will impart the strength of feeling The SLTA has experienced from the small independent licensed traders of Scotland who now demand justification for the setting of these extortionate fees.

With regard to the running costs of the new Liquor Licensing system, we would also draw your attention to further correspondence sent to the Cabinet Secretary for Justice:-

“Dear Cabinet Secretary,

Thank you for your letter of 24th January, which we received yesterday, in response to our letter regarding the Liquor Licensing Fees.

We note the comments made, but considering the vast majority of Licensing Boards have stated they will be applying the maximum fee, our members are still of the view that this will be a money making exercise for Local Councils who we are sure will find some way of justifying the fees set.

Another matter has come to light which only exacerbates our anger at the high level of fees imposed on the Licensed Trade. At a recent meeting of a Local Council Licensing Forum, which at this time will remain anonymous, the matter of liquor licensing fees was discussed. The Licensing Standards Officer astounded the forum members when he revealed that his remit, as a Licensing Standards Officer, not only covered liquor licensing but all licensing matters under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act, 1982.

Our understanding is that Civic licences are required for Cinemas; Fairgrounds; Gaming Machines in non-liquor premises; Houses in Multiple Occupation; Indoor Sports Entertainment; Late Hours Catering; Market Operators; Marriage Places; Metal Dealers; Public Entertainment; Raised Structures; Safety of Sports Grounds; Second Hand Dealers; Street Traders including food vans; Mobile shops; Stalls; Wheelie bin cleaners; Taxi drivers; Taxi vehicles and Private Hire Cars; Theatres and last but not least, Window Cleaners.

If this is indeed the case, it is an absolute outrage that the Licensed Trade is to bear the overwhelming costs for these officers when their duties and responsibilities will encompass other forms of licensing requirements. Or is it the case that licensing fees, for the licences referred to above, will also be increasing to proportionately cover the costs of the newly employed Licensing Standards Officers?”

With regard to Local Councils justifying the fees set, we are aware of one Council which has used the additional fee income to vastly increase staff and internet resources and still have a budget surplus for the transition year. It will be interesting to hear what they now intend to do with the remaining surplus!
As previously stated there are a great deal of legal technical issues to be considered, and we trust those dealing in the legal process of applying for liquor licences will also have been afforded the opportunity to make comment.

Written submission from the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland

ACPOS is broadly supportive of the overarching aims of the bill and welcomes the move toward positive and practical improvements in sentencing, criminal procedure and licensing.

In relation to specific sections of the legislation the following comments are offered:

Section 14 & 20 – Community Payback orders, Reports about Supervised Persons
This development may have an impact on the nature of post conviction reporting by the police to monitoring agencies but should not be any more onerous than that work already carried out.

Section 17 – Presumption against short periods of imprisonment or detention
This proposal will ensure that only people who deserve to be in prison should be sent there. The greater use of “Community Payback Orders” may encourage low level offenders to discontinue their offending behaviour, when they realise how damaging their behaviour has been to the Community and the people therein.

In relation to the intention to repeal Section 169 and Section 206 (2–6) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 which permit a summary court to detain a person at court or a police station until 8 pm in lieu of imprisonment, or any “certified police cell” for up to four days. ACPOS believes both provisions are archaic and indeed there are not thought to be any such “certified cells” in Scotland (not to be confused with “legalised cells” under the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1989).

In reference to the automatic release at the half way point for those imprisoned for less than 1 year, the Bill proposes that conditions may be imposed that “a serious breach could” mean the offender returning to custody. Members suggest that consideration to changing this phrase to should lead to a return.

Although the Bill contains proposals to move away from imposing a custodial sentence for less than 12 months, the good work achieved to date in relation to the deterrence of knife crime would be lost if knife crime is not separated from this legislation.
Section 23 – Offences aggravated by racial or religious prejudice
It is felt that it may have been more useful to have all hate crime legislation in one place. That said this enactment will harmonise the operation of hate crime in Scotland into line with England and Wales.

It is positive that in tackling hate crime, offenders are clear that elements of the sentence are based upon aggravating factors.

ACPOS wish to again highlight the opportunity for the Scottish Parliament to include the sexual orientation, gender identity and disability aspects of the Offences Aggravated by Prejudice Bill in this bill, to provide one piece of legislation for all hate crime. This was alluded to, both in the written and oral evidence given to the Justice Committee on the Offences Aggravated by Prejudice Bill. It appears the opportunity has not been taken.

In advance of the introduction of these amendments, consideration should be given to a publicity campaign for public awareness with a view to challenging attitudes and behaviour.

Clarification is also required as to the exact classifications being used to identify ethnicity and religion.

Section 24 – Voluntary intoxication by alcohol: effect in sentencing
Victims of offences will benefit most from this proposal when they see that voluntary alcohol intake will not play a part in the defence of the crime, especially when the offence is of a violent nature and the victim has been left traumatised. There are many people who consume alcohol sensibly and do not commit offences. Those persons with a proclivity toward offending should be encouraged to follow this example and learn to know their limitations, particularly when they are no longer able to rely on alcohol in their defence.

It is suggested that this proposal should be widened to include all intoxicants, whether legitimate, prescribed or otherwise.

Section 34 - Extreme Pornography
Members feel clarification over what constitutes ‘extreme pornography’ is needed as the term is subjective and open to interpretation by legal experts.

It must be highlighted that although criminalising possession of such material strengthens the current legislation, there are real challenges around being able to monitor and police this. Ongoing capability and capacity issues could impact on the ability of the Scottish Police to be pro-active in this area. Such material can be easily accessed via the internet, most sites containing material are located out with UK Law enforcement jurisdiction and may in fact be legal in their country of origin.

The Scottish Police may also face challenge in managing the expectations of interested agencies, such as Rape Crisis and Violence Against Women Groups, regarding the resource committed to and effective policing of this issue.
Section 35 - People Trafficking
ACPOS is supportive of the changes to this legislation but would suggest that amendment should also be made to ensure any offences created are inclusive of persons 'within' the UK who undertake trafficking activities (i.e. Internal Trafficking) and, not limited or exclusive to those persons orchestrating trafficking from a foreign destination.

It is also felt that the definition of facilitation should include activity around the transit process i.e. the purchase/procurement of travel documents, ground transport, offers of work and accommodation. This should also extend to the definition for internal trafficking.

It is vital that further consideration should be given to extending the legislation to include labour exploitation, sexual exploitation and domestic servitude rather than being exclusive to prostitution. In this regard the definition of 'sexual and non-sexual exploitation' should be clarified further.

In historical English legislation (prior to the UK Borders Act 2007), 'sexual exploitation' included any offence under the Sexual Offences Act (inclusive of prostitution etc) and indeed acted as an aggravation to that offence. In Scots Law, common law crimes of rape or indecent assault etc would be considered independently for investigation and prosecution (and with weighty penal consequence for offenders). These charges however take no statutory account of the victim’s trafficked status for sentencing purposes.

It is not clear yet if the practicalities of this change have been considered. It may have onerous implications for the Police, particularly Process Servers and/or Case Management staff.

Section 41 – Breach of Undertaking
This proposal will have no significant operational impact on the Scottish Police. It should reduce the number of offences created but will require amendment to IT systems and also amendment to force guidance.

There might also be a requirement to seek clarification on the Lord Advocate’s Guidelines which currently direct that such an offence be treated as a unique offence.

Section 47 – Remand and committal of children and young persons
Members feel there will be a challenge in identifying appropriate places of safety, ensuring these are readily available and fit for purpose. There will be an onus on local authorities to provide these services.

Section 58 - 60 – Retention and use of samples etc
While ACPOS is supportive of the measures proposed, members note that the Bill is silent on persons who have committed an offence and are subsequently offered a Procurator Fiscal direct measure or are processed by Police and then issued with a FPN. In previous consultations on this matter, ACPOS has requested that clarification be made regarding the retention of samples from FPN recipients for the full comparison process. Members are disappointed that this has not been addressed in the Bill.

The recent judgement from the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR), in the case of S and Marper v UK commented favourably on the current Scottish position on retention of DNA. It was also recognised that DNA is classed as more sensitive personal information than fingerprints and other relevant physical data. ACPOS is fully supportive that the retention of fingerprint information is placed on an equal basis as DNA.

Section 63 – Spouse or civil partner of an accused a compellable witness
The proposal to remove this condition will be an advantage. Many offences where a ‘spouse’ is a ‘competent’ witness are incidents that have occurred within the family home, where their evidence may well be crucial for a conviction however currently they cannot be compelled. Where the ‘victim’ of the offence is a child within the home this change will ensure they are better protected by the criminal justice system.

Section 64 – Special Measures for child witnesses and other vulnerable witnesses
This will enhance the ethos of the Vulnerable Witnesses (Scotland) Act 2004 and ensure the benefits are available for all Court proceedings rather than just trials. This will reassure vulnerable witnesses that they will be afforded the level of protection they require when in contact with the criminal justice system, from start to finish.

Section 67 – Television link evidence
The Bill comments on the difficulties requiring someone travelling from another jurisdiction to a Scottish Court (Paragraph 350) and extends Section 273 to cover those jurisdictions out with Scotland but within the UK. Whilst this appears a common-sense approach, it seems strange to put provisions in place for a witness attending the Scottish Borders from Northumbria but not consider making similar arrangements for a witness from Orkney giving testimony at Dumfries. It may be appropriate to consider such measures on a case by case basis with applications being viewed objectively and considering the interests of justice.

Section 71 - Sharing information with anti-fraud organisations
The proposal brings Scotland to a consistent position with that in England and Wales and is consistent with the current drive to better align and coordinate counter fraud arrangements across the UK. This is entirely consistent with the ACPOS view of the future UK arrangements and recognises that a significant amount of fraud activity operates across jurisdictions. Enhanced information sharing arrangements inform assessment of trends and threats in that regard and ACPOS are supportive of the introduction of such a measure.
The Serious Crime Act 2007 contains provisions to enable public authorities to share information with each other and with anti-fraud organisations to help prevent and detect fraud. At present this does not relate to any powers devolved to Scotland.

It should be noted that the Serious Crime Act 2007 includes a section named - Schedule 3, Data Protection Act 1998 (c.29) (conditions for processing sensitive personal data).

It is suggested that in order to cover the wording contained within that schedule in this Bill, the following text should be inserted after paragraph 7;

(a) is either—
(i) the disclosure of sensitive personal data by a person as a member of an anti-fraud organisation or otherwise in accordance with any arrangements made by such an organisation; or
(ii) any other processing by that person or another person of sensitive personal data so disclosed; and
(b) is necessary for the purposes of preventing fraud or a particular kind of fraud.

(2) In this paragraph “an anti-fraud organisation” means any unincorporated association, body corporate or other person which enables or facilitates any sharing of information to prevent fraud or a particular kind of fraud or which has any of these functions as its purpose or one of its purposes.”

The proposal is that these provisions will extend the Serious Crime Act 2007 Act to cover all of Scotland’s public authorities; in effect repealing the restrictions relating to devolved powers in the Act.

Although the key information detailed in the Bill refers to 'public authorities' it goes on to say that the Serious Crime Act 2007 also has 'specified anti-fraud Organisations’ detailed in SI 2008/2353 which specifies 6 anti-fraud organisations. It is not clear from the 'key information’ if this SI would also apply to Scotland. The Act also contains safeguards and makes it an offence to further disclose information obtained under the powers of the Act for any other purpose.

Providing that it is clear that both the aforementioned provisions under the Serious Crime Act 2007 also relate to Scotland then the sharing of information would be legitimate in terms of Data Protection.

It should also be made clear that the provision with regard to the sharing of information relates to 'Serious Crime’ only. Those who have commercial interests might otherwise be in a position to request information relating to individuals who they are involved with on a day to day commercial basis by making the representation that they require the information since it 'is necessary for the purposes of preventing fraud or a particular kind of fraud'.

The proposals in relation to compensation orders against an uninsured driver would be a welcome step forward and should compliment the work of the Motor Insurers Bureau. The MIB provides the means for the victim of an uninsured driver to receive compensation for any loss resulting from the incident. This service is funded by motor vehicle insurers and generally the uninsured driver is not pursued in order to make good the compensation paid out by the MIB.

The proposal to allow the court to make a compensation order against the uninsured and offending driver restores the balance somewhat in attempting to get the offender to financially recompense the victim. However, in practice, the victims of a serious or fatal road crash would always approach the MIB or perhaps the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board first. Proposals for the award of court imposed compensation may more readily be applicable to the less serious cases where minor injury or damage is caused. Recompense in respect of the loss of a no claims bonus, a policy excess, or even simply higher premiums would obviously be most welcome for those who are victims of uninsured drivers.

ACPOS has asked the Motors Insurers Bureau (MIB) for their observations in respect of this and particularly into claims against uninsured drivers, for which the MIB already make restitution in respect of loss sustained by affected drivers. They advise that any claim received for uninsured loss requires the claimant to make a declaration that they have/have not received restitution from elsewhere. Any such restitution would be taken into account by the MIB and would likely reduce the compensation paid out by them. In view of this, they do not see the proposed legislation impacting on their day to day basis. They do point out however, that this very much relies on the honesty of the claimant who may make a false declaration in order to receive additional monies.

With regard to a road death, members believe the wording of this section requires careful consideration as those who have suffered bereavement as a result of such a collision will be emotionally vulnerable and in some cases hostile to the thought of the person who caused the death of a loved one having anything to do with their funeral. They may also see any compensation order as the value the State puts on their loved one’s life.

A definition of ‘sensitive’ is given however there is no definition of ‘highly sensitive’. If police officers are to be required in law to apply such categories then a definition of highly sensitive is necessary.

Using schedules to list each item of (relevant) information to a prosecutor will be very time-consuming. It may not be the most effective method in all cases and, the draft legislation is non-specific as to the means by which the prosecutor may disclose information to the accused (section 97). ACPOS would seek clarification on the need for a statutory requirement for scheduling of information. Developments in police information management may result in more effective systems available to police forces (and prosecutors) but legislation would require the continued use of schedules.

Overall, it is felt that the method by which police forces reveal the existence of information to prosecutors can be competently and effectively addressed within the Code of Practice which will underpin the implementation of Part 6 of the Bill.

ACPOS is of the view that the person who is best positioned to make a judgement on the likely impact should potentially sensitive information be released to the accused, is the police officer. It is entirely appropriate that the prosecutor should objectively review the judgements of the police and it is to be expected that they will disagree on occasions.

Should the prosecutor disagree with police assessment of levels of sensitivity and, after review there is still disagreement, then it should be possible for the prosecutor to amend the schedule(s) accordingly without a police officer being required to alter their professional judgement. It may be more appropriate for scheduling processes to be detailed within the Code of Practice rather than in the primary legislation.

Section 121 - Conditions to which licences under 1982 Act are to be subject.

It is suggested, in respect of licences that relate to activities in particular geographical areas (such as street traders) that if a council used its discretionary power the badge as it currently stands – unlike the licence – will not stipulate the area within which the trader is licensed to operate.

Section 126 - Licensing of public entertainment.

The provisions, if introduced, will assist not only the police but the council when dealing with public safety issues in connection with such events.

Section 127 - Licensing of late night catering

The Bill's provisions extend the part of the 1982 Act covering late hours catering to ensure that licensing authorities have the power to license any premises selling food or drink at late hours. This amendment will give licensing authorities the option of licensing all such premises, if they consider it necessary to do so. Going forward, this may have fairly significant implications for additional workload for the police in relation to the both the administrative process and in relation to any requests by the local authority for analysis to be carried out by the police in relation to crime / disorder profiles with regards to premises that may be included in this new category. That said this is this is a section of the Act that should be fully supported.
This section amends the requirements contained within the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 obliging a Chief Constable to provide the licensing board with an antisocial behaviour report and, instead, an antisocial behaviour report will only be required if the licensing board requests one, or if the Chief Constable wishes to forward a report for the Board’s consideration. This much reflects the situation that has pertained during the Transition Period and the amendment is welcomed. As ACPOS has maintained consistently, information in relation to anti-social behaviour in the vicinity of premises is, in itself, meaningless to a significant extent, unless a detailed evaluation of each and every incident is carried out. While it is recognised that there will always be a number of premises dependent on geography which will not feature to any significant extent on Crime Management and Command & Control Systems, there will, inevitably, be a large number of premises that will do.

Importantly, it is not, nor has it ever been, suggested that such incidents of antisocial behaviour should be directly attributed to premises and, clearly, where a licence is sought for premises not previously licensed, the usefulness of attributing antisocial behaviour then occurring within the vicinity to those premises (or as previously indicated any specific premises) is dubious. What will be more effective is close monitoring of activity in, or within the vicinity of, existing licensed premises; examining recorded crimes and incidents that can be related to existing licensed premises and seeking a review of the premises licence. Going forward, that will remove premises that do not operate in conformity with the licensing objectives and help to decrease significantly the negative impact that the antisocial behaviour associated with the operation of licensed premises has on our communities.

Related amendments to Section 74 of the Act
A Chief Constable may make a recommendation that the licensing board refuse a personal licence application if he considers it necessary for the purposes of any of the licensing objectives. There is however no opportunity for a Chief Constable to make a formal ‘representation’ to the licensing board regarding issues related thereto that may not merit a recommendation to refuse but would nonetheless be relevant to the licensing board’s consideration of the application.

It should be noted that ACPOS has not reviewed nor provided comment on Sections 2-13, 16, 19-22, 44, 48-57, 61, 62, 65, 76, 80-82 and 117-120.

John Pow
Interim General Secretary
Justice Committee
Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill
Written submission from Glasgow City Council

Part 1 – Sentencing

Section 2 (4) - The stated objectives of achieving consistency in sentencing practice and promoting greater awareness and understanding seem entirely appropriate. The third objective of assisting the development of policy is less clear. The policy is presumably that of the Scottish Government although this is not stated. Policy will vary over time and will be dependent upon the Government of the day.

Section 5 (5) – The Sentencing Council’s assessment of the costs and benefits of guidelines should seek to encompass an analysis of the costs and benefits to society in general and not simply those related to the Court process.

Section 6 - The proposed consultation on guidelines is extremely narrow. This contradicts the objective of promoting “greater awareness and understanding of sentencing policy and practice” as stated at section 4.

Section 10 - The Bill stipulates that the SCS must provide the Council with information relating to sentences imposed by Courts. If analysis of costs and benefits is to cover the wider implications for local authorities and society in general how is the Council to be expected to obtain this information and who would be responsible for the provision of such information. Section 10 (3) might benefit from a more prescriptive timescale.

Section 11 - “Scottish Ministers” are required to have regard to any advice or proposals from the Council. This provision could be used to change arrangements in relation to the early release of prisoners on Home Detention Curfew. This provision currently allows SPS to commute sentences without reference to the sentencing Court or the Parole Board.

Section 13 – The provision for an annual report to Parliament appears to ensure appropriate scrutiny and accountability. Parliamentary debate will in itself assist in raising public awareness of sentencing policy and practice.

Section 14 - The new CPO may include 1 or more of 7 conditions listed. There is no reference to other conditions which SER authors may deem appropriate for include as a condition of a CPO. This needs clarification. The use of multiple conditions may raise resource issues.
Section 15 - Existing legislation stipulates that a precondition for granting an NHO is that there must be a course of conduct amounting to harassment in considering an NHO (2 relevant incidents which result in prosecution). The provisions of the Bill will remove this, a very positive development.

This Bill will amend legislation to ensure that courts consider previous convictions and have access to relevant information to demonstrate the propensity for an offender to commit crimes of harassment.

In respect of domestic abuse where harassment of victims is not uncommon and part of a pattern of abusive and violence, the changes to current legislation are positive.

Section 16 – Minimum term of imprisonment is now 15 days (not 5). Depending on success of other elements of the bill this could obviously result in those previously detained for 5 days being detained for 15.

Section 17 - The language may not be strong enough to enact the change the Government is looking for here. May result in longer sentences being passed e.g. where judge previously considered a 3 month sentence they may now look at a 6 month.

Section 18 - There is a new definition - "short term custody and community prisoner". This might result in more offenders being released under statutory supervision. Those who are currently released automatically half way through a short term prison sentence would require supervision under the new bill. This would have resource requirements for CJSW.

Slight confusion around parts 4-6 of section 18. This may mean more statutory supervision (on short term community license).

Section 19 - It seems in most cases that removal will be after they have served one half of their sentence (there will not be a community element). In practice this will apply to very few cases.

Section 21 - This provision would significantly aid risk management and ultimately child protection/public protection for offences with significant sexual element. The provision would also ensure that offences such as Breach of the Peace are not viewed as ‘low tariff’ offending behaviour.

Section 23 – Welcome the requirement that the Court must now record how an aggravation has affected the sentence (if at all- and if not the reasons must be stated)

Section 24 – Refer to the CJA response to the consultation paper-Sentencing Guidelines and a Scottish Sentencing Council (Question 16) http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Resource/Doc/258411/0076649.pdf This is something which could be considered by the Sentencing Council once it has been established.
Part 2 – Criminal Law

Sections 25-28 – Glasgow City Council (GCC) agree with comments made by Glasgow Community Safety Services (GCSS) that the links between trafficking and serious organised crime are already well documented. Prostitution and trafficking of women is the third highest “black market” income earner globally after drugs and arms. Therefore, we would also support any measures which would strengthen the law linked to organised crime.

Section 29 - The Council welcomes the efforts to reduce the opportunities for serving criminals to have access to information and communication devices (mobile telephones etc) which allows their continued involvement in offending behaviour or permit further intimidation or targeting of witnesses and victims. The introduction of penalties for those introducing such devices and other prohibited items is welcomed.

Section 32 - The imposition of considerable financial penalties may deter companies/bodies being involved, directly or indirectly in sexual exploitation of children. This would also make individuals within companies/bodies accountable – individual and corporate responsibility. A financial deterrent may also significantly reduce the resources which are made available to facilitate sexual exploitation of children. This legislation would also reinforce on a national and international level the criminality of child exploitation.

Section 34 - The proposal to increase the sentencing powers of Courts in relation to publishing, selling or distribution of extreme pornographic material will confirm the seriousness of this offence. In turn, this may increase the level of reporting of sexual offending against women.

We agree with GCSS comments that challenging the demand for extreme images is a step in the right direction towards generating public discussion on the issue of commercial sexual exploitation, raising awareness and changing attitudes towards pornography. We also support the fact that the Scottish proposals are going far beyond the arguably narrow definition of “extreme pornography” adopted in England and Wales. The Scottish offence, by covering all obscene pornographic images which realistically depicts rape or other non-consensual penetrative sexual activity, whether violent or otherwise, is necessarily broader which in turn increases the scope of images which can be targeted. We support proposed maximum sentence of 3 years for possession of extreme pornography. If effectively enforced this could provide a deterrent.

We also need to make sure that by only focusing on extreme pornography, that we are not sending out the message that other pornographic images are acceptable and any less harmful.
Section 35 - GCSS welcomes the Scottish Government’s intention to bring Scots Law in relation to trafficking of persons in line with England and Wales and ensure consistency in the protection of victims across the UK and GCC would agree with this. Glasgow has the highest number of people involved in the sex industry outside of London, and approximately 50% of those involved are from overseas (Scotland’s Slaves: An Amnesty International briefing on trafficking in Scotland, 2008).

It is clear that despite provision in the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003, there are still definite gaps in the current legal framework to protect victims of trafficking. It must be noted that we believe the only way that trafficking activity can truly be halted is to disrupt the market by challenging demand.

Part 3 – Criminal Procedure

Section 38 - We welcome any attempt to remove children from Criminal Justice Systems. It provides a guarantee for the small minority that this affects.

Section 47 - Would agree with reducing the number of remands.

Part 5 – Criminal Justice

Section 72 – We support GCSS view that the introduction of new powers within the Anti Social Behaviour (Scotland) Act 2004 for the closure of premises associated with human exploitation. We recommend that the new measures include not just only closing premises associated with trafficking, but covers flats and brothels in general where prostitution occurs. We believe that at the same time as instructing a closure order on premises, those caught purchasing sex indoors should be penalised and ask that consideration be given to criminalising the purchase of sex in any venue.

Section 73/Section 74 - Proposed changes to current legislation would undoubtedly aid risk management and place greater responsibility on the offender to engage in managing his own risk. Currently the legislation focuses on restrictions within SOPO/RSHO, e.g. no contact with children under the age of 16 years, however, this proposal would permit incorporating requirements of the individual, e.g. you shall participate in risk assessment process and report changes to circumstances.

In removing age restrictions, Courts will have discretion to impose SOPO based on assessed level of risk of sexual harm as opposed to age of offender or sentence imposed.

Section 80 - The Government’s intention here is not clear. This section may refer to any organisation which provides assistance to persons affected by an offence. It does not appear to apply specifically to Victim Support Scotland although this section may be used to provide grants to that organisation. If the Government’s intention is to provide security of funding to victim support organisations then this is a welcome development. However the wording of this section does not guarantee that outcome.

Part 7 - Mental Disorder and Unfitness for Trial

Sections 117-120 - This introduces a more explicit “test” for the courts in relation to diminished responsibility and the new term of unfit for trial.

Part 8 – Licensing under Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982

Section 121- Subsection (3) introduces the concept of “mandatory” and “standard” licence conditions”. New section 3B indicates that licensing authorities “may determine conditions to which licences granted by them under this Act are to be subject”. These are the new “standard conditions”. The licensing authority are required to publish any standard conditions proposed by them. That being so there will have to be some “transitional provisions” to allow licensing authorities the time to draft, consider, publish & determine standard conditions for all licence types.

Section 123 – Makes the licensing of metal dealers one of the “optional provisions” requiring a resolution of the licensing authority to be of effect. Presumably this would retrospectively de-license metal dealers in areas where such a resolution is not made. Again would this require some transitional provisions for those areas wishing to retain the licensing of metal dealers?

Section 124 – Subsection (2) amends section 13 of the 1982 Act to require that anyone applying for a taxi or private hire car driver’s licence has to have held a “full driving” licence for the period of 12 months immediately prior to the date of application. This will further penalise anyone whose licence has been suspended by the Courts. The 12 month period will only start from the point when they are given back their licence. The previous provision did not penalise in this way.

Subsection (3) changes the requirements relative to the review of taxi fares. Previously the review had to be commenced within 18 months from the date when the previous fare tariff came into effect – so the outcome and the new fares thus fixed could come into effect well after the 18 month period. The new provision requires the process to be completed within the 18 month period. This could be problematic given that the consultation process etc can be long and tortuous. There seems to be a right of appeal given to taxi operators whether or not they made any representations to the licensing authority when publicising the proposals. It would seem better to only give such a right of appeal to those who responded to the consultation exercise. Subsection (5) deals with the requirements for the publication and coming into effect of taxi fares. It includes a requirement to publish in a newspaper which is curious given the ‘modern’ approach of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 which permits advertising via a web-site.
Section 125 – This appears to repeal the Exemptions from the need to hold a market operators licence for such as charitable or community organisations. That being so, such organisations may in future consider that the cost of obtaining a licence, together with the costs of meeting the various requirements of the statutory consultees, are prohibitive and may thus lose out on established fund-raising ventures. Curious drafting would seem to repeal subsection (2) (a) of the current section 40 whilst leaving in a subsection (b).

Section 126 - In terms of the current provisions of the 1982 Act only those forms of entertainment for which a charge is made are license-able. This amendment would require the licensing of events which would be free to the public. Again the cost of applying for and obtaining a licence may prove prohibitive for such as community organisations that have previously held local events providing forms of entertainment. Curious drafting again re the amendment to current section 41(2) (d) – why not simply repeal “or Part II of the Gaming Act 1968”?

We agree with GCSS suggestion for a further amendment to section 41 of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 instead of just focusing on removing the existing exemption for free events.

The Criminal Justice and Licensing Bill also provides a valuable opportunity to reassess the current licensing of lap dancing venues.

Section 127 – This changes the requirement for a late hours catering licence from relating to the sale/consumption of “meals or refreshment” to the sale consumption of “food” – as defined in section 1 of the Food Safety Act 1990. This includes “drink” & “chewing gum” – but presumably not alcoholic drink as that can only be sold via a licence under the 2005 Act.

Section 128 – This amends various provisions of schedule 1 to the 1982 Act. Applications will now have to include the applicant’s date and place of birth. 28 days rather than 21 days will be given for the receipt of objections or representations. 14 days notice of any hearing of the application is to be given rather than the current 7 days. A new paragraph 8(5A) is to be introduced to allow a licensing authority “on good cause shown” to deem an application as being one of renewal notwithstanding that it is made up to 28 days after the expiry of the licence. This is very concerning from a regulatory perspective. It is assumed that it is being introduced due to some concept of saving applicants from the results of their own inadvertence in not renewing timeously. It is not know why they are less likely to forget 28 days after the expiry date than at the actual expiry date. Also knowing the date of the expiry of a licence is fairly crucial – both generally as regards whether an offence is being committed and also in taxi licensing terms (having regard to the power given to licensing authorities to limit the number of taxi licences for their area) as regards whether one of the limited number of taxi licences is now “available”? And at what point is “good cause shown”? Does there have to be a hearing? The period of notice as regards the date of a hearing is to be reduced from 21 days to 14 days. Reasons for decisions are to be sought by a failed applicant or objector within 21 days rather than 28 days. Also changes are made to applications for sex shop licences as regulated by schedule 2 of the 1982 Act whereby applicants must also now given their date and place of birth.

Part 9 – Alcohol Licensing

Sections 130 – 138 - Glasgow City Council adopts the comments made by the City of Glasgow Licensing Board with regard to the liquor licensing aspects of the Bill, particularly as many of the substantive issues have been removed from this Bill and are to be included within a Health Bill later in the year.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from the Information Commissioner's Office

Introduction

The Information Commissioner's Office (ICO), the regulatory body for the Data Protection Act 1998 (DPA) throughout the whole of the UK, welcomes the opportunity to respond to the Call for Evidence on the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. Our interest in the Bill primarily relates to issues surrounding the retention of biometric information and we are pleased to note that many of the views we expressed in our response to the Scottish Government's Consultation on the Acquisition and Retention of DNA and Fingerprint Data are reflected in the Bill. We also have an interest in the proposed amendments to the Public Finance and Accountability (Scotland) Act 2000 relating to data matching exercises undertaken by Audit Scotland and we welcome the proposed requirement that this office be consulted as part of the development of a code of practice on data matching.

Sections 58 – 60 - Retention and use of samples etc.

Section 58

Section 58 amends the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 ("the 1995 Act") to provide consistency between the retention periods applied to DNA samples and that applied to other other forensic material. This appears to be an appropriate approach to take.

Section 59

In our response to the Scottish Government's consultation on the Acquisition and Retention of DNA and Fingerprint Data, we indicated that whilst our preferred position was that there should be no change to the current position relating to the retention of biometric data from children dealt with through the Hearings system, we recognised that an element of retention would provide a balance between the public interest in retaining relevant material of those who have committed violent or sexual crimes and the recognition that offences committed by children may not be replicated in adulthood.

The proposal contained within Section 59 of the Bill reflects that balance. Relevant physical data taken from those found to have committed a relevant offence would normally be held for a period of three years only, and we support this approach. However, we further recognise that chief constables on occasion may have valid grounds to require that such data are held for longer than three years. Hence we are also in agreement with the proposal that under such circumstances an application for an extension of the retention period may be made to a Sheriff but we would stress that such applications should not become the norm.

We are pleased to note that the Bill provides for strict parameters relating to the timing both of an application being made to the Sheriff and the destruction of the data if the appeal is unsuccessful.

Section 60

Section 60 states the purposes for which relevant physical data may be used. It restricts the use of samples to the prevention, detection, investigation and prosecution of crime and to the identification of deceased persons. The introduction of clear limits to the use of what can be highly intrusive information is welcomed but, as indicated in our response to the Government’s consultation, we are unsure how such information can be used for the prevention of crime.

We recommend that the statutory provision should be extended to include research purposes. However, such research must be strictly limited to projects related to the other defined uses (for example, to determine the effectiveness of the database); most importantly, the database should not be used for highly intrusive research into genetic structures and related activities.

Section 70 - Data matching for detection of fraud etc.

The ICO notes that the Bill contains proposals to introduce provisions consistent with those contained in the Serious Crime Act 2007 to provide a statutory basis for the National Fraud Initiative in Scotland. We welcome the clarification of practice in Scotland and note the attention paid to protection of privacy within this section of the Bill which is particularly important given the breadth of information which may be sought by Audit Scotland in fulfillment of this function. We also welcome the requirement that Audit Scotland produce a data matching code of practice and that the ICO must be consulted prior to its publication and subsequent amendments.

Written submission from East Lothian Council

I refer to the above Bill dealing with criminal justice matters, modernising general licensing provisions and specific provisions under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 and improving the operation of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005.

I now note that Sections 129 to 140 of the Bill relating to the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 have been withdrawn. My remaining interest in the Bill is only in connection with Sections 121 to 128, Part 8 in relation to licensing under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982. My comments are made by me in my officer capacity of Head of Law and Licensing.

I note that Part 8 of the Act inter alia proposes to introduce mandatory licence conditions prescribed by Scottish Ministers by statutory instrument, add to those permitted rights of entry and inspection “an authorised civilian employee” employed by a police authority and authorised for that purpose and others by the Chief Constable, make various amendments to the licensing of taxis and private hire cars, amend some of the timescales relating to the publication and coming into effect of taxi fares and make amendments in respect of the licensing of market operators, public entertainment and late night catering licensing.

All of the proposals under these sections appear to be sensible or at least unobjectionable, in particular I would support the amendments of the following:-

Section 125 – Licensing of Market Operators

The deletion of Section 40(2)(a) which currently exempts markets held by charitable, religious, youth, recreational, community, political or similar organisations from the requirement to be licensed, has meant that until now markets held by such organisations could be held outwith the framework of control with suitable licensing conditions and therefore such events were not regulated, which could easily be to the detriment of the public with regard to safety and lack of measures for public protection. In addition the removal in sub-section (4) of the words “by retail” removes another loophole as “private market” will be defined to include where goods are offered by sellers by any means to the public.

Section 126 Licensing of Public Entertainment

The removal of the words “on payment of money or monies worth” which defines situations where the use of premises as a place of public entertainment requires a licence is a worthy amendment. Without it for such events where the public are admitted without charge would not need a licence and hence would be unregulated.

Section 127 Licensing of Late Night Catering

The substitution of the word “food” for “meals or refreshment” as a definition of when the use of premises for late hours catering licenses are required has the effect of widening the definition (excluding liquid refreshment) and therefore removes potential argument as to whether such use of premises for the supply of a particular category or type of food is something less than a meal and therefore does not require to be licensed i.e. is a kebab a meal or not?

Sections 121 to 128 make a number of other technical amendments including changes to notice periods and periods by which certain procedures must be completed. All of these appear to me to be satisfactory.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Scottish Women’s Aid

Foreword
Scottish Women’s Aid (“SWA”) is a national organisation working for change on issues of domestic abuse, and an umbrella body to a membership of 39 autonomous Women’s Aid groups throughout Scotland which provide temporary accommodation (refuge), information and support to women, children and young people who experience domestic abuse.

Introduction
We welcome the opportunity to comment on these proposals. While there is much to commend in this Bill, we have concerns on certain aspects of the proposals, specifically on sentencing guidelines, the operation of the Scottish Sentencing Council (“SSC”), Community Payback Orders, the introduction of a presumption against short periods of imprisonment or detention and the disclosure of Crown evidence to the defence. We would be pleased to discuss our comments further with the Justice Committee.

Section 5 Sentencing guidelines
This section states, inter alia, that “5) The Council must include in any sentencing guidelines— (a) an assessment of the costs and benefits to which the implementation of the guidelines would be likely to give rise, (b) an assessment of the likely effect of the guidelines on— (i) the number of persons detained in prisons or other institutions, (ii) the number of persons serving sentences in the community, and (iii) the criminal justice system generally”

The statute must also, however, place a duty on the SSC to ensure that the guidelines include an assessment of the costs, likely effect and risk, including risk of further offending, to the public generally and victims and witnesses of specific crimes, arising from the implementation of the guidelines.

Section 6 Procedure for publication and review of sentencing guidelines
The section states, inter alia, that “…(1) The Council must, before publishing any sentencing guidelines or revised sentencing guidelines, (a) publish a draft of the proposed guidelines, and (b) consult the following persons about the draft— (i) the Scottish Ministers, (ii) the Lord Advocate, (iii) such other persons as the Council considers appropriate.”

It is crucial for the acceptance of the guidelines, and to promote transparency and consistency in their production that both the public and all organisations involved in supporting victims of crime, particularly those in the voluntary sector, are able to comment on draft guidelines before they are produced. Therefore, it is... not sufficient for the section to simply state “such other persons as the Council considers appropriate” as this has the potential to limit the extent of consultation and the consultees.

Section 11 The Council’s power to provide information, advice etc.
This section provides that the Council may publish or otherwise disseminate information about sentencing matters, provide advice or guidance of a general nature about such matters, and conduct research into such matters.

In the consultation paper on sentencing, consultees were asked whether they agreed that the SSC’s statutory functions should include providing information to the public about the sentencing process and if so, how that process could be made clearer and more understandable to ordinary members of the public and what measures might be taken by the SSC to make the sentencing process more transparent.

It was, therefore, understood that any Sentencing Council would have these duties prescribed as a mandatory part of their function. However, section 11 does not lay this duty on the SSC and falls short of giving the commitment needed.

We would reiterate the comments we made in our response to the consultation in that the SSC must provide information to the public on the sentencing process, the provision of information in itself resulting in a more transparent process.

Section 12 Business plan
Again, with reference to our comments on section 11 above, section 12 also fails to state that the SCC will accept comments or representations from the public or other parties as to issues that they may wish to consider. The planning process must be open and transparent to achieve the success of the SCC and its work.

Schedule 1 The Scottish Sentencing Council
Section 9 of this Schedule states that the SSC may determine its own procedure and that of any committees established by it.

Further details and clarity on how the SSC will operate is required. In our response to the consultation paper, SWA stated that while we agreed that the SSC should be given the functions proposed, for reasons of transparency, the legislation establishing the SSC on a statutory footing must be more than a basic framework and should set out how the SSC will establish its method of working; this should include detailed procedures for producing sentencing guidelines and carrying out its other functions so that the public, in particular, know what the SSC is doing, why and how.
14 Community payback orders

- 227N Offenders subject to more than one unpaid work or other activity requirement
  Section 227N(1) indicates that where a court is considering imposing an Unpaid Work and Other Activity requirement on an offender already subject to an existing such requirement(s), the court has discretion to direct that the new requirement can be concurrent to any existing requirement(s).

This would not follow policy intent that the sentence should act as an effective deterrent. Firstly, the sentences should run consecutively, not concurrently, as the net effect otherwise is no additional punishment whatsoever for the offender, and secondly, if an offender has re-offended whilst undertaking an existing unpaid work requirement, this indicates that they are not suitable for this disposal and a more robust approach by the court should be taken.

- 227O Rules about unpaid work and other activity
  These need to be scrutinised under the current review of the Bill and not dealt with subsequently by statutory instrument.

- 227P Programme requirement
  We are pleased to see that the section includes the wording “(4) If an offender’s compliance with a proposed programme requirement would involve the cooperation of a person other than the offender, the court may impose the requirement only if the other person consents.” Where the court is considering referring the abuser to a perpetrator programme, this will offer protection to women and children experiencing domestic abuse as the court will be required to hear from them as to any concerns about their safety or other issues which may arise as a consequence.

In situations where a custodial sentence is not imposed, it would be helpful to see the courts making use of the residency requirement under the new section 227Q introduced by section 14 of the Bill. This would be useful in ensuring that abusers given community payback orders are, if necessary, required to live away from the family home. While this does not give anything like the protection afforded by a custodial sentence, it may be useful in these circumstances.

- 227S Mental health treatment requirements: medical evidence
  This section proposes that a written report purporting to be signed by an approved medical practitioner may be received in evidence without the need for proof of the signature or qualifications of the practitioner.

This proposal is not acceptable. Any report which attributes the offender’s behaviour to a mental condition must be submitted by a credible, accredited practitioner operating in the field relative to the offence, and be signed by them.
We would also be concerned about any move to refer perpetrators of domestic abuse to “medical health treatments” as an alternative to either a custodial sentence or referral to a perpetrator programme. This is particularly relevant as we have seen increasing evidence of the pathologising of the behaviour of perpetrators of domestic abuse. However, arguing that the behaviour is due to psychological factors simply diminishes the abuser’s criminal responsibility and does not take into account their personal responsibility for perpetrating the abuse, or the dynamics of power and control in domestic abuse.

Any suggestion that the abuser’s cultural background should excuse crime, mitigate responsibility or reduce the penalty for criminal behaviour or that they are in need of medical “treatment” or “therapy” is dangerous to the women, children and young people who have experienced domestic abuse, belittles the crime and provides abusers with a regrettably convenient excuse.

- 227W Periodic review of community payback orders
  This section indicates that on imposing a community payback order in respect of an offender, the court may include in the order provision for the order to be reviewed at such time or times as may be specified in the order. Since the rationale behind community payback orders is that the offender will be “visible” to the court, it is therefore important that these reviews are held by the court to inform them of the offender’s compliance or otherwise with the order, the risk they pose to the community and, thus, their suitability to continue on order.

- 227ZB Breach of community payback order
  If the offender fails to appear as required by a citation to the offender, the court must issue a warrant for their arrest unless there are mitigating circumstances such as illness.

Section 17 Presumption against short periods of imprisonment or detention
We acknowledge that these proposals may have a positive impact on certain offenders with chaotic lifestyles for whom prison is a “revolving door” and not appropriate for addressing the issues behind their criminality.

However, the criminal behaviour of perpetrators of domestic abuse does not fall into this category and the proposals to discourage the use of short term sentences are likely to have a negative impact on women, children and young people experiencing domestic abuse.

Any presumption in sentencing against the use of prison in cases involving domestic abuse will only serve to increase the risks to safety for women, children and young people experiencing domestic abuse; further, it will undermine the work done within the criminal justice system and in public awareness-raising on the seriousness of domestic abuse and how it should therefore be dealt with by the courts. It would be disastrous if the proposals were to foster an attitude amongst abusers that their behaviour was no longer being taken seriously in terms of sentencing and that they could, to all intents and purposes, abuse with impunity.

In preparing this response, SWA consulted our member groups and the women they support and these are some of the responses we received:-

- “Any violent crime should be custodial .. to send a message out to the men that violence is never acceptable, especially when you think of the scale of domestic abuse. The courts should be treating it more seriously and a year or over should be mandatory. If the Scottish Government want to incarcerate the most “dangerous and violent “then they should start with men who abuse their partners and children. What do they define as dangerous and violent? Is it not enough that women and children are systematically abused?

- The ordeal of a court appearance is only made bearable by the thought that the perpetrator will receive a sentence that relates in some way to the severity of the crime.

- She feels that a custodial sentence will give her and her children time to adjust, and prepare for the perpetrator being at large.

- It could be argued that that if it has reached the level that the abuser has been charged with assault or other that they are a dangerous person. Are individuals- woman and children any less in need of protection because the assaults take place usually in the home and it is named domestic abuse?

- They (the women in refuge) felt that short term prison sentences were sending out a message to society that DA is unacceptable and if there is a problem with overcrowding in prisons then the Govt. should find a way of dealing with that issue. The women felt short term sentences were a breathing space for women to move on or otherwise make themselves safe….

- Domestic abusers are some of the most dangerous and violent offenders in society. Any family who have experienced abuse know that these proposals will not work and most likely make matters worse…make sure they actually serve 6 months and not only a part of that because of the way the system works at the moment.

- We have fought so hard and long to have DA recognised as a serious crime, this is going to be a backward step. .. It is so important for abuser, and the children and young people in the family to get the message that the courts are taking it seriously loud and clear- if we don’t, what are we saying they or their mums are worth? Giving the family the space to know what life is like without the abuser (even for a short time) can not only bring respite but gives the woman a chance to call in support for herself and her children, move to another area, it also keeps them safe from his continued harassment and abuse. We encourage women to contact the Police saying that they will be believed and that the abuser will not get away with it. Will they still report if they think all he will get is a slap on the wrist? What do we say to them now?

- I feel that six months or less still shows the perpetrator that the crime is taken seriously and is being treated as so. Hopefully it will impact on his future behaviour. It also helps the victim of the attack believe that they are worthy of being protected and that they did the right thing by reporting the incident.

- We have always felt that custodial sentences for perpetrators of domestic abuse) are an effective way of showing that the justice system and society find domestic violence as totally unacceptable as any other form of violence. Community service… utterly fails to recognise the seriousness of domestic abuse and its effects, not just on the women and children concerned, but on the values and attitudes filtered through our whole society.

Consequently, where the crime involves violence and/or there is a background or history of domestic abuse, sentences of 6 months or less must be retained as an option. Since individual incidents do not always reflect the ongoing nature of the abuse perpetrated by a particular abuse, it is vital that the courts consider history and behaviour, evidence of patterns of abuse and controlling behaviour.

This section proposes that those sentenced to a custodial sentence of a year or less would subsequently, on release, be subject to licence conditions, which is a positive move. However, since prisoners currently serving a year or less are not released until they have served half of their sentence, we are very concerned with the additional proposals in this section to extend the use of Home Detention Curfew (i.e. electronic tagging), which would allow the discretionary release of these prisoners before the half way period of their sentence.

This is not acceptable and does not reflect either the intention of the court in imposing the sentence it considers appropriate and, in terms of domestic abuse, does not provide certainty and clarity for those women or children who have experienced the abuse as to how long the perpetrator will be out of their lives.

We also note that Scottish Ministers and local authorities will be required to put in place joint working arrangements in relation to the assessment and management of the risks posed by short-term custody and community prisoners. These joint working arrangements should be documented in a policy document available to the public, should involve extensive training of those involved and must contain mandatory provisions for consultation with the partners of the local Multi-Agency, Violence Against Women, Community Safety and other fora; similarly, if the discussions are undertaken by community Justice Authorities or Criminal Justice Boards, the same consultation must be undertaken.

Section 32 – Certain sexual offences by non-natural persons
Under the provisions it will be competent for the court to impose an unlimited fine following successful prosecution on indictment, instead of or as well as, imprisonment. While the availability of a fine in solemn procedure will now allow the courts to penalise corporate offenders, we would be concerned that any change of the law in this way, particularly in relation to the policy in keeping people out of prison, would result in offenders being given fines instead, a punishment which they may be easily able to afford given the amount of money made internationally in relation sexual exploitation of children.

Section 34 – Extreme pornography
We would agree with the comments in the briefing on this section prepared by Rape Crisis Scotland and the Women’s Support Project.

Further, we would add that certain terms in the section require explanation. It will be a defence for person accused to prove that they a legitimate reason for being in possession of the image concerned, but “legitimate” is not defined and for the avoidance of doubt this must be clarified- e.g. for the purposes of prevention and detection of crime?

An additional defence under this section is that the accused was sent the image concerned without any prior request having been made by or on behalf of them and that they did not keep it for an unreasonable time. Again, what is “unreasonable” and in what circumstances would retention be deemed reasonable?

We agree with these proposals and would comment that for the avoidance of doubt and to ensure that there are no misunderstandings, the section should also read that the statement should have been read and agreed by its author.

Section 66 Witness anonymity orders
We agree with this section, subject to the caveat that, for the protection of witnesses, the wording in proposed section 271P(4) should be amended by replacing “may”, as highlighted below, with “must”, viz “Accordingly, where the prosecutor or the accused proposes to make an application under this section in respect of a witness, any relevant material which is disclosed by or on behalf of that party before the determination of the application may be disclosed in such a way as to prevent— (a) the identity of the witness, or (b) any information that might enable the witness to be identified, from being disclosed except as required by subsection (2)(a) or (3)(a).”
Section 80- Assistance for victim support
We welcome the indication in the Bill’s Policy Memorandum that this section may empower the Scottish Government to provide funding for the support of victims beyond the limits of current section 10 provision. We are particularly interested to note the reference to support for those with no recourse to public funds. However, we assume that this provision would require an increase in the funds currently available through the section 10 funding stream.

Section 85 Meaning of “information”
This intention of this section requires clarification as the wording is contradictory. Subsection (1) begins “In this Part “information”, in relation to an accused, means material of any kind (other than precognitions and victim statements) given to or obtained by the prosecutor in connection with the case against the accused.”

However, subsection (2) then goes to define information and states “In particular, “information” includes— (a) information contained in precognitions, (b) information contained in victim statements…”

We understand that anomaly has already been identified by the COPFS and that their position is that victim statements should be regarded as information which will not routinely be disclosed and if disclosure is required, then only the relevant and material information will be extracted and disclosed.

Section 98 Confidentiality of disclosed information
This section applies the prosecutor is required to disclose information to an accused. Section 97 allows the prosecution to limit disclosure of sensitive material to “access only”, in cases where the accused is representing themselves. Strictly speaking, there is nothing in section 98 to prevent a self-representing accused demanding a copy of sensitive material for the preparation of their own defence, or for a defence representative to give a copy of such material to an accused ostensibly for the same purpose.

In order to protect those victims and witnesses whose personal information may be open to such scrutiny, section 98 must be unequivocal in forbidding, in cases where such accused have a personal connection with the victim and or witnesses, cases involving sexual offences, or cases where there is a sexual element to the crime, the accused from obtaining or retaining a personal copy of any material.

Where an accused applies to the court for an order enabling the accused to disclose specified information to a specified person for a specified purpose, the section requires the court to give both the prosecutor, and any person appearing to the court to have an interest in the information to which the application relates, an opportunity to be heard.

The section must clarify the procedure, how the parties will be notified, whether this notification will be served by the court or by the accused, the grounds on which the court will allow or disallow the application and the appeal process available to the prosecution.

Section 114- Code of Practice
We agree with these proposals and it is encouraging to see that the Code of Practice will be placed before the Scottish Parliament, thus, presumably, being available to public scrutiny.

We note while that the section states that police forces, prosecutors, those submitting reports to prosecutors and those engaging in the investigation of crime or sudden deaths must have regard to the Code, there is no reference to its application to defence agents or self-representing accused. It may be that the Code is not appropriate but given that the legislation places obligations and rights on the accused, the section must clarify how practice and procedural guidance will be produced for defence agents or self-representing accused.

The Code of Practice should be incorporated into the working practices of the COPFS, the police and any other relevant agencies and must cover:-
- the obtaining and disclosure of medical and dental records, etc,
- the obtaining and disclosure of visually recorded interviews and CCTV footage
- how disclosure will dovetail with the restrictions on sexual offences evidence and applications under section 275
- cases where the accused can represent himself but there is still a sexual element to the case
- responsibilities of the investigating officer in conducting reasonable lines of enquiry and the identification of possible exculpatory evidence

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Cyrus Tata, Centre for Sentencing Research, Department of Law, Strathclyde University

PART 1: Sentencing

The Scottish Sentencing Council (s3-6) : Merit in Principle but Will it be Truly Independent?

Although I have some major concerns about the particular proposals in the Bill, there is merit to the principle of a Sentencing Council. A Sentencing Council could assist the informed reflection on sentencing policy and practices. A Sentencing Council can potentially be a way of trying to develop an informed sentencing policy by creating ‘buffer’ between judges and ill-informed criticisms by the media and some politicians. It can also be a way of communicating with the public and informing the public about the reality of sentencing practices. Research (including that in Scotland) shows clearly that public attitudes and opinion about sentencing are partly a consequence of low levels of knowledge about sentencing the justice system more generally. There is an urgent need to address low levels of public knowledge about sentencing and criminal justice. A Sentencing Council can be a way of addressing low levels of public knowledge about sentencing and also encouraging public consultation about some of the thornier issues in sentencing.

Is a Sentencing Council necessarily a threat to judicial independence? Unless one takes the unsustainable posture that there can be no such thing as policy in sentencing, then a Sentencing Council need not necessarily threaten judicial independence at all. Indeed, if suitable arrangements are made a Council could strengthen public confidence in the justice system and the judiciary, and thereby its long-term independence from (especially) the executive. To say that any forum such as a Sentencing Council necessarily threatens judicial independence would be a misunderstanding of what judicial independence means. Constitutionally, sentencing in individual cases is a matter for judges to decide within the law, but sentencing policy is and always has been a matter on which the public can have a role. Sentencing is not fundamentally a technical matter (although there are technical aspects, of course). Most judicial sentencers readily acknowledge that they do not have a monopoly of knowledge about punishment and penal policy: other professions have much to contribute. Sentencing is conducted in the name of the public, to serve the public and paid for by the public. It is entirely constitutional for Parliament to make arrangements for a body such a Sentencing Council to assist in the development of principles and policy. However, while the principle of a Sentencing Council has much potential, I have concerns about the particular arrangements being proposed.
The Proposed Relationship between the Sentencing Council and the Courts

There are two key issues here:

1. Departures.
   Section 7 states that judicial sentencers can depart from guidelines as long as they state their reasons for doing so. As it stands, this sounds so permissive as to render guidelines worthless: all a judicial sentencer would need to do would be say that the guidelines are not applicable in the instant case because of the particular facts and circumstances. There has been considerable scholarship on previous attempts to require judicial sentencers to provide formal reasons for departures and what we know from this should feed into any new attempt to require reasons to be given.

   This remarkably permissive approach to departures will contradict what is described as one of the two main aims of the proposals – encouraging consistency in sentencing. If the grounds for departure are not specified by the Council or the Court of Criminal Appeal, it is likely that there will be greater inconsistency in sentencing for like cases – it is likely that different sentencers will develop different compliance/departure practices in similar cases. Some will be minded to comply whereas in the same case others will find that departure is possible. The practical effect of such guidelines would depend heavily on the Court of Criminal Appeal.

Will the Sentencing Council be sufficiently independent from the executive?

1. The arrangements (sections 8 and 12) do not show sufficient independence from the executive branch of the state.
   On the one hand the Scottish Government has argued for flexibility in how the Council approaches the production of guidelines and associated matters. On the other hand, there is a real danger that the arrangements will not ensure the Sentencing Council’s independence from the executive branch of the state. Named office holders (including Ministers) would be able to invite the Council to consider producing guidelines in certain areas, and while the Council could decline to do so, it would in effect be answerable to Ministers. There is a danger that this arrangement will not display genuine independence.

2. The arrangements could come to be viewed with suspicion which will damage the work of the Council.
   A second danger is that the proposed arrangements between the Council and government may come to be viewed (whether rightly or not) with suspicion and cynicism. It will not be long before it is alleged that the apparent independence of the Council is not real and that the Council is being surreptitiously leant on by Ministers (or others). For this reason, critics are likely to claim that independence is a merely a pretence.

This 2007 Act relates to the release of prisoners (and implicitly deals with judicial sentencing). I have previously submitted evidence both orally and in writing to Justice 2 Committee (see Annex), which, if implemented as it stands, would make a unsatisfactory situation even worse. The Act has not yet been implemented. Section 18 of the current Bill sets out amendments which generally speaking mitigate some (though not all) of the most perverse effects of the 2007 Act (for example the 15 day cut-off anomaly—see annex).

While, the current Bill cannot be said to make release arrangements much clearer or more transparent, the apparent intention (as set out in the policy memorandum) to increase the 15 day cut-off to 12 months makes sense (similar to the position which was proposed by the now-defunct Sentencing Commission). It is sensible that such a cut-off should be in line with the new summary sentencing powers (see annex for further explanation). In addition, the proposal to create ‘short-term custody and community prisoners’ (s18) is an improvement on the 2007 Act, in as much as it appears not to be making unrealistic promises which accompanied the 2007 Act about supervision of released short-sentenced prisoners.

Section 6 of the 2007 Act is one of the more illogical elements of that legislation. The current Bill does not appear to seek to repeal or amend it.

That would be mistake. Section 6 of the 2007 Act provides that the custody part must be a minimum of 50% of the overall sentence, but that this may be increased to 75% if the individual sentencing judge considers it appropriate. What is the rationale for allowing individual sentencers to increase the custody element to 75%? None of the accompanying documentation to that Bill (not in the current Bill) has provided any explanation. S6 is bound to create less clarity in sentencing – not more. Section 6(4) provides that an individual sentencer may increase the custody element to 75% in view of: the seriousness of the offence/s; previous convictions; the timing and nature of a guilty plea. Yet all three of these criteria currently form (and will continue to form) the basis of determining the overall headline sentence. Why should individual sentencers now be asked to make the same assessment twice? At best this seems to provide for unnecessary duplication and confusion. Moreover, this would often cut the time for supervised rehabilitation in the community to help the offender not to reoffend (see Annex).
ANNEXE

WRITTEN EVIDENCE SUBMITTED TO THE JUSTICE 2 COMMITTEE OF THE SCOTTISH PARLIAMENT ABOUT THE CUSTODIAL SENTENCES AND WEAPONS (SCOTLAND) BILL, SUBMITTED 20TH NOVEMBER 2006

1. THE BILL IGNORES THE KEY TO ACHIEVING CLARITY IN SENTENCING

The Bill deals with the management of sentences without tackling sentencing itself – once again changing exit points without looking at entry. The Bill has shied away from looking at sentencing policy. While it is accepted that the allocation of punishment in individual cases is a matter for the courts, the overall objectives and shape of sentencing policy is a matter for Parliament. The Bill will not achieve greater transparency because ultimately, in and large part, the 'disjuncture' between time announced and time served is a practical consequence of not tackling the question of who goes into prison and for what. By ignoring that question of who we should send to prison (i.e.: especially where persons are not a danger to the public) and for what, governments will continue to find that they have to manipulate release arrangements so as to relieve pressure on prisons caused by the throughput of huge numbers of very short term prisoners.

2. ISSUES ARISING FROM THE 15 DAY CUT OFF.

ANY period in custody is extremely serious and has damaging effects leaves one in two homeless; breaks social and familial ties etc which are so vital to desistance.

There are also serious equal treatment considerations:

1. The perverse effects of the 15-day rule. This means that a person sentenced to custody for 21 days will serve less than a person sentenced to custody for an apparently less period (eg 14 days). This is plainly absurd and undermines the objective of clarity and intelligibility.
2. In addition to the perverse effects of the 15 day cut off, some sentencers may feel it is a matter of justice (comparative proportionality) that someone who would have been sentenced to 21 days imprisonment would serve less than someone who is sentenced to 14 days. It will be tempting (and in some respects understandable) for individual sentencers to inflate their sentence to try to avoid this comparative injustice. Other individual sentencers may feel that they cannot do this.
3. Given that the Scottish Executive acknowledges that between 15 days and 6 months the licence will be nominal, why have the 15 day cut off point at all?

3. UNINTENDED INFLATIONARY PRESSURES ON SENTENCING

Many (though not all) individual sentencers will feel that supervision after release from custody (i.e. combined sentence) is desirable in many cases. The policy memorandum tells us that only those serving 6 months or more will be expected to be in supervision (and it may well be that in time 6 months comes to be seen as too low to provide meaningful supervision). Consequently, many individual sentencers will choose to add the extra time necessary in order that the person before them will definitely get the supervision and support. With the new summary sentencing powers being increased to 12 months\(^1\), this will be very tempting. It would have been more sensible to have kept the 12 month cut off recommended by the Sentencing Commission since this would coincide with maximum summary powers. Alternatively, the maximum summary powers should be kept at 6 months.

4. NOMINAL LICENCE PRACTICE WILL DAMAGE PUBLIC CONFIDENCE IN COMMUNITY SENTENCING IN GENERAL

The Policy Memorandum concedes that those sentenced to custody for six months or less (and we suggest probably more than 6 months in practice) will be subject to only a nominal licence. This will set the reputation of community punishment up for failure. Inevitably, it will not be long before one or more persons on a nominal licence commits a serious offence, which attracts considerable public attention. When it is discovered that in such cases s/he was ‘on licence’, the reputation not only of licence but (by association) community punishment more generally will be damaged. While this ‘failure’ would, of course, not be a failing of community punishment or criminal justice social work \textit{per se}, it will be portrayed as such in the inevitable media furore, which will point the finger at criminal justice social work. Public confidence in punishment in the community will, as a result, be undermined by its association with the nominal licence. In other words, by making licensing so wide, universal and nominal, it and all community sentencing is being set up for repeated public relations failures.

5. SETTING OF THE ‘CUSTODY PART’ IN THE PROPOSED COMBINED STRUCTURE (SECTION 6)

Section 6 of the Bill is one of the most unclear and contradictory parts of the Bill.

A. Section 6 provides that the custody part must be a minimum of 50\% of the overall sentence, but that this may be increased to 75\% if the individual sentencing judge considers it appropriate. What is the rationale for allowing individual sentencers to increase the custody element to 75\%? None of the accompanying documentation provides an explanation.

B. S6 creates less clarity in sentencing – not more

Section 6(4) provides that an individual sentencer may increase the custody element to 75\% in view of: the seriousness of the offence/s; previous convictions; the timing and nature of a guilty plea. Yet all three of these criteria currently form (and will continue to form) the basis of determining the overall headline sentence. Why should individual sentencers now be asked to make the same assessment twice? At best this seems to provide for unnecessary duplication and confusion.

C. S6 will create exacerbate disparities in sentencing

The policy memorandum supposes that 50% will be the normal ‘punishment part’ set by the court. This appears to amount to wishful thinking: there is nothing in the Bill which will ensure that this is likely to be the case. Indeed, individual sentencers are likely to deal with very similar cases in dissimilar ways (disparity).

D. S6 means that the aim of long-term public protection will be undermined “Public protection is of paramount importance.”2 This is why the new combined structure is proposed for all custodial sentences of 15 days or more: to be subject to licence in the community. Community supervision and licence conditions are intended to reduce the risk of re-offending both during the community part of the sentence and after the expiration of the sentence and thereby increase public protection. Yet the proposal in section 6 to allow individual sentencers, in effect, to decrease to 25% the period of community supervision will undermine the very efforts to increase public protection, through a supported and supervised transition back into the community. It is likely that practices will vary between individual sentencers dealing with substantively similar cases.

The Bill proposes that individual sentencers should be allowed to increase the custody part of a sentence to up to 75% because they wish, in effect, to punish the offender twice: once in terms of the overall sentence and again by limiting the time for structured community supervision and support. Yet ironically, in many of those very cases where the offender and the community will most need community supervision the community element will have been reduced. Unlike indeterminate life sentenced prisoners, determinate sentenced prisoners cannot be held or subject to licence beyond 100% of their sentence. Therefore, by allowing individual sentencers to reduce the community part to just 25% it will in fact make management and supervision of offenders both more difficult and shorter. Thus, enabling individual sentencers, to reduce the community element to 25% will undermine the very reason for ending automatic unconditional release: public protection, which is claimed to be of “paramount importance”.

Square Peg in a Round Hole. The Bill has attempted to apply the logic of indeterminate sentence arrangements (e.g. for life sentence prisoners) to all 15 day-plus determinate sentence prisoners. The Bill appears to rely on the rationales used for indeterminate sentence prisoners and apply this to all determinate sentence prisoners sentenced to 15 days or more. The key difference is that determinate sentence prisoners must be released from all restrictions after the completion of 100% of their sentence.

E. Artificial distinction between ‘seriousness’ and ‘protection of the public’ leads to more confusion not less.

S6(5) provides that in setting the custody part, the court "must ignore any period of confinement which is necessary for the protection of public". Background documentation indicates that this is supposed to require sentencers only to include the 'punishment part' of sentencing and thereby subtract the 'risk part' from the sentence. In practice I cannot see that this will work. In practice, the categories of 'risk' and 'seriousness' will continue to be very difficult to distinguish in determinate sentence cases. The Bill's attempt to draw this distinction will be seen to be artificial and un-transparent.

I would recommend, therefore, that the Bill should not enable individual sentencers to vary the custody percentage for determinate sentenced cases. The purposes of retribution, deterrence, culpability and seriousness can be (and are) achieved more transparently through the setting of the appropriate overall headline sentence.

6. IF S6 IS RETAINED THEN THERE WILL NEED TO BE A REQUIREMENT FOR SENTENCE RECALIBRATION

In its report\(^3\), the judicially-led Sentencing Commission explicitly recommended that to take account of increases in real time served in prison, there should be recalibration of sentencing:

"We therefore recommend that, in any new statutory regime, Parliament expressly provides that a sentencer, when having regard to sentences imposed under the previous regime, must also have regard to the right to early release under that previous regime. Accordingly, it will be appropriate for sentencers acting under the new regime…to recalibrate and reduce them by the extent necessary…”[paragraph 5.8, sic]

Currently, it is understood that the sentenced person would be released after 9 months of an 18 month sentence. (50%). However, section 6 will allow the individual sentencer to pass the same headline/official sentence (18 months) for the same case, but to increase the effective period in custody to 75% (in this example 12 months). Thus, the effective (or real) custodial sentence will be 3 months longer, although the official/headline sentence remains the same.

For reasons not explained by the background policy documentation, the recommendation by the Sentencing Commission that “Parliament expressly provides” for recalibration has been completely omitted from the Bill.

Written submission from South Lanarkshire Council

The Council welcomes the Bill and supports the general thrust of the Bill which, in broad terms, aims to reduce re-offending by supporting rehabilitation at the same time as ensuring that risks to the public are properly managed. The principle of reducing the number of short-term sentences and strengthening community based alternatives is also welcomed.

The establishment of a Sentencing Council should lead to greater transparency and also has the potential to raise public understanding of the effects of sentencing.

From a Social Work Resources’ perspective, there is a concern that there is a wide perception, supported by some elements of the media, that any sentence other than prison is a soft option. In fact, imprisonment contributes significantly to alienation from the community and increases the risk of further offending.

There is evidence that well resourced community based orders can make a significant difference in helping individuals understand the consequences of their behaviour, take responsibility for their behaviour and change their pattern of behaviour. Ultimately, this makes communities safer.

Sections 3 – 8 on the establishment of a Scottish Sentencing Council have the potential to increase understanding of the impact of sentencing within the community.

The Council welcomes the sections of the Bill that require ongoing review of sentencing guidelines which will help ensure that sentencing remains relevant.

In relation to Section 6 on the requirement to publish and review sentencing guidelines and Section 12 on the publication of a business plan, we would welcome guidance that clarifies who should be consulted on these with the aim of ensuring that relevant agencies, such as those representing victims, local authorities and other interested groups have the opportunity to express a view.

The following are areas in which the Council would request clarification:-

- Section 227a (2) - advises that a court must receive a report from an officer of a local authority before imposing a Community Pay Back Order. This should be done by a qualified Social Worker.
- Section 227f (1)(a) - establishes that an Order should not interfere with the person’s religious beliefs. While we support that principle, we suggest that further definition is required in order to ensure that the position is not abused.

- Section 227f (2) - this and other sections suggest that there will be different components to a Social Enquiry Report, for example, assessment of the criminogenic behaviour and of defining some of the practical arrangements surrounding the person’s life. Guidance needs to ensure that the correct check list is in place.

- Section 227g (2) - in providing information to the court, will the officer of the local authority be able to make a clear statement of what cannot be provided? This is particularly important in relation to the number of the treatment requirements outlined in section 227g (2)(b) where support will be required from partner agencies in other Social Care and Health Services to, in some instances, provide the treatment. We need to clarify what their responsibility is in providing such services. This could have financial or other resource implications for providers.

- Section 227h (5) - the requirement to pay compensation should be treated as part of the supervision requirement – does the responsibility for the supervising local authority extend to the collection of compensation payments?

- Section 227i (1) - advises that the offender must, for the specified number of hours, undertake unpaid work and another activity. In relation to another activity, does this include the ability to participate in education or some other form of learning? In relation to unpaid work, if this is the only disposal of the court, does this require an assessment prior to being ordered?

- Section 227l (1) - specifies the time period in which unpaid work or other activity requires to be completed. In other parts of the legislation, it talks about the importance of sequencing activity. Does this mean that, in terms of the assessment, it would be possible for the local authority officer to determine when the unpaid work activities should start to allow completion within the time sequence? For example, if someone has an alcohol or drug problem they may require treatment before they are fit to start on the unpaid work activity.

- Section 227m - appears to be a replacement for the current Supervised Attendance Order for non payment of fine. Is there an assessment required before this can be imposed, and can this order be imposed without an offender’s consent?

- Section 227p (3) - this states that suitability for a programme requires to be part of the assessment process. Will this ensure that, if a person is seen as being unsuitable, the court cannot impose such a condition? What are the rights of the authority to return to court if an unsuitable condition is imposed?

- Section 227s (1) - does this allow for electronic submission of reports?

- Section 227u (1) - requires clarity on the responsibility of Health and Social Care providers where a person is finding it difficult to comply with the treatment element of the Order and are then refused services. Experience suggests that sometimes individuals require a level of support in order to be able to accept the treatment component. Therefore, if a drug treatment requirement is one element of a condition, and the offender is complying with other parts of the Order, is there the possibility of the supervising officer having the discretion to suspend an element of the condition until the person can be supported to accept the treatment?

- Section 227w (3) - the views are welcomed as a way of enabling compliance. It would be helpful if guidance clarified whether the court prescribes the review period; the local authority suggests within the initial assessment what is a realistic period. In other words, can the review period be negotiated?

- Section 227za - we require further clarification of the detail of transfer arrangements and how particular Orders could be managed if a person is moved some distance from the original authority.

- Section 227ze - is there a timescale for completing the report, and can the report be verbal?

- Section 227zg - imposes a new duty on an annual consultation about unpaid work. Further guidance is required on how this is managed, and how it fits in with some other activities within the local authority area.

We also need to consider that there are currently significant issues regarding the management of offenders who cross jurisdictions. It would be helpful if the current legislation could clarify responsibilities in relation to that.

Part 2 Sections 25-28 deal with serious organised crime - Section 28 provides that certain classes of individuals have a duty to report suspicion of possible criminal activity to Police, particularly those who hear about the offences in relation to their trade or professional business. The only specific exclusion is the Legal Profession. Are Social Workers who receive information obliged to report it to the Police? If so, we need guidance on rules and responsibilities.

- Section 29 - provides a clearer definition to prescribed articles.

- Section 34 – Extreme pornography - introduction of the provision is welcomed. However, we support the view that has been expressed by Rape Crisis and the Women’s Support Project that it could be stronger and more effective by:-
  - amending the definition of extreme by changing the wording to an act which results or threatens to result in a person’s severe injury
  - broadening the scope to cover non photographic visual depictions of extreme pornography. This would cover the use of virtual technologies
  - broadening the definition of extreme to include depictions of incest
  - making clearer definition of possession to include repeat viewings of material without actually downloading files

- Section 38 in relation to the prosecution of children - we welcome the raising of the age of criminal responsibility from 8 to 12 years.

We believe this should be accompanied by increasing the powers available to the Children’s Hearing by extending the definition of a child to include those aged up to 18 years, ensuring this definition is applied to all legislation relating to children and ensuring that all children and young people are dealt with in a separate court, where their best interest should be the primary consideration.

Section 47 - the remand and committal of children and young persons - we welcome the step that repeals the power to remand a child into custody. We should ensure that children are not placed in adult establishments and, where secure accommodation is seen as the only option by a Children’s Hearing or Court, they should be placed in specialist units for the shortest possible period governed by GIRFEC principles.

Section 63 - which refers to the spouse or partner accused being a compellable witness - although we agree with the principle, it’s important that sufficient safeguards are in place to protect those individuals who may be subject to abuse or threat by a partner.

Licensing under Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982

Section 121(2)
The deletion of the word “unconditionally” is generally welcomed.

Section 123(3) – Licensing of metal dealers
The proposed changes to the metal dealers’ exemption warrant limits are to be largely welcomed.

Section 125 – Licensing of market operators
These amendments could have an impact on small charitable organisations which may want to have car boot sales, etc, but would find the cost of a market operators’ licence prohibitive.

Section 126 – Licensing of public entertainment
This could have severe implications for small organisations which perhaps put on entertainment at no cost and the need to apply for a public entertainment licence could make the cost of providing entertainment prohibitive.

Section 127 – Licensing of late night catering
This should provide some clarity and end previous dubiety as to what was meant by ‘meals or refreshment’.

Section 128 – Application for licences
The requirement to add the date and place of birth is one which is generally welcomed and a practice which South Lanarkshire Council has already adopted.

Section 128(b) - which increases the objection period from 21 to 28 days will cause delay for persons wishing to obtain a licence although it may make it easier for partner organisations to submit timeous reports.

Section 128(d) - this increases the notice given to applicants when they are invited to attend a hearing. This will affect the ability to set up a hearing at relatively short notice, however, from an applicant’s point of view it will give them longer to prepare their case.

Alcohol Licensing

Section 130 – Premises licence applications – notifications requirements
This amendment is to be welcomed.

Section 134 – Occasional licences
While the amendment is generally welcomed, it is suggested that the Licensing Board be given the power to delegate the functions of deciding whether an occasional licence application requires to be dealt with quickly to the Clerk as, if not, the benefit of this amendment will be severely hampered and will in effect defeat the purpose of the amendment.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Glasgow Community and Safety Services

Glasgow Community Safety Services (GCSS) is charitable organisation formed in partnership with key stakeholders such as Glasgow City Council, Strathclyde Police and voluntary sector bodies to provide an integrated multi-service response to community safety issues. GCSS welcomes the opportunity to respond to the principles of the Criminal Justice & Licensing (Scotland) Bill which is seen as a significant and positive development in the delivery of justice and care to all of Scotland’s citizens.

As an integrated multi-service provision, GCSS has build up considerable experience and expertise on various issues which can inform to the consideration of the Criminal Justice & Licensing (Scotland) Bill and future developments at Stage Two of this process at the end of the year.

We have broken our response down into key areas and kept to the limited response requested:

GCSS GENERAL RESPONSE

We welcome the Scottish Governments proposal to establish the use of Community Payback Orders which will replace existing community penalties. This proposal highlights a commitment to increase the effectiveness of community penalties with a focus on reparation to communities and robust procedures for the rehabilitation of offenders.

The order will provide access to a range of services which can be tailored to meet the criminogenic needs of each offender which is crucial to reducing reoffending and making Scotland safer. The reparation elements of the order will provide the opportunity for offenders to make amends for the harm caused to the community, allowing them to move on from the offence whilst acting as visible justice for the community affected by anti social and offending behaviour.

Overall we are pleased that key objective is to make it easier for prosecutors to obtain criminal NHO’s against offenders. Women who have been subject to domestic abuse often report repeated threats and continued harassment long after they have exited the relationship. It is therefore helpful that Sheriff’s will be able to see pertinent details of previous offences. We are hopeful that this will offer greater protection to women and deliver a clear message to offenders that their behaviour will no longer remain invisible to authorities and they will be held accountable.

There is one area of concern, in section 2B ‘The court must give the offender an opportunity to make representations in response to the application’. Given that NHO’s are granted only once a conviction has been secured, we wonder why this exception has been created, to the best of our knowledge this does not exist elsewhere in criminal law.

We would also propose that if a criminal NHO has been granted in one Sheriffdom that the NHO also applies in other Scottish Sheriffdom’s. This offers more consistent protection for women, this is important especially if women move from one area to another.

Robust monitoring is always key to gauging effectiveness of any proposed changes and we would urge the Scottish Govt. incorporate this within the soonest possible timescale.
SECTION 17: PRESUMPTION AGAINST SHORT PERIODS OF IMPRISONMENT OR DETENTION

We support the Scottish Government’s intention to suggest that custodial sentences under 6 months should not be imposed unless particular circumstances of the case lead sentencers to believe that no other option would be appropriate.

We acknowledge that imprisonment or detention is necessary for some offenders who pose a real risk to the public or themselves. However, we also believe that short term prison sentences have limited capacities to address each offender’s issues and therefore reduce reoffending. It has also been acknowledged that, in some cases, short term periods of imprisonment can lead to an increase in factors which contribute towards reoffending on release from prison.

GCSS agrees that community sentences can be effective alternatives to short periods of imprisonment by acting as a punishment and also providing the opportunity to address the needs of the offender, reducing recidivism rates.

SECTION 23: OFFENCES AGGRAVATED BY RACIAL OR RELIGIOUS PREJUDICE

We agree with the content of this proposal as it serves to highlight the further seriousness of the aggravated offences and gives the Courts added options in dealing with racism/religious prejudice.

SECTION 38: PROSECUTION OF CHILDREN

We welcome the proposal to raise the age of criminal responsibility from 8 to 12 whilst still allowing children under 12 to be referred to the Children’s Reporters Administration on offence grounds.

It is well documented that the current laws surrounding the prosecution of children in Scotland set the age for criminal responsibility significantly lower than recommendations of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. GCSS agrees that the prosecution of children under 12 does not fit well with the rights of the child. However we do believe that children over 8 years of age should be deemed to be responsible for their actions.

We fully support the intention to ensure that children aged 8-12 can be referred to the Children’s Reporters Administration on offence grounds. In Scotland, we have an effective structure for dealing with youth offending through an integrated welfare system. We believe that restorative justice services play an important role in addressing issues of youth offending providing an opportunity for children to learn about the consequences of their behaviour, and allowing victims to have a voice in the process. Restorative processes play an effective role in dealing with low level and minor offending by children but can be used on a limited basis for children involved with social work services or with a number of previous offences. GCSS would like to see more robust guidelines for the use of restorative processes where a child is subject to a supervision order.

GCSS agrees with the policy suggestion of ensuring that children are no longer imprisoned with convicted adult offenders. We believe that children under 16 should be treated as such and that more suitable arrangements are made for remand and committal purposes which takes more regard to the welfare of the child.

SECTION 63: SPOUSE OR CIVIL PARTNER OF ACCUSED A COMPELLABLE WITNESS

We agree with all aspects of this policy section.
Justice Committee
Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill
Written submission from the Trafficking Awareness Raising Alliance

SECTION 34: EXTREME PORNOGRAPHY

We welcome the Scottish Government’s intention to criminalise the possession of extreme pornography as it highlights a growing commitment to challenging the demand for such extreme images and is a step in the right direction towards generating public discussion on the issue of commercial sexual exploitation, raising awareness and changing attitudes towards pornography. We believe that pornography creates the culture and conditions where violence against women can thrive. Undoubtedly, pornography results in a broader cultural harm by dehumanising women, reducing them to body parts seen to enjoy pain, humiliation and subordination. We know that women involved in prostitution are frequently used to make pornography and research into the methods of human traffickers indicate that pornography is used to “teach” women how to act. Pornographic pictures of trafficked women are also taken by traffickers and are then used to coerce women into sexual exploitation.

What was once regarded as extreme in the porn industry has now become mainstream, which is leading to distorted images about gender among young people and will ultimately have an impact on their ability to form healthy, respectful relationships.

Examining the proposed legislation more closely it is important that we acknowledge our support for the fact that the Scottish proposals are going far beyond the arguably narrow definition of “extreme pornography” that was adopted in England and Wales. The Scottish offence, by covering all obscene pornographic images which realistically depicts rape or other non-consensual penetrative sexual activity, whether violent or otherwise, is necessarily broader which in turn increases the scope of images which can be targeted. It also prevents the unhelpful myth, that rape has to be violent from being further perpetuated. We hope Scotland will learn lessons from the English model in order to produce a stronger, more credible piece of law. Seemingly, in England and Wales there have been few prosecutions and we would hope the proposals here will be more than just of symbolic value. We are happy with the proposed maximum sentence of 3 years for possession of extreme pornography, as if effectively enforced this could provide a deterrent to users of such material.

- Defines an image as extreme if the material in question is “explicit and realistic”, we believe there may be scope for a broadening of definition. As it stands, non photographic representations of extreme, violent sexual acts are not covered in the Bill for example such as on virtual worlds such as Second Life. Although not photographic, we believe these images are equally as harmful and the Bill would provide an opportunity to also sanction against this type of pornography.

- Similarly, within this section we think there is a missed opportunity here to include depictions of incest which are increasingly common on pornography sites.
- It is crucial that clear guidance is issued to the relevant agencies that will be implementing and enforcing the legislation, to ensure that it does not become a dormant instrument.
- We are concerned that there may be difficulty in proving images of rape, due to the issue of consent. It is clear that some images will clearly be criminal; however there is the concern that those in the middle which are harder to prove might simply slip under the radar.
- There is an inherent lack of consent among all those persons who appear in pornography due to the underlying exploitation and harm involved. However, this may be difficult to show when women are generally portrayed as “enjoying” rape, pain and humiliation.
- Clarity is also required as to what “possession” covers and a concise definition is needed, so for example those that view material without actually downloading it do not slip through the net and avoid criminalisation.

We also need to make sure that by only focusing on extreme pornography, that we are not sending out the message that other pornographic images are acceptable and any less harmful.

Recommendation: Although it is out with the scope of this Bill, ideally we would be in favour of legislative sanctions banning all forms of pornography due to our belief that it is degrading to the women involved, harmful to users and complicit in violence against women both in its production and in its consumption.

To conclude, although ultimately a narrow measure, by only focusing on extreme pornography, as opposed to the industry as a whole, we are still wholly in support of this move which hopefully will reduce the demand for extreme images and send out a clear message that they and the people who look at them have no place in a civilised society. We hope this legislation has the “teeth” to do this, and recommend that it is backed up by clear guidance and a public education campaign. Young people must be educated on the difference between porn related sex and healthy sex which is based on values of respect, equality and mutuality.

We welcome the Scottish Government’s intention to bring Scots Law in relation to trafficking of persons in line with England and Wales and ensure consistency in the protection of victims across the UK. Glasgow has the highest number of people involved in the sex industry outside of London, and approximately 50% of those involved are from overseas (Scotland’s Slaves: An Amnesty International briefing on trafficking in Scotland, 2008). It is clear that despite provision in the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003, there are still definite gaps in the current legal framework to protect victims of trafficking. We support an extension of provisions to include facilitating the arrival or entry into the UK of a person for the purposes of exploitation, regardless of where the facilitation took place and irrespective of the nationality of the facilitator. This extra-territorial measure widens the scope of the law to target the perpetrators of modern day slavery. However, it must be noted that we believe the only way that trafficking activity can truly be halted is to disrupt the market by challenging demand.

GCSS strongly supports the introduction of new powers within the Anti Social Behaviour (Scotland) Act 2004 for the closure of premises associated with human exploitation. Street prostitution, although the most visible, is only a small percentage of prostitution activity in the UK today. The covert nature of the indoor trade means that the numbers of women involved in the off street sex industry can be hard to quantify combined with the difficulties in gleaning intelligence to support law enforcement agencies in their efforts. The TARA Project has estimated that upwards of 700 women have been brought to Scotland for the purpose of commercial sexual exploitation, with over 40 different nationalities of women engaged in off street prostitution in Glasgow alone.

We recommend that the new measures include not just only closing premises associated with trafficking, but covers flats and brothels in general where prostitution occurs. It is deceptive to see prostitution and trafficking as two separate issues, as if one is “free” and the other “forced”. This fails to take into account the lack of choice evident in all types of exploitation, and implies it is the time or distance that is the important thing, not the abuse.

It is not clear from the Bill as to whether the closure orders would be temporary or permanent; no period of time is specified. It would be useful to have some clarity here in order to act as guidance to the relevant agencies who would be involved in enforcement.

Although, a closure order is undoubtedly a worthy tool, as closing such premises sends a message out to society that such anti-social behaviour and exploitation of people will not be allowed to flourish in our communities, there may also be merit in seeking to impact on the behaviour and activities of the owner and operator of these premises.

Particularly in relation to brothels and “massage parlours”, options should be made available to police and relevant authorities to prevent those who own or operate such premises from simply relocating, or nominally transferring ownership or licence.
• We believe that at the same time as instructing a closure order on premises, those caught purchasing sex indoors should be penalised and ask that consideration be given to criminalising the purchase of sex in any venue.

Furthermore, we believe that although the proposed amendment is a valuable shift in the right direction, the implementation of closure orders for premises associated with exploitation is only a half measure in terms of truly challenging the demand which fuels the UK sex industry.

In practice, as long as the demand exists, vulnerable women will continue to be drawn into prostitution as a form of “survival behaviour” due to addiction issues, homelessness, poverty and experiences of abuse. Scotland has gone some way towards tackling street prostitution with the introduction of the Prostitution (Public Places) Scotland Act 2007 which ensures that those who buy sex on the street face the full force of the law. Conviction rates are high and initial signs show that the law has had some deterrent impact on those who consider paying for sex on the street or in a public place. However, under the current legal framework men can still purchase a woman indoors without committing an offence. This is clearly an unsatisfactory situation.

Recommendation: In response, therefore, to this gap in the law, we consider that there is opportunity within the Criminal Justice and Licensing Bill to rectify this through the introduction of a specific offence which criminalises buying sex in all settings. A Swedish delegation of experts visited Glasgow in March 2008 advocating this approach, which has not only dramatically reduced prostitution, but it is also no longer an attractive destination for traffickers. For example, the Swedish Government has estimated that in the last few years only 200 to 400 women and girls have been annually trafficked into Sweden for prostitution, while in neighbouring Finland the number is 15,000 to 17,000.

Recommendation: We suggest a further amendment to section 41 of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 instead of just focusing on removing the existing exemption for free events. The Criminal Justice and Licensing Bill also provides a valuable opportunity to reassess the current licensing of lap dancing venues. The licensing of lap dancing clubs is currently regulated under Section 41 which outlines the need for a “public entertainment licence” in order to legally operate.

• We consider the term “entertainment” wholly misleading in the context of activities which so clearly denigrate women in an environment of male power and control. Portraying women as sexual objects plays a part in normalising sexual violence and contributes to the male abuse of women being acceptable, tolerated, condoned and excused.

- We would strongly welcome the move to re-categorise the licensing of lap dancing clubs away from the “entertainment” provision towards “sex shop” licensing (Schedule 2 of the Civic Government Act 1982) as this would give local authorities greater powers to apply conditions and restrictions on such clubs.

Indeed, in Glasgow the local authority has set the provision for sex shops at nil due to the underlying belief that there would be an overwhelming contradiction in licensing such exploitative activities while at the same time trying to promote a Scotland grounded on human rights and equality for all. We believe that local authorities must have the option to refuse to license such establishments.

SECTION 21: EXTENDED SENTENCES FOR CERTAIN SEXUAL OFFENCES

We would be overwhelmingly in support of this provision which would allow the courts to protect public safety to a greater degree by giving them the power to impose an extended sentence for an offence which discloses a significant sexual aspect to the offender’s behaviour. This may be utilised when prosecuting trafficking offences when the victim has been trafficked by the perpetrator for the purpose of sexual exploitation. Often the agent may themselves have subjected the victim to rape and sexual assault. Similarly, this may be used against pimps and men who exploit women involved in prostitution.

SECTION 80: ASSISTANCE FOR VICTIM SUPPORT

We would support any measure which would improve support for victims of crime. In particular, in relation to victims of trafficking and sexual exploitation emergency support is often required when they are recovered. Locating suitable emergency accommodation can often be challenging and funds in place for this type of resource would be valuable.

SECTIONS 25 – 28: SERIOUS ORGANISED CRIME

The links between trafficking and serious organised crime are already well documented. Prostitution and trafficking of women is the third highest “black market” income earner globally after drugs and arms. Therefore, we would support any measures which would strengthen the law linked to organised crime. In particular, section 26 “offences aggravated by connection with serious organised crime” is relevant and we would hope that this provision would mean increased sentences for those that organise and facilitate the buying and selling of human beings.
Introduction

COSLA welcomes the opportunity to provide a response to the Criminal Justice and Licensing Bill. We are supportive of the principles underpinning the Bill, albeit we have highlighted the potential implications of implementation in relation to resource issues.

Our response to the Bill’s provisions is set out under three sections relating to the criminal justice and the licensing sections of the Bill along with resource issues.

Cllr Harry McGuigan
COSLA Community Wellbeing and Safety Spokesperson

Criminal Justice Section of the Bill

The Scottish Sentencing Council: COSLA welcomes the establishment of the Scottish Sentencing Council. However, it is important that this new Scottish Sentencing Council works alongside Community Justice Authorities as part of the wider Local Government Family to ensure that community sentences operate in a manner that enhances their credibility with the Courts and with the general public. As such, close working between the Sentencing Council and the CJAs will add value to what both organisations can do in relation to this remit and any failure of either organisation to do so will result in potential public confusion.

Community Payback Orders: COSLA looks forward to working with the Scottish Government and other partners in implementing its proposals, in particular “Community Payback” which will provide the courts with credible alternatives to prison sentences. However, it is imperative that arrangements for Community Payback Orders are robust and reliable to allow the general public to have confidence in them.

We believe that there may be potential for confusion between the Drug Treatment and Testing Orders and Community Payback Orders with the requirement of drug treatment. As such, there is a need for clarity to define these differences. In addition, the Court will not be able to impose a Community Payback Order without “taking account of a report from an officer of a local authority”. Given the possible conditions/requirements that can be imposed through a CPO the nature of the assessment undertaken by the officer of a local authority will be different to current Social Enquiry Report assessment practices of councils. As a result, staff will require additional training and guidance.
In relation to Community Payback Orders there is no guidance within the Bill regarding the qualifications/skill set etc of the “officer of the local authority”. Given the complexity of the assessment required and the potential to deprive an offender of their liberty we suggest that the author of such a report/assessment should be a qualified social worker.

The Bill also states that the “offender must attend appointment with the responsible officer” and that “the nature of the unpaid work or other activity to be undertaken by the offender is to be determined by the responsible officer”. There is no guidance offered within the Bill as to the qualification levels of the “Responsible officer”. At the moment only social workers are recognised as supervising officers or probationers. Non social work qualified staff can and do act as supervising officers for offenders on community service and supervised attendance orders. Therefore, it would be helpful to have guidance which allows for a combination of social work qualified and non social work qualified staff to be Responsible Officers for the supervision requirement of a Community Payback Order.

Further, COSLA welcomes the requirement for offenders to participate in specified programmes aimed at addressing offending behavioural needs. However, the Bill does not make reference to the availability or prioritisation of programmes.

In relation to the periodic review of Community Payback Orders we note the inclusion of reviews within the legislation but think further guidance on the purpose and practice of reviews should be issued following consultation with stakeholders. This should ensure consistency in the operation of reviews.

Presumptions Against Short Periods of Imprisonment or Detention:
COSLA is disappointed that the Scottish Government did not take account of the Scottish Prisons Commission’s recommendations in full i.e. the abolition of short sentences. As such, we believe that the text within section 17 needs to be strengthened in order to endorse the title. We are also concerned that Section 17 of the Bill may have results that have not been foreseen and need further clarification, for example, the section has the potential to result in a significant rise in the number of Social Enquiry Reports requested or an increase in up-tariffing.

Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007: COSLA broadly supports the Amendments of the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act, particularly, as it extends the ability to support people in the community. However, there needs to be clarity within the Bill on ‘prescribed periods’.

Sexual Offences Prevention Orders: COSLA welcomes the move away from simply prohibiting the defendant from doing anything described in the order to requiring the defendant to do anything described in the order and believe that this will strengthen our ability to positively influence offender behaviour.
Victims: COSLA believes it is hugely important that victims should be recognised in the Bill, given victims and potential victims are customers of the criminal justice system. As such, we are of the view that they should be taken into account otherwise this will be a missed opportunity. We are aware that the accredited programmes and many other programmes address the understanding of victim issues but suggest that this could be a standard requirement of a Community Payback Order.

Young People Who Offend: The Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill will abolish the legislation that allows 14 and 15 year olds to be remanded to adult prisons. Nevertheless, it is recognised that some young people cannot remain in their communities as the risks they present, both to themselves and others, are too great and may need to be managed within a secure environment. COSLA is committed with the Scottish Government to ensure that secure care is provided. However, this is a very specialist and costly intervention and should be targeted at the very few young people who need it.

COSLA supports the increase in the age of criminal responsibility to 12 years of age. Also, we support in principle Section 59 of the Bill in relation to the retention of forensic samples from children charged with serious violent and sexual offences with the caveat that the criteria are specific and restricted to serious sexual or violent offences only.

Serious and Organised Crime: We support the proposals outlined in the Serious and Organised Crime Sections (25-28) of the Bill whilst recognising that the statutory supervision of such offenders on licence may place further demands on local authority social work services.

COSLA has general support for the proposals and the majority of the comments made through our member councils to the licensing section of the Bill. We seek either clarification or request further consideration of issues stemming from the proposals that relate to licensing of metal dealers, licensing of market operators, licensing of public entertainment, premises licence applications, premise licence applications: antisocial behaviour reports, occasional licences, extended hours applications: variations of conditions and emergency closure orders on behalf of local authorities.

Resource Issues for Local Government

COSLA is very clear that for the provisions of the Bill to be implemented effectively in relation to the criminal justice elements of the Bill there is a need for a radical shift of resources. These resources should be transferred on an incremental basis to councils and the wider Local Government family in terms of Community Justice Authorities and the Police. As a result, interim transitional financial arrangements should be established following a resource redistribution review.
As it stands the Bill has significant specific financial implications for councils. Section 14 ‘Community Payback Orders’ and Section 17 ‘Protection against Short Periods of Imprisonment or Detention’ are the areas with greatest implications for councils. These arise from the need to increase average unpaid work hours per offender per week by a factor of almost 100%. In addition, the need to make new Community Payback Orders available for a significant number of persons currently the subject of short sentences of imprisonment. As such, the proposed legislation on changes to sentencing has the potential to impose a significant impact on criminal justice social work resources. Examples of new costs include reports for Review Courts, community sentencing also prison sentences and release arrangements. The Financial Memorandum, issued along with the Explanatory Notes, indicates that the majority of additional costs incurred by local authorities will be met through existing Section 27A funding. However, the estimated costs of core services appear to be based on 2007/08 costs and do not take account of the cost of living resources.

Potentially the resources needed to support ‘progress courts’ are considerable. As such, the effective targeting of this provision will be critical to ensure best use of staff time and court time. Similarly where a court considers a Community Payback Order appropriate for an offender under the age of 18 years, the supervision requirement will become mandatory. This age group often have difficulty engaging with services and non compliance can be higher. Therefore, sufficient and age appropriate resources alongside access to universal services will be critical to break the ‘cycle of offending’ that results in a disproportionate number of young people being remanded or sentenced to imprisonment. This will have implications for local authority social work services including Children’s Services and Criminal Justice Services.

The financial implications of implementing revisions to the Custodial Sentence and Weapons Act (S18) are significant and will require a considerable increase in staff resources. Should the Bill confirm the introduction of post release statutory supervision on all sentences of 12 months or more we would urge a gradual introduction, initially targeted at offenders assessed as presenting a high risk of harm and those sentenced to imprisonment in excess of 2 years.

Further, any resource implications relating to the implementation of the provisions of the Bill relating to the licensing should be fully taken on board to ensure the effective implementation of the aims of the Bill.

Written submission from the Equality and Human Rights Commission

1. The Equality and Human Rights Commission was established by the Equality Act 2006 and came into being on 1 October 2007. We are the independent advocate for equality and human rights across the three nations of Great Britain, and we work to reduce inequality, eliminate discrimination, strengthen good relations between people, and promote and protect human rights. We enforce equality legislation on age, disability, gender, gender reassignment, race, religion or belief, and sexual orientation and encourage compliance with the Human Rights Act. In Scotland, we co-locate and work in partnership with the Scottish Human Rights Commission.

2. We welcome the opportunity to comment on the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill at Stage 1. The Bill is very timely for the Commission’s work in Scotland in its first year, as we have been very active in relation to criminal justice, having given written and oral evidence on both the Sexual Offences (Scotland) Bill and the Offences (Aggravation by Prejudice) (Scotland) Bill. We have also commissioned research on policy responses to gender-based crime in Scotland, which we hope to publish by mid May, and criminal justice will continue to be a significant theme in our work planned for 2009-10.

3. The Bill contains a great number of provisions, many of which the Commission welcomes, such as the clarification of the Anti Social Behaviour (Scotland) Act 2004 Act to allow for the closure of premises associated with sexual exploitation and human trafficking, and the tightening of the law on sexual images of children. We also very much welcome the proposals to harmonise statutory aggravations across all areas (making sure that courts appraise offenders of the seriousness of religious and racially aggravated crimes at the point of sentence in the same way proposed for disability, homophobic and transphobic hate crime. There are however two areas where we would like to make specific points. These regard the provisions for Community Payback Orders (CPOs), specifically in relation to a requirement for mental health treatment, and provisions relating to possession of extreme pornographic material.

4. Community Payback Orders and Mental Health: the Commission welcomes proposals at Section 17 for a presumption against short periods of imprisonment or detention. As the report of the Scottish Prisons Commission makes clear, Scotland already has one of the higher prison populations in Europe, imprisonment does little to reduce reoffending, and an approach weighted towards payback to the community would be more beneficial for victims and offenders in all but the most serious types of crime.

5. We would welcome further detail on the proposal at Section 14, to amend Section 227 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 to allow for a Community Payback Order (CPO) to require mental health treatment. The policy intention behind this appears sensible, providing for a more tailored response in cases where offending behaviour is a symptom of underlying mental health issues, and where imprisonment could further exacerbate an existing condition, causing both additional distress to the sufferer and increasing the likelihood of further offending. However, the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003 already has extensive provisions (Part 8 to Part 13) for persons who become subject to mental health legislation through criminal justice orders.

6. There is no information in the Bill, Policy Memorandum or Explanatory Notes on how a mental health treatment CPO would sit alongside Parts 8 to 13 of the 2003 Act; there may be understandable reasons why this is so, but it would be useful if ministers could elaborate on how these two sets of provisions will work in tandem.

7. Possession of extreme pornographic material: Section 34 the Bill proposes mirroring, with some modifications, Section 63 of the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 in England and Wales ii. We would like to raise two issues in relation to this: How the creation of a specific criminal justice response to the possession of extreme pornography relates to the wider issue of pornography in the public sphere and online; and the Scottish Government’s proposal to go beyond the England and Wales Act by criminalising possession of depictions of rape.

8. The Scottish Government’s proposals follow the joint Scottish Executive/Home Office consultation of 2005 iii. Many submissions to that consultation raised important questions about how to define ‘extreme’ pornography, and suggested that there are clear links between all pornography and wider gender inequality. Women’s organisations have pointed to studies which implicate pornography at every stage of the sexual abuse cycle, from predisposing men to abuse, to legitimating abuse, to reducing internal and external inhibitions to abuse, and in initiating and carrying out abuse iv.

9. There are concerns then that any attempt to define in law what constitutes ‘extreme’ pornography should not inadvertently legitimise or normalise less extreme pornography. At the same time, the last two decades have seen an exponential growth in pornography on the internet; some of this material can only be described as violent and extreme, depicting degradation, violence and rape. It would seem reasonable then to have a strengthened criminal justice means of responding to an internet-driven explosion in extreme and violent pornography. The Commission would therefore welcome further clarification from ministers on how they see the law working in practice, and on how changes to the criminal law might sit within a wider policy debates on pornography and gender inequality.

10. In addition, unlike the 2008 Act in England and Wales, the Bill proposes extending the definition of ‘extreme’ to include depictions of rape. Whilst this recognition that the depiction of rape constitutes an extreme image sends a very welcome message, it would be useful to give thought to how this will fit with the statutory definitions of rape and consent in the Sexual Offences (Scotland) Bill also currently before the Parliament.

Written submission from the Human Genetics Commission

The Human Genetics Commission (HGC) is grateful for the opportunity to contribute evidence to the Justice Committee in relation to the general principles of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. The HGC is the UK-wide advisory body on developments in human genetics and their ethical, legal, social and economic implications. As Chair of the HGC’s Identity Testing Monitoring Group, I have been asked to respond on behalf of my fellow Commissioners. As requested by the Committee, our comments relate to general principles underlying the Bill. In line with our remit, our response arises from reflections on provisions relating to DNA retention, as considered in Professor Fraser’s report and subsequent policy documents, and provided for in clauses 58-60 of the Bill.

Since its establishment, the HGC has had a close and continuous involvement with policy issues relating to the collection, retention and use of genetic information for forensic purposes, and has contributed to a number of consultations on proposals to revise legislation both in England and Wales, and in Scotland. Forensic use of genetic information was the subject of a chapter of our first report, *Inside Information, balancing interests in the use of personal genetic data*¹ (2002) and, last year, the HGC commissioned a “Citizens’ Inquiry”, involving two panels of citizens in Glasgow and Birmingham, to explore public concerns about forensic DNA databases.² This was followed by a broader public consultation in the second half of 2008. The Commission is currently in the process of drawing together a report on forensic DNA databases to be published later this year. More particularly, we recently made submissions both to Professor Fraser’s review of DNA and fingerprint retention and to the Scottish Government’s consultation on proposals arising from that report.³

There are two issues raised in the Bill to which we wish to draw the Committee’s attention.

The presumption of innocence

We recall that the Commission has, on previous occasions, expressed a preference for the arrangements for retention of DNA data in Scotland over

2. The Citizens’ Inquiry was commissioned by the HGC in partnership with the ESRC Genomics Policy and Research Forum in Edinburgh and the Policy, Ethics and Life Sciences (PEALS) Research Centre in Newcastle, with funding from the DIUS Sciencewise Programme and the Wellcome Trust. The citizens’ findings were published in July 2009. Full information is available at: www.hgc.gov.uk/Client/Content.asp?ContentId=755 [Link no longer operates] those that apply to records from England and Wales retained on the National DNA Database. We recognise that the approach adopted in Scotland is a pragmatic one that seeks to strike a balance between the benefits of retaining personal data for possible use in future investigations and interference with the civil liberties of those whose data is so retained. However, the difference between the approach in Scotland and that taken in England and Wales is, in this respect, one of magnitude rather than principle. Whilst we recognise that there are pragmatic arguments for the retention of records, for a limited time, relating to those proceeded against, but not ultimately convicted of, certain serious violent or sexual offences, in the absence of a finding of guilt by a court (or at the outcome of children’s hearings) a sufficient justification must be produced for any interference with the right to privacy of such persons. One of the concerns that has been raised with us repeatedly is the lack of publicly available evidence for the utility of retaining records relating to people not convicted of an offence. We expect to consider this further in our forthcoming report.

We would therefore take issue with the conclusion in paragraph 301 of the policy memorandum in which it is argued that “DNA is classed as more sensitive personal information than fingerprints and other relevant physical data. So, if DNA can already be retained... it is logical to retain any fingerprints and other material...” We agree that issues relating to DNA certainly differ from those relating to fingerprint data, and there can be no more of an objection to holding information that is less sensitive than to holding information that is more sensitive. However, notwithstanding inferences that can be drawn from certain obiter dicta in the judgement of the European Court of Human Rights in the case of S and Marper v. The United Kingdom, we believe that the case for retention of any samples from persons not convicted of an offence requires very substantial justification and we would urge the Scottish Government to place any evidence on which they rely in support of this approach in the public domain.

The list of applicable violent and sexual offences still to be developed in relation to the retention of samples from un-convicted children will be of particular significance. In the case of children, the difference between the conclusions one might draw from different perspectives is likely to be most pronounced, given the greater potential of their future lives and their greater vulnerability. We here reiterate the advice in our earlier submission to the Scottish Government consultation: namely, that we would wish the definition of the crimes for which samples may be kept without conviction to include a reference to their seriousness, as well as the fact that they are sexual or violent, in a way that could be consistently operationalised.
The purpose of DNA retention

We appreciate that an underlying aim of the draft legislation is to provide clarity on the purposes for which biological samples and records of forensic data can be used (policy memorandum, para.305; explanatory notes para.309). This is consistent with advice in our earlier submissions. However, we are not sure that the provisions, as drawn, provide that clarity.

In particular, the use of a biological sample, or DNA information derived from it, “for the identification of a deceased person or a person from whom the relevant physical data, sample or impression came” (cl.60 inserting new section 19C(2)(b)) seems somewhat broad. We believe that this is likely to be of very little practical utility (and of benefit mainly to convicted offenders) and that it extends the possible use of samples beyond the ambit of the purpose for which they were originally collected, namely, the investigation of crime. The scope of use of DNA information retained on the database is also something to which we expect to give consideration in our forthcoming report.

Finally we note that the draft legislation does not contain provisions to place on a statutory basis the governance of repositories for biological samples and DNA records. This is something we suggested in our earlier submissions and to which we also intend to return in our report.

I am happy for you to reproduce this response and to quote from it in any report you publish in relation to the consultation. To comply with our open working style a copy of this response will be placed on the HGC’s website.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Midlothian Council

The proposals as regards the licensing provisions are generally acceptable here.

The Members of the Council’s General Purposes Committee when discussing the matter expressed concern about Public Entertainment – the proposal to give local authorities the discretionary power to regulate free-to-enter public entertainment activities, particularly in relation to gala days and fetes, etc. The Members considered that there is a need to ensure that the volunteers who organise these events are not over-burdened by regulation. Whilst it is recognised that Local Authorities will have the discretionary power to licence these activities, caution is urged as regulation may lead such activities being discontinued and therefore a diminution of local traditions and special events and occasions. Volunteers need to be supported rather than potentially place obstacles in their path.

As regards Applications, it is noted that the Bill extends the periods for receipt of representations and notice of Hearings. Whilst this is acceptable, the introduction of a transitional period after licences have expired when application can be made for renewal, appears to be a backward step. It is likely to lead to confusion and a brake on enforcement.

It is noted that no clarification has been given about the other issues contained in the Task Group’s report which have not survived in the Bill.

Also, a number of other issues have been raised in the meantime, including knife dealers. Can such regulations be added to this Bill?

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from the Judges of the High Court of Justiciary

Purposes and principles of sentencing
1. We are content that the purposes and principles of sentencing should be set out in statute. Only two matters call for comment. First, it is not clear why the purposes and principles should not apply where the offender is at the time of the offence under 18 (subsection 5(a) of section 1). In the case of such an offender account will, of course, require to be taken of his or her age but the considerations referred to in subsections (2) and (3) appear to be equally apt for the sentencing of any person who has attained the age of criminal responsibility. Secondly, we refer to section 2(2) in our discussion of the proposed Scottish Sentencing Council (below).

The Scottish Sentencing Council
2. The Financial Memorandum accompanying the Bill states that it is anticipated that an annual budget of approximately £1 – £1.1m will be required to fund the proposed Sentencing Council; in addition there will, it is estimated, be an initial set up cost of £450,000. These costs do not take into account the provision of back office functions such as IT and human resources services which, it is suggested, will be provided by the Scottish Court Service. All these costs are to be borne by the Scottish Government.

3. We are profoundly concerned that, at the present time of financial stringency, when the justice system has other very pressing demands for funding – not least of judicial training and of the provision of judicial manpower – the Government is promoting and the Parliament is contemplating such expenditure on such a Council.

4. The function of the proposed Council is, according to the Bill, “to prepare and publish guidelines relating to the sentencing of offenders” (section 5(1)). We acknowledge that the preparation and the publication of sentencing guidelines have their place in a well-ordered criminal justice system. It is important that sentencers, while deciding individual cases on their own facts and circumstances, should have a reference framework against which such decisions can be taken. The traditional framework is the body of prior decisions made in analogous cases by the High Court of Justiciary, sitting as a court of criminal appeal. Many such decisions are reported in Green’s Weekly Digest and are collated in Morrison – Sentencing Practice. They are thus readily available to the legal professions, including to sentencers. Sentencing is also the subject of training on courses run by the Judicial Studies Committee. The judgments in cases on appeal may also include statements of wider application than to the cases under immediate consideration.

5. Where a sentence, imposed at first instance or considered on appeal, is of a sensitive character or otherwise appears to be of particular public interest, it is the practice of the courts to issue a “sentencing statement” explaining the circumstances. This practice, which is relatively recent, has, it is believed, led to a significantly better understanding, by the public and the press, of sentencing decisions. There may be room for extending this practice.

6. Apart from deciding appeals against sentence, the High Court also has power (under sections 118(7) and 189(7) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995) to pronounce “guideline judgments” on sentencing matters. Any court subsequently passing sentence is obliged to have regard to any relevant opinion pronounced under either of these subsections (section 197). The power to pronounce guideline judgments was initially used somewhat sparingly – though important judgments were pronounced with reference to child pornography and to discounts for early pleas of guilty. In more recent times the power has been used where a particular class of sentencing situation appeared to require more general guidance. Recent examples relate to “cannabis farmers” and to a particular aspect of discounting for an early offer of a plea. The court is now taking a pro-active attitude by seeking to identify cases which would benefit from guideline judgments. Lord Macfadyen was initially tasked with identifying such cases. This work is currently being carried on by Lord Carloway.

7. Other mechanisms also exist for examining general approaches to sentencing practice. For example, towards the end of last year, the Lord Advocate marked appeals (on the basis of alleged undue leniency) against the punishment parts specified for certain persons convicted of murder. She is taking the opportunity to seek from the court general guidance on the current levels of such punishment parts. These cases are scheduled to be heard before an enlarged court later this year.

8. Thus a range of mechanisms already exist for exploring and developing sentencing issues. These could no doubt be improved and, perhaps, as suggested below a wider participation be engaged. However, the central and essential element of these arrangements is the constitutional principle that, with limited and specific statutory exceptions, the High Court has always been and remains the body ultimately responsible for decision-making in the development and implementation of sentencing policy. We regard that principle, which is well-noted in Scotland, as of the first importance.

9. That principle was recognised by the Sentencing Commission for Scotland (chaired by the late Lord Macfadyen) when in August 2006 it recommended, in its report “The Scope to Improve Consistency in “The APSS would be responsible for the necessary research and consultation, and for framing the draft guidelines. The adoption of these guidelines, however, with or without modification, would be a matter for the Appeal Court. The membership of the APSS would have a strong judicial component, but it would also include people who would bring other relevant skills and experience to its work. In that way, the recommendations of the APSS would reflect a breadth of experience and thorough investigation, while the role of the Appeal Court in deciding whether to approve draft guidelines would ensure that sentencing remained essentially a judicial function.”

10. The current proposals in the Bill fundamentally undermine that principle. The proposed Scottish Sentencing Council (of which only a minority, it seems, are to be judicial office holders and only two out of twelve are to be of High Court status) will prepare and publish guidelines which will have direct legal effect, thus restricting the sentencing discretion and power not only of all courts, including the High Court sitting as a court of appeal (section 7(1)(a)), but also of that court when carrying out its other function of issuing guideline judgments (section 7(1)(b)). The proposed Council is to have power to prescribe the circumstances in which its guidelines may (and presumably where they may not) be departed from (section 5(3)(d)). Even the sentencing purposes and principles formulated in section 1 are to be subordinated to the Council’s sentencing guidelines (section 2(2)). Whatever may be asserted about the residual discretion of individual judicial office holders when passing particular sentences, the Bill’s proposals strike directly at the independence of the judiciary (and in particular of the High Court) as the arm of Government essentially responsible for the setting of sentencing policy. The proposals (as framed) are fundamentally unacceptable both on domestic constitutional grounds and because mandatory directions to the court by a non-judicial body undermine the judicial independence required of courts by Article 6 of the European Convention on Fundamental Rights and Freedoms.

11. The Bill’s proposals may be contrasted with the legislation which currently applies in England and Wales. While a Sentencing Guidelines Council is established there under section 167(1) of the Criminal Justice Act 2003, it is constituted by a majority of judicial members (eight out of twelve) and is headed by the Lord Chief Justice, the most senior member of the English criminal judiciary; its constitution can thus be regarded as essentially judicial. Further, that arrangement goes at least some way to reducing the risk of clashes on sentencing matters between the Council and the Court.
12. If it is thought necessary or appropriate to establish a Sentencing Council in Scotland, we strongly urge the Parliament to adopt a function for it of the kind envisaged by the Sentencing Commission for Scotland – namely the function, after appropriate research, of drafting guidelines for consideration by the “Appeal Court” (that is, the High Court sitting with a quorum of at least three judges) with power to the Appeal Court to approve such draft guidelines (see its report, paras. 9.22 – .26). On such guidelines being approved sentencers would require to have regard to any guidelines which were relevant and to state, at the time of sentencing, their reasons for any departure from such guidelines (para. 9.27). As to the constitution of such a Council, we suggest that its membership should include a significant number of persons who do not hold judicial office but strongly urge that there be a majority of judicial office holders. The practical experience of actual sentencers – at all levels – must surely be of primary importance.

13. The Council, whatever its membership, would have added prestige and influence if it were chaired by the Lord Justice Clerk, the second most senior member of the Scottish judiciary. We note that para. 1(5) of Schedule 1 (lay members of the Commission) requires one member to have knowledge of the issues faced by victims of crime. There is no equivalent provision for a person having knowledge of the effect on offenders (such as a criminologist). It will be important that this be borne in mind in the appointments of the remaining lay member or members. The paragraphs in the Commission’s report referred to in paragraphs 9 and 12 are reproduced in the Appendix to this submission.

14. The establishment of such a Council would, like the Bill’s proposals, involve significant expenditure – not least if its functions were to include those specified in section 5(5) (assessment of costs and benefits and of the likely effect of guidelines on the numbers of persons detained in prisons etc.). A much less expensive course would be to develop and expand the present arrangements under which the court itself identifies cases which are suitable for guideline judgments. At present such identification depends solely upon judicial initiative. However, Lord Carloway, who now has responsibility in this field, is at present considering whether there would be advantage in enlarging the personnel who might be involved – possibly the legal profession or even wider interests. If the Parliament were interested in this approach, we would be happy to explore the matter further.

15. If there were to be a Sentencing Council of the kind envisaged in the August 2006 Report or a development of the kind envisaged in the immediately preceding paragraph, the necessary administrative arrangements could be embraced within the Scottish Court Service as constituted by the Judiciary and Courts (Scotland) Act 2008. However, a body as envisaged by the Bill, with the potential for conflict with the Court, could not, in our view, be accommodated within the new, judicially – led Service.

Other aspects of Part 1
16. We have the following observations to make on the remaining proposals in Part 1.

(i) Section 17
While the sentencing of offenders to imprisonment for less than 6 months is a matter primarily for sentencers in courts of summary jurisdiction, we have experience of it when considering cases on appeal. Our experience is that under existing arrangements courts resort to short custodial sentences only where there is no realistic alternative – for example, when all non-custodial measures have already been tried but failed or where the offender’s criminal record is such that only a custodial sentence is likely to bring home to the offender the unacceptability of his or her repeated conduct. We doubt whether the proposed legislative changes will in practical terms achieve much.

(ii) Section 24
We are concerned about the absolute terms of this proposal. Circumstances can arise where a person consumes alcohol voluntarily but in a situation of personal stress (say, bereavement or other trauma) and then goes on to commit an offence. This provision as framed would prohibit a court from taking into consideration the background to the consumption.

PART 2: CRIMINAL LAW

Serious organised crime (sections 25-28)
17. We recognise that concerns about the growth of organised crime, which senior officers on the SCDEA among others have articulated, may lie behind these provisions. Criminal activity which is carefully planned, which involves a significant number of people and which is designed to fund an affluent lifestyle would clearly fall within the concept.

18. The law as it stands allows the court to punish involvement in such activity, when it is identified, by taking it into account when fixing a sentence for the particular criminal activity of which an accused person has been convicted. We would not want the enactment of these provisions to inhibit the court when sentencing from taking into account the level of sophistication in planning and the potential financial gains to be realised from criminal activity, where the accused in future has not been charged under these sections.

Section 25: Involvement in serious organised crime
19. A person who agrees to become involved in serious organised crime under our existing law commits the offence of conspiracy to commit a crime. It will be important for those who propose this legislation to explain to the Parliament and more widely what it is designed to achieve which the existing law does not already provide for. It is desirable also that the drafting of the provisions should not restrict in any way the flexibility of the existing criminal law to punish such activity when it is shown to exist in the context of another indicted crime but where these provisions are not labelled.

20. We are puzzled by the policy behind section 25(3). Involvement in serious organised crime must entail involvement in a conspiracy to commit at least one serious offence or acting with others to commit such an offence - see the definitions of “serious organised crime” and “serious offence” in section 25(2). Even if such involvement were to be peripheral, we doubt that it is appropriate that it should be prosecuted on summary complaint as the involvement relates to an indictable offence. If “material benefit” (in the definition of “serious offence”) is to be interpreted so widely as to render a summary complaint appropriate, that begs the question whether the definition goes far beyond what the public would associate with serious crime.

21. We think that there may be a danger of bringing within these provisions a wider range of offenders than is appropriate. If this is correct, we doubt that it is a principled approach in the criminal law simply to leave it to the discretion of the prosecuting authorities when to invoke provisions which are themselves unduly wide in their scope.

Section 26: Offences aggravated by connection with serious organised crime

22. In our view what this section seeks to do reflects current sentencing practice. The court takes into account the intention of the individual in perpetrating a particular offence, where that intention can be reliably inferred from the proven circumstances. Often the only source of the relevant information is what the accused has said to the police or another person. Evidence from a single source is sufficient under the existing law to establish an aggravating intention. We doubt the need for this provision.

23. If the proponents of this Bill consider this provision is desirable as part of a new statutory regime in relation to serious organised crime, it will be necessary to preserve the flexibility which the existing law gives to treat such matters as aggravations even when this provision is not labelled. We have difficulty in seeing the need for the requirements set out in section 26(5) which might give rise to the implication that without the labelled charge and the express statement of aggravation in both the sentencing speech and the record of the conviction, the court could not take account of such circumstances in sentencing.

Section 27: Directing serious organised crime

24. This provision is consistent with the other provisions on this subject. It appears from section 27(3) that this offence is essentially the same as the existing crime of inciting another to commit an offence as it would be perpetrated in the same way.

25. We doubt the need for section 27(4) as it is simply a statement of the way in which intention is ordinarily established in any case where it is relevant. The context includes what people said and did. As neither judge nor jury can look into a person’s mind and have to rely on the context to infer intention, we see no benefit in stating the obvious.

Section 28: Failure to report serious organised crime

26. We have considerable concerns as to how these provisions will work.

27. First, while actual knowledge of the commission of a relevant offence, although hard to prove, may justify treating non-disclosure as a criminal offence, difficulties will arise in relation to the level of suspicion needed to render criminal any failure to disclose such suspicion.

28. Secondly, given the wide definitions of “serious organised crime” and “serious offence” in section 25 the duty to disclose will cover most common law crimes and many statutory offences where a person acts with another with the intention of securing a material benefit. Is it intended to cast the net so widely?

29. Thirdly, we are concerned about the breadth and lack of definition of some of the concepts in the context of a proposed statutory criminal offence. For example, is “material benefit” in subsection (2) (which is a pre-condition of the obligation of disclosure by the person in the close personal relationship) the same as or different from the same term in the definition of “serious offence” in section 25(2)? Further, will “reasonable excuse” in subsection (4) cover fear for one’s safety or job?

Section 29: Articles banned in prison

30. We have no comments on the principle. We assume that it is envisaged that members of the public will surrender their mobile phones etc in a designated area at the prison.

Section 32: Sexual offences by bodies corporate

31. Section 32(3), by covering the acts or omissions of a person who purports to act as a director, manager or partner, will impose criminal liability on the non-natural person even where the natural person is unconnected with the entity but misrepresents his authority. While we recognise that there are precedents for the provision (such as section 130 of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982), we consider that it would be appropriate that there should be a more significant connection between the offending natural person and the entity than merely his misrepresentation of authority.
Section 34: Extreme pornography
32. We have some concerns about the policy in these provisions relating to the definition of pornography. The definition of pornographic image in subsection (3) could, and in the minds of many, will extend to what others would regard as works of art. While we recognise that the provision is concerned with extreme pornography and that extreme is defined in subsection (6), we question the policy of allowing a designated body to exclude from the scope of the criminal law an image which meets the definition of extreme pornographic image. Why should such a body, in the context of criminal law, decide that such material, the possession of which would otherwise be criminal, is acceptable as a part of or as being in its entirety a work of art?

33. We are also at a loss to understand the defence in proposed section 51C of the 1982 Act protecting the persons who directly participated in the act depicted. If the depiction is unacceptable as amounting to extreme pornography, we do not see why the participant who retains the material for private use should have the defences available in subsection (4) of section 51C when other possessors, for good policy reasons, do not.

Section 39: Liability of partners
34. We think that this provision is effective but note that the use in subsection (1) of "corporate offence" may be misleading as the definition of what subsection (2) covers. We understand that the purpose of the provision is that where a partnership is guilty of an offence to which subsection (2) applies, namely an offence which if committed by a body corporate would give rise to criminal liability also on the part of the director, the partner also will be guilty of the offence in such circumstances.

Section 40: Witness statements
35. The section gives the prosecutor a discretion to give a witness a copy of a statement which he or she had made. By adopting the definition in section 262 of the 1995 Act, the statement does not include a precognition but includes part of a statement.

36. We recognise that there may be value in allowing a witness to read a prior statement before giving evidence in court. It is not uncommon for a witness when being examined to be referred to a very small proportion of a statement without having the opportunity to appreciate the context and thereby remember what he or she was trying to convey. To prevent abuse in this way, judges regularly demand to have sight of copies of such statements before a witness is examined on them. Nonetheless, we have concerns about the proposal which we set out more fully in our response to section 62.
37. In particular the reference to prior statements is one of the factors which has increased the average time which it takes to complete a trial. Where a witness has given more than one police statement a considerable time can be spent picking over the precise differences between the statements, which may not be productive when it is recalled that the words in the statement are often a police officer’s summary or rationalisation of what the witness has said in response to a question.

Sections 54 to 57: Crown appeals
38. We have already expressed support for the proposal for a Crown appeal in our response to the Scottish Law Commission’s paper on this subject.

Section 61: Referrals from the SCCRC
39. We support this proposal as we see no good policy reason for allowing an appellant, without the leave of the court, to raise new grounds of appeal or re-open unsuccessful grounds of appeal which are not related to the reasons contained in the Commission’s statement of reasons. We consider that this innovation may affect the way in which the Commission carry out their work and would wish to be assured that the change in policy has been discussed with them.

PART 4: EVIDENCE

40. This clause seeks to add a new section 261A to the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the Act”), which would confer on the court a power to allow a witness to refer to a prior statement while the witness is giving evidence. The proposal is one that gives us real cause for concern.

41. Most prior statements of witnesses take the form of police statements. When the witness is a police officer the statement is normally prepared by the witness himself. Expert witnesses tend to do the same. However when the witness is a civilian witness, the statement is written down by a police officer as the witness explains to him what he knows about the matter under investigation.

42. The statements of civilian witnesses are frequently taken shortly after the incident to which they relate. Whilst they are framed as if they are in the words actually spoken by the witness, it is not uncommon for the language used to suggest that the taker of the statement may have exerted some influence over the terms in which the witness’ recollection of events is phrased. Whilst some police statements are read back to the witness and the witness is then asked to sign the statement, that does not always happen. A further factor to be taken into account is that some witnesses provide a series of police statements. On occasion the terms of later statements are difficult, if not impossible, to reconcile with the terms of earlier statements.
43. The Scottish system has traditionally looked with disfavour on the practice of “trial by prior statement”; a practice which has given rise to serious problems in other jurisdictions. The emphasis in our system has always been on the value and importance of evidence given under oath in the witness box; subject to certain limited exceptions, prior statements have generally been excluded as hearsay evidence. Evidence given from the witness box, based on the witness’ recollection of what happened, in contrast to the adoption of the contents of statements made at some pre-trial stage, tends to be the best evidence. It has the added quality of being more readily tested by cross-examination.

44. We have a number of serious concerns. We apprehend that the proposed section 261A, in tandem with clause 40, will lead to a significant increase in the use of prior statements in criminal trials. We anticipate that witnesses will enter the witness box armed with copies of their police statements and that whether the request to look at the prior statement comes from the Crown or from the witness himself, control over reference to prior statements will, in practical terms, pass from the Court to others, in particular to the witness. We anticipate that the witness may volunteer that the answer to the question he has been asked is to be found in his police statement, which he has with him and would like to read out. If that were to become a common practice, it would not only lengthen some trials. As police officers become aware of the greater reliance on evidence contained within police statements, it might affect the manner in which police officers take statements from civilian witnesses, resulting in a further emphasis being placed on framing the statement in clear and comprehensible terms – whatever language may have been used by the witness when the statement was taken.

45. In our opinion, the limited circumstances in which the common law and the provisions of section 260 of the Act enable the Court to allow reference to prior statements are more than sufficient to ensure that a witness can be questioned as to the contents of a prior police statement should the interests of justice require that to happen.

46. In our experience, it is often difficult for a jury (and indeed for the judge who has to direct the jury) to disentangle evidence given by a witness in court from what the witness is reported to have said on some previous occasion, often (but by no means always) in a statement to the police. This frequently arises when a witness is asked to adopt a prior statement under the procedure set out in section 260 of the Act. The Court can be left in a state of uncertainty about the extent to which the witness has adopted the contents of the previous statement; often the witness agrees with some parts of the earlier statement, but disavows other parts. The position is all the more complicated when the witness has given more than one police statement. Moreover the witness’ position may fluctuate in the course of his evidence. The matter then requires to be made the subject of careful (and inevitably somewhat complex) directions by the trial judge. We expect that juries often find it difficult to understand how much of the previous statement the witness has actually incorporated into his evidence. They may then be left in a state of uncertainty about which version of events properly counts as the evidence of the witness.

47. In recent years the practice of putting previous statements to witnesses has undoubtedly increased. On occasion, that practice is pursued for no obvious purpose and to little practical effect. It has, however, increased (often unnecessarily) the complexity and the length of trials.

48. The practical difficulties to which we refer are liable to be accentuated, in our view, by the new provisions, which appear to contemplate that an even greater use will be made of witness statements. This would be a detrimental development.

49. The purpose of the proposed new rule is stated as being to allow the witness to “refer” to a previous statement in the course of giving his evidence. What is not clear is what is intended to be the evidential effect of such a reference, or indeed what the purpose of the witness making such a reference is intended to be. If the purpose is merely to assist the witness to remember what he said nearer the time of a crime or some other event, the procedure under section 260 of the Act is already available to enable the witness to adopt the more contemporaneous version of events as part of his evidence in court. As presently framed, the provisions seem to us to suffer from a lack of clarity and focus as to the purpose and effect of allowing a witness to refer to a prior statement.

50. In the circumstances, we consider that there is a real danger that the new provision will encourage a greater reliance to be placed on the contents of police statements, as opposed to a witness’ recollection of what happened and that this may complicate and lengthen trials.

51. In addition, we have some concerns about certain aspects of the drafting of the provisions.

52. The heading to the section uses the expression “witness statements”. The same expression is employed in section 40, which allows the Crown to provide a witness with a copy of his statement or to give him access to it, before and during a trial.

53. Section 40(1)(b) makes it clear that the “witness statement” has to be contained in a document.

54. It should be noted that section 262 of the Act is proposed to be amended so as to apply to the new section 261A. Section 262(1)(a) provides that a “statement” includes “any representation, however made or expressed, of fact or opinion. From this it would appear to follow that it would be possible for a prior statement for the purposes of the new section 261A to include an oral statement. It seems clear that this is not what is intended. Section 261A envisages that the witness statement will be a written document. This can be inferred from sub-clauses (1) (c) and (d), which refer to the prosecutor and the accused having seen or having been given an opportunity to see the statement.

55. We would suggest that it should be made clear, on the face of the legislation, that for the purposes of the provisions in the proposed new section 261A the expression “witness statement” means only a statement contained in a document. This would be consistent with the approach reflected in section 40.

Section 63: spouse or civil partner of accused a compellable witness

56. We are in agreement with the policy reflected in these provisions whereby a spouse or civil partner will be treated no differently from any other witness in criminal proceedings when cited to give evidence. We agree that the public interest today requires that spouses and civil partners are compellable witnesses for the prosecution, accused or co-accused. The proposed reform may prove to be of particular value in cases where children are the victims of crime.

Section 64: special measures for child witnesses and other vulnerable witnesses

57. We agree that special measures for vulnerable witnesses should become available in all types of hearings at which such a witness may be required to give evidence and that such measures should no longer be limited to trials.

Section 65: Amendment of Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003

58. We have no comments to offer on this provision, which is consequential on the extension of special measures to any type of evidential hearing in criminal proceedings.

Section 66: Witness anonymity orders

59. In view of the decision by the House of Lords in R v Davis [2008] UKHL 36, we support the view that it is appropriate to introduce statutory provisions regulating the court’s powers to permit a witness to give evidence anonymously. It would be unsatisfactory to leave the matter to be governed by the common law in Scotland when the House of Lords has held that no such common law power exists in England and Wales. Although not directly applicable in Scotland, the decision in Davis may be thought to have introduced a measure of uncertainty about the position here.

60. We note that the provisions in the Bill broadly replicate in Scotland those of the Criminal Evidence (Witness Anonymity) Act 2008.

61. We have the following observations about the drafting of the section in its present terms.
The proposed section 271N refers, in sub-section (5)(a)(i), to “the judge or other members of the court” in the context of providing that the court is not authorised to require the witness to be screened to such an extent that he cannot be seen by such persons. We are uncertain as to who exactly is intended to be covered by the reference to members of the court other than the judge. We recommend that this be made clear on the face of the legislation.

The proposed section 271Q(6) provides that Condition D (one of the four conditions which must be satisfied before an order can be made) is that (a) “the witness would not testify if the proposed order were not made”. Taken literally, this condition might be thought to be almost impossible to satisfy since any witness is obliged to testify when validly cited and called upon so to do. The point might be met by making it clear that the condition is to the effect that the witness would not willingly testify if the proposed order were not made.

In the proposed section 271R the considerations to which the court must have regard when deciding whether Conditions A to D are met are set out in some detail. In sub-section (2)(b) reference is made to assessment of the “weight” of the witness’s evidence. We would question whether it is necessarily helpful to introduce the notion of “weight” in the context of an assessment of credibility. In sub-paragraph (c) reference is made to the evidence given by the witness being the “sole or decisive evidence implicating the accused”. Having regard to the doctrine of corroboration, we have difficulty in understanding how circumstances could arise where the evidence of a single witness might be the sole evidence implicating the accused. For similar reasons, we would question whether use of the word “decisive” is appropriate in this context. It might be preferable to refer to whether the evidence “might be material evidence implicating the accused”.

The proposed section 271S requires a “warning” to be given by the judge to the jury when evidence has been given by a witness at a time when a witness anonymity order applied to the witness. Having regard to modern practice, we suggest that it would be more appropriate to refer to a “direction” from the trial judge.

62. We agree that it is appropriate to introduce provisions extending the existing procedures for the giving of evidence by live television link to witnesses who are outside Scotland, but within the United Kingdom.

63. We note that while there has been no formal consultation in relation to this proposal, it has the support of the Scottish Court Service and the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service.
PART 5: CRIMINAL JUSTICE

64. Having considered the provisions contained in this part of the Bill, we would wish to comment only on sections 68 and 69.

Section 68: Upper age limit for jurors

65. This seeks to increase the age limit for jurors in criminal trials from 65 to 70 years. It will be recalled that we supported this proposal in our response to the consultation paper entitled “The Modern Scottish Jury in Criminal Trials”.

66. While we appreciate that the scope of the Bill does not extend to civil as opposed to criminal procedure, we would observe that it may be thought to be anomalous to have different age limits for jurors in criminal and civil cases.

Section 69: Persons excusable from jury service

67. Again, we would refer to our response to the consultation paper in which we supported this reform.

PART 6: DISCLOSURE

Introductory

68. By way of a general observation at the outset we would remark that the proposed provisions appear overly complicated, given that the principle of disclosure confirmed in McLeod v HM Advocate (No.2) 1998 J.C. 67 can be shortly stated, and that the style and structure of the drafting of the provisions are also, in our view, often unnecessarily complicated and “user unfriendly”. To give an example, section 93(1) states:

“(1) Subsection (2) applies where the prosecutor is obliged to comply with the requirement imposed by subsection (5) of section 89 in relation to an accused such as is mentioned in paragraph (a) or (b) of subsection (1) of that section.”

69. Reference back to paragraphs (a) and (b) section 89(1), in itself an unnecessarily detailed provision, reveals that in the complicated wording of the quoted provision what was simply intended was the case of a person being prosecuted on solemn procedure.

70. There are many more possible examples of both drafting and structural complexity, to some of which we shall advert in these observations. Subject to that general remark, we make the following, more detailed observations and expressions of view.

71. Subject to the foregoing general observation, we have concerns respecting the terms of paragraph (c) of subsection (2). We appreciate that the draftsman has sought to restrict the obligation to disclose the previous convictions and outstanding charges of Crown witnesses to those “material to the accused’s case”. That phrase carries the possible implication that what is to be disclosed should be material to a particular defence. However, the reason for which details of previous convictions of prosecution witnesses are sought is almost invariably to discredit the witness by revealing his or her criminal past, not to provide support for a particular line of defence. In that regard it should be borne in mind that as the law of evidence is currently thought to stand, a witness may only be cross-examined on previous convictions of, or inferring, dishonesty. The previous conviction of a witness is thus deployed to weaken the Crown case.

72. While we appreciate of course that in Holland v HM Advocate 2005 S.C. (PC) 3 the Judicial Committee held that details of an outstanding charge against a witness ought to have been disclosed, we have to say, with respect, that it is not immediately apparent why it should be proper to attack a witness' credibility or reliability on the basis of an outstanding charge. The witness enjoys the presumption of innocence just as much as does the accused, who also, by definition, has an outstanding charge or charges.

73. Clearly, witnesses also have rights, particularly under Article 8 ECHR. Nor is it evident that a witness should be put in the position of having to respond to an unproved allegation at the trial of the accused.

74. The legislature may therefore wish to consider the principle of disclosure of outstanding charges in its examination of this section.

Sections 86 to 89: Schedules of Information
75. In our view the inclusion in the Bill of these somewhat convoluted sections is not appropriate or necessary. Police forces act subject to the direction of the Lord Advocate and it appears to us that the practical arrangements for the provision of information to Crown Office by the police and any other investigating agency, whether by schedules or otherwise, should be a matter of administrative arrangement, no doubt within the framework of the code of practice which section 114 requires the Lord Advocate to draw up. To attempt to address such practical, administrative arrangements by means of detailed provision in primary legislation risks creating an undesirable lack of flexibility and the possibility of raising objections and questions of a highly technical nature.

Section 89: Prosecutor’s duty to disclose information
76. The duty of disclosure resting on the prosecutor, as recognised since McLeod, can be stated shortly and simply as being a duty to disclose all evidence or information of which the prosecutor is aware which would tend towards exculpating the accused, either by weakening or

1 Cf Wilkinson The Scottish Law of Evidence pp31-32 undermining the prosecution case or by providing or supporting a defence for the accused.

77. We think it regrettable that the Bill does not contain a clear, principled statement of that duty but instead, by a process of dépeçage or dismemberment, seeks to state the duty in discrete provisions, including some described as examples. While it may well be that the whole of the duty is covered by the various provisions, the drafting appears unnecessarily complicated and tends to obscure the essential singularity of the duty to disclose material tending towards exculpation.

78. We would add that example (b) in subsection (4) – “information that would be likely to be of material assistance to the proper preparation or presentation of the accused’s defence” – may go wider than the scope of the Art 6 ECHR obligation of disclosure set out in McLeod. It adopts the test applied by the courts in deciding whether to grant an order for the recovery of documents from the Crown or a third party. As the opinions of the members of the Privy Council in McDonald v HM Advocate [2008] UKPC 46; 2008 S.L.T. 993 indicate,2 there may be material which is not subject to the prosecutor’s obligation of spontaneous disclosure, but which may be recoverable if it would be of assistance in the proper preparation or presentation of the defence. It is thus not accurate, as matters currently stand, to list example (b) as exemplifying the disclosure obligation. Further, from the point of view of the prosecutor – and indeed the court, if called upon to review the disclosure – the exercise of identifying material tending to exculpate the accused and the exercise of identifying materials which might assist in the preparation or presentation of the defence are different.
The latter exercise potentially requires much greater anticipation of possible ways of presentation, as opposed to the identification of exculpatory material.

79. We also have difficulty in understanding the inclusion of the provision in paragraph (c) of each of sub-sections (3) and (4) of “information likely to form part of the prosecution case”. If it is to form part of the prosecution case it is presumably incriminatory, and thus would not be part of the duty to disclose exculpatory material. This difficulty is perhaps another reflexion of the overly complicated drafting of this Part of the Bill and creates potential difficulties to which we shall later allude.

Section 93: Additional disclosure requirement
80. Given our views on the inappropriate nature of the inclusion of provisions relating to the providing of schedules of information in primary legislation, this section would fall to be omitted.

Sections 94 and 95: Defence statements

2 See paragraphs 50, 62, 64 and 67 to 69
81. We are opposed to the notion that in any case there should be any requirement to lodge a “defence statement”.

82. There is a well established system of requiring the defence to lodge a “special defence” in cases where, in essence, the defence line indicates or requires notice to the prosecutor. The Crown’s obligation of disclosure will obviously be exercised against the existence of a notice of special defence, and to that extent a further requirement for a “defence statement” adds little other than the inclusion of a further piece of paper-work in the pre-trial procedures.

83. Moreover, the status of such a statement is unclear. Is it to be held as binding on the lines of defence or contestation at the trial?

84. We appreciate that at base the concern may be that implement of the Crown’s duty of disclosure is to an extent dependent on awareness of the line of defence. But in our view the perception of that concern may be largely over-stated. Practitioners in the criminal courts in Scotland are well aware of the practical realities and of the respective evidential strengths and weaknesses of their respective cases. The prosecutor will normally have little real difficulty in envisaging the possible lines of defence (indeed, it would be his duty to consider those, both prior to the initiation of the prosecution and continually thereafter). Were there to be any particular matter upon which the defence sought disclosure, that can be intimated other than by the formal means of a defence statement.

85. The provisions on defence statements are a further example of the introduction in this Bill of unnecessary legislative complexity into what is essentially a matter of practice and procedure.

86. It may also be observed that the provision in the envisaged section 70A(5) for the lodging of a defence statement “at any other time before the trial diet” presents scope for prompting the review exercise under section 94 on the eve of the trial and thus scope for deferring the trial.

87. This is but one of the possible consequences of these provisions.

Section 96: Effect of guilty plea

88. We have some difficulty in understanding the purpose of this section, which on the face of matters seems unnecessary. The information which the section contemplates is [in sections (2)] “... information which is likely to form part of the prosecution case”. As already mentioned in our observations on section 89, information likely to form part of the prosecution case is incriminatory information and those observations apply also here. But it is self evident that once the plea of guilty has been recorded there would be no reason whatever to disclose further incriminatory material (except in so far as necessary for the Crown narration of the circumstances of the offence). If however what is contemplated is somehow exculpatory material it is difficult to see why the obligation to disclose is removed by a likelihood that it might be part of the evidence led in the prosecution case but is not removed if the information would not be likely to be included in the Crown case.

89. We would add that in solemn proceedings it is not competent to withdraw a plea of guilty after it is recorded, but subsection (3) is not restricted to summary cases.

Section 97: Means of disclosure
90. Is this section necessary? There is nothing in the provisions elsewhere which suggests any restriction on the means of disclosure.

Sections 98 and 99: Confidentiality of disclosed information
91. While it is appreciated that it is desirable to have provision for the maintenance of confidentiality and the prevention of the misuse of information which has been disclosed, the scope of section 98 is very wide, particularly if section 89 is to extend to information “likely to form part of the prosecution case”, and thus embrace information which is incriminatory. It would also embrace information which is essentially in the public domain or which would not be regarded as confidential in any real sense. One possible way of keeping the offence under section 99 within reasonable bounds would be to confine it to information which the Crown has categorised as confidential when disclosing it.

Section 100: Order enabling disclosure to third party
92. It is not apparent what end this section is truly intended to serve. Section 98(3) allows the accused to disclose information, disclosed to him by the Crown, to third parties for the purposes of the proper preparation and presentation of his case. So this section must envisage a purpose other than the proper presentation or preparation of the case. But what kind of purpose? If it were the intention (which we doubt) to mitigate the width of the criminal liability created by section 99, we think the problem would be better addressed by the primary step of reducing the ambit of the information to which section 98 extends.

Sections 102 to 113: Orders restricting disclosure
93. We agree that it is appropriate to have some provision on the taking by the Crown of a public interest objection, but the terms of these sections strike us as on the one hand, overly complicated, and on the other hand perhaps insufficiently broad in the respect that they do not provide for the taking of a PII objection by a public authority or person or body whose interests the Lord Advocate does not represent.

94. It is also noted that nothing is said about the funding of special counsel.
APPENDIX

Extracts from the report of the Sentencing Commission for Scotland, “The Scope to Improve Consistency in Sentencing” (August 2006)

“Foreword
We have made a number of recommendations, the central one being the introduction of a procedure for giving effect to sentencing guidelines. We recommend the creation of a statutory body, the Advisory Panel on Sentencing in Scotland (APSS). That body would be responsible for the preparation of draft sentencing guidelines for consideration by the Appeal Court of the High Court of Justiciary. The APSS would be responsible for the necessary research and consultation, and for framing the draft guidelines. The adoption of these guidelines, however, with or without modification, would be a matter for the Appeal Court. The membership of the APSS would have a strong judicial component, but it would also include people who would bring other relevant skills and experience to its work. In that way, the recommendations of the APSS would reflect a breadth of experience and thorough investigation, while the role of the Appeal Court in deciding whether to approve draft guidelines would ensure that sentencing remained essentially a judicial function. We envisage that the introduction of sentencing guidelines would be a gradual process. Particular guidelines, once adopted by the Appeal Court, would guide the sentencer, but would not dictate the sentence in the individual case. They would, we consider, promote and encourage consistency of approach, and thus improve consistency in sentencing, while preserving the important element of judicial discretion. We see the system for the preparation and adoption of sentencing guidelines which we have recommended as complementary to the existing, but little-used, power of the Appeal Court to pronounce guideline judgments.”

9.14 To assist the Court in providing further guidance to sentencers, and in particular handling the introduction of sentencing guidelines into sentencing practice, we recommend that a sentencing advisory body, to be known as the Advisory Panel on Sentencing in Scotland (“APSS”), should be created. The APSS should be of similar composition and have similar powers to those of the Sentencing Advisory Panel in England and Wales. The creation of such a body would ensure that sentencing would continue to be a judicial function, but that the Appeal Court would have the benefit of advice from a body drawing on a range of relevant skills and experience, including, possibly, members of the public with the necessary knowledge and experience. We consider that those who contribute to, and manage the outcome of, the sentencing process, including sentencers from all levels of the judiciary, are in a position to have some involvement in and make a valuable contribution to the development of sentencing policy in Scotland.
9.15 We regard this approach as preferable to the creation of a sentencing commission, or a body like the Sentencing Guidelines Council in England and Wales, in which other individuals are involved along with judges not only in the drafting of such guidelines but also in their finalisation and promulgation. We do not support such an innovation. While different models to that which we propose operate in other jurisdictions, we consider that in Scotland the Appeal Court should be allowed to remain in overall control of sentencing policy, subject of course to any legislation that either the Westminster Parliament or the Scottish Parliament may enact.

9.16 However, we also consider that judges in Scotland should be aware of, and take account of, how their sentences are perceived by the public and moreover of the responsibility, which they share with many others, to do all that can be done to maintain respect for, and confidence in, the law of our country. An advisory body, comprising a reasonably compact group drawn from across the criminal justice spectrum, including sentencers from every level, and other individuals with relevant experience and expertise, would, we consider, provide material assistance to the Appeal Court in carrying out the vital duties which the Appeal Court requires to perform. It should be noted that we did consider whether the proposed body should comprise only individuals drawn from the various levels of the judiciary, but we rejected that model in favour of that which we have recommended.

"9.22 We recommend that the APSS should draft guidelines for the consideration of the Appeal Court on general topics relating to sentencing, such as the issues covered in the Sentencing Guidelines Council’s Guideline on “Overarching Principles: Seriousness”, which is reproduced in Annex E, Discounts in Sentences following Pleas of Guilty and new sentencing disposals introduced by parliamentary legislation. As far as new sentencing disposals are concerned, we consider that before the relevant statutory provisions come into force, it would be beneficial to sentencers to have guidance from the APSS, as approved by the Appeal Court, as to how the statutory powers could be applied. We also envisage sentencing guidelines dealing with particular categories of crimes and offences.

9.23 We anticipate that in preparing draft sentencing guidelines the APSS will wish to carry out such research or other investigations and undertake such discussions as it considers necessary. The statute creating the APSS should provide details of those whom the APSS should be obliged to consult in the context of drafting guidelines and we so recommend. That would not prevent the APSS from consulting more widely if it deemed that desirable in the context of the development of any particular guidelines.

9.24 In the light of its deliberations, and where relevant its consultations, we envisage that the APSS would submit draft guidelines, together with a memorandum explaining the background to, and any comments on, the detailed terms of the draft guidelines, to the Appeal Court for its consideration. Guidelines for categories and types of crimes and offences would have both narrative and numerical aspects although guidelines on sentencing principles, for example, would be in purely narrative form. We stress that it would be for the APSS to determine the format and style of the sentencing guidelines it decided to place before the Appeal Court for approval. We are not suggesting that they would necessarily wish to follow the approach taken by the Sentencing Guidelines Council in England and Wales.

9.25 We recommend that the Appeal Court, sitting with a quorum of at least three judges, should be able to approve the draft guidelines. The Appeal Court should also have power to remit the draft guidelines back to the APSS, for that body to re-consider the draft guidelines and to amend them, if it chose to do so, in the light of any points raised by the Court. On that having been done, the APSS would be able to resubmit the draft guidelines to the Appeal Court for its further consideration.

