Bill (As Passed) (SP Bill 24B) 3376
Foreword

Purpose of the series

The aim of this series is to bring together in a single place all the official Parliamentary documents relating to the passage of the Bill that becomes an Act of the Scottish Parliament (ASP). The list of documents included in any particular volume will depend on the nature of the Bill and the circumstances of its passage, but a typical volume will include:

- every print of the Bill (usually three – “As Introduced”, “As Amended at Stage 2” and “As Passed”);
- the accompanying documents published with the “As Introduced” print of the Bill (and any revised versions published at later Stages);
- every Marshalled List of amendments from Stages 2 and 3;
- every Groupings list from Stages 2 and 3;
- the lead Committee’s “Stage 1 report” (which itself includes reports of other committees involved in the Stage 1 process, relevant committee Minutes and extracts from the Official Report of Stage 1 proceedings);
- the Official Report of the Stage 1 and Stage 3 debates in the Parliament;
- the Official Report of Stage 2 committee consideration;
- the Minutes (or relevant extracts) of relevant Committee meetings and of the Parliament for Stages 1 and 3.

All documents included are re-printed in the original layout and format, but with minor typographical and layout errors corrected. An exception is the groupings of amendments for Stage 2 and Stage 3 (a list of amendments in debating order was included in the original documents to assist members during actual proceedings but is omitted here as the text of amendments is already contained in the relevant marshalled list).

Where documents in the volume include web-links to external sources or to documents not incorporated in this volume, these links have been checked and are correct at the time of publishing this volume. The Scottish Parliament is not responsible for the content of external Internet sites. The links in this volume will not be monitored after publication, and no guarantee can be given that all links will continue to be effective.

Documents in each volume are arranged in the order in which they relate to the passage of the Bill through its various stages, from introduction to passing. The Act itself is not included on the grounds that it is already generally available and is, in any case, not a Parliamentary publication.

Outline of the legislative process

Bills in the Scottish Parliament follow a three-stage process. The fundamentals of the process are laid down by section 36(1) of the Scotland Act 1998, and amplified by Chapter 9 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders. In outline, the process is as follows:
• Introduction, followed by publication of the Bill and its accompanying documents;
• Stage 1: the Bill is first referred to a relevant committee, which produces a report informed by evidence from interested parties, then the Parliament debates the Bill and decides whether to agree to its general principles;
• Stage 2: the Bill returns to a committee for detailed consideration of amendments;
• Stage 3: the Bill is considered by the Parliament, with consideration of further amendments followed by a debate and a decision on whether to pass the Bill.

After a Bill is passed, three law officers and the Secretary of State have a period of four weeks within which they may challenge the Bill under sections 33 and 35 of the Scotland Act respectively. The Bill may then be submitted for Royal Assent, at which point it becomes an Act.

Standing Orders allow for some variations from the above pattern in some cases. For example, Bills may be referred back to a committee during Stage 3 for further Stage 2 consideration. In addition, the procedures vary for certain categories of Bills, such as Committee Bills or Emergency Bills. For some volumes in the series, relevant proceedings prior to introduction (such as pre-legislative scrutiny of a draft Bill) may be included.

The reader who is unfamiliar with Bill procedures, or with the terminology of legislation more generally, is advised to consult in the first instance the Guidance on Public Bills published by the Parliament. That Guidance, and the Standing Orders, are available for sale from Stationery Office bookshops or free of charge on the Parliament’s website (www.scottish.parliament.uk).

The series is produced by the Legislation Team within the Parliament’s Chamber Office. Comments on this volume or on the series as a whole may be sent to the Legislation Team at the Scottish Parliament, Edinburgh EH99 1SP.

Notes on this volume

The Bill to which this volume relates followed the standard 3 stage process described above.

The written evidence received by the lead committee was listed at Annex E of the Stage 1 report and published electronically on the committee’s website. Hard copy versions of all written evidence and supplementary written evidence received by the lead committee has, therefore, been included after the Stage 1 report. During and after the Stage 1 process, there was a series of correspondence between the lead committee and the Scottish Government. Hard copy versions of these documents are also included after the Stage 1 report.

Reports from the then Subordinate Legislation Committee and Finance Committee are included in the lead committee’s Stage 1 report. The written evidence received by the Finance Committee and the Official Report of the oral evidence taken by the Finance Committee were not included in the lead committee’s Stage 1 report. The written evidence, the relevant extracts from the Official Report and the Committee’s minutes are, therefore, included in this volume after the Stage 1 report.

Stage 2
The lead committee invited further written evidence during its Stage 2 consideration. The written evidence received is included after the Official Report of the final day of Stage 2 consideration. The lead committee also received further correspondence from the Scottish Government during the committee’s Stage 2 consideration and this correspondence is included after the written evidence referred to above.

Stage 3
Prior to Stage 3, there was further correspondence between the lead committee and the Scottish Government and this is included following the report from the Subordinate Legislation on the Bill as amended at Stage 2.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

[AS INTRODUCED]

An Act of the Scottish Parliament to make provision about sentencing, offenders and defaulters; to make provision about criminal law, procedure and evidence; to make provision about criminal justice and the investigation of crime (including police functions); to amend the law relating to the licensing of certain activities by local authorities; to amend the law relating to the sale of alcohol; and for connected purposes.

PART 1

SENTENCING

Purposes and principles of sentencing

1 Purposes and principles of sentencing

(1) The purposes of sentencing are—

(a) the punishment of offenders,
(b) the reduction of crime (including its reduction by deterrence),
(c) the reform and rehabilitation of offenders,
(d) the protection of the public, and
(c) the making of reparation by offenders to persons affected by their offences.

(2) A court, in sentencing an offender in respect of an offence, must have regard to the purposes of sentencing.

(3) Other matters to which a court must have regard in sentencing an offender in respect of an offence include—

(a) the seriousness of the offence,
(b) any information before the court about the effect of the offence on any person (other than the offender),
(c) the range of sentences available to the court in dealing with the offence,
(d) the desirability of ensuring consistency in sentencing in respect of the same type of offence,
(e) any information before the court about the circumstances and attitude of the offender (including, for example, information about the matters specified in subsection (4)).

(4) Those matters are—

(a) any other offences committed by the offender,

(b) any change in the offender’s behaviour or attitude as a result of previous sentences imposed in respect of any other offence,

(c) the offender’s family circumstances,

(d) the level of risk which the offender poses to the public,

(e) the offender’s willingness to reform.

(5) Subsections (2) and (3) do not apply—

(a) in relation to an offender aged under 18 at the time of the offence,

(b) in relation to the imposition of a sentence in respect of an offence so far as the sentence for that offence is fixed by law,

(c) in relation to the making of—

(i) a compulsion order under section 57A of the 1995 Act,

(ii) a guardianship order under section 58(1A) of that Act,

(iii) a restriction order under section 59 of that Act,

(iv) a hospital direction under section 59A of that Act, or

(v) an intervention order under section 60B of that Act.

(6) In this Part, “sentence” includes any order or disposal which a court may make in dealing with an offender in respect of an offence, but does not include an order for committal in default of payment of any sum of money or for contempt of court; and “sentencing” is to be construed accordingly.

Relationship between section 1 and other law

(1) Where, under a provision of any enactment, the matters to which a court must or must not have regard in sentencing an offender in respect of an offence are inconsistent with those to which the court must have regard under section 1, the court need not comply with section 1 to that extent.

(2) Where the matters to which a court must have regard under section 1 in sentencing an offender in respect of an offence are inconsistent with the sentencing guidelines, the court need not comply with section 1 to that extent.

(3) Where the matters to which a court must have regard under section 1 in sentencing an offender in respect of an offence are inconsistent with those to which the court must or must not have regard by virtue of any rule of law, the court need not comply with the rule of law to that extent.

(4) Otherwise, section 1 does not affect any other duty or power imposed or conferred on a court to take account of or have regard to (or not to take account of or have regard to) any matter in sentencing an offender in respect of an offence.
The Scottish Sentencing Council

3 The Scottish Sentencing Council

(1) There is established a body corporate to be known as the “Scottish Sentencing Council” (referred to in this Part as the “Council”).

(2) Schedule 1 makes further provision about the Council.

4 The Council’s objectives

The Council must, in carrying out its functions, seek to—

(a) promote consistency in sentencing practice,
(b) assist the development of policy in relation to sentencing,
(c) promote greater awareness and understanding of sentencing policy and practice.

5 Sentencing guidelines

(1) The function of the Council is to prepare and publish guidelines relating to the sentencing of offenders.

(2) Such guidelines are to be known as “sentencing guidelines”.

(3) Sentencing guidelines may in particular relate to—

(a) the principles and purposes of sentencing,
(b) sentencing levels,
(c) the particular types of sentence that are appropriate for particular types of offence or offender,

(d) the circumstances in which the guidelines may be departed from.

(4) Sentencing guidelines may be general in nature or may relate to a particular category of offence or offender or a particular matter relating to sentencing.

(5) The Council must include in any sentencing guidelines—

(a) an assessment of the costs and benefits to which the implementation of the guidelines would be likely to give rise,

(b) an assessment of the likely effect of the guidelines on—

(i) the number of persons detained in prisons or other institutions,
(ii) the number of persons serving sentences in the community, and
(iii) the criminal justice system generally.

(6) The Council must specify in any sentencing guidelines the date on which the guidelines take effect.

(7) Different dates may be specified in relation to different provisions of the guidelines.

(8) The Council—

(a) must from time to time review any sentencing guidelines published by it, and

(b) may publish revised guidelines.

(9) This section applies to any revised guidelines as it applies to sentencing guidelines.
6 Procedure for publication and review of sentencing guidelines

(1) The Council must, before publishing any sentencing guidelines or revised sentencing guidelines—
   (a) publish a draft of the proposed guidelines, and
   (b) consult the following persons about the draft—
       (i) the Scottish Ministers,
       (ii) the Lord Advocate,
       (iii) such other persons as the Council considers appropriate.

(2) The draft must include the assessments referred to in section 5(5).

(3) The Council must, in finalising the sentencing guidelines or revised sentencing guidelines, have regard to any comments made on the draft following publication and consultation under subsection (1).

7 Effect of sentencing guidelines

(1) A court (whether at first instance or on appeal) must—
   (a) in sentencing an offender in respect of an offence, have regard to any sentencing guidelines which are applicable in relation to the case,
   (b) in carrying out any other function relating to the sentencing of offenders, have regard to any sentencing guidelines applicable to the carrying out of the function.

(2) If the court decides not to follow the guidelines, it must state the reasons for its decision.

(3) The sentencing guidelines to which the court must have regard under subsection (1) are those applicable to the case at the time the court is sentencing the offender or, as the case may be, carrying out the function.

(4) Subsection (5) applies where, on appeal in any case, the High Court of Justiciary passes another sentence under one of the following provisions of the 1995 Act—
   (a) section 118(3),
   (b) section 118(4)(b),
   (c) section 118(4A)(b),
   (d) section 118(4A)(c)(ii),
   (e) section 189(1)(b).

(5) The sentencing guidelines which the High Court must have regard to under subsection (1) in passing that other sentence are those applicable to the case at the time it is passed.

(6) A revision of the sentencing guidelines after an offender is sentenced in respect of an offence is not a ground for the referral of the case to the High Court of Justiciary under section 194B of the 1995 Act (references to the High Court of cases dealt with on indictment).

(7) In section 108 of the 1995 Act (Lord Advocate’s right of appeal against disposal where conviction on indictment), after subsection (2) insert—
“(2A) In deciding whether to appeal under subsection (1) in any case, the Lord Advocate must have regard to any sentencing guidelines which are applicable in relation to the case.”.

(8) In section 175 of the 1995 Act (prosecutor’s right of appeal against disposal in summary proceedings), after subsection (4B) insert—

“(4C) In deciding whether to appeal under subsection (4) in any case, the prosecutor must have regard to any sentencing guidelines which are applicable in relation to the case.”.

8 Ministers’ power to request that guidelines be published or reviewed

(1) The Scottish Ministers may request that the Council consider publishing or reviewing sentencing guidelines on any matter.

(2) The Council must have regard to any request made by the Scottish Ministers.

(3) If the Council decides not to comply with a request made by the Scottish Ministers, it must provide the Scottish Ministers with reasons for its decision.

9 High Court’s power to request review of guidelines

(1) The High Court of Justiciary may refer sentencing guidelines to the Council and ask the Council to review them in the circumstances set out in subsection (2).

(2) Those circumstances are where—

(a) on appeal in any case, the High Court passes another sentence under a provision of the 1995 Act mentioned in subsection (3), and—

(b) in doing so, the High Court—

(i) decides not to follow any relevant sentencing guidelines, or

(ii) concludes that the guidelines do not deal, or deal adequately, with a significant issue raised by the appeal.

(3) Those provisions are—

(a) section 118(3),

(b) section 118(4)(b),

(c) section 118(4A)(b),

(d) section 118(4A)(c)(ii),

(e) section 189(1)(b).