9.26 The Appeal Court, having re-considered the draft guidelines and any further advice from the APSS, should have power to approve the draft guidelines, subject to any amendment it considers appropriate. It should also have power to decline to approve the draft guidelines. We so recommend. We would expect that in the event that the Appeal Court declined to approve draft guidelines, or approved them subject to amendment, it would issue an Opinion making clear the reasons for its decision. In the event that the Appeal Court declined to approve sentencing guidelines drafted by the APSS, we would not envisage the Appeal Court drafting and issuing its own guidelines. We consider that it would be inappropriate for there to be two categories of guidelines, one drafted by the APSS and approved by the Appeal Court and the other drafted and issued by the Appeal Court. In the event that the Appeal Court declined to approve sentencing guidelines drafted by the APSS, any guidance that the Appeal Court deemed it appropriate to provide on issues covered by the rejected draft guidelines could be included in a guideline judgment issued by the Court under its existing statutory powers.

9.27 It would thus be sentencing guidelines approved by the Appeal Court to which sentencers would require to have regard. We recommend that statutory duties should be placed on sentencers to have regard to relevant sentencing guidelines and to state in open court, at the time of sentencing, their reasons for any departure from such guidelines. There is, of course, already a statutory requirement on sentencers to have regard to the terms of guideline judgments issued under sections 118(7) and 189(7) of the 1995 Act."
Justice Committee

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from the Sheriffs’ Association

1. Preliminary observations

1.1. We were concerned, once again, at the limited time given to digest, analyse and comment on far-reaching changes to criminal justice. If our comments are regarded as important, we should be given time to prepare them. We are pleased that we were subsequently given an extension of time to do this. We recognize that we were able to comment on proposals contained during earlier consultation. We have not previously, however, been able to comment on all the detailed legislative changes in the Bill, which require careful scrutiny.

1.2. Because we do not comment on all the provisions in this Bill, it should not be taken that we agree with those on which we do not.

1.3. It is disturbing that provisions for the Sentencing Council are contained in the Bill when the Policy Memorandum acknowledges (para. 40) that the responses to the proposals in the consultation document have not yet been analysed.

1.4. With so many amendments to and additional sections in the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 in legislation over recent years (with this Bill there is a section ZK), a further consolidation of criminal procedure legislation is a priority.

2. Part 1 - Sentencing

2.1. We attach and adopt as part of our evidence our response to the consultation paper “Sentencing Guidelines and a Scottish Sentencing Council”.

2.2. In relation to sentencing, the Policy Memorandum states (para. 8) that the objective is “to create a straightforward and transparent framework within which sentencers can base their decisions; thereby increasing general understanding of the purposes and principles of sentencing and improving confidence in the sentencing process”.

2.3. Public confidence, however, is not enhanced when, for example, a sentence of imprisonment, which is imposed by a court and publicly announced, bears no relation to the time served by the offender and a prisoner is released by executive order (i.e. home detention curfew) long before the offender has served the statutory minimum period of sentence (for a short-term prisoner, that is one half of the sentence). Under the home detention curfew provisions, a prisoner may be released from as early as four weeks after starting a prison sentence. This does not make sentencing transparent. It does not make sentencing consistent; and if the aim is to make sentencing consistent, it undermines it. In fact, it makes a mockery of the sentencing process. This situation is not improved by the Bill.

2.4. We draw attention again to the fact that there is little empirical evidence that there is widespread inconsistency in sentencing. If, as the Policy Memorandum accepts, a sentence is a decision in individual cases, then consistency is a pipe dream, an unachievable goal unless sentencing takes no account of individual circumstances and is sentencing by numbers on a grid. An un-researched public (mis)perception is hardly a basis for interference with the sentencing process and the independence of the judiciary.

2.5. We now turn to consider certain provisions of this Part.

_Purposes and principles (clauses 1 and 2)_

2.6. We do not consider that it is necessary to set out some of the purposes and principles of sentencing. It is not possible to include all of them. Not to do so, however, implies that those not mentioned are less important than those that are. In so far as clause 1 contains principles which judges currently take into account, we do not object to them. We accept that the principles to which the court must have regard in clause 1(3) are not exclusive or exhaustive. We do wish to draw attention to some principles that ought to have been included: -

- Denunciation. This has been one of the purposes in sentencing in certain circumstances, but is not included as a purpose in clause 1(1). As is clear from Nicholson on Sentencing Law and Practice, second edition, para 9-07, it is a legitimate part of a sentence to express society’s abhorrence of a particular crime.
- Nature or character of the offence. Only seriousness is mentioned.
- Local circumstances. A local problem may require inconsistency with national “consistency”.

2.7. Clause 1(3)(d) refers to regard being had to “the desirability of consistency in sentencing”. “Consistency in sentencing is not stated in the Bill as a purpose of sentencing. This provision assumes a purpose that is not stated. Under the proposal, if the court considers that consistency is not desirable, it may be ignored. How is a court to ascertain what the consistent sentence is if there is no guideline published? We also refer to what we say in paragraph 2.4 above. This provision should be removed as containing no principle that can be applied in practice.

2.8. It is not clear, and the explanatory notes do not explain, why subsections (2) and (3) of clause 1 do not apply in relation to young offenders or those subject to a life sentence (in respect of which the judge will require to pronounce the appropriate punishment part of the sentence). If different considerations are to apply in respect of these groups of offenders, where are they to be found? In relation to the punishment part of life sentences, Part 1 of the Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Act 1993 will be repealed by the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007.
2.9. Having gone to great care to set out the principles and purposes of sentencing to which the judge “must” have regard in order to “create a straightforward and transparent framework”, clause 2 then provides three opt-outs from compliance with clause 1, thus restoring opaqueness.

2.10. We assume, from the introductory words of subsection (3) of clause 1, that it is not intended by clause 1(3)(b) (effect on any person other than offender) to exclude from consideration any information about the effect on the offender that may be relevant. If our assumption is incorrect, then such information, where relevant, should be clearly stated as included.

Sentencing Council (clauses 3-13)

2.11. We remain unpersuaded that the responsibility for sentencing guidelines should be taken from the judiciary. We opposed it in our response to the consultation paper referred to in paragraph 2.1 above. We do not see how public confidence is enhanced by passing the decision-making to a body outside the judiciary that will set the tramlines in which individual decisions by the judiciary must be made. Rather than improving public confidence, it is a statement that judges cannot be trusted to make the right decisions either at first instance or on appeal. If such a council is required to propose guidelines, it should make its final proposals to the High Court of Justiciary sitting as the Court of Criminal Appeal or Justiciary Appeal Court for approval. A situation could develop whereby the Council (given its non-judicial majority) and the appeal court disagree over a sentencing matter. Apart from the constitutional significance of this, it cannot promote public confidence in and understanding of sentencing policy and practice. We note that the Sentencing Commission recommended that adoption of the guidance issued by the Council, with or without modification, should be a matter for the Appeal Court.

2.12. We are concerned about the implication that the Council will in fact have to take into account the cost of custodial sentences in setting an appropriate guideline. Under clause 5(5) the Council must include the cost in any guidelines. Cost is not actually relevant to the imposition of an appropriate sentence. It is not clear why it must be included in the guideline itself unless it is to have an effect on the creation of the guideline or, worse, to influence the court.

2.13. We note that in clause 5(3) the Council may have regard to the purposes and principles set out in clause 1. We find it unacceptable that, while the judiciary is obliged to have regard to them in imposing a sentence, the Council is not obliged to have regard to them in setting the guideline. It is contrary to the objectives of the Bill, and contrary to the statement of purposes and principles in clause 1, that the Council is not required to have regard to them.

2.14. Any guidelines will lack credibility unless based on proper research. We note that the estimated cost for the first year for research, publications and website will be £270,000 (para. 670 in the Financial Memorandum). How much of that sum is in fact for research is not disclosed. The research to be undertaken by the Council is not limited to determining appropriate sentences, but also the costs and effects mentioned in clause 5(5). The cost of research will be even less than the undisclosed cost. Notwithstanding that it is said to be based on figures for the Sentencing Guidelines Council for England and Wales, we would be surprised if guidelines could be researched so cheaply and satisfactorily as to increase public confidence.

2.15. We are concerned that guidelines may provide for “the circumstances in which the guidelines may be departed from” (cl. 5(3)(d)). This is an unwarranted restriction on sentencing in individual circumstances. On the one hand the judiciary appears to be given the discretion to depart from guidelines (cl. 7(2)). On the other hand, it is clear that the Council may exclude it. The Council cannot possibly foresee every circumstance in every case. It is the function of the appellate courts to determine whether a sentence is appropriately within or outwith a guideline. If not, what is the function of the appellate courts to be?

2.16. We are concerned that there is a specific reference to the Lord Advocate as a person who must be consulted about any draft guidelines, while the judiciary is not a body that must be consulted because it will fall into the category of “such other persons as the Council considers appropriate”. There will be a prosecutor on the Council. The Lord Advocate is head of the prosecution service; and prosecutors are not concerned with sentencing. Although the judiciary is represented on the Council, it is in the minority. We fail to see why the judiciary, such as the Lord Justice General of Scotland, is not one who must also be consulted.

2.17. The Government’s paper “Protecting Scotland’s Communities – Fair, Fast and Flexible Justice” stated that the Sentencing Council would be “judicially-led”. Having a judicial chairman on a Council of 12 members of which only five are judicial members, is paying only lip service to the concept of a judicially led Council. It is not “judge led”. There must be a majority of judicial members on the Council.

2.18. The Council is to have two judges who are either sheriffs principal or sheriffs: Sch. 1, para. 1(3)(b). It would be possible, therefore, to have no sheriffs or only one. Sheriffs principal rarely undertake criminal work and cannot be said to have relevant experience that would justify either membership on the Council or membership that is equal in number to or instead of sheriffs. Since the vast majority of sentences are imposed in the sheriff courts, we find it staggering that it can be contemplated that the Council could have no sheriffs on it. There must be at least two sheriffs on the Council if there is to be such a body. The sheriffs could have no confidence in a Council that did not have sheriffs on it.

2.19. We do not oppose the presence of a police constable on the Council, but are surprised to find such a person categorized as a “legal” member.
Community payback orders (clause 14)

2.20. The Sheriffs’ Association welcomes proposals that provide for further and better community disposals as an alternative to imprisonment, such as those proposed in clause 14. We support the idea of one order that may include one or more elements as proposed. We support the reduction in the minimum number of hours of unpaid work to 20 hours. The current minimum of 80 hours is too high and can prevent, for example, the imposition of consecutive orders.

2.21. It is imperative, however, for community disposals to be at all effective, and to receive public confidence, for there to be substantial financial provision and other resources available.

2.22. In proposed section 227A(3) of the 1995 Act, we consider it an unnecessary addition and complication that the offence in respect of which it is imposed must also be “serious enough to warrant the imposition of such an order”. Where a community payback order is imposed instead of imprisonment for an offence, it is already serious enough to warrant its imposition.

2.23. In relation to the proposed new section 227F(1) of the 1995 Act, we do not envisage and do not propose to enquire into a person’s religious beliefs in court before imposing a sentence. We expect any relevant information to be provided in social enquiry or other reports or by the defence.

2.24. Payment of fines is looking as if it is becoming increasingly voluntary. The impact of supervised attendance orders as obligatory for payment of fines under £500 and discretionary in other instances has been reduced because the maximum sentence of imprisonment for breach is 30 days. We note that, under proposed new section 227M(2), such an order will be replaced by a level 1 community payback order with 30 days again being the maximum period of imprisonment for breach. The only means available of making offenders do what they do not want to do is to impose a period of imprisonment if they do not do it. If the maximum of that period is too low, it is no longer a means of enforcement or punishment for breach. If the maximum is 30 days, the maximum term served is 15 days. Some offenders think it is worth the breach. If one were to include a discount for admitting the breach, the punishment is rendered meaningless and of no effect.

2.25. Proposed new section 227N(5) states that, where a community payback order is already in effect, the maximum number of hours that may be imposed in another consecutive order is 300 less the number of hours specified in each existing order. Thus, if the total hours specified in the first order were 300, another order could not be imposed. It would be better if the court were able to impose “300 less the number of hours remaining in each existing order”. Thus, if the offender had completed 50 hours of an existing 300-hour order, the court could impose 50 hours on the new order. This is the current position in section 238(9) of the 1995 Act. This should remain the position.
2.26. In proposed new section 227Y(5) and (6), there are limitations to variation of orders, other than for breach, by an extension of time or an increase in hours, as the case may be, to the maximum that could have been specified when the order was imposed. There are circumstances in which it may not be appropriate to breach an offender for failure to complete a programme timeously; but if the offender were near the end of a three-year order, it would not be possible to extend it. Section 227Y(5) is the same as at present for extension of time of probation orders (s.232(2)(c)). In relation to increase in hours on community service, the court may use up what is remaining out of the maximum hours (s. 240(1)) and the new provision will change that.

2.27. Currently, when a community service order is breached, the hours can be varied under section 239(5) of the 1995 Act up to the maximum and, where a probation order is breached, the time may be varied but not so as to increase the period beyond three years from the date the order was imposed (s. 232(2)(c)). In breach of a community payback order it looks as if the only limit appears to be that the variation cannot be such as could not have been imposed originally (proposed new s. 227Z(6) and (7)). Thus the position as proposed by the Bill would be the same as for increase in hours for community service but, in relation to extension of time, no similar restriction as before. It may be, however, that there is no restriction under new section 227ZB(5)(c).

2.28. If this all sounds confusing, it is. It should not be. We think that it would be better to have one of two options: - (a) the same rule for all situations, i.e. the hours or time in respect of a consecutive order, a variation of an order at a review, on application to the court or variation on a breach; or (b) one rule for variation on a breach and another rule for the other situations. At least in relation to breach, we think that the court should be able, if allowing the order to continue and varying the time or hours, to extend the time up to a further three years or increase the hours up to a further 300 hours.

2.29. We note with some relief that periodic reviews of community payback orders are not to be mandatory. For them to be mandatory would be unduly burdensome to the system financially and take up already precious court time. The Financial Memorandum notes (paras. 687-688) that the estimated cost of one review per order for all orders would be over £1 million. We would point out that it is unlikely, however, for orders of 12 months or more, that there would be as few as one review.

2.30. Clause 17 proposes to insert subsection (4A) in section 204 of the 1995 Act so that a sentence of six months’ imprisonment or less may be imposed only if there is no other method of dealing with the offender. Where a discount of one-third is applied for pleading guilty at the first opportunity, this means in effect a sentence of nine months or less. It would be better to provide that the six–month period is the sentence that would have been imposed but for any discount.
2.31. We note, and support the fact, that sentences of imprisonment of six months or less are not to be prohibited. It is said by some that short prison sentences are ineffective and they point out that the prisons can do little with such short-term prisoners. This is to misunderstand the point of such sentences. A custodial sentence is the only punishment that an offender cannot avoid undertaking. Community disposals may be avoided and, without the option of custody for breach, would be rendered voluntary. It is clearly recognized that short sentences have a value since a custodial sentence of up to 30 days is to be a sentencing option for breach of a level 1 community payback order. We are frequently told by defence agents and the authors of social enquiry reports that a short period in custody has been a salutary lesson for the offender. Short periods in custody are clearly of use. As a means of dealing with breaches of court orders, as a sharp reminder to some offenders of the consequences of breaking the law for repeated offending when all else has been tried, or to give the public some measure of relief from their activities, short prison sentences have a purpose.

Amendments to the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007 (clause 18)

2.32. We attach and adopt our response in 2006 to the consultation document on the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Bill. Apart from the creation of short-term custodial and community sentences, the abolition of custody-only sentences and consequential amendments, the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007 is not altered. Our response then is as relevant now as it was.

2.33. There will be three types of sentence of imprisonment: short-term custody and community sentences, other custody and community sentences, and life sentences. A short-term prisoner will be automatically released from prison after one-half of the whole sentence and will be on community licence for the remainder of the sentence (new s. 5 of the 2007 Act). A prisoner serving any other custody and community sentence will normally be released after serving the custody part of the sentence (unless the Scottish Ministers determine that the offender would be likely to cause serious harm to a member of the public) and on community licence for the remainder (s. 11 of the 2007 Act). Life prisoners must be released on life licence after the end of the punishment part unless the Parole Board determines that the prisoner would be likely to cause serious harm to a member of the public (ss. 22 and 23 of the 2007 Act).

2.34. We note that a short-term custody and community prisoner will now not be a person serving a sentence of less than four years, but a person serving a sentence for less than the period prescribed by Scottish Ministers by statutory instrument. Thus, the meaning of a short-term sentence may vary from time to time, the period no doubt being determined by such factors as the size of the prison population. From paragraph 75 of the Policy Memorandum we glean that it may be presently intended that the period may be any sentence of less than 12 months.
2.35. Section 6 of the 2007 Act, which deals with the length of the custody part, applies only to custody and community sentences of a term of at least the prescribed period. Accordingly, it would appear that when the court imposes a short-term custody and community sentence, it simply imposes a sentence of imprisonment of X months; if that is less than the prescribed period, the prisoner will serve half of it in prison. Under section 6, if the court imposes a sentence of imprisonment of at least the prescribed period other than a life sentence, the court must specify the custody part of the sentence. The custody part of any such custody and community sentence normally will be half of the sentence (but in certain circumstances may be more though not more than three-quarters). There is also the possibility of the offender being released even earlier on either sentence under curfew licence, a topic to which we now turn.

2.36. With the repeal of Part 1 of the Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Act 1993, and section 3AA in particular, when the 2007 Act comes into force, the curfew licence provisions of the 2007 Act (ss. 47-49) will apply as amended by the current Bill. They will replace, in name, the home detention curfew. This will mean that a prisoner may be released on curfew licence (a) where the sentence (we assume this means the whole sentence) is three months or more and (b) after the later of the greater of one-quarter or four weeks of the sentence, or before the day 166 days before the expiry of one half of the short-term sentence or the custody part of any other custody and community sentence, and (c) in any event, only before the day 14 days before the end of one-half of the short-term sentence or the custody part of any other custody and community sentence. These provisions are similar to those in the 1993 Act and, again, the Scottish Ministers may alter the periods of time mentioned (s. 47(9)(b) of the 2007 Act).

2.37. It hardly makes public sentencing decisions of the courts clear to the public or enhances its confidence in the system, if the public has no idea what the time served will be and if the actual time served bears no resemblance to sentence imposed in public by the court. It involves an unseen, unaccountable exercise of executive discretion in contrast to public sentencing in open court.

2.38. We note that the judges will be required under section 8 of the 2007 Act to provide a report to the Scottish Ministers about the offender and the circumstances of the case as it considers appropriate in every custody and community sentence other than a short-term sentence. If this means every sentence of 12 months or more, this will be a very onerous and time-consuming obligation on the courts.

2.39. It would appear that, if a short-term custody and community prisoner commits an offence punishable by imprisonment while on community licence, it will not be possible, as at present, to sentence that person to serve the portion of his sentence remaining from the commission of the offence to the expiry of his or her community licence. This is because of the repeal of section 16 of the 1993 Act and the fact that there is no substituted provision. In relation to any other custody and community prisoner, the Scottish Ministers must recall the licence if the person is not of good behaviour: s. 37 of the 2007 Act. We are of the view that the courts should continue to be able to return offenders to prison to serve the unexpired portion of a sentence when convicted of committing an offence after early release and during the period of the unexpired portion.

2.40. It is already the common law that intoxication is not generally an excuse. The Policy Memorandum states (para. 103) that the statutory provision is to “make it clear to offenders and the courts”. Offenders, and, most certainly, we, already know; we do not need to be told.

2.41. We do not think it serves any useful purpose to state this as a mandatory and inflexible rule of law. If, for example, someone’s voluntary alcoholic drinks have been spiked with stronger liquor, and he or she then commits a breach of the peace, why should not that intoxication (if the court is satisfied of it) be taken into account by way of mitigation?

2.42. We do not think it wise for the law not to take account of intent or at least knowledge. We do not understand why the usual legal concept of “knowingly” is not used. We think that the expression used should be “knowingly and voluntarily consumed alcohol”.

3. Part 2 - Criminal law

Serious organised crime (clauses 25 – 28)

3.1. We are not clear that the offence of being involved in serious organised crime adds anything to the substantive crimes for which persons may currently be prosecuted or to the sentence that could otherwise be imposed. Court time will be taken up unnecessarily.

3.2. We note that, whereas a crime of conspiracy could attract a sentence of life imprisonment, the new statutory offence of being involved in serious organized crime under clause 25 attracts a maximum sentence of only 10 years’ imprisonment and directing it attracts a maximum of 14 years.

3.3. The definition of serious organized crime in clause 25 is very wide and vague. Thus, if two people agree to steal a meat pie from a shop to give it to a starving beggar, they commit the crime of being involved in serious organised crime. This is because the beggar will have received a material benefit.

3.4. Having regard to the wide definition, the offence of failure to report serious organised crime under clause 28 is a frightening prospect. It is of some concern that a person may unwittingly fall foul of this provision.

3.5. It is not always appreciated that courts can take aggravating circumstances into account in sentencing without there having to be a statutory aggravation as in clause 26. There may be a desire for statutory aggravations for statistical purposes, but they are not necessary.
4. Part 3 – Criminal procedure

Prosecution of children (clause 38)
4.1. We note the proposed raising of the age for prosecution of children from 8 to 12. This change will have no significant impact on the work of the Sheriff Court.

Witness statements (clause 40)
4.2. This clause provides for a witness, who has not seen a statement he or she has made, to see it before giving evidence. Contrary to the implication of paragraph 203 of the Policy Memorandum, some witnesses do see their statements before giving evidence, accordingly we accept the policy objective of fairness. It must be recognized, however, that having seen the statement before giving evidence may be used as a criticism of credibility. We have more to say about witnesses seeing their statements during the trial in paragraphs 5.2 – 5.7 below.

Breach of undertaking (clause 41)
4.3. We understand the wish to put breach of undertakings on the same statutory basis as breach of bail. We note that the penalties will be the same. There is, however, this distinction between bail and the proposal in the Bill. Under section 25 of the 1995 Act, the court must explain the effect and consequences of breach of bail conditions to the accused in ordinary language and the accused must be given a written explanation of all that in ordinary language. There is no such requirement currently under, or proposed in this Bill by amendment to, section 22 of the 1995 Act under which provision the accused is released on an undertaking by a police officer. If a person is to be liable to the same penalty for breach of an undertaking as for breach of bail, we think that the same explanations must be given. Section 22 should be amended accordingly.

Bail condition for identification procedures etc. (clause 43)
4.4. The usual condition imposed by a court is to attend an identification parade on being given 48 hours notice. If “reasonably instructed” in this provision includes “reasonable notice”, this provision would accord with current practice.

Disclosure of convictions and non-court disposals (clause 52)
4.5. Fixed penalties do not appear on someone’s record as a previous conviction. For that reason, and because sometimes it may be more of a hassle to challenge it, a fixed penalty is paid (sometimes the notice is not received but becomes payable). The basis on which a fixed penalty is paid or becomes payable may, therefore, be different from that of a conviction. It may not be appropriate, therefore, to treat a fixed penalty as if it were a conviction for the purposes of sentencing.

Time limits for lodging certain appeals (clause 53)
4.6. The time limit for an appeal against a decision at a first diet is to be increased from two to seven days. We are not in favour of this proposal for the sheriff court. Under section 66(6) of the 1995 Act, a first diet must be held not less than 10 days before the trial diet (and not earlier than 15 days after service of the indictment). Both the first diet and the trial diet are fixed at the time the indictment is served on the accused. The first diet is usually held 14 days before the trial diet. It is common for there to be a continued first diet within seven or even a few days of the trial diet. Increasing the time limit to seven days would mean that the accused could seek leave to appeal against a decision made at a continued first diet on the day of the trial diet or later. Witnesses (possibly vulnerable witnesses) and jurors cited to attend for the trial diet will, to say the least, be inconvenienced, the trial will be postponed and the court programme will have to be re-written. Furthermore, by extending the time limit, it will be less likely than before that leave to appeal would be granted. The purpose of the two-day time limit was because, and to ensure that, any appeal could be dealt with expeditiously without interfering with the date of the trial.

4.7. The situation in the High Court is different. A trial diet is not fixed in the High Court until the preliminary diets: s. 72A(1) of the 1995 Act. There may be more than one preliminary diet. It is possible, therefore, for a decision to be made on a preliminary issue before a trial diet is fixed in the High Court. A seven-day rather than a two-day time limit is, therefore, unlikely to affect a trial diet in the High Court. In the sheriff court, on the other hand, an increase in the time limit could seriously disrupt the course of justice.

4.8. These provisions in relation to jury trials are claimed to enhance public confidence. We fear that they will have the reverse effect. By allowing for appeals during a trial, trials will take longer (they will seem to be never ending), and the practical difficulties of keeping jurors waiting and available will result in aborted trials.

Submissions as to sufficiency of evidence (clause 54)

4.9. At present the defence may make a submission of no case to answer at the end of the prosecution case under section 97 of the 1995 Act. That submission is restricted to the sufficiency of the evidence. At the end of all the evidence the defence may make a common law submission that is not so limited to persuade the judge to withdraw some or all of the indictment from the jury, to amend or reduce a charge or to make some other direction. The proposed new section 97A of the 1995 Act does not interfere with the no case to answer submission. The Policy Memorandum states (para. 273) that the purpose of this new section is to replace the common law submission with a statutory submission (see s. 97A(3)) but that it is not intended to implement the Law Commission’s recommendation to include a submission that no reasonable jury properly directed could convict (paras. 284-286). The proposed new section 97A(2) is not the common law submission in statutory form, and subsection (2) is, therefore, not co-extensive with a common law submission. We are relieved to see that it will remain possible for the defence to make a common law submission that no reasonable jury properly directed could convict. For example, it would remain possible to make a submission of 4.10. It is not clear why it is provided in proposed new section 97C of the 1995 Act that the judge must direct the prosecutor to amend the indictment when a successful submission to have it amended is made. The present position is that the judge directs the jury. We do not see why that should not remain the position. It is right that this be so because it is the judge who has made the decision, not the prosecutor.

4.12. We have very serious concerns about the effect these provisions, exercisable before the verdict of the jury, will have. The proposals go too far in redressing any perceived imbalance of unfairness to the Crown. They fail to recognize the realities and practicalities of jury trials. They will result in substantially increased cost of jury trials to the public purse. The suggestion in paragraph 292 of the Policy Memorandum that these reforms will improve the law at a low overall cost is questionable.

4.13. If it is thought desirable to give the prosecution equal rights of appeal with the accused, it could be given a right of appeal exercisable at the conclusion of the trial (though it would be necessary to face up to the difficulty of the Crown having a right of appeal against an acquittal by a jury). If the prosecutor is to have these rights, why not the accused? The defence has and is to be given no equal right of appeal before the jury verdict (it cannot appeal until sentence has been passed). The proposed provisions give the prosecution greater rights than the accused, could prejudice a fair trial under article 6 of the European Convention of Human Rights, and will disrupt, delay and extend the course of justice. The principles of fairness, finality, certainty, expedition rather than delay in trials, and the rule against double jeopardy must trump the Crown being given greater rights than the accused.

4.14. It is stated in paragraph 278 of the Policy Memorandum that it is not anticipated that these rights of appeal without leave will be used except in a very limited number of cases. One generally finds that if a person is given a power, it will be exercised. Interested parties in individual cases may lobby the prosecutor to exercise that power. Unless the Lord Advocate is to give a direction to prosecutors to exercise the right of appeal only in exceptional circumstances, it will be sought to be used often.

4.15. We cannot have trials peppered with interruptions for consideration of appeals. It will lead to a nightmare that criminal justice can do without if the court makes a decision that the prosecutor does not like. No doubt the prosecutor will want an adjournment to consider whether to appeal or ask for leave to appeal. If leave is to be sought, there will be further delay while there is argument in court about whether leave should be given. Then the court has to adjourn to discover whether there is the remotest chance of an appeal being heard expeditiously. Then the court has to hear argument about whether, even if an appeal can be heard expeditiously, there should be a further adjournment for it to be heard. Then the judge has to write a report for the appeal court. Then there has to be an adjournment for the appeal to be heard. After that the parties will require time to consider the consequences of the result of the appeal on how to present their cases. This process will take at least two days, assuming that the appeal can be heard immediately. After that, if there are any of the jurors – and witnesses - still around, the trial can be resumed.

4.16. While all this is going on, what are the jurors to do, as they will not be in court while all this is going on? Are they to sit around waiting in the jury room or at home? Can they return to work meanwhile; if so can they all be got back? It is difficult enough to keep jurors contented and to avoid them becoming frustrated and irritated at frequent disruptions and adjournments, without such additional delays. A two–day trial will inevitably become a five-day trial. It is in the realms of fantasy to expect jurors to keep themselves available while the prosecutor goes off at intervals for days to appeal decisions he or she does not like during a trial.

4.17. One redeeming feature is that proposed new section 107D(2) of the 1995 Act permits the court to refuse to allow an appeal that the prosecutor has of right or even where leave has been granted. It appears that the court at first instance may refuse to allow the appeal to be heard even if it can be heard expeditiously. It is not at all clear on what ground the court may refuse it. We would like to point out that the High Court is unlikely to be able to hear these appeals expeditiously: it has such a burden of work that it finds it difficult to hear appeals on preliminary issues from the sheriff court at first diets expeditiously.

4.18. In proposed new section 107D(6), it appears to be thought that it is a simple matter, if an expedited appeal is successful, of sending the case back for the trial to proceed. There will, of course, be the problem of getting everyone back together again, including the jurors, to which we alluded in paragraphs 4.15 and 4.16 above. There could be prejudice to the accused, for example, resulting from a break in the flow of the evidence or evidence in chief and cross-examination being separated by a period of days.

4.19. Proposed new section 107F is somewhat curious. If the Crown, for example, appeals as of right (i.e. without leave) against a decision to delete part of the circumstances in an indictment but the decision does not result in an acquittal by the trial judge of a charge, the court must desert the diet pro loco et tempore in respect of that charge, i.e. reserving the right of the prosecutor to raise it afresh, subject to the appeal court’s refusal under s. 107F(4). The trial is to proceed in relation to anything else.

5. Part 4 – Evidence

5.1. The provisions in this Part follow on from consultation documents published in 2006 and 2008. We have observations to make about one issue in these provisions.

Witness statements: use during trial (clause 62)

5.2. There are at present four situations in which prior statements of witnesses other than the accused may be used during a trial. One is where the evidence of the witness is inconsistent with a prior statement (s. 263(4) of the 1995 Act). The purpose is at least to challenge the credibility and reliability of the witness and also in the hope that the witness might accept the truth of the prior statement. Any part of the prior statement becomes evidence only in so far as the witness accepts it to be the truth. The second is where the witness adopts a prior statement in a document of which the witness was the originator as his or her evidence in court (s. 260). The third is where a witness cannot remember everything, accepts that he or she made a prior statement to someone and accepts that if he or she said what he or she is alleged to have said, it must be the truth. In that case the person to whom the statement was made may give evidence of it and it becomes part of the evidence of the witness: Jamieson v. HM Advocate, 1994 J.C. 251; 1994 S.C.C.R. 610. The fourth is where the statement was recorded by the witness at the time of the incident to which it relates and is used to refresh the memory of the witness.

5.3. In Hughes v. HM Advocate, 22nd January 2009, XC268/07, at para. [13], the Appeal Court stated that “the starting point in all criminal trials remains parole evidence. To put a written statement before a witness for the purpose of leading him in chief is clearly unacceptable and before, therefore, reference is made to any written statement the purpose of doing so should be clear.”

5.4. The proposed new section 261A of the 1995 Act would permit the court to allow a witness, while giving evidence, to refer to any prior statement he or she made. The section does not explain the purpose of doing so or if there are any limitations other than that the court has a complete discretion whether to allow the witness to look at it. The provision is not limited to statements made at the time of the incident to which the statement relates. It is an extension of the fourth rule mentioned in paragraph 5.2 above. It is clearly related to clause 40 which permits a witness, before giving evidence, to see a statement he or she made. It appears that it is to be permitted as an aide memoire.

5.5. The Policy Memorandum states (para. 205) that the provision is intended to allow prosecution witnesses to refer to their statements “in the same way as police witnesses have long been assumed to be able to consult their notebooks” (emphasis added). The proposed new section is not limited to prosecution witnesses; there would be no justification for limiting it to prosecution witnesses. There is no assumed improper or unfair advantage given to certain witnesses such as police officers. The common law is that any witness can refer to a statement or notebook (a) if he or she recorded that statement himself or herself, (b) if he or she did so at the time of the incident to which it refers and (c) for the purpose of confirming something or checking something forgotten. It is one thing to allow a witness to read a statement before giving evidence, it is quite another to extend the rule just mentioned to include a witness refreshing his or her memory from a statement made at any time. We do not wish evidence in chief of a witness to consist of the answer to the question “Is that your evidence contained in that statement?” It will be recalled from what we said at paragraph 4.2 above that being given the opportunity to look at the statement will not make the witness immune from being challenged on credibility and reliability.

5.6. If the common law position is to be extended, then the statement should at least be one that complies with the recommendation of Lord Coulsfield in his Review of the Law and Practice of Disclosure Proceedings in Scotland at paragraphs 10.6.1 and 10.8, i.e., that it is signed by the witness when made, and, we think, having been read by the witness when made. This has not been followed up in the proposed provision.

5.7. We think that this provision in clause 62 will lead to a number of appeals to define its parameters, possibly even under the proposed new section 107B.

6. Part 6 – Disclosure

6.1. This Part contains detailed, complicated and time-consuming rules about disclosure that will further delay trials. The Crown already has difficulty providing disclosure in time for first diets, intermediate diets and even trial diets.

6.2. No doubt the rules will provide a paper trail so that in any audit, perhaps after a challenge, it can be ascertained whether the rules have been followed. The trouble with detailed statutory rules of this kind is that they can result in the letter of the law being followed while the spirit of it gets lost sight of.

Meaning of “information” (clause 85)

6.3. We note from the terms of subsection (1) and (2) of clause 85, perhaps to preserve the sanctity of the precognition and to protect the victim statement, that these documents are not themselves “information”, but that the contents of them are.

Provision of information (clauses 86 – 93)

6.4. As soon as practicable after the accused appears on petition or indictment, the prosecutor must serve a notice on the investigating authority requiring it to send, as soon as practicable, schedules listing all relevant information for or against the accused, categorising the information as sensitive, highly sensitive and non-sensitive and giving a brief description of each item of information (cl. 86). Whenever further information comes to light, this exercise must be repeated in respect of it. The prosecutor may challenge the categorisation and require the investigating authority to change it. As soon as practicable after the accused appears on petition or indictment, or pleads not guilty on summary complaint, the prosecutor must disclose the information of the kind mentioned in clause 89(3) to the accused, and has a continuing duty to do so as more relevant information comes to light (cl. 90). In relation to solemn proceedings, the prosecutor must also disclose the schedules of information which are categorised as non-sensitive.

6.5. We foresee delays created by information having to be categorised, the information having to be described, and with inevitable arguments between the prosecutor and the investigating authorities over the correct categorisation. While the prosecutor has to disclose to the defence all information within the meaning of clause 89(3), under clause 93 it has only to disclose a schedule of information falling within the non-sensitive category. It is not clear from the statutory provisions why there is a need for two categories of sensitive information. There is no hint of it in Lord Coulsfield’s Review of the Law and Practice of Disclosure Proceedings in Scotland or in the subsequent consultation paper, or analysis of the responses and next steps document.

Orders restricting disclosure etc. (clauses 102 – 113)

6.6. In a democratic society such provisions are likely to be regarded as disturbing. We anticipate time taken up with challenges under the European Convention of Human Rights.

6.7. If disclosure of information would be likely to cause serious injury or death, obstruct or prevent the prevention, detection, investigation or prosecution of crime or causes serious prejudice to the public interest, the prosecutor may apply to the court for non-disclosure. The prosecutor may also apply for an order not to tell the accused about the application for non-disclosure (a non-notification order) and for the accused not to be allowed to attend or make representations at the application for non-disclosure (an exclusion order) or simply for an order for the accused not to be allowed to attend or make representations at the application for a non-disclosure order (exclusion order only). If the prosecutor applies for a non-notification order, the accused is not even allowed to attend or make representations at it either.

6.8. The tests for granting non-notification and exclusion orders are lower than that required for a non-disclosure order: in relation to public interest, it is simply whether “it is not in the public interest that the nature of the information be disclosed”, instead of “likely to cause serious prejudice to the public interest”. We are not clear why the test is lower for non-notification and exclusion orders.

6.9. We note that there is provision for the appointment of special counsel if the court considers it necessary to ensure that the accused receives a fair trial
We think that such an appointment may be inevitable for an application for a non-notification order, an exclusion order or a non-disclosure order where either of the first two has been granted. The task of special counsel will be difficult because he or she will not be familiar with the details of the defence case and because the accused is not to be made aware of the contents of these applications (cl. 113(4)).

Defence statements (clauses 95 and 95)

6.10. Lord Coulsfield, in paragraphs 7.7 and 7.8 of his Review, suggested voluntary defence statements for the purposes of helping the Crown identify information that the defence wished to have. The proposal in the Bill in solemn proceedings goes much further and new section 70A of the 1995 Act states that the accused must state his defence to the indictment at least 14 days before the first diet in the sheriff court. It was never intended that the defence statement was to be anything more than to assist in the disclosure process and to provide a means for the accused to seek specific information.

6.11. There is no time limit for the prosecutor to disclose any information; the prosecutor is required only to do so “as soon as practicable”. A first diet must be held no less than 15 days after service of the indictment (s. 66(6) of the 1995 Act). Accordingly, firstly, if the first diet was on the fifteenth day, an accused would have one day to prepare and lodge a defence. That does not meet the object of fairness mentioned in paragraph 468 of the Policy Memorandum. Secondly, while it is said at paragraph 265 of the Policy Memorandum that, in order properly to consider whether to appeal certain decisions, parties need seven rather than two days, it is not clear why it is regarded as legitimate to envisage almost no time at all for an accused to consider and lodge a defence.

6.12. The accused could find himself in the position of having to lodge a defence to the indictment, not simply a request for information, before the prosecution has provided any information about the prosecution case, or anything relevant to the defence, through disclosure. As we have indicated in paragraph 8.1, the Crown has difficulty in providing disclosure of the prosecution case in time for first diets and trial diets. If the prosecution has not disclosed its case, how and why is the accused to state a defence? It will no doubt be regarded as repugnant to our legal system that an accused must state a defence before the prosecution has disclosed its case. It is contrary to the principles of our law, the right to silence and article 6 of the European Convention of Human Rights. It is unnecessary to achieve the object of assisting the Crown to disclose information that the defence wants. We foresee challenges and difficulties in the conduct of trials.

6.13. What is to happen when, having lodged a defence after the prosecutor discloses the prosecution case or more of it, and the accused changes his defence? Is the accused to be able to be cross-examined on it? Is the accused to be denied cross-examining on a point not in the defence statement? All this would be contrary to the proper purpose of lodging the defence statement.
6.14. We note, fortunately, that there is to be no requirement on the accused to lodge a defence in summary proceedings: it is entirely voluntary under clause 95. There may, however, be consequences for not doing so.

6.15. While there are no direct sanctions for the accused not lodging a defence (and there could not be), there are consequences in solemn proceedings. The first consequence appears to be that the prosecutor may not have to try so hard to make further disclosure. While there is a continuing duty on the prosecutor to disclose until the end of the proceedings under clause 90, the further duty to review all relevant information for or against the accused only arises if the accused lodges a defence: see cl. 94(1) (solemn) and cl. 95(3) (summary). There is a danger that if the accused does not ask for a document or does not disclose a defence to which there is relevant information, that the information may be overlooked. There will continue to be delays and arguments, or aborted trials, because of apparent non-disclosure.

6.16. The second consequence appears to be the intention that, in order to get information it wants, the defence has to state in the defence what information disclosed. Since commission and diligence for the recovery of documents will be available, however, this consequence may be less damaging.

6.17. We would be concerned if there were to be a third consequence in that any grant or continuation of legal aid were to be affected. That would result in delay in, and longer, trials.

6.18. In relation to summary proceedings, the defence statement may be lodged at any time up to the conclusion of the proceedings. This means that it could be lodged at the beginning of or during the trial. This will result in postponements of trials. Even if lodged as early as the intermediate diet, there will be an increase in postponements.

7. Part 7 – Mental disorder and unfitness for trial

7.1. We note that this Part follows substantially the recommendations of the Scottish Law Commission in its “Report on Insanity and Diminished Responsibility” in 2004. We support the proposals in the Bill in principle. We support the wider definition of “mental disorder” using the definition in section 328 of the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003.

Criminal responsibility of persons with mental disorder (clause 117)

7.2. We are not sure if the proposed new section 51B(3) of the 1995 Act in clause 117 of the Bill, achieves the object, stated in paragraph 534 of the Explanatory Notes, with the greatest clarity. That object is that intoxication will not preclude a defence of diminished responsibility provided that there is an independent basis for the plea. We are aware that the provision is as proposed in the draft Bill in the Scottish Law Commission report. In the proposed section 53B(3)(b) of the 1995 Act, it might be better if the word “it” were replaced by “abnormality of mind”.
Unfitness for trial (clause 119)

7.3. We note the removal of the requirement of the evidence of two medical practitioners in section 54(1) of the 1995 Act in clause 119(2)(a)(i) of the Bill, and the wider statutory test of “mental or physical condition” in the new section 53F(1) of the 1995 Act in clause 119(1) of the Bill. While accepting the appropriateness of this, we simply wish to record that we anticipate more applications to the court and more protracted proceedings as a result.

RESPONSE BY THE SHERIFFS’ ASSOCIATION TO THE CONSULTATION DOCUMENT:
SENTENCING GUIDELINES AND A SCOTTISH SENTENCING COUNCIL

The Sheriffs’ Association welcomes the opportunity to respond to this consultation document. The Sentencing Commission Report published in August 2006 recognised that 96% of sentences imposed in Scotland are imposed in the summary courts and, when account is also taken of sentences imposed in the sheriff courts under solemn procedure, only around 2% of sentences imposed in Scotland are imposed in the High Court. The Sheriffs’ Association, representing the body of the judiciary, which imposes the vast majority of sentences, considers it is uniquely placed to respond to the proposals in this consultation document.

We are concerned that the proposals proceed in the absence of any evidence that there exists any inconsistency in sentencing or lack of public confidence in the system of sentencing. The Sentencing Commission did not commission independent research to establish if there existed any inconsistency in sentencing and recorded that research into inconsistency in sentencing in Scotland is virtually non-existent. The Sheriffs’ Association therefore considers that before any proposals are introduced proper independent research needs to be carried out to establish whether or not there is any significant inconsistency in sentencing in Scotland.

The Sheriffs’ Association believes the current procedure for dealing with any sentences that are imposed outside the normal parameters is effective and commands respect. Any sheriff, or other judge, subject to an appeal against sentence has to give cogent reasons for the decision made and, if that reasoning does not stand up to scrutiny, the sentence will be reduced, or increased.

We do not accept that the solution to those cases where a sentence falls outside the recognised parameters is by way of the burdensome and, we suspect, expensive bureaucracy that will be the result of these proposals.

The consultation document at paragraph 1.1, quotes the late Lord Macfadyen that,

“a perception of inconsistency in sentencing is likely to lead to a loss of public confidence in the criminal justice system”.

The consultation document leaps from that hypothesis to the conclusion expressed at paragraph 1.5, that because sentencing works on an individual case basis, supplemented by recognised sources relied upon by judges, the public do not understand the sentencing process, or the reasons behind decisions and states that,

“This has helped to create a common perception that sentencing in our courts is inconsistent which, consequently, has had a negative effect on confidence in the criminal justice system”.

No evidence is produced to support these claims. They are contradicted at paragraph 1.7 where it is recorded that particularly amongst practitioners the view is held that sentencing is not inconsistent but is dealt with on an individual basis. The Sentencing Commission found little empirical evidence to support the view that there was widespread inconsistency in sentencing in Scotland.

The Sheriffs’ Association is concerned that, in the absence of any evidence to support the notion that there exists widespread inconsistency in sentencing which require guidelines to be introduced, the aim of this policy is more to do with Government concerns over a rising prison population and thereby to interfere with judicial independence by limiting the number of offences which merit a sentence of imprisonment. We note in paragraph 1.10 the comment that sentencing decisions are not made in isolation but have consequences for other parts of the criminal justice system which have to implement the sentence. That comment is open to the interpretation that in imposing a sentence the judiciary should take account of the impact on the Scottish Prison Service of sentencing an offender to custody. In our view it is essential that the judiciary remain free to impose the appropriate sentence for the offence committed, regardless of the impact that sentence may have on the prison population. Any attempt to influence any sentencing decision in that way would be an attack on judicial independence.

While the consultation document claims to recognise that sentencing is a complex matter and has become more complicated, as a result of legislation and decisions of the Appeal Court in recent years, what is proposed will, in the view of the Sheriffs’ Association, make sentencing even more complex. The proposals will also, in our view, have a significant impact on judicial, particularly shrieval, resources.

It is proposed in paragraph 1.13 that where any sentence is outwith the range provided by the guidelines the judge has to explain in full the reasons for departing from the guidelines. Those reasons have to be given at the point of sentencing, see paragraph 2.11.

The impact of the proposals on court time will be considerable particularly in the sheriff court. It is not uncommon for a sheriff in a busy court to impose in excess of 50 sentences a day. In addition to all the factors which a sheriff already has to take into account before imposing any sentence it is proposed that guidelines will also have to be consulted before sentencing. That will be time consuming and will have to be taken into account in every case. It will be impossible to do so without allowing for out of court preparation time. Moreover, since a departure from the guidelines will require the judge to state full reasons for doing so at the point of sentencing, it is envisaged the court will have to adjourn to allow that judge to prepare his statement. That will have an impact on the number of cases it will be possible to deal with in a day. The cumulative effect of these proposals will result in the need for additional judicial resources to cover the additional courts that will be required to dispose of business, or current targets for disposal of cases will be greatly exceeded.
While the Sheriffs’ Association remains opposed to the introduction of sentencing guidelines we wish to comment on the proposed model for any Sentencing Council, which will draft such guidelines.

While the Sentencing Commission referred to the existence of sentencing guidelines in other jurisdictions, such as England and Wales, some USA States and countries in Western Europe the consultation document has rejected those in favour of the New Zealand model. We have reservations about the reasoning behind that choice. The consultation document explains that the creation of a Sentencing Council in New Zealand was due to concern over “a burgeoning prison population” as a result of which its Sentencing Council has to prepare a statement on the likely impact of sentencing guidelines on the prison population. The Sheriffs’ Association is concerned that the preference for the New Zealand model may lie in a desire to achieve a reduction in the prison population. For the reasons already stated we consider attempts to achieve that end by means of sentencing guidelines is a potential threat to judicial independence.

The consultation document goes on to argue that the New Zealand model is attractive because of New Zealand’s similarity to Scotland in terms of population and its legal system. We do not find these arguments convincing as a reason for adopting the New Zealand model. It seems to us that any model which is adopted should be one from a country with a strong connection with Scotland in terms of suffering from the same social and cultural problems which lead to offending. New Zealand does not satisfy that criteria.

While New Zealand has a population of 4.5 million it has an economy based on agriculture and tourism. We are not aware of New Zealand being a society that suffers from the effects of binge drinking, a drugs culture, a culture of carrying weapons or of gang culture, and the crimes committed as a result thereof. These problems are prevalent in Scotland and underlie the commission of a considerable number of offences. In our view a more appropriate model is to be found in that of England and Wales, which has similar social problems to that of Scotland.

It is also of concern that the New Zealand model was introduced as recently as November 2007 by the New Zealand Sentencing Council Act, and its effectiveness, or otherwise has not been tested. Indeed we believe that, following the recent election in New Zealand leading to a change in Government, the Sentencing Council may be abolished. It is understood the new Government does not agree with the Sentencing Council’s aim of reducing sentences by 25%, and intends to divert the $1.5 million funding for the Sentencing Council into providing services for victims of crime.

We note that the Sentencing Council in New Zealand has a minority of judicial members. The Sheriffs’ Association is opposed to any Sentencing Council which does not have a majority of judicial members. As the consultation document points out in paragraph 3.1 the composition of the membership of any Sentencing Council is important since those who have to comply with the guidelines have to have confidence that the guidelines are drawn up by those with the appropriate expertise, experience and skills. The Sheriffs’ Association is of the view it is unlikely that the shrieval branch of the judiciary would have confidence in any Sentencing Council that did not have a majority of judicial members.

If a Sentencing Council is to be introduced it would be appropriate, in our view, to adopt a similar membership to the structure in England and Wales set out in Annex B of the consultation document, which has a majority of judicial members.

The Sheriffs’ Association however remains opposed to the proposal that a Sentencing Council be created to draft sentencing guidelines. If sentencing guidelines are to be introduced, which for the reasons stated we are convinced are unnecessary, we prefer the model recommended in 2006 by the Sentencing Commission, chaired by the late Lord Macfadyen. It recommended that a sentencing advisory body, the Advisory Panel on Sentencing in Scotland (“APSS”) be created to frame draft sentencing guidelines with the adoption, or otherwise, of those guidelines being ultimately a matter for the Appeal Court. That recommendation recognised the importance that the Appeal Court remain in overall control of sentencing policy.

The omission of any reference in this consultation paper to the recommendation of the Sentencing Commission that an Advisory Panel on Sentencing in Scotland (“APSS”) be created, as opposed to a Sentencing Council, is an omission we find surprising. The notion of creating a Sentencing Council was rejected by the Sentencing Commission. We agree with the reasoning behind that decision, see paragraph 9.15 of its report. The Sheriffs’ Association regard it as fundamental to the constitutional principle of judicial independence that sentencing remains a judicial function, and maintaining the role of the Appeal Court in overseeing that function would ensure the protection of judicial independence.

The Sheriffs’ Association, subject to the observations made in our introductory remarks, responds to the questions in the consultation document as follows:

Remit of the Scottish Sentencing Council

Question 1 – Do you think that this proposed remit is appropriate? If not, what alternative would you suggest?

No. The Sheriffs’ Association does not consider that the proposed remit is appropriate for the following reason.

Since the aim of the Sentencing Commission in proposing sentencing guidelines is to promote and improve consistency in sentencing, to increase public confidence and to recognise the final decision on sentence is based on the fact of the case and is for the judiciary, we consider the proposed remit should be restricted to those aims. We are of the view that if there is to be a Sentencing Council then the principle of promoting greater understanding and enhancing public confidence in the criminal justice system may be worthwhile including in the remit.

We suggest the remit of any Sentencing Council should be to:

“Promote consistency in sentencing practice; to ensure that sentencing practice is transparent and understandable, while preserving the important element of judicial discretion;

“Inform and educate the public about sentencing decision making, with a view to promoting greater understanding and enhancing public confidence in the criminal justice system.”

We consider the references to policy should be removed from the remit, as should the reference to developing sentencing policy, and the reference to informing the Scottish Ministers and Parliament on sentencing practices and areas for reform. This would recognise that any Sentencing Council should be judicially led and should not encroach into the area of policy.

Question 2 – Do you think that these proposed functions are appropriate? If not, what alternatives would you suggest?

No. The proposed functions are not appropriate. So far as sub-head one is concerned sentencing levels for particular offences are already prescribed both for common law and statutory offences. Any attempt to have sentencing powers more narrowly circumscribed within the parameters already set is an interference with judicial independence and would be contrary to section 1 of the Judiciary and Courts (Scotland) Act 2008.

The requirement in sub-head two that judicial guidelines should be produced on particular types of sentences, disposals and other orders available at the time of sentencing is unnecessary since judges are aware of their sentencing limitations at present.

We consider sub-head three is an attack on judicial independence. The notion that judges be faced with a list of grounds justifying a judge’s departure from sentencing guidelines is also offensive. The consultation document fails to recognise that at present there exists a perfectly adequate system for dealing with any sentence imposed which is outwith the recognised parameters, and that is by appeal to the Court of Criminal Appeal.

Sub-head four is objectionable. It could allow a provision to be introduced that the judiciary had to take account of prison capacity when considering the appropriate sentence to impose.

Sub-head five refers to guidelines being produced to support research and academic work relevant to the Council’s remit. This is inappropriate at this stage. The time to carry out research is before considering implementing proposals thereby ascertaining whether there is any need for these reforms.
The purpose of sub-head six is objectionable in its suggestion that information on, compliance with, and departure from sentencing guidelines is to be collected and that information is to be published. The proposal is a potential attack on the independence of the judiciary particularly if the identity of the judges who do not comply is included.

Sub-head seven and the proposal that the public should be provided with information about sentencing is too vague. If implemented it will lead to confusion and misunderstandings.

The Sheriffs’ Association does not suggest any alternative function. We suggest that proper independent research is carried out to establish whether there is any inconsistency in sentencing which would justify the establishment of a Sentencing Council to produce sentencing guidelines.

Question 3 – Do you think our proposals in relation to the production of sentencing guidelines are adequate?

No. While the consultation document professes to allow the Sentencing Council to establish its own method of working including procedures for producing sentencing guidelines it then goes on to impose controls on how the Council is to work. The Sheriffs’ Association considers that a Sentencing Council has to be a judicially led body with a majority of judicial members and what is proposed does not provide for that essential element.

The Sheriffs’ Association finds it objectionable that office holders including the Scottish Ministers, the Lord Advocate, possibly the Secretary of State for Scotland and the Advocate General for Scotland would have to be consulted in relation to the business plan. Any Sentencing Council must remain independent and to carry out its function in accordance with this remit it should be adequately funded.

The introduction of the role of Lord Advocate to the sentencing process is objectionable given her role as head of the prosecution service.

The Sheriffs’ Association finds objectionable the suggestion that Ministers, including the Lord Advocate, should be able to ask the Sentencing Council to produce guidelines on particular issues and, if the reference were not taken up, the Sentencing Council would have to explain its reasons for not doing so in its annual report. That could allow political interference in the sentencing process. For any Sentencing Council to have any credibility it must remain free of political interference.

Question 4 – Do you think that we are proposing the correct level of consultation on draft sentencing guidelines?

No. Certain office holders are named as being required consultees. For the reasons given above we consider that those office holders should not be consulted.
We note in particular that the judiciary is conspicuous by its absence as one of the parties to be consulted. As the sentencing process is in our view solely a judicial function it is obvious it should be the main consultee.

The suggestion that the public should have the opportunity to comment on draft guidelines before they are finalised is mistaken. It could be abused by special interest groups with their own agenda.

We regard as unacceptable the proposal that any Sentencing Council will require to have in mind when framing guidelines the costs of particular disposals and the likely impact on the prisoner population. The judiciary currently do not consider such factors when selecting sentence as such considerations interfere with judicial independence. In imposing any sentence, whether it is a custodial or non-custodial sentence, a judge has a number of important principles to consider but the cost of any such disposal should never be a consideration. The judiciary must remain free of any attempt by the Executive to influence judicial decision making because of cost implications.

Question 5 – Do you consider that our proposals for the relationship between the Sentencing Council and the courts are appropriate?

No. The proposal that judges of all courts, including the Court of Criminal Appeal should be under an obligation to adhere to the sentencing guidelines effectively elevates the Sentencing Council above the courts and is a clear interference with the independence of the judiciary.

The suggestion that if the guidelines are departed from the judge is required to formally state, and also record, detailed reasons for doing so when sentence is imposed will have a considerable impact on the running of the courts and will inevitably lead to a need for more judicial resources particularly in the sheriff court where the majority of sentences are imposed. Since the proposal demands a record with detailed reasons, this will involve a written report by the judge. That report will require to be compiled prior to imposing the sentence and will lead to courts being adjourned on a regular basis for the judge to prepare that report. The notion that a judge should provide a report to the Sentencing Council is objectionable in principle. It is to the Appeal Court that any judge has to justify the reason for his sentence and not a Government sponsored body.

Question 6 - Do you agree that the Scottish Sentencing Council should have the power to carry out, commission and coordinate research?

Yes. Sentencing guidelines would have no credibility unless based on research and carried out by truly independent researchers.

Question 7 – a) Do you agree that the Scottish Sentencing Council’s statutory functions should include providing information to the public about the sentencing process?
b) If yes, how do you think that process could be made clearer and more understandable to ordinary members of the public?

7(a) We have no difficulty with this proposal and see no harm in explaining the sentencing process so long as it does not interfere with the process itself.

7(b) The proposals are so complicated that in our view the process is likely to be less clear and less understandable to the public but how any Sentencing Council sets about achieving a process that is clearer and more understandable to the public would be a matter for them.

Question 8 – What measures might be taken by the Scottish Sentencing Council to make the sentencing process more transparent?

We do not understand what is meant by this question. We consider the sentencing process is already transparent and is enhanced by accurate and adequate press reporting. The judiciary in imposing sentence is obliged to explain the reasons for imposing any particular sentence and does so in a clear and concise manner.

Question 9 – Do you agree that the Chair of the Scottish Sentencing Council should be a senior member of the Judiciary? If not, who do you think would be a more suitable chairperson?

We are emphatically of the view that the Chair of the Scottish Sentencing Council must be a senior member of the judiciary.

Question 10 – Do you consider the proposed membership of the Council to be appropriate? If not what alternative membership do you think would be more suitable?

No. It is essential that a Scottish Sentencing Council has a majority of judicial members. The proposed composition of the Sentencing Council in the consultation document is unacceptable. It proposes a Council with a minority of four judicial members with seven non-judicial members. That composition flies in the face of the statement in the consultation document which claims to recognise that for judges and others to have confidence in sentencing guidelines they should be drawn up by those with the appropriate expertise, skills and experience. Those with that experience are the judges who impose sentences as they have the detailed and up to date experience of sentencing, while remaining an independent body not representing any faction or single interest group.

Sentencing is a wholly judicial function. We therefore propose that the model in England and Wales is the appropriate model to adopt which has a majority of judicial members comprising eight judicial members representing every tier of the court system.
Suggested Membership of a Scottish Sentencing Council

The Sheriffs’ Association considers that any membership of the Scottish Sentencing Council should reflect that the function of sentencing is wholly judicial. We propose that the Chairperson should be the Lord President, in his capacity as Lord Justice General, or the Lord Justice Clerk. There should be in addition one Inner House Judge with experience of sitting on sentencing appeals, and one Outer House Judge with experience of presiding over High Court trials and sentencing at first instance.

In addition the number of sheriffs on any Sentencing Council should be increased to reflect the position that the majority of sentencing in Scotland is carried out by sheriffs, both at summary and solemn level. We propose that there should be six sheriffs to reflect the number of sheriffdoms in Scotland, and the diversity of local communities within those sheriffdoms.

In addition there should be one Justice of the Peace or Stipendiary Magistrate.

We propose that the four non-judicial members are appointed conform to the English model. Those four non-judicial members would be individuals restricted to one each of those with experience of policing, criminal prosecution, criminal defence and the interests of the victims.

Question 11 – Do you agree that there should be a Scottish Government observer at meetings of the Council? If not, it would be helpful if you could provide your reason(s).

No. Such a presence would interfere with the requirement for total independence of the judiciary and of the sentencing process. Having a Government observer would give rise to the grounds of suspicion that the Sentencing Council was Government controlled or at least influenced. Any Sentencing Council has to be, and be seen to be, independent of Government.

Question 12 – Do you agree with the proposed appointments process? If not, how do you think the process could be modified to make it more effective?

No. We find the notion that the Lord President should consult with the Scottish Ministers before appointing judicial members objectionable.

The Lord President should be free to appoint whoever he wishes as judicial members without any political or other outside input.

The Sheriffs’ Association agrees that it is appropriate that appointments be for a fixed term of five years to ensure independence and impartiality. This should not include the chairman who will be there ex officio.

We agree with the proposal that Ministers will appoint non-judicial members after consulting with the Lord President.
Question 13 – Do you agree with our proposals for how the Scottish Sentencing Council should be resourced and supported? If not, what alternative arrangement do you think would be more appropriate and/or effective?

We are not convinced that it is appropriate to give the financial and administrative responsibility for a Sentencing Council to the Scottish Court Service.

We are of the view that whatever organisation or model is adopted it should not be allowed to impinge on the current services provided by Scottish Court Service or the resources of that service.

We are particularly pleased to note that the consultation document states that the Sentencing Council should be set up in such a way as to ensure its independence from Government. It is therefore crucial in our view that the points we have already made which indicate a lack of distance from Government in the operation of the Council is recognised.

Question 14 – Do you agree with our proposals for a statutory statement on the purpose of sentencing? If not, how do you think these proposals could be modified to make them more effective?

No. Enshrining the purpose of sentencing in statute is unnecessary. The factors enumerated are all ones which every judge considers when imposing a sentence.

Question 15 – Do you agree with our proposals for a statutory statement on the principles of sentencing? If not, how do you think these proposals could be modified to make them more effective?

No. We regard the proposals for a set of statutory principles as unnecessary. What are described as statutory principles are the factors which all judges currently have regard to when selecting an appropriate sentence to impose. It is apparent to many judges when they impose a sentence in open court that not only the accused person but also the victims and indeed the accused’s family understand the reasons for the sentence imposed.

We are concerned that the sub-headings of paragraph 4.5 do not specifically include the danger that an offender may present to the public but is relegated along with the general consideration of other factors. In our view the danger that an offender may present to the public is of paramount importance and together with the seriousness of the offence should be included at sub-head one.

The circumstances of the offender, their willingness to reform etc. as encompassed in a Social Enquiry Report are factors which are always considered by judges and have a major significance on the sentence which is ultimately imposed. It justifies a higher priority.
The desirability of consistency with sentencing levels is of lower priority to public danger or willingness to reform.

Question 16 – Do you agree with our proposals to state explicitly in statute that voluntary drunkenness or intoxication can never be considered a mitigating factor by the courts? If not, it would be helpful if you could provide your reason(s).

No. We consider it is unnecessary as there is already sufficient guidance from the Appeal Court.

December 2008
THE SHERIFFS’ ASSOCIATION

COMMENTS OF THE COUNCIL OF THE SHERIFFS’ ASSOCIATION TO THE JUSTICE 2 COMMITTEE ON THE CUSTODIAL SENTENCES AND WEAPONS (SCOTLAND) BILL

The Council of the Sheriffs’ Association does not consider that the provisions of this Bill will achieve the objective of delivering clarity and transparency in sentencing.

The Council recognises that the policy and policy objectives of the proposed legislation are for the Executive and Parliament and not for the Association. However, the Council has serious concerns about aspects of the proposals for the implementation of the policy and policy objectives.

The Council has no difficulty with the proposal that sentencing judges will have a role in setting the custody part of sentences of imprisonment (“custody and community sentences”) and recognises that this role may, to a certain extent, make the process more transparent. However, in relation to transparency, clarity and certainty the Council has concerns about the role of the Executive and the Parole Board in reviewing and altering the custody part, as well as determining the conditions of community licence. The Council also has concerns about the operation of the Bill’s provisions in relation to the judicial decision-making process.

So far as the judicial decision-making process is concerned, we note that in deciding on the appropriate custody part the sentencing judge will not be permitted to take into account a factor that has customarily figured commonly in the judicial sentencing process. Clause 6 (5) requires the sentencing judge in specifying a custody part “to ignore any period of confinement which may be necessary for the protection of the public”. That appears to suggest that risk of re-offending is not be a factor that may be taken into consideration. Indeed the Explanatory Notes (Para.16) state in relation to subsection (5) – “The question of risk (or the protection of the public) will be assessed during the custody part and, if necessary, will be decided by the Parole Board.”

The Policy Memorandum states that “Public protection is of paramount importance” (Para.7). The protection of the public is a factor to which sentencing judges have customarily attributed high importance in determining the appropriate sentence to impose. The question arises of whether it is the intention of this proposed legislation to remove that factor from the judicial sentencing process.

It is not clear how the provision of clause 6(5) would affect the sentencing process so far as concerns the selection of a custodial sentence, rather than an alternative to custody, or as regards the setting of the overall “headline” sentence of “imprisonment”. Nor – in relation to the setting of the “custody part” - is it clear how the provision sits with the requirement in clause 6(2) to set the custody part as the appropriate period to satisfy the requirement of deterrence. Assuming this to be a reference to individual and not general deterrence (although this is not made clear), it might be thought that the sentencing aim of deterrence involves protection of the public (from further offending by the offender) and that the sentencing judge’s assessment of the period of custody appropriate to deter the particular offender from re-offending may require to involve assessment of risk of re-offending as a factor in that calculation.

There may be a further difficulty for sentencing judges in calculating the appropriate sentence, created by clause 6(4)(c). If the intention is that the provisions of section 196(1)(a) and (b) of the 1995 Act, in conjunction with the case law from the case of Du Plooy v HM Advocate, should operate in such a way that any proposed increase in the custody part (in terms of clause 6(3)) is to be reduced in recognition of an early plea of guilty, does this mean that the sentencing judge in such circumstances is to give an offender the benefit of a double discount, with both the overall “headline” sentence and the custody part being reduced?

The point about double application of the same factors would also seem to apply to the other matters relevant to the imposition of a higher custody part in terms of the proposed section 6(3) and (4). The seriousness of the crime and the accused’s record are likely to be taken into account in setting the overall “headline” sentence as well as being matters relevant to specifying a custody part that is greater than half of the overall sentence.

As we have said, the policy of the proposed legislation is a matter for the Executive and not for this Association. In fact we have no difficulty with what is stated in the Policy Memorandum about creating a transparent sentencing regime that will improve public confidence and provide transparency and certainty for victims. However, we do not believe the proposed legislation will achieve that and we think it appropriate to offer comment because we believe this will create difficulties for the judiciary, as well perhaps as for victims and the public. Although the custody part of a sentence of imprisonment will be imposed and announced at the public sentencing hearing, it will not be possible to predict or state at that time what the duration of the period that will actually be spent in prison will turn out to be or what the conditions of licence during the community part of the sentence will be. The only part of the sentencing process that will be in public will be this hearing. This situation would not appear to be conducive to or consistent with a policy of clarity, certainty and transparency, and it will create a difficult situation for the sentencing judge at the time of sentencing.

Although there is no specific provision to this effect in the Bill the Policy Memorandum states that "the court will explain the consequences of the combined structure when imposing sentence." (Para. 11) Is not clear how that is to be achieved, in the absence of specific statutory provision. However, such an explanation may present a difficult task, so far as clarity and certainty are concerned.

An example of the sort of explanation that may require to be given follows. It supposes a sentence imposed by a sheriff on indictment in respect of a crime of assault to severe injury and permanent disfigurement in a case where a plea of guilty has been tendered at the First Diet.

Sheriff – “The sentence of the court is a sentence of imprisonment - that is a custody and community sentence - of three years. The sentence takes account of your early plea of guilty, in accordance with the requirements of the law. It would otherwise have been a sentence of four years, but a discount of one quarter has been given.

The custody part of your sentence will be one half - that is eighteen months - in accordance with the relevant statutory provision. I consider that to represent an appropriate period to satisfy the requirements for retribution and deterrence. In specifying the custody part I have been required by statute to ignore any period of confinement which may be necessary for the protection of the public, and I have not therefore taken into account the risk of you endangering members of the public by re-offending.

I cannot tell you (or your victim or the public) at this stage whether you will in fact actually spend 18 months in prison. It is open to the government to release you from prison on curfew licence before you have served 18 months. It is also open to the government and the Parole Board to delay your release from prison beyond the expiry of 18 months. The period of imprisonment may be extended up to a maximum of 27 months if the government and the Parole Board consider that you would, if not confined, be likely to cause serious harm to members of the public.

Part of your sentence will be served on community licence. In terms of the sentence I have imposed the period in the community on licence will be for one half of your sentence – namely 18 months. However, you will appreciate from what I have just said that it may turn out to be for more or less than that. I cannot at this stage tell you what the conditions of your licence will be when you are serving the community part of your sentence. These conditions will be set by the government or the Parole Board. If you breach the conditions of licence your licence may be revoked and you may be re-imprisoned, although you will not be further detained if the Parole Board determines that you would not, if not confined, be likely to cause serious harm to members of the public.

This is the only public hearing at which your sentence will be announced. I hope the consequences of the combined structure of your sentence are clear to you.”

As regards early release on Curfew Licence, we note that the Policy Memorandum makes clear (in Para.36) that the Bill re-enacts the arrangements introduced through the Management of Offenders etc (Scotland) Act 2005, known as Home Detention Curfew. These measures are seen as providing “a useful incentive in appropriate cases”, but would be subject to strict controls, prescribed in the Bill, such as the exclusion of high risk offenders and sex offenders. Clarification of clause 36(1)(b) would be helpful, as regards its meaning and the Executive’s intentions.

The Council would also wish to comment on the question of reports by sentencing judges, which has been raised in comments submitted by Sheriff Reith QC, who is a member of the Parole Board. The need for such reports is very limited at present, particularly so far as sheriffs are concerned. Reports are mainly required in cases where a custodial sentence of 4 years or more is imposed. (They are also required where a consecutive sentence is imposed which takes the accused into the category of a long-term prisoner or where a supervised release order or extended sentence takes the overall sentence into the 4 years or over category.) It is unclear what implications the proposed new statutory provisions may have for the provision of reports by sentencing judges. The Council would strongly oppose any suggestion that sentence reports should routinely require to be provided by sentencing sheriffs as a result of this proposed legislation. Any such requirement would add an unacceptable additional burden to the work of sheriffs and would be quite disproportionate to what would be likely to be the actual need for reports. We would expect that the number of cases in which the Executive thinks it appropriate to refer the sentence to the Parole Board would be only a small proportion of the total number of cases in which a custody and community sentence is imposed. In any case, as noted above, the matters to be taken into account by the sentencing judge in deciding whether it is appropriate to set a longer custody part are not to include any period which may be necessary for the protection of the public (clause 6 (5)). The test for consideration of denial of release at the end of a custody part that is less than the maximum will be the protection of the public (from serious harm). There should therefore be no need for any reports from sentencing judges, as the criterion for consideration of refusal of release at the end of the original custody part will be that the sentencing court will not have considered (or indeed been permitted to consider).

The Council would also associate itself generally with the other comments submitted by Sheriff Reith, so far as relevant to the interests of sheriffs, including those relating to the abolition of the power of the court to decide to require an early-released re-offender to serve the unexpired portion of the sentence.

Justice Committee
Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill
Written submission from the Law Society of Scotland

INTRODUCTION

The Law Society of Scotland (the “Society”) welcomes the opportunity to comment upon the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009 and has the following comments to make upon its terms.

GENERAL COMMENTS

The Society has responded to a number of Scottish Government consultation papers containing proposals which are now upon the face of the Bill.

In particular, the Society’s Criminal Law Committee responded to the Scottish Government’s consultation paper on sentencing guidelines and the Scottish Sentencing Council in November 2008, the Scottish Government’s consultation paper upon a statutory basis for disclosure in criminal proceedings in Scotland which contained proposals for legislation to implement the recommendations in the Coulsfield report in January 2008 and the Scottish Executive’s consultation paper on proposals to amend the law on the compellability of spousal witnesses in September 2006. The Society’s Criminal Law Committee also responded to the Scottish Law Commission’s discussion paper on Crown appeals in May 2008.

The Society’s Licensing Law Sub-Committee would wish to respond to Parts 8, 9 and 10 of the Bill under separate cover.

Reconsolidation of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995

The Society is of the view that the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill has been presented as a miscellaneous provisions type Bill with a number of wide-ranging proposals. The Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 has been amended on a number of occasions since 1995. A reconsolidation to make the law accessible and easier to understand is required.

SPECIFIC COMMENTS

Part 1 Sentencing

Section 1 Purposes and Principles of Sentencing

The Committee agrees with the purposes and principles of sentencing which more or less reflect the terms of Section 142(1) of the Criminal Justice Act 2003 (England) but suggests that the purpose as outlined at Section 1(1)(b) should be the deterrence of crime as opposed to the reduction of crime (including its reduction by deterrence). The Society also believes that one of the main principles of sentencing is to serve the interests of justice and that should be reflected on the Bill. The Society agrees with the proposals for a set of Statutory Principles in relation to sentencing on the basis that judicial independence would not be compromised in applying these principles.

Section 3 and Schedule 1 The Scottish Sentencing Council

The Society can see merit in a transparent arrangement for sentencing. However, any Sentencing Council should operate in a way which does not detract from judicial independence.

Section 4 The Council’s Objectives

Consistency in sentencing practice should be distinguished from uniformity so that judicial independence remains. What has to be taken into account is that different courts throughout the country will sentence according to local issues. With particular reference to Section 4, the Society notes Section 4(c) which will help to ensure that non-lawyers in the sentencing process, i.e. the accused, the complainer and the public will have an enhanced understanding of sentencing practice and policy.

It is unclear from the Bill if a Scottish Sentencing Council would function in respect of reserved offences under the Scotland Act 1998 e.g. terrorism, firearms and drugs, company law, intellectual property, insolvency and corporate homicide offences. Accordingly, will the Council propose guidelines with regard to reserved offences as inconsistencies will no doubt arise in sentencing practice with regard to these offences in Scotland as opposed to elsewhere within the United Kingdom?

Section 5 Sentencing Guidelines

With particular reference to Section 5(5), the Society is concerned about the assessment of the costs and benefits under Sections 5(5)(a) and (b). This seems to predicate sentencing on financial issues rather than fulfilment of the sentencing purposes under Section 1. The Society is concerned if sentencing guidelines are to be produced by the Sentencing Council on the basis of a perceived need to reduce the prison population in Scotland.

The Society also notes the position in England and Wales and particularly the findings of the Sentencing Commission Working Group chaired by Lord Justice Gage which recommended the placing of a duty on the Sentencing Guidelines Council to estimate the effect of guidelines in terms of the prison population or other correctional resources. Lord Justice Gage also recommended that the Council provide an overview of all the factors that impact on the prison population and alert the UK Government to significant developments and to oblige the UK Government, when introducing a Bill, or launching a new policy, to invite the Sentencing Guidelines Council to assess its impact on correctional resources. The Society believes that Scottish Ministers should be under an analogous duty subject however to the Scottish Sentencing Council also taking into account the application of the sentencing purposes.

Section 6 Procedure for Publication and Review of Sentencing Guidelines

The Society does not agree that the level on consultation on draft sentencing guidelines is correct. Section 6(1)(b) should include the Lord Justice General. The Society agrees that the Council should have a discretion to consult with such persons or bodies as it considers necessary as stated in Section 6(1)(b)(iii).

Section 7 The Effect Of Sentencing Guidelines

The Society notes that, in terms of Section 7(2), reasons must be stated by the court for a departure from the guidelines. The Society is concerned that this would result in a ground of appeal against sentence on the basis of such a departure.

Section 8 Ministers’ Power to Request that Guidelines be Published or Reviewed

The Society welcomes the provisions at Section 8 whereby Scottish Ministers may request that the Council consider publishing or reviewing sentencing guidelines on any matter.

Section 9 High Court’s Power to Request a Review of Guidelines

The Society believes that it would be more appropriate for the Lord Justice General to refer sentencing guidelines to the Council than the High Court of Justiciary. It should be a matter for the Lord Justice General rather than individual courts as to whether sentencing guidelines should be referred to the Council.

Section 10 Scottish Courts Service to Provide Sentencing Information to the Council

The Society agreed that the Scottish Courts Service must provide the Council with sentencing information and welcomes this provision.

Section 11 The Council’s Power to Provide Information, Advice, etc

The Society welcomes this provision which will allow the Council to provide information and advice about sentencing matters.
Section 12 Business Plan

The Society is of the view that, in preparing a business plan, the Council must also consult with the Lord Justice General.

Section 13 Annual Report

At Section 13(5) the Society is of the view that a time limit should be prescribed within which Scottish Ministers must lay before the Scottish Parliament each report submitted to them by the Council.

Section 14 Community Payback Orders

The Society notes the policy intention of the Bill to introduce a new style easy to understand “Community Payback Order” to replace what is considered an unnecessarily complex range of sentencing options currently available which are not readily understood by the public. The Society highlights, however, that these provisions are likely to be resource intensive and notes at paragraph 698 of the Financial Memorandum that additional costs which will be incurred by local authorities will be reimbursed by the Scottish Administration through ring-fenced funding arrangements for criminal justice social work. It is important that local authority social work departments are geared for the implementation of this section if this proposal is to be successful.

The Society refers to the case of Brennan v HMA 1977 JC38 where Lord Justice General Emslie stated at Page 46, “In the law of Scotland, a person who voluntarily and deliberately consumes known intoxicants, including drink or drugs, of whatever quantity, for their intoxicating effects, whether these effects are fully foreseen or not, cannot rely on the resulting intoxication as the foundation of a special defence of insanity at the time nor, indeed can he plead diminished responsibility”.

In the law of Scotland, a plea in mitigation is a speech made by the accused (or more commonly his legal representative) at the sentencing stage presenting the arguments for a lenient sentence. Although Lord Justice General Emslie was referring to defences, the Society is of the view that the statement would apply to mitigation but not to a mere explanation of the commission of the offence. With particular reference to Section 1(4)(e) of the Bill, the courts must have regard to, “the offender’s willingness to reform”. The court cannot take voluntary consumption into account but the court will need to know this information to conform with Section 1. This provision does not include a reference to drugs; both alcohol and drugs should be considered.
Part 2 – Criminal Law

Sections 25-28 – Serious Organised Crime

The Society welcomes appropriate provisions put in place in order to tackle those involved in serious organised crime.

Section 28 – Failure to Report Serious Organised Crime

The Society refers to the judgement in Niemietz v Germany 1992 ECHR application number 13710/88 where the court held that there had been a breach of Article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights, Article 8 states “1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence. 2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as in accordance with the law and as necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.”

In this case, which involved the unlawful search of a lawyer’s office in Germany to find documents revealing the identity of a supposed associate of the lawyer, the court held that the search was a violation of Article 8 and commented that the notion of “private life” should not be taken to exclude activities of a professional or business nature. The Society questions whether the provisions of Section 28 comply with Article 8.

Section 29 – Articles Banned in Prison

The Society notes the policy objective of Section 29 is to provide an effective deterrent against the use (often for illegal purposes) of personal communication devices within prison.

With particular reference to the definition of “personal communication device”, this includes a mobile telephone or any other portable electronic device that is capable of transmitting or receiving a communication of any kind. The Society notes the provisions as contained in the Prisons and Young Offenders Institutions (Scotland) Rules 2006 at Part 8 entitled “Communications”. At paragraph 59(1) any letter or package, other than one to which Rule 57 or 58 applies (correspondence to and from the court and correspondence to and from legal advisers) which a prisoner wishes to send or which is addressed to the prisoner may be opened by an officer. The Society highlights the potential for communications by email from a desktop computer in for example the prison library which is not included in the definition of “personal communication device”.

Section 30 – Sale and Hire of Crossbows to Persons Under 18

The Society notes that this provision will allow a test purchasing scheme with regard to age restrictions on the sale of crossbows. The Society notes that there appears to be no similar provision with regard to the sale and hire of bow and arrow.

Section 34 Extreme Pornography

The Society supported the policy objective of seeking to help ensure that the public are protected from exposure to extreme pornography that depicts horrific images of violence in its response to the Home Office and Scottish Executive joint consultation in 2005.

At that time, the Society took the view that, if the policy intention is to free the public from this material, then the law must target producers and suppliers. The Society notes that the intent is to discourage interest in extreme pornographic material by breaking the demand/supply cycle by creating the new offence of possession of extreme pornography. This section may achieve that objective.

The Society also notes that similar provision is found in Section 63 of the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 which applies to England, Wales and Northern Ireland.

The Society further notes that the provisions here will cover all obscene pornographic images, but would question the possibility of the unintended effects of these provisions in that it may be argued that certain works of art may depict aspects of what the section describes as either obscene, pornographic or extreme. Further clarification of the extent to which the definition will operate is needed.

PART 3 – CRIMINAL PROCEDURE

The Society notes that Section 38 provides that a child under the age of 12 “may not be prosecuted for an offence” and there is no proposal to raise the age of criminal responsibility. The United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child requires that an age of criminal responsibility should be identified, it does not specify what that age should be. It should be noted that the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child expanded upon this in April 2007 and that, whilst noting that there was a wide range of ages of criminal responsibility amongst states parties, this Committee made its position clear when it described them as ranging ‘from a very low level of age 7 or 8 to the commendably high level of 14 or 16’ and found that setting the age below 12 ‘not to be internationally acceptable’.

The Society further notes that in 2000, an advisory group to the Scottish Parliament recommended that the age of responsibility be raised to 12. The then Scottish Executive referred the matter to the Scottish Law Commission who recommended that any rule on the age at which children cannot be found guilty of an offence should be abolished, albeit it also recommended that it should no longer be competent to prosecute a child below the age of 12. This finding seems to be set against the background of the welfare based Children’s Hearing system but it should be noted that the UN Convention mandates providing for an age of criminal responsibility below which no child can be guilty of an offence. It does not allow for the abolition of the age of criminal responsibility due to a welfare based system being in place.

The Society welcomes the policy intention behind Section 38 that it should no longer be competent to prosecute a child below the age of 12, nor to prosecute a person for an offence committed while he or she was below the age of 12. The interests of the child should be paramount and the child’s welfare must be the focus of attention even in the difficult circumstances of “offending” behaviour. The Society suggests that it would be appropriate to raise the age of criminal responsibility to 12 and to create a new, non-offence ground of referral to a Children’s Hearing along the lines of “the child has behaved in such a way as to cause (or risk causing) harm to himself/herself or another person or damage to property”. The Society suggests that social work intervention would then be possible in respect of the child. The benefits of this proposal would be that the child would not carry the taint of criminality for the rest of his or her life and that he or she would receive early intervention.

The Society suggests that the accused be given more notice of an additional charge. Section 27 of the 1995 Act should be amended to allow an additional charge to be added to the complaint, either at the intermediate diet or at any time before the trial on cause shown.

Section 54 – Submissions as to the sufficiency of evidence

The Society welcomes the introduction of a statutory replacement for the Common Law Submission at the close of all criminal defence evidence as reflected in Section 97A of the Bill at Section 54.

Whilst the Society is of the view that finality and certainty in criminal proceedings are important, nevertheless the arguments for crown rights of appeal are substantial and justify a change in the current practice subject always to sufficient safeguards being in place. With reference to Section 107B, (Procurator’s Right of Appeal: Decisions of Admissibility of Evidence) the Society welcomes sub-section 4 which ensures that Procurators Fiscal do not make routine appeals against decisions on admissibility of evidence where the court has initially made a finding that the evidence the prosecution seeks to lead is inadmissible. The Society however highlights the certain procedural difficulty in that the court, in determining whether leave to appeal should be granted, is required to take into account the effect that the finding has on the strength of the Procurator’s case.
The Society would also highlight the issues surrounding time limits where an accused remains in custody.

Section 58 – Retention of samples etc.

The Society welcomes the proposal as set out in Section 58 of the Bill which amends Section 18A of the 1995 Act to authorise the retention of fingerprints and any other forensic data already taken from persons proceeded against but not convicted of a serious sexual or violent offence for a three year period.

The Society’s view is that the acquisition and retention regime for fingerprints should reflect that of DNA given the primary purpose of both DNA and fingerprints is the same i.e. to assist the police with the investigation of an offence by identifying individuals who are connected with criminal enquiries.

The decision of the European Court of Human Rights on the Marper case is relevant. The Grand Chamber of the ECHR found that the retention of DNA profiles, cellular samples and fingerprints was disproportionate and therefore unjustified under Article of the European Convention of Human Rights and that this decision would require new legislative measures to meet a requirement while the Convention. Whilst the position in England and Wales under Section 64(1)(a) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 allows the police to hold fingerprints and DNA samples of persons investigated for a crime for an indefinite period, contrary to the three year rule in Scotland, the Society is of the view that Section 58 has to be properly considered against the terms of the Marper judgment.

The Society is of the view that there should be no change in the present arrangements, on the basis that it is not appropriate as a matter of principle to take and retain DNA and fingerprints from children who are dealt with by Children’s Hearings as opposed to the criminal courts.

The Society notes from the terms of Section 18B(6) that a relevant offence is such relevant sexual offence or relevant violent offence as the Scottish Ministers may by order made by statutory instrument prescribe and is concerned that such offences are to be prescribed in secondary legislation albeit under affirmative procedure rather than placed on the face of the Bill.

Section 61 Referrals from Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission: Grounds for Appeal

The Society is concerned that these provisions with limited appeal following upon a reference made by the Commission to be based only on the Statement of Reasons given in the referral although it is noted that the court can allow other grounds to be argued.
Section 62 Witness Statements: Use during trial

The Society reiterates its concerns as set out in its response to the Scottish Government consultation paper entitled “A Statutory Basis for Disclosure in Criminal Proceedings in Scotland Proposals for Legislation to Implement the Recommendation in the Coulsfield Report”. The Society’s Criminal Law Committee disagreed with the proposal that witnesses should be able to refer to copies of their statements when giving evidence. Differences in the practices and procedures for taking of statements are such that there is no guarantee that consideration of such statements as are noted in Scotland prior to the giving of evidence would lead to more accurate or reliable information being given. Indeed, the Society highlights that material discrepancies between statements given to the police and evidence given in court at a later date can call into question the credibility and reliability of a witness.

Part 4 Evidence

Section 63 - Spouse or Civil Partner or Accused Compellable Witness

The Society does not agree with these proposals to amend the law on compellability of spousal witnesses. Section 264 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 should not be repealed because this would ignore the long-established purpose behind the rule on compellability of spousal witnesses as established in common and statute law, which attaches to the status of marriage and the risk of perjury by the spouse as a compellable witness. It is the common experience of practitioners who serve on the Society’s Criminal Law Committee that spouses or partners rarely give evidence against their partner nor speak out even when compelled to do so by law.

Were the law with regard to compellability of spousal witnesses to be changed, then perhaps a fairer approach would be to remove the right not to give evidence against a spouse or civil partner where the offence is one against a child. It should be noted that this would equate with the statutory position in England and Wales in terms of Section 80 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 where the spouse of an accused in England and Wales is a compellable witness for the prosecution where the offence charged involves:

1. Personal violence against the spouse or against a child under the age of 16

2. A sexual offence against a child under 16 or;

3. Attempting or conspiring to commit or aiding and abetting or inciting the commission of an offence with regard to types of offences set out above.
Section 66 Witness Anonymity Orders

The Society notes the policy intention of witness anonymity orders to permit witnesses to give evidence in court using measures designed to preserve their anonymity. It further notes that legislation was introduced in England and Wales in July 2008 following upon the decision of the House of Lords in the case of R V Davies 2008 UK HL36. With regard to a new Section 271(N)(4)(c) inserted into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 by Section 66 of the Bill, the Society highlights a practical issue. With regard to courts making orders requiring special measures to be taken in relation to a witness in criminal proceedings in certain cases, it may be necessary for the defence to ask a question which may result in the witness’s identity becoming known. How will Section 66 operate in compliance with Article 6 of the ECHR to ensure that the accused receives a fair trial?

Section 68 – Upper Age Limit for Jurors

The Society has no objection in principle to allowing persons aged 65 – 70 to serve on juries. It is important that the age balance of jury composition is considered carefully.

Section 69 Persons Excusable From Jury Service

The Society agrees with the proposal to reduce the entitlement to excusal as a right from five years to two years for those jurors who attended court but who are not selected by ballot to sit on a jury.

The Society notes with interest that the Scottish Government has commissioned an independent review under Edward Bowen QC, Sheriff Principal for the Sheriffdom of Lothian & Borders, for the more efficient and cost-effective operation of Sheriff as Jury Courts in the interests of justice and to reduce inconvenience and stress to witnesses and victims.

Section 81 – Public Defence Solicitors

The Society notes that Section 81 of the Bill is in effect a tidying up measure to remove reference to a feasibility study into the Public Defender Solicitors Office that must be laid before the Scottish Parliament before 31 December 2008. The study was completed and submitted to the Scottish Parliament in December 2008. Under Section 81(2), the Society notes that Section 73 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003 (which requires Scottish Ministers to lay a report on the feasibility of the PDSO before Parliament before 31 December 2008) will be repealed.

The Society believes that in criminal legal assistance funding should be invested in the legal aid system in order to ensure access to justice for those who cannot afford their own defence. The Society is of the view that Scottish solicitors provide an independent service which is good value for the taxpayer whether they are employed in the PDSO or work in the private sector.

Part 6 – Disclosure

The Society welcomes the Scottish Government’s initiative to put in place a statutory basis for disclosure with regard to criminal proceedings in Scotland following upon the decisions in Holland v HMA 2005 SCCR417 and Sinclair v HMA 2005 SCCR446 and Gair v HMA 2006 SCCR419. The Society’s position is that a full and fair system of disclosure to the accused is an essential element of a fair trial and without such a system there can be no guarantee of an accused person receiving a fair trial.

The Society would, however, highlight a concern with regard to Section 94(2) (entitled Defence statements: solemn proceedings) which inserts a new Section 70A into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 entitled “Defence statements”. The Society notes that new Section 70A(2) provides that an accused must lodge a defence statement at least fourteen days before the first diet and at least fourteen days before the preliminary hearing. It is the Society’s view that the lodging of defence statements are unhelpful. The Society would refer to paragraph 7.7 to 7.12 of Lord Coulsfield’s report as follows:-

7.7 A further important question is how to allow the Defence to convey information about their thinking to the Prosecutor, in order to inform and stimulate decisions on disclosure which accurate reflect the intention of the Defence. In most cases it is likely to be obvious to the Crown whether any material they hold is potentially exculpatory, but sometimes there will be unexpected lines of defence which the Prosecutor could not reasonably foresee, and in these cases advance notice by the Defence will put the Prosecutor in a better position to judge what material needs to be disclosed. There is no doubt that it was be to the advantage of the Defence to provide such a statement if there is a particularly positive line of defence and the Defence are looking for material to support it. Any system of disclosure therefore needs to enable and encourage the Defence to make an advance statement of their position whenever they perceive that this would help to secure fuller relevant disclosure and a fair trial for their client.

7.8 The statutory system in England and Wales goes further than this. Under the CPIA, the provision of a defence statement in response to the initial disclosure is mandatory in all Crown Court cases, and the statement is required to specify the respects in which the Defence takes issue with the Crown case. As I understand the position, that requirement was intended not only to assist in the process of disclosure, but also to help in Case Management. However, discussion with practitioners has indicated that in the majority of cases defence statements are late, unspecific and unhelpful. It has been argued to me that that is not a reason for not insisting on the provision of defence statements, and that the obligation to provide them could be more rigorously enforced. Experience suggests, however, that it would be difficult to enforce a requirement without either causing delay, or prejudicing a legitimate defence, or both. In Scotland there are well established rules defining the cases in which notice of a special defence has to be given. If it is necessary for the Defence to apply to the Court for additional disclosure, as discussed later, it will be necessary for them to explain the reasons for the request. I have not been convinced that a general requirement for a defence statement would give any significant additional benefit, to justify the additional work and cost which would be generated.

7.9 A system of schedules of material and solemn cases should be introduced, along with lines of the system in England and Wales.

7.10 The legislation or the statutory Code of Practice should explicitly place on the Crown a responsibility to review disclosure decisions in the light of any new information provided by the Defence.

7.11 The Code of Practice should set out a standard recommended form for a defence statement for this purpose.

7.12 Again, I make further recommendation about police training and other matters necessary for the implementation of the duty of disclosure in Part III.

The Society believes that the accused’s ability to lodge a defence statement depends on proper disclosure by the Crown in the first place. It is the experience of practitioners of the Society’s Criminal Law Committee that full disclosure has sometimes not been obtained even after First Diet or Preliminary Hearings. It will be incumbent upon the Crown to discharge its duty to disclose information in terms of Section 89 of the Bill in order to allow Section 70A to function properly.

The Society notes that the prosecutor’s duty to disclose is to remain upon the face of this Bill as contained in Sections 89 to 93 of the Bill yet provision with regard to defence statements is to be contained in the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995.

The Society notes the terms of Section 70A(6)(a) where the definition of “defence statement” means a statement setting out the “nature of the accused’s defence, including any particular defences on which the accused intends to rely”. The Society believes that ordinary defences such as mistaken identity etc are clearly well defined and in appropriate cases where notice is felt to be helpful to the Court or the Crown, this is covered by the rules of the current special defences as set out in Section 78 of the 1995 Act.

With particular reference to Section 70A(6)(b) the defence statement requires to set out “any matters of fact on which the accused takes issue with the prosecution the reason for doing so”. The Society highlights the practical difficulty in that the defence will not know which facts the prosecutor intends to rely upon. The Society believes that sub-paragraphs (c)(d)(e) are already well covered by Lord Coulsfield’s observations at paragraph 7.7 of his Report about the necessity of the Defence applying to the Court for additional disclosure which would require reasons for the request to be given. The Society believes that such procedure could have been enacted by way of Minute of procedure without any undue disruption.

In all the circumstances, the Society believes that there is no reason to depart from the terms of Lord Coulsfield’s recommendations.

The Society notes that there is no sanction contained within the new Section 70A for non-compliance.

Part 7 – Mental Disorder and Unfitness for Trial

The Society welcomes the reformulation in Part 7 of the Bill of the Test of Insanity. It believes, however, that a further volitional element should be included. The Society previously commented in its April 2003 response to the Scottish Law Commission discussion paper entitled “Insanity and Diminished Responsibility”, that

To frame the defence of mental disorder solely on a cognitive test rooted in the accused’s appreciation of the effects of his or her conduct at the time of the offence does not adequately reflect the variety of ways in which a person’s mental disorder might impact on his or her actions…. Adding the volitional test to the cognitive test would …. more closely reflect the established common law of Scotland and would more appropriately define the situations in which a person should be relieved of criminal responsibility as a result of the effects of mental disorder.

For example, a person who kills his or her children while suffering from a depressive illness may be able to appreciate what he/she is doing and understand that it is wrong in the eyes of the law, but nonetheless be driven to commit the crime by his or her illness. In such a case his or her illness overcomes his or her volition. The Society notes that the Bill does not allow a special defence in these circumstances.

FINAL COMMENTS

The Society trusts that these comments will assist the Scottish Parliament’s Justice Committee at Stage 1 of the Bill.
Justice Committee
Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill
Written submission from the Law Society of Scotland

PART 8 – LICENSING UNDER CIVIC GOVERNMENT (SCOTLAND) ACT 1982

Introduction

The Law Society of Scotland (‘the Society’) welcomes the opportunity to comment upon Parts 8 and 9 of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009 and has the following comments to make upon its terms.

General Comments

The Society has submitted a response to Parts 1 to 7 inclusive of the Bill under separate cover.

The Society notes that Section 129 of the Bill (Sale of Alcohol to Persons Under 21 etc.) and Section 140 of the Bill (Licensed Premises: Social Responsibility Levy) are to be removed from the Bill at Stage 2.

The Society further notes that these provisions may be introduced in a Health Bill in future and would welcome the opportunity to comment at a later stage.

With regard to part 9 of the Bill the Society is concerned that the Bill does not seek to repeal the appeal provisions contained within Sections 131 and 132 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 and the Act of Sederunt (Summary Applications and Appeals etc Rules) Amendment (Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005) 2008 where there has been a departure from appeal by way of summary application to the sheriff to one where appeal is made by application by way of stated case. It is the Society’s view that the new procedure is both cumbersome and time consuming. The Society is of the view that appeals against decisions of the Licensing Board should revert to summary application procedure. The Society understands that this view is supported by other stakeholders.

The Society is further concerned that that the Bill does not amend the 2005 act by the re-introduction of the site only application procedure under Section 26 (2) of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976. In terms of section 26 (2), an applicant could make an application to the board having obtained only planning permission. The difficulty now is that applicants require to incur the expense of an operating plan, a layout plan and all statutory consents before the Board can consider the application for premises licence. The current provisions discourages applicants from applying for a premises licence where one may well be granted without objection.
The Society’s Licensing Law Sub-Committee responded to the Scottish Government consultation entitled ‘Changing Scotland’s Relationship with Alcohol: a Discussion Paper on our Strategic Approach’. It would appear to the Society that the main aspects of that consultation paper may be carried forward in any separate Health Bill. The Society’s Licensing Law Sub-Committee stated at that time that it would welcome any initiative brought forward to improve the nation’s health and to encourage both the sensible retailing and consumption of alcohol. The Society’s Licensing Law Sub-Committee notes that Parts 8 and 9 seek to amend both the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 and the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 respectively and would wish to make specific comment upon its terms.

SPECIFIC COMMENTS

Section 121 – Conditions to which Licences under 1982 Act are to be subject

The Society notes that this Section inserts new Sections 3A, Mandatory Licence Conditions and 3B, Standard Licence Conditions into Section 3 of the 1982 Act. The Society notes that the existing ‘deemed grant’ provisions whereby a licence is deemed to have been granted where the licensing authority has failed to reach a final decision on a grant application before the expiry of the statutory period is to be retained. The Society notes that thereafter, Scottish Ministers may prescribe mandatory licence conditions by order and licensing authorities may determine conditions to which licence is granted by them are to be subject to ‘standard conditions’. The Society also notes that licensing authorities are required to publish such standard conditions proposed by them. The Society is of the view, therefore, that a transitional period will be required in order to allow licensing authorities the time to draft, consider, publish and determine standard conditions for all licence types.

Section 122 – Licensing: Powers of Entry and Inspection for Civilian Employees

The Society notes that the Bill seeks to extend the rights of entry and inspection under the 1982 Act to include civilian staff employed by the police under the provisions of Section 9 of the Police (Scotland) Act 1967. The Society would consider this to be a helpful measure with regard to police allocation of resources, but has no specific comment.

The Society notes that the Bill seeks to replace the mandatory licensing scheme for metal dealers with an optional scheme allowing it to the discretion of local authorities to determine whether or not licences are required in their areas. This requires a resolution of the licensing authority to be of effect. The Society would anticipate the retrospective de-licensing of metal dealers in areas where such a resolution is not made and accordingly a transitional period would be required for those areas wishing to retain the licensing of metal dealers.

Section 124 – Licensing of Taxis and Private Hire Cars

The Society notes that Section 124 (2) amends Section 13 of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 to require that anyone applying for a taxi or private hire car driver’s licence now has to have held a full driving licence for the period of 12 months immediately prior to the date of application, as opposed to having held it during any continuous period of 12 months prior to the date of his application (Section 13(3) of the 1982). The Society is unsure as regards the policy intent of this provision as it may unduly penalise applicants who have not held a full driving licence for the period of 12 months immediately prior to the date of application.

Section 13 (3) of the 1982 Act ensures that an individual has at least 12 months’ driving experience before being able to apply for a taxi or private hire car driver’s licence and was not enacted to “double penalise” an individual who had already been disqualified by the court from holding or obtaining a driving licence. By way of practical example, under the current provisions, a taxi driver disqualified for six months on 1st January 2009 under the “totting up” provisions would be in a position to make application on or after 1st July 2009. While it is clearly a matter for the licensing authority as to whether his taxi driver’s licence is granted, under the new provisions, he would have to wait until 1st July 2010 before he could make application. In effect, he cannot earn a living as a taxi driver for 18 months following upon being disqualified by the court from holding or obtaining a driving licence for only 6 months. Should this provision be taken forward, the Society believes that licensing authorities should have discretion to grant on cause shown by the applicant.

Section 124(3) amends Section 17 of the 1982 Act by changing the requirements relative to the review of taxi fares. The Society notes that the review at present is to be commenced within 18 months from the date when the previous fare tariff came into effect and that the outcome and new fares fixed can come into effect well after the 18 month period. The Society notes however that this new provision requires that the process be completed within the 18 month period and would highlight the practical issue of this 18 month period requiring to take into account the consultation process which can take a considerable period of time.

The Society further notes that Section 124(5) inserts a new Section 18A into the 1982 Act entitled Publication and Coming into Effect of Taxi Fares. The Society notes that in terms of the new Section 18(A)(3) the licensing authority must give notice of the scales by advertisement in a newspaper circulating in its area and specify in that advertisement the date on which the scales are to come into effect. The Society would consider requirement to publish a newspaper somewhat anomalous and expensive given the modern approach of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 which permits advertising via a website.

The Society notes that this section amends Section 40 of the 1982 Act by repealing the exemption from the requirement to hold a market operator’s licence for functions held by charitable, religious, youth, recreational, community, political or similar organisations. The Society further notes that an exemption is still in place for markets held only for the sale of livestock, fodder or grain.

It is unclear as to the policy intent of this particular provision as charitable and community organisations in future will require to consider the cost of obtaining a market operator’s licence and associated costs and that this may well prove to be prohibitive and consequently such organisations may consider it unviable to hold such functions. The Society questions whether this amendment is in the public interest.

The Society notes that in terms of the current provisions as contained in Section 41 of the 1982 Act, only those forms of entertainment for which a charge is made require a Public Entertainment Licence and this amendment would require the licensing of events by public entertainment for such events which are free to the public. The Society notes that this should allow licensing authorities to control large scale public entertainments which are free.

With reference to the comments at Section 125 above, the cost of applying and obtaining a licence would no doubt prove prohibitive for such community organisations which have previously held local events providing forms of entertainment for free. While the Society recognises that certain large scale free events may sensibly require to be licensed, it questions the need to license small scale free community based events.

The Society notes that this amends Section 42 of the 1982 Act by substituting the word ‘food’ for ‘meals or refreshment’. This means that premises providing meals and refreshments between 11pm and 5am which at present require to be licensed will now require to be licensed if they sell food.

It should be noted that the definition of food as defined in Section 1 of the Food Safety Act 1990 includes both drink and chewing gum. The Society is of the view that Section 42 of the 1982 Act was enacted in order to regulate the sale of meals or refreshments from take-away establishments located in the main in city centres and in residential areas with potential for disturbance. The Society would therefore question why late night grocers, 24-hour stores and motorway service stations etc should be brought within the scope of these provisions and questions whether the regulation and cost is proportionate to the perceived benefit.

The Society notes that a number of provisions of Schedule 1 to the 1982 Act are to be amended in terms of Section 128 of the Bill which include extending the time allowed for making representations or any application for the grant or renewal of a licence from 21 days to 28 days, increasing the period of notice which licensing authorities must give for attendance at the hearing from seven days to 14 days and allowing licensing authorities to consider licence renewal applications received after the expiry date as renewals rather than applications for a new licence for up to 28 days after the expiry of the previous licence.

With particular reference to Section 128(2)(e) which inserts paragraph 5A into Schedule 1 of the 1982 Act, the Society is concerned that a licensing authority may, for the purposes of sub-paragraph 5 of the 1982 Act (grant or renewal of a licence) deem an application for renewal of a licence made up to 28 days after the expiry of the licence to be an application made before the expiry. Whilst this provision appears to save an applicant from his or her own inadvertent failing to renew timeously, there are practical difficulties. The date of expiry of a licence is crucial both as regards to whether an offence has been committed and also, in taxi licensing terms, having regard to the power given to licensing authorities to limit the number of taxi licences for their area, whether one of the limited number of taxi licences is now available. The Society would further highlight that there is no test for ‘on good cause being shown’ nor does there require to be a hearing of such good cause.

Section 130 – Premises Licence Applications: Notification Requirements

The Society welcomes the amendment to Section 21 of the 2005 Act whereby Licensing Boards no longer require, when notifying the range of interested parties as required by the 2005 Act to include with that notification a copy of the application, except in respect of the Chief Constable who requires to be provided with a copy of the application. Whilst it is noted that the provision of a copy of the application to any other person to whom notice is given is discretionary, the Society would suggest that such person to whom notice of an application has been given can of course inspect the application at a local authority office during normal working hours.

The Society notes that this amendment to Section 23 of the 2005 Act would be that an application must now be granted if the applicant accepts a modification to either the operating plan or the layout plan (or both). From a practical point of view, an amended layout plan would require to be lodged in order to reflect the modification and proceedings would require to be continued to allow this to take place. It should be noted that such a modification may have a consequential effect upon capacity which requires to be included within the operating plan and also the amended plan might require local authority consent, from planning, building control and environmental health. It may also require listed building consent. The Society would highlight potential difficulties in Licensing Boards either proposing modifications to layout plans which had received the statutory consents which would then no longer be capable of obtaining such consent or, conversely, Licensing Board refusing applications accompanied by layout plans which had received the appropriate statutory consents. The Society would suggest that this proposal requires further clarification.

Section 132 – Premises Licence Applications: Anti-Social Behaviour Reports

The Society notes that Section 132 inserts a new section 2A into Section 22 of the 2005 Act by allowing the Chief Constable to make representations concerning a premises licence application by providing the Board with an anti-social behaviour report. The Society has no particular comment with regard to this provision as it is a matter for the appropriate Chief Constable to make such a representation. The Society also notes that the Board itself can request such a report from the appropriate Chief Constable in terms of the new Section 24A of the Act, and has no comment to make with regard to this provision.

Section 133 – Sale of Alcohol to Trade

The Society welcomes this provision which corrects an unintended consequence of the 2005 Act, and will now allow the trade to purchase alcohol from a premises holding a premises or occasional licence.

Section 134 – Occasional Licences

The Society welcomes this provision which will enable the fast tracking of some occasional licences where there is very limited notice of a need for such a licence, e.g. a funeral but would question why similar provision has not also been applied to extended hours applications.

Section 135 – Extended Hours Application: variation of conditions

The Society welcomes this provision. It notes that there does not appear to be a change to the position as set out in the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976 with regard to Licensing Boards having the flexibility to apply additional conditions to granting extended hours applications.
Section 136 – Personal Licences

The Society welcomes the provision to amend Section 74 to allow a Licensing Board to refuse to process or issue a personal licence if the applicant already holds a valid personal licence and the creation of a new offence to apply for a second personal licence under the 2005 Act if the applicant already holds a personal licence. The Society is, however, of the view that a personal licence application should not be required to be signed by the applicant and that the applicant’s properly instructed agent should also be in a position to sign the application on the applicant’s behalf. The Society believes that Licensing Boards should be obliged to participate in providing information to the National Database.

Section 137 – Emergency Closure Orders

The Society notes the policy intent of this provision and welcomes the amendment of the definition of a senior officer from being a Constable over above the rank of Superintendent to the rank of Inspector or above. Whilst this is more a matter for police priorities and resources, the Society would consider this to be a sensible proposal.

Section 139 and Schedule 4 - Further Modifications of the 2005 Act

The Society notes that further modifications are made to the 2005 Act including extending police powers to object and has no particular comments to make upon the terms of Schedule 4.
The Scottish Prison Service supports the measures contained in the Bill. In particular, it welcomes the potential longer term benefits of the package of community based measures, including the presumption against short sentences, and the proposals for tough alternatives to custody. These have the potential to reduce churn and allow resources to be focussed on achieving a workable sentence management regime for those offenders who are sent to prison.

SPS is committed to working with the Scottish Government to deliver and realise the benefits of the Offender Management Strategy. We are already actively contributing to the new programme of work in addition to strengthening our approach to offender management, continuing to work at improving joint working with CJAs, local authorities, statutory and other partners.

The SPS believes that excessive use of prison and overcrowded prisons reduce public protection rather than contributing to public safety. Prison can do good for some offenders, in particular those that present a serious risk of public harm. But prison itself can do harm; and the biggest harm is to people serving short sentences.

Imprisonment impacts on the life not only of an offender but of their family, the very act of imprisonment can reduce the positive factors which would contribute to reduce re-offending in the future. An offender is removed from employment, suffers disruption to the relationships and controls offered by family and community, and can lose access to their home. It is difficult to promote inclusion from an excluding process and use of short term imprisonment is likely to take the most deprived and make them even harder to reach in the future. Indeed the pressure of numbers created by short term churn makes effective rehabilitative work with longer term prisoners more difficult because time is spent managing the population, diluting the focus of resources on rehabilitation.

It is only right to take every opportunity to find effective disposals which stop or reduce offending and re-offending at the earliest stage, diverting minor of first offenders from the “conveyor belt” of the criminal justice system and tackling offending behaviour without the added negative impact that prison produces. Research suggests that early intervention and a care based model is more effective with young people than a justice based approach, that desistance is best supported in the community and that effective community based disposals have positive impact on public protection.

We are all committed to making Scotland a safer place this can be better achieved by breaking the cycle of re-offending at the earliest possible stage.
Diverting some of these offenders into meaningful community alternatives and leaving Prisons to those whom we know can benefit from the range of interventions we have to offer, would be a very positive step in making Scotland safer and stronger.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from John Muir, Damian’s Law Campaigner

The importance of Damian's Law was never specifically the absolute introduction of mandatory sentencing, but more importantly an attempt to shake the government, the judiciary, the police and the public out of their complacency and the sanitised academic approach to the serious violent crime which is largely responsible for the situation Scotland the indeed the UK are facing.

We have perhaps become so used to violent crime over such a long period of time that our resolve and horror is not truly reflected in the punishment and sentencing or the lack of and regardless of political gesturing. Is it any wonder that the criminal fraternity are laughing at our miserable efforts to enforce current laws. Have we really become that sanitised to violence.

We have a clear and present danger on our streets. Violent recidivist criminals are all too often in and out of prisons on a relatively short term revolving door basis. This has to stop! So what are you, the politicians, going to do about them? That is why I went to Parliament with our petition and in doing so my composure was ruffled at the way the debate lost sight of the essential fact that we are having people murdered and mutilated by knife crime. My annoyance is clearly representative of the public anger.

Because an individual holds a public office or rank it should not be assumed that they know best. It seems to me that some in this debate think this precisely. The politicians and authorities must have the support of the collective public and if you fail to deal with the current problems while whistling the praise of untested solutions the entire venture will fail – not least from lack of confidence from the electorate and the general public.

Self accountability must be reintroduced. Why is it when all of us in decent society make a mistake we have to explain ourselves – but commit a crime they can elect to say nothing. This is utter nonsense and that can be described as a true criminal charter. The foundation stones and corner stone of Scottish Law where violent crime is concerned have crumbled and as a consequence the building which has been built upon it has devalued. The time to act is now or step aside.

As I clearly stated blame is not the game but in order to understand the way forward we must understand where we are – and where we have come over the last few decades where violent crime is concerned. There are many truths within every argument and as the petition clearly demonstrated all points of view must be considered but not at the expense of common sense. However to be perfectly frank much of the debate was taken by the morally righteous who have completely missed the point and where the debate was hijacked by the long term social do-gooders. There was a complete failure to address the here and now. We have to sort out the here and now before we can have any mandate to address the future. It is earnestly requested that the sentencing policy be stricter and more severe, and the community service is more strictly supervised, and also invoke and demand that high visibility clothing should be provided and worn. The other legal suggestions which we have discussed should also be implemented forthwith.

ADSW supported the principles underpinning all of the above Reports, as well as, highlighting the potential implications of implementation.

ADSW supports the criminal law, court procedures and licensing implications outlined in the Bill, whilst recognising the demands and resource impact on Local Authority and other Services providers.

The Bill is structured into 9 Parts; ADSW will focus comment on those sections relevant to LA social work services.

S 3 - 13 - Scottish Sentencing Council

ADSW supports the principle of a judicially led Scottish Sentencing Council (SSC). To improve public confidence in the Criminal Justice System it will be imperative that the SSC has the authority to address inconsistent application of the guidance thereby ensuring a more consistent and transparent approach in the disposal of justice.

S14 - Community Payback Order (CPO)

The CPO will provide a single sentence to replace the existing range of community sentences - Probation, Community Service and Supervised Attendance Orders.

The new order will enable the courts to impose one or more of seven requirements including unpaid work with activities, and supervision alongside a range of treatment or specific interventions. In addition, the court will be able to impose a compensation order.

The intention is that once a CPO is made the Order will begin immediately. The unpaid work and other activity requirements will commence within 7 days and be completed within 6 months. Local Authorities will be required to consult with communities on an annual basis to determine the nature and type of unpaid work that will be undertaken and of benefit to the community.
ADSW recognises it is important for the court and public to have confidence in the range of community sentences. The Association is working with Local Authorities and Scottish Government to improve current arrangements.

ADSW supports the introduction of progress courts, but considers the resource should be targeted rather than universally applied to all offenders.

The Association supports the use of the supervision requirement for those under 18 years sentenced by adult criminal courts for offences that justify the imposition of a CPO. ADSW considers it essential that the interventions reflect the age and maturity of such offenders along with the risk of reoffending.

ADSW supports the use of a CPO as an alternative to expensive and ineffective short sentences of imprisonment. The profiles of offenders who receive such sentences are well recorded. It must be acknowledged however that this will place increased demands on a range of specialist and mainstream services including LA social work, housing and education services; Health; Jobcentre Plus and others. In order to ensure Services have sufficient capacity to take on this additional work, a review of existing structures and resources will be required as well as the provision of additional resources. The intended reduction in the prison population will be a gradual process, therefore a transfer of resources from SPS to community services is not realistic in the foreseeable future.

ADSW unreservedly supports the presumption against short periods of imprisonment or detention. Currently LACJSWS supervise post sentence statutory licenses for all offenders sentenced to imprisonment of 4 years or more and other specific shorter sentences, e.g. Supervised Release Orders, Extended Sentences and Short Term Sex Offender Licenses.

‘Scotland’s Choice’ Report proposed that statutory supervision on License be imposed on sentences of 2 years or more. This Bill proposes the introduction of short custody and community licenses for those sentenced to 12 months or less and custody and community licenses for those sentenced to more than 12 months. The implications of introducing the new custody and community licences and extending formal supervision to all prisoners sentenced to more than 12 months will have massive implications for LACJSWS. It is also anticipated that breach of such licences would be considerable thereby placing additional demands on the resources of the police, courts, SPS and the Parole Board.

ADSW supports the revision to Extended Sentences for sexual offenders and offences aggravated by racial or religious prejudice.

Implications of Part 1 for the LA

Criminal Justice Social Work Statistics produced by Scottish Government have shown an annual increase in the use of community sentences. The latest figures 2007-08 show both Community Service and Probation Orders increased by 4.5% and 4% respectively. 9255 Community Service and Probation Orders with unpaid work conditions amounting to 1,331,365 hours were imposed whilst during the same period the successful completions of Orders increased.

A recent audit of community service highlighted variations in the commencement and completion of orders. LACJSWS confirm significant increases in the number of orders, offenders in employment or training restricting availability for unpaid work and staffing issues including medical absences, vacancies and recruitment difficulties. The consequences of ‘Single Status’ for several areas cannot be underestimated.

The additional £2m made available to meet increased Community Service numbers and expectations is welcomed. The anticipated increase in numbers is uncertain. To ensure LA’s have the infrastructure to support increased capacity to deliver appropriate services, ADSW will support a resource scoping exercise to ascertain accurate unit costs for Community Service and other community sentences, where expectations and interventions may have exceeded allocated resources, (Sexual Offenders / MAPPA, accredited programme interventions and risk assessment processes).

Potentially the resources needed to support ‘progress courts’ are considerable. Effective targeting of this provision will be critical to ensure best use of staff and court time.

Similarly where a court considers a CPO appropriate for an offender under the age of 18 years, the supervision requirement will become mandatory. This age group often have difficulty engaging with services and non compliance can be higher. Sufficient and age appropriate resources alongside access to universal services will be critical, to break the ‘cycle of offending’ that results in a disproportionate numbers of young people being remanded or sentenced to imprisonment. This will have implications for LA social work services including Children’s Services and Criminal Justice.

The financial implications of implementing revisions to the Custodial Sentence and Weapons Act (S18) are significant and will require a considerable increase in staff resources. Should the Bill confirm the introduction of post release statutory supervision on all sentences of 12 months or more ADSW would urge a gradual introduction, initially targeted at offenders assessed as presenting a high risk of harm and those sentenced to imprisonment in excess of 2 years.

Part 2 Criminal Law

ADSW supports the proposals outlined in the Serious and Organised Crime sections, (25 - 28) whilst recognising that the statutory supervision of such offenders on licence may place further demands on LACJSWS.

Amendments proposed in Sections 33 - 34 the Protection of Children and Prevention of Sexual Offences (Scotland) Act 2005 are supported. Such amendments could result in more offenders being placed under the statutory supervision of LACJSWS whilst S33 - 34 could result in further demands on the MAPPA process and have implications for the LA, police and SPS Amendments in S35 are supported.

Implications of Part 2 for the LA

The amendments proposed may increase the demands on LA services especially those of Social Work.

Part 3

ADSW welcomes and fully supports the increase in the age of criminal responsibility to 12 years of age.

S59 Retention of forensic samples from children charged with serious violent and sexual offences is supported in principle with the caveat that the criteria are specific and restricted to serious sexual or violent offences only.

Part 4

Implications of Part 1 for the LA

S 63 Spouse or civil partners as compellable witnesses is supported especially in cases involved child abuse or violence.

ADSW endorses the amendments in S64 - 67 intended to reduce the trauma or distress of giving evidence to witness especially child witnesses.

Part 5

ADSW supports the amendments made in S72 - 75 and is mindful that those referring to sexual offenders (S73 - 75) may place further demands on LA within MAPPA arrangements.

S84 Compensation Orders can be an addition requirement of a CPO. This will place additional responsibilities on the LACJSWS to encourage payment of the compensation or instigate enforcement and breach proceeding such the compensation not be paid.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Lord Coulsfield

1. In order to overcome the problems which have arisen over the disclosure of prosecution material to the accused, it is necessary to ensure that investigators and prosecutors at all levels understand and accept the duty which lies upon them. It is, therefore, in my view, important to state the fundamental duty of the prosecution clearly and in a simple and memorable form at the start of the relevant part of the statute.¹ The provisions of the Bill are much too elaborate and diffuse and tend to confuse rather than clarify the statement of the fundamental duty. The first provision of the part of the bill dealing with disclosure should simply say:-

“The prosecutor must disclose to the accused all material evidence or information of which he is aware which would tend to exculpate the accused, whether by weakening the Crown case or by providing a defence for the accused.

This duty applies both to material of which the prosecutor is aware before or at the commencement of criminal proceedings and to any material of which he becomes aware at any subsequent stage of proceedings.

If there is no such material, the prosecutor must so inform the accused.”

That simple formulation would cover everything at present contained in sections 85, 89 and 90 of the Bill. I prefer the above wording to that of the English legislation because it emphasises that the onus to disclose exculpatory material is on the prosecution, so that if there is such material it must be disclosed whether or not the accused has put forward any particular line of defence. The reference in the CPIA may suggest that there is some limitation on the duty of the prosecution by reference to the line of defence which the accused has actually adopted. Emphasising the positive duty on the prosecution to identify exculpatory material, whether or not the accused has

“The prosecutor must –
(a) disclose to the accused any prosecution material which has not previously been disclosed to the accused and which might reasonably be considered capable of undermining the case for the prosecution against the accused or of assisting the case for the accused, or
(b) give to the accused a written statement that there is no material of a description mentioned in paragraph (a)"

“Prosecution material” is defined as material which has come into the possession of the prosecutor which has been inspected by him.
any idea of it, is also likely to be valuable in conveying to the police the extent of the duty which is incumbent on them.

2. I recommended that in disclosing relevant information police and prosecutors in Scotland should adopt the practice, similar to the existing English practice, of listing the material in various categories set out in schedules. The Bill makes the provision of schedules, both by the police to the prosecutor and by the prosecutor to the accused, a statutory requirement. That was not my intention and it is, I think, a serious error. The use of schedules is only a method of carrying out the duty of disclosure. It is an inconvenient and cumbersome method. One should not exclude the possibility that, with experience, better methods may be devised. If any prescription is required, it should be done by a code of practice or by regulation: it is easy to amend a code of practice but much harder to amend a statute. There may even be cases in which it is inconvenient or harmful to use schedules even where adequate disclosure could be made in a different form. In England, the statute does not include any requirement for schedules.

3. In any event, there is no need for statutory regulation of the arrangements between the police and the Procurator Fiscal: they are supposed to be working together. The purpose of any schedules prepared by the police is to tell the PF what material the police have. The police are to be encouraged to put everything into those schedules which could possibly be thought disclosable, and the PF/Crown will then have to decide what should actually be disclosed. There should be no question of sending a schedule back to the police to be adjusted, as is envisaged in section 5 (4).

4. I understand that a policy decision may have been taken to include provision for defence statements in the legislation, but I would nevertheless observe that, for the reasons set out in my report, I think that requiring a defence statement in every case is not necessary and is liable to cause expense and delay. The position in Scotland is different from that in England in that there is already a requirement to lodge a special defence in certain cases. There was no similar requirement in English procedure and the requirement for a defence statement may do something to limit the use of “ambush” defences there. Even so, there is little enthusiasm for defence statements. There is something to be said for providing for an option to lodge a defence statement where the defence are proposing to ask for some particular disclosure where the reasons for asking for the information would not appear from the material available to the prosecutor, although in practice in Scotland the defence would proceed by a specification of documents and would have to give reasons for their request in the course of that procedure.

5. The provisions dealing with the withholding of information are also very much too complicated. The English legislation allows for information to be withheld on public interest immunity grounds where it is “not in the public interest.” Is it necessary to have more elaborate provisions in section 102 (2) and other similar contexts? Section 102 and following also appear to me to be much too elaborate and complicated. Section 3 (6) of CPIA 1996 merely provides that material is not to be disclosed “to the extent that the court on the application of the prosecutor concludes that it is not in the public interest to disclose it and orders accordingly." If detailed provision for the procedure in relation to applications and orders is necessary, it should be in an Act of Adjournal.
I thought it would be helpful, ahead of the Lord Advocate’s appearance before the Justice Committee on 9 June, to provide some general information about the involvement of the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service in the development of this important Bill and the provisions which will have a particular impact on the work of COPFS.

As part of the Scottish Government, COPFS has been fully involved in the development of the provisions in the Bill and, as is normally the case with Government Bills, would not normally provide separate written evidence to Parliamentary Committees in the way that stakeholders beyond Government are usually invited to do.

The Lord Advocate, however, regards this Bill as one of the most important pieces of criminal justice legislation to come before the Scottish Parliament. For that reason, she has asked COPFS officials to provide as much assistance and information as possible to the Justice Committee as part of its consideration of the Bill. In addition, if the Justice Committee agrees, the Lord Advocate thought it would be helpful if I were to accompany her on 9 June to answer any questions which the Justice Committee might have about the impact of the Bill on the work of COPFS.

In that connection, there are a number of different parts of the Bill which COPFS regards as particularly important to its work.

Part 6 of the Bill relates to the disclosure of evidence in criminal proceedings and enacts almost all of the recommendations of Lord Coulsfield’s Review of the Law and Practice of Disclosure in Criminal Proceedings in Scotland from 2007. The Lord Advocate strongly supported the setting up of Lord Coulsfield’s review and welcomed Lord Coulsfield’s conclusions as a basis for bringing greater certainty and transparency to the operation of disclosure in Scotland. COPFS also seconded an experienced prosecutor to Lord Coulsfield’s review team.

The Justice Committee will be aware that Lord Coulsfield’s Review was initiated in response to a sudden and significant change in disclosure practice in 2005 brought about by decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in two Scottish criminal appeals, Holland v HMA [2005] SC(PC) 3 and Sinclair v HMA [2005] SC(PC) 28. Subsequent decisions of the High Court of Justiciary and the Judicial Committee contributed to the development of the law in this area after 2005 but Part 6 of the Bill offers, for the first time, a clear procedural and legal framework for disclosure within which the police, the Crown and the accused can operate with certainty.
The statutory provisions in the Bill will be supplemented by a Code of Practice which the Lord Advocate will issue in terms of section 114 in her capacity as head of the system of prosecution and investigation of deaths in Scotland. As such, in terms of the Lord Advocate’s independence in carrying out these roles, the Code of Practice will not be subject to the approval of any other individual or organisation, including Scottish Ministers or the Scottish Parliament, although it will be prepared in consultation with the police and other reporting agencies and will be made public in terms of section 114(4).

The purpose of the Code of Practice is to set out publicly the procedures to be adopted by investigators and prosecutors which might be thought to be less appropriate for primary legislation such as the conduct of lines of enquiry during an investigation, the detailed responsibilities of key roles in the investigation and prosecution and the consequences for completion of reports and witness statements. It will apply to all agencies which report deaths and offences to Procurators Fiscal, including the police, as well as all prosecutors in Scotland. Work has started in preparing a draft Code of Practice and, although this will not be complete by 9 June, the Lord Advocate is happy to confirm that a copy of the first draft can be provided to the Committee as soon as it is available to help the Committee’s consideration of this important area of law and practice.

There are also a number of parts of the Bill where the Scottish Government is taking the opportunity to update Scots criminal law as a result of experience in Scotland or elsewhere. Important among them is the new Witness Anonymity Order in section 66 which, following a recent decision of the House of Lords in an English criminal appeal, will give greater certainty to vulnerable witnesses or undercover law enforcement or intelligence officers whose safety would be compromised by the disclosure of their identity. Protective measures such as those referred to in section 66(4) of the Bill have been used before in Scotland and while there have been no judicial decisions in Scotland against their use following the House of Lords decision, the current position is that no guarantee can be given to witnesses that there are steps which can be taken to protect their identity. This new provision will allow that guarantee to be given, with an explanation that it is for the court to decide on the appropriate measures, which will provide a welcome degree of reassurance for witnesses who fear for their safety, particularly vulnerable members of the public giving evidence against those in their local community. While it is difficult to give a precise estimate of the number of cases in which they would be used, COPFS envisage these orders being sought, as they have been in the past, in serious cases.

Similarly, sections 54 to 57 introduce new provisions on submissions of sufficiency of evidence in solemn cases and new powers of appeal by the Crown against judicial rulings in that regard. These provisions follow a report of the Scottish Law Commission in July 2008 on a reference under section 3(1)(e) of the Law Commissions Act 1965 by Scottish Ministers. The provision in relation to expedited appeals will be helpful in ensuring that such issues can be dealt with promptly and with minimum inconvenience to jurors, witnesses and court officials in any case where an appropriate judicial ruling is appealed in this way.

There are also a number of provisions in Part 2 of the Bill which introduce new criminal offences in response to new or changing criminal behaviour. COPFS has been fully involved in the development of the new offences and has been able to contribute recent prosecution experience to consideration of new offences, including those relating to serious and organised crime and sexual offences.

In relation to serious and organised crime, the new offences are regarded as additional tools for investigators and prosecutors to tackle more effectively the networks which are now understood to direct and support serious and organised crime. They are designed to allow easier and more effective interruption of activities which are carried out to direct or in support of wider criminal activity.

As for sexual offences, in particular the new offence of extreme pornography, COPFS recognises the compelling reasons for the introduction of the new offences. The availability and circulation of such images, it can be argued, normalises extreme and violent sexual acts including sexual crime and life threatening activities. The policy intention behind the provisions is to help to ensure that the public are protected from exposure to extreme pornography that depicts horrific images of violence. Although the offence is broad in its terms and allows for a wide latitude of discretion in determining what amounts to a prohibited image, careful consideration will be given, if it is enacted, to the development of clear guidance for police and prosecutors to ensure that it is enforced consistently and fairly.

Written submission from Audit Scotland

The Policy Memorandum and Explanatory Notes provide some information on the purpose and operation of this section. However we thought that the Committee may be interested to understand a little more about the National Fraud Initiative and how it is operated.

Data matching exercises have been carried out by The Audit Commission in England for some years using auditors’ powers to obtain information from audited bodies and others for the purposes of their audit. Audit Scotland taken part in the last three of these biennial exercises and publishes summary reports on the results of the work. The latest report, on the 2006/07 exercise, is available at http://www.audit-scotland.gov.uk/work/nfi.php. Hard copies are also enclosed for your convenience. The Public Audit Committee of the Scottish Parliament took evidence from Audit Scotland on the last NFI report and indicated its support for legislation in this area.

These exercises have identified outcomes valued at £37 million in Scotland and led to bodies aiming to recover significant sums, where practicable. At least 75 prosecutions have been achieved to date. Examples of the types of fraud and error detected by the exercise are:

- Public pensions continuing to be claimed after the pensioner has died
- Housing benefit claimed by public sector staff or pensioners without declaring their income
- Housing benefit claimed by ineligible students
- Individuals receiving student awards who are not entitled to be in the UK (with attendant potential implications for public safety in certain cases)
- Care homes claiming payments after the resident has died

The exercises have been carried out using a Code of Data Matching Practice which sets out the protocols for the ways in which data subjects are informed that their data will be used, for how that data is handled and stored and when the data will be destroyed. The Code is reviewed by the UK Information Commissioner before it is issued. Along with the other UK audit agencies, Audit Scotland meets regularly with the Information Commissioner’s office to ensure that data protection issues, including proportionality, are properly considered. For example, data matches are not derived from random matching of the information collected. Information is only compared between specific datasets where previous pilot exercises have yielded good results.

All data is submitted for matching over secure electronic links and matches are available to audited bodies to view on a secure website with strong access controls. Data is not sent by hard copy or on disks. The Code of Data Matching Practice and Fair Processing Notices are also published on our website.
The Serious Crime Act 2007 contains provisions that placed the NFI on a statutory footing in England, Wales and Northern Ireland. It also clarified some issues such as the power for data to be matched across borders.

Without similar explicit powers in Scotland Audit Scotland would have to continue to rely on its existing powers to obtain the relevant information. These powers are not consistent across the different parts of the public sector and do not allow for cross border matching. For example if a resident of a local authority area bordering England claims housing benefit in Scotland but fails to declare income earned from a public body in England this will not be detected by the current exercises as there is no power to use or share data in this way. With the proposed powers such cases would be detected and the relevant national audit agencies would be able to share the appropriate matches.

In the absence of similar clear legislation in Scotland it will undoubtedly be the case that fraud and error will be less likely to be detected in the public sector in Scotland than elsewhere in the United Kingdom and cross border cases will not be detected at all. The fact that the exercise takes place also acts as a deterrent and so the impact of the work is potentially far greater than the amounts identified by it. This work will continue to develop elsewhere in the UK and, in our view, it is essential that Scotland does not fall further behind in the powers available to conduct such exercises.

We recognise that there is a balance to be struck between the rights of the individual and the powers of public bodies to obtain and use data but we do not believe that it is appropriate for public sector employees and pensioners to be able to make invalid claims for scarce resources without their employers being able to access modern methods to detect such cases. We also recognise that the vast majority of public servants are entirely honest and we therefore take great care to ensure the security of the information at all times. In addition, it is made clear that a match arising on any of the reports is only an indicator that further enquiries are required to identify the reason for it, which may be entirely innocent. The Committee may wish to be aware that all of Audit Scotland’s own staff are included in the exercise.

Whilst it would be possible to construct legislation allowing each individual body to conduct such exercises Audit Scotland believes that the approach of using the national audit agencies to conduct the exercises working together, with similar Codes of Practice and using one party to carry out the matches, is the most efficient, effective and secure way to minimise fraud and error in this area.

Written submission from the City of Edinburgh Licensing Board

I refer to your letter of 2 April addressed to Chief Executives of local authorities and would confirm that the Licensing Board of the City of Edinburgh discussed the sections of the above Bill looking to improve the operation of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 at a recent meeting.

The Board have instructed me to make the following submissions:

1. Section 130 – Premises licence applications: notification requirements

   The Board agreed with the proposal to reduce the requirement to notify interested parties with copy applications but suggests that it would be appropriate to retain a requirement to notify Licensing Standards Officers with a copy of the application. It is the Board’s intention that the copy application will be available on its website at a future date and in the meantime, the copy application will be available for examination at the Board’s offices. The letter notifying applicants should contain a statement giving a broad outline of the terms of the application, e.g. variation of licence to add function suite, as a means of providing some basic information.

2. Section 131 – Premises licence applications: modification of layout plans

   The Board welcomed this amendment which gives effect to the practical reality that where the Board and applicant accept that the plan requires to be modified, the Board is allowing applicants to submit a modified layout plan.

3. Section 132 – Premises licence applications: antisocial behaviour reports

   This was extensively discussed by the Board who had the benefit of the views of the local Police Inspector. The Board is conscious that in its work it receives extensive support from Lothian and Borders Police and that information concerning premises is made available as a matter of course. Whilst the Board is satisfied that it retains the power to request a report, it was concerned to emphasise that reports must be relevant to the premises under examination and that this requires a subjective judgement on the part of the Police making a representation or objection in relation to a licence application. Such a report is felt to be more valuable than the type of antisocial behaviour report specified in the Act. The amendment proposed to the Act has been driven by financial and resource considerations and this Board would emphasis the need for consideration of the type of report that would be of most value.
4. Section 133 – Sale of alcohol to trade

   The Board had no comment to offer on this proposal.

5. Section 134 – Occasional licences

   The Board accepted the need for this amendment but questioned whether extended hours applications might require similar provision.

6. Section 135 – Extended hours applications: variation of conditions

   This amendment was welcomed by the Board.

7. Section 136 - Personal licences

   These provisions were welcomed by the Board.

8. Section 137 – Emergency closure orders

   The Board had no comment to offer.

9. Section 138 – False statements in applications: offence

   This provision was welcomed by the Board.

10. Schedule 4 – Further modifications of 2005 Act

    This provision was welcomed by the Board.

The Board has become aware that the Government may also seek to amend the current appeal arrangements in the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005. It would suggest to the Committee that the current arrangements are cumbersome and that thought should be given to reverting to the arrangements for summary appeals under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976. In doing so however there should be no question of losing the ability to suspend licences with immediate effect.

The Board has considered your policy for handling information received in response to calls for evidence and does not require the evidence submitted to be treated as confidential or to be published anonymously.

Dear Convener

As you are aware, there has been discussion recently about the level of Parliamentary scrutiny proposed for the Government’s alcohol reforms and both Robert Brown MSP and yourself, on behalf of the Justice Committee, wrote letters to the Cabinet Secretary for Justice on the issue. This discussion has focussed in particular, on the Government’s proposals for minimum pricing of alcohol.

Scotland’s alcohol misuse problem is estimated to cost our country at least £2.25billion per year in extra services and lost productivity and professionals are agreed that the threat posed to our national health from current levels of consumption is very great. Alcohol-related hospital admissions and deaths have increased markedly in recent years and this Government has already set out our framework for addressing the root causes behind these statistics.

Having taken account of the representations made the Government now proposes to introduce a new health bill that deals with a range of alcohol measures, including minimum price per unit of alcohol, alcohol promotions, limiting the use of marketing material, wine glass sizes, sale of alcohol to persons under 21 and the social responsibility levy.

A new bill to take forward these provisions collectively will give this issue the prominence required and the Government welcomes the fact that the proposals in the Bill will be subject to full Parliamentary scrutiny.

I am copying this letter to Christine Grahame, Convener of the Health Committee, business managers and opposition Justice and Health spokespersons.

[Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1]

The Convener (Bill Aitken): Good morning, ladies and gentlemen. I begin the meeting with my usual admonition for mobile phones to be switched off. We have received no apologies; we have a full turnout.

Item 1 is consideration of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. Members should have with them written submissions from the judges of the High Court of Justiciary and briefing papers from the Scottish Parliament information centre. I welcome to the meeting Lord Hamilton, Lord President of the Court of Session and — perhaps more appropriate, given the focus of our questions this morning — the Lord Justice General; Lord Gill, the Lord Justice Clerk; and Carolyn Breeds, the deputy legal secretary to the Lord President.

Lord President, I am aware of your commitments at the appeal court this morning. We will attempt to get through our business as expeditiously as possible, so we will move straight to questions.

In your written submission, you state that the current "range of mechanisms … for exploring and developing sentencing issues … could … be improved".

Will you give us a brief overview of those mechanisms and suggest how they could be made better?

Right Hon Lord Hamilton (Lord President and Lord Justice General): I am not sure whether I am wired up or not.

The Convener: You are completely wired for sound.

Lord Hamilton: That is splendid.

As we indicate in our paper, there are a number of existing mechanisms for seeking to secure consistency of sentencing. They include the general framework of decisions by judges—particularly judges of the High Court sitting on matters of appeal—and the facility that the High Court has to issue guideline judgments, which it did to only a limited extent initially but in relation to which a measure of momentum is now building up.

There are other mechanisms. The Lord Advocate is currently making use of Crown appeals in two murder cases to seek general guidance from the court in relation to the range of punishments for those who are sentenced to life imprisonment for murder. A system has also been in place for some time in which Lord McFadyen and now Lord Carloway have sought to identify cases that are coming to appeal that might be suitable for guideline judgments. We are therefore being alerted to that.

There is a prospect of improving on and extending that system. I have suggested to Lord Carloway—he is now considering it—that a reference body should be set up. It could include members of the profession, other judicial office-holders such as sheriffs or justices and, conceivably, persons from the outside community. Those people would make their particular contributions to that exercise and identify particular areas in which it might be useful if we issued guideline judgments on matters on which we have not done so already. That is the sort of line that I envisage.

The Convener: I note with interest that Lord Carloway is now carrying out that exercise. What criteria is he applying in identifying appropriate cases?

Lord Hamilton: I am not sure that I have identified any specific criteria. The exercise covers cases in which there would appear to be a generality of concern: cases in which general matters arise rather than matters that are simply special to the particular circumstances of a case.

The Convener: It appears—and your paper mentions—that there is a view that there is scant evidence of inconsistency in sentencing, although the public perception is perhaps that such inconsistency exists. Have you any views on what action could be taken to overcome that perception?

Lord Hamilton: As we say in our paper and as has been recognised, there is no empirical evidence to suggest that there is inconsistency in sentencing. Of course, one needs to understand what consistency of sentencing is in the first place. I have no difficulty with people understanding that broadly similar circumstances of offence and offender should in general attract a broadly similar sentence. That appears to me to be an appropriate part of a well-ordered criminal justice system.

I am not aware of, and no one has brought to my attention, any empirical evidence to suggest that there is inconsistency of sentencing in Scotland. I am concerned that the bill may involve the expenditure of a substantial amount of funds on a particular exercise without the truth of the premise... that there is an inconsistency in sentencing being examined.

On more than one occasion I have made an offer to the Cabinet Secretary for Justice to open the doors of the justiciary office so that the records can be examined of cases in which either the prosecutor or the convicted person has appealed against the sentence—whether or not leave to appeal has been granted; what has happened if leave has been granted and the matter has been dealt with in the appeal court; and, lastly, what the appeal court has done in those particular circumstances. An empirical exercise could be carried out to identify whether there is any true inconsistency of sentences across the board.

If that was done—and I make the offer to the Parliament now—one could discover whether there is in fact an inconsistency of sentences. If there were no inconsistency, the appropriate exercise would be to dispel the false impression that there is an inconsistency; if there were an inconsistency, the appropriate exercise would be to address that matter and determine the best way to cure it. That offer is open.

The Convener: We will take that into consideration.

Another concern that you express in your paper is that the sentencing council would undermine the independence of the judiciary. Clearly, it would be inappropriate for politicians to interfere in individual cases, but why might it be considered unconstitutional for a Parliament to establish an independent body to produce general sentencing guidelines? That has been done in other jurisdictions.

Lord Hamilton: One has to recognise the radical difference between the proposals now made and the proposals that were made by the Sentencing Commission for Scotland, chaired by Lord Macfadyen. The commission recognised the importance of the High Court of Justiciary, as the senior criminal court in Scotland, being the ultimate body responsible for laying down sentencing guidelines. It saw the advantage in there being an advisory body with a research facility for undertaking exercises and putting matters before the appeal court for endorsement or otherwise. However, I think a situation in which an outside body that is not itself elected and which comprises, as the present proposals indicate, a majority of non-judicial office-holders impinges on the independence of the judiciary, if that body is to lay down what are, in effect, prescriptive guidelines.

I understand that, in England and Wales, a majority of judicial office-holders sit on the Sentencing Guidelines Council. In our jurisdiction, it has been recognised—most recently in the 'Judiciary and Courts (Scotland) Act 2008—that the judiciary is itself an arm of Government and has important functions to fulfil. That would properly be recognised by a scheme in which, ultimately, the laying down of the guidelines were reserved to the highest criminal court in this country, which is what has happened traditionally.

The Convener: Lord Gill, would you like to introduce anything into our discussions at this stage?

Right Hon Lord Gill (Lord Justice Clerk): I am slightly troubled by the term “inconsistency”. Forgive me for going back to a slightly earlier point, but it relates to the point that has just been raised with the Lord Justice General.

If the legislation sets out to achieve what is described as consistency, it seems essential that it should define what it means by consistency and inconsistency. The consultation paper started off by talking about inconsistency and then spoke about a perception of inconsistency, which is rather a different thing. It is not quite clear yet what the legislation seeks to achieve. There is no definition of consistency in the draft, and it seems to me that those who would form a sentencing council would find some difficulty in knowing exactly what they were trying to do unless the legislation gave them a clear definition by which to judge their own views and decisions.

That raises in a clear way the constitutional issue that underlies this legislation. It is part of the constitution that it is for the appeal court to determine sentencing, except to the extent that legislation lays down what the sentence should be. To read the bill, one might think that it involved merely the creation of some quango but, in fact, there is a huge constitutional question underlying the bill. That is what troubles me.

Nigel Don (North East Scotland) (SNP): I am grateful to Lord Gill for reaching that point, which is where I wished to come in. Your submission states at paragraph 8:

Although penalties such as prison, fines, admonition and discharge—and indeed execution and transportation—predate any Parliament, is it not fair to say that anything to do with probation, community orders, drug treatment and testing orders and so on is a creature of Parliament? Therefore, is it fair to say that the development of sentencing policy has been parliamentary, rather than judicial, over recent history at least?
Lord Hamilton: There is no doubt that statute—acts of Parliament—has brought into range for the sentencer a number of sentencing options as to what, in the modern community, are thought to be appropriate disposals. However, the question whether the sentencer has the option of prison or a community service order or the like is different from the matter of what his actual decision making is, or what the range of his decision making is. The range of decision making is one question that has been truly germane to the exercise of authority by the courts hitherto.

Nigel Don: My point is about the constitutional issue, which is at the nub of the question. I understand entirely the sentiments that you have recorded. Parliament has decided that capital punishment is no longer appropriate, and it has moved the boundaries. I am not suggesting that anybody should do this, but surely it is open for Parliament to say that nobody will ever be put in prison again. That is absolute nonsense, but we could theoretically do that. That is surely a matter of policy and, if we were to do that, that would be sentencing development—undevelopment, we might say for that example. Surely it is for us to do that, rather than yourselves, and if we were to do that, you would be stuck with it. I apologise for using an extreme example, which you will obviously see straight past, but I am trying to distinguish between policy development, which I think is for us, for better or for worse, and individual sentencing, which is clearly and unambiguously for yourselves.

Lord Hamilton: There may be a question of propriety as to in which arm of government particular functions properly lie. We are not being asked, under the bill, to contemplate Parliament itself dealing with guidelines. It is not that Parliament will make the guidelines; Parliament is going to strip the High Court of Justiciary of powers that it otherwise had and pass on to a non-elected non-judicial body the function that the High Court has exercised hitherto. That is where I see a particular difficulty.

Nigel Don: So if we—in this committee, let us say for practical purposes—were to retain the development of policy and the processes of the proposed Scottish sentencing council, you would be happy as it would then be a matter of Parliament developing policy.

Lord Hamilton: The question is whether you could do that practically in any meaningful way—and I would still have an issue with the propriety of that course. There is a debate here: although it is technically within the powers of the Parliament to say that there shall no longer be imprisonment, there is a question as to whether it would be proper for it to do so. Likewise, there is a question as to whether it would be proper for it to remove from the High Court the powers that it has exercised hitherto.

Angela Constance (Livingston) (SNP): I wish to pick up on the panel’s point that there has been no empirical evidence for inconsistency in sentencing. The panel is aware of the 2006 report by the Sentencing Commission for Scotland, which I believe was chaired by a High Court judge and whose membership included other judges and sheriffs. The report stated:

Lord Hamilton: I think that the commission made it clear that, in so far as there was any evidence, it was anecdotal rather than from a study into the particular matter. It took the view that, given the time constraints that it had to deal with, it would take too long for such an exercise to be carried out. I am not sure that I accept that that would take long; it appears that if the right materials were made available the exercise could be quite short. The commission recognised that there was no study that supported the proposition that there was an inconsistency in sentencing.

Angela Constance: The report stated that there was some evidence. Is it not the case that one proposal is for the sentencing council to undertake some more in-depth research?

Lord Hamilton: I suppose that, to some extent, the in-depth research would be about whether there is inconsistency in sentencing. However, in a sense, that puts the cart before the horse, because we should want to know that there is truly an inconsistency in sentencing before undertaking the very expensive exercise of setting up a body of the kind envisaged in the bill, with operating funds that have been identified of more than £1 million a year.

Angela Constance: I would accept that if that were the only case for establishing a sentencing council, but, as I am sure that other members will explore, it is also about society having an input into the core values of our criminal justice system.

Lord Hamilton: I have no problem with society having an input. If it is thought to be financially justifiable to have a sentencing council, I can see an advantage in persons from society in general being involved. However, they should be involved on an advisory and informing basis, rather than on a determining basis, which should be left to the High Court itself.

The Convener: Having dealt with that section, we must turn to the purposes and principles of sentencing.
Cathie Craigie (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth) (Lab): Lord Hamilton, you say in your submission:

“We are content that the purposes and principles of sentencing should be set out in statute.”

Do you think that that would be helpful or necessary? As a lay person, I would expect the purposes and principles to be widely known by the people sitting in judgment.

Lord Hamilton: I do not think that it is essential. I am not sure to what extent people who are otherwise ill-informed would read an act of Parliament to discover the purposes and principles of sentencing. Such purposes and principles have been set out in statute in a variety of jurisdictions. The proposals draw on the English experience, although one or two aspects are perhaps new. They also reflect to a large extent what the courts do. I have no particular difficulty with having the purposes and principles of sentencing set out in an act of Parliament if it is thought that that will assist members of the public to understand what courts do and what principles they look to in deciding on particular disposals, but I do not regard it as critical.

Cathie Craigie: You said that that had been done in other jurisdictions. Has it been done only in England? Has research been carried out to see whether it has made any difference?

Lord Hamilton: I am not aware of any research on that.

Cathie Craigie: In your submission you say that there are two matters of concern to you. One is section 1(5)(a), which provides that the purposes and principles do not apply to people who are aged under 18 at the time of committing an offence. Will you expand on your concerns about that?

Lord Hamilton: I think that the provision is drawn from English experience and the Criminal Justice Act 2003, but as I understand it the English have a quite separate system of youth criminal justice. In Scotland, the children’s panel takes a non-criminal approach to problems that arise in relation to young people, but in more serious cases we bring people who are under 18 before the ordinary criminal courts. In such circumstances—for example, if a 17-year-old is brought before the criminal courts because they have committed murder or a robbery—we do not see in principle why the purposes and principles that are set out in section 1 should not apply. Of course the courts must take into account the person’s youth, but it seems equally apt to consider, for example, whether a sentence would help in

in relation to a 17-year-old as it does in relation to a 19-year-old or 21-year-old.

Cathie Craigie: You said that it is not essential to set out in statute the purposes and principles of sentencing, but would you want to add anything to section 1?

Lord Hamilton: I do not think that there is anything that I would press for. I noticed that the Sheriffs Association talked about denunciation in its submission—the importance of a judge’s expressing society’s condemnation of what has been done when they sentence in a particularly atrocious case. I suspect that that is not as much a purpose and principle of sentencing as it is an appropriate mechanism to be used when a judge is expressing why they are doing what they are doing.

The Convener: Paul Martin will explore unresolved issues to do with the proposed Scottish sentencing council.

Paul Martin (Glasgow Springburn) (Lab): A function of the proposed sentencing council will be to prepare sentencing guidelines to which a court must have regard. How do you interpret the phrase, “have regard to”?

Lord Hamilton: It does not bind absolutely, but it is constraining to a significant extent, as I think it is intended to be. Currently, the lower courts require to have regard to a guideline judgment that has been issued by the appeal court. Likewise, if the bill were passed, not only the initial sentencing courts but the appeal court, which would deal with sentencing guidelines and the like and with cases on appeal, would be constrained by the provisions and would require to apply them unless there was good reason not to do so.

Paul Martin: Do you welcome the inclusion of such a phrase in statute?

Lord Hamilton: I do not welcome the concept if the situation is that guidelines are to be laid down by the sentencing council, as distinct from being laid down by the appeal court on a recommendation by the sentencing council.

Paul Martin: Although the bill uses the phrase, “have regard to”, the judiciary could ignore the guidelines. There could be circumstances in which a court said, “We had regard to the guidelines but we took a different decision.”

Lord Hamilton: We must proceed on the premise that the courts will implement acts of Parliament that exist to be applied. There will no doubt be circumstances such as you describe, but they will require to be carefully examined. If a lower court stated that it had had regard to the guidelines but thought that the circumstances were special and therefore that it should not apply a particular guideline, that would be open to examination, in the same way as it would if the guideline had been laid down by the court.

Paul Martin: Does more need to be done to provide sentencers with sentencing guidelines and to provide the general public with accurate information on the sentencing process?

Lord Hamilton: As I say, sentencing guidelines are used increasingly by the court. On alerting the public to what is happening, there have been important developments in our dealings with the press and the public in relation to what we do in the process of sentencing. Sheriffs and judges much more frequently issue sentencing statements in cases that are likely to give rise to public concern, anxiety or interest. That could involve an explanation of why a particular principle of sentencing was adopted.

Paul Martin: Could the sentencing council play a role in developing information for public consumption about the sentencing process?

Lord Hamilton: It could be a source of information as to what it was doing in that regard. If it were an advisory body—as I suggest it should be, if there is to be a council—it could publicise what it was doing so that the public could understand it.

Nigel Don: If we accept the premise that the sentencing council is to be established in some form or other, what changes would you make in respect of its proposed composition or membership?

Lord Hamilton: I urge strongly that the council should have a judicial majority—the proposals are short of representation from among senior members of the judiciary. It would be inappropriate merely to have the Lord Justice Clerk as the chairman and one other judge—in effect, a first-instance criminal judge—as the only two senators on the council. I would be minded to double that to four senators. I would leave the number of sheriffs and justices the same, but I would remove the constable, because I do not recognise the function of the constable in that regard. I would reduce the provision in paragraph 1(5)(b) in schedule 1 from "two other persons" to "one other person", which would mean council membership of 12, with judicial office-holders being seven of the 12.

Nigel Don: We could spend the next half hour picking over that. I want to pick up on the general principle of the council including lay people, which brings me back to the basic principle behind the proposals. Surely—although we are clear that this should not happen in individual cases—society should have a say in sentencing policy. Sentencing policy concerns the man and woman in the street. Although it would be wholly inappropriate simply to pick two people off the street, surely there are people outside the legal system who can bring their life experience to the council, as MSPs do to our role. I am not suggesting that lay members of the council should be MSPs or ex-MSPs, but we represent, and sometimes meet, people out in the world. It is surely not inappropriate for representatives of society to be part of the process of policy development.

Lord Hamilton: I am content with that, but the issue is the degree of involvement. There could be very important input from somebody who has particular knowledge of the issues that victims of crime face or from a penologist who has particular knowledge of the effects on convicted persons who are given particular disposals. Such knowledge could usefully be brought into an exercise that would give rise to informed advice on what the courts should do.

Nigel Don: You have spoken a bit about the process of establishing guidelines. How would you—assuming that we will have the sentencing council and that it will produce guidelines—like the proposed legal effect of the guidelines to be changed?

Lord Hamilton: I might be repeating myself: the critical difference is that the sentencing council should be an advisory body that does research and prepares draft guidelines that it presents to the appeal court, which endorses the guidelines if it thinks fit and sanctions them, such that sentencing courts are bound to have regard to them. That is how I would organise it.

Nigel Don: If the appeal court chose not to sanction guidelines, where would we be?

Lord Hamilton: I have no doubt but that the appeal court would have to explain why it was not sanctioning the guidelines. It might have a power to remit guidelines to the council for reconsideration in the light of the court's views, after which an amendment might be made. Another possibility is that the court could sanction guidelines subject to amendment.

Cathie Craigie: You have told us what happens when guidelines are prepared and issued now. Is any account taken of informed representatives' views by whatever panel of judges considers guidelines?

Lord Hamilton: We do not have input from members of the public generally. We take into account representations that might be made by the Lord Advocate as prosecutor, for example. I can think of an appeal against an allegedly unduly lenient sentence in a rape case in which the Lord Advocate put before us several factors in relation to public concerns and so on. We had, under the new regime on the constitution of rape, to make a distinction between rapes that are of a particularly brutal character and those that are not. Information from the prosecutor, as well as anything that might be said on the accused’s behalf, is input into such matters. However, we do not receive information from the public in general.

The Convener: Does the Lord Justice Clerk have anything to add? I have no doubt that you wish to make the point that judges, too, are members of the public and speak to people in their everyday lives.

Lord Gill: Contrary to any other popular belief, there is no doubt that we have our finger on the pulse, simply because of our long experience as practitioners and judges and because of the number of cases that we deal with in the appeal court day in, day out.

I will mention one point in supplement to what the Lord Justice General has said. There is a role for a sentencing council in Scotland, but it is not what is proposed in the bill. We need hard research to establish the effects of sentencing.
The courts have before them a wider range of disposals than they have had at any stage in history. We need to know how to measure the success of those disposals and, if a criterion exists for their success or failure, to know what is happening out there in the field. Useful research could be done on that.

A sentencing council could do much on that matter. It could also consider developments in sentencing in other jurisdictions in the world and see what other imaginative ways have been devised in other countries. That would provide a basis to enable sentencing by the High Court and by sheriff courts to be better informed. Of course, such a council would, in essence, be a research and advisory body, which would be different from the conception in the bill.

Robert Brown (Glasgow) (LD): I have one or two points to make on short custodial sentences.
Again, a constitutional issue underlies the matter.
Section 17 talks about replacing short sentences with community sentences, to an extent. Does that raise the prospect of undue interference with the judiciary’s freedom on sentencing? That is a relatively substantial policy direction.

Lord Hamilton: The ECHR is concerned with the requirement that every person whose criminal as well as his civil position is to be adjudicated on is entitled to an impartial and independent tribunal.
That includes circumstances in which a person who has been condemned in a criminal case is disposed of by a judicial office-holder, so the judicial office-holder must be an independent tribunal. I am concerned that if the judicial officeholder is constrained to a significant degree by the dictates of a body that is neither a judicial nor
the sense that it is not elected —
holder must be an independent

the requirement that every person whose criminal

tribunal. I am concerned that if the judicial officeholder is constrained to a significant degree by the dictates of a body that is neither a judicial nor — in the sense that it is not elected — a democratic body, an issue might well arise about whether the person who is sentenced has had the benefit of having their disposal dealt with by an independent tribunal.

Robert Brown: The issues of principle aside, is it fair to say that that casts an element of uncertainty on proceedings?

Robert Brown: The ECHR is concerned with the requirement that every person whose criminal as well as his civil position is to be adjudicated on
is entitled to an impartial and independent tribunal.
That includes circumstances in which a person who has been condemned in a criminal case is disposed of by a judicial office-holder, so the judicial office-holder must be an independent tribunal. I am concerned that if the judicial officeholder is constrained to a significant degree by the dictates of a body that is neither a judicial nor — in the sense that it is not elected — a democratic body, an issue might well arise about whether the person who is sentenced has had the benefit of having their disposal dealt with by an independent tribunal.

Lord Hamilton: It certainly raises a question about them.

Robert Brown: I wish to develop a slightly different point that follows on from that. The Sheriffs Association expressed some concerns about the composition of the proposed sentencing council and have referred to the fact that the Lord Advocate must be consulted on the draft guidelines, whereas the judiciary does not have to be. In addition, they feel that the fact that there is to be a prosecutor on the council means that there is a suggestion that arrangements will have a prosecutorial bias. Do you have any concerns about those aspects?
Lord Hamilton: I suppose that one starts from the premise that in general—at least, traditionally—the prosecutor or the Lord Advocate has not been concerned with sentencing. In our jurisdiction, the prosecutor does not, as happens in other jurisdictions, propose that a particular sentence be imposed by the court. Nonetheless, the Lord Advocate has an interest in what the courts do, as is illustrated by the fact that statute allows her to appeal, without leave, to the High Court against a sentence that she contends is unduly lenient. I therefore have no particular difficulty with recognising that she, or someone on her behalf, should have an interest in the matter.

Robert Brown: It says in section 2(2) that where the guidelines from the Scottish sentencing council are inconsistent with section 1,

"the court need not comply with section 1."

Does that not raise a question about what principles should be applied by the sentencing council in that regard? Will you elaborate on that?

Lord Hamilton: I have a concern about that. If the principles are to be recognised as being applicable in the criminal justice system, they should also be applicable to the sentencing council. It should not be free to deal with the matter without regard to those principles.

Robert Brown: I am conscious of the time, but I have a final question, which relates to the issue about alcohol in section 24. You suggested in your submission that bereavement would be a possible mitigating factor. Voluntary intoxication is not a mitigating factor under the bill, but should that exclude consideration of bereavement in the background as a factor of which account should be taken? In other words, would the provisions in that section be as practically restrictive as you suggest in your submission?

Lord Hamilton: If there is an absolute prohibition on taking into account the existence of voluntarily ingested alcohol, I do not think that the sentencer would be allowed to take into account background circumstances such as a personal tragedy of that sort.

One can think of other examples. A recent case gave rise to a lot of controversy: a young woman who had been sexually assaulted outside a club of some sort had driven off while she was affected by alcohol and was ultimately prosecuted. There was a question about whether she should have been prosecuted and about what the ultimate disposal should have been. If the terms in section 24 were to apply, it would not be possible to take into account that that young woman had driven off under the influence of alcohol, but in circumstances in which most people would recognise that there was a mitigating factor.

Robert Brown: That is perhaps a salutary example of the kind of difficulties that one can get into when trying to be too prescriptive about such matters in statute.

Lord Hamilton: Yes—that is true.

The Convener: Robert Brown might think that; the Lord Justice General cannot possibly say it.

Stewart Maxwell (West of Scotland) (SNP): On Robert Brown’s question, I am not sure that I follow the line of argument. Section 24 talks about “voluntarily consumed alcohol”, which must not be taken into account as a mitigating factor. Section 24 does not suggest in any way, shape or form that you could not take into account as a mitigating factor other circumstances—for example, if the person had been recently bereaved, sexually assaulted or any other circumstance. Because you cannot take into account the fact that the person was under the influence of alcohol, I do not follow why you cannot take into account that they were emotionally disturbed or had acted in an abnormal way because of other circumstances.

Lord Hamilton: I see your argument, but it seems to me that section 24, as it is framed, gives rise to an ambiguity that ought to be addressed.

The Convener: Surely the argument would be that the proximate cause of the intoxication was the traumatic experience that the individual had had and it would be competent to introduce that experience in mitigation.

Lord Hamilton: I will leave that matter for the committee to consider.

The Convener: We are aware of the time constraints this morning, Lord Justice Clerk, do you wish to add anything in conclusion?

Lord Gill: No—there is nothing that I wish to add.

The Convener: Lord Justice General, do you wish to add anything?

Lord Hamilton: No thank you.

The Convener: I take it that if any issues arise, you will be happy to respond to them in correspondence.

Lord Hamilton: Certainly.

The Convener: I thank you very much for your attendance this morning; we appreciate the pressures on your time. It has been an exceptionally useful evidence session.

10:49

Meeting suspended.
However, I doubt that we would change the principles should perhaps be followed too, but that it would be very difficult to define them all.

Sheriff Fletcher: We suggested one possible addition, but that is all it was—one possible addition. We also tried to show that many other principles should perhaps be followed too, but that it would be very difficult to define them all. However, I doubt that we would change the principles that have been set out, if they are to remain in the bill and be enacted.

Johan Findlay (Scottish Justices Association): I do not have much to add to that. It is clear that justices, in particular, are trained very highly in sentencing—we use those principles all the time.

Cathie Craigie: Aside from what is in the legislation, should there be publicity so that the general public understand the purposes and principles behind sentencing?

Sheriff Fletcher: The general public might not take kindly to being lectured on the principles behind sentencing. Some people will be interested anyway, and will want to inform themselves about the principles in different ways, but I doubt very much whether the general public would be interested in seeing the principles.

Robin White (Scottish Justices Association): I take a slightly different tack from my colleagues: I see no harm in a statement of principles such as that in section 1. We could argue for a long time about what should go in the list—I would add “denunciation” as another aim of sentencing—but I do not think that there is any great controversy about the aims of sentencing. Various authors have produced various lists, but they all boil down pretty much to the list that is in the bill—which appears, incidentally, to have been lifted from the English legislation.

The list in section 1 perhaps suffers because it contains the sort of things that sentencers obviously take into account when sentencing. However, I do not see any particular harm in stating the principles.

I feel—pace Sheriff Fletcher—that the list may have more value from the public’s point of view. We will, no doubt, discuss the proposed sentencing council, but one of its functions will be to provide public information and education. I think that it is generally agreed that there is a good deal of public ignorance about the purpose of sentencing, so it would be useful to have an authoritative and orthodox statement of the principles, if only to allow a sentencing council to use its terms when talking to the public.

The Convener: That possibility already exists, because an official is employed by sheriffs and judges to ensure that appropriate statements are publicised. Is not that the case, Sheriff Morrison?

Sheriff Nigel Morrison QC (Sheriffs Association): Yes—that is true.

I would like to add that the purpose of setting out the principles in the bill was not simply to set them out. As the policy memorandum indicates, the purpose was to achieve consistency, transparency... and confidence. However, we do not think that that purpose has been achieved.

Cathie Craigie: I think that other committee members will ask about that in more detail later.

The Convener: We turn now to the somewhat more vexed issues of consistency in sentencing and the proposed Scottish sentencing council.

Bill Butler (Glasgow Anniesland) (Lab): Good morning Ms Findlay and gentlemen. What is wrong with asking the courts to exercise their discretion, in individual cases, within a general sentencing framework that has been established by some other body?

Sheriff Fletcher: It is not correct to say that we think that it is wrong to have a sentencing council, or that we think that it is it wrong that members of the public should have an input to allow consistency of sentencing to be achieved—or to be seen to be achieved, as it is perhaps more correct to say.

As we said in our written response, the difficulty that we are concerned about is the constitution of the proposed body. It is fair to say that it would be difficult for the main sentencers in Scotland—the sheriffs—to have confidence in a body that did not have a judicial majority.

Bill Butler: Do other members of the panel wish to add anything to that?

Sheriff Morrison: The Lord Justice General and the Lord Justice Clerk made the point that, under the European convention on human rights and the decisions of the European Court of Human Rights, sentencing is for judges, and, as Mr Don said earlier, the principle of policy—with a capital P—is a matter for Parliament. However, the proposed sentencing council would take away from Parliament from the judges the policy making, to an extent, and the decision making.

Bill Butler: Parliaments create criminal offences that the judiciary then applies in individual cases. If that is all right, why should it be undesirable for a non-judicial body to be involved in establishing sentencing guidelines that the judiciary then applies in individual cases? Is the problem the type of body that the bill proposes? Lord Gill said that there is a place for a sentencing council, but not the one in the bill. He went on to sketch briefly his thoughts on a research and advisory body. Would you be more comfortable with such a body? Is the problem the sentencing council that is outlined in the bill?

Bill Butler: The proposed sentencing council is indigestible, then. Is that because there would not be a judicial majority on the council and that, rather than being an advisory body, it would take over what the court of criminal appeal does as a determining body? Is that correct?

Sheriff Morrison: Yes.

Sheriff Fletcher: Yes, that is the difficulty. Sentencing has been described as an art rather than a science. I do not think that everyone realises the amount of time that it takes to come to a decision about an individual sentence. That is why it is so attractive to other people to have guidelines, which they think would be relatively straightforward to apply to cases. In fact, the circumstances in every case are so different that guidelines are difficult to apply. I am not suggesting that we should not have guidelines because I or other sheriffs find them difficult. I am simply trying to illustrate the fact that guidelines are not the be-all and end-all.

However, if guidelines are to be prepared, that should be done by a body in which the majority of people deal with sentencing all the time. Sheriffs, judges and justices of the peace are regularly subjected to training, involving all sorts of sentencing exercises in which skilled people discuss sentences. It is important that such training also involves lectures from a variety of people—psychologists, psychiatrists, social workers, victim support people, police officers and academic lawyers—who describe the purposes of sentencing. The skill that those people have is gathered over a long time, and it seems to me that that is the skill that should be employed to create sentencing guidelines. That work has to be informed by the wider public, and I have no difficulty whatsoever with the wider public being involved in helping to create those guidelines. However, it is not so easy to have confidence in a body in which the majority of the people who make the guidelines do not have that skill.

Johan Findlay: I often describe sentencing as neither an art nor a science but as an impossible equation in which one balances the means of the offender against the seriousness of the offence. As Sheriff Fletcher said, it is very difficult to lay down guidelines on that.

I am never very sure what we mean by public opinion. It is very often that which is reported in the press; we do not know who exactly has said something in the beginning or where it is leading.

Bill Butler: It may be editorial opinion.

Johan Findlay: It could be that or anything else. It is very difficult to get public opinion. A lay person on the Scottish sentencing council, depending on what background they come from, may be very biased, nevertheless theirs would still be a lay opinion. Justices are lay people, but we have had years of training. I have been a justice for 22 years and—as Sheriff Fletcher said—we are pretty expert on sentencing.

Bill Butler: Does the panel agree with Lord Hamilton’s comment that the need for guidelines, as set out in the bill, will constrain sentencers and the appeal court to a significant extent?

Sheriff Morrison: I agree with him. There are elements in the bill that would make guidelines prescriptive—I think that that was the word that he used—and I agree.

Bill Butler: Are we all in agreement?

Robin White indicated agreement.

Sheriff Fletcher indicated agreement.

Johan Findlay indicated agreement.

Bill Butler: I am obliged.

Robin White: I was hoping to say something about some of the other matters that have been raised in the past few minutes, particularly the constitutional issue. Certainly, two constitutional issues are involved—we might call them the internal and the external.

The internal is the actual constitution of a Scottish sentencing council. Our evidence has spoken in favour of a 50:50 split between judicial and non-judicial members. One can argue until the cows come home about the appropriate level. We ended up with 50:50 having tried to square a circle by giving confidence to the judiciary, which might argue for a judicial majority, but also confidence to the public at large—

Bill Butler: Could that not lead to stasis?

Robin White: That is precisely my next point, if I may say so. Public confidence might require a judicial minority—

Bill Butler: Why should that be so?

Robin White: With the greatest respect to all members of the judiciary, it is because there is a danger of a certain amount of conservatism—with a small c—in sentencing, by which I mean that, on the whole, most sentencers are pretty satisfied with sentencing at present. However, if one wants a few new ideas or some public reaction one might not want a judicial majority.

Bill Butler: What is your evidence for that assertion?

Robin White: Which assertion?

Bill Butler: About small-c conservatism.

Robin White: I have no evidence at all.

Bill Butler: Therefore, it is your opinion.

Robin White: As are most of the things that are said from this side of the table.

I mentioned the internal. Might I say something about the external, which the Lord Justice General said something about? The proposed sentencing council would be a constitutionally interesting body externally because clearly the Parliament can tell the courts what to do—full stop. You made the point about the creation of new criminal offences, for example. The Parliament could decide that there should be a fixed penalty for every single offence in the calendar and the courts would loyally have to obey that. It would not be good policy, but it would be perfectly sound constitutionally. That is not true for the Executive. The courts do not do what the Executive says. If the Executive wishes a particular policy to be followed, the appropriate course is for it to introduce legislation. The proposal falls somewhere between those two; guidelines are not exactly a nudge and a wink, but they have an interesting status. We are used to the idea of guidelines in legislation—they have been around for a very long time.

Bill Butler: What is your reply to what Lord Hamilton said about the phrase “have regard to” being too prescriptive, with which Sheriff Morrison agreed?

Robin White: I would always defer to the Lord Justice General, but I should have thought that the phrase “have regard to” was not inappropriate. You can interpret it as you wish, but it means something like “must have in your mind”.

Bill Butler: If you can interpret it as you wish, why have it at all?

Robin White: Because you have to have something.

Bill Butler: Okay.

Robin White: You could use alternatives such as “must take account of”, which racks things up slightly, or “is obliged to”. If one is to have principles, there must be a verbal form for the notice that the courts should take of them. With great respect to the Lord Justice General, I should have thought that “have regard to” was at the lower end of the requirements.

Bill Butler: I am obliged.

Nigel Don: Some of the questions that I wanted to ask have been pre-empted. Sheriff Fletcher’s comments about the people who train sheriffs seemed to reflect precisely the description of those who would be appointed to the sentencing council. Is there a synergy that may have eluded you?

Sheriff Fletcher: That is partly why I chose to mention those people, although there are others who give us lectures. I was trying to illustrate the fact that judges have training that extends beyond what you might think of as our little world—if some people think that we have one—into the wider world, not just of the general public but of experts who know how things work and tell us about the difficulties and advantages of dealing with people in the way in which we are required to deal with them.

Nigel Don: Is there not an advantage in constituting a body that can provide guidelines regularly to everybody, rather than putting up with what is necessarily intermittent training? I nearly used the word sporadic, but there is nothing random about it. If there were such a body, guidelines could be issued generally, rather than being issued occasionally to those who happen to be being trained at a particular time.

Sheriff Fletcher: The advantage of training is not just that it gives people knowledge but that it allows them to absorb that knowledge in a way that enables them to form the skill that they need to do the job. That is different from having a body of people who have a skill because they are experienced and trained and live in the real world, which we do. It is better for guidelines to be produced by people with that body of knowledge than by people such as psychologists, psychiatrists and policemen, who add just one aspect of their knowledge.

The Convener: Ms Findlay, do you have anything to add?

Johan Findlay: No—Sheriff Fletcher’s answer is quite clear.

Robert Brown: Do both the justices and the sheriffs accept what I understand to be the view of the senators: first, that there is a place for research into the effects of sentencing, on which we could be better informed; and, secondly, that the nub of the matter is who has the final decision on sentencing guidelines? Should it be the body that will be set up under the bill or should it be the High Court in its appeal capacity, with the sentencing council acting just as an advisory body? Is that not the nub of the constitutional point? What is your view on that?

Sheriff Fletcher: Sheriffs think that the High Court of Justiciary, advised by guidelines, should have the final say.

Robert Brown: Is there a place for better research into the effects of sentencing?

Sheriff Fletcher: Definitely. A wide variety of sentences are available to us, and we use them pretty regularly. We see the results of those sentences: in some cases community service is successful, but in others it is completely unsuccessful. However, we have no research that tells us whether, overall, that is the correct course for us to take. It would be helpful to have such research.

Robin White: For precisely the reasons that Sheriff Fletcher has highlighted, I absolutely agree that it would be enormously valuable for the bill to give the sentencing guidelines council the function to carry out or commission research.

I have to say that I defer to the Lord Justice General on the point about constitutional status. I suppose that, from a judicial point of view, it would be a good deal more satisfactory for the guidelines to have the imprimatur of the High Court acting as a court of appeal.

Paul Martin: Why has no research been carried out? After all, some of you have significant experience in the judiciary and I am sure that over the years sheriffs and various authorities have made representations on that matter. Why are you asking for research now?

Robin White: A good deal of research has been carried out, but there is plenty of room for more. New sentences keep being introduced; for example, community payback orders might well come in as a result of the bill, and research will have to be carried out on their effect, on variations within unpaid work and so on. No one will argue that there is no research; it is just that there needs to be a lot more.

Paul Martin: So some research has been carried out.

Robin White: Yes, but it is constrained by funders funding people to do it.

Paul Martin: I appreciate that, but you said that new legal remedies such as CPOs are going to be delivered—

Robin White: I am sorry. My point is that when new sentences such as drug treatment and testing orders and restriction of liberty orders are invented and introduced someone early on has to find out whether they are having their intended effect.

Paul Martin: So is there a failure in—

Robin White: I am not saying that there has been a failure. I am just saying that there could be more and better research.

Paul Martin: Please let me finish my question. Has there been a collective failure in this respect, perhaps by Parliament, the justice directorates and so on? In almost every evidence session, someone says that we need more research. Surely we need first to clarify the research that already exists and secondly to think about the action that needs to be taken as a result of any research that is carried out. After all, if, in light of research showing that a particular sentence has been effective, we say that you will be required to deliver it, you will simply say that we are taking away the judiciary’s independence. In that case, what purpose will research have?

Robin White: With respect, that sounds like a counsel of despair.

Paul Martin: It does not.

Robin White: I do not wish to monopolise the discussion, but let me address the two points that you have raised. On the question whether enough research exists already, that is a matter that needs to be discussed and on which we will end up with our own opinions. It certainly is an issue, but I doubt that it can be resolved today. As for the question of what happens as a result of research, that is a matter of political will.

Johan Findlay: An amount of research has been done, but it is not always easy to get hold of it. It depends on who has commissioned it or carried it out. A sentencing council or advisory board would be able to gather that research together and give it to the people who need to see it.

Paul Martin: So you are not able to access the existing research.

Johan Findlay: It depends on where you come from. Some—but not all—research will go to the courts or the various training bodies.

Paul Martin: So is there nothing available on the internet, for example? I am sorry to labour this point, but the question is whether or not we can access research.

Johan Findlay: We can access some.

Paul Martin: I suppose that my point is that if we are seeking to procure new research we have to ensure that it will be used. I am sure that, with Google, you could find quite a substantial volume of academic research; I am also sure that a number of you are able to access other academic research. We need to ensure the quality of that research and that, when it is carried out, its conclusions are taken forward.

Johan Findlay: That is right.

The Convener: On the question of research, surely the effectiveness of different sentences can be determined by the recidivism rates of those who have received them.

Sheriff Fletcher: That is certainly one way of checking the effectiveness of sentences.

Paul Martin wanted to know who would make use of the research. I can tell him that the judiciary certainly would, because we want to know which of the sentences available to us is the most effective in preventing reoffending. We are finding ways of doing that and, if you like, looking for scientific reasons behind our choice of sentence instead of relying on what seems best to the individual sentencer.

Stewart Maxwell: Let me take you back, Sheriff Fletcher. A moment ago, in your answer to Mr Butler, you seemed to suggest that the bill changes who has the final say—that it will not be the appeal court, but the sentencing council. However, that is not strictly correct, is it? Although you will have to have regard to the guidelines, the final say will still rest with the judiciary.

Sheriff Fletcher: Sorry. I did not mean to say that the final say will not rest with the appeal court. I thought I said that I thought that it should rest with the—

Stewart Maxwell: I understand. You are saying that the final say should rest with the appeal court, as it currently does. However, surely the final say will still rest with the appeal court, even if the envisaged sentencing council is brought into being?

Sheriff Fletcher: I suppose that it will, except that the judges in the appeal court, like all other judges, will be required to follow the law, and the law requires them to have regard to the guidelines rather than whatever other things they might think it more appropriate to have regard to.

Stewart Maxwell: You will have to have regard to the guidelines but, as we explored with Lord Hamilton and Lord Gill, that does not necessarily mean that you must obey them absolutely. There could be circumstances in which, although you would have regard to the guidelines, you would come to a different conclusion. Is that not the case?

Sheriff Fletcher: Yes. "Have regard to" means exactly what you say that it means.

Sheriff Morrison: There is, however, a provision in the bill that will allow the sentencing council to exclude departure from the guidelines. It is not simply a matter of the judges having regard to them, because the sentencing council will be given that power.

Angela Constance: It could be argued that consistency in sentencing is not achievable without removing the freedom of the sentencer to take into account the various individual circumstances of a case. However, it could also be argued that that would be overstating the case, given the fact that well-formed sentencing guidelines could help to achieve greater consistency without unduly limiting the ability of the sentencer to deal with individual circumstances. I would be interested to know the views of the panel about that, starting with Mr White.

Robin White: It is interesting that consistency is seen as the prime virtue in all of this. As our written evidence suggests, there is at least one other criterion that might be applied—appropriateness. A judge can clearly be consistent in error. Nevertheless, consistency is the prime criterion because that is perceived to be the public concern.

The problem with consistency is that, as Sheriff Fletcher said, every sentencing decision is multidimensional. There is a large, although not infinite, number of considerations that one might wish to take into account. We have talked about whether such decision making is an art or a science, but the phrase that I would use is “arbitrary and intuitive”. I mean arbitrary not in the sense of capricious, but in the sense that there is a decision, and I mean intuitive in the sense that there is no arithmetic or accountancy to the decision—it is a decision that one must take on the basis of what one thinks is appropriate in terms of the principles of sentencing.

Therefore, although consistency is not a thing to be discarded—it is something to be concerned with—the question is: consistency with what? We have our list of half a dozen principles, which are not ranked. One clear decision that anybody who passes a sentence must take into account is which of those principles—which are often inconsistent—is the prime principle to apply. There is then the possibility of aggravating factors, mitigating factors and so on. I do not know whether that answers your question.

Angela Constance: Given the fact that the sentencing guidelines offer a framework rather than a chart, do you think that they could be helpful in achieving consistency and appropriateness?

Robin White: Indeed they could. That is their value. You spoke of charts, and you might know that in some American states, sentencing commissions produce charts from which judges can read off the appropriate sentence. Judicial discretion for anyone there is minimal. That system is conceivable—it operates—but I do not think that we would want it here. What do we have instead? We have guidelines that one would hope would demonstrate appropriateness as well as consistency.

Sheriff Fletcher: I agree. I do not think that I am suggesting that guidelines are not helpful or that they should not exist. I am worried not about the guidelines but about who gives them. We are perfectly used to guidelines being given by the High Court of Justiciary. We regularly find ourselves following them because we are aware of them, or being challenged because we have not followed them. That is not a problem; it is not difficult. I just suggest that the people who give the guidelines should be the ones with the skill to do that.

The Convener: Before we leave this point, there is one issue around the guidelines that concerns me. I would be interested to hear whether the witnesses think that the wording in the bill is inconsistent with my concern.

In your commission areas, there will be differing criteria and sentencing policies for the same offences. For example, someone who drives at high speed through a small village in the country would obviously attract a great deal more localised odium than someone who does the same thing along Great Western Road in Glasgow. As such, the penalty would be increased. In fact, within your jurisdiction, Sheriff Fletcher, it could be argued that disorder in the centre of Perth would be viewed more seriously than disorder in certain parts of Glasgow. Therefore, members of the bench might well feel that sentences should reflect the degree of public concern about certain issues.

As I see it, that point would not be picked up within the requirements of the consistency approach that is demanded by any potential sentencing body.

Sheriff Fletcher: No, and of course there have been occasions when people have thought that a serious offence in one part of the country, where there was a particular problem, required to be dealt with even more seriously than the same offence in another part of the country. I do not think that there is anything wrong with that. It is a reflection of the judiciary’s ability to recognise both what is going on in their own area and what might be necessary to improve life in that particular part of the world.

The Convener: Does Sheriff Morrison consider that the wording in the bill would allow for different sentences for the same offence, bearing in mind the locus of the offence?

Sheriff Morrison: I am not sure that it does, actually.

The Convener: Yes; I think that that is a problem.

Johan Findlay: With guidelines, there is always a danger that we lose a lot of local discretion, which is so important to justices and sheriffs who sit in a local sheriffdom.

The Convener: I think that we have largely covered the material that the next two questions would have looked at. I will go to Stewart Maxwell.

Stewart Maxwell: Thank you, convener. I turn to section 5(5) of the bill, which says that the Scottish sentencing council must include in any sentencing guidelines an assessment of the likely impact of those guidelines on various aspects of the criminal justice system, including:

“(i) the number of persons detained in prisons or other institutions,
(ii) the number of persons serving sentences in the community, and
(iii) the criminal justice system generally.”

What are your views on that provision?

Sheriff Fletcher: That is partly why we are constitutionally concerned about the bill’s provisions. There is little doubt that sentencers consider themselves unable to take into account—it would be inappropriate for them to do so—the kind of matters that are set out in section 5(5), such as,

“(i) the number of persons detained …
(ii) the number of persons serving sentences in the community, and
(iii) the criminal justice system generally.”

We think that we should be dealing with the individual with regard to the individual offence that that individual has committed, taking into account society’s view of what the sentence should be. However, we should not take into account whether there is enough room in the prison, whether there are enough community service places or what the situation is in the criminal justice system generally. We think that the person who is being sentenced is entitled to be sentenced by someone whose attention is not directed at whether there is a place available for them.

Stewart Maxwell: I think that section 5(5), which sets out the context for the guidelines, is not as prescriptive as you suggest. Do you agree that the factors that you mention are taken into account in the general thinking of sentencers? I can remember sheriffs complaining that there were not enough community service places and saying that that impacted on their ability to sentence people in that way.

Sheriff Fletcher: That is a complaint that has been made. We are forced to take that consideration into account because we cannot sentence someone to do community service if we know that they are not going to be able to do that for nine months, which was the position at one point. In such a situation, we might decide that we should send the person to prison instead. However, that consideration should never be in a sentencer’s mind or, in my opinion, the minds of those who are setting the guidelines.
are only four or six stipendiary magistrates, and they are in only one area, Glasgow.

The Convener: There will be four of them, full time.

Johan Findlay: Thank you. We do far more work than those four stipendiaries. We would be extremely concerned if we did not have a say or a place on the sentencing council.

Robin White: I will reinforce that point. For what it is worth, the equivalent legislation for England and Wales concerning the Sentencing Guidelines Council specifically requires separate representation for justices. That is to say, there must be a justice of the peace on the council, as opposed to a district judge, who is the rough equivalent of a stipendiary magistrate.

As I think the Lord Justice General observed, it is not obvious why there should be any police membership of the Scottish sentencing council, or prosecution membership, for that matter. If there were to be such membership, the Scottish Prison Service should also be represented, as it has a lot more to do with sentencing than the police do. The Convention of Scottish Local Authorities should be represented, too, as community sentences are carried out by local authority employees, broadly speaking.

Stewart Maxwell: You said that proper research should be carried out before any guidelines are issued by the sentencing council. Is proper research undertaken for any guidelines that are issued currently? Could you point to that research?

Sheriff Fletcher: I do not think that it is correct to say that academic research is carried out, but the guidelines that are currently issued by the High Court of Justiciary are issued after both sides have addressed all the matters that might concern the High Court. Counsel will have researched their position.

The example that the Lord Justice General gave showed that a great deal of trouble is gone to in order to carry out research on behalf of one side or the other, so that the High Court of Justiciary can be informed in the guidelines that it issues.

Stewart Maxwell: Is it your view that the sentencing council will not carry out an equivalent level, if not a greater level, of research, whether it is academic or other research, before coming to a decision about issuing guidelines?

Sheriff Fletcher: No, we hope and expect that it will do that.

The Convener: If there are no further questions on that subject, we will now turn to the somewhat more vexed problem of short custodial sentences.

Robert Brown: In their submission, the High Court judges expressed the view that the proposed change in section 17 regarding short-term sentences will be unlikely to affect existing sentencing practice. The Sheriffs Association has also expressed a number of views in its submission about the reasons why short-term sentences, in various circumstances, have a fairly significant part to play.

Could you give us some insight into what you think the results of the changes that are contained in section 17 might be? Do you agree with the High Court judges on that matter? Do you think that any practical steps could be taken to reduce the number of short custodial sentences?

Sheriff Fletcher: It must be clear to most people that sheriffs and justices use a custodial sentence only as a last resort—I am sure that that is the case. It might be difficult always to be sure that a custodial sentence is a last resort, but that is an individual decision in an individual case. We impose a custodial sentence only when we can do nothing else, or when we think that society requires that, because it will not put up with repeated offending by someone while, apparently, nothing is done about it.

Robert Brown: Does that boil down to saying that you agree with the High Court judges that the provision might not make much difference?

Sheriff Fletcher: I do not think that it will make much difference. However, it will make a difference to the practice, because the sheriff or anyone who is sentencing somebody to less than six months will have to state their reasons for doing so. That might sound simple because, usually, when one is sentencing someone to imprisonment, one says something like, “There is nothing else that I can do with you, so I’m going to send you to prison.” However, if we are required to do that by statute, the unintended result might be to slow down the court process while the judge makes up the statement that he has to make. If he has to do that regularly, that will slow down the process. Throughout the bill, there are many other provisions under which sheriffs will have to give reasons for what they do when they do it. Each time they have to do that, that will slow down the court process.

Robert Brown: We will take that warning seriously but, nevertheless, do you not accept that, for reasons to do with the public perception of consistency and appropriateness of sentence and with the ability to consider the effectiveness of sentences, there is a considerable advantage in a requirement to state reasons for the decisions that are made?

Sheriff Fletcher: As I said, reasons are almost always stated. I do not think that people are sent to prison without the judge giving reasons. Those might not be the type of reasons that will have to be given when the bill is enacted but, nonetheless, reasons are given. The trouble is that the audience is not necessarily the general public. In many cases, nobody hears the sentence except the person who is the recipient of it. I am not sure that the general public will be helped by the measure, because they might not find out about the reasons.

Johan Findlay: Sheriff Fletcher is absolutely right. I have heard sheriffs say that they write up a reason carefully for specific offences but there is nobody in the court to hear it. The newspapers publish what they want to anyway—they do not always publish exactly what the sheriff said. The same is true of justice of the peace courts. It is rare to have a press presence in those courts, so it is difficult to know who will hear the reasons.

Robert Brown: Your submissions mention the important issue of funding for community sentences. If there is to be an emphasis on community payback orders, they will need to be funded. Sheriff Fletcher said that funding issues ought not to affect the judgment of sentencers but, in practice, they sometimes do. Will you elaborate on your concerns about the important issue of funding?

Sheriff Fletcher: When we deal with a community service order, which is the equivalent of the order that you mention, it is extremely important that the person who is put on community service starts it quickly after the sentence is imposed. It is fair to say that, for a time, that did not happen in most parts of the country. When the community service does not start quickly, the impetus to carry out the sentence is lost. One of the main impetuses is that the person is relieved of the order that you mention, it is extremely important that the person who is put on community service starts it quickly after the sentence is imposed. It is fair to say that, for a time, that did not happen in most parts of the country. When the community service does not start quickly, the impetus to carry out the sentence is lost. When the community service does not start quickly, the impetus to carry out the sentence is lost. One of the main impetuses is that the person is relieved of the order.

Sheriff Morrison: The local sheriff in Perth, for example, will know about the times when there have been difficulties with community service. Social inquiry reports have told us that community service would be a good idea but that it would be nine months until the person could do it.

Robert Brown: Do you have a different view on that, Sheriff Morrison?

Sheriff Morrison: No.

Robert Brown: There have been issues in Edinburgh, have there not?

Sheriff Morrison: We get information packs that tell us about the particular types of programme that are available. Individual courts hold meetings with the sheriffs and the social work department to tell us about new initiatives or changes in current initiatives. As well as relying on social inquiry reports to indicate what might be an appropriate disposal, we are also made aware of and kept up to date about individual programmes.

Robert Brown: Is the position in your jurisdiction the same as the position that Sheriff Fletcher described in respect of the availability and timeousness of community sentences?

Sheriff Morrison: Yes. We are told occasionally that there is a problem and that there will be a delay. There is no problem currently in Edinburgh. I believe that there is a problem in Glasgow, because of a strike—such things can affect the situation. A programme might stop. A community programme for sexual offenders was stopped when the people who had been running it stopped, and it was some time before it was replaced. Such problems arise from time to time.

Johan Findlay: We do not have community service. I believe that only one court in Scotland has it. Under summary justice reform, we have been promised that we will have different types of community disposal, and we look forward to that. However, at the moment, courts have very few disposals available to them. We have argued long and hard—indeed, for more than 400 years—that we need more disposals.

The Convener: I am sure not you personally.

Johan Findlay: Sometimes it feels like it.

The Convener: I will play devil’s advocate for a moment, Sheriff Fletcher. You dealt with the increased time on report writing that will be necessary under the proposals. Surely the matter is fairly simple. The most telling phrase for a sheriff to use is, “In light of the seriousness of the offence and the accused’s pattern of offending, a custodial sentence is justified.” Would that not fit the bill?

Sheriff Fletcher: I do not know the answer to that. I do not know what the High Court of Justiciary would think—

The Convener: I am interrupting you but, when I did these things, I used that phrase consistently in my stated cases and notes of appeal, and I never had any problem.

Sheriff Fletcher: Perhaps we can follow your example.

Angela Constance: I want to follow up on Robert Brown’s question on the wide body of research informing decision making. As someone who, in a former life, has written more social inquiry reports than you have had hot dinners, I understand how such reports may—or may not—inform the decision making. We know fairly conclusively that only one in four of those who are given short sentences will be conviction free two years on. However, if they are given a community disposal, the figure goes up to three in five. How does the broader information inform decision making? Of course, I understand that it has to be balanced with the individual circumstances of the case.

Sheriff Fletcher: I understand what you mean by the research, but we have to take into account the fact that people who get non-custodial sentences are those who have not reached the same stage in their criminal career—if I can call it that—as those who are sent to prison. By the time someone is sent to prison, it is probably less likely that they will not reoffend. They will have been through all the non-custodial sentences and are now being sent to prison—neither the non-custodial sentences nor their time in prison has stopped them. I am not surprised at that. It happens. On the other hand, a number of people who get caught further down the scale can be reformed and do stop offending. I do not find the statistics as convincing as others do. We continue to require the ability to send someone to prison for a short sentence. On some occasions, it works wonders. Despite what the statistics say, we will never see that person again. I am sure that that is the experience of every sheriff.

What do we do with someone who does not carry out their community payback order? Every week, we have boys like that standing in front of us. We can tell from the way that they look at us that they are not going to do it.

Angela Constance: Perhaps there is a role for the Scottish Prison Service in any sentencing council. Mr White picked up on that earlier. We have had much discussion this morning about training and the need to listen to the experience and knowledge of those in other disciplines, whether psychology or social work. What contact do sheriffs have with the Prison Service? As part of their training, do sheriffs go into prisons and look at the impact of short-term sentences on the individual and the chum in prisons, with all the difficulties that that causes?

Sheriff Fletcher: Part of a sheriff’s training is to visit the nearest prison. I am not suggesting that it happens regularly, but sheriffs are always asked to visit a prison at some point in their training. Some sheriffs continue to make such visits, simply to keep themselves informed of what is going on in prison. Sheriffs have contact with the Prison Service at least once in their careers, but probably more often than that.

Angela Constance: Would the views of prison officers be thought to be valid? You said that social workers and psychologists would be listened to.

Sheriff Fletcher: If they came and gave a talk to sheriffs during their training, they would certainly be listened to.

Sheriff Morrison: In my time as director of judicial studies, people from the Prison Service lectured to sheriffs regularly.
The Convener: Are there any other questions at this stage?

Cathie Craigie: I have one about short periods of imprisonment. In your submission, you point out that sometimes a "custodial sentence is the only punishment that an offender cannot avoid undertaking."

You also say that it is clear that "short sentences have a value since a custodial sentence of up to 30 days is to be a sentencing option for breach of a level 1 community payback order".

Will you say a bit more about how that will balance out?

Sheriff Fletcher: The point is that the bill suggests that custodial sentences are a possible disposal when such orders are breached. I tried to make the same point earlier—if we have such orders, we must remember that there are some people who will simply not do them. The fact that some people will not do them gets around in places such as Perth and Dumfries, where I sat as a sheriff. The tic-tac was obvious. If something was going wrong with the system, the people who were used to coming to the court soon got to know that. The result, quite frankly, is that we are left a laughing stock.

Robert Brown: I have a comeback that is inspired by what you have just said. At the end of the day, the Scottish Prisons Commission and others have laid down a challenge for us to address, which is that short-term prison sentences, aside from whatever deterrent effect they might have, are not long enough to allow anything useful to be done with offenders. Something like two thirds of people reoffend within two years of serving a short-term sentence, and I think that I am right in saying that about 92 per cent of the prisoners at Polmont prison have been there before. By anyone's reckoning, those figures do not indicate that short-term prison sentences are a success, however one defines that. Do you have any views on how we can improve what happens in prison or develop alternatives that are more effective in achieving society's ends?

Sheriff Fletcher: The problem, of course, is the short-term nature of sentences. We recognise that people do not have time to settle into prison and do a course of any length or significance. I do not think that it is for me to suggest how prison ought to be run.

I agree that many people who serve short-term sentences return to prison, and I have given one possible reason for that, but there is another group of people for whom prison is a much more serious problem than it is for most of the short-term prisoners whom we are talking about. Some of the people in that group might be relatively young or at a relatively early stage in their criminal careers. Sometimes everything can be nipped in the bud through the use of a short-term sentence, because the person suddenly realises that we mean business and that they will not be able to carry on living in the way that they have done because, if they do, they will end up in prison. Every now and then, a success is achieved that is a shock to the system, in that a complete change in a person is suddenly observed, simply because they went to prison or into detention at an earlier stage than one might think.

The Convener: To follow up Robert Brown's point that short prison sentences can be ineffective, do you adhere to the argument that is made in paragraph 2.3 of your submission, in which you point out the issues that arise when a prison sentence is in fact much shorter than the sentence that has been imposed by you in court?

Sheriff Fletcher: Yes.

Sheriff Morrison: I do not want anybody to think that we as sheriffs want to impose prison sentences—even short ones—but sometimes we have to do it. I accept that not much can be done with people when they are sent to prison for short-term sentences but, as we explained in our paper, to which the convener has just drawn attention, we sometimes have to impose such sentences.

Sometimes it does work. My attention was drawn the other day to someone who was given a drug treatment and testing order. He was not following it properly, and he committed an offence of house-breaking for which he was sentenced to a short period of imprisonment. During that time, he reflected on his life and his offending and, according to the social worker's report, saw the error of his ways. He came out of prison, and he is now doing extremely well on his drug treatment and testing order and making a success of it. A short sentence is not always negative.

Cathie Craigie: I just want to clarify something. As has been mentioned, the bill states that there will be a presumption against imprisoning someone for less than six months. However, given that an accused who pleads guilty is allowed a discount on their sentence, does the presumption in effect cover sentences of nine months?

Sheriff Fletcher: Yes. If a person pleads guilty at a very early stage, a discount of one third is not uncommon. That means that if we were to sentence someone to nine months, the actual sentence that would be imposed would be six months. We are telling them, "I would have given you nine months, but I am giving you a discount of three months, so you will go to prison for six months.” That would bring us within the realm of that section of the bill.

The Convener: But that person would serve a maximum of three months.

Sheriff Fletcher: Yes, he would serve three months at the most.

The Convener: Are there any other questions?

Stewart Maxwell: Just for clarification, with regard to the circumstances that you mention—or circumstances in which someone might be sentenced to less than six months—you would, even if the bill was passed unamended, still have the right to impose short sentences. There would be a presumption against it under the bill, but you would still have that right. Just because a sentence might happen to be six months, or end up as six months because of various procedures, it would not mean that a person would automatically not get a prison sentence.

Sheriff Fletcher: They might not automatically—that is true. However, all sheriffs and justices would have regard to that rule, because we are bound to do so. It would cause us to hesitate, because we would have to think about whether we can truly justify giving such a sentence.

The Convener: As there are no further questions, I ask Ms Findlay whether she has anything to say in conclusion.

Johan Findlay: No, thank you—everything has been said.

The Convener: Sheriff Fletcher?

Sheriff Fletcher: I have nothing to add—thank you.

Robin White: I would like to add something that has not so far been touched on. It is not often realised that the majority of criminal sentences these days are passed not by courts but in the form of conditional offers. If there are to be guidelines on court disposals, it seems that there should be guidelines on conditional offers, including fiscal fines and so on. There are guidelines, but they are of course unpublished, as they are internal to the Crown Office. It seems strange that we are arguing for open and transparent sentencing by courts, while accepting behind-closed-doors sentencing by fiscals and police.

The Convener: You have included that in your submission to the committee, Mr White.

I thank Mr White, Ms Findlay, Sheriff Fletcher and Sheriff Morrison for their contributions this morning, which have been extremely valuable. I suspend the committee briefly.

Meeting suspended.

12:07
On resuming—

The Convener: We resume consideration of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. I welcome our third panel of witnesses. The right hon Lord Cullen is a former Lord President of the Court of Session and Lord Justice General. Professor Jan McDonald, from the Royal Society of Edinburgh, is a retired professor of humanities. I understand that Professor McDonald will give a brief opening statement.

Professor Jan McDonald (Royal Society of Edinburgh): The Royal Society of Edinburgh is a rather different organisation from those that you have met this morning. Founded in 1783, it was a product of the Scottish enlightenment. We see ourselves as Scotland’s national academy of science and letters, and our fellowship is about 1,400 people who are appointed by peer review. It is particularly germane to our discussions today that those fellows are drawn from a very wide range of disciplines—science, medicine, theology, the arts and humanities, the social sciences, business and industry, and the law.

The Royal Society of Edinburgh is a completely independent body with no political affiliations whatever. Our principal function is to provide public benefit through research and scholarship and to promote research and scholarship within Scotland and internationally. We also have a strong outreach programme in primary and secondary education, as well as in the higher echelons of research. In addition, we instigate and carry out major inquiries on our own initiative.

We also respond to Government consultation papers, the process of which may be of interest to the committee. Once senior officers decide that a consultation is germane to our interests and that we have the expertise to deal with it, the general secretary and the appropriate vice-president instigate a consultation. All the fellows are contacted and any fellow may respond. As is natural, people cluster to their expertise, but it will have been by no means uncommon for non-lawyers to contribute their views on the bill. After views are submitted, a small committee is usually established—Lord Cullen chaired the committee on the bill. A report is then prepared, sent for consultation to those who contributed their views and formally passed by the general secretary and the appropriate vice-president.

That is all that I want to say to give members an idea of the context of our submission and the procedures that gave rise to it.
The Convener: Thank you. It is important that we know the basis on which the society operates.

Cathie Craigie: Good afternoon. I note from your submission that you are concerned about the validity of setting out in section 1 the purposes and principles of sentencing. Will you say a bit more about that?

Right Hon Lord Cullen (Royal Society of Edinburgh): Our view is that there is no need for the statement, which is probably incomplete, as it misses out at least one quite important factor. We wonder what benefit the public will obtain from knowing of the statement.

We notice that the proposed sentencing council will have the power to issue guidelines that might have something to do with sentencing policy and principles. That might suggest that what is in the bill is not the complete statement, as it might be altered by the body whose formation is under consideration.

Cathie Craigie: Would leaving the statement in the bill benefit the justice system and the public?

Lord Cullen: No.

Cathie Craigie: If the statement were left in the bill, should anything be added to it?

Lord Cullen: The trouble is that that would be like adding one unnecessary thing to a lot of other unnecessary things. However, I can think of a few additions. For example, we mention in our submission the absence of any reference to the significance of a guilty plea, which is a potent factor.

The Convener: That is fairly clear.

Stewart Maxwell: Lord Cullen says that the statement has no benefit. Would publishing such a list or putting it in statute do any harm? Would having such a list in the public domain do the public any harm?

Lord Cullen: Probably not, apart from the fact that—as I mentioned a moment ago—the sentencing council might be able to alter the principles and purposes in a way that none of us sitting round the table knows.

The Convener: We turn to consistency in sentencing and the sentencing council’s activities.

Bill Butler: Good afternoon. The Sentencing Commission for Scotland suggested that, although the empirical evidence for significant inconsistency in sentencing is limited, there is a public perception of inconsistency, which needs to be addressed. Do you agree with that assessment?

Lord Cullen: I am not aware of anything that would give a foundation for that view, and I wonder where it was drawn from. What is in the press does not perhaps represent an accurate picture of what the public think. I cannot confirm whether a perception of inconsistency exists. If it does exist, there might be ways of tackling it, but that is another matter.

Bill Butler: Is the view that I described mere assertion?

Lord Cullen: I would not accuse the Sentencing Commission of mere assertion; I just wonder what the basis for the view is.

Bill Butler: The commission’s comment is baseless—you can find no basis for it.

Lord Cullen: I am not sitting in judgment on that matter; I am simply saying that I am not aware of any general lack of confidence in the consistency of the sentencing process. That is purely a personal view.

Bill Butler: I understand that, Lord Cullen. Do you want to comment, Professor McDonald?

Professor McDonald: One of the earlier witnesses made a sensible point when asking whether inconsistency would be a bad thing, were it to exist, because each particular case might require a particular judgment.

As far as perception is concerned, I agree with Lord Cullen, but managing perception is rather more subtle than the bill perhaps allows.

Bill Butler: I take that point. I will move on to another issue. It has been argued that the bill’s proposals for a Scottish sentencing council would undermine the judiciary’s independence. Of course, we all agree that it would be inappropriate for politicians to interfere directly with sentencing decisions. However, why might it be considered unconstitutional for a Parliament to establish an independent body to produce general sentencing guidelines?

Lord Cullen: If you are talking about a body to produce general sentencing guidelines, that is a statement in the abstract, so to speak. Our view on the proposed sentencing council is rather different from our attitude to a possible advisory body. I know that earlier witnesses took you over much of this ground, but I think that we could see a case for an advisory body. Our concern is about the bill’s proposal for a sentencing council, which raises the crop of difficulties to which you just referred.

Bill Butler: Do you agree with Lord Gill’s statement earlier that there is a place for a sentencing council but not the one in the bill? He suggested that a research and advisory body might be more appropriate.
Lord Cullen: That is more or less the view that I have just expressed.

Professor McDonald: I agree with that view, although I sympathised with the committee member who made the point earlier that when in doubt, say research. A research and advisory body might play a larger role in disseminating information to improve public perception than in researching and advising. More informed dissemination might give us a more informed public with more acute perception.

Bill Butler: Yes, and that is worth striving for.

Professor McDonald: Indeed.

Bill Butler: I am obliged.

Lord Cullen: I do not want to take the committee over ground that it has already gone over this morning, about what inconsistency is, but one could identify it if one found that a sentence in a particular case was significantly out of line with what one would expect for similar circumstances. That is perhaps a clear way of putting the question of inconsistency, and that is what the appeal court effectively exists for. In other words, if a sentence appears to be excessive for the given circumstances of a case, the appeal court will deal with it and substitute an appropriate sentence.

Bill Butler: So you are saying that it should be left to the appeal court.

Lord Cullen: That is one way of approaching the matter. However, if one has a vague idea that there is something inconsistent in sentencing, one must be specific as to what inconsistency is.

Nigel Don: Lord Cullen, I think that you were in the public gallery earlier when one of the sheriff witnesses said that he thought that it was appropriate for the local situation to be taken into account in sentencing. The inference is that a particular behaviour might be penalised differently in different places. I did not challenge that view at the time, but does it strike you, as it now strikes me, that that would be an unfair inconsistency in sentencing? For example, if I did something illegal in the middle of Perth or Edinburgh—of course, I would not do so—surely I should expect that, at least in principle, I would receive the same penalty in either place.

Lord Cullen: I was not surprised by the sheriff’s comment, and I think that he was probably correct. After all, the local sheriff knows the local conditions and he knows the sort of things that are causing trouble locally and need to be stamped on. I can quite understand that the significance of an offence committed in a particular part of Scotland may be far greater than the significance of the same offence committed somewhere else.

Nigel Don: Is that not inconsistency?

Lord Cullen: No, not at all.

Nigel Don: Discrimination?

Lord Cullen: Absolutely not. It is bringing in a local factor that has a bearing on what the appropriate sentence should be.

Bill Butler: So it is simply a matter of using good judgment.

Lord Cullen: Yes—and that illustrates how wide and varied the factors are that any sentencer has to take into account. The local impact of a particular kind of offensive conduct is one of many such factors.

Robert Brown: Underlying the approach that the committee and others take to the bill and to other matters of criminal justice is the question of the effectiveness of the remedies that are imposed by sentencers. That is one reason why research is so important.

Will Lord Cullen or Professor McDonald comment on the general pessimism that is caused by the unpleasant statistics on the high reoffending rates of short-term prisoners and the high, but not quite so high, reoffending rates of people serving community sentences? In considering the effectiveness of sentencing, the statistics are pretty depressing. Has the Royal Society of Edinburgh researched how to increase the effectiveness of disposals that are given to people who cause society problems at various levels? Have you any general comments?

Lord Cullen: I find it hard to give a firm answer to your point, as it is some three years since I was a sentencer. However, before one embarks on profound changes to any disposals system, there ought to be well-informed research. That is really all that I can say.

Robert Brown: Does the Royal Society of Edinburgh believe that there is a considerable need for different kinds of new research?

Professor McDonald: As it happens, we are holding a forum on this topic on Thursday. The sheriff made a very good point earlier.

Robert Brown: The sentencing council would prepare guidelines. Is it the case that while you are not against there being guidelines, you are concerned about the constitutional issue of where the guidelines come from and what their standing is in relation to sentencers? Is that a fair interpretation of your views?

Lord Cullen: That is accurate. An advisory body is one thing, but what is being proposed is another.

Robert Brown: How do you interpret the phrase “have regard to”, which we discussed earlier? In other words, how much discretion would a court have to depart from that phrase—and from the guidelines—when applying justice in individual cases?

Lord Cullen: I heard the previous discussion, which was quite interesting. One has to bear in mind the fact that the expression “have regard to” may be used in a number of completely different contexts. One context—although not the one that is in the bill—is that of a court being required to take something into account as a factor. In such a context, the court can attach as much or as little significance to the factor as it thinks appropriate. All the court has to do is honestly apply its mind to the factor.

The context here is rather different. If we consider section 7, we see that the court must not only “have regard to” the sentencing guidelines but state its reasons for not following them. In effect, the court will be much more restricted: if it decides not to follow the guidelines, it will have to give positive reasons for its decision.

If we read on in the bill, we see that if the court does not approve of the guidelines, it may ask the sentencing council to review them—which I think means have another look at them. However, there is no way in which the court will have the last say; the council will have the last say.

Robert Brown: I think that Lord Cullen mentioned section 2(2) and the situation of the sentencing guidelines being inconsistent with the guidelines in section 1. Do you envisage any real limitation—if I may put it that way—in the power of the proposed sentencing council’s sentencing guidelines to depart from the theme of section 1?

Lord Cullen: It is plain that the council will be given wide powers. In that context, I point out that guidelines may include a statement of the circumstances in which guidelines may be departed from. The council will be able to restrict the scope of a court to depart from guidelines.

Robert Brown: One submission made the point that guidelines may specify the circumstances in which they may not be departed from, which might have even more significant consequences.

Stewart Maxwell: I would like to follow up on the issue of who has the final say, which we discussed earlier. Are you making the point that the sentencing council will have the final say on guidelines? Surely you are not suggesting that it will have the final say on sentences. At the end of the day, that is a matter for the judiciary—the sentencer—which can depart from guidelines.

Lord Cullen: Of course, the overall position is that the court has the final say on sentences. However, the guideline that restricts the scope of the court’s discretion has now entered the scene, in such a way that the court has no ultimate way of displacing it. Even if the court asks the sentencing council to review the guidelines, the council does not have to comply with any view that the court expresses.

Stewart Maxwell: Is that any different from the current situation with regard to guidelines?

Lord Cullen: At present, guidelines are issued by the appeal court. From time to time, they may be modified or altered, but the court remains in charge of them. The significance of the guidelines is that they are applicable to and require to be obeyed by sentencers in the High Court, the sheriff court or the justice of the peace court, as the case may be. We are dealing with a constitutional point—whether the court remains in charge of its original and proper constitutional responsibility to determine sentences.

Stewart Maxwell: We are also discussing the right of Parliament to determine policy on sentencing, as opposed to individual sentences, which the judiciary has the absolute right to impose with variation. The bill does not take away that power.

Lord Cullen: The route is through Parliament, but it will produce a body that is neither Parliament nor judiciary and that will be given the degree of control and latitude for which the bill provides.

Stewart Maxwell: In other words, the body will be independent of both the judiciary and Parliament.

Lord Cullen: It will not be subject to control. Parliament could decide to abolish the sentencing council, but for the moment it has let loose the tiger.

Stewart Maxwell: I am not sure that I agree that independent bodies are necessarily tigers in such situations, but I will move on.

The Convener: Before you do so, Paul Martin has a question.

Paul Martin: You will have noted from my questions to previous witnesses that I am interested in the research. First, what research would you like to be done? Secondly, have we explored the research that is currently available to us? I would be astounded if research had not been done into community disposals—in fact, I have seen many such studies.

Lord Cullen: I do not pretend to be aware of what research is available. I am not saying that I want research to be done, only that it would be useful for you to ensure that you have a sound evidence base for any important change to the control of the sentences or sentencing practice that you are considering.

Paul Martin: So you are suggesting that we explore the evidence base, rather than that we procure or launch a new academic research programme.

Lord Cullen: Indeed.

Professor McDonald: Some research centres already exist; there is one at the University of Strathclyde.

Paul Martin: Given what we have heard from previous witnesses, do you accept that we are not always best at exploring the research that is available and that we are too quick to launch new research?

Professor McDonald: There could be more opportunities for knowledge transfer than exist at present.

Lord Cullen: I seem to recall from the consultation paper—it may also be in the bill—that it is intended that the proposed sentencing council will carry out research to underpin what it does. No doubt, the same would apply—perhaps even more strongly—to an advisory body.

Stewart Maxwell: You will be aware of the existing guidelines regime in England and Wales and the Coroners and Justice Bill that is going through the Westminster Parliament. That bill includes provisions that would alter the legal effect of guidelines in England and Wales. Instead of the courts being required to have regard to the guidelines, they would be required to follow the guidelines unless “it would be contrary to the interests of justice to do so”.

Do you have any thoughts on the proposed changes in England and Wales, particularly in relation to the bill that we are discussing?

Lord Cullen: It would take some time to work out the precise difference between the proposed English formula and the proposed Scottish formula. The English version is perhaps slightly stronger than the proposed Scottish version, but I would not go any further than that.

Stewart Maxwell: I have not been involved with the Coroners and Justice Bill, but I assume that a direction to follow guidelines would be stronger than a direction to have regard to them.

Lord Cullen: Yes. It all depends on how much is built into the tail-end of the proposition, about it being not in the interests of justice. It depends on how that is interpreted.

Stewart Maxwell: Does Professor McDonald have any knowledge of or views on that change?

Professor McDonald: I am sorry, but I do not.

Cathie Craigie: Lord Cullen pointed out that the bill as it stands would give the sentencing council the power to amend the guidelines and come up with different guidelines. Is that right?

Lord Cullen: Yes, the sentencing council will do that. I think that it will have to review guidelines from time to time. That will be part of its practice.

Cathie Craigie: Stewart Maxwell talked about the situation in England and Wales. There, instead of being asked to have regard to the guidelines, the courts will be asked to follow them. Is there any chance that we could find ourselves in the same circumstance?

Lord Cullen: I think that that would be a step too far for the sentencing council. It would have to seek some legislative alteration, but that would be to alter the basic framework within which it had been created.

Paul Martin: Should the public be provided with more information on the sentencing of offenders?

Lord Cullen: There is a case for providing more information to the public on the range of sentences that is passed. That might address some of the concerns that have been expressed with regard to the bill and the consultation paper. It may get rid of the perception that there is inconsistency in sentencing or that the public do not quite understand what might be expected if a person comes before the court on a certain charge. I think that there is something to be said for that.

Paul Martin: Do you believe that the sentencing council will have a role to play in providing that information?

Lord Cullen: It probably will. However, equally, the information could be provided by any other means, such as good public information leaflets. Something for the public to read, with all the information in one document, might be a useful thing to produce. I do not know how a sentencing council or an advisory body would go about its work, but it might do it in a piecemeal way and it might be useful for the public to get the complete picture by looking at figures that indicate the range of possible sentences. As they will realise, every case will depend on its individual circumstances and the various factors in operation.

Nigel Don: Paragraph 7.4.2 of your written submission suggests what the membership of the sentencing council might be. You heard the previous discussion—in particular, I am thinking of Mr White’s comments about the sentencing council being given a certain independence and natural respectability if the judiciary were to form a minority of its membership, and the point about the SPS. Is that a reasonable argument? Has your take on the membership, as expressed at paragraph 7.4.2, changed slightly?

Lord Cullen: No. I am not persuaded that having a minority of people with experience of sentencing would be a good idea. We are talking about a body that will have to reflect, for certain purposes, what actually happens; it is not being introduced to bring about change, and it will not change practices. In essence, it will simply reflect what happens. If we are to have a sentencing council, surely we would look to sentencers as the people who are best equipped to play a part in the formation of guidelines.

Nigel Don: Thank you; that is very clear.

The Convener: Is there anything that you would like to say in conclusion, Professor McDonald?

Professor McDonald: I agree strongly with Lord Cullen’s last point. There is very little point to involving non-experts in making expert decisions. If the problem is public perception, and we then involve members of the public without improving public perception, perhaps we need to educate our masters, if such they are to be.

Lord Cullen: The proposed composition of the sentencing council is a bit of a mixture, in the sense that it will be a hybrid that is made up of a body that is controlled by the judiciary and an advisory body. We might well expect an advisory body to include members of the community, but what would they be doing on a body that will lay down the law and have the final say? That is one of the problems that is fleshed up when we consider the proposed composition of the body. There is certainly room for using the expertise of members of the community, but in a different way.

The Convener: Thank you, Professor McDonald and Lord Cullen. We are much obliged to you for giving your evidence so clearly and, if I may say so, in a very entertaining manner. Thank you.

Bill Butler: I have a question regarding something that Professor McDonald said. If there is to be such a body, are you against any non-expert being on it? I am sure that you did not intend it to be so, but your assertion seemed very antidemocratic. You used the phrase “educate our masters” and, as you know, that phrase was used against the Reform Act 1832. I am sure that you did not mean that, did you?

Professor McDonald: I think it was the later act, but that does not matter.

Bill Butler: It might have been 1868.

Professor McDonald: It was 1867, but that does not matter.

Of course I am not against the body having lay members. However, considering that we have a body of High Court judges, it is important that the expertise of lay members is not dominant in the proposed body. That must be the case.

Bill Butler: Thank you for clarifying that for me.

Professor McDonald: I am sorry if I misled you.
Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener: Item 5 is consideration of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. This is our substantive business for today. We shall take evidence particularly on the provisions in part 1 around sentencing and community payback orders. The committee held its first evidence-taking session last week, when we took evidence from judges, sheriffs and justices of the peace on the proposal to create a Scottish sentencing council. Today’s session will build on that evidence.

Our first witness is the right hon Henry McLeish, who was the chair of the Scottish Prisons Commission. He is well known to most of us around the table. I welcome Mr McLeish and invite him to make a short opening statement, after which we shall move to questions.

Right Hon Henry McLeish (Scottish Prisons Commission): Thank you, convener and committee members, for the invitation to speak to the committee in this evidence-taking session. As you pointed out, convener, I chaired the Scottish Prisons Commission, which reported last year. There has been a great deal of debate since then. We have a unique opportunity for significant and radical reform of the criminal justice system. We tried to base our work on evidence because it was clear that, over the past 10 or 20 years, we had built up an enormous amount of research in Scotland and we were keen to take that forward. Importantly, we have the opportunity, in Scotland, to move to a greater degree of bipartisanship on the issues that are before us.

I have the benefit of having been in politics for 30 years—I was one of you, although I am no longer so—and I understand the pressures that you face from the public, the press and a complex constituency of criminal justice interests for certain things to be done and said. Members of the Scottish Prisons Commission felt that we were an impartial group, and we provided 23 recommendations on ways in which to take matters forward in the public interest. At the end of the day, whether we are in government or out of government, in Parliament or out of Parliament, we are essentially serving the public. We believed that we have a great opportunity to reform the criminal justice system; therefore, our proposals were designed largely to take practical steps towards that on the basis of the available evidence.

I am pleased to participate in the debate and will seek to answer your questions to the best of my ability.

The Convener: Thank you for that, Mr McLeish. We move to questioning specifically on the Scottish sentencing council.

Bill Butler (Glasgow Anniesland) (Lab): Good morning, Mr McLeish. You said that the Scottish Prisons Commission’s report was evidence based. The report suggests that there are inconsistencies in sentencing. However, the Justice Committee has heard that there is very little, if any, empirical evidence to suggest that inconsistency exists. How would you address that seeming paradox? How would you respond to the charge that there is little empirical evidence of inconsistency?

Henry McLeish: I do not accept the premise that there is a paradox. There is sufficient evidence from various sources to suggest that there are inconsistencies in sentencing throughout Scotland. In a way, much of that is part of the judicial system. We have one of the best court systems and benches in the world. The judiciary’s impartiality and the division between the judiciary, Parliament and Government are sound. In that sense, it is no surprise that different decisions will be taken on different cases in different courts throughout Scotland.

Society, parliamentarians and the Government have the right to look at issues surrounding court decisions. I do not believe that the sentencers are being undermined. Society, through parliamentarians and, eventually, through the Government and legislation, is looking for transparency in decisions. If there is one thing that I recognise from my sojourn in politics, it is that the general public, if they are interested, are largely confused about why certain decisions are taken and why certain outcomes happen. Transparency is one issue.

Secondly, we as a society surely have the right to outline a framework within which the judges and sheriffs operate. In a sense, that is the kind of accountability that we would talk about in other areas, and it is part and parcel of what we are discussing.

Thirdly, if we can get to a point at which there is a framework and transparency, the public will start to understand more fully some of the issues involved. What perplexes me about the public response, which is, nevertheless, often understandable, is that the public fail to understand why certain cases with characteristics that are similar to those of previous high-profile cases end in a completely different outcome. It is incumbent on us all—me, at one step removed, you and the Government—to ensure that the system is understood much more clearly.
Overall, I do not think that there should be any real issues of division between the bench, parliamentarians and the Government about setting a framework. If the sentencing council works effectively, there might be fewer concerns as we see what is happening. There is fear and apprehension at the moment. Of course, there is the traditional view among the bench that it would rather get on with things with less meddling from the political classes.

Bill Butler: I hear what you are saying, but you said in response to my initial question—I think that I am quoting you correctly—that there is "sufficient evidence" from various sources of inconsistency. Will you outline those sources and back up your assertion that there is sufficient evidence?

Henry McLeish: Different levels of sourced evidence were not in the commission’s report—I hope that the report was brief and crisp. The first generalised level is publicly recorded cases that generate public debate in Scotland. That is one area. Perhaps, like committee members, I would not set a great deal of store by what is covered in the annals of the press. Secondly, there are court decisions—volumes of material emanate from the courts and come through the Government and the statistical research side. Those decisions illustrate how certain cases are dealt with. Thirdly, there is anecdotal evidence, which I do not take as seriously as the sourced evidence that you would find in Government and Parliament publications, but which illustrates that there are genuine concerns.

I do not accept for a minute that we want to meddle with the court system. I cannot say that the court system is one of the best in the world while also saying that we have to be radical in our approach to it. However, there is a case for the sentencing council. In an ideal world, that should not be an issue that divides the bench from parliamentarians or from the public.

Bill Butler: I think you said that there were four sources. Let us set to one side the anecdotal evidence and, as you put it, the publicly recorded cases or those that are covered in press reports. You talked about two other sources: court decisions and statistical sources. Are you saying that the recommendations of the commission are based absolutely on court decisions and statistical sources? How much credence, investigation and examination did the commission give the court decisions and statistical sources? Are you saying that the recommendations of the commission are based absolutely on court decisions and statistical sources?

Henry McLeish: In the work of the commission, the sentencing council and the other national agency that we suggested were not the most important considerations. The commission made 23 recommendations. I would argue that, in the grand scheme of things—I mean no disrespect to the Government’s concern about this—the sentencing council was not a high priority for the commission. Given what is before the committee, I still believe that it is not a priority.

Bill Butler: You said that transparency was one of the objectives of the commission’s report and of the proposed sentencing council. Other objectives were to promote consistency in sentencing and to assist in the development of sentencing policy. Do you think that the proposed measures represent significant progress from the present situation?

Henry McLeish: My view, as chairman of the commission, is that the sentencing council did not figure overprominently in the commission’s considerations. I say that not to escape the question, but because it was the reality. We felt—and I still feel—that the bench in Scotland faces much more important issues than just this issue around sentencing. I understand fully the emotions and concerns that the issue generates, but, for me, it is not a priority.

Bill Butler: That is very clear. Thank you.

Stewart Maxwell (West of Scotland) (SNP): Good morning, Mr McLeish. I want to take you back to the independence of the judiciary, which you touched on in your answers to Mr Butler. We heard oral evidence from judges and sheriffs last week in which they questioned the statement that the sentencing council would not affect, undermine or impinge on their independence. Do you accept their line of argument? What is your general view on the issue?

Henry McLeish: I do not accept that line of argument, because, as I said in my responses to Bill Butler, I do not think that the sentencing council is an important issue in the criminal justice system in Scotland. Secondly, that argument is a natural response from the bench, given its perception that the Parliament or Government wants to meddle in what it has regarded as its own sphere of activity. Leaving aside those two considerations, society as a whole has to be part of the process. I do not mean that society will be involved in any way in making judgments or decisions, but, in 2009, it is important that the public understand and appreciate more fully the workings of the system. Given what I have read and given what the make-up of the sentencing council will be, I do not think that the council can be regarded as a threat to the independence of the judiciary.

If you do not mind, convener, I will give an example of an area about which we hear a huge number of contradictory views. The presumption against six-month sentences is seen as a threat to the independence of the judiciary, but, at the same time, parliamentarians talk about having mandatory sentences for knife crime. My logic suggests that having a mandatory sentence for knife crime takes away completely the independence of the judiciary in one area of crime.
The arguments about the independence of the bench have become overemotional. That independence has been safeguarded and is respected. No one around the table or in Government wants to undermine it in any way. We are adding a bit of transparency, which will help the criminal justice system to operate effectively.

Stewart Maxwell: To sum up, your view is that a sentencing council would provide not complete, but greater, clarity for the public on the processes, Enabling people to understand them to a greater degree. You rather pre-empted my next question, which was about the strange anomaly of those who call for mandatory sentences calling for judicial independence at the same time, so I will not ask it.

In evidence last week, judges and sheriffs asserted that the creation of a sentencing council would lead to their ability to sentence being constrained to such an extent that they would, in effect, have given up the flexibility that they have currently to the council, which would have the last word on sentencing. Do you accept that assertion?

Henry McLeish: I do not accept it as a premise for the future activity of the sentencing council. If I were asked today which of the 23 recommendations I would leave out, it would be the recommendation that a sentencing council be established. I am not surprised that the bench is making a song and dance about the issue, because it sees anything that it thinks threatens its independence as an issue. For the bench it may well be an issue, but in the greater scheme of issues it is a modest measure. It has been discussed for some time, will not undermine the independence of the judiciary and will open a window for society generally. Other countries that have mandatory sentences are beginning to encounter problems—I am thinking of California’s three-strikes-and-you’re-out policy. We have a judiciary that is as independent as any judiciary in the democratic world could be. All of us, including members of the committee and the Government, value and prize that. Although I understand the bench’s reaction, I would not lose much sleep over the proposal.

Stewart Maxwell: You said that if you were to leave out one recommendation it would be the proposal for the establishment of a sentencing council. However, I presume that you support the 23 recommendations and would prefer all of them to be implemented.

Henry McLeish: Indeed. I was trying to give an indication of my priorities—nothing more. I fully support the 23 recommendations.

Robert Brown: As I understand it, you are saying that inconsistency in sentencing and the need for guidelines are largely a matter of perception and that, in reality, there may or may not be inconsistency. Is my interpretation of your position correct?

Henry McLeish: There are both perceptions and realities. Bill Butler asked a fair question about the corpus of evidence. Our discussions with an enormous number of people indicate that there is evidence of inconsistency. It is important that the bench’s perceptions of what a sentencing council would do and some politicians’ perceptions of the benefits of having such a council are handled more reasonably, as there are extremes at both ends. The establishment of a sentencing council is a modest measure that should not get too many people too excited.

Robert Brown: Two arguments are entwined here. First, are guidelines needed in the first place? Secondly, if there are to be guidelines, under whose authority should they proceed? Do you accept that there is a difference between the Parliament passing legislation that lays down policy and the range of sentences that are available in particular cases, a quango such as the Scottish sentencing council giving instructions to judges, and the judiciary deciding matters with advice of a sentencing council? There are three different levels.

Henry McLeish: I share the concerns of many of my former colleagues in the Parliament about quangos. I would not want to talk about the SENTENCING cOUNCIL issuing instructions, as “instructions” is a value-loaded and threatening word. I am not yet convinced that the Government thinks that setting up a sentencing council is the most important issue on the agenda, but it would help in relation to the view of society at large. I see no threat to the independence of the judiciary.
There is a widespread perception of inconsistency, which can be supported by evidence. However, I would hate the proposal for a sentencing council to dominate the important work that the committee has ahead of it. There is a grave danger of the issue becoming distorted.

Robert Brown: At the end of the day, if the SENTENCING cOUNCIL were an advisory council whose recommendations were considered by the appeal court in some appropriate way and sanctioned at that level, we would not face the constitutional issue that has caused so much angst in the higher and lower ranks of the judiciary. That is the key point that I am trying to get at.

Henry McLeish: You are absolutely right. We must debate, discuss and arrive at a format for the sentencing council. My low prioritisation of the recommendation revolves around society generally having better insight into what is happening. It is entirely up to members and the Government to decide the procedure for the council’s operation. I have no strong views on the issue. My only concern is that the sentencing council should not appear as an ultra-quasi-legal body that looks like it is imposing its individual judgments on the work of the courts. That would be reprehensible and a backward step that would not help us to maintain the independence of the system that we value so much.

Robert Brown: Thank you for those helpful comments.

The Convener: In a moment, we will move on to the issue of community payback and alternatives to custody, which is of particular interest, but I am still slightly troubled by the fact that there appears to be a lack of empirical evidence of inconsistency in sentencing. Much of the evidence is apocryphal. Do you know of any research that has demonstrated the existence of inconsistency? You say that you spoke to a number of people; can you give us examples that arose in those discussions and inquiries?

Henry McLeish: I will try to be upfront with the committee. First, the issue did not take up a great deal of the commission’s time during its work, which lasted about nine months. Secondly, there is an amazing array of court statistics in Scotland that could provide the committee with the evidence that it requires. Thirdly, it is clear that the issue has been rumbling around in parliamentary and Government debate for some time. For that reason, the commission and I thought that the proposal had merit. The laws that parliamentarians make provide frameworks for what the bench does anyway, so the establishment of a sentencing commission seemed to be a modest step forward, especially in relation to the public, who figured prominently in other aspects of our work.

Bill Butler: Are you saying that no analysis of the evidence took place and that there was no real research? If so, there is no evidential basis for the recommendation.

Henry McLeish: That is not entirely true. I have indicated that the establishment of a sentencing council was not a priority for the commission. After analysing the criminal justice and prison systems, we came up with recommendations. The proposal fitted in with the thinking of the commission, which wanted far more transparency to be injected into the criminal justice system in Scotland.

Bill Butler: With respect, the committee recognises that point; no member has trouble with greater transparency. I will break the question down. Was any research undertaken?

Henry McLeish: We did not commission any research.

Bill Butler: So there was no scientific analysis of the data that you say are lying about in the court system.

Henry McLeish: We did not—

Bill Butler: Am I right in saying that there was no scientific analysis?

Henry McLeish: Let me answer your question. We did not seek any original research. However, the commission thought that the establishment of a sentencing commission was a sound idea, as part of wider society’s view of the criminal justice system. That is why we supported it.

Bill Butler: You are telling the committee this morning that there is no scientific or evidential basis for the recommendation.

Henry McLeish: We did not seek any evidence. As I have said to you, there are sources that would show inconsistencies. We happily acknowledged and accepted that. However, within the commission, we discussed issues—

Bill Butler: With respect, what were those sources? If you sought them out, did you look at them so that you were content to make such a recommendation? If you did not seek them out, look at them and analyse them as a committee and if there is no independent research analysis, your recommendation is mere assertion, is it not?

Henry McLeish: No, it is not mere assertion. It is confusing to suggest that we did not have any evidence. We did not seek any evidence.

Bill Butler: Therefore, you did not have any evidence before you. If you did not seek it out, you did not have it before you—is that right?

Henry McLeish: In our nine months of work right across the criminal justice system, the issue intervened at different levels, at different times and on different subjects. We did not commission any independent research because we did not consider the matter a priority. We know, however, that the court statistics in Scotland—I have seen a lot of them—show inconsistencies.

To answer Bill Butler’s question directly, we did not have evidence on which we based the recommendation, but it was consistent with the wider thinking on most of the recommendations that we made. As a consequence, we were happy to make the recommendation.

Bill Butler: So, at best, you could argue that the recommendation—you say that it is not a priority, so I am astonished that it is a recommendation—was based on an impression. Would that be correct?

Henry McLeish: No, it would not.

Bill Butler: What would you say, then?

Henry McLeish: It goes well beyond an impression. In looking at the vast array that is the criminal justice system, you are focusing on the issue of the proposed sentencing council. However, we were looking at the whole panoply of sentencing, including specific issues such as sentences of six months and less. We knew that there was significant variation in the court system in Scotland in relation to six-month sentences. We did not say, “The sentencing council is to be discussed today—let’s have all the evidence,” but it permeated our work on other considerations that there was a clear case to be made for a sentencing council.

Bill Butler: Would you recommend such an approach to a student who was writing a PhD?

Henry McLeish: I do not accept the inference of your questions. I started off by saying that the issue was not a priority for the commission. We did not need a PhD-type research programme to inform the commission members that, right across the board of our considerations, there was inconsistency in the court system.

Bill Butler: It seems that you did not need any research programme at all.

Henry McLeish: No, that is not true. I have tried to explain. If I may be robust, convener, this is a very unproductive line of questioning. I have said that the issue was not a priority for us. I have also said that, in coming to the 22 other recommendations and in undertaking nine months of work, we came across issues in every court in Scotland. Some of our recommendations are about the efficiency of the court system. I do not accept that there was no basis for including the recommendation in the commission’s final report.

Bill Butler: I am obliged.

The Convener: We will leave that line of questioning and move on to the use of imprisonment and community payback.

Robert Brown: In many ways, this is at the heart of the commission’s report. You had in the back of your minds issues such as overcrowding in prisons and the ineffectiveness of certain sentences, not least prison sentences. The report states that prison should be used for those offenders whose crimes are serious and violent and for those who present a risk to public safety. Can you give us some examples of how such an approach would change the current use of custodial sentences?

Henry McLeish: We were keen to find out the profile of the prison population. It seemed elementary to find out, first, who was in prison and why they were in prison. It is self-evident that for society, for the press, for politicians and for the public in general, people who commit serious crimes—we can define those—should be in prison, for serious reasons to do with the need for rehabilitation and, more important, public safety.

When we looked at the profile of the prison population, we found that the category that I have just described did not make up the majority of the prisoners in Scotland. For example, we found that, in 2007-08, there were more people on remand in prison than people who had been sentenced. However, the 2007-08 figures confirmed that 76 per cent of those who were given a custodial sentence received a sentence of less than six months. Prisons were being used to warehouse people who had incredibly deep alcohol and drug abuse problems. We also found that, in most of our prisons, 75 to 80 per cent of prisoners had some mental or physical illness. The profile of the prison population in that respect again suggested that prisoners were being warehoused.

The next issue that we examined was compliance. We discovered that there had been a vast increase in the number of people who returned to prison not because they had committed further crimes but because they had broken the rules. The problem of prisoners serving life sentences by instalments was another major facet of the prison population—so much so that, in 2005-06, the 7,000 prisoners who were given a custodial sentence had between them 45,000 previous custodial convictions. That leads to the revolving-door syndrome.

The prison officers were keen to tell us that the more space there is in prisons and the less time they have to spend on churning and the administration of short-term prisoners, the more they can do with the serious offenders in our prisons who need rehabilitation and who need to be there for long periods to protect the public. The initial phase of the commission’s work was to analyse the prison population and gauge what we could do with the group of offenders who need not be in prison.

Robert Brown: Many of us would accept the general logic of what the commission found in that direction. However, is there not a significant resource issue in terms of long-term savings in expensive prison costs versus the short-term need to fund the alternatives that you seek to put in place? How important was the resource issue in the commission’s thinking on such matters?
Henry McLeish: Very important. In the final part of the report, we made it clear that no one should be under the impression that the proposed changes could be made without considerable input of new resources—the statement was as bald as that. There must be new resources. If we are successful in the long term, there could conceivably be a transfer of resources from prisons to the community, but that cannot happen in the short term. Therefore, we argued—I have argued this with the minister, too—that we need new resources. For community sentences to work, parliamentarians, the public and the bench must be assured that they can trust the alternatives. We need new resources to send a powerful message that community sentences can work and do not pose the risks that some people have implied. Resources are critical. We cannot move down the proposed path to any significant degree unless we have the resources—not money just shuffled around in a budget or produced through creative accounting in either the Parliament or the Government, but new resources physically on the ground to make community payback a genuine option.

Robert Brown: In fairness to the Government, I point out that £2 million has been invested to get current community sentences up to scratch. Do you agree, however, that that does not deal with the new community sentences that would result from the policies that you advocate in the new community sentences that would result from the policies that you advocate in the commission’s report? Are you able to give us any ball-park figures for the cost of those?

Henry McLeish: I do not have any figures, partly because we were not asked to consider that. The commission was seeking ideas and recommendations.

We looked at the cost—whatever it is—in this way. Let us take, for example, the issue of drug and alcohol abuse. Alcohol abuse is an embarrassment to us on a global scale. We have the eighth largest consumption of alcohol in the world, and there are those who abuse it. In prisons, there are enormous problems with drugs and alcohol. If we want any form of payback in the community, we must provide facilities for drug rehab and detox. In Scotland, there are simply not enough of those facilities to tackle the current problems, without planning ahead. That is why I say that significant resources are needed; £2 million is a start, but the indications are that much more is needed even to tackle the health issues that are related to the policy.

The problems of criminal justice cannot be solved by the criminal justice system alone. Drug and alcohol abuse are major health matters, so I see no reason why the health budget should not provide facilities and resources for the community payback scheme in each community. It would be less significant to take a few million pounds from the health budget than it would be to redirect a few million pounds within the criminal justice budget, which is very small.

On a wider theme, three quarters of Scotland’s prisoners come from one quarter of Scotland’s local government wards. Those areas, by definition, suffer the most crimes, have the most victims and produce the most prisoners. We, as a society, must appreciate that the criminal justice system deals only with the symptoms and effects and that the wider causes of the problems are deeply rooted in inequalities in our communities. In Scotland, the inequalities are as bad as those in England, where the situation is only slightly better than the situation in America.

We have massive problems with inequalities and with alcohol and drug abuse. Unless and until resources are allocated to tackle those problems, there will be a shallow feel to recommendations that say that community payback and community options are the best way forward.

Robert Brown: We have heard evidence about the use that is made of short-term sentences. The sheriffs, in particular, have given us oral and written evidence to the effect that short-term custodial sentences can be effective and are necessary in some circumstances. They have also told us that the current use of such sentences is generally appropriate. Those people deal with sentencing at the sharp end, day in, day out in the courts. Do you have a view on that? Can you give us a feel for the circumstances in which, in your view, short-term custodial sentences will continue to have a place?

Henry McLeish: Yes. That takes us back to earlier discussions about the independence of the judiciary.

Certain countries have gone so far as to legislate to ensure that no custodial sentence is less than six months. That was an option for us—to legislate, and that would be it. However, to preserve the independence of the judiciary and to take a commonsense approach, we rejected that option. Of the people who go to prison for less than six months, a small group have committed what I would regard as serious offences, one of which is domestic violence. I will not go into it, but that is a heinous crime yet, for this, that or the other reason, a tougher sentence is often not imposed.

The policy memorandum to the bill states:

“We want to make it clear that sentencers should not impose a custodial sentence of 6 months or less, unless the particular circumstances of the case lead them to believe that no other option would be appropriate.”

That respects the independence of the bench but gives a hint that society wants the judiciary to look more closely at custodial sentences of less than six months. Nevertheless, if the bench and the public are to have confidence in the alternative, we need the resources and a new mindset, and we must ensure that the alternative works.

In 2007-08, 16,700 custodial sentences and 16,700 community sentences were given in Scotland. It is not that community sentences are not playing their part, but the prison population has risen steadily whereas community sentencing has plateaued over the past four years. There is a good mix of sentencing, but we could go much further.

Robert Brown: The sheriffs argued that, at the moment, they do not send anybody to jail whom they do not have to send to jail. If all that the statute does is formalise that, we ain’t going to make much difference to what happens. I assume that that was not the intention of the commission.

Henry McLeish: It certainly was not. There are circumstances in which six-month sentences have been applied and should continue to be applied. However, we proposed a presumption against short-term sentences, as there are other ways of dealing with offenders. If prison were working for a large section of the population, there would not be so much reoffending and so many reconvictions. Those outcomes show that we are not best served by the current practice. We believe that the bench could do more but, to be fair to them, they need alternatives, and the range of alternatives varies across Scotland. I would not like to think that they would imperil anybody in a community by placing an offender in the community when the full range of facilities was not available to them.

Robert Brown: Let me sum up the resource issue. If there were no more resource available bar the £2 million that has been allocated for community sentences, would you still recommend the substantial change in the law that you have proposed, which is a presumption against short-term sentences?

Henry McLeish: Yes, I would. I accept the basis of the recommendation, as there are solid ideas that we think can be pursued. As I have said, community sentences are equivalent to custodial sentences. However, if you speak to the public, to parliamentarians or to the bench, you will encounter a degree of scepticism or cynicism about community sentences and a degree of concern for public safety. Unless and until we overcome that, we will not get the full benefits of the commission’s recommendations. That is why resources are a critical factor in moving us down that road.

Dr Richard Simpson (Mid Scotland and Fife) (Lab): Thank you, convener, for allowing me to speak even though I am not a member of the committee. I was the Deputy Minister for Justice and have worked in the prison service, so this is a particular interest of mine. I also acknowledge Henry McLeish’s views on the sentencing of women, which is where some of the debate started.

Things have already been tried in the sentencing of women. As the Deputy Minister for Justice, on the basis of “Women Offenders: A Safer Way”, which was produced by Sheila McLean, I introduced the time-out facility in Bath Street, Glasgow, which now treats 500 drug addicts who would otherwise have gone into custody. However, at the same time that the number of women who are admitted to prison on fine default has fallen, the number who are on remand has increased substantially. The changes made—which were, in effect, to introduce the sort of community sentences to which you have referred in treating the major drug problems that we have—have not led to a reduction in the number of admissions to prison. We are still faced with the situation of more women going to prison and the number of daily residents also doubling—both factors are important. In a sense, community sentencing has been tried with women and is evaluated as helping to reduce reoffending by taking those people out of their drug problems. Nevertheless, how will it alter the continued build-up in prisons if it is used similarly for male prisoners with the same results? The logic of pursuing it seems problematic, to say the least, unless there is a huge increase in resources to introduce multiple time-out centres and alternative community sentences for those with alcohol addiction.

Henry McLeish: I will briefly give some context.

Over the past decade, if the crime level has gone down, the prison population has gone up; if the crime level has stayed the same, the prison population has gone up; and if the crime level has gone up, the prison population has gone up. Those are the facts. There is therefore no correlation between the level of crime and the prison population.

Secondly, the bigger issue is that, although we did some in-depth analysis, we could not explain why the prison population at Cornton Vale has increased by well over 120 per cent in the past decade. There are issues to do with women on remand and younger women getting more involved in violent street scenes as a result of alcohol. To address Richard Simpson’s point about the prison population, like most prisons, Cornton Vale is a very depressing place. We do not deny that there are some serious criminals in Cornton Vale who need to be there for their own... benefit and for public safety. However, there is a more substantial group of people in Compton Vale who I believe need not be there. They have committed crimes, so they should be punished, but their punishments in Compton Vale only add to their career in crime. They are pathetic and, in the main, they are some of the most serious drug addicts; their alcohol problems and the damage that has been done are also enormous.

Richard Simpson is right to say that community sentences have been tried. However, we see no conceivable reason why the female prisoner population should have increased. Does it have something to do with the Scottish mindset? The male prisoner population did not increase to the same extent. If the problem is alcohol and drugs, the offenders need significant rehab facilities. It is clear to me that, although there is the time-out facility in Glasgow, there are no comparable facilities elsewhere in Scotland. For drugs, there is a postcode lottery, which is an issue that we can tackle. Why has Scotland’s women prisoner population increased by 120 per cent? I do not know the answer; I am posing the question.

Ten years ago, when I was the minister responsible for home affairs, I wanted the prison population at Compton Vale to be halved from 200 to 100. That was to ensure that the serious prisoners would still be looked after but the rest of the prison would be part hospital, part detox facility and part rehab facility. It was also partly to ensure that serious support was provided for the women, some of whom were there because it provided respite from barbaric partners and domestic violence.

I went to Compton Vale not long before we published the report. There was a young woman there who was in for alcohol and drugs offences. It was not the first time that she had been in. There was a round-table discussion with the governor and she said that she was getting out the next day. I asked whether she was pleased about that and she said, “No, because I’ll be back.” I asked the governor what support she was getting. She did not have a doctor or a house—or a family, because they had disowned her. The governor said, “This is only Wednesday. She’s going out on Thursday.” I upbraided the governor and said that that was a pathetic answer. Two weeks later, Lesley Riddoch, who was on the commission, found the woman lying in the gutter outside Starbucks. Please tell me how prison worked for her.

In Compton Vale and Barlinnie, we see dysfunctional people who are suffering from a wide range of mental and physical illness. That is not an excuse for committing crime, but it suggests that different forms of punishment might be beneficial to them as well as to society.

Dr Simpson: I was not saying that the community sentences are not working. You have made the point extremely well, but I would like you to comment a little further. The problem is that if someone has a sentence of less than three months, they will not get on to any sort of treatment programme in the prison. As you said in your opening remarks, it is about warehousing for the prison. The prison concentrates on prisoners who get sentences of more than six months. Is the answer not to have the community justice authorities commence assessment and in-reach programmes in the prison, which will continue outside, rather than taking these people out of the prison? Many people need the boundaries of prison to start with. They need the containment of prison to get to the point where they can engage.

One illustration is the Airborne Initiative, which the Labour Government abandoned after I left office. It was abandoned because those with a drug problem who were sent to Airborne could not engage in treatment to tackle their drug problem and the default rate was therefore massive. The situation of short-term offenders is exactly the same. If they are not treated and managed and do not begin a treatment programme, we will have difficulties. Surely the key thing is to link the community justice authority and the prison and not go into all this stuff on different sentences.

Henry McLeish: We need both. The sentencing issue is important. The mindset that we are locked into in Scotland is that prison is a discrete alternative: it has walls, barbed wire and fences and it has been around for 100 years or longer. Community justice is a more complex and difficult alternative for the public and bench alike. That said, why can we not move to a situation where the prison and community sentences are merged? People have similar problems, whether they are dealt with in the community or in prison.

Why can there not be a major national health service provision at Compton Vale? Why can we not offer a range of alternative services in the community? Why not have proper rehabilitation for serious offenders? We need to accept that remand prisoners do not get access to anything. The 2007-08 figures show that 50 per cent of prisoners got a sentence of less than three months and 76 per cent got a sentence of less than six months. In that short time, it is not possible to do anything coherent by way of the prisoner rehabilitation that we are discussing.

I want to see a complete shake-up in our thinking so that it is no longer a case of behind closed walls for some and in the community for others. We need an integrated criminal justice system, we need to change the mindset and we need to be able to shift resources more easily. Society as a whole needs to be involved, through Government departments such as health and education.

Huge energy is involved in running Polmont young offenders institution. However, when you ask about the educational background of the young men there, the answer is that it was really hit and miss. Most of them either rejected school or were rejected by school. One would think that their arrival at Polmont would be seen as an ideal opportunity for second-chance basic learning, but no—not in Scottish prisons. We can do a lot in our prisons that we are not doing at present. More positive outcomes would result from people taking a more flexible view of the whole system.

Nigel Don: If I heard correctly your answer to Robert Brown’s last question, you suggested that, even if it was unclear where resources for community sentences would come from, we should still push in that direction. I will put the question the other way round. If there were more resources in the community, would there be any need to do any of the things that you suggest? Would it not be clear to the bench that they should use community sentence disposals?

Henry McLeish: No. That is my bigger concern. As I have said in other fora, much of what we suggested in our report is common sense, and our view is that some of it could have been implemented some time ago. In talking of resources, we are talking about mindset. At Cornton Vale, there is also the mystery package—the vastly increased numbers—for which people, as yet, have no explanation.

We need both resources and the proposed changes. What I have tried to say honestly to the committee today—and I have been strong on resources—is that we can proceed with our recommendations. There are community options, and they can be used more greatly than at present. Criminal justice is a question of trust. I am worried about what the public, bench and press think, and politicians, too, clearly have to be reassured that this is the right step to take. For that to happen, trust has to be translated through physical developments including resources. We can do that, but resources would be a real help.

Cathie Craigie (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth) (Lab): If the presumption is against short custodial sentences, could that lead to the imposition of longer sentences?

Henry McLeish: We have an intelligent bench. One of our fears was that, if we said that there should be no sentence of less than six months, people would find a way of getting round that. That is why we came to the conclusion that we would rather work in a politically bipartisan way and with the support of the bench and the public by legislating for only a presumption against sentences of less than six months. Essentially, if the sheriff felt that a non-custodial sentence would be inappropriate, he could make a case for applying a sentence of less than six months. That is the best explanation that I can give of that.

Cathie Craigie: Will we just need to wait and see on that issue?

Henry McLeish: I am an optimist in life. The judiciary on the bench have operated for a considerable time, they have lots of experience and they are concerned about their independence. The reason why we opted for six months—some people might call that a compromise, as other countries do not have six-month sentences—is that we do not want tariffs just to drift up.

We have issued a challenge to everyone to make the proposals work, and we believe that they can work. As at the end of 15 May, we had 8,300 people in our prisons. The American experience suggests that—for a variety of reasons, known and unknown—the prison population will just go up and up. We have identified ways of keeping imprisonment for those who need it and providing other alternatives for those who could be better cared for. However, we will still punish people: our report suggested not alternatives to punishment but alternatives to prison.

Cathie Craigie: Let me move on to those alternatives. The commission’s report stated:

“the key challenge is to make community sentences more meaningful, visible and immediate in their operation and impact.”

Will the community payback orders that are provided for in the bill offer the immediacy and impact that the report rightly identified?

Henry McLeish: That is very much what we had in mind. First, we want to see the courts operate in a different way. Secondly, we want more payback options in the community.

Indeed, perhaps I have been listening to the convener too much—we agreed about this over a few refreshments at a dinner in Edinburgh—but I want a very tough line to be taken with those on community sentences. By that, I mean that, whereas a custodial sentence is dramatic, reportable and accountable—the offender leaves in a white van—a community sentence does not seem to the public to have the same seriousness, immediacy or urgency. An offender is not sent down to a community sentence as happens when a custodial sentence is given.

One of our recommendations that is meeting resistance—I want to explain this—is that we want the courts to act in the same way whether they impose a custodial or community sentence. We want a message to be sent to the public that a community sentence is a real sentence. The person given such a sentence should also disappear in a van to start it, although they will then, of course, go back into civvies.

We want social workers to provide fewer reports. It was instructive that in America—justice is a bit rougher justice there—the judge who is equivalent to our sheriff has a computer in front of him with four parts to the information. He does not have a “This Is Your Life” report if the person has been involved only in some minor crime. The system there is much more efficient, and we want to see the same here. We think that the Government hands down far too many instructions about when reports are needed and what length they are required to be. Such reports are not needed in all cases but, sadly, they are often provided. There is a massive bureaucracy.

On another problem in the criminal justice system, we suggested to the Association of Directors of Social Work and local government that there should be a single-day response, but that has not been accepted. The latest suggestion is that community sentences should start within three weeks or 12 days.

On the efficiency of the courts, I think that we could do an awful lot to send powerful messages that the offender will be punished. Although a different sentence might be given, the sentence should look to all intents and purposes solid and secure.

In addition, we recommended that progress courts should be part of the sheriff court apparatus. Over the past decade, the biggest increase in people going to prison has been in those who are recalled for breaking rules of probation or whatever. We have had a 1,000 per cent increase in the number of recalls to prison over the past decade. Essentially, that means that, as a society, we are asking people who are totally dysfunctional to turn up for this or that meeting. We are asking them to do things that they have never done in their life, and if there is a breach the next step is to send them back to prison.

The Pew Center in the States has published a very good report on Kansas, which is a very conservative state—nearly a southern state, but not quite. Over the past two or three years, there has been a remarkable reduction in recalls through a series of incentivisations, some of them financial. As a result, the prison population has gone down.

If our progress courts are to come into play, what should happen is this: if someone is asked to turn up, somebody will go and drag them out of bed—and I know that there will be human rights considerations—so that they are at the meeting.

The system that we suggest does not pretend for a minute that people will just turn up, because that would be fanciful and ridiculous, but it will be tough in getting people to where they need to be. People should not need that, but those in question are so dysfunctional that they have probably never turned up for a meeting in their life.

Along with the progress courts and the way in which we deal with people, the third point about payback is that a wide menu of appropriate choices should be available to the bench. There would then be less pressure on sentencers to put people inside if they felt that it was a good idea not to do so.

Cathie Craigie: Robert Brown focused on resources. I think that the majority of committee members will agree with what you said, but making community sentences work with immediate effect will take resources. I do not think that the figure of £2 million that has been mentioned in relation to this bill will do the job. Without resources, and without the people to go to somebody’s door and say, “Right, come on—you’re coming along,” the ideas are meaningless. We are kidding ourselves on. What can be done without financial resources?

Henry McLeish: Powerful recommendations have been made, but I have made it clear that we need resources to make them work effectively and to give a wide choice to the bench.

In the era of austerity that we have been promised post-2011, public expenditure will be tight. I am not convinced that the money that we spend on criminal justice in local government or in central Government is being spent effectively. I have spoken about having more efficient court systems, fewer social work reports and less bureaucracy. Such things may have only marginal significance, but in the current economic climate I would like to think that, with new resources, every pound that we invest in criminal justice will yield a far better return.

The challenge is not only to central Government but to local government—to the 32 councils and to the community justice authorities. They have a contribution to make.

The recommendations are sound and should be taken up. My concern is that they will not obtain the maximum advantage for society unless a sensible level of resources is available.

Cathie Craigie: So, investment now would pay off in later years, when money might be redirected from the prison service.

Henry McLeish: Cathie, you probably know as much as I do about these issues. What you say is logical, but it is also illogical in a sense. If we could redirect funds now, it would be helpful. However, given the prison population and the prison budget, it would be hard to transfer any resources until there were significant changes in prison numbers.

Even if we reduce—by a handful or even more—the population in any one prison, we will still not be able to shift resources because the capital asset and the overheads and staff will still be there. A huge transformation is required in the longer term.

I have spoken about bipartisanship, and I do not like the fact that Scotland is out of line with most developed, western European countries. I do not like the fact that we are suggesting policies that make no sense to people in any other country. If our policies were working and the outcomes were positive, we would not need to worry, but this is another benchmark of lack of progress. If we are interested in Scotland the brand, we should seek to have the best court system in the world. On many criminal justice activities, we are currently Europe’s poor neighbour.

Paul Martin (Glasgow Springburn) (Lab): You raised the issue of fast-track disposals. Would community courts provide us with an opportunity to develop that principle?

Henry McLeish: We visited Finland and New York, where we saw the original Red Hook, whose equivalent is in Liverpool. We went to the Bronx, Brooklyn and downtown Manhattan, where we discussed the possibility of setting up special courts of one sort or another to deal with specific problems. The commission’s view, to which I subscribe, is that radical reforms in every court in Scotland are preferable to creating special courts such as knife courts and drugs courts. From my political experience, I know that establishing a special court is good, generates publicity and moves matters forward for a while, but why can we not have a system in which more radical ideas—the best ideas in the world—are implemented in every court, so that every court becomes a special court in relation to the totality of problems that it faces? We judged that changes could be made in every court, with the co-operation of the bench and criminal justice social work.

Paul Martin: I appreciate your point—that existing courts should be more efficient—but if we established community courts some of the resources that are provided currently could be redirected to delivery in the community. The Lord Advocate and others with experience in the judiciary have advocated that approach on many occasions. You may have advocated a similar approach in your long political history.

Henry McLeish: I may have been there before—my memory is not as good as it used to be. The commission thought that resourcing courts throughout Scotland—getting changes in every court—was important. On the other hand, we know where the bulk of crime, victims, prisoners and those serving community sentences in Scotland are located. It comes back to the point that Richard Simpson made—should we invest resources in community sentencing or in prisons? Should we put resources into the poorest areas in Scotland, which suffer from massive inequalities—from his experience, Paul Martin knows more about that than I do—and intervene before matters reach the courts? I would rather see all the courts develop and invest more resources in the courts that serve the areas with the biggest problems.

Paul Martin: You expressed concern about the timeframe for fast-track justice. Would the community court model not give us the ability to deliver fast-track, same-day justice in practice, as it would allow us to deal with the individuals who commit crimes in the communities in which they committed them? Might that not save considerable resources in the long run?

Henry McLeish: You are right to make the point that community is a powerful concept. The scenario that you have described could happen. I suggest three measures to ensure consistency throughout Scotland: first, we should establish progress courts to chase people up; secondly, we should offer a wide choice; and thirdly, the same-day justice that is provided for custodial sentences should be available in every court. However, I accept your point that there is a need to ensure that the maximum amount of resources go to the areas where they are needed. From the evidence base, we know where the problems are, but we are not doing a great deal, as a society, to tackle basic inequalities.

The Convener: You have pre-empted some of my questions. You dealt with the issue of offenders who lead chaotic lifestyles not turning up to meetings. I think that you would concede that the existing community service order compliance rate is much less than satisfactory, even though, for perfectly sound reasons, social workers are in many cases reluctant to report a breach. Some people simply have no intention of carrying out their community service order. How will the proposed legislation tighten that up?

Henry McLeish: We have to take as our premise that, for some people, there is no action that we—those who are here or the Government—could devise that would be of benefit.

You made a point about recall, breaches and rule breaking. In a modern society, it is ridiculous that we put people in a situation when we know that they will be unable to abide by its conditions. If they frequently break the rules, a custodial sentence is ultimately available. However, the commission’s view is that not enough is being done. I agree that, in our so-called sophisticated society, there has to be a rougher end of justice. If we want to stop people being recalled, breaching or going into prison, some tough action in the community would help considerably.

The Convener: Yes, but those offenders are not prepared to co-operate. We must remember that they have been sentenced to community service as an alternative to custody. They are drinking in the last chance saloon, and they are carrying on drinking—it would probably be more appropriate to say that they are taking drugs—and reoffending. How do you cope with such people? I see nothing in the provisions that you are suggesting that is likely to cope with that element.

Henry McLeish: Again, I would caution you on that. Although we have specific recommendations, they are interlocking. What I have tried to do—this answers one of Cathie Craigie's points—is to get certain measures to start to interlock to provide a better result. While I do not disagree with the cynical view, which is that for some people community sentencing will never be appropriate, I do not think that we have given community sentencing, in its widest sense, our best shot. By implementing the recommendations we can start to do that.

When a sheriff gives someone an order, it is often the last time that the sheriff will have any involvement until that person is sent away. Taking the criticism that we are talking about, we are trying to fill that gap. That is why the progress courts have a different role for social workers.

I saw something in Barlinnie that I fully support. Prison officers have various forms of what they call buddying schemes. Why do we need fully qualified, skilled, professional social workers involved in the community when we can deploy resources on new ideas that have proven their worth elsewhere? To describe it as hard-line or tough is fair enough, but there are lots of things that we can do that we are not doing. I am confident that, in that sense, the recommendations can help.

The Convener: All of us around the table—I include you in that—have a duty to the victims of crime. In many instances, the victims of crime do not accept that community sentences work. You have outlined the lack of visibility and the lack of feedback into the community about what precisely happens. In short, the public think, "They’re getting away with it.” Is there anything in the report that would provide reassurance to the public?

Henry McLeish: Yes. I return to my earlier point. First, the interlocking nature of the recommendations, especially on the efficiency of the court system, will give that perceptible reassurance that justice is happening and that offenders are not walking away. The opposite perception worries me as much as it worries you.

Secondly, we have a situation in which the outcomes, whether in custody or in the community, are not good. We must improve those outcomes, and the recommendations can work to tackle some of those issues.

Bill Butler gave me a hard time about the evidence base, but we took an awful lot of evidence and considered an awful lot of reports on the public perception of crime. I do not mean to be critical when I say that it is interesting that, often, the view of the press and politicians does not square up with what the public actually think.

There have been recent cases in Scotland in which the public thought that the sentence did not match the crime. The public want longer and harder sentences to be handed down to people who commit heinous crimes, but they are often a bit more sympathetic than the press would have us believe when people who are involved in drugs and alcohol are given prison sentences of less than six months.

There is something out there that we can tackle. On sentencing and consistency, many of the people whom I used to represent would say, "Why did he get that sentence? I want longer sentences for crimes that matter", but they would not want someone to be locked up in Cornton Vale for six months whose crime was theft but whose problem was that their brain was awash with alcohol and probably that they had been beaten by their partner. I am not a sentimentality merchant. We covered the whole prison population and did not single out Cornton Vale in our report. There are big questions for us all.

The Convener: I think that we can agree that the outcomes are not good under either heading. However, sometimes our communities require a little respite from the shoplifter who has offended 40 or 50 times, the person who has driven for the fourth time while drunk and disqualified and the small-time drug pusher who has previous convictions. Such offenders normally attract sentences of six months or less. Is the community not entitled to look to us to provide protection from such people, albeit in the short term?

Henry McLeish: That argument was put to us and we can see merit in it in the short term, but I reject it because what people want in communities throughout Scotland is a long-term future in which the crime figures go down and people are less afraid of crime and can have a sense of security. The respite approach is no more than a short-term consideration. When I was a member of the Parliament, the chief constable of Fife Constabulary said to me that if he could get authorisation to take 90 kids to Blackpool there
The public want solutions for the long term. They want harder, stiffer, more appropriate sentences for serious offenders and they can be quite tolerant of short-term approaches that are seen to work and that involve some payback.

The Convener: We will not go down the road of considering the temporary increase in the Blackpool crime rate that might have arisen if the chief constable’s suggestion had been taken up.

Henry McLeish: That would have been an English problem.

The Convener: Exactly—not our problem.

As there are no more questions for Mr McLeish, I thank him for giving up his time this morning, which we have greatly appreciated.

On resuming—

The Convener: We welcome panel 2: Councillor Margaret Kennedy, convener, and Anne Pinkman, chief officer, of Fife and Forth Valley community justice authority; Jim Hunter, chief officer, north Strathclyde community justice authority; Tony McNulty, chief officer, Lanarkshire community justice authority; and Raymund McQuillan, vice-convener, and Yvonne Robson, professional development manager, from the Association of Directors of Social Work.

Councillor Kennedy is the Liberal Democrat member for Cupar in Fife Council and, since 2007, she has been vice-chair of the council’s police, fire and safety committee. However, she attends today in her capacity as convener of Fife and Forth Valley community justice authority. I invite her to make some brief opening remarks.

Councillor Margaret Kennedy (Fife and Forth Valley Community Justice Authority): As convener of Fife and Forth Valley community justice authority, I welcome and thank you for your decision to come to Alloa to take evidence on the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. The proposed legislation is important. It has its roots in the Scottish Government’s review of community penalties and the recent Scottish Prisons Commission’s review, led by Henry McLeish. The CJAs positively welcomed the reviews and, likewise, we welcome the opportunity to participate in the bill process. The CJAs support and endorse the intentions of the bill, as outlined in the written evidence that we submitted. We will be pleased to answer questions on our written evidence and any other questions that you wish to ask.

The Convener: Thank you. We will proceed to questions. The panel is fairly formidable, so I suggest that we pose the questions through you, Councillor Kennedy. If you feel the need to invite one of the officials to respond, please do so. We will obviously want to hear from them under specific headings that are part of their remit. Paul Martin will start the questioning.

Paul Martin: What are your views on the purposes and principles of sentencing as set out in the bill?

Jim Hunter (North Strathclyde Community Justice Authority): The principles of sentencing are always two or threefold. Punishment is certainly always part of sentencing considerations; rehabilitation and restoration to victims or the community are the other principal considerations.

Paul Martin: Do you want to highlight any areas of sentencing that could be added to the bill?

Jim Hunter: No—the purposes and principles of sentencing are covered fairly fully in section 1.

The Convener: We move on to the Scottish sentencing council, which was a fairly vexed issue this morning.

Bill Butler: Good morning, colleagues. Does more need to be done to provide sentencers with sentencing guidelines, and to provide the public with accurate information on the sentencing process? If so, could the proposed sentencing council play a role in that?

Would Councillor Kennedy like to lead, or direct someone else to do so?

Councillor Kennedy: I am happy for Ms Pinkman to lead.

Anne Pinkman (Fife and Forth Valley Community Justice Authority): The CJAs—both the conveners and the chief officers—support the recommendation on the establishment of a sentencing council. That is not to say that we wish to undermine the independence of the judiciary, but we feel, for some of the reasons that the right hon Henry McLeish outlined this morning, that it would add to the level of knowledge and understanding of the general public and to the level of transparency in the system.

The court sentencing statistics that are published annually bear out the fact that there are inconsistencies in sentencing throughout Scotland—those are reflected in the statistics for both males and females. My colleague Mr McNulty has some statistics.
Bill Butler: What are those inconsistencies? The committee and I would be grateful if you could outline them for us based on evidence.

Tony McNulty (Lanarkshire Community Justice Authority): The Government publishes statistics annually on sentencing in every sheriff court in Scotland. The sentences are listed, and the percentage of custodial sentences, probation orders, community service orders and fines that are imposed are highlighted. I will not mention the courts by name because you can look them up yourselves, but in some courts 22 per cent of the sentences that are imposed are custodial, whereas in other courts custodial sentences account for 11 per cent of sentences. There seems to be no rhyme or reason for such variations in sentences. That is the main evidence: those statistics are published every year.

Bill Butler: What role could the proposed sentencing council play in providing accurate information for the public’s delectation?

Jim Hunter: The sentencing council would have a major role in relation to the transparency of the system. That would involve explaining the purposes and the principles of sentencing in ordinary language; monitoring sentencing across the different courts and judiciaries in Scotland; and performing some kind of evaluation of that monitoring, and being able to comment on it and explain why sentencing in certain parts of Scotland may differ from sentencing in other parts.

The idea is not that we should have complete consistency throughout Scotland—that would probably be too ambitious and not a good thing in any case, because local circumstances differ. Someone needs to explain that.

Bill Butler: That is exactly what Lord Cullen said last week. Are you saying that we are seeking coherence, and not necessarily uniformity, in sentencing?

Jim Hunter: Yes, absolutely—I agree with what was said on that. The sentencing council, or another such body, should be able to explain that to people. The bill includes a requirement for the sentencing council to report annually; it should be able to use that and other mechanisms to explain that idea, so that the public understand why those differences occur.

Bill Butler: If a Scottish sentencing council is established, would you like any changes to be made to the proposals that are set out in the bill? Are there any ways of modifying that particular proposal?

Raymund McQuillan (Association of Directors of Social Work): At this stage, there is no great desire for any alteration to the proposals.

We will have to see how the sentencing council develops before we produce strong proposals or make our views known on how it is operating. However, I support the view that has been expressed on the statistical base that is available on inconsistencies in sentencing. The statistics to which Tony McNulty referred are widely available and highlight clearly the inconsistencies in sentencing across courts, a range of disposals and a range of similar types of offences. It is widely known that inconsistencies exist.

Bill Butler: Are not those bare statistics? Is it not the case that we would have to analyse the statistics and that we cannot simply infer from them that there is inconsistency?

Raymund McQuillan: I do not agree that that is the case.

Bill Butler: Why not?

Raymund McQuillan: Because the knowledge of inconsistencies is available from the statistics themselves.

Bill Butler: But we have to analyse, examine and interpret the statistics—we cannot simply take them at face value, can we, Mr McQuillan?

Raymund McQuillan: In some cases, we can. When we have statistics that show clearly differences in sentencing for similar types of offences across a range of courts in Scotland, we can take them at face value. I agree that further analysis is needed, and I suggest that the sentencing council will give us the basis for that.

Bill Butler: Last week, the suggestion was made by, I think, the Lord President and certainly by Lord Cullen that, if there is to be a Scottish sentencing council—of course they do not see the need for it, whereas you do—it should have a judicial majority. There would be a majority of people who have expertise and experience as sentencers, which is not what is proposed in the bill. What do you think about that?

Jim Hunter: I can give a personal view.

Bill Butler: That is what I am asking for.

Jim Hunter: I do not think that that would be a problem, provided that there were lay members on the council. That issue is not a major sticking point in progressing the matter.

Tony McNulty: One theme in community justice authorities is that our customer is the victim—that is who we are there for. I have no problem with that suggestion on the make-up of the sentencing council, but it is important that victims are well represented on the council because, just as we are, the courts are there to serve victims. That would be my only proviso.

Bill Butler: I hear you loud and clear.

Raymund McQuillan: I do not regard that as a major difficulty. We must focus on the sentencing council’s major purposes. If a majority of the members of the sentencing council were judicial members, that would not necessarily deflect the council from its major purposes. Those major purposes have been highlighted: they are to introduce a degree of transparency and greater clarity in sentencing and to provide an ability to analyse sentencing patterns—the need for which Bill Butler has highlighted several times—and a greater understanding of sentencing processes and patterns throughout Scotland.

Robert Brown: I am intrigued by Mr McQuillan’s suggestion that we can use the bare statistics. Surely, among other things, the pattern of crime in different sheriff court areas must be taken into account, which requires deeper analysis. The pattern in Orkney must be different from that in Glasgow.

Raymund McQuillan: There are different patterns, but the available statistics break down sentencing patterns by type of offence. That gives us greater consistency in interpreting what is taking place.

Robert Brown: Yes, but my point is that the mere fact that 11 per cent of those who commit certain sorts of crime go to prison in one place whereas in another area the figure is 22 per cent does not tell us anything without further analysis. The real question is to do with the breakdown of crimes. Some research on or information about the situation is needed. For the sake of argument, assault can involve a fairly minor incident up to something approaching a murder—there is a range. Without a breakdown, how can we possibly draw conclusions about those matters?

Raymund McQuillan: I am not arguing that further analysis is not required; I am saying that we can draw conclusions from the available statistics. The statistics do what you suggest they do not do—they give a direct comparison by type of offence. For example, we can compare custodial sentence rates for housebreaking in one part of the country with those in another part of the country.

Robert Brown: The ADSW’s written submission states:

“To improve public confidence in the Criminal Justice System it will be imperative that”

the Scottish sentencing council

“has the authority to address inconsistent application of the guidance”.

I am bothered about that, because it refers not to producing guidance and general policy, but to monitoring, which does not sound as if it ought to be done by the sentencing council. In other words, that seems to refer to instruction to judges or a supervisory role over the courts. Will the ADSW witnesses elaborate on that point?

Yvonne Robson (Association of Directors of Social Work): As has been said, some analysis is required. If there is clear evidence of varying sentencing patterns throughout the country, the sentencing council could provide some guidance to try to eradicate anomalies where they are pronounced.

In one court, over a period of time, there were pronounced differences in custodial sentences. Following discussions with the bench about confidence in community sentences, those differences were reduced quite substantially. Mr Hunter will substantiate that. That example shows that trends can be changed when discussions take place and confidence in community sentences is improved.

Robert Brown: But is that a matter for the sentencing council? You are talking about relationships with judges and how the general guidance that is set is applied on the ground. There would be all sorts of implications for the separation of powers if a quango, which is what the sentencing council will be, had such a power or influence over the judiciary. Are you not concerned about that approach?

Yvonne Robson: The intention is to ensure that there is dialogue so that serious anomalies are addressed by people with expert knowledge.

Stewart Maxwell: Can I take you back to the point about inconsistent sentencing and statistics? Do you agree that, if there was no inconsistency in sentencing, that would be obvious from the statistics because, given the range of cases that go through the courts over a period of time, the sentences would average out? Do you agree that the statistics show a range of different sentences between different courts because there is an underlying problem of inconsistent sentencing and not because all the less serious assaults occur in one part of the country and all the serious assaults occur in another part? Do you agree that the averaging out deals with the problem and that the statistics can be relied upon to show that we do, in fact, have inconsistent sentencing?

Anne Pinkman: I agree.

Dr Simpson: I would like to hear your comments on the disjunction between prison and the community. For example, only 1,000 of the 18,000 offenders with custodial sentences are placed on alcohol reoffending programmes in any year, and a number of individuals in prisons cannot be started on drug treatment programmes because they are not guaranteed to get a community place when they come out. Much of what is proposed does not address the problem, which is the disjunction between the community element and the prison element.

Can we improve the situation without changing the law—for example, can we ensure that someone who serves half a sentence in prison is placed on a community programme immediately when they come out? At present, people who could begin reoffending programmes while they are in prison do not do so because there is not enough time for them to complete the programme before they come out. Why are they not placed on a programme that is subsequently taken over by the community side, or does that already happen?

The Convener: Who will take the first cut at that question?

Councillor Kennedy: Dr Simpson’s point is correct and well made. There is perceived to be a wall or barrier between the SPS and the wider community. Obviously, the prisons or the CJAs should remove that. In our CJA, we recognised early on that we needed to bring together health and the prison service. The drugs and alcohol programmes are a key part of that role, and mental health is inextricably linked to both issues.

I ask Anne Pinkman to expand on that and comment on our health forum.

Anne Pinkman: Fife and Forth Valley community justice authority puts great effort into bringing together the three Forth Valley prisons and our colleagues in NHS Forth Valley and NHS Fife. We are addressing the issues that Dr Simpson raised. That said, issues arise around short-term prisoners, one of which relates to attempts to put in place arrangements before an individual is released. It is easier to do that for those who are serving longer sentences.

We have made great strides in ensuring that treatment can continue when an individual goes into prison. One example is the maintenance of an individual’s methadone script. People might ask why someone who is serving a short sentence should be maintained on methadone. The answer is that interrupting someone’s methadone treatment over the course of a short sentence can be disruptive to the individual. On their return to their community at the end of their sentence, or on its expiry, the individual can be placed on a waiting list and, in some areas, they may have to wait considerable months before they can continue with their treatment.

We have made great strides in that direction. We now need to make a significant effort to ensure that we can replicate that progress for all individuals when they come out of prison. That will be extremely challenging, given the increasing number of individuals who are serving short-term sentences.

The Convener: Would that be the general view in the CJAs?

Jim Hunter: Yes.

Tony McNulty: I think that what Dr Simpson suggested relates more to the previous legislation—the Management of Offenders etc (Scotland) Act 2005. Among other provisions, that act encouraged the CJAs to talk to the Scottish Prison Service about having what are called community-facing prisons. Previously, 400 of the 1,700 prisoners in Barlinnie prison were from Lanarkshire. The majority of prisoners in Barlinnie were from Glasgow, so most services were geared towards them—the focus was on Glasgow housing, social work and so on.

Those Lanarkshire prisoners are now in Addiewell. In all, 85 per cent of the 700 prisoners in the new Addiewell prison are from Lanarkshire. Lanarkshire housing and Jobcentre Plus staff are going into the prison, along with colleagues who specialise in literacy programmes, financial advice and help for families. Community people in Lanarkshire are no longer saying, “We can close the book, because that person is in prison. They will not be back for three months, so we don’t need to worry about them until then.” Instead of that, we are getting continuity.

The fact that someone has become a prisoner for six months does not mean they will not return to the community, that their families do not still live in the community or that the community no longer has a responsibility to try to reduce the chance of the individual reoffending on their return. That needs to be recognised, and that cultural change is far more important to the community justice authorities than formal programmes are.

Raymund McQuillan: In principle, I do not disagree with the contention that there should be greater joined-up working between prisons and community-based social work on the continuity of programmes. Community justice authorities across Scotland are working actively towards restoring greater consistency in the work of prisons and communities. In the context of today’s discussion, however, that does not provide a solution. The problem with the current situation is the greater number of short-term prisoners who are released into the community with little or no supervision. Dr Simpson’s proposal regarding short-term prisoners would involve community-based criminal justice social work in activity that it is not funded to provide at present.

In a wider sense, the ADSW contends that the direction of the bill should be to replace short-term sentences rather than to enhance co-operative arrangements between the SPS and community-based social work, based on the current prison population. We would prefer to see a reduction in the prison population and an increase in work with offenders in the community.

Dr Simpson: I am not sure whether the panel heard the evidence from Henry McLeish. My point was that the Government tried successfully to do that for women offenders. From evaluation, we know that there was a reduction in reoffending among 500 women who went through the time-out programme in Glasgow and had their drug problems treated. Despite that evidence, we have seen a continuing rise in the prison population. Your hypothesis is that, if we put the money into a community resource, the prison population will drop. That is not proven by the reality of the women’s prison system.

Raymund McQuillan: I do not think that that is my hypothesis. The ADSW supports the view that the prison population should fall, but I do not contend that that will be achieved simply by enhancing programme work.

Over recent years, the prison population has grown substantially; each day now, more than 8,000 people are in prison. Over the past 20 years, during which time the contribution of community-based social work interventions has increased significantly, there has also been an increase in prison populations. The sentencing council would allow us to analyse in more detail the reasons behind the continued growth in prison populations when crime rates are falling and the quality of community-based provision is increasing.

Dr Simpson: In the past five or six years, during which we have been trying community sentencing, the number of prisoners being admitted on sentences has dropped by 5,000—from 23,000 to 18,000—whereas the number being admitted on remand has gone up from 18,000 to 23,000 or slightly more. Much of the rise in the daily population is because of longer-term sentences for serious offences, but the other reason is remand. We have been moving in the right direction, but remand and breaches really need to be tackled as they are the two areas in which substantial rises have occurred. In one case the percentage is high, although the numbers are small. In the case of remand, the increase is about 28 per cent. Huge numbers of additional people are going into prison.

The Convener: I take it that that was a question and not a comment. Can someone please respond?

Anne Pinkman: SPS statistics for 2008-09 show that half of the liberations of prisoners to Fife and the Forth valley were people who were remanded only. They were remanded into custody, and at the point of sentence received either a backdated sentence that allowed them to be freed from the court, or a non-custodial disposal.

Jim Hunter: I want to follow up on Dr Simpson’s point. Over the past few years, progress has been made on the interface between prisons and communities and examples of good practice exist across Scotland and can be developed. However, the huge problem that prevents significant progress is what Alex McLeish referred to as the “churn” within prisons. It is just—

The Convener: Alex McLeish is the manager of Birmingham City Football Club.

Jim Hunter: I beg your pardon—Henry McLeish referred to churn. What happens is that a wall of people comes in and out of prison day after day. That prevents the Scottish Prison Service from beginning to do anything with the very short-term prisoners.

Mr McLeish also referred to “warehousing”, which is really what it is. No matter what we try to do to develop good practice, no matter what social work departments do in the community, and no matter how good is the will of prison officers, wall of bodies prevents any progress.

The Convener: The interventions from Dr Simpson, welcome as they have been, have diverted us slightly from our track. We will move on to ask about community payback.

Cathie Craigie: The community payback order will replace a number of current community disposals. Would there be any value in retaining any of those disposals, or does the bill encompass what is needed?

Jim Hunter: Briefly, we fully support the establishment of the new community payback order, which we think will simplify matters and help people to understand. I do not think that any of the three orders that will be removed would be worth retaining in its own right.

Cathie Craigie: I note that the written submission from the community justice authorities states:

“We do note that while the CPO is designed to replace most existing community sentences, this does not include the DTTO and RLO which remain in place. We believe there may be potential for confusion”.

Can you expand on that?

Jim Hunter: Under the new community payback order, the court will have the opportunity to include an additional requirement for drug treatment. That is right and proper. However, drug treatment and testing orders will be retained under the bill. We merely make the point that, if the bill’s aim is to simplify things to make them much more transparent and easy to understand, leaving both measures in place could cause a difficulty in that people might get them confused.

Cathie Craigie: If there are suggestions about how that could be improved, now is the time to make them.

Jim Hunter: We were not sure why drug treatment and testing could not have been made a requirement of the new community payback order, within the same criteria.

Cathie Craigie: Do any of the other witnesses want to comment?

The Convener: I take it that no one from the Association of Directors of Social Work wants to comment on that.

Cathie Craigie: As those who were present for our earlier evidence session will have heard, it is accepted that many offenders live chaotic lives that can make it extremely difficult for them to complete a community sentence by turning up when they are supposed to do so. Getting Henry McLeish to drag them out of bed might be a bit extreme, but many people whom I represent would certainly think that that would be reasonable. Can anyone outline to the committee the problems that, in the wealth of experience that the panel has, currently exist on the ground?

Raymund McQuillan: In terms of offenders’ compliance rates with community service orders, we have considerable difficulties, although it should be noted that the vast majority of offenders comply with and complete their community service orders. Those who either choose not to comply or are unable to do so tend to present a range of difficulties and problems that are associated with background issues such as addiction, which cannot easily be overcome during the course of a community service order.

In terms of what currently happens, there is potentially a three-way dynamic involving the offender, the supervising officer and the courts. From time to time—although not in all cases—that can lead to a situation in which offenders might not turn up because they know what they might get away with. For example, with a view to ensuring that the order is completed successfully, the supervising officer might be reluctant to register a breach at a particularly early point. In the event of a breach, an offender who is taken back to court might, in any case, be returned to the community to complete the terms of the order. The three-way dynamic that can exist in some cases requires that each of the parties be clearer about their roles and responsibilities.

From a community-based social work point of view, I believe that local community-based organisations should be very clear—clearer than we currently are—with offenders about our expectations about compliance: we should be clear about what action will be taken and when. We should also ensure that that action is taken. The current guidelines suggest that an offender who does not turn up without a satisfactory excuse should be given a first warning, then a final warning, and that thereafter breach proceedings should take place. Within the community-based social work scenario, situations sometimes arise in which people are given more than those three warnings.

I suggest that each of the three parties—the offender, social work staff and the courts—needs to take due cognisance of their roles and responsibilities. From a community-based social work perspective, I think that it is imperative that we enforce the client’s obligations more rigorously. In doing that, the intention would clearly not be to increase the levels of breach but to enhance the levels of compliance.

Cathie Craigie: Will the new community payback order lead to improvements?

Raymund McQuillan: I am quite convinced that the new order as outlined and the timescales that pertain to it give an opportunity to those of us in community-based social work to address our responsibilities by ensuring that orders start quickly, and by being clear with offenders about their responsibilities and what actions will be taken if they fail to comply. That must be within a framework of providing necessary support to offenders who have underlying difficulties, for example by providing addiction services.

Cathie Craigie: What opportunities will the new order give you that you do not already have?

Raymund McQuillan: It provides for a substantial tightening of timescales, which sends an important message from the courts to the public and to offenders about the commencement of new orders. We support the view that orders should be started and should finish quickly. The current arrangements provide for the work to commence within three weeks; under the new arrangements, that period would be reduced to one week. Current legislation allows one year for completion of a community service order; the new guidelines suggest that orders should be completed within three to six months. It would be in the interests of justice and of the efficiency and effectiveness of community-based social work if, alongside that, local practices took due cognisance of their responsibility to enforce compliance and to ensure that offenders who fail to comply are dealt with swiftly.
Yvonne Robson: The new order will also provide an opportunity for the imposition of electronic monitoring, if someone is taken back to court for breach. As Mr McQuillan said, if an offender is in breach currently, the court either allows the order to continue or considers sending them to prison. The imposition of electronic monitoring, with the support that the community payback order will provide, may be sufficient to help some offenders to move away from non-compliance towards compliance.

The Convener: Offenders are not complying at the moment. I return to the point that orders will be made as a direct alternative to custody. How many last chances do people get?

Raymund McQuillan: At present, compliance rates are about 75 per cent. We cannot assume that people generally do not comply with orders. The breach rate is about 25 per cent.

The Convener: I understand that it is a bit higher than that. Your figures may be more up to date than mine.

Raymund McQuillan: Yours may be more up to date than mine.

Cathie Craigie: Are the figures that you have given those for the Fife and Forth valley area?

Raymund McQuillan: No.

The Convener: We will sort the matter out.

Jim Hunter: There is some confusion about breach. Mr McQuillan is correct: the completion rate for community service is probably much higher than the breach rate, because people who breach community service orders are taken back to court, where a sheriff decides whether to terminate the order and send the offender to custody, to take other action or to continue the order. If the order is continued and the offender is given a chance to finish the sentence, the breach still counts. Often the figure that is reported as the breach rate does not reflect the number of people who successfully complete community service.

The Convener: The figures may not be inconsistent.

Angela Constance (Livingston) (SNP): What do you think of Henry McLeish’s suggestion earlier this morning that people should start their community sentence on the day on which it is given?

Raymund McQuillan: People who are given custodial sentences are taken away on the day, so what has taken place is highly visible to the public. It is unfortunate that, occasionally, when someone is given a community sentence, the public perceives them as having got off, which is clearly not the case. I support the view that it is important that something visible is done on the day. Under the arrangements that are being discussed with the Scottish Government, an order will be served on the day on which the court makes its decision. A social work representative will have the opportunity to discuss the order’s parameters and the obligations that it imposes, and to make arrangements for the offender to start work within five days.

Angela Constance: I was interested in Mr McLeish’s suggestion that there should be more frugal or targeted use of social work resources. He gave the specific example of social inquiry reports being used less often to assist in sentencing. What do you think of that suggestion?

Raymund McQuillan: I do not have the statistics to hand, but I think that the number of social inquiry reports produced in Scotland is about 40,000. There are discretionary reports, which sheriffs may request, but in some circumstances reports are required by statute.

When reports are required by statute, there is little differentiation between cases that might lead to custodial sentences and cases that might not. As a result, the same type of report can be produced in all circumstances, regardless of whether the outcome is likely to be custody. On most occasions, there is little guidance from the bench on sentencing intentions and whether custody is being considered. That can tend to lead to reports being produced in a standardised form.

Some authorities in Scotland are participating in pilot exercises in which different formats and timescales for social inquiry reports are being considered—I think that three or five authorities are involved in the pilots. The exercises are due to be completed by the end of June and we hope that they will provide interesting lessons for us.

Stewart Maxwell: How will the bill address the public perception that community sentences are a soft option? What else needs to be done to improve understanding of, and confidence in, community disposals?

Yvonne Robson: There is much evidence that community service orders are meaningful and beneficial to individuals and communities. The ADSW has embarked on a 12-month public relations strategy, which will help the public to understand much more about social work and criminal justice. There is an on-going process in which we need to engage.

Most, if not all, areas in Scotland publicise work that is done through community service. We must go further and publicise other disposals that currently operate and will be incorporated into the new community payback order. We must explain to the public what probation orders are and what community payback orders that involve supervision, unpaid work or drug treatment are. There is evidence that when the public have some knowledge and understanding of the matter, they are much more sympathetic to, and tolerant of, the court’s approach to offenders, as Mr McLeish said.

Anne Pinkman: There is much to be done to raise the profile of and levels of understanding of community-based disposals. CJAs very much welcome the proposed requirement for consultation about the undertaking of unpaid work in communities.

Yesterday, I received the results of a survey on community service that we conducted. Our area was one of three that received short-term funding for the community service visibility project, which ran for six months. The project was not costly—it cost a little more than £11,000. We surveyed residents of four local authorities in Fife and Forth valley in November and we did so again last month. It was interesting that we were able during that short period to raise awareness of community service by 50 per cent, through a combination of posters, newspaper articles, advertisements on radio and invitations to listeners of a local radio station to vote for a community service project. The approach paid dividends. It is interesting that respondents have indicated that their awareness was raised most through the newspaper articles.

I will highlight a couple of other interesting points from the residents survey, which we can make available. Just under 50 per cent of residents considered that community service is an easy option, but it was reassuring that more than 60 per cent accepted and understood that it was an alternative to custody. More than 50 per cent of the respondents considered community service to be a way for offenders to make amends to the community for the wrong that they had done. Finally, on the type of work that offenders should undertake, almost 90 per cent of those who participated in the survey felt that offenders should be involved in work that helped the community, but 57 per cent also thought that the work should allow offenders to improve their employment skills. The residents survey produced a lot of useful information that will help us to improve and continue to develop knowledge and understanding of community service, and to inform the work that we have our offenders undertake, not just in Fife and Forth valley but throughout the country.

Stewart Maxwell: That is very interesting: thank you. I think that the committee would benefit from seeing a copy of the survey. I would certainly appreciate seeing the results.

The Convener: I was about to say that that would be useful. What was the size of the sample?

Anne Pinkman: The survey sample was 3,500 residents, which was considered to be a reasonable size.

Stewart Maxwell: You said that awareness was raised. It is certainly useful and valuable to raise awareness—I would not say otherwise—but it is not the same as changing perceptions about whether community service is a soft option. Was there any impact on that?

Anne Pinkman: I would prefer to defer that question and respond later, if I may, because I received the results only late yesterday afternoon and I have had only a quick read of them. I would not want to mislead you about what the survey did or did not say.

Stewart Maxwell: That is fair enough.

Anne Pinkman: I will make the survey available.

The Convener: That is an entirely appropriate response.

Robert Brown: It has become clear that there is agreement among the panel about the importance of the community dynamic and the perception of community service. If I have picked this up right, there is also agreement about the formal requirements of community orders, such as that they must start quickly and that there must be robust enforcement if they are breached. The cast-iron test is whether these things work. Many of us have significant concerns about the effectiveness of some of the current community orders—for some individuals, at least. How good are community orders at the moment? What has to be done to make a significant difference to the reoffending rates of people who undertake community service, other than the formal matters of getting the orders to start more quickly and enforcing them more satisfactorily?

Anne Pinkman: Although reoffending rates across the piece are high and we would all like them to be lower, the reoffending rates for community service are the lowest recorded; they are lower than the rates for those who receive prison sentences and considerably lower than the rates for those who receive periods of imprisonment and also—

Robert Brown: You are dealing to some extent with a different tranche of prisoners—or, rather, people who have been convicted—are you not?

Anne Pinkman: Not necessarily, because many individuals who receive community service have served custodial sentences, and vice versa. Those who serve short-term sentences and those who receive community-based disposals are similar—they are the same group. We know that the reoffending rates for those who receive community service are lower.
Robert Brown: We are, however, talking about reoffending rates of something like 42 per cent, if I recall correctly, which is still pretty high, given the expense involved.

Can you give us any guidance about the different sorts of community orders? There are drug treatment and testing orders at one extreme, with probation orders at the other—and other things in between. Where are the big gaps in service that prevent us from producing a better effect with regard to reoffending rates and the improvements to people’s lifestyles that we want?

Raymund McQuillan: The critical test of any order is the reoffending rate. We must accept that premise. When we analyse the effectiveness of sentencing and community disposals, we must consider the reoffending rates. There are a couple of caveats about how we do that, however. This goes back to statistics again, but our analysis is not yet as good as it must be. The information that we currently have about reoffending rates perhaps tells us how many people reoffend, but it does not tell us about the actual level of reoffending. We might measure the number of people who reoffend, but those who reoffend might be doing so at a reduced frequency or they might, for all we know, be committing more serious offences. We need better analysis of what we mean when we say “reduced levels of reoffending”. Are we talking about people who reoffend once or more or about the level of reoffending? Do we include in our discussion analysis of the seriousness of the offences? I do not think that we do, at present. The figures are misleading, to some extent.

I support the premise that the critical test of the effectiveness of any disposal, including custody, has to be its impact on reoffending rates. Although custody is the most important measure, I would add that it is not the only measure. We would also like to consider the effectiveness of community disposals in particular in addressing the risks and needs that are presented by each individual offender, which will of course vary. We must have a view to the effectiveness of disposals in addressing addiction, employability and accommodation issues, as well as a host of other issues that individual offenders present.

Robert Brown: That is a useful analysis—although it was not quite what I asked for, which was where you think there are major gaps.

For the sake of argument, let us consider somebody who is sent out on a community sentence, cleaning off graffiti or picking up litter. If the mental health and employability problems and the other things that Mr McLeish talked about earlier are not tackled early on, and if the disposals are not properly targeted, people might end up more alienated than when they began. Is there a need to look afresh in some detail at the appropriateness of what we are doing in relation to community sentences and at how it is matched to the individual offender’s needs?

Tony McNulty: The community justice authorities have been tasked with reducing reconviction rates. Obviously, someone can reoffend but not be caught, which is why we talk about reconviction rates. The aim is to reduce rates by 2 per cent across the whole range of disposals, including custody. The most recent figures that I have indicate that there is a reconviction rate of 42 or 43 per cent after two years.

Robert Brown: That is right.

Tony McNulty: I understand that the rates for prison and probation both run at about 63 per cent after two years. One of the biggest, most immediate gaps that we had in Lanarkshire, as shown by the figures, concerned short-term prisoners. They were in and out, on remand or because of short sentences. Nobody touched them. Most of them were men, and they were not prioritised in relation to child care, health or social work—they were beyond social work as they were not statutory cases. They were tried on probation and community service. The police picked them up, but they were released and caused immense problems for the communities that they returned to—drinking and committing breach of the peace. Basically, they were lawless. They were not working, they were not part of society and they were going in and out of prison. That was the case at Barlinnie, and now it is the case at Addiewell. That group of people were not just caught and reconvicted; they were caught so many times in one year that they were a nightmare. We were not touching that group with disposals at all.

Then the routes out of prison project came along—some members will have heard of it—which was a simple, straightforward project involving people who had been through the prison system or who had been involved in the justice system, and who talked the same language as the prisoners. Obviously they were put through a selection process—I think that there were about 400 applicants for five jobs. The advert in the Sunday Mail said that the project would employ ex-prisoners.

Those people go into prisons, but it is six weeks before they build up a relationship with the prisoner. With the Scottish Prison Service and the prison officers, they address the range of needs of the prisoner to reduce the chances of their reoffending. It might be about employability, literacy—many of the prisoners cannot read or write—signing on at the job centre or getting a general practitioner, which many of them need. It might also be about housing or getting in touch with their family and returning to a family situation.
They need to be taken by the hand—I do not mean literally, but almost—and shown round a range of agencies on their release to help them settle back into their community.

The figures show that that approach might be successful, although it is too early to say. Like Anne Pinkman, I will not say that we have had success, but the early indications are that that approach might help to reduce the 63 per cent reconviction rate. I could give the committee other examples, but I will not, because they are available in our three-year plan and our annual reports.

The key point is that not only the police, the courts and social work but the community must deal with crime. The basis for having CJAAs is that communities are affected by crime. I want to involve communities, local health boards and addiction services and explain what we do. People who go into prison or are given a probation order for committing an offence are from a community, so we must generate community services for them.

There is a smashing initiative to address domestic violence in North Lanarkshire called MARAC—multi-agency risk assessment conferencing—which was lauded by Her Majesty's chief inspector of constabulary. When a policeman is called to a domestic violence incident, they immediately fill in a one-page form and pass it to their superiors, and a risk assessment is done right away. The main agencies involved, such as health and, for children, education immediately get round a table and discuss how to protect the victim. I have attended Coatbridge MARAC. If the offender gets bailed, we go to the court and get bail conditions put on them, which the police strictly supervise. Everything gravitates towards ensuring that the victim is protected.

If the offender is taken into custody, that is fine, but we want to know when they will come out. We can protect the victim by, for example, placing a tag in their house, so that if the offender comes anywhere near it, an alarm will go off and the police will know. We need such imaginative ways of working, because there is no single answer. There is a lot of hard work for us to do. I think that the bill's community payback orders will help us, but they will be only one tool.

Robert Brown: The witnesses must have many social work and CJA contacts across Scotland, and there must be examples of good practice in different local authority areas. Can you send us further information on that? I see that the witnesses will.