(4) On referring sentencing guidelines to the Council under subsection (1), the High Court must state the reasons for its decision or conclusion.

(5) The Council must review any guidelines referred to it under subsection (1) and, in doing so, must have regard to the High Court’s reasons for its decision or conclusion.

(6) In subsection (2), “relevant sentencing guidelines” means—

(a) any sentencing guidelines which the court whose decision is the subject of the appeal was required to have regard to in the case under appeal,
(b) any sentencing guidelines which the High Court, in exercising its power under any of the provisions mentioned in subsection (3), was or would be required to have regard to in the case.

10 Scottish Court Service to provide sentencing information to the Council

(1) The Scottish Court Service must provide the Council with such information relating to the sentences imposed by courts as the Council may reasonably require for the purposes of its functions.

(2) The information must be provided in such form and by such means as the Council may require.

(3) The Council must from time to time publish information about the sentences imposed by courts.

11 The Council’s power to provide information, advice etc.

(1) The Council may—
   (a) publish or otherwise disseminate information about sentencing matters,
   (b) provide advice or guidance of a general nature about such matters,
   (c) conduct research into such matters.

(2) The Council may in particular provide advice or submit proposals about sentencing matters to the Scottish Ministers or any member of the Scottish Parliament.

(3) The Scottish Ministers must have regard to any advice given or proposals submitted by the Council.

(4) In this section, “sentencing matters” means—
   (a) sentencing guidelines,
   (b) the practice of the courts in relation to sentencing, and
   (c) any other matter relating to sentencing.

12 Business plan

(1) The Council must, before the submission day for each period of 3 years, prepare and submit to the Scottish Ministers a plan (a “business plan”) describing how the Council proposes to carry out its functions during the period.

(2) The “submission day” is—
   (a) for the period of 3 years beginning on the day on which this section comes into force, the day specified by order made by the Scottish Ministers,
   (b) for each succeeding period of 3 years, the first day of the period.

(3) A business plan must—
   (a) be prepared in such form as the Scottish Ministers may direct,
   (b) contain the information specified in subsection (4) and such other information as they may direct, and
   (c) be submitted by such time as they may direct.
(4) The information referred to in subsection (3)(b) is details of the matters in relation to which the Council proposes to prepare sentencing guidelines.

(5) The Council may include in a business plan such other information as it considers appropriate.

(6) In preparing a business plan, the Council must consult—
   (a) the Scottish Ministers,
   (b) the Lord Advocate, and
   (c) such other persons as it considers appropriate.

(7) The Scottish Ministers must lay before the Scottish Parliament each business plan submitted to them.

(8) The Council must, as soon as practicable after a business plan has been laid before the Parliament, publish it in such manner as it considers appropriate.

(9) The Council may at any time during a period covered by a business plan review the plan for the period and submit to the Scottish Ministers a revised plan.

(10) Subsections (3) to (8) apply to a revised plan as they apply to a business plan.

13 Annual report

(1) The Council must, as soon as practicable after the end of each financial year, prepare and submit to the Scottish Ministers a report on the carrying out of its functions during the year.

(2) The report must—
   (a) be prepared in such form as the Scottish Ministers may direct,
   (b) contain the information specified in subsection (3) and such other information as they may direct,
   (c) be submitted by such time as they may direct.

(3) The information referred to in subsection (2)(b) is details of—
   (a) the sentencing guidelines published or revised during the year (if any),
   (b) any draft sentencing guidelines being consulted upon,
   (c) requests made by the Scottish Ministers under section 8 and of the Council’s response to them,
   (d) references made by the High Court of Justiciary under section 9 and of the Council’s response to them.

(4) The Council may include in the report such other information as it considers appropriate.

(5) The Scottish Ministers must lay before the Scottish Parliament each report submitted to them.

(6) The Council must, as soon as practicable after the report has been laid before the Parliament, publish it in such manner as it considers appropriate.
14 Community payback orders

After section 227 of the 1995 Act insert—

“Community payback orders

227A Community payback orders

(1) Where a person (the “offender”) is convicted of an offence punishable by imprisonment, the court may, instead of imposing a sentence of imprisonment, impose a community payback order in respect of the offender.

(2) A community payback order is an order imposing one or more of the following requirements—

(a) a supervision requirement,

(b) an unpaid work or other activity requirement,

(c) a programme requirement,

(d) a residence requirement,

(e) a mental health treatment requirement,

(f) a drug treatment requirement,

(g) an alcohol treatment requirement.

(3) A court must not impose a community payback order on an offender unless it is of the opinion that the offence, or the combination of the offence and one or more offences associated with it, was serious enough to warrant the imposition of such an order.

(4) Where an offender is convicted of an offence other than one punishable by imprisonment, the court may impose a community payback order in respect of the offender imposing—

(a) a level 1 unpaid work or other activity requirement, or

(b) such a requirement together with a supervision requirement.

(5) A justice of the peace court may impose a community payback order under this section only if the order imposes one or more of the following requirements—

(a) a supervision requirement,

(b) an unpaid work or other activity requirement,

(c) a residence requirement.

(6) Subsection (5)(b) is subject to section 227J(3).

(7) Before making a community payback order imposing two or more requirements falling within subsection (2), the court must consider whether, in the circumstances of the case, the requirements are compatible with each other.

(8) The Scottish Ministers may by order made by statutory instrument amend subsection (5) so as to add to or omit requirements that may be imposed in a community payback order imposed by a justice of the peace court.
(9) An order is not to be made under subsection (8) unless a draft of the statutory instrument containing the order has been laid before and approved by resolution of the Scottish Parliament.

(10) In this section—

“court” means the High Court, the sheriff or a justice of the peace court,

“imprisonment” includes detention,

“level 1 unpaid work or other activity requirement” has the meaning given by section 227I(4).

227B Community payback order: further provision

(1) This section applies where a court is considering imposing a community payback order in respect of an offender.

(2) The court must not impose the order unless it has obtained, and taken account of, a report from an officer of a local authority containing such information relating to the offender as may be specified by Act of Adjournal.

(3) The clerk of the court must give a copy of any report obtained under subsection (2) to—

(a) the offender,

(b) the offender’s solicitor (if any), and

(c) the prosecutor.

(4) Before imposing the order, the court must explain to the offender in ordinary language—

(a) the purpose and effect of each of the requirements to be imposed by the order,

(b) the consequences which may follow if the offender fails to comply with any of the requirements imposed by the order, and

(c) where the court proposes to include in the order provision under section 227W for it to be reviewed, the arrangements for such a review.

(5) The court must not make the order unless the offender has, after the court has explained those matters, confirmed that the offender—

(a) understands those matters, and

(b) is willing to comply with each of the requirements to be imposed by the order.

(6) Subsection (5) is subject to section 227M(7).

227C Community payback order: responsible officer

(1) This section applies where a court imposes a community payback order in respect of an offender.

(2) The court must, in imposing the order—

(a) specify the locality in which the offender resides or will reside for the duration of the order,
(b) require the local authority within whose area that locality is situated to nominate, within five days of its receiving a copy of the order, an officer of the authority as the responsible officer for the purposes of the order,

c) require the offender to comply with any instructions given by the responsible officer—

(i) about keeping in touch with the responsible officer, or

(ii) for the purposes of subsection (3), and

d) if the order does not impose a residence requirement, require the offender to notify the responsible officer of any change or proposed change of address.

(3) The responsible officer is responsible for—

(a) making any arrangements necessary to enable the offender to comply with each of the requirements imposed by the order,

(b) promoting compliance with those requirements by the offender,

(c) taking such steps as may be necessary to enforce compliance with the requirements of the order or to vary or discharge any of them.

(4) References in this Act to the responsible officer are, in relation to an offender in respect of whom a community payback order has been imposed, the officer for the time being nominated in pursuance of subsection (2)(b).

(5) In reckoning the period of five days for the purposes of subsection (2)(b), no account is to be taken of Saturdays and Sundays.

227D Community payback order: offender’s duties

(1) Subsection (2) applies where a community payback order has been imposed in respect of an offender.

(2) The offender must—

(a) report to the responsible officer in accordance with instructions given by that officer,

(b) if the order does not impose a residence requirement or a restricted movement requirement, notify the responsible officer without delay of—

(i) any change or proposed change of the offender’s address,

(ii) the times, if any, at which the offender usually works (or carries out voluntary work) or attends school or any other educational establishment, and

(c) where the order imposes an unpaid work or other activity requirement, undertake for the number of hours specified in the requirement such work or activity as the responsible officer may instruct, and at such times as may be so instructed.

(3) Failure to comply with a duty under subsection (2) is to be treated as a failure to comply with a requirement imposed by the order.
227E Community payback order: further provision

(1) Where a community payback order is imposed in respect of an offender, the order is to be taken for all purposes to be a sentence imposed on the offender.

(2) On imposing a community payback order, the court must state in open court the reasons for imposing the order.

(3) The imposition by a court of a community payback order in respect of an offender does not prevent the court from—
   (a) imposing a disqualification on the offender,
   (b) making an order for forfeiture in respect of the offence, or
   (c) ordering the offender to find caution for good behaviour.

(4) Where a court imposes a community payback order in respect of an offender, the clerk of the court must ensure that—
   (a) a copy of the order imposing the community payback order is given to—
       (i) the offender, and
       (ii) the local authority within whose area the offender resides or will reside, and
   (b) a copy of the order and such other documents and information relating to the case as may be useful are given to the clerk of the appropriate court (unless the court imposing the order is that court).

(5) A copy of the order imposing the community payback order may be given to the offender—
   (a) by being delivered personally to the offender, or
   (b) by being sent—
       (i) by a registered post service (as defined in section 125(1) of the Postal Services Act 2000 (c.26)), or
       (ii) by a postal service which provides for the delivery of the document to be recorded.

(6) An order imposing a community payback order is to be in such form, or as nearly as may be in such form, as may be prescribed by Act of Adjournal.

227F Requirement to avoid conflict with religious beliefs, work etc.

(1) In imposing a community payback order in respect of an offender, the court must ensure, so far as practicable, that any requirement imposed by the order avoids—
   (a) a conflict with the offender’s religious beliefs,
   (b) interference with the times, if any, at which the offender normally works (or carries out voluntary work) or attends school or any other educational establishment.

(2) The responsible officer must ensure, so far as practicable, that any instruction given to the offender avoids such a conflict or interference.
Supervision requirement

227G Supervision requirement

(1) In this Act, a “supervision requirement” is, in relation to an offender, a requirement that, during the specified period, the offender must attend appointments with the responsible officer or another person determined by the responsible officer, at such time and place as may be determined by the responsible officer, for the purpose of promoting the offender’s rehabilitation.

(2) On imposing a community payback order, the court must impose a supervision requirement if—

   (a) the offender is under 18 years of age and the court is satisfied as to the services which the local authority will provide for the offender’s support and rehabilitation in the specified period,

   (b) the court, in the order, imposes—

       (i) a programme requirement,

       (ii) a residence requirement,

       (iii) a mental health requirement,

       (iv) a drug treatment requirement, or

       (v) an alcohol treatment requirement, or

   (c) the order imposes two or more requirements (other than a supervision requirement).

(3) The specified period must be at least 6 months and not more than 3 years.

(4) In this section, the “specified period”, in relation to a supervision requirement, means the period specified in the requirement.

227H Supervision requirement: power to order payment of compensation

(1) This section applies where a court imposes a community payback order in respect of an offender which imposes a supervision requirement.

(2) The court may also impose a requirement in the order that the offender must pay compensation for any personal injury, loss or damage caused (whether directly or indirectly) by the acts which constituted the offence in respect of which the order is imposed.

(3) The court may require the compensation to be paid in a lump sum or in instalments.

(4) Where a requirement to pay compensation is imposed, the offender must complete payment of the compensation before the earlier of the following—

   (a) the end of the period of 18 months beginning with the day on which the requirement is imposed,

   (b) the beginning of the period of 2 months ending with the date on which the period specified in the supervision requirement ends.

(5) The requirement to pay compensation and the requirement in subsection (4) are to be treated for the purposes of this Act as if they were part of the supervision requirement.
Unpaid work or other activity requirement

227I Unpaid work or other activity requirement

(1) In this Act, an “unpaid work or other activity requirement” is, in relation to an offender, a requirement that the offender must, for the specified number of hours, undertake—
   (a) unpaid work, and
   (b) another activity.

(2) The nature of the unpaid work and other activity to be undertaken by the offender is to be determined by the responsible officer.

(3) The number of hours that may be specified in the requirement must be (in total)—
   (a) at least 20 hours, and
   (b) not more than 300 hours.

(4) An unpaid work or other activity requirement which requires the work or activity to be undertaken for a number of hours totalling no more than 100 is referred to in this Act as a “level 1 unpaid work or other activity requirement”.

(5) An unpaid work or other activity requirement which requires the work or activity to be undertaken for a number of hours totalling more than 100 is referred to in this Act as a “level 2 unpaid work or other activity requirement”.