The direction of travel of the community payback order is okay, but it covers a multitude of sins and a series of practical disposals, some of which are more effective than others. It is therefore important to get a handle on what works.

I have a question about resources, which were referred to earlier. If the bill is passed, there will be more community disposals, in the form of community payback orders. What will be the resource implications for criminal justice social work services? Do you have concerns about that?

Jim Hunter: We provided written and oral evidence to the Finance Committee on our concerns about the bill's financial memorandum. We are concerned that the baseline for calculating the cost of community payback orders was the funding that is currently in place for probation orders, community service orders and supervised attendance orders. Those disposals are not sufficiently funded at present, therefore that fault has been carried forward in calculating costs for the new order. That is our first concern.

Our second concern is around the Government's postulation in the financial memorandum of a zero per cent, 10 per cent and 20 per cent increase in the number of orders as a result of other measures in the bill, such as the presumption against short sentences and the attractiveness of the new community payback order. The Government has perhaps underestimated the increase in the number of social inquiry reports that will be a direct consequence of the presumption against short sentences. Our view is that sheriffs might ask for social inquiry reports when they would not previously have done so—in other words, they will ask for social inquiry reports in cases in which they would have imposed a straightforward short sentence of imprisonment and would not have required a social inquiry report because the person was over 21 and had been in prison before. Because of the presumption, they will be able to ask for a social inquiry report so that they have all the information about what is available in the community, which may increase the number of requests. That was not taken into account in the financial memorandum, but it would have been reasonable to do so.

Robert Brown: Does that not pale into insignificance in comparison with the sheer cost of paying for 20 or 30 per cent more community sentences? I presume that we are talking about interventions at the more expensive end, given that you are trying to do something effective with people who would otherwise have gone to prison.

Tony McNulty: Angela Constance and Henry McLeish mentioned the number of social inquiry reports that may be required. The cost of those may not be high, but the important thing to remember is that the money for community payback orders is money for working with offenders to reduce the chance of their reoffending. Background reports for the courts are costly, as they involve six hours of a qualified social worker’s time. If the issue is appealability—if the sheriff asks for a report so that the decision will be harder to appeal—that would be an inappropriate use of social work. It would not be using the process to tackle offending; it would be using it for the sake of the court. The bill provides that

“A court may pass a sentence of imprisonment for a term not exceeding 6 months on a person only where the court considers that no other method of dealing with the person is appropriate.”

When a court imposes a custodial sentence of six months or less, it will have to state its reasons for doing so. However, the report in The Herald on the committee’s meeting of 12 May stated:

“Sheriffs were no more enthusiastic about the proposals, with the Sheriffs’ Association being highly critical of the proposal to make the Bench offer an explanation before handing down any sentence of less than six months.”

If I were a sheriff, I would be greatly tempted to ask for a background report so that I could say that community service and probation had been tried and failed, which was why I was giving the offender a six-month or three-month custodial sentence. That could result in the expenditure of scarce resources that, frankly, would not go towards reducing reoffending.

Robert Brown: I accept that point. I have, perhaps, sent you off in the wrong direction. Do you not also have to take account of the increased number of sentences and the need to fund and support them? Do you accept that the level of intervention would have to be high if it is to work?

Tony McNulty: Yes, I absolutely agree.

Robert Brown: Do you mind if I make one other, brief point, convener?

The Convener: No, please carry on.

Robert Brown: In their evidence, the ADSW witnesses talked about supporting a resource scoping exercise to ascertain accurate unit costs for community service and other community sentences. Were you asked to do that, in some way, during preparation of the bill? I presume that the Government approaches you for that sort of information.

Yvonne Robson: That goes back to what a CJA colleague said. We are given allocations under specific headings and the probation allocation is based on the cost of a standard probation order. However, 56 per cent of all probation orders have additional conditions, some of which—particularly group work programmes or community sex offender group programmes—are very intensive, and the supervision of high-risk offenders can be very intensive. We therefore support what CJAs have said—we do not have accurate costings.

Given the projected increase of 20 to 30 per cent in the number of community sentences, we need to break down the allocation into more realistic costings. At present, the total is divided by the number of new orders to give the annual cost, but that is insufficient. We must break down the cost to understand it. There are also differences between what it might cost to provide a service in an urban area with good transport services and what it might cost in rural areas where resources are much more stretched.

Robert Brown: Whatever else comes out of the bill, community payback will not involve a standard probation order in most instances, at least in terms of new people.

Yvonne Robson: That is correct.

The Convener: I remind members that the Finance Committee will report to us on the financial issues relating to the bill in due course.

Angela Constance: I had intended to ask about how drug treatment and testing orders could cause confusion with the drug treatment requirement in community payback orders, but Ms Peattie rather effectively addressed that point earlier. I will therefore move on to another question.

The Convener: I think that you mean Mrs Craigie.

Angela Constance: I keep doing that, Cathie.

Cathie Craigie: I am used to it.

Angela Constance: I apologise.

I want to ask the CJA witnesses a question, perhaps because HM Prison Addiewell, in my constituency, houses a lot of Lanarkshire people. The CJAs expressed concern in their written evidence that the bill does not refer to the availability or prioritisation of programmes that offenders will be required to undertake. Will you elaborate on your concerns and say how they can be addressed?

Tony McNulty: We are almost returning to the previous point. Our concern is that people talk about programmes, but programmes are expensive. If resources are not available for programmes to be put in place, they will become a wish list; they will exist in people’s minds more than in reality.

Programmes have a place and can be successful, but there is a danger that they will not produce results if we overly rely on them. Almost by definition, they quite expensively target a low number of offenders. There will always be a question about a programme’s value compared with a wider blunderbuss effect on people who constantly reoffend but do not quite hit the heights of getting statutory supervision—I talked about them earlier.

The eight CJAs in Scotland are clear about their spending priorities. Obviously, our first priority is the most vulnerable, who may be subject to crime by sex offenders and violent offenders. The multi-agency public protection arrangements, which involve agencies coming together, are a terrific success in Scotland and are the first spending priority. If funding was cut, money would still be spent on them. The second priority for CJAs is statutory services, because they deal on a day-to-day basis with people coming out of prison, people who have been sentenced to four years or more, violent offenders and sex offenders. Sadly, the third-placed priority is probably reducing reoffending and dealing with the group that does not hit the heights that I have mentioned.

Programmes must be viewed in that context. Our concern is that it is easy to talk about programmes, but finances and the reality of putting programmes in place must be considered.

Stewart Maxwell: I want to return to something that we discussed earlier and to the evidence that we received from the sheriffs last week. They stated that short custodial sentences can be effective and that the current use of such sentences is appropriate. What are your views on that?

Jim Hunter: I imagine that a sheriff on the bench with a number of cases every day will not want to reduce their options. I see exactly where they are coming from, but the question why Scotland has the third-worst custodial rate in Europe remains. Is it because we are much more aggressive, abusive or antisocial than people in other European countries? Nobody has yet been able to convince me that that is the case. The use of short sentences must therefore be questioned. I am not denying that using them is justified and that in some cases there are no other options—and the opportunity to use them has been left in the bill—but the problem is simply that they are being used far too frequently.

Tony McNulty: A year ago in October, I attended an ADSW conference, which obviously was full of social workers. A sheriff in the audience—I cannot remember where he was from; it may have been Dundee—stood up and talked about short sentences. He said with a lot of feeling that, with certain offenders, he was left with no option but to give some respite to the community by handing down a short custodial sentence. The social workers applauded him, because they knew exactly where he was coming from. He did not want to hand out such sentences, but he did not think that he had any alternative. He was as frustrated as everybody else in the hall was that that was the only tool left to him. Perhaps, sadly, the issue is not short sentences but our inability to deal more smartly with offenders.

The Convener: Can we hear from the social workers?

Raymund McQuillan: There is no doubt, as Jim Hunter has pointed out, that a range of agencies and individuals in Scotland are deeply concerned about the continual growth in the use of short sentences. I do not propose to comment on or criticise individual sentencing decisions, but I think that it would be unusual if sheriffs turned up and said, “Our sentencing decisions are wrong.” There is no doubt that there is a consensus that many of the growing number of short sentences that are being issued are not successful in terms of reducing reoffending or changing people’s lifestyles or patterns of offending.

I support Tony McNulty’s view that more work needs to be done on the alternatives that are available, which leads us back quite neatly to the question of resources. Currently, the level of service that is provided by national standards amounts to a minimum of 17 contacts a year, which is not high, but many areas struggle to achieve that level. We have touched on the funding issues and discussed what the appropriate level of funding might be.

I agree that there is a need for community-based criminal justice social work services to scrutinise what they do. That has to be done within a consensus that accepts that we must seek to fund the level of service that is described as adequate.

The Convener: The bill seeks to amend the custody provisions in the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007, prior to those provisions being brought into force. The political thinking of the Government is that amending that legislation will help to create an effective regime for managing offenders. What are your views?

Anne Pinkman: The CJAs agree with your statement.

The Convener: It is not my statement; I was paraphrasing the Government.

Anne Pinkman: I beg your pardon. The CJAs agree with what you have just said. There is, however, concern about the timescales within which changes could be introduced. Clearly, there will be considerable resource implications if offenders serving sentences are to be routinely supervised on release or if they receive sentences that combine prison and community service.
We are reassured that the financial memorandum suggests that the changes would be introduced in five years’ time. That should be a sufficient timescale to allow for the reduction in the prison population that will be necessary if the new provisions are to be introduced.

The Convener: In the shorter term, will the changes impact on criminal justice social work services?

Anne Pinkman: We agree that the provisions should apply to offenders who are sentenced to one year or more, but that should be the case after a phasing-in period, in which supervision initially applies to those who are sentenced to two years or more.

Yvonne Robson: We support that.

The Convener: As we have no further questions, I thank the members of our panel for their exceptionally useful contributions.

On resuming—

The Convener: Good afternoon, ladies and gentlemen. I remind those who were not present this morning that it is important that mobile phones are switched off so that they do not interfere with the proceedings. Those who have not switched off their phone should do so now.

We enter uncharted territory this afternoon, in that we will now have an open-mike session to enable those who have not been called as formal witnesses to give their views on the issues under discussion. For all committees of the Parliament, it is important that every effort is made to engage with the public and with the people of Scotland generally on the issues that we, as politicians, are considering. The Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill covers many different aspects. Issues of sentencing and the sentencing measures that are potentially available—from imprisonment to a range of other options—are of interest to all communities. We are very keen indeed to hear the views of this community today.

Anyone who wants to contribute to the debate should indicate that they wish to do so by raising a hand so that our very able assistants in the hall can pass a microphone to them. If people feel more comfortable sitting, they may sit. If they want to stand up, they may stand up. Perhaps those who represent an organisation could introduce themselves and their organisation briefly before they make their point. Obviously, contributions are also welcomed from private individuals. All contributions will be recorded and will form part of the record of parliamentary proceedings.

Who will ask the first question or make the first point? At this stage, as is inevitable, there is stony silence, but I am sure that someone wants to offer a point. Councillor Kennedy, do you want to say something? I think that you felt that a couple of issues that arose this morning were not properly ventilated. This is an opportunity for you to put your point on record.

Councillor Kennedy: The point that I want to make is about the linkage between community justice authorities and community planning partnerships, which has a direct impact on how we manage or deliver certain services in the community. That has been the experience not just in the Fife and Forth Valley community justice authority area but in other CJAs areas. The issue is perhaps complicated by the community planning set-up—I accept that that differs from one local authority to another—but there is also perhaps a lack of understanding among some people in the Society of Local Authority Chief Executives and Senior Managers about where the CJAs should sit. Some in SOLACE take the view that the CJA should be part of the community safety partnership. Although community safety is part of our remit or role, I feel strongly that we should be at the community planning partnership level to deal with the more strategic policy setting. We deal with not just the antisocial behaviour management side of things but health, education, employability and so on. In the opinion of Fife and Forth Valley CJA, that needs to be articulated a little bit more at the top. We need a better understanding of where we should all sit together.

The Convener: Thank you—that is now on the record.

Would anyone else like to ask a question or raise a point? Please do not feel in any way inhibited. We have allocated this time for you; we have come a long way, and it has cost a lot of money.

Elma Mitchell (Devonvale Hall Co Ltd): I am the secretary of Devonvale Hall—

The Convener: Could you perhaps give your name—[Interruption.]

Elma Mitchell: I am sorry. I am Elma Mitchell—is that your telephone?

The Convener: Yes, it is. [Laughter.] Mega-embarrassment.

Bill Butler: There will be a short custodial sentence.
Elma Mitchell: I am the secretary of Devonvale Hall. We run the hall in Tillicoultry and we have the criminal justice boys to help us. They do an exceptionally good job; we could not run the hall without them. However, they have only one vehicle, and there can be only five of them for each supervisor. That means that a lot of the boys are not out helping the community. I feel that a lot more money should be put in, so that the boys can have another supervisor, and so that they can have two more vehicles. That would be the bottom line.

The Convener: Thank you for that. You have raised a resource issue for the local authority and the CJA. Your point is well made.

Stewart Maxwell: Is there demand for people to do more work, but not enough resources even to allow them to do the work that there is at the moment?

Elma Mitchell: We use the young people regularly. They clean the hall and set it up for the next function, and they look after the grounds. They do virtually anything that we ask them to do. Only two of us run the hall during the day, but we are poor pensioners and we cannot do it all. The young people—although they are not all young—have been absolutely exemplary and a great help to us in the three and a half years during which we have run the hall.

Stewart Maxwell: Do you believe that more communities could benefit from such work?

Elma Mitchell: Yes, more communities could benefit, but more resources are definitely needed.

The Convener: As there seem to be no further points at the moment, we will move on to take evidence from our final panel. After that, we will perhaps hear more points from members of the public. We are keen to do that.

14:18

Meeting suspended.

14:19

On resuming—

The Convener: We will now hear from our final panel of witnesses, who represent the Scottish Consortium on Crime and Criminal Justice. The members of the panel are Professor Fergus McNeill, who is professor of criminology and social work at the University of Glasgow; John Scott, who is chairman of the Howard League for Penal Reform in Scotland; and Professor Alec Spencer, who is from the University of Stirling and was formerly the director of rehabilitation and care on the board of the Scottish Prison Service. I thank you all for coming, gentlemen; it will be invaluable for us to hear your evidence.

Paul Martin: Good afternoon, gentlemen. In your written evidence, you state that the purposes of sentencing, as set out in the bill, "raise almost as many questions as they answer."

Will you elaborate on the questions that arise, and suggest what the answers might be?

Professor Fergus McNeill (Scottish Consortium on Crime and Criminal Justice): The difficulty with the way in which the bill is drafted is that it simply lists a range of purposes that sentencing might serve. The list is familiar, covering exactly what is found in similar legislation or in the relevant textbooks in various jurisdictions. It provides no coherent rationale that a sentencer might employ when thinking about which principles should apply or have priority in particular circumstances, or how to choose between different purposes of punishment or sanctioning that might conflict in certain ways.

The bill makes provision not just for attending to the issue of rehabilitation, but for punishment. Sometimes punishment may affect adversely the prospect of rehabilitation, whereas sometimes promoting rehabilitation may seem not to be doing enough in terms of punishment. The bill does not help to clarify how those competing priorities should be balanced in individual cases or even in general terms in the system.

Paul Martin: Can you make any practical suggestions that would improve the bill?

Professor McNeill: One of my suggestions is covered not in the submission from the Scottish Consortium on Crime and Criminal Justice but in the submission from the Scottish centre for crime and justice research. It would be helpful if we stated an overall purpose of the sanctioning system, under which the separate principles could be subsumed and to which they might refer. For example, some jurisdictions might have an overarching statement that the criminal justice and sanctioning system should serve to promote the existence of a just, decent and fair society. Although that sounds bland and general, it allows at least some way of looking at how specific principles are applied in particular cases and how they connect to one another.

Another specific value that I strongly urge the Parliament to consider including in the bill is a commitment to the principle of parsimony. When judges impose custodial sentences, they are exercising the greatest degree of power over individual citizens of the state that is possible in a democratic society. In one respect, they should always do that with a bad conscience, because although it is sometimes necessary, it is a bad thing to do in its own right. We should always seek to impose the least intrusive measure that is consistent with the requirements of justice. The principle is not stated in those terms in the bill—certainly not with that degree of clarity. Its inclusion would be very welcome.

Nigel Don: I detect a resistance to generate a hierarchy, but I will push you on the issue. I suggest that society would like to minimise the tendency to offend in the first place. By definition, once someone is in the justice system, that opportunity has passed. Would a reasonable priority be to minimise the incidence of reoffending? Would that find some favour as an overarching principle?

Professor McNeill: Yes and no. It is a laudable objective for the system to pursue, but if adhering to the principle allowed disproportionate sentences—perhaps even incapacitating sentences of a duration that was not merited by the gravity of the crime—to be applied, that would be contrary to the interests of justice. Although reducing reoffending is necessary and desirable, I would not have it as an overarching principle. A better approach than putting the reduction of reoffending first is to try to approximate to fairness and justice in the first instance, before thinking about the specific outcomes that we might pursue through a properly proportionate penalty.

I will give you a slightly extreme example. If I were to take the book or film "A Clockwork Orange" a bit too literally, I might say that the Ludovico method—the particularly brutal version of aversion therapy that is deployed—was an effective way of reducing reoffending, as it appears completely to disable the offender and prevent them from reoffending once they have been through it. However, the cost of the treatment is too high, because it is so brutal and inhumane. For me, there are principles that take priority over reducing reoffending.

Nigel Don: You made a fair point about the list of principles being indiscriminate—we realise that it is. Policy requires some kind of prioritisation, or it is not policy. I take your point that minimising reoffending is probably not the overwhelming priority—it occurred to me that capital punishment is the most effective way of reducing reoffending, with transportation possibly coming next. However, is there a risk that if we go for fairness we will end up with a principle that is so wishy-washy that it allows anything and is no longer a principle?

Professor McNeill: I do not agree. We can be robust in creating opportunities for people to make reparation—or pay back, in the language of the bill—without that necessarily meaning that priority is given to reducing reoffending. The example that you heard from the member of the public was not first and foremost about the extent to which community service reduces reoffending; it was about the valuable public service that people provided.

In a sense, those people paid forward. They might have been in debt to society and they might not have remedied the situation in relation to the victims of their crimes, but they paid forward by undertaking work that was of benefit and value to the community. In and of itself, that is robust and sufficient, but if community service or payback has the additional effect of reducing reoffending, which it might well do, so much the better. However, that is a secondary benefit and not the one that I would prioritise.

Professor Alec Spencer (Scottish Consortium on Crime and Criminal Justice): On whether the reduction of crime should be set out as a purpose of sentencing, it is a mistake to believe that the criminal justice system can cure the ills of society. It is the ills of society—inequalities, deprivation and so on—that are primarily responsible for levels of crime.

The criminal justice system cannot resolve the problem of the crime rate, so we must start somewhere else. The criminal justice system is a response to people who offend; it is not a method of reducing crime—and I do not think that there is much evidence that deterrence, as a concept, works.

Angela Constance: We have heard an erudite discussion about the merits of including in the bill the purposes and principles of sentencing, but what does the panel think about the practical application of those principles? In Scottish legislation in recent years the trend has been clearly to set out principles—without applying a hierarchy to them—that were intended to be used by the practitioners who would use the legislation to intervene in a way that would have an impact on other people’s liberty. I am thinking about the Adults with Incapacity (Scotland) Act 2000 and the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003.

The inclusion of sentencing principles in the bill is surely just about asking sentencers to consider and apply principles of best practice. It is surely more pragmatic than the erudite and intellectual discussion that we have heard suggests.

Professor McNeill: I agree. You provided good examples—we can also include section 16 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995, which enshrines important principles that are intended to govern the judgments that are made by key decision makers in the relevant system. I am in no way against the articulation of principles in the bill. Indeed, I do not think that the bill goes far enough in articulating how the principles might best be put into operation by the relevant practitioners.

John Scott (Howard League for Penal Reform in Scotland and Scottish Consortium on Crime and Criminal Justice): If we do nothing, the current record-level prison populations will simply continue to increase. It might help if, at the beginning of the bill, there is something that gets sentencers’ attention and makes them think about what they are doing—and which makes them change their mind in some cases. I was at an event last week at which sentencers were wringing their hands and saying, “Why do we have a record prison population? We don’t know; we’d like to find out.” Whenever sentencers gather, they usually agree that there are too many people in prison and that some of those people should not be there. However, each of those people has been sent there by a sentencer who no doubt thought that that person had to be in prison.

A statement of principles would be good, but the danger is that sentencers will simply say that they have been following the principles anyway. They need to think about their approach to sentencing more than they might have been doing and, in some cases, change it.

Angela Constance: Will they not have to provide evidence of how they have applied the principles?

John Scott: Yes, although that can sometimes be done rather too easily. Since the change in the bail laws, sheriffs have to give reasons for granting or refusing bail. In some situations—I am not saying that this is universally the case—it is clear that not much more is done than ticking boxes. In fact, a form with the boxes is provided to the sentencers. Obviously, they want to get through the business, but there is a danger that sentencing is reduced to a mechanical process or a case of the sentencer saying, “I’ve taken rehabilitation into account—of course I have,” rather than stopping to think how it features in the sentence.

The Convener: Having dealt with the somewhat esoteric issue of purposes and principles, we will move on to a more practical level and deal with the proposed Scottish sentencing council. I note that the witnesses do not have an agreed position on the proposal, but we will pursue it with them individually.

Bill Butler: Good afternoon, gentlemen. As you know, the objectives of the proposed sentencing council are to promote consistency in sentencing, assist the development of sentencing policy and support transparency in sentencing. Do the proposed measures represent significant progress on the current position? As you do not have a collective view, we will start with Professor Spencer.

Professor Spencer: With the convener’s indulgence, I will start somewhere else if I may. Why are there proposals for a sentencing council? Because the Scottish Prisons Commission talked about recommending a prison population level of 5,000, and sentencing lies somewhere behind that. The first thing that the Government and the Parliament need to decide is the appropriate prison population level. Such levels have been decided in other countries. For example, Finland decided as a matter of social policy to reduce the numbers in prison and, over a period, set about reaching its desired level through legislation, sentencing and the interventions that the state provided. It reduced its prison population by three quarters.

Therefore, politicians must start by deciding what they want the prison population to be. My personal view is that the prison population is too high. I accept the commission’s proposal of 5,000, although I would have gone for a slightly greater reduction and halved the prison population to 4,000. In my experience, and according to the evidence, quite a number of people in prison do not require to be there. We have heard about remands already. A large number of people on short-term sentences go to prison. They create churn and a digression from the work of prison, which is to lock up the people who commit serious crimes and present a danger to the public. There will be others who should not be there. Removing them would give a population of 5,000.

Fergus McNeill has already talked about parsimony in sentencing. That means that prison should be the last resort, not the normal response in our society.

Bill Butler: Will the sentencing council aid that, to draw you back to the original question?

Professor Spencer: Thank you. I was going to say that, therefore, the proposal for a sentencing council is a case of using a sledgehammer to crack a nut. I am not sure that I completely favour a sentencing council, because we have to get the number of people in prison down, and judges have to fit in to that framework.

Bill Butler: How would you reduce the number? You say that the sentencing council would be a sledgehammer to crack a nut. What would be your much more sophisticated tool of preference?

Professor Spencer: I think that judges should sit down together and work out how they are going to reduce the number of people in prison. They need to say that only the most serious of crimes warrant imprisonment. I certainly agree with the proposal in the legislation that sentences of less than six months should not normally be custodial.
Bill Butler: One of my colleagues will come to that, professor, but that was an interesting comment. Can we now move on to Professor McNeill?

Professor McNeill: Are principles, and is a council, progress? In my view, yes. It is helpful to go back to the Scottish Prisons Commission’s “Scotland’s Choice” report and think about the context that it provides for the discussion of the measures in the bill. The report suggested that paying back in the community should be the default position and that, rather than thinking about imprisonment and alternatives to imprisonment, we should think about such community payback and alternatives to that. It is about trying to invert what is at the centre of our sanctioning system and our judicial consciousness, for want of a better expression.

Bill Butler: I am sorry to interrupt, but, in your view, does imprisonment have a place? If so, what is that place?

Professor McNeill: I was about to go on to say that it does. “Scotland’s Choice” states explicitly that imprisonment should be reserved for offences that are so serious that no other sentence is appropriate, and for situations in which there is a significant risk of serious harm to the public that must be dealt with through the detention of the offender. It says—

Bill Butler: If I may interrupt again, what about a situation in which someone offends time and time again, such as a burglar—although perhaps not one who is involved in the theft of a masterpiece of fine art? Is there not an argument that a custodial sentence would, in the end, have a salutary effect?

Professor McNeill: I do not know that there is evidence for the argument that a custodial sentence would have a salutary effect.

Bill Butler: What is the evidence against it?

Professor McNeill: Well—the fact that burglars recidivate at such high rates in spite of sentences of imprisonment being handed down to them.

If you will permit me to return to your original question, “Scotland’s Choice” explicitly states that a key and initial function of a sentencing council would be to establish the precise practical meaning of the two principles of seriousness and risk and how they should be applied and put into operation. The current proposals do not make it explicit that that would be an immediate function of a sentencing council, which is a serious missed opportunity.

To be fair to my colleagues in the consortium, although I am prepared to say personally—and probably with a greater degree of enthusiasm than other consortium members—that I think sentencing principles and a sentencing council are a good idea and probably long overdue, I am not so sure that the specific proposals in the bill are the best way to go about establishing guidelines or a council. You will have seen from the consortium’s submission that there is a great deal of anxiety among its members about certain risks that are created by the way in which specific proposals in the bill are drafted. I will happily leave it at that, if you want to move on.

Bill Butler: I have one further question. Do you agree that a sentencing council should be advisory rather than anything else? If you do, you will be agreeing with the Lord President and Lord Cullen, who gave evidence last week.

Professor McNeill: Is that intended to encourage or discourage me?

Bill Butler: That is, of course, a matter entirely for you. I would not constrain you in that way.

Professor McNeill: No, I do not think that such a council should be merely advisory. If it were, it would be too straightforward for judges to depart from the advice that the council issued.

I would want a sentencing council to produce mandatory guidelines—I am giving a personal view, not a consortium view—but I would nonetheless hold to a position that judges should be able to depart from the guidelines and give reasons for doing so in individual cases. Where sentencing councils operate in other jurisdictions, one benefit of such a procedure is that it allows a jurisprudence of departures—in other words, the development of legal reasoning and debate about what should and should not permit a departure from the rule to be applied.

Bill Butler: Is that jurisprudence not in place at the moment? That is what the sentencers argued last week.

Professor McNeill: No. At the moment, there is a system in which, after the fact, through an appeals process, guidelines come to be issued or appeal court decisions might have some effect in moderating individual sentences and also in communicating messages to the wider community of judges. However, that leaves us vulnerable to jurisprudence developing only on matters that happen to come before the appeal court. That is not a rational way to go about establishing a sentencing policy—it is at the mercy of events as opposed to being principled and thoughtful. I would much prefer guidelines to be developed in advance to set a framework.

I will give an analogy; it will not take long to do so. It is, I admit, an imperfect analogy, but it helped me to formulate my views. As an academic, I am a judge all the time. At the moment, examination boards are looming, and I am judging a ridiculous volume of student scripts. In exercising my professional discretion and deciding which mark to award to each individual script, I continually refer to stated guidelines that determine—

Bill Butler: Do you refer to grade-related criteria, as we used to call them?

Professor McNeill: There are criteria for each grade and for each separate module that I assess. The designers of the module will have indicated what it was trying to achieve. I apply to each individual case both the general guidelines on grades and the specific guidelines on the outcomes that we are after. Moreover, I willingly and happily subject my individual professional judgment to moderation by my colleagues internally in the university and externally in the academic community. I am talking about important decisions that affect my students’ career prospects and futures, but those decisions are in many respects far less important than the decisions that sentencers make every day in our courts. However, the process of moderation and the guidelines that are produced in advance of the decision making to which sentencers are subject are much weaker than the procedures that I am happy to submit myself to as a professional academic.

Bill Butler: The analogy is very good although, as you say, not perfect.

John Scott: I am on the sentencing council sceptic wing of the consortium.

Bill Butler: Is that the wing that has more members?

John Scott: It is hard to say. I think that a lot of people are in the middle and that the two sides are about even.

I think that the sentencers and judges were right last week when they said that sentencers do not start with a blank piece of paper and end up with something that bears no relation to what has happened in equivalent cases. There is a fair degree of consistency in sentencing in Scotland. However, I have problems with the meanings of the words “consistency” and “inconsistency”. The word “inconsistent” is more often used to describe a sentence that is perceived as lenient. There is rarely an outcry about a sentence that is seen to be too hard, although that does happen. I am concerned that a march towards consistency is really an attempt to ensure that sentences are levelled up.

Given what is proposed in the bill, it is interesting that the appeal court has used its own powers to issue guidelines, although, I admit, it has done so on only a handful of occasions. However, that has happened in the past couple of years, and the appeal court may be prompted to use those powers by the thought of what else might come in its place. Doing things in that way is useful, because although, as Fergus McNeill says, whatever is placed in front of the appeal court will be reacted to, whenever there are particular issues that are problems, even if the issue is just a local one, they will usually end up in the appeal court. Things will take a bit longer, but I am concerned that the sentencing council would be under immediate pressure to react immediately to condemn and force the judiciary into adopting a more severe stance towards a particular offence that happened to attract the attention of the editor of a tabloid. Perhaps the sentencing council would be more susceptible to such pressure, although I think that sentencers are also susceptible to it. In recent years, sentences have gone up—there has been an inflationary drift. Someone who is convicted of an offence today will get a higher sentence than someone who was convicted of that same offence 20 years ago would have got. That is partly because of the backdrop of increased penalties in legislation, and also because of public pressure.

Bill Butler: You say that you are sceptical about the proposed sentencing council. Does that mean that you are wholly against it, or do you think instead that it should be modified and adapted in a way that makes more sense to you and meets your concerns and doubts?

John Scott: It could be modified to ensure that it plays a useful role. It could be an advisory body rather than a body that issues guidelines. The relationship between the council and the court would require to be spelled out better than it is.

One of the things that are clear but, perhaps, surprising is that our sentencers do not know why the prison population is as high as it is. Perhaps the sentencing council could have a useful role to play with regard to research. It could also get involved with explaining matters more clearly to the public. Traditionally, courts have been bad at explaining anything that they have done. In recent years, however, that has improved significantly—when a case is of significant interest to the public, the press officer at the High Court will try to prepare some material to explain the situation. However, an issue that arises is how that is reported, which means that the newspapers have to be part of that process as well. The sentencing council might also be able to conduct events with the public, which would be helpful because, the more information the public get, the more they can see that a decision that might seem to be inconsistent is actually an appropriate decision that takes into account factors of which they were not aware.

Bill Butler: Would you say that, sometimes, the public’s view is coloured by the proprietors of certain newspapers, who simply want to sell more newspapers?

John Scott: Absolutely.

Bill Butler: I absolutely agree with that, too.

The Convener: As the only active practitioner present, you are not under common-law caution in respect of that answer, Mr Scott.

Stewart Maxwell: I agree that there tends to be public outcry about sentences being too lenient. However, there has also been outcry about sentences being too harsh, usually when someone who has been defending their property has injured someone, for example. Although there is not usually outcry about sentences that are seen to be too harsh, I assume that the courts’ appeals process deals with the cases about which there is such an outcry. What are your views on that?

John Scott: The appeals process deals with the majority of cases. When a client is charged with a particular offence, I can tell him what the sentence is likely to be, within a band, provided that the Crown has made the information available. However, there are judges who operate beyond the upper end and below the lower end of the band. The sentences that are imposed by those sentencers, whether they are exceptionally lenient or exceptionally severe, do not necessarily always end up in the appeal court—the Crown would have to decide whether to appeal if it thought that the sentence was unduly lenient.

There is a different dynamic around what happens in the appeal court. The fact that something is seen by the public as being excessively harsh or lenient is not a guarantee that the appeal court will deal with it. Further, the appeal court often decides to leave sentences alone if the sentence is deemed to be—in the form of words that it uses—harsh but not severe. Again, at that stage, we are down to playing with words.

Stewart Maxwell: You say that, because of your experience in this area, you can use the information that the Crown has provided to tell someone what sentence they are likely to get, within a band but there will be judges who will issue sentences beyond the upper end and below the lower end of that band. Does that statement not suggest that a sentencing council that produced guidelines would be a useful tool?

John Scott: I am not sure that guidelines would be useful in that regard, as the appeal court already issues similar guidelines. Judges have a necessary degree of independence, and the sort of judges to whom I am referring will not change their behaviour based on sentencing guidelines, whether those guidelines come from the appeal court or the sentencing council, even if that results in repeated appeals.

Stewart Maxwell: Earlier, we heard that only some cases reach an appeal and result in a judgment being given, which results in an anomalous situation in which we have guidelines from the appeal court in some areas but not in others. If we had a sentencing council that issued guidelines, we could see clearly whether someone was continually sentencing too harshly or too leniently.

John Scott: You are right to point out that flaw in the current set-up. The fact that a matter requires attention does not mean that it will necessarily end up in the appeal court.

Professor McNeill: You have hit on one of the reasons why I am generally in favour of the notion of a sentencing council issuing guidelines. Through the activity of such a council, we could achieve a coherence in our approach to sanctioning that does not currently exist. That coherence would be intelligible not merely to judges but to lawyers, defence agents, accused persons and—importantly—social workers struggling with the task of writing a court report and going to a court without being sure who is going to be on the bench or what that person might consider to be a suitable range of realistic penalties. We have ample evidence that social workers are struggling to come to terms with making a judgment about what is and is not realistic. Part of the reason for that is that they do not have a common framework or an expressly articulated framework for sanctioning to which they can look for guidance that might help them. I think that we can get better coherence and communication between the relevant professionals if we have stated principles and guidelines.

To reflect properly the views of my colleagues on the consortium, I should underline the fact that there is grave anxiety that the sentencing council might be exposed to undue political pressure and that the kind of media attention that has already been referred to could have an exceptionally detrimental and damaging effect on its operation, which could lead to serious consequences for the operation of the criminal justice system. Our hesitation is about the specifics of the proposals, as drafted.

Stewart Maxwell: Professor Spencer, would you like to add anything?

Professor Spencer: I think that inconsistency is useful, if we have an independent judiciary, but, on the other hand, that usefulness depends on the inconsistency not being too inconsistent and being able to fit into a coherent system that everyone can understand and there not being mavericks.

If we have a coherent framework whose boundaries everyone understands—which is achieved through good judicial training, benchmarking, judges discussing cases and using the information technology system that enables them to compare sentences and so on—it is entirely appropriate for judges to make independent sentencing decisions based on the merits of the individual case. My concern has always been that there is an upwards drift. That needs to be addressed and, as a group, judges have to be encouraged to reverse the direction of that drift, so that we can have a manageable number of people in prison.

Professor McNeill: On that very point about the independence of the judiciary, do you therefore agree with the argument that a sentencing council might undermine or inhibit that independence?

Professor Spencer: Again, that depends on the format. If the council is advisory, it will provide guidelines but will not necessarily instruct. We are in Alloa, and I am pleased that, if the Government statistics are correct, the court in Alloa has the lowest level of custodial disposals. However, other courts have higher levels. So be it. That depends partly on the decisions of individual sheriffs. If sheriffs and judges were constrained and told what they had to do, that clearly might fetter their independence. They must be able to judge individual cases, taking into account the individual circumstances, the nature of the offence and the offender and putting all that together. As we have heard, the judge must also consider reports from social workers and find out about the backgrounds in trying to reach a reasonable outcome. That is what is required.

Stewart Maxwell: Is it not the case that having a set of guidelines, with the ability to depart from them, would provide a framework that would give consistency and clarity and all the other things that we have discussed but would also give the correct balance in relation to judicial independence?

Professor McNeill: That is part of the answer, but the bill raises a slightly more vexed constitutional question. How I read the bill is that it is not trying to interfere with judicial discretion in individual cases. It will leave decisions in the hands of the judges, but within a framework of guidelines that the council will produce. The question is under what authority the council will produce the guidelines. Although the Parliament in all sorts of ways sets frameworks, limits powers and establishes duties of judges already through legislation, will the sentencing council act with the authority of Parliament when it issues a guideline or will it, to an extent, act under pressure from the executive arm of government? What precisely will its relationship be to Parliament and the Executive? Further, the council’s relationship with the appeal court is not entirely clear from the bill. Those issues require clarification.

There is a risk of undue political interference in the process of establishing the guidelines. I want Parliament to exercise its democratic right—I argue that it is a duty—to make clear statements about the systems of punishment and sanctioning that should exist in Scotland. I am happy for Parliament to create a body that exercises some functions on its behalf and maybe goes into a level of detail that the Parliament and the Justice Committee could never go into in their own right. However, I am slightly worried about the Cabinet Secretary for Justice having a role in the appointment of members of the council. I am not sure what the independence of those members would be once the council was operational.

I have other problems with the proposed composition of the council. For example, I am not sure why a constable is to be represented, when those involved in the administration of punishments are not. It seems obvious to me that somebody from the Scottish Prison Service and somebody from criminal justice social work ought to be involved in the council, given that they have practical day-to-day experience of making the sentences of the courts take effect. That strikes me as an exceptionally valuable form of expertise to bring to the deliberations of the sentencing council. The prosecuting arm of the justice system is already to be represented through the nomination of a procurator fiscal or a representative of the Crown Office. I am not sure what the police function is in the proposed constitution of the council.

John Scott: Given that my preference is for a council that is an advisory body, questions of independence do not really arise.

Stewart Maxwell: I have one final point, just to nail down the issue. If there were to be a sentencing council and it was not going to be advisory, what proposals would make it acceptable? Professor McNeill made some points about the make-up of the council. Should the balance be changed? For example, it has been suggested that sentencers—judges and sheriffs—should make up the majority on the council. Should it be subject to the appeal court judges, as has also been suggested? Professor McNeill questioned the proposal that the Cabinet Secretary for Justice would appoint members. Who else would appoint them?

Professor McNeill: There could—and perhaps should—be a role for Parliament in determining appointments to a sentencing council. Through that mechanism, the Executive’s direct involvement would be moderated.

On the specifics of how I would constitute a council if I were in a position to do so, I do not feel that my expertise or knowledge of these councils around the world allows me to answer your question. I encourage you to put the question to Professor Neil Hutton when he gives evidence at a later date. He has an exceptional level of expertise in the operation and constitution of councils around the world.

Angela Constance: Professor McNeil has intimated who he would like to be included on the sentencing council. Does any other panel member have a view on that? Also, where should the balance of power on a sentencing council lie? Should the majority of members be judges?

Professor McNeill: I do not have a firm position on who should be in the majority. I can see why judges might think that the maintenance of judicial independence requires them to be in the majority. It is interesting to hear them talk about it. A job remains to be done in teasing out what they mean by “judges” in that context. As I see it, as the council’s constitution is proposed in the bill, it will have five judges, although I am not sure that that is the view that the two senators took last week.

Given that the greatest volume of business, particularly involving short sentences, is in sheriff courts, there needs to be better representation of sheriffs and not of more senior judges. I am not sure that sheriffs are adequately represented. At the moment, there are eight lawyers as against four laypeople. I am not sure that I favour that. I am sorry to be equivocal and not to have a straight answer for you. I can say only that I remain to be convinced. I am open to argument on both sides.

John Scott: I would lean towards having a majority of judges on the sentencing council, if it were going to be more than just advisory, for the reasons of independence that Fergus McNeill mentioned.

Professor Spencer: I do not have a view. I share the view that Fergus McNeill gave.

Paul Martin: Professor McNeill spoke about independence. Section 8, “Ministers’ power to request that guidelines be published or reviewed”, makes a number of references to ministers’ powers. For example, it says:

“The Council must have regard to any request made by the Scottish Ministers.”

Is that the kind of reference about which you are concerned?

Professor McNeill: Yes. It gives some pause for thought, although I do not want to suggest that the Cabinet Secretary for Justice or, more properly, Scottish ministers should not have input into the work of the sentencing council. That would obviously not be sensible. It all depends on how we interpret the vexed phrase “must have regard to”. If that means “must consider, but can ignore”, I am not too alarmed by section 8. If it means “is under some obligation to respond to”—if “must” means “must”—does that mean that the council must respond to the request but can respond in the negative? The practical effect of the section is unclear.

Section 8(3) says:

“If the Council decides not to comply with a request made by the Scottish Ministers, it must provide the Scottish Ministers with reasons for its decision.”

What reasons are acceptable and what are unacceptable? What happens if the Scottish ministers are unhappy with the reasons that the council has given? Could we end up in a ping-pong battle of referral, re-referral and refusal to consider and reconsider? I am not sure that the relationship between the Parliament, the Executive and the judiciary has been adequately thought out in relation to the constitution of the council.

Paul Martin: It is difficult to envisage the relationship. If there is going to be one, I suppose that the minister would hope that the council will have regard to any request that he makes. It is difficult to strike a balance; it will have to be one or the other. It will be difficult if, when the minister makes a particular request, the sentencing council says, “Well, we are independent,” but the legislation says, “Well, sorry, you’re not. You must have regard to a request.” We cannot have our cake and eat it, can we? We have to decide one way or the other. Do you agree?

Professor McNeill: I am sorry, you will need to clarify—decide one way or the other between which two positions?

Paul Martin: The phrase “must have regard to” is difficult. I appreciate your point that the Government must have some sort of relationship with the council, but it is difficult to envisage, because of that phrase, where the balance will be struck.

Professor McNeill: It would depend on what kind of referrals the Scottish ministers would pass to the sentencing council. If section 8 means that ministers reserve the right to refer to the council, for whatever reasons, particular practical or political concerns, then that is fine. It would be entirely appropriate for ministers to ask the council to consider such issues. However, if the section means that ministers would be able to say to the council, “You will now produce guidelines on this,” I would be slightly more hesitant in saying that it was appropriate. I would like the council to be able to say, “We’ve considered the request for guidelines to be produced in relation to particular matters, but at the moment we have more pressing priorities.” The council would then explain why those priorities were more pressing. The isue in question is the relative authority and power of the different arms of government.

Cathie Craigie: The consortium’s written evidence says:

“The case for and likely effects of a Sentencing Council are far from clear.”

From the evidence that we have heard so far, I think that we could all agree with that statement. In the same paragraph, you say:

“a sentencing council would cost £1 million a year.”

You then suggest that that resource could be more effectively used elsewhere. Will you give us some examples of how the resource could be better used? Other than by the creation of a sentencing council, how might the objectives that have been set for the council be met?

Who wants to answer? Professor McNeill, you seem to be het all the time because you are in the middle.

Professor McNeill: I know—it is just not fair. I demand guidelines.

The Convener: But you must answer.

Professor McNeill: Right. I will have regard to the question, although I may not answer it.

What does £1 million buy you in the criminal justice system? Alec Spencer will correct me if I am wrong but, by my calculations, it buys you 25 prison places for a year, or fewer than 1,000 community penalties—which range in price from about £1,000 to £1,500. I think that those figures are roughly correct at the moment, although, as we have heard this morning, that is not by any means an adequate level of resourcing if we want community penalties to be as effective as I feel they could be.

I have to state clearly that what I have just said reflects a range of views within the consortium.
Speaking personally, I would say that investing £1 million in producing a coherent and rational approach to sentencing would be an excellent use of taxpayers’ money—as long as a coherent and rational approach was indeed the outcome.
However, from the earlier discussion, the committee has already heard all the caveats about whether the proposals as they stand would achieve such an outcome.

I think that £1 million would be an entirely acceptable price to pay for greater coherence in our approach to sentencing. Whether the present proposals would deliver that coherence is a question that the consortium is debating.

Cathie Craigie: Does anybody else wish to comment?

John Scott: No, I have nothing to add to that.

Cathie Craigie: All right, I will move on to ask about consistency in sentencing. Evidence that the committee has heard, last week in particular, has suggested that more research is required to establish whether there really is inconsistency in sentencing. We heard this morning from social work representatives that there was evidence of inconsistency. That evidence came from Government statistics. Do you think that a sentencing council would produce consistency?

Professor McNeill: Would it produce consistency? Let me go back to the premise on which the question is based.

Cathie Craigie: Would it produce consistency, and do you believe that there is inconsistency at the moment?

Professor McNeill: That is where I wanted to start. Do I believe that there is inconsistency? Yes,
I do. What do I base my belief on? Several things.
Let me first define consistency and inconsistency, as that was troubling for the senators last week.

Technically, to demonstrate inconsistency in the sentencing of offenders one would have to be able to show that exactly the same offender appearing before different judges for exactly the same crime would be sentenced differently. That will never happen, so there is no way for any research to be conducted that would absolutely nail the question of judicial consistency or inconsistency—it is simply not possible. Judges will always be able to say that every case is unique, and they are right to make that argument. In that respect, I have no argument with what the witnesses said last week.

However, is there variance in sentencing that seems to be beyond what is defensible? I think that the answer to that question is yes. This morning, you heard evidence of the statistical patterns of sentencing in different courts. There is clear evidence from those statistics that there is significant variance between different sheriff courts in Scotland. The question is whether that variance is defensible in relation to what is going on in different sheriff court areas and the different business that comes before different courts. On that issue, I can cite three studies from the 1990s that looked at that directly or indirectly in researching various aspects of sentencing. I will give you the references later if you want them.

The studies all found evidence of a degree of consistency across sentencers but some evidence of inconsistency. One study—to which Professor Hutton can speak when he comes to the committee—looked at three sheriff court areas and found that, by and large, the sentencing by the 10 practitioners in them was within a reasonable range of variance with the exception of the sentencing of one sheriff, who was significantly out of line with his or her colleagues—I must be careful how I phrase that.

I did some research in the 1990s that looked at three sheriff court areas. To eliminate the tension around the similarities and dissimilarities between cases, I ran all the cases through a particular instrument that tries to assess the likelihood of custody. I discovered that, of the three courts that I was looking at, the one that sentenced most people to custody was the one that apparently dealt with the least serious cases. That is prima facie evidence of inconsistency.

The third study was the one that generated the instrument that I used in my study. It, too, found variance that could best be understood as the result of different judicial sentencing practices. I am convinced, therefore, that there is a degree of variance in sentencing that goes beyond what is reasonable and defensible.

A more pragmatic source of evidence that suggests variance in the system is the fact that accused persons going before the courts and the lawyers who defend them know full well that going before different sentencers requires different tactics. At intermediate diets, some people will plead guilty instantly if the judge whom they are going to appear before is deemed to be a relatively lenient sentencer. If a harsher or more punitive sentencer is on the bench, the person will not plead guilty in the hope that, when they return to court later, they will face a different judge.

Judges know that that happens. It is called judge shopping, and it goes on all the time in our system—sorry, that is an exaggeration; it goes on to a significant degree in our system. Social workers know about it because they have to cope with it in the reports that they write. My first court report was for Ayr, and my second court report was for Kilmarnock. Foolishly, I wrote them on the presumption that roughly the same thing would go on in the two courts, but my practice teacher told me that I could not possibly submit the report that I had written to Kilmarnock. It was okay for Ayr but it would not have done for Kilmarnock, as things are done differently there—at least, they were during the early 1990s.

Everybody understands that that goes on. When we say that such evidence is anecdotal, we are not doing justice to the weight of evidence that shows that there is significant variance. That is partly why I am in favour of establishing a system that aims for greater coherence.

I think that your initial question was whether a sentencing council will work and eliminate inconsistency. It will help us to make progress, and it will improve on the current position. It will expose judicial decision making to a degree of scrutiny against agreed standards—which do not currently exist in the system. That is why I am in favour of progressing in that direction, albeit with all the caveats about whether the measures that are before us provide the right way to proceed.

Cathie Craigie: We are getting deeper and deeper. Your response has not helped me to make any progress in my thinking about this. Although we might expect the Government to have to hand all the necessary research and information, anecdotal or otherwise, even the policy memorandum that accompanies the bill, in discussing public perception, says that there is no "empirical evidence to support the contention that inconsistency is present".

Professor McNeill: That is actually very simple to explain.

Cathie Craigie: Well, explain it.

Professor McNeill: There are two clauses in the relevant sentence in the report by the Sentencing Commission for Scotland. The first says that there is no compelling empirical evidence that inconsistency exists. The start of my answer agreed with that—it is impossible to provide compelling empirical evidence that inconsistency exists, because no two exactly similar but separate cases are ever sentenced. I agree with that clause of the sentence.

The second clause says that there is a perception of inconsistency and that that perception is not unfounded. That is lawyerly, and the position that emerged from the Sentencing Commission was one of compromise, but both statements are entirely true. There is evidence that provides a foundation for a view that there is a degree of variance—I use that word carefully—but whether that amounts to inconsistency, in the strictest terms, is another question. I know that that is pedantic, but that is the way it is with the evidence on this question.

John Scott: One danger that I see in this part of the bill is that it proposes legislation that attempts to end a perception of something, but legislation is not terribly good at doing that. An important part of the proposed Scottish sentencing council would be its work to explain what goes on. That can sometimes be difficult even for those who are involved in the system—it is quite a challenge. If the public are presented with fuller information, they will come down from a position of wanting hanging and flogging, but trying to get the necessary information is a challenge in itself.

The Convener: Some inconsistencies might be explicable by local circumstances that determine sentencing policy. For example, Professor Spencer tells us that here in Alloa there is a very low ratio of custodial sentences. That presumably reflects on the fact that there is very little trouble in Alloa. [Laughter.]

Professor McNeill: You have been tried in the court of public opinion, convener.

The Convener: I got exactly the response that I was looking for.

Robert Brown: I am impressed with the personal experience that Professor McNeill has brought us, which I think reflects the experience of those of us who have been in practice in different courts—Kilmarnock has been instanced in that regard.

I have a slightly different thought on the matter. If there were a sentencing council of the sort that is proposed, would repeated departure from guidelines by a particular sheriff raise any implications about their continuance in office? Has there been any thought about those implications?

Professor McNeill: That is one implication of the bill. It is not easy to countenance a situation in which a sentencing council issues guidelines that are implemented throughout the courts with the exception of one or two judges, who are repeatedly appealed against when they refuse to comply with the guidelines and who do not provide satisfactory explanations for departure from the guidelines. Because of judicial independence, are they simply allowed to remain in office forever? There would be considerable pressure in such cases to do something about such judges—to get rid of them if they are not going to change. That is a dangerous piece of ground.

Robert Brown: Is it, or is it not? The issue is quite difficult in some ways.

John Scott: It depends. When I agree with a sentence I am not terribly troubled about it, but if something is inconsistent it attracts my attention. My fear is that judicial decisions could be the focus of adverse comment, perhaps because of a failure to comply with guidelines that had come about through intense public or political pressure or ill-judged comments about a single case. Such guidelines would potentially not be just but could not be resisted by the appeal court because of the dynamic whereby the proposed Scottish sentencing council had the upper hand.

Robert Brown: Is there a risk of what we might describe as defensive decision making by judicial persons? The fear of medical negligence processes can lead to a defensive approach taking precedence over sensible decision making.

John Scott: There is certainly a risk of that.

However sentencers justify their decisions, I want the process that they go through to be better. I want a change in judicial behaviour so that thousands fewer people go to prison, on the basis that sending people to prison is an expensive way of doing things badly. I am not convinced that the bill will help us in that regard.

Professor McNeill: I agree with John Scott. If a particularly recalcitrant judge continually refused to react to guidelines or appeals, questions would be asked about their professional competence. I would have grave anxieties if the decision to discipline that judge rested with someone other than the judiciary, but that does not mean that there ought not to be an internal discipline process in the profession, as there should be in any profession, to manage practice that is out of kilter with accepted norms.

John Scott: We are in dangerous territory, but there would be situations in which a judge’s repeated behaviour would require to be considered if they were to continue in the job.

The Convener: The Judiciary and Courts (Scotland) Act 2008 provides for such situations.

We move on to consider the use of imprisonment and community payback.

Robert Brown: These issues are perhaps more central to our consideration of the bill. The Scottish Prisons Commission said in its report:

“It is the view of the Commission that prison should be used for those whose crimes are serious and violent, and for those who present a real risk to our safety.”

Does the panel agree? In practical terms, what are the implications for how we tackle these matters?

Professor McNeill: I agree whole-heartedly. We rely far too much on imprisonment, which seems to be the sanction that we countenance imposing repeatedly, irrespective of the evidence of its ineffectiveness. That might be because an offender has no choice but to comply with imprisonment, whereas all sanctions in the community require an element of co-operation if they are to work.

If short custodial sentences are related to exceptionally high rates of reconviction, if they overcrowd the prison system and inhibit the effectiveness of what can be done in prison with people who are serving longer sentences, and if they produce bigger problems for the communities to which prisoners return, I can see no logical or rational basis on which to continue the upward drift in the use of imprisonment that we have experienced in the past decade or two.
I did not quite understand the second part of your question. Were you asking about the measures in the bill?

Robert Brown: My question was about the implications of the Prisons Commission’s approach to short-term sentences and what it means for the way in which the courts operate and for the facilities that need to be put in place to deal with additional community sentences.

Professor McNeill: The genuinely radical aspects of the Prisons Commission’s report have come into the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill in only a refracted and partial way. For example, the three-stage approach to sentencing that is articulated in “Scotland’s Choice” is not in the bill. The provision for the use of progress courts that was envisaged by the commission is not included in the bill in the same way. Progress courts are an option that sentencers may consider when a community payback order is imposed, but the commission envisaged that every community payback order would involve the offender accounting for their progress in public in court. Progress courts were intended to be specialist courts, using particularly trained judges who understand the problems of people involved in persistent offending, the complexities of the process of supporting those people to change and the realities of managing issues of compliance constructively. The bill includes no provision for the creation of a specialist court.

The Prisons Commission required a huge, up-front investment in services in the community that would have allowed the creation of a system in which judges could have confidence—a system in which criminal justice social work and community justice authorities were well and truly prepared and properly resourced. No one could have anticipated what has happened in the global economy since the publication of the report, but those events have created a climate in which it is much more difficult to make the proposals work in practice. I have anxieties about the level of resourcing for the reforms that are planned. Would you like me to comment on whether I think that the reforms could work?

Robert Brown: I will come back to that after asking your colleagues about the resource issue, which is central. Is there agreement that there must be significant, short-term but up-front resource to kick-start the reforms and to make them happen? I know that Professor Spencer has views on the issue.

Professor Spencer: I support the commission’s recommendation that custodial sentences be limited to those who require them—serious and violent offenders. Such sentences should be used to deal with serious offences and for the protection of the public. Community disposals should be the default position: we should talk not about alternatives to prison but about alternatives to community disposals, which should be the option for most people.

Resources are a difficult issue. I agree with the McLeish report that a large amount of resources are needed up front, but I am a realist and am not sure that that will be possible. I have suggested that there may be ways of organising things. For example, local prisons could be handed over to community justice authorities; their resources and those of the community could be merged and managed by such authorities. That would enable a better movement of staff and financial resources and allow local prisons to be used for programmes.

There are ways of starting the change. If we continue to have two separate organisations—community structures and prison structures—money will not flow from one to the other, because there is enormous pressure on the prison system, where numbers are rising.

As we know, 81 per cent of court sentences—14,686 in the last year for which we have statistics—are for six months or less. The prison system counts its numbers up to but not including six months—I do not know why we count our statistics in different ways—so it had 8,191 receptions last year of people who were serving less than six months.

Most of those sentences are very short—10,000 of the 14,686 sentences of less than six months were actually less than three months—and the average time, which the prison system’s statisticians use to calculate population levels and projections, that someone who was serving a sentence of less than six months spent in prison was 23.25 days. That is a not very long time—one cannot do anything with people in that time, but it costs an enormous amount of money to process them.

I have heard the convener talk this morning and on other occasions about community respite, but a sentence of such a short period does not give that respite. I am not advocating long sentences, but that is a complete waste of money and resource. If we want to start focusing resources on the community, we have to get rid of that big churn and use the money to help with health, employability, literacy, housing and so on, and with addictions such as alcohol and drugs.

The Convener: I think Nigel Don would be grateful for a bit of clarification on that point.
Nigel Don: Can you just clarify that number—the 23 point-whatever-it-was days?

Professor Spencer: It is 23.25 days.

Nigel Don: I will not worry about taking it to significant figures any more than you would, but I would like to know whether that is the number of days that the individual actually spent in prison on remand and after sentencing, or whether it is just post sentencing.

Professor Spencer: It is post sentencing. If the remand is being rolled into that, it is counted in a different way.

Nigel Don: So that figure is for after the sentencing.

Professor Spencer: It is for after the sentencing, but, of course, one does not work with offenders until they are sentenced.

Nigel Don: I realise that. Is it possible that those who generated that statistic could also tell us what the average remand period was? It need not necessarily be this instant, but although we have established what the number means it is frequently misunderstood. We need to know what the total numbers are, or the number that you gave will not mean much.

Professor Spencer: Perhaps you can get that figure. I might find it within a few minutes; it might be in the Scottish Prison Service annual report. The statistics come from the SPS statisticians—perhaps your committee can get those details.

Nigel Don: I am sure we can—thank you.

The Convener: We must also seek the statistics on the actual sentence that was imposed, which in the case of a 23-day sentence would be about three months, bearing in mind that so many people are released after serving 25 per cent of their sentence, albeit that they might be tagged.

Professor McNeill: I am sorry to jump in ahead of John Scott, but I have some numbers on resources that might help to provide a frame of reference. The proposal to implement the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007 at a cut-off point of one year, at which point the new release process kicks in, is costed at about £47 million. Unless I am wrong, that figure is somewhere between a half and a third of the total current budget of criminal justice social work services.

The cost of Addiewell prison is £25 million to £30 million per annum and—with inflation and various other costs built in—possibly £1 billion over 25 years. If we consider the cost of investment in community penalties and community payback in relation to what we get for our money in prison expansion, it still seems—even in financial times as dire as those that we currently face—that that is a critically neglected area of investment in a civilised country such as Scotland.

Robert Brown: That is helpful, but I will query one further relevant aspect. As you mentioned, the convener talked about community respite, which is an important aspect—perhaps not in the prison sense but in the sense of effectiveness of disposal to stop people committing offences.

I have some concerns about the community sentences as they currently exist, and as they would presumably continue under the new regime, with regard to whether they might be made more effective within their context. It is clear that they cover a range of sins, from probation to drug treatment and testing orders and various other things in between, and some of those methods are more effective than others.

What needs to be done to make community sentences more effective, particularly in reducing offending? I think that we can take for granted more formal aspects such as starting early and dealing more effectively with breaches, but I wonder whether with their expertise panel members can give us some views on the matter.

Professor McNeill: Again, that issue is not unconnected to resource questions. The Prisons Commission report, for example, referred to an 80 per cent increase in a decade in the volume of reports that social workers are writing. That increase and the effects of the release reforms in the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007 mean that social workers in the community are getting busier and busier writing reports for court and managing people coming out of prison.

The only thing that can suffer in that economy is the management of people on community payback orders. I am seriously concerned that criminal justice social workers simply do not have enough time to spend on proactively addressing issues of compliance with offenders on community penalties and supporting what is for many of them a very complicated process of change. Frankly, I would love to see the skills of our criminal justice social workers unshackled by adequate resourcing and by a move to redirect their energies away from report writing and post-release supervision—important though those activities are—and towards the delivery of the new community payback order.

There have been advances in our understanding of how people change—in other words, the process of desistance. In fact, that is my principal field of research and writing. I could go on incessantly about the issue; I will not do so, but I am happy to provide documentation about it if the committee is interested. I am already involved in working with criminal justice social workers, community justice authorities and the Scottish Government on trying to ensure that the emerging evidence informs approaches to practice. That said, we need a systemic context that allows our social workers to use their skills and ensures that they are not distracted by having to deal with the front end and back end of the business, which simply leaves the core underresourced.

Robert Brown: A summary of that information would be helpful. Do other witnesses have other thoughts about the community payback orders?

John Scott: The question of the effectiveness of community penalties—and the issue of resources, which ties into it—is crucial. In fact, it is one of the issues that I am most concerned about. We should bear in mind that there is no law to prevent the proper funding of what is going on in criminal justice social work and that the range of community penalties in the different parts of Scotland is probably as wide as that in any other country.

I imagine that the courts will have raised expectations about the community payback orders, but the fact is that, when they come into play, there will be only the same—or perhaps even less—funding than there is at the moment. At the moment, a community penalty is judged as having failed when, in fact, the supervising officer might not have been able to do everything that he wanted to do. Some of the time, that comes down to resources.

As for the transformative effects of this rebranding, the fact is that much of what is in the community payback order is covered by existing orders, and the approach might founder when judges find that it gives rise to similar problems—especially in light of the suggestion that they should not use short-term custodial sentences, about which, as members will be aware, there has been a degree of resentment. As a result, they will have higher expectations about what should go in place of existing community penalties, but the penalty itself might be destined to fail.

Angela Constance: What do the witnesses think of the suggestion that was made by a sheriff at last week’s meeting that short custodial sentences are effective and their current use is appropriate?

Professor Spencer: I have not read the Official Report of that meeting and I do not know who said that, so I will not comment on that individual’s remarks. I think that the use of short-term and very short-term sentences is complete eye-wash. It has no effect at all on reducing crime. We know from research from around the world that where prison is used on its own—in general, short-term sentences involve only prison—crime increases by between 1 and 3 per cent. I can give the committee references to that research later. We know that when people are sent to prison for a short while, it is likely to be disruptive in a range of areas. A person’s tenancy might be lost, their employment will certainly be lost, and their family support might diminish. If they have financial problems, those problems will be worse when they come out of prison.

Time should be taken to consider what the issues are in determining what is most effective. I think that I said earlier that the criminal justice system cannot resolve the ills of society. In general, the ills of society—inequalities and so on—generate the conditions that lead to people offending and committing crimes, which is unfortunate. Time is needed to work with people so that they learn job skills, how to relate to employers, literacy skills, life skills, how to sort out their addiction problems, how to boil an egg and so on. Such things take time and resources.

There needs to be tolerance for people serving community payback sentences. When most of us bring up children, we do not say to them when they are two or three, “Don’t do that,” then punish them the next time they do it; it can take years for them to learn what is and is not appropriate behaviour. The same applies to offenders. They may want to change, but perhaps they do not have the capacity to do so, therefore they need to be worked with over a period. Of course there will be lapses, but if the trend is right, that is the way that they need to go.

I think that we heard this morning that looking at reconvictions, for example, will not tell us about the nature of a person’s offending, whether its frequency has reduced, whether the amount of harm has reduced or whether the person is on the right track. Only bald statistics will be seen. An holistic approach that is not easy to define needs to be taken. A generic payback sentence might allow social workers or people who counsel offenders to try to achieve that.

Angela Constance: Professor Spencer, given your background in the Scottish Prison Service, can you comment on how prison officers at the coalface view short-term sentences?

Professor Spencer: I do not think that they think that short-term sentences are very helpful. We understand why people are given long-term prison sentences—they have committed a serious offence. Staff have time to get to know such people and to try to work out what their issues are, to assess them, to work out what the risks are, and to try to sort out interventions. It is to be hoped that they will have contributed to a change in the approach of such people when they come out of prison. However, if a person is in prison for the average of 23.25 days, for example, there will not be time for such things. The prisons are overcrowded. There are two or three prisoners to a cell, and large numbers of them are processed and moved elsewhere, so staff do not have the time to get to know them individually. They certainly do not have the capacity to do individual interviews and to assess prisoners and work out which interventions would be best for them. Very short sentences are a complete waste of time. Prison staff are frustrated by them and by people going in and out of prison. The staff have to service those people by providing bedding, laundry and food and making all the other necessary provisions, therefore they cannot do the job that they want to do, which is about making society safer.

Professor McNeill: I will try to be brief, although the question is an invitation to talk about desistance.

The Convener: Feel free to adopt Professor Spencer’s arguments.

Professor McNeill: I will add a very brief comment, if I may. First, the sheriff could not possibly have had in mind reducing reoffending as the measure of short custodial penalties’ effectiveness. I have not read the Official Report of last week’s meeting, but I presume that that cannot possibly be what he or she had in mind. I say that because three things help people to stop offending: getting older and becoming more mature; developing social ties that mean something to them; and changing their view of what they are about as a person. Short periods in prison do not help with any of those three things. Prison takes away responsibility and inhibits the development of maturity; it damages and often breaks already fragile social ties; and it confirms a negative narrative of a person as an offender, a prisoner and, often, a hopeless case.

From a desistance point of view, or from any evidence in relation to reconviction, we cannot argue that short sentences are effective in that sense. However, to be fair, the sheriff might have had in mind two other possibilities. One is that the approach is effective because it hurts. On a straight retributive, pain-for-pain analysis, maybe that is true the first or second time—I do not know. The Cabinet Secretary for Justice clearly disagrees, but maybe pain for pain works. The other possibility is that the sheriff was thinking about containment and respite, which I take seriously. Like everybody else, I live in a community and I have concerns about crime and antisocial behaviour. However, as a criminologist, when I think about those concerns and how I want them to be handled, I do not want people who cause trouble in my community to be sent to prison to do not very much for a short period of time except have their prospects of stopping behaving that way when they come out damaged. That just does not make sense, as it is a way of storing up trouble for the community, not a way of solving the problems for the community.

I would much rather have people working in the community—perhaps in a community hall, as we heard about earlier—making a positive contribution, building social ties and perhaps seeing themselves in a different light, as they recognise in other people’s eyes that they have made a positive contribution and understand that they might be able to continue to do that in other ways. I would feel safer as an individual if fewer people went to prison, because I understand the evidence, which compels me to acknowledge that short prison sentences simply are not the best way forward.

John Scott: The evidence last week that defended the continued use of short-term sentences was pretty apocryphal. Obviously, each individual sentencer has their own experience. A sheriff might sentence the odd offender to a relatively short custodial sentence and never see them again. However, that experience is not a terribly good basis on which to justify the continuation of something that we know does not work very well at all in the vast majority of cases. Even in such individual cases, we do not know what happened when the people came out of prison.

Paul Martin: A form of payback is already in place by virtue of community service. What evidence is there that community service is more effective than short-term sentences? You have said that short-term sentences are no good, but will you clarify what percentage of them are no good? Are we saying that all those people who receive a community disposal such as community service, which is in effect the same as payback, become model citizens?

Professor McNeill: Payback is a bit different from community service, because, as set out in the bill, it involves more flexibility and a range of measures that are not currently applied to community service. However, we know that, in general, the reconviction rate with community service is significantly better than that with imprisonment, particularly short sentences, but we do not know—

Paul Martin: What is the percentage?

Professor McNeill: The two-year reconviction rate for people who are given community service is 42 per cent, as against 60-something per cent for people with prison sentences in general and an even higher rate—which escapes me—for people with short prison sentences.
The general picture is that community service performs better, although a selection effect might apply. I note the comment that was made before lunch that the two populations that receive prison sentences and community sentences are not as dissimilar as we might expect but, nonetheless, a selection effect might be at play.

Why might community service work better? An intriguing bit of research on that came from Scotland. Some time ago, Gill McIvor at the University of Stirling examined community service in operation. She discovered that, although community service has—strictly speaking—no rehabilitative intent and is meant to be a punishment whereby people pay back through work, it fares better than probation, which is meant to be the rehabilitative option to tackle offence-related needs. She also discovered that contact with beneficiaries of community service—offenders coming face to face with people who benefit from the work that they do—and a sense that the work is meaningful contribute to the reduction in reoffending.

That is only one study, but it links with desistance literature in several ways. I could point the committee to numerous such references. Payback provides a potential opportunity for people who have for a significant time seen themselves as and received the message that they are a detractor from their community—a troublemaker in their community. If they embark on payback with the support of a good social worker and they begin to make a go of it, the possibility of change occurs to them as they gradually see themselves in a different and more valued social role. That is why community service has significant rehabilitative potential.

Professor McNeill: There are two ways to approach that. First, are we content that the opportunity that we have provided for an offender has been sufficiently resourced and properly supported, to give it the best possible chance to work? The evidence that the committee has heard from sheriffs suggests problems with the resourcing of community service in some areas. One problem is that I am not entirely convinced that we can always attribute the failure to take the opportunity simply to the offender.

Secondly, the provisions in “Scotland’s Choice” to avoid short sentences were to apply at first instance. The commission said that nobody should go straight to a short custodial sentence, but that that would remain a possibility when default on a community penalty—community payback—could not be handled in any more constructive way.

I want the courts and criminal justice social workers to work as hard as they possibly can to support compliance and to be realistic about how difficult the process of change is. As in the drugs courts, I want lapses and relapses to be handled robustly but sensitively. Nonetheless, I recognise that the public require a backstop. If somebody who has been given every opportunity and all the support, and for whom the right opportunities have been supplied at the right time, still does not avail themselves of those opportunities, a time might come when a custodial sentence is necessary. I am just not sure whether our current recourse to short custodial sentences is always necessary.

The Convener: I think that the question has been answered, so I ask Professor Spencer to be brief.

Professor Spencer: We are talking mainly about young people, of whom we lock up far too many in Scotland anyway.

The Convener: Mr Martin’s question was general.

Professor Spencer: Prison sentences do not work. We lock people up, but when they come out of prison, they are still prolific offenders. If it costs us £40,000 a year to lock somebody up, we would have a much better bang for our buck and a much better chance of reducing their reoffending if we spent that £40,000 on them in the community. There are organisations that provide intensive support to and supervision of offenders and which show much higher levels of success. Of course that costs more, but nothing like the amount that it costs to keep someone in prison.

If you want impact, you get it not by sending people to prison only for them to continue to be prolific offenders when they get out, but by using the resource in the community, although it may cost more.

The Convener: Professor McNeill referred to the fact that the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill will amend the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007 prior to its coming into force. Are your concerns purely on financial matters?

Professor McNeill: Far from it. Where do I begin? The matter is dealt with in the submission from the consortium and, at length, in the submission from the Scottish centre for crime and justice research. I will put it bluntly: the 2007 act is a dreadful piece of legislation, which will have very negative consequences for the operation of the prison service and criminal justice social work. The money that it will cost to implement it would be far better spent on making community payback work. The money must be spent up front on community payback and not on a peculiarly muddled and ill-considered set of release reforms.

I accept the argument that release arrangements needed to be reformed, but I would rather scrap the whole thing and start again. If we were to do that, it would be almost impossible to come up with a worse piece of legislation. I am sorry to be a little intemperate, but that is my view on the matter.

The Convener: It is not in the least intemperate; it is an honest view. I am aware of what you said in your submission, but my question gave you the chance to say it for the Official Report. Do I take it that your colleagues concur with that view?

Professor Spencer: Yes.

John Scott: Not only do I concur, but I would be even less temperate in stating my view than Fergus McNeill was. If the provisions were to be implemented, Scotland would be less safe. We do not have enough people to do risk assessments. We would need a parole board that was about 20 times its current size. Instead of dealing with the most serious crimes, it would have to deal with some of the least serious ones. The legislation is a waste of professional resources that could be better targeted towards making Scotland safer.

The Convener: Thank you.

I thank the panel for their attendance. I am sorry that the session has been fairly lengthy—there was a fair amount to go through.

I return to the earlier agenda item, under which members of the public were given the opportunity to raise any issues. We are once more in open session and have a few minutes in hand. If anyone wishes to raise a point with the committee, I invite them to do so.

Sheila Wynne: I am a volunteer from Clackmannanshire with too many volunteer positions to mention. The view of the community in Clackmannanshire of the Alloa court system is that the sheriff does not do anything. People who visit the court for various reasons—for a day out or whatever—think that the public are allowed to run riot in the court building. It seems that there is no way of saying, “Right. You must shut up or get out.”

Although I agree with community sentencing, where are the human rights of the victims? Not much has been said about that in recent times. The human rights of the accused seem to be more important—they have far more human rights than the victim has. When habitual offenders are given community sentences, the community has to deal with it. The health and wellbeing of the community should come first.

I am talking on a personal level, having had 10 years of that. I am coming out the other side only now. My views were not taken into account and I know that, in saying that, I speak for many others.

The Convener: Thank you. The individual difficulties, as you perceive them, at Alloa sheriff court are not a matter for the committee. As you will appreciate, we are here to conduct an evidence-taking session on the operation of the bill, and your views will be taken into account in that regard.

Elma Mitchell: You asked about the benefits of community service. Many of the people who have worked for us have come back to us and said, “Thank you for what you have done.” A lot of them had to be taught how to use a hoover, because they did not have a clue how to do so. We have taught them how to garden and so on. We are continually trying to educate them. There is a benefit in their doing community service.

The Convener: Thank you. Does anyone else wish to speak?

Mary Bruce: Having spent 10 years as a member of visiting committees at our two local prisons, I am pleased that the issues that we are addressing today are being addressed, and I am pleased to be part of that discussion. I believe that the committee’s visit is the first positive step towards creating an interface with the community.

The last panel concentrated on the community, which is an important matter. We in the community see how the process works and can see examples of good work, such as that which is done by Elma Mitchell. I have been involved in situations in which prisoners have been working on projects that have been of great benefit to the community and to the young people who were involved.

This morning, Councillor Kennedy asked for there to be more liaison between the groups of people who are involved in providing the support for offenders that we are talking about. One of the areas that have not been mentioned today is the way in which the statutory organisations can work together with the voluntary organisations and churches to enable the skills and knowledge of people in the community to be used properly. You brought your committee here today. If the new authorities and the other people who are involved in this area would act in a similar way and publicise what they do in order to ensure that people were more informed about the system, the benefits—to the victims of crime, as well as the perpetrators—would be immense.
The Convener: Thank you. Are there any further contributions?

Sheila Wynne: Earlier this afternoon, you talked about the community safety partnerships. In some areas, the communities have become effectively involved in the partnership teams but, in many other areas, that has not happened. Are there guidelines that could be given to the partnerships to help them involve the community? Clackmannanshire’s council for voluntary services is involved in our local partnership, but it would be useful if members of community groups such as neighbourhood watch groups or the tenants and residents federation could be told how they can get voted on to the partnership and become properly involved in it as well. Would it be possible to get guidelines that the whole of Scotland can work from?

The Convener: I cannot answer your question, but Government ministers will be able to read your comments in the Official Report.

I thank everyone who has contributed. This has been a novel event, but I think that it has been worth while. I am pleased that some members of the public have felt able to contribute.

Meeting continued in private until 16:10.
The Convener: Agenda item 2 is further consideration of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. As the committee has taken evidence only on part 1 of the bill so far, we have concentrated on the proposed sentencing council, minimum sentences and community payback orders. In today’s session, we will concentrate on other criminal law and procedure provisions in the bill.

I welcome our first three witnesses: Chief Constable Stephen House of Strathclyde Police and Chief Constable David Strang of Lothian and Borders Police, both of whom are representing the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland; and Gordon Meldrum, who is the director general of the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency. I should perhaps mention that Chief Constable Strang was a member of the Scottish Prisons Commission.

Our questioning will be opened by Nigel Don.

Nigel Don (North East Scotland) (SNP): Good morning, gentlemen, and thank you for coming along. With reference to sections 25 to 28 of the bill, can you describe to me what is wrong with the present state of the criminal law that requires the proposed provisions on serious organised crime?

Gordon Meldrum (Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency): The specific offences that the bill introduces—namely, being involved in and directing serious organised crime—will be useful additions to the existing criminal law, in that they will cater for the people whom the popular press often refer to as the Mr and Mrs Bigs. Such people do not get too close to the front-end criminality, but they are most certainly involved in the background in what I might describe as orchestrating the business.

Under the existing criminal law, it is difficult to embroil those people in any particular operation or arrests that might take place, other than on charges of conspiracy. At the moment, such people may sit in the background to organise and orchestrate crimes such as drug trafficking or human trafficking, but they do not come close enough to the front-end criminality to enable us to gather evidence against them that could put them into the criminal justice system. The proposed offences will help.

Nigel Don: Can you clarify where the law of conspiracy fails us?
Gordon Meldrum: The current law does not necessarily fail us, but it can be difficult to prove that someone who appears not to be overtly involved is engaged in a criminal conspiracy. Often, we have only covert intelligence on the individual that we cannot share with the courts. The current criminal law does not completely fail us—we can use the charge of conspiracy—but it is difficult to prove that such individuals have been involved in a specific offence, whereas the provisions in the bill will create the specific offences of being involved in and directing serious organised crime.

Nigel Don: Is not the problem finding the evidence that such people are involved in serious organised crime rather than finding the offence with which they can be charged? In other words, is not the issue a matter of the evidence rather than of the offence under which they are prosecuted?

Gordon Meldrum: If I am honest, it is sometimes a case of both. On some occasions it is a matter of evidence, and on others conspiracy is so broad that what constitutes a conspiracy comes down to a subjective assessment. I return to the point that the proposal in the bill creates for the first time the specific offence of being involved with and/or directing serious organised crime.

Nigel Don: But the evidence that will enable you to prosecute somebody for being involved or directing is surely the same evidence as would found a charge of conspiracy; is it not?

Gordon Meldrum: It most certainly could be, but on occasion it would be useful to have that alternative to criminal conspiracy. From my perspective, if we in this country are serious about tackling serious organised crime, serious organised crime groups and serious organised criminals, the proposal in the bill sends out a message to them that the country is prepared to create legislation to deal specifically with them and the threat, risk and harm that they bring to communities in Scotland.

Nigel Don: I am conscious that I am speaking to senior serving police officers, but I suggest that sending messages is done by taking people to court and the consequences that come from that, rather than from the words that we use in statute.

Others will address the width of the provisions, but I notice that in your submission, Mr Meldrum, at least as I read it, that you seem to suggest that you would have preferred the offence to be even wider. Is there not a risk that we are simply creating offences that help the police to come up with some prosecution when they feel like it rather than generating a law that makes it clear that serious and organised crime is verboten?

Gordon Meldrum: Much of what I said in my submission about sections 25 and 27 to 28 was to seek some clarification as to what might constitute, for example, agreement or an act of serious violence, because some of the definitions are open to interpretation. The part of the submission where I might have pushed the bounds and raised a slightly wider issue with the bill is where I suggested bringing it in line with the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 so that we can introduce a retrospective element. As we start to understand serious and organised crime better by virtue of work that we are doing in policing and law enforcement, is there an opportunity to apply the bill retrospectively to those individuals who we believe are involved in and/or directing serious and organised crime?

Nigel Don: If I might just take a slightly different tack, gentlemen, I wonder whether you can explain to me why we need to have a specific statutory provision that being involved in organised crime generates an aggravated offence—effectively, that aggravation can be taken into account—when it can be taken into account by the courts anyway. Am I misreading it, or is there something in the proposal that I do not understand?

Chief Constable Stephen House (Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland): It is a valid question. In the early discussions with the people who developed the legislation, in which Mr Meldrum and I were involved, we talked about exactly the issues that Nigel Don is probing. The discussion was about how we take the intelligence that we have that somebody is involved with serious and organised crime and convert it into something that a court can consider and make a judgment on. That is the difficult area that we have to deal with.

What is in the sections under discussion is an attempt to broaden things out—Nigel Don used a similar phrase—so that we can have a better understanding of involvement in serious and organised crime, even if it is at arm’s length.

In relation to a number of activities in Scotland, it is felt that people are involved in serious and organised crime but are sufficiently removed from it that the current legislation is not getting to them. You asked whether involvement in such crime is already covered by the law. That challenge was made, and the view from the people who form the law, who have far more experience in law than I do—and probably any of us does—was that there is a need for something that goes beyond the current provision.

All I know is that there is an element of frustration, because there are people who our intelligence suggests are involved in serious and organised crime but the current legislation is not sufficiently flexible to allow us to bring them to the attention of the fiscals so that they can determine whether they should be prosecuted.

Nigel Don: I am sure that colleagues will want to explore this. Can the witnesses define “serious” and “organised” in the context of the bill? The bill does not define those terms.

Gordon Meldrum: In preparing to give evidence I used the definition of “serious organised crime” in section 25(2), which is:

“crime involving two or more persons acting together for the principal purpose of committing or conspiring to commit a serious offence or a series of serious offences”.

Nigel Don: Is that adequate?

Gordon Meldrum: That is a difficult issue. For many years, people who are involved in law enforcement have been debating what constitutes serious crime, organised crime, serious and organised crime, and so on. The definition in section 25(2) is broad, but trying to make it tighter could be problematic. I am speaking personally when I say that the definition is reasonable.

Nigel Don: Therefore, what is serious and what is organised will have to be defined by the courts. Are you happy with that?

Gordon Meldrum: Yes.

Nigel Don: The definition seems to be circular, given that it refers to “serious offences”.

The Convener: The committee has a problem with the definition, which will emerge in due course.

Robert Brown (Glasgow) (LD): It has been suggested to us that the definition of “serious organised crime” in the bill “will cover most common law crimes and many statutory offences where a person acts with another with the intention of securing a material benefit.”

In its submission, the Sheriffs Association suggested that two people who conspire or agree to steal a meat pie from a shop to give to a beggar would commit an indictable offence, which would therefore fit the category of “serious offence” in the context of section 25(2). It is clear that the bill is not trying to get at such offences. How adequate is the distinction between serious organised crime and the petty crimes that are not intended to be caught by the bill?

Chief Constable House: I am sure that no one here would categorise the stealing of a meat pie as serious and organised crime. I do not come at the issue from a legalistic point of view; I take a more practical approach, which involves considering whether we should devote resources to a case and whether the public would approve of our doing so. In the case that you described the answer would be no; we would not divert a huge amount of resource to such a crime.

If we tighten the definition too much we will miss issues and new crimes. Criminals might even exploit the definition to ensure that activity does not fall within the definition of “serious organised crime” and therefore cannot attract the powers that we are talking about. Definitions have been exploited in that way in the past.

I am sure that we are all happy to explore the definition, but tightening it would be problematic. If we apply a value to it, we might miss one end of the extreme. If we include violence, we will miss the huge amount of serious and organised crime to which violence is not attached. If we say that more than 10 people must be involved, we get back to intelligence and questions about how many people we can prove are involved. A tighter definition would make the bill much more inflexible and make it much more challenging for courts to make rulings.

Robert Brown: Does the panel agree that the areas of conspiracy and crimes that are associated to the main crime have always been difficult for the law and that, over the years, there has been criticism when the courts have taken too wide a view of such matters? I am not trying to get you to come up with a definition, but in practical terms is there a distinction between those offences that are likely to be prosecuted, as they will result in a significant jail sentence, and those that theoretically could be? Is there a cut-off point in terms of the seriousness of the case? Is that what you have in mind?

Chief Constable David Strang (Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland): The fact that the definition is in section 25 does not mean that, from an operational and practical point of view, it will be applied in every case. It could be—that is where the exercise of judgment and discretion on the part of the procurator fiscal comes in.

The definition in section 25 allows us to tackle people who are involved in serious and organised crime, so it is useful legislation. However, it does not mean that we will automatically apply it to everything that technically falls within that definition.

Robert Brown: You would, perhaps, agree that it is not a terribly satisfactory situation if the police and prosecuting authority in a democracy have a theoretical power to prosecute people for all sorts of minor things against a background of a law that is intended to target serious organised crime. Do you agree that there is a problem with that concept?

Chief Constable Strang: I think that people understand what serious and organised crime means. I understand the difficulty that you have and your desire to clarify the definition further, but the notion of serious and organised crime has a meaning that would ensure that the provisions were not applied inappropriately or widely.

Robert Brown: It does not have a narrow meaning. The bill says:

“serious offence’ means an indictable offence’.

That means that many of the routine common-law offences are covered, which means that it is a wide definition.

Chief Constable Strang: Yes, but in terms of the standard that is applied by the police or prosecutors, it would never be the intention to apply the provision to what would be seen as a minor offence, on the scale of things, regardless of whether it fell within the technical definition as an indictable offence.

Robert Brown: On the other side of the coin, the written submission from the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency expressed worries that the definition of violence excludes the fear of violence and the intimidatory aspect of people’s behaviour that might exist in the background. Could you elaborate on that point?

Gordon Meldrum: In witness statements or through intelligence, we pick up on the fact that serious and organised crime groups operate through a culture of fear, intimidation and threats. On occasions, there might not be a physical act of violence but there will be threats, intimidation and all sorts of other non-violent abuse. That is how those groups manipulate people from all walks of life in order to get their own way.

Robert Brown: Would you like the definition of serious violence to be widened to cover that kind of situation?

Gordon Meldrum: It would be helpful if it were widened to include threats and intimidation.

Robert Brown: Section 28 deals with failure to report serious organised crime. Earlier, you referred to people being involved in such crime or directing it, but you seemed to steer clear of the failure-to-report aspect. Does that indicate a degree of unhappiness with that particular charge—which in some ways is a bit novel in the law—as it goes beyond people doing things positively and says that people are guilty of criminal offences merely by their presence or their knowledge?

Gordon Meldrum: My failure to mention the failure-to-report aspect was due entirely to my ineptitude; no other issue was attached to it.

The Convener: Refreshingly honest, if I may say so.

Robert Brown: Nevertheless, are there concerns about that offence? It seems to me that it might be a bridge too far, as it goes beyond people’s actions and includes people who just happen to know about things. That is quite a novelty in the law and raises a lot of issues about establishing facts and the background.

Gordon Meldrum: Speaking on my own behalf and from the perspective of the SCDEA, I support that offence. I draw a parallel with what we call the suspicious-activity report system that operates throughout the United Kingdom. Anyone who is involved in financial transactions has a duty to report if they feel for any reason that a transaction does not add up. That system involves the sort of failure to report that you are talking about.

As far as I understand the provision—I am sure that the Crown will have a much better perspective on it—it is designed to catch the individuals whom I have often publicly described as the consultants and facilitators. They oil the wheels of organised crime but do not necessarily get close to the front-end criminality—they might be involved in the banking profession, the legal profession, the accounting profession, the haulage industry and so on. I am not saying for a second that all of those people are corrupted by organised crime, but some of them might be. Often, they have a knowledge of the business of serious organised crime, if not necessarily the daily transaction of the criminality. The fact that they fail to report that knowledge often inhibits us. Having an offence around failure to report knowledge of serious and organised crime would be helpful with regard to those people.

Robert Brown: Section 25 makes it an offence for a person to agree with another person to become involved in serious organised crime. That seems to give you the power that you might need to deal with the people about whom you are talking.

Perhaps I should declare my interest as a former practising solicitor in this context—or not in this context, I should say.

Gordon Meldrum: Although I accept that section 25 says what it says, I think that the specific provision around failure to report, as opposed to simply agreeing in general, is helpful. I know that I would say that, as I am the director general of the SCDEA, but I genuinely feel that it is useful.

Robert Brown: With regard to the people who have the connection that is defined in section 28(1)(b), could you define the difference between “involvement” and “knowledge or suspicion”?

Gordon Meldrum: I am sorry; could you state the specific question again?
Robert Brown: Could you define the difference between "involvement" in section 25 and "knowledge or suspicion" in section 28, given that section 28 states that there has to be some professional or personal relationship in order to land someone on the front line? If someone has knowledge of such crime, is not the notion of involvement adequate?

Chief Constable House: I will give you a practical example that is very much on my mind at the moment, as I am trying to buy a house in the west of Scotland. The legal company that is handling matters for us wrote us a formal letter to ask where the money is coming from because it needs to be sure about that. As Gordon Meldrum has said, we are talking about an extension of that.

On your specific question, for example, if a junior member in a legal practice facilitates the purchase of a house for £500,000 in cash and is well aware that the money is probably dodgy and comes from drugs or serious and organised crime, in my view that person is involved. The senior partner in the company may not be involved but will have knowledge of it, and section 28 would mean that they had a duty to report it.

Robert Brown: Is that not covered by the regulations on money laundering anyway?

Chief Constable House: Yes, but I am using it as an example. We could use the example of an accountant or haulier, as Gordon Meldrum did. If someone knew that something was suspicious, section 28 would lay on them a duty to report it.

Robert Brown: Can you give us examples that go beyond existing legislative and administrative requirements to demonstrate that section 28 is necessary? The example that you have given seems to me to be covered by money laundering legislation. The offence that section 28 proposes does not seem to add anything to that.

Chief Constable House: Organised crime groups require or want other services that are not connected with money laundering but facilitate their work, such as getting hold of premises. They will go to estate agents to look for premises to put into use as a cannabis factory. That is a pretty current example. Knowledge and involvement may be two separate matters in that instance.

Robert Brown: Are they? If somebody has knowledge of that position, they are manifestly involved. They have gone beyond thinking about it to taking the matter forward, have they not?

Chief Constable House: No, I do not agree. There is a difference in the definition. If someone has hands-on involvement in setting up the lease and rental of premises, they are clearly involved. However, if someone else in the company knows about it, their defence in law would be that, although they may have had some suspicion or known that it was going ahead, they were not involved. Section 28 says that, if somebody is aware of such activities and has suspicions, they are required to report them.

Robert Brown: That seems to me to be a charter for getting at the minions in firms rather than the senior directors. Is that right?

Chief Constable House: We are asking for new legislation—I said that we were widening the legislation and making it more flexible—simply because we have to get at serious and organised crime in any way that we can. The people who choose to become involved in it make a conscious choice. Therefore, they are ready for it and are getting into a defendable position. We get to those people through others who are involved in it but may be on the fringes—I would not use the word minions. In section 28, we are saying that, if such people have suspicions or knowledge, they need to step forward and, if they do not, they commit an offence.

Robert Brown: I suggest that section 28 is an astonishingly wide power that, in addition to perhaps—I use the word "perhaps" consciously—covering a number of positions beyond being involved, puts a considerable amount of power in the hands of the state and the prosecution to go after many other people who may not be involved in serious organised crime.

Chief Constable House: Yes, I understand your position. My position is that the state is not trying to go after those smaller people but, through them, is trying to get at serious and organised crime groups and gangs. I am afraid that the tentacles of such gangs reach out a long way. Many people make money from, and have business that is associated with, organised crime; that needs to be challenged with some new legislation. The legislation may be considered challenging, but we need it. We support it strongly because we have to get at serious and organised crime.

Robert Brown: I use the word "perhaps" perhaps—covering a number of positions beyond being involved, puts a considerable amount of power in the hands of the state and the prosecution to go after many other people who may not be involved in serious organised crime.

Robert Brown: I understand the motivation, but I remain concerned about the means of pursuing serious and organised crime under section 28. Might ACPOS and the SCDEA be able to come back to us with a bit more background detail on some practical examples? That would be extremely useful.

The Convener: Perhaps we can hear from Mr Meldrum on the general context.
Gordon Meldrum: I do not know whether this information helps, but in our operations against organised crime we continually come up against a group of people who do not go anywhere near the front-end criminality but who facilitate the business on behalf of more than one organised crime group. The organised crime groups themselves can take their criminality only so far before they have to go somewhere for assistance. There seems to be a group of people to whom serious organised crime groups tend to head back, for whatever reason. As a police officer, my view is that those people undoubtedly know that they are involved in serious and organised crime, but there is never any disclosure of that. Practically speaking, that is the group whom we are trying to identify and capture with the provisions in section 28.

Robert Brown: My final question is on ACPOS’s comment on section 18 that “the good work achieved to date in relation to the deterrence of knife crime would be lost if knife crime is not separated from” the legislation on short-term custodial sentences. Will you elaborate on that? There is obviously a bit of a challenge there. Does knife crime raise different issues from other sorts of violent crime or other crimes that might be caught by the legislation on short-term sentences and community sentences?

The Convener: Perhaps that is a question for you, Mr House.

Chief Constable House: It would be if I could find the part of our submission to which Robert Brown is referring, but I cannot.

Chief Constable House: I am not certain that the submission was written by the violent crime reduction unit, but I think that it is saying that knife crime is a particularly serious issue for us in Scotland and that it has to be addressed properly. However, I am not sure that I would be as keen as the submission suggests to separate out particular kinds of crime.

Knife crime is horrific in the west of Scotland. This weekend, we had three homicides and 40 odd serious assaults, and knives have featured heavily in all of them. We have to deal with the possession and use of knives sensitively and intelligently, rather than in a dramatic, headline-grabbing way that sounds like the obvious answer. The obvious answer initially is that everybody who is convicted of knife possession as a first offence should receive a term of imprisonment. A great many people probably should receive that sentence, but creating legislation that says that everybody should receive a custodial sentence in the first instance would open up the law of exception, in that exception after exception would come forward.

I guess that the submission is saying that knife crime needs sensitive and sensible treatment and that there has to be a separate debate on it, which I think involves, quite rightly, a number of people around the table.

Robert Brown: If I understand you correctly, you are saying that whatever the original view that led to that statement in the ACPOS submission, you are not convinced that there is a need to separate out knife crime when we are considering short-term sentences, and that one can look at the arguments about punishment, deterrence and rehabilitation in a more general way. Is that an unfair summary?

Chief Constable House: It is not. I am not clear why we would have to separate out knife crime in particular. We have not yet got to the views on short-term sentencing in any case, although I am sure that we will do so in due course. I am happy to talk to my colleagues about this, but I am not sure why knife crime was separated out. It has to be dealt with sensitively and intelligently, because it is a massive issue for the country, but I am not certain what lies behind the idea that it should be separated out from the debate on short-term sentencing.

Nigel Don: I wonder whether I could wrap up the thinking on serious and organised crime by reflecting what I think you have said. These are my words, not yours. You would like sections 25 to 28 to be drawn more widely, so that they can be used sensitively, rather than more narrowly, so that they restrict you. Is that a fair comment? You are looking for prosecution discretion on wide-ranging offences. I see three nodding heads—you agree with that.

Gordon Meldrum: Yes.

Nigel Don: Would it also be fair to say that you recognise the problem that we have, as custodians of the legislative process, of creating unnecessarily wide offences? Do you recognise that we are reluctant to do that because, at the end of the day, it could be us?

Chief Constable Strang: In our view, the drafting should not be unnecessarily wide; we are arguing that it should be necessarily wide. I understand why you want to avoid drafting an unnecessarily wide piece of legislation, but we argue that wide drafting is necessary if we are to get at the heart of serious and organised crime in Scotland.

Chief Constable House: The points that you make, sir, are to the point. We initially looked for some way for us all—police, fiscals and defence—to agree that an offence was within the definition of serious and organised crime and therefore the provisions would apply, which would get us past the criticism that the legislation was incredibly wide and could be used for anything, including the theft of a meat pie. If we could overcome that and define a far narrower range of offences to which the provisions would apply, we would probably all be happier with them. The difficulty is that serious and organised crime reaches into so many different areas. We have heard recently about security companies, taxi companies, bus companies and a variety of other companies that are all within the ambit of serious and organised crime. That is why it is difficult to provide a definition with which we would all be much happier. Police officers like working within definitions; we are not particularly comfortable with broad-ranging things, either. However, providing such a definition is very challenging.

Bill Butler (Glasgow Anniesland) (Lab): I, too, like working with definitions that I accept and that are clear to me, but I am a bit troubled by what I have heard. Chief Constable House just said, in response to Robert Brown, that he does not necessarily agree with ACPOS’s written submission on the need to separate out knife crime. You are speaking for ACPOS today, so which is ACPOS’s position on the matter? Is it your position this morning or the position that is outlined in the written submission? We need to be clear about that. If you are unable to give us that information today, we need to get it in writing. We cannot have two positions from ACPOS.

Chief Constable House: Convener, I am happy to take your guidance on the matter. If you would like me to provide written confirmation of our position, I would be happy to do so. I do not understand the exact meaning of the submission in terms of the need to separate out knife crime. For what reason would that be done? If you would prefer it, I would be happy to write to the committee, confirming ACPOS’s position.

The Convener: We need some clarification, as there appears to be a split on the issue. You have given your personal view, which is fine, but you are representing ACPOS today and we need ACPOS’s position to be defined for us.

Chief Constable House: That is true, convener. Thank you. However, as the chair of ACPOS’s crime business area, it would not have been right for us to turn up here and say that we did not need to answer any questions because ACPOS had given the committee a written submission. The benefit of giving oral evidence is that it challenges issues and makes us come back and be a bit clearer about what we are saying.

The Convener: Written clarification would be welcome.

Bill Butler: It is always helpful. You are right to say that it is in the interaction here, at committee, that we find out what needs to be clarified—as do you. If you could submit that clarification, we would be absolutely delighted.

The Convener: That takes us to fingerprint and DNA data.

Bill Butler: As you know, the bill will extend existing police powers on the retention of fingerprint and DNA data. However, it will not allow the police to retain such data where a case is concluded by an alleged offender accepting an alternative to prosecution, for example a fiscal fine or a fixed-penalty notice. In its written submission, ACPOS raises that as a concern. Why is ACPOS concerned?

Chief Constable House: Our concerns are to do with the fact that the legislation on fixed-penalty notices was introduced to provide alternatives to prosecution and a more flexible, speedier system, and to reduce paperwork. That is working, but it means that there is a slight reduction in the number of people whose DNA is taken. That is a fairly fine, practical point.

In certain police force areas, fixed-penalty notices for minor disorders such as drinking or urinating in the street are often issued on the street. In such cases, the requirement on—but, more important, the ability of—the police service to take DNA is zero, because we do not require our officers to take buccal swabs on the street. DNA is taken in the fixed-penalty notice disposal process only when people are taken back to the police office, which allows photographic, fingerprint and DNA evidence to be taken. Our view is that when there is a return to the police office and DNA is taken under a fixed-penalty notice for a minor offence, it sometimes indicates the sort of person from whom we would want to take DNA. The view has been expressed that the more people we take DNA from, the larger the DNA database and the higher the chance of catching people earlier in their cycle of offending. Our concern is that if we are not allowed to take DNA from anyone who receives a fixed-penalty notice, we will miss out on a section of people who it would be worth while having on the database.

Bill Butler: I hear what you are saying, chief constable, but could it be argued that that omission—if it is an omission—is deliberate, because alternatives to prosecution are extremely unlikely to be used in cases in which the offence is serious, so why the need to take and retain DNA?

Chief Constable House: That takes us to a fairly wide political, philosophical and law enforcement point, which is that the wider the DNA database, the greater the chance of catching people. If the database is narrow, we have less chance of catching people. There is a balance between that issue and the civil liberties issue. It is about proportionality.

Bill Butler: The extended powers in the bill originate from a need to keep us consistent with the European convention on human rights, specifically in relation to the case of S and Marper v the United Kingdom, in which the European Court of Human Rights criticised the blanket retention of DNA in England and praised the specific and targeted Scottish regime on DNA profiles. I hear what you are saying, but I am not convinced by it.

Chief Constable House: Let me try again. We are not in any way proposing that we move to the English model. It seems far more likely that, despite Government resistance down there, the English model will move towards a Scottish/ECHR-compliant model, which is as it should be.

This is a practical, policing point of view. Someone who drinks or urinates in public might come to the notice of a police officer, but for efficiency reasons, and to cut down on paperwork, we no longer take them into custody and put together a full file. That is why we are not getting DNA from them. That is a change in administration; it is not a change in the way that society views such crimes. In practical terms, the majority of fixed-penalty notices for such offences are issued on the street, and the police do not take DNA on the street. However, I think that such people should still come within the ambit of our ability to take DNA, and that we should be allowed to take the person to a police office, to do the work there and to take DNA.

Bill Butler: Why would you need to retain the DNA of someone who urinated in the street? Surely that is a minor offence. We are not talking about people who have been prosecuted for but not convicted of violent sexual offences. Surely those offences are not comparable.

Chief Constable House: The offences are not comparable, but the first example still involves a breach of the law.

Bill Butler: Is it not simply the case that taking the DNA would be more administratively efficient for you? The offences are not comparable in seriousness.

Chief Constable House: The issue is nothing to do with administrative efficiency; it is to do with catching people who have committed serious crimes as early as possible. I will give an example that is not from Scotland, but from down south. An individual was arrested in Brighton for what could be considered a fairly minor offence. They were taken back to the police station, where they were photographed and fingerprinted and their DNA was taken. The custody sergeant decided to refuse charge, so that person was released without further police action being taken. That person’s DNA was retained—that is allowed under the English legislation at the moment—and their information was put on the DNA database. That person is now in custody for the particularly brutal rape and murder of a woman in London. That was the only way in which that person could have been caught, because the investigation was two or three years old and was, in effect, on hold, because no other lines of inquiry existed.

Exactly the same issue applies. I return to my point that a decision must be made between what some see as civil liberties issues and the effectiveness of investigation. There is no doubt that if the DNA database is extended as widely as possible, it will allow us to detect offenders who have committed serious crime more quickly in their cycle of offending. If the database is narrowed, the ability to detect will be reduced. If the DNA of somebody who comes to the notice of the police because they have committed a relatively minor offence on the street is allowed to go on the database, and they commit a more serious offence or have already committed a string of more serious offences for which they have not been caught, they will come to the notice of the police and be put in custody.

Bill Butler: Forgive me—that is a perfectly coherent and comprehensible philosophical position, but the bill does not advocate blanket retention. Because of concerns about wider provisions on the retention of DNA down south, the bill goes for more specific retention in two instances. I might be wrong, but I think that you are arguing for blanket retention. My question is specific to the bill, which says that we need a targeted extension that remains within ECHR. Do you agree with that?

Chief Constable House: You are right to correct me. Actually, I am arguing not for blanket retention but for a public debate so that the public understand what they would have if blanket retention were introduced and what they will not have if it is not introduced. We are back to the balance that must be achieved.

We have adopted a system of issuing fixed-penalty notices for some offences, to be more efficient and effective. That is good and it is working, but all that I am saying is that changing to that system should not stop us taking DNA from someone from whom we would have taken DNA if we had not introduced that system. The commission of relatively minor offences often indicates a lifestyle that might include violence and a proclivity to violence. The issue is not always what will happen in the future; the first time that a serial offender comes to the notice of the police—the first time that we catch them doing anything—might be when they are drinking in public. If we can take their DNA at that time, we can find that they are an offender. If we cannot take their DNA, we will lose the ability to sift through such people.

Chief Constable Strang: It is worth remembering where fixed-penalty notices came from. They were a part of summary justice reform to reduce delays and the number of cases that were reported. The non-taking of DNA was an unintended consequence of introducing fixed-penalty notices.

Bill Butler: Do the witnesses feel that the proposals in the bill achieve an appropriate balance between the rights of individuals and the ability of police officers to carry out their work efficiently and effectively?

Chief Constable House: In general, we do, but we are concerned about the issue that you have highlighted, Mr Butler—that of fixed-penalty notices—and we are concerned about children who go to children’s hearings. Our submission makes a point that I think is common sense: if someone admits guilt and goes to a children’s hearing, it should be possible to take their DNA.

Chief Constable Strang: I understand people’s concerns, but I think that the balance is right. In any new legislation that introduces requirements or restrictions, you need to weigh up the benefits. Every piece of legislation restricts freedoms in some ways, so you have to judge whether the price is worth paying. In the cases that we are talking about, there would be security benefits from detecting crimes. I feel that the proposals in the bill are properly balanced.

Bill Butler: That was the general response that the committee received in written evidence. However, I raise the issue because the witnesses suggested in their submission that there was a loophole or gap. I get the clear impression from the witnesses that that gap should be bridged. Is that correct?

Chief Constable Strang: Yes, absolutely. There was perhaps an oversight in earlier times, and it needs to be resolved.

Bill Butler: I am obliged.

Paul Martin (Glasgow Springburn) (Lab): I would like to ask Chief Constable House about practical examples of DNA retention. It can be difficult to talk about specific cases, and we have to use the information that is available, but I will ask about the case of Peter Tobin. You talked about the possibility of preventing crimes. Social profile information is now available on Tobin, and it is known that he was a petty offender earlier in his life. Had DNA retention been in place as a legal remedy, could Tobin have been detected much earlier?

Chief Constable House: That is a specific example, and I have talked about a specific case down south, but there is a general issue. We should not pretend to the public that DNA retention would stop all offending, because it would not. However, if DNA were left at the scene of an offence and were properly gathered, it would allow the police to match it with information on the DNA database. That could stop somebody early in their cycle of offending, if they could be found. The evidence from areas where DNA is retained is that it allows officers to step in effectively at an early stage. In areas where that is not done, series of crimes can go on and on, with tragic results.

Paul Martin: If he had been detected for housebreaking at an early stage in his criminal career, and if DNA had been retained at that point, he could have been detected for crimes that followed that initial housebreaking.

Chief Constable House: I am not trying to avoid the point that you are making, but I want to be clear. If someone were arrested for housebreaking or for any minor offence, and if DNA were taken, it would be on the database. If the person committed a further offence and left DNA—for example, if they committed a rape—the DNA could be matched. That would not stop people offending, but it would allow us to step in earlier in cycles of offending. If everything was managed effectively and efficiently, the cycle of offending would be stopped much earlier—after the first serious offence, we would hope.

Angela Constance (Livingston) (SNP): Chief Constable House gave us an example from down south, and we have just heard about the Peter Tobin example. Has any research been done into whether people who commit minor misdemeanours on the street and receive a fixed-penalty notice, are, by and large, law abiding, or is it the case that a significant proportion of serious offenders also commit minor misdemeanours? Does research exist that gives an evidence base for the need to retain DNA from people who receive fixed-penalty notices?

Chief Constable House: I am convinced that there is a huge body of work around that. I cannot quote any of it right now, but I can tell you that what we know about criminals is that they break the law, and they tend not to break only one law. They do not think, “I am a housebreaker, therefore I will only ever do that.” You see that in Hollywood films, in which people are professional criminals and they commit one type of crime, but that is not the case in reality. For example, research that was done on who illegally uses disabled bays at supermarkets—we all get furious about that—found that many of them had criminal records. Research that was done on the diaries of heroin users—drugs may be a slightly different issue—indicate that they will turn their hand to anything; they do not think to themselves, “I will just do this.”

I suggest that the same applies to other criminals. People get caught for the strangest reasons and in the strangest circumstances. For example, Peter Sutcliffe was intercepted by uniformed officers on the street because of his car tax, or for driving the wrong way down a one-way street, or something like that.

People break the law. My proposal, to come back to fixed penalties and low-level crime, is that if we lived in a world with no crime, we would not have to take any DNA, but that is not the case, so we must try to prevent crime as much as possible. In my professional view, the taking and retention of DNA is a useful weapon for the police in preventing series of crimes. That must be balanced against human rights and an overbearing state. Frankly, it is for you to decide where that balance lies.

There have been proposals—I make it clear not from me—that we should take DNA from everybody in the country at birth. There would therefore be no prejudice and no need for guilt to be proven before taking someone’s DNA: we would take DNA from everybody. It would be something that the state did and the DNA would be retained in a bank. If that were done, there would undoubtedly be a reduction in crime, but do we want to do that? That is a matter for the public.

If you restrict the DNA database to people who commit very serious offences, the chances are that we will catch some people but new people into the market who have precursor offences will not be caught. It is a well known fact—talk to any analyst or academic in the field—that when it comes to sexual offences it is very rare for someone to step in straight away and do a full-blown abduction and rape. They will usually go through precursor offences of indecent exposure, indecent assault and stealing underwear from washing lines. All those offences are precursors—they work up to the very serious offences. They do a little bit of exposure, then abduction and then full-blown sexual assault, often leading to murder. The earlier you get the DNA, the earlier you can interpose into that process.

The Convener: We need to move on, but Mr Meldrum wants to make a quick point.

Gordon Meldrum: I have a brief point in response to the question about serious criminals committing less serious offences. We often see that with the individuals and groups that the SCDEA examines. To be frank, we are often mesmerised by the fact that while they are involved in serious crime, on another day for another reason they will commit, for example, minor road traffic offences, shoplifting offences and common assaults. We often see evidence of serious criminals committing minor offences.

The Convener: We turn to the issue of disclosure; Stewart Maxwell will lead the questioning.

Stewart Maxwell (West of Scotland) (SNP): Good morning, gentlemen. Does the current regime for the disclosure of evidence in criminal cases cause any difficulties for the police? If so, could you explain what those are?

Chief Constable House: The issue is that the law must be seen to be transparent, fair and open. What we must not do is to present the evidence that we want to be presented, while not presenting other bodies of evidence that contradict what we are saying or suggest that a suspect is innocent. I hold up my hands and say that my experience of Scottish policing is about 19 months old, so I am not sure that I am well placed to say whether the current situation causes major difficulty. From what I have seen in Strathclyde it does not, but my colleagues who have more knowledge might be better placed to speak on that aspect.

The Convener: That is fair. Does anyone contradict that view?

Gordon Meldrum: The SCDEA has a slightly different perspective, because we work alongside the national casework division of the Crown Office in relation to our prosecutions, so a senior procurator fiscal is attached to our investigations at an early stage. However, I do not contradict or take exception to anything that Chief Constable House said.

The Convener: Do you agree, Mr Strang?

Chief Constable Strang: Absolutely. We are content with how things are. They do not cause difficulties.

The Convener: That is fine. Thank you.

Stewart Maxwell: The bill creates a statutory framework for disclosure. Does that represent an improvement on the current situation? You seem to suggest that there is no problem at present.

Chief Constable House: I am afraid that I will sound boring and repetitive. Our main worry about the bill is the resources that will be required. I have considerable experience in the area because I worked in the English and Welsh system for 27 years, and disclosure was a massive drain on police resources. It was introduced for valid reasons—which have not necessarily been demonstrated in Scotland—but it was a monster, to be frank, and one from which England and Wales have stepped back significantly.

Disclosure was the subject of massive amounts of training down south, which will also be required up here. We will have to train every police officer in disclosure because it will affect them all. We understand that it will not affect every court case because it will apply only to solemn cases—sheriff-and-jury or High Court cases—but there will be implications for all officers because we do not always know where cases will go in the end.

We are also concerned that too much is being dealt with in the bill. We would like more to be covered in the code of practice, because we believe that that is the appropriate place.

Stewart Maxwell: I notice that you make that distinction in your written evidence. Why would it be better for the matter to be dealt with in the code of practice?

Chief Constable House: It would be more appropriate for the scheduling processes if it was dealt with in the code of practice rather than being locked into the words of the bill and defined there.

Stewart Maxwell: Is it an issue of flexibility?

Chief Constable House: Yes. Putting the details in the code of practice would allow more flexibility and probably a bit more debate on the issue, which would be appropriate for the scheduling. There are also questions about the definitions of “sensitive” and “highly sensitive”.

Stewart Maxwell: I will come to that in a moment. Do you agree that a case can be made that what should and should not be disclosed and the definitions thereof should be included in the bill and that codes of practice or guidance are not the appropriate place for such important details?

Chief Constable House: All I can say is that our view is that should be contained in the code of practice, which is a better place for it. We have spoken to people down south about that, and I repeat that we believe it is more appropriate for it to be in the code of practice than in statute.

Stewart Maxwell: I am just trying to explore why you think it would cause difficulty if it was in the bill rather than in the code of practice. How often do you expect that the legislation would have to be changed? Obviously, if it was in the legislation, that would have to be changed rather than the code of practice. What specific practical difficulties would result?

Chief Constable House: If the provisions on scheduling remain in the bill, we would want a requirement for consultation if the prosecutor disagrees with the police assessment of the level of sensitivity of an item of information. I am not sure whether that point was sufficiently emphasised in our written submission. Currently, the bill provides that the prosecutor must return the schedule to the police to adjust the determination, with no scope for review or consideration. That means that the police officer can give a professional opinion, the lawyer can say no and that will be the end of it, although the police officer's opinion has not changed.

Stewart Maxwell: That is an argument about amending the bill, as opposed to removing the provisions from the bill and putting them into guidance, is it not?

Chief Constable House: I think that the whole thing would be better if the requirements on scheduling were in the code of practice.

Stewart Maxwell: What are the views of Chief Constable Strang and Mr Meldrum on this matter?

Chief Constable Strang: Chief Constable House, as the chair of our crime business area, is presenting the ACPOS view on crime, so that is the ACPOS position. However, I understand the argument that the primary legislation need not be amended and that there are advantages of flexibility in having provisions on disclosure in the code of practice.

Gordon Meldrum: I agree with what Chief Constable House said.

Stewart Maxwell: May I delve into the issue of resources? Chief Constable House said that when a similar disclosure provision hit England, a huge amount of training and other resources had to be applied to it, which created a lot of difficulty. However, do the police not undertake disclosure, anyway? Chief Constable House seemed to suggest that there would be a manifestly huge difference between what currently goes on and what would go on in the future if the bill was enacted as it stands. Can you explain that to me? I am having difficulty in understanding that point, because I imagine that the police undertake much of the bill's disclosure provisions, anyway.

Chief Constable House: Much of the provisions are undertaken currently, but the bill will place a burden on the police officer that will mean that every significant inquiry—this will impact massively on serious and organised crime—will have to put aside a number of officers to ensure that the disclosure legislation is complied with and that everything that comes into the possession of the police officers is assessed to determine whether the police will use the information as part of the prosecution, how it will be held and whether it will be presented as part of the case. All the information will have to be listed and scheduled so that it is available for examination by the defence.
To return to Mr Maxwell’s original point, the question is what is wrong with the current system of disclosure that means that the bill’s provisions are required. The current system depends on the police conducting an investigation and building a case, which is presented to the procurator fiscal and taken to court. There must be trust on all sides that what is presented is the meat or crux of the matter and that the police do not have files of undisclosed reports or have not suppressed a witness statement. For example, the police could interview 150 people in a murder investigation and all might say the same thing apart from the 150th, who might say that he does not think that the accused person was there at all. There is an issue around how much is disclosed and how much is held back. Currently, that is done pretty much on professional trust and integrity. The bill is trying to codify that and to say, “Never mind all that. You will provide all this information in the more serious cases.”

Again, if Scotland has got to where England and Wales already are in that regard, that is one issue. We are not opposed to the proposal across the board. However, there are huge implications for resourcing the proposal because more and more police officers will have to sit down and work out what material they have, what they need to present, how they should schedule it, what pieces of paper they will send to the fiscals and so on. That will all go on in far more detail than it does at present.

Stewart Maxwell: You seem to accept the point that you undertake that process currently because you have to. I understand that the bill proposes a more formal process that will be laid down in statute, as opposed to the current arrangements. I am not sure that there is such a massive difference.

Chief Constable House: I think that there is. From my personal experience, I found huge differences in the law when I came north of the border, because the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 and disclosure requirements do not apply here. The amount of time that my officers spend on paperwork—although they complain about it bitterly—is significantly less than is spent by their colleagues down south. One of the major reasons for that is the disclosure situation. The disclosure requirements would take police officers off the street because each major case would need a disclosure officer—perhaps two for a murder investigation—who would deal with nothing but the disclosure issues. The disclosure requirements would also eat into the time of officers on, frankly, every case. Because we do not know where a case will end up, officers would need to comply with the legislation. The requirements will make a significant difference to the number of officers on the street. I have no doubt about that.

Gordon Meldrum: On the issue of resourcing, let me support what Chief Constable House has said. As I said in the agency’s written submission, we have scoped the issue as best as we could and as scientifically as we could. We did that by speaking to both the Metropolitan Police specialist crime directorate and the UK Serious Organised Crime Agency. Our assessment—it is a guesstimate to a certain extent—is that we will require 15 full-time disclosure/revelation officers within the agency. As members will appreciate, the number of cases that we report into the criminal justice system over the course of a year is minuscule in comparison with the rest of the Scottish police service. However, we believe that we will require that number of people simply because of the scale and complexity of our operations. Let me give a practical example without going into too much detail. One of our current operations involves somewhere in the region of 200,000 documents. An assessment would need to be made on the disclosure and scheduling of each of those documents.

Although the spirit within policing in Scotland and within law enforcement agencies such as the procurator fiscal has been to disclose information, formalising that as a requirement in the statute book will introduce an additional layer of complexity to the disclosure of material. There will need to be an assessment and ultimate signing off in deciding whether information is disclosable. That will require more people, over and above the people who are doing the day job at present.

Stewart Maxwell: The fundamental point that I am genuinely trying to understand is the difference between what happens currently and what will be required in the future. If a case involves 200,000 documents, each of those documents needs to be examined anyway. I would have thought that the police need to do much, if not all, of the work that is being formalised under the bill. I am trying to discover what the difference is between what happens currently—it seems to me that most of this stuff happens anyway—and what will be required if the bill is enacted as it stands. Given that the work needs to be done anyway, I do not understand why 15 full-time officers would need to be dedicated to disclosure as a result of the requirements being written down in a formal process.

Gordon Meldrum: As Chief Constable House said, we disclose based on professional judgment. Although we examine every document, we do not necessarily assess them for disclosure purposes, put that assessment in writing, have a conversation with the procurator fiscal, come to a determination on whether the document is disclosable and then schedule everything as either disclosable or non-disclosable. On one level, an administrative process will need to be built around the disclosure of the document over and above the professional judgment that is currently taken.

Nigel Don: Undoubtedly, this is a point of detail, but it has been said that police officers will be needed to deal with disclosure. I have nothing against police officers—they would be well trained for such a task—but there is a need for disclosure to be dealt with by a police officer, or could the job be done by someone who knows that particular part of the trade?

Gordon Meldrum: From my perspective, from having sent quite a number of my people down south, my answer as director general of the agency would be that the job need not be done by a police officer, but the individuals involved would need specific skills. I have actually scoped the requirements in our written submission. Our 15 officers would cost just short of £1 million; our 15 police staff would cost just over £0.5 million.

Nigel Don: I recall that. Are you happy that appropriately trained staff could do the job without needing to be warranted police officers?

Gordon Meldrum: In my view, yes.

The Convener: Will Mr House comment on that aspect from his experience down south? Are such matters dealt with down south by full-time professional police officers or by ancillary staff?

Chief Constable House: In the main, on the more serious murder investigations, the job is done by police officers. I think that there is no real need for that, as the job could well be done by properly trained full-time non-sworn police staff. However, I do not think that that is the point; in a large number of other cases the arresting officer and the investigating officer will still be required to do their own paperwork, because we do not have that sort of administrative backup for people. At the top end—homicide investigations—specialists take over and do the paperwork for a lesser cost as opposed to no cost. However, if uniformed police officers who are patrolling the streets arrest somebody for an offence, they still have to do the paperwork themselves; they do not get admin backup, so it still means cops being off the street.

The Convener: We turn to the subject of sexual offences.

Cathie Craigie (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth) (Lab): Good morning, gentlemen. Section 33 includes provision to extend the law on indecent images of children and section 34 makes it an offence for a person to be in possession of extreme pornographic images. Can you give examples of how the existing law will be strengthened by those proposals?

Gordon Meldrum: The SCDEA’s written submission comments on what constitutes an extreme image. Regarding the current definition in the bill, it says:

“The definition of an ‘extreme image’ presents practical difficulties. The use of the terminology ‘depicts, in an explicit and realistic way’ would seem to include all images where such acts are depicted but are subsequently shown to have been staged or acted out. For example a realistic depiction of a rape or sexual murder, which is undoubtedly pornographic but where the ‘victim’ is shown to have suffered no harm and to have been a willing participant in actions depicted, would appear to be included in the definition.”

That may not be a helpful response, because I am pointing out that we have said that work needs to be done on that definition.

Cathie Craigie: Do you have a suggestion for how it could be improved?

Gordon Meldrum: Not in front of me, but if you will bear with me, I would be happy to get back to you with thoughts and suggestions, if that would be helpful.

The Convener: That would indeed be helpful.

Cathie Craigie: The committee would welcome that.

Chief Constable House: I do not differ in any way from what Mr Meldrum said about the definition. We would also be happy to get involved in the work on that.

The Convener: Perhaps ACPOS will also give us something in writing under that heading.

Cathie Craigie: That would be useful.

On section 34, ACPOS commented that there would be challenges in monitoring the changes to the legislation and whether capacity issues would impact on Scottish police forces’ ability to be proactive in the area. The general public want the police to be proactive. What are the pressures in that area and how could the bill be improved to deal with them? Are there financial or resource pressures on the ability to do the job?

Chief Constable House: There are always financial and resource pressures, because we use public money that is being spent somewhere. With the current financial outlook, I do not see more funding becoming available for an area such as this, but if it does, that would be great.

If we get a tight definition of extreme images, that would probably help us to deal with the situation. The problem is the huge flood of material that is available on the internet; in most cases, that is outside UK law enforcement and it is therefore beyond our ability to shut down the websites.
Those are the major issues that confront us, especially because different countries have different tolerance levels and the material might not be illegal in the country in which it was put on the website.

The issues are the volume of work involved, the subjectivity about what is pornography, the simple requirement to have people watching and dealing with such material to make an assessment and the need to take into account—I mean this seriously—their health, safety and welfare, given that the material is highly corrosive. I am sure that members have watched such material professionally, as I have done. The thought of having somebody watch it hour after hour for an investigation is quite troubling. Such people also need to be highly specialised and experienced. Therefore, we are talking about pretty expensive, top-end resources to deal with those things. This sounds sad, but those people deal with one case at a time, and we know that there is a flood of material out there because there seems, tragically, to be demand for it.

Cathie Craigie: The SCDEA submission says that it deals specifically with that matter. That is obvious a concern for Mr Meldrum as the man who is responsible for staffing the department. Do you want to add anything to what Chief Constable House has said?

Gordon Meldrum: I do not think so. I simply reinforce the point that we have people who are, unfortunately, involved in that work pretty much 24/7, because we have the national e-crime unit. As our written submission says, we have specific measures in place to monitor the overall health, welfare and wellbeing of those people.

I think that there will be an upward trend in e-crime in general, whether such crimes involve extreme pornographic images, fraud or other crimes that are committed with an e-crime attachment. We see that trend already. As Mr House has said, how to police the worldwide web from within the confines of Scotland is a particularly problematic issue for us. In general, we require the right people with high-end skills who can forensically interrogate the internet. However, there are not too many of those people around.

I know that none of what I have just said helps with the bill. I am sorry about that; I have simply made observations.

Chief Constable House: We are interested in another definition—the definition of the word "possession". I have personal knowledge of the difficulties that there have been with the meaning of that word in cases involving images. Does a person possess an image if someone sends it to their website, they view it once and then leave it there? Does that constitute possession? Does the person have to get the image himself or herself? It is important to try to nail down those issues in prosecutions. Cases have been lost in which it was able to be proven that a person did not establish a link to a website and that the link was established by somebody else for them, although the person did not break that link and it stayed open. There have been debates about physically getting images and images being pushed on to the computers of people who did not go and get them. That is arrangeable through a phone call. Such issues are involved. The information technology issues become highly technical and are beyond my knowledge, but they come into play in successful prosecutions as well.

Cathie Craigie: I am sure that the committee would be pleased if you made suggestions on those areas that we could consider as we take the bill through its parliamentary stages. That would be useful.

Chief Constable House: I am sure that we and the SCDEA could work jointly on that.

Cathie Craigie: We are all aware of the difficulties that computer-generated images, cartoons and drawings that graphically depict children in a sexually abusive way can cause. How should the law deal with that issue? From what has been said today, you should be able to come back to us on that. Should any proposals to deal with that type of child pornography be extended to deal with extreme adult pornography?

Chief Constable House: In my view, the answer to that is yes, but that is a personal view. I suppose that we should follow up the issue in writing. We will do that.

The Convener: Right. You could do so, because the issue has not been considered by the wider body that you represent.

Chief Constable House: Yes.

The Convener: That is fine.

Chief Constable House: I will move on to the issue of drawings and other things, which you hinted at. We are particularly concerned about the virtual world websites, such as Second Life and others, within which depictions of violent child and adult pornography are starting to emerge. As I understand it, the images on those sites are not photographic, and therefore the law as it stands struggles to deal with them.

I am sure that that involves only a very small number of images at the moment, but that will undoubtedly increase, given the number of people who are involved in the virtual worlds way of life.
We will have to consider that issue, because those things seem to be developing into a bit of a trend. Adult and child pornographic violence is taking place in alternative realities; I know that that sounds hugely bizarre and is a bit of a stretch to consider as we sit here, but it is happening nonetheless and causing severe distress.

Cathie Craigie: I want to draw together the issues for my understanding. Sections 33 and 34 are necessary, as the law in those areas needs to be improved, but perhaps they could be improved because circumstances move quickly in that field and will have changed even since the consultation was carried out. I would welcome more information on that.

It is helpful for us to take on board the comment about resources in relation to staff, and the ability of police and agencies to deal with that issue, with regard to our budget considerations later this year.

Nigel Don: Am I right in thinking that in the situation that we are discussing, you would support the inclusion of very wide-ranging words in the bill? In other words, would you prefer to let the court restrict what is obscene and pornographic, rather than let us do so in the legislation?

Chief Constable House: I return to what I said earlier: we simply want to work in a world of certainty. I do not mind whether a judge tells us what is what, or whether the law does that—the difficulty arises if we develop a case and bring it to court, and it falls apart because the definition is not right. I am not particularly worried about whether you use the bill to give us the right guidance or reserve that guidance for a court to give.

Nigel Don: The phrase “explicit and realistic” in section 34 seems to set boundaries, but one does not have to be terribly clever to get round those boundaries.

Chief Constable House: No.

Nigel Don: I do not possess those skills myself, but it is rather obvious how one might do it. Those are presumably the kind of phrases that need to be taken away, otherwise we will just open up another world in which people can act outside the law.

In such a situation, in order to avoid setting a boundary over which people can promptly go, we surely need a law that is effectively infinite so that only the courts can drag it back.

Chief Constable House: Yes—I do not disagree with that. One can see ways to get round the “explicit and realistic” provision in five seconds flat.

Nigel Don: As Cathie Craigie said, we would appreciate any suggestions on how those words should be put together conceptually.

Chief Constable House: It would have to centre around the distress and alarm that the images cause, but one then comes up against people who will say, “I wasn’t alarmed or distressed by it—it is a part of life.” It is not easy.

The Convener: Perhaps Mr House has a high tolerance level for distress.

Chief Constable House: Perhaps sitting in front of the committee is adding to that.

The Convener: Stewart Maxwell would like to come in.

Stewart Maxwell: My question is on a separate area.

The Convener: I was just about to ask some closing questions.

Stewart Maxwell: It is a general question about section 17, which deals with the presumption against short custodial sentences. What is the view of ACPOS on the effectiveness or otherwise of such sentences?

Chief Constable Strang: I am happy to respond to that on behalf of ACPOS. The ACPOS evidence to the Scottish Prisons Commission—which did not come from me—acknowledged that short sentences did not in general address the underlying factors that lead to offending behaviour. A longer custodial sentence is appropriate for serious offences, but the types of offences for which people are sent to prison for a short time tend to be at the more minor end of the scale.

ACPOS supports the community payback order because it allows the sentencing court scope to include conditions that address the underlying cause, whether that is alcohol, drugs or mental health issues. It is also of more benefit to the community that has been the victim of the crime, in that requiring the offender to pay back in some way is a more satisfactory outcome than their going to prison for a short time. The academic evidence is clear that the likelihood of reoffending is less with a community sentence than with a repeat short prison sentence. ACPOS welcomes that proposal in the bill.

Stewart Maxwell: Much of the debate has been about short sentences for acts that are deemed to be serious. I know that that sounds slightly odd, but much attention has been paid to knife carrying. Will you express your views on that?

It is generally accepted that the public views non-custodial sentences as a soft option. How do we get round that?
Chief Constable Strang: For the public and sentencers to have confidence in a community sentence, it clearly needs to be not the soft option. That is why it needs to be immediate and visible, and people need to have confidence that it will be completed, that it is not simply an appointment in four weeks’ time and that something will happen if the offender does not turn up. Progress courts will be important, as will follow-up of community sentences and consequences for people who do not comply. Those all need to be put in place before short sentences are removed. Offenders are sentenced to short-term imprisonment because people do not have confidence in community sentences, so I agree that a lot of work needs to be done to increase their effectiveness and public confidence in them.

Chief Constable House: Convener, may I comment on knife crime? I know that time is short.

The Convener: You have already expressed a view on that. Do you have anything to add to what you said earlier?

Chief Constable House: Our submission talks about most occasions; there are occasions when a custodial sentence may be correct. There is a public appetite for locking someone away for six months on their first conviction for carrying a knife, but the court needs to understand why the person is carrying a knife. If it is because they are going to do violence, a prison sentence may well be right. However, if it is because of peer pressure, I suggest that another approach is right—explaining and doing some meaningful, visible work on the consequences of knife carrying and violence. Sentences for second and third convictions for knife carrying should not be less than six months anyway, so they would fall outside the provisions.

Bill Butler: In ACPOS’s view, is there a place for short custodial sentences?

Chief Constable Strang: Each case must be taken on its merits. There will be occasions when the court considers that a short custodial sentence is necessary and appropriate. We want a shift in the general approach to one that recognises that putting people in prison for a short time and then allowing them out unsupervised simply does not address the crime problems that Scotland faces. In principle, there should be a presumption against short sentences. Also, if people go to prison, their sentences should contain a custodial element and a community supervision element so that they are not simply released unconditionally. However, there will be occasions when a court thinks that a short custodial sentence might be appropriate.

Bill Butler: Are you saying that there is a place for short custodial sentences?

Chief Constable Strang: I am saying that I do not think that we can entirely remove that possibility; I am not suggesting a percentage or saying in what circumstances such sentences should be given. It would be unacceptable to say to sheriffs, justices or judges that they cannot in any circumstances sentence someone to imprisonment for less than six months.

Bill Butler: That is clear. Thank you.

The Convener: We are really behind the 8-ball. Cathie Craigie will ask a final question.

Cathie Craigie: Chief Constable Strang’s answer to Bill Butler cleared up the point about which I was going to ask. I was looking for clarification of what ACPOS said in its written evidence.

The Convener: I thank the witnesses for their attendance. You are aware of the matters that remain outstanding and will be dealt with in correspondence. We look forward to hearing from you in due course.

On resuming—

The Convener: Panel 2 is made up of witnesses from Victim Support Scotland: David McKenna is chief executive, Susan Gallagher is director of development, and Jim Andrews is director of operations. Thank you for the submission that you were kind enough to send us, which we read with considerable interest. We move straight to questions.

Bill Butler: What are Victim Support Scotland’s views on the proposal to establish a Scottish sentencing council?

David McKenna (Victim Support Scotland): We warmly support the proposal to bring into being a Scottish sentencing council. In the 21st century Scotland needs not just a Parliament but a sentencing council.

That is not a reflection on the judiciary; we have great judges and sheriffs, who are professional and experienced—our judiciary is probably one of the best in the world. It is about the need to build public confidence in our sentencing processes, so that there is demonstrably a greater understanding of consistency in sentencing. That is required in the 21st century. The sentencing guidelines will be an important tool for judges and other sentencers. The proposal is a win-win for communities, victims and the criminal justice system.

Bill Butler: You mentioned the need to build public confidence in sentencing and an understanding of consistency. The committee has heard different views on whether there are inconsistencies in sentencing. In your experience of working with victims of crime, have you come across examples of inconsistent sentencing or a commonly-held perception that sentencing is inconsistent? I think that your view is informed by such experience. What impact does inconsistent sentencing—or a perception of inconsistency—have on victims?

David McKenna: The area is complex. Many victims and families will never be satisfied by the sentence; for many people, no sentence is the right one. We understand that. However, all too often victims and their families say to us, “Not only did I not agree with the sentence but I have no clue how any system could have arrived at that sentence.”

It is not easy to demonstrate to people who are involved with the criminal justice system and to communities the parameters within which sentencing takes place. We say to people, “Okay, you might not be happy with the sentence, but at least you should have the right to understand how it was arrived at.” Apart from the lack of information and support for victims and witnesses in the criminal justice system, the impact of sentencing is the issue that victims raise most often with Victim Support Scotland.

There is little evidence of inconsistency, but there is even less evidence of consistency. The purpose of the new approach will be to demonstrate to the public that there is consistency and to build communities’ confidence, so that people can have confidence when they participate in the criminal justice system, not just as victims but as witnesses who want to contribute to the process.

Bill Butler: Are you saying that clarification of the parameters of sentencing will help to build confidence in the system, and that although someone might not be satisfied with a sentence, at least the rationale behind the sentence will be explained to them?

David McKenna: People have the right to understand why a particular sentence was given in a particular case. That is what sentencing guidelines can do for us.

The Convener: Can they? The perception of inconsistency in sentencing does not appear to be borne out by the evidence. Is there a reason to think that if we set up a sentencing council that clearly lays down parameters, the public will become aware of and be satisfied with those parameters? There are difficulties in that regard, are there not?

David McKenna: Absolutely. The issues will not be addressed simply through the provision of a sentencing council, which is why we welcome the proposal that, as part of its legal responsibilities, the sentencing council would build confidence by providing information on sentencing in Scotland. As I say, it is a matter not of the sentencing council simply existing, but of the processes that the council will go through to demonstrate publicly the guidelines and parameters that judges will use as a tool in sentencing. I am not saying that the sentencer or the judge will not have discretion, but we need to be able to say to victims that, given the circumstances of their particular case, the guidance indicates that the judges will work within parameters X to Y. We do not have that at the moment.

Robert Brown: You support the issuing of guidelines and the establishment of a sentencing council. Given some of the difficulties that judges, in particular, have expressed, would you be satisfied if the body turned out to be a sentencing advisory council, with the judiciary having the last word on the guidelines?

David McKenna: I am not sure whether that arrangement would be as effective in demonstrating sentencing consistency to the public as the approach that is set out in the bill. An advisory group might just disappear into the background and never be heard from again. It might do good work, but it might not make the public and communities feel secure or confident about the sentencing process. The bill’s current approach is the right way forward.

Robert Brown: I follow your argument about the status of the proposed body, but nevertheless we are talking about what would be, effectively, a quango that would be appointed by the Government and would give instructions to the judicial system and judges. Given such provisions, would you be satisfied for the final say on the matter to lie with the judiciary?

David McKenna: I have read some of the judiciary’s views on the relationship between it and the proposed council and on what you might call the separation of powers. I am not an expert on constitutional law, but I know that we have a very good judiciary who do a great job, and I do not think that a sentencing council’s statutory arrangements would affect the judiciary’s performance or the role that it carries out in our courts. I cannot see judges being told, “You will do this or that,” and thinking, “That’s not right, but I’ll do what they say anyway.” The bill contains the necessary checks and balances. The issue is about enhancing sentencing consistency by working in partnership and bringing into the process not just judges but people from communities and different areas of society. I do not see that as a challenge for the judiciary, although I understand its views on the matter.
The Convener: We move to the use of custodial and community sentences.

Paul Martin: What is the panel’s view of evidence from sheriffs that short custodial sentences can be effective and that their current use is generally appropriate?

Jim Andrews (Victim Support Scotland): In general, we support the use of community payback orders but recognise that, as ACPOS made clear earlier, custodial sentences might be appropriate in certain circumstances. However, we believe that a wider use of community payback disposals presents a real opportunity for 21st century Scotland to address some reoffending issues. It is important that victims have a clear understanding of, are involved in and contribute to the process and that the outcomes are visible to communities. It is also to be hoped that the community payback process will benefit offenders to ensure that it is as much of a win for them as it is for communities and offenders.

Paul Martin: Section 17 is on “Presumption against short periods of imprisonment or detention”. Do you think that such a presumption and the views that you have just expressed reflect the views of most victims? Do most victims really feel that they do not want an individual who might, for example, be involved in serious antisocial behaviour to face the possibility of incarceration?

Jim Andrews: To start with, I think that most victims would wish that they had never become a victim in the first place. Then they would wish to know why they had become a victim and whether they had been a random victim or had been targeted or whatever. Finally, they would hope that what happened to them never happened again. In that context, if community payback is seen to be effective, I think that victims would support it.

Paul Martin: But do you accept the sheriffs’ view that short sentences are the only way for communities and, indeed, victims to get respite from the prolific offenders who turn up at court on many and several occasions? Does the short-sentence approach not represent victims?

Jim Andrews: As others have pointed out, on certain occasions individuals will require a custodial sentence not only to give their community some respite but to ensure the security of the victim and the community in which they live. As a result, on some occasions custodial sentences will always be appropriate. However, the presumption in favour of community disposals applies not to those individuals but to other offenders who might be better dealt with under that approach.

Paul Martin: What examples can you cite from your experience of supporting victims to back up that view? What consultation has taken place with victims on section 17?

Jim Andrews: Each year, Victim Support Scotland supports about 100,000 victims of crime, about 30,000 of whom are victims of violent crime such as serious assault or assault against the person. In communicating the feedback that we receive from service users, we try at all times to ensure that we represent all victims’ views. Of course, not every victim reacts to a crime in the same way or will necessarily have the same opinion about what happened to them but, in general, victims look for justice and want a clear and transparent system that has clear outcomes that benefit them, the community and the offenders.

Paul Martin: With respect, I am looking for specific examples. In your submission, you say, significantly:

> “Victim Support Scotland supports this section when suitable alternative disposals are ... available.”

You must have based that view on evidence that such a disposal is of benefit to victims. On the basis of work that you have carried out, do you feel that that is the view of most victims? Where is the evidence that such disposals are of benefit in the majority of cases?

Jim Andrews: From the information that we receive through our operational services, which are in every local authority area in Scotland and provide day-to-day support for victims of crime, we believe that victims of crime would support these measures.

Paul Martin: So there is evidence that you could provide to the committee after this meeting.

Jim Andrews: We could provide background information.

Robert Brown: One imagines that people’s attitudes to such matters might well change when they become a victim. Has any consistent view emerged from victims on the circumstances in which only a custodial sentence or only a community sentence might be appropriate, or are those views simply too diverse because of the different attitudes held by and the personalities of the victims themselves?

Susan Gallagher (Victim Support Scotland): In our experience, victims of serious crime always want the offender to be given a custodial sentence, as a result of not only their personal experience, but their experience in their community and their worries about their safety. Victim Support Scotland feels strongly that custodial sentences are appropriate in such cases.
Robert Brown: I do not think that anybody would argue with that for serious offences.

Susan Gallagher: Serious offences, violent offences and assaults.

We know from our experience on the youth justice side that many victims feel strongly that young offenders should not necessarily be incarcerated, but should be helped and supported. Some victims feel that an offender should be helped rather than just put in prison.

Robert Brown: From what was said earlier, I took it that the primary wish of victims is for justice to be done but that they also want to prevent the offender from repeating the offence with another victim. Is that a reasonable interpretation?

Susan Gallagher: Absolutely.

Robert Brown: Against that background, how do victims feel about the effectiveness of short-term custodial sentences?

Susan Gallagher: People think that when somebody goes into prison they will be helped and supported from the moment they arrive until the moment they are let out—that they can go on anger management courses and other courses of that nature. However, with short-term sentences, such courses will not necessarily be available, so victims often feel a bit let down.

We also know that some victims feel angry when offenders go to prison and then receive, in the victims’ eyes, the benefits of participating in alcohol programmes, drug programmes or substance-abuse programmes, when the victims themselves are not eligible for such services within their community and can get them only if they pay for it. That is a disparity.

Victims often feel that, instead of being given short-term sentences, offenders could be put to better use in their community, where they could do work of value for the community as a whole and, possibly, for the victim. Putting people in prison for short-term sentences will not necessarily help the victims.

Robert Brown: In your submission, you make two very interesting suggestions. First, you suggest that the court should set an alternative sentence alongside the community payback order. Secondly, the order should be given only if the chosen treatment or activity is immediately available. Both those suggestions would involve substantial changes to the current arrangements.

I can see the merit in your suggestion on alternative sentences, but breaches of orders can be very varied. Some people are defiant from the beginning, but others breach orders in a more modest way, or simply fail to turn up at some point. As a result, your suggestion might not be terribly helpful in making community sentences work better.

David McKenna: We have to build confidence within communities. At present, things can be long and drawn out, and the outcome may be nothing like what it might have been had a community disposal not been given in court. We have a real opportunity to transform how we deal with low-level offending, to make things better for offenders, for victims and for the community. If the community and the judiciary are not confident in the proposals, the proposals will not work.

We are keen that communities should be given information on policies and procedures in relation to community payback orders. Communities should be involved in consultations and in the delivery of services. In the sentencing process, it should, from the beginning, be made clear to the victim and to the community what the alternative would have been. Mr Brown is right to suggest that people’s situations can change, but that can happen in every aspect of life. We are talking about situations in which, had the community payback order not been available, a prison sentence would have been given there and then.

We need to give victims information about that process and about the terms of any order. Indeed, victims’ views ought to be taken into account when the terms of an order are set, to ensure that their safety and security, and that of the community, are protected. Regardless of the nature of the offence, we need to ensure that people on community payback orders do not go back into the community and reoffend. One way to do that is to involve the community in understanding what the individual has been asked to do.

Robert Brown: Are you suggesting that, in practical terms, there would be a presumption that a suspended sentence would be the alternative, but that there would be some wriggle room in suitable instances?

David McKenna: Yes.

Robert Brown: You say that a community sentence should be handed out only if the chosen treatment is available at the time of sentencing. There are several ways of achieving that—it can be done administratively or when orders are handed out. Do you think that the best way to tackle the obvious problems of getting disposals to start on time and making them suitable is through the judge, who may or may not have knowledge of the administrative background that is available to the social work department or whoever?

Susan Gallagher: That is an option, but we want services to be available in communities—and we want communities to see that services are available and that resources are put in to ensure that they are available—so that when a judge hands out a sentence, they know that the person concerned will be able to get the necessary support in the community. From our understanding of how community service orders work, people can sometimes wait for weeks or months for that to happen, which does not help to instil confidence in the general public. We think that making resources and services available quickly will help with confidence and transparency.

Robert Brown: The core points are the provision of information to victims, the perceived effectiveness of community sentences and the actuality: whether they are what they were supposed to be and whether people on them can get cracking from an early stage.

Susan Gallagher: Absolutely; and information should be available to people on what the sanctions will be if an order is breached.

The Convener: I have a couple of questions. There is a general perception among the public that community sentences are the soft option. I know that you have partly dealt with this, but with regard to the bill specifically, how do you think that that image could be improved—assuming that you do not think that community sentences are a soft option?

David McKenna: All three of us will have great ideas about that, but the first thing to say is that, at present, community sentences are misunderstood by communities. Communities do not see them and do not know that they are happening. In some ways, community sentences are unwanted, because of people’s experience of crime and because they do not get information about what is happening. That is why the existing orders fail us.

We need to move to a position in which we understand the outcome that we want to achieve for offenders, which is that they reduce or stop their offending and we thereby reduce crime. The desired outcome for prisons is clear—we want to spend less money putting people in prison. We do not do enough talking about the outcomes for our communities that we will deliver through community payback orders. That discussion needs to start now.

We need to tell communities—I am making these outcomes up—that 1 million new trees will be planted in Scotland, that there will be a reduction of 1MW in the amount of power that is used, or that 500 miles of countryside will be opened up and made more accessible to people. We need to say to communities what CPOs will mean for them. Instead of just saying that they will be good for communities, we need to say, for example, that they will result in the development of 100 play parks or the installation of 10,000 recreational benches or seats in leisure areas across Scotland. We need to set out an agenda that shows what CPOs will mean for communities and which drives delivery of such outcomes. That is the missing part.

Jim Andrews: Community payback could be a huge success if it were linked to community planning and community safety and if community planning partnerships identified work that needed to be done in communities in their area. Through the community payback programme, such work would start to get done, which, as well as being visible, would be beneficial to the offender.

The Convener: You have dealt with the issue of speed. There seems to be a general agreement that, regardless of the form that it takes, community service should have an immediacy that it does not appear to have in some jurisdictions at the moment.

Turning to visibility, there is a view that, whatever happens, offenders should be punished to an extent. How do you identify that a community service project is being carried out by those who have been sentenced by a court to do so? Do you take what some might call the extreme measure of having people wear Guantanamo bay suits? Do you have them wearing something that is recognisable? Do you advertise on the site by means of a billboard that it is a community service project? Are you prepared to do such things even if it causes some embarrassment to the offender?

David McKenna: I certainly believe that community service has to be visible; it does not have to be about wearing bright orange or fluorescent jackets with large signs on them. I hear the discussion from both sides about how community service should not be too brightly visible. We should talk to offenders about their views. I suspect that many offenders who participate in community service—if it is a constructive sentence for them—will want to take some pride in the fact that they are giving something back to the community. We can have visible community service and design that visibility into the programmes so that it does not embarrass people or take away their dignity, but helps to build their pride and dignity. We will have to wait and see what happens in that respect.

The Convener: I come back to something that you said earlier. I was interested in the statistics that Mr Andrews provided that showed that in the course of a year you deal with some 30,000 people who are the victims of violence. In some cases, the violence is minimal, but in others it is considerable. Those of us around this table speak frequently to victims of crime—perhaps the people to whom you have spoken are of a more forgiving nature—but if I were walking along the street at night and an 18-year-old with a history of previous convictions head-butted me and broke my glasses... and teeth, apart from the pain and woe caused to me and the considerable expenditure that I would incur, I would expect that guy to be locked up. Would I be wrong to expect that?

David McKenna: Many people share that view, but many victims do not share it. We stand back and see that what is happening is that we are sending people to jail for two, three or four months. That is costing us a lot of money and the people are getting no help or support to change how they live when they come out of prison. Indeed, when they come out of prison they have often lost their home, family and job. So prison is expensive and it does not improve the position of the offender or the victim. Community sentencing costs a lot less, and if it could be even 1 or 2 per cent more effective, we could reduce the level of victimisation that the community might experience in the future, even though it is a challenge to get things right in the immediate period.

In the case of low-level crimes, most people do not want people to go to jail. That is the general experience about which we hear, not from the 30,000 people who suffer violent crime, but from the other 70,000 who suffer low-level property crime. People say to us, “I don’t want them to go to jail; I just want to know that it won’t happen again.” The most common words that come out of victims’ mouths are, “I don’t want it to happen again.” The present system practically ensures that it will happen again and that is the sad part about it.

Cathie Craigie: A majority of MSPs believe entirely in Victim Support Scotland’s position on immediacy and that the punishment should fit the crime and should be swift, and that there should be some payback to the community to make amends for the crime that has been committed. However, to achieve those goals—particularly immediacy—there is a cost. We have had oral and written evidence that getting the resources required for the bill’s proposals will be difficult. If the bill is passed without additional resources being allocated to it, will it be effective?

Susan Gallagher: That is the challenge for everybody. The system does not have many resources in place, so it does not necessarily advocate for the needs of communities, victims of crime or even offenders. You are right—if resources are not provided effectively, the bill might not do the best that it could do.

Resources must be available for a variety of measures. Notwithstanding that, some opportunities that are still out there might not cost as much to put in place. Our organisation works in most communities and in the 32 local authority areas. If we are given small amounts of resources, we can work with providers to assist them with victim awareness training, for example. Ways are available now in which we can assist the process in communities. However, our organisation feels strongly that resources need to be in place to enable effective implementation.

David McKenna: I will make two quick observations. The figure depends on how it is counted, but Scotland spends £2 billion on criminal justice. We are not talking about £500 million to get the provisions off the ground. Within the existing spend, there must be ways of doing things differently that will release resources to allow measures to happen.

We need a new dynamic in how we think about the issue. For example, judges and sheriffs can make compensation orders to victims. That does not happen often, sometimes because no victim is discernible. When that is the case, why cannot a compensation order be made in court for use in community payback by the community that the crime has affected? The Procurator Fiscal Service can make compensation awards to victims—in effect, they are fines that go to victims. However, victims often do not want such awards, or no victim is discernible. Why cannot that money be channelled back into the communities that suffered the crimes, to improve their safety and improve life there?

We must start to consider new ways of operating in the future and not just rely on the old ways. Plenty of resources are in the system.

Cathie Craigie: Given that resources will be tight in the next financial year, when we will want to implement the bill, if victims were given the choice between spending £1 million on a quango—the sentencing council—or on front-line services, what would be their priority?

David McKenna: How tempting—let me think. It is clear that investment must be made in front-line services. At the same time, investment must be made in the future.

Cathie Craigie: You cannot have both. What is the priority?

David McKenna: Perhaps we cannot have the Rolls-Royce option in both cases, but the challenge for us is to find something in the middle that invests in today and in the future.

Members will have seen the international statistics and those from Scotland and the UK that show the public’s decreasing confidence in their criminal justice systems and their decreasing likelihood of coming forward as witnesses, of reporting crime and of co-operating with the authorities. Dealing with those issues presents challenges for society. To build confidence, we must invest in initiatives such as the sentencing council. Otherwise, what we are talking about today will not matter in 20 years’ time, because nobody will co-operate with the criminal justice system or come forward as a witness and communities will look to deal with crime differently.

We must find a way to invest in the future and in front-line services, although perhaps we will not have the Rolls-Royce in both cases. I am thankful that working that out is not my job.

The Convener: That is an honest response.

You make an interesting point about money going into communities as reparation. It would be competent for a court to impose a compensation order if an agency could handle that.

David McKenna: Absolutely.

The Convener: The problem is that most offenders do not pay.

David McKenna: Of course that is correct. However, evidence from the United States and other countries shows that if compensation orders or victim fund orders are used rather than fines, they are far more likely to be paid. Offenders pay more when compensation orders rather than fines are used.

The Convener: All things are relative.

David McKenna: Yes.

The Convener: No great success has been experienced in collecting fines or compensation orders here, but that is for another day.

Nigel Don will close on disclosure.

Nigel Don: Given that it is a procedural matter, the more detailed the evidence we receive from those who understand these things, the better.

Susan Gallagher: Okay. That is no problem.

Nigel Don: That would be appreciated. Thank you.

The Convener: As the committee has no further questions, I thank Ms Gallagher, Mr McKenna and Mr Andrews for their attendance this morning and for their exceptionally helpful evidence.

12:21

Meeting suspended.

12:23

On resuming—

The Convener: We resume in order to take evidence from our third panel. I welcome Maire McCormack, head of policy, and Nico Juetten, parliamentary officer, both from the office of Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People; Tom Roberts, head of public affairs at Children 1st; and Dr Jonathan Sher, director of research, policy and programmes at Children in Scotland. Thank you for your attendance. We move straight to questions, which will be opened by Angela Constance.

Angela Constance: Good afternoon. Under the provisions in the bill, it will still be possible to deal with children aged between eight and 12 on offence grounds. What are your views on that? What further changes, if any, do you seek?

Maire McCormack (Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People): Thank you for inviting us. As you would expect, we approach the bill from a children’s rights perspective. The function of Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People is to promote and safeguard children’s rights and to have regard to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. That guided our approach to our submission.

The bill deems children under eight to lack capacity, as is the case under section 41 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, which is left intact, but those aged between eight and 11 are not decriminalised. The bill simply states that they cannot be prosecuted. If a child accepts an offence ground or that is established, there are serious implications under section 3 of the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974. Our office has evidence that there are implications later in life for children who accept such grounds, because the information is still carried when they are looking for employment or want to go to college.
The fact that they accepted a ground as a young child can come back to haunt them.

Tom Roberts (Children 1st): As we state in our submission, the prosecution of children of eight on offence grounds does not fit with the model to which we think Scotland aspires in dealing with young people who offend. We also argue that it does not fit with our international obligations and is not in the best interests of those children, which is the starting point from our perspective.

Dr Jonathan Sher (Children in Scotland): Children in Scotland commends the Government for recommending an increase in the age, but we believe the proposal in the bill falls far short of what could and should occur. Perhaps there was a misunderstanding, because the policy document that explains the intent clearly notes the intention to increase the age of criminal responsibility to 12, but the bill does not do that. It confounds two different things: the age of criminal responsibility and the age of criminal prosecution. We believe that both should be increased. We see no point in, and do not support, splitting the two ages and maintaining a system that regards children in primary 4 as adults if they behave badly. They are not adults, but children.

We recommend that the age be increased to 16, not 12. There is no scientific basis for picking a particular age, whereas there is a scientific basis for understanding that a child’s developmental age and their chronological age can be extraordinarily different. All 12-year-olds, 10-year-olds or 14-year-olds are not at the same developmental level and they do not have the same capacity or responsibility. The law ought to reflect a more sensible view.

The age of 12 is arbitrary, as any other age would be arbitrary. It was chosen simply because the UN said that it was the absolute minimum that would not be internationally appalling. I do not think that those were the UN’s exact words, but that was certainly the sentiment. However, it is not good enough for Scotland to be internationally compliant. Through the children’s hearings system, Scotland deservedly has a reputation for having far more than a minimalist approach to children’s rights and wellbeing.

We argue that 16, not 12, should be both the age of criminal responsibility and the age of criminal prosecution. That would dovetail with other things that already exist. The children’s hearings system, by and large, operates until the age of 16. Polmont young offenders institution starts to take offenders at the age of 16. Looked-after and accommodated children continue to be so until they age out at 16. Even if 16 is somewhat arbitrary, it is at least consistent with other laws relating to age and the perception of responsibility.

Angela Constance: Dr Sher anticipated my second question, but I would be interested to hear what the other three witnesses think about the age of criminal responsibility and the age of prosecution.

Maire McCormack: The bill is good in that it states that children under 12 cannot be prosecuted. Few children under 12 are prosecuted at present. I think that there have been four such prosecutions in the past four years. We are extremely pleased that the Lord Advocate’s discretion in deciding whether to prosecute children under 12 is to be removed, so that no child under 12 will now be prosecuted. That is a welcome proposal.

Angela Constance: Has the bar been set too high or too low at 12?

Maire McCormack: The difficulty is that the bill has been presented as raising the age of criminal responsibility; in fact, the age of criminal responsibility will remain at eight. As Jonathan Sher pointed out, the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child refers to “a very low level of age 7” and to “the commendable high level of age 14 or 16”.

The committee states that setting the age lower than 12 “is considered … not to be internationally acceptable”.

Two issues have been conflated. Prosecution is one thing, but capacity, which is not touched on, is also relevant to the age of criminal responsibility. The small group of children between eight and 11 will be immune from prosecution, but there has been no engagement with the issue of capacity. We need to consider whether a child is able to understand the nature and consequences of the crime that has been committed. Our submission focuses on the consequences. The UN Committee on the Rights of the Child’s guidance on the subject says that we should engage with the issue of capacity, not set the bar too low, and take into account the child’s emotional, mental and intellectual capacity.

Angela Constance: Are you suggesting that splitting the age of prosecution from the age of criminal responsibility is unhelpful?

Maire McCormack: It is very unhelpful, as it conflates two issues. We are dealing with a hugely complex legal construct. Last week, we met to discuss it with a number of experts; we have all found it a difficult issue to tackle. The policy memorandum says that the age of criminal responsibility is being raised, but it is not—it will... stay at eight, which is deplorably low. That will have consequences when children go through the children’s hearings system on an offence ground. It is good that the age of prosecution is being raised, but the two issues are distinct. We need to ask ourselves whether the bill complies with the spirit of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. We have made some suggestions that may be helpful. We would like both the age of criminal responsibility and the minimum age of prosecution to be raised.

Nico Juetten (Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People): Scotland is a bit awkward on the issue, as there are a number of different concepts around the age of criminal responsibility. At present, we are employing at least two of those. We have a capacity cut-off at eight that the bill does not propose to change in any way. We have what one legal academic has called an age gateway of 16—that is the cut-off after which young people are dealt with through the adult criminal justice system as a matter of standard procedure. We also have a bit of a cut-off on the prosecution of children under 12. It is not as clear cut as the others, but it is clarified in the bill. I understand that, at the moment, children under 12 can be prosecuted only with the express consent of the Lord Advocate. Although that is good to an extent, it is much better to draw an absolute line in primary legislation. Three concepts are in use here at the moment. The bill clarifies the place of one of them, but it does not do much more than that.

Angela Constance: What would you like to see?

Nico Juetten: Essentially, we would like to see the decriminalisation of children under the age of criminal responsibility. That could be achieved in different ways. We could raise the age of criminal responsibility, which would mean that no child would be dealt with in the children’s hearings system on an offence ground, with the potential criminal consequences that that entails, such as a criminal record. Alternatively, the Parliament could reconsider section 3 of the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974 and remove the criminal consequences of offence ground referral—I understand that it has the power to do so.

I do not think that we have concluded what is preferable, but we want children who commit offences to be dealt with by the children’s hearings system and the underlying reasons for the offences—their needs and so on—to be addressed in the interests of the offender, the wider community and the victim. We do not want children to leave the children’s hearings system or any other forum with a criminal record or to be unaware that they might have one.

Tom Roberts: I support much of what has been said. We would certainly prefer the age of criminal responsibility and the minimum age for prosecution to be set at 16. That would fit with international obligations and with a number of other areas of our society, as Jonathan Sher said. Setting 16 as the minimum age would also pick up on how we view the activities of young people under 16 as a shared responsibility between us as a society, the young people themselves and their parents. The fact that children have to stay in full-time education until they are 16 suggests that we as a society regard them as still growing and developing as individuals up to that age, so applying the full extent of the law to those who are below 16 feels incongruous.

Dr Sher: Another point about the congruity around the age of 16 is that section 42(1) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 states:

“No child under the age of 16 years shall be prosecuted for any offence except on the instructions of the Lord Advocate”.

The proposal regarding the age of 16 that is before the committee today is therefore not a radical new idea: it is, in fact, normal practice. We think that the law should rise to meet that standard. Fundamentally, we believe that it is not appropriate to label any child as a criminal. Criminal status should be reserved for those whom we consider to be adults.

I will give three quick reasons for that. First, there is not a shred of evidence from Scotland or from any other developed nation that indicates that labelling, punishing and conferring criminal status and a criminal record on children does the slightest bit of good for them as human beings, for society or for making communities safer. Such an approach has no positive consequences for anyone involved; in fact, it makes things worse, because conferring criminal status and labelling a child as a criminal gives that child an identity, and children have a habit of living up to or down to the labels that we assign to them. If we call them criminals, we can pretty much count on their adopting that identity and living down to it. Calling them criminals therefore does not make practical sense in relation to community safety or personal development.

Secondly, people come out again. We are talking about people who can expect to live for more than half a century after whatever happens in response to their behaviour happens. What is likely to produce the best outcome for that next half century of their being among us? There is no evidence that criminalising them will make that a better half century for them, us or our communities.

Finally, it seems to me that, amazingly enough, we can learn something from the States. As my accent betrays, that is where I come from. The American criminal justice system is absolutely not one that Scotland should emulate or want to emulate. However, even in America, where the level of incarceration is appallingly high, someone is not automatically considered for the criminal justice system until they are 18—even 16-year-olds are not automatically considered to be adults. We have to think carefully before creating a society in which a child can behave badly enough to earn adult status but in which there is no corresponding positive behaviour that will result in adult status. Criminality is an adult construction; it is not for children.

Robert Brown: I understand the labelling point and the criminal conviction aspect. However, I would like to ask a technical question about the children’s hearings system. What are the implications of the age of prosecution and/or age of criminal responsibility being set at 12, 16 or some other age in between for the children’s hearings system in terms of its grounds of referral and any additional powers that it might need? Obviously, children under the ages of 12, 13 and 14 can commit what we would describe objectively as crimes. Does there need to be a kind of offence-type ground, whether we make it a non-offence ground or whatever, that will allow the children’s hearing to have adequate competence in these areas? Does the children’s hearing require additional powers if the prosecution arrangements are done away with for children under a certain age?

The Convener: If you answer that, Ms McCormack, that will give you an opportunity to respond to the previous question as well.

Maire McCormack: In our submission we suggest that section 41 of the 1995 act should be repealed and that a new non-offence ground should be introduced to allow for children who are under 12 to be referred to the children’s hearing—

Robert Brown: That involves situations in which the children have been, in effect, offending, as it were.

Maire McCormack: It would be a behavioural ground that would have no prospect of criminal consequences. We believe that it would be an abdication of our responsibility towards children who exhibit offending behaviour if their needs and behaviours were not addressed. We suggest that work should be done on rehabilitation and that people should focus on putting forward a new ground of referral. I think that that was raised during the discussions on the children’s services bill, so it is not a new proposal.

The proposal would also encompass children who were under eight who did something that would be an offence ground at the hearing but who could not go to the hearing because of their age, which would be useful because those children are vulnerable and have deep-seated needs.

Robert Brown: Is there a need for the panel to have any additional powers?

Maire McCormack: Not that I am aware of.

Dr Sher: The submission from the Scottish Children’s Reporters Administration offered the same idea, which Children in Scotland supports. We believe that a new, non-offence ground should be added. I want to be clear that Children in Scotland is absolutely not recommending that children who behave badly should be given a free pass or that we should look the other way when that happens.

We care about all children, and the truth is that most of the victims of child-perpetrated bad behaviour are other children. A 12-year-old child is far more likely to give a right kicking to someone who is 10 than someone who is 27. Because we care about what happens to all children, we believe that children’s bad behaviour should be handled seriously by the children’s hearings system. Children should not be given a free pass. They cannot behave in any way that they like, and there need to be immediate and real consequences if they behave badly. However, the point of those consequences, even if they include being sent to secure accommodation, is not simply to punish them but to find ways of unlocking the door so that those children can have better futures and become law-abiding and productive good citizens. We need to do everything in our power to ensure that that happens. The children’s hearings system has a better chance than the criminal justice system does of producing that outcome.

Stewart Maxwell: I accept what you are saying about there being no free pass and children not being allowed to create mayhem and go free. The children’s hearings system has a great role to play, and I am a strong supporter of it. However, surely the fact that we would be retaining section 42 of the 1995 act, which ensures that those between 12 and 15 would be prosecuted only on the direct instruction of the Lord Advocate, strikes a better balance than removing entirely the power to prosecute those under 16 does.

Tom Roberts: I think that that is a question of how we want to set out our approach to young people who become involved in what we would call offending behaviour. Part of what is important is the nature of young people’s involvement in offending. The University of Edinburgh’s study of youth transitions shows that a lot of young people become involved in what we would call criminal activity in adults but do not carry on that activity when they become adults. That should teach us some lessons about how we respond to young people in those situations. We have already mentioned that, if you mark someone as being criminal, they start behaving like a criminal. A number of studies have shown that we are too quick to criminalise, and that it is more effective to minimise the response and focus on diversion as much as possible.

We are not convinced by the argument that there are some crimes that are serious enough to require referral to a higher court and cannot be dealt with in the children’s hearings system, with all its welfare-based provisions.

Stewart Maxwell: I do not want to get into a debate about that, but there have been some exceptionally horrible cases in which children under the age of 16 have committed heinous crimes. I am not sure that the general public would support the line of argument that you just expressed.

Tom Roberts: It is important to design our system based on our approach to the majority of young people, rather than the one or two extreme cases.

Stewart Maxwell: Sorry to interrupt, but is that not exactly what is being proposed? The norm would be for cases to be dealt with through the children’s panel system but, on the instruction of the Lord Advocate, certain rare cases involving children between the age of 12 and 15 could be prosecuted. As I asked earlier, is that not the right balance?

Tom Roberts: I do not think that European countries and other countries around the world that do not have that provision are suffering from a major outbreak of youth crime. As Jonathan Sher said, we are not arguing that there should be no response; we are talking about what the starting point for that response should be. I think that the starting point for almost all young people who are involved in criminal activity must recognise that there are significant welfare needs in their background. The better we can respond to those needs, the more likely we are to prevent further reoffending and divert those children from a lifetime of crime.

Stewart Maxwell: At the start, Maire McCormack said that four cases involving children under the age of 12 had been prosecuted last year.

Maire McCormack: In the past four years.

Stewart Maxwell: That is an extremely small number. Does the fact that those cases have arisen—-and have been able to be prosecuted because of decisions of the Lord Advocate—suggest that there is a case to be made for keeping the age of criminal responsibility at eight but changing the age of prosecution to 12? If the age of criminal responsibility were changed to 12 as well as the age of prosecution, the possibility of prosecuting cases involving people under 12 would in effect be removed.

I have another quick question. In those countries that have higher ages of responsibility and prosecution—Dr Sher mentioned that it is 18 in the USA—is it not the case that, when a crime has been committed by two people, one over the age of responsibility and the other under it, there can often be an attempt to manipulate the system so that the responsibility is shifted to the younger individual because the punishment element is so much less for them?

Maire McCormack: I will answer your first question first. If you are putting a high-risk offender or a higher-tariff young offender into the community, the community has to feel confident that that is appropriate. When community-based facilities are being promoted, decision-makers have to be reassured that they are appropriate and effective for those offenders. I know that the Scottish Government is doing a lot of work on that. The hearings system also has to be informed about the disposals that are available. It is a real challenge for some excellent organisations, such as Includem, to find resources to invest in such services and in service development, given the current financial climate. The hearings system should be made aware of the disposals that are out there, which can be effective and appropriate. The disposals that are available to the hearings system include secure accommodation for a very small number of young people. I know that the securing our future initiative report looks at improving the secure estate to deal with that very small number. Work is being done, but perhaps the hearings system has to be beefed up to ensure that certain disposals are facilitated.

Dr Sher: I am not persuaded by the argument that just because something has been done means that it was the right thing to do and that we should keep doing it. There have been prosecutions of children under the age of 12, albeit only a handful, but that does not mean that prosecuting them was the right decision. I have no evidence that the outcomes in those situations would encourage a repetition of that process.

Instead of stopping the thinking process at the point at which you say, “Okay, now they’re a criminal,” we have to take the next step and say, “Now that we’ve labelled them a criminal, what is the predictable consequence of that and what will happen to them?” Until we can answer that, we will not have the solution. There is no evidence from anywhere that suggests that labelling and treating children as criminals turns their lives round or makes their communities safer. It does
The Convener: You will adopt your previous arguments. We move on to consider the provisions on fingerprint and DNA data, which are causing concern. The issue is fairly straightforward, so we are looking for reasonably short answers.

Bill Butler: Under section 59, the retention of fingerprint and DNA data obtained from children who are dealt with through the children’s hearings system will be allowed. The witnesses think that the approach is inappropriate; will you outline your concerns?

Nico Juetten: We think that automatic retention is inappropriate and that retention through the children’s hearings system is inappropriate. Those are two separate points, which I will address in tum.

Our overarching principle, which we derive from the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child, is that children who offend should be treated differently from adult offenders, because the same assumptions cannot be made for both groups. For example, is behaviour at one point when someone is growing up necessarily predictive of behaviour at another point? The age and developmental stage of the child matters and predicting future behaviour is not straightforward. That is a background point.

In some cases, it will be necessary to retain a child’s DNA profile on the database—

Bill Butler: You are talking about your recommendation in paragraph 6.4 of your submission, which is that the bill be amended to ensure that there is no automaticity.

Nico Juetten: That is correct. We would not want automatic retention, for the reasons that I intimated. However, we accept that for the protection of others—in most cases, other children and young people—it might be necessary in exceptional cases to retain a DNA profile of a young person on the database. We have opinions on how that should be done—

Bill Butler: In your written submission, you suggest that the intervention of a sheriff should be required before a young person’s DNA profile can be retained—never mind the extension of powers to retain DNA, which is what the bill talks about.

Nico Juetten: We need safeguards for children. There is no doubt that retention of a DNA profile is significant interference with a person’s right to a private and family life, but retention can be justified in exceptional cases.

My second point is about where decisions about retention should take place. The children’s hearings system is not the appropriate forum for that. We do not want the system’s character to shift significantly towards being more adversarial, with more legal representation. There must be significant legal safeguards if such a level of interference in a child's right to a personal life is to be granted.

Tom Roberts: As the committee heard from witnesses earlier, the debate about the role of DNA in society and how, when and where it should be retained is continuing. I am not sure that it is appropriate to pitch children into the debate at this stage. I am concerned that we are taking action because we can, rather than because we have thought through the gain to society, particularly from a child's perspective.

I am also concerned that the bill does not make it clear what offences would allow for retention of DNA—

13:00

Bill Butler: Perhaps I can help you there, Mr Roberts. I understand that the bill provides for the retention of DNA in cases involving violent or sexual offences. It is very specific about that. We are not talking about blanket DNA retention, which is the route down which our previous panellists seemed to be going. We are bringing practice into line with the ECHR because a particular case in England showed that there was nearly blanket retention in some areas. The retention of DNA must be more specified and targeted in respect of the Scottish disposal. Does that help?

Tom Roberts: It does a little. We have had a lot of debates with people beyond Children 1st about the issue, as it is a difficult one. If there are circumstances in which retention might protect other people—

Bill Butler: Including other children.

Tom Roberts: Absolutely. We would be open to that discussion. However, we do not feel that the bill as drafted or the debate as it is at the moment has brought us to that point. There is the significant issue of a consequence of someone going to the children's hearings system being the retention of their DNA.

Bill Butler: I put it to you that you would have a point were it not for the fact that the bill is very specific about retention being for those children who are dealt with by the children's hearings system for specified violent or sexual offences. Does that help you?

Tom Roberts: There is discussion to be had about the offences that are dealt with by the children's hearings system at the moment. On reading what was in front of us at the time, we did not feel convinced that the argument had been made for the retention of DNA—

Bill Butler: At all?

Tom Roberts: No.

Bill Butler: Okay. That is very clear. What about Dr Sher?

Dr Sher: This is an area in which I can claim not the slightest expertise, so my comments will be short. At stage 1, we think that the principle that makes sense is that there should not be automatic retention of DNA from all children who behave badly at any time. We think that there is more substantive ground for retention on a more targeted, case-by-case basis. We do not have a problem with that.

Bill Butler: That is exactly what you say in your written submission. You state:

"The policy intent ... of specified time limits for the retention and destruction of samples taken from children" is "heading in the right direction."

Maire McCormack: I agree with my colleague and with Tom Roberts. The bill talks about "sexual and violent offences", but that is a broad spectrum and it does not define what those offences are. I know that a working group will be set up to look into that, but we need to consider the definitions. Different agencies have different thresholds and a different understanding of what a sexual or violent offence is. We should be thinking about managing the risk and assessment of the planning, but—

Bill Butler: But you agree with your colleague that there may be certain circumstances in which DNA retention would be an appropriate way forward.

Maire McCormack: As we state in our written submission, sections 16 and 17 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 both state that the children's interests are paramount. The UN Convention on the Rights of the Child also talks about the child's best interests. Nevertheless, in certain cases, those must be balanced against other rights. In tightly controlled circumstances, when it is explicit, proportionate and separate from the children's hearings system—which is a welfare-based function and should not be looking at whether a child is a criminal; that is not what it is about—we are very clear that—

Bill Butler: Sure. That is very clear. I would like to move on if I may. Mr Juetten can come back in when I move on.

You have said that you have concerns about something as radical as this proposal. It is quite right for you to have those concerns. Could any of the concerns that you have about the proposal be addressed by specific changes to the provisions in the bill? The office of the Commissioner for Children and Young People has suggested certain amendments in paragraph 6.4 of its written submission.

Nico Juetten: Well, yes. We are asking for the process to be tweaked, if retention goes ahead, because the children’s hearings system is not the appropriate place for such a decision to be made if, as we advocate, retention is not to be automatic. There are a few things to be said about the tentative proposal in our written submission. As with any proposal on the matter—which is a wee bit of a minefield, to be honest—there are upsides and downsides. We are aware that the fact that it would involve an additional court process after the children’s hearing established an offence ground or that offence ground was accepted is an issue—it would be another big burden and another process to go through. However, at this stage, we accept the need for that process for want of a better proposal for a system that does not put a burden of double jeopardy—if we can call it that; I know that it is not quite precise—on young people. I am trying to say that we need a proper process with proper safeguards for such great decisions.

Bill Butler: Are you saying that one of those safeguards is the interposition of a sheriff in terms of establishing the ground, rather than what the bill suggests, which is simply that the extension should go to the sheriff?

Nico Juetten: I am sorry, can you repeat that, please?

Bill Butler: Well, in your submission, you suggest that the bill be amended so that DNA is retained if

“(1) the child has been referred on an offence ground; (2) the offence is one of a list of ‘trigger offences’ … ; these should be serious violent and sexual offences” and they should be specified, as Ms McCormack said, perhaps by regulation; and “(3) the child and their relevant adult have accepted the ground, or it has been established by a Sheriff”.

It seems to me that you suggest an additional safeguard there.

Nico Juetten: The reporter will refer the child to the children’s hearing on an offence ground, if there is a reason for that. If the child does not accept that ground, it can be referred for proof to a sheriff. That is the process in the children’s hearings system as is. After the ground is established, the children’s hearing can make a supervision requirement. In essence, the thinking behind our proposal was that, if it is deemed absolutely necessary in the exceptional case of serious violent and sexual offences that the child’s DNA should be retained on the database, the police should make a separate application to the sheriff.

Bill Butler: So there should be an additional layer to be gone through and the sheriff should be part of that.

Nico Juetten: Yes.

Bill Butler: Okay, I understand that.

What are the witnesses’ views on the retention of fingerprint and DNA data taken from children who are prosecuted in the criminal courts? It is a small number.

Nico Juetten: That already happens for children who go through the criminal courts system. Over the past three years, if I remember rightly, about 500 children under 16 went through criminal prosecution. That is a bit of an aside, but it is relevant. According to the most recent figures, we already have DNA profiles for about 2,500 under-16s on the database. In the same timeframe, we had just below 500 prosecutions, so there is some explaining to be done about how those profiles got on to the database in the first place.

Bill Butler: What is your view, though?

Nico Juetten: The same principles apply as I mentioned in relation to retention as an outcome of a hearing. The process argument would fall by the wayside because it would simply not be the case and there would be legal safeguards. However, we would generally advocate caution in those cases, simply because it is not necessarily appropriate to retain the DNA profiles of children in the same way as we do for adults for the reasons that I have given.

Maire McCormack: Obviously, I agree with my colleague. There is an issue. One of the key principles of the UNCRC is non-discrimination and, currently, a child of 16 who goes through the courts has their profile retained but one who goes through the hearings system does not. As Nico Juetten said, there is an issue with what is currently retained and how it is monitored, whether for minor or more serious offences. I understand that the Coroners and Justice Bill that is being considered down south will introduce a power for the Information Commissioner’s office to audit without invitation, so we hope that that will deal with the issue. However, as we say in our submission, a lot of DNA is being retained for a substantial amount of time, but we do not know how long for and why.

Bill Butler: I take that point.

Tom Roberts: As stated in our final comment on the issue in our submission, we advise a strong presumption against the retention of the DNA of children. I would stick by that. Both in the children’s hearings system and in the adult courts system, we recognise that a discussion is to be had about where retention of DNA might help other children or other members of the community.
However, I do not feel that we have yet had that discussion in full as a society, so that caution should remain.

Bill Butler: That is very clear, thank you.

Dr Sher: As we believe that no child under 16 should be prosecuted, there is a sense in which this should be a non-issue and we would reassert that principle in this context. As a secondary principle—on this I want to confirm the viewpoint of my colleagues—there should be no automatic retention of DNA. There should be a legislative presumption against the retention of DNA, but a legislative presumption is not a ban. We accept that there will be grounds and times and circumstances in which retention is appropriate and reasonable.

Bill Butler: That seems a wholly reasonable answer, for which I am obliged.

The Convener: Finally, we have a couple of questions on the sexual offences provisions.

Cathie Craigie: Convener, I know that we are pushed for time, so I will put both my questions at once. First, section 33 includes provisions to extend the law on indecent images of children. Are members of the panel happy with those provisions? Secondly, section 34 will apply to computer-generated images. How should the law deal with that issue?

Tom Roberts: We made a number of comments on those provisions. As a general point, we think that legislation needs to catch up with what is happening out there and with how such material is used to promote and justify the abuse of children. That is a significant issue. My only concern—although I am not a lawmaker—about the provisions in the bill is about the need to distinguish between the different purposes behind the creation of images. For example, we highlight the fact that images can be used in medical textbooks. The need to ensure that the law on the distribution of such material can be adequately enforced is an important principle.

We also need to ensure that the law keeps pace with technology. Given that computer-generated images can be used to groom children by suggesting to them that something that happens on their computer must be acceptable, the distribution of such images can cause harm or distress to children and can be just as bad as the other type of material that circulates on the internet. We need to ensure that our laws can deal with that appropriately.

The Convener: Does anyone else have a contribution under this heading?

Maire McCormack: We support the view that has been put forward by Children 1st, but I think that there is an issue with the definition of possession. What that means needs to be clarified.

Cathie Craigie: As those who were present for the earlier discussion will know, we have asked for further information on that issue from the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland and the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency, which also had some concerns about the matter.

The Convener: As there are no further questions for the panel, I thank Ms McCormack and the gentlemen for their attendance, which has been very useful and is greatly appreciated.

Meeting suspended.
Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

10:46

The Convener: Item 4 is continued consideration of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. The evidence taken today will build on the evidence taken on parts 1 to 7 of the bill.

I welcome today’s first panel, which consists of Alan McCready, deputy director with responsibility for law reform, and Bill McVicar, convener of the criminal law committee, who are both from the Law Society of Scotland; and Ian Duguid QC, chairman of the criminal bar association at the Faculty of Advocates. I thank you for your written submissions, and I assure you that they have all been carefully read.

We will move straight to questions, and I will ask the first one, on the Scottish sentencing council. Mr Duguid, the provisions in the bill that deal with the sentencing council have attracted criticism on the basis that they would undermine the independence of the judiciary. What are your views?

Ian Duguid QC (Faculty of Advocates): I agree substantially with that view. I read with interest the evidence that the Lord Justice General and the Lord Justice Clerk gave to the committee on a previous occasion. They were clearly concerned about the independence of the appeal court in respect of its ability to set the sentencing guidelines that currently operate for everyone who practises in the courts. They also questioned the necessity of having another body, which would be unelected, to provide guidelines. As far as I can see, there are clear difficulties with that.

Like the Lord Justice General and the Lord Justice Clerk, I do not see that there has been an inconsistency in sentencing to the point at which another body is required to set guidelines. They were also concerned with the composition of the body in its proposed form because there would not be a majority of judicial members, which would also be a concern for us. There is also a constitutional question, which it is not necessary for me to get into.

All those observations were substantially well founded. I am not sure that a difficulty currently exists. There was discussion about whether there is a perception that there is inconsistency and the idea that that is perhaps brought about by newspaper reports of sentences that members of the public find difficult to understand, but it is perhaps a matter of understanding more than anything else. One of the most obvious recent examples is the case in England when the judge who was sentencing in the baby Peter case was, by all reports, strictly adhering to guidelines, which he was obliged to follow, but the outcome was, apparently—in the view of the editors of The Sun and the Daily Mail—totally unsatisfactory.

I am not sure that the setting up of a body that fixes guidelines and causes judges to adhere to those guidelines will really address all the problems that are thrown up by individual cases. The proposed body is expensive—the suggestion is that £1 million will be spent on establishing it and operating it. I question whether that expenditure on the legal system is necessary and appropriate at this time.

The Convener: Thank you. That is very clear.

Bill McVicar (Law Society of Scotland): I agree, in principle, with what Mr Duguid has said. We are concerned to understand what is meant by consistency in sentencing. Two apparently similar cases may attract different sentences for reasons that are particular to those cases; that is the difficulty in applying strict guidelines. The question is whether we want uniform sentences or consistent sentences—and what is meant by consistent sentences. It seems to me that such matters are not properly dealt with in the bill.

The other question is whether the Government is really looking for mandatory sentences of some description—sentences that must be imposed if certain criteria are met. There is an element of concern about the undermining of judicial independence in sentencing when one moves into the field of mandatory sentences. Judges are entitled to have their own personal views of particular cases as long as they act in a judicial way. One judge may take a different view of the gravity of a particular case from the view that is taken by another judge. Are we to say that one or the other of those judges is wrong?

The Convener: You have anticipated what I was going to ask. Could there be local circumstances in which sentencing disparity was appropriate?

Bill McVicar: Absolutely. It is crucial that, in some places, judges have regard to local circumstances in passing sentence.

The Convener: Do you adopt that argument, Mr Duguid?

Ian Duguid: I understand the reasoning for it, and I can think of some examples of local circumstances calling for different courses of action, but it is a difficult matter to reconcile. Fundamentally, people do not want to be treated differently in one part of the country from how they are treated in another part of the country. If there is a fundamental basis for the sentencing, the refining of the sentence can take into account local circumstances—I do not have any difficulty with that—but the creation of differences in sentencing and perhaps even a sentencing commission providing for different local circumstances is not a course that I would endorse.

I understand the basic principle of taking account of different local circumstances. I am thinking of, for example, road traffic offences that occur on the A9. Should the sheriffs who dispose of cases along the length of that route dispose of them differently from sheriffs who deal with such cases in and around the streets of suburban Edinburgh? Of course they should—there is a recognition of the fact that many accidents occur on the A9 and something has to be done about it. I totally agree with taking local circumstances into account for that sort of example, but I do not think that it would be right to set different fundamental principles in different jurisdictions.

Nigel Don: I want to challenge Mr Duguid on the idea that dangerous driving on the A9 is different from dangerous driving on the streets of Edinburgh. It is either dangerous driving or driving without due care and attention—or any other form of words that you would care to come up with—or it is not. That offence will have its own local context in terms of how fast drivers should be going and how much traffic there is around them, but if it is the same basic offence why should it attract a higher penalty on the A9 than in the suburbs of Edinburgh?

Ian Duguid: I am giving you my answer from anecdotal evidence. There has been a recognition that speeding occurs on the A9 and that, notwithstanding the fact that speeding can constitute dangerous driving, speeding in itself should be curbed to a significant extent on that road. The question is whether the penalties that are given in the sheriff courts in Perth and Inverness should be higher than those that are given in Edinburgh. Of course I do not want to suggest that speed is speed and dangerous driving is dangerous driving, but there is anecdotal evidence that the penalties that are imposed notoriously reflect the number of fatalities on the stretch of road—and that is certainly the case in my experience.

Nigel Don: I am quite prepared to believe that that is the case and that research would demonstrate it—we do not need to do the research—but I am still not sure that I could defend it as a matter of policy or principle.

Ian Duguid: I was not trying to defend it—

Nigel Don: Forgive me for interrupting, but if we want to reduce the speed on the A9 we should do it through road engineering or any number of other mechanisms, and not by saying, “If you get caught, the penalty will be higher.”

Ian Duguid: I do not think that we disagree about that. What I am saying is that local circumstances are reflected in the imposition of penalties. That is a fact. If you are asking me whether I endorse that principle, my answer is that the fundamental principle of dealing with dangerous driving is that everyone should face the same penalty, but if local sheriffs deal with local circumstances by imposing harsher penalties, that is a matter for them. They can choose to use the discretion that they have. Do the sheriffs in Edinburgh choose to exercise their discretion in the same way as sheriffs elsewhere? The anecdotal evidence is that they do not, but that does not alter the basic proposition that dangerous driving is an offence that carries the same penalty throughout the nation.

Nigel Don: Surely that brings us to the nub of the matter. If sheriffs in Perthshire, Aberdeenshire or wherever take different views—I am still not sure whether you think that that would be a good or a bad thing, but you are not on trial—surely that is wrong. Surely, in principle, the penalty for the offence should be the same throughout the country, albeit that the similarity of offences on different stretches of road might be difficult to measure. Is that not what equity and fairness are about?

Ian Duguid: The answer is yes. I think that the question that we started off with was, “Should account be taken of local circumstances in setting guidelines?” I broadly disagree with that as a principle, but I recognise that local circumstances are reflected every day in the sentences that judges impose. I am talking about sheriffs dealing with their different localities.

If you are asking me whether local circumstances should affect the decisions that are taken, the answer is that they can do that, but I do not agree that, as a matter of principle and across the board, it should be recognised that the sentence for dangerous driving will be X in one jurisdiction and Y in another. I am in favour of a universally applied penalty across the board. If individuals choose to use their discretion to reflect local circumstances and meet local difficulties, that is their business. That is what the discretion of presiding judges is all about.

Robert Brown: I am not necessarily following the line of Nigel Don’s argument, but I have a question for Mr McVicar, who defended the discretion of individual sheriffs. Glasgow and Edinburgh sheriff courts have a number of different sheriffs and the different decisions that they make have an effect on whether people plead guilty at certain stages and so on, so the matter is a significant public issue. Do you have a view on how that should be tackled? Would the sentencing council approach, whether it was advisory or of the nature that the Government proposes, be a possible way forward?

Bill McVicar: I am not sure that a sentencing council and guidelines would necessarily deal with the matter. Every judge who imposes a sentence in a case has discretion. Unless we move to a system of mandatory sentences, it will always be possible for a problem to arise between different sheriffs in the same building.

I follow up on what Ian Duguid said with an example. If someone was dealing in drugs in Glasgow, an identifiable range of sentences would apply, but if they were the first person to be caught dealing in dangerous drugs in a small town or village, would the sheriff not be entitled, in the interest of deterrence, to impose a greater sentence? Is that not an example of something that would allow the judge to impose a sentence towards the higher end of the range of acceptable sentences?

The Convener: Gentlemen, you have made your views on the sentencing council clear. If, at the end of the day, it was the will of Parliament that such a council should be imposed, what changes would you suggest that might be beneficial?

Bill McVicar: With regard to the current proposals, I agree with what the Lord Justice General said about the need for a greater number of judicial members on the council, with a view to drawing on the greater experience of those who are involved in the sentencing process. As a practitioner of the imposition of sentences, that is the principal change for which I would argue.

The Convener: Do you adopt those arguments, Mr Duguid?

Ian Duguid: Yes, I agree with that view. The Law Society’s submission identified the question of whether a member of the constabulary counted as a legally qualified person to sit on the council, but that is perhaps a matter of drafting. An issue of more general interest is whether a member of the constabulary should have any place on a sentencing body. Apart from those details, I broadly agree with the Law Society’s submissions.

The Convener: Having dealt with the qualities of the constabulary and the issue of sheriff shopping, we turn to serious organised crime, which Paul Martin will deal with.

Paul Martin: Good morning, gentlemen. Are the new offences of involvement in and direction of serious organised crime necessary, given that people can already be prosecuted for conspiring to commit crime or inciting others to commit a crime?

Ian Duguid: No, those provisions are not really necessary; I am not sure that they will add anything to the criminal justice system. We had a brief discussion before today’s meeting about the supply of controlled drugs—or drug dealing, as some people refer to it—and we were questioning whether almost every supply of drugs has involvement in serious organised crime as its end result. The supply of drugs is in a sense simply perpetuating an organisation that is both serious and organised, and it is a serious crime.

There is potential for prejudice against an accused person simply by making the allegation that they are involved in serious organised crime. For example, if a jury considers whether a person is involved in the supply of drugs, will it be influenced in any way by a couple of lines at the end of the charge that state that it will be established that that individual is guilty of involvement in serious and organised crime? Where do we draw the line between defining someone as simply a drug dealer and as a drug dealer involved in serious organised crime? It is a difficult distinction to make.

One provision in the bill suggests that the evidence of only one person is required to prove that an offence is aggravated by a connection with serious organised crime. The law as it stands provides for a number of aggravations, such as racially aggravated offences and assault that is aggravated by the seriousness of injury, which each require evidence from only one source. The bill suggests that that will be the case with involvement in organised crime. There are issues to do with whether it is proper for such an aggravation to be addressed by the involvement of one witness and whether that evidence would be an opinion, such as that of a police officer who comes along and says, “Well, as far as I’m concerned, that individual is involved in serious organised crime.” Would that be admissible and acceptable evidence? Such issues raise a number of problems, which, if the bill is passed in its current form, are likely to create difficulties and raise matters for the appeal court to resolve.

The framing of the legislation and its exactness is important. Your question was, “Do you think those provisions are really necessary?” From a practitioner’s point of view, we question whether something like that really is necessary.

Paul Martin: Why do you think the Government has introduced those provisions? Have you picked up on anything that clarifies its reasons? The reasons must exist: the Government would surely not want to add to the current legal remedies unless something required it to do so.

Ian Duguid: One of the most interesting features of the provisions is that involvement in serious organised crime will carry a maximum sentence of 10 years, whereas directing serious organised crime will carry a maximum sentence of 14 years. One therefore assumes that the bill’s drafters were concerned that persons who are in some way remote from involvement need to be picked up by the criminal law. I whole-heartedly agree with that proposition. If the bill’s aim is to get to the bigger perpetrators and to the people who direct involvement while remaining at arm’s length from crime, I wholly endorse it.

If the bill is trying to pursue persons who have a remote connection with serious organised crime, that is a perfectly laudable objective. That aspect of the provisions is well founded; the issue is whether enough care has been taken in the drafting and whether the bill will create more difficulties than it is trying to solve. Who is envisaged to be “involved in serious organised crime”?

Is it every person across the board?

Paul Martin: Do the other witnesses want to add to those comments?

Bill McVicar: I presume that the Government is attempting to draw attention to its concerns about serious organised crime. The common law would probably deal with most of the matters that are covered in sections 25 to 28.

The bill seems to provide for two separate issues. First, being involved in offences that are connected with serious organised crime should carry a heavier penalty. That is a laudable aim in its own right, and I have no difficulty with it. Secondly, the bill seems to introduce an offence of directing serious organised crime, which I suppose might be regarded as a new offence. I have not studied the matter in great detail, but the intention might be to add to the law of conspiracy and incitement to commit crime. If so, that is also a laudable aim.

In our submission we expressed concern that section 28, “Failure to report serious organised crime”, might be in conflict with article 8 of the European convention on human rights. We drew attention to a German case, which it might be worth considering in due course.

Paul Martin: The witnesses may take it as a compliment when I say that between them they have decades of experience in law. How would you define “serious organised crime”?

The Convener: Is that a question of which the witnesses would have preferred prior notice?

Paul Martin: What would the witnesses say is or is not serious organised crime?
Bill McVicar: The definition in section 25 appears reasonable, in that it draws attention to the fact that certain activities that go on should be regarded as more serious for future purposes. I suppose that the definition will cover activities such as drug dealing and people smuggling—although that is covered under different legislation—and the organisation of bank robberies, for example. The definition is fairly wide.

Paul Martin: Is the definition not as focused as it should be? Will it catch individuals who should not be caught? We heard about challenges in that regard during last week's meeting. For example, the Sheriffs Association suggested that two people who agreed to steal a meat pie would commit an offence that fell within the scope of the bill. Do you agree?

Alan McCreadie (Law Society of Scotland): I certainly think that the definition of "serious offence" as an indictable offence that is "committed with the intention of securing a material benefit for any person" is too wide and might need to be amended appropriately. I read the Official Report of last week's meeting, when the meat pie example came up. It is clear that it is not the intention of the Parliament—

Paul Martin: So you recognise that, as drafted, the legislation could result in the theft of a meat pie being categorised as a serious offence.

Alan McCreadie: As it stands, section 25 could be interpreted in that way.

Paul Martin: So the wording needs to be improved.

Alan McCreadie: I think that it has to be looked at.

Paul Martin: Do you have any views on the matter, Mr Duguid?

Ian Duguid: I have to say that, after looking at the bill's definition of serious offence and its reference to "material benefit", I am not sure that they cover, for example, a recent High Court case that I was involved in that involved eight paedophiles. That case was charged as a conspiracy, and one could not say that the offence itself was neither serious nor organised. The prosecution's case was extremely well investigated, presented and prosecuted, and it secured the conviction of people whose offence one would think should fall under the definition of serious organised crime. They were, after all, a group of paedophiles who were in contact with one another. I am simply not sure whether the aggravation set out in section 25 would really meet the case in which those individuals were involved.

Would the aggravation of serious organised crime have made any difference to the case? I do not think so. As anyone who listened to the evidence will appreciate, the offence was serious and organised, but it was charged and presented as a conspiracy. The case itself has not yet been resolved with regard to penalties, but I am not sure that it would fall within the scope of the definition in section 25. It presents an unusual difficulty for the drafters of the legislation.

Of course, that is only one example. The fact is that any paedophile ring will try to gain benefit, but only for its members' own corrupted pleasure. Even though most people would view it as serious organised crime, such an offence does not fall within the bill's definition.

Paul Martin: Do you therefore acknowledge that, although politicians talk about wanting to challenge serious organised crime, the fact is that we do not actually know what we mean by the phrase? The public and political view is that it is all to do with the Mr Bigs in the criminal underworld, but our challenge is to define the offence to ensure that we deal with those individuals.

Ian Duguid: I absolutely and fully appreciate the difficulties that you face. After all, you are the lawmakers: you pass the legislation and the courts simply apply the provisions. I also realise that it is difficult for drafters to include within a definition everything that can be envisaged, but you should ask yourself whether the common law already deals adequately and properly with these situations and whether, in that case, we require a statute that in some way restricts what should fall within the definition of serious organised crime.

Paul Martin: What are your views on the concerns expressed by High Court judges and the Sheriffs Association about the potentially very wide scope of the proposed offence of failing to report serious organised crime?

Ian Duguid: I share those concerns. Anyone who reads the press will know what such an offence might cover. It might, for example, cover the relatives of those charged with the terrorist offences prosecuted in London because they withheld information about the individuals' whereabouts and the plans. However, I do not know whether, under this broadly framed offence, other persons whose involvement might be more difficult to define are at risk of being prosecuted for something of that nature.

Alan McCreadie: On section 28, Mr McVicar referred earlier to the possibility of a challenge under article 8 of ECHR with regard to the individual's right to privacy. We cited the German case of Niemietz v Germany and I note a reference in section 28(1)(b) to envisage concerns policing the internet, but I have generated images. The difficulty that I can deal with such images, including computer - adult pornography. It is only proper that the law recognises that pseudo-images in cartoon form and constructed in images, including what are, I think, described as Government (Scotland) Act 1982 deals with concern about that. Section 52 of the Civic extended to extreme adult pornography? to deal with that type of child pornography be sexually abusive way. Should any future proposals and drawings that graphically depict children in a there has been consultation on how the law should operate in compliance with article 6 of ECHR. If is correct. It appears from proposed new section 271N(4)(c) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, which says “that the witness” should not be “asked questions of any specified description that might lead to the identification of the witness”. One can consider cases in which difficulties might arise from the fact that a witness might have viewed an image in their house and in some cases it is difficult to know whether what the witness says is correct. It appears from proposed new section 271N(4)(c) that the defence would not be allowed to explore that avenue with a witness if it seemed appropriate. I wonder whether that subsection operates in compliance with article 6 of ECHR. If one is not able to explore properly the defence, there is at least a possibility that the right to a fair trial will be denied.
Bill Butler: Is that a continuing worry for you?

Bill McVicar: It is a concern that we mentioned in our written submission and which I mention now with particular reference to proposed new section 271N(4)(c). It might be that if we sat and thought about it more a few other bits and pieces would arise, but the concern might be met by the fact that the court would then prevent the trial from proceeding further if it were based on a fundamental extent on that witness’s evidence.

Bill Butler: So there is possibly a need for amendment of that provision.

Bill McVicar: There is, but I do not know how one would go about it. We will be asked to think about amendments later on.

Bill Butler: Indeed—that is why I asked you the question in that particular fashion. There is a possible need for amendment.

Bill McVicar: Yes.

Bill Butler: That is clear. Thank you.

The Convener: We will follow that up in due course. Nigel Don will now ask about disclosure of evidence.

Nigel Don: Gentlemen, I wonder whether we can start not with disclosure of evidence as such, but with defence statements and their mandatory nature or otherwise in solemn cases. The Law Society has indicated clearly that it is against them; does Ian Duguid have any comments to make?

Ian Duguid: I am very much against defence statements.

Nigel Don: Do you feel a need to expand on that?

Ian Duguid: If I understand correctly, the committee that was chaired by Lord Coulsfield, from whom you will no doubt hear more today, did not recommend that defence statements be introduced. They are a concept that is particular to the law of England and Wales and are required there because they do not have the procedures that we have: for example, if it is planned that a special defence will be advanced in the course of a trial, it is required that that be intimated to the prosecution 14 days before the preliminary hearing. The defence statement provision relates to that very same requirement. If it is suggested that a defence such as self-defence, alibi or incrimination will be promoted, notice is required. Our procedures include a preliminary hearing at which the admissibility of evidence is addressed.

All such measures were introduced in 2004, following Lord Bonomy’s High Court reforms. We have gone some way towards addressing the issues that defence statements were designed to address in England—I read in Lord Coulsfield’s report that they were intended to assist in case management. We have such measures, so I am curious as to whether a defence statement will do anything over and above what we have, other than increase expenditure. If lawyers are going to commit themselves to a document that will be read to a jury and which, if it is not followed, will be the subject of comment by a trial judge, that process will—I presume—incur expense. Is any of it necessary? I was interested to hear that Lord Coulsfield thought that, on balance, it was not, perhaps for the reasons that I outlined. He can explain that more fully.

I am not sure how the measure found its way into the bill. I suspect that it is there because prosecutors think that they would be further assisted. We must ask ourselves whether the measure is necessary to address disclosure matters. I understand that the purpose of the defence statement is to ensure that, if the Crown has disclosed information and possesses further information, it will feel an obligation to disclose that.

Nigel Don: I think that that is the logic.

Ian Duguid: That situation should not arise under the present system. As I said, the system requires notification of a special defence and the holding of preliminary hearings, which do not apply in England and Wales. We can see why the idea was thought to be good for England and Wales, although Lord Coulsfield says that the statements have been found in general to be “late, unspecific and unhelpful.”

I do not know how the provision would advance the procedure of disclosure. It would create a further tier that would be likely to delay trials and to cost money through the need for additional hearings and for documents to be drafted. I find nothing in the provision that persuades me that Lord Coulsfield’s conclusion is unfounded. In fact, I thought, rather, that his approach and decision were well argued.

Nigel Don: Thank you for distinguishing eloquently between the two legal systems.

I will drag you on to the subject of disclosure. Disclosure is well established and is probably well understood, so I will draw you on to the provisions on non-disclosure. Are you concerned about whether the non-disclosure processes in the bill are compatible with the ECHR?

Bill McVicar: I understand that Lord Coulsfield proposed a relatively informal process of including information on schedules and inviting lawyers to consider whether they would want as a matter of right to see further information that had not been disclosed. However, the provisions in the bill are terribly complicated and they might—
Unfortunately—complicate the system more than is necessary. The bill adopts more or less wholesale an English system that does not necessarily sit well with our procedures. That is not a criticism of the English system—the English do things differently from us—but that system would not fit terribly well with our procedures. I do not know whether the proposed special counsel system for hiding information from the defence—that is what it will come down to if the rules are enacted—is compatible with human rights.

Before I have no more opportunity to speak, I will return to defence statements. Among other provisions, subsection (6)(b) of proposed new section 70A of the 1995 act says that a “defence statement” means a statement that sets out “any matters of fact on which the accused takes issue with the prosecution and the reason for doing so”.

However, 14 days before a preliminary hearing or first diet in the sheriff court, we do not always know the facts that the prosecution will seek to establish. It is difficult to know how the defence will be able to deal with a requirement to set out “matters of fact on which the accused takes issue with the prosecution”.

Furthermore—others have said this and I agree—the danger is that, if the accused has to set things out in the detail that seems to be envisaged, their right to silence will be undermined.

Nigel Don: Does the Law Society or the Faculty of Advocates have other concerns on the law of disclosure?

Ian Duguid: No. I recognise that some provisions are necessary. Special counsel, which deals with public interest immunity, is, in a sense, an import from England. I recognise that the matter will have to be addressed in some shape or form. However, there are some questions. Are the proposals balanced? Do they take account of the need for disclosure, which—in statutory form—is appreciated and recognised? Also, are there enough safeguards for withholding of information? Clearly, there will be situations when the information will have to be withheld in the public interest. Some framework has to be provided for that situation.

Nigel Don: I am sure that we will hear a lot more about that.

I turn to witness statements and whether witnesses can refer to the written statements that they or others have made before the trial. Again, the matter appears to be contentious. Will you draw out the arguments or express an opinion on the subject?

Ian Duguid: I am totally against those provisions. Members of the constabulary are concerned about the onus that will be placed on them in taking statements. One probably has to be in practice in our courts to appreciate the frequency with which witness statements are placed in front of witnesses, either because they have forgotten that they gave one and want to see it again, or because they are giving evidence that is different from what is in the statement. Establishing whether the police officer noted correctly the statement can become a challenge.

The proposal is that, before a witness starts his evidence, he should have his statement placed in front of him. Will the accused be able to challenge a witness’s credibility and reliability if the witness simply says, “I’ve said it before, so I’m saying it again. There you are”? The situation could become difficult to monitor accurately.

I am not suggesting that police officers routinely make up witness accounts. However, the bill makes no provision for the witnesses for the accused person—the defence witnesses. Usually, what is defined as a statement is what a police officer has recorded. A police officer does not have a recording facility; he meets the witness and writes down what he thinks that they said. In a rather obscure and odd way, the Scottish courts recognise that account as an admissible statement. However, if one sends a legally qualified solicitor to interview a witness for the defence and he does the same exercise, it is called a precognition, which is inadmissible in accordance with the practice of the courts.

The difficulty immediately arises that the prosecution is placed at an extreme advantage over the defence. The question arises whether the provision will ever be sustained as a matter of fairness to the accused. If prosecution witnesses can have a statement in front of them and read it out, and defence witnesses have no such facility, is that a recognition that defence witnesses are in a different position to prosecution witnesses? Of course it is not.

There is nothing in the bill to address that glaringly obvious difference. Of course, the difference has been brought about because of a recognition by the courts that, when a police officer takes a witness’s account, it is a police statement and that, when another person takes a witness account, it is a precognition. The difference is that the court can admit a police statement but not a precognition. Until that difference is addressed, we will sometimes have to try to justify the most ridiculous descriptions. It is said, I suppose, that police officers routinely write down what a witness says. However, police officers, like everybody else, try to paraphrase that so that it does not take an age to complete.
It is a very difficult situation, which, in practice, creates a lot of difficulties for lawyers. The bill’s provisions go nowhere near addressing that difficulty; rather, they will compound the difficulty and the difference between prosecution witnesses and defence witnesses. Unless some facility is introduced to deal with defence witnesses, I cannot see that the provisions will make for fairness to the accused in a trial.

Nigel Don: You have made an excellent case for the defence. Thank you.

Ian Duguid: I did not mean to.

The Convener: There is no need to go any further. You do not need to oversell a good case.

Bill McVicar: I respectfully agree with what Mr Duguid says. I also refer you to what the judges say in paragraphs 43 and 44 of their written submission:

“The Scottish system has traditionally looked with disfavour on the practice of ‘trial by prior statement’.”

They subsequently address the points that Mr Duguid has made and conclude that “As police officers become aware of the greater reliance on evidence contained within police statements, it might affect the manner in which police officers take statements from civilian witnesses”.

You might think that that is a good thing, but the judges continue that that would result “in a further emphasis being placed on framing the statement in clear and comprehensible terms—whatever language may have been used by the witness when the statement was taken.”

The problem is that the statement will not be the words of the witness. Having asked witnesses countless times about the statements that they have given to the police and whether what is contained in those statements is right, I can say that, unless almost every witness in the universe is telling lies about it, the police tend not to write down exactly what the witness has said.

The Convener: I think that that is the practicality of it. The final question is on unfitness for trial.

Bill Butler: Although the written submission from the Law Society generally welcomes the provisions on mental disorder and unfitness for trial, it suggests some changes, including that a volitional test be added to the cognitive test. What changes would you like to be made and why?

Bill McVicar: Rather than unfitness for trial, we are talking about the defence that is presently described as insanity. We suggest that the definition in the bill is too narrow. As our written submission states:

“To frame the defence of mental disorder solely on a cognitive test rooted in the accused’s appreciation of the effects of his or her conduct at the time of the offence does not adequately reflect the variety of ways in which a person’s mental disorder might impact on his or her actions ... Adding the volitional test to the cognitive test would ... more closely reflect the established common law of Scotland and would more appropriately define the situations in which a person should be relieved of criminal responsibility as a result of the effects of mental disorder.”

That would not have the same effect with regard to a person’s fitness for trial.

Our submission continues:

“For example, a person who kills his or her children while suffering from a depressive illness may be able to appreciate what he/she is doing and understand that it is wrong in the eyes of the law, but nonetheless be driven to commit the crime by his or her illness. In such a case his or her illness overcomes his or her volition. The Society notes that the Bill does not allow a special defence in these circumstances.”

Mental disorders and the law are not comfortable bedfellows in many situations, and it is difficult to find even a couple of doctors who agree about anything in the criminal courts. We are concerned that, if the bill focuses too narrowly on the understanding of the accused person, we may miss cases in which the medical doctors regard a person as being, under the present law, insane.

Angela Constance: I agree with the Law Society’s suggestion and I note that the Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland makes a similar point in its written submission.

I want to ask about the thorny issue of people with a sole diagnosis of a psychopathic personality disorder. As things stand, the defence of mental disorder would not apply to those individuals. That is quite right, but I understand that other personality disorders could give rise to the defence of mental disorder. What are the general views of panel members on that? In its submission, the Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland expresses concern about and looks for further clarification on that. It states:

“The Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003 ... Definition provides that a ‘mental disorder means any illness, personality disorder, or learning disability how ever caused or manifested’.

Ian Duguid: I cannot remember what the question was.

Angela Constance: In essence, I am saying that individuals with the sole diagnosis of a psychopathic personality disorder could not claim the defence of having a mental disorder, but people with other personality disorders could claim that defence. Do you, as legal practitioners, have any issues with that?

Ian Duguid: I recognise that I have no expertise in that matter. I do not think that I have any expertise in it beyond that which members of the committee have. As Mr McVicar said, experience... suggests that the law and mental health are difficult to reconcile. I suppose that in the defence of serious crimes, one investigates individuals with mental illnesses, mental disorders and personality disorders. In many ways, practitioners are guided by what the experts say, and I do not think that anyone involved in the law ever tries to intrude on their expertise.

I do not think that I will add anything to the committee’s deliberations by trying to answer the question. Angela Constance is right: personality disorders are sometimes difficult to define and name. You are right to express concern if a problem is being established with people with psychopathic personality disorders and other personality disorders, but psychiatrists can probably best explain the differences and how they affect the workings of an individual’s mind and their responsibility for criminal acts, for instance. Obviously, the bill addresses the commission of serious criminal acts.

I suspect that I have talked around your question without answering it. It would probably be better to ask an expert such as a psychiatrist the question.

Angela Constance: Okay. Perhaps I should ask a more specific legal question.

Section 117 in part 7 of the bill proposes to insert new section 51A(2) into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. That new section states:

“But a person does not lack criminal responsibility for such conduct if the mental disorder in question consists only of a personality disorder which is characterised solely or principally by abnormally aggressive or seriously irresponsible conduct.”

The Scottish Association for Mental Health has asked for a definition of “abnormally aggressive or seriously irresponsible conduct.”

As legal practitioners, do you think that a further definition of a psychopathic personality disorder is needed?

Ian Duguid: Examples must be given if the definition is to be enhanced. If the examples are not exhaustive—if you ask any expert, I think you will find that they will not be—it becomes difficult to expand on that definition.

I offer the example of a case that I was involved in quite recently. A young boy ended up killing another young boy by stabbing him in the course of a fight. However, in the days before the fight, the young boy who committed the stabbing had been climbing up on the top of buildings and threatening to throw himself off, had been jumping through the glass partitions of bus shelters, and had been throwing himself at shop windows. Not surprisingly, we consulted a psychiatrist to see what sort of difficulty he had. The psychiatrist described it not even as a personality disorder but as a behavioural disorder, which is less serious. You and I would regard it as seriously odd and extreme behaviour, but it does not come within what the law would require. However, it is right that if you are talking about serious crime and about people who are not fully responsible for their acts, the test must be made comparatively high. In the case of insanity, if you are dealing with people who not only are not responsible but are suffering from a genuine mental illness, that has to be identifiable in the clearest of situations.

Ms Constance is asking me whether the definition in the bill requires expansion: I suspect that that could be done only by giving a limited number of examples. However, unless a psychiatrist could say that the list was exhaustive, I am not sure that the attempted refinement would improve the situation.

Angela Constance: Thank you. I understand.

The Convener: Have you anything to add, Mr McVicar?

Bill McVicar: Not that I could properly set out in comprehensible language.

The Convener: As there seem to be no further questions for this panel of witnesses, I thank the gentlemen very much indeed for their attendance. That was a very useful session.

On resuming—

The Convener: Our second panel of witnesses comprises Professor Jim Fraser, who is the director of the centre for forensic science at the University of Strathclyde, and Tom Nelson, who is the director of forensic services with the Scottish Police Services Authority. I should mention by means of introduction that, at the request of the Scottish Government, Professor Fraser reviewed and reported on the operation and effectiveness of Scotland’s statutory regime governing the acquisition and retention of DNA and fingerprint data. He reported in July last year.

Welcome to the committee, gentlemen. I do not think that we need detain you too long. We will move straight to questions.

Bill Butler: Good morning, gentlemen. In light of the ruling by the European Court of Human Rights in the case of S and Marper v the United Kingdom, do the proposals in the bill on the retention of fingerprint and DNA data achieve an appropriate balance between law enforcement and the rights of individuals?

Professor Jim Fraser (University of Strathclyde): Yes, I think they do. The main issue relates to the retention of samples from unconvicted people. Proportionality is a tricky issue, because there are not many data to allow detailed analysis. However, when I considered the three-year period, the available data showed that a considerable number of people reoffended during the period. That was a fairly short period, and the study related to serious offences, so the retention struck me as reasonable and balanced.

Bill Butler: Even in cases in which people were prosecuted but not convicted?

Professor Fraser: Yes. The situation seems to conform with S and Marper. The issue in England and Wales was not so much about the right to retain the data of someone who was unconvicted as about the right to retain the data indefinitely. The UK Government argued that the evidence base gave it the right to retain data indefinitely, but that argument was rejected by the European court.

Bill Butler: And any extension would have to be agreed by a sheriff, rather like what happens with a risk of sexual harm order. Is that a fair comparison?

Professor Fraser: A chief constable has the right to ask a sheriff, on the basis of evidence, for an extension of two years. That is a recurrent right; the chief constable can go back and ask for it again. The key point is that there is a legal process, so there is an expectation that evidence will be presented and independently assessed. Those things were missing in S and Marper.

Tom Nelson (Scottish Police Services Authority): I agree with Professor Fraser. The way forward that is being proposed for Scotland is supported by what is coming out of the European court. Scotland is held in very high regard because of how we manage and retain samples on the database. I do not think that we have any fears in that area.

Bill Butler: Thank you for those clear answers.

Stewart Maxwell: Good morning, gentlemen. What is your view of the difference between people who have committed an offence and been sent to jail, and whose DNA has been retained, and people who have accepted an alternative to prosecution, such as a fiscal fine, and whose DNA has not been retained?

Professor Fraser: I did not form a strong view on that; from recollection, it was not part of my terms of reference. The issue of direct disposals came up, and was referred to in my report, but I did not feel that I had the data to make any real sense of that. It strikes me that the purpose of such disposals is the speedy administration of justice. That purpose had not previously taken DNA into account, and I felt that the issue merited more research and more consideration, so I did not express a view.

Tom Nelson: Again, I agree with Jim Fraser. An opportunity may have been missed; we need to be careful, and more work is needed. If more cases take the road of alternatives to prosecution, I will be concerned about losing opportunities to get people's DNA profile and check it against the DNA database. A lot more work needs to be done in this area.

Stewart Maxwell: Do you mean that a lot more work needs to be done to prove the case for retention? Do you accept that it is illogical that DNA is retained in some cases but not in others?

Tom Nelson: I honestly believe that, if we do not have the opportunity to check against the DNA database samples from cases that are dealt with by fixed-penalty notices and fiscal fines, we will miss the opportunity to get matches on the database. We need to view that as a risk to our system.

The Convener: For the uninitiated, can you indicate the cost of taking and storing a DNA sample?

Tom Nelson: There is a cost, but I do not have the figure to hand. It includes the cost of police involvement and the purchase of the swab. At our laboratory in Dundee, there are up to 30 freezers full of samples, so storing samples in the most appropriate way is a significant issue.

The Convener: I will pursue the matter in a different direction.

Paul Martin: I want to return to the previous question and to relate it to the issue of fighting and preventing crime. Mr Nelson, did you make the point that we have an opportunity to prevent individuals who are subject to fiscal fines from committing violent crimes at a later stage?

Tom Nelson: That is the point that I hoped to make. At the end of the day, we know that people have a career in criminal activity. The more intervention we can have earlier on, the better we can assist those individuals, so that they do not become repeat or recidivist offenders. We have an opportunity to help people at an earlier stage.

Paul Martin: Politicians say that they want to get tough on crime and the causes of crime, and to prevent crime. You are suggesting that, by retaining more samples, we could prevent some crimes from taking place in the first place and save resources in the long term.

Tom Nelson: We must look at both sides. We also need to support the people concerned, to help them to leave the career path that they are on. However, if we do not have their samples on a database, we will not be able to detect their involvement in crimes and the public’s fear of crime will increase.

Paul Martin: Some concerns have been expressed about the proposal to allow the retention of fingerprint and DNA data from children who are dealt with through the children’s hearings system. Why should samples from children who have not been prosecuted in the criminal courts be retained?

Professor Fraser: I was asked specifically to look at that issue, which is complex. It is made especially complex by the particular status of children’s hearings, which are not criminal hearings. Nonetheless, I was asked to consider whether there was potential benefit in taking samples from children.

Before I discuss the data, I will comment on the consultation responses. As far as I recall, only one individual objected in principle to taking samples from children. Almost everyone else who responded to the consultation thought that there was some merit in sampling in certain cases, as long as it was balanced in some way and was limited to serious offences. The consultation took place before the case of S and Marper v the United Kingdom was decided by the European Court of Human Rights, and proportionality was a key issue. The general tenor of the responses that I received—from a wide range of organisations—was that the taking of samples from children was legitimate, provided that a balance was struck between infringing on the children’s justice system in Scotland and public protection.

The data that I obtained related more to the management of the Scottish Children’s Reporter Administration, so I did not have detailed criminological data. However, it was quite plain that the vast majority of the cohort of children who were dealt with by children’s panels—something like two thirds of them—were referred not for an offence but for their own protection or for some other problem. Only about a third of the children were referred for an offence of some kind. Of those, a smaller proportion were referred for serious sexual and violent offences. Those figures relate to what the children were reported for, which was not necessarily what was found by the children’s panel or the sheriff. We are talking about very small numbers of children.

In summary, I found that there was general agreement that a small group of those children plainly had the potential to commit violent offences and to develop a criminal career. My aim was to try to identify that small group of children. My recommendation was that a sample should be retained if the child accepted that he had committed, or was found by a sheriff to have committed, an offence in the narrow category of serious sexual and violent offences.

Because the numbers involved are small, and because the offences are serious and involve some sort of judicial proceedings—that is, some process whereby the child is represented—I feel that the recommendation strikes a good balance between looking after the welfare of the very small number of children involved and public protection.

Tom Nelson: I support Jim Fraser’s words. We cannot get away from the fact that, although only a small number of people are involved, some within that age group will commit serious offences. The statistics from the database show that those who are aged 17 and under account for just over 3 per cent of the database entries but are responsible for 15 per cent of crime scene matches. They account for a very small percentage, but they are obviously active.

Paul Martin: For clarity, let me summarise the points that have been made. The data would be retained to identify people at an earlier stage of their criminal career both to prevent that criminal behaviour from continuing and to protect the public, who could be affected by that behaviour in the longer term. Is that a fair reflection of what has been said?

Professor Fraser: Let me just add one point. Tom Nelson referred to matches, which are the measured outputs from the database. However, there are some subtleties of interpretation in deciding whether a match becomes a detection and then a conviction. It is important that the data are seen for what they are. A match will not necessarily lead to the resolution of a criminal offence or to someone being convicted in court. However, I accept that general argument as a good summary.

Robert Brown: Taking the slightly opposite end of that argument, I want to ask whether Professor Fraser believes that the stamping of children as criminals by their DNA is actually a good thing. The background to my question is that the definition in proposed new section 18B(6) of the 1995 act—which section 59 of the bill would insert—refers to “such relevant sexual offence or relevant violent offence as the Scottish Ministers may by order … prescribe.”

That definition could cover not just the serious offences that have been mentioned but any sexual or violent offence, which—we should bear in mind—could go from, at one extreme, murder to, at the other extreme, a punch on the nose. Is that definition sufficiently proportionate in dealing with children under the bill?

Professor Fraser: My intention in the recommendations was certainly not that a punch on the nose would ever merit sampling. I very much tried to identify those children who not only had committed violent or sexual offences but might go on to commit further offences. That brings in the issue of public protection. However, I do not think that such children would be stigmatised or criminalised by the retention of their DNA. If they were criminalised, the judgment would be made either by the children’s panel or by a sheriff. The DNA sample would be taken after that and would be retained only in certain cases. Again, I think that the argument comes down to the numbers involved and the proportionality of the measures.

Angela Constance: You made a number of recommendations in your report that did not require legislation. For example, you made suggestions about governance arrangements for fingerprint and DNA databases. What progress has been made in implementing those recommendations?

Professor Fraser: I can speak only generally on that issue. I only know that a committee has been formed to consider governance arrangements and how the outputs from the database can be measured. Tom Nelson might be in a better position to reply.

Tom Nelson: The committee has been set up. Its first meeting will be in June, and it will consider governance and reporting and how we can meet the standards in James Fraser’s report.

Within the Scottish Police Services Authority, we already manage other databases, such as the criminal history system. We will use people within our organisation to ensure that the same standards that apply to the other databases apply to the DNA and fingerprint database.

The Convener: As there are no further questions, I thank you for your attendance, gentlemen. The session has been brief but valuable.

On resuming—

The Convener: Our next witness is the right hon Lord Coulsfield. The issue of disclosure has caused some excitement in Scottish legal circles, Lord Coulsfield is the author of the “Review of the Law and Practice of Disclosure in Criminal Proceedings in Scotland”, which has been of great assistance to us.

Welcome to the committee, Lord Coulsfield. We will proceed straight to questions.

Your written submission suggests that it would be useful to set out the prosecution’s duty of disclosure at the beginning of the relevant part of the bill. How would you improve the bill to that extent?

Right Hon Lord Coulsfield: As I hope you might have gathered from my written submission, I do not criticise the general approach of the bill in most areas, but I am extremely concerned about the way in which it has been drafted, particularly with regard to the length and complication of proceedings.

You might have seen in today’s Herald Mr Gordon Meldrum of the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency complaining about the potential bureaucratic implications of the bill. In one sense, that is not a well-founded complaint, because the work that will have been done on disclosure already has to be done. The general requirement of disclosing information to allow a fair trial to take place is a requirement that derives from the ECHR and, indeed, our own legal history, going back to the 17th century—even if we did not have the ECHR, courts would still have to grapple with the issue of fair trial. In modern conditions, where so much depends on background investigation, intelligence, the accumulation of detail and scientific evidence, achieving a fair trial in any circumstances requires the prosecution to tell the defence what it knows, whether that helps the prosecution or not.

In that sense, any complaint about work for the police must be regarded with a little care. However, given that there is such a duty on the police, it is extremely important that the ordinary serving officer knows in a clear, direct and simple form what they are supposed to do. That can be reduced to quite simple terms because, essentially, they are required to scrutinise the evidence as they get it and ask whether it will help the prosecution, and also whether it could help the defence, in which case they must record and disclose it.

I am concerned that the drafting of the bill tends to obscure that simple duty. I know that the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland has taken up the issue of ensuring that ordinary front-line officers know what they are supposed to do, and is setting up extensive training arrangements, under the supervision of Detective Chief Inspector Laurie, who worked with me on the report. My concern is that the drafting of the bill does not assist the police in fulfilling the obligation.
The Convener: Suppose the bill was passed in its present form. Could you conceive of difficulties in respect of appeals to the court of criminal appeal and, possibly, to Europe on the basis that the wording did not make the obligation clear?

Lord Coulsfield: I am not sure that I can envisage appeals to Europe, but I can certainly envisage a lot of procedural wrangling at the preliminary and, perhaps, trial stages of cases in Scotland.

Contrary to what I intended, the bill introduces a statutory requirement on the police to prepare schedules, which they should give to the procurator fiscal—there are provisions about handing them back and forward and changing them—and the procurator fiscal is statutorily required to hand over schedules to the defence. I can see a lot of scope for wrangling about whether the police have performed their statutory function, before we even get to the question of disclosure by the prosecution to the defence.

The Convener: The provisions seem to be a trifle convoluted. Is there scope for making them simpler, so that they can be more readily understood and the administrative wrangles that you mention can be avoided? For example, could the terminology that is used for the various types of orders—non-disclosure, exclusion and non-notification—be improved upon, and could some of the detail in that part of the bill be dealt with elsewhere in the bill?

Lord Coulsfield: It could certainly be dealt with elsewhere; my view is that a lot of it should not be in the bill at all.

In the report, I made the point that although I recommended the set-up that involves schedules and orders, I do not like it. The criticism that the set-up is cumbersome and convoluted is sound. One ought to have as simple a way of carrying out the task as possible.

The preparation of schedules and so on is only a mechanism to enable the fundamental duty of the disclosure of material evidence to be carried out. As a mechanism, it ought not to be in the bill at all. If anything, it should be in a code of practice that can be agreed. Of course, the Procurator Fiscal Service already has a disclosure manual, which is, to a certain extent, agreed with the police. The requirements should be in a code of practice, because then they can be changed. One hopes that, with time and experience of the disclosure mechanism, the situation will become easier and less fraught.

As I said earlier, fundamentally, the obligation on the police is a simple one. You do not want to confuse that situation with any more detailed rules about what is or is not disclosable. You do not want to divert police officers from thinking about the case in front of them by getting them to look up section 27 or paragraph 35 in a book to find out whether a particular piece of information is subject to disclosure. You want them to understand that, as police officers, they have a duty to consider not only what evidence helps the Crown case but what evidence might be material to the defence case.

I mentioned Detective Chief Inspector Laurie who, as I understand it, is now in charge of preparing training programmes for the police. He has continually made the point that it is a question of good policing; we are not talking about an extra requirement. A good police officer who carries out his duty properly will always be alive to the proposition that he may come across evidence that favours the defence. It is sound policing to note such evidence and to refer to it in information that is passed on.

When it comes to orders, you will appreciate from my report that I have deep concerns about some of the procedures for withholding information from the defence. In my view, issues to do with orders, such as the procedure for making them, the terms of orders and what kind of orders can be made, should all properly be found in subordinate legislation, because one hopes that, with experience, it will be possible to simplify and improve the procedure, so it should be easy to change.

The Convener: Robert Brown has a question, although, to an extent, you have anticipated it.

Robert Brown: You have made it clear that the present provisions are extremely elaborate. That is emphasised by the fact that part 6 runs to 15 pages. You have suggested that a code of practice would be a better way of tackling disclosure. Do you envisage taking most of part 6 out of the bill and replacing it with your statement of principle and a reference to the code of practice?

Lord Coulsfield: What I suggested in my submission is not necessarily a fully considered piece of drafting, but it sets out what I regard to be the essential principle that must be included in the bill. If that principle is set out, I do not think that sections 85 to 90 are necessary. They could be replaced by one or possibly two fairly short and simple sections.

Robert Brown: There has been a bit of coming and going on defence statements, on which the Government takes a different approach. Do you retain the view that, in most cases, defence statements are not advantageous from the point of view of equity and fairness? If so, how do you anticipate the provisions on defence statements operating in practice if they remain mandatory? What difficulties do you envisage that causing?

Lord Coulsfield: I have not heard any argument that has led me to change the view that I expressed in my report, which is that defence statements are unnecessary in our procedure. Mr Duguid talked about the disadvantage of what is proposed and I think that, essentially, I agree with what he said. The defence statement provisions will add an extra stage of work and expense.

One of the problems of criminal trials is getting people to concentrate on getting on with the evidence. Given that the defence statement is supposed to state any facts that the defence challenges, an advocate depute who was presenting a case and who was not quite sure what to do next might, instead of getting on with the case, be tempted to say, "Why didn’t you say that in your defence statement? What did you really mean by your defence statement?" People might get into a sterile argument about terminology, just as happens, in some cases, with prosecution statements.

Requiring the preparation of defence statements would have a cost in time and expense, and they could cause confusion and delay and add to complexity in the conduct of trials.

Robert Brown: There would also be a loss of focus on what it is all about.

Lord Coulsfield: Yes.

Stewart Maxwell: Are you saying that the Bonomy reforms should be left as they are?

Lord Coulsfield: I have not had the occasion to think about whether the Bonomy reforms as such need to be changed. The issue goes further back than Bonomy, of course. As Mr Duguid or Mr McVicar said, from a very early date Scottish procedure has required certain defences to be stated in advance of a trial as special defences: insanity, alibi, mental disturbance, self defence and so on. England never had any such requirement, and books about English criminal procedure are always talking about the problem of ambush defences—for example, when the defence suddenly produces a witness who says, "The accused wasn’t there", and the prosecution has had no notice of that. In so far as the defence statement procedure has any benefit in England, it is as a means of catching up with the arrangements that we have had for centuries in requiring certain defences to be specified.

The Bonomy reforms carried the approach further, because they provided a procedure that gives every opportunity for such defences, and points about the admissibility of evidence and so on, to be brought out and considered in advance of the trial. I cannot see how a general requirement to have defence statements will add anything.

Stewart Maxwell: Are the proposed procedures on non-notification orders compatible with ECHR?

Lord Coulsfield: With any luck, we will have a much clearer idea about that by the end of the month. In March, the House of Lords in England heard a case that is concerned not with criminal prosecutions but with control orders under terrorism legislation, under which there is a procedure for the use of special counsel to consider information that is thought not to be suitable for public disclosure. The bill envisages the same sort of procedure, and the same sort of problem might arise. Special counsel were employed in the case and the Court of Appeal, by divided decision—two to one—held that the use of special counsel was compatible with ECHR article 6. The decision was appealed to the Lords, and a decision is expected in the next two or three weeks—I made an effort to get a hint of what the decision might be, but I am afraid that I was not successful.

Stewart Maxwell: Perhaps we should wait, too.

Lord Coulsfield: The issue has been highly controversial and has generated a great amount of academic writing as well as discussion in court decisions. Widely differing views have been held.

If we are asking ourselves whether the proposed system would be compatible with ECHR, the response must be that the system as it has been operating in England has so far survived all the challenges that have been made to it, but one cannot say whether it will continue to do so.

Stewart Maxwell: At our meeting last week, witnesses from ACPOS put forward a strong case that the proposed disclosure regime will create an enormous additional workload and told us how many extra officers or non-uniformed staff would have to be set aside to deal with each case. You suggested that you did not agree with that view. Is there a difference between what the police currently do and what they would have to do under the new regime? Would there be an additional workload? If so, can it be quantified?

Lord Coulsfield: I do not believe that the passing of the legislation will increase the workload. I hope that, with the passage of time, the legislation and the practice under it will reduce the workload or at least make it easier for the police—as they get into the work and get the appropriate training—to perform their duties.

What creates the workload is the existing requirement to ascertain and disclose all material that might be helpful to the defence, to use a broad terminology. I hope that legislation of the kind that I recommend will make it easier for the police because it will clarify in their minds what their job is. I cannot see that there is any way in which the obligation can be fulfilled without a system of back-up and recording, which leads one back to schedules, unless somebody can think of something better.

Stewart Maxwell: Last week, we heard evidence from the police that, when such a system was introduced in England, it led to an exponential increase in the workload of police officers and forces that are involved in investigations. Why are the police arguing that the workload will increase? You said that you do not agree.

Lord Coulsfield: There was a massive increase in the English workload, but not because of the system that was introduced. The increase was due to the decisions in three European cases, which told the police that they had to ascertain, record and report the information. I do not deny that there was a massive increase in the workload in England, as there has been in Scotland. I have every sympathy with the police when they complain about the burdens on them and the difficulty of performing their duties, but those burdens arise as a result of the interpretation of the requirements of article 6 by the European Court. I will qualify that. We tend to blame the European convention on human rights for a lot of things, but as I think I said earlier, under modern conditions the courts and Parliament have to face up to the question of how to secure a fair trial, given the nature and quantity of the information that is involved in a major investigation, and it is difficult to see how that could be done without a considerable investment of time, energy and money by the police.

Stewart Maxwell: Is it fair to say that the bill just provides a framework for what is supposed to happen?

Lord Coulsfield: Yes. As I said, I do not think that the bill is particularly good at providing a clear framework and I would like it to be improved, but the idea is certainly to provide a structure. The police accept that they will have to do what is proposed. If the structure works and police officers are properly trained, that should improve the police's capacity to deal with the burdens that certainly arise as a result of the disclosure requirements.

Paul Martin: Earlier, we heard evidence from Mr Duguid about the quality of the witness statements that the police prepare and provide. Should we consider using information technology more effectively and perhaps using audio or video recording to improve the quality of witness statements?

Lord Coulsfield: I could talk for quite a long time about statements and the way in which modern practice has made them much more important than they were when I started in practice in 1960. Criminal practice has changed since I first appeared in the criminal courts, which was prior to criminal legal aid. For my first case, I got a copy of the indictment just before I got on the train to Glasgow and I saw my client when I arrived at the High Court; we then went into court and started the trial. Statements were virtually unknown then and it was certainly unknown for people to be referred to them. The assumption then was that we assembled our witnesses and went in, and what mattered was what the witnesses said at the trial. However, practice has changed materially since then.

I listened to Mr Duguid’s earlier evidence. He made a particular point when he was answering, I think, Mr Martin, which I want to pick up. One of the reasons for having a provision for witnesses to see their statements is that of fairness to the witness. It has become common practice for a witness to give their evidence in chief, then to be asked questions along the lines of, “Did you say this?” or, “Have you ever said that?” or, “Did you tell a police officer the next thing?” Of course, currently, the questioner has the advantage of having the statement, but the witness has no such advantage, because they have never seen the statement. The witness can perhaps remember talking to a police officer, but they do not know what the officer recorded.

Paul Martin: But the quality of information that the police provide could be improved. We live in a video age, with YouTube and so on.

Lord Coulsfield: One of the ways of improving the quality of police information is by placing more emphasis on something that is already part of police training, which is that—I think that somebody referred to this earlier—they should, so far as possible, write down the witness’s actual words. I rather doubt whether video recording would help. We must remember that quite a lot of statements are taken, for example, at eleven o’clock at night on Sauchiehall Street, with a number of people standing—

Paul Martin: Police headcams record such situations. You made a point about resources, but surely we could improve best use of resources to record properly what was said.

Lord Coulsfield: I do not know whether a video camera of some kind could be used in that way, because I have not looked at the issue. However, I know that Lothians and Borders Police is experimenting with a notebook that is essentially a personal digital assistant—perhaps you have heard about that experiment. The advantage of using the PDA, of course, is that it records what the police officer writes on it—I am told that officers’ handwriting has greatly improved since they started using that sort of thing—in blocks of text that are locked in after 10 words or so and cannot be changed. If a witness says that they want to correct what they said, the officer must write “Witness corrects the statement” and so on. It seems to me that that has potential for making a big improvement in the quality of police statements.

Nigel Don: Thank you, Lord Coulsfield, for your comment about the ECHR and the upcoming House of Lords decision. Can I ask you whether a House of Lords decision is now as relevant as it undoubtedly once was, or whether, if we are looking for a view on what the ECHR really means, we need a European Court of Justice decision? Obviously, a House of Lords decision is a statement of the view of the House of Lords and is therefore binding where it is binding, but does it actually give us a definitive answer these days?

Lord Coulsfield: No. You are perfectly right that, for some questions at least, the European Court of Justice is the final court. There is still an area of coming and going between Europe and the supreme courts of the various jurisdictions, because, while the European Court essentially interprets the European convention on human rights, the interpretation of domestic law is a matter for the supreme court, which in this case is the House of Lords. There is therefore an area in which the House of Lords still may make a final decision.

Nigel Don: I am sure that that is for another day.

Lord Coulsfield: Yes. In some cases, there is a subtle and complicated relationship between what the supreme court can decide and what the European court decides.

The Convener: While you are here, will you tell us the name of the outstanding case?

Lord Coulsfield: It is the Home Secretary against AF and others—it is reported with initials—and the reference in the Court of Appeal was [2008] EWCA Civ 1148. It appears in the civil judgments because it is not a criminal proceeding but a proceeding under the Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005 for a control order.

The Convener: I thank you very much for coming this morning. It has been extremely useful.

Lord Coulsfield: Thank you very much for giving me the opportunity.

The Convener: Delighted. There will be a brief suspension.
issue more from the perspective of considering prison populations. I cannot speak about the specific mechanics of a sentencing council, but the fact that we seem to send more of our population to prison every year than any other country in Europe does mean that something is not right at the sentencing end. To the extent that a sentencing council would improve transparency and coherence—I am not sure that consistency is the only value that should be discussed—I wholly support my colleagues.

James Chalmers (University of Edinburgh): Given that the bill makes clear that the final decision on sentencing is still left to judges, I do not see how judicial independence is undermined.

Bill Butler: All right, that is very clear.

Dr Armstrong mentioned consistency of sentencing. What evidence is there of significant inconsistency in sentencing in Scotland? If there is, will the bill help to address that perceived inconsistency? Mr Chalmers can begin.

James Chalmers: I will have to defer to my colleagues on that matter.

Bill Butler: That is fair enough. Dr Armstrong?

Dr Armstrong: I know that Neil Hutton and Cyrus Tata are responsible for quite a lot of the evidence on consistency and inconsistency, so I will be brief. The judges may not feel that there is any evidence of inconsistency, but are they offering any evidence for consistency? The question suggests that there is a lack of evidence in general, and Neil and Cyrus have dealt with that issue, but if the judges are not sure about the consistency or inconsistency, there seems to be a strong argument to support some sort of mechanism that rationalises the process.

Bill Butler: That is a neat way of turning it round. I do not know what the judges would say, but I can guess.

Professor Hutton: Cyrus Tata and I carried out a study, which I will let him talk about. When proposals for a sentencing council were being drawn up in New Zealand, which has a pretty similar system to ours in that it allows for extensive judicial discretion, a national comparison was carried out. Substantial variations were found, which were unlikely to be attributable to differences in offences and offenders, and some courts were found to be systematically more severe than others. I would guess that if we carried out the same research in Scotland, we would come to similar conclusions.

Bill Butler: Are you saying that there is no research in Scotland?

Professor Hutton: Cyrus Tata will talk about the research that we conducted, which as far as I am aware is the only study of consistency in sentencing in Scotland. Judges talk about individualised sentencing, and how important it is to take account of the facts and circumstances of each case. I agree that that is important, but the other important aspect of justice and sentencing is fairness and treating like cases alike, and judges have no way to define what a like case is.

The onus is on the judiciary to tell us what they mean by consistency, and to explain that in a transparent way to the public. They do not have a language—that is a criticism not of judges but of the structure in which they work—that enables them to talk about consistency. That is why we need guidelines, and the sentencing council.

Bill Butler: That is very clear.

Dr Tata: Consistency should not be the be-all and end-all of our discussions about a sentencing council. It is more interesting to consider what a council could do, such as bolster independence. The issue has come up several times, and it has been claimed that there is not a shred of evidence of inconsistency. The response to that is that there is limited evidence of a degree of inconsistency in the courts, but also evidence of consistency, by which I mean—

Bill Butler: Why is the evidence so limited? Is there a problem in gathering evidence?

Dr Tata: There are various problems. First, to compare like cases is quite difficult. For example, I do not consider the Government statistics about different courts’ rates of custody to be evidence of consistency or inconsistency because, as committee members have pointed out, those are bald statistics.

Bill Butler: So they are of as much use as league tables of school performance—in other words, useless.

Dr Tata: Exactly. They do not control for input. If you do not control for input, you are unable to control for output. The first point is a methodological one.

Secondly, as you are well aware, this is a very sensitive area, and it is natural that people will be somewhat reluctant, or careful, about co-operating with research in this area.

Bill Butler: Do you mean judges?

Dr Tata: Among others. Such reticence would be perfectly understandable, from their perspective.

Bill Butler: Is that not frustrating for you, though?
Dr Tata: It is understandable. As a researcher, one must always understand the pressures that people are under on a daily basis.

Bill Butler: I understand that, but a disinterested observer might say that the judges could be accused of blocking research. What do you think about that? I am not saying that they are guilty of that; I am just saying that they could be accused of it.

Professor Hutton: The study that Cyrus Tata and I did many years ago was at the invitation of some sheriffs. They asked us to consider the pattern of sentencing in three courts. In order to do that, we had to have some definition of consistency. We did that by asking the judges to help us to define consistency. They drew up a way of doing that—in effect, guidelines—and we demonstrated that there was a large degree of consistency but that one or two judges were out of line with the others. It is unusual for judges to participate.

Bill Butler: That is the point that I was just about to make. That is the exception rather than the rule.

Dr Tata: You raise a good question.

As well as the dedicated study that Professor Hutton mentioned, which was conducted some time ago and was a small study, a number of other pieces of research evidence come to mind. One involved the statistical risk of custody instruments that were developed for social work and so on but applied to sentencing. There is a degree of inconsistency, although I am not saying that it is wild inconsistency.

A third way in which inconsistency has been found is through simulation studies. That has been done as part of other, wider research studies, including work that we have done in which we have asked sentencing judges and sheriffs and so on to consider what kinds of sentence they would give when, for example, they heard a mock plea mitigation about the case.

Fourthly, part of another piece of work that I did was to consider, among other things, the impact of sentence discount case law—recent case law such as Du Plooy and so on. That appears to have been interpreted in relatively different ways by different sentencers. That is not a criticism of individual sentencers; it is the way in which the structure in which one works—

Bill Butler: You would say that the thing to aim for is not uniformity but coherence.

Dr Tata: Indeed. Uniformity is not consistency. It is important that we compare like cases. We are not saying that all house break-ins must get the same sentence.

I want to mention briefly a further couple of pieces of evidence of inconsistency. The fifth is the awareness among practitioners, including sentencing judges and lawyers, of a degree of difference within the same court. All the evidence that I have mentioned goes beyond the defence of localised sentencing. We are talking about sentencing within the same busy court, for example. There is awareness among sentencing judges that if a case goes before another judge, it may well get a different sentence. The simulation studies are sometimes done in private among judges. There is an awareness of that.

Finally, the sentencing information system, which was introduced at the High Court some years ago at the judges’ own request to assist them in their pursuit of consistency, showed a degree of variation but a great deal of consistency. The overall picture is rather like a bell curve, with a lot of consistency and some variation.

Bill Butler: That is very helpful. Will the bill help to tackle existing inconsistencies?

Professor Hutton: Well-crafted guidelines, the best example of which is probably the Minnesota guidelines, can help enormously. First of all, given that the range of penalty for an offence can be quite wide, there is scope for a warranted level of disparity—in other words, judges can sentence across a particular band. However, they can always depart from the guidelines. The Minnesota system builds in a 20 per cent departure rate, anticipating that judges will sentence outwith the guidelines in one case in every five and recognising, as judges keep telling us, that cases are very different and complicated and that guidelines cannot capture all of the many factors that have to be taken into account.

That said, guidelines can capture most things and, when judges depart from them, they will be able to give their reasons for doing so. Giving judges something to argue against helps to bolster judicial independence. If they decide to depart from the guidelines in a particular case, they can set out the range of penalties for the crime and then give a clear reason in public for their decision. Unlike the present situation, such a move blends consistency and individualised sentencing in a way that is transparent to the public.

Bill Butler: I am obliged to you for that very clear explanation.

Robert Brown: As you have clearly shown, this is not merely a simple matter of consistency and inconsistency; it is much more complicated than that and brings in many other issues, not least policy making on the basis of research. Are the judiciary in Scotland generally receptive to the idea of taking research on sentencing into account in their determinations and decisions? I guess that that question is for Dr Tata or Professor Hutton.

Dr Tata: I will respond briefly and then pass over to Professor Hutton. Judges are routinely sent research reports, but they are extremely busy people who day after day have to think about individual cases. That is perhaps different from thinking about policy, but there is certainly room for more knowledge transfer, knowledge exchange and so on. A sentencing council would be able to assist in that, particularly if it were genuinely independent from the executive branch of government. I have to say, though, that my concerns in that respect are not shared to the same extent by my colleagues.

Professor Hutton: I am afraid that I do not know whether judges are receptive to research because, as Dr Tata pointed out, it is hard to see how such evidence would help them to make decisions on individual cases. On the other hand, a sentencing council or that kind of body would give the opportunity to get together to discuss issues not only with one another but with other people, to consider evidence and to develop sentencing policy for certain kinds of case or offence. As they have no institutional means for doing that at the moment, it is a bit difficult to answer your question.

That said, when I speak privately to judges, they appear to be very interested in research on, for example, the effectiveness of sentencing, but it is very difficult to see how they can take that into account in any systematic way, other than on a case-by-case basis.

Robert Brown: Does that raise the broader question whether we are using prison resources and other resources in the most effective way to achieve certain ends? For example, I was very struck by the tables of statistics in Dr Armstrong’s submission, comparing Scotland’s use of imprisonment with that of other countries. I wonder whether Dr Armstrong has any view on the suggestion that one benefit of the sentencing council approach might be that, as a matter of public policy, judges and others would be able to consider some of these themes, see whether we are getting best value out of prison and find out what we could do differently.

Dr Armstrong: Yes. At the moment, there is no centralised source of information and no mechanism for co-ordinating sentencing—that is probably what we want more than to tell the judges what to do—so that the prison population is turning out to be more like that of Slovakia than that of Sweden. If judges knew that we are heading towards Transnistria rather than Ireland, they would be surprised and worried. The fact is that it takes quite a lot of digging, on an individual basis, to figure that out. A sentencing council would therefore be an important resource for judges.

I agree with Neil Hutton and Cyrus Tata that, when one speaks to judges individually, one finds that quite a few are interested in research—in fact, they have invited us to do research—yet many others seem not to be aware of the research. It is instructive that the work on sentencing and the sentencing information system that has been done by the centre for sentencing research, which is dedicated to the study of sentencing in Scotland, was not mentioned in evidence when it was claimed that there is no research on the consistency or inconsistency of sentencing in Scotland. There is a mixture of opinions.

Judges would be worried and surprised to discover not only that Scottish prison practice more closely resembles that of an eastern European country than that of a western European country, but that the Scottish prison population is composed mainly of people serving short sentences. Our prison practice is eastern European not because we put bad people away for a long time but because we put so many people away for 23 days.

Robert Brown: Some of what you say points towards the general area of decisions and sentencing guidelines, but quite a lot of it points back to the Parliament and the Executive in terms of the bills that we pass and the administrative actions that are taken in support of the general courts system. Is that right? The sentencing council could be very narrow and deal only with one bit of that rather than having a wider, more general remit of sentencing reform. Is that fair?

Dr Armstrong: Yes, I think that that is right. Whatever evidence exists on the effectiveness of sentencing councils and on the consistency or inconsistency of sentencing, there is no evidence to tell you what values the criminal justice system should ultimately have. That is for the political system of the country.

In talking about consistency, I am reminded that, in the American south, prior to the existence of the United States Sentencing Commission and guidelines, sentencing was incredibly consistent—blacks got consistently higher sentences than anybody else. Consistency in the absence of values inserted into it by the political system is meaningless. That authority and conviction must come from a separate body working in co-ordination with the law.

Robert Brown: Would you like to speak a little on the benefits that a sentencing council could bring? We have begun to get into that area a bit with one or two things that have been said. Dr Tata, do you have any thoughts on that?
Dr Tata: The bill proposes that the sentencing council will prepare guidelines. However, I think that that is the less interesting part of what a sentencing council could do. There is a great deal of consensus around what others have said about the advisory possibilities of a council.

For example, the council could examine the relationship between front-door sentencing and back-door sentencing—release arrangements that will remain and are to do with the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007, which are problematic. Release has been a problem for us for decades and we have not been able to deal with it properly because front-door sentencing has been left to judges in individual cases whereas back-door sentencing has been given over to the Executive. We must reconsider those types of sentencing together, as a whole, in order to get a coherent policy. That is one thing that the council might do. It might also look at other policy areas, such as the increasing imprisonment of women and the incarceration of children. There is a whole bunch of things that the council might do.

The other thing that the council might do is develop research into public attitudes. Sentencers on a daily basis, quite rightly, say that although they are not led by public opinion they take it into account in some way or other. What do we know about public opinion and public attitudes beyond what the tabloid editors suppose that the public think? How can we find out more about that? Can we also develop greater public confidence in sentencing by providing more information about what goes on? For example, previous research has shown that most people think that rapists are typically given a non-custodial sentence, but that is simply wrong. How do we go about tackling that misinformation and misunderstanding? I have described just a few of the things that a council could do, in addition or as an alternative to issuing guidelines.

Dr Tata: I will try to be brief. I am anxious that, under the bill as it stands, the council will not be distant enough from Scottish ministers and the Lord Advocate. We need to put more distance between the two groups. The council needs to be a genuinely independent buffer, to protect judicial independence from the heat of the moment and from future justice ministers, whoever they may be, taking forward—

Robert Brown: Does the point not apply to the Parliament as much as to the Executive? It was suggested that there would not be the same issue if there were more parliamentary control. However, the separation of powers involves three stools—it does not apply only to the Executive.

Dr Tata: Indeed. However, I have less anxiety about the Parliament, simply because the Parliament, by its nature, is a much more open body.

Robert Brown: That is a helpful point.

Professor Hutton: With the greatest respect to my colleague—as we always say when we are about to call what someone has said a load of rubbish—I am firmly of the belief that issuing guidelines is a vital part of a sentencing council’s role. Guidelines are important because, as I have said before, they enable us to develop a language for talking about consistency in sentencing, which is vital to persuading the public that we are trying to do justice and to be fair. I agree with Cyrus Tata that it is important for a sentencing council to be involved in public engagement, public education and research into sentencing practice. The remit for the council that is proposed in the bill is fairly broad and would allow the council to do many different things. Whether it would do them is a different story and is related to the composition of the council, to which we will return.

James Chalmers: In the absence of guidelines, whether they come from a council or from somewhere else, it is difficult to have a proper public debate about appropriate sentencing, except at the level of individual cases. It would be much more helpful if we were able to have that debate at a more general, abstract level.

Robert Brown: My final question concerns the relationship between the sentencing council and other organisations. Dr Tata suggested that some of the constitutional issues might be overcome if the council’s role were advisory. Do panel members have a view on the matter and on the linked issue of the legal effect of any guidelines that might emerge from the council’s deliberations?

Robert Brown: Can you elaborate on why you think that the sentencing council should have the final say? The judges take the opposite view and argue that guidelines should have the imprimatur of the assembled judiciary.

Professor Hutton: If there are to be sentencing guidelines, there must be one body—not two—that is responsible for issuing them.

Robert Brown: Why should it not be the appeal court, as has been suggested?

Professor Hutton: If we have a sentencing council whose task is to devise guidelines, it is appropriate that it should have final authority. That preserves judicial independence at a sufficient level, as it allows the appeal court to make decisions in individual cases. The court would be able to say to the council, “The guidelines do not work here—have another look at them.” In the States, the commission that is responsible for the guidelines amends them if they are not working in practice.

Nigel Don: I return to the very beginning of part 1 of the bill, which sets out the purposes of sentencing, rather than an overarching principle. Someone—it may have been one of you, but I cannot remember—commented that perhaps we should start with an overarching principle of fairness, before worrying about consistency and coherence. If we started from the principle that the basis of the legal system, from which sentencing must derive, is fairness, would that be a fair point and would it be worth saying?

The Convener: It is appropriate for Professor Hutton to answer.

Professor Hutton: It was probably me who made the comment.

The Convener: It was—that is why I said you should answer.

Professor Hutton: We can try hard to deliver fairness, whereas it is much harder to be sure that sentencing can effectively reduce offending, so we should strive hard to deliver fairness. The first guideline that the English Sentencing Guidelines Council produced was a statement of overarching principles of fairness in sentencing. It is arguable that the Scottish sentencing council’s first guideline should set an overarching framework in which to work.

The Convener: That is fair enough.

Cathie Craigie: Section 17 discourages the use of short sentences of six months or under. However, sheriffs have argued to the committee that short sentences can be useful. What are panel members’ views?

The Convener: It might be appropriate for Dr Armstrong to lead the response.

Dr Armstrong: When I was at Barlinnie last Monday, I was asked what could possibly be done with all the inmates there who are serving sentences of between 20 and 30 days. That is just about enough time for officers to assess whether a person has a drug problem, will have a housing need when they are released or has family problems, before it is time for that person to go home.

Perhaps the judges might like to take a tour of the prisons, because I have not gained the impression from the people who work in them that six-month prison sentences are effective. The bill specifies six-month custodial sentences. That does not mean that six-month sentences do not work. A six-month sentence in the community that started immediately and involved a project that might relate to the person’s drug offending, housing issues or work—

Cathie Craigie: I am sorry—we are talking about custodial sentences now, but we will discuss community sentences later.

Dr Armstrong: I was just making a comparison. When the press report a proposal to eliminate six-month sentences, that suggests that anyone who does something that is not very serious will experience no consequences.

The experience of those who work in prisons is that not much can be done with people who have short sentences. The Scottish Prisons Commission report found the phenomenon of life by instalments, whereby people endlessly serve short sentences of six months or under. They have a lifetime of sentences, but without the programming that is available to people who serve life sentences—they go in and come out and nothing happens, except that they become angrier about being incarcerated for short periods or they lose contact with whatever supportive social contacts they had. Some good research, which the commission’s report cites, says that short prison stays are not only ineffective but criminogenic. People are more likely to engage in worse offending after they have been imprisoned than before.

Cathie Craigie: How do you respond to the sheriffs’ point that in some cases—such as that of the repeat offender who has had community sentences and fines that have not worked—a short sentence can turn a person’s life around?

Dr Armstrong: I have seen no anecdotal or empirical examples of that. I have heard the sheriffs say that, but I would like to see the person for whom that is true. Strathclyde Police’s violence reduction unit, which has famously said that it needs more public health workers than police officers, issued a little handout of the story of David—I do not know whether the committee has seen it. The story follows the life of a young man who started by serving short sentences and who ended up as a murderer with a long-term sentence. Such stories are telling. A series of short sentences leads to bad results. If the judges can produce another story—about Mary, for example—in which a six-month sentence causes her to bottom out and turn around, I would be interested in seeing it. I have not seen any such evidence; it would go against pretty much all the international research that exists.

Cathie Craigie: Have you carried out any research on why people are imprisoned for less than six months, such as for periods of 20 or 30 days? For what crimes are such people imprisoned?

Dr Armstrong: I have not conducted any research on that. I am currently doing a project that looks at remand and the use of backdated sentences, which is an interesting phenomenon. Some people do short-term sentences simply because they are on remand. By the time that they get to court, they are sentenced to whatever time they did on remand. The interesting thing about that group of people is that they tend to be remanded not because of the crime with which they are charged, but because of their history: they already have an extensive criminal history, or they were on bail, or they have previously failed to comply with bail conditions. That fits the model of feeling like a last resort, in that the people are remanded and are then given a short sentence. However, to answer your question, I have not done any research on that issue.

Dr Tata: As we discussed previously, for a couple of reasons I am rather more agnostic than Dr Armstrong is on the presumption against sentences of six months or under. If it is so difficult to deal with people who are in prison for short periods of time, the obvious answer—one can hear people saying it—is, "Well, send them to prison for longer if that will help them more." No. The issue that needs to be grappled with is not the length of time, although the six-month limit is problematic because it is not harmonious with the new summary powers for sentences of up to 12 months. Instead, we need to look at what types of cases, broadly speaking, should be imprisonable. If the argument behind the bill is that we should not imprison non-violent, non-dangerous offenders who might simply be feckless, we should focus on those types of cases. We should specify those cases, rather than a limit of six months, because the group of prisoners on sentences of six months or under will include—this will give the tabloids a field day—people who are convicted of dangerous and violent offences. That is what we should focus on.

I will make a couple of quick points about the argument—which I entirely understand—that says, "Look, I have lost patience with this person, who keeps coming back without fulfilling the conditions that are supposed to be carried out. I am at the end of my tether. As a last resort, I have to send this person to custody, even though the initial offence is not one that would warrant a custodial sentence." I can understand that sense of frustration, but we need to ask ourselves what prison is for and whether it should be used to incarcerate people who are not a risk to public safety.

It is sometimes assumed that people who fail to comply with the conditions of a community order do so wilfully. That might sometimes be the case, but an emerging body of recent research evidence shows that quite a large proportion of those people simply do not understand the conditions. Recent research by Dr Nancy Loucks shows that a high proportion of people who are given a community penalty or custodial sentence have quite serious learning difficulties. Such issues might be picked up on even when they are mentioned in the social inquiry report.

We need to be a little bit careful with the argument that says, "We are at the end of our tether, so this person must go to custody." The issue is a little bit more complex than that. In addition, there is no objective standard as to where one might reach the end of one’s tolerance and different sheriffs will have different tolerance levels. The issue is a little bit more complicated than that.

Cathie Craigie: Where should the needs of victims be taken into account? The written submission from either Dr Tata or Professor Hutton—as sod’s law would have it, I cannot find the relevant paragraph—suggests that the purposes of sentencing should include the issue of fairness. How is it fair to a community not to imprison a person who, without being violent, has been noisy and has engaged persistently in antisocial behaviour, for which fines have already been imposed? If that behaviour goes on and on, where does fairness for the victim come in? Perhaps a short prison sentence might give both the community the respite that it needs and the offender the shock that is needed to change that behaviour.

Professor Hutton: The problem of persistent but arguably not serious offenders is not unique to our jurisdiction. I accept that not particularly serious behaviour can cause people a lot of distress and trouble in some communities. However, every jurisdiction has the same problems and other jurisdictions seem to find more imaginative ways of dealing with it that do not result in the use of prison.
We have to bring resources into the matter. We have limited resources to spend on criminal justice and must decide how we will get the best value for that money. We have to make difficult choices about how to spend it. Do we want to spend it on putting people in prison for 20 days to give communities a brief respite or should we spend it on work in prison to try to reduce more serious offenders’ offending behaviour so that, when they are released from prison—as they inevitably will be—they are less dangerous and less of a threat to the community?

It is about balancing two kinds of damaging behaviour and two different kinds of victims and deciding where best to spend our resources. If you look at it that way, it becomes a slightly different question.

The Convener: I am anxious to get as much out of this evidence-taking session as we can and I stress the need for the answers to be as brief as possible.

Angela Constance: The bill seeks to amend the custody provisions in the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007 prior to their being brought into force. It is intended that that will help to create an effective regime for managing offenders. What are the witnesses’ views on that?

Dr Tata: I have concerns about the 2007 act. I gave evidence to the Justice 2 Committee about the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Bill, which I thought was a pretty poor piece of legislation, as many witnesses said. This bill seems to offer the hope of mitigating some of the worst problems of the 2007 act, particularly the 15-day cut-off whereby the act attempted to bring combined sentences down to 15 days. That was crazy, and it was recognised that that was simply not achievable. Instead, the bill talks about a “prescribed period”. The policy memorandum suggests that that will be 12 months but it is not set out in the bill, and I have concerns about that.

The bill mitigates some of the problems of the 2007 act but, in doing so, passes discretion over to the Executive, which is problematic. I return to the point—I am trying to be brief, convener—that we need to consider front-door and back-door sentencing in the round. A sentencing council could help in that. It is the only way that we will be able to deal with the problem of release, which has dogged successive Governments.

Professor Hutton: I agree with that and have nothing to add.

The Convener: You concur with your colleague.

Professor Hutton: Indeed.

The Convener: Does James Chalmers have anything to add?

James Chalmers: I do not.

Dr Armstrong: I agree with Dr Tata.

Nigel Don: That takes us on to alternatives to prison, about which the Scottish Prisons Commission had quite a lot to say. Will the witnesses give their perspective on the suggestions that have emerged for non-custodial, community sentences and whether they will be effective?

Dr Armstrong: I included a section on effectiveness in the materials that I circulated to the committee. What do we mean by effectiveness? Do we mean that community sentences will eliminate the likelihood of someone reoffending? There is some evidence that they will and that they work a little bit better than short prison sentences at doing that.

I have listed in my submission a few factors for when community sentences are at their most effective. They are most effective when they are administered immediately and are clearly packaged or labelled so that they are understandable to sentencers and those who are being sentenced. To the extent that the bill accomplishes those aims, it can be effective. There is some provision in the bill to encourage swiftness and clarity through the single community payback order, although some orders are excepted from that. The current financial climate might make it difficult to implement some of those aspirations.

Nigel Don: I want to pick up on what you said about immediacy. The timescale that is envisaged seems to be that the appropriate officer should be available and the community sentence should start within seven days, which does not seem immediate to me.

Dr Armstrong: You are right; it does not seem immediate to me, either. There is no magic number in the literature that defines “immediacy”. The Scottish Prisons Commission considered community sanctions in various jurisdictions and found that in some places “immediacy” means the same day and in others it means within a week. What it does not mean is three to six months, which is the timescale in the current climate, after which there can be a further wait if the programme in which the person is at last allowed to enrol has a waiting list.

In Norway there is a reverse approach. There is a waiting list to get into prison, but community sentences start immediately. There is never a delay to get into a community programme, but when the prisons are full no one else is allowed in. Norway dealt with the resource issue by reversing the waiting list issue.
Cathie Craigie: What happens to the people who are waiting to go to prison?

Dr Armstrong: They stay at home until space opens up in prison for them.

Cathie Craigie: What if the person is a murderer?

Dr Armstrong: There are probably priority prisons, and there are secure—

Cathie Craigie: So there is not a waiting list; there are priority prisons—

Dr Armstrong: There are maximum security prisons. However, people who have been convicted of homicide might wait for a prison place. Bail is allowed for people on homicide charges.

Nigel Don: What do other members of the panel think about the immediacy issue?

Professor Hutton: If punishment is to be effective, the important issue is probably not immediacy after the decision to punish but immediacy after the commission of the offence, which is a different story altogether. How long do people have to wait before they come to court? That is a resource issue.

Nigel Don: That is an interesting perspective.

The Convener: The issue is also whether the offender pleads guilty at the earliest opportunity.

Professor Hutton: Indeed.

Nigel Don: My original question was about the effectiveness of community penalties. Do the witnesses have other views on what is proposed?

Professor Hutton: If judges are to have the capacity to attach a large number of conditions to a community penalty, I would be concerned that the more conditions are imposed, the greater the chance that they will be breached and the person will ultimately end up in prison. There needs to be proportionality of punishment in the context of community penalties. How many conditions will be imposed on a person? Will conditions relate to the seriousness of the offence, or will they be entirely about what is needed to make the offender become a better person or change their life? Such issues are not addressed in the bill.

Nigel Don: Is it fair to say that the Scottish sentencing council will be important precisely in that context? In other words, it will suggest to judges and sheriffs what is appropriate and say how many conditions might be imposed. The council could conduct research into such matters.

Professor Hutton: Indeed.

Angela Constance: Will the bill improve public understanding of community sentencing?

Professor Hutton: Probably not, on its own, but if the sentencing council works well it will be able to do much to improve public understanding.

Dr Tata: I concur with that. One issue is the implementation of the release arrangements, which are regarded as community penalties—although technically they are not. The bill does not make the position clear, which is unfortunate.

The sentencing council has the potential to improve public understanding, but the bill cannot do that and does not make things clearer.

Angela Constance: Is there more that we can do to improve public understanding?

Professor Hutton: Are you asking what the Parliament or the Government can do? I can give you an example of a sentencing council that has taken public engagement and education seriously. The Sentencing Advisory Council in Victoria, Australia, has been energetic in that regard. It runs a “you be the judge” roadshow for schools, trade unions, colleges and other places, at which judges and the community discuss sentencing.

It generates many reports about sentencing practice, it is good at disseminating that information, and it has good relationships with the media. It does not stop scare stories coming out, but it provides positive stories about sentencing, which are difficult to get into the media unless there is a relationship with them. Obviously, individual judges cannot talk to the media on a one-to-one basis, but a sentencing council can take a professional approach to communications and work with judges to communicate things more clearly. The Victoria council is a good example of a body that tries to build public engagement. Things will not change overnight. It is a matter of starting a cultural process that will take much longer.

Dr Tata: I agree. The Victoria council provides an excellent example of how to engage with the public. We also need to try to find out a little bit more about what the public think about specific issues and areas. At the policy level, there must be a two-way street between the public and the council.

The Convener: I have a couple of brief questions for clarification, the first of which is to Dr Armstrong. I thank you very much for your written submission, which is clear about incarceration levels elsewhere, and relates incarceration levels to populations. I am happy to accept the figures, but have you related incarceration levels to offending levels?

Dr Armstrong: No.

The Convener: Why not?
Dr Armstrong: Because the relationship between crime and imprisonment appears in Scotland, as in most jurisdictions, to be weak and not to explain sufficiently prison populations. Last night, Sonja Snacken, who is a professor in Belgium, gave a lecture at the University of Edinburgh in which she considered the relationship between crime and imprisonment. She surveyed research across Europe, which shows that there is less of a relationship between crime and imprisonment than there is between economic cycles and imprisonment or between political factors and imprisonment. In addition, various prison projections that were calculated using different crime versus criminal justice scenarios were included in the 2001 Halliday report on sentencing in England and Wales, and it was found that a change in crime levels has less impact on the prison population than a change in sentencing law.

The Convener: It strikes me that it is a little bit odd that nobody has related the number of people who have been jailed to the number of offences that have been committed, as the number of people who have been jailed is an obvious corollary of that.

Dr Armstrong: It is natural to think that, and that should be obvious. There should be a relationship between how much harm there is in a community and how many sanctions exist in it but, over time, we have found that there does not seem to be a very strong relationship between the two. A graphic in the Scottish Prisons Commission’s report shows changes in the prison population. A line goes straight up while the crime rate in Scotland goes up, down or stays stable. The report points out that the prison population has gone up when crime rates have increased, stayed flat and declined. That is an interesting example from Scotland that shows that there does not seem to be a corollary relationship between crime and imprisonment.

James Chalmers: There are two difficulties.

The Convener: I am sorry, Mr Chalmers. I am aware that you have not really—

James Chalmers: I have less to say about sentencing than my colleagues have. It is not my specialist field.

As I was saying, there are two difficulties. One is obtaining comparable data on crime rates across jurisdictions as opposed to data on imprisonment, which can be quite reliably obtained. The second is that it is not clear where that will take us. If we found that the offending rate in Scotland was much higher than offending rates in other countries, we might conclude that more imprisonment was justified, or we might conclude that more imprisonment was not working. I do not know which answer would be correct.

The Convener: We must end the discussion; obviously, we have had to truncate it slightly. I thank the witnesses for coming to the meeting. I am sure that they would be more than happy to respond to any issues that we might ask them about in writing.

The meeting will now continue in private for a brief time.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener (Bill Aitken): Good morning, ladies and gentlemen. Let us get under way. I ask everyone to ensure that mobile phones are switched off. There is a full turnout of the committee and therefore no apologies.

Under item 1, we will take evidence on the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. Today’s evidence will build on evidence already taken on parts 1 to 7 of the bill. I welcome our first panel who are Mike Ewart, chief executive, and Rona Sweeney, director of prisons, from the Scottish Prison Service. I apologise to Ms Sweeney in particular that this evidence-taking session had to be adjourned a couple of weeks ago because of time. Thank you very much for your forbearance. We also thank Mr Ewart for the submission that he sent in, which enables us to go straight to questions, led by Bill Butler.

Bill Butler (Glasgow Anniesland) (Lab): Good morning, colleagues. As you know, the bill seeks to discourage the use of short custodial sentences in cases in which other appropriate sentencing options are available. What can prisons do with offenders who are sentenced to short periods of custody, and is six months a suitable dividing line between short sentences and other sentences?

Mike Ewart (Scottish Prison Service): It is fair to say that any period has an element of the arbitrary and cannot take account of the particular circumstances of every individual.

There is a strong consensus that six months is an appropriate dividing line—that has been a consistent feature of both academic literature and work in other jurisdictions. On the basis of the evidence that we can adduce from international practice and from the studies that have been done, six months appears to be appropriate.

Rona Sweeney (Scottish Prison Service): In relation to delivery in prison, there is little that can be done—it varies depending on the individual and the difficulties that they have when they come into prison, and the sentence will reflect any period spent on remand. For people who are with us for a very short time, the focus is around health care—particularly if they have an addiction, in which case we try to give them some support to deal with that. In general we try to build up their health. As I say, what can be done depends on the individual. We follow a process in trying to link people up with the community, but in many ways we are trying to undo the harm that imprisonment has caused.

Bill Butler: So anything other than health care, such as coherent rehabilitation work, is not really possible in sentences of less than six months.

Rona Sweeney: Not generally, no. During those very short sentences we focus on undoing the harm that imprisonment has caused, because we know that many of the protective factors that support someone in not reoffending are damaged by imprisonment. We try to help the individual build bridges back into the community to reduce that harm, but we are not doing anything more elaborate than that by way of offending programmes or something that is focused specifically on reducing the risk of reoffending.

Bill Butler: Does Mr Ewart agree with that?

Mike Ewart: It may be helpful to add that the six-month period that might be the overall length of a sentence is not necessarily the period that the Prison Service has to work with somebody. Often people have served a period on remand, and there may be factors that lead to their being discharged long before the six-month point is reached. Most short sentences are significantly shorter than six months.

Bill Butler: That is very clear.

The committee has received evidence from sheriffs in which they argue that short custodial sentences can be effective and that the current use of such sentences is generally appropriate. Do you have a view on that?

Mike Ewart: It is obviously delicate territory for me to comment on, because I might be taken as questioning a judicial decision, and I do not want to do that.

Bill Butler: It is just a general view that sheriffs have expressed in their evidence. Do you have a general view on their general view?

Mike Ewart: I have had many discussions with sheriffs. I have taken the opportunity to go to sheriffs’ training days and discuss issues around imprisonment with them. I am sure that, in the individual decisions that they make, that generality is entirely right. They are, at the point of decision, making what they feel to be the correct decision.

I have heard sheriffs make two collective comments that I would question. The first is that a short period of imprisonment may give relief to the community from which the offender comes.
Although that is, in its own terms, obviously true, it must be balanced against the question whether a short-term sentence does more harm than good, as Rona Sweeney eloquently expressed, and might therefore contribute to further reoffending. Overall community safety might be compromised more by a short sentence, so there is a balance of arguments to be had there.

The second contention that I have heard from sheriffs is that after someone has appeared before them a number of times and has been dealt with by community disposal, which has not worked in the sense that the individual has breached or has failed to complete an element of the requirements of the disposal or has reoffended, they have no choice but to invoke imprisonment. In certain circumstances, that might happen because it is what the law requires.

One question is whether, if a community disposal was appropriate four or five times for a particular offender in particular circumstances, that disposal might still be appropriate if the only factor that has changed is the irritation of the criminal justice system with that character’s reappearance.

Bill Butler: Right—that is clear.

Rona Sweeney: I agree with the chief executive. Our focus is to keep in secure custody and to care for all who the courts send us. It is not our public duty to doubt or judge that in any way. However, I am glad that we are having this discussion, because it is our public duty to alert the committee to the limitations of what we can do with very short sentences.

Robert Brown (Glasgow) (LD): I want to develop Mike Ewart’s point about whether short sentences do more harm than good. Is it your view that short-term sentences across the board make people worse rather than better?

Mike Ewart: There is a strong consensus in academic and other literature that that is likely to be the case. I think that the McLeish commission used the famous phrase, which came from a Home Office report in the early 1990s, that in such circumstances, prison could be an expensive way of making bad people worse.

One can adduce a number of factors that have been teased out in many pieces of work. The first is that people lose the benefit of what Rona Sweeney called the protective factors: home, employment and family, or relationships more generally. That is a simple fact of what happens when people are sent to prison. As I think I have said previously on public platforms, that impact is rather well captured by the Dutch prison service, whose principal statutory requirement is to undo the harm that is done by imprisoning people in the first instance.

The second factor is the one that is colloquially called the university of crime. People are brought into an environment in which they may be more likely to reoffend when they are released because of the nature of the impact of the imprisonment on the protective factors, and they are exposed to people with more experience, who might coerce them into further activity or simply lead them into association with others who might do that.

Obviously, those factors cannot be traced in every individual case, but I believe that there is a strong consensus that those are the major factors and that is the outcome.

Robert Brown: I want to challenge that a bit. A number of people who go to prison—whether on short-term sentences or longer sentences—are unemployed, have fractured family links, hang about with a difficult group of people and have a strong sense of alienation because of what has gone on before. Does prison make things worse in that respect? Can the short-shock aspect—the nastiness of going to prison—have an effect on individuals? Can things apply across the board, or do you have to distinguish between individual cases?

Mike Ewart: We very much have to distinguish between individual cases. I might put one case, but there is an alternative case that might apply. If I gave the impression that everyone has a happy domestic environment and a full-time job before they go to prison, you are right to point out that that would be entirely inaccurate. The reality is that, whatever the person’s circumstances, they are made more difficult by imprisonment. Perhaps it would be better for me to leave it with that qualification.

The argument has been adduced on the issue of the short, sharp shock, which has been the subject of a practical experiment. A few decades back, that approach was formal policy in England and Wales for quite some time. However, one hears braved-off from people in prison, such as: “Now I’ve experienced prison and I can cope with it. What more can you do to me?”

Robert Brown: In your written submission, you say:

“Research suggests that early intervention and a care based model is more effective with young people than a justice based approach.”

What do you mean by “young people”? Are such approaches also effective with older people? What is the age range of those who go to prison on short-term sentences?

Mike Ewart: That substantive point was also followed through in the Government’s consultation paper and has been summarised more sharply in other places. I think that Andrew McLellan, for example, has said on several occasions that prison, which comes at the very end of the process, is the wrong instrument for correcting social ills, which should be dealt with at the beginning of life. That is the nub of the argument.

Young people represent a very significant proportion not only of the prison population but of those who have their first contact with prison. Indeed, the fastest growing group in the rising prison population is young male offenders between 16 and 21 years old.

Robert Brown: I suppose that the nub of my question is whether the mechanisms that you have advocated in your submission work as well with prisoners in their late 20s and other older prisoners as they do with young people. Having worked in the education system, you will know that the children’s panel system is based on different principles. Can such principles be applied to the adult justice system and to prisoners who have, rightly or wrongly, reached that point without any early intervention?

Mike Ewart: There are different kinds of intervention. Many of the structured interventions that can be made in the prison setting are based on cognitive behavioural approaches, which could be used equally well with older people outwith the prison system. In other words, there is no specific element of the prison context that makes such interventions effective or not.

Robert Brown: I suppose that my key point is that problems such as overcrowding plague the short-term sentence approach. I appreciate that there are limits on all of this, but if you had more resource, could you be more effective with short-term prisoners—assuming of course that you had them for more than a few days? Moreover, are you able to do anything useful with those on remand, given the number of people who tend to be released after being on remand without serving any additional sentence?

Mike Ewart: I will ask Rona Sweeney to answer your points about remand and the question of people being invited to, but not required to, take part in activities.

With regard to resource, which I take to mean the staff and buildings necessary to give us capacity, I have to say that, given the current restrictions on the building envelope, I would not argue that we could do any more if we had more staff. I would like to have time to consider in an entirely theoretical way the possibility of doing different things with staff and resource. I have seen a number of different approaches that have been taken elsewhere, for example in Norway, where the prison system runs what amount to hostels to allow people to continue their education and work. Such models, which we do not have at the moment, might provide a possible way forward, but I stress that that is purely a germ of an idea in my mind, not a major policy proposal.

Overall, I would be extremely reluctant to argue for an increase in the scale of the prison estate. I want to improve the quality of the existing prison estate and to make some marginal increases to capacity, and we have plans to do that. However, my long-term contention has always been that we already lock up too many people, making ourselves, as a community, less safe as a result. If we build more capacity, that will not provide us with elastic in the system because the extra places will be filled up. That would not result in an improvement in our performance.

Rona Sweeney: I will deal with the point about remand prisoners. Some of our services are no different, whether a prisoner is on remand or has been convicted, so our remand prisoners are able to access health care services, as you would expect, social work services and addiction services. There is a difference in that, under prison rules, convicted prisoners are required to work. Our definition of work is quite broad and includes other purposeful activities, such as education or attendance at programmes. That requirement does not exist for remand prisoners. Some sites offer those services to remand prisoners when they can, and some remand prisoners accept them, but not all of them. Not every prison can offer remand prisoners such activities because of overcrowding and the fact that spaces are limited.

The Convener: Before we proceed, it might be useful if you could provide the committee with a note—at a date that is convenient to you—of the number of remand prisoners that you have, and of how many of them have been remanded in custody because of a deferred sentence and how many of them are awaiting trial on a summary matter. That would be a useful piece of information to have, if that were possible.

Paul Martin (Glasgow Springburn) (Lab): I invite Mr Ewart to elaborate on the issue of resources, particularly as it relates to prisoners who serve short sentences. How do the resources that are required for prisoners who serve short sentences compare with those that are required for prisoners who serve long-term sentences?

Mike Ewart: In principle, there is no difference between the overall resource requirements for prisoners in the two categories. It might be possible to attribute some marginal additional costs to prisoners on longer sentences who access more in the way of programmes and education, but I do not think that I could put my hand on my heart and say that we could give you a clear breakdown of the figures that you have asked for on the basis of how we allocate our budgets, because they are allocated to institutions and activities, not to categories of prisoner. If it would be helpful to the committee, we could take that question away and see what clarity we could provide.

Paul Martin: In your mind, there is no financial benefit attached to the scrapping of sentences of six months or less. Is the Government wrong to say that that will result in the saving of quite significant resources?

Mike Ewart: That is not what I am saying. I am suggesting to you that if I were to divide the operational costs of a prison or of the Prison Service collectively by the number of customers that we had on any one day, that would not distinguish effectively between prisoners in different categories of sentence.

Paul Martin: Would you like to comment, Ms Sweeney?

Rona Sweeney: I am not sure that I understand your question exactly. Our understanding of the modelling, which I know that the committee will have explored, is that if we were to reduce the number of sentences of six months or less by 50 per cent, that would have an impact on our population of between 250 and 300 people, which would mean that we would still be above the design capacity and would still have overcrowding. We would have to take a significant volume of prisoners out of the system, to the extent that we could start to close prisons, before we could release resources and hand those back to the community. I am not sure whether that was what you were asking about.

Paul Martin: In summary, there are two types of sentence: short and long term. Is one more expensive than the other? Mr Ewart has said that as far as he is aware, without going into the matter in any further detail, he does not think that there is any difference. Is that correct?

Mike Ewart: Calculated on a daily basis, prisoner costs are more or less the same, regardless of length of sentence.

Paul Martin: So if the Government were to move in this direction, the only reason for doing so would be to reduce prisoner numbers. Can you confirm that there is no financial benefit?

Mike Ewart: The purpose of the bill is to try to make better use of the resource that we have. We have advanced the argument that using short-term prison sentences puts the community at greater risk, in aggregate.

Nigel Don (North East Scotland) (SNP): If I understand you correctly, you are reflecting what I have always believed—that almost any business has few costs other than fixed costs and that, regardless of what else it does, it must still pay the bills. If a significantly smaller number of short-term prisoners came through the door, would you spend significantly less time letting them through the door and out again? Is it fair to say that, although that might not change your total fixed costs, because you would have to have the same number of personnel, it would free up a significant amount of time to allow those people to do something else?

Mike Ewart: That is a fair comment. The debate tends to be focused largely on either the average daily population or the peak daily population. At the moment, the figure is about 8,500. You are right to say that that conceals the churn of about 40,000 admissions in the course of a year.

Nigel Don: Are you able to quantify that—not in money, but in man and woman hours? Can you calculate how the reduced churn converts into man hours that are available for doing other, more productive things in prison?

Mike Ewart: I will defer to greater experience.

Rona Sweeney: We could do such a calculation. I understand that each year we have more than 8,000 receptions of prisoners with sentences of six months or less. The process varies a great deal, because we try to be as person focused as we can. It is a vulnerable time for individuals. Prison staff are alert to the fact that people are vulnerable, especially to self-harm. Care must be taken with those who are addicted to substances, until our health care teams are able to understand the complexities of their situation. The vulnerability of prisoners is such that many sites have a first-night-in-custody centre, where we can focus our attention much more acutely on those who have just come through our doors, as we may not know much about them or understand their complex needs.

We could do more modelling. The reception process varies a great deal, because it is focused on individuals. It tends to take between 20 and 50 minutes per individual, depending on their needs and how well we know them. I can explore the issue further, if the committee would like.

The Convener: That would be helpful.

Nigel Don: It would be hugely helpful.

Cathie Craigie (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth) (Lab): The bill establishes a presumption against sentences of less than six months and shifts the emphasis from criminal justice services to local authorities and community partnerships. In its written evidence, the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities states that it "is very clear that for the provisions of the Bill to be implemented effectively in relation to the criminal justice

I take from that that COSLA envisages resources being transferred from organisations such as the Scottish Prison Service to local authorities, which will be responsible for implementing community payback orders. However, this morning you have suggested to the committee that, although there may be a reduction in the number of people coming through the door, work will continue to have to be done and there will be no scope for shifting resources. Is that a fair interpretation of your position?

Mike Ewart: That is a bald summary, but it is the nub of the issue. I discussed the issue in precisely those terms with the conveners and chief officers of the community justice authorities at a meeting earlier in the year. We all share an ambition to shift resource from strong dependence on a wholly penal solution to a much stronger system of community disposals. In addition, an even bolder statement is that we want to shift resource from the end of the process to earlier in individuals’ lives.

However, the real challenge is not in persuading people that community disposals are a good idea—there is an obvious groundswell of support for that proposition—but in managing the transition to them. During the period in which effective community disposals and interventions are built up and crucial confidence in them is developed, so that we collectively feel that that is the appropriate route, we will still have to maintain the required resource for keeping more or less the current population running through the prison system. There will not be a major shift of population until that confidence is established. The transitional arrangements will be the real challenge. Henry McLeish and his colleagues on the Scottish Prisons Commission made their view clear. Certainly, Mr McLeish made it clear in his public statements that the proposition that he advanced would introduce people who would—unlike the group whom we have just been discussing—serve substantially longer sentences and so would be in the system longer, which would keep the numbers high. We discussed that prior to the enactment of the 2007 act, and we continue to follow it through. Rona Sweeney might want to add to that more general observation.

Rona Sweeney: The challenge for us will be the risk assessments, because we are not yet clear what they will look like. Until we understand the sentence lengths, it is difficult for us to say much.

Angela Constance: Do you envisage that the amended provisions will, once they are brought into force, impact on resources—for example, those for risk assessments?

Rona Sweeney: Until we understand where the line will be drawn and what the risk assessment will look like, we do not know.

Angela Constance: Mr Ewart—do you have anything to add?

Mike Ewart: No. In this case, we are in territory that we must explore as the work is done.

The Convener: We proceed to community justice authorities.

Stewart Maxwell (West of Scotland) (SNP): The committee has heard evidence that some community justice authorities have been proactive in engaging with the Scottish Prison Service and with other relevant authorities and agencies in order to provide continuity of treatment and support to offenders once they are released. We heard about that from one particular CJA. In your experience, does that level of engagement apply throughout the country in all prisons?

Mike Ewart: From my point of view—I think it will be the same for my colleagues—contact and interaction with the community justice authorities have happened across the board and have been positive. When the community justice authorities came into being, we established a system of liaison officers to facilitate the relationship between the CJAs and the Scottish Prison Service. We have had a useful series of bilateral exchanges with individual CJAs on, for example, the development of the specification for the new prison for the north-east. More generally, in a meeting with members of the SPS board and CJA conveners and chief officers, we had an extremely helpful and open discussion about the strategic issues that we face together.

There is contact not just with the liaison officers or at board level, but between establishments and their CJAs. We hope to see that continue as we develop, through discussing with the CJA partners the community-facing prison model. I was properly upbraided for using such jargon previously. We are trying to see whether we can develop a prison that will deal with more of the community’s total imprisoned population closer to home.

Rona Sweeney: The level of contact between individual sites and their CJAs reflects the extent to which a prison’s population is also the CJA’s population. In some sites, where the large majority of prisoners are local—such as in Greenock prison before, and even since, it took women prisoners—there is very close liaison with the CJA. I know that the governor at Greenock has a number of priorities in her planning documents that have been generated through her dialogue with the CJA.

In prison sites such as Shotts, where prisoners come from all over the country, there is less active involvement with the CJA. There is still contact, but there is less of an overlap of interests.

Stewart Maxwell: The relationship between prisons and CJAs seems to be working positively and reasonably well across the country. It is working particularly well in prisons that deal with a local population, but there are difficulties. Perhaps more work has to be done in prisons that deal with people from throughout the country.

Rona Sweeney: Yes.

Stewart Maxwell: How can things be improved?

Rona Sweeney: One of the important things that we have for prisoners is the link to individual social work departments and social workers. There is a process of integrated case management for prisoners, which is a bit like the annual appraisal process in which one might be involved in the workplace. There is an annual case conference, attended by the prisoner’s supervising social worker from their home area, either in person or by videolink. We have links other than direct links through the CJA that can help to bridge the gap for individuals when they go back into the community. As the chief executive said, we are committed to developing community-facing prisons wherever we can, so that prisoners are closer to their home areas and to services there.

Stewart Maxwell: Does the system work better with longer-term prisoners than it does with shorter-term prisoners? Is there a particular difficulty with the relationship between the prison and the CJA, the support network and the treatment that offenders receive when they leave prisons where prisoners are on short sentences?

Rona Sweeney: Yes. The model that I have just described is for long-term prisoners. There is an on-going commitment to them, because they leave on a supervised basis and will have support from someone in the community.

For short-term prisoners, we do something less elaborate; we have what is called a community-integration plan. Basically, service providers are asked to make links. The housing people in the prison will therefore make links to housing people in the community. The process is less formal and less structured.

Mike Ewart: There is, in respect of people who serve short sentences, a relevant issue that is not specifically for us to address. I know from our partners in housing and social services—to which Rona Sweeney referred—that one of their challenges is that they might start the process of creating an integrated plan for a prisoner to whom they have been introduced, but not have time to provide many back-up services before that individual enters the community.

Stewart Maxwell: I want to move on to another issue. In the weeks in which we have considered the bill, we have discussed the make-up of the sentencing council. What are your views on comments that have been made about the SPS being represented on the proposed sentencing council because of its obvious experience of, and involvement with, the impact of sentences?

Mike Ewart: I will give a purely personal response—there is no policy response to give the committee on behalf of the Government. My strong preference is that the Prison Service be one of many sources of potential advice to the sentencing council on questions that it might wish to address to the Prison Service. However, there are two reasons why it would not necessarily be appropriate for the Prison Service to be formally represented on the sentencing council. First, we are required to discharge the lawful warrant that is the outcome of a sentence. Secondly, unlike some other organisations that take part in such discussions, we are part of Government and could be seen to be directed by ministers. I do not think that such a position would be helpful for us or for the sentencing council.

Stewart Maxwell: In your view, it would be helpful if the Prison Service acted through a formal method or some other method as an advisory and information service to the sentencing council.

Mike Ewart: I hope that we would be asked to provide advice.

Stewart Maxwell: Ms Sweeney, do you have a contrary view?

Rona Sweeney: No—I agree with Mike Ewart.

The Convener: I thank Mr Ewart and Ms Sweeney very much for their attendance. Their evidence has been extremely helpful.
Meeting suspended.

On resuming—

The Convener: I welcome our second panel of witnesses, which consists of Councillor Harry McGuigan, who is the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities’ community wellbeing and safety spokesperson, and Mike Callaghan, who is a policy manager for COSLA. We have received COSLA’s written submission, which is extremely helpful. It enables us to proceed immediately to questions, which will be led by Nigel Don.

Nigel Don: Good morning, gentlemen. Thank you for coming to the meeting.

I know that some of my colleagues want to talk to you about community payback orders and their content. I will therefore avoid that matter for the moment.

In your written submission, you suggest that it will be important for the proposed sentencing council to work alongside community justice authorities to ensure that community sentences gain credibility with both the courts and the general public. Will you please elaborate on how that relationship should develop?

Councillor Harry McGuigan (Conveneion of Scottish Local Authorities): I do not want to elaborate on that too much, because it is an issue of considerable contention for the judiciary and so on. However, we think that at least consistency of understanding between the sentencing council and the local authorities will be needed. Dialogue is important. We must be careful about the territory that we are moving into, however, so I would be cautious about exploring the matter in great detail this morning.

Nigel Don: I understand your caution, but I do not really want you to be cautious. I would really like to get your opinions on what the issues are. You might want to be cautious about exactly what side of the line you put your feet on, but it would be helpful if you could tell us where you think the lines are and where the areas of contention will be.

Councillor McGuigan: I will be cautious and careful because I do not think that I have the in-depth knowledge and understanding that would enable me to be more informative. However, that is not to suggest for a minute that we are badly informed about the issues around the proposal and what the impacts of a sentencing council would be on the wider judicial process.

We have an opportunity sensibly to improve what is happening in the wider judicial set-up, although I say that without going into the detail of how that could be done. There needs to be more in-depth analysis of what we may or may not be able to do and what might or might not be perceived by the judiciary as being a challenge to its independence.

Nigel Don: Others will want to explore the content of community payback orders, but I am interested in how they might operate. Section 14 talks about a “responsible officer”, which you mention in your submission. I am not quite sure that I have yet heard anyone say how they think that system is going to work. Should the responsible officer who is identified by the court be the man or woman who is engaged in face-to-face supervision of the person who has been sentenced, or should it be, for example, the director of social work in the local council, who would delegate the face-to-face supervision? The position is not prescribed in the bill, so I am interested to know how you think it should work.

Councillor McGuigan: You are right to say that the issue has to be considered in greater detail. The responsible officer, as far as we are concerned, should be a qualified social worker. I do not think that you would expect to see a situation in which the court would identify personally whom the responsible officer would be. Rather, the social work department should identify who would be best equipped to undertake the role, in the context of its overall resources at that time. The responsible officer must be a qualified social worker.

Nigel Don: The bill says that the local authority must nominate the responsible officer—the court will not specify who the person should be. Should the responsible officer be the person who works face to face with the person who has been sentenced, or should it be the person who is in overall charge of the process, such as the director of social work, who would delegate the face-to-face work to others?

Councillor McGuigan: We live in the real world. We could nominate an individual to be the responsible officer, but that person might fall ill or be unavailable for another reason, which would mean that someone else would have to be identified. There are sensible mechanisms that can ensure that the responsible officer will be identified in a way that is manageable within the context of the real-world circumstances that we face.

Robert Brown: The community payback order replaces a number of existing orders. Do you think that any of those disposals should have been retained, or does the new order adequately encompass the various elements that should be available to the court?
Councillor McGuigan: Different people will give different answers about which disposals should or should not be retained, but I approach the issue with an open mind. First, we need to ensure that the new community payback order will make a real difference in rendering our communities safer and more secure and more comfortable with the processes of justice. We need to be careful not to make the mistaken assumption that was made previously—and perhaps even is being made now—that a community payback order will necessarily always work. In community sentencing, we have some pretty poor examples out there as well as some excellent examples that are working. Exemplars of good practice and proven impact should be retained, but those that are less credible and less effective should be examined to see whether they can be improved and be made more robust and more effective. Those that cannot be improved need to be replaced by those that are more effective.

The question is a good one, in that it highlights that the community payback arrangements will fall down if they are weak and if they are simply rhetoric that sounds fine without really making a difference out there. Some people have suggested that the proposals are a move away from tough justice, but I believe in effective justice. The community payback order will be a move towards effective justice if the arrangements are made properly, carefully and thoughtfully as part of a collective analysis and understanding of what we are trying to achieve.

Robert Brown: I believe in effective justice as well, but let me just pursue that point so that we are clear that we are talking about the same thing when we talk about effective justice. How do you define what is effective in this context? What is your understanding of that?

Councillor McGuigan: First of all, I define effective justice as justice that renders our communities safer, happier and better places to live in. Effective justice is about ensuring that the victims of crime are looked after. The victims need to be comfortable that the processes of justice have been effected properly and in a way that they would associate with being fair and with giving the desired reparation both to the community and to themselves.

Of course, we can use terms such as punishment, retribution and restitution, but there must also be rehabilitation. Offending behaviour happens in our communities, and offenders will go back into those communities. It is imperative that the community is also prepared to work collectively to ensure that the support arrangements are in place to enable rehabilitation and reconnection of the offender with the community. That is the broader aspiration that I have for what might be called effective justice.

Robert Brown: Let us strip that down a little. The community payback order comprises a payback element—the work that is done, which needs to be effective and meaningful—and a rehabilitative element. As the representative of local authorities throughout Scotland, what is your view on the current availability of programmes to meet those needs through the existing community disposals, never mind any that might follow?

Councillor McGuigan: That is a big issue that needs to be faced. I doubt very much whether there are sufficient programmes available for community sentences, especially if we move towards an increased demand or call on services that are to be delivered locally. The quality of such programmes is another matter, too. We need to question whether current resources are sufficient to enable quality, effectiveness and credibility in community sentences.

I firmly believe, and it is COSLA’s position, that as long as community sentencing is properly resourced, proper training is given and the support services that are needed more widely are built in, it will not simply be about people doing community work and communicating that to the public, although that is important, but will make a real difference to the individual and to the community against which that individual has offended and to which they will return.

Robert Brown: You made an interesting comment about the quality of some of the programmes and remedies that are available, which is slightly to one side of the resource issue. Questions about quality imply that some programmes could be stopped, and the resources redistributed to something a bit more effective. Have you any thoughts about the mechanisms through which that might most effectively be done? It is a key issue.

Councillor McGuigan: I do not know that it is as key an issue as you make out, but it is important. We have to ask what the deficiencies are in the programmes that are perhaps not the best type of programme. If they are not working or making a difference, we need to ask why and perhaps build in the missing features to enable them to work better.

In some situations, of course, a particular programme will just not work and will not be convincing in any way. It then has to be removed from the programme catalogue; the resource for it then becomes available, but that will not be a great amount. Resources will also be focused on trying to improve the quality and extent of the current community payback programmes and of the new ones that are introduced.
Robert Brown: Accepting that resource is limited—on which subject we will no doubt hear more later—it is important that the programmes that are in place work, are effective and achieve the best results with the money that is put in. Does COSLA have an angle on how effective those programmes are throughout the country? What improvements could be made in how they are assessed and judged and in who decides on it all?

Councillor McGuigan: COSLA works closely with the community justice authorities, which have a major role to play in assessing and commenting on the quality of the provision, and it makes interventions where it considers that it is necessary to do so. Local authorities have a responsibility to ensure that they face up to their commitments under the concordat and the single outcome agreements. Those agreements are part of the concordat and are credible; they are not a pretence. We are focusing on those main aspects.

Robert Brown: Does Mike Callaghan have any thoughts on that?

Mike Callaghan (Convention of Scottish Local Authorities): I reiterate the points that Councillor McGuigan has made. Community payback orders are essentially a spend-to-save option. Such an option involves the redistribution of current resources to the new system. You are asking about where the resources will come from. There could be opportunities for existing programmes and initiatives such as drug and alcohol strategies and modern apprenticeship initiatives, which are currently working in isolation, to converge and join up their activity and resources to implement community payback orders.

The programme as a whole is a challenge, especially given the economic downturn and the financial context of diminishing resources in the public sector. However, we have to consider where opportunities exist, and examine other areas in which a shift in resources towards the wider local government family can be implemented.

Robert Brown: My final point is on the “robust” and “visible” aspects of the Scottish Government’s intentions in this regard. You have dealt with that issue to a degree, but what do you think is required to make the community orders robust and visible? I suppose that that relates, to some extent, to the victim end of the issue.