(6) The Scottish Ministers may by order made by statutory instrument substitute another number of hours for any of the numbers of hours for the time being specified in subsections (3) to (5).

(7) An order under subsection (6) is subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of the Scottish Parliament.

(8) In this section, “specified”, in relation to an unpaid work or other activity requirement, means specified in the requirement.

227J Unpaid work or other activity requirement: further provision

(1) A court may not impose an unpaid work or other activity requirement on an offender who is under 16 years of age.

(2) A court may impose such a requirement on an offender only if the court is satisfied, after considering the report mentioned in section 227B(2), that the offender is a suitable person to undertake unpaid work in pursuance of the requirement.

(3) A justice of the peace court may impose a level 2 unpaid work or other activity requirement only if—
   (a) the Scottish Ministers by regulations made by statutory instrument so provide, and
   (b) the requirement is imposed in such circumstances and subject to such conditions as may be specified in the regulations.
(4) Regulations are not to be made under subsection (3) unless a draft of the statutory instrument containing them has been laid before and approved by resolution of the Scottish Parliament.

227K Allocation of hours between unpaid work and other activity

(1) Subject to subsection (2), it is for the responsible officer to determine how many out of the total number of hours specified in an unpaid work or other activity requirement are to be allocated to undertaking, respectively—

(a) unpaid work, and
(b) another activity.

(2) The number of hours allocated to undertaking an activity other than unpaid work must not exceed whichever is the lower of—

(a) 30% of the total number of hours specified in the requirement, and
(b) 30 hours.

(3) The Scottish Ministers may by order made by statutory instrument amend subsection (2).

(4) An order under subsection (3) is subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of the Scottish Parliament.

227L Time limit for completion of unpaid work or other activity

(1) The total number of hours of unpaid work and other activity that the offender is required to undertake in pursuance of an unpaid work or other activity requirement must be completed by the offender before the end of the specified period.

(2) The “specified period” is such period beginning with the imposition of the requirement as the court may specify in the requirement.

(3) That period must not be less than—

(a) in relation to a level 1 unpaid work or other activity requirement, 3 months,
(b) in relation to a level 2 unpaid work or other activity requirement, 6 months.

227M Fine defaulters

(1) This section applies where—

(a) a fine has been imposed on an offender in respect of an offence,
(b) the offender fails to pay the fine or an instalment of the fine,
(c) the amount of the fine or the instalment does not exceed level 2 on the standard scale, and
(d) apart from this section, the court would have imposed a sentence of imprisonment on the offender under section 219(1) of this Act in respect of the failure to pay the fine or instalment.
The court must, instead of imposing a sentence of imprisonment under section 219(1) of this Act, impose a community payback order on the offender imposing a level 1 unpaid work or other activity requirement.

Where the amount of the fine or the instalment does not exceed level 1 on the standard scale, the total number of hours specified in the requirement must not exceed 50.

On completion of the hours of unpaid work and other activity specified in an unpaid work or other activity requirement imposed under this section, the fine in respect of which the requirement was imposed is discharged (or, as the case may be, the outstanding instalments of the fine are discharged).

If, after a community payback order is imposed in respect of an offender under this section, the offender pays the fine or the full amount of any outstanding instalments, the appropriate court must discharge the order.

If, after a community payback order is imposed on an offender under this section, the offender pays part of the fine, or part of any outstanding instalments, the appropriate court must vary the order to take account of the payment.

A level 1 unpaid work or other activity requirement may be imposed on an offender under this section whether or not the offender indicates a willingness to comply with the requirement.

Where a community payback order is imposed under subsection (2), section 227B(5) does not apply.

Subsection (2) is subject to sections 227J(1) and 227N(2), (3) and (6).

In this section, “court” does not include the High Court.

227N Offenders subject to more than one unpaid work or other activity requirement

This section applies where—

(a) a court is considering imposing an unpaid work or other activity requirement in respect of an offender (referred to as the “new requirement”), and

(b) at the time the court is considering imposing the requirement, there is already in effect one or more such requirements in respect of the same offender (each referred to as an “existing requirement”).

The court may, in imposing the new requirement, direct that it is to be concurrent with any existing requirement.

Where the court so directs, hours of unpaid work or other activity undertaken after the new requirement is imposed count for the purposes of compliance with that requirement and the existing requirement.

Subsection (5) applies where the court does not so direct.

The maximum number of hours which may be specified in the new requirement is 300 less the total number of hours specified in each existing requirement.
(6) Where that maximum number is less than the minimum number of hours that can be specified by virtue of section 227I(3)(a), the court must not impose the new requirement.

227O  Rules about unpaid work and other activity

(1) The Scottish Ministers may make rules by statutory instrument for or in connection with the undertaking of unpaid work and other activities in pursuance of unpaid work or other activity requirements.

(2) Rules under subsection (1) may in particular make provision for—

(a) limiting the number of hours of work or other activity that an offender may be required to undertake in any one day,

(b) reckoning the time spent undertaking unpaid work or other activity,

(c) the payment to the offender of travelling or other expenses in connection with the undertaking of unpaid work or other activity,

(d) the keeping of records of unpaid work and other activity undertaken.

(3) Rules under subsection (1) are subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of the Scottish Parliament.

Programme requirement

227P  Programme requirement

(1) In this Act, a “programme requirement” is, in relation to an offender, a requirement that the offender must participate in a specified programme, at the specified place and on the specified number of days.

(2) In this section, “programme” means a course or other planned set of activities, taking place over a period of time, and provided to individuals or groups of individuals for the purpose of addressing offending behavioural needs.

(3) A court may impose a programme requirement on an offender only if the specified programme is one which has been recommended by an officer of a local authority as being suitable for the offender to participate in.

(4) If an offender’s compliance with a proposed programme requirement would involve the co-operation of a person other than the offender, the court may impose the requirement only if the other person consents.

(5) A court may not impose a programme requirement that would require an offender to participate in a specified programme after the expiry of the period specified in the supervision requirement to be imposed at the same time as the programme requirement (by virtue of section 227G(2)(b)).

(6) Where the court imposes a programme requirement on an offender, the requirement is to be taken to include a requirement that the offender, while attending the specified programme, complies with any instructions given by or on behalf of the person in charge of the programme.

(7) In this section, “specified”, in relation to a programme requirement, means specified in the requirement.
Residence requirement

227Q Residence requirement

(1) In this Act, a “residence requirement” is, in relation to an offender, a requirement that, during the specified period, the offender must reside at a specified place.

(2) The court may, in a residence requirement, require an offender to reside at a hostel or other institution only if the hostel or institution has been recommended as a suitable place for the offender to reside in by an officer of a local authority.

(3) The specified period must not be longer than the period specified in the supervision requirement to be imposed at the same time as the residence requirement (by virtue of section 227G(2)(b)).

(4) In this section, “specified”, in relation to a residence requirement, means specified in the requirement.

Mental health treatment requirement

227R Mental health treatment requirement

(1) In this Act, a “mental health treatment requirement” is, in relation to an offender, a requirement that the offender must submit, during the specified period, to treatment by or under the direction of a registered medical practitioner or a chartered psychologist (or both) with a view to improving the offender’s mental condition.

(2) The treatment to which an offender may be required to submit under a mental health treatment requirement is such of the kinds of treatment described in subsection (3) as is specified; but otherwise the nature of the treatment is not to be specified.

(3) Those kinds of treatment are—

(a) treatment as a resident patient in a hospital (other than a State hospital) within the meaning of the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003 (asp 13) (“the 2003 Act”),

(b) treatment as a non-resident patient at such institution or other place as may be specified, or

(c) treatment by or under the direction of such registered medical practitioner or chartered psychologist as may be specified.

(4) A court may impose a mental health treatment requirement on an offender only if the court is satisfied—

(a) on the evidence of an approved medical practitioner (within the meaning of the 2003 Act), that Condition A is met,

(b) on the written or oral evidence of the registered medical practitioner or chartered psychologist by whom or under whose direction the treatment is to be provided, that Condition B is met, and

(c) that Condition C is met.

(5) Condition A is that—
(a) the offender suffers from a mental condition,
(b) the condition requires, and may be susceptible to, treatment, and
(c) the condition is not such as to warrant the offender’s being subject to—
   (i) a compulsory treatment order under section 64 of the 2003 Act, or
   (ii) a compulsion order under section 57A of this Act.

(6) Condition B is that the treatment proposed to be specified is appropriate for the offender.

(7) Condition C is that arrangements have been made for the proposed treatment including, where the treatment is to be of the kind mentioned in subsection (3)(a), arrangements for the offender’s reception in the hospital proposed to be specified in the requirement.

(8) The specified period must not be longer than the period specified in the supervision requirement to be imposed at the same time as the mental health treatment requirement (by virtue of section 227G(2)(b)).

(9) In this section, “specified”, in relation to a mental health treatment requirement, means specified in the requirement.

227S Mental health treatment requirements: medical evidence

(1) For the purpose of making a finding under section 227R(4)(a) or (b), a written report purporting to be signed by an approved medical practitioner may be received in evidence without the need for proof of the signature or qualifications of the practitioner.

(2) Where such a report is lodged in evidence otherwise than by or on behalf of the offender, a copy of the report must be given to—
   (a) the offender, and
   (b) the offender’s solicitor (if any).

(3) The court may adjourn the case if it considers it necessary to do so to give the offender further time to consider the report.

(4) Subsection (5) applies where the offender is—
   (a) detained in a hospital under this Act, or
   (b) remanded in custody.

(5) For the purpose of calling evidence to rebut any evidence contained in a report lodged as mentioned in subsection (2), arrangements may be made by or on behalf of the offender for an examination of the offender by a registered medical practitioner.

(6) Such an examination is to be carried out in private.

227T Power to change treatment

(1) This section applies where—
   (a) a mental health treatment requirement has been imposed on an offender, and
(b) the registered medical practitioner or chartered psychologist by whom or under whose direction the offender is receiving the treatment to which the offender is required to submit in pursuance of the requirement is of the opinion mentioned in subsection (2).

(2) That opinion is—

(a) that the offender requires, or that it would be appropriate for the offender to receive, a different kind of treatment (whether in whole or in part) from that which the offender has been receiving, or

(b) that the treatment (whether in whole or in part) can be more appropriately given in or at a different hospital or other institution or place from that where the offender has been receiving treatment.

(3) The practitioner or, as the case may be, psychologist may make arrangements for the offender to be treated accordingly.

(4) Subject to subsection (5), the treatment provided under the arrangements must be of a kind which could have been specified in the mental health treatment requirement.

(5) The arrangements may provide for the offender to receive treatment (in whole or in part) as a resident patient in an institution or place even though it is one that could not have been specified for that purpose in the mental health treatment requirement.

(6) Arrangements may be made under subsection (3) only if—

(a) the offender and the responsible officer agree to the arrangements,

(b) the treatment will be given by or under the direction of a registered medical practitioner or chartered psychologist who has agreed to accept the offender as a patient, and

(c) where the treatment requires the offender to be a resident patient, the offender will be received as such.

(7) Where arrangements are made under subsection (3)—

(a) the responsible officer must notify the court of the arrangements, and

(b) the treatment provided under the arrangements is to be taken to be treatment to which the offender is required to submit under the mental health treatment requirement.

Drug treatment requirement

227U Drug treatment requirement

(1) In this Act, a “drug treatment requirement” is, in relation to an offender, a requirement that the offender must submit, during the specified period, to treatment by or under the direction of a specified person with a view to reducing or eliminating the offender’s dependency on, or propensity to misuse, drugs.

(2) The treatment to which an offender may be required to submit under a drug treatment requirement is such of the kinds of treatment described in subsection (3) as is specified (but otherwise the nature of the treatment is not to be specified).
(3) Those kinds of treatment are—
   (a) treatment as a resident in such institution or other place as is specified,
   (b) treatment as a non-resident at such institution or other place, and at such intervals, as is specified.

(4) The specified person must be a person who has the necessary qualifications or experience in relation to the treatment to be provided.

(5) The specified period must not be longer than the period specified in the supervision requirement to be imposed at the same time as the drug treatment requirement (by virtue of section 227G(2)(b)).

(6) A court may impose a drug treatment requirement on an offender only if the court is satisfied that—
   (a) the offender is dependent on, or has a propensity to misuse, any controlled drug (as defined in section 2(1)(a) of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 (c.38)),
   (b) the dependency or propensity requires, and may be susceptible to, treatment, and
   (c) arrangements have been made for the proposed treatment including, where the treatment is to be of the kind mentioned in subsection (3)(a), arrangements for the offender’s reception in the institution or other place to be specified.

(7) In this section, “specified”, in relation to a drug treatment requirement, means specified in the requirement.

Alcohol treatment requirement

227V Alcohol treatment requirement

(1) In this Act, an “alcohol treatment requirement” is, in relation to an offender, a requirement that the offender must submit, during the specified period, to treatment by or under the direction of a specified person with a view to the reduction or elimination of the offender’s dependency on alcohol.

(2) The treatment to which an offender may be required to submit under an alcohol treatment requirement is such of the kinds of treatment described in subsection
(3) as is specified (but otherwise the nature of the treatment is not to be specified).

(3) Those kinds of treatment are—
   (a) treatment as a resident in such institution or other place as is specified,
   (b) treatment as a non-resident at such institution or other place, and at such intervals, as is specified,
   (c) treatment by or under the direction of such person as is specified.

(4) The person specified under subsection (1) or (3)(c) must be a person who has the necessary qualifications or experience in relation to the treatment to be provided.
(5) The specified period must not be longer than the period specified in the supervision requirement to be imposed at the same time as the alcohol treatment requirement (by virtue of section 227G(2)(b)).

(6) A court may impose an alcohol treatment requirement on an offender only if the court is satisfied that—

(a) the offender is dependent on alcohol,
(b) the dependency requires, and may be susceptible to, treatment, and
(c) arrangements have been, or can be, made for the proposed treatment, including, where the treatment is to be of the kind mentioned in subsection (3)(a), arrangements for the offender’s reception in the institution or other place to be specified.

(7) In this section, “specified”, in relation to an alcohol treatment requirement, means specified in the requirement.

Community payback orders: review, variation etc.

227W Periodic review of community payback orders

(1) On imposing a community payback order in respect of an offender, the court may include in the order provision for the order to be reviewed at such time or times as may be specified in the order.

(2) A review carried out in pursuance of such provision is referred to in this section as a “progress review”.

(3) A progress review may be carried out by the court which imposed the community payback order or by the appropriate court.

(4) A progress review is to be carried out in such manner as the court carrying out the review may determine.

(5) Before each progress review, the responsible officer must give the court a written report on the offender’s compliance with the requirements imposed by the community payback order in the period to which the review relates.

(6) The offender must attend each progress review.

(7) If the offender fails to attend a progress review, the court may—

(a) issue a citation requiring the offender’s attendance, or
(b) issue a warrant for the offender’s arrest.

(8) The unified citation provisions apply in relation to a citation under subsection (7)(a) as they apply in relation to a citation under section 216(3)(a) of this Act.

(9) On conclusion of a progress review in respect of a community payback order, the court may vary, revoke or discharge the order in accordance with section 227Y.

227X Applications to vary, revoke and discharge community payback orders

(1) The appropriate court may, on the application of either of the persons mentioned in subsection (2), vary, revoke or discharge a community payback order in accordance with section 227Y.
(2) Those persons are—

(a) the offender in respect of whom the order was imposed,
(b) the responsible officer in relation to the offender.

227Y Variation, revocation and discharge: court’s powers

(1) This section applies where a court proposes to vary, revoke or discharge a community payback order under section 227W(9) or 227X(1).

(2) The court may vary, revoke or discharge the order only if satisfied that it is in the interests of justice to do so having regard to circumstances which have arisen since the order was imposed.

(3) In varying an order, the court may, in particular—

(a) add to the requirements imposed by the order,
(b) revoke or discharge any requirement imposed by the order,
(c) vary any requirement imposed by the order.

(4) In varying a requirement imposed by the order, the court may, in particular—

(a) extend or shorten any period or other time limit specified in the requirement,
(b) in the case of an unpaid work or other activity requirement, increase or decrease the total number of hours specified in the requirement,
(c) in the case of a supervision requirement containing a requirement to pay compensation under section 227H, vary the amount of compensation or any instalment.

(5) The court may not, under subsection (4)(a), extend any period or time limit so as to extend it beyond the maximum period or limit that could have been specified in the requirement when it was imposed.

(6) The court may not, under subsection (4)(b), increase the total number of hours beyond the maximum that could have been specified in the requirement when it was imposed.

(7) Where the court varies a restricted movement requirement imposed in a community payback order, the court must give a copy of the order making the variation to the person responsible for monitoring the offender’s compliance with the requirement.

(8) Where the court revokes a community payback order, the court may deal with the offender in respect of the offence in relation to which the order was imposed as it could have dealt with the offender had the order not been imposed.

(9) Where the court proposes to vary, revoke or discharge the order otherwise than on the application of the offender, the court must issue a citation to the offender requiring the offender to appear before the court (except where the offender is required to appear by section 227W(6)).

(10) If the offender fails to appear as required by the citation, the court may issue a warrant for the arrest of the offender.
(11) The unified citation provisions apply in relation to a citation under subsection (9) as they apply in relation to a citation under section 216(3)(a) of this Act.

227Z. Variation of community payback orders: further provision

(1) This section applies where a court is considering varying a community payback order in respect of an offender.

(2) The court must not make the variation unless it has obtained, and taken account of, a report from the responsible officer containing such information relating to the offender as may be specified by Act of Adjournal.

(3) The clerk of the court must give a copy of any report obtained under subsection (2) to—

(a) the offender,
(b) the offender’s solicitor (if any).

(4) Before making the variation, the court must explain to the offender in ordinary language—

(a) the purpose and effect of each of the requirements to be imposed by the order as proposed to be varied,
(b) the consequences which may follow if the offender fails to comply with any of the requirements imposed by the order as proposed to be varied, and
(c) where the court proposes to include in the order as proposed to be varied provision under section 227W for it to be reviewed, or to vary any such provision already included in the order, the arrangements for such a review.

(5) The court must not make the variation unless the offender has, after the court has explained those matters, confirmed that the offender—

(a) understands those matters, and
(b) is willing to comply with each of the requirements to be imposed by the order as proposed to be amended.

(6) Where the variation would impose a new requirement—

(a) the court must not make the variation if the new requirement is not a requirement that could have been imposed in the order when it was made,
(b) if the new requirement is one which could have been so imposed, the court must, before making the variation take whatever steps the court would have been required to take before imposing the requirement had it been imposed in the order when it was made.

(7) Where the variation would vary any requirement imposed by the order, the court must not make the variation if the requirement as proposed to be varied could not have been imposed, or imposed in that way, in the order when it was made.
227ZA Change of offender’s residence to new local authority area

(1) The section applies where—

(a) the offender in respect of whom a community payback order is in force proposes to change, or has changed, residence to a locality (“the new locality”) situated in the area of a different local authority from that in which the locality currently specified in the order is situated, and

(b) an application is made to the appropriate court under section 227X(1) for the order to be varied so as to specify the new local authority area in which the offender resides or will reside.

(2) The court may vary the order as proposed in the application only if satisfied that arrangements have been, or can be, made in the local authority area in which the new locality is situated for the offender to comply with the requirements of the order.

(3) Where the court varies the order as proposed in the application, the court must also vary the order so as to require the local authority for the area in which the new locality is situated to nominate an officer of the authority to be the responsible officer for the purposes of the order.

227ZB Breach of community payback order

(1) This section applies where it appears to the appropriate court that an offender in respect of whom a community payback order has been imposed has failed to comply with a requirement imposed in the order.

(2) The court may—

(a) issue a warrant for the offender’s arrest, or

(b) issue a citation to the offender requiring the offender to appear before the court.

(3) If the offender fails to appear as required by a citation issued under subsection (2)(b), the court may issue a warrant for the arrest of the offender.

(4) The unified citation provisions apply in relation to a citation under subsection (2)(b) as they apply in relation to a citation under section 216(3)(a) of this Act.

(5) If the court is satisfied that the offender has failed without reasonable excuse to comply with a requirement imposed by the order, the court may—

(a) impose on the offender a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale,

(b) revoke the order and deal with the offender in respect of the offence in relation to which the order was imposed as it could have dealt with the offender had the order not been imposed, or

(c) vary the order so as to impose a new requirement, vary any requirement imposed by the order or discharge any requirement imposed by the order.

(6) The requirements which the court may impose under subsection (5)(c) include a restricted movement requirement.
(7) If the court imposes a restricted movement requirement, the court must also vary the order so as to impose a supervision requirement, unless a supervision requirement is already imposed by the order.

(8) Where the court varies the order so as to impose a restricted movement requirement, the court must give a copy of the order making the variation to the person responsible for monitoring the offender’s compliance with the requirement.

(9) The period for which the restricted movement requirement is in effect must not exceed whichever is the lesser of—

(a) the period for which the supervision requirement has effect, and

(b) the period of 12 months.

(10) If during the period for which the restricted movement requirement is in effect it appears to the person responsible for monitoring the offender’s compliance with the requirement that the offender has failed to comply with the requirement, the person must report the matter to the offender’s responsible officer.

(11) On receiving a report under subsection (10), the responsible officer must report the matter to the court.

(12) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations made by statutory instrument substitute for the number of months for the time being specified in subsection (9)(b) another number of months.

(13) Regulations are not to be made under subsection (12) unless a draft of the statutory instrument containing the regulations has been laid before and approved by resolution of the Scottish Parliament.

227ZC Breach of community payback order: further provision

(1) Subsection (2) applies where the court, under paragraph (b) of subsection (5) of section 227ZB, revokes a community payback order imposing only a level 1 unpaid work or other activity requirement.

(2) In dealing with the offender as mentioned in that paragraph, the court may not impose a sentence of imprisonment for a term exceeding—

(a) in the case of a justice of the peace court, 20 days,

(b) in any other case, 30 days.

(3) Evidence of one witness is sufficient for the purpose of establishing that an offender has failed without reasonable excuse to comply with a requirement imposed by a community payback order.

(4) Subsection (5) applies in relation to a community payback order imposing a supervision requirement containing a requirement to pay compensation under section 227H.

(5) A document bearing to be a certificate signed by the clerk of the appropriate court and stating that the compensation, or an instalment of the compensation, has not been paid as required by the requirement is sufficient evidence that the offender has failed to comply with the requirement.
(6) The appropriate court may, for the purpose of considering whether an offender has failed to comply with a requirement imposed by a community payback order, require the responsible officer to provide a report on the offender’s compliance with the requirement.

227ZD Restricted movement requirement

(1) In this Act, a “restricted movement requirement” is, in relation to an offender, a requirement restricting the offender’s movements to such extent as is specified.

(2) A restricted movement requirement may in particular require the offender—

(a) to be in a specified place at a specified time or during specified periods, or

(b) not to be in a specified place, or a specified class of place, at a specified time or during specified periods.

(3) A restricted movement requirement may not require the offender to be at any place for periods totalling more than 12 hours in any one day.

(4) A restricted movement requirement—

(a) takes effect from the specified day, and

(b) has effect for such period of not more than 12 months as is specified.

(5) A court imposing a restricted movement requirement must specify in it—

(a) the method by which the offender’s compliance with the requirement is to be monitored, and

(b) the person who is to be responsible for monitoring that compliance.

(6) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations made by statutory instrument substitute—

(a) for the number of hours for the time being specified in subsection (3) another number of hours,

(b) for the number of months for the time being specified in subsection (4)(b) another number of months.

(7) Regulations are not to be made under subsection (6) unless a draft of the statutory instrument containing the regulations has been laid before and approved by resolution of the Scottish Parliament.

(8) In this section, “specified”, in relation to a restricted movement requirement, means specified in the requirement.

227ZE Restricted movement requirements: further provision

(1) A court may not impose a restricted movement requirement requiring the offender to be, or not to be, in a specified place unless it is satisfied that the offender’s compliance with the requirement can be monitored by the method specified in the requirement.

(2) Before imposing a restricted movement requirement requiring the offender to be in a specified place, the appropriate court must obtain and consider a report by an officer of the local authority in whose area the place is situated on—
(a) the place, and
(b) the attitude of any person (other than the offender) likely to be affected by the enforced presence of the offender at the place.

(3) The court may, before imposing the requirement, hear the officer who prepared the report.

227ZF Variation of restricted movement requirement

(1) This section applies where—
(a) a community payback order which is in force in respect of an offender imposes a restricted movement requirement requiring the offender to be at a particular place specified in the requirement for any period, and
(b) an application is made to the appropriate court under section 227X for the requirement to be varied so as to require the offender to be at a different place (“the new place”).

(2) Before making the variation proposed in the application, the appropriate court must obtain and consider a report by an officer of the local authority in whose area the new place is situated on—
(a) the new place, and
(b) the attitude of any person (other than the offender) likely to be affected by the enforced presence of the offender at the new place.

(3) The court may, before making the variation proposed in the application, hear the officer who prepared the report.

227ZG Remote monitoring

Section 245C of this Act, and regulations made under that section, apply in relation to the imposition of, and compliance with, restricted movement requirements as they apply in relation to the imposition of, and compliance with, restriction of liberty orders.

227ZH Restricted movement requirements: Scottish Ministers’ functions

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations made by statutory instrument prescribe—
(a) which courts, or class or classes of courts, may impose restricted movement requirements,
(b) the method or methods of monitoring compliance with a restricted movement requirement which may be specified in such a requirement,
(c) the class or classes of offender in respect of whom such a requirement may be imposed.

(2) Regulations under subsection (1) may make different provision about the matters mentioned in paragraphs (b) and (c) of that subsection in relation to different courts or classes of court.