Councillor McGuigan: One of the most important aspects is resources. You asked Mike Ewart and Rona Sweeney about that earlier. The big issue is the transitional funding that will be required as we move more people out into the community. We need to be mature about how we do that, because it will not work if resources are limited.

We have made representations on the basis that we associate fully with the principles of the bill but, unless the resources are available and there is a willingness to redistribute resources between the set of agencies—not just the Scottish Prison Service, but local authorities and the national health service—it will be extremely difficult to make the significant improvements that we believe are necessary.

Robert Brown: The Government has stated that community sentences will be “robust, immediate and visible”. The use of the word “immediate” is fairly obvious and has a number of implications, but what do you understand by the words “robust” and “visible” in the context? What are the implications for local authorities?

Councillor McGuigan: A robust community sentence is one that requires the offender to undertake open and committed service to the community. That can take many different forms. I could list four or five that exist in North Lanarkshire—four that are highly commendable and one that is not worth as much as the other four.

Communication is an important aspect. The community and the victims must know and understand that community sentences exist and that they enrich their community, not just in the short term through the projects that are undertaken but in the long term through the lasting, sustainable impact that they have on the community. That sustainability is crucial. We need sensible communication about what is happening so that people realise the value of the community payback programme. If the programme is managed properly—sensitively, supportively and robustly—the individual is likely to become reconnected to and reassociated with their community, and the community will benefit from that.

I am a great believer in communities playing a bigger role in the justice system. I have often said that the justice system almost captures justice issues and takes them away from the communities where the offences occur and where the victims live. There needs to be a better way of reconnecting communities to the whole system.

Paul Martin: Good morning, gentlemen. Councillor McGuigan mentioned the chaotic lifestyles of many of the offenders who will participate in the community payback programme. How realistic is it to assume that those individuals will complete their community paybacks? We know that community service involves many challenges. Why should the community payback programme be different?
Councillor McGuigan: It will be different only if it is of better quality and has a better combination of input from the various agencies. I have seen community sentencing arrangements that have input from only one agency. If we consider, for example, social work departments and the supervision that takes place there, criminal justice social work is a tiny corner of what social work does. That must change. All the community agencies must recognise that they have a role to play and they must be part and parcel of the thinking processes to identify meaningful, sensible, useful and—I use the word again—effective community sentences. In the past, we have perhaps not done that. We now have an opportunity to examine the bigger picture and involve the other agencies.

Paul Martin: We talk about the community justice authorities and the other agencies working together. We talk a good game about delivery and integration, and we can legislate for that in respect of community payback orders, but how can we be assured that individuals who have chaotic lifestyles will complete the programme? No matter which agencies supervise them, they might decide that they do not want to complete the programme. What is different about the proposed approach? In the 10 years that I have been in Parliament, I have not yet met a witness who has not said, “We need to work together as part of the programme.” What is different about the new programme?

Councillor McGuigan: I have also encountered that situation and I sometimes rebuke the very people who say, “Well, we’ve been doing it for 10 years and it never worked so if we do it again it won’t work”. You have to question whether the new programme will work differently.

I disagree with you that the multi-agency approach has been as obvious as you have found it to be—I have not found it to be so obvious as that in the community sentencing and community activity arrangements that are in place. It will be a challenge. One of the key agencies will be the community justice authority, which is responsible for looking at how well and how effectively the various agencies and community planning partners are delivering on their single outcome agreements in the area. If they do not deliver on the outcome agreements, they should be held to account. You and I have a responsibility to ensure that they are held to account if they are failing.

Paul Martin: Can I take you back to consider the individual offender? You are talking about support for the offender that you hope to see in place and I am sure that we will come on to resources, but the offender has not changed; they are still the same offender who has completed community service previously and who has now been asked to complete community payback. If that offender is leading a chaotic lifestyle today, will it make any difference if we pass legislation in the Scottish Parliament? Will they become a new type of offender? What evidence is there that they will change their chaotic lifestyle?

Councillor McGuigan: I think that there will be a change. We are not talking about the offender simply going through the same old process that they went through before; there is a change in terms of the specific, person-centred support that the individual will get. I take your point that that is a necessary part of the programme. If we were simply to follow the old way where everyone went through exactly the same curriculum—for want of a better word—and the particular features of their requirements did not matter, it would fail. However, if we are ensuring that the process is offender centred as far as the rehabilitation aspect is concerned, it has to be victim centred as well because communities are the victims.

The programme will work if all the agencies are working to a plan, including local authority housing, education, employment skills and confidence building, citizenship and trying to reconnect, as you say, an alienated group of people who have been round the course a few times and do not have a great deal of confidence in the system. We have a new opportunity to make sure that those additional services are built in and we do not simply come up with a list that says, “Here’s what we do and it’s the same for Joe, Jimmy and Annie as it is for everyone else.” The approach has to be more person centred.

Paul Martin: You have said that you want to put in place support mechanisms for chaotic individuals that you hope will have a more positive outcome. We know that the current arrangements for community service mean that a high number of people do not complete it. I cannot remember what the statistic is, but I think that Mr McLeish referred to it in his evidence. Are you willing to state on the record today that we will see a significant reduction in the number of those who do not complete payback orders? Surely if you are so confident—yours has been a confident performance today—we can get something on the record today to the effect that we will see a massive reduction in the numbers of those—

Councillor McGuigan: Of course you cannot say that and you would not expect me to. I am confident that the arrangements that will be put in place under the bill will improve on the current ones. I am also confident that community planning partnerships and the Scottish Government will have big responsibilities in the area and they have to make sure that they meet them fully. You will have a responsibility to ask questions if they are failing. However, if you want me to put my hand up and say, “Look, everything’s going to be wonderful,” you have the wrong man sitting in this chair.

The Convener: That was a very wise response, Councillor Mcguigan.

Cathie Craigie: Will ask some questions on resource issues.

Cathie Craigie: As the convener has instructed, I will move on to resources. According to the financial memorandum, the majority of additional costs incurred under section 14, which relates to community payback orders, under section 17, which relates to the presumption against short periods of imprisonment, and under section 20, which relates to reports about supervised persons, will be funded under section 27A of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968. Given that that funding, which is provided to local authorities, is in turn channelled through the community justice authorities, COSLA is clearly right to point out in its submission that if these provisions are to work, they have to be resourced.

In your submission, you say that there has to be a “radical shift of resources”. The same comment has been made in other evidence that we have received. However, as you might have heard, the Scottish Prison Service has just told us that there might not be that kind of “radical shift of resources” from the areas that I had thought might be targeted. What are the resource implications of these provisions for local authorities?

Councillor Mcguigan: If you are asking me to tell you where you can find the money to deliver this—

Cathie Craigie: I do not have to find the money.

Councillor Mcguigan: Okay. If you are asking me to tell you where we, collectively, can find the money, I think that the matter must be addressed in an entirely separate review. Otherwise we will be putting legislation in place and expecting the resources for it to be somehow conjured up.

I simply do not think that the bill will work if the necessary resources are not in place. Local authority budgets are not as abundant as you might believe, and we are making considerable efficiency savings—cuts, if you like—in many services. As you point out, the provisions for community payback orders, which involve reviews, putting in place responsible officers and meeting other responsibilities, will cost the local authority a fair amount, which I cannot quantify at the moment. I know that the Scottish Prison Service and others have argued that if fewer people require certain services, it might free up resources. However, as has been pointed out, prison staff, for example, will still be required, so such moves might not free up the massive amount of resources that you might think. On the other hand, some pressure might be taken off the NHS.

As a result, we need an overall review of the existing sources where resources might be found and transferred, distributed or whatever. However, if the money cannot be found from those quarters, we have to put our money where our mouth is and find the resources to ensure that the bill works in making our communities safer and reducing reoffending. It simply will not work otherwise, and I give my full backing to such moves.

Having discussed the issue with him, I know that the Cabinet Secretary for Justice is well aware of my view that the bill must be backed up with resources. Indeed, he, too, would like to see those resources being made available. The committee has to say for itself what the priorities should be; if one happens to be the safety and wellbeing of communities, the bill should be on the receiving end of resources.

Cathie Craigie: COSLA also states in its written submission:

> “interim transitional financial arrangements should be established”

Have there been reasonable returns from the cabinet secretary on that? Is it too early to discuss it?

Councillor Mcguigan: It is too early, although there is continuing discussion among us about the bill’s financial implications. I repeat that, if the bill’s intentions are not accompanied by a big resource—I will not quantify how big—the bill will be much weaker than it should and could be.

Cathie Craigie: Do you agree that it is important that the committee ensures that financial resources follow the bill?

Councillor Mcguigan: That is critical.

Cathie Craigie: Okay. I think that that is it on the resources aspect, convener. However, does the COSLA representative want to highlight anything in the bill that has not been discussed in this session?

Councillor Mcguigan: No, nothing jumps to mind. I have covered most of the business.

The Convener: Yes, that is fair. Do members have any other questions?

Stewart Maxwell: Can I take the witnesses back to the proposed Scottish sentencing council? I did not ask a supplementary question on that earlier because I wanted to double-check what the COSLA written submission said on it. Nigel Don asked earlier whether you could elaborate on how the relationship between CJAs and the sentencing council would work in practice. COSLA’s written evidence says:

“COSLA welcomes the establishment of the Scottish Sentencing Council. However, it is important that this new Scottish Sentencing Council works alongside Community Justice Authorities as part of the wider Local Government Family to ensure that community sentences operate in a manner that enhances their credibility with the Courts and with the general public.”

I want to ask the same question that Nigel Don asked. How do you envisage that relationship working in practice, given what your written evidence says?

Councillor McGuigan: It would work through the CJAs working very closely to their plans, which were submitted to, and approved by, the cabinet secretary. Those plans must interface with, or be woven into, the local authorities’ and the community planning partnerships’ single outcome agreements. If that does not happen and a CJA operates in isolation from the collective aspiration of key agencies in our communities, something is amiss. The CJAs will have to sit at the table with other agencies. I cannot be positive about this, but I think that most CJAs are, indeed, regarded as key partners in community planning partnerships. The CJAs’ way of working and their plans, policies and proposals should therefore be mirrored in single outcome agreements.

Stewart Maxwell: I accept what you say about CJAs, single outcome agreements, local government and community planning partnerships, but the question was really about how CJAs and the Scottish sentencing council would work together on a day-to-day basis. How would that relationship operate in practice, given that your written submission states that it is an important feature?

Councillor McGuigan: Right. I am sorry that I went into other territory. It makes sense that the sentencing council and CJAs understand what each other is about and what is available—what the strengths and weaknesses are of, for example, community payback. If a CJA does not have programmes that are tailored to the needs of particular individuals, it needs to talk to the sentencing council about what variations or alternatives are possible. That would seem to me to be a sensible, on-going dialogue. We must be careful that CJAs do not influence, or overinfluence, what the sentencing council will do—that is similar to Mike Ewart’s earlier point. I, too, do not think that CJAs should sit on the sentencing council, just as I do not think that the SPS should sit on it. It is about on-going dialogue, sharing of information and analysis of what is and is not working and how it can be reviewed to ensure that it has the intended impact.

Stewart Maxwell: That is helpful.

The Convener: We must move on. I thank Councillor McGuigan and Mr Callaghan for their evidence, which is greatly appreciated.

11:30

Meeting suspended.

11:32

On resuming—

The Convener: We will now hear from the third panel of the morning. I welcome the Lord Advocate, the Rt Hon Elish Angiolini QC; the Solicitor General for Scotland, Frank Mulholland QC; and John Logue, head of policy division at the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service. Thank you for coming. We will move straight to questioning.

I open on the possibly vexed issue of the Scottish sentencing council. As you will have seen from the evidence that we have taken until now, the proposal to set up a sentencing council has attracted criticism from the judiciary, which thinks that its independence would be undermined. Do you have a view on the matter?

Elish Angiolini (Lord Advocate): Traditionally, the Lord Advocate does not play a significant role in sentencing, but she does have a role. One witness suggested that I have no locus in sentencing, but that is not the position in law. The Lord Advocate has the right to appeal what is perceived to be an unduly lenient sentence, but that is interpreted restrictively. Because the Lord Advocate and her prosecutors are the gatekeepers of what comes into the system and of the forum in which it is prosecuted, they have a significant influence on the sentencing process. We also provide information to the court, which influences sentencing. We have a significant interest and role.

In my view, a sentencing council can only be a good thing. I do not think that it would interfere with judicial independence. The Sentencing Guidelines Council in England and Wales has been a significant contributor to developing jurisprudence, on the basis that it is a resource for judges. One difficulty that our judges have faced in the past is the lack of availability of a systematic resource to which they can refer and from which they can seek advice or guidance. The sentencing council will be a huge addition to the justice system. As well as helping to achieve consistency and provide transparency and understanding of the sentencing process, it will allow judges to obtain information that will assist them in the sentencing process. At the moment, they have difficulty in pinpointing such a resource. Altogether, the sentencing council will be a real benefit to the judiciary, and I hope that that is how they will see it in years to come.

The structure that is proposed in the bill will not result in interference with judges' independence. It is quite clear that it will not be the council's role to provide prescriptive mandatory guidelines or to interfere with judges' independence in particular cases. The council will provide guidelines that the courts must "have regard to", which means that they must give them consideration. If it is considered that the application of the guidelines is not acceptable in a specific case, reasons will be given why that is the case—that is a rational approach. Equally, if the appeal court considers that the judge's determination was correct, it can refer the matter back to the sentencing council. Altogether, the bill presents a package that I think will only improve the sentencing process and assist our judiciary.

The Convener: As you say, the guidelines that the sentencing council issues will not be compulsory. It might be said that they will give a nudge in what is considered to be the appropriate direction. What would you say to the argument that, in effect, there is a sentencing council in force at the moment, which is called the appeal court?

The Lord Advocate: The appeal court has the ability to produce guideline opinions, and I am extremely enthusiastic about its doing so. It has not done that particularly frequently, although it has been asked to do so in relation to a pending case in which I have appealed sentences. When the appeal court produces guideline opinions, that is a highly effective way of looking at sentencing across the board and providing a consistency—as opposed to a uniformity—of approach.

The benefit of having a sentencing council will be that the court will be able to look at other information on aspects of sentencing that do not relate solely to the judiciary. As a public prosecutor, I prosecute in the public interest. Constitutionally, I must do so independently, but that does not mean that I exist in a hermetically sealed vacuum when I determine what the public interest is. I take account of information from a number of sources. That is extremely important. The independence of judges in community courts in the United States is not constrained by their going out and speaking to their local communities; in fact, that enhances their understanding of what the problems are and how the public view matters.

At the moment, it is difficult for judges to know, other than through the tabloid media or the editors of the tabloid media, whether their sentencing reflects public interest, and I am not sure that that is the best way to approach sentencing. The council will create an opportunity for a much more systematic approach to be adopted and will give judges a resource that will allow them to understand and research whether their sentencing approach is relevant, appropriate and effective.

The Convener: No one doubts that sentencing is sometimes a complex and difficult issue. We have received some contradictory evidence about alleged inconsistencies in sentencing. I know that you might have reservations about commenting in any great depth but, in your experience, is there a serious problem with inconsistency?

The Lord Advocate: When judges sentence, they are not sentencing widgets. Sentencing is not a process that is subject to some form of regular procedure that will result in uniformity for all sentences, and nor should it be. Every case is different. Judges must approach cases on a fact-specific basis. If they were not to do so, it would result in arbitrary outcomes. They must consider not only the nature of the crime, but the circumstances of the accused and the victim, the issue of whether there was any provocation and the context in which the crime took place.

There is no such thing as a uniform crime. The crime of murder, for example, covers a vast range of activity and the nature of the conduct can become more aggravated depending on the circumstances of the case. Therefore, it can be difficult to assess whether there is inconsistency in the sentencing process, because of the absence of data and, indeed, of a system that is open to examination. I have been a practitioner in the courts over the years and I can tell you that there is anecdotal evidence across the board that some sentences surprise practitioners and that in certain circumstances it is difficult to predict what the sentence will be. As a prosecutor, that concerns me, because if a victim of a crime in certain circumstances was to ask me what sentence they could expect the accused to receive, I would be challenged in answering, unless I had an idea of who the judge was, which might give me an indication of the range of the sentence. The situation would be similar for defence counsel. The individual judge might have a significant impact on the sentence.

Lord Macfadyen put it well in his report when he said that even if there is no information that shows beyond a doubt that there is inconsistency across the board, there is certainly a perception of that. That perception might be driven to an extent by the tabloid media, but I can say from my experience as a prosecutor that there are instances of sentences that are outwith the general realm of sentences that are imposed.

On days when a particular judge is known to be on duty, there might be a queue of enthusiastic guilty pleas, but on other days, the court can be a veritable desert as far as guilty pleas are concerned. We will always have some judges who are more lenient and others who are more
The Lord Advocate: I am not sure that it is an issue. The structures of the courts are such that they remove the opportunity to select a judge. Someone might want to do that if they know that a particular judge is an extremely hefty sentencer—they might be inclined to try to avoid that court. That will not be ironed out by the existence of a sentencing council, because, as I said, there will always be judges who are more draconian and those who are more lenient. The important thing is that guidance will be available, which the council will have looked at. The judge will have regard to that guidance and he will explain his departure from it in the context of the sentence, which, in turn, will allow the prosecutor to determine whether the sentence is within reason and within the range established by HM Advocate v Bell.

The Convener: Have you seen any significant increases in section 76 applications dependent upon the particular judge?

The Lord Advocate: You might be relieved to hear that we do not research the sentencing of judges on that basis. There has certainly been a rise in section 76 pleas since the introduction of the Bonomy reforms and the Du Plooy judgment, which is much to be welcomed. However, we as the prosecution do not put a searchlight on where they occur.

The Solicitor General has just pointed out that you would not know who the judge would be for a section 76 plea, which would perhaps avoid the vagaries of someone attempting to ensure that a particular judge was on duty on a particular occasion.

Cathie Craigie: The convener raised the issue of the Lord Advocate’s recourse to the appeal court. Can you advise the committee today—or perhaps later in writing—how many times, on average, the Crown would appeal a sentence?

The Lord Advocate: There was a recent parliamentary question on that. I think that there have been 68 appeals against unduly lenient sentences since the provision on that was introduced. The approach that I have taken—and which my predecessors have taken—is that we will not take appeals unless there is a significant issue regarding the case. We do not wish to use the mechanism constantly as a way of directing the judiciary in its sentencing procedure. It is used selectively in circumstances that have been considered judicially in the case of HM Advocate v Bell.

The Convener: We move on to the issue of voluntary intoxication. Stewart Maxwell, who has no interests to declare, will lead the questioning.

Stewart Maxwell: Thank you for clarifying that, convener.

Section 24 provides that the voluntary consumption of alcohol leading to intoxication cannot be taken into account as a mitigating factor in sentencing. Given current sentencing practice, I wondered whether you believe that that provision is required.

The Lord Advocate: Most judges would suggest that voluntary intoxication does not form the basis of mitigation and, in some circumstances, some judges would treat it as an aggravating factor. However, that does not prevent a culture in Scotland in which, if you were intoxicated, you will put that matter before the court by way of mitigation. Day in, day out, notwithstanding the understanding that it does not mitigate, solicitors continue to put it before the courts in mitigation that their client would not have carried out the crime if sober. That is particularly prevalent as an excuse or as a form of mitigation in domestic abuse cases.

Although our judges would not take into account intoxication, law is not just for judges, solicitors and those who use the courts; it is for the public. An important message would be sent out if we codified what is already known in our common law, which is that alcoholic intoxication is not a mitigating factor and that defendants who have imbibed alcohol will not have their sentences reduced because of that. It is important, in the current context in Scotland, to enshrine that message in our law.

Stewart Maxwell: I agree, particularly in relation to domestic abuse. I, too, have heard such examples. Should the provision be extended beyond alcohol to other intoxicating substances?

The Lord Advocate: Voluntary intoxication, be it through alcohol or other drugs, can result in certain offences being committed, but alcohol is still the primary feature in the cases that cross the threshold of the prosecutors, particularly in relation to aggressive and violent conduct. Certain drugs can inhibit aggressive behaviour, although they... are not a neutral aspect, but drugs are often significant in so far as a person’s addiction—their withdrawal symptoms and their need to secure a fix—is the reason for a crime being perpetrated in the first place.

Stewart Maxwell: Some of the evidence received by the committee has been about the issue of a drunk person who committed an offence or a breach of the peace, but who became drunk as a result of a personal tragedy, such as a family bereavement. It is suggested that such circumstances might be mitigating. What is your view?

Also, you touched on alcoholism. Many people—I hope most people nowadays—see alcoholism as an illness. What is your view of someone who commits an offence when they are trying to get over that illness but they fall off the wagon?

The Lord Advocate: Those are two separate and distinct issues. There is the issue of the underlying cause of the intoxication. In the first example that you gave, in which someone who is suffering from profound grief drinks and then commits an offence, it is the grief that is the underlying cause or mitigating circumstance to which you would attach any significance—if that were relevant to the sentence.

Likewise, if someone is an alcoholic, they have an illness—a condition—that is one of the causes of their taking alcohol; it is therefore alcoholism rather than intoxication that is the mitigating circumstance. There is a distinction here. If someone has become a chronic alcoholic, there is often organic damage to their brain. A situation in which someone has gone out and had five Bacardi Breezers, three After Shocks and ten pints of Carlsberg is different from one in which someone has developed a personality disorder or organic brain damage as a result of years and years of alcohol abuse.

The Convener: We turn to serious organised crime—a matter that I know is of particular interest to the Solicitor General. Paul Martin will lead the questioning.

Paul Martin: Lord Advocate, can you clarify the current legal position? Can people already be prosecuted for conspiring to commit a crime or inciting others to commit a crime?

The Lord Advocate: Yes.

Paul Martin: Why should that be confirmed in legislation? Why has the Government introduced the sections in the bill that refer to serious organised crime?

The Lord Advocate: The provisions add to the armoury of the police, the prosecution and the criminal justice system more generally. As we know from information that was recently published by the serious organised crime task force, and as communities already know, serious organised crime is a huge problem throughout the world. Such crime does not understand or observe borders. It attracts investors from abroad. It is important to ensure that a signal goes out to those who might have the propensity to invest in organised crime in this country that they will not be comfortable here, and that a modern, contemporary law gives that strong message. Where people will invest in illegal activities is a consideration.

On whether the bill simply duplicates what already exists, it is, to some extent, not essential to have the provisions. With creativity, we could find ways under the common law of prosecuting most of the offences that are covered. However, section 25 in particular goes further than what is currently seen as conspiracy. Currently, there is a conspiracy if two or more persons agree to commit a crime. However, section 25 goes further back than that. It states:

“A person who agrees with at least one other person to become involved in serious organised crime commits an offence.”

Things are taken a stage back. We are talking about the stage of preparation and the stage of perpetration. In many cases, we have evidence that does not quite show that the person was at the actual conspiracy stage; rather, it relates to their becoming involved in a conspiracy. The person will have set up himself or herself and their business to become involved in that, but we could not get sufficient evidence to show the commission of a specific crime, albeit that generic evidence was available that showed involvement with people connected with money laundering, drug supplying or human trafficking, for instance. The offence in question will be useful as another aspect of our prosecution armoury.

There is also a useful message about aggravation, which is a separate and distinct offence. Let us consider an 18-year-old or a 19-year-old with a conviction on indictment for assault to severe injury in their schedule of previous convictions. If such a conviction is aggravated by their involvement in serious organised crime, an entirely different message and signal will be given in later years and to those who may employ them in the future about what that assault was about and what they might have been involved in. There is therefore a question of labelling, which we have considered with racist crime and more recently with hate crime. Such an approach is useful in showing the nature of the activity as well as whether the crime was innovative or new.

Prosecutors currently have the choice of prosecuting malicious mischief or vandalism. It is not a question of legislating for the sake of legislating; rather, it is about giving clear messages to the public about what the law is and how we treat and deal with aggravated offences by reference to membership of a conspiracy. I hope that, in addition to dealing with the crime itself, the courts will clearly show and reflect the seriousness with which engagement in serious organised crime, intimidation, the exploitation of human beings for human trafficking or sexual purposes, or engagement in drug trafficking are treated in Scotland by reference to the aggravation and by having the particular offences available. I think that the provisions will be very useful.

The Solicitor General may have more to say about the matter. His discussions with the Attorney General of British Columbia brought the existence of such offences in Canada to our attention.

The Convener: It would be useful to hear from the Solicitor General at this stage.

Frank Mulholland (Solicitor General for Scotland): I visited British Columbia a couple of years ago, where I discussed serious and organised crime. British Columbia is blighted by that problem too. There was a raft of common-law or codified offences in Canada to deal with the matter, but for the reasons that the Lord Advocate articulated, the view was taken that a message had to be sent out and additional tools had to be given to law enforcement agencies and prosecutors to deal with it. There was a particular problem with Montreal biker gangs, I think, as a direct result of drug-dealing activities involving murder and that type of thing. That is why that particular legislation was introduced. I spoke to the Attorney General of British Columbia at the time—I think that there had been five successful prosecutions.

They take a slightly different approach to sentencing in this regard. If someone is convicted of a substantive offence and the aggravation, then by law the sentences must be consecutive. I do not understand that that is proposed in relation to the bill, but they thought that that was of particular use.

Paul Martin: I think that the Lord Advocate said at the outset that some elements of duplication are involved and that current legal remedies can be taken forward. Surely they can already be used as a way of sending out a public message? From a prosecutor's point of view, how helpful is it for politicians—myself included—to keep on sending out the message that we want to send out a message. There are many ways of doing that other than by duplicating legislation. The law is there to be enforced. If a legal remedy is available to us, why do we not enforce it? Why do we not use that route to send out the message? Are we not reinventing the wheel? I appreciate that there are additional elements to some parts of the bill, but there is clear duplication in other parts. How helpful is that to you as a prosecutor?

The Solicitor General for Scotland: There is duplication across the common law, for example between the common law and statute on vandalism and malicious mischief. Indeed, there is duplication across serious and organised crime—there is a raft of offences that we can deploy when indicting criminals. However, we seek to say that a person has committed a crime as part of a serious and organised crime group for the purpose of obtaining money, perhaps through drug dealing, intimidation and violence, people trafficking or labour—that type of thing. Legislation gives a framework for prosecutors and investigators in considering serious and organised crime. In my view, that is very useful, and that is the view of the Canadian authorities, too.

Paul Martin: I turn to the definition of serious and organised crime. Some have suggested that we are not focusing on what is serious and organised crime. If you have read the Official Report of last week's meeting, you will know that the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland could not confirm what its view of serious and organised crime is. Surely we have fallen away from the focus of the bill.

The Lord Advocate: I saw a suggestion that two people coming together to steal a pork pie or some other type of meat pie could amount to a serious and organised crime under the definition. Of course, if two people conspire to steal a meat pie, I can—theoretically—indict them for that. Currently, that is under the common law. However, I would not do so, because if I did, I would receive criticism—and not delicate criticism—from the judiciary and others. I would be seen as having lost all common sense. Our common law allows us to indict a whole range of crimes from breach of the peace and assault and prosecute people under summary complaint. The definition in the bill is "indictable offence". Clearly, the definition straddles a number of different types of offence.

One thing that we have learned about serious and organised crime is its capacity for innovation and change. The people who commit these crimes are innovative creatures. Fifteen or even 10 years ago, we as prosecutors could not possibly have envisaged the serious and organised crime that we see at the moment. We could not have envisaged the nature of the conduct in which these criminals are engaged. I would like to see flexibility, in so far as it is possible, so that we are not caught with a gap in the law that means that we cannot deal with something as a result of having narrowed it down to a schedule in such a way as to prescribe the nature of the offence. That would be the difficulty. For instance, let us consider those who engage in the trade of child pornography. Fifteen or 20 years ago, it would have been very difficult to envisage that type of trade taking place, but it is certainly taking place at the moment. We want to be able to take into account such new types of crime and prosecute people without being prescribed by what we currently know and recognise as organised crime.

Paul Martin: Is that specific example an area where you cannot intervene at the moment? Do you not have a legal intervention that allows you to prosecute those engaged in child pornography?

The Lord Advocate: Of course we do. As with most things, we can intervene. One of the beauties of the common law is that it allows a degree of flexibility, but with the jurisprudence of the European convention on human rights, particularly article 7, there is a drive towards greater certainty about what constitutes an offence. The exercise of our courts’ power to declare what is a crime is likely to fall into desuetude.

The benefit of having a wider definition is that it gives us the capacity to indict immediately, without having to wait for legislation, when an innovative new business is created that should clearly be struck at in the context of serious organised crime, as opposed to the simple commission of fraud. Even emergency legislation can miss that opportunity. For example, we know that terrorists use credit card fraud as an effective way in which to raise money to perpetrate their activities. I could indict that activity as a fraud, but I would not do so. I would use the terrorism legislation, which duplicates the crime to some extent, but gives a clear message on purpose and intention and provides a framework.

On the point about duplication, there is a distinction to be made. The legislation gives the activity a flavour and a label, so it sends a clear message on the nature of the activity not just to the sentencer at the time but to sentencers in the future, to the public, to prospective employers, and to those who consider people for immigration. The provision would also be useful throughout Europe. If an individual who had committed an assault in the United Kingdom was thinking of settling down in Paris, it would be useful for the authorities there to know that they committed the assault for the purposes of serious organised crime.

The Solicitor General for Scotland: I have a good example of that, to supplement what the Lord Advocate said. There is evidence that some illegal dumping of toxic waste is related to serious organised crime. That is a statutory offence on its own, regardless of the context. However, if it is committed for the furtherance of serious organised crime, that will aggravate the offence, and the courts will be able to deal with the crime in the context in which it was committed.

Paul Martin: Concern has been expressed about the wide scope of the offence of failing to report serious organised crime. What are your views on that?

The Lord Advocate: The offence is modelled on the proceeds of crime legislation and the provisions on terrorist structures that are contained therein. I have no difficulty with that. There is a clear protection for legal privilege, but it should not be used as a cover by solicitors or other professionals who would facilitate crime. We would consider the facts of each case, but we need certainty about that.

In the current environment, if someone goes to a solicitor and, with no reference or background information, wants them to hire some barns in disparate and remote parts of Scotland, the solicitor will be aware of the problem that we have with cannabis cultivation and might have a basis for believing that the request is unusual. The solicitor might then acquire the information that the individual has no other business connections, and they might compile other evidence. We begin to see how professionals have a responsibility to help us to prevent the growth of organised crime.

The provision is important because a lot of organised crime can take place only with the acquiescence of certain professionals, be they estate agents, solicitors or others, who allow activity to take place through what are ostensibly legal and legitimate activities. We must ensure that we tackle that route. Organised criminals need professionals to launder their money, to transact, and to lease properties. I am not concerned that the provision is too widely drawn, but if that is seen to be the case, we can consider whether amendments might provide reassurance.

Nigel Don: I am grateful to the Lord Advocate for her comment that the European convention on human rights is and will increasingly be inconsistent with the Scottish courts’ declaratory power to establish what they believe the law is now when it was not understood to be the law before. That probably explains—for the first time to me—why we increasingly come up with statute law that is wider than we might have wanted. It is because the courts cannot expand it for us.

In that context, I wonder whether the definitions of a serious offence in section 25(2)(b) are wide enough. It has been suggested to us that threats and intimidation are a part of the culture that we are trying to work against but that they might not be covered.
The Lord Advocate: They would be covered by the current definition. Threats and intimidation are indictable offences; the outcome depends on the situation in which they take place. I could indict a threat or extortion in the High Court—indeed, we have done so.

The Solicitor General for Scotland: Just issuing a threat is, in itself, an indictable crime under Scottish common law.

Nigel Don: So you are happy with the drafting of that section.

The Solicitor General for Scotland: Yes.

The Convener: The situation is fail-safe—nobody could fall through the crack in the pavement, either way.

The Lord Advocate: Who knows? If we had a crystal ball, we could look into it.

In this context, a significant feature is the ability to mutate from one type of organised crime to another. We need the flexibility in our law that will enable us to deal with that. If we prescribe things too tightly, we will end up trying to deal with the drugs barons of 10 to 15 years’ time—who might have moved on to human trafficking or various activities that we as yet cannot conceive of—with an act from 2009 that, by that time, might appear all fuddy-duddy and passé.

Robert Brown: Lord Advocate, you say that you are comfortable with the provisions in section 28 that deal with people who have knowledge or suspicion of crimes. However, do you accept that that proposal moves on quite a distance from traditional concepts of law in this area? There is no question of the person’s involvement in crime—if there was involvement, the person could be dealt with under one of the other sections. The offence that would be created by section 28 does not concern involvement but knowledge or suspicion, which does not even go as far as knowledge. What is the essence of that crime? What are you trying to get at that you cannot get at by using the provisions on involvement?

The Lord Advocate: You are right to say that knowledge is a step away from direct involvement in activity, but I point out that the provision is modelled on provisions in the Terrorism Act 2000 and the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002. As I said earlier, it is important that we can get to people who, through their proximity to certain activity that they know to be serious organised crime, have the ability—outwith the realms of professional privilege—to provide information that would be of use to the authorities. It is important that we have that provision. The courts would judge objectively what it was reasonable to infer from the activity and what information the individual had access to. I do not think that the provision would be applied by the courts arbitrarily or on a whim; they would have to believe that it was reasonable to have such a suspicion, based on the objective facts that were available to the individual.

Robert Brown: Is the issue not to do with the individual having some sort of involvement? In its supplementary letter to the committee, ACPOS talked about situations in which an individual received benefits, such as payments of money, which would imply involvement. I am quite comfortable with the provision dealing with people who have a degree of involvement, but I have concerns about someone being prosecuted for their knowledge and suspicions, without there being some other involvement beyond that. Most people who view these matters in a traditional fashion might take that view as well.

The Lord Advocate: If I am a solicitor in practice, I may not deal with a particular client’s case but I know what is going on in the office. How would you consider that that matter should be approached?

Robert Brown: Would you elaborate on that?

The Lord Advocate: I think that, in such circumstances, the professional responsibility should be such that that knowledge is sufficient, in so far as it relates not to the privilege aspect but to the facilitation of crime. If I were a young lawyer in a firm of solicitors and I knew that in the firm something criminal was going on that involved serious and organised crime, the fact that I was not a partner or directly involved with that client should not absolve me of my professional responsibility, under the legislation, to report that.

That is why the obligations that we have placed on our financial institutions with regard to money laundering and terrorism are so important. We are dealing with a serious situation. Serious organised crime could be significantly undermining our economy and our employment laws—people involved in serious organised crime do not have to have regard to employment legislation, as they can simply intimidate or knock off those with whom they are not satisfied. They also do collateral damage to our communities in terms of the confidence of our young people and their aspirations about where they can go in their lives: if they see that those who are involved in serious organised crime are those with money and assets, that is a problem.

I understand your concern about knowledge being a step away from involvement, but I think on balance that, because of the public interest, the use of the provision is justified in the situations in which we see it being used.

Robert Brown: You seem to suggest that you would be picking off the minnows rather than going after the senior partners and others who knew more about the activities and were actually involved.

The Lord Advocate: I assure you that we would not use the provision to the exclusion of the prosecution of others—we would not let the major players off. The issue is about whether the person with knowledge of the activity would be liable to prosecution. In some cases, such people are liable to prosecution because of their own activities, and, in those cases, we use them as witnesses for the Crown. The provision would not be used arbitrarily, and discretion would be applied in those circumstances.

Robert Brown: Do you think that there are adequate protections against people being dragged into the context of the activity, even though their involvement is extremely peripheral?

The Lord Advocate: The protection is the integrity of the individual, their professional ethics and their ability to resist accommodating the activity that I described in the firm or organisation that they work in.

The difficulty is that, at the moment, there is no obligation for professionals, but if they are trained in law school about the significance of the issue, it will bring it to light. The provision will also make those who might be inclined to engage in or facilitate such criminal activity think twice about doing so, as they will be aware that the younger solicitors in the organisation and others who might have knowledge of the activity are obliged by law to report that.

Robert Brown: Can you provide us with precise examples of situations in which there has been a problem of the sort that you are talking about? I appreciate that you cannot breach people’s confidence with regard to particular cases, but can you illustrate your point more precisely? You do not need to do so today; you could do so in subsequent evidence.

The Convener: Clearly, any case the Lord Advocate referenced could not be a current case; it would have to be historical.

The Lord Advocate: Yes, I cannot talk about a case that involves on-going investigations.

Anyone who is involved in the investigation of serious organised crime—in Scotland, Europe and across the world—knows that it cannot take place without the involvement of the legitimate professionals and agents who facilitate the necessary processes. We have to get to the heart of that activity and disrupt it. If we show our willingness to do so, our professionals will ensure that their ethics and practices are such that, when individuals come to them with suitcases full of cash or demand to purchase large assets without any apparent sources of money, they ask questions proactively with a view to the circumstances that might result.

Robert Brown: Are there not already arrangements in place under money-laundering legislation and so on that deal with such situations in a much more focused way?

The Solicitor General for Scotland: An example of what we are talking about would be an estate agent who factors four or five flats on someone’s behalf finding that they are paying monthly electricity bills of £5,000 per flat. That would tip off anyone with any semblance of common sense that something strange is happening in the flats, and, if they applied that common sense, they would probably conclude that the flats were being used as cannabis farms. Should that person be able to say, “I had suspicions, but I decided not to do anything about it because I was getting a big fat fee for factoring the five flats”?

That sort of situation is not covered by money-laundering legislation but would be covered by the provision in the bill. The proposal would give law enforcement a great tool and send out a message to those who are willing to engage in serious organised crime that we have the tools to deal with them.

The Convener: This is an important aspect of the bill but, as there are no further questions on it, we will move on to deal with witness statements.

Bill Butler: Section 62 creates a power for the court to allow a witness to refer to his or her statement in the first place. What are your views on that proposed change to current practice?

The Solicitor General for Scotland: I think that the proposed change is a good thing. Let me explain why.

Many trials are really a memory test for witnesses. For example, in a cold case, witnesses who gave evidence in 1991 might be called to give evidence in 2009 and be questioned on the detail of their statement. If they cannot remember precisely what they said or if they say something slightly different, they will be accused of being inconsistent. It seems unfair that the only person in a prosecution who cannot see the statement before the trial is the witness who gave the statement in the first place.

Another aspect is that police officers are allowed to refer to their notebook as an aide-mémoire. Their notebook will often contain their own statement. Therefore, the proposed change has a precedent in Scots law in relation to police witnesses.
I think that the change will also reduce the length of trials. In my experience of many trials over the past five to 10 years, witnesses can be asked, "Was it at 5, or was it at 4? Was it rainy that day, or was it windy? You said that it was rainy, but you now say that it was windy." Cutting that questioning out of trials and getting down to the actual substance of the case would be a good thing.

Another aspect is that the statements must be accurate. The committee has heard evidence from various persons involved in the criminal justice system who—from the Official Reports that I have seen—have complained about the accuracy of police statements. I will not pretend that there are no problems, but measures are in place to deal with that, such as training, guidance and co-training with the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service on the new standard statement, which tries to focus police officers. Police officers also now have electronic notebooks. In addition, Lord Coulsfield has recommended that statements in solemn cases should be signed by the witness.

In my view, the proposed change will improve the accuracy of statements. If witnesses can see their statement in advance of giving evidence, they will be able to see whether it contains any inaccuracies that should be drawn to the attention of those involved in the case. The proposal is a further measure that will save time and improve criminal justice for witnesses. After all, we rely on witnesses to prove cases so we need to treat them with respect.

Bill Butler: Are there no potential drawbacks?

The Solicitor General for Scotland: I mentioned the accuracy of statements, which we hope the proposed change will help to improve. I see no problem with the proposals. For example, when I was over in The Hague last week to see the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, the prosecutors involved in those war crimes trials told me that they go through what they call a pre-trial proof, in which witnesses can go over their statements with the prosecutor. That also happens in other jurisdictions, including England, so I do not see why it should not happen here.

Bill Butler: That is very clear, thank you.

The Convener: We now turn to disclosure, which has caused some excitement. The questioning will be led by Robert Brown.

Robert Brown: As the Solicitor General will know from our evidence last week from Lord Coulsfield and others, it has been suggested—the subject of disclosure takes up about 15 pages of the bill—that the whole principle behind disclosure has been lost. Questions were asked about the workability of the provisions. Do the law officers have any technical views on whether the provisions are workable and practical? Could many of them be junked from the bill and put into a code of practice or something of that sort? What are your views on that general approach and on the comments that were made last week?

The Lord Advocate: I have had an opportunity to consider the provisions. The Solicitor General deals with disclosure and also heads our reference group, so he will answer the question, but first let me say that Lord Coulsfield did a tremendous piece of work, which was instigated by my predecessor as Lord Advocate, Lord Boyd, and by me as Solicitor General because of the great uncertainty resulting from the extent of our obligations. What has become apparent since then, from development of the common law through the appeal court and the Privy Council, is the extent to which matters are still capable of development. Although the essential concept appears to be breathtakingly simple, its practical application is extremely complex. Therefore, it has been necessary to bolt down, in a sense, that which might in the future have a consequence for a prosecution.

Much more streamlined legislation would be more attractive, but to leave open some issues might imperil future convictions because a decision that the obligations were different from those that had been understood by prosecutors would, to some extent, have retrospective effect. That has been one of the guarding principles. I certainly agree with the desire to make things as straightforward and simple as possible—there is a possibility that the schedules of evidence could be taken out of the bill and put into subordinate legislation. Again, I understand that Parliament likes to have, as far as possible, certainty about the law in the primary legislation rather than in subordinate legislation. I will let the Solicitor General give his views.

The Solicitor General for Scotland: Superficially, disclosure does not appear to be, and should not be, a complex matter, but when one gets heavily involved in the subject, it can be seen to be quite complex. For example, the COPFS disclosure manual that we have published on the Crown Office website contains 178 pages, 33 chapters and 11 annexes. That gives you a flavour of the complexity of disclosure in daily operations.

To echo what the Lord Advocate said, prosecutors need certainty. You need to know with which rules you must comply in order to comply with disclosure obligations. The problem with the common law is that it develops. We know from experience that there is a legal fiction that a change or development in the common law is retrospective—therefore you look at old convictions after a change in the law and it imperils old cases. The bill gives us a comprehensive set of rules so that the police and the prosecutor know that if they comply with those rules, they will comply with their disclosure obligations, which will ensure a fair trial in accordance with article 6 of the European convention on human rights.

As the Lord Advocate said, one or two matters could reasonably be taken out of the bill and put into subordinate legislation or a code of practice, such as schedules of evidence.

Robert Brown: We can look at the detail of that. One suggestion is that there should in the bill be a better statement of principle that provides a starting point, is ECHR-compliant and does what it can to allow an element of flexibility for development without losing the precision that you seek. Are you in favour of a clear statement of principle in the bill, as suggested by Lord Coulsfield?

The Solicitor General for Scotland: I agree that there should be a statement of principle in the bill, but there is one in section 89(3), which derives from the duties as set down in the most recent and up-to-date case from the Privy Council, which is McDonald, Blair and Dixon v HMA. It says that the subsection will apply where “(a) the information would materially weaken ... the prosecution case,

(b) the information would materially strengthen the accused’s case, or

(c) the information is likely to form part of the prosecution case.”

That is a statement of principle—it is our disclosure obligation. It takes into account the most up-to-date and authoritative jurisprudence on the matter from the Privy Council, and it is enshrined in the bill.

Robert Brown: To take that further, do you agree that the more complex the arrangements for the detailed rules are, the easier it will, along the line, prove to challenge some minor aspect of them and that therefore, the complexity is a bit of a challenge in itself?

The Solicitor General for Scotland: I am a great advocate of simplicity, but as I said, disclosure is a complex matter. When you look at the number of relevant provisions and sections in comparison with our disclosure manual from which we operate, they are not overly long or detailed and they give us a comprehensive set of rules or provisions. We know that if we comply with them, we will ensure a fair trial and comply with our disclosure obligations.

The Lord Advocate: On Mr Brown’s point about whether a technical failure to comply with one aspect of the disclosure obligations might result in a conviction falling, as jurisprudence has developed on article 6 of the ECHR in Scotland, the appeal courts have acknowledged that failure to disclose would not in itself render a trial unfair and contrary to article 6. Rather than consider a technical breach that might not affect a conviction, the court would consider the fairness of the whole trial and would examine, in that context, the impact and material significance of a failure to comply with the regulations.

Robert Brown: Defence statements have been subjected to even greater criticism—on the principle, rather than their detail. Evidence has consistently suggested that such statements do not work but only make things more complex. New information from England suggests that the statements are used only in a vague way and that they make little difference at the end of the day. In short, they are complex, they waste time, and they do not help in getting at the heart of the issues. What is your view?

The Lord Advocate: That was the position when Lord Coulsfield considered defence statements in England and Wales. I subsequently met the Director of Public Prosecutions for England and Wales, and learned that statutory amendments and changes in practice mean that the experience is now quite different. From the prosecution perspective, the statements are now a different and more useful creature—

Robert Brown: When were the changes made?

The Lord Advocate: I think they were made 12 to 18 months ago. John Logue, who is the head of policy here, might be more au fait with implementation. The clear message from England and Wales is that the new version of the defence statement, as now implemented, is quite a different creature from that which existed at the time of Lord Coulsfield’s work.

I am happy for the Solicitor General for Scotland to deal with these matters, but I know that there has been debate over whether the statements should be voluntary or mandatory. The prosecutor has to understand what is relevant and material to an accused, in terms of his defence, as well as what is relevant and material to the prosecution, and decisions have to be based on all the available information.

In many cases, especially High Court cases, there may be more than 3,000 statements, thousands of productions, and information that is very broad. To understand what might be relevant or of interest to the defence, it is of considerable help—in establishing the rights of the accused to a fair trial under article 6 of the ECHR—to be able to anticipate in what the defence might be interested. It is not just about assisting the prosecution; it is also about assisting the accused. It is not about prosecution by ambush or surprise—we now disclose all our relevant information—but nor should it be about defence by ambush or surprise. Things have changed with disclosure: the environment in which we prepare cases is no longer the traditional arm’s-length preparation, with defence precognition and separate Crown precognition.

If information that is relevant to the defence is esoteric or not patent, I would, as a prosecutor, want to know about that not after six weeks of trial, but before the trial commenced, because it may affect whether the prosecution should proceed at all. We should not waste the resources of the criminal justice system when a defence can clearly be made out. It is in the public interest for us to be aware of that at an early stage. Information that might assist the defence should be made known.

In Scotland, special defences are currently intimated. One is not bound by them—nor would one be by defence statements—but the special defences are restricted to particular circumstances. There are other defences for which it would, even with a crystal ball, be difficult to discern what will emerge during the trial. How can a prosecutor properly and comprehensively satisfy their obligations to the accused in the context of 3,500 statements if they have no idea what the defence will be or what might be relevant to the defence? The Solicitor General has a good example from a trial that he conducted.

The Solicitor General for Scotland: Before I give my example, I will draw on my experience at The Hague at the ICTY. I popped in to see the procedural hearing for the prosecution of Radovan Karadzic for war crimes in Serbia and Bosnia. He has been ordered by a procedural judge—Lord Bonomy: a Scottish judge who is highly regarded out there—to lodge a pre-trial brief within three weeks. As I understand it, the trial is not due to start until September or October. The pre-trial brief is a detailed case on Karadzic’s behalf that answers and sets out his defence against the allegations in the pre-trial brief that the prosecutor has lodged. That is an example of how it works on the continent; there are other jurisdictions that require such measures.

To give my example, which the Lord Advocate mentioned, I prosecuted a murder trial in Glasgow a number of years ago, which concerned a young lad who was shot at close range with a sawn-off shotgun in Kenmure Street. A special defence of incrimination was lodged, but that did not give me any details.

There was a raft of disclosure in that case, but it only became clear to me towards the end of the defence case that the details of the incrimination involved the fact that the person who had committed that awful crime was wearing a balaclava. I asked, of my own volition, whether a search of the police statements could be made to see whether there was any mention of the recovery of a balaclava in any of the nearby gardens or buildings. Lo and behold, we found a statement from a police officer who said that he had recovered a balaclava. I disclosed that fact towards the end of the defence case, but I would not have known about it if I had not received that information. I am sure that the defence would have wanted to know that well in advance of the trial. With the best will in the world, I do not have a crystal ball, and I need to be advised as to the precise details of the defence that the accused is going to put forward.

Scots law has always been based on fair notice: the defence advises the Crown of the nature of its case, then the Crown advises the defence on what the prosecution’s case is. The provision would supplement that and help to focus trials. Trials are paid for by the public purse, so we want them to focus on the issues, rather than on trying to second-guess the real issues with a crystal ball.

Robert Brown: It is an issue not about principle, but about the practicalities and how the process works. It strikes me from the way you described the balaclava example that that fact might well not have emerged from a defence statement anyway, certainly in the way that statements were used in England before the recent changes, which might have made a difference. Is not that a case for the lodging of defence statements to be optional rather than their being a more substantial requirement?

The Solicitor General: That goes back to the question of what is the nature of a trial. A trial is a test of the prosecution evidence and the defence case, if the defence wants to put forward a case. One would want to identify issues in advance of the trial because that, in my view, makes for a much better trial. It means that it will not be simply a case of taking a scattergun approach to the evidence: there will be focus to assist the court and the jury, and there will be no excessive delays or long trials. A defence statement is a good thing: it should be mandatory rather than discretionary in order to achieve the purposes that I have articulated.

Robert Brown: Can you give the committee further details of the changes in the English legislation, and how that legislation has improved the position there? The information that the committee has received suggests that there were significant issues with the English position before the legislation was introduced. Again, it is a matter of practicalities: whether the legislation is working; whether it has been in place long enough to make a difference; and whether it can be translated into the Scottish system. You do not have to supply the detail now. Perhaps you can write to the committee.

The Lord Advocate: John Logue might wish to deal with that.

John Logue (Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service): I am happy to do so. The legislative change in England and Wales is quite recent, so it might be safer if we provide the details in writing—I do not have the information with me today.

An important point of principle is that it is difficult to conceive of a reason why the defence would, at the stage of being ready to go to trial, be unable to advise anyone of what its case is. After all, as a result of the recent changes, the defence now has fair notice of the entirety of the Crown case to the extent that is required under the law, and the accused is the only person in the process who is able to say at that stage what the defence case potentially is.

There is no reason in principle why provisions that require the defence to provide a statement cannot be made to work effectively. Much of that—as I think is the case in England and Wales, on which we will provide more detail—comes down to the way in which the court manages and oversees the process. Legislation can, therefore, advance the matter only to a limited extent. The final part of the answer essentially requires—to advance the point that the Lord Advocate and the Solicitor General have made—a mature approach from all those who are involved in the criminal justice process.

The Convener: It would be helpful if someone could produce a paper for us, because that issue came—as our American baseball friends would say—from left field and has caused us some consternation.

Nigel Don: Do you expect an increased workload under the disclosure regime? I get the impression that you feel that you are doing it already and that the bill merely tells you what you need to do.

The Lord Advocate: I hope that we will to some extent reduce the workload that relates to disclosure as a result of the developments that we are currently researching. We are running pilots of pen drives, encrypted websites and so on to remove the labour intensity of the process. Disclosure was a huge additional burden when it was introduced in 2005 and it was responded to very well, given that it happened overnight. So far as the police are concerned, there should be no difference from current obligations in respect of disclosure: there is no change to the law or to the extent of our obligations. There may be alterations to working practices but—again—given the practices that have been developing, it should not be a dramatic change. It should be neutral.

Nigel Don: I will turn to the non-notification order procedures. It has been suggested that that process might not be consistent with the ECHR. Can you give us a policy steer on whether it is an acceptable way forward?

The Lord Advocate: As Lord Advocate, I will look at whatever manifestation there is of that provision at the end of the bill process and I will refer the matter to the Privy Council if I consider it to be incompatible with the ECHR. However, the issue of special procedures and non-notification has been looked at by the House of Lords in R v H and C and it has been looked at again by the House of Lords in the appeal court this week, when there was an opinion regarding special advocates. I am satisfied that, so far as is possible, the bill sets a framework that will be compatible with the ECHR as we understand it in the United Kingdom, and that much will depend on the facts of individual cases. It will ultimately be for judges to determine whether the provisions, as they operate in practice, can allow fair trials in that respect. That judicial role will be important.

Stewart Maxwell: We have received written evidence about non-invasive post mortems from the Scottish Council of Jewish Communities. In principle, do you have any objection to the introduction of non-invasive post mortems— in other words through magnetic resonance imaging scans—into the Scottish system, with the obvious caveat that the procurator fiscal would have the final say. I raise the issue not only in the light of the evidence from the Scottish Council of Jewish Communities, but because I think that Muslim communities and other communities would probably support the introduction of such post mortems and because the Coroners and Justice Bill, which is currently going through the UK Parliament, makes provision for such a change in England and Wales, following the pilot trials in Manchester. Do you have any objection in principle to something similar coming into effect in Scotland?

The Lord Advocate: No—but it would depend on the nature of the death. Stewart Maxwell referred to deaths generally, but in the context of suspicious deaths, when we are looking at potential homicide, we would require to ensure as far as possible that we present the best possible case to the court. Where possible, if there was a significant clinical history—for example, if a person had sustained injuries and it was a very long time before they died, and there were significant clinical notes as well as computed tomography scans in life and so on—the need for a very invasive post mortem might be reduced, but might nonetheless be required thereafter to satisfy the evidential tests of corroboration, if the cause of death were to become more complex because of that very fact and causation was an issue.

I do not think that non-suspicious deaths would be within the scope of the bill, but the matter is already very much of interest to procurators fiscal. Indeed, John Logue and his staff have been looking at how we can reduce, to some extent, the terrible trauma of post-mortem examination for next of kin in any circumstance, but particularly where provision can be made for view and grant, as it is referred to. A number of pathologists in Scotland will be satisfied that by looking at the clinical notes and the X-ray material that may be available, as well as at the clinical history, by viewing the body externally and by taking samples for toxicology or for other purposes, they will be able to certify death on that basis. Where possible, that will be done. In other circumstances, such an approach might not be possible.

The specific issue of the use of CT scans by the Manchester coroner is something that we have considered. We visited the Manchester coroner with a view to establishing whether such an approach could be introduced in Scotland. That study is on-going and Mr Logue will be able to assist the committee on where that work is now.

John Logue: We are considering the matter closely because of representations that have been made to us. However, it is important to bear in mind a number of important differences.

In the context of the statutory scheme and the operation of the coroner’s role, the legislation in England and Wales specifies when post mortems are required. We have a very different scheme in Scotland, so we need to consider whether MRI scan post mortems are useful, whether legislation is required for such post mortems to happen, and whether the broader role that the procurator fiscal has in relation to the investigation of deaths offers other opportunities.

There are other ways in which the procurator fiscal investigates deaths in Scotland, which mean that the use of such equipment—as it is envisaged in England and Wales—would not be necessary in Scotland. The answer, as the Lord Advocate has said, is that there is in principle no objection to its use, but the context may be very different. It may not be required as it is in England and Wales, and we are happy to consider other ways in which we can resolve the issue. At the end of the day, we must be guided by medical opinion as to when that is appropriate, in addition to our own views, to which the Lord Advocate alluded in relation to suspicious deaths. The early indication is that the use of such equipment may have limited scope, but that does not mean that we should not consider whether it would be useful.

Stewart Maxwell: I accept what the witnesses are saying—with the exception of the last point that Mr Logue made about how useful such scans would be. The evidence from the Manchester pilot is that replacing a surgical invasion with an MRI scan has reduced the number of post mortems by about 90 per cent or even more, which is more extensive than the limited application that Mr Logue is suggesting.

John Logue: The difference is between the context in which the procurator fiscal investigates deaths in Scotland and the more prescriptive and regulated scheme whereby the coroner in England and Wales investigates deaths. I understand that there are generally many more post mortems in England and Wales at the instigation of the coroner. I am trying to get across the fact that there may be more flexibility in the current system in Scotland, which means that MRI scans will not have the impact that they appear to be having in England and Wales. That is my understanding following an early visit to the coroner and the professionals who operate the scheme.

Stewart Maxwell: I have written to the Cabinet Secretary for Justice about the matter, which merits further discussion before stage 2.

The Convener: It is work in progress for the Crown Office. By that time, the situation will, we hope, be clarified.

Nigel Don has a final point to raise.

Nigel Don: Looking at the sections about extreme pornography, I am left with the impression that the offences are more widely drawn regarding images of children or images that may have come from children, than are those regarding images of adults. That may or may not be a correct perception. Given the influence of computer software and the developing nature of crime, which the Lord Advocate mentioned earlier, is section 34—which deals, essentially, with adult pornography—drawn widely enough?

The Lord Advocate: Yes. We already have the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982, which includes the wider definition of, or the fundamental platform of, obscenity. It provides a list, although, with the passage of time and for the reasons that I mentioned regarding serious organised crime, a list that tries to be exhaustive might always be seen to be in some sense deficient or might not cover innovation. The difficulty in respect of pornography is that we come up against the ECHR rights of freedom of expression and the article 8 rights to privacy in the context of sexual activity. It is important to derive some certainty in that area in order to show a balance—to show not only that what is being done in engaging article 8 is proportionate, but that it has a degree of certainty in that area of criminality.

The Convener: I thank the Lord Advocate, the Solicitor General and Mr Logue for their attendance. If we could have the further information that has been requested as soon as possible, we would be even more appreciative.

Meeting suspended.
The Convener: This morning’s principal business is our continuing consideration of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. The committee has taken evidence on the bill’s criminal justice provisions. Some variety is perhaps called for, so today we will concentrate on the licensing provisions in parts 8 and 9.

I welcome the first panel, which comprises Alan McCreadie, the deputy director of law reform, and John Loudon, the convener of the licensing law sub-committee, from the Law Society of Scotland. We thank the Law Society for its written evidence, which we read with considerable interest.

We will go straight to questions, which I will start. Your submission highlights matters that the bill does not deal with but which you believe it should deal with, such as amendments to the appeal provisions in the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 and the reintroduction of a site-only application procedure. We read with particular interest what you said about appeals, but will you describe in more detail the difficulties that you expect if the 2005 act is not amended, and talk about the site-only application procedure?

John Loudon (Law Society of Scotland): We have the rare situation that almost every lawyer—if not every lawyer—whom I have met agrees that the new appeal procedures are cumbersome, expensive and not working in practice. That is what the private sector, the public sector and sheriffs have said.

The problem is that the clerk to the licensing board—somebody like the committee’s adviser, Robert Millar—must produce a stated case and identify facts. In general, a licensing board is not a place where facts are identified: committee members who have been licensing board members will know that boards hear ex parte statements from people such as me, hear the objectors and take a view on the matter. At the end of the day, the applicant, the objector or I can ask for written reasons, which have historically been the basis on which a decision is made whether to appeal.

The new procedure is a long way from that. Hindsight is a wonderful thing, but it would be relatively easy to drop back to the summary procedure. Some debate might take place about the provisions for instant suspension. You might recall that, under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976, if a licensing board suspended a licence, somebody such as me would simply appeal, so the suspension had no effect—

The Convener: I am aware of that procedure.

John Loudon: I thought that you might be.

The Convener: I was the victim of it several times.

John Loudon: Under the 2005 act, if a board decides to suspend a premises licence holder, the suspension is instantaneous, but the person can go to the sheriff principal to ask for the decision to be reviewed. Objectively, it is difficult for a sheriff principal to do that quickly. How can a sheriff principal gainsay a licensing board when it has exercised its discretion without hearing all the evidence? For the first time that I can remember, there is, right across the board, a wish to revert to the summary procedure under the 1976 act.

I do not know whether Alan McCreadie wishes to add anything.

Alan McCreadie (Law Society of Scotland): I am not sure whether there is anything that I can usefully add. From my experience as a clerk to a district court, I know that, following the implementation of the Criminal Proceedings etc (Reform) (Scotland) Act 2007, many solicitors in local government who previously clerked district courts and licensing boards have transferred to the Scottish Court Service. There may be resource issues for councils or clerks who are simply not used to stated case procedure, but it does not seem to sit well with an appeal against a licensing board's decision for there to be a decision on which facts have been admitted and proved and thereafter for the sheriff principal to adjudicate.

John Loudon: The other matter that the convener raised was that of what I would call section 26(2) applications under the 1976 act. Some members will know that, under the old provisions, it was possible to apply for a licence in principle. Someone who wanted a public house licence went to the board and gave a brief description of the premises as they would be. If the board granted that licence, the applicant could go to affirmation and finality. The mischief under the 1976 act was that the board had no control over the detail once someone got to the affirmation stage.

We do not have that facility under the 2005 act, and there is a desperate need for it. I recently advised a pension fund about a major development—a large hotel project—that it was considering, for which it did not have an occupier. When I explained that it would be necessary to get planning permission and to produce detailed plans of the hotel, right down to fire exits and fire alarms, and an operating plan, the fund's representatives told me that it would cost them more than £200,000 to do that. As a result, the project is simply not happening. That represents the loss of a major inward investment to Scotland, which is crackers.

If, under the 2005 act, we had a procedure that was similar to the section 26(2) procedure under the 1976 act, an applicant who wanted to obtain a premises licence would outline broadly what they wanted. The real plus of such a system is that the applicant would have to get their plans approved at a later stage, and the boards would have the power to review, modify, revoke or suspend a licence if they were not happy. There is a control in the 2005 act that was missing from the 1976 act. It does not matter whether we are talking about a corner shop or a huge development—it is extremely important that people have the ability to apply without having to produce detailed plans.

Let us say that someone wants to put a small pub in a village. Before they can get off first base, they must have detailed drawings of the pub, right down to where the bar and the exits are, just to lodge the application. That situation is crackers, and it is certainly not good for business or for Scotland. I feel passionately that people need to have the flexibility to lodge section 26(2) applications, while the boards should be left with control over the details of opening hours, operating plan and layout plan.

The Convener: I turn to another issue that obviously causes you some concern—the fact that the bill provides for the attachment of mandatory and standard conditions to any type of licence that is issued by a licensing board. You say that consideration should be given to having a transitional period so that licensing authorities have time to consider and approve standard conditions for all licence types. Will you take us through some of the practical difficulties that could arise?

Alan McCreadie: We raised that point regarding section 121 of the bill and the fact that a deemed grant will not now be unconditional—the society noted that mandatory licence conditions can be applied. I do not think that there is any particular difficulty with that but, from a practical point of view, the society considered that a transitional period should be required to allow such conditions to be put in place. There will be a move from deemed grants being unconditional, as is the case now, so we were calling for a sufficient period to allow licensing authorities that deal with civic government-type licences under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 to bed in the new conditions. The society did not have a particular view on the matter other than the practical implications that section 121 would have.
The Convener: So there would be no particular issues and the proper administration of the licensing system would not be prejudiced by there not being arrangements in place in the short term.

John Loudon: I do not think that there is a problem on the civic government side. It is simply a question of identifying what the conditions would be, having some discussion about that and reaching agreement. The conditions could then be rolled in, perhaps, as licences are renewed.

The Convener: We will stay under the same general heading, with Nigel Don continuing the questioning.

Nigel Don (North East Scotland) (SNP): Let us talk about something that I do not think we have ever spoken about before, Mr Loudon, as I was never on the licensing committee: taxis. As we understand it, the bill requires local authorities to review taxi fares every 18 months at the maximum. I am referring to section 124(3)(a). In your submission, you suggest that that will be a difficult timetable to work with. Will you elaborate on that for us?

John Loudon: The concerns about that aspect of the bill primarily came from council solicitors who are involved with taxi reviews. They were concerned that it would be difficult—because of all the parties concerned and all the consultation that was required—for such reviews to be completed within 18 months. I do not know whether that is impossible, but it is difficult. Glasgow City Council is particularly concerned about that period—I do not know what the City of Edinburgh Council’s current view is on the matter.

Nigel Don: Perhaps we can ask. Is the problem that we cannot find a way of having an 18-month cycle? I find that idea difficult—we could simply suggest numbers far enough in advance so that the cycle could always be made to work. Is there a need in principle to survey the number of taxis that are required? Is that a part of the plot that is not written in?

John Loudon: To a certain extent, it depends on the area of Scotland. Some parts of the country have caps on the number of taxis; others do not. It might be more of a problem in the bigger cities than elsewhere. If the reviews were in the system, and if people were given enough notice, they might be manageable even if they had to be carried out within 18 months.

Alan McCreadie: I do not think that I can usefully add much on the subject of that 18-month review period. Mr Loudon was right to state that it would depend on the local authority area. The fact that a consultation must be factored in means that the 18-month period within which the review process must be completed might prove problematic, purely from a practical point of view.

Nigel Don: It would be useful to get clarity on that. A local authority might finish up, in effect, having a continuous consultation because numbers have to be produced every 18 months. It is not obvious to me why that is impracticable, although I appreciate that it might be if other things get in the way.

John Loudon: Perhaps that would be the answer—to have a revolving review.

Nigel Don: That makes sense to me—it is not obvious to me why that is not possible. I think that is why we are asking the question.

Alan McCreadie: I am not sure. I would really have to investigate that point further.

John Loudon: If you could give us some clarity about where such a review would cause a problem, it would be useful.

The Convener: It might be a matter for each local authority.

Nigel Don: They are all doing the same thing.

The Convener: Such arrangements would not be precluded under the bill as it stands.

Alan McCreadie: That may well be the case.

The Convener: In any event, it would be useful if you could come back to us on that point.

Alan McCreadie: We certainly will.

Nigel Don: Your submission also picked up on the issue of people whose driving licences are suspended. The legislation suggests that they have to have a licence for 12 months before they can apply or reapply for a taxi licence. Therefore, if somebody had a six-month suspension, it would be 18 months before they could drive a taxi again. I see the practicalities of that situation. Is it really a problem?

John Loudon: It might be a problem for some people, but it could be overcome simply by giving the licensing committee discretion on the matter.

In other words, if the committee sitting to consider a particular application were given discretion to look at the facts and circumstances, it is likely that it would come up with the right answer, even though we do not always agree with what committees come up with. In the example given, if somebody had a six-month ban and could not reapply for a licence for a further year, it would be effectively an 18-month penalty, which does not seem fair. However, I would be comfortable if the committee considering the case were to look at the facts and circumstances and take a view.

Nigel Don: I am not so sure whether they would, but we will get a chance to ask them about it later.
Your submission also picks up the issue of advertising taxi fare scales in local newspapers. It seems a relatively trivial matter, but is that really the wrong medium in which to advertise such things these days?

John Loudon: As you know, newspaper adverts are extremely expensive. They have to be paid for by somebody—it will come out of the fees. In this day and age, most people know that almost all information should be easily available on the web. I accept that some council websites are not as good as others, but they could be improved. If you do not have web access in your house—although the majority of people do—you can certainly access it in your local library. It is not a problem. If people are aware that the first place to look for information about the council, be it about taxis, pubs or even road closures, is on the web, you will save an awful lot of money. Newspaper adverts are a one-off and expensive cost. If you happen to read the local paper, it is fine, but if you do not take it on the Tuesday night when it is published, it is of no use to you.

Nigel Don: By way of extension, do you suggest that we should do the same thing with almost all the other public notices that appear in the papers—put them on the web?

John Loudon: If you are asking me for a purely personal opinion, the answer is yes. If people accept that public information is readily available on the web and council websites are user friendly and easily accessible in libraries, I would be happy with that.

The Convener: We will now proceed to the possible unintended consequences to charities, with Robert Brown.

Robert Brown (Glasgow) (LD): I will ask a supplementary question on that last point first, if I may. Among the issues is one of time. People can get all sorts of general information from a website, but if they want to know about dates for objections or new applications, I presume that it is desirable to have a specific notice that draws their attention to the information. Do you agree that that need is not met by website information?

John Loudon: Again, purely personally, I think that councils should have a website with links to all the things that are happening so that people can see that, over the coming month, there will be X, Y and Z and all they do is click on the roads, public entertainment or licensing link, which takes them to the next information. It should be really easy for people to access information in that way. A lot of council sites are not user friendly, but they could be made so. The savings to the public and private purses of not having to run all those newspaper adverts would be considerable.

Robert Brown: Let us move on to the exemption enjoyed by charitable, youth, religious, community and other organisations to the requirement to hold a market operator’s licence, which is to be changed by section 125. You made some observations about that. Will you give us more insight into what you think the consequences of that provision might be? Some of them are fairly obvious, but perhaps there are wider issues to consider.

John Loudon: The provision is similar to that for the licensing of public entertainment. In certain circumstances, it is patently obvious that someone needs a licence, but in others it is not. I offer a practical example. One of the ladies who works in my team has a severely handicapped son. Recently, she and others have been trying to organise an event to raise money for people in that situation. At present, they do not have to pay a fee for a licence. If they had to do that, the event simply would not happen.

Patently, some things need licences and others do not. It comes down to common sense. A large public event will usually need a licence. There are questions about how we define “large” but, if someone is trying to get 50 people together to raise some money for charity or whatever, it is not proportionate to impose the need for a licence and a fee.

Robert Brown: Lots of summer galas of varying sizes and scales take place in Glasgow and other areas. Some of them are week-long events with parades and roads being closed, whereas others are minor events with a few stalls on a public site. Where should the balance lie with such events, which will probably be hit the most by the bill? On the one hand, we have the bureaucracy of the licensing process. Is that necessary? What is its practical advantage? On the other hand, if an event is licensed, the authorities have some control over it.

John Loudon: I am not sure how we can strike the right balance. I suppose that I would turn the question on its head and ask where we have problems at present. If there are problems, can we identify them, find out the cause and determine the best solution? I am not aware that there are problems throughout the country with unlicensed events, but the proposal must have come from somewhere. I presume that somebody has information to explain why licensing is needed. If so, that is fine, but if there is no problem and no mischief to fix, why do we need to go down the regulatory route? If a problem has been identified, that is fine, but I am not aware of one.

Robert Brown: There have been some issues with free events—not events run by charities but concerts and various things of that sort. The bill removes the exemption that free events enjoy... from the requirement to hold a public entertainment licence. Do you have a view on that?

John Loudon: Personally, I think that a large-scale public event probably needs a licence, regardless of whether it is free or charged for, because there will be health and safety and other issues that might not arise with smaller events. However, do we draw the line at 50 people or 500 people? It is difficult. All that we could do is to ask councils and police forces which events cause them difficulties and where they draw the line, and take a view based on that.

Robert Brown: Can the matter be dealt with by definitions in the bill that separate big events—those above a certain size—from small, non-challenging events?

John Loudon: There will be a problem wherever you draw the line. If the line is drawn at 500 people, people will go up to 499, or they will come and ask people such as me how they can stretch the limit. It is difficult to be prescriptive, but ultimately there must surely be a degree of common sense, the reasonable exercise of discretion, and a system that is proportionate to the risk. The public interest is paramount.

Robert Brown: I think that I am correct to say that, under the bill, it will be left to local authorities to decide whether to license events. We could argue that that is the proper approach because local authorities know the local circumstances that might arise. Is that a flexible arrangement that will allow proper consideration to be given, or is the matter so cumbersome that we need to create a general scheme rather than make decisions in individual cases?

John Loudon: The system might become too cumbersome or overprescriptive. At the end of the day, local councillors know their area. I read recently in a newspaper that Dundee City Council has decided to ban cakes from fêtes. That would be fine if there were a problem, but I am not aware that there is a problem. I keep coming back to that point: if there is a problem or a mischief that needs to be cured, we should make rules to cure it, but if not, why should we regulate something that does not cause difficulties?

Stewart Maxwell (West of Scotland) (SNP): I want to follow up the point about youth, religious or community groups having to apply for a licence. Mr Loudon seemed to indicate in answer to Robert Brown’s original question that such groups must apply for a licence. However, the Law Society’s written evidence states:

“It is unclear as to the policy intent of this particular provision as charitable and community organisations in future will require to consider the cost of obtaining a market operator’s licence and associated costs and that this may well prove to be prohibitive”.

The bill’s policy memorandum states that local authorities may choose not to license events such as gala days. Surely that indicates that local authorities will have flexibility over such licensing and that the groups about which Mr Loudon said he was concerned would probably not have to apply for a licence.

The bill’s policy memorandum states that local authorities may choose not to license events such as gala days. Surely that indicates that local authorities will have flexibility over such licensing and that the groups about which Mr Loudon said he was concerned would probably not have to apply for a licence.

John Loudon: I sincerely hope that that would be the case, but local authorities sometimes err on the side of caution, so they may opt to include such groups in licensing.

Stewart Maxwell: If there is something to be cautious about, is it a bad thing if local authorities err on the side of caution?

John Loudon: If there is something to be cautious about or there is a mischief, I have no difficulty with a local authority erring on the side of caution. However, I have a problem if licensing is applied across the board without a bit of discretion and proportionality, because that will catch things that were never intended to be caught. I do not think that anybody here would have a problem with a large event with 500 people having to have a licence, but many of us would be concerned if, for example, a local fête for 40 or 50 people had to have a licence and go through all the required procedures, as that would not be necessary.

Stewart Maxwell: I agree with you. However, I am confused, because the bill seems to provide flexibility for local authorities to choose to license—or not—an event on the basis of local discretion and whether the event is very large or very small, as you described. I am therefore a wee bit confused about what your problem is.

Alan McCreadie: I am not exactly sure how that flexibility is put in place, given the amendment of section 40 of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 by section 125 of the bill, unless it is done by a section 9 resolution, whereby a local authority would simply resolve not to have market operators licensed at all. I suppose investing some discretion in the local authority can be brought in by regulation. I concede that I have perhaps missed something, but I am still unsure about how discretion is introduced through the amendment of section 40 of the 1982 act by section 125. However, you are right that the policy memorandum states that local authorities should be vested with discretion.

Stewart Maxwell: Does the bill as drafted not implement what the policy memorandum states? Is that the issue?

Alan McCreadie: From my reading of the bill, that appears to be an issue, unless I have missed something.
Stewart Maxwell: If you can contribute anything else after further reading, perhaps you can write to us.

Alan McCreadie: Indeed—we will.

Stewart Maxwell: We might need to take up your point with the Cabinet Secretary for Justice.

The Convener: It would be useful to have further information from Mr McCreadie. Cathie Craigie might have a couple of points on the same issue.

Cathie Craigie (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth) (Lab): The policy memorandum seems to be silent on section 125—it does not give any explanation of it. However, the explanatory notes state clearly that "licensing authorities have discretion as to whether to charge reduced or no fees".

That seems to suggest that somebody would have to apply for a licence and that it would then be up to the local authority whether to charge a fee. Is that your understanding? Have you raised concerns about the issue because you do not see any evidence for the change?

Alan McCreadie: Our question is whether the licence is required in principle, rather than whether it should be for local authorities to determine whether a fee should be charged for a charitable or youth organisation event. The bill certainly requires further scrutiny in that regard, and I undertake to look at the area.

Robert Brown: I want to be sure that I am clear about this point. I must confess that I understood that there was a difference between the local authority having the discretion to decide whether to have a scheme for the licensing of charitable events and the like, and how that discretion was exercised, which would obviously have to be in accordance with general principles. The local authority would therefore have to develop arrangements for events, rather than consider each event independently and flexibly. Is that your understanding?

Alan McCreadie: Yes.

Robert Brown: It is not only about the fee; for small bodies, which are perhaps not very experienced in such matters, it is also about the process and the annoyance of having to go through it. Is that also your fear?

John Loudon: The process can be very daunting. It is sometimes bad enough for lawyers, but my assistant, for example, who is an experienced paralegal, would have found the process daunting. We do not want to put people off holding such events. I come back again to the fact that it is in the public interest that they happen; it is good for the community and we do not want to make it difficult for them to be held. I have no problems with licensing large events.

Robert Brown: Am I right that the provision would apply to both indoor and outdoor events? We mentioned galas. Would it also apply to church fêtes, events held in council halls and such like?

John Loudon: I thought that it would apply to all events, whether inside or outside.

Robert Brown: That is what I thought.

The Convener: That was also my interpretation.

Paul Martin (Glasgow Springburn) (Lab): Good morning, gentlemen. The bill makes provision for applications for licences under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 to be treated as renewals when they have been received within 28 days of the expiry of an old licence. Your submission refers to that provision. Can you elaborate on some of the issues with the provision that you have raised?

John Loudon: The matter is reasonably straightforward. One can see the logic and the fairness of having a bit of leeway. However, what happens if, for example, an offence occurs or someone applies for an extra taxi during the 28-day period? If the wording were adjusted to accommodate such developments, there would not be a problem. It seems fair to allow a bit of leeway, but it is necessary to address the issue of something occurring within the 28-day period.

Paul Martin: Can you suggest any particular wording, or can you respond to the committee later on the matter?

John Loudon: I cannot do so yet, but I am sure that we can have a look at it for you.

The Convener: I will cite an example—you will appreciate that, for lay people, it is always best if an example can be used for illustrative purposes. Let us assume that a taxi driver neglects or fails to apply to renew his licence. Three weeks in, it comes to the attention of the police that he has been reported for sexual assault. Does that require to be picked up by new wording? Is that an appropriate illustration?

John Loudon: Yes. That is also my interpretation.

The Convener: We now turn to alcohol licensing with Cathie Craigie.

Cathie Craigie: Your submission highlights the practical difficulties that may arise if a licensing board were able to grant a licence subject to modifications to the layout plan. Can you elaborate on those practical difficulties?

John Loudon: The issue has been a matter of much debate among members of the Law Society’s licensing law sub-committee. Let us imagine that we are in a room with a licence in a listed building—I do not know whether the Parliament building is listed yet. There is a bar in one corner and, for whatever reason, the licensing board decides that it must be moved to another position. The operator may have got their building warrant and other consents based on the bar being in its current position, so the decision has an immediate knock-on effect. Many buildings in places such as Edinburgh, Glasgow and Dundee are listed. If there are changes, the operator may need listed building consent, planning consent and a building warrant, which would not necessarily be easy to get. Is it not for the operator to decide how he wants his business laid out and run? Modifications have been made to layout plans during transition. I am pretty sure that the legislation does not allow for that, but it has happened and it has worked.

For instance, if the plans show an outside area to the left of the front door, but everyone agrees that the area is to the right and adjusted plans are submitted, that has just been accepted—it has worked. However, I do not think that that is covered in the legislation. Although I am not aware of bars being moved, some boards have asked for the plans to show the location of gaming machines. That is micromanaging. It should be for the operator to decide where they want their bits of kit, having regard to the terms of the liquor and gambling legislation, which are fairly tight. A number of problems might arise if boards are able to tell operators to move a bar, a toilet or what have you—I do not think that the board is the right place for that to happen.

Cathie Craigie: The explanatory notes state that the intention is that the licensing board would grant the licence

> "if the applicant agreed to the proposed modification."

Your evidence is that a board might decide to grant a licence subject to a modification, but the applicant might not be in a position to agree to the modification because of other warrants or planning consents.

John Loudon: That is part of the issue. Is it reasonable or proportionate for a board to say that someone can have their premises licence provided that they move a gaming machine from the left-hand side of the room to the right-hand side? I can envisage circumstances arising, although not often, in which boards ask for modifications that the applicant simply does not want to do. I do not think that there is a right of appeal in that regard.

Alan McCreadie: I do not think that there is. For want of a better phrase, we would end up with a catch-22 situation. Once the technical consents have been given, if the board is not happy with something, which is then fixed—if the applicant is happy to do so—the premises might then no longer meet the technical consents.

John Loudon: Some of the witnesses who will give evidence after us might want to expand on the issue.

The Convener: Surely the difficulty could be overcome fairly simply. If the licensing board wants a bar moved to another place and the applicant is of the view that that is totally inappropriate, he does not have to take up the licence—he could submit a new application that would then be a matter for determination by the board and subsequent appeal, if necessary.

John Loudon: That is possible, but a new application is an expensive process. It takes three to six months to process an application, by the time that the application with all the detailed plans is submitted, the plans are published on the board’s website, the neighbour notification is carried out and the hearing takes place. It is not reasonable to require that to happen.

The Convener: Has anybody challenged a decision yet?

John Loudon: There have been a number of appeals in relation to premises licences. Those relate mainly to the definition of the term “excluded premises” and the contradiction between the 2005 act and the guidance—the act talks about residents, whereas the guidance talks about the community. Very few of those cases have gone through to decisions. There was a case in Aberdeen involving the Co-operative and the Shafiq case in the west of Scotland, but those were both to do with petrol stations. I am not aware of any other cases.

Cathie Craigie: If an applicant does not accept the amendment to the layout, can they ask the board to continue the process so that they can check with other authorities, or does the board have to reach its decision within a specified period?

John Loudon: One can always ask a board to continue. In most cases, if there was a reasonable ground for continuation, the board would grant it—generally, boards are not unreasonable. However, one might not be able to get a satisfactory answer from all the departments. For instance, obtaining listed building consent is a time-consuming process, as members will be aware.

Cathie Craigie: That is obviously an issue that we must consider more closely.

I will move on to ask about section 135. Your submission welcomes the provisions in the bill that will enable occasional licences to be granted outwith the normal timescales, when the licensing board is satisfied that the application should be dealt with quickly. You make the point that a similar fast-track procedure should be considered for applications for extended hours. What would be the advantages of that?

John Loudon: Under the 1976 act, occasional extensions, as they are known, are common. It is very rare for there to be a problem with an occasional extension: you put in your application and it is processed and granted. Some boards turn such applications round within two or three days, although others take a couple of weeks.

I will give the committee a practical example. I have recently been advising some larger contract caterers. Often, they are asked to provide facilities for weddings and functions at relatively short notice. Historically, that has not been a problem. People have been able to get an occasional licence, or an extension of hours in premises where a licence existed, quite quickly. However, I have advised the caterers that they should allow at least two months for an application for an occasional licence, and possibly the same length of time for an application for extended hours. The caterers have been absolutely horrified.

The good news is that all the competition is in the same boat. However, a lot of conference and function business is carried out at relatively short notice. Historically, that has not been a problem. People have been able to get an occasional licence, or an extension of hours in premises where a licence existed, quite quickly. However, I have advised the caterers that they should allow at least two months for an application for an occasional licence, and possibly the same length of time for an application for extended hours. The caterers have been absolutely horrified.

The Convener: When there are premises licences, an argument might be made that the applicant, or licence holder, could register as a person authorised to keep his premises open with an extension to the previously permitted hours, provided that he telephoned his local police office to say, “I intend to stay open until 2am.” Thereafter, he would be invoiced by the licensing authority. That is what happens in Germany and Austria.

John Loudon: I can see that that would be great; equally, I can see that many of my clients would say to me, “Just get it for me, John, and we’ll keep it just in case we ever need it.” However, if the system were used properly and respected, it would be a nice, simple solution.

Nigel Don: We have already talked about site-only licences. The submission from the Scottish Beer and Pub Association says that, under section 45 of the 2005 act, there is only “A two-year window … from the provisional grant of licence to confirmation”.

I can see how that could cause problems and am slightly surprised that the witnesses have not raised the point.

John Loudon: It is already causing major problems. I will give the committee a practical example with which I have been involved. I was at the Edinburgh licensing board—Marjorie Thomas from the board is here today—where we sought to convert an entertainment liquor licence for a new casino in Fountainbridge to a premises licence. That was granted without issue or objection. Indeed, we even had the support of the local community council.

As soon as the licence was granted, I said to the board that I needed an extension to the two-year period because the company now had to go back to the bankers and the developers to get the project done. Demolition and rebuilding are involved, for retail units and so on, and the work will not be completed within two years. The board members smiled and said, “There shouldn’t be a problem. Just come back in a year or in 15 months’ time and tell us how you’re getting on.”

There is now a real prospect that the development will not go ahead. The company cannot take the risk: there might be an election, and different councillors might be on the board. Two years is a very short time for a big project. The Scottish Parliament building is one example; the Land Securities development at Livingston took six years; and the Scottish Widows development at Fountainbridge has taken six years. Two years is crazy.

There is no mischief in allowing a longer period. A project of any size will take longer than two years. If the project is not completed within two years and the board does not grant an extension, the developer might have spent heaven knows what and still have no licence. Developers are simply not going to do that. Bankers or financiers will not lend someone the money to do that.

Nigel Don: I think that five years is the period in which you have to get something on the ground after you get planning permission for a development. Would that be a sensible period?

John Loudon: Five years is sensible, especially for the bigger projects, such as the redevelopment of a town centre. Is there a mischief in such a period? If the licence is granted, the board can take that into account when it is looking at whether there is overprovision and so on. If the project is not taken through to completion, it will simply fall out of the system. There must be a degree of security to allow projects to go ahead. Even for a small project, such as a new pub or restaurant, two years from the date of grant is too tight a period in which to get everything in place and completed—you need the completion certificates.

Nigel Don: The Scottish Licensed Trade Association submission made some extremely interesting points about the fees for licences, which are to be based on rateable value, and the fact that supermarkets would pay relatively small fees in comparison with the fees paid by the small trader with a shop on the street corner. Given your considerable experience, will you give me some clues about the balance in all this? It is plain that licensing a supermarket with a very large turnover does not require a great deal more work by the licensing authority than licensing a corner shop, so it could be argued that it would be perfectly equitable for the supermarket and the corner shop to pay the same fee. However, the submission quite rightly states that 7.5 per cent of the fees will be paid by traders that have something like 50 per cent of the turnover. How can we balance that?

John Loudon: With the judgment of Solomon. It is very difficult to strike the balance. You will never get it right, because whatever you plump for, there will always be people who are caught fairly—or unfairly. A large supermarket, hotel or pub chain will probably present all the material to the board in a well-organised and efficient way and it will not take a lot of administration to deal with the application. However, the tiny wee restaurant or corner shop might present material to the board in a complete mess, which takes a lot of time to deal with. I know that because I have been at many board hearings where a lot of time has been spent trying to deal with the smaller applicant who has not taken professional advice, who has not gone to the expense of employing someone to help them and who takes up a disproportionate amount of time at the hearing. It is very difficult to come up with a scheme that everybody will be happy with. We have the rateable values and there are sliding scales. I appreciate what the SLTA is saying. I am glad that I am not the one who has to make the decision on the fees, because it is not easy.

Nigel Don: Thank you for clarifying that point for me.

The Convener: That was a refreshingly honest answer.

Robert Brown: The Law Society submitted a supplementary letter on some of the technical points to do with heritable securities and so on.

I want to ask about the logistical problems that you anticipate in relation to the transition date of 1 September 2009. You said in your letter that, given the logjam that is building up—I have heard this from the trade, too—consideration might be given to allowing some sort of extension or dispensation for applications that are in the system by a certain date, so that they can carry on and be okay when it comes to the transition date. How can that be done? Are there powers in existing legislation to do that? The bill will not be passed in time. Can such a dispensation be done by statutory instrument? Can you give us any guidance on the implications of that?

John Loudon: I think that such a move will be essential. A significant percentage of premises throughout Scotland will not have designated premises managers on the premises licence and will not have the premises licence and summary up by 1 September. I think that you can do pretty nearly anything that you want under section 146 of the 2005 act, which is a wide-ranging, bits-and-pieces section.

I will give you a practical example. So far, I have received one premises licence with a designated premises manager on it, although we have made many hundreds of applications across Scotland. I have had applications for personal licences in with some boards since before the turn of the year, and those personal licences have not yet been issued. There is a large misunderstanding across the industry that the training certificate is the personal licence. All the trade bodies have worked hard—I know that licensing lawyers have worked hard—to get clients to understand that it is a three-stage procedure involving training, the personal licence and the designated premises manager.

Even when the training has been done and the application for a personal licence is in, applicants have no control over how the boards process that—there is no time limit to say that a personal licence application must be dealt with in, say, a month. So, although we have put in hundreds of applications early, they are still in the system and we have no control over when the licences will be issued by the boards. Then, once a licence has been issued by the board, the licensee must nominate a designated premises manager. The board must do all that administration and processing and have the licence back with the applicant by 1 September or the applicant cannot trade alcohol. If, for whatever reason, the board does not do that by 1 December, the applicant’s premises licence is revoked. It is horrendously complicated.

Let us take the Sheraton Grand hotel in Edinburgh as an example. If the application is in but the board simply has not got around to processing it by 1 September, the hotel cannot sell alcohol. If the application has not been processed and cleared by 1 December, the licence will be revoked. That is draconian. My feeling is that, if somebody has taken the trouble to get an application into the system in reasonable time—I think that we said by 31 July in the supplementary evidence—there should be a dispensation to allow them to continue to sell alcohol after 1 September.
until the application has been processed and dealt with; otherwise, we will have big problems.

Robert Brown: Your evidence is that the problem extends across a good part of Scotland.

John Loudon: Right across Scotland.

Robert Brown: Is that because of the bureaucratic implications for the boards and the pressure of work?

John Loudon: It is because of the sheer volume of applications. We have about 17,000 licensed premises in Scotland, each of which needs at least one DPM. That is a minimum of 17,000 DPMs. However, most licensed premises will need two or three personal licence holders, so we are talking about not 17,000 applications across Scotland, but 50,000 or 60,000 applications across Scotland. I do not care how efficient the boards are—that is a huge administrative burden on them.

Some boards are a year behind in issuing premises licences, which are supposed to be dealt with within six months. I prophesy that, with the best will in the world, come 1 September, we will have a problem. Not only is that not in the trade interest; it is not in the public interest. It is not right. Ladies and gentlemen, you have the ability to do something about it.

The Convener: We have received representations regarding the matter, which we take very seriously.

There are no further questions for this panel of witnesses. I thank Mr McCreadie and Mr Loudon for their attendance this morning and for giving their evidence in such a clear and cogent manner.

10:59
Meeting suspended.

11:00
On resuming—

The Convener: Our second panel is Assistant Chief Constable Andrew Barker, Fife Constabulary, and Inspector Gordon Hunter, Lothian and Borders Police, who represent the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland. We have your submissions, for which we are very grateful, so we will move straight to questions. I think that we need not detain you very long this morning.

Aileen Campbell: Good morning. I will kick off with a question on the concerns about an increase in the theft of metal due to its high value, which I think the Law Society highlighted in its submission. The bill replaces the mandatory licensing scheme for metal dealers with an optional scheme at the discretion of the local authority. Does ACPOS have a view on the impact of that change?

Assistant Chief Constable Andrew Barker (Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland): The theft of metal has been an issue in the past. Our local experience is that it has been curtailed to a large extent, probably due to the economic downturn. I have looked into the issue in Fife fairly recently. As with other issues that you discussed with the Law Society, the question is when to impose the provision and when not to do so. It is difficult to say what the effect of local authorities being given discretion will be throughout the country. The issue may have faded somewhat as a result of the economic downturn.

Aileen Campbell: You are content with that being left to the discretion of the local authority.

Assistant Chief Constable Barker: Yes, at this point.

Aileen Campbell: On public entertainment licensing, you may have heard comments in the previous evidence session about problems with the licensing of free events. Respondents have suggested that the proposal may have an impact on the willingness of small, community organisations to put on free events. The Law Society suggested that it might be disproportionate to license such events. Why will the provision be useful to you? Does the policy memorandum offer local authorities enough flexibility not to penalise small events by requiring them to apply for a licence?

Assistant Chief Constable Barker: I can add very little to what the Law Society said. My difficulty is with the word “large”. Where do we draw the line? Community events can draw several thousand people. Will that sort of event be licensed? I echo the previous panel’s comments on the matter. We do not want to discourage community events, which are very much to the fore, particularly in areas such as the one that I police. I have lost count of the number of galas and local events that have taken place in Fife in my time there.

However, where do we draw the line? I am thinking of an event that is intended to attract 50 people but which attracts 500 or 1,000 people. It is very difficult to define a large event. Safety is the paramount issue. In that regard, I cannot put it better than a previous witness did: what is the mischief that we are trying to resolve? There is no particular issue with community events, but the question is where we draw the line.

Aileen Campbell: Where have the problems with large events arisen? What type of event has created problems? Clearly, the policy intention of the bill is to help to control such events. What is the question is difficult. If a local event is being — through advertising — an event. If an event does not need a licence at the to whom first? You talked about an emerging demographics. We cannot give a definitive answer 's definition, just because of the area might differ from another local authority 's policy on what is large, when that applies and whether definitions exist of a large event for which notification is required and a small event for which notification is not required.

Assistant Chief Constable Barker: I am not fully cognisant with that area of the bill. In the past, the problem has been free events that have attracted thousands of people. If they are not regulated and controlled, they cause significant issues. Questions arise in relation to what my officers are going to do, what the role of the police is, how many officers are required for public safety and how we progress things. I do not have a lot of personal experience of the free events that have caused problems. Perhaps Gordon Hunter can say something on the issue.

Inspector Gordon Hunter (Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland): The question is difficult. Several factors kick in—they depend on the event's size. For example, we start to think about traffic management and public safety in relation to equipment that is brought on to a site. Many issues are not necessarily policing matters, but public safety departments throughout the country consider a variety of issues in relation to structures that are brought on to a site.

Police consider the potential for public disorder and traffic management, which can without a shadow of a doubt become a major issue. Traffic management is not a major issue for a small event that involves 50 people, but if the event involves 500 people, it suddenly becomes a big issue. Even in smaller villages—the whole village turned out for our local fête recently—difficulties can be caused over a long period, and alcohol is being put into the mix. There is a stack of considerations.

Aileen Campbell: So, when it is sensible to require and request a licence is at the local authority's discretion on the basis of its local knowledge and that of your police colleagues.

Assistant Chief Constable Barker: A great deal of historical knowledge is also involved. We are all aware of events that have taken place for many years and which we see no need to license. Whether emerging events go down the same route is a difficult call for a local authority to make. The question is whether an event is likely to be large. One local authority's definition of what is large might differ from another local authority's definition, just because of the area's demographics. We cannot give a definitive answer on what is large.

Nigel Don: I will try to tease that out. Who talks to whom first? You talked about an emerging event. If an event does not need a licence at the moment, how does anybody know about it—other than through advertising—until it happens?

Assistant Chief Constable Barker: I agree that the question is difficult. If a local event is being developed or planned, we will probably hear about it through community officers or local groups such as community councils. Most such groups ask the police first for advice on whether any regulation applies, so I think that that is what will happen in the future.

As I said, that raises the issue of how people know a local authority's policy on what is large, when that applies and whether definitions exist of a large event for which notification is required and a small event for which notification is not required.

Nigel Don: Thank you for making it clear that the first notification of an event is probably to the police, through officers who are on foot in the community. On that basis—which I would predict—is it reasonable to say that you are the best judges in the first instance of what should be licensed? I am not worried about what the bill says at the moment. If the local chief constable were to advise the local authority that an event should be licensed, might that be a way forward?

Assistant Chief Constable Barker: On what grounds would we give that advice? Would the decision relate to an event's size, public safety or public disorder? We return to the same lack of definition as exists about what is large. Would the call about an event be based on professional judgment? A joint decision would have to be made that involved the chief constable, whom I would certainly want to influence whether an event was licensed, but what would be the criteria for the decision?

Inspector Hunter: I will add to the mix my experience that when people look for advice about events that are coming up, they do not necessarily approach only the police—they regularly approach public safety departments first for information. In reality, what matters is good communication. The police, local planning authorities and council departments now all have reasonably good links, so we have discussions—event planning-type meetings—that take many issues forward. The decision would probably sit better with that set-up than with a single person.

Nigel Don: That is what local councillors would predict. I am struggling with knowing what framework we should set down on paper. When the system works well, communities, the police and local authorities do not need to worry about what is in legislation—they just get on with it. That is how the world should be. However, we are worried about what we should prescribe in the framework and to whom we should give the power. How we should formulate that is not yet clear.

The Convener: Does Mr Barker have further views on the point?
Assistant Chief Constable Barker: It will be a joint decision. I am struggling to think what the prescribed criteria would be. However, as with most licensing issues, there will be close cooperation.

It is also important to take into account the other prescriptions that exist regarding the safety of events, such as the guidance on structures, which Gordon Hunter mentioned. That comes into play where there are to be large structures on the ground. We also have to consider whether to set a limit of 100 people, 500 people or whatever. That will vary in different parts of the country. A large event for one area will be a small one elsewhere. However, I am struggling to come up with helpful comments on exactly what the prescriptions should be.

The Convener: I have a further question on changes to the 1982 act. As you know, the bill extends the licensing system to include premises that sell food late at night. In your submission, you state that that will have resource implications for the police. Will you expand on that?

Assistant Chief Constable Barker: We make the point that the provision will have resource implications in relation to processing and reporting on such applications, but I emphasise that our submission fully supports the change.

The Convener: It is within our experience that such premises can sometimes be a source of disorder late at night. Will the licensing of such premises be a useful tool where there are difficulties?

Assistant Chief Constable Barker: The short answer is yes.

The Convener: Thank you. We move on to alcohol licensing, with Cathie Craigie.

Cathie Craigie: Good morning, gentlemen. The policy memorandum gives us an insight into the implications in relation to processing and reporting. The 2005 act requires chief constables to report to the licensing board on antisocial behaviour. The 2005 act requires chief constables to report to the licensing board on antisocial behaviour, but it has been suggested that the requirement is “unnecessarily onerous”. Will you comment on that?

Assistant Chief Constable Barker: The points that we make in our submission relate to the arrangements during transition, which worked particularly well. We asked whether an antisocial behaviour report is to be required in respect of every premises and what the relevance of that would be. We also asked how specific we can be in what is linked back to premises.

The provisions that were put in place during transition have been helpful. The amount of work that would be involved in producing an antisocial behaviour report for every premises is considerable. In our submission, we state that, where there are clusters of licensed premises in a town or city centre, it would be difficult in a general report to attribute antisocial behaviour to particular premises, but we can say that a group of premises has caused concern.

We are saying that, if we can report on instances that are particular to premises and can be attributed to them, that is helpful. Gordon Hunter has experience of that.

Inspector Hunter: All big cities have areas where there are lots of licensed premises. We have to consider how we can attribute specific instances to specific problem premises. If we take Princes Street in Edinburgh as an example, or George Street, which is perhaps a better example, can we attribute antisocial behaviour to the east end or the west end? Is it all caused by one premises or does it relate to a variety of premises? Large numbers of people travel through George Street to get to other parts of the city, so it is difficult to link antisocial behaviour with premises in that manner. Queen Street, which is the next street down, is probably one of the busiest thoroughfares in Edinburgh. There is only a small number of licensed premises there, but we see a higher level of disturbance because people visit the area as they are going home at the end of the night.

Cathie Craigie: I know from colleagues that antisocial behaviour in the centre of Edinburgh is a huge concern. Hardly a week goes by without a member raising the matter in the Parliament. Will the proposals in the bill deal with the issue?

Inspector Hunter: I think that the existing mechanisms and the proposed new mechanism deal with it more than adequately, because a board will be able to ask for a report if problems have been identified, perhaps as a result of complaints, and the chief constable will have an opportunity to submit a report if he has identified a clear pattern of disorder around premises. I think that the mechanism in the bill is more than adequate, without being a blanket provision.

Cathie Craigie: Mr Barker, you said that the mechanisms that have been used during the transitional period have been working. Could you tell us a bit more about them?

Assistant Chief Constable Barker: I think that they are the same as what is proposed in the bill—instead of an antisocial behaviour report being provided for every licence application, such a report is provided on premises only if one is requested.
Paul Martin: Do you accept that, under the current regime, some applications could slip through the net and some applications—for off-licences, for example—might not be subject to proper interrogation? I know that, in parts of my constituency, the acceptance of applications for off-licences has led to an increase in antisocial behaviour, which has not been reported to the licensing authority. Does the present method ensure that off-licence applications are carefully considered by the licensing authority?

Inspector Hunter: The situation that you describe certainly does not match my experience. We have examined all premises licence applications, which has taken up a considerable amount of time, and we do take account of complaints. I suspect that it is possible that some applications have slipped through the net, but strong legislation will mean that we will be able to identify problems and deal with them by way of review. That is a strong mechanism for weeding out problematic premises that have been missed, but I suggest that very few, if any, such premises have been missed.

Paul Martin: You say that examining all premises licence applications is onerous in terms of the resources that are required. If someone submitted an off-licence application for premises in Ruchazie in my constituency, what resources would be required if you had to provide a report to the licensing committee on that application?

Inspector Hunter: It is probably easier for me to talk about my force’s area rather than your force’s area. Our information technology systems do not link up quite as well as those in your force’s area. I would have to assign a researcher and an officer to check all our systems, which could equate to two days’ work for one premises.

Paul Martin: The other aspect is that, if a successful application results in an increase in antisocial behaviour, more resources will be required if officers have to attend the premises on, let us say, more than 100 occasions. Having to deal with that antisocial behaviour will have an impact on the local community. Do you accept that?

Inspector Hunter: I accept that. However, we have undertaken to provide antisocial behaviour reports on all applications by new premises, so we would catch such cases. Although we have said that we will not provide reports on all applications by existing premises, we would report any existing premises that were causing problems in the community to the board in any case.

Paul Martin: The 2005 act requires an antisocial behaviour report to be provided for every new premises licence application but, in the bill, the Government proposes that whether to provide such a report should be at the discretion of the chief constable. How will communities ensure that information about any antisocial behaviour that takes place—whether it occurs outside nightclubs or outside off-sales—is properly taken account of by the police authority? Under the bill, it will be for the chief constable to decide whether to report such behaviour; he will not interrogate every application.

Inspector Hunter: It is a difficult question to answer succinctly. The reality is that licences are granted in perpetuity and that, in future, we will consider only applications for new licences. However, the police monitor problematic premises on a daily basis. We examine extremely closely the complaints that local communities make to us or to the local authority through community councils.

One of the huge benefits of having licensing standards officers will be the fact that we will be able to monitor those premises and put packages of measures in place to reduce the level of antisocial behaviour. Where we identify problematic premises that do not come up to standard, the community, the police, the licensing standards officers or the local authority will ask for a review. I suggest that that is a strong power.

Paul Martin: What is proposed is an informal mechanism by which, as a result of intelligence gathering, the police could provide an antisocial behaviour report for consideration in the processing of a licensing application. The point that I am making is that the 2005 act guarantees that such a report will be submitted no matter what. Such reports might also highlight the fact that certain premises have no problems with antisocial behaviour. However, the bill proposes an informal mechanism whereby the licensing authority’s consideration may be informed by such reports from the police, which raises the possibility that some people will slip through the net. That may affect the resources that will be required by police officers to deal with those premises at a later stage.

Inspector Hunter: We must concede that, yes.

Cathie Craigie: You told us that, rather than take up the challenge and answer Paul Martin’s question about Springburn, you wanted to deal with your own area. That is perfectly acceptable. You said that your force would find it more difficult than Strathclyde Police, for example, because you do not have the recording mechanism—I suppose that that is the IT system. How widespread is that? I just assumed that everybody working in the police forces can now press a button and get all that information. Is that situation unique to your force?
Inspector Hunter: A number of forces have difficulties, but the majority of forces have systems that will do that relatively quickly.

Cathie Craigie: I consulted my own community on this aspect of the legislation a few years ago. They expect the police to be able to report on the activities that take place around licensed premises. The general public feel, rightly or wrongly, that a lot of the antisocial behaviour that they experience in their community is generated by licensed premises or people spilling out of licensed premises drinking alcohol out of bottles that they have purchased as off-sales. We will have a dilemma in reconciling what the community expect of their police service with what the police service considers reasonable.

Assistant Chief Constable Barker: I can pick up on a couple of those points. I recently assumed responsibility for licensing and recognise that the need for an integrated system is very much a priority. I can only echo what you say. I expect the police service to take note of which licensed premises experience difficulties with drinking, as the issue is raised by communities throughout Scotland and is something that we are bringing to the fore.

On the points that Gordon Hunter has made, there is a difference between when antisocial behaviour reports are put in place for premises and what their specification is. As I said earlier, should they relate to a group of premises? How should we detail which premises, if any, have a linkage to the antisocial behaviour that is taking place?

You make a valid point in respect of the systems that should be in place. That matter is being addressed at the moment.

Cathie Craigie: If a system were in place that made it simple to press a button and get information about the incidents that the police had been called to deal with at or around specific premises, that would address ACPOS’s concerns about resources.

Assistant Chief Constable Barker: To a point. However, you have raised the issue of whether the incidents relate to the premises or to the area around the premises. When there is antisocial behaviour in a specified radius in Edinburgh or Glasgow city centre, how do we attribute that to particular premises? A licensee can take particular care to do all that they can within their premises, but there can still be an issue outwith the premises. There are specification issues there. Nevertheless, we will provide information in respect of all new applications and, for all current licensees, we will continue to monitor the behaviour of premises as they go forward.

Cathie Craigie: We have to remember that not all licences are held in city centres.

Assistant Chief Constable Barker: That is clearly the case. An awful lot, if not the majority of licensed premises, cause very few problems to either the police or the community. There are premises that cause problems but, as you rightly mention, there are also problems with people drinking alcohol in the street or elsewhere, which is not necessarily related to a particular premises.

Inspector Hunter: A related problem is that a large number of new premises opening up are in areas where there is demand and need for alcohol or a corner shop. As there is little or no disorder in those areas, any report would reflect that and would not be informative per se. I can think of a good example. The Law Society mentioned earlier the big developments that are happening. If there is a big development in the city centre, there will be a large number of incidents in the vicinity. If that development were slightly out of the city centre, there might be no incidents. It is about how you interpret such situations because you will not necessarily get what you expect.

Cathie Craigie: But you have to listen to what communities are saying and what they expect from people who serve them, whether it is MSPs or police officers.

Inspector Hunter: Absolutely.

The Convener: That was interesting evidence. If there are no final questions for ACPOS, I thank ACC Barker and Inspector Hunter for giving their evidence so clearly.

On resuming—

The Convener: I welcome the third panel of witnesses. They are Paul Waterson, who is the chief executive of the Scottish Licensed Trade Association; Colin Wilkinson, who is the secretary of the Scottish Licensed Trade Association; Patrick Browne, who is the chief executive of the Scottish Beer and Pub Association; Paul D Smith, who is the executive director of Noctis and— to add to this morning’s confusion— Paul Smith, who is the vice-chair of the Scottish Late Night Operators Association. Thank you for giving of your time to come here this morning. We will move straight to questioning.

Bill Butler (Glasgow Annesland) (Lab): Good morning, gentlemen. In your view, what are the main problems with the operation of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005? What changes would you like to be made to the bill to address your concerns?

Paul Waterson (Scottish Licensed Trade Association): The main problem that we have is trying to control local discretion. Licensing boards throughout the country interpret the 2005 act in many different ways, so we need somehow to standardise matters. It is difficult for us to give advice or opinions when licensing boards appear to be doing their own thing, as we often see. As the 2005 act gains momentum in the long term, the situation will only get worse. That is a serious criticism that we have.

Bill Butler: Will you give us examples in which there has been too much local discretion and a lack of standardisation?

Paul Waterson: In respect of operating plans and toilet provisions in Glasgow, there is no standardisation in respect of grandfather rights and what is meant by them. For example, licensees may not have room to put in new toilets, but their licence may depend on their doing so, and different boards may have different interpretations of the rights. We were told that people would have grandfather rights but, all of a sudden, parts of those rights are being taken away from licence holders. It puts licence holders in a very difficult situation if they are told that they have to put new toilets in when they do not have room for them.

Bill Butler: I will ask a High Court judge question along the lines of “Who are the Beatles?” Just for the record, what are grandfather rights?

Paul Waterson: I am sorry. Basically, they are the rights that allow licence holders to trade as they did under the 1976 act.

Bill Butler: I am grateful for that clarification.

Paul D Smith (Noctis): I will follow on from what Paul Waterson has just said. One of our central concerns is that imposition of requirements at local level is not handled reasonably. We are dealing with responsible businesses that have licences—other aspects of the economy and other business leaders are treated slightly differently. The attitude seems to be, “Well you’ve just got to get on with it in the licensed trade, because you operate under different rules.” Our argument is that we are talking about people’s livelihoods: businesses in the licensed trade are employers, and recent United Kingdom figures show that 50 pubs are closing every week.

Particular difficulties affect the licensed trade at the moment, and we would hate to see the bill exacerbate those difficulties. The present difficulties have been described numerous times in the press over recent months, so we do not need to go over them again.

Bill Butler: Just for the record, would you go over one or two of those difficulties again?

Paul D Smith (Noctis): We are in the middle of a credit crunch, and the smoking ban has inevitably raised issues—people do not go to licensed premises as much as they used to. Another issue is the cost of supermarket alcohol relative to on-trade alcohol. Numerous issues arise for the on-trade, and to exacerbate them would present lots and lots of people with considerable difficulties. We fail to see why that is necessary. The two-year rule, for instance, does not seem to make a huge amount of sense in terms of allowing major developments. The bringing into Scotland of money and jobs seems to be very important right now, so anything that prevents it does not seem to be sensible.

Paul Smith (Scottish Late Night Operators Association): One of the biggest problems that we will see with the 2005 act relates to its intention to control irresponsible promotions. Any adjustment in price will have to remain in place for 72 hours, and other promotions that currently exist will be banned. Members of our association are phoning me and asking, “If I run this promotion come 1 September, will it circumvent the act?” When I then hear the creative and imaginative promotions that are coming forward, I have to say, “Yes, that will circumvent the intent of the act, although it is not in the spirit of the act.” As well-intentioned as are the controls in the 2005 act to prevent irresponsible promotions, they are weak and will fail. I fear that irresponsible promotions will continue.

For example, one of our members said that, although they must keep the same prices for 72 hours, they would introduce on a Wednesday and Thursday a brand of vodka that was 50p cheaper than the £2.80 for their main line of vodka because they want to drive business on those nights, then, come Friday and Saturday, they would simply de-list the cheap brand so that it would not be available. They would therefore not be adjusting the price, which they are not entitled to do under the controls in the 2005 act, but just de-listing a brand. I bounced that example off lawyer advisers, who said that it would be perfectly reasonable to do that.

The trade is only now—because 1 September is fast approaching—beginning to sit down and turn its attention to the issue. My fear is that once the 2005 act comes fully into force on 1 September, we will see a raft of promotions out there that will circumvent the 2005 act’s intention to control irresponsible promotions, which was a central pillar of the Nicholson report. The question is how we address irresponsible practice in the on-trade and deep discounting in the off-trade, and the effect that it has on both areas and on the health of our nation's people. I am gravely worried: I think that we will see huge problems shortly after the 2005 act comes fully into force.

Patrick Browne (Scottish Beer and Pub Association): I thank the committee for the opportunity to be here today. The issues fall into two camps. First, there are issues around licensing transition. People have this morning expressed concern about designating managers of premises by the deadline of 1 September. There are real issues around that, which could have major implications for the industry.

The second category of issues concerns unintended consequences that will arise from the bill's wording and the need for greater clarity. For example, the Law Society flagged up issues around the appeals process. We were promised a fast-track process whereby, if a licence was sanctioned, suspended or revoked, we could go in front of a sheriff and have the issue resolved in weeks. The problem at the moment is that the process takes up to six months, or longer.

The second area on which it would be useful to get greater clarity—I think the Scottish Government is working on this—is what constitutes a major or minor variation under the 2005 act. At the moment, changing a pub's name is apparently viewed as a major variation that requires the licence holder to go through the process of relicensing their premises, which seems to be a bit extreme.

Bill Butler: I am grateful for that. I have a question for Paul D Smith. The Noctis written submission refers to the development of a role of night-time economy co-ordinator to run in parallel with that of licensing standards officer. What are the practical advantages of creating such a role? You refer in your submission to the example of Bournemouth.

Paul D Smith (Noctis): Historically, Bournemouth Borough Council had issues with the licensed trade and the police. A relatively short time ago—within the past couple of years, I think—the council employed as a night-time economy co-ordinator a former licensee who had run a hotel many years ago and understood the licensed trade. The co-ordinator's job is to liaise with the council, the police and local licensees, which encourages dialogue between the different groups. We undertook a major initiative last year on community engagement because we believe that it is the key to providing answers to some conundrums. Local forums can help operators, the council and the police work together effectively.

There being a night-time economy co-ordinator means that the different groups can be brought together to address particular issues. We often reach for legislative solutions when, in fact, a simple conversation would solve problems. Neither the people who run pubs and clubs nor the police and local authorities want difficulty: they want simple and practical solutions.

Bill Butler: Is that a separate position or could further advantage be taken of those co-ordinators if a slight change was made to the remit of the licensing standards officer?

Paul D Smith (Noctis): Very possibly. The understanding that partnership is the key should lie at the heart of the licensing officer's role: officers have to respect the licensees and business owners in their communities. By and large, licensees are not looking to get around anything, to make difficulties or to cause problems. The majority of people who run licensed businesses in Scotland, England and Wales or wherever view their businesses as assets to their communities. Those who do not take that view are very much in the minority. The real danger is that we could end up looking at that tiny minority and viewing their behaviour as the norm—we could end up creating a legal structure in which the presumption is that these are difficult businesses that need to be sat on. That would not help to address the broad issues around those businesses as community assets—as hubs where people gather and places where people are employed.

Bill Butler: That is fairly clear. Thank you.

Robert Brown: I want to pursue the issue of the processing of personal licences, which the Law Society of Scotland and others have raised. I seek clarity on the significance and composition of these licences. The Law Society suggested that two components are involved: the backlog of applications that licensing boards are yet to consider, and lack of knowledge about the trade—people are not applying for posts. The two issues are somewhat different one from the other. What is Mr Browne's view on that, including on the need to find a solution?

Patrick Browne: It is clear that the onus is on individual licensees to ensure that they comply with the requirements of the 2005 act. I am reasonably confident that our members have done so, wherever possible; they have submitted their applications and await their licences.

The issue is complicated by a range of factors. Licensing boards have rightly focused on processing premises licence applications instead of getting to personal licence applications, the result of which is that we now have a backlog of personal licence applications. Also, communication with the trade has been limited. The previous Scottish Government’s last promotional campaign on the issue that was aimed at the industry was in December 2007, just a few months before transition. Since that time, we have had no follow-up.

A real issue is involved, the scale of which will become apparent only as we approach 1 September. Many councils go into recess for part of the summer, so during that period it will be more difficult for them to process applications at the rate at which they have so far.

Robert Brown: Have you had any communication with the Scottish Government on the perceived problems? If so, have you heard of anything in the pipeline to sort them out?

Patrick Browne: The SBPA met the Cabinet Secretary for Justice a few weeks ago. We raised the issue with him and followed up with a letter in which we highlighted the research that is now in the public domain. We made that approach, but we have so far had no positive response, other than the expectation that individual applicants should have their licences in place by 1 September.

The problem is not only the 1 September deadline because some boards are imposing deadlines that are well before then for submission and processing of personal licence applications, after which the licensee’s name is added to the premises licence. For example, Orkney Islands Council has suggested that applications should be made by 30 June, and other councils are following suit with similar deadlines. The issue is starting to bite.

Paul Smith (Scottish Late Night Operators Association): An application for a personal licence must be made to the board in the area in which the person resides. That is causing a backlog, because some managers in my company live in one part of the country but work in another. We cannot apply to make them designated premises managers until they have their personal licences. Some boards will allow an application for a designated premises manager to be made first, but some will not accept such an application unless the person’s personal licence is provided at the time of the application.

Such situations are causing my company deep concern. We are on the phone every day to ask how the personal licence application process is going, but we are told, "We can’t tell you; you’ll just have to wait and see." When we ask whether the application will be granted in time, we are told, "We don’t know." To resolve that problem, I might have to remove a manager from his position and fill it with someone who has a personal licence.

Colin Wilkinson (Scottish Licensed Trade Association): We have the same problem. We encouraged our members to apply for personal licences when they applied for premises licences. Some were told, “Just forget about that the now,” but they are now being chased by licensing boards for their applications.

The SLTA office gets a lot of phone calls on this. We represent about 1,200 independent licensed trade businesses and we have noticed a marked increase in the number of people who seem to think that all they need to do is sit through their training.

Robert Brown: There is a double issue, as identified by the Law Society of Scotland.

Colin Wilkinson: There definitely is.

Robert Brown: Is there a considerable backlog of applications, with relatively few being granted, as we have heard?

Colin Wilkinson: Yes.

Paul Waterson: The situation will get worse.

Robert Brown: As I understand it, the SLTA raised three points to do with fees in its written submission. First, you said that fees are higher in Scotland than they are in England. Secondly, you suggested that there is a disparity in the treatment of registered clubs. Thirdly, and perhaps most significant, you made the point that although supermarkets have the bulk of offsales trade, their fees are relatively small beer, so to speak. Do the other witnesses share those concerns? Is there a case for making the supermarkets bear a greater proportion of the total cost of the licensing system?

Colin Wilkinson: May I add something? The system is based on rateable values, but no consideration was given to the fact that the rateable values of on-trade and off-sales premises—mainly supermarkets—are calculated in completely different ways. For the on-trade, the calculation is based on turnover—the value is roughly 8 or 9 per cent—whereas for supermarkets it is based on square footage. The people who benefit most from the sale of alcohol should pay proportionately.

Patrick Browne: We supported the principles behind the proposals on fees that were put to the Scottish Government. We accepted the rateable value calculator—I think that we allowed for the view that the SLTA expressed.

I will be honest and say that our biggest problems have been first, the lack of transparency in boards’ operating costs and fee income, and secondly, the setting of the maximum fee at twice the original level. There has been a double whammy, which has meant that some boards—I stress that I am talking about probably only four or five—are doing well and making loads of cash. I think that one board was planning for a surplus of £500,000 in the previous financial year. That money disappeared into the council coffers at the end of the financial year. It had been paid by the trade in good faith, but the trade gained no benefit from it. The combination of the two factors that I mentioned has not been helpful.

Robert Brown: It is obvious that the relationship between the on-trade and the off-trade is an underlying issue. I guess that the organisations that the two Mr Smiths represent have a slightly different mix of members than the other witnesses’ organisations have. Is that right?

Paul D Smith (Noctis): We represent late-night economy businesses; the Scottish Late Night Operators Association has a similar membership. We represent clubs, bars, live venues and student venues.

One of the key issues involving the supermarkets and our membership is around preloading. The relative cost of off-trade alcohol means that lots of people—the vast majority—are preloading, to a lesser or greater extent, before they go out to our members’ premises. Without doubt, that is causing a problem, and not just with our members’ premises being relatively empty early in the evening. We are not hugely keen on this, but if our members run a deep-discounted promotion, their businesses will be bustling early in the evening. If they do not, people will turn up a couple of hours later having had quite a lot to drink from the supermarket. Taxi drivers used to talk about taking inebriated people home; now they talk about bringing inebriated people into the towns and cities. That change has come about over recent years.

There is a key question about our members’ businesses getting into trouble. They must obviously turn away some people who have spent money on taxis to come into town. When they get to the door of the premises, those people are too inebriated to get in, and that can cause altercations on the door. It puts our members’ businesses in a pretty invidious situation: potentially, they can be in quite a lot of trouble with the police and local authorities, based on incidents that occur when they turn people away. That should not be the case. Our members do not, by and large, sell alcohol to people in those circumstances—rather, they turn them away. There have been instances in England and Wales under the legislation there—the Licensing Act 2003—when that has caused problems. The businesses concerned have had pretty difficult conversations with their local councils and with the police, not based on their having caused the problems, but on their experiences of people turning up at their doors having had too much to drink before getting to their premises.

Robert Brown: Those are all important points, but I will stick to the issue of fees, which I began with. I want to clarify whether the other organisations support the approach that Mr Wilkinson has outlined on behalf of the Scottish Licensed Trade Association—that the supermarkets should bear a higher proportion of the cost of regulating the system, in terms of fees, partly for the reason that has been explained and partly for more general reasons.

Paul D Smith (Noctis): It seems fair, given that the majority of alcohol sales are moving towards the off-trade, that the off-trade should bear a reasonable percentage of the costs.

Robert Brown: Do you have a similar view, Mr Browne, or do you take a different view?

Patrick Browne: When the original fees proposal was being discussed, we stood by a principle—that our fees should reflect costs. If it costs the same amount of money to administer a licence for a supermarket as it does for a larger pub, the two businesses should pay broadly the same amount.

There might be an opportunity to examine the rateable value bands on which the calculation is based and to adjust the bands to reflect the change. There might be an opportunity to consider imposing higher bands at a higher level. That might be a way forward.

The fundamental principle is that premises should pay broadly the amount of money that it actually costs to administer the licensing process.

Nigel Don: I want to pick up on that issue. It would be useful if somebody came up with a better banding system—which seems to be accepted in principle—improved the numbers and gave us their ideas. Otherwise, we are all guessing.

Paul Waterson: The foundation for the system is a ratio, if you use the rates. You should remember that the rates for on-trade premises are far higher than for off-sale premises, therefore it is unfair to use rates to start with: you might wish to use turnover instead. I do not think that the fees that some pubs are charged—which we know some of them cannot afford, which is why they are going out of business—equate to those for supermarkets turning over millions of pounds in alcohol sales a year. The rates are fundamentally flawed to start with, because the two sides of the trade pay according to entirely different ratios. Our ratio is 9 per cent of turnover, whereas the supermarkets’ ratio is nowhere near that.

Nigel Don: Presumably you could give us an estimate of a fudge factor, or multiplier, that would enable you to get on-trade and off-trade back to something like equity. Is one rate two times higher or five times higher than the other, for instance?

The Convener: You will appreciate that your evidence on that would have to be tested by some means.

Nigel Don: The point is that, if the arithmetic is not right, I would be happy for us to find a way of improving it, although it would not be perfect. It would be helpful if, having accepted the basic principle that rateable value is a way forward, you gave us some mechanism for coming up with something that is equitable. That needs to come from gentlemen such as yourselves because, frankly, we would be guessing—it is not something that we can do.

Colin Wilkinson: In its consultation document on the draft Licensing (Fees) (Scotland) Regulations 2007, the Scottish Government described its remit as *to define a system:

- Allowing for full cost recovery
- Having the same scale of charges across Scotland as a whole*— which we do not have—and

Which would not be unfair to SMEs.

What we have got is certainly not fair to small and medium-sized enterprises.

Nigel Don: I ask you to work on the basis that we accept that as a statement of principle but we need you to give us the answer, please, as we have no mechanism for coming up with one. That would be helpful.

Let us move on to site-only licences. Most of you were here earlier when we spoke about them. What was helpful about site-only licences under previous legislation? How should the matter be dealt with in the future?

Paul Smith (Scottish Late Night Operators Association): I support the position that was put forward by the Law Society. My company undertakes many large-scale developments across Scotland. As the representative from the Law Society said, we need to go through certain processes, starting with securing an option on a piece of land or a building. Often, the vendor of the land or building will willingly enter into a restricted option period, but they will not want to sit on it for an indefinite length of time without knowing that a licence will be secured. Once the land or the building is secured, we have to build the concept and define how large the development will be, what it will involve and what the principal costs will be. We then have to engage with our funders, to ensure that the funding is available, and apply for a licence. We have to secure some form of licence at that stage to conclude the deal with the vendor on the piece of land or building and move to the next stage of the fine detail. That is how it has worked under the 1976 act.

In the past eight years, I have successfully built three very large developments in Scotland using the principles in the 1976 act. I doubt that I would be able to do the same under the 2005 act, as I see all sorts of hurdles—not least of which is the fact that I would not be able to secure funding if I did not have a licence. Any vendor of land or property would not tie into an option for many years until we got through to the detail and secured the licence under the 2005 act. That would severely restrict my company’s ability to grow and develop. I appreciate the Law Society’s concerns.

Nigel Don: Does anybody else have anything to add?

Paul Waterson: Five years seems fair.

Paul Smith (Scottish Late Night Operators Association): That accords with planning consent which, when it is granted, lasts for five years, so it is logical.

Nigel Don: Thank you very much.

The Scottish Beer and Pub Association’s written submission raises concerns about the personal details of licence applicants being made available to the general public. Can you expand on that, please?

Patrick Browne: It is a point of basic fairness. Given the fact that licensees tend to be public figures in their communities, they may not always want personal information to be in the public domain. In the case of a pub company, information about directors in a different part of the country might be made public. Our view is that, in the interests of data protection and personal privacy, it is reasonable that that information be made available to licensing boards, so that they can complete the necessary statutory checks, but not to everybody.

Nigel Don: What particular information are you worried about? Can you give an example—a hypothetical one, if necessary?
Patrick Browne: Our written submission refers to people’s names and addresses being made available. Making someone’s address public poses particular issues in relation to personal privacy. We are concerned that the information could be misused.

Nigel Don: Does anybody else have anything to add?

Paul Waterson: We agree that it is not right that the addresses of people who run local pubs and so on are made public.

Cathie Craigie: Good afternoon, gentlemen. Section 131 will give licensing boards the power to grant licences subject to the modification of premises, if the applicant agrees to the modification. The Scottish Beer and Pub Association was the only panel member to highlight concerns about that in its submission. The committee is not helped much by the fact that the submissions from the boards of our two largest cities seem to disagree about the implications of section 131. What are the panel’s views? Will the change bring any benefits for your members or the public?

Patrick Browne: We have no issue with an applicant and a board mutually agreeing that a course of action is appropriate for an application, with a consequent change to a layout plan. Our concern is that we are not convinced that that is how the process will work. The Law Society’s representatives talked about a board saying that a bar should be moved from one side of a room to another. Such a situation would be fairly extreme. I have attended many board meetings in the past 18 months, for my sins. Board members might have concerns about the proximity of furniture or a door to the bar, about a serving hatch that is in the wrong place, about a pillar on the bar obstructing the view of the rest of the bar or about an amusement machine. Our concern is that if boards are given the power to make changes, they might try in some cases to do so without agreement and leave it for the applicant to seek a remedy.

In the transition, it appears to be agreed that when an applicant and a board agree a course of action, the operating plan will be changed and the layout plan will be changed as a consequence. Our concern is that including in provisions the layout plan as well as the operating plan might be a step too far.

Paul Smith (Scottish Late Night Operators Association): I agree. My concern is that when an applicant is before a licensing board that is considering the operating plan and the layout plan in detail, the board might, in effect, present the applicant with a fait accompli. If the board does not like the position of the bar or where a clutch of tables, a seating area or a dance floor is located, it can say that it will agree to the application if the applicant agrees to change the layout. That is presenting a fait accompli.

Licensing boards are not experts in design and build. Designers with many years’ experience set out how licensed premises will work. I recently worked on a licensed premises of more than 40,000ft² that contained many trading aspects, including restaurants, a nightclub, a private members lounge, private function rooms, a bar, kids areas and amusement areas. It is critical that different trading areas work together and that crowd control measures allow movement through a building without obstruction. Achieving that takes many months of careful planning and design.

I am worried that licensing boards, which sometimes have only five or 10 minutes to decide on an application, could suggest a change that might seem right to them but which would destroy a building’s layout and design. I am greatly concerned that if an applicant were presented with a fait accompli—we should remember that the decision whether to grant the licence on the day might be critical for the applicant to secure options on buildings or funding—they might be forced to accept it.

As the Law Society said, boards would be micromanaging premises. We should leave it to the experts, who have spent weeks and months on working out the layout. They know best.

Paul D Smith (Noctis): I do not know of a single licensee who aims to lay out premises in a way that causes maximum aggravation. Licensees lay out premises to minimise aggravation. Bars and other features are sited to allow reasonable movement through the premises. It makes absolutely no sense for a licensee to create plans that lead to problems or confusion. That is why, as Paul Smith from the SLNOA said, a huge amount of effort goes into plans. People do not want seemingly random decisions to be made. There are financial implications, too. It is not reasonable to expect people to have to go back into another three or six-month cycle just because of some random decision made at a board.

The Convener: We will pursue the issue with council representatives presently, but would it not be the case, Mr Browne, that in the run-up to an application being heard by a board, discussions would take place between the applicant, his legal representatives and representatives of council departments, for example people in building control? If concerns arose to do with the siting of, for example, a non-weight-bearing pillar, they would be discussed at the time. Some agreement or compromise could probably be reached.

Patrick Browne: I take that point, convener, but when issues have been raised during transition and discussions have taken place, applicants have sometimes accepted the view of the board but at other times they have not and the matter has fallen, because people have not wanted to push it.

If you gave boards the dual lever of amending the operating plan and the layout plan, the pressure could be too much. It would allow boards to comment on issues such as the siting of an amusement machine in a bar. They could say, “Why don’t you move it? We think it should be here on the plan.” That would add a further layer of complication.

I have no difficulty with agents acting on behalf of an applicant agreeing with a board on an outcome that is acceptable to both parties. However, if the amendment to the 2005 act were passed, I would be concerned about boards making unilateral decisions on changes.

Paul Smith (Scottish Late Night Operators Association): Convener, you are dead right: the place for discussions is between building control, building standards and the architect or designer, as the application goes through the process. I have often found that, because of their knowledge of building regulations, people suggest that an application might not comply, and changes are made. Between them, the applicant and building control arrive at the right end result. It worries me that, having reached that point, the application could be placed in front of a licensing board with no experience that might make suggestions as serious as changing the position of the bar, for example.

The Convener: Do you concur, Mr Smith with a D?

Paul D Smith (Noctis): I do, completely. Sometimes, the simplest solutions are the best. A conversation at an early point is obviously better than a late conversation with the board.

The Convener: I see that Mr Waterson accepts that point.

Stewart Maxwell: If the licensing board was pushing for changes at that stage, it would surely have to have a reasonable case for doing so. Mr Browne, you said that decisions would be taken unilaterally—you may even have said arbitrarily. You surely are not suggesting that licensing boards would make changes for no reason. There would have to be solid logic behind any decisions. Reasons would have to be explained.

Patrick Browne: I am loth to suggest that changes would be taken for no reason. However, I spent four years as a member of a licensing board, so I have been privy to discussions from the other side. I have also attended quite a few board meetings over the past 18 months, and there have been occasions on which board members have commented on the siting of an amusement machine, but board officials have had to point out that the location was chosen as a result of professional advice from officials, LSOs and others.

Paul Smith of the SLNOA made a point about people dropping in at the end of the process, rather than being involved in the discussions throughout. That is dangerous. Giving power over the operating plan and the layout plan might be taking a step too far.

Paul Waterson: You would open up things to the inconsistencies that we spoke about before: the whole of the country would be different, with an inconsistent approach. Something might seem logical to a licensing board, but that does not mean that it is right. In our experience, unfortunately, licensing boards sometimes have ideas on how things should run that are different from everybody else’s.

Stewart Maxwell: But, on the other side of the coin, just because a licensee thinks that something is right does not mean that it is right.

Paul Waterson: The first thing that anybody would say to an architect is, “Remember the board.” As Paul D Smith said, people do not go looking for problems. Changes are made as the process goes on. There is no need for another tier.

12:15

Paul Smith (Scottish Late Night Operators Association): The point is to leave it to the experts. The licensed trader—the person who is making the investment—who has probably put his home on the line and is prepared to suggest the design and layout of his premises is an expert, and building control people are experts. Those are the people who should be involved. With respect, licensing boards are often far from expert in such situations and a knee-jerk comment can kill a design scheme. If there is imposition on the layout or operating plan, it will not work.

Paul Martin: Gentlemen, do you want to comment on the Government’s proposed new provision in section 132, on antisocial behaviour reports?

Paul D Smith (Noctis): Although we have no issues with problem premises being dealt with effectively, altercations caused by doing the right thing and turning people away can find their way into reports. Similarly, problems can be caused by an operator doing the right thing by managing people in and out of premises where there are no smoking areas—a lot of late-night premises do not have designated smoking areas. An operator might be doing their damnedest to avoid problems, but problems can occur. They can be placed in a pretty invidious situation if they are doing their best to stop people coming into their premises yet they are still falling foul of the authorities. That is not particularly fair.

Paul Martin: You make a powerful point, but if police reporting mechanisms were more effective in reporting incidents, they might at the same time report that the applicant had made reasonable efforts to deal with the problem. It is important to recognise that while the vast majority of licensees run good and effective businesses and deal with antisocial behaviour, antisocial behaviour reports provide an opportunity to highlight those who do not.

Paul D Smith (Noctis): Absolutely. The more evidence there is of antisocial behaviour on their premises the better. It would also be useful to give good premises more of a pat on the back. Of course I would say that, because I run the trade body for the late-night sector, which often operates under difficult trading conditions that are managed incredibly well by our members. However, there are operators out there who are causing problems. Most of the people on this panel would be happy for the rogue operators to be removed.

Paul Martin: The Government proposes that it would be for the licensing authority to request an antisocial behaviour report or for the police to decide to provide one. Will that create consistency issues? Some applicants might say, “Why am I being reported by the chief constable when another applicant is not being reported to the authorities, even though I am aware of antisocial behaviour on their premises?” Having a consistent approach, which was delivered under the 2005 act, would ensure that all reports were provided consistently. Under the proposed provision, a report would be made only at the request of the chief constable or the licensing authority.

Paul Waterson: We are saying that the problem premises should be taken to task. They should be identified by the police or by the licensing board, if there are problems. However, when we get right down to local issues, there should be some discretion. That is the discretion that I am talking about. Who has better knowledge of the local issues than the licensing board or the local police?

Paul Martin: How do we ensure that the process is robust? We passed the Licensing (Scotland) Bill in 2005 because the police were not providing consistent information to boards. The provision whereby the police had to provide antisocial behaviour reports in every case ensured consistency. I appreciate that some boards have local intelligence, but sometimes that local intelligence is unfair. The requirement to provide antisocial behaviour reports ensures that there is a consistent approach.

Paul Smith (Scottish Late Night Operators Association): It is difficult to argue against your point. Consistency says that if we are to have a process of providing antisocial behaviour reports, it should apply to all premises. I fully take that on board. However, perhaps I am missing something. Such reports have had to be supplied for every application during transition but, given that the transition period is nearly over and licences are granted in perpetuity, antisocial behaviour reports will require to be provided only for new licence applications under the 2005 act. I do not think that that represents a burden on the police. I do not see what the difficulty is, even though I still feel that the provision in the 2005 act remains a problem, because of how distance is calculated and the fact that offences can be caught that are not related to premises.

An antisocial behaviour report will have to be prepared for every new application, when a board member requests one or when the police want to bring to the board’s attention premises that have already been granted a licence. By and large, all the work has been concluded. I take your point on board. Consistency and fairness suggest that antisocial behaviour reports should be supplied for every licence application.

I still have doubts about how the information is identified and brought together. I can give the committee a practical example relating to premises that I have in Fife. Simply by virtue of the premises’ location—adjacent to an extremely busy taxi rank, which is a hotspot for antisocial behaviour—the premises were subject to an antisocial behaviour report that was supplied by the police in relation to an application during the transition under the 2005 act. The report made the area sound like a war zone. When the report was read out, I saw some board members raise their eyebrows and focus on the premises. The first question that I asked was whether the police were prepared to comment on whether they thought that the premises were well run or were problem premises. To their credit, the police said that they were extremely well run premises. However, the report made the location of the premises sound like a war zone.

Stewart Maxwell: I have a question about consistency versus local flexibility. Do you agree that although consistency is often welcome, it serves no purpose to use up police resources, licensing boards’ time and the time and effort of your members churning out antisocial behaviour reports on premises that, frankly, give concern to no one?

Paul Smith (Scottish Late Night Operators Association): I agree. On one hand, there is the consistency argument; on the other is the fact that producing an antisocial behaviour report for every licence application involves a lot of work for the police. If the premises are not problem premises, what is the need for a report? However, although I recognise both points of view, I think that, by and large, the work under the 2005 Act has now been done. The police will have to produce reports on new premises licence applications, but the number of applications that are made under the 2005 act will be limited, not least because of the condition of the economy and the state of our sector. If a member of a licensing board or a local councillor asks for a review, an antisocial behaviour report will require to be produced, but that should not be too difficult to do.

Paul Waterson: Antisocial behaviour reports can be used as powerful tools against premises. They can be used to say, “We’re getting reports that the premises aren’t being run properly.” However, if all premises are the subject of such reports, the message is that people do not have to worry too much, as 95 per cent of the reports are useless anyway because, as Paul Smith said, a premises might be next to a taxi rank or might be one of a cluster of pubs. That is the basis of our thinking.

Patrick Browne: I echo what Paul Smith from the SLNOA said towards the end of his remarks. Under the 2005 act, anybody can ask for a review of a licence at any time on the basis of any of the licensing objectives. If a board accepted an approach from a member of the public who complained about a premises on the basis of the crime and disorder objective, I would expect the board to ask the police for an antisocial behaviour report, so I suspect that we might get to that point anyway. However, there is a difference between asking for antisocial behaviour reports on 20,000 premises in advance of licensing transition and what we will have from now on, which is, perhaps, 700 reports a year plus the review applications.

The Convener: I have a final question for Mr Waterson. In your initial answer to Bill Butler, you pointed out what you regard as inconsistencies between licensing boards. I can well understand the frustrations of the SLTA in that respect and the difficulty that you have in giving advice to individual members, but do you agree that different licensing regimes, in some respects, should be applied in Glasgow and, say, Moray, where different local conditions apply?

Paul Waterson: In relation to training, a single, consistent message goes out throughout the country, which works well. However, if we think about permitted hours, while the position in the short term might be fine, as time goes on and licensing boards change and develop their ideas, we could end up with a patchwork effect. One side of a street could be open and the other side closed. As far as I know, the overprovision provisions in the 2005 act have not even commenced yet.

It would be a lot easier if the positions on overprovision and permitted opening hours were set out nationally, with some local discretion, of course. We have lost some of the more consistent parts of the 1976 act as we have tried to give boards more and more control, and they will use that—they will interpret things in ways that give them even more control. That is a dangerous situation to be in.

The Convener: Gentlemen, thank you for giving evidence today. It has been a very useful exercise.

12:27
Meeting suspended.

12:29
On resuming—

The Convener: I welcome our fourth and final panel, which comprises Councillor Marjorie Thomas, chair of the city of Edinburgh licensing board; Mairi Millar, senior solicitor and assistant clerk from the city of Glasgow licensing board; Frank Jensen, legal team leader at Fife Council; and Sylvia Murray, policy manager at the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities. Thank you for giving of your time this morning to give evidence. We will move straight to questions. Time is getting on, so if one of you has answered a question and the others agree with what has been said, do not hesitate to say so.

I draw your attention to the fact that the bill proposes to extend licensing requirements in relation to market operators and free events. You will have heard the evidence given by earlier witnesses, who expressed concern that the provision could impact negatively on charitable and community events. Are those concerns valid?

Frank Jensen (Fife Council): Yes. At the moment, local authorities are required to resolve either to license or not to license a market operator’s whole activity—there is no discretion as to which bits of that activity they may or may not license. For the past 20 years or so, numerically the most common type of market has been the car-boot sale, of which there are and will continue to be many in Scotland. Conveniently, from the point of view of administration of the market operator licensing system, most of those fall within the exemption, because almost all of them are run by voluntary, charitable, sporting or recreational organisations for fundraising purposes. The removal of the exemption will bring all of them within the scope of the licensing regime.

It would be highly desirable if there were explicit provision that gave local authorities discretion to determine which categories of market in their area they wished to license, control or regulate. The committee has already heard from others about how the issue might be determined—through assessment of perceived risk, numbers and so on. Such explicit provision would allow local authorities to decide whether to license small-scale markets, or car-boot sales by church groups, and so on. That is essential, as the concerns that were expressed to the committee earlier are well founded.

The Convener: Do any of you take a contrary view?

Mairi Millar (City of Glasgow Licensing Board): No. I agree with what was said. It is important to point out that, even if such events were not licensed, they would still be subject to inspection and scrutiny by our out-of-hours health and safety team, for example. Applying for a licence has cost and practical implications—it is a cumbersome process that would put off a number of charitable organisations.

The Convener: I turn to the question of licences that have, in effect, lapsed because the application is late. As you are aware, the bill makes provision for licence applications that are made within 28 days of the expiry of the existing licence to be treated as renewals, rather than new applications. Might that have any negative consequences?

Mairi Millar: It is unclear what would happen during the 28-day period. Earlier today the point was made that we will be in a sort of limbo. It is not entirely clear whether someone who has not renewed their licence and is found driving during the period is committing an offence. Glasgow has a long-standing policy of limiting the number of taxis. If a licence application is not made at the renewal point, should we take it that the licence will not be renewed and that there is a free licence, or must we wait until the 28-day period has expired? It is unclear how we should deal with speculative applications that come in during that time.

The Convener: No one has any other comments to make on that, so we will turn to alcohol licensing.

Nigel Don: I am delighted that you probably heard the comments from the trade representatives about modifications to layout plans and operating plans. Will you give us the view from the other side of the table? Are their concerns justified?

Mairi Millar: I heard comments about frivolous matters in relation to attempts by boards to modify layout plans. I am not aware of the board in Glasgow ever having intervened because it was unhappy with the cosmetic layout of premises. Any attempts to modify the layout or operating plan have been the result of concerns raised by building control officers or licensing standards officers, so I do not buy into the remarks about frivolous matters.

I am concerned that section 23 of the 2005 act, if amended by section 131 of the bill, would provide that, if the modification were agreed by the board, the application would have to be granted. If a modification is agreed at the licensing board meeting, amended plans are prepared and developed. Only at that stage do we consult again building control and the fire authority. An issue might arise that was not in the board’s or the applicant’s thoughts when the modification was agreed and the bill seems to provide that “the Board must grant the application” with the modification, despite any concerns that might arise subsequent to the modification having been discussed.

Nigel Don: Can you suggest, either now or in writing later, how we can end up with a mechanism that will close the loop in that regard?

Mairi Millar: I do not think that there is a particular problem at the moment. In Glasgow, if there is a concern it will be discussed and the application will be continued to allow amended plans to be lodged. The amended plans would go to the various officials and, if they were fine, there would be a straightforward grant. If there were a difficulty, the application would go back to the board, where the issues would be considered without the constraint of the board being in the “must grant” situation.

Nigel Don: So the answer is to continue the application to the next board meeting.
Mairi Millar: Yes. That is what happens in practice. I think that that is the case with other boards, too. I know that John Loudon talked about it earlier.

Nigel Don: Is it fair to say that most boards meet more frequently than once a quarter?

Mairi Millar: During transition the Glasgow board has been meeting twice a week. It is difficult to anticipate how often it will meet in future, but I would imagine that meetings will be at least monthly.

Nigel Don: That is what I thought. When I was on the licensing board in Dundee, we tended to meet quarterly, but there was almost always one meeting four weeks after the cycle to catch up with the continued business. Councillor Thomas, do you have any thoughts on how councillors will feel about being told that they come up with frivolous changes?

Councillor Marjorie Thomas (City of Edinburgh Licensing Board): I agree with Mairi Millar. The word frivolous did not gel with my experience. Any decisions that boards make are taken seriously. We would never agree to anything unless the officials were happy with the changes. As far as operating plans are concerned, I think that we have once done something because of a red line—a small issue—but never anything of major significance. I concur with Mairi Millar that the board would change plans only if officials reckoned that we needed to do so.

Nigel Don: Do you concur with the idea that boards might meet often enough to ensure that variations to applications can be dealt with by continuing the application?

Councillor Thomas: Yes. In Edinburgh we meet monthly on Mondays and Tuesdays and throughout the recess, too. Sometimes the board meeting lasts from 9 until half past 6. There is plenty time.

Nigel Don: Do the other witnesses have anything to add to that?

Frank Jensen: In Fife, the board has been meeting weekly during the transitional period. Thereafter, its meetings will probably be monthly. Then again, if urgent business requires to be dealt with, it is relatively easy to convene a meeting at shorter notice.

Amendments to layout plans have been dealt with in much the same way as in Glasgow. Most amendments have been for fairly basic, innocuous matters, such as reducing the number of different display areas in off-sales from four or five to two.

Cathie Craigie: Does Mairi Millar believe that section 131, on the modification of layout plans, adds anything to the bill? If not, should it be taken out?

Mairi Millar: I do not think that the amendment of section 23 of the 2005 act is necessary. Current practice deals more than adequately with the situation.

Cathie Craigie: The written submission from the City of Edinburgh Council’s licensing board says that “The Board welcomed this amendment which gives effect to”

what happens in practice, but you said earlier, Councillor Thomas, that you agreed with Miss Millar’s points. Can the City of Edinburgh Council clarify its position in that respect?

Councillor Thomas: My point was that, to my knowledge, plans with which we have dealt have rarely had to be changed. I agree that it is not a frivolous thing, but a process that we go through. I can say only that it has not been an issue in Edinburgh. Perhaps Edinburgh and Glasgow have slightly different views on that.

Mairi Millar: It is important that licensing boards have the power to modify layout plans. My difficulty is with the “must grant” provision that would be the effect of the proposed change to section 23 of the 2005 act.

The Convener: In fairness to the previous witnesses, it should be put on record that none of them used the word “frivolous”.

Paul Martin: The bill will modify the requirement to provide copies of premises licence applications, so that only a chief constable will be required to receive a copy. Copies of applications will no longer be provided in local newspapers and so on. What are your views on that?

Mairi Millar: A balance must be struck. Given the length of such documents, it would be overburdensome for boards to have to provide copies of the application form, the operating plan and the layout plan for neighbourhood notification and various other consultations. A chief constable and a fire authority should certainly receive all those documents in order that they can comment on them.

The difficulty with simply notifying—particularly people living within a 4m radius of the applicant’s premises—is what they would be notified of, given that they would not get a copy of the application and that the 2005 act introduced generic premises licences. Previously, it was possible to say whether an application was for a public house, or an entertainment licence and so on, but we are now able to say only that an application has been received for a premises licence to authorise the sale of alcohol for on-sales, off-sales or both. My experience throughout the transition period for the 2005 act coming fully into force is that people who have received letters of notification have had no idea as to what was proposed, because of the lack of information that I have described. In all honesty, I think that even providing them with a copy of the application form, operating plan and layout plan would take them no further. I find it difficult to understand what is proposed in applications, because the generic operating plan has little or no information about what will happen on the premises.