(3) Regulations under subsection (1) are subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of the Scottish Parliament.
(4) The Scottish Ministers must determine the person, or class or description of person, who may be specified in a restricted movement requirement as the person to be responsible for monitoring the offender’s compliance with the requirement (referred to in this section as the “monitor”).

(5) The Scottish Ministers may determine different persons, or different classes or descriptions of person, in relation to different methods of monitoring.

(6) The Scottish Ministers must notify each court having power to impose a restricted movement requirement of their determination.

(7) Subsection (8) applies where—

(a) the Scottish Ministers make a determination under subsection (4) changing a previous determination made by them, and

(b) a person specified in a restricted movement requirement in effect at the date the determination takes effect as the monitor is not a person, or is not of a class or description of person, mentioned in the determination as changed.

(8) The appropriate court must—

(a) vary the restricted movement requirement so as to specify a different person as the monitor,

(b) send a copy of the requirement as varied to that person, and

(c) notify the offender of the variation.

227ZI Documentary evidence in proceedings for breach of restricted movement requirement

(1) This section applies for the purposes of establishing in any proceedings whether an offender in respect of whom a restricted movement requirement has been imposed has complied with the requirement.

(2) Evidence of the presence or absence of the offender at a particular place at a particular time may be given by the production of a document or documents bearing to be—

(a) a statement automatically produced by a device specified in regulations made under section 245C of this Act, by which the offender’s whereabouts were remotely monitored, and

(b) a certificate signed by a person nominated for the purposes of this paragraph by the Scottish Ministers that the statement relates to the whereabouts of the offender at the dates and times shown in the statement.

(3) The statement and certificate are, when produced in evidence, sufficient evidence of the facts stated in them.

(4) The statement and certificate are not admissible in evidence at any hearing unless a copy of them has been served on the offender before the hearing.

(5) Where it appears to any court before which the hearing is taking place that the offender has not had sufficient notice of the statement or certificate, the court may adjourn the hearing or make any order that it considers appropriate.
Local authorities: annual consultation about unpaid work

227ZJ Local authorities: annual consultations about unpaid work

(1) Each local authority must, for each year, consult prescribed persons about the nature of unpaid work and other activities to be undertaken by offenders residing in the local authority’s area in respect of whom community payback orders are imposed.

(2) In subsection (1), “prescribed persons” means such persons, or class or classes of person, as may be prescribed by the Scottish Ministers by regulations made by statutory instrument.

(3) A statutory instrument containing regulations under subsection (2) is to be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of the Scottish Parliament.

Community payback order: meaning of “the appropriate court”

227ZK Meaning of “the appropriate court”

(1) In sections 227A to 227ZI, “the appropriate court” means, in relation to a community payback order—

(a) where the order was imposed by the High Court of Justiciary, that Court,

(b) where the order was imposed by a sheriff, a sheriff having jurisdiction in the locality mentioned in subsection (2),

(c) where the order was imposed by a justice of the peace court—

(i) the justice of the peace court having jurisdiction in that locality, or

(ii) if there is no justice of the peace court having jurisdiction in that locality, a sheriff having such jurisdiction.

(2) The locality referred to in subsection (1)(b) is the locality for the time being specified in the order imposing the community payback order under section 227C(2)(a).”.

Non-harassment orders

In section 234A of the 1995 Act (non-harassment orders)—

(a) in subsection (1), for “harassment of” substitute “misconduct towards”,

(b) in subsection (2), for “further harassment” substitute “harassment (or further harassment)”,

(c) after subsection (2) insert—

“(2A) The court may, for the purpose of subsection (2) above, have regard to any information given to it for that purpose by the prosecutor—

(a) about any other offence involving misconduct towards the victim—

(i) of which the offender has been convicted, or
(ii) as regards which the offender has accepted (or has been deemed to have accepted) a fixed penalty or compensation offer under section 302(1) or 302A(1) or as regards which a work order has been made under section 303ZA(6),

(b) in particular, by way of—

(i) an extract of the conviction along with a copy of the complaint or indictment containing the charge to which the conviction relates, or

(ii) a note of the terms of the charge to which the fixed penalty offer, compensation offer or work order relates.

(2B) But the court may do so only if the court may, under section 101 or 101A (in a solemn case) or section 166 or 166A (in a summary case), have regard to the conviction or the offer or order.

(2C) The court must give the offender an opportunity to make representations in response to the application.”; and

(d) for subsection (7) substitute—

“(7) For the purposes of this section—

“harassment” and “conduct” are to be construed in accordance with section 8 of the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 (c.40), “misconduct” includes conduct that causes alarm or distress.”.

16 Short periods of detention

(1) The 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(2) Section 169 (detention in precincts of court) is repealed.

(3) In section 206 (minimum periods of detention)—

(a) in subsection (1), for “five” substitute “15”, and

(b) subsections (2) to (6) are repealed.

17 Presumption against short periods of imprisonment or detention

(1) The 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 204 (restrictions on passing sentence of imprisonment or detention), after subsection (4) insert—

“(4A) A court may pass a sentence of imprisonment for a term not exceeding 6 months on a person only where the court considers that no other method of dealing with the person is appropriate.

(4B) Where a court passes such a sentence, the court must—

(a) state its reasons for the opinion that no other method of dealing with the person is appropriate, and

(b) have those reasons entered in the record of the proceedings.”.

(3) In section 208 (detention of children convicted on indictment)—
(a) after subsection (1) insert—

“(1A) Where the court imposes a sentence of detention for a term not exceeding 6 months on a child, the court must—

(a) state its reasons for the opinion that no other method of dealing with the child is appropriate, and

(b) have those reasons entered in the record of the proceedings.”, and

(b) in subsection (2), after “(1)” insert “and (1A)”.

18 Amendments of Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007

(1) The Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007 (asp 17) is amended as follows.

(2) In section 4 (basic definitions)—

(a) in subsection (1)—

(i) the definitions of “custody-only prisoner” and “custody-only sentence” are repealed,

(ii) in the definition of “custody and community sentence” for “15 days or more” substitute “at least the prescribed period”,

(iii) after the definition of “Parole Board” insert—

““prescribed period” means such period as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify,”; and

(iv) after the definition of “punishment part” insert—

““short-term custody and community prisoner” means a person serving a short-term custody and community sentence, “short-term custody and community sentence” means a sentence of imprisonment for an offence for a term of less than the prescribed period”; and

(b) subsection (2) is repealed.

(3) For section 5 (release of custody-only prisoners on completion of sentence) substitute—

“Short-term custody and community prisoners

Release of short-term custody and community prisoners

As soon as a short-term custody and community prisoner has served one-half of the prisoner’s short-term custody and community sentence the Scottish Ministers must release the prisoner on short-term community licence.”.

(4) In Chapter 3 of Part 2, in the chapter title, for “Community” substitute “Short-term community, community”.

(5) In section 29 (release on licence of certain prisoners: the supervision conditions), in subsection (2)(a)—

(a) in sub-paragraph (ii), the words from “serving” to the end are repealed,

(b) sub-paragraph (iii) is repealed,

(c) in sub-paragraphs (iv) and (v), for “person” substitute “short-term custody and community prisoner”,

(d) in sub-paragraph (vi), for “person” substitute “short-term custody and community prisoner serving a sentence of imprisonment of 6 months or more and”, and
(e) in sub-paragraph (vii), at the beginning insert “a short-term custody and community prisoner who is”.

(6) After section 29 insert—

“Short-term community licences

29A Release on short-term community licence: conditions

(1) This section applies where, by virtue of section 5, the Scottish Ministers release a prisoner on short-term community licence.

(2) The Scottish Ministers must include in the prisoner’s short-term community licence—

(a) the standard conditions, and

(b) where the prisoner falls within section 29(2), the supervision conditions.

(3) The Scottish Ministers may include in the prisoner’s short-term community licence—

(a) where the prisoner does not fall within section 29(2), any of the supervision conditions,

(b) such other conditions as they consider appropriate.

(4) The Scottish Ministers may—

(a) vary any condition mentioned in subsection (2) or (3),

(c) cancel any condition mentioned in subsection (3),

(b) include any further conditions in the licence.

(5) The Scottish Ministers may not cancel any condition mentioned in subsection (2).

(6) Before exercising any of the powers conferred by subsection (3) or (4), the Scottish Ministers must, in pursuance of arrangements established under section 46A(1), co-operate with the appropriate local authority.

(7) In this section, “appropriate local authority”, in relation to a short-term custody and community prisoner, means the local authority for the area in which the prisoner—

(a) resided immediately before the imposition of the short-term custody and community sentence, or

(b) intends to reside on release on short-term community licence.

(8) If, by virtue of subsection (7), two or more local authorities are the appropriate local authority in relation to a short-term custody and community prisoner, those authorities may agree that the functions conferred on them by subsection (5) and section 46A(2) may be carried out by only one of them.”.
(7) After section 46 insert—

“Assessment of conditions for short-term community licences

46A Joint arrangements between Scottish Ministers and local authorities

(1) The Scottish Ministers and each local authority must jointly establish arrangements for the assessment and management of the risk posed in the local authority’s area by short-term custody and community prisoners released on licence subject to the supervision conditions.

(2) For the purposes of assisting the Scottish Ministers in deciding whether, under section 29A(3)(a), to include any of the supervision conditions in a prisoner’s short-term community licence, the Scottish Ministers and the appropriate local authority must, during the first half of a short-term custody and community prisoner’s sentence, assess, in accordance with arrangements established under subsection (1), whether any of those conditions are appropriate.

(3) In this section, “appropriate local authority” is to be construed in accordance with section 29A(7) and (8).”.

(8) In section 47 (curfew licences)—

(a) in subsection (1), after “to” insert “a short-term custody and community prisoner or”,

(b) in subsection (2) for “the custody part of the prisoner’s sentence” substitute—

“(a) in the case of a short-term custody and community prisoner, the first half of the prisoner’s sentence,

(b) in the case of a custody and community prisoner, the custody part of the prisoner’s sentence”,

(c) after subsection (3) insert—

“(3A) The Scottish Ministers may release a short-term custody and community prisoner on curfew licence only—

(a) after the later of—

(i) the day on which the prisoner has served the greater of one-quarter or four weeks of the prisoner’s sentence, or

(ii) the day falling 166 days before the expiry of one-half of the prisoner’s sentence, and

(b) before the day falling 14 days before the expiry of one-half of the prisoner’s sentence.”,

(d) in subsection (4)—

(i) after “a” insert “custody and community”, and

(ii) in paragraph (a)(ii), for “135” substitute “166”, and

(e) in subsection (8), for “the custody part of the prisoner’s sentence” substitute—

“(a) in the case of a short-term custody and community prisoner, the first half of the prisoner’s sentence,

(b) in the case of a custody and community prisoner, the custody part of the prisoner’s sentence”.
Schedule 2 amends the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act (asp 17) and the 1995 Act in consequence of amendments made by this section.

19 Early removal of certain short-term prisoners from the United Kingdom

For schedule 6 to the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007 (asp 17) (transitory amendments of the Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Act 1993) substitute—

(introduced by section 66(3))

TRANSITORY AMENDMENTS

1. Until the coming into force of the repeal by this Act of Part 1 of the Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Act 1993 (c.9), that Part has effect in accordance with paragraphs 2 to 4.

2. In section 1 (release of short-term and long-term prisoners), subsection (3) has effect as if for paragraphs (a) and (b) there were substituted “must,”.

3. Section 9 (persons liable to removal from the United Kingdom) has effect as if—

   (a) subsection (1) were repealed, and
   (b) in subsection (3), after “section”, where it first occurs, there were inserted “and sections 9A and 9B”.

4. That Part has effect as if after section 9 there were inserted—

“9A Persons eligible for removal from the United Kingdom

(1) For the purposes of this Part, to be “eligible for removal from the United Kingdom” a person must show, to the satisfaction of the Scottish Ministers, that the condition in subsection (2) is met.

(2) The condition is that the person has the settled intention of residing permanently outside the United Kingdom if removed from prison under section 9B.

(3) The person must not be one who is liable to removal from the United Kingdom.

9B Early removal of certain short-term prisoners from the United Kingdom

(1) Subject to subsection (2), where a short-term prisoner is liable to, or eligible for, removal from the United Kingdom, the Scottish Ministers may remove the prisoner from prison under this section at any time during the period of 180 days ending with the day on which the prisoner will have served one-half of the prisoner’s sentence.

(2) Subsection (1) does not apply in relation to a prisoner unless the prisoner has served one-quarter of the sentence.

(3) A prisoner removed from prison under this section—
(a) if liable to removal from the United Kingdom, is so removed only for the purpose of enabling the Secretary of State to remove the prisoner from the United Kingdom under powers conferred by—

(i) Schedule 2 or 3 to the Immigration Act 1971 (c.77), or

(ii) section 10 of the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999 (c.33),

(b) if eligible for removal from the United Kingdom, is so removed only for the purpose of enabling the prisoner to leave the United Kingdom in order to reside permanently outside the United Kingdom, and

(c) in either case, so long as remaining in the United Kingdom, remains liable to be detained in pursuance of the prisoner’s sentence until the prisoner has served one-half of the sentence.

(4) So long as a prisoner removed from prison under this section remains in the United Kingdom but has not been returned to prison, any duty or power of the Scottish Ministers under section 1(1), 1AA or 3 is exercisable in relation to the prisoner as if the prisoner were in prison.

(5) The Scottish Ministers may by order amend the number of days for the time being specified in subsection (1).

(6) A statutory instrument containing an order under subsection (5) may not be made unless a draft of the instrument has been laid before, and approved by resolution of, the Scottish Parliament.

9C Re-entry into United Kingdom of prisoner removed from prison early

(1) This section applies in relation to a person (referred to in this section as “the removed person”) who, after being removed from prison under section 9B, has been removed from the United Kingdom before serving one-half of the sentence.

(2) Where the removed person re-enters the United Kingdom at any time before the date on which the person would have served the person’s sentence in full (but for the person’s removal from prison under section 9B), the person is liable to be detained in pursuance of the person’s sentence until the earlier of the following—

(a) the date of the expiry of the outstanding custodial period,

(b) the date on which the person would have served the person’s sentence in full (but for the person’s removal from prison under section 9B).

(3) In the case of a person liable to be detained under subsection (2), the duty to release the person under section 1(1) or 1AA(1) applies only after the expiry of the outstanding custodial period.

(4) A person who is liable to be detained by virtue of subsection (2) is, if at large, to be taken for the purposes of section 40 of the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1989 (c.45) (persons unlawfully at large) to be unlawfully at large.

(5) Subsection (2) does not prevent—
(a) the further removal from prison under section 9B(1) of a person falling within that subsection, or
(b) the further removal from the United Kingdom of such a person.

(6) In this section, the “outstanding custodial period” means, in relation to a removed person, a period of time equal to the period beginning with the date of removal from the United Kingdom and ending with the date on which the person would, but for the removal, have served one-half of the sentence.”.

Until the coming into force of the repeal by this Act of Part 1 of the Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Act 1993 (c.9), paragraph (c) of section 24 of the International Criminal Court (Scotland) Act 2001 (asp 13) (limited disapplication of certain provisions relating to sentences) has effect as if—

(a) after “9” there were inserted “, 9A, 9B, 9C”, and
(b) after “transfer” there were inserted “, removal”.”.

Other sentencing measures

20 Reports about supervised persons

(1) Section 203 of the 1995 Act (reports) is amended as follows.

(2) In subsection (3), for the words from “the offender” to the end substitute—

“(a) the offender,
(b) the offender’s solicitor (if any), and
c) the prosecutor.”.

21 Extended sentences for certain sexual offences

In section 210A of the 1995 Act (extended sentences for sex and violent offenders)—

(a) in subsection (10), at the end of the definition of “sexual offence” add—

“(xxviii) an offence (other than one mentioned in the preceding paragraphs) where the court determines for the purposes of this paragraph that there was a significant sexual aspect to the offender’s behaviour in committing the offence;”, and

(b) after subsection (11) add—

“(12) An extended sentence may be passed by reference to paragraph (xxviii) only if the offender is or is to become, by virtue of Schedule 3 to the Sexual Offences Act 2003 (c.42), subject to the notification requirements of Part 2 of that Act.”.

22 Effect of probation and absolute discharge

(1) In section 1(4) of the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974 (c.53) (construction of references in Act to “conviction”), for “section 9 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1949” substitute “section 247 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (c.46)”.

(2) In section 49(6) of the 1982 Act (offences relating to dangerous and annoying creatures: power to order disposal of creature), the words “or makes a probation order in relation to him” are repealed.
(3) In section 58(3) of the 1982 Act (convicted thief in possession: power to order forfeiture of tools etc.)—
   (a) the words “or makes a probation order in relation to him” are repealed, and
   (b) for the words from “discharged absolutely” to the end substitute “, as the case may be, discharged absolutely.”.

(4) In section 96 of the 2005 Act (exclusion orders: supplementary provision), after subsection (2) insert—
“(2A) For the purposes of section 94, section 247(1) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (c.46) (convictions deemed not be convictions where offender placed on probation or discharged absolutely) does not apply to a conviction for a violent offence within the meaning of section 94.”.

(5) In section 129 of the 2005 Act (relevant and foreign offences), after subsection (4) add—
“(5) For the purposes of the provisions of this Act specified in subsection (6), section 247(1) and (2) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (c.46) (convictions deemed not to be convictions where offender placed on probation or discharged absolutely) does not apply to a conviction for a relevant offence.

(6) Those provisions are—
   (a) section 21(4),
   (b) section 23(6),
   (c) section 24,
   (d) section 33(6),
   (e) sections 41 to 44,
   (f) section 73(3),
   (g) section 75,
   (h) sections 80 to 83,
   (i) section 89(4) and (5),
   (j) subsection (3) of this section, and
   (k) section 130.”.

23 Offences aggravated by racial or religious prejudice

(1) In section 96 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 (c.37) (racially aggravated offences), for subsection (5) substitute—
“(5) The court must—
   (a) state on conviction that the offence was racially aggravated,
   (b) record the conviction in a way that shows that the offence was so aggravated,
   (c) take the aggravation into account in determining the appropriate sentence, and
   (d) state—
(i) where the sentence in respect of the offence is different from that which the court would have imposed if the offence were not so aggravated, the extent of and the reasons for that difference, or
(ii) otherwise, the reasons for there being no such difference.”.

(2) In section 74 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003 (asp 7) (offences aggravated by religious prejudice)—

(a) after subsection (2) insert—
“(2A) It is immaterial whether or not the offender’s malice and ill-will is also based (to any extent) on any other factor.”,

(b) subsections (3) and (4) are repealed, and

(c) after subsection (4) insert—
“(4A) The court must—
(a) state on conviction that the offence was aggravated by religious prejudice,
(b) record the conviction in a way that shows that the offence was so aggravated,
(c) take the aggravation into account in determining the appropriate sentence, and
(d) state—
(i) where the sentence in respect of the offence is different from that which the court would have imposed if the offence were not so aggravated, the extent of and the reasons for that difference, or
(ii) otherwise, the reasons for there being no such difference.”.

Voluntary intoxication by alcohol: effect in sentencing

(1) Subsection (2) applies in relation to an offender who was, at the time of the offence, under the influence of alcohol as a result of having voluntarily consumed alcohol.

(2) A court, in sentencing the offender in respect of the offence, must not take that fact into account by way of mitigation.

PART 2

CRIMINAL LAW

Serious organised crime

Involvement in serious organised crime

(1) A person who agrees with at least one other person to become involved in serious organised crime commits an offence.

(2) For the purposes of this section and sections 26 to 28—

“serious organised crime” means crime involving two or more persons acting together for the principal purpose of committing or conspiring to commit a serious offence or a series of serious offences, and “serious offence” means an indictable offence—
(a) committed with the intention of securing a material benefit for any person, or
(b) which is an act of serious violence committed with the intention of securing such a benefit in the future.

(3) A person guilty of an offence under subsection (1) is liable—
(a) on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 10 years or to a fine or to both,
(b) on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 12 months or to a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or to both.

26 Offences aggravated by connection with serious organised crime

(1) This subsection applies where it is—
(a) libelled in an indictment or specified in a complaint that an offence is aggravated by a connection with serious organised crime, and
(b) proved that the offence is so aggravated.

(2) An offence is aggravated by a connection with serious organised crime if the person committing the offence is motivated (wholly or partly) by the objective of committing or conspiring to commit serious organised crime.

(3) It is immaterial whether or not in committing the offence the person in fact enables the person or another person to commit serious organised crime.

(4) Evidence from a single source is sufficient to prove that an offence is aggravated by a connection with serious organised crime.

(5) Where subsection (1) applies, the court must—
(a) state on conviction that the offence is aggravated by a connection with serious organised crime,
(b) record the conviction in a way that shows that the offence was so aggravated,
(c) take the aggravation into account in determining the appropriate sentence, and
(d) state—
(i) where the sentence in respect of the offence is different from that which the court would have imposed if the offence were not so aggravated, the extent of and the reasons for that difference, or
(ii) otherwise, the reasons for there being no such difference.

27 Directing serious organised crime

(1) A person commits an offence by directing another person—
(a) to commit a serious offence,
(b) to commit an offence aggravated by a connection with serious organised crime under section 26.

(2) A person commits an offence by directing another person to direct a further person to commit an offence mentioned in subsection (1).
(3) For the purposes of subsections (1) and (2), a person directs another person to commit an offence if the person—

(a) does something, or a series of things, to direct the person to commit the offence,

(b) intends that the thing or things done will persuade the person to commit the offence, and

(c) intends that the thing or things done will—

(i) result in a person committing serious organised crime, or
(ii) enable a person to commit serious organised crime.

(4) For the purposes of subsection (3)(b) and (c), the intention of the person directing the other person may be reasonably inferred by the context in which the steps taken to direct the person were taken.

(5) The person directing the other person commits an offence under subsection (1) whether or not the other person in fact commits—

(a) a serious offence, or

(b) an offence aggravated by a connection with serious organised crime under section 26.

(6) Any direction by means of a message (however communicated) is to be treated as done in Scotland if the message is sent or received in Scotland.

(7) In this section “directing” a person to commit an offence includes inciting the person to commit the offence.

(8) A person guilty of an offence under subsection (1) or (2) is liable—

(a) on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 14 years or to a fine or to both,

(b) on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 12 months or to a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or to both.

28 Failure to report serious organised crime

(1) This section applies where—

(a) a person (“the person”) knows or suspects that another person (“the other person”) has committed—

(i) an offence under section 25 or 27, or

(ii) an offence which is aggravated by a connection with serious organised crime under section 26, and

(b) that knowledge or suspicion originates from information obtained—

(i) in the course of the person’s trade, profession, business or employment, or

(ii) as a result of a close personal relationship between the person and the other person.

(2) In the case of knowledge or suspicion originating from information obtained by the person as a result of a close personal relationship between the person and the other person, this section applies only where the person has derived a material benefit as a result of the commission of serious organised crime by the other person.
(3) The person commits an offence if the person does not disclose to a constable—
   (a) the person’s knowledge or suspicion, and
   (b) the information on which that knowledge or suspicion is based.

(4) It is a defence for a person charged with an offence under subsection (3) to prove that the person had a reasonable excuse for not making the disclosure.

(5) Subsection (3) does not require disclosure by a person who is a professional legal adviser (an “adviser”) of—
       (a) information which the adviser obtains in privileged circumstances, or
       (b) knowledge or a suspicion based on information obtained in privileged circumstances.

(6) For the purpose of subsection (5), information is obtained by an adviser in privileged circumstances if it comes to the adviser, otherwise than for the purposes of committing serious organised crime—
       (a) from a client (or from a client’s representative) in connection with the provision of legal advice by the adviser to that person,
       (b) from a person seeking legal advice from the adviser (or from that person’s representative), or
       (c) from a person, for the purpose of actual or contemplated legal proceedings.

(7) The reference in subsection (3) to a constable includes a reference to a police member of the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency.

(8) A person guilty of an offence under this section is liable—
       (a) on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years or to a fine or to both,
       (b) on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 12 months or to a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or to both.

Articles banned in prison

(1) In section 41 of the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1989 (c.45) (unlawful introduction of tobacco etc. into prison)—
       (a) for subsection (1) substitute—

   "(1) A person commits an offence if without reasonable excuse the person—
       (a) brings or otherwise introduces into a prison a proscribed article (or attempts to do so),
       (b) takes out of or otherwise removes from a prison a proscribed article (or attempts to do so).

(1A) A person who commits an offence under this section—
       (a) where the proscribed article falls within paragraphs (b) to (f) of subsection (9A), is liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for a period not exceeding 30 days or to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale (or to both),
(b) where the proscribed article falls within paragraph (a) of subsection (9A) (whether or not also within paragraph (f) of that subsection), is liable to the penalties set out in section 41ZA(5),

(b) in subsection (2), for “the foregoing subsection” substitute “subsection (1)(a),”

(c) in subsection (2A)—

(i) for “article mentioned in paragraphs (a) to (e) of subsection (1) above” substitute “proscribed article”, and

(ii) for “article mentioned in those paragraphs” substitute “proscribed article”,

(d) in subsection (2B)(c), for the words from “mentioned” to “that subsection)” substitute “that is a proscribed article falling within paragraph (d) to (f) of subsection (9A) (but not also within paragraph (b) or (c) of that subsection), or falling within paragraph (a) of that subsection”,

(e) in subsection (3), for “subsection (1) above” substitute “this section or section 41ZA”,

(f) after subsection (9) insert—

“(9A) In this section, a “proscribed article” is—

(a) any personal communication device,

(b) any drug,

(c) any firearm or ammunition,

(d) any offensive weapon,

(e) any article which has a blade or is sharply pointed,

(f) any article (or other article) which is a prohibited article within the meaning of rules made under section 39.