Paul Martin: Communities and community councils usually get initial notification of a licence application via a newspaper. Is that not a helpful way of advising the community that a licence application has been submitted? People can then interrogate the information at a later stage, if they want to.

Mairi Millar: Boards can advertise applications either in a newspaper that circulates throughout the board’s area or on a website. There is a move away from newspaper adverts. There is an Improvement Service initiative, which I think is supported by the Scottish Government, to set up a national website on which all public-notice applications will be advertised. That takes me back to the earlier point about adverts for taxi fare changes. We wonder why the bill prescribes a newspaper advert for that when there is a move away from that type of advertising. This morning, John Loudon spoke about the difficulties with newspaper adverts. They appear at a point in time, so if people miss them, that is it, whereas people know where to look for a website. It is useful to notify community councils and neighbours that an application has been received. If they wish, they can come to the licensing section office and look at the application form and the operating and layout plans. However, as I said, I am not clear how much information that would give them.

Paul Martin: Do you accept that there is a move away from providing information to communities? As I said, I embrace the IT age in which we live, but about 40 per cent of the population in the UK does not have access to broadband. Some communities do not have access to the web. I appreciate that people can go to their local library, but the opportunity to provide information to the public via a newspaper is helpful, is it not?

Councillor Thomas: I agree with Mairi Millar. We have had difficulty in Edinburgh with people perceiving that they were not able to find adverts, so we have considered the issue in great detail. We have considered putting information in libraries and elsewhere, but people are becoming much more web orientated. Given the costs, we are advised that using the web is the way forward. I do not want members of the public to think that anything is being hidden. We want to make it crystal clear that the information is open and that nobody has anything to hide. We will try to find the best way to educate people that the information is on the council or board website, using links and so on.

Paul Martin: I am sorry to labour the point, but councils send out various publications. Every month, I am sent a copy of Glasgow magazine, which gives information about surgeries and events. Nobody has ever told me that the council should stop sending out that magazine because people can access information on the web. We still send out paper forms of information. Libraries have countless items of literature from local councils on various issues. Why is it an onerous task to send out information on applications, given that councils are happy to send out paper on other occasions? We cannot have it both ways.

Mairi Millar: Obviously, we will still notify the community council that an application has been received for its area and we will carry out the neighbourhood notification. During the transition period, there was no requirement to provide all the documentation. I would be reluctant to send out all the documentation for the neighbourhood notification. We had one application that resulted in 200 letters of notification being sent out. Photocopying a 16-page application form and operating plan and sending that to 200 local residents would cause chaos in our office.

Paul Martin: What are the witnesses’ views on antisocial behaviour reports?

Mairi Millar: One of my main concerns about the antisocial behaviour reports is that there is no tie-in with the applicant premises. That is a particular concern with premises that are not yet in operation. The suggestion is that boards might be provided with antisocial behaviour reports that detail the number of incidents of antisocial behaviour in a particular locality. My experience of appeals is that the courts want the board to establish culpability on the part of the applicant or licence holder. With board decisions that are based on test-purchase operations, the courts are looking for the board to establish that the failure is the licence holder’s fault and to show a causal connection. Against that background, I would be reluctant to advise a board that it could refuse an application based on an antisocial behaviour report, because that report will display no evidence of culpability on the part of the applicant. They cannot be shown to be responsible through their actions for the antisocial behaviour.

I also adopt all the points that the previous witnesses made about location. The applicant’s premises might be situated on a main thoroughfare where people are routinely passing by. Antisocial behaviour issues might also arise near premises that are located close to a particular type of hot spot, such as a football stadium. The problems might not be related to the management’s operation, or future operation, of the premises.

Frank Jensen: I go along with that entirely. So far, the antisocial behaviour reports that our board has viewed have been of very limited value, essentially because of that point about culpability. The reports do not contain a great deal of information that can be used, although they might paint a picture of the area. The information in antisocial behaviour reports might be used more beneficially in larger areas such as town centres, where the details could be reported to licensing forums, which can make general recommendations to the licensing board on terminal hours and other issues. However, that option is available already.

Paul Martin: Convener, I know that we are short of time, but I want to ask just one brief question.

The Convener: Let us fully examine the issue.

Paul Martin: Concerns have been raised about the requirement to consider an antisocial behaviour report, but licensing boards must surely take into account whether antisocial behaviour has surrounded the premises to which the application relates. If antisocial behaviour clearly did not exist to the same extent previously and has increased since the premises started operating, surely the board must be in a position to be properly informed about the kind of activities that are taking place. For example, if the police are called 167 times to a particular premises, surely that should be reported to the board without requiring a police officer to decide whether to provide the information. Is the requirement for an antisocial behaviour report not a more comprehensive way of doing that? Perhaps the reporting is not an exact science at the moment, but it could be developed properly to provide proper information.

Frank Jensen: I agree with that. If information has been built up over a period—for example, if the police were called to a premises 167 times in 2008 and 427 times in 2009—the board could take that information into account.

Mairi Millar: Perhaps a distinction should be made between a new application and a review. In reviewing premises licences, some tweaking might be useful to allow boards to look at whether there has been a build-up in instances of antisocial behaviour since the premises started operating.

The Convener: Stewart Maxwell has a question on what was said earlier about notification.

Stewart Maxwell: I just want to clarify one point. Ms Millar said that, under the new proposals, neighbour notification will still be required, community councils will still be notified and people will still be able to look at applications in more detail in their local council offices. However, as Mr Martin pointed out, not everyone has broadband. In the council’s view, what is the value of advertising in local newspapers? I ask for two reasons: first, not everyone buys a local newspaper; secondly, sales of local newspapers have declined quite rapidly in recent years. Does the council believe that providing access to the internet in public libraries—which are not only local but free—is a better way of notifying people than using local newspapers, whose sales are declining?

Mairi Millar: Under the 1976 act, everything was referable to the quarterly meeting of the licensing board, so people could have a reasonable expectation about when the newspaper advert would appear. For example, for the January quarterly meeting, the advert would appear just before Christmas so anyone with a particular interest would buy the paper around that time to see the notice. Because we no longer have quarterly meetings and because every time limit for an application runs from when the application was lodged, our adverts would need to appear every single day, depending on the number of applications that we receive. There could be no certainty in the public’s mind about when the newspaper advert would appear.

My original point was that I do not think that we could ever condense the information into a newspaper advert in such a way as to provide meaningful information to members of the public on what was being applied for.

Cathie Craigie: The bill provides for an occasional licence to be granted outwith the normal timescales when a licensing board is satisfied that an application should be dealt with quickly. Some of the written evidence that we have received expresses concern that that function cannot be delegated to members of the licensing board’s staff. Does that need to be addressed?

Mairi Millar: Having clerked the city of Glasgow licensing board for about half its meetings during the transition period, I like to think that I have earned its trust and respect, but under the proposals in the bill, I, as assistant clerk, would be unable to take that decision. That seems odd, given that many of my other responsibilities are more onerous.

Having said that, I have a concern about the decision that we would be asked to take. We mentioned that in our submission. My concern is about when it would be appropriate to exercise that discretion. Would it become routine for applicants to look to the clerk to exercise their discretion and reduce the time limit?

Cathie Craigie: You go into that in detail in your written submission. Do you want to add any comments on the matter or does your submission say it all?

Mairi Millar: The point was made earlier that one of the drivers for the reduced reporting time is the need to deal with emergency or short-notice situations such as funerals, but such cases would be more appropriately dealt with through extended hours applications. It might be useful to have a similar type of provision, although I am concerned that clerks would routinely be asked to exercise discretion and I wonder in what circumstances the reduced reporting period would be appropriate.

Cathie Craigie: It would be useful if you could write to us with your thoughts on how the bill can be improved in that respect.

Mairi Millar: We are certainly happy to do that.

The Convener: I take it that the other members of the panel concur with the views that Ms Millar expressed. They are indicating that they do, which enables us to move on to Robert Brown.

Robert Brown: If I may, convener, I will pursue the point about occasional licences. Ms Millar said that it is difficult to envisage circumstances in which they will be required, even for funeral parties, which tend to be at licensed premises and not unlicensed ones. Do the other members of the panel know any circumstances in which occasional licences would be needed?

Frank Jensen: The range of circumstances is broader than just funerals. The vast majority of applications that we get for occasional licences and extensions are for routine events such as fundraising events by voluntary organisations in village or community halls, birthday or golden wedding celebrations and so on. As often as not, even now, people apply at the last minute. We might get a non-controversial application from someone who seeks an occasional licence for a village hall from 7 pm until 11 pm and we know that there will be no difficulties with it. It would be beneficial if such applications were included in the process.

As clerks, we work closely with the board and we know its line on hours, including terminal hours for events. If the application is for an 18th birthday party, we are alerted to the kind of event that it is likely to be. If we receive any adverse comments, we invariably consult the convener of the board or a local board member.

Robert Brown: In short, then, we are discussing not emergencies but applications for routine events from people who do not know the procedure and have applied late. The applications are often not controversial and you are content with the arrangement.

Frank Jensen: Yes.

Robert Brown: Is there a need for a similar fast-track procedure for extended hours applications, or would that raise other, more complicated, issues?

Frank Jensen: I think that there is. I suspect that the licensed trade would wish to benefit from that process. The trade is contracting as a result of these changes; it will be looking to provide a full range of services, including for functions. Those who are involved in the trade will want to do that even more than they are doing at the moment. The simple answer is yes.

Robert Brown: Extended hours can be troublesome for the public in some suburban locations. Would objections be made on that ground to applications being fast-tracked without the usual provision for matters to be considered more widely?

Frank Jensen: Boards have their statement of licensing policy, which they follow, and there are also the licensing objectives. We are aware of the terminal hours issue. At present, if anyone asks for the occasional extension beyond those hours, the application is looked at closely. We are aware of the issues with regard to existing licensed premises, and we can and will impose conditions in the future. We have licensing standards officers who visit premises before an event takes place.

Robert Brown: You are saying that it might be helpful to have a fast-track procedure and that you would have no major concerns about that. Is that the position of colleagues, for example in Glasgow?

Mairi Millar: In the past week, the clerk to the board and I sat down together to look at the provisions for occasional and extended hours applications. The process is fairly tortuous for members of the trade and those who are on the regulatory side. It would be nonsensical to have to convene and hold a board meeting to determine an extended hours application or an occasional licence—just that would not happen within the timescales.

My points on the subject in our submission are fairly narrow in scope. That said, there is cause to look again at the totality of the occasional licence and extended hours application provisions.

Robert Brown: That is helpful.

Earlier, we heard the views of the Scottish Licensed Trade Association on licensed clubs. We heard that fees in Scotland are higher than those in England, and about whether supermarkets should be put into a higher category of premises that pay more in fees towards the overall administration costs. What is your view on the association’s concerns?

Mairi Millar: I have no detailed submission to make on the way in which fees are established. Obviously, I was not prepared to deal with that today.

As the committee heard, processing an application for a larger premises gives rise to no greater involvement than an application for a smaller premises. Both types of application go through exactly the same notification and advertising procedures and consultation with building control and licensing standards officers. The process is no more time consuming just because a premises is bigger.

It has always been recognised that fees would have to be reviewed once we were through transition. In making those projections, we do not yet know the level of business activity post transition—that remains to be considered. The Glasgow board has given an undertaking to review fee setting after transition. We will need to set out a detailed submission on the mechanism in the regulations for fee setting.

Robert Brown: Does Councillor Thomas have anything to say from a policy point of view on representations from the on-trade with regard to supermarkets?

Councillor Thomas: I have a lot of sympathy with them. Everybody in the business knows that young people in particular drink before they go out and obviously get their booze from the cheapest source. I do not know how the issue can be addressed, but it might be worth examining that. In Edinburgh, we have taken seriously—as I am sure all the boards have—the new rules about reducing the areas in which supermarkets can display their alcohol, which will have some effect. With the way things are going, the matter would definitely be worth considering.

Robert Brown: Are there any other views on that or are the other witnesses happy with those observations?

Frank Jensen: My views are the same.

Aileen Campbell: The bill requires that personal licence applications be signed by the applicant. Concerns have been raised about that provision. Glasgow licensing board said that it may be contrary to the requirements of the European services directive, which may mean that such applications must be capable of being submitted electronically. The Law Society said that it could preclude signature by a legal agent or employer, which may be appropriate in some circumstances. What are the witnesses’ views on those issues?

Mairi Millar: The European Union services directive will bring about fundamental changes to liquor licensing and civic government licensing. A huge number of amendments will have to be made to the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 to implement the directive fully and that is to be done by 28 December this year. I have concerns about whether those legislative changes will be in place in time for licensing authorities to gear up for their implementation. It is a huge issue, which is probably beyond the scope of today’s meeting. Under the services directive, we will move to allowing applications for personal licences to be submitted online. If they are submitted online, they cannot be signed.

Aileen Campbell: Does anyone else have views about a legal agent or employer not having the right to sign an application?

Frank Jensen: The 2005 act defines an applicant as “the person making the application”.

That is not necessarily the person who will benefit from the application; it could be a lawyer or anybody else. If we apply the normal rules of grammar, the applicant is the one who makes the application and, therefore, the application could be signed by anybody. However, the services directive will point the direction. Signatures and overprovision are aspects of liquor licensing that the directive may catch, as both fall under its provisions on barriers to trade.

Mairi Millar: Since the Glasgow licensing board’s submission was made, it has been clarified that, although liquor licensing is within the scope of the EU services directive, personal licensing is outwith it. However, there are still implications for other types of liquor and civic licences.

Aileen Campbell: The previous panel of witnesses said that authorities were sending inconsistent messages about whether it was fine for a premises manager not to have a personal licence. We were given the example that one company may have to second a manager who has a personal licence while another manager waits for theirs to come through. How do you respond to the problems that businesses face and the point about the inconsistency of the messages from local authorities? Perhaps the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities is best placed to give a view on the differences of approach throughout the country.

Sylvia Murray (Convention of Scottish Local Authorities): We do not have a view on that specific point, but the question of consistency throughout the country is raised often on many issues and the standard answer is that that is local democracy in action. It is a fine balance to strike all the time but it is virtually impossible. We try to promote consistency but it is not always possible because local priorities always come into play.

Frank Jensen: I suspect that the inconsistencies are relatively few and that they are magnified during the transitional period, as each board is at a different stage in the grant and issue of personal licences. I hope that the issues will resolve themselves over the next 12 months.

Robert Brown: A number of witnesses have raised the issue of personal applications being dealt with slowly. Will licences be processed by 1 September in the areas that you represent? Should we be looking to put in place a mechanism to allow derogation from the existing arrangements?

Mairi Millar: Glasgow has been processing and issuing personal licences throughout the process. We deal with applications within four to six weeks, and licences have been issued. However, personal licence applications are not yet arriving in great numbers; as of last month, we had received fewer than 1,000. That does not mean that applications have been received for premises managers for 1,000 of the 1,800 premises in Glasgow, as multiple applications are coming in for single premises. We are well short of the number of applications that would reflect the number of premises in Glasgow. It is now nearly 16 months into the transitional process, but applications are not coming in.

Robert Brown: You have not told or implied to people that they cannot lodge them yet, as was suggested earlier.

Mairi Millar: No, we have been looking for applications throughout the process. It is fair to say that everyone’s focus was on premises licences, but we have always had procedures in place to process personal licence applications. With the best will in the world, if we get a windfall of applications in July and August, they will not be issued in time for 1 September.

The Convener: You are saying that you have received four applications for some premises and none for others. That makes the situation worse.

Mairi Millar: We cannot relate personal licence applications to premises, but the numbers suggest that we have not received —

The Convener: Could you not guesstimate?

Mairi Millar: I guess that we have not received enough applications to be able to appoint a designated premises manager for each of the premises in Glasgow.

The Convener: What is the position elsewhere?

Frank Jensen: Like Glasgow, we have been accepting applications. We have issued about 800 licences for the 900 applications that we have received. We estimate that between 2,000 and 2,500 personal licence holders are needed to serve as premises managers if licensed premises are to run properly, so we are expecting a lot of applications. We told applicants earlier in the year—and have continued to repeat—that we could guarantee to issue personal licences in time if applications were received prior to 31 May. The guarantee dropped off in intensity after that date.

Councillor Thomas: I agree. At each board meeting, when we receive applications, we ask people whether they have personal licences. They say that they have, but they really mean that they have the training certificate. We are emphasising the point but, despite our best efforts, there may well be an issue towards the end of the period.

Robert Brown: That raises a subsequent issue. We have heard different accounts of who is at fault but, regardless of whether people are submitting applications late, the failure of licences to be issued in time will have a practical and economic effect. Can you guide us on how the issue might be dealt with and on the remedies that might be provided?

Mairi Millar: It needs to be dealt with through regulation, given that the mandatory conditions that apply to premises licences require there to be a designated premises manager; without one, premises cannot sell alcohol.

Robert Brown: In short, you do not have power to exercise discretion.

Mairi Millar: No, the licensing of a designated premises manager is part of the mandatory conditions.

Nigel Don: Am I right in thinking that the European services directive is directly applicable, because it is a directive, and that, even if we produce a statute that is inconsistent with it, you will have to work within its terms?

Mairi Millar: Absolutely.

Bill Butler: Several respondents have noted that not all local authorities have chosen to use the national personal licence database and that, in addition, there are no timescales for inputting information into the database. Some argue that that hampers licensing boards’ ability to check the history of applicants and therefore discharge their duties in considering applications. What are your views on the issue?
Mairi Millar: That is certainly the case at the moment. Amendments to the 2005 act that are proposed in the bill will cure many of the problems that we have identified with personal licences. There would have been no point in our checking the database during transition, because we had to grant the licence if it met certain minimum requirements. Given the changes that the bill may bring about, the personal licence database will be useful in the future, but it is certainly not useful during transition under the current provisions.

Bill Butler: That is very clear. Does anyone want to add anything or differ?

Frank Jensen: I agree with those comments.

Bill Butler: I will take it that there is agreement.

I have one other question. Some respondents have stated that the appeals procedure under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 is unnecessarily complex and have called for it to be replaced with something more akin to the procedure under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976, which involved a summary cause appeal process. What do panel members think about the matter?

Mairi Millar: John Loudon made the point earlier that it is rare for licensing lawyers to agree unanimously on an issue, but this is one of those rare occasions when we are all in agreement—the stated case procedure does not work for licensing appeals and a straightforward return to the summary application is welcomed by all.

Bill Butler: Is it welcomed by all?

Frank Jensen: I concur.

Councillor Thomas: Yes.

Bill Butler: It seems to be welcomed by all, convener. I have no other questions.

The Convener: We have a healthy degree of unanimity. As there are no other questions for the panel, I thank the panel members very much—it has been a particularly useful session.

The committee will now move into private session.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener (Bill Aitken): Good morning. I remind everyone to switch off their mobile phones. We have an apology from Angela Constance, who is attending a funeral. She might join us later.

Item 1 on our agenda is continued consideration of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. Today is the concluding evidential session on the criminal justice parts of the bill.

Given the breadth and complexity of the bill, the committee has agreed to postpone taking evidence from the Cabinet Secretary for Justice on the licensing parts of the bill until after the summer recess.

Panel 1 officials will support the cabinet secretary on sections 1 to 37, and panel 2 officials will provide support on sections 38 to 120.

I welcome Kenny MacAskill, the Cabinet Secretary for Justice, who is supported by George Burgess, from the criminal law and licensing division; Wilma Dickson, from the community justice services division; and Rachel Rayner, from the legal directorate. All of them are from the Scottish Government and none of them requires any introduction to the committee.

I invite the cabinet secretary to make a short opening statement.

The Cabinet Secretary for Justice (Kenny MacAskill): The Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill is a wide-ranging piece of legislation that takes forward many of the Scottish Government’s priorities. In my opening statement, I will not cover everything that is contained in the bill, but I want to talk about a couple of very important elements.

The bill provides for a tough new sentence—the community payback order—as a replacement for a number of existing community penalties. The community payback order will allow offenders to repay communities for the damage that they have done by offending and will help to tackle reoffending rates with quick justice.

This year, we have already invested an additional £2 million in community service—£1 million to get orders under way and completed more quickly, and a further £1 million in recognition of underlying workload increases. That equates to a 15 per cent increase in funding for community service between 2008-09 and 2009-10, which will roll forward into next year.

Community sentences need to start on time and be enforced rigorously. However, as Robert Brown has emphasised, they also need to offer the support that offenders need. The recent audit of local authority performance revealed the distance that remains to be travelled towards the new targets that have been agreed with local authorities for the start and completion of community service orders, particularly with regard to the target for work to start within seven days of the sentence being passed.

I can announce today that we propose to make available an additional £5.5 million over the next two years to help us achieve our twin goals of having a higher number of more robust community sentences and providing better support to offenders.

Start-up funding of £1.5 million will go out this year, rising to an extra £4 million in the following year. That extra £4 million equates to an additional 15 per cent expenditure on the core community sentences—probation and community service—year on year.

Most of that money will go to local authorities, to help them clear their backlogs and achieve tighter turnaround times. We want to work with them to ensure that, if the Parliament supports the bill, they will be ready when the new community payback order comes into force. Once that transition period is complete, resources can be redirected to additional CPOs.

Subject to the views of the Parliament, we need to provide resources to deliver the new approach to sentence management that is introduced in the bill. Much of that funding will go to local authorities, but courts will also require investment to support progress hearings, and the new breach provisions will require extra electronic monitoring capacity. We need to give the courts tough options, short of prison, to deal with those who fail to comply with their orders.

The issue is not all about money. It involves the Government and local authorities working together to achieve shared goals for tighter delivery and find more efficient ways of working that will ensure that the judiciary gets the information that it needs in the most useful form, that social workers do not waste time on bureaucracy and that we make the best use of information technology to speed up case handling. However, we recognise the need to invest. Money is tight, and every penny has to be made to count. Sometimes, we have to focus investment on top priorities, which is what we are doing in this case.

Alongside the community payback order will be the introduction of a statutory presumption against the courts imposing prison sentences of six months or less. We should be clear that the courts will still be able to impose sentences of six months or less—there will be no statutory bar. However, the courts will need to explain why they think that the use of such a short sentence is justified, as opposed to the use of an alternative disposal such as the community payback order.

This is not about saving money; it is about our making communities safer by facing up to the challenge of turning round the reoffending behaviour of low-level criminals and making them pay back the community for the damage that they have done. Short custodial sentences do not allow the offending behaviour to be addressed.

I realise that this is a complex and technical piece of legislation. I am aware that the committee has received a considerable number of written submissions on the bill and has heard oral evidence from numerous organisations and individuals. Even though we have the rest of the morning, I would be surprised if we were able to answer all the queries that have been raised in evidence to the committee. I will therefore be happy for my officials to work with the clerks on any queries that remain outstanding following today’s meeting.

The Convener: That is helpful, Mr MacAskill. We are unlikely to conclude our consideration of the bill today, and other questions will arise. We will put them to you in writing for answer over the summer recess—when I am sure you would otherwise only be enjoying yourself anyway.

I will open with a question on the purposes and principles of sentencing. Why was it deemed necessary to set out in the bill the purposes and principles of sentencing? Will they apply to offenders who are under 18 at the time of the offence?

Kenny MacAskill: They will not apply to people who are under 18.

We think that sections 1 and 2 are clear and easy to understand. They set out the purposes and principles of sentencing, and we think it essential to do that. Sentencing does not have just a single purpose—that of punishment—and the lack of hierarchy in section 1 is quite deliberate. In trying to get the balance right, fairness is important, and setting out purposes and principles will contribute to achieving that.

We are happy to consider any specific suggestions that the committee may have, but we felt that we should state what is being done when courts exercise the majesty of the law.

The Convener: Some people have told us that they consider section 1 incomplete.

Kenny MacAskill: If people feel that it is incomplete, we will be more than happy to take on board any recommendations from the committee. Such things will always have to be flexible, because changes will occur in society and in people’s perceptions. We have set down the parameters within which the people who are charged with the function of dispensing justice should operate.

The Convener: We have to consider public perceptions, and I fully accept that they may sometimes be slightly detached from reality.

You suggest that no inference is to be drawn from the order in which the purposes and principles of sentencing are listed, but are you still confident that the public will end up with a greater understanding of the purposes of sentencing, or of the purpose of a particular sentence in an individual case?

Kenny MacAskill: We have embarked on a journey, and the legislative framework will assist us. A start has been made with the way in which sentences are announced in court; they are now made clear to everybody. Such ideas came in with the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007; people now realise how long an offender will spend in prison and what issues will be dealt with in other ways.

This is a work in progress. We have to tackle public misunderstanding in a range of ways. That will involve educating people about civics—or whatever terminology we want to use. However, making the role of sentencers clear, and making clear the requirements that are on them, will help to kill off the myths and to ensure that people understand what is happening in the courts. That will be important.

The Convener: Our questions also impinge on aspects relating to the Scottish sentencing council. I invite Bill Butler to pursue that line.

Bill Butler (Glasgow Anniesland) (Lab): Good morning, cabinet secretary. As you will know, the committee has heard conflicting evidence on whether sentencing is inconsistent. Do you believe that there is significant inconsistency in sentencing? If so, to what do you attribute that?

Kenny MacAskill: The Sentencing Commission for Scotland raised the issue of inconsistency in sentencing, and we are building on its comments. Equally, the Crown has mentioned difficulties in relation to judge shopping, for example. As the convener suggested, the public perceive—although their perceptions may not reflect the Bill Butler: You are right to say that public perception is powerful and must be taken account of, but can you provide the committee with details of academic research that shows that there is inconsistency in sentencing?

Kenny MacAskill: The Sentencing Commission for Scotland concluded in 'The Scope to Improve Consistency in Sentencing':

'such research evidence as does exist, limited though it is, supports the view that there is some inconsistency in sentencing in Scotland'.

The commission went on:

'the experience of members of the Commission'— who were very senior—

'points to the occurrence of some inconsistency in sentencing in Scotland'.

The commission noted that there was a great deal of anecdotal evidence in that regard. It would be inappropriate of me to mention individual cases, but I stand four-square behind the commission. The composition was powerful and its membership was highly esteemed.

Bill Butler: I do not doubt that. However, when we questioned Mr McLeish, the chair of the Scottish Prisons Commission, he was unable to come up with much in the way of academic evidence that proved that there is inconsistency. You said that there is such evidence, 'limited though it is'; can you forward to us the academic evidence that persuaded the commission and then you that there is inconsistency in sentencing?

Kenny MacAskill: I cannot second-guess the McLeish commission; we have founded our approach on the conclusions of the Sentencing Commission for Scotland, which was an august body that contained senior figures, including senior members of the judiciary. We are building on their comments. As we have said, factors other than inconsistency are involved. However, we think that there is disquiet among the public about inconsistency in sentencing, which must be tackled, whether it is based on anecdotal evidence or reality. The Sentencing Commission for Scotland said publicly that there is an issue. We are predicating our position on that view.

Bill Butler: The provisions on the proposed Scottish sentencing council have attracted criticism. It has been argued that they could undermine the independence of the judiciary. It was suggested that the High Court will be stripped of powers, which will be passed to a non-elected, non-judicial body, thereby giving rise to concerns about compatibility with the European convention on human rights. How do you respond to those criticisms?

Kenny MacAskill: There is no substance to such fears. It is perfectly clear that the approach is compatible with the ECHR. Not long ago, the Parliament enshrined in statute the independence of the judiciary. The Government intends neither to go against the will of the Parliament nor to interfere with the independence of the judiciary. We made it clear that the sentencing council would only set guidelines and would not give directions. The understandable concerns that might exist among the judiciary can be allayed; it is clear that the sentencing council will not interfere with judicial independence and will not be incompatible with ECHR, given its limited powers.

Cathie Craigie (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth) (Lab): It was suggested in a written submission to the committee that the creation of the Scottish sentencing council would be objectionable on constitutional grounds. How do you respond to that?

Kenny MacAskill: Given that we do not have a written constitution in this country, I find it hard to understand where the person who expressed that view is coming from. The approach is not incompatible with ECHR and the council will not interfere with the independence of the judiciary. Such fears are unfounded. We have made it as clear as we can that we will not interfere with the ultimate responsibility of each sheriff or judge to make the decision that they think is appropriate to the specific offence of the individual offender who appears before them.

However, we believe that inconsistency in sentencing is a difficulty that must be dealt with. Equally, we believe that not only those who are given the privilege of sitting on the bench but people who represent interest groups such as victims organisations should be able to have some say, even if the ultimate decision in an individual prosecution will be made by sheriff A or judge B. There is something manifestly wrong in our society if the views of a representative of a victims organisation cannot be heard. That is why we believe that there should be a sentencing council. It will not interfere with the independence of the judiciary and it is certainly not unconstitutional.

Cathie Craigie: The make-up of any sentencing council is not the point. It has been put to the committee that it would be unconstitutional to take responsibility away from Parliament, ministers and the appeals court—that is the point that I am trying to make. I am sure that the cabinet secretary will have read the Official Report of the committee meeting when members of the judiciary and witnesses who came with them gave oral evidence. The constitutional issue is important, and I would like to hear a Scottish Government viewpoint on it.

Kenny MacAskill: I just cannot see the basis on which the sentencing council could be viewed as unconstitutional. It will not interfere with the independence of the judiciary and it is clearly intra vires. I do not understand the difficulties that people have with it or the question of its being unconstitutional. Ultimately, that is a matter for lawyers, whether our Government lawyers, the Lord Advocate or, indeed, the Parliament’s lawyers—as we have seen in recent events. They will decide whether the bill is intra vires, but the fact that the bill was introduced with a clean certificate seems to me to indicate that nobody views it as anything other than perfectly constitutional. I therefore cannot understand where the problem arises.

Cathie Craigie: Convener, perhaps we can furnish the cabinet secretary with an extract from the Official Report of the evidence that we took on the issue, and ask for a response on it.

The Convener: By all means. I am sure that the cabinet secretary, having had sight of the extract, will respond appropriately.

Kenny MacAskill: By all means. All I can say is that it would be entirely inappropriate for me to seek to berate the legal advice and the sign-off that was given by the Presiding Officer, the Parliament and, indeed, other people charged under the Scotland Act 1998 with responsibility for ensuring that proposed legislation remains within the powers of the Scottish Parliament and is constitutional.

Bill Butler: As you said, one of the functions of the proposed sentencing council will be to prepare sentencing guidelines that a court must ‘have regard to’ when sentencing an offender. How should the phrase ‘have regard to’ be interpreted?

Kenny MacAskill: I will adopt the position that was taken by my learned friend the Lord Advocate when she appeared before the committee on 9 June. Requirements for the courts or other decision makers to have regard to certain matters are well preceded in statute, and the courts have been clear about what is required. The Lord Advocate explained on 9 June:

> ‘The council will provide guidelines that the courts must ‘have regard to’, which means that they must give them consideration. If it is considered that the application of the guidelines is not acceptable in a specific case, reasons will be given why that is the case—that is a rational approach. Equally, if the appeal court considers that the judge’s determination was correct—’ or incorrect—

> ‘it can refer the matter back to the sentencing council.’—[Official Report, Justice Committee, 9 June 2009, c 2057.]

Bill Butler: Do you agree that sufficient discretion will be left with the court, even given the sentencing guidelines?

Kenny MacAskill: We have always sought to make it clear that, if a sheriff or judge believes that the guidelines are inappropriate in a particular case for whatever reason—whether because of something pertaining to the individual offender or because the offence is regarded as so unusual—the sentence must be left to their discretion. It is a matter for the individual presiding whether that means that the sentence will be less or more liberal than the guidelines suggest. We fully support that position, which is how it must be. It comes back to the fact that, although there will be broad guidelines, each individual offence and offender is unique.

Nigel Don (North East Scotland) (SNP): That takes me back to the purposes of sentencing, or at least the purposes of the sentencing council. It has been suggested—and I agree with the suggestion—that it might be better if the bill said that the overarching principle was fairness, which is a concept that five-year-olds understand. If we have sentencing that is coherent and appropriate, that broadly fits with fairness.

Kenny MacAskill: Fairness is clearly an appropriate factor but it is not the only one that those who impose sentences should consider. It is, presumably, about balancing in the scales of justice the interests of the community and wider public against those of the individual. However, it is also appropriate to take into account a variety of other matters in sentencing, such as the message that a sentence can send to the wider community.

Fairness is clearly a critical factor, although it is not the only one. However, we will not stand on nomenclature and, if anybody can suggest better definitions and terminology, we would be more than happy to accept them. Our general view is that fairness is important, but sentencers have to take other factors into account when sitting on the bench and presiding over the sentencing of an individual.

Bill Butler: You will be aware of the evidence that the committee took from sentencers on the proposed membership of the Scottish sentencing council. What are the reasons for not having a judicial majority on the council?

Kenny MacAskill: We must be clear that the council will be judicially led. We accept that that is important. We are open to persuasion, but our view is that it is important that the council also has representatives of broader society. That is why the council is in the bill. The ultimate decision will be made by the judiciary, who will have the power to act in their own way because of whatever reasons they consider make the treatment of a specific individual or offence different from what is suggested in the guidelines. They will be protected by that power, so it is important that we take into account others who have an interest, such as the police, the prosecution service or Victim Support Scotland. If the guidelines are not prescriptive but must be taken into account by sentencers, the fear that they will interfere with judicial discretion will be allayed. The judiciary should recognise that all our communities have a broader interest in sentencing and should be represented. The proposal gives us the best of both worlds: it will protect judicial independence, and it will ensure that the broader community has an opportunity to say how it regards offending.

Bill Butler: You say that you are open to persuasion on the council’s composition. What is the purpose of a constable being a statutory member? Should the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities be represented?

Kenny MacAskill: The inclusion of a constable is simply shorthand for including the police. A decision will have to be made about whether that is a chief constable or somebody else.

I am happy to consider whether COSLA should be represented but we cannot have representation from every organisation that has legitimacy—such as the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland, the Scottish Police Federation, the Association of Scottish Police Superintendents and so on—because, as with any committee, there comes a time when we have to balance a broad base.

The only difficulty with including COSLA is that, the more non-judicial members we put on the council, the more judges or sheriffs we would have to put on to try to keep a reasonable balance and the less time they would have to sit on the bench and do their day jobs. Without being flippant, we need to ensure that we strike an appropriate balance between the non-judicial and judicial members of the council. However, we are open to suggestions and more than happy to consider including representation from COSLA.

Bill Butler: I am glad to hear that. In effect, you are saying that you would be open to that type of suggestion if it was manageable and was seen to retain the balance that you seek.

Kenny MacAskill: Absolutely. Such things are not static. As we have seen with other bodies, we must be flexible and pragmatic as society changes. We have not set the matter in tablets of stone. We have said that the council should be judicially led, although we do not think that a judicial majority is needed. Thereafter, the membership is about ensuring that the balance is not out of kilter so that we do not have five members from the judiciary and 25 Uncle Tom Cobbleighs and all. Equally, who those representatives should be is an important matter to discuss and we will be happy to take advice from anyone.

Robert Brown (Glasgow) (LD): I am surprised to some extent that the cabinet secretary cannot see that there is a problem with having a prosecutor and a constable on a sentencing council that will in effect give directions—albeit in general terms—to the judiciary. Might not a way round the problem be to give the judiciary the final say through the existing appeal court procedures? In effect, that would make the sentencing council an advisory council and thus keep both the independence of the different parts of the machinery of government—the separation of powers, if you like—and the input from victims and others, which we all feel is important.

Kenny MacAskill: I think that we have struck the correct balance. We have made it quite clear that, if a sheriff or judge believes that there is good reason to ignore the guidelines, they may do so—

Robert Brown: With great respect, my question is about how the sentencing council arrives at the guidelines in the first place. I appreciate that later bit.

Kenny MacAskill: I am coming on to that.

It would be ludicrous if a body dealing with the protection of our communities from offending did not include representation from the police and the prosecution. I do not believe that there will be a conflict of interest. Indeed, if the police and prosecution were not represented, good questions would be asked about how such an august body could operate without a clear input from those who are at the coalface. Clearly, as happens in a whole variety of other situations, those who are appointed will act as members of the sentencing council and will not necessarily wear the hat of their day job, but the experience that they will bring will be absolutely essential. I would think it remiss if we were to conclude that a sentencing council should not have a representative from the police or from the prosecution service. I do not see any conflict thereafter.

As I said, by laying down guidelines while allowing the sentencer to decide ultimately to say, ‘The guidelines do not apply for the following reasons,’ we are striking the appropriate balance. That protects the individual member of the judiciary; equally, it allows the appropriate input from our communities.
Robert Brown: With respect, no one suggests that the sentencing council should include no representatives of victims organisations. My question is whether the proper balance would be achieved if the council was an advisory council with the imprimatur, as it were, coming from the judiciary. After all, the judiciary need to interpret and make individual decisions on these matters at the end of the day.

Kenny MacAskill: I have made it quite clear that I think that the sentencing guidelines must be more than advisory. The judiciary will have the opportunity to say that the guidelines do not fit in the particular circumstances of an individual offender or individual offence. However, to give the sentencing council a status that will allow the views of the broader community to be included, the guidelines will need to be more than just a whim or fancy. Therefore, we need to ensure that the sentencing council can set broad guidelines that provide the parameters, but ultimately the judiciary will have the opportunity to state for the record that the guidelines should not apply in particular circumstances. However, in the main, the guidelines will apply.

Clearly, we have other ways in which the court provides assistance. What the High Court does in disseminating down is useful, and the sentencing council will be able to operate with that. However, as I said, we think that the current proposal strikes the appropriate balance. The bill will give our communities the right to have a say on sentencing to try to achieve better consistency of sentencing without interfering with the ultimate independence of the judiciary.

Robert Brown: I want to pursue two other aspects. First, I want to ask about the interrelation between the sentencing guidelines and the statutory purposes of sentencing that are set out in section 1. I am bothered by section 2(2), which says in effect that the sentencing guidelines need not comply with the principles and purposes of sentencing as set out in section 1, which is normally regarded as the principal section. Why is that the case? Why do the principles of sentencing not override everything, including this somewhat indeterminate body—the Scottish sentencing council—that sits in the middle?

Kenny MacAskill: To some extent, we are talking about a very general matter and then moving on to deal with more specific things. After describing the ambit of or the backdrop to what we are seeking to do—the broader background to which Nigel Don referred—the bill focuses on more specific matters. I do not think that the two provisions are inconsistent. The bill will simply allow the sentencing council, in dealing with specific matters, to be a bit tighter than it would be in dealing with a much more general philosophical position.

Robert Brown: With great respect, section 1 refers to ‘the punishment of offenders’, ‘the reduction of crime’, ‘deterrence’, ‘reform’, ‘protection of the public’ and ‘reparation’. How can those things possibly not be taken account of in the sentencing guidelines?

Kenny MacAskill: We are talking about the backdrop and the general wide position that we are setting out. You then have to drill down and focus. That applies to a variety of other matters. I do not think that there is any inconsistency. If you have particular points to make, we will be more than happy to consider them. We are talking first about a general, philosophical view, then about rather more specific matters. It will be for those on the sentencing council to consider that.

Robert Brown: That perhaps raises the question of what purpose section 1 is intended to serve. Bearing in mind that any judge or sheriff worth his salt, any solicitor practising in the court and any prosecutor will be well aware of all the requirements of sections 1(1)(a) to 1(1)(e), what difference are you intending to make to the existing situation by stating those—dare I say it—fairly motherhood-and-apple-pie things in legislation?

Kenny MacAskill: We are doing that because we have not really done so before. We are stating for the record what we are doing. To some extent, the bill is a consolidation bill that sets out publicly what we are seeking to do and how we will do it. It comes back to some of the points that you made earlier. There is a lack of knowledge or awareness of what we are seeking to do. The bill is part of a journey of educating our people about the courts and law and giving them an opportunity to participate. We are setting down what we are seeking to achieve and the structures that will help to achieve it. We will proceed in that general direction.

Robert Brown: My final question is about section 1(5). You indicate that the sentencing purposes will not apply to people under 18. Section 1(5) states:

‘Subsections (2) and (3) do not apply ... in relation to an offender aged under 18’

but section 1(1) manifestly does. Will you explain more precisely the effect of that on offenders aged under 18?

Kenny MacAskill: Section 1(1) deals with the duty on the court; other sections deal with specific matters. Section 1(1) sets out the purposes. Sections 1(2) and 1(3) show what requires to be applied. Section 1(5) makes it clear that sections 1(2) and 1(3) do not apply with regard to under-Robert Brown: How does section 1(1) apply to offenders under 18, which it obviously does? What is the effect of it?

Kenny MacAskill: It sets out general principles to which regard has to be had. You described it as motherhood and apple pie. I think that it is an appropriate statement for a civilised society and democracy to make.

Robert Brown: Yes, but it is not something to which regard has to be had, because section 1(2) does not apply to offenders under 18. What is the purpose of it in relation to offenders under 18 if the courts are not required to have regard to it? How does it interact with anything that the courts have to do with offenders under 18? I could understand it if section 1(1) did not apply to offenders under 18—that would be a possible, if slightly peculiar, position. However, I cannot understand why section 1(1) applies when sections 1(2) and 1(3) do not apply.

Kenny MacAskill: I will leave George Burgess to explain the technical matter.

George Burgess (Scottish Government Criminal Justice Directorate): The approach that is being taken in section 1(5) in relation to under-18s and certain other groups is to disapply just the bits in sections 1(2) and 1(3) on the specific duties on the court. We have disapproved only what has to be disapproved. That is not to say that the courts might not recognise exactly the same principles of sentencing that are in section 1(3) as being, in the main, appropriate for under-18s. Section 1(1) really just defines the purposes of sentencing. We did not see any need specifically to disapprove it for under-18s. The duty on the court to have regard to those purposes is disapproved, but the purposes themselves sit there. In a sense, the purposes beat the air for the under-18s. The court is not themselves sit there. In a sense, the purposes apply only in relation to over-18s. The issue is perhaps more important when it comes to the principles of sentencing in relation to over-18s. The issue is perhaps more important when it comes to the principles of sentencing in section 1(3). Section 1(3) requires the court to have regard to certain factors. That is where we might recognise more of a difference in the approach that we want the courts to take when they deal with under-18s. A number of provisions in the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 already require special consideration to be given to younger offenders. There is perhaps more of a need to disapprove section 1(3) for under-18s than there is to disapprove the purposes of sentencing, but we have achieved what we think is necessary.

Robert Brown: I will leave it there.

The Convener: That might have to be looked at again.

Cathie Craigie: I have two points: one on the sentencing guidelines and one on membership of the sentencing council.

The Sheriffs Association raised concerns with the committee about the implication that the council will have to take into account the cost of custodial sentences in setting an appropriate guideline:'

Section 5(5) states that 'The Council must include' that cost in any guidelines but, as the Sheriffs Association points out:

'Cost is not actually relevant to the imposition of an appropriate sentence. It is not clear why it must be included in the guideline itself unless it is to have an effect on the creation of the guideline or, worse, to influence the court.'

Why is it necessary to include the cost of custodial sentences in the guidelines?

Kenny MacAskill: It is what we would do for a bill, and it is what we would expect to be done. We are not saying that the cost of a custodial sentence has to be weighed on the scales of justice, but an assessment of the costs and benefits of different disposals must be carried out. Disposals such as drug treatment and testing orders have cost implications for a variety of authorities. It is simply a matter of ensuring awareness of what those costs are. We are not seeking to constrain the courts. The bill does not say that they must use the cheapest option; it says that they must have some assessment of the option that they intend to use. Everyone who is involved in making use of the public purse must take cognisance of what the ultimate bill will be. You would correctly expect us to do the same for a bill. We expect people to understand the financial implications of any course of action, even if they choose to accept those financial implications.

Cathie Craigie: You are clear that the courts will not have to take that cost into account.

Kenny MacAskill: There is nothing that says that the courts will have to take the cheapest option or that they cannot choose a disposal that costs more than X thousand pounds. The bill says that the courts must understand and be able to work out the implications of particular disposals. As I said, DTTOs have tariffs, and people need to understand the cost implications for others of using them. It is a matter of ensuring that, as a country, we have an element of joined-up working, without putting any constraints on the courts.

Cathie Craigie: I return to membership of the sentencing council, on which you have already answered a number of questions. The specific issue that I want to raise is the proposal to include a constable on the sentencing council. I heard what you said in answer to Robert Brown’s question but, given that every police officer who is trained in Scotland is clear that their role is not to judge but to ensure that they bring criminals before the bodies whose role it is to judge, why should we cloud that position by including a constable on the sentencing council?

Kenny MacAskill: Because they would not be judging. It has been made quite clear that the sentencing council’s role will be to give guidelines, not judge. The responsibility for judging people will lie with those who have been elevated to the bench in either a shrieval or a judicial capacity. They will provide their input, and the input of the police, in the form of a constable, will be important. They will be able to reflect the views of the police, based on what they pick up on in communities. However, they will not be there to judge; they will be there to give advice.

Cathie Craigie: Any person—including a police officer—on the sentencing council will make a judgment on what is an appropriate sentence for a particular crime. That is where I see possible conflict between the role of police officers and the role of a member of the sentencing council.

Kenny MacAskill: I do not like to be tautological, but I would have thought that the definition of ‘judgment’ would be the choice between A or B. However, the members of the council will not be asked to choose A or B; they will be asked to set guidelines. They will say, for example, ‘We view the possession of a knife as a serious offence, and we expect courts to treat it that way.’ They might say something similar about sectarian singing and so on. They will state views; they will not specifically judge people—no decisions percolate down quickly, is not the case in practice. Significant progress is being made, however, and I welcome the steps that have been taken by the appeal court to ensure that its views and decisions are disseminated down, electronically or otherwise. The specific role of the sentencing council will be to build upon that, and to ensure that our judiciary is well advised on those views. The two are not contradictory—they run in parallel. The views of the court of criminal appeal will be extremely important in ensuring that we get that down. Its decisions are binding, but it is misguided to think that it allays the public’s fears or that we should not have an opportunity to take a broader view.

The Convener: Surely the court of criminal appeal’s decisions are disseminated quite quickly—you see them in the Scots Law Times every week. Scottish criminal cases are published regularly. I do not see that a problem exists.

Kenny MacAskill: It is accepted by the judiciary that the system is not working as well as it would like, and that decisions are not being disseminated down. Although the IT system seems to be up and running, there is considerable progress to be made. We envisage that the sentencing council will work with the appeal court to improve that; in fact, it is a matter of working not simply with the appeal court but with the Judicial Studies Committee. However, on the idea that everything is hunky dory—no, it ain’t.

The Convener: Is it not the case that despite the best intentions of all concerned—and I have no doubt that those intentions are good—you will never solve the problem, in that any system in which the human element is present will always provide the occasional difficulty?

Kenny MacAskill: That is why we have an appeal court and are not changing the appellate system. That is why, if people feel that sentences are too lenient, the Crown has the right to appeal. That is why a sentence can be appealed if it is felt to be too harsh. If it is felt that there has been a miscarriage of justice, there can be an appeal. Indeed, one section of the bill will give the Crown the right of appeal—there has been something manifestly wrong in our system because the defence has had the right of appeal but the Crown has not. I look forward to the support of the committee on that.

You are correct—to err is human. We try to minimise that, but mistakes are made. That is why we have an appeal system, and it is why we are introducing the right for the Crown to appeal. It is why, if a sheriff is perceived as having given too harsh or too light a sentence, it can be appealed.

Equally, we must have a broader view of how we as a society view issues such as knife crime. We must make it clear to the judiciary that there is considerable fear and alarm in our communities and we want those communities to be represented. There has to be the right balance between having the checks that are necessary in every system, and the legitimate needs of communities and others—whether it is police, prosecution or victims—to be heard on what they view as the appropriate tariff for the offences faced by society.

The Convener: Since the start of the meeting, it has been intimated to me that Angela Constance will not be present. Aileen Campbell will be attending as her substitute. While there is no requirement in standing orders to do so, I would prefer substitutions to be for the entire meeting and to be intimated at the start. That being so, I ask Aileen Campbell to confirm that she is attending as a substitute for Angela Constance.

Aileen Campbell (South of Scotland) (SNP): I confirm that.

The Convener: Thank you. We turn to the issue of short custodial sentences.

Cathie Craigie: The committee has received and heard evidence arguing that short custodial sentences can be effective and that the current use of such sentences is generally appropriate. What are your views on that?

Kenny MacAskill: All the evidence seems to be that they are not effective. The statistics show that short sentences simply result in churn. However, we reserve the right for sheriffs—or the judiciary, although it would normally be a sheriff—to impose a short sentence if they feel that that is the only appropriate sentence.

We have preserved the correct balance. The idea that short sentences are effective is disputed by those who work with such prisoners, who say that they can do little with them—they cannot address their literacy and numeracy needs, their drug, alcohol or other dependency and their mental health problems. Such prisoners are simply contained and corralled, then released—prison staff cannot work with them. The statistics show that of those who are given a short sentence of under six months, 75 per cent reoffend within two years, whereas two thirds of those who are given a community sentence do not reoffend within two years. Community sentences appear to be much more efficacious.

That said, we acknowledge that some people are given a chance and do not take it. Imposing a short sentence might be appropriate, and we would not seek to interfere if a sheriff gave good reason, which might simply be that the individual would do nothing else and had to be punished. Alternatively, the sheriff might find some reason why a short sentence would be effective.
Cathie Craigie: You relied on the fact that the judiciary supports some of the proposed measures in part 1. However, on section 17, the submission from the judges of the High Court of Justiciary says:

‘Our experience is that under existing arrangements courts resort to short custodial sentences only where there is no realistic alternative—for example, when all non-custodial measures have already been tried but failed or where the offender’s criminal record is such that only a custodial sentence is likely to bring home to the offender the unacceptability of his or her repeated conduct. We doubt whether the proposed legislative changes will in practical terms achieve much.’

That is from people who deal with sentencing.

The Sheriffs Association made a similar comment and pointed out that ‘short sentences have a value since a custodial sentence of up to 30 days is to be’ an ‘option for breach of a level 1 … payback order.’

The sheriffs feel that custodial sentences are a means to deal with breaches of court orders and to remind the offender of the consequences of breaking the law.

Kenny MacAskill: Absolutely—that is why we have the 30-days option. We can take a horse to water, but we cannae make it drink. If somebody is given the opportunity to do a community payback order but they cock a snook at society—never mind those who seek to reform them—they must be punished. We will fully support any sheriff who says, ‘We’re sick and tired of your behaviour. If you think you can just sit at home and not go out to do some work to make up for the damage, you’ll go to prison.’ A fail-safe sanction must be available—the provision is in the bill because we recognise that.

I return to the idea that the system is all working out and everything is fine. I do not remember whether 14,000 or 16,000 short sentences are imposed each year. We have a revolving door. Such sentencing is not working. If it were working to stop offending, the imprisonment figures would be reducing, but they are not. People are going into and coming out of prison while their problems remain unchecked, because the prison system does not have the opportunity to address their alcohol problem, mental health issues, drug addiction or other difficulties.

Members probably know that, after I give evidence to this committee, I will give evidence to the Equal Opportunities Committee, which is extremely concerned about the number of women offenders, especially in Compton Vale. I do not think that that committee would complain about a person who stabbed somebody or dealt in substantial quantities of drugs having to face the consequences of their action. However, I think that that committee will tell me that a serious issue is that women who have a heroin addiction or an alcohol problem enter prison with a short sentence and when they come out, their problem has not been solved.

The Government is seeking a joined-up approach. As you correctly said, there must be a fail-safe sanction, so that we can deal with a person who does not take the opportunity that we have tried to give them, but we must also take on board that sending some people to prison does not solve the problem for our communities. It is not about being tough or being liberal; it is about doing what works. The evidence is clear: tough community sentences work.

Cathie Craigie: That is all very well. I agree that there is an issue for the Scottish Prison Service to sort out when people are in prison. The public not only expect offenders to pay their debt to society, but think that we have a duty to address the issues that led to their breaking the law.

However, the judges of the High Court of Justiciary said in their submission:

‘Our experience is that under existing arrangements courts resort to short custodial sentences only where there is no realistic alternative … We doubt whether the proposed legislative changes will in practical terms achieve much.’

The statistics that you gave do not represent people who do not deserve to be in prison.

Kenny MacAskill: We are not interfering with a sheriff’s ultimate right, after considering the individual, the offence and all the options, to impose a short sentence if they think that there is no alternative. If you want me to tell the Equal Opportunities Committee that it is wasting its time, because there is no problem and everyone in Compton Vale was sent there correctly, I can do so, but I do not think that that is what the committee has learned. I have great respect for our sheriffs and judiciary, but there is a problem that must be addressed.

Cathie Craigie: If only I had the power to instruct the cabinet secretary on what to say or do when he appears before a parliamentary committee.

What changes do you expect as a result of the measures in the bill?

Kenny MacAskill: We are looking to end the free-bed-and-board culture. Far too many people go to prison and sit there twiddling their thumbs. Their stay in prison is paid for by the taxpayer, which compounds the agonies arising from the crimes that they committed in their communities.
We want, first, such people to be punished and to pay something back, and secondly, to address people’s underlying problems, whether we are talking about a young girl’s heroin addiction or a young man’s alcohol problem. That seems to be an appropriate approach, which would make our communities safer and address our problems. However, the ultimate decision will be made by the sheriff. The package must be taken in the round.

We are heading towards having community payback orders, so that there will be an opportunity to provide tough community punishments and to tackle the problems that underlie criminality, which in Scotland are frequently to do with drink, drug addiction or mental health issues. We acknowledge that the approach is not cost free. Robert Brown legitimately made that point, as did Harry McGuigan when he gave evidence to the committee, which is why I phoned him yesterday as a courtesy.

We are talking about a broad package in which we move away from an approach that is not working. We must acknowledge that our prisons are bursting at the seams, mainly with people who are serving very short sentences. The prison service cannot tackle the underlying problems of those people, who get free bed and board, which infuriates our communities. We want to deal with less serious offenders through community payback orders, which will free up our prisons to deal with the people who have to be there because they are a danger to our communities.

People must be given work to do and other opportunities that the committee has discussed. However, if someone cocks a snook at society when they are given such opportunities or if a sheriff thinks that a CPO is not appropriate, we will leave it open to a sheriff to impose a short sentence, so that we can strike the right balance. Something ain’t working at the moment, which is why we are heading in the direction that I described. We acknowledge the legitimate concerns of committee members and COSLA; that is why we are ramping up our support and putting an extra £5.5 million into community justice.

Cathie Craigie: On the other hand, it has been suggested to the committee that courts might give longer sentences in order to circumvent the provisions in the bill. Could that be a problem?

Kenny MacAskill: No, I do not think so. Sheriff Fletcher touched on that in his evidence to you. I do not think that any sheriff would do that. They will give what they regard as the appropriate sentence. As I said, if they believe that a short sentence is appropriate, the Government will respect that. Where people seek to cock a snook, we will ensure that we give sheriffs full support.

I think that Sheriff Fletcher said it much more articulately than I could. He made it clear that that would not be the case, and that is how I see it.

Cathie Craigie: It has been pointed out to us that those who plead guilty at an early stage could have their sentences reduced by a third, which means that sentences of nine months could fall within the provision. Is that correct?

Kenny MacAskill: That is the rule under the current legislation. It applies whether the person appears on indictment in the High Court due to a serious drug offence or elsewhere. That is the rule that the Government inherited.

The Convener: It came from the Du Plooy judgment, which was a High Court decision, and it was then incorporated into legislation. Is that correct?

Kenny MacAskill: Yes.

The Convener: Mrs Craigie’s point is that the top line of an individual’s sentence could be 12 months, but on the basis of an early plea being tendered, it would be reduced by four months to eight months. Thereafter, because of early release, the individual could be out after a maximum of four months, which is below the six month cut-off period. That would negate what you seek to do.

Kenny MacAskill: George Burgess will give you the specific answer and I will give you a comment thereafter.

George Burgess: I do not think that the scenario that you presented would operate. The provision in section 17 operates on the sentence, which is the overall period. The fact that the person who is given the sentence would spend a shorter period than that in prison is not relevant to the calculation, which is done on the basis of the sentence. The 12-month sentence that might be reduced to eight months would not be caught by the provision.

The Convener: I accept that that will be the case under the legislation if it is approved, but the de facto position would be that the sheriff might well think that a sentence of 12 months was appropriate in a certain case, but because of the plea, a third would be taken off that, which would reduce it to eight months. Thereafter, because of early release, the individual would be out after four months. That negates Mr MacAskill’s argument that individuals who find themselves in custody for short periods do not provide the Scottish Prison Service with the opportunity to rehabilitate and to combat drug or alcohol difficulties or whatever.

Kenny MacAskill: That is why, in later sections of the bill on which you might care to question me, or not, we take steps to end the arbitrary unconditional automatic early release that was commented upon by the McLeish commission and which— as we never hesitate to remind each other, convener— was introduced by a Conservative Government many years ago.

You will be glad to know that the sentence will be stated publicly, for the record, in the court so that everybody, and not just the sentencer who imposes it, knows what the sentence is. There is clearly something wrong in our society when the sentence that is given is sometimes understandable only to the sheriff who dispenses it and to those with legal qualifications, rather than to everyone in the court, including the bereaved or the victims. It seems to us that, if somebody is to be released—and people have to be released when they are given determinate sentences—it should be based on some conditions.

We are addressing the matter by building on the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007. Letting people out early is not necessarily a bad thing if they show remorse and have been dealt with, but there is something wrong with a system in which people get out after the same period of time whether they show no remorse for what they have done or whether they have recanted and reformed and will be an exemplary citizen. We are addressing the situation that we inherited.

The Convener: You should not bandy words with me, Mr MacAskill. I feel forced to remind you that your members in the Westminster Parliament did not exactly rush to assist when the Conservative Government sought to remedy what was inherited.

Paul Martin (Glasgow Springburn) (Lab): I return to six-month sentences. You used the term ‘less serious offenders’. What would be the profile of such offenders? What sort of crime would they have committed?

Kenny MacAskill: Ultimately, I will leave that to the sentencing council. You have to remember the variable nature of common-law offences in Scotland. A breach of the peace can result in someone being charged on indictment— rightly so—but it can also be a relatively minor matter. We have to have flexibility. You bandy around words in asking what constitutes an offence, Mr Martin. However, you must remember that a breach of the peace covers offences from the extremely serious to those that can be dealt with in a justice of the peace court or—at some future stage—by way of a fixed penalty or fiscal fine. If the offence is serious, it can result in a considerable jail sentence.

Paul Martin: You want to move away from six-month sentences. That is the issue. You said that you were considering that for less serious offenders, and I am asking for an example of what you mean. Should a housebreaker receive a sentence of less than six months?

Kenny MacAskill: I am giving you an example—

Paul Martin: Perhaps you will let me finish the question—

The Convener: Let him finish the question.

Paul Martin: Housebreakers can receive a sentence of six months or less. Are you saying that theirs is a less serious offence? Should housebreakers receive community sentences?

Kenny MacAskill: I am leaving the matter to the sentencing council to advise me on. I have seen a breach of the peace result in an extremely lengthy sentence. You must remember that the common law of Scotland allows for interpretation. Sentencers have the necessary flexibility to deal with offences that range from a serious assault to a fairly minor breach of the peace. The Solicitor General for Scotland has commented on that and other matters.

We can pander to scaremongering or recognise that the common law of Scotland allows flexibility in dealing with statutory offences. These things have to be taken in the round. We want to have a sentencing council that has the ability to deal with such matters. That will allow sheriffs to decide on individual cases. A breach of the peace can be extremely serious. If it means a lengthy sentence, the courts will get our full support. We seek to allow sentencers to take account of the views of the sentencing council and to do the job that we pay them to do.

Paul Martin: All that I am asking you to do today, cabinet secretary, is to assist the committee by telling us what you mean by the term ‘less serious offenders’. You are asking us to accept your policy on short custodial sentences. However, the background notes on the bill make it clear that, when you use the word ‘flexibility’, you are talking about a presumption against six-month sentences. Sheriffs will have to explain why they have given such sentences. I am asking you to give an example of what you mean by a less serious offence. Housebreakers can receive a sentence of less than six months, as can those who are involved in child pornography. Is it acceptable that people who commit such offences receive a community sentence?

Kenny MacAskill: Public safety is paramount—it always has been. That is why we have rolled back the provision of private prisons and so forth. There will always be people who have to go to prison because they are a danger to our communities. If they have committed a serious offence, and no other sanction satisfies public safety or mores, they have to go to prison. Beyond that, it is clear that there are shades of grey. That is why we recognise the right of individual sheriffs to take positions that differ from that of the sentencing council or appeal court. The convener mentioned that. Sheriffs tell us that they have differentiated in the case of offender X because of the different circumstances that apply in the case. That route is open to sheriffs.

The Convener: I will follow up the point that Mr Martin made. It is difficult to define on paper what is a serious or less serious offence. As you correctly state, cabinet secretary, breach of the peace, which is normally a minor offence, can be serious from time to time. Shoplifting of a value of £30 to £40 would hardly be a hanging matter, but how would we cope with an offender who has done that 30 or 40 times despite having gone through the full gamut of disposals from admonition to probation and community service?

Kenny MacAskill: Shoplifting might be fuelled by an addiction, which would trigger a view to be taken. Equally, people might shoplift as part of an organised gang, which is an extremely serious offence. I was a defence agent for 20 years, and I remember the problems that we had with people who had been driven out of London, Leeds and then Newcastle and who then came up here to shoplift at will as part of serious and organised crime. The specific offence of shoplifting—and the goods that they were caught with—might not necessarily have been high value, but I would fully support any sheriff who took extremely serious actions against such people.

We have to recognise the common sense of our judiciary and allow them to exercise it. That is why they already determine what matters can be dealt with by non-custodial sentences. We also have to provide other wraparound measures, which is why we are introducing quicker community punishments and additional measures. We cannot simply consider in isolation whether a sentence is custodial or non-custodial. That must be considered in the context of everything that we are doing: the additional funding that is going in, the additional resourcing that will be provided and the additional provisions that will give us the opportunity to keep offenders on a tight leash. Some people are unlikely to come to a court's attention ever again after their release but, as we well know from drug treatment and testing orders, there are instances in which people benefit from being kept on a fairly tight leash, which is why progress courts are being introduced.

The matter cannot be viewed in isolation; it has to be viewed in the round. The round is what we are offering as alternatives, what other measures besides simply punishment are available to tackle underlying problems, how we maintain those measures and how we get offenders into the punishment quickly.

Cathie Craigie: I agree that the matter cannot be viewed in isolation and strongly agree that people who are a danger or threat to communities should receive custodial sentences, but I am still concerned that section 17 will allow folk to slip through the net. I also have concerns about how we balance section 1(1)(d)—‘the protection of the public’ under the purposes and principles of sentencing—with what may happen if courts implement section 17. I have concerns that people who are a threat, a danger or even a nuisance to the communities will avoid custodial sentences and continue to be a nuisance to the community.

Kenny MacAskill: First, we have the fail-safe of the appeal court. If a sentence was felt to be entirely unreasonable, it could be appealed—assuming that the committee supports the bill’s provisions on Crown appeals. If a disposal was breached, there would be an opportunity for the sentencing council and sheriffs to review how such offenders or offences are dealt with. Those systems are built into the proposals.

Any case in which we deal with people who have underlying problems and who are sometimes not the most rational will always require the exercise of judgment and be fraught with difficulties. That is what our sheriffs face at the moment. Unfortunately, the people they deal with, the nature of their offences and the problems that they carry will not be changed by legislation because they involve social and economic factors.

The bill allows the judiciary to give an offender a short prison sentence if they do not think that a non-custodial sentence is appropriate. It also allows for a community payback order to be appealed if it is felt to be an inappropriate sentence. If any recalibration is required, that can be achieved by the individual sheriff learning from their position, by the sentencing council and, ultimately, by the appeal court.

Stewart Maxwell: Section 23 deals with ‘Offences aggravated by racial or religious prejudice’.

Does the Government intend to lodge an amendment at stage 2—or, indeed, stage 3—to take account of the passing of the Offences (Aggravation by Prejudice) (Scotland) Bill, which deals with additional aggravated offences against the lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender and disabled communities?

George Burgess: It is more the other way round. Section 23 will bring the racial and religious aggravation provisions into line with the provisions in the Offences (Aggravation by Prejudice) (Scotland) Bill.
Stewart Maxwell: So there will be no difference between the two pieces of legislation.

George Burgess: That is right. The section ensures consistency.

Aileen Campbell: On the impact of short sentences on children, which I have previously pursued with you, cabinet secretary. Families Outside has said that children of a parent in prison are more likely to end up in prison in later life and to suffer from regressive behaviour such as bed wetting and failing at school. I acknowledge other members’ comments that people who have done something bad in society must be punished with the appropriate sentence, but do you believe that the use of non-custodial sentences will also have a wider societal benefit?

I also flag up to members that Justice Albie Sachs, who has been involved with child impact assessments in South Africa, is giving a lecture tomorrow. Perhaps such issues can be tied in with the cabinet secretary’s reasons for ensuring that people who receive short sentences do not necessarily need to go to prison as it can be much better for them to be dealt with outside. After all, prison impacts not just on the individual involved but on their families and on wider society.

Kenny MacAskill: That is already covered in the bill. Under section 1(4)(c), ‘the offender’s family circumstances’ are taken into account; moreover, proposed new section 227B(2) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 as inserted by section 14 says:

The court must not impose the order unless it has obtained and taken account of, a report from an officer of a local authority containing such information relating to the offender as may be specified by Act of Adjournal.

As I said to Cathie Craigie, after this meeting I will give evidence to the Equal Opportunities Committee’s inquiry into female offenders in the criminal justice system. We recognise that female offenders have specific problems. For example, many of them have been victims of abuse; they are far more likely than male offenders to have mental health and addiction problems; and they often have to deal with child care problems. Indeed, as you point out, the danger is that offending behaviour will simply pass from generation to generation and on for eternity. We have to break that cycle, and the treatment of children is important in that respect.

Equally, as Mr Aitken will no doubt point out, we have to take into account victims’ children, some of whom will have lost their mothers or witnessed their being harmed. There is a balance to be struck, but I assure you that in both the principles that lie behind sentencing and the specific opportunities afforded by community payback orders we will take women offenders’ needs into account. As I said, I will soon be talking at length on that subject to another committee.

The Convener: Perhaps to a more receptive audience. [Laughter.]

Cathie Craigie: Judges and sheriffs have expressed concern that the provision in section 24, ‘Voluntary intoxication by alcohol: effect in sentencing’, is unnecessary because they already decide whether to take such matters into account. Do you have any comments on their evidence in that respect?

Kenny MacAskill: Intoxication by alcohol is not supposed to be used as a defence. However, if you go into any court in the land—as I did for 20 years until 10 years ago—you will hear defence lawyers saying, ‘Yes, he did it, but he’s very sorry. He’s kind to dogs; he walks old ladies across roads; he wasn’t there; he didn’t do it; it wisnae him; he was drunk or under the effect of drugs.’ There comes a time when we have to say clearly, ‘It wisnae the drink that did it; it was you. If that’s how you behave under the influence of alcohol, you have to accept the responsibility.’

The correct judicial interpretation is that alcohol is not meant to be used as a defence, but it is frequently so used by those who are participants in the legal process. For example, defence agents will say, ‘Yes, he did it and he is very sorry, but it was the drink that did it.’ We need to say, ‘No, it was not.’

The bill will act as a trigger in giving that message to the public. On a previous bill, Bill Aitken argued that those who assault and attack emergency workers were already dealt with by the courts. However, as a society we sometimes need to say, ‘We are not putting up with this.’ We have made it clear, if a person attacks a paramedic who is doing their job, that we will not sanction that and that such crimes will be recorded for posterity. As a society, we sometimes need to say, ‘It wasn’t the drink that did it; it was you.’ We need to make it clear that we are not putting up with flimsy excuses any more.

The Convener: I get the impression that we will not reach unanimous agreement round the table on short custodial sentences, so we will now go on to the issue of community payback. The questions will be led by Paul Martin.

Paul Martin: The policy memorandum on the bill states that community payback orders will be ‘robust, immediate and visible’. First, what is meant by ‘robust’?

Kenny MacAskill: We are committed to delivering robust community payback orders, which means that they must start on time and be completed quickly. We are also committed to ensuring that enforcement is robust, because the community payback must be done.

As I said, we have already invested an additional £2 million to resource local authorities to deliver improved performance. We acknowledge that the recent audit showed significant failures, but our target is that unpaid work should start within seven days. That is why, as I said at the outset, we are investing an additional £5.5 million over the next two years. That is where we are coming from in terms of ‘robust’. We want to ensure that the community payback order starts early and is kept on track. If people do not comply, there are sanctions for failure.

Paul Martin: Whether a community payback order starts on time will obviously be an issue for the agencies that deliver the framework. Will the sanctions that are to be put in place also apply to the agencies if they do not deliver on time?

Kenny MacAskill: To go back to the very beginning, many of the proposals came from the McLeish commission. I remember Lesley Riddoch saying that, when she visited court, she was gobsmacked to see how someone who was given a custodial sentence, whether of three months or of three years, was taken down below to serve their sentence—in more modern courts, they might not necessarily be taken below, but they are taken away in handcuffs by police or Reliance officers—whereas someone who was given a community sentence got a wee note of paper telling them to turn up at the social work department at an unspecified date, perhaps after calling a phone number. As I said earlier, I served as a defence agent for 20 years, but I never quibbled with that—that was just what happened. Anyone who got a prison sentence went down there and then, but for anyone who got a community sentence the details were worked out in due course. Why?

When people are given a community sentence by Edinburgh sheriff court, it might not be possible for them to be taken out of the back of the court to be given a brush, shovel or whatever and then put in a van to be taken down to Portobello beach, but the idea that community sentences will just work their way through is nonsense. I am extremely grateful to Lesley Riddoch and the other members of the McLeish commission. They came in without any baggage and said, ‘Frankly, that’s bonkers.’ The situation was bonkers. That is why we want community sentences, whenever possible, to start within seven days. The notification of what people are expected to do and the provision of information to the social workers should happen there and then, and the community payback should then start within seven days. We want to make the procedure tighter. As I said, this is a journey of travel, and we are grateful to Lesley Riddoch for that.

Paul Martin: Cabinet secretary, I could not agree more on the importance of delivering community sentences on time, but my point is that, if the offender is to be required to serve the community sentence within a seven-day period, what will happen if the relevant agency does not deliver within those seven days? Will sanctions be taken against agencies? Sometimes local authorities might let down the offender by not ensuring that effective justice is delivered quickly. The offender might not be the one who lets the system down.

Kenny MacAskill: You are right. The audit showed us that the system is not working appropriately the length and breadth of the country. Work is in progress on that with COSLA, which flagged up that it wants to deal with those matters. COSLA is united with us on the issue, but it has said that local authorities will not be able to achieve that without resourcing. That is why we are committed to more resourcing.

There will be further audits by, for example, the Social Work Inspection Agency. I do not think that we would serve our system well by pillorying a council, although a sheriff might want to bring somebody from it before them if there was a manifest failure. We can assure you that there will be auditing by SWIA and that we will deliver what we have set out to do.

Paul Martin: How robust is that? An offender might be advised that swift justice will be served on them but, if the system is let down by the local authority, where is the robust mechanism to deal with that? You have acknowledged that the current congestion in the system is because local authorities are not delivering the service that they should, so surely there should be a sanction to deal with them. I am not advocating one; I am just asking whether you have anything in place.

Kenny MacAskill: That is why we have SWIA reports. When areas of the country are flagged up as having problems, the issue is raised in the parliamentary chamber—for example, the First Minister must answer questions on it at First Minister’s question time. Nobody enters public service, or public life, to do Scotland down and make it less safe and secure. When local authorities are found not to be delivering, action is taken and, for example, new lead officials are brought in to address the problem. That is the current practice, but if you are suggesting that we need some statutory intervention to address problems immediately, I am willing to consider that. We already have audits, SWIA and the view that local authorities must do their best. If they do not, they are open to criticism locally and, ultimately, here in this committee or in the parliamentary chamber.

Paul Martin: On visible community service, how will a community be able to identify that a community payback scheme is operating in their community?

Kenny MacAskill: We are already seeing that. I go to many places that have been painted or whatever through community service. Indeed, I was delighted to be advised by the minister of Portobello old parish church that the community service team will help with a fallen ceiling there. They cannot do the complicated cornice work that will have to be done, but they will do some of the hard donkey-work to ensure that the parish church is put back as it was. Do we need to have people in orange jumpsuits? No, but we need to ensure that, where appropriate, there are plaques. I have been in many a place where it was clear from plaques, whether on park benches or whatever, that community service work had been done there. I will therefore leave to the common sense of communities the decision about what work needs to be done locally.

Communities are already dealing with that question. In Buckhaven, for example, community service workers have been doing up local paths. Wherever possible, we must make it clear when community service work has been done in areas, although I do not necessarily think that Portobello old parish church would want a big plaque under the stained-glass windows in the church hall saying that it was all done by community service—I would happily support people saying that they do not want that, thank you very much. We must ensure, though, that people are out there doing what is necessary, whether picking up litter on Broughty Ferry beach, doing up paths in Fife or a variety of other work. Wherever possible and appropriate, we should say that the work was done by community service—that seems to me to get the right balance.

Paul Martin: But do you accept that the visibility issue is a challenge? Constituents have advised me of work in the local community that they understood was carried out by local contractors rather than community service. If you want community payback orders to be a visible process, do you acknowledge that that presents challenges in getting the message across to communities? I am not advocating any particular method of doing that; I am just asking whether you recognise that there is a challenge. Again, constituents have advised me that the local housing association’s contractors did certain work that was, in fact, done by community service.

Kenny MacAskill: I want community service work to be done for two reasons. First, I want the kids—in many instances, it is young men—to pay back by the sweat of their brows for the harm that they have done. I make no apology for saying that. Secondly, I want people to be able to see their community getting better. In some instances, there will be a partnership between community service and others because some work, such as that for the ceiling in Portobello old parish church, requires skilled labour. That work cannot be dealt with by people who are on community service, for a variety of reasons.

It seems to me to be about getting the right balance. What matters is that offenders do some hard work to pay back for the damage that they have done and that our communities are improved, as opposed to our paying for three square meals for offenders in the free-bed-and-board culture of prison.

I saw a group of kids at Portlethen when I was travelling to Aberdeen. I am relaxed if folk who see a group of kids doing up the park at the side of the main dual carriageway to Aberdeen cannot tell from a distance whether they are council employees, kids doing community service or whatever. What matters is that they are doing the work and the community is being improved.

Paul Martin: I am sorry to labour the point, but the policy memorandum says that you want to ensure that ‘sentences served in the community are robust … and visible’.

Therefore, I do not accept your latter point. You say that you are relaxed about the matter but, if you want sentences to be visible, the community needs to know that community payback work is being carried out.

Kenny MacAskill: Visibility comes in a variety of ways. Communities should know what work can be done. I visited a scheme in Fife, for example, in which people were asked to nominate work to be done. People could vote on the internet, as they can do for television programmes, or they could text in to say what they wanted to be done. Things were put in ascending order. In fact, there is more work in Scotland at the moment than community service kids can do.

It is about striking a sensible and legitimate balance. I want the work to be done and our communities to get better. Where appropriate, it should be said that community service people did the work. That might not be appropriate in places such as churches, but it seems to me that such an approach achieves the appropriate balance. That is what is meant by visibility. Communities should be allowed to know that such work can be done. People in Fife can say that they need the coastal path to be done up or other things to be tidied up or done. The level of skill that is required may be beyond the community service team or there could be health and safety issues. My community council at Meadowbank, for example, asked me about getting kids to get rid of their spray paint. I investigated the matter and found that some equipment for removing paint is subject to health and safety regulations, so it would be inappropriate for them to use it. However, that is not necessarily to say that they could not paint over things.

Things will develop and evolve. The community justice authorities have a role in that, and the community service teams are doing a good job in driving things home. Fife provides a clear example of what can be done so that there is community involvement as well as community visibility.

The Convener: I think that Mr Martin feels that there is a false prospectus with regard to the definition of the word ‘visible’. I have some sympathy with what he has said but, as it is unlikely that there will be consensus on the matter, I suggest that we move on.

Paul Martin: On resources, the cabinet secretary told us that he had a discussion with Councillor McGuigan yesterday. When he gave oral evidence to the committee, Councillor McGuigan focused on the provision of adequate resources to COSLA to carry out the necessary work. Have you advised him that you will provide all the resources that he requires to deal with COSLA’s commitments?

Kenny MacAskill: That is clearly an issue for COSLA. Harry McGuigan was correct to raise the issue, which Robert Brown and Henry McLeish have also raised. We recognise that there must be resources, which is why I said at the outset that we propose to make £5.5 million available over the next two years, as well as the additional resources to which we have already committed. I hope that we will be able to get more resources, but much depends on whether we will be given consequentials and assistance with the swine flu pandemic, for example. The Government must meet needs, but we cannot provide as much as we would like because we have not received Barnett consequentials for prisons, nor have we yet been given assistance in tackling a clear issue of national urgency. However, I hope to provide more resources if we can.

We have got the £5.5 million. The courtesy call to Harry McGuigan meant no disrespect to the committee or Parliament; I simply wanted to let him know that we would be making an announcement. He is out of the country, but I understand that he is delighted by the progress that we have made. It is clear that the money is not a king’s ransom. We would like to be able to get more money, but swine flu, Barnett consequentials and other things are causing difficulties for the Cabinet Secretary for Finance and Sustainable Growth.

Robert Brown: I would like to pursue the issue of resources, if I may. I am grateful that there will be additional funding, but I want to be clear that the funding relates specifically to the existing community orders. I think you said in your introductory remarks that it is designed to increase the speed and, perhaps, the quality of the current process. Will you confirm that?

Kenny MacAskill: Wilma Dickson will comment on that.

Wilma Dickson (Scottish Government Criminal Justice Directorate): The priority, particularly for this year and next, is to get up to speed. For a number of local authorities, there is quite a transition period for retooling and dealing with backlogs. At the end of that period, it should be possible to divert resources away from catching up and into investment in additional CP0s.

Robert Brown: I follow that, but we have had figures from Glasgow and other parts of the country about the extent of the backlog—I suppose that it has not been helped by the recent strike in Glasgow, although that is another issue. It seems to me that the bulk of the money will be required to bring the existing orders up to scratch and to hold them there. If that is not done, there will be a falling away again. At the end of the period, how much of the resource—I appreciate that there is another £2 million—that will not be needed just to keep the existing orders up to scratch will you be able to reallocate?

Wilma Dickson: It might be helpful if I say that one of the other things that you should take into account is that we need to resource the additional costs of progress courts and to put some extra capacity into electronic monitoring. Most of the money will go out to local authorities. Obviously, all the £1.5 million that will go out this year will go to local authorities on the normal distribution formula as quickly as possible, because we want to start on the catch-up as quickly as possible.

Robert Brown mentioned Glasgow. In Glasgow, the strike has been resolved. There is a way forward there, which is very positive. In addition, quite a substantial slab of the money for next year will go out to local authorities. We would expect that by the end of that period, the catch-up will have happened, and that there will be scope to redirect and build up more community payback orders.

Kenny MacAskill: We cannot be too prescriptive. Some areas have specific problems. Robert Brown mentioned Glasgow, but other areas are doing remarkably well. The money has to go mainly into front-line services, and spending decisions are—given the particular needs of the criminal justice social work department—best made by local authorities, and not by me in St Andrew's house. We have given you the broad direction of travel. We are more than happy to work with local authorities on this, but ultimately it is their call.

Robert Brown: There are two or three other important issues. I think that most of us would agree about the quality of some community service orders at the moment. You mentioned the 42 per cent reoffending rates, which is one test. The rate is better than that which is achieved by short-term sentences but, arguably, not that much better, considering that you are dealing with a lesser category of offender. Are there mechanisms in place to improve the quality of community service orders by making them more focused on reducing reoffending rates and achieving more success?

Kenny MacAskill: Yes—and that has, to an extent, to be dealt with locally. It is about ensuring that we get best practice across the board. Equally, we have to recognise that there are particular problems in some areas because of their volume or geography. Community sentencing in the Highlands and Islands and in Dumfries and Galloway is particularly challenging because of the geography of those areas. It is about learning from good practice and figuring out what works in a particular area.

We must also consider what we have got with CPOs and recognise that as well as the community payback punishment aspect, we need to address the underlying problem—alcohol, drugs or whatever—in other ways.

Robert Brown: The committee is concerned about the number of breaches of community service orders—some of us have asked about that from time to time. The Government and the committee would probably agree that that has to be tackled. It is a matter not just of starting effectively but of keeping at them effectively, and dealing with breaches properly, while recognising the need for flexibility. Under the arrangements that you are putting in place, do you anticipate an increase in the number of breaches that will have to be dealt with by reference back to the courts?

Kenny MacAskill: We hope that progress courts will alleviate that. We have learned from DTTOs and from speaking to sheriffs that sometimes it is not simply about keeping people on a tight leash and berating them; sometimes it is about encouraging them, and saying how well they have done. We are giving sheriffs the flexibility to encourage people who are doing well to overcome their addictions, to become less of a nuisance in their communities and to contribute as net taxpayers who function manageably in our communities, rather than their being a drain on taxpayers.

We will provide the tools, such as the progress courts, to monitor those who might have a specific problem and who need to be kept in check. Sometimes, the aim is to encourage as well as to berate—I have picked that up from sheriffs. Electronic monitoring is also available to allow a belt-and-braces approach to be taken. Such matters must be worked out. Some of that is about embarking on a journey. We must set the parameters and have the structures of community progress courts. We have the resources—the additional money—and we must allow sheriffs and social work departments to work together. As you know, in areas that work well, much cooperation takes place between sheriffs who want to know what work is available and social workers who want to feed back information.

Robert Brown: The number of new orders will be crucial. I am bound to say that the presumption against short-term sentences implies that the intention is that in the bulk of such cases sentences will no longer be imposed and will be replaced by community orders. The financial memorandum talks about alternative scenarios of 10 and 20 per cent increases in community orders. If the new policy is to have any impact, such increases would be rather low.

I understand that about 19,000 community orders were given in 2007-08, if we add together community service orders, probation orders and supervised attendance orders. That is not a million miles away from the 14,000 to 16,000 short-term sentences that the cabinet secretary talked about. One imagines that, to make a significant impact on short-term sentences—we accept that some will continue to be imposed for all sorts of purposes—thousands of additional community service orders will have to come into the system, rather than the 10 to 20 per cent increase that the financial memorandum suggests. What was the basis for the prediction of 10 or 20 per cent? If such figures are achieved, will they make much difference in the overall scheme of things?

Kenny MacAskill: You are correct to raise the issue. We do not believe that a millennium moment will occur. In 2007-08, there were 8,191 direct sentence prison receptions for sentences of under six months, which equated to only 6,076 individuals. That shows that some people go to prison more than once for a short sentence and often more than once in the same year, through the revolving door.

Our assumption of a 10 or 20 per cent increase in the number of community orders would result in Robert Brown: You suggest that we will end up with significantly higher figures and therefore increased resources in future years. In that context, would it be an advantage to phase in introduction and to adopt the Liberal Democrats’ suggestion of three months rather than six months as the cut-off point? I accept that such matters are, to a degree, arbitrary. Even with the extra resource that you talked about and some reallocation later, will the facilities be available to make the policy a success? You will perhaps accept that if the policy does not work effectively, is not seen to protect communities and does not increase success at preventing reoffending, communities will be considerably disillusioned.

Kenny MacAskill: Those concerns are valid and legitimate. I have talked about the additional funding—a bit more might be obtainable, but that depends on some factors—together with improvements in practice. We take into account the fact that sentencers will not change their habits overnight; some people always take time to change. Also, some people will still receive short sentences. Such matters can be dealt with—we are on a journey in that direction of travel.

Robert Brown: What assumption have you made about the long-term increase in community sentences, once the legislation is fully in place, the lead-in period is over and confidence-building measures have been taken? Are you talking about a 50 per cent, 25 per cent or 90 per cent increase?

Wilma Dickson: It might be helpful if I return to the figures and explain some of them. There is a difficulty in that there are different ways in which we count sentences. The higher figure of 12,000-plus short sentences is a perfectly accurate figure for the number of sentences that the courts impose. However, given that some people have served time on remand or are given three or four concurrent sentences, the figure for sentence receptions is much lower and the figure for the number of people who go into prison is lower still.

If we look at the figure for direct sentence receptions, the number of individuals in a year is only 6,100. In the assumptions that we have made for increased CPOs, the 10 per cent figure is 1,900 and the 20 per cent figure is 3,800. The individuals who get short prison sentences and go into prison represent a much higher proportion than may first appear to be the case. That is because, paradoxically and counterintuitively, the number of individuals who go into prison each year is about half the number of short sentences. We are probably talking more about that targeted population. On that basis, the assumptions of 10 per cent and 20 per cent give figures of 31 per cent and 62 per cent of present receptions. The number is not as negligible as it looks. If I failed to explain that clearly enough to the Finance Committee, it is probably my fault.

Robert Brown: That is helpful.

The Convener: I see exactly where you are coming from. Many accused avail themselves of the roll-up facility, particularly when they are in custody.

Cathie Craigie: My question is on community payback orders under section 14. Proposed new section 227B(5) of the 1995 act states:

‘The court must not make the order unless the offender has, after the court has explained those matters, confirmed that the offender (a) understands those matters, and (b) is willing to comply with each of the requirements to be imposed by the order.’

What if the offender is not willing?

Kenny MacAskill: A person who says that they will not comply with an order will not get one. The situation will be the same as with bail: a standard bail condition is that the person must not commit another offence. If the offender says, ‘I’m gaunae’, they will be told, ‘You’re no getting bail.’

Cathie Craigie: So, if the offender is not willing to comply with the order, the court has recourse to a custodial sentence.

Kenny MacAskill: The point that I made earlier was that you can take a horse to water, but you cannot make it drink. If the offender was told, ‘This is what you’re gaunae do’, but then said, ‘I’m no doing it’, the sheriff would be right to say that a custodial sentence is the alternative. If a bail condition is that the person cannot go to the pub or return to the matrimonial home, but the person says that they will do that, they will be remanded.

Cathie Craigie: I am not talking about bail conditions; I am talking about community payback orders.

Kenny MacAskill: You are talking about the court laying down an order and the person refusing to accept it. If they refuse to accept it, the order will not be given. People either accept the terms and conditions or face the forfeit. In such circumstances, I have no doubt that the offender would be given a custodial sentence.

The Convener: Right. This is an appropriate time to have a suspension. I am conscious that you have an appointment elsewhere, cabinet secretary. We will have a five-minute break.
Meeting suspended.

11:01

On resuming—

The Convener: I thank everyone for being back in their seats so promptly. Robert Brown will lead the questioning on serious organised crime.

Robert Brown: Why are the new offences of involvement in, and direction of, serious organised crime needed, given that people can already be prosecuted for conspiracy to commit a crime or inciting others to commit a crime? Is the common law under that heading not entirely adequate? Does it overlap with the new proposals?

Kenny MacAskill: It can be difficult to prosecute at the top end of criminal network offences. Indeed, that has been highlighted in the media south of the border. Although conspiracy can be charged for serious organised crime, the prosecution authorities have given evidence to the committee on the difficulties of doing so and proving the offence. Serious organised crime is a significant threat and we must address it; it is unacceptable. Therefore, it is appropriate to build a statutory basis for specific offences.

Robert Brown: Section 25(1) says:

'A person who agrees with at least one other person to become involved in serious organised crime commits an offence.'

To all intents and purposes, that sounds like a definition of common-law conspiracy. Will you elaborate on how it is different from the common law?

Kenny MacAskill: Clearly, it would be possible to libel that crime as conspiracy. Indeed, that option may remain for the Crown in some circumstances. However, with these provisions, we are recognising that serious organised criminal gangs operate in Scotland. Those gangs are involved not only in the drugs trade but in people trafficking and smuggling, for example. They also seek to undermine legitimate areas of the economy and drive hard-working Scots off the road or undermine their businesses. We must recognise that problem. As with the Emergency Workers (Scotland) Act 2005 and the bill's provisions on intoxication, we are sending a clear message about how seriously the Government and society view serious and organised crime.

The Crown has made the point that proving conspiracy can be difficult. It is therefore appropriate that we have an additional statutory basis that allows us, while keeping the appropriate balance in the scales of justice, to ensure that it is not as difficult to convict someone of involvement in serious organised crime as it is to convict them of conspiracy, and to send a message that society will take serious organised crime extremely seriously.

Robert Brown: There is no disagreement around the table on the importance of serious organised crime, for the reasons that Mr MacAskill mentions. However, my question is this: what is the difference between the definition of involvement in serious organised crime under section 25(1) or that of directing serious organised crime under section 27(1), and the definition of conspiracy that a judge would apply under the common law?

George Burgess: I point back to the evidence that the Lord Advocate and the Solicitor General for Scotland gave to the committee a couple of weeks ago. They explained the extent to which the new offences in the bill could get into the serious crime organisation a bit earlier in the chain—before the conspiracy had formed—and why, in their view, they would be better than relying simply on common-law conspiracy. I cannot really add to what the law officers said on that occasion.

Kenny MacAskill: I think that the provisions have their genesis in the serious organised crime task force, which included not only the law officers and the police but—so that we could deal with the tentacles of organised crime—Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs, the Serious Organised Crime Agency and the Scottish Prison Service. Some ideas were also taken from Canada, where the Solicitor General had seen the benefits that had accrued from such measures. It seems to us that, if tackling serious organised crime in the way that is proposed will have benefits—as in Canada—over using the common law of conspiracy, which is not necessarily delivering as we would wish, it is appropriate that we take action. As is perhaps always the case, the common law will still exist after we bring in the statutory offence, but the provisions are about tackling the specific problem that we believe exists in Scotland. As well as ensuring that we have the legislative basis to support those in SOCA, HMRC, the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency and the police who are involved in tackling the issue, the provisions will ensure that the balance is not tilted too much against the opportunity to protect our communities.

Robert Brown: Let me move on slightly. It was suggested in previous evidence, as the cabinet secretary perhaps heard, that two people who together organised to steal a pie could be covered by the definition of ‘serious offence’ in section 25(2)(a). The criticism is that the bill mixes together very serious matters with potentially trivial matters at the bottom end of the scale. I accept that the prosecution can exercise a degree of discretion, but is there not potential for narrowing the scope of those rather significant charges in the bill?

Kenny MacAskill: I know that that is not a flippant point, but it is also quite correct to point out that discretion needs to be exercised by the police, the SCDEA and the prosecution. We also need to recognise that folk will use the common sense that they are born with, so the Crown will not libel such matters on a whim or fancy. Indeed, if any such matter were so libelled, I would expect our judiciary to treat the charge with the contempt that it deserved by dismissing it fairly summarily. As I said, the provisions are intended to ensure that we have the appropriate statutory powers to protect our communities. We do not anticipate that the new offence will be used in huge volumes, but we believe that the ability to use it is necessary to protect our communities from the threat that they face.

Robert Brown: In that context, have officials given any attention to the possibility of narrowing down the scope of the provision to meet the objection—of the public, to some degree—that such charges sound, and are, very serious whereas they could be used for things that are not very serious at all? We surely do not want to water down or dilute the concentration on serious organised crime.

Kenny MacAskill: We are more than happy to reflect on that. However, as was pointed out earlier, the offence of breach of the peace can constitute anything from a minor matter, such as a ruckus out in the hallway there, to behaviour that is equivalent to stalking—I recall a defence agent once charging someone on indictment with a breach of the peace for that, and rightly so, given the person’s threatening and intimidatory manner. However, the requirement for definition is clearly greater for a statutory offence than for an offence under the common law, which allows more flexibility, so I am more than happy to undertake to reflect on the points that have been made.

Equally, however, judicial interpretation will also be required if and when charges are brought in due course. As we discussed when we considered another bill recently—it might have been the Sexual Offences (Scotland) Bill or the bill dealing with the Somerville judgment—some matters will ultimately be decided by judicial interpretation. That point certainly came up in our consideration of the Somerville bill in the context of what would constitute being beyond the relevant period. We will reflect on the issues that have been raised, but the fail-safe of judicial interpretation should ensure that matters are not brought willy-nilly.

Stewart Maxwell: I have a brief follow-up question on the issue of duplication. When the Solicitor General gave evidence two weeks ago, he gave the example of malicious mischief, which is an offence under the common law but is usually prosecuted under statutes dealing with vandalism. Clearly, such duplication already happens. However, I want to move the discussion on slightly by asking whether the cabinet secretary agrees with the point that, although persons can already be charged with conspiracy, there is a great deal of usefulness in having a statute that specifies that they were involved in serious organised crime. In effect, having such an offence on the books allows it to be put on record what the conspiracy was about, given the difference between a mild conspiracy and involvement in serious organised crime. A specific statute of that sort allows it to be put on record that the individual has been involved in serious and organised crime, as opposed to just conspiracy, which, although it could be serious, might not be seen in the same light.

Kenny MacAskill: Absolutely. It is similar to the reason why we passed the Emergency Workers (Scotland) Act 2005 and a variety of other measures. Indeed, it is why the Parliament passed the hate crime bill more recently. It should be recorded—people should know that what they have carried out is viewed as significantly more serious than the milder actions that you referred to. To take the example of someone committing an assault by throwing a stone, if they are doing so at someone who, as part of their job as a paramedic, is trying to treat a person who has collapsed from a heart attack, the circumstances should be recorded. First, that is to know the number and extent of such incidents, as is the case for race hate. Also, it should be on the record what the offender was up to.

The Convener: There is a general aim that is shared round the table as to what we are trying to do here.

Kenny MacAskill: Absolutely.

The Convener: I note what you said in reply to Mr Brown—that you will consider the matter again.

Robert Brown: The focus of concern about the serious organised crime provisions lies with section 28, which is on knowledge or suspicion. I accept that there are exemptions, but you might agree that that element goes considerably beyond normal previous concepts of law, which have attempted to define what a crime and an attempt to commit a crime consist of. Section 28 moves very much into offences of omission, as it makes people guilty not for things that they have definitely and directly done themselves, but for things that they know about and have not seen fit to report to the proper authorities. Do you accept that the section has wide powers? Do you accept the concerns that have been expressed about it in some quarters? Is there any way in which those concerns might be alleviated by focusing more directly on the people you are trying to get at? Who is the target of section 28 and how can you focus on those people?

Kenny MacAskill: You are right that it is a wide target. We know that serious criminals require facilitators—professional advisers, basically—whether for property deals, for legal matters or for accountancy. The provisions are a backstop, to an extent. We hope that the situations that they cover do not arise, and we fully support the work of professional and trade organisations in relation to money-laundering legislation and the wider ethos, rules and regulations. We hope that matters are resolved from within, rather than without. However, I would not hold my breath about that, given the nature of the money and benefits involved. Although the provisions in the bill are a backstop, which we want to work, we believe that the new offence adds impetus to get our approach right.

You are correct to say that the section concerns omission, in many instances, but there is a clear difference between somebody in a garage encountering a person coming in with £40,000 in used notes in a holdall and not asking any questions, and somebody who, in whatever capacity, is sorting out property deals for people seeking to launder money in the knowledge of where that money has come from.

Some of the provisions are about allowing discretion and judgment to be used by the police, the SCDEA, HMRC and, ultimately, the Crown and the courts. There are indeed areas that concern omission, but it is not so much the person whom we might ask, ‘Where did you think the money was coming from?’ whom we are targeting; we are targeting the people whom we know to be working as the scribes or authors of inventive schemes to take money that has been bled from our community to make themselves ever richer.

Robert Brown: Are the conspiracy and involvement elements not dealt with by section 25, or by the money-laundering regulations, perhaps with some additions to them? Could you be a bit clearer about the mischief that is not being met at the moment, which would not be covered by the money-laundering arrangements, by the common law of conspiracy or by section 25?

Kenny MacAskill: Without going into anecdotal tales, which is never the best way, I suggest that those matters have to some extent been covered, in principle, by the Solicitor General and that it will be the Crown and the police who drive them forward. They have flagged up a cause for concern. You are correct that there will be areas where there is overlap between what is clearly conspiracy and a variety of other matters. We are aware that serious organised crimes are being carried out in a variety of ways and we believe that we must take steps to combat such crime. This proposal has come from the serious organised crime task force to enable us to deal with activities that we know are going on, whereby people are buying up legitimate businesses and places such as new-build flats in order to hide drugs or carry out a variety of other activities.

The job of our Government is to ensure that the appropriate legislative framework is put in place to allow the police and the prosecution service to do their job. They have told us that they do not believe that the current law of conspiracy is appropriate. We hope that we do not have to prosecute individuals who are involved in professional services that are respected in Scotland and that do a good job in our communities, but we know that, for whatever reason, some people fall from grace. We want to ensure that we protect our communities. I am more than happy to go back and ask for greater detail, but I am not the person who should provide such detail; it should be provided by those who sit on the serious organised crime task force, whether it be HMRC or the SPS. We know that serious crime is being organised not only in areas of urban deprivation of Scotland but in areas of extreme wealth, where people have managed to get themselves because of what they have done and, tragically, it is sometimes also being organised from prison, where people have correctly been sent.

Robert Brown: I repeat that nobody around the table has anything other than a desire to tackle serious organised crime, but we are still entitled to ask you whether your proposal does what it says on the tin.

The committee has heard evidence that suggests that part of the issue is evidential rather than to do with the substance of the legal provisions. Might it be beneficial to look at that element—the procedure and evidential law—rather than at the substantial definitions? In that context, we understand that the United Kingdom Government is considering and consulting on the scope of the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000. Has the Scottish Government been involved in that and is there scope for a similar review of legislation in Scotland on the evidential side to ensure that we have all the weapons, not only substantial but—perhaps at least as important—evidential, to address these particularly difficult issues?

Kenny MacAskill: We have not been involved in that, but you are correct that the issue is not only the legislative framework but how we can apply our evidence and how we act in respect of the powers for police, prosecutors and whatever else. We do not quite have an open book, but we established the serious organised crime task force to deal with these issues in a variety of ways. We are dealing with one matter that it has flagged up and we are more than happy to co-operate, adopt ideas and work with various authorities on these issues. As was made clear by the task force’s recent announcement, we know that many of the criminal gangs that operate in Scotland are not based in Scotland. Many come from south of the border and some even come from beyond the shores of the UK. We work with UK authorities on the issue—for example, HMRC and SOCA sit around the table with us—and we also co-operate with Europol. There is genuine openness and we are willing to work in whatever way, with whatever authorities, in whatever jurisdictions, to tackle a global problem.

The Convener: This is an important topic. As there are no more questions on it, I will say that it is a matter to which everyone will give considerable thought before the legislation proceeds.

We now turn to the issue of retention of samples.

Stewart Maxwell: The committee has heard a variety of evidence about whether the retention of DNA samples should be extended to offenders who receive fixed-penalty notices. Some people have argued that many of those offenders go on to commit serious crimes and that the retention of their DNA would be an effective tool in detecting such crimes. Do you agree that the retention of such samples should be based not on the penalty that is received but on the offence that is committed?

The Convener: Before Mr MacAskill answers that question, I point out that the officials have changed. Denise McKay, from the legal directorate, and Rachael Weir, from the criminal procedure division, both in the Scottish Government, have seamlessly assumed their seats. Mr MacAskill may now proceed.

Kenny MacAskill: Stewart Maxwell makes a valid point. The Government has made it clear that we are open to reviewing matters—for example, Professor Fraser’s review covered issues relating to children. We are getting people on board to work out what the correct balance should be. The Government is firmly opposed to any blanket retention of forensic data for an indefinite period; such data should not be retained indefinitely unless the person has been convicted in court.

However, we recognise that it is appropriate to consider the issue of retention with regard to youngsters who commit serious offences and people who commit offences that are dealt with using fixed-penalty notices, and I assure members that we are doing so.

Stewart Maxwell: I am delighted to hear that. Is it likely that the Government will either accept an amendment at stage 2 or lodge its own amendment on that point?

Kenny MacAskill: We are happy to consider our position on that, subject to provisos in the Parliament about matters being legal, appropriate and compliant with the ECHR.

Stewart Maxwell: I have written to you on that matter, as I am sure you are aware, and I look forward to receiving your response. You briefly mentioned DNA samples from children; the bill clearly provides for the retention of samples from children who have been referred to children’s hearings for relevant serious and violent offences. Can you elaborate on the rationale behind those provisions and explain how the list of applicable offences will be developed?

Kenny MacAskill: We know that, tragically, there are a small number of youngsters who commit very serious sexual or violent offences, and who sadly continue in many instances to pose a threat beyond childhood. We are considering how to achieve the appropriate balance. It is important to remember that the provisions relate only to serious sexual or violent offences; we will consult with the forensic data working group on the list of offences.

Retention will be time limited, and both the child and the responsible adult will need to accept that the child has committed an offence, or a sheriff will have to find that to be the case. Children may also be victims and they have rights. Nothing will be done with the DNA that is retained unless another offence is committed. We are ensuring that appropriate people from a variety of backgrounds are involved in considering what should be on the list of trigger offences.

Stewart Maxwell: When is that likely to be forthcoming?

Kenny MacAskill: It will probably not be before the bill is passed, as it will take some time to work out. Some element of flexibility may ultimately be required, given the nature of the offences. I cannot give you a timescale, but I can certainly undertake to ask the members of the working group whether they have set a timetable. The bill will provide us with the appropriate powers, and we can then drill down to a much more specific level with the working group.

Stewart Maxwell: Just to be clear, do you expect that the working group will report before consideration of the bill is concluded?

Kenny MacAskill: We do not have a timescale. We could inquire about what stage the working group has reached, but it is still being set up and we have not set a timescale for its work. We are not expecting the group to sit and do nothing, but we have allowed it to decide on a timescale—we have only established the framework and brought the members together. I am happy to ask the group's members whether they can give us any information that we can pass on to you about the timescale for the investigation.

Stewart Maxwell: I presume that you expect that the outcome of the working group's deliberations will not impact in any way on the provisions in the bill.

Kenny MacAskill: No—there is sufficient flexibility in the framework of the bill to allow us to use the outcomes from the working group to deal with more specific matters.

The Convener: It would be useful if we could find out the timing of the working group's report. It seems to me that we are getting things slightly out of kilter. I appreciate that there may be problems, but we would want to have the information from the working group prior to legislating. That may not be possible, but can we find out what is happening?

Kenny MacAskill: We undertake to give you that information.

Robert Brown: What will the interim position be if there is a gap between the passing of the bill and the working out of the list? What will happen in the meantime?

Kenny MacAskill: The legislation will not be brought into force. I presume that it will require the trigger of subordinate legislation thereafter to bring it in. To some extent, what we are legislating for in the bill is the powers. What will have to come through thereafter will be done through a Scottish statutory instrument. If Parliament passes the bill, it will give only a consequent power, and thereafter a statutory instrument will be required to come before the committee.

Stewart Maxwell: I understand the process, but could I clarify whether the SSI will list the specific offences to be included? Given the nature of the subject matter, I assume that it will be an affirmative instrument.

George Burgess: Perhaps I can assist. We should look at section 59 of the bill and the new section 18B that it inserts into the 1995 act. Section 18B(6) provides that a relevant offence is such an offence as ministers may prescribe. What ministers can prescribe has to be selected out of what is already defined in the 1995 act as relevant sexual and relevant violent offences, so there is already a limitation on the scope of the possible set of offences that can be specified—it is not a free-for-all for ministers to choose whatever they like. It will be an order made by statutory instrument. We will need to check on the procedure to establish whether the negative or affirmative procedure will be used, but the Subordinate Legislation Committee will no doubt have considered that in recent weeks.

Stewart Maxwell: I would be grateful—as I am sure the committee would be—for confirmation of which procedure will be used. Given the nature of the subject matter, I expect it to be the affirmative procedure but, if it is not, I hope that we can have some understanding of why it is not.

Kenny MacAskill: We will check that out for you.

Paul Martin: Will the minister clarify that it is not the Government's intention to move in line with the position in England and Wales on the retention of DNA?

Kenny MacAskill: Given that the position in England and Wales has been traduced, if I can put it that way, by the European Court of Human Rights, the short answer is no. First, it would be impossible to do that, given the views of the European Court of Human Rights. Secondly, we think that, as people in other jurisdictions have said, we have the correct balance. We must recalibrate it, and that is the point made by Mr Maxwell in relation to the need to consider the issue of serious violent offences committed by young people. We are also considering whether the retention of DNA samples should apply to offenders who receive fixed-penalty notices. However, we believe that indefinite retention of such samples has been shown to be illegal by the Marper judgment and that, in any case, it was not the appropriate way to go.

Paul Martin: When we took evidence from Chief Constable House, I questioned him on whether there are opportunities to prevent crimes from taking place at a later stage by identifying offenders at a much earlier stage. Do you not recognise that the system that is in place in England and Wales is a very effective detection method at a very early stage of the criminal's career?

Kenny MacAskill: We recognise the benefits of DNA evidence in, for example, the successful prosecution of Peter Tobin in the Vicky Hamilton case, which was to the great credit of both our police and the Solicitor General. Such evidence is used for detection, but I remind Mr Martin that the Marper judgment has been issued. That is the position in which we find ourselves not only in Scotland but south of the border and that is why courts have been saying that they think that the current position in Scotland strikes the correct balance. I pay tribute to your colleague Cathy Jamieson and others who put us in this position at the outset. For the record, we do not want to go down the English route because we think that we have the appropriate balance, subject to the outcome of the matters that we are checking. Moreover, we cannot take that approach because of the European court judgment.

Paul Martin: For the record, I confirm that the position on DNA was introduced by an amendment that I lodged to the Police, Public Order and Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill—not that I do not want to give credit to Cathy Jamieson where it is due.

The point on Peter Tobin is interesting because one of the questions that I raised with Chief Constable House was the possibility that we could have detected him at a much earlier stage of his criminal career if we had had the opportunity to retain his DNA much earlier. Do you not acknowledge, even on anecdotal evidence, that we could have prevented some of the murders that he committed if we had identified him much earlier?

Kenny MacAskill: I am a great supporter of the excellent work that forensic departments the length and breadth of Scotland do. I have seen the forensic department in Glasgow and pay great tribute to it. Indeed, it was a privilege for me as Cabinet Secretary for Justice to present an award—I have done it two years in a row—to those who have done sterling work. However, I am not quite sure what you are suggesting. I recognise the great benefits of forensic science to law enforcement.

Paul Martin: The question is clear. I posed the same question to Chief Constable House, who understood it. Could we have detected Peter Tobin earlier if we had been able to retain DNA samples decades ago?

Kenny MacAskill: I am not qualified to comment on the Peter Tobin case. You would be better asking my former school and football colleague Detective Chief Inspector Keith Anderson—now retired—who was the investigating officer, or Frank Mulholland, the Solicitor General, who prosecuted the case. I cannot comment on what could or should have been done. I am delighted at the excellent work done by Keith, Lothian and Borders Police and every other police force north and south of the border that collaborated and delighted at the sterling work that the Solicitor General did in bringing Peter Tobin to justice for the murders of Vicky Hamilton and Angelika Kluk. Beyond that, I cannot guess; I have never seen the files.

Paul Martin: Do you accept that the DNA retention opportunities that are provided to us allow us to identify criminals at much earlier stages of their careers? Yes or no.

Kenny MacAskill: Absolutely. That is why the Government is ensuring that the Scottish Police Services Authority is properly resourced and that the appropriate steps are taken to ensure that forensic science is all that it can be in Scotland. I pay great tribute to our forensic science officers in the SPSA.

The Convener: One might have considerable sympathy with what Mr Martin suggests, but there is a prohibitor in respect of the European court judgment, is there not?

Kenny MacAskill: Yes.

The Convener: That is as far as we will get today. Mr MacAskill has kindly agreed to fit in an extra meeting, at which we will deal with the licensing issues that arose last week. At that meeting, there will also be the opportunity to raise a number of other issues that we did not get time to deal with today. This morning’s meeting has been exceptionally useful and exposed the cabinet secretary to fairly intensive examination on the Government’s policy. I thank Mr MacAskill and his officials for attending.

11:33

Meeting suspended.
On resuming—

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener: Item 2 is our final oral evidence-taking session on the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. The majority of the questions will be on the licensing provisions, with which we will start. After dealing with that issue, we will return to the criminal procedure questions that we did not have time to cover when we last considered the bill.

I welcome to the committee the Cabinet Secretary for Justice, Kenny MacAskill. On this occasion, he is supported by George Burgess and Tony Rednall, of the Scottish Government criminal law and licensing division, and Craig McGuffie, principal legal officer in the Scottish Government legal directorate.

Stewart Maxwell (West of Scotland) (SNP): My first question concerns the task group that was established by the previous Executive to review the provisions in the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982. I believe that the report of the task group was published in 2004. According to evidence that the committee has received, only some of the task group’s recommendations have been taken forward. Why did the Government take that approach?

Secondly, why is the 1982 act merely being updated rather than being replaced?

The Cabinet Secretary for Justice (Kenny MacAskill): The 1982 act has served Scotland well and, rather than replace it, we have sought to build on it and enhance it. It seems to us that we should seek to improve something that has worked reasonably well rather than making a change for the sake of it.

On your first question, all but two of the recommendations of the task group that require legislation have been taken up. One recommendation that we have not taken up is that a section be renamed “Late Hours Food and Drink Provision”. The issue of nomenclature is dealt with elsewhere.

The other recommendation that we have not taken forward is “that a statutory obligation should be placed upon licensing authorities to ensure that any licensing requirements they have in place are adequately enforced.”

We do not think that such a statutory obligation is required, as section 9(2) of the 1982 act includes a provision requiring activities to be licensed where a resolution is made. Therefore, the duty that is asked for already appears in that act.

One other recommendation requiring legislation does not appear explicitly in the bill. However, we intend to deal with that through the enabling power in section 121, which will allow Scottish ministers to prescribe by order a variety of matters.

Stewart Maxwell: Thank you for clarifying that.

Section 121 enables ministers to set mandatory conditions and licensing authorities to set standard conditions for licences granted under the 1982 act. We have heard evidence that such mandatory conditions are a radical departure from the 1982 act and will not allow licensing authorities to take local circumstances into account. A number of licensing authorities have also suggested that there should be a transitional period to allow them to draft, consider and publish standard conditions. What were the reasons for creating such mandatory conditions? Will you accept the proposal that a transitional period be introduced?

Kenny MacAskill: Several issues are involved. Obviously, the power to set mandatory conditions allows for the implementation of some of the task group’s recommendations, for example on the carrying of licences, in a more flexible way. We accept that the setting of mandatory conditions has the potential to limit local flexibility. Whenever they exercise the power, ministers will need to be aware of that. We are seeking an appropriate balance between matters that require to be dealt with uniformly and those that require to be dealt with on a much more localised basis. We recognise the need for a transitional period in which local authorities can set standard conditions. We will consider that carefully as part of implementation.

Stewart Maxwell: Do the mandatory standard conditions not remove local flexibility to such an extent that local differences in circumstances will be ignored?

Kenny MacAskill: No. It is a matter of getting a balance. Clearly, there are instances when it is appropriate for matters to be dealt with uniformly across the country. Equally, there are instances when an element of more localised treatment is required.

As I said, we need to recognise that there will be instances when ministers of whatever political hue will seek to do things a bit more rigidly. Equally, there will be instances when it will be appropriate for them not to do things in that way. My take on the issue is that mandatory conditions will have to be used sparingly.

Stewart Maxwell: I will push you on that. Will you give specific examples of conditions that will be national and mandatory and conditions that will be localised and flexible?
Kenny MacAskill: I will leave the specifics to George Burgess.

George Burgess (Scottish Government Criminal Justice Directorate): It might be helpful if I explain the genesis of the mandatory conditions power. In response to your previous question, the cabinet secretary said that one recommendation was to make it mandatory that the licence holder should carry the licence, or a copy or plate of the licence. We felt that the easiest way in which to achieve that would be to create a power to set mandatory conditions. Given that the 1982 Act covers a variety of licences, we felt that it would be better to create a power than to write directly into the 1982 Act a different type of condition for each type of licence. That was our starting point for creating the mandatory conditions power. We do not have a long list up our sleeve of other mandatory conditions that we are looking to insert by way of the power.

The origin of the standard conditions recommendation in the task group’s report was a concern that licences can be granted by default. At present, if the licensing authority does not consider the application within a sufficient timeframe, the licence is granted unconditionally. Standard conditions are created as a set of conditions that apply automatically to any licence that is granted by default. For most types of licence, most local authorities have a set of standard conditions. As the cabinet secretary said, before the provision is brought into force, plenty of time will be allowed for local authorities to determine and fix their standard conditions.

Stewart Maxwell: That is helpful.

The Convener: As there are no further questions on the task group report or mandatory and standard conditions, we move on to questions on the licensing of taxis and private hires.

Nigel Don (North East Scotland) (SNP): Good afternoon. My question is on section 124, which lays down that licensing authorities will have to set taxi fares every 18 months and review charges following consultation with the appropriate people. I have no problem with the drafting, but how will that work in practice? Will we see a rolling review with fares set every 18 months or will there be consultation periods of a few weeks or months every 18 months?

Kenny MacAskill: My understanding is that 18 months will be the maximum period for carrying out such a consultation. The approach takes forward a task group recommendation and it is important to remember that it clarifies an interpretation of the current conditions as contained in the 1982 Act.

Our understanding is that most authorities have been working on the basis that the review process should be completed within 18 months. We are not aware that compliance has caused undue difficulty. The 18-month period is not meant to be viewed as a rolling review period—unless an authority wants to do that. If an authority decides to review fares, the consultation period should be no more than 18 months, and the authority should seek to complete the consultation in less time than that.

Nigel Don: Are there sanctions on a licensing authority that fails to set its charges in the right period?

Kenny MacAskill: None is specified. I am not aware of sanctions being required or of any breaches. I know from my experience with the City of Edinburgh Council that the taxi trade is not shy in coming forward if it thinks that there are matters that are prejudicial to its financial wellbeing. To some extent, there is an in-built mechanism for local authority accountability, given that councillors are lobbied by the trade.

If people think that a fail-safe mechanism is necessary, I am more than happy to consider the issue. However, neither the trade nor councils think that it is necessary, and it appears that everything is dealt with within 18 months.

Nigel Don: It appears to be a classic case of, “It ain’t broke, so don’t fix it.”

The Convener: If there are no more questions on the issue, we move on to consider the provisions on miscellaneous licences.

Bill Butler (Glasgow Anniesland) (Lab): Section 125 will remove the exemption for non-commercial organisations from the requirement for a market operator’s licence, and section 126 will remove the exemption from the requirement for a public entertainment licence for free events. Witnesses have suggested that the approach will increase costs for charity, community and other such groups and might discourage such groups from holding events. How do you respond to such concerns?

Kenny MacAskill: The removal of the exemptions will not prevent local authorities from creating their own exemptions for some or indeed all of the organisations that currently benefit from exemptions. Paragraph 563 of the explanatory notes says that although the change "will bring charitable organisations etc within the scope of the licensing provisions, licensing authorities have discretion as to whether to charge reduced or no fees to such organisations."

Many local authorities set different charges for different bodies or types of events. The changes will give greater local flexibility and will help to prevent some of the abuses that the task group noted in its report.

Bill Butler: Is it realistic to presume that local authorities will use their discretion and not charge such organisations, given the current economic climate? If local authorities are allowed to charge, they will surely do so.

Kenny MacAskill: It is for local authorities to decide on such matters and to be held accountable to their electorate for their decisions. We must allow local authorities to make a decision. Some licensing authorities might decide that a charge is appropriate; they will have to answer for that to the council and to the electorate. Some might decide on a reduced charge, depending on the event for which the licence is sought—a car boot sale or whatever. The approach recognises that Scotland is a varied country. In a recession, we want to ensure that the voluntary sector is catered for, but the best people to make that judgment are the members of the local authority, who will take account of the needs of charities and the wants of the community.

Bill Butler: Will the approach not lead to an absurd situation, whereby a branch of an organisation in one local authority area will be charged and a branch of the same organisation in another area will be exempt? Is that not unfair?

Kenny MacAskill: That is democracy.

Bill Butler: Equating democracy with absurdity and unfairness—if that is what you are doing—is not the way to go. Surely the approach will be a hostage to fortune. We should not be withdrawing the exemptions; there is no need to do so.

Kenny MacAskill: Local authorities already decide the charges that they levy. It is about allowing local authorities to use the common sense that they are born with and to represent the area to which they are accountable.

Bill Butler: I could say common sense, that most uncommon sense, but I will refrain from quoting the poet. Does the cabinet secretary not understand that the committee’s information is that the revenue of most village halls is about £3,000 a year or less and that the average fee for such licences is about £200 a year? Will such a fee not be a bit of a burden on those whose local authorities are, according to your definition, less democratic than others?

Kenny MacAskill: I trust these matters to the judgment of the elected local councillors; it is not appropriate that they should be specified from St Andrew’s house or Victoria Quay. There are good reasons why, in Scotland, we allow these matters to be decided by the locally elected representatives, who are closest to the people and are able to meet those concerned and take the nature of the village hall into account; they know the organisations involved and in many cases they know the people involved personally. In some instances, different fees may be charged by different local authorities, but that already happens in relation to a variety of matters.

Bill Butler: Should we encourage it in relation to this matter?

Kenny MacAskill: It is for local councillors to use the common sense that they are born with to recognise that many parts of the voluntary sector do an excellent job with a limited budget. They know the organisations and their communities, and I want to give them the flexibility to do what they think is appropriate. They will ultimately be held to account—as you and I are—by the electorate.

Bill Butler: Once every four years, which means that, for four years, events may not be held that have been held for 50 years.

Kenny MacAskill: As we heard, the same issues arise in relation to taxi fares. There is a constituency of interest that will not be shy in coming forward. We should trust the ability of councillors, of whatever political colour, to make an appropriate decision to represent what is needed in their communities.

Bill Butler: I do not agree with you, cabinet secretary, but I hear what you are saying.

Robert Brown: I will pursue that issue with the cabinet secretary, if I may. The bill is designed to remove a current exemption; in other words, there will no longer be a general exemption. Would it not be preferable to do this the other way round and give councils the power to charge without automatically removing the exemption? I can understand that large events of one sort or another might need to be covered by the provisions, but in relation to the typical women’s guild event, summer gala or a similar event at a modest level, it strikes one that a sledgehammer is being used to crack a nut. What are your thoughts on fiddling about with the formulation of the provision?

Kenny MacAskill: Would George Burgess like to comment?

George Burgess: Yes. The answer to that question lies in the transitional provisions. Perhaps it will be helpful if I set out our intention in that regard. When these provisions and the ones on scrap metal dealer licensing and so on come into force, the default position will be whatever the local authority has already decided is the scope of the licensing scheme in its area. Of course, most of those are optional licensing schemes that the local authority elects to apply or not and whose precise scope it determines. On day one, the licensing scheme will apply to precisely what it applied to before the provisions came into force. It would take an active decision by the local authority to decide to apply the provisions to those organisations or events that are currently covered by the exemption. There will not be an automatic application of the provisions to those organisations or events. That is not in the bill; it will be covered in the transitional and commencement provisions, but that is the effect that we are looking to achieve. There will not, on day one, be any requirement to license voluntary organisations or the like. It will be down to the local authority to take that step, which they currently cannot take, if they see a need to apply the provisions to that class of body.

Robert Brown: That may help, but I will pursue another issue, which is discretion—Bill Butler may have touched on the issue. We have been asked whether local authorities have discretion not only to bring the scheme in or not to bring it in, but to bring it in for certain types of organisations and to exempt certain others—to charge some people and not others. Will the local authority have full discretion on all these matters and not just on whether to have a scheme?

George Burgess: Yes.

Robert Brown: Can you point us to a provision in the bill that identifies that?

George Burgess: I think that it is in section 9 of the 1982 act rather than in the bill. I think that it is section 9 and that another section is linked to that. However, we are satisfied that local authorities have discretion in licensing and in relation to fees. If you look at the fees that are currently set by local authorities for different licensing systems, you will see that that discretion already exists and is used.

Even going back to some of the earlier questions, I think that there is provision in paragraph 15 of schedule 1 to the 1982 act on how local authorities are to set the fees. Essentially, it is looking for a cost-recovery regime, so licensing is not intended as a cash cow for local authorities. As the cabinet secretary has said, there would be quite a bit of fuss if local authorities attempted to use the licensing scheme in that way.

Robert Brown: It is fair to say that there is some concern among the committee about the direction of travel of these provisions. I appreciate that you have identified the linkage between the 1982 act and the current bill, but it might be helpful if the Scottish Government could give us an explanatory note that goes into the matter in a bit more detail. I know that you have dealt with some of it in the evidence today, but I would personally like to look at it a bit more closely and ensure that it does exactly what you say on the tin that it does and that we have chapter and verse on it. That would be helpful to the committee.

The Convener: It would indeed. As I recollect from local government days, the section 9 resolution under the 1982 act worked reasonably satisfactorily. However, you will already have got the impression from the committee that there is some anxiety over this section of the bill, cabinet secretary, so we would appreciate clarification on it.

Cathie Craigie (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth) (Lab): Cabinet secretary, you will not be surprised that committee members used the explanatory notes and the policy memorandum to guide us in getting into the policy intention of particular parts of the bill. Part 8 covers sections 121 to 128. The policy memorandum covers all those sections except for section 125, so it is silent on the Government’s policy intention on that issue. Do you believe that charitable organisations should be brought within the bill’s scope?

Kenny MacAskill: I believe that local authorities should be given the discretion to act according to how they see matters in their area. As I said to Bill Butler, it is clearly appropriate to look after the interests of the voluntary sector, especially in a time of recession. Equally, we all know that there are areas in each constituency where voluntary organisations can sometimes be viewed as impeding legitimate trade. It may be felt that that is inappropriate and that there should perhaps be the same level of licensing. I therefore think that it is best left to those who are accountable and responsible to deal appropriately with the needs and wants in their areas. The Government and I remain fully committed to the excellent work that the voluntary sector does. However, as I said, each specific matter is best dealt with by the local authority that knows the area.

Cathie Craigie: A very important point about accountability and responsibility follows on from that. If the bill were to go through, all 128 members of the Scottish Parliament with voting powers would be accountable and responsible for the decision that they took to pass it. I repeat the question: do you believe that charitable organisations should be brought within the bill’s scope?

Kenny MacAskill: As I said, I believe that local authorities should be given the powers to use their discretion and act accordingly. Indeed, local authority members should be able to use the common sense that they were born with in order to look after the interests of their communities and of charities that act appropriately. If there are instances when charities go head to head with legitimate businesses that have been in place for some time, local authorities should be able to use the flexibility to act as they see appropriate.

Cathie Craigie: What consultation has been done on the matter? What evidence led the Government to include such organisations in the remit of licensing boards? Where are the examples that suggest that the new provisions would be advantageous?

Kenny MacAskill: Our approach comes from the task group’s recommendations. Anybody who represents an urban area will be aware of some relevant examples. I am a great supporter of charity shops, which do an excellent job for the organisations that they represent. However, in some areas, traders point out that although they have to pay full rates and do various other things, charitable organisations are going head to head with them. We recognise that we have to look after the interests of charities. They do an excellent job, using volunteers in the main, on a shoestring.

There are also instances when we must provide some balance. The best people to decide on such matters are those in local authorities. They know the area, and they are charged with the responsibility of listening to all parties—business and the voluntary sector.

Cathie Craigie: I remind the minister that—as far as I understand it—we are dealing with market operators here, not traders on main streets.

Kenny MacAskill: A considerable number of markets operate on a commercial basis. The point is to allow people in local authorities to use the common sense that they were born with to judge what is clearly a commercial operation and what is a charitable operation.

Cathie Craigie: I am sure that the committee will pursue the matter.

The Convener: We will revert to the issue, yes.

Stewart Maxwell: I seek further clarification on the points that Cathie Craigie has raised. Is it reasonable to suggest that the decision that a local authority might take would be based not necessarily on the type of organisation, but on the type of event or activity that the organisation is involved in? It is the activity or event that is important, rather than the nature of the organisation.

Kenny MacAskill: Absolutely. The situation must be considered in the round. A variety of factors are involved. You are right to say that it is the event that is relevant. Is it wanted, is it suitable and is the activity already being provided? There is also the question of who is doing it and why.

The Convener: There are no further questions on section 125.

I refer you to the renewal of licences and to section 128, which allows licensing authorities to consider licence renewal applications that are received up to 28 days after the expiry date of the previous licence as renewal applications, rather than as applications for a new licence. We have heard concern that that approach could cause difficulty if an offence was committed during the 28-day period. Would it be possible to give us your justification for that provision? Has any consideration been given to that issue?

Kenny MacAskill: If the licensing authority allows a late renewal application, trading will be legal, in the same way that it will be when the renewal application is made on time. If there has been no renewal application, or if the licensing authority does not recognise good cause for a late application, offences concerning trading without a licence will apply as normal.

The Convener: Therefore, there should be no particular difficulty in that regard. We need to consider the miscellaneous licences for market traders and the problems of reset, with which you will be familiar.

Kenny MacAskill: Yes.

The Convener: It is a common difficulty that arises under that occupation. If somebody is convicted of reset during the 28-day period, there should not be a difficulty regarding the forfeiture of a licence.

Kenny MacAskill: Not that I am aware of. Section 128 allows the licensing authority to recognise honest mistakes and to allow a licence holder to continue to trade, even if the renewal application is made late. It is not meant to deal with people who commit criminal offences.

The Convener: Let us turn now to alcohol licensing, starting with the modification of layout plans.

Cathie Craigie: Section 131 enables licensing boards to modify layout plans that have been submitted to them in relation to a premises licence application. We have heard from respondents who are concerned that a licensing board could require a costly or time-consuming layout or design change—perhaps a change that required planning permission. What are your views on those concerns?

Kenny MacAskill: The provision was included following a request from licensing boards, which saw it as being helpful, rather than something that would stifle businesses—it should enable applications to be progressed, rather than rejected. It came from people who sought to smooth matters, or perhaps just to iron out glitches. All such decisions rely on licensing boards using a degree of common sense in relation to the changes that they ask for. If a change is large or radical, the question is whether... the premises were suitable in the first place. It is important to remember that the applicant must agree to the changes—they cannot be agreed without the applicant commenting.

In a nutshell, the provision came from licensing boards, which were trying to be helpful by suggesting that—if the applicant changed this or did that, they would be happy to grant the application. If the applicant said no, the application would have to go away for consideration, but if they said yes, it could proceed.

If there is nervousness about that in the trade, I am more than happy to discuss the issue with it—I will be having meetings with the Scottish Licensed Trade Association again shortly. I take from the provision that licensing boards are seeking to act in a helpful manner in situations in which board members have some concerns. If boards can agree the modification with the applicant, rather than remit the application or bring it to a hearing, the issue can be sorted there and then. However, if there are concerns about the provision, I am happy to discuss them.

Cathie Craigie: I am grateful for that answer. There were also concerns about the short timeframe for agreeing modifications and consulting the relevant authorities so that they could look at the application more fully. Given that you are to meet the SLTA shortly, I assume that you will discuss these issues with it and that you will share information about that discussion with the committee.

Kenny MacAskill: Absolutely. I will meet the SLTA shortly. I was at a reception last night at which I met hoteliers and restaurateurs associations from Edinburgh and Glasgow. I am conscious that a variety of bodies out there represent the trade. It is not simply the SLTA; there are others. We are happy to listen, meet and engage. We recognise that there are unintended consequences—they might be covered in further questions about the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005. We are here to try to make things work better, so that licensing boards can act accordingly and we can make our communities better.

The Convener: We now turn to antisocial behaviour reports.

Paul Martin (Glasgow Springburn) (Lab): Cabinet secretary, what difficulties do you have with the current arrangements, which were introduced by the previous Executive and agreed by the former Local Government and Transport Committee and which require an antisocial behaviour report for all applications for a premises licence?

Kenny MacAskill: We took the view that was put forward by the police, who saw a great deal of trouble and inconvenience with information of little relevance being provided. We have sought to strike the appropriate balance between the needs and wants of our communities, the requirements of our police and the amount of information that can be dealt with by the board that is charged with the ultimate responsibility of deciding whether to grant the application.

Paul Martin: Where does the community come in? I lodged the relevant amendment to the Licensing (Scotland) Bill when it was before the former Local Government and Transport Committee, because communities were concerned that when an application was being renewed, information about antisocial behaviour relating to the premises was not being properly reported to the licensing committee. Do you accept that the amendment that was agreed to required a more consistent approach to reporting on antisocial behaviour, rather than leaving it at the behest of the chief constable?

Kenny MacAskill: No. I think that we have struck the appropriate balance. We have to take into account the fact that licensing standards officers are up and running. A variety of checks and balances exist. We have to consider the scheme and the operation of the 2005 act in the round. The police have a particular role and duty. There are also the rights of individuals and the rights of the trade. Balance is provided by the licensing board, which is assisted by licensing standards officers.

Paul Martin: Given the licensing sergeant’s workload, would you be confident that if there were, say, 200 calls about antisocial behaviour at an off-licence, the police would always have such information at their disposal? Would it not be better to allow the police to interrogate matters more consistently through, for example, computerised systems, which are easier to use than the systems that were used in the previous regime, and ensure that applications involving premises that are associated with antisocial behaviour are not accepted?

Kenny MacAskill: I do not seek to interfere in police operational matters with regard to licensing or, indeed, the investigation of minor or serious crimes. Whether the police use information technology systems in that respect is a matter for them.

As the representative of a constituency that is close to the Parliament, my experience is that the police very much have their ears to the ground and their eyes on where incidents are taking place. They are not shy in coming forward, and I believe that in looking after people’s interests and dealing with antisocial behaviour the police and, in particular, licensing officers do an excellent job. I am more than happy to put my trust and faith in their ability to carry out the appropriate tasks with which they have been charged.

Paul Martin: Can you give a guarantee today that, if the Government’s proposals are agreed to—

Kenny MacAskill: I cannot give a guarantee on any matter that is—

Paul Martin: Please let me finish the question.

The Convener: Let Mr Martin finish his question, cabinet secretary.

Paul Martin: Will the cabinet secretary guarantee today that applications that are granted will contain no element of antisocial behaviour that has been reported to the licensing committee?

Kenny MacAskill: My answer to that question is the same as that to any question that seeks a guarantee from me on matters that are not under my direction or within my control: I cannot give a guarantee on any matter that is the operational responsibility of the police. However, as the Cabinet Secretary for Justice on the very day that we have announced the rolling-out of an additional 1,044 police officers, I can say that I have the utmost faith in our police. From experience in my constituency and having met licensing police officers in Perth and, indeed, in Mr Martin’s city of Glasgow, I think that they do an excellent job. Sometimes something might fall by the wayside, but they are the first to recognise that they might have erred. As I have said, they do an excellent job and we are very well served by them in licensing matters and in everything else that they do to protect, guard and serve us.

Paul Martin: I wonder whether the additional police officers that have been introduced to deal with the supposed workload will be made available to prevent antisocial behaviour. After all, we must ensure that any application that comes with reports of antisocial behaviour must not be granted. I am also grateful for the confirmation that you cannot give a guarantee that any reports of antisocial behaviour surrounding an application will not go by the wayside.

Kenny MacAskill: I am delighted to assure you that the 1,000 additional officers that this Government has provided for our communities will indeed be out there in those communities. When we agreed to fund that proposal, the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland assured us that those officers would not be behind desks but would be visible in our communities. It was a pleasure to accompany two police officers from Baird Street—which I believe is in your constituency, Mr Martin, although I might be wrong—as they went out and about doing an excellent job. I give you an absolute assurance that those officers will be out in our communities. I do not direct them operationally; as you well know, any such move would be constitutionally inappropriate. Indeed, it would be as inappropriate for me to do that as it would have been for my predecessors, whatever their political hue.

The Convener: Now that the cabinet secretary has satisfied the committee about his knowledge of the geography of Glasgow, we will move on to the issue of occasional licences.

Bill Butler: Perhaps we can turn back to the bill.

As you know, cabinet secretary, section 134 enables applications for occasional licences to be fast-tracked where appropriate, with the time allowed for comments from chief constables and licensing standards officers reduced from 21 days to “not less than 24 hours”.

To be fair, I point out that some respondents have welcomed that provision; however, others are concerned that the new procedure could be open to abuse by applicants. What is the Government’s view on such concerns?

Kenny MacAskill: We are happy to look at concerns if they are raised, and it is clear that some people have raised concerns with you. However, I believe that we have the appropriate balance. There are good reasons why licences should be fast-tracked for a variety of local events that provide benefit. Again, it comes back to licensing boards knowing their communities and the individuals concerned. The 2005 act does not delegate to officers the granting of occasional licences, responsibility for which remains with the board members or the clerk. Occasional licences can be granted for events of significant size and also for those of a less significant size.

If there are significant concerns, either from the committee or indeed from the trade, we are happy to look at them, but my experience leads me to think that matters can be dealt with by checking with the convener of the board. We need some flexibility to let local events take place if they serve and benefit the community.

Bill Butler: I agree that we must exercise common sense, but concern has been expressed that the proposed amendment to the 2005 act to which I referred—for the consultation period to be reduced to “not less than 24 hours”—appears not to take into account the requirement for every application to be advertised for a period of seven days. Surely the proposal raises false expectations.
Kenny MacAskill: I ask Tony Rednall to comment on that.

Tony Rednall (Scottish Government Criminal Justice Directorate): The seven-day period is held in regulations, which we will look to change if the provisions are passed.

Bill Butler: I see. Well, that makes that clear.

I have one more question. The committee heard evidence that questioned why the power cannot be delegated to members of staff who are employed to assist the licensing board and the clerk, and it was also suggested that the provisions should be replicated for applications for extended hours under the 2005 act. What is the Government’s view on those suggestions?

Kenny MacAskill: We are happy to look at them. Our initial view is that the board is ultimately accountable and there has to be some signing off by those who are ultimately to be held responsible, just as we sign things off as a Parliament. If there is a need for more flexibility, we are more than happy to look at that. If the board conveners and those who seek the power to act on authority are happy, we have no fixed views. It is a matter of ensuring that we get the right balance of ultimate accountability and responsibility. If a licence is granted at 24 hours’ notice and there is trouble, for example, the local community will want to know why.

We are genuinely open to discussing the matter. If that is what boards want, we will be prepared to consider it, but I would want to take the temperature of the boards.

Bill Butler: If I may say so, that guarantee is most welcome. I am glad that that is on the record. Thank you.

The Convener: We move on to questions on the appeal procedure from Robert Brown.

Robert Brown: The cabinet secretary will be aware of the evidence that we received about the appeal procedure. I think it is fair to say, if I have not misread it all, that there is a fairly uniform view from those who have to operate the system that the stated case appeal procedure under the 2005 act does not work well. There seems to be strong support for going back to a reapplication system, which would be rather more informal and perhaps more effective in achieving what is wanted. Have you had cause to think about that? Can you give us any guarantee or undertaking on that aspect?

Kenny MacAskill: Yes. You are quite right. We now recognise the concerns that have been raised that the stated case procedure that is detailed in the 2005 act seems not to work as well as the previous summary application procedures. I did not use those in relation to liquor licensing because I was not involved in that area, but they were used in a variety of other areas. We will seek to lodge amendments at stage 2.

Robert Brown: I am grateful for that.

I take the opportunity of our discussion to return to personal licences, which do not strictly come under the bill, but about which we had an exchange before the recess. The matter has been the subject of quite a lot of publicity in the press recently. I do not want to look at the matter too widely, but given the furore about the new date, the lack of granting of applications—Cathie Craigie might know more about this, but apparently no personal licences have been granted in North Lanarkshire—and some of the issues of interpretation, can we have an update on the matter?

Tony Rednall: In relation to personal licences, regulations were put to the Parliament to enable people to nominate, during the past month, a deemed premises manager who had completed their personal licence qualification but had not yet been granted their personal licence. As far as we are aware, in the past couple of weeks, licensing boards have been telephoning licensed premises that do not have a deemed premises manager to ensure that one is put in place. We believe that only a minority of premises do not have one in place.

In the majority of licensing board areas, enforcement officers and the police have agreed that they will take a pragmatic approach in going around premises. Officers will contact the licensing board to ensure that an application has been made and then allow the premises to continue trading. Recently, a lot of attention has been given to the issue of whether premises have a premises licence when trading is carried out. We believe that quite a few licensing boards got most of their premises licences out. However, a few are behind, one of which is North Lanarkshire licensing board. It is an offence for premises to trade in those circumstances, but they have a good defence in that the licensing board has not issued the licence. We would not expect licensing standards officers to go looking for a licence if their council is behind.

Robert Brown: The committee has previously alerted the Government to the point that it is not satisfactory for legislation to have all sorts of good intentions while, in effect, the discretion of the enforcement authorities allows an illegal situation to continue. Have you had further discussions with councils or the trade—or perhaps both—with a view to regularising the situation? Is there a time limit within which the process will be finished and the issue sorted out? Will you need to lay further subordinate legislation before the Parliament? The situation is a bit of a mess, although I hasten to say that that is not necessarily the Government’s fault. However, there is a practical problem to be dealt with.

Tony Rednall: Licensing boards are working extremely hard to rectify the situation in which they find themselves by getting out licences and ensuring that people have the correct paperwork. The problems have frequently been a result of a mess being made of applications. Licensing boards are working hard to ensure that provisions are in place so that premises can open. The boards are trying to ensure that those provisions are legal, by using occasional licences, for example. Many boards will hold hearings on 15 September to try to catch up and deal with premises in relation to which a mess was made in the application process, to ensure that those premises are not closed for a significant amount of time. The boards are taking action to rectify the situation as quickly as possible.

The Convener: I refer members to the correspondence that we had with the cabinet secretary when the matter was raised with the committee previously. The Government has done everything that could reasonably be expected of it. There is definitely evidence that local authorities—or licensing authorities, if I am to be strictly accurate—are now dealing with the matter. The situation is unsatisfactory but I hope that it will be remedied fairly quickly.

We will now leave the licensing provisions of the bill and return to the criminal justice aspects, to sweep up some of the questions that we did not have the opportunity to ask the cabinet secretary on 23 June. I will suspend the meeting briefly to allow the officials to change over.

Meeting suspended.

16:54

On resuming—

The Convener: I thank the officials who are leaving. The cabinet secretary has been joined by Rachael Weir from the Scottish Government's criminal procedures division and Denise McKay from its legal directorate. As ever, Mr Burgess is with us.

We will deal first with disclosure, on which I ask Robert Brown to lead the questioning.

Robert Brown: Mr Burgess obviously is omniscient on such matters.

As the cabinet secretary knows, there has been a lot of evidence from knowledgeable sources about the complexity and length of the arrangements that the bill proposes on disclosure. It has been suggested that there is a need for a simple statement of the Crown duty of disclosure at the beginning of part 6 and that a good bit of the detail could be removed to, for example, the proposed code of practice. That seems a reasonable suggestion. Is the cabinet secretary sympathetic to it?

Kenny MacAskill: It is a question of theory and practice. In theory, disclosure is relatively simple, but in practice it can involve a great deal of complexity. It is clear that we do not want to make matters as opaque as possible. As the Solicitor General said in his evidence to the committee on 9 June, a significant amount of advice requires to be given to prosecutors. We have tried to strike the appropriate balance and to ensure that the bill contains what is necessary. Unfortunately, it is not possible to reduce the relevant provisions to a one-liner. We must have some flexibility in regard to how the law develops. We have done our best to restrict the bill's provisions on disclosure, but although it would appear to be a straightforward concept, in practice, as the Solicitor General said, a great deal of guidance has to be issued. That is why we have had to be broad.

Robert Brown: Surely that is the point. Flexibility does not readily come from the inclusion of provisions in statute; it more readily comes from codes of practice and guidance. The information that we have received has come not from amateurs but from people with a close knowledge of the system. They have expressed significant concerns about how the bill deals with disclosure. Given the evidence that the committee has received, is it not worth having another look at the disclosure provisions?

Kenny MacAskill: Absolutely. We are happy to reconsider whether elements of the provisions could appropriately be dealt with in rules of court or a code of practice, but I must sound a note of caution. The duty of disclosure is a critical duty, and if too many provisions were removed, Parliament would be deprived of its important scrutiny role. We are more than happy to consider whether rules of court or a code of practice could be used, but we think that the bill should provide sufficient specification on what is an important issue.

Robert Brown: I will move on to defence statements, which have been the subject of quite a degree of controversy and comparison with the English system.

It has been suggested that the provisions on defence statements will not work and that the use of defence statements does not readily fit with the Scottish system, which already provides for the use of alibis and special defences. In the light of the evidence that the committee has received, has a sufficient case been made for requiring defence statements in solemn cases? Could we have a halfway house, whereby defence statements were voluntary? Will the issue be looked at again? It has been indicated that there would be problems with the proposal working in practice and that it would not necessarily achieve what the Government wants it to achieve because of the attitude of judges and the legal profession to the rights of the defence in Scots law.

Kenny MacAskill: As you said, defence statements will be mandatory only in solemn cases. When they gave evidence, the Lord Advocate and the Solicitor General gave examples that demonstrated the scale of the task that prosecutors face. We are conscious that it has been suggested that the existing special defences are enough. We disagree and are persuaded by the Crown that a restricted range of potential defences are covered and that being limited to intimating those defences in the context of disclosure would risk essential information not being disclosed that might very well have been disclosed if the prosecutor had appreciated its significance. I do not know whether Denise McKay wants to add anything to that.

As I said, the Lord Advocate and the Solicitor General gave the committee clear examples of instances that would not be covered simply by the defence of alibi, impeachment or whatever else. There are instances in which the Crown’s obligation cannot really be triggered unless it is given some idea of what the likely defence will be.

The Convener: Does Denise McKay have anything further to add?

Denise McKay (Scottish Government Legal Directorate): No, I have nothing further to add to what the cabinet secretary has said.

Robert Brown: I suggest to the cabinet secretary that a chicken-and-egg question is involved. In the Government’s mind, what is the purpose of defence statements? Are defence statements intended to enable the Crown more adequately to fulfil its disclosure duty, or are they intended to enable the Crown to have more detailed knowledge of the nature of defences going forward? As the cabinet secretary will be aware, the latter would raise other sorts of issues.

Kenny MacAskill: Clearly, they are about the Crown fulfilling its duty. To do that, the Crown needs to know what the defence is looking for in the myriad of evidence that might be available. As the member well knows, in significant solemn matters the evidence can go from the almost sublime to the ridiculous, including who was where and who put up the ticker tape. In some instances, such details can be of significant importance if it suddenly comes to light that the evidence includes people who say that the person did not come in this or that direction.

Defence statements are about ensuring that the Crown can fulfil its duty. In order that the Crown can do that, it must know what the defence is looking for. Defence statements are not about asking people to incriminate themselves—that would be precluded under the European convention on human rights. They will simply allow the Crown, when reviewing what needs to be disclosed to the defence, to have some idea of what is totally extraneous and will not be part of the defence argument. That will mean that the Crown can dispense with details about ticker tape and who drove the vehicle that carried such-and-such. However, there may be instances in which such information is relevant, so the Crown needs to know what is relevant. Defence statements are about the Crown being able to fulfil its statutory duty.

Robert Brown: Does that not make the point that voluntary defence statements, which would in principle be triggered by the defence, would be a more satisfactory and less bureaucratic way of dealing with the matter, given the fears that have been expressed both about what is said to have happened in England and about how the proposed requirement would fit into the Scottish system?

Kenny MacAskill: I recognise that problems have arisen in England and Wales, where a different system operates. The Crown Office has provided further written evidence on the changes that took place in England and Wales. Given the significance and importance of such matters, it appears to us that there should be a statutory disclosure duty on the Crown. If the Crown is to fulfil that statutory duty, the statements that it receives from the defence must provide the appropriate information that will allow the Crown to do so, therefore it is appropriate that defence statements should be mandatory. That view is also taken by the Crown.

Nigel Don: My question is on non-disclosure and special counsel, which are provided for under sections 102 to about 116. Some submissions have raised concerns about the compatibility of those provisions with the European convention on human rights. In our collective absence, on 10 June a report was published by a specially convened nine-member Appellate Committee of the United Kingdom House of Lords on the case of the Secretary of State for the Home Department v AF and others—the complete citation includes the information "[2009] UKHL 28"—that considered the issue of secret evidence in terrorism cases. It is not difficult to draw the conclusion that that judgment might be relevant to the issues that we are considering under the bill. Does the cabinet secretary think that non-disclosure will be acceptable in Scottish law? Are those provisions in the bill being looked at?

Kenny MacAskill: We think that sufficient safeguards are already built into the bill, which is why the Presiding Officer has allowed it to be introduced. We are aware of the case south of the border to which the member referred, but it does not apply to the procedures that we operate in Scotland. It is certainly correct to say that the matter could at some stage apply in Scotland, but the procedures here would be different. With the non-disclosure provisions, we have checks and balances through the ability to appoint special counsel. In our view, we would not be in the same position in which the courts in England have found themselves, because we have those checks and balances and the bill comes within the ECHR. Denise McKay can elaborate on the matter in greater detail.

Nigel Don: I would be grateful for that.

Denise McKay: You described the evidence that was dealt with in the case of the secretary of state v AF as secret evidence. In immigration cases, the judge considers the evidence and makes a decision based on it. However, it has never been the intention that under the disclosure scheme that we have brought before the Parliament evidence that the accused has not seen will be put to the judge when reaching his verdict. Any information covered by a non-disclosure order will be put to the side and will not go towards the verdict.