(9B) In this section, a “personal communication device” includes—

(a) a mobile telephone,

(b) any other portable electronic device that is capable of transmitting or receiving a communication of any kind,

(c) any—

(i) component part of a device mentioned in paragraph (a) or (b),

(ii) article that is designed or adapted for use with such a device.”,

(g) in subsection (10), in the definition of “offensive weapon”, for “the Prevention of Crime Act 1953” substitute “section 47 of the Criminal Law (Consolidation) (Scotland) Act 1995 (c.39)”.

(2) After section 41 of that Act insert—

“41ZA Further provision for communication devices

(1) A person commits an offence if, knowing another person to be a prisoner, the person gives a personal communication device to the prisoner while the prisoner is inside a prison.

(2) A person commits an offence if, by means of a personal communication device, the person—
(a) transmits, from inside a prison, a communication of any kind, or
(b) intentionally receives, when inside a prison, a communication of any kind.

(3) A person commits an offence if, while inside a prison, the person is in possession of a personal communication device.

(4) A person who commits an offence under subsections (1) to (3) is liable to the penalties set out in subsection (5).

(5) The penalties are—
(a) on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for a period not exceeding 2 years or to a fine (or to both),
(b) on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a period not exceeding 12 months or to a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum (or to both).

(6) In this section, “personal communication device” is to be construed in accordance with section 41(9B).

41ZB  Exceptions as to communication devices

(1) No offence—
(a) under section 41, where the proscribed article falls within paragraph (a) of subsection (9A) (whether or not also within paragraph (f) of that subsection), or
(b) under section 41ZA(1) to (3), is committed by a person where subsection (2) applies.

(2) This subsection applies—
(a) if (and in so far as) the act which constitutes the offence is done by the person at or in relation to a designated area at the prison, or
(b) if (and in so far as) the person is acting in circumstances to which an authorisation under subsection (8) applies.

(3) No offence—
(a) under section 41, where the proscribed article falls within paragraph (a) of subsection (9A) (whether or not also within paragraph (f) of that subsection), or
(b) under 41ZA(2) or (3), is committed by a prison officer (or other prison official) where subsection (4) applies.

(4) This subsection applies—
(a) if the device is one supplied to the person specifically for use in the course of the person’s official duties at the prison, or
(b) if (and in so far as) the person is acting in accordance with those duties.

(5) No offence under section 41ZA(3) is committed by a person other than a prisoner if in the circumstances there is a reasonable excuse for the possession.
(6) The defences mentioned in subsection (7) apply in any proceedings for an offence under—
   (a) section 41(1), where the proscribed article falls within paragraph (a) of subsection (9A) (whether or not also within paragraph (f) of that subsection), or
   (b) 41ZA(1) to (3).

(7) In relation to such an offence, it is a defence for the accused person to show that—
   (a) the person reasonably believed that the person was acting in circumstances to which an authorisation under subsection (8) applied (even though no such authorisation did apply), or
   (b) in the circumstances there was an overriding public interest which justified the person’s actions.

(8) An authorisation under this subsection is a written authorisation that is given—
   (a) in favour of any person specified in the authorisation (or person of a specified description),
   (b) for a specified purpose, and
   (c) by—
      (i) the governor or director of a prison in relation to activities at that prison, or
      (ii) the Scottish Ministers in relation to activities at any specified prison.

(9) A designated area referred to in subsection (2)(a) is any part of the prison, used solely or principally for an administrative or similar purpose, that is specified as such by a written designation given under this paragraph by the governor or director of the prison.

(10) Prison officers (or other prison officials) who are Crown servants or agents do not benefit from Crown immunity in relation to an offence under—
   (a) section 41, where the proscribed article falls within paragraph (a) of subsection (9A) of that section (whether or not also within paragraph (f) of that subsection), or
   (b) section 41ZA.”.

Crossbows, knives etc.

30 Sale and hire of crossbows to persons under 18

35 (1) The Crossbows Act 1987 (c.32) is amended as follows.

(2) In section 1 (sale and letting on hire), the words from “unless” to the end are repealed.

(3) After that section insert—

“1A Defences

(1) It is a defence for a person charged with an offence under section 1 (referred to in this section as “the accused”) to show that—
(a) the accused believed the person to whom the crossbow or part was sold or let on hire (referred to in this section as “the purchaser or hirer”) to be aged 18 or over, and

(b) either—

(i) the accused had taken reasonable steps to establish the purchaser or hirer’s age, or

(ii) no reasonable person could have suspected from the purchaser or hirer’s appearance that the purchaser or hirer was under the age of 18.

(2) For the purposes of subsection (1)(b)(i), the accused is to be treated as having taken reasonable steps to establish the purchaser or hirer’s age if and only if—

(a) the accused was shown any of the documents mentioned in subsection (3), and

(b) the document would have convinced a reasonable person.

(3) Those documents are any document bearing to be—

(a) a passport,

(b) a European Union photocard driving licence, or

(c) such other document, or a document of such other description, as the Scottish Ministers may by order made by statutory instrument prescribe.

(4) A statutory instrument containing an order under subsection (3)(c) is subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of the Scottish Parliament.”.

(4) After section 3 insert—

“3A Test purchasing

(1) A person under the age of 18 who buys or hires, or attempts to buy or hire, a crossbow or a part of a crossbow does not commit an offence under section 2 or 3 if the person is authorised to do so by the chief constable for the purpose of determining whether an offence is being committed under section 1.

(2) A chief constable may authorise a person under the age of 18 to buy or hire, or attempt to buy or hire, a crossbow or a part of a crossbow only if satisfied that all reasonable steps have been or will be taken to—

(a) ensure the person’s safety, and

(b) avoid any risk to the person’s welfare.”.

31 Sale and hire of knives and certain other articles to persons under 18

(1) Section 141A of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 (c.33) (sale of knives and certain articles with blade or point to persons under eighteen) is amended as follows.

(2) In subsection (1), after “sells” insert “or lets on hire”.

(3) In subsection (3A), after “sell” insert “or let on hire”.

(4) For subsection (4) substitute—

“(4) It is a defence for a person charged with an offence under subsection (1) (referred to in this section as “the accused”) to show that—
(a) the accused believed the person to whom the article was sold or let on hire (referred to in this section as “the purchaser or hirer”) to be of or above the relevant age, and

(b) either—

(i) the accused had taken reasonable steps to establish the purchaser or hirer’s age, or

(ii) no reasonable person could have suspected from the purchaser or hirer’s appearance that the purchaser or hirer was aged under the relevant age.

(4A) For the purposes of subsection (4)(b)(i), the accused is to be treated as having taken reasonable steps to establish the purchaser or hirer’s age if and only if—

(a) the accused was shown any of the documents mentioned in subsection (4B), and

(b) the document would have convinced a reasonable person.

(4B) Those documents are any document bearing to be—

(a) a passport,

(b) a European Union photocard driving licence, or

(c) such other document, or a document of such other description, as the Scottish Ministers may by order prescribe.

(4C) In subsection (4), “the relevant age” is—

(a) in the case where the article is a knife or knife blade designed for domestic use, 16 years, and

(b) in any other case, 18 years.”.

Sexual offences

32 Certain sexual offences by non-natural persons

(1) The Protection of Children and Prevention of Sexual Offences (Scotland) Act 2005 (asp 9) is amended as follows.

(2) At the end of each of the following provisions insert “or a fine or both”—

(a) subsections (4)(b) and (5)(b) of section 9 (paying for sexual services of a child),

(b) subsection (2)(b) of section 10 (causing or inciting provision by child of sexual services or child pornography),

(c) subsection (2)(b) of section 11 (controlling a child providing sexual services or involved in pornography), and

(d) subsection (2)(b) of section 12 (arranging or facilitating provision by child of sexual services or child pornography).

(3) After section 14 insert—

“14A Offences by bodies corporate etc.

(1) Subsection (2) applies where an offence under sections 10 to 12 committed—
(a) by a body corporate, is committed with the consent or connivance of, or is attributable to any neglect on the part of, a person who—
   (i) is a director, manager, secretary or other similar officer of the body corporate, or
   (ii) purports to act in any such capacity,
(b) by a Scottish partnership, is committed with the consent or connivance of, or is attributable to any neglect on the part of, a person who—
   (i) is a partner, or
   (ii) purports to act in that capacity,
(c) by an unincorporated association other than a Scottish partnership, is committed with the consent or connivance of, or is attributable to any neglect on the part of, a person who—
   (i) is concerned in the management or control of the association, or
   (ii) purports to act in the capacity of a person so concerned.

(2) The individual (as well as the body corporate, Scottish partnership or, as the case may be, unincorporated association) commits the offence and is liable to be proceeded against and punished accordingly.

(3) Where the affairs of a body corporate are managed by its members, this section applies in relation to acts and defaults of a member in connection with the member’s function of management as if the member were a director of the body corporate.”.

33 Indecent images of children

(1) In the 1982 Act—
   (a) in section 52 (indecent photographs etc. of children)—
      (i) in subsection (2C)(b), for “a pseudo-photograph” substitute “an indecent pseudo-photograph”,
      (ii) after subsection (8) add—
         “(9) In this section, references to a photograph also include a tracing or other image, whether made by electronic or other means (of whatever nature), which is not itself a photograph or pseudo-photograph but which is derived from the whole or part of a photograph or pseudo-photograph (or a combination of either or both).
         (10) And subsection (2B) applies in relation to such an image as it applies in relation to a pseudo-photograph.”,
   (b) in section 52A (possession of indecent photographs of children), in subsection (4), for “and (8)” substitute “and (8) to (10)”.

(2) In Schedule 1 to the 1995 Act (offences against children under the age of 17 years to which special provisions apply), in paragraph 2B, after “photograph” insert “or pseudo-photograph”.

(3) In Schedule 3 to the Sexual Offences Act 2003 (c.42) (list of sexual offences for the purposes of Part 2)—
(a) in paragraph 44, for the words from “the” where it third occurs to the end substitute—

“(a) the prohibited goods included indecent photographs or pseudo-photographs of persons under 16 and the offender—

(i) was 18 or over, or

(ii) is or has been sentenced in respect of the offence to imprisonment for a term of at least 12 months, or

(b) in imposing sentence or otherwise disposing of the case, the court determines that it is appropriate that the offender be regarded, for the purposes of Part 2 of this Act, as a person who has committed an offence under this paragraph.”.

(b) in paragraph 97(b), for “and (8)” substitute “and (8) to (10)”.

34 Extreme pornography

(1) In section 51 of the 1982 Act (obscene material)—

(a) for subsection (3) substitute—

“(3) A person guilty of an offence under this section is liable—

(a) on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a period not exceeding 12 months or to a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or to both, or

(b) on conviction on indictment—

(i) in a case where the obscene material is or includes an extreme pornographic image, to imprisonment for a period not exceeding 5 years or to a fine or to both, or

(ii) in any other case, to imprisonment for a period not exceeding 3 years or to a fine or to both.”, and

(b) in subsection (8)—

(i) before the definition of “material” insert—

““extreme pornographic image” is to be construed in accordance with section 51A;”, and

(ii) the definition of “prescribed sum” is repealed.

(2) After section 51 of that Act insert—

“51A Extreme pornography

(1) A person who is in possession of an extreme pornographic image is guilty of an offence under this section.

(2) An extreme pornographic image is an image which is all of the following—

(a) obscene,

(b) pornographic,

(c) extreme.

(3) An image is pornographic if it is of such a nature that it must reasonably be assumed to have been made solely or principally for the purpose of sexual arousal.
(4) Where (as found in the person’s possession) an image forms part of a series of images, the question of whether the image is pornographic is to be determined by reference to—

(a) the image itself (and any sounds accompanying it), and

(b) where the series of images (and any sounds accompanying them) is such as to be capable of providing a context for the image, its context within the series of images.

(5) So, for example, where—

(a) an image forms an integral part of a narrative constituted by a series of images, and

(b) having regard to those images as a whole, they are not of such a nature that they must reasonably be assumed to have been made solely or principally for the purpose of sexual arousal, the image may, by virtue of being part of that narrative, be found not to be pornographic (even if it may have been found to be pornographic where taken by itself).

(6) An image is extreme if it depicts, in an explicit and realistic way any of the following—

(a) an act which takes or threatens a person’s life,

(b) an act which results, or is likely to result, in a person’s severe injury,

(c) rape or other non-consensual penetrative sexual activity,

(d) sexual activity involving (directly or indirectly) a human corpse,

(e) an act which involves sexual activity between a person and an animal (or the carcase of an animal).

(7) In determining whether (as found in the person’s possession) an image depicts an act mentioned in subsection (6), reference may be had to—

(a) how the image is or was described (whether the description is part of the image itself or otherwise),

(b) any sounds accompanying the image,

(c) where the image forms an integral part of a narrative constituted by a series of images, the context provided by that narrative.