We can distinguish the Scottish scheme from the case of the secretary of state v AF because the Scottish scheme will never rely on evidence that the accused has been unable to see. The Scottish Government’s view is that that would not be compatible with ECHR and would not represent justice for the accused. Such evidence will not be relied on and it will be put to the side. That is a critical element of the disclosure scheme that we have brought to the Parliament, and it is a critical element in ensuring compatibility with ECHR.

Nigel Don: Thank you. That is revelatory to me. That was not my understanding. I want to bounce that back and ensure that I have got it right. Non-disclosed evidence will be brought to court—and, if necessary, discussed with special counsel in order to elucidate the facts—so that it can be put to one side by the judge and not put to the jury. In that way, such evidence will be dealt with in court—albeit in camera—but will be no part of the evidence on which guilt can be found.

Denise McKay: Absolutely—perfectly put. That is exactly how the scheme will work. Special counsel will be the independent voice and the independent advocate. The judge will be the person who makes the decision, so the information will be put to the judge. Special counsel will have an opportunity to make representations, alongside the Crown. Ultimately, the judge will make the decision. There will be judicial independence in all of these matters.

Nigel Don: Thank you—I take compliments where I find them. That is helpful.

The Convener: After that exemplar of clarity, we go to unfitness for trial.

Angela Constance (Livingston) (SNP): Part 7 of the bill, on mental disorder and fitness for trial, has been broadly welcomed, not least because the new statutory defence will replace the common-law defence of insanity and because it will get rid of all the old-fashioned, outdated language. However, the committee has received evidence from organisations, including the Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland, raising concerns that the provisions are inadequate for people who, when they commit an offence, know that their actions are wrong but are nonetheless compelled to commit the offence due to their illness or mental disorder. We have been given two examples. The first is severe cases of depression in which, although the people concerned know that their actions are wrong, they are, because of their view of themselves and the world, unable to resist the impact of their illness. The second example is someone with a psychotic illness who has command hallucinations. For example, they know that it is wrong to harm another person, but because of their delusional beliefs they cannot resist the impact of their illness. What is the Government’s view of that? Will the Government seek to amend the bill to include those individuals who have a diagnosed mental disorder and who know that their actions are wrong but who, due to their illness, cannot resist their urges?

Kenny MacAskill: For many a year there have been deep-running debates about personality disorders, as well as about the issue to which you refer. Unless the committee persuades us otherwise, we will not seek to amend the bill, because we are basically implementing provisions that the Scottish Law Commission considered long and hard. Things have not been done on a whim and a fancy; the Law Commission went away and discussed matters.

The issue is deeply complex. It is about where we strike the balance in respect of those who clearly have a treatable mental health issue and those, such as those to whom you refer, who have a personality disorder and complex issues to deal with. The Law Commission considered the matter in detail, and the new special defence, in proposed section 51A(1) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, provides that

"A person is not criminally responsible for conduct constituting an offence ... if the person was at the time of the conduct unable by reason of mental disorder to appreciate the nature or wrongfulness of the conduct."

I understand the issues to which you refer. The test relies on the accused not being able to understand the wrongfulness of their actions. Therefore, any accused person who suffers from a mental disorder that means that they understand that what they are doing is wrong but is unable to stop their conduct is excluded from the special defence.

As I have said, we are implementing the Scottish Law Commission’s recommendations, because it is difficult to know where the line must be drawn. I am open to listening to representations, as the committee has done, but the Law Commission has already listened to recommendations and representations from the Crown and others and put forward the special defences. We based the provisions on the views of the Law Commission, which carried out intensive research, but I am open to other views.

Angela Constance: In the interests of clarity, I was certainly not making any arguments for people with a sole diagnosis of psychopathy. I know all too well the risks and dangers of getting the wrong men in the wrong system and I understand the caution.

My brain is a little bit rusty because of the recess, but I am sure that the committee heard evidence on the issue not just from organisations with a role in advocating on behalf of people with mental health problems or learning disabilities; I think that people with a legal background also reflected on the issue. I do not want to name those people, because I may be being inaccurate. I will have to go back and read the Lord Advocate’s comments. I think that the Law Commission also gave subsequent oral evidence to the committee, but that will have to be checked for the sake of accuracy. As I say, I have a rusty brain.

There are real issues to do with people who have a bona fide mental disorder or psychotic illness who understand that what they are doing is wrong but who cannot resist their command hallucinations because of the severity of their diagnosed illness. I continue to be concerned about that. However, I am happy to check the evidence and write to the cabinet secretary if need be.

Kenny MacAskill: We are more than happy to consider any representations from the committee or individual members. We are standing on the views of the Law Commission, but we appreciate the complexities that are involved and we are more than happy to consider information that people provide to assist with the Law Commission’s proposed changes. Criminalising the sick is the last thing that we are seeking to do. If we can avoid any manifest injustices, we will be more than delighted to do so. However, the difficulty lies in ensuring that we draw the line so that certain people to whom you have referred do not escape justice.

The Convener: To be fair to Ms Constance, her memory is not flawed. I recollect such evidence being given. Obviously, the matter could be pursued to advantage.

A letter has been received from the Scottish centre for crime and justice research that relates to section 41, on breach of undertaking. I am not totally satisfied that the objection in it is particularly well founded. Can you assure us that there was adequate consultation on that section? Does it widen the net, as has been claimed, bearing in mind the terms of the 1995 act? I do not think that it will make things particularly different, but I am interested in receiving an explanation from the cabinet secretary or one of his officials.

Kenny MacAskill: I cannot give you a categorical assurance on the matter, but I am more than happy to undertake research and to write to you about it.

George Burgess: Last September, we published a document entitled “Revitalising Justice—Proposals to Modernise And Improve The Criminal Justice System” in which we outlined our intentions. No comments on that matter were received at that stage.

The Convener: That is fine. We may pursue the matter in writing.

Members have no more questions. We will pursue in writing a number of issues that are not as important as those that we have pursued in the meeting.

I thank the cabinet secretary and his officials for their attendance. The committee will now move into private session.

Dear Member

I refer to the oral evidence session on Tuesday 16 June 2009 and to the Law Society of Scotland’s written submission with regard to Parts 8 and 9 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005.

The Law Society’s Licensing Law Sub-Committee would very much like to take this opportunity to highlight a few of the practical issues arising with regard to implementation of the 2005 Act.

Firstly - with regard to Section 34 of the Act (Transfer or Application of Person other than Licence Holder). It should be noted that it is considered that the wording in the Action particular, landlords, new buyers or prospective new tenants where the premises licence holder may have absconded, banks or holders of heritable securities are not in a position to apply to the appropriate Licensing Board for the transfer of the licence given the list of prescribed persons as defined in the Licence Transfer (Prescribed Persons) (Scotland) Regulations 2007.

Secondly - A further question has arisen when an administrator is appointed by the Court following upon the insolvency of the premises licence holder.

In terms of the 1976 Act, there was no requirement for the licence to be transferred. The position now is that the administrator would be required to become the premises licence holder in his own right as opposed to as an agent of the insolvent company, (and apply within 28 days of their appointment) and may be reluctant to do so.

This is a matter which requires further clarification.

Thirdly - With regard to the provisions of Section 35, which deals with variation on transfer, the Sub-Committee notes that the transfer will fall if the variation of the licence is not granted. It is also important to have the option to withdraw the variation if the transfer did not proceed.

Fourthly - The Sub-Committee have asked for consideration to be given to the return to a Section 26(2) 1976 Act type consent with regard to new provisional premises licences. The position at present means that applicants would require to obtain all statutory consents and provide fully detailed drawings with a provisional premises licence application. Accordingly application costs may well be prohibitive with no guarantee of the application being granted. There is also the problem that the approved operating plan and layout plan are unlikely to be in a form that will suit a variety of prospective occupiers. The two year period from grant to final completion, apart from relatively small projects, is simply too short.
Lastly - The Sub-Committee would also highlight what may well be major logistical problems in advance of the fast approaching transition day of 1 September 2009. With regard to personal licence holders given that each individual premises will require to have a designated premises manager and such as person must be the holder of a personal licence.

In order to obtain a personal licence, the applicant must hold a relevant training qualification and thereafter apply for the personal licence and have that application processed and granted. It is only then that the personal licence holder can request a Board to note them on the premises licence as the designated premises manager and a personal licence holder can only be a single designated premises manager. Every single premises licence requires a separate designated premises manager. Premises without a designated premises manager by 1 September 2009 cannot sell alcohol and if there is no designated premises manager on the premises licence by 1 December 2009, the premises licence is revoked. Can consideration be given to allowing dispensation for those applications that are in the system by say 31st of July but not processed before 31st August and 1st December respectively?

Whilst the Sub-Committee is at present commenting upon the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill it would consider it appropriate to bring these matters to the attention of the Justice Committee for information.

Alan McCreadie
Deputy Director, Law Reform
16 June 2009
As you may recall I was asked, when giving evidence to the Committee about the principles of the Bill, what changes, if a Scottish Sentencing Council were to be established, I would suggest to its composition or membership. I made certain suggestions for change but stated that I would leave the sheriffs and justices the same. In making that comment I had overlooked that the provision in question speaks of “two persons holding the office of sheriff principal or sheriff”. As the Sheriffs’ Association pointed out in their evidence later that day, that could in theory result in there being two sheriffs principal and no sheriff on the Council.

That would, in my view, be an undesirable result. As the sheriffs are, in virtually all circumstances, the sentencers in the sheriff court, it would be desirable that at least one, if not two, of the members of any Sentencing Council should hold that office.

The Sheriffs’ Association has recently reminded me of my response to the Committee and asked me, if I in fact agreed with the view expressed by it, to advise the Committee accordingly. That I am happy to do.
As you are aware, Chief Constable David Strang, Deputy Chief Constable Gordon Meldrum and I presented oral evidence to the Scottish Parliament Justice Committee on 26 May 2009 on behalf of ACPOS in relation to the proposed Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill.

During the oral session it was agreed that we would collectively provide additional information to the Justice Committee to clarify some specific points, these relating to the following:

1. Clarification of the statement in ACPOS’ written submission in relation to section 18 of the Bill - "the good work achieved to date in relation to the deterrence of knife crime would be lost if knife crime is not separated from this legislation."
2. Section 28 – Failure to report serious organised crime – practical examples of pursuing serious organised crime under section 28, and
3. In conjunction with SCDEA, to suggest amendments to the definition of extreme pornography in section 34,
4. To consider how the law should deal with computer-generated images, cartoons and drawings that graphically depict children in a sexually abusive way. Should legislative provisions be extended to deal with extreme adult pornography of a similar type? (Consideration might be given to the use of the phrase "explicit and realistic" as part of the definition of what constitutes an extreme image), and
5. Section 34 – definition of the word ‘possession’

The ACPOS and SCDEA positions are now provided in respect of the above issues:

Section 18 – Amendments of Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007

ACPOS would confirm that it was never their intention that knife crime be separated from the provisions of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. Their original response was intended to convey the position that considerable work has been undertaken over the previous years, both in relation to policy development and also in terms of communication, to send a clear message to those who carry, possess or use knives that they are likely to face a term of imprisonment.

Changes to legislation, such as the Police, Public Order and Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2006, the Lord Advocate guidelines on knife-crime and general changes to sentencing for knife-crime, collectively demonstrate an attitudinal and societal change to knife crime and provide a clear message that there will be a presumption that those found guilty of carrying a knife would face a term of imprisonment.
The Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill provides that there will be a presumption against sentencing individuals to short term sentences. Section 18 states that “as soon as a short-term custody and community prisoner has served one-half of the prisoner’s short-term custody and community sentence the Scottish Ministers must release the prisoner on short-term community licence”.

The original ACPOS written response was attempting to communicate that the provisions of section 18 of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill may be seen by some as contradicting earlier actions and messages sent out in relation to knife crime.

In their previous written response, ACPOS were merely attempting to highlight that there may be a conflict of messaging arising from the current sentencing position on knife crime and that proposed by the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. ACPOS were suggesting that this may be an issue requiring separate consideration so as not to undermine all the good work that has been done previously around knife crime.

ACPOS were not intending to suggest that knife crime be treated differently from other crimes or be separated from the provisions of the Bill; rather they were trying to highlight through the example of knife crime, that there may possibly be unintended consequences arising due to the generality of the provisions contained within section 18 of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill.

Section 28 – Failure to Report Serious Organised Crime

As indicated by Mr Gordon Meldrum whilst giving his evidence to the Committee, ACPOS and the SCDEA support the proposal outlined in section 28.

Those individuals who are members of a trade business, in employment or a profession - whether it is the banking, financial or legal profession or any other profession for that matter - but who through their involvement with either individuals or groups of individuals obtain a knowledge of the business of serious organised crime or form a suspicion that they may be subject of exploitation by serious organised crime groups and fail to report that knowledge or suspicion should be held to have committed an offence. This can be illustrated through the following examples.

During a recent investigation it became apparent that a number of persons were identified as having knowledge of the business of a serious organised crime group. There was however insufficient evidence to charge them with offences in connection with the primary activity of the group. Had the provisions of section 28 been available then they most certainly would have been charged under those provisions. As it was, whilst a number were charged with other offences, some of those involved could not be charged and therefore evaded prosecution.

In another example, during a particular operation, it became apparent that professionals from both the legal and finance communities had knowingly facilitated the movement and dispersal of funds of a serious organised crime group. Whilst it was possible to report offences under the Proceeds of Crime Act, 2002, again had the provisions of section 28 been available then they would have been reported under those provisions.

We are also aware of examples where members of financial institutions have been in receipt of gifts and hospitality from members of serious organised crime groups in return for arranging lending facilities which provide the group with financial stability whilst at the same time ensuring that the serious organised crime group is protected from any attempts by the financial institution to recover any unpaid debt by providing the financial institution with plausible explanations as to why credit should be extended.

A professional individual not subject to oversight by any professional body provided advice to serious organised crime groups on ‘tax avoidance’ whilst never actually taking any personal possession of criminal property.

Another professional individual, whose business was to incorporate limited companies and establish associated bank accounts on behalf of unidentified overseas individuals, many of whom were identified as having links to serious organised crime groups, utilised members of his family to act as company directors and secretaries who signed powers of attorney to allow the individuals overseas to operate bank accounts.

During one Strathclyde Police serious and organised crime operation, investigations identified that the principal target of the operation was using the services of various professionals. One was known to have been paid sums of cash (aside from his professional fees) to engage in activities to protect those involved in the crime group. Whilst he was not directly involved in the activities of the serious and organised crime group, he is known to have had knowledge that the individuals he was acting for were involved in serious and organised crime. Another provided legitimate professional services to launder money obtained through serious and organised crime. Whilst he was not directly involved in the criminal activities of the serious and organised group, he had knowledge that those he was acting for were involved in such activities. The provisions proposed in section 28 would have been of great assistance during this operation.

During another Strathclyde Police operation into serious and organised crime, the principal target is known to have used the services of many individuals within local authorities, the legal, banking and financial professions to secure land deals in a bid to launder illegally obtained money. Assessments of those who have assisted the target suggest they were aware (i.e. had knowledge) that the target was involved in serious and organised crime, but that they themselves were not directly involved. Again, the provisions proposed in section 28 would have been of great assistance during this operation.

The actions of the individuals referred to clearly demonstrate that they may have knowledge, but that they may not have direct involvement in serious organised crime. We believe the above examples clearly demonstrate the requirement for section 28 for those who have knowledge of the activities of serious organised crime groups but who are not themselves directly involved in such activities.

Section 34 – Extreme Pornography

Definition of ‘extreme pornography’

Section 34 proposes amendments to section 51 of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 to include the creation of the offence of possession of extreme pornographic images. An ‘extreme pornographic image’ is described as an image which is obscene, pornographic and extreme.

As can be seen Section 34 refers to the depiction of certain acts in an explicit and realistic way

A pornographic image is defined as being of such a nature that it must reasonably be assumed to have been made solely or principally for the purpose of sexual arousal.

An extreme image as an image which depicts, in an explicit and realistic way any of the following:-

(a) An act which takes or threatens a person’s life
(b) An act which results, or is likely to result, in a person severe injury
(c) Rape or other non-consensual penetrative sexual activity
(d) Sexual activity involving (directly or indirectly) a human corpse
(e) Any act which involves sexual activity between a person and an animal

ACPOS are fully supportive of the provisions set out within (a) to (e) above. However, with regard to the definition of ‘extreme’, and accepting that it is being used to refer to an image which is defined as pornographic, it may be considered that the list of depictions (a) to (e) above are restrictive and if so it is suggested that the Bill could be amended to replace the provisions currently set out within (a) to (e) to the following:

(1) an illegal act,
(2) an act which appears to be illegal and cannot readily be construed otherwise; or
(3) an act which is/would be an offence in Scotland in respect of which the court, in imposing sentence or otherwise disposing of the case, would be likely to determine that there was a significant sexual aspect to the behaviour.

This would have the effect of including all images of illegal acts committed with a sexual motivation (subject to the exclusions currently outlined within the Bill).

Whilst the words ‘pornographic’ and ‘extreme’ have been further defined within the legislation, the word ‘obscene’ has not.
In regard to that which may be obscene, if it is considered appropriate that obscene is defined as ‘abhorrent to morality or virtue; specifically designed and intended to incite lust or depravity’, it fits with the definition of pornographic and should be outlined within the legislation.

An image which is designed or intended to incite lust or depravity, is of such a nature that it must reasonably be assumed to have been made solely or principally for the purpose of sexual arousal and depicts, in an explicit and realistic way, any of the acts described, can be said to be an extreme pornographic image.

Images which are judged to be pornographic and extreme could be accepted as being obscene if they are offensive, disgusting and offend accepted standards of public decency. If an act containing a significant sexual element is considered to be illegal then depictions of that act which are produced for the purpose of sexual arousal should be encompassed within this legislation.

The use of the phrase ‘in an explicit and realistic way’ is worthy of debate when considering the definition of ‘extreme’ in respect of cartoon images, etc. It may be argued that cartoon (or other) images with gross distortions are not ‘realistic’. However these may well portray extreme pornographic images which are clearly understood.

Potentially this offers a loop-hole in the legislation. It may be more appropriate to address the action rather than the realistic portrayal of the image. For example reference may be made to an image being extreme if it ‘depicts in an explicit manner a representation of an event of a sexual and pornographic nature’.

Dealing With Cartoons and Computer-Generated Images

When considering cartoons etc. of indecent images of children it may be worth remembering that pictures of actual child abuse have a crime attached and a real victim in addition to the possession etc of the image constituting an offence. It could be argued therefore that the possession of a cartoon or other computer generated image etc may be considered to be a lesser offence.

However as the management of offenders becomes ever more important we may be called upon to make assessments on offenders who have cartoons etc. depicting COPINE level 4 and 5 abuse but “real” images of a lesser COPINE level. Does this make them more or less likely to offend against a child?

From experience it is most unusual to find such material without conventional indecent images being present. At present, the images present would be counted and the COPINE levels determined and any other relevant material included in an informative paragraph within the body of the report to the Crown office and Procurator Fiscal’s Service. This serves the requirement to inform the legislative and post conviction management of offenders.
As usual the crux of these deliberations revolve around what we consider to be more important, sufficient resources to detect people with unacceptable material, or managing the risk they pose and/or rescuing children whose abuse has been made internet currency.

There are however, examples of such material which may be considered obscene pornography (within the above definitions) but not extreme. Pornography depicting aliens, monsters, angels, gods, etc are examples of this.

Any meaningful attempt at including such material in legislation should include a phrase such as 'explicit and realistic depiction of a human being' carrying out the extreme pornographic acts as described.

Definition of ‘possession’

This matter was subject of previous discussions between DI McDevitt of the SCDEA E Crime Unit, Mr. Gerry McLaughlin, (Scottish Government, Criminal Law and Licensing Division), Fiona Hooligan and Dawn Sampson (Both Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal’s Service).

The general agreement was that any proposed legislation should reflect the current legislation used for the possession, manufacture and distribution of indecent images of children, namely Section 52 Civic Government (Scotland) Act, which is informed by stated cases. This view was supported by the Crown Office representatives.

If an individual goes onto the internet, whether a website, forum, newsgroup, peer to peer network, etc and downloads an indecent image of a child onto their computer that individual has committed the offence of manufacturing an indecent image of a child, under Section 52 (1) (a).

If that individual then sends that image, by whatever means, to another person or persons, that individual has committed the offence of distribution of the indecent image of a child, under Section 52 (1) (b).

It is accepted that if an individual manufactures and/or distributes such images it can be said that the individual had been in possession of them inasmuch that they (the images) were under their knowledge and control.

Possession is only ever libelled in seclusion when the provenance of images cannot be determined, for example when a suspect is found in possession of compact disks or other media. Manufacture and Distribution are seen as more serious offences and dealt with as such by the Scottish Courts.

The proposed legislation deals only with possession of images and fails to make any mention of manufacture or distribution. This omission is hard to understand.

With the logical progression from criminalising the possession, etc of images of actual child abuse to criminalising the possession, etc of ‘generated’ images, it seems equally logical that where extreme adult pornography is criminalised this should be extended to include ‘generated’ images. In each case the ‘generated’ images may be said to perpetuate demand for such images in all their forms and therefore lead to further abuse and the coercion or forced participation of actual persons in the creation of real images. This is particularly concerning given the increased involvement of Organised Crime Groups in the production of such images and the trafficking of participants.

In terms of a definition for “possession” the standard definition of being under a person’s knowledge and control is accepted.

There are exclusions outlined within the proposed Bill which deal with aspects of obtaining unsolicited images e.g. the receipt of an image within an e-mail with there being no knowledge of the content prior to opening the message and the appropriate action being taken within a reasonable period of time.

During the Committee’s oral session on 26 May specific issues were raised concerning the definition of possession. Having considered these further, ACPOS and the SCDEA are content that existing legislation and case law would provide sufficient definition around the term ‘possession’.

ACPOS hope the above information assists members of the Justice Committee.

Supplementary written submission from Victim Support Scotland

Victim Support Scotland was asked, while giving oral evidence on the 26th of May to the Justice Committee regarding the Criminal Justice and Licensing Bill, to provide additional written evidence regarding disclosure of sexual evidence. We were also asked to provide further support for our statements in relation to community payback orders.

1. Disclosure

1.1 Material information

Section 85 in the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill states that “information” means “material of any kind…given to or obtained by the prosecutor in connection with the case against the accused”. The section declares that this includes convictions, outstanding charges and statements of witnesses. Section 85(2)(c) proclaims that “any previous convictions and outstanding charges relating to witnesses” must be “material to the accused’s case” to be seen as information that must be disclosed. Victim Support Scotland would like to see wider clarification on what should be seen as “material”. The vital part in disclosing information is that it should be relevant to the case at hand. Sections 89(3) to 89(5) states that the prosecutor must disclose information to the accused that “tends to exculpate the accused”; that would “be of material assistance to the proper preparation or presentation of the accused’s defence”; or that “relates to the material line of the accused’s defence”. As such, general information aimed to cast doubt on the credibility or reliability of a witness should not be allowed, unless it is specifically necessary and relevant to the case. This is of vital importance, as extended disclosures may adversely impact on victims’ and witnesses’ willingness to report a crime or step forward as a witness, due to fear that their past may be openly disclosed in court and to their family. It is of fundamental importance to ensure that the procedures for disclosure do not inhibit victim and witness participation in the criminal justice system.

1.2 Sexual history and character evidence

Victim Support Scotland shares Rape Crisis Scotland’s concern that victims in sexual offence trials are continuously being questioned on their sexual history and character, despite legal reforms seeking to restrict the use of such evidence. The questioning greatly invades the privacy and dignity of the victims and in many instances, does not bring any more reliable facts to the trial. Instead, the evidence merely serves to disregard and discredit the information given by the victim. We strongly agree with the aim of the Sexual Offences (procedure and Evidence) (Scotland) Act 2002 (the 2002 Act), which according to its Policy Memorandum was to strengthen existing legal provisions restricting the extent to which evidence can be led regarding the sexual history and character of victims in sexual offence trials. The Policy Memorandum further declares that:

“Such evidence is rarely relevant. Even where it is relevant, its probative value is frequently weak when compared with its prejudicial effect. This may include invasion of the complainer’s privacy and dignity and distortion of the course of the trial by diversion of attention from the issues which require to be determined in arriving at a verdict onto the past behaviour of the complainer.” (para 17)

Following the 2002 Act, the then Scottish Executive commissioned research into the impact of the reform. The researchers concluded that the reforms made by the 2002 Act has led to more, rather than less, use of sexual history and character evidence in court. “The legal reform has not only not had the intended effect but could be said to have moved in the opposite direction”.1 For sexual history and character evidence to be led under the 2002 Act, the party wishing to lead such evidence must apply in writing to the court. Section 274(1) of the 2002 Act sets out the test to be applied by the court in determining whether or not to allow the evidence. This includes a requirement for the court to balance the significance of the evidence sought to be admitted against the risk of prejudice to the administration of justice if the evidence is admitted. “The “belt and braces” and “scatter-gun” strategy adopted by Defence lawyers in the drafting of applications suggests that the objective is to find anything that the court will accept”.2 The research into the impact of the 2002 Act found that it is relatively easy to construct a claim that whatever questioning or evidence the Defence wants to put on the complainer has some relevance. “Moreover, most Judges seem to take the view that if what the Defence seeks can be claimed to have some relevance to fair trial considerations, then those considerations outweigh those in relation to the complainer, and the evidence sought is allowed”.3

In contrast to the view of the courts, the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service claims that the probative value of the (sexual) evidence is to be weighed against its potential prejudicial effect in relation to the privacy of the complainer and the administration of justice. The legislation seeks to ensure that the accused’s right to cross-examine witnesses is weighed against the complainer’s right to privacy, as well as public interest considerations. These public interest considerations include: complainers not being deterred from reporting crimes; juries not being distracted by irrelevant material; and the prevention of acquittals arising not from the evidence but from prejudice.4 Current practices on this matter are however evidencing developments in the opposite direction, with an increase in the use of evidence of a sexual nature.

2 Ibid, p. 134
3 Ibid
Rape Crisis Scotland claims that “one of the reasons that women give us at rape crisis for not reporting their experience to the police is the prospect of giving evidence in court and their past history being under scrutiny”.

Victim Support Scotland believes the frequency with which sexual history and character evidence is used needs to be addressed. Acknowledging that the current Criminal Justice & Licensing Bill does not look at the use of sexual evidence per se, we believe that the issue could be partly addressed through disclosure provisions. Victims’ previous sexual history and character should not automatically be seen as “material”, as it deals with previous events and should generally not be of more importance to determine the matter at hand than for any other crime. Therefore this type of evidence should, similar to other forms of evidence, only be allowed if it is materially relevant to prove whether or not the accused is guilty of the accused offence. The criminal justice system, including the courts, should resist the view that any comment or derogative fact about the victim’s credibility or past experiences is adequate grounds for relevance and necessity in order to fulfil the “fair trial” requirement of article 6 ECHR. This includes the victims’ medical records; unauthorised disclosure of this information is a serious breach of the victims’ privacy under article 8 ECHR, exposes victims to irrelevant and speculative comments regarding highly private matters and can significantly impact the willingness of rape victims to report a crime.

Research regarding the experiences of being a complainer in a sexual offence case found that all interviewed victims, who had given evidence in court, question whether the process had been worthwhile. They said that they would not recommend anybody to pursue a sexual complaint and if they themselves were victimised again, they would try to just “get on with it”. This must be addressed; it must be ensured that the courts are accessible to all victims of crime and that victims’ rights are upheld throughout the entire justice process. Being a victim of a sexual offence is an extremely traumatic experience, and it is a difficult step to report the incident to the police, knowing that there will be intrusive questioning and examinations to come. Having taken the decision to engage in the criminal justice system, it is very important for victims to feel that their story is believed, that their suffering and status as an innocent victim is recognised, and that a proportionate response is given to the violation they have gone through. This is vital to ensure that victims feel confident to report any crimes committed against them, which is fundamental to the functioning of the entire criminal justice system.

1.3 Safeguarding disclosed information

In addition to regulate what information should be disclosed, it is also important to control what happens to information once it has been disclosed.

5 Written evidence given to the Scottish Parliament, Justice Committee by Rape Crisis Scotland regarding Sexual Offences (Scotland) Bill (2008)
Section 97 of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill, declaring means of disclosure, states that “the prosecutor may disclose the information by any means” and “in particular, the prosecutor may disclose the information by enabling the accused to inspect it at a reasonable time and in a reasonable place”. Victim Support Scotland believes that the presumption should be that sensitive information regarding the victim, including initial statements from the victim, medical records, personal background should not be given to the offender to use at his/her disposal. It is particularly important for victims of serious crime that the offender does not have control of the victim’s information, including detailed statements of the offence. In sexual offence cases, the offender has lost the ability to represent him/herself and cross-examine the victim, due to the strain and effect this would have on the victim and to avoid secondary victimisation. We believe the same application of thought can be applied to prohibit offenders having control over medical records and disclosed statements from the victim, including personal details of a sexual nature and exhaustive descriptions of the crime, as this intrudes on the victim’s right to respect and privacy. Many victims feel forced into a passive position throughout the criminal justice process, with no control over what happens during any part of it. They may feel that in general their views and feelings are not taken account of, which may at times be almost as distressing and disempowering as the original crime, resulting in what is often referred to as the "secondary victimisation" of victims. “What can be done…is to minimise that discomfort and distress and ensure that appropriate support is available to victims both within, and from outwith, the system, to help them deal with both the consequences of the crime and any distress caused by the process leading up to the trial, the trial itself, and thereafter”. Part of doing so is to ensure that the victim’s statements, experiences and medical records are treated with respect and dignity, and should therefore not be given to the accused by the defence council to be used at his/her own disposal. We fully agree that the statements should be shown to the accused, who should be given full access and understanding of its content. For instance, the defence should present the information to the accused in the defence council’s office or if the accused is in custody, in an allocated room. However, the information should be given back to the defence council once the accused has gained a full understand of its content, to respect the victim’s right to privacy and to ensure that the documents are not being used inappropriately.

2. Community Payback Orders

As stated in the oral evidence session, we agree with the introduction of payback orders and the overall aims set out in the bill. For many offenders, community-based punishments are proven to be more effective at reducing reoffending compared with short term prison sentences. As such, community sentences can potentially mean fewer victims and victimisation throughout our community. In our view, community payback orders would however only be appropriate for less serious non-violent crimes. In a survey into public

7 Redressing the balance - Cross-Examination in Rape and Sexual Offence Trials, a Pre-Legislative Consultation Document, Scottish Executive (2001) opinions regarding community sentence, it was collectively held that “community service should only be used for minor offences”.\(^9\) Section 1(1) of the Criminal Justice and Licensing Bill declares that the purpose of sentencing includes elements of punishment; deterrence; rehabilitation; public protection and reparation. We expect that any community payback order will take all these factors into account.

Research conducted by SmartJustice and Victim Support gives a unique insight into how victims think the criminal justice system should deal with people who commit non-violent crimes. It shows that around two thirds (62\%) of victims think that sending the offender to prison does not prevent re-offending and 8 out of 10 (80\%) victims think that more constructive activities for young people in the community and better supervision by parents would be effective in stopping re-offending. When asked how non-violent crimes like shoplifting, car theft and vandalism can be reduced, more than half (54\%) were in favour of making offenders work in the community to stop them returning to crime. “It is clear from the survey that most victims don’t believe that prison produces law abiding citizens...What people seem to want is not retribution but effective ways to prevent the next victim”.\(^10\) Head of Research & Development at Victim Support, Peter Dunn, said “Victims are often assumed to be vengeful towards offenders and favour harsh punishments. This is misleading. Most victims, while feeling angry about what has happened to them, want the offender to stop offending both against them and against other people. This research confirms that a lot of victims are interested in the prospect of constructive work being done with offenders to prevent their further offending. It shows that many victims of crime want effective measures to tackle the root causes of offending, which involved more than vengeance and punishment for its own sake”.

Research into public perceptions and attitudes in Scotland on community sentencing shows concerns regarding current changes in prison policies. The introduction of privileges such as television and game boys is seen by the public as rewarding prisoners for their crime and does little to deter people from reoffending. Furthermore, “those who receive a prison sentence for a minor offence may be exposed to hardened criminals, the repercussions of which may be long lasting and ultimately detrimental to the individual and society”.\(^11\) We believe any community based approach to disposals must give relevant, timely and meaningful information for victims throughout the process. One way to ensure that victims are kept fully informed of the outcome of the case and the reasoning behind it is to establish a public domain of sentencing information. This would enable the general public, including victims and their families, to search for cases to assess previous sentences along with the application of thought or reasons behind that particular sentence. Accessing such information would set reasonable expectations for victims, as well as make the entire sentencing process more transparent to the general public. This would also help to make the court process more transparent which would increase confidence in the justice system.

For victims and the communities in which they live, a primary need in the aftermath of crime is safety and sense of security. Seeing the offender with no apparent restriction on their freedom critically undermines any concept of justice being served. Currently there is no real provision of information to educate the public as to the role, remit and effectiveness of community sentences.\(^\text{12}\) In our view, it is very important that the community payback orders are visible and provide a real and tangible benefit and reparation to the community, while fulfilling the purposes of sentencing; i.e. punishment; deterrence; rehabilitation; public protection and reparation.

The fact that the offender is to be convicted of an offence punishable by imprisonment implies that it is to be considered a substantial crime and not a petty incident. From a victim perspective, it is therefore questionable to substitute imprisonment with merely a supervision requirement or drug treatment. Section 14 227A(2) states that a community payback order must impose “one or more of the following requirements:

(a) a supervision requirement,
(b) an unpaid work or other activity requirement,
(c) a programme requirement,
(d) a residence requirement,
(e) a mental health treatment requirement,
(f) a drug treatment requirement,
(g) an alcohol treatment requirement.”

Victim Support Scotland acknowledges that it is very difficult to balance and compare different disposals; no punishment will compensate the intangible costs of being a victim of crime. However, looking at the requirements in section 14, 227A(2), we believe it is not proportionate to replace a custodial sentence with for instance merely unpaid work or a drug treatment requirement. We therefore believe there should be requirement to combine more than one of the mentioned requirements, in particular if one of the requirements is a treatment order. It is absolutely vital that the verdict is proportionate and reflects the severity and the circumstances of the crime. The criminal justice system must demonstrate to the victim that it recognises the victim’s position and the impact of the offence. Community sentences are primarily efficient if punishment is combined with the opportunity for offenders to turn away from crime.\(^\text{13}\)

As stated during the oral evidence session, in addition to the suggested proposals, we would like to introduce the two following requirements:

\(^{12}\) Ibid
\(^{13}\) Community Sentencing – Reducing reoffending, changing lives, Ministry of Justice (2008)
a) an alternative (suspended) sentence should be set out by the court alongside the community payback order, which would announce what sentence would be given if the offender breaches the payback order. This would give more clarity to the victim, offender and the general community about the content of the sentence and what will happen if the order is not fulfilled.

b) a community payback order can only be given if the chosen treatments/activities are available at the time of sentencing. This will ensure that the offender will start the disposal straight away, instead of for instance waiting several months to begin a particular treatment, which gives a signal to the victim that nothing has happened. Confidence in the criminal justice system has been shown to form an important part in the recovery process for many people affected by crime; the belief that justice has been made greatly aids recovery. The effects of unclear and disproportionate sentences undermine this concept and have a damaging effect on both victims and communities. It is therefore of vital importance, both to the victim and for society as a whole, that the community payback order will provide an adequate and proportionate response to the crime and that each disposal will fulfil all the purposes of sentencing as set out in section 1(1) of the Bill.
In view of the fact that the Committee, in today’s meeting, did not have time (in the final evidence session) to ask questions on any issues other than sentencing, I thought it might be helpful to let you have a note on two other issues in respect of which you indicated that the Committee had expressed particular interest.

You mentioned that the Committee “has questioned the scope of the [extreme pornography] provisions contained in the Bill and has also asked whether the definition would or should cover computer generated images”. I am not sure exactly what aspects the Committee had in mind in relation to scope, but I would be happy to provide a response to any issues raised. As for computer generated images, I would comment as follows:

First, are these covered? I think it is clear that s 34 of the Bill does cover computer generated images. The only limiting factor is that an image must be “realistic” to fall within the scope of the provisions. The Bill is not limited to particular types of image. In this respect, it is rather wider than the offence of possessing indecent photographs of children, which is restricted to “photographs or pseudo-photographs”, including photographs comprised in films. A “pseudo-photograph” is “an image, whether produced by computer-graphics or otherwise howsoever, which appears to be a photograph”. (Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 ss52-52A.)

Professor McGlynn and Dr Rackley, in their written evidence (CLJ8, para 3.1) have argued that “[p]aintings/drawings are not covered as they are not realistic”. There is no reason why, as a matter of fact, paintings and drawings cannot be regarded as “realistic”, and it is common to use such language to describe works of art. McGlynn and Rackley’s interpretation might imply that only photographs or pseudo-photographs are covered by s 34, but if that were the case one would expect the draftsman to adopt the language found in ss52-52A of the 1982 Act. The use of the word “image” clearly implies that materials other than photographs and pseudo-photographs are covered by s 34. Leda and the Swan, the painting to which McGlynn and Rackley refer, might be regarded as “unrealistic” purely on the basis of the size of the swan relative to Leda in the image, and not because it is a painting. Even if McGlynn and Rackley are right and I am wrong on this point, the potential “chilling effect” on freedom of expression which can be created by ambiguous statutory language will be obvious.

Secondly, should computer generated images be covered? This is a more difficult question to answer without understanding the rationale for the new offence: as I noted in my written evidence, this is unclear. One possible (partial) justification for the offence is the likelihood of harm having been caused to those persons depicted in extreme pornography. This has little application to depictions other than photographs, although the inclusion of pseudo-photographs might be justified on the basis that it can (I assume) be difficult to establish that an image is a genuine, rather than a pseudo, photograph. The justification for the new offence (whatever that may be) is clearly stronger in respect of photographs than other material. There would be much to be said for limiting the scope of the offence to photographs and pseudo-photographs. This would be consistent with the regime governing indecent photographs of children and would help to dispel concerns about works of art falling within the scope of the offence.

You mentioned also that views on provisions on mental disorder and unfitness for trial might be sought. I note that, when representatives of the Law Society and the Faculty of Advocates gave evidence earlier this morning, there was some discussion as to whether the proposed definition of mental disorder excluding criminal responsibility (under s 117, inserting s 51A into the 1995 Act) was adequate. Reference was made to the written submission of the Law Society of Scotland, which states that (CJ86a, p 13):

“...a person who kills his or her children while suffering from a depressive illness may be able to appreciate what he/she is doing and understand that it is wrong in the eyes of the law, but nonetheless be driven to commit the crime by his or her illness. In such a case his or her illness overcomes his or her volition. The Society notes that the Bill does not allow a special defence in these circumstances.”

I think, with unfeigned respect, that this concern proceeds on a misunderstanding of the Bill’s provisions. The Society may have in mind the much-criticised English legal position. In English law, no defence of insanity is available to a person who knows their actions to be legally wrong, but – due to mental disorder – does not appreciate that they are morally wrong. But that is the English legal position, not the Scottish one. Scots law has previously allowed a defence of insanity in the circumstances envisaged by the Society, where mental illness renders a person incapable of appreciating the moral wrongfulness of their actions (see HM Advocate v Sharp 1927 JC 66, the facts of which are very similar to the Society’s example). The Bill would not change this, and a defence would similarly be available under the new s 51A, which encompasses a failure to appreciate either legal or moral wrongfulness (see para 527 of the Explanatory Notes to the Bill). (The English position has, incidentally, been rejected by other common law jurisdictions.)

The possibility of what is sometimes termed a “volitional insanity” defence was fully reviewed by the Scottish Law Commission in its 2004 Report on Insanity and Diminished Responsibility and rejected for cogent reasons which have not been challenged. The Commission had in mind the fact that those who argued for a volitional test often had in mind cases such as that envisaged by the Society, which are in fact accommodated by the defence proposed by the Commission and included in the Bill.
It should be borne in mind that a person who kills in circumstances where mental illness has substantially diminished their capacity for self-control would be able to plead diminished responsibility under the new s 51B and so be convicted of culpable homicide rather than murder.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Further written submission from the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service

Following the recent appearance of the Lord Advocate before the Justice Committee on 9 June 2009, I now attach a short note (please see the Annexe) setting out the changes in legislation in England & Wales in relation to the use of defence statements, including a requirement on the defence to actually specify within the defence statement what the actual defence is upon which they seek to rely.

The Crown Prosecution Service Policy Division has also confirmed that these legislative changes were accompanied by an increased drive by the Judiciary to ensure that the defence complied with the statutory requirement, following a clear indication both from Parliament, through the legislative changes, and the Lord Chief Justice that disclosure must be a priority for the courts. As a result, where a defence statement has not been lodged, judges are requiring the defence to complete these in court at the pre-trial hearing or alternatively they are being advised that if a defence statement is not lodged then adverse comment can be made to the jury. Together these changes have already seen a significant positive impact and work is currently ongoing to further strengthen the process.

Firstly, the Criminal Procedure Rules are being revised to include a standard form of defence statement to ensure consistency of practice. Should the provisions in relation to defence statements be implemented in Scotland, I understand that a similar approach will be adopted here. Secondly, the rules are due to be revised to include a requirement on the Crown Prosecution Service to advise the court when initial disclosure is carried out. The requirement to submit a defence statement is linked to the timing of initial disclosure, as the statement must be lodged within 14 days of initial disclosure. By advising the court of the date of initial disclosure, this will enable the court progression officer to ensure that the defence comply timeously with the requirement to submit a defence statement and to liaise with them where none has been lodged.

I hope that this information is helpful. Please let me know if there are any other issues on which the Justice Committee would like information.

NOTE – LEGISLATIVE CHANGES IN RELATION TO DEFENCE STATEMENTS IN ENGLAND AND WALES

Criminal Proceedings and Investigations Act 1996

This act introduced the requirement on the defence to lodge a defence statement where the accused is charged with an indictable offence. It further provides for a system of voluntary defence statements for non-indictable offences. Such defence statements would become mandatory if the defence then seek to apply to the court for an order requiring the prosecutor to disclose information that the prosecutor has not deemed to be material.

It should be noted that the 1996 Act, when first implemented, did not include any provisions specifying what information should be contained within the defence statement nor were there any provisions in relation to updating previously lodge defence statements.

Criminal Justice Act 2003

This Act inserted a number of new provisions into the 1996 Act in relation to:

- Content of the defence statement;
- Updated defence statements;
- Notification of defence witnesses;
- Failings in disclosure by the defendant.

These provisions were implemented in April 2005.

Content of the Defence Statement

An additional section into the 1996 Act, prescribing what information should be included within the defence statement, namely:

- The nature of the defence, including any particular defences on which the defendant intends to rely;
- Indicating the matters of fact on which the defendant intends to take issue;
- Setting out, in respect of each of these, why the defendant takes issue with the prosecution;
- Indicating any point of law which s/he wishes to take and any authority upon which s/he seeks to rely.

In addition, the new section sets out details of the information that must be included in the defence statement where the defendant is seeking to rely on a defence of alibi.
Updated Defence Statements

The 2003 Act also introduced a further additional section into the 1996 Act in relation to updated defence statements, specifying that the defence must provide an updated defence statement in advance of the trial, or alternatively a written statement confirming that there has been no change in his/her defence since the lodging of the initial defence statement.

Defence Witnesses & Experts

Although not strictly in relation to defence statements, the 20033 Act inserted 2 further provisions into the Bill relating to advance disclosure of the defence position; namely provisions requiring the defence to intimate details of defence witnesses and details of any experts instructed by the defendant.

Failings in disclosure by the defendant

The 2003 Act also introduced a further new provision on defence statements which enable the judge to warn the defendant that a failure to lodge a defence statement or a failure to include the correct information can result in the possibility of comment being made or inferences drawn. The new provisions also enable a copy of the defence statement to be given to the jury either at the instigation of the judge or on application of either party.

In addition, a new provision was introduced which sets out that the court or the prosecutor can make such comments as appears appropriate if:

- A defence statement is either not lodged at all or is not lodged timeously;
- An updated defence statement is not lodged or is not lodged timeously, where an updated defence statement is required;
- The defence statement contains inconsistent defences or the defendant puts forward a different defence at trial.

Thereafter, the court of the jury can draw such inferences as appear proper in deciding the guilt or innocence of the defendant.

Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008

This Act made a further amendment to the 1996 Act and inserted an additional requirement on the defence in relation to the content of the defence statement, namely that the defendant must set out in the defence statement particulars of the matters of fact on which the defendant intends to rely for the purposes of his/her defence.

As a result of this amendment, there was a consequential amendment allowing comments to be made and inferences to be drawn if the accused then seeks to rely on a matter of fact not specified in his/her defence statement.
These provisions were implemented in November 2008.

Crown Office
June 2009
Supplementary written submission from the Law Society of Scotland

I refer to your email dated 17 June 2009 enclosing a copy of the relevant sections upon which clarification was sought by the Justice Committee.

I would now like to respond as follows.

Section 124 - Licensing of Taxis and Private Hire Cars

As stated in the Society’s written evidence, it was noted that the review at present is in terms of Section 17 of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982, and in terms of Sub-Section (2) thereof, it shall be the duty of the Licensing Authority to fix from time to time scales for the fares and other charges …. and to review the scales at intervals not exceeding 18 months from the date on which the scales came into effect (whether proceeding upon a review under this Section or not)."

Section 124 seeks to amend this provision by inserting a new Section 17(2) into the 1982 Act whereby "the Licensing Authority must fix scales for the fares and other charges mentioned …. within 18 months beginning with the date on which the scales came into effect."

The Society noted that this new provision requires that the process be completed within an 18 month period taking into account the consultation process.

It was noted during the oral evidence session that the review period, although not exceeding 18 months, can vary from licensing authority to licensing authority. Indeed, some licensing authorities carry out a review annually. The Society was simply highlighting the practical issue of having the process completed within 18 months as opposed to the position at present whereby there is no obligation to complete the review but an obligation to review scales at intervals not exceeding 18 months.

Although it is preferable to have the process completed within 18 months, Section 17(2) at present allows licensing authorities some flexibility in the circumstances where a subsequent review is due to take place and the fares have not been fixed with regard to the preceding review.

To this end, the Society was of the view that Section 17(2) of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 does not require to be amended.

Section 125 – Licensing of Market Operators
Section 126 – Licensing of Public Entertainment
In its Memorandum of Evidence, the Society questioned the policy intent of removing the exemption from the Market Operators Licensing Provisions for non-commercial organisations at Section 40(2) of the 1982 Act.

It also questioned the need to license small scale free community based events in terms of Section 126 of the Bill.

It is noted in terms of both the explanatory notes and policy memorandum to the Bill that licensing authorities have discretion as to whether to charge reduced or no fees to charitable organisations etc. in terms of Section 125 and that authorities should have discretion whether to license events such as gala days or school fetes in terms of Section 126. It appears that the Bill does not provide for this discretion. I have considered the terms of Section 9 of the 1982 Act whereby inter alia the licensing of market operators and public entertainment only have effect insofar as the licensing authority has so resolved. The discretion referred to in both the policy memorandum and explanatory notes could only be exercised should a licensing authority not resolve to license these activities or, more likely, to resolve either all such classes of an activity subject to exceptions or any particular such class or classes in terms of Section 9(3)(c)(ii) and (iii). It is also noted in terms of Section 9(5)(b) that a resolution made with regard to places of public entertainment in particular shall specify the place or places, or class or classes thereof, which shall thereby fall to be licensed.

This is the only manner in which licensing authorities could decide not to license functions held by charitable, religious, youth, recreational, community, political or similar organisations in terms of Section 40 as amended by Section 125 of the Bill and decide not to license small scale free community based events in terms of Section 41 as amended by Section 126 of the Bill.

If this is the case, there is the curious situation of invoking Section 9 of the 1982 Act in order to circumvent the Section 125 and 126 Amendments to Sections 40 and 41 of the Act.

The Society would once again question whether any amendments to Sections 40 and 41 are necessary and what the reasons for these proposals actually is.

Section 128 – Applications for Licences

At the oral evidence session held on 16 June 2009, the Society's Licensing Law Sub-Committee Convener, John Loudon, in response to a question posed by Paul Martin MSP stated that a bit of leeway with regard to renewals received outwith the time limit as being fair but that practical issues such as the potential for offences being committed outwith the period would no doubt give cause for concern.

With particular reference to the Society's written evidence, concern was expressed at the new Paragraph 5A being inserted into Schedule 1 of the 1982 Act by Section 128(2)(e). The Society stated that the date of expiry of a licence is crucial both as regards to whether an offence has been committed and also, in taxi licensing terms, having regard to the power given to licensing authorities to limit the number of taxi licences for their area, where one of a limited number of taxi licences is now available. The Society further highlighted that there is no test for "on good cause being shown" nor does there require to be a hearing of such good cause.

In all the circumstances, the Society would consider it more appropriate to limit the period to e.g. seven days in order to diminish the likelihood of these issues occurring while still allowing a reasonable amount of leeway although the Society remains of the view that this particular provision does not require to be amended.

Alternatively, should the 28-day period be retained, the Society would consider it appropriate that the licensing authority convene a hearing in order to determine whether there had been cause shown for such a late renewal.

This wording could simply be attached at the end of Paragraph 5A.

Alan McCreadie
Deputy Director, Law Reform
The provisions contained within the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 make the administrative process in relation to occasional licences an unduly onerous one for both applicants and Licensing Boards.

Due to the requirement to allow 21 days for consultation with the Police and Licensing Standards Officers on each occasional licence application, together with the possibility of having to hold a meeting of the Licensing Board (or alternatively allow the applicant an opportunity to respond to any comments received), applications for events in unlicensed premises require to be lodged not less than 6 weeks prior to the date on which the licence is intended to take effect. In many cases, due to the nature of the event, this may not be possible.

The current provisions also remove a significant degree of discretion on the part of the Licensing Board. For example, the only matters that the Clerk or the Board can take into account in determining an application are comments by the Police, Licensing Standards Officers or an objection or representation. This precludes the Licensing Board from taking account of any issues arising from the local knowledge of the members or from allowing consultation with other council sections such as building control or environmental health, whose comments do not take the form of either an objection or representation.

In my view the answer to this difficulty is to substantially amend the provisions contained within sections 56 to 60 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 so as to essentially revert to the process contained within sections 33 and 34 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976.

If the option of substantially amending sections 56 to 60 of the 2005 Act is not favoured, then I would respectfully suggest that further consideration is given to whether the proposed amendments within the Criminal Justice & Licensing Bill are appropriate. The proposed amendment to allow the consultation period to be reduced down to not less than 24 hours where the application requires to be dealt with “quickly” does not appear to take into account that every application requires to be advertised for a period of 7 days. Given this requirement, there would seem little point in enabling the consultation period to be reduced down to not less than 24 hours as this will create a degree of expectation that an application can be dealt with essentially in a few days.

As the licensing section is now processing applications for occasional licences, I can now say (with the benefit of experience) that applicants are finding the statutory prescribed forms both cumbersome and confusing. In turn the amount of information which the Licensing Board has to process is excessive. Licensing Boards should be able to develop their own forms, or alternatively further consultation should be carried out with Clerks to devise a more “user friendly” application.

The administration of occasional licences becomes ever more problematic in terms of the information which requires to be retained in the Licensing Register maintained by Licensing Boards. The Licensing Register (Scotland) Regulations 2007 require that copies of each application form for an occasional licence, together with a record of the decision, are to be retained for five years. The Glasgow Licensing Board processes approximately 4000 to 5000 occasional licence applications per annum. While the licensing section has a very sophisticated software system, it is anticipated that the storage of this amount of data will be significantly challenging. It is unclear what benefit is to be derived from retaining information in relation to short-life events for a period of five years.

All of the above is to be achieved for a fee of £10 per application. This does not reflect the amount of processing required.

In conclusion, and in my own personal view, the arrangements for occasional licences under the 2005 Act have no discernable positive impact on either Licensing Boards or applicants. The situation is not improved by the amendments proposed in the new Bill.

Dear Cabinet Secretary

As you will know the Justice Committee is reaching the end of its oral evidence taking.

Many issues have arisen, some minor or technical, some not so minor. There is only so much the Committee will be able to cover at next week’s oral evidence session with you, therefore I am writing now to advise that it is likely that there will be a number of issues which the Committee will seek to follow up by way of correspondence following that meeting.

One of the most pressing issues to emerge from the Committee’s evidence relates to the licensing provisions. In advance of next week’s meeting, the Committee would be grateful if you would advise what representations have been received in relation to any backlog of personal licence applications. From the evidence heard by the Committee, this appears to be an issue of significant concern, particularly given the deadline of 1 September 2009 for all such licenses to be in place. One suggestion made to the Committee was that a further transition period, for applications received by 1 June, extending the date to 1 December could be introduced. Such an adjustment could require the Government to bring forward regulations.

The Committee would be grateful if you would advise what discussions there have been on this issue, what your views are and whether any action is proposed.

I look forward to hearing from you as a matter of urgency.

Bill Aitken MSP
Convener, Justice Committee
17 June 2009
Dear Convener

Thank you for your letter of 17 June 2009 concerning the state of play on personal licence applications under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005.

The Act is being implemented to the timetable set by the previous Scottish Executive. The transition timetable, which started on 1 February 2008, was designed to ensure the licensed trade had sufficient time to apply for premises licences and personal licences, and that licensing boards had sufficient time to process these.

Though there is a concern about the low number of applications for personal licences submitted at this stage in the transition period, it has been possible to submit an application for a personal licence since 1 February 2008. This was set out clearly in the “What all licensees need to know about changes in Scottish licensing laws” document issued to all licensees before the start of the transition. We have also taken every opportunity at various events to stress the need to get applications in as early as possible. Most recently my officials wrote on 12 January to stakeholders including the licensed trade bodies stressing the need for personal licence applications to be submitted, and the importance of Boards processing and issuing licences as speedily as possible. We are also aware that the licensed trade associations have carried out work to alert their members to the personal licence requirements.

To obtain a personal licence a qualification is needed. When it was brought to our attention that some people were completing the training but not taking the next step of applying for the actual licence, the Government contacted the main training bodies and we now understand that it is common practice to remind people of the need to apply, or even to provide application forms at the end of the training.

We are also aware that many Boards and Police forces have reminded applicants for the premises licence of the need to have a personal licence holder designated as a premises manager if they wish to serve alcohol from 1 September. Furthermore, transition regulations require Boards to write reminding each premises licence holder of the need to apply for a personal licence. I am therefore content that every reasonable effort has been made by Government, Boards, and the licensed trade to encourage the trade to submit their applications to allow them to operate under the 2005 Act.
In respect of the second concern about the speed at which Boards are dealing with applications, I have attached for the Committee’s interest a table which was compiled this month showing the number of applications applied for, granted and issued by each Board. I have instructed officials to continue to monitor the process and to write again reminding licensing boards of the importance of issuing the personal licences as soon as possible. While the table shows a backlog in some areas, I am sure you would agree that it demonstrates Boards are getting on with the task, but success does depend upon the trade submitting their applications in the first place.

The personal licence is a fundamental part of the new licensing regime. It ensures that there is a known, trained person responsible for the serving and sale of alcohol in every licensed premises. There has been a generous implementation period since the Bill was passed in 2005 and the Government will not be extending the 1 September deadline for the Act coming fully into force.

We will however continue to monitor the situation in respect of personal licence applications and may consider a temporary adjustment to the transitional arrangements, if that is justified, to assist the trade and licensing boards in the remaining few months of the transition period.

Parliament has chosen to license the sale of alcohol because it is a unique product and should be treated as such. Ultimately it is for those who wish to benefit from its sale to ensure they have fulfilled their responsibilities in undertaking the necessary training and applying for the relevant licences.

Dear Cabinet Secretary

Following the Justice Committee’s meeting on 23 June, it was agreed that I would write to you for further information or clarification on a number of issues that have arisen in the context of the scrutiny of this Bill so far.

At the evidence session on 23 June, you will recall that Cathie Craigie MSP drew attention to the evidence received from sentencers in relation to the proposal for a Scottish Sentencing Council. She stated, “It has been put to the committee that it would be unconstitutional to take responsibility away from the Parliament, ministers and the appeal court…” Can I draw your attention to the official report of the meeting of 12 May 2009, particularly columns 1761 and 1762, and invite any further response you have in relation to this evidence.

On 23 June, you made mention of a forensic data working group which is developing a list of applicable offences for retention of DNA samples from children. You undertook to find out what timetable that group is working to, what stage the group has reached to date and to report back to the Committee. It was noted that a statutory instrument will be brought forward in due course. The Committee would be grateful by your confirming whether such an instrument will be subject to affirmative or negative procedure.

In relation to serious organised crime, in response to a question from Robert Brown MSP, you advised that the Scottish Government had not been involved in the consultation on the scope of the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000. What involvement, if any, has the serious organised crime task force had? Again on serious organised crime and the provisions in the Bill, the Committee would be interested to receive further information on what work was undertaken to develop section 28 of the Bill.

Finally, in relation to community sentences and treatment orders, can you advise what information is normally available to sentencers in terms of the types and availability of different community disposals and what proposals the Government has to make improvements to the information that is available to sentencers.

I look forward to hearing from you.

Bill Aitken MSP
Convener, Justice Committee
7 July 2009
Dear Convenor

Thank you for your letter of 6 July following up a number of issues that arose during my evidence to the Justice Committee on 23 June on the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill.

Scottish Sentencing Council (sections 3-13 of the Bill)

The issue of the constitutional status of the proposed Scottish Sentencing Council was raised. I am aware that evidence put to the Justice Committee has suggested that the establishment of a Scottish Sentencing Council would take away responsibilities relating to sentencing from the Parliament, Ministers and the Appeal Court (High Court of Justiciary). Further, it is suggested that this renders the establishment of the Council in some way "unconstitutional". Aside from the fact that the establishment of an independent body to produce sentencing guidelines has been done in other jurisdictions, there has never been any intention of removing existing responsibilities in relation to sentencing from Parliament, Ministers and the Courts, and there is nothing in the Bill that does so.

Some of the evidence provided to the Committee states that the plans for a Scottish Sentencing Council will remove the powers of the High Court of Justiciary to issue guideline judgements and pass them on to a non-elected body. There is no intention on the part of the Government to remove any of the powers or functions from the High Court of Justiciary or any other sentencers, and there is nothing in the Bill that does so. The guidelines to be issued by the Sentencing Council do not prevent judges from imposing a particular sentence in a particular case. The provisions for the establishment of a Sentencing Council make it clear that the High Court will be able to continue to exercise its powers under sections 118(7) and 189(7) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 to issue guideline judgements, powers that it has to date seldom used. Section 9 of the Bill gives the High Court the power to refer sentencing guidelines to the Sentencing Council and ask that the Council review them in cases where the High Court has passed a sentence on appeal and has decided not to follow any relevant guidelines or where the High Court has concluded that a particular guideline does not deal, or deal adequately, with a significant issue raised by an appeal. The Council is required to review any guidelines referred to it by the High Court and in doing so must have regard to the High Court's reasons for its decision or conclusion.
The Sentencing Council is to be an independent body. The role of Ministers and Parliament in developing the criminal law and establishing offences and penalties in statute will remain the same. Ministers and Parliament are exercising those powers through consideration of this Bill, which is the appropriate constitutional process.

Against that background, I fail to see any substance to the argument that the proposals for a Scottish Sentencing Council are "unconstitutional".

DNA, fingerprints and other physical data (sections 58-60 of the Bill)

I agreed to provide some further information on the Forensic Data Working Group which is developing a list of applicable offences for retention of DNA samples from children.

The Working Group held its inaugural meeting on 14 July 2009, when members discussed their draft remit and terms of reference and gave initial consideration to their programme of work. The full membership of the Working Group is attached as Annex 1 to this letter.

In broad terms, the Working Group will develop detailed proposals on governance, accountability and transparency issues, taking forward the recommendations in the Fraser Review. This will include proposals for independent oversight within governance structures and for putting in the public domain information on policies, management and procedures relating to DNA and fingerprint acquisition and retention. The Working Group will also develop procedures and guidance to implement the DNA and fingerprint provisions in the Bill; and will consider the operation of existing DNA and fingerprint legislation to ensure operational consistency across Scotland.

The Working Group also agreed to establish a sub-group to consider the offences that should apply to the Children's Hearings provisions (section 59 of the Bill). This sub-group will hold its first meeting on 11 August 2009. If approved by Parliament, new section 18A(6) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (as inserted by section 59 of the Bill) will allow the Scottish Ministers to bring forward a statutory instrument specifying the offences that will apply for retention of DNA samples from children. The work of this sub-group will inform the content of the statutory instrument and I can confirm this statutory instrument will be subject to affirmative procedure.

The Working Group aims to meet every 6-8 weeks. As it is still in the process of scoping its work, no overall timescale has been set for the completion of its work. After full consideration of the issues at hand, the Working Group will report back to me with their recommendations.
I will be pleased to update the Committee on relevant developments and to share the Working Group's recommendations when they become available.

Serious Organised Crime (sections 25-28 of the Bill)

You asked what involvement the Serious Organised Crime Taskforce has had in the consultation on the scope of the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000. As a group, the Serious Organised Crime Taskforce has had no involvement in the consultation, though individual members of the Taskforce, on behalf of their respective organisations, may well have responded to it.

You also sought information on how the new offence of failing to report serious organised crime had been developed. Early discussions of the Serious Organised Crime Taskforce focused on creating new offences aimed at those directing or involved in serious organised crime and subsequently proposals were brought before the Taskforce. Further discussions highlighted the need to capture those professionals who facilitate and benefit from such crime, to make profits for themselves as well as organised criminals and to include close associates who are knowingly living from the proceeds of such crime.

The requirement for an offence of failing to report serious organised crime has been borne out by the recently published Serious Organised Crime Mapping project which identified 241 individuals as providing specialist links to serious organised crime networks. I should stress that if there is evidence to suggest those people are actively involved in serious organised crime, then that separate offence will be triggered. The failing to report offence is to capture those people who fail in a duty to report their knowledge and suspicions of individuals involved in serious organised crime if they receive a benefit from not doing so.

Community Payback Orders (section 14 of the Bill)

In relation to communication to sentencers of information regarding statutory community disposals, this is normally undertaken by means of circulars to relevant stakeholders including sheriff clerks, who are therefore in a position to provide information, where needed, to sentencers on the statutory disposals available to the court. With regard to the local support programmes, which underpin certain orders such as probation, responsibility for informing local courts of the availability of such programmes rests with the relevant criminal justice social work teams within local authorities. In addition the information for sentencers website is designed to provide relevant information on community disposals and local programmes. The website can be found through the following link:

http://www.sentencinqinformationscotland.com [Link no longer operates]
You also asked what proposals the Government has to make improvements to the existing information arrangements. We have identified a need for updating the information currently available on the website and are taking steps to put in place the necessary improvements. We have also had recent exploratory discussions with members of the Judicial Studies Committee on the likely information needs of sentencers in respect of the Community Payback Order provisions within the Bill.

Disclosure (sections 85-116 of the Bill)

Though questioning did not reach the disclosure provisions in the Bill during my evidence session on 23 June, I am aware the disclosure provisions are both complex and technical in nature. In order to assist you with consideration of these provisions, the flowcharts contained in Annexes 2(a), 2(b) and 2(c) to this letter set out the steps in the disclosure process for both summary and solemn cases. These flowcharts were crafted by my officials during development of the disclosure provisions and assisted them in understanding the overall proposed disclosure "end to end" process. I hope these flowcharts are also helpful to members of the Committee in considering the disclosure provisions.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Letter to the Cabinet Secretary for Justice

Thank you again for your evidence yesterday afternoon. Unfortunately, there was only so much the Committee was able to cover at the session and it therefore agreed that I should write to ask a number of further questions relating to the licensing provisions in the Bill. These questions are listed below. I have also included a further question on section 41 of the Bill which supplements my final oral question yesterday. I would be grateful for a response to this letter by Tuesday 8 September if possible in order to enable the Committee to take it fully into account when we consider our draft report.

Part 8 – Licensing under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982

Licensing of taxis and private hire cars

The 1982 Act current requires applicants for taxi or private hire car licences to have held a driving licence for a car under Part III of the Road Traffic Act 1988 for any continuous period of 12 months. Section 124 of the Bill requires that applicants for taxi and private hire licences must have held a driving licence for 12 months immediately prior to the application. It has been suggested that discretion should be granted to local authorities to allow them to make the appropriate decision based on the applicant’s individual circumstances. What is your view on this suggestion?

The Bill amends the 1982 Act to widen the right of appeal against a licensing authority’s review of taxi scales to include representatives of taxi operators. The Committee has received evidence suggesting that the right to appeal decisions should only be extended to those who responded to the original review. How do you respond to that suggestion?

Section 124 of the Bill extends from 5 to 7 days the period in which revised taxi scales can come into effect once they are published. To be deemed published, the scales must be advertised in a newspaper circulated in the relevant area. Evidence pointed to the cost of publishing notices in newspapers and also the inconsistency with the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 which allows publication via a website. How does the Scottish Government respond to these points?

The Committee received evidence suggesting that the 1982 Act be updated to include additional restrictions for non-UK residents who might apply for taxi and private hire car driver licences as they may not be subject to the same background and criminal checks. Is this something that could be incorporated into the Bill?

The Committee understands that, under the 1982 Act, licensing authorities have the power to limit the number of licensed taxis and require taxi drivers to undertake route tests, but cannot impose such requirements on private hire car drivers. Would the Scottish Government be prepared to consider this as a further measure to be addressed in the Bill?
Licensing of lap dancing clubs

It was suggested to the Committee that the Bill provides an opportunity to reassess the licensing of lap dancing clubs, which are currently regulated under section 41 of the 1982 Act. Should this be included in the Bill?

Licensing of late hours catering

Section 127 of the Bill substitutes the word “food” for “meals and refreshment” and gives licensing authorities the power to license any premises selling food or drink at late hours. Some evidence questioned whether the regulation and cost was proportionate to the perceived benefits. How would you respond to this?

Applications for licences

Section 128 of the Bill lengthens the objection period and increases the notice period for attending hearings. The Committee has received evidence stating that an increase in the length of the objection period is unnecessary as most applications do not attract any objections while there is already a provision allowing the authority to consider objections outwith that time. What is your view on this concern?

Section 128 of the Bill requires applicants to provide additional personal details to licensing authorities when submitting an application. There was concern that these details might be placed in the public domain, rather than only being used by applicable statutory bodies. What assurances can you give on this issue?

Section 128 also reduces the time for licensing authorities to produce a Statement of Reasons. What is the Scottish Government’s reason for this change?

Part 9 – Alcohol Licensing

Notification of licence applications

Section 130 removes the need for licensing boards, when notifying interested parties of a licence application (as required by the 2005 Act), to include a copy of the application, except in respect of the Chief Constable. There appears to be confusion about what information will be notified to interested parties. Could this provision result in interested parties being given insufficient information to properly inspect and consider the licence application?

Court-appointed administrators

The Committee received some evidence regarding transferring licences to court appointed administrators under the 2005 Act. The potential difficulty is that the administrator would be required to become the premises licence holder in his own right as opposed to an agent of the insolvent company and that he or she might be reluctant to do so. How do you respond to this?
Occasional licences

The Committee also heard evidence that the current occasional license procedure in the 2005 Act is too complicated and removes a significant degree of discretion on the part of the licensing board. The submissions go on to suggest the 2005 Act should be amended to return to the much simpler and more effective procedure contained in the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976. What is your view on this suggestion?

Extended hours applications: variation of conditions

Section 135 of the Bill allows licensing boards to apply additional conditions to extended hours licences. The Committee received evidence asking whether the licence holder would be afforded a hearing on whether the variations proposed are necessary for the purposes of the licensing objectives. There was also a concern that licensing boards may not have the power to enforce such provisions. How do you respond to these points?

False statements in applications: offences

Section 138 of the Bill makes it an offence for a person who already holds a personal licence to apply for a second personal licence. The Committee was asked to seek assurances that the provision would cover electronic applications under the EU Services Directive and also that applicants who make honest oversights or mistakes are not sanctioned. Can the Minister give such an assurance?

National Personal Licence Database

The Committee was told that not all licensing boards use the Scottish Government’s National Personal Licence Database and that there is no required timescale for inputting evidence into the database. What is the Scottish Government’s view on the uptake and use of the database?

Further modifications of the 2005 Act

Section 139, which makes various amendments to schedule 4 to the 2005 Act, is intended to widen the grounds on which a chief constable can object to a premises licence. Some evidence questioned whether this change is appropriate as it could lead to the chief constable commenting on matters which are more appropriately dealt with by other agencies with more relevant, or indeed the only, expertise. How do you respond to this observation?

Level of fees

The Committee has received evidence expressing concern about the relatively small licence fees paid by supermarkets compared with smaller traders, despite the high proportion of sales that supermarkets account for. There have also been concerns about the discrepancies in the level of fees set by boards across the country, with some accused of seeing fees as “a money making exercise”. What are your views on these concerns?
Criminal Procedure

Section 41 – breach of undertaking

The Scottish Centre for Crime and Justice Research “strongly object” to the new offence of “breach of undertaking”, on the following grounds:

- that it was not adequately consulted on
- that it removes the rationale for having a system of undertaking in the first place
- that it has “a dangerous and costly net-widening potential”
- that it is not supported by the evidence of what we know works
- that it undermines the Bill’s overall aim of reducing the use of prison for people serving very short sentences.

What is your response to these arguments?

I look forward to hearing from you.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Letter from the Cabinet Secretary for Justice

Thank you for your letter of 2 September asking a number of questions that have arisen during your Stage 1 scrutiny of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill ("the Bill"). I also take the opportunity to provide some further information regarding section 125 of the Bill following discussion at the session on 1 September.

For ease of reference, each question/issue is repeated below along with our response to the issues raised.

Part 8 – Licensing under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982

Licensing of market operators – section 125

During my evidence session on 1 September, there was discussion regarding the effect of section 125 of the Bill in terms of the licensing of non-commercial market operators. We agreed to provide further information as to how the system would operate if section 125 is approved by Parliament.

By way of background, the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 ("the 1982 Act") provides a statutory regime for the licensing of a number of activities. Parts I and II of the 1982 Act deal with licensing by local authorities of a range of activities including taxis and private hire cars, second-hand dealers, metal dealers, street traders, market operators, public entertainment operators, indoor sports entertainment operators and window cleaners.

Licences issued under the 1982 Act fall into two basic categories, namely mandatory provision and optional provision. The distinction between the two categories refers to whether the licensing authority has any discretion as to whether it licences a particular activity.

Currently, the 1982 Act requires licensing authorities to operate licensing schemes for the activities of metal dealers and indoor sports entertainment operators. The other activities listed in Parts I and II of the 1982 Act may be subject to licensing, but this is at the discretion of the licensing authority. These optional licensing activities include taxis and private hire cars, second-hand dealers, street traders, market operators, public entertainment operators and window cleaners (it should be noted that section 123 of the Bill seeks to remove metal dealers from the list of mandatory licensing activities and add it to the list of optional licensing activities).

Section 125 of the Bill seeks to amend section 40(2) of the 1982 Act to remove the exemption from market operators’ licensing for non-commercial operations (including charitable operations). If approved by Parliament, the effect of section 125 would be that licensing authorities would have discretion... as to whether they licence non-commercial market operator activities. This is as a result of non-commercial operations then falling within the scope of section 9(3) of the 1982 Act (which provides for this discretion).

The provisions in section 125 take forward a specific recommendation of the Task Group report¹. The Task Group report discussed the justification for making this recommendation as follows:

“Para 7.6 – The Task Group noted that under the existing provisions charitable, religious, youth, recreation, community, political or similar organisations are exempt from any licensing requirement. We sought views on whether this exemption should now be repealed in light of the increase in the number of such events and associated problems, including public safety concerns. We recognised however that such problems and concerns were liable to occur regardless of who is actually holding the sale. The majority of respondents agreed that the exemption should be removed. However, some concerns were expressed that the licensing fees might have an adverse impact on some of the charitable organisations running such events that are currently exempt from any licensing requirement. We took the view that, even if the exemption was removed, it would still be open to licensing authorities to provide their own exemptions for certain charitable events, or to alter their fee structure to ensure that charitable events were not unduly penalised.

Recommendation

The Task Group recommend that the exemption from the market operators’ licensing provisions for non-commercial organisations at Section 40(2)(a) be removed and thereafter licensing authorities consider introducing a revised fee structure to take account of licences issued to charitable organisations.”

Paragraph 15 of Schedule 1 to the 1982 Act provides for the fees regime for licensing authorities. If section 125 is approved and a licensing authority did subsequently decide to licence non-commercial market operator activities, the 1982 Act affords licensing authorities full flexibility in deciding whether to charge reduced or no fees to non-commercial organisations. For example, a licensing authority could decide to licence non-commercial market operators but charge no fees to applicants².

We will consider carefully the transitional provisions required for the introduction of the discretion being given to licensing authorities in terms of the licensing of non-commercial market operator activities. Following the commencement of the provisions, we intend that the transitional provisions will operate in a manner so that non-commercial operators would not require to apply for a licence unless a licensing authority made regulation to that effect. This would have the effect that from “day 1” of the new system after the section 125 provisions have come into force (and section 40(2) of the 1982 Act is therefore amended), no non-commercial market operators would require a licence to operate (even if the licensing authority had in place a general market operators’ licensing regime).

In seeking to implement this Task Group recommendation, we consider affording discretion to licensing authorities in this area is appropriate as it will give licensing authorities the ability to decide whether to licence non-commercial market operations in light of their own local circumstances.

Licensing of taxis and private hire cars

Justice Committee – The 1982 Act current requires applicants for taxi or private hire car licences to have held a driving licence for a car under Part III of the Road Traffic Act 1988 for any continuous period of 12 months. Section 124 of the Bill requires that applicants for taxi and private hire licences must have held a driving licence for 12 months immediately prior to the application. It has been suggested that discretion should be granted to local authorities to allow them to make the appropriate decision based on the applicant’s individual circumstances. What is your view on this suggestion?

SG response – The provisions in section 124(2) of the Bill take forward a Task Group recommendation. The purpose of the section 124(2) is to ensure that an applicant has a proven record of unblemished recent driving experience to the benefit of public safety and confidence. The provision achieves this end and will ensure a uniform approach throughout all areas which would not be achievable if we were to afford licensing authorities discretion in this area.

Justice Committee – The Bill amends the 1982 Act to widen the right of appeal against a licensing authority’s review of taxi scales to include representatives of taxi operators. The Committee has received evidence suggesting that the right to appeal decisions should only be extended to those who responded to the original review. How do you respond to that suggestion?

SG response – This takes forward a Task Group recommendation. We think it is appropriate that the right of appeal should be extended to representative persons or bodies since these groups require to be consulted by a licensing authority in any review of taxi scales and notified of the outcome.

Justice Committee – Section 124 of the Bill extends from 5 to 7 days the period in which revised taxi scales can come into effect once they are published. To be deemed published, the scales must be advertised in a newspaper circulated in the relevant area. Evidence pointed to the cost of publishing notices in newspapers and also the inconsistency with the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 which allows publication via a website. How does the Scottish Government respond to these points?

SG response – We have looked to be consistent with existing practice, which we understand has worked well and we are not aware of any specific concerns in relation to cost. We do note the point about the use of websites, although making such a change would have potential implications for other parts of the 1982 Act.

Justice Committee – The Committee received evidence suggesting that the 1982 Act be updated to include additional restrictions for non-UK residents who might apply for taxi and private hire car driver licences as they may not be subject to the same background and criminal checks. Is this something that could be incorporated into the Bill?

SG response – Apart from the evidence received by the Committee, we have received no approaches from licensing authorities or indeed police bodies, to suggest that they are experiencing difficulties over assessing the suitability of foreign national applicants for taxi/private hire car licences. We are not aware this is a widespread problem therefore. We are however in touch with the relevant Council’s Licensing Board on this matter.

Justice Committee – The Committee understands that, under the 1982 Act, licensing authorities have the power to limit the number of licensed taxis and require taxi drivers to undertake route tests, but cannot impose such requirements on private hire car drivers. Would the Scottish Government be prepared to consider this as a further measure to be addressed in the Bill?

SG response – We are aware from the Task Group report that there had been a lobby of support for licensing authorities to limit the number of private hire car licences which it issues. While we do not consider that this is an issue which we should look to address in the context of this Bill, we do anticipate that we may need to look more widely at the existing powers once we have a clearer understanding of where the current consultation on vehicle accessibility is proceeding.

Licensing of lap dancing clubs

Justice Committee – It was suggested to the Committee that the Bill provides an opportunity to reassess the licensing of lap dancing clubs, which are currently regulated under section 41 of the 1982 Act. Should this be included in the Bill?

SG response – We consider that the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 (“the 2005 Act”) enables local authorities to take what action is required in this area.

Licensing of late hours catering
Justice Committee – Section 127 of the Bill substitutes the word “food” for “meals and refreshment” and gives licensing authorities the power to license any premises selling food or drink at late hours. Some evidence questioned whether the regulation and cost was proportionate to the perceived benefits. How would you respond to this?

SG response – This takes forward a Task Group recommendation. The Task Group took the view that the principal justification for licensing such premises related to the potential for large numbers of people leaving pubs, night clubs etc. late at night to cause a disturbance, and that this potential exists regardless of whether the food or drink being sold has been cooked or pre-prepared in any way. As such, the Task Group considered that licensing authorities should have the option of licensing all such premises if they consider it necessary to do so. In view of this, we concluded that the phrase "meals and refreshments" should be replaced with "food". We agree that giving licensing authorities this discretion is appropriate as they are best placed to decide what subset of food and drink retailers need to be licensed.

Applications for licences

Justice Committee – Section 128 of the Bill lengthens the objection period and increases the notice period for attending hearings. The Committee has received evidence stating that an increase in the length of the objection period is unnecessary as most applications do not attract any objections while there is already a provision allowing the authority to consider objections outwith that time. What is your view on this concern?

SG response – This takes forward a Task Group recommendation. While we accept that the existing time period of 21 days to object to applications is usually sufficient, there can be occasions where more time is needed. For example, sometimes by the time police receive an application form from the licensing authority they have much less time than 21 days to respond. The proposal, which was supported by a majority of respondents who participated in the Task Group's consultation, to increase the length of the objection period by an additional 7 days to 28 days would ease such problems considerably. It will still be competent for a licensing authority to consider a late objection or late representation if they are satisfied that there is sufficient reason why it was not made in the time required. However we agree with the Task Group that it is sensible to include explicit provision to lengthen the objection period from 21 days to 28 days as this will ensure all interested parties have sufficient time to respond.

Justice Committee – Section 128 of the Bill requires applicants to provide additional personal details to licensing authorities when submitting an application. There was concern that these details might be placed in the public domain, rather than only being used by applicable statutory bodies. What assurances can you give on this issue?
SG response – We would expect local authorities to use the additional information provided in the application only for the purpose of assisting relevant authorities such as the police in looking into the background of the applicant. We would not expect this additional information to be published and nothing in the 1982 Act will require this additional information to be published.

The application itself is not required to be published under the terms of the 1982 Act and this does not change. Information that is currently made publicly available by the applicant in a notice under the requirements of Schedule 1, paragraph 2(3) of the 1982 Act will continue to apply. An applicant’s date of birth and place of birth is not amongst these requirements and this does not change.

It should be noted the requirement to provide further information takes forward a Task Group recommendation. In reviewing the provisions of Paragraph 1(2) of Schedule 1 of the 1982 Act (which stipulate the information which must be included on any licence application form), the Task Group considered whether the mandatory information specified should be extended to include 'date of birth' and 'place of birth'. The Task Group recognised that such information can be helpful to the police in carrying out criminal background checks. Respondents to the consultation were almost unanimously in favour of such a change and we have provided for it in section 128 of the Bill.

Justice Committee – Section 128 also reduces the time for licensing authorities to produce a Statement of Reasons. What is the Scottish Government’s reason for this change?

SG response – This takes forward a Task Group recommendation. The Task Group considered the current timescales for the procedures for a licensing authority notifying an applicant of the outcome of an application, for the recipient to obtain reasons for that decision from the licensing authority and for the appeals process.

Under the current system, a licensing authority must notify the applicant (as well as the chief constable, objectors and where premises are involved the fire authority) of its decision on whether or not to grant a licence within 7 days of it being taken. The applicant then has 28 days from the date the decision was taken to request a written statement of reasons from the licensing authority which has 10 days to comply with that request.

The Task Group report followed a report produced by COSLA on the Civic Govt Act. COSLA had proposed a revised timetable in their report so that the time period for applicants to request reasons should be reduced from 28 days to 7 days and the time period within which a licensing authority must provide the written statement of reasons should be increased from 10 days to 14 days.

The Task Group considered that a reduction in the period available for requesting reasons from 28 days to 7 days was unreasonable, given that the applicant may be on holiday at the time the decision is taken. The Task Group concluded that the period for requesting reasons be reduced to 21 days without adversely affecting the applicant to help speed up the process.

Part 9 – Alcohol Licensing

Notification of licence applications

Justice Committee – Section 130 removes the need for licensing boards, when notifying interested parties of a licence application (as required by the 2005 Act), to include a copy of the application, except in respect of the Chief Constable. There appears to be confusion about what information will be notified to interested parties. Could this provision result in interested parties being given insufficient information to properly inspect and consider the licence application?

SG response – We do not consider this to be the case as notification will inform people where such information can be accessed.

The employment of Licensing Standards Officers will ensure there is an official available to advise the public on what the application actually seeks and how the public can support, oppose or comment on the application to the Licensing Board.

Court-appointed administrators

Justice Committee – The Committee received some evidence regarding transferring licences to court appointed administrators under the 2005 Act. The potential difficulty is that the administrator would be required to become the premises licence holder in his own right as opposed to an agent of the insolvent company and that he or she might be reluctant to do so. How do you respond to this?

SG response – We are unaware of the specific details of this potential difficulty and we will consider this situation further.

Occasional licences

Justice Committee – The Committee also heard evidence that the current occasional license procedure in the 2005 Act is too complicated and removes a significant degree of discretion on the part of the licensing board. The submissions go on to suggest the 2005 Act should be amended to return to the much simpler and more effective procedure contained in the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976. What is your view on this suggestion?

SG response – The process ensures that occasional licences are given consideration by the relevant enforcement agencies but also that the local community affected by them have an opportunity to comment. It is important to remember there are no restrictions on the size or frequency of occasional licences except those decided by the Licensing Board. The previous regime did not enable the local community to comment and this regime ensures they can. We consider simplification of the procedure as suggested would remove that community involvement.

Extended hours applications: variation of conditions

Justice Committee – Section 135 of the Bill allows licensing boards to apply additional conditions to extended hours licences. The Committee received evidence asking whether the licence holder would be afforded a hearing on whether the variations proposed are necessary for the purposes of the licensing objectives. There was also a concern that licensing boards may not have the power to enforce such provisions. How do you respond to these points?

SG response – A Licensing Board may hold a hearing although that is a matter for the Licensing Board to consider.

The position on enforcement is no different from any other licence in that anyone not implementing the conditions would commit an offence and could be prosecuted and/or face a hearing from the Licensing Board where the Licensing Board could impose a sanction ranging from a warning to revocation of the licence.

False statements in applications: offences

Justice Committee – Section 138 of the Bill makes it an offence for a person who already holds a personal licence to apply for a second personal licence. The Committee was asked to seek assurances that the provision would cover electronic applications under the EU Services Directive and also that applicants who make honest oversights or mistakes are not sanctioned. Can the Minister give such an assurance?

SG response – We are in the process of ensuring all provisions of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 and this Bill meet the requirements of the EU Services Directive. A defence is afforded in that the person must knowingly make a false statement before an offence is committed.

National Personal Licence Database

Justice Committee – The Committee was told that not all licensing boards use the Scottish Government’s National Personal Licence Database and that there is no required timescale for inputting evidence into the database. What is the Scottish Government’s view on the uptake and use of the database?

SG response – The Database is operated by the Local Government Improvement Service and we understand all Local Authorities have signed up to participate.

We understand there are some technical difficulties which are being tackled to ensure each local authority and the Police can interface with the database.
We are aware there is a large amount of data concerning Personal Licences still being processed and we therefore expect a time lag following transition before all this information is on the database.

It will be to the advantage of all licensing boards to take part and if this is not forthcoming we will consider making it mandatory.

Further modifications of the 2005 Act

Justice Committee – Section 139, which makes various amendments to schedule 4 to the 2005 Act, is intended to widen the grounds on which a chief constable can object to a premises licence. Some evidence questioned whether this change is appropriate as it could lead to the chief constable commenting on matters which are more appropriately dealt with by other agencies with more relevant, or indeed the only, expertise. How do you respond to this observation?

SG response – Section 139 of the Bill will ensure a Chief Constable has the same ability as members of the public to comment on an application. It is then for the Licensing Board to weigh the information before reaching a decision.

We think it is entirely appropriate that the Police should comment on such matters as securing public safety, preventing public nuisance or protecting children from harm. The Police frequently deal with the outcome of the chaotic lives lived by those addicted, they see first hand the outcomes of heavy drinking from domestic violence, they experience what happens to young people who put themselves at risk through overindulgence and they view the devastation that can be wrought by drunk drivers. As such, we maintain that gives the Police as much right as the rest of us to comment on all the Licensing objectives.

General issues

Justice Committee – The Committee has received evidence expressing concern about the relatively small licence fees paid by supermarkets compared with smaller traders, despite the high proportion of sales that supermarkets account for. There have also been concerns about the discrepancies in the level of fees set by boards across the country, with some accused of seeing fees as “a money making exercise”. What are your views on these concerns?

SG response – Parliament has agreed the licensing regime must be self financing. Fees are set by the local authorities within capped bands and those bands ensure a small corner shop pays less than a large supermarket. This is unlike the current arrangements where everybody pays the same. It is easy to say the costs should be loaded onto the biggest retailers but we believe the system has to be fair to everyone, including the council tax payer. The fees are charged for the cost of processing the application (a position that will be reinforced by the forthcoming EU Services Directive. Any Board which collects an excess is expected to reduce the coming year’s annual fee.

We have asked the Accounts Commission to consider these all issues and will consider any recommendations they choose to make.

Criminal Procedure

Section 41 – breach of undertaking

Justice Committee – The Scottish Centre for Crime and Justice Research “strongly object” to the new offence of “breach of undertaking”, on the following grounds:

- that it was not adequately consulted on
- that it removes the rationale for having a system of undertaking in the first place
- that it has “a dangerous and costly net-widening potential”
- that it is not supported by the evidence of what we know works
- that it undermines the Bill’s overall aim of reducing the use of prison for people serving very short sentences.

What is your response to these arguments?

SG response – We should say, for the avoidance of doubt, that breach of undertaking is not a new offence. It was already an offence under section 22 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”). The Criminal Proceedings (Reform) (Scotland) Act 2007 (“the 2007 Act”) then amended section 22 of the 1995 Act and introduced undertaking conditions. Undertaking conditions are similar to bail conditions. The introduction of undertaking conditions helped underpin the undertaking system so that the police could be more confident in using undertakings to release an accused from police custody pending their first appearance in court.

Allowing people to breach the conditions of an undertaking without any penalty could result in the system of undertakings becoming ineffective. Therefore when conditions were introduced through the 2007 Act, the scope of the offence of breaching an undertaking was widened.

The intention behind section 41 of the Bill (which seeks to add new section 22ZA to the 1995 Act) is that where an offender breaches an undertaking by committing a further offence, the breach of undertaking will be considered as an aggravation of that further offence. We do not agree that amounts to “a dangerous and costly net-widening potential”. At the moment, such a breach of undertaking is treated as a separate offence. The section 41 provisions consolidate the further offence with the breach of undertaking so that it is treated as an aggravation of this further offence. We regard this as a fairly minor change bringing consistency to the system (so that offending while on an undertaking and offending while on bail are treated the same) and helping ensure these particular types of breaches are treated in a fairer way.
It should be noted the more significant changes such as the introduction of undertaking conditions themselves and the resultant extension of potential undertaking offences were introduced in the 2007 Act and these had been consulted on. The extension of the undertaking system and the associated offences were recommendations of the Sentencing Commission who consulted on their proposals before producing their report “Report on the use of Bail and Remand” in April 2005:

http://www.scottishsentencingcommission.gov.uk/docs/scoreubr.pdf

In September 2005, the then Scottish Executive announced it intended to take forward this Sentencing Commission proposal in their publication “Bail and Remand – The Scottish Executive Action Plan”:

I hope this is helpful.

In response to the query regarding section 135 of the Bill, we would draw attention to paragraph 582 of the explanatory notes as this confirms what section 135 of the Bill is intended to achieve. The provisions will enable Licensing Boards to amend for the first time the conditions of operation for a licensed premises for the duration of the extended period and the period that the extension applies to. For example, if a premises was ordinarily open on a Saturday from 11am until 11pm and applied to extend its licence to 2am on Sunday morning, a Licensing Board would be able to vary conditions (such as requiring door supervisors and/or the use of plastic drinking vessels) for the period 11am to 2am, or any part of that period.

We think this is a sensible measure that provides greater flexibility to Licensing Boards in respect of considering Extended Hours licence applications. We note the comments made by Aberdeenshire Council Licensing Services and North Aberdeen Divisional Licensing Board and we will re-examine the provisions in section 135 in light of their comments to ensure the powers assigned in the provision are clear.

Supplementary written submissions from the Scottish Government

During the briefing to the Justice Committee on section 18 of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill, it was agreed to provide further information in respect of the implementation costs of this provision in the Bill.

As stated in the Financial Memorandum accompanying the Bill (paragraphs 782-785), there are no direct cost implications of the amendments proposed to the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007. Those provisions of the 2007 Act are not in force, so the most relevant comparisons are between the cost of implementing the 2007 Act as originally enacted, and the cost of implementing the 2007 Act as amended by the Bill. That is what the table below paragraph 785 of the Financial Memorandum seeks to do.

The costs involved in implementing the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007 as originally enacted (column headed “full implementation”) and as amended (columns headed “combined sentence applied at 1 year” and “combined sentence applied at 2 years”) are based on current assumptions and prisoner projections and show the indicative impact on applying the modified measures. The figures are based on prison population projections for 2015-16. As can be seen, the costs of implementing the 2007 Act with the amendments in the Bill would be lower than implementing it as originally enacted.

The modifications to the 2007 Act are only one part of the Scottish Government’s offender management plan as recommended by the independent Scottish Prisons Commission. However, the Commission said that while these provisions will vastly improve the way that offenders are both assessed and managed in prison and in the community, they cannot be activated until we have tackled the current high numbers of those in custody.

The costs of implementing the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007 (as amended by section 18 of the Bill) will, however, require financial commitment at a future stage. As the costs will fall into the period of a future spending review, it would be premature to pre-empt that outcome. The costs of implementing the custodial sentence arrangements will be subject to discussion by the Scottish Government in the context of that spending review.

As you will know the Justice Committee is continuing to consider its draft Stage 1 report on the above Bill.

During the Committee’s discussion of Part 6 – Disclosure, a number of issues arose in respect of which the Committee agreed it would be helpful to write to you now, rather than simply highlighting them in the Committee’s report, so that your response can be considered prior to finalising the report.

To assist the Committee in judging: (a) the extent to which existing law and practice on disclosure needs to be reformed; and (b) whether or not the proposals in the Bill address existing problems in an effective way, the committee would appreciate the following:

1. A clearer explanation of the law and practice as they currently stand in relation to disclosure of evidence in Scotland, including information on the scope of the duty of disclosure, the mechanisms for ensuring that there is fair disclosure and procedures for withholding sensitive information.

2. An explanation of why the current Scottish regime for disclosure of evidence is considered to be defective and how the proposals in the Bill are intended to address any problems with the current disclosure regime.

3. The Scottish Government’s views on the concerns that have been expressed about the complexity of the proposals set out in the Bill and what scope there is to simplify the provisions in the Bill (e.g. by dealing with more aspects in guidance rather than statute).

4. In relation to Applications to court: orders restricting disclosure at sections 102 to 106, the Scottish Government’s view on Lord Coulsfield’s comment that these provisions are overly complex.

5. Clarification of what (if any) role ‘special counsel’ currently play within the Scottish legal system and how they will, within the context of the Scottish Government’s proposals on disclosure, help to ensure that an accused person receives a fair trial.

It would be very helpful if you could respond by 21 October 2009.

I look forward to hearing from you.

Justice Committee
Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Letter from the Cabinet Secretary for Justice on disclosure issues

Thank you for your letter of 8 October which seeks a response on a number of disclosure questions that arose during the Justice Committee’s discussion of Part 6 of the Bill.

Q1 – A clearer explanation of the law and practice as they currently stand in relation to disclosure of evidence in Scotland, including information on the scope of the duty of disclosure, the mechanisms for ensuring that there is fair disclosure and procedures for withholding sensitive information.

Scope of duty of disclosure

Lord Coulsfield’s report on the Law and Practice of Disclosure in Criminal Proceedings in Scotland very fully explores the law and practice of disclosure in Scotland, including the scope of the duty (and its historical development), the remedies and mechanisms for ensuring that the duty of disclosure is fairly carried out and procedures for withholding sensitive information. The Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service (COPFS) has also published extensive guidance to prosecutors on the extent of and application of their duties in practice in respect of disclosure.

Disclosure by the Crown in criminal proceedings is presently carried out on a common law basis, the legal principles of which have been established in various cases over the years (and particularly since 1998 to the present day) which have examined issues of disclosure by the prosecutor to the defence. It is to be noted that the case law in this field is still evolving, as demonstrated by the recent case of HMA v Murtagh, discussed below.

The basic principle which underpins disclosure of evidence by the prosecutor to the accused is fairness to the accused person, and in particular the ECHR Article 6 rights to a fair trial. Under that Article the accused has the right to what is known as “equality of arms” with the Crown. Under the common law, as laid down in the leading case of McLeod, the Crown have a duty to disclose to the accused not only the incriminatory information which the prosecutor intends to lead in evidence against him but also any information which would tend to exculpate the accused or which would be likely to be of material assistance in the preparation or presentation of his defence.

The legal principles of the present disclosure system have been established through various cases over the past years which have focused on disclosure issues:
• HMA v McLeod (no2), 1998 SCCR 77 – established the principle that the Crown should provide the accused with the material evidence for or against him.

• Sinclair v HMA 2005 SCCR 446 (Privy Council decision) – established that the statements of all witnesses that the Crown intends to lead at trial would likely to be of material assistance to the proper preparation and presentation of the defence and would therefore always be material information that must be disclosed to the defence.

• Holland v HMA 2005 SCCR 417 (Privy Council decision) – established that criminal history records for witnesses that the Crown intends to lead at trial would likely to be of material assistance to the proper preparation and presentation of the defence and would therefore always be material information that must be disclosed to the defence.

Since the publication of Lord Coulsfield Review in August 2007 there have been a number of other high profile cases which have sought to further clarify the law:-

• McDonald v HMA 2008 SLT 993 (Privy Council decision) – confirmed the principle that the Crown need only disclose information that materially weakens the prosecution case or materially strengthens the defence case and that it was entirely appropriate for the Crown to make this assessment; established that the Crown cannot give an absolute guarantee that all material information had, or ought to have been, disclosed.

• HMA v Murtagh [2009] U.K.P.C. 35 (Privy Council decision) – established that the Crown is only obliged to disclose the material parts of those criminal history records that it is obliged to disclose under Holland v HMA; confirmed that the appropriate formulation of the disclosure test is to disclose any information that materially weakens the prosecution case or materially strengthens the defence case.

There have been developments, too, in the way in which information is disclosed. Information can be disclosed by any means, whether by providing copies of material to the defence or allowing the defence the opportunity to view the information. The discretion to determine the method of disclosure rests with the prosecutor.

In the past, where copies of disclosable information were being provided, they would be posted to the defence solicitor. As a data controller, however, the Crown must take such technical and organisational measures as are necessary to protect information against the risk of accidental loss or damage. Accordingly, in January 2009, COFPS implemented a new process whereby defence solicitors were required to attend at a local Procurator Fiscal Office to collect disclosure material. As the solicitors also have to sign a receipt for the material, this process also ensures that the prosecutor has a clear audit trail.
of disclosure in order to satisfy the court that it has fulfilled its disclosure obligations.

COPFS is in the process of implementing a new process whereby information is disclosed to the defence electronically on an encrypted pen-drive which the defence agent can collect from a local PF Office. This process provides an additional level of protection and will reduce the amount of paper generated by cases. COPFS is currently developing a secure website which will allow solicitors to electronically access their disclosure evidence remotely.

Procedures for withholding sensitive information

At present there is no set process by which the Crown or UK Government can seek to withhold material information in criminal proceedings in Scotland on grounds that its disclosure would prejudice an important public interest. In some limited circumstances, the Crown or UK Government could raise this before the judge in the criminal proceedings and arguments could be presented to the Court on the appropriateness of withholding the information, as was the case in the recent appeal of Megrahi v HMA. However, due to the absence of any ex parte process in the Scottish criminal legal system, there is no established mechanism by which the Crown can seek a ruling from the court on the non-disclosure of sensitive material information, particularly where the disclosure of the existence of the information could prejudice the public interest the Crown is seeking to protect. If such a circumstance was to arise, the Crown would need to find a way in which to raise the issue with the judge outwith the presence of the accused or his legal representative.

Mechanisms for ensuring that there has been fair disclosure

If the prosecution fails to disclose material information there are well-established remedies in law, which include ordering disclosure, allowing adjournment of the case and, where there has been a miscarriage of justice, appeals against conviction, which are intended to cover such cases where there has been a failure to disclose material information. There is no change proposed in the Bill to any of the existing remedies for failure to disclose information.

Also, the defence may petition the court to seek recovery of documents where they consider that the prosecutor holds material information which has not been disclosed. There is no change proposed to this mechanism in the Bill.

Q2 – An explanation of why the current Scottish regime for disclosure of evidence is considered to be defective and how the proposals in the Bill are intended to address any problems with the current disclosure regime.

There had been a series of high profile criminal cases in which it emerged that material which should have been disclosed had not been which led to the then Scottish Government to appoint Lord Coultsfield in November 2006 to conduct a review of the law and practice of Disclosure and to make recommendations to ensure that the law and practise of Disclosure was certain and fit for 21st century justice. Lord Coulsfield’s review, published in August 2007, sets out in great detail and with clarity the problems which had been encountered with the current regime for disclosure in criminal proceedings; and what legal, practical and administrative steps ought to be taken forward to remedy the position.

The provisions in the Bill are designed to implement the recommendations by Lord Coulsfield to address the problems he identified. There are 44 recommendations altogether but only some of them require legislation. Others can be taken forward through a statutory code of practice and in guidance to prosecutors and investigators. The main thrust of the recommendations is to provide clarity around what disclosure means exactly, who carries the duty of disclosure and when. In creating such a new scheme it is necessary also to consider when disclosure is not appropriate. We deal with this below.

The aim of these provisions is not to reform the law but to place the existing law on a statutory footing and provide both the prosecutor and the defence with a greater degree of certainty. Disclosure is presently carried out on a common law basis but it is clear from continuing development of the common law through the courts that allowing the law to develop in this fashion creates uncertainty. Disclosure, however, is an area where practitioners require certainty; prosecutors, in order that they can be confident that decisions taken in respect of disclosure are in compliance with the law and, equally, defence practitioners, in order to give advice to their clients. This is achieved by legislation which provides that necessary certainty, clarity and consistency.

Q3 – The Scottish Government’s views on the concerns that have been expressed about the complexity of the proposals set out in the Bill and what scope there is to simplify the provisions in the Bill (e.g. by dealing with more aspects in guidance rather than statute).

The Scottish Government has listened carefully to the views expressed on complexity. Clearly, we did not set out to make this unduly complex, quite the opposite. That said, although the essential concept of the Crown’s duty of disclosure is simple, its practical application can be extremely complex and the draft provisions reflect this complexity. Attempts to set it out more simply often risk missing critical elements. Given the difficulties identified by Lord Coulsfield we want to avoid that and ensure that the legislation provides certainty, clarity and consistency to ensure justice for Scotland.

That said, we are concerned at the views expressed that the provisions are too complex and we are happy to look again at the provisions to ensure that they are comprehensive and comprehensible.

We are happy to look, also, at whether elements of the provisions could appropriately be dealt with in rules of Court or in the Code of Practice, particularly those which are more informative than regulatory or which seek to establish standard processes. We will do so with some caution, though. The duty to disclose is a critical duty and if we were to remove too many provisions we would deprive Parliament of its role in scrutinising the proposals.

Q4 – In relation to Applications to court: orders restricting disclosure at sections 102 to 106, the Scottish Government’s view on Lord Coulsfield’s comment that these provisions are overly complex.

Lord Coulsfield recommended that the legislation should provide for a system of ‘Public Interest Immunity’ hearings. Again, this is something which seems superficially simple but which is quite complex and the provisions reflect that.
Several cases, however, including cases from the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg have looked at the difficult issue of withholding information from the defence. Each case offers its own principles, rules and tests that have to be satisfied to ensure legislation is compatible with human rights.

The Bill provisions are designed to capture these important tests and to seek to find the correct emphasis on when are some rights more or less important than other rights. Ensuring that the provisions reflect those different principles and tests adds to the complexity. Since what the provisions do is to establish processes through which that which the accused is entitled to have can be withheld from him we think it is vital that the provisions set out fully the tests and principles which apply. That adds to the complexity.

Whilst much of the detail could have been left to a Government of the future to make Regulations or to the courts to establish their own rules covering aspects of this issue, this Government considered it correct and appropriate to give Parliament the opportunity to scrutinise these new important tests and to decide for itself that it was satisfied that the weight of ECHR compatibility was right.

That said, we are aware of the concerns that have been raised in relation to the tests applied and we will consider whether any clarification is required.

Q5 – Clarification of what (if any) role ‘special counsel’ currently play within the Scottish legal system and how they will, within the context of the Scottish Government’s proposals on disclosure, help to ensure that an accused person receives a fair trial.

I am aware that this gave members some cause for concern and that it was explored in evidence with me before the Committee at Stage 1.

At present the use of special counsel within the Scottish criminal legal system has been extremely restricted, primarily due to the absence of a set procedure for dealing with the non-disclosure of material information and the appointment of Special Counsel. Special Counsel will help the accused to receive a fair trial because they will be present when the defence are not permitted to be, to ensure there is an adversarial element to the process, and offer counter arguments to those brought by the Prosecutor who is seeking to withhold information.
In addition the Special Counsel will be able to see the non disclosed information and make arguments to the Court about whether it is so important to the defence that, without it, he cannot receive a fair trial.

Unlike in the case of Immigration Control orders, as considered in the English House of Lords case of Secretary of State for the Home Department v AF and others, the information that is withheld from the defence cannot be used by the court in reaching its determination or verdict. The fundamental differences between the circumstances of the AF case and the provisions of the Bill are that, in control order cases, the non-disclosed information is the incriminatory evidence used by the court in deciding whether to grant the order whereas, in our proposed scheme, it is only the exculpatory evidence which is not disclosed (and, even then, only where rigorous tests are met) and, therefore, the court has to entirely disregard information which is the subject of a non-disclosure order in reaching its verdict. As such, Special Counsel within the scheme proposed in Scotland for non-disclosure orders in criminal proceedings do provide an additional safeguard in ensuring that the accused’s rights are protected.

I hope my response is helpful to members of the Committee in considering the disclosure provisions.

As you are aware, there has been discussion recently about the level of Parliamentary scrutiny proposed for the Government's alcohol reforms. This discussion has focussed, in particular, on the Government's proposals for minimum pricing of alcohol.

Scotland's alcohol misuse problem is estimated to cost our country at least £2.25 billion per year in extra services and lost productivity and professionals are agreed that the threat posed to our national health from current levels of consumption is very great. Alcohol-related hospital admissions and deaths have increased markedly in recent years and this Government has already set out our framework for addressing the root causes behind these statistics.

Having taken account of the representations made the Government now proposes to introduce a new health bill that deals with a range of alcohol measures, including minimum price per unit of alcohol, alcohol promotions, limiting the use of marketing material, wine glass sizes. The new bill will also include the proposals on the sale of alcohol to persons under 21 and the social responsibility levy which are currently in the Criminal Justice and Licensing Bill.

A new bill to take forward these provisions collectively will give this issue the prominence required and the Government welcomes the fact that the proposals in the Bill will be subject to full Parliamentary scrutiny.

I would restrict views to Parts 8 and 9. Part 8 deals with amendments to Civic Government Licensing. The view is taken that there would be minimal costs to local authorities even in relation to the withdrawal of the exemption of community markets in respect of market operators licensing, the reference to money or money’s worth within the definition of places of public entertainment and the introduction of the definition of food to late hours catering.

Local authorities have well established Civic Government Licensing systems and in respect of optional activities such as market operators, places of public entertainment and late hours catering have made resolutions. The Financial Memorandum seems to assume that with the proposed changes implemented, local authorities would then go for fresh resolutions to cover the widening of the definitions and, if appropriate, to specify what particular types of event would be exempted, such as small galas and perhaps community or charitable markets.

I had anticipated that the Council’s previous resolutions would stand and thereafter the resolution could be varied under Section 9(9) of the 1982 Act.

If paragraph 978 is instead correct the local authority would require initial consultation, decision of intention to make a resolution and following newspaper notice and consideration of responses a decision to license together with newspaper notices. This would, if it were the case involve local authorities in substantial expense and use of resources. Consideration would have to be given as to the position of existing resolutions and the timeframe for new resolutions. The process would take at least 12-14 months. Even if this proves not to be the case the suggestion that fees for charitable and community markets or free music events and framework displays may be reduced or waived is not helpful as fee structures have been set, the consultation will be the same for these events and any weighing of fees will mean a substantial increase for commercial operators of markets and public entertainment.

The Social Responsibility Levy (Polluter Pays) will raise serious difficulties for local authorities including identifying relevant premises and substantiating this identification, recovery of the levy and action to be taken when the operator is unwilling or unable to pay.

Costs
4. If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the Financial Memorandum? If not, please provide details.

As the Committee will no doubt be aware criminal justice services in this local authority are funded in terms of section27a funding via a funding distribution from the South West Community Justice Authority. We are aware that the Chief officers of the 8 CJA’s in Scotland are meeting to discuss their response to any financial implications that may arise from a Criminal Justice perspective as a consequence of this Bill. This Authority is therefore not currently in a position to make specific comments in this respect. Following the removal of section 129 of the Bill, the only provision likely to have a financial impact on this Authority in relation to the licensing is in respect of the proposed notification process in the fare review process. The memorandum correctly identifies that any such additional costs incurred will be taken into account in licence fees applied by individual local authorities but does not recognise that, as such, they will indirectly be met by the general public.

5. Are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?

As above.

6. Does the Financial Memorandum accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?

From a criminal justice perspective the implications of the Bill (particularly in relation to the presumption against custodial sentences of less than 6 months) will potentially place significantly increased demands upon criminal justice services. Inevitably we would expect costs to rise considerably year upon year as the Act comes into force.
Our experience over the past few years is that there has been a considerable increase in the use of community sentences/requests for reports without making any significant impact upon the levels of custodial sentencing. The financial memorandum by using 10% to 20% assumptions does accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty about costs and timescales but there must be a greater uncertainty as to what impact the Bill will have upon short sentences to reduce the daily prison population and how this may require, in effect resource transfer, to facilitate a commensurate rise in community sentences/alternatives to custody. This Authority remains unclear about the financial implications surrounding the additional burden that might fall on local authorities through increased demands for alternative remand accommodation most likely in the form of secure accommodation. During the period April 2008 to March 2009 forty six juveniles appeared from custody at Kilmarnock Sheriff Court – six of whom were remanded in custody and eight placed in secure accommodation. At present there does not appear to be any mechanism to allow a juvenile to be transferred from a remand placement to secure accommodation.

Wider Issues
7. If the Bill is part of a wider policy initiative, do you believe that these associated costs are accurately reflected in the Financial Memorandum?

Please refer to previous comments about the impact on custodial sentencing.

8. Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation or more developed guidance? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?

A more accurate response to this question might be forthcoming from the CJA’s. At present it is not possible for this Authority to estimate or quantify additional costs arising from either subordinate legislation or more developed guidance.

Stuart McCall
Legal and Procurement Services Manager
North Lanarkshire Council has not taken part in a prior consultation exercise for the Bill: questions 1 to 3 of the questionnaire are, accordingly, not applicable.

In respect of question 4 -6 in respect of cost there are only elements of, in particular, the licensing issues which will impact on local authorities such as North Lanarkshire Council. There are three main areas worthy of comment as follows:

(1) Section 124 relates to licensing of taxi and private hire cars and inter alia contains a proposal to extend the way in which local authorities carry out review of taxi fares. Local authorities are empowered by the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 to set reasonable fees to meet the whole costs of administration of taxi licensing. Having conducted a substantial review of fees a number of years ago, recent practice has been to adopt an inflationary increase in fees for taxis (and other activities licensable under the 1982 Act) on 1 April in each year, in line with the council’s overall approach to discretionary fees and charges generally. If the proposal to notify all taxi operators of taxi fares proposals passes into legislation, there will, following the methodology set out in paragraph 980 of the Explanatory Notes, be a cost impact on this authority of circa £1100 over a three year period. If the cost cannot be absorbed from existing income streams a very modest increase in fees would be required and this would be undertaken via the appropriate committee.

(2) Section 129 relates to a proposal to allow licensing boards a discretionary power to restrict the sale of alcohol to persons aged under 21 years from certain premises. Full consideration of this proposal by the Licensing Board can only take place after any legislation is passed. The Board will require at a minimum to consult with the licensed trade, the Chief Constable, the local Licensing Forum and other appropriate local groups and organisations who are not represented on the Forum as to any new policy which might be introduced and in what manner. Depending on any policy ultimately adopted there may be an impact on the administration of the application process or, more likely, variation of existing premises licence documentation. Any associated work will require to be absorbed within the existing licensing administration operation. There will also be an impact on the delivery of our Licensing Standards Officer service in relation to the provision of guidance to licence holders and regular inspection of premises, although again the extent will not be able to be assessed until decisions are made on policy by the Board. Paragraph 769 of the Explanatory Notes states “there is likely to be a marginal additional cost on Licensing Boards …”. It is impossible to assess at this stage whether that statement is true or not. The Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 sets a mix of capped discretionary fees and mandatory fees for varying types of application. The North Lanarkshire Board has in the main adopted maximum fees where the capped maxima apply. Under present legislative powers there is very limited scope to address a trading deficit if the costs of administration of existing regulations (and any new amendments) outweigh fee income. There is of course scope to reduce maximum fees if income outweighs costs. (When decisions on fees were made by the Board in January 2008 it was noted and accepted that meaningful review of fees by the Board could not in any event take place until the close of financial year 2009/10 at the earliest, the 2005 Act only coming into full operation on 1 September 2009).

(3) The impact of other proposals in relation to Civic Government Act activities – metal dealers, market operators, late night catering and public entertainment - is likely to be minimal in cost terms and would in any event be recovered through licence application fees.

In respect of the wider issues covered by questions 7 and 8 our position would have to be reserved until the 2005 Act is fully operational.

Questions 1-3 – N/A

Costs

4. If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the Financial Memorandum? If not, please provide details.

No account appears to have been taken of the additional costs associated with operating in island, rural or remote environments. The same base costs would be incurred and in such localities the turnover is not there to cover the base costs that must be incurred to provide the service. This should be recognised and the appropriate funding provision addressed.

5. Are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?

The financial costs on the licensing side which is already affected cannot be met without further funding being made available.

6. Does the Financial Memorandum accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?

Not known

Wider Issues

7. If the Bill is part of a wider policy initiative, do you believe that these associated costs are accurately reflected in the Financial Memorandum?

Not known

8. Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation or more developed guidance? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?

Yes – as with all new legislation future costs regularly arise and this should be recognised. One example on the criminal justice side is that there appears to be no indication of additional funding mentioned to address the training requirements of those involved in CJSW and related bodies

Consultation

1. Did you take part in the consultation exercise for the Bill, if applicable, and if so did you comment on the financial assumptions made?

I did not take part in the consultation exercise for the Bill and was not part of the discussion process which arrived at the financial assumptions set out in the Memorandum.

2. Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the Financial Memorandum?

Accordingly, it would not have been realistic for my views to have been taken into account prior to this point.

3. Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?

As I was not part of the consultation process, the question concerning adequacy of time to contribute to it did not arise.

Costs

4. If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the Financial Memorandum? If not, please provide details.

The Bill has major financial consequences for my organisation, Perth and Kinross Council. Section 14 ‘Community Payback Orders’ and Section 17 ‘Protection against Short Periods of Imprisonment or Detention’ are the factors with greatest implications for us. In practice, the resource implications arise from two factors:

- The need to increase average unpaid work hours per offender per week by a factor of almost 100%
- The need to make new Community Payback Orders available for a significant number of persons currently the subject of short sentences of imprisonment.

5. Are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?

The national weekly average number of Community Service hours carried out per offender is of the order of 3.5 - 4 hours. Locally, we have managed to get this figure above 4 hours, but only after considerable effort, a variety of initiatives and the temporary provision of additional resources. In order to meet the Government’s requirement of a 100 hour Unpaid Work Order being completed within three months (let alone their expectation that some Orders in excess of 200 hours should be completed within six months), however, we would need to double our achievements of recent months.

Perth and Kinross covers 2,000 square miles and has a higher than average male employment rate. Consequently, not only do we suffer through the current funding formula for core Criminal Justice Social Work Services, but we also need to provide work at weekends – and pay people to supervise offenders at such times. We provide a wide variety of tasks, including both team and individual placements, but a doubling of the average hours per offender will be a major undertaking.

The Bill’s expectation that we also absorb a very significant proportion of those persons currently sentenced to short terms of imprisonment imposes, if anything, even greater expectations on the Service. On the basis of figures provided from colleagues in the Scottish Prison Service, 170 persons from the Perth and Kinross area were imprisoned during the last year for which we have hard data. Even if only 150 of these were to end up on Community Payback Orders, this would equal the total number of persons currently sentenced to Probation here or exceed the numbers currently on Community Service Orders. In short, it amounts to a very significant increase in the numbers of persons subject to Community Supervision. Bearing in mind, that all of these persons would otherwise have received sentences of imprisonment, it seems reasonable to assume that their crimes would merit the equivalent of Probation or Community Service – both of which will now be subsumed within the new Community Payback Orders.

On the basis of the funding provided to increase Community Service hours last year, it would appear that the pro-rata allocation for Perth and Kinross from the proposed figure of £10million nationally might be of the order of £190,000. In order to oversee the additional offenders on Community Payback Orders, I would anticipate that between 2 and 3 Community Service Supervisors, 1.5 Community Service Officers and between 1 and 1.5 Social Workers will be required. These staff will need to be managed, clerically supported, accommodated and have their transport, training and supplies and services needs met. On this basis, I would anticipate that the cost to this Council of providing a robust, reliable service which meets the requirements of the Act would be closer to £250-280,000.

On the basis of the proposed additional allocation of resources, I am not content that this organisation could meet the costs associated with the Bill. Already, with a standstill Criminal Justice Social Work budget over the last four years, I am unable to keep up with existing infrastructure costs. As to how these additional costs should be met, perhaps a resource transfer from the Prisons division should be effected – reflecting the reducing number of persons entering the Prison system.

6. Does the Financial Memorandum accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?

I would not consider that the Financial Memorandum accurately reflects the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to rise – in relation to the expectations of local authorities. As and when the twin effects of introducing Community Payback Orders and restricting the use of short term custody come into effect, the impact upon Criminal Justice Social Work Services will be very significant and almost immediate.

Wider Issues

7. If the Bill is part of a wider policy initiative, do you believe that these associated costs are accurately reflected in the Financial Memorandum?

Unless I am mistaken, the Bill does not make specific reference to the costs involved in providing part Custody/part Community Orders in further fulfilment of the recommendations of Scotland’s Choice. This may require substantial resource transfer from the Prisons Division and may need to await the closure of an entire facility to free up such resources.

8. Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation or more developed guidance? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?

I am not in a position to comment upon the possible future costs arising from subordinate legislation or more developed guidance. I am clear, however, that the costs associated with introducing community alternatives to custody for such a large number of current prisoners are not adequately reflected within the Financial Memorandum thus far – particularly for rural areas with a dispersed population and limited offender availability for work.

Lead Officer, Criminal Justice and Substance Misuse Services
Perth and Kinross Council
Consultation

1. Did you take part in the consultation exercise for the Bill, if applicable, and if so did you comment on the financial assumptions made?

Community Justice Authorities were consulted regarding the Bill as outlined in the Policy Memorandum, however, we were not consulted on the financial assumptions as these were only made available to us on 13 March 2009.

2. Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the Financial Memorandum?

See above.

3. Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?

There has been insufficient time to consider the financial implications of this Bill and to consult CJA Boards and other partners.

Costs

4. If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the Financial Memorandum? If not, please provide details.

CJAs have responsibility for the distribution of financial resources to Local Authority Criminal Justice Social Work Services across competing demands.

We welcome the commitment that costs will be fully reimbursed for the new arrangements (paragraphs 698 and 784).

However, we have some concerns around the financial assumptions in that they may not reflect a potential increase in SERs requested from Justice of the Peace Courts or from Sheriffs imposing short term sentences who will have to explain how a community disposal could not be made.

There is an assumption that the unit costs for probation, community service and supervised attendance orders which were used as the basis of costing for the new order were sufficient in the first place. The basis of the costings may also not reflect the qualitative change required in how community sentences are delivered alongside the anticipated increase in volume.

5. Are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?
CJAs do not directly commission or deliver services. CJAs are required to make sure allocations are aligned against Government and local priorities and strive to ensure funds are available.

6. Does the Financial Memorandum accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?

CJAs recognise that estimates have been provided between 0% - 20% growth. There is no evidence to suggest whether this will meet margins of uncertainty

Wider Issues

7. If the Bill is part of a wider policy initiative, do you believe that these associated costs are accurately reflected in the Financial Memorandum?

No, the Bill is part of wider policy initiatives; Protecting Scotland’s Communities: Fair, Fast and Flexible Justice, Safer and Stronger Scotland, Reducing Reoffending, and Summary Justice Reforms and does not capture any savings from the intended reduction in short term prison sentences. It, therefore, provides an incomplete picture of the financial implications.

8. Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation or more developed guidance? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?

There are many potential costs associated with the wider policy agendas, such as diversion schemes, addressing offending behaviour in the community and early years initiatives.

These increased demands will be met by Local Authorities, whilst any reduction in the use of imprisonment will not, at present, yield additional resources for redeployment.

The proposed requirement for sentencers to state why short term prison sentences are being imposed may lead to an increase in the demand for SERs.

On behalf of the Community Justice Authorities
Referring to the questions contained in the invitation letter I can confirm that the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service was involved in the consultation exercise on the Bill and had sufficient time to contribute thereto. We did make comment on the financial assumptions made. These comments are accurately reflected in the Financial Memorandum.

The Bill does have financial implications for COPFS and these have been accurately reflected in the Financial Memorandum, together with the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates. I am confident that the Service can meet these costs.

It would not be appropriate for the COPFS to address questions arising from the policy considerations behind the Bill. These are more appropriately addressed by the Scottish Government. Similarly it is a matter for the Scottish Government to address issues of additional costs in the future, associated with subordinate legislation or more developed guidance.

Consultation

1. Did you take part in the consultation exercise for the Bill, if applicable, and if so did you comment on the financial assumptions made?

The Scottish Court Service (SCS) is an Executive Agency of the Scottish Government. As such we were involved in the development of many of the proposals now contained in the Bill, and it was unnecessary for us to participate in the formal consultation exercise.

2. Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the Financial Memorandum?

Costs

4. If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the Financial Memorandum? If not, please provide details.

The Financial Memorandum is, in general, a fair reflection of possible costs to the SCS, although the estimates are subject to variation depending on how many cases are affected by the Bill’s provisions, and are inevitably based on assumptions about court time required, which is hard to estimate with complete accuracy at this stage.

There are some further areas where we could expect modest set-up costs. In particular the special measures for child and vulnerable witnesses at clause 64 of the Bill will require installation of vulnerable witness facilities in 3 further High Court court rooms, at an estimated cost of £0.06m, and the witness anonymity proposals at clause 66 of the Bill would incur a set-up cost for the SCS, for the installation of voice modulation equipment, which we provisionally estimate at £0.007k, together with annual running costs of £0.042m, based on the assumption that there will be 200 such cases p.a.

5. Are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?

To the extent that the Bill reflects new costs on the SCS, we would expect these additional costs to be funded by Scottish Government.
6. Does the Financial Memorandum accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?

Yes

Wider Issues

7. If the Bill is part of a wider policy initiative, do you believe that these associated costs are accurately reflected in the Financial Memorandum?

We are unaware of any associated costs.

8. Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation or more developed guidance? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?

We do not envisage any additional costs.

CONSULTATION

Question 1. Did you take part in the consultation exercise for the Bill, if applicable and if so did you comment on the financial assumptions made?

Answer:
The Scottish Legal Aid Board (the Board) did not take part in the consultation on the Bill but we were asked to provide input to the Financial Memorandum in respect of two of the three areas relevant to the Board in relation to which assumptions have been made. This was in respect of Mandatory Defence Statements, on page 118 of the Financial Memorandum and Crown Appeals at page 140.

There is one further relevant area detailed in the Financial Memorandum upon which we were not asked to comment, namely: amendments to the Custodial Sentences and Weapons Act 2007, at page 124.

Question 2. Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the Financial Memorandum?

Answer:
In relation to Mandatory Defence Statements, our comments have been accurately reflected.

Question 3. Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?

Answer:
Whilst the Board did not take part in the consultation on the Bill, we did have sufficient time to contribute to those aspects of the Financial Memorandum on which we were asked to comment.

COSTS

Question 4. If the Bill has any financial implications for your organization, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the Financial Memorandum? If not, please provide details.

Answer:
The financial implications in relation to Mandatory Defence Statements and Crown Appeals are accurately reflected in the Memorandum.

With regard to the financial implications for the remaining area relevant to the Board in the Financial Memorandum, we would observe as follows.

Although we did not provide comment on the amendments to the Custodial Sentences and Weapons Act 2007 in the current Financial Memorandum (at page 124), we did provide input to the Financial Memorandum to the Custodial Sentences and Weapons Act 2007 when it was at Bill stage. In relation to the amendments to the Custodial Sentences and Weapons Act 2007, we cannot offer comment, as the rationale for the financial assumptions contained in the Financial Memorandum have not been set out.

Having considered Crown Appeals, we would agree with the financial implications on page 140.

Question 5. Are you content that your organization can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill. If not, how do you think these costs should be met?

Answer
The Scottish Legal Aid Fund is not cash limited but initiatives, such as those contained in the Bill, may impact on Fund expenditure depending on the number and average case costs. Whilst we do not know the numbers involved, we would like to take this opportunity to highlight the following issues in relation to the Bill’s new provisions as far as they may potentially affect the cost of legal aid and thus Fund expenditure.

- Clause 14 Community Payback Orders

In terms of the Advice and Assistance (ABWOR) (Scotland) Regulations 2003 (2003 Regulations) we cannot provide legal assistance for these orders because there is no provision in them to enable us to do so. These regulations will require to be amended accordingly and the Board have notified the Scottish Government of the need for this change.

Assuming the 2003 Regulations are amended, this new order will sit alongside existing orders detailed in regulation 4 of the 2003 Regulations, such as Breach of Probation and Breach of Community Service. As far as costs are concerned it would therefore be reasonable to assume that likely costs to the Legal Aid Fund can be calculated by reference to the current average cost of the existing cases contained in regulation 4 as referred to above.

This average cost, in the period 2007-2008, was £323 per case in the Sheriff Court. What is unknown is the likely number of breaches. This is because we do not know how many orders are likely to be made, nor the numbers of breaches. The financial implications therefore cannot be commented upon because the cost will be £323 times the number of breaches of the order. In addition, the Bill provides for review of such orders. In terms of the existing legislation there is currently provision for ABWOR in relation to review of probation orders and we therefore assume it is the intention to provide similar legal assistance for review of Community Payback Orders in addition to breach. It is noted that the policy intention is to replace the existing range of orders such as Probation and Community Service with the Community Payback Order and therefore the cost is expected to be neutral if this is the case.

The Bill, however, also provides that Community Payback Orders can be made in the JP as well as the Sheriff Courts. This means that breaches of such orders made in the JP Court will be an additional cost to the Fund because this is a new type of disposal that the JP Court can make.
Ordinary advice and assistance would however still be available (as it is for any matter of Scots law), but this would not allow a solicitor to take steps in proceedings including representation of the client in court. Where advice and assistance is made available for cases in the JP court there will be a corresponding additional cost to the Fund.

- Clause 15 Non-Harassment Orders

Unlike the new Community Payback Orders, there is currently provision at 4(2)(g) in the 2003 Regulations relation to this type of proceedings insofar as they relate to the revocation and variation of these orders. The proposed amendment makes it less onerous for prosecutors to apply for such an order. Given the threshold has been lowered, it follows that more orders can be made and potentially, more revoked or varied.

There would therefore be an associated cost to the Fund based on (as noted for Community Payback Orders) the average cost of a case governed by regulation 4 of the 2003 Regulations (£323), times the number of revocations and variations. However, according to our figures for the past five months ABWOR has been granted twice in respect of these orders, which would seem to indicate that revocations and variations are relatively few.

- Clauses 25 and 27 Involvement in Serious Organised Crime and Directing Serious Organised Crime

It is worth indicating in relation to cases falling under these two clauses that, while they are not expected to be numerous, they may be potentially more costly in terms of added complexity of the case.

- Clause 41 Breach of Undertaking

This section does not create a new offence as such. Rather it amends section 22 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 to bring the consequences for offending while on an undertaking in line with the situation for breach of bail. It is seen as “cost neutral” to the Fund.

- Clause 46 Breach of Bail

This new section allows prosecutors to amend the principal complaint to allow additional charges of breach of bail which come up during the currency of proceedings.

In cases where summary criminal legal aid has been made available for the substantive offence the Board does not make any additional payments for any subsequent breach of bail in terms of section 27(1)(a) of the 1995 Act as this work is deemed to be subsumed into the original grant of criminal legal aid. However, for breaches of bail in terms of section 27(1)(b) of the 1995 Act, the Board will pay a half fee to solicitors.

Accordingly, this new section will potentially result in a saving against the Fund for those cases were a half fee was previously paid. The total saving will depend upon the number of ‘half fees’ we currently pay which no longer are raised as a separate complaint; for a breach of bail in terms of section 27(1)(b) of the 1995 Act we pay, as summary criminal legal aid, £257.50 in the Sheriff Court and £157.50 in the JP Court. The ABWOR fee is £257.50 and £75 respectively.

- Clauses 102-112 Disclosure

In the absence of anticipated numbers of such applications being made by the prosecutor, it is difficult for the Board to provide a reasonable estimate as to cost. For solemn procedure it would appear that there will be no associated cost to the Fund as the envisaged procedure excludes defence participation.

There is limited involvement for the defence (and accordingly associated costs against the Fund) under summary procedure, but again we do not have any indication as to the number of occasions that this is likely to happen. Summary cases are paid on a fixed fee basis and therefore the only additional cost to the Fund would arise should these hearings result in the Board being asked to treat the case as an ‘exceptional case’. If the Board considers the case merits ‘exceptional case’ status, the case is then paid for on a “time and line basis”. The current average for a case granted exceptional case status is approximately £1400; this compares to the average payment in a summary fixed fee case of £588.

With regard clause 107 (Special Counsel), we do not know how often this procedure would be used. Given the wording of this clause and the import of the Policy document accompanying the Bill, this appears to be a cost for the Scottish Court Service given that the appointment of Special Counsel is by the Court. The position would require clarification.

In the event that the Board had to meet the cost of Special Counsel, as a reasonable comparator the applicable rate could be that currently paid to counsel in Commission and Diligence proceedings. Counsel in these types of proceedings are paid with regard to the fees paid to counsel for days of trial. These rates, which vary depending on the status of counsel and category of offence, can be found at Schedule 2 of the Criminal Legal Aid (Fee Regulations)(Scotland) Regulations 2007). These fees are summarized below:

Question 6. Does the Financial Memorandum accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?
Answer
In the absence of more detailed information as regards the potential volume of applications and the assumptions on which the amendments to the 2007 Act were based, we are unable to comment further.

WIDER ISSUES
Question 7. If the Bill is part of a wider policy initiative, do you believe that these associated costs are accurately reflected in the Financial Memorandum?

Answer:
In the absence of information about any wider policy initiative, we are unable to comment.

Question 8. Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation or more developed guidance? If so is it possible to quantify these costs?

Answer:
For the reasons detailed above we are not currently in a position to provide an answer to this question.

Owen Mullan
Head of Criminal Legal Services
Overall, with the possible exception of the amendments to the CSAW Act 2007, we consider there to be no significant financial impact of the Bill’s provisions on the SPS, either in terms of additional costs or resources released.

A number of the specific measures in the Bill identify illustrative costs or savings to the SPS. These have been derived by applying the average long term full economic cost of a prisoner place to the Scottish Government’s assumptions about the number and length of convictions resulting from the various measures.

Whilst these are valid as illustrative costings, the actual financial impact on the SPS is much harder to gauge. The SPS is funded for its design capacity, which will rise to just under 7,600 in the course of 2009/10. Despite the provision of the new 700 place prison at HMP Addiewell, a new houseblock at Edinburgh, and a further houseblock scheduled to open at Polmont in the autumn of 2009, the SPS is already operating at substantially above its design capacity (prisoner numbers were 8,066 as of the 8th of April), without consequent additional funding.

Indeed, despite the investment in the new prison, the SPS continues to operate at levels beyond the assessed operational limits at some establishments with consequent erosion of service delivery as existing resources become overstretched. HMCIP has pointed out the ‘evils’ of overcrowding and he is right. The Financial Memorandum records that the CSAW Act 2007, as amended, will have additional financial consequences for the SPS, albeit these are less than the 2007 Act as enacted. The Memorandum also acknowledges that implementation will not be possible until the prison population has been reduced to a point where there are resources available to support the changes. In this context, the SPS welcomes the potential longer term benefits of the package of community based measures, including the presumption against short sentences, and the proposals for tough alternatives to custody. These have the potential to reduce churn and allow resources to be focussed on achieving a workable sentence management regime for those offenders who are sent to prison.

SPS is committed to working with the Scottish Government to deliver and realise the benefits of the Offender Management Strategy. We are already actively contributing to the new programme of work in addition to strengthening our approach to offender management, continuing to work at improving joint working with CJAs, local authorities, statutory and other partners.

The SPS believes that excessive use of prison and overcrowded prisons reduce public protection rather than contributing to public safety. Prison can do good for some offenders, in particular those that present a serious risk of public harm. But prison itself can do harm; and the biggest harm is to people serving short sentences.

Imprisonment impacts on the life not only of an offender but of their family, the very act of imprisonment can reduce the positive factors which would contribute to reduce re-offending in the future. An offender is removed from employment, suffers disruption to the relationships and controls offered by family and community, and can lose access to their home. It is difficult to promote inclusion from an excluding process and use of short term imprisonment is likely to take the most deprived and make them even harder to reach in the future. Indeed the pressure of numbers created by short term churn makes effective rehabilitative work with longer term prisoners more difficult because time is spent managing the population, diluting the focus of resources on rehabilitation.

It is only right to take every opportunity to find effective disposals which stop or reduce offending and re-offending at the earliest stage, diverting minor or first offenders from the “conveyor belt” of the criminal justice system and tackling offending behaviour without the added negative impact that prison produces. Research suggests that early intervention and a care based model is more effective with young people than a justice based approach, that desistance is best supported in the community and that effective community based disposals have positive impact on public protection.

We are all committed to making Scotland a safer place this can be better achieved by breaking the cycle of re-offending at the earliest possible stage. Diverting some of these offenders into meaningful community alternatives and leaving Prisons to those whom we know can benefit from the range of interventions we have to offer, would be a very positive step in making Scotland safer and stronger.

Consultation

1. Did you take part in the consultation exercise for the Bill, if applicable, and if so did you comment on the financial assumptions made?

SPSA Forensic Services did not provide direct input into the consultation on the Criminal Justice and Licensing Bill, but did provide input to a separate consultation on Disclosure. The costs provided by SPSA Forensic Services were estimated for that consultation, i.e. costs associated with Disclosure, which links to part 6 of the Bill.

2. Do you believe your comments on the financial assumptions have been accurately reflected in the Financial Memorandum?

The comments and assumptions made have been recorded on pages 110 and 111 of the Memorandum and are accurate as provided by the SPSA.

3. Did you have sufficient time to contribute to the consultation exercise?

Yes, however the request for estimated costs was separate to the consultation process and was completed on a relatively short timescale. This limited the level of internal consultation / fact finding that the costing was based on.

Costs

4. If the Bill has any financial implications for your organisation, do you believe that these have been accurately reflected in the Financial Memorandum? If not, please provide details.

The costs provided by SPSA Forensic Services have been recorded on pages 110 and 111 of the Memorandum and are accurate as provided by the SPSA. (assumed to be included in the combined costs referenced in the summary table as Sections 85-116 – Disclosure)

The figures provided do not capture the cost associated with the disclosure of previous convictions for SPSA expert staff.

The estimated cost for this is around £50/60k per annum (recurring) to pay for the resources necessary to ensure this information is provided. These costs were not included as it is assumed these costs would be covered as part of the police costs for providing details of witness previous convictions.

5. Are you content that your organisation can meet the financial costs associated with the Bill? If not, how do you think these costs should be met?
SPSA Forensic Services was established based on the costs incurred by Scottish Police Forces during 2006 / 2007 in the delivery of forensic services. The impact of disclosure will generate new work that will need to be addressed by an increase in resources across the service. As this is effectively new business it cannot be funded from within the current finances of the organisation.

In order to meet these additional requirements it is envisaged that these costs will be the subject of a detailed business case and bid for additional funding from the Scottish Government.

6. Does the Financial Memorandum accurately reflect the margins of uncertainty associated with the estimates and the timescales over which such costs would be expected to arise?

In terms of the estimated costs, the figures supplied remain in line with SPSA’s assessment of the impact of Disclosure on the organisation.

In terms of timescales, it is envisaged that some level of training will be required during this financial year to ensure SPSA is ready to respond to the requirements set out in the Bill during 2010, and to fall in line with Police / COPFS timescales for implementation. This timescale is not reflected in the Memorandum.

Wider Issues

7. If the Bill is part of a wider policy initiative, do you believe that these associated costs are accurately reflected in the Financial Memorandum?

It is not clear what implications a wider policy initiative would have for SPSA Forensic Services, as such SPSA Forensic Services cannot comment at this time.

8. Do you believe that there may be future costs associated with the Bill, for example through subordinate legislation or more developed guidance? If so, is it possible to quantify these costs?

There may be additional future costs, in particular if such legislation affects the speed of response or the volumes of responses required, but it is not possible to quantify these additional costs at this time.

I have considered the minutes of the Finance Committee and note Colleagues covered the financial aspects of the Bill from a Criminal Justice perspective.

There are common costs that are borne by all Councils in making provision to meet their statutory obligations be that under licensing and or from the criminal justice side. The costs are alluded to by my colleague in his response at Q8 below. On the licensing side the establishment costs are to be met and both the Civic Government and Liquor Licensing are meant to be self funding however, the base line costs, which are more capable of being absorbed in the larger areas have an effect on the ability of smaller, rural locations to achieve that. There are minimum baseline costs that are required to support the statutory functions. For the licensing side this is reflected in fee income and the absence of the number of traders to support that. The removal of the sections referred to by the Scottish Government is noted. The reference was to alert the Committee to the fact that regardless of where you are based there are minimum costs to be met to deliver a service this applies generally to the Bill as a whole. The Bills provisions are far reaching and colleagues who appeared before Committee addressed these costs on the Criminal Justice side. The proposals regarding the Civic Government reform and liquor licensing are noted and may lead to streamlining.

SUPPLEMENTARY SUBMISSION FROM PERTH AND KINROSS COUNCIL

You are correct in saying that I restated our position somewhat in relation to the adequacy of proposed funding for Community Payback Orders / Reduction in numbers entering Prison for periods of less than 6 months. I amplified my written observations by observing that, although the prospective sum seemed realistic in relation to the number of additional staff who may be required on the ground to deliver these enhanced services, I did not think that sufficient allowance had been made for management, accommodation, clerical support and transport costs. These costs are equally important, have not always been accounted for in the past and impact directly on our ability to deliver fast and effective services.

I was also invited by Mr Welsh to confirm the Unit costs allowed per Probation Order as I did not have these to hand when asked during yesterday’s meeting. These I have calculated by comparing the sum provided to Tayside CJA for the provision of Social Work services with the actual number of probation Orders/Community Service orders etc for the last available year, as follows:

1. Allowance per Probation Order - £1364.
2. Allowance per Supervised Attendance Order - £564
3. Allowance per Community Service order - £2389

It is the allowance per Probation Order which gives me greatest cause for concern. These are used to supervise some of our most concerning offenders and can be up to 3 years in length. The Unit cost allowed for delivery of such services is unrealistic now and will become more so as we endeavour to supervise people in the churn of short term prison sentences who require ever higher levels of support and supervision if they are to escape the cycle of reoffending.

Clause 89. Prosecutor’s duty to disclose information
The prosecutor is only required to disclose information which is material to the defence, but must notify the accused of other information held which does not meet these criteria. The accused will be able to apply to the court for an order requiring the prosecutor to disclose information which was not considered to meet the criteria for disclosure.

Clause 94. Defence statements: solemn proceedings
The prosecutor is required to review the decision taken under Clause 89 in the light of the information provided in the defence statement; The accused will similarly be able to apply to the court for an order requiring the prosecutor to disclose information following lodging of defence statement and the prosecutor’s subsequent review.

Clause 100. Order enabling disclosure to third party
The accused is prohibited from using the information disclosed, for any purpose apart from preparation of the defence or an appeal. However, the accused will be able to apply to the court for permission to pass specified disclosed material to a specified person.
It is anticipated that a similar procedure will apply in all three of the above types of application.

Marilyn Riddell
Policy and Legislation Branch
Policy and Strategy Directorate
During our evidence to the Finance Committee on the Financial Memorandum for the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill, we agreed to provide further information in respect of the Community Payback Order and presumption against short periods of imprisonment (sections 14 and 17 of the Bill).

Clarification has been sought on the breakdown of prisoners currently serving short term prison sentences. Direct sentenced receptions to Scottish penal establishments in 2007-08 for offenders sentenced to under 6 months amounted to 8,191, comprising 6,964 adult prisoners and 1,227 young offenders. These figures, which exclude 3,610 receptions for fine default and 412 receptions for recall, are from the Prisons Statistics Scotland 2007-08 bulletin published in August 2008.

The numbers of receptions differ from the figures for custodial sentences which appear in the Criminal Proceedings in Scottish Courts statistical bulletin, the most recent edition of which was published on 28 April. The latter records sentences of courts whilst those in the prisons statistical bulletin count receptions to penal establishments. Direct sentenced receptions to penal establishments (i.e. excluding fine defaulters) are counted differently from custodial disposals in the court proceedings statistics for two main reasons. Firstly, a number of offenders will have been held on remand prior to sentencing and, as a result, served the required number of days before being sentenced. These individuals would be included within the court statistics, but excluded from the sentenced prison receptions. Secondly, if a person is given custodial sentences for separate sets of charges from the same court on the same day, this is reported as multiple custodial sentences in the court statistics, but only one direct sentenced reception.

Of the 8,191 receptions for sentences of less than 6 months a certain number of individuals were received into custody on more than one occasion. In total, 6,076 individuals accounted for the 8,191 receptions in 2007-08. In essence the presumption set out in section 17 of the Bill against custodial terms of 6 months and under has the potential to impact on the 6,076 individuals received into custody in the latest year for which data is available plus the 3,610 receptions for fine default (this represents 3,246 individuals). The Committee will wish to be aware that the 3,610 receptions for fine default represented a 39% reduction from the previous year’s figure of 5,963 and a further reduction is anticipated in the current year. This follows implementation in September 2007 of provisions whereby courts, which would otherwise have imposed a short custodial sentence for those defaulting on fines not exceeding £500 are required instead to impose a Supervised Attendance Order. The latter provision operated only for part year in 2007-08 and the full 12 months effect has still to be realised.

A snapshot of the crime breakdown of those received into custody for sentences of under 6 months is attached at Annex A. On 26 March 2008, this stood at 536, which represents 7% of the total prison population at that point.
One aspect of our proposals is that for the first time courts will have access to imposing an unpaid work and other activity requirement for relatively short periods starting at 20 hours. Existing Community Service Orders have a minimum period of 80 hours and whilst Supervised Attendance Orders are for periods of between 10 and 100 hours with the exceptions of two relatively small scale pilot exercises they are restricted to use with offenders who have defaulted on their fines i.e. they are not used as a sentence of first instance.

We believe that the shorter time periods could prove an attractive sentencing options for courts particularly justice of the peace courts where a level 1 unpaid work and other activity requirement could be used with an offender who lacks the financial means to pay a fine. Whilst there might be significant numbers of such orders these are likely to be offset by the number of offenders who might otherwise have been fined, subsequently defaulted on the fine and had a level 1 order imposed as a result. The net increase may not therefore be too dramatic.

As we underlined in oral evidence, it is difficult to predict with any certainty changes in sentencer behaviour, which is why we have used a range of assumptions about possible outcomes. Sentencers will rightly retain discretion to sentence as they think appropriate having regard to the specific circumstances of the case. As indicated by the Minister for Community Safety during the Parliamentary debate on offender management on 8 January this year, there is no intention to remove sentencers powers in relation to those sentenced who might otherwise have received custodial terms of 6 months or less:

“The member said that he is against removing all discretion from sheriffs, but that is not what is proposed. We are not removing discretion but creating a presumption.”

Our 10% and 20% assumptions of increased numbers of Community Payback Orders in absolute numbers set out in paragraphs 695 and 697 of the Financial Memorandum represent additional capacity of 1,939 and 3,878 orders beyond the total number of existing orders imposed by courts in 2007-08 and as set out at paragraph 679 of the memorandum. This additional capacity requires to be considered in the context of the 6,076 and 3,610 receptions indicated above. Past experience suggests that sentencers are cautious in making changes to their sentencing behaviour and we therefore believe that the assumptions represent a reasonable range of increases in the context of the numbers of prison receptions for individuals for this length of sentence.

The approach we have adopted in terms of the Financial Memorandum is to attempt to identify the additional costs which are likely to be incurred as a result of the provisions in the Bill. Whether the existing baseline is sufficient to is, we believe, a separate issue and outwith the scope of the memorandum although the Committee will wish to be aware that an additional £2 million has been made available for 2009-10 to Community Justice Authorities to achieve improvements in immediacy and speed of completion of community service orders and increased workloads.

The Committee also asked whether Community Justice Authorities (CJAs) were consulted on the contents of the Financial Memorandum and had sufficient time to respond. Whilst the CJAs were not consulted on the detailed figures in the memorandum they were alerted in advance to the timing of the Bill’s introduction and to the likelihood that they would be invited to give evidence to both the Finance and Justice Committees on the provisions within the Bill. Scottish Government officials offered to provide the Chief Officers of the CJAs with a detailed briefing of the figures and assumptions used in the Financial Memorandum but this offer was declined on the basis that it was not felt to be necessary.

Notes:

If a prisoner is convicted of more than one crime/offence, the main crime/offence is defined as the one attracting the longest sentence, and assumed to be the most serious.

1 Given that the exact length of a 6 month sentence will depend on the date of sentencing and the number of days in the month, extracting the numbers sentenced to exactly 6 months would require a separate exercise and take some time. The scale of change in this case is estimated to be about 10% at the most.
During the evidence session, Alastair Merrill undertook to provide additional information to the Committee on a number of issues. He also referred to information that the SPS had submitted to the Justice Committee in Autumn 2008. I have therefore attached a copy of Mike Ewart's response to the Justice Committee scrutiny of the SPS draft budget for 2009-10\(^1\), together with an extract of his evidence to the Justice Committee in September 2008\(^2\). This information provides full details of the Assessed Operation Limit of the SPS and how the reduction of short-term prison sentences is only likely to have an effect on the churn of the prison population, as opposed to having a significant reduction in cost or prisoner places in the short-term. It should be noted that the current AOL is 8920. I can also confirm that the annual average cost per prisoner place, including capital charges, for 2007-08 was £41,470 (and £32,358 excluding capital charges).

In relation to the further analytical information on the effect on the Prison Service of the reduction in short-term custodial sentences and confirmation of the number of prisoners in custody who are serving a sentence of 6 months or less, Scottish Government colleagues have agreed to provide this information.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill: Financial Memorandum

The Convener (Andrew Welsh): Good afternoon and welcome to the Finance Committee’s ninth meeting in 2009 in the third session of the Scottish Parliament. I ask everyone—members and public alike—to turn off their mobile phones and pagers.

We have received apologies from Joe FitzPatrick. In his place I welcome Kenneth Gibson, who is attending as a Scottish National Party substitute. As this is the first time that Kenneth Gibson has attended a Finance Committee meeting in that capacity, I invite him to make a declaration of any interests relevant to the committee’s remit.

Kenneth Gibson (Cunninghame North) (SNP): The vineyards in Provence and the château in Tuscany are, I think, the only things that I wish to declare at this time. Sorry, I have no declarations whatsoever to make in relation to the work of the committee.

The Convener: I am tempted to ask more, but I shall resist that temptation.