(8) A person guilty of an offence under this section is liable—

(a) on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a period not exceeding 12 months or to a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or to both,

(b) on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for a period not exceeding 3 years or to a fine or to both.

(9) In this section, an “image” is—

(a) a moving or still image (made by any means), or

(b) data (stored by any means) which is capable of conversion into such an image.
51B Extreme pornography: excluded images

(1) An offence is not committed under section 51A if the image is an excluded image.

(2) An “excluded image” is an image which is all or part of a classified work.

(3) An image is not an excluded image where—

(a) it has been extracted from a classified work, and

(b) it must be reasonably be assumed to have been extracted (whether with or without other images) from the work solely or principally for the purpose of sexual arousal.

(4) In determining whether (as found in the person’s possession) the image was extracted from the work for the purpose mentioned in subsection (3)(b), reference may be had to—

(a) how the image was stored,

(b) how the image is or was described (whether the description is part of the image itself or otherwise),

(c) any sounds accompanying the image,

(d) where the image forms an integral part of a narrative constituted by a series of images, the context provided by that narrative.

(5) In this section and section 51C—

“classified work” means a video work in respect of which a classification certificate has been issued by a designated authority,

“classification certificate” and “video work” have the same meanings as in the Video Recordings Act 1984 (c.39),

“designated authority” means an authority which has been designated by the Secretary of State under section 4 of that Act,

“extract” includes an extract of a single image,

“image” and “extreme pornographic image” are to be construed in accordance with section 51A.

51C Extreme pornography: defences

(1) Where a person (“A”) is charged with an offence under section 51A, it is a defence for A to prove one or more of the matters mentioned in subsection (2).

(2) The matters are—

(a) that A had a legitimate reason for being in possession of the image concerned,

(b) that A had not seen the image concerned and did not know, nor had any cause to suspect, it to be an extreme pornographic image,

(c) that A—

(i) was sent the image concerned without any prior request having been made by or on behalf of A, and

(ii) did not keep it for an unreasonable time.
(3) Where A is charged with an offence under section 51A, it is a defence for A to prove that—
(a) A directly participated in the act depicted, and
(b) subsection (4) applies.

(4) This subsection applies—
(a) in the case of an image which depicts an act described in subsection (6)(a) of that section, if the act depicted did not actually take or threaten a person’s life,
(b) in the case of an image which depicts an act described in subsection (6)(b) of that section, if the act depicted did not actually result in (nor was it actually likely to result in) a person’s severe injury,
(c) in the case of an image which depicts an act described in subsection (6)(c) of that section, if the act depicted did not actually involve non-consensual activity,
(d) in the case of an image which depicts an act described in subsection (6)(d) of that section, if what is depicted as a human corpse was not in fact a corpse,
(e) in the case of an image which depicts an act described in subsection (6)(e) of that section, if what is depicted as an animal (or the carcase of an animal) was not in fact an animal (or a carcase).

(5) The defence under subsection (3) is not available if A shows, gives or offers for sale the image to any person who was not also a direct participant in the act depicted.”.

People trafficking

(1) In section 22 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003 (asp 7) (traffic in prostitution etc.)—
(a) in subsection (1)(a)—
(i) after “arrival in” insert “or the entry into”,
(ii) after “such arrival” insert “or entry”,
(b) for subsection (4) substitute—
“(4) Subsection (1) applies to anything done in or outwith the United Kingdom.”,
(c) for subsection (5) substitute—
“(5) A person may be proceeded against, indicted, tried and punished for any offence to which this section applies—
(a) in any sheriff court district in which the person is apprehended or is in custody, or
(b) in such sheriff court district as the Lord Advocate may determine, as if the offence had been committed in that district (and the offence is, for all purposes incidental to or consequential on trial or punishment, to be deemed to have been committed in that district).”, and
(d) subsection (6) is repealed.

(2) In the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc.) Act 2004 (c.19)—
(a) in section 4 (trafficking people for exploitation), in subsection (1), after “arrival in” insert “, or the entry into,”, and
(b) in section 5 (section 4: supplemental)—
(i) subsections (1) and (2) are repealed, and
(ii) after subsection (2) insert—
“(2A) Subsections (1) to (3) of section 4 apply to anything done in or outwith the United Kingdom.

(2B) A person may be proceeded against, indicted, tried and punished for any offence to which section 4 applies—
(a) in any sheriff court district in which the person is apprehended or is in custody, or
(b) in such sheriff court district as the Lord Advocate may determine, as if the offence had been committed in that district (and the offence is, for all purposes incidental to or consequential on trial or punishment, to be deemed to have been committed in that district).

(2C) In subsection (2B), “sheriff court district” is to be construed in accordance with section 307(1) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (c.46) (interpretation).”.

Fraud and embezzlement

Alternative charges for fraud and embezzlement

In Schedule 3 to the 1995 Act (indictments and complaints), after paragraph 8(3) insert—
“(3A) Under an indictment or a complaint for breach of trust and embezzlement, an accused may be convicted of falsehood, fraud and wilful imposition.

(3B) Under an indictment or a complaint for falsehood, fraud and wilful imposition, an accused may be convicted of breach of trust and embezzlement.”.

Conspiracy

Conspiracy to commit offences outwith Scotland

(1) The title of section 11A of the 1995 Act becomes “Conspiracy to commit offences outwith Scotland”.

(2) In that section—
(a) in subsection (1), for “in a country or territory outside the United Kingdom” substitute “outwith Scotland”,
(b) in subsection (3)—
(i) for “the law in force in the country or territory where the act or other event was intended to take place” substitute “the relevant law”, and
(ii) for “the law in force in the country or territory” where it second occurs substitute “that law”, and

(c) after subsection (3) insert—

“(3A) In subsection (3) above, “the relevant law” is—

(a) if the act or event was intended to take place in another part of the United Kingdom, the law in force in that part,

(b) if the act or event was intended to take place in a country or territory outwith the United Kingdom, the law in force in that country or territory.”.

PART 3
CRIMINAL PROCEDURE

Children

38 Prosecution of children

(1) The 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(2) After section 41 insert—

“41A Prosecution of children under 12

(1) A child under the age of 12 years may not be prosecuted for an offence.

(2) A person aged 12 years or more may not be prosecuted for an offence which was committed at a time when the person was under the age of 12 years.”.

(3) In section 42 (prosecution of children), in subsection (1)—

(a) for “No child under the age of 16 years shall” substitute “A child aged 12 years or more but under 16 years may not”,

(b) for “his instance” substitute “the instance of the Lord Advocate”, and

(c) for “a child under the age of 16 years” substitute “such a child”.

(4) In section 234AA (antisocial behaviour order), in subsection (2), paragraph (b) is repealed.

39 Offences: liability of partners

(1) A partner of a partnership (other than a limited liability partnership) is guilty of a corporate offence where—

(a) the partnership is guilty of the corporate offence, and

(b) it is proved that the corporate offence—

(i) was committed with the consent or connivance of the partner (whether alone or among others), or

(ii) was attributable to the neglect of the partner (whether alone or among others).
(2) In subsection (1), a “corporate offence” is an offence in relation to which an enactment has the effect that where—

(a) a body corporate is guilty of the offence, and

(b) it is proved that the offence—

(i) was committed with the consent or connivance of a director (whether alone or among others), or

(ii) was attributable to the neglect of a director (whether alone or among others), the director (as well as the body corporate) is guilty of the offence.

(3) Subsection (1) does not apply in relation to a corporate offence if an enactment (other than subsection (1)) makes provision in relation to the offence having the same effect as that subsection.

Witness statements

40 Witness statements

(1) This section applies where—

(a) in the course of a criminal investigation, a witness makes a statement in relation to the matter to which the investigation relates,

(b) the statement is contained in a document, and

(c) the witness is likely to be cited to give evidence in criminal proceedings arising from the matter.

(2) Before the witness gives evidence in the criminal proceedings, the prosecutor may—

(a) give the witness a copy of the statement, or

(b) make the statement available for inspection by the witness at all reasonable hours.

(3) Section 262 of the 1995 Act (interpretation of certain expressions for purposes of sections 259 to 261A of that Act) applies for the purposes of this section as it applies for the purposes of section 261A of that Act except that for the purposes of this section “statement” does not include a victim statement.

Police liberation

41 Breach of undertaking

After section 22 of the 1995 Act insert—

“22ZA Offences where undertaking breached

(1) A person who without reasonable excuse breaches an undertaking given by the person under section 22—

(a) by reason of failing to appear at court as required under subsection (1C)(a) of section 22, or

(b) by reason of failing to comply with a condition imposed under subsection (1D) of that section, is guilty of an offence.

(2) A person who is guilty of an offence under subsection (1) is liable on summary conviction to—
   (a) a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale, and
   (b) imprisonment for a period—
      (i) where conviction is in the JP court, not exceeding 60 days,
      (ii) where conviction is in the sheriff court, not exceeding 12 months.

(3) Despite subsection (1)(b), where (and to the extent that) the person breaches the undertaking by reason of committing an offence while subject to the undertaking—
   (a) the person is not guilty of an offence under that subsection, and
   (b) subsection (4) applies instead.

(4) The court, in determining the sentence for the subsequent offence, must have regard to—
   (a) the fact that the subsequent offence was committed in breach of the undertaking,
   (b) the number of undertakings to which the person was subject when that offence was committed,
   (c) any previous conviction of the person of an offence under subsection (1)(b),
   (d) the extent to which the sentence or disposal in respect of any previous conviction differed, by virtue of this subsection, from that which the court would have imposed but for this subsection.

(5) Subsections (3)(b) and (4) apply only if the fact that the subsequent offence was committed while the person was subject to an undertaking is specified in the complaint or indictment.

(6) In this section and section 22ZB, “the subsequent offence” is the offence committed by a person while the person is subject to an undertaking.

22ZB Evidential and procedural provision

(1) In any proceedings in relation to an offence under section 22ZA(1), the fact that a person—
   (a) breached an undertaking given by the person under section 22 by reason of failing to appear at court as required under subsection (1C)(a) of that section, or
   (b) was subject to any particular condition imposed under subsection (1D) of that section, is, unless challenged by preliminary objection before the person’s plea is recorded, to be held as admitted.

(2) In any proceedings in relation to an offence under section 22ZA(1) or (as the case may be) the subsequent offence—
(a) something in writing, purporting to be an undertaking given by a person under section 22 (and bearing to be signed and certified), is sufficient evidence of the terms of the undertaking so given,

(b) a document purporting to be a notice (or copy of a notice) effected under subsection (1F) of that section is sufficient evidence of the terms of the notice,

(c) an undertaking whose terms are modified under paragraph (b) of that subsection is to be regarded as if given in the terms as so modified.

(3) The fact that the subsequent offence was committed while the person was subject to an undertaking is to be held as admitted, unless challenged—

(a) in summary proceedings, by preliminary objection before the person’s plea is recorded, or

(b) in the case of proceedings on indictment, by giving notice of a preliminary objection in accordance with section 71(2) or 72(6)(b)(i) of this Act.

(4) Where the maximum penalty in respect of the subsequent offence is specified by (or by virtue of) any enactment, that maximum penalty is, for the purposes of the court’s determination of the appropriate sentence or disposal in respect of that offence, increased—

(a) where it is a fine, by the amount equivalent to level 3 on the standard scale, and

(b) where it is a period of imprisonment—

(i) as respects conviction in the JP court, by 60 days,

(ii) as respects conviction in the sheriff court or the High Court, by 6 months, even if the maximum penalty as so increased exceeds the penalty which it would otherwise be competent for the court to impose.

(5) A penalty under section 22ZA(2) may be imposed in addition to any other penalty which it is competent for the court to impose even if the total of penalties imposed may exceed the maximum penalty which it is competent to impose in respect of the original offence.

(6) The reference in subsection (5) to a penalty being imposed in addition to another penalty means, in the case of sentences of imprisonment or detention—

(a) where the sentences are imposed at the same time (whether or not in relation to the same complaint), framing the sentences so that they have effect consecutively,

(b) where the sentences are imposed at different times, framing the sentence imposed later so that (if the earlier sentence has not been served) the later sentence has effect consecutive to the earlier sentence.

(7) Subsection (6)(b) is subject to section 204A of this Act.

(8) The court must state—

(a) where the sentence or disposal in respect of the subsequent offence is different from that which the court would have imposed but for section 22ZA(4), the extent of and the reasons for that difference, or
(b) otherwise, the reasons for there being no such difference.

(9) A court which finds a person guilty of an offence under section 22ZA(1) may remit that person for sentence in respect of that offence to any court which is considering the original offence.

(10) At any time before the trial of an accused in summary proceedings for the original offence, it is competent to amend the complaint to include an additional charge of an offence under section 22ZA(1).

(11) In this section, “the original offence” is the offence in relation to which an undertaking is given.”.

Bail

42 Bail review applications

(1) The 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 30 (bail review)—

(a) for subsection (2A) substitute—

“(2A) On receipt of an application under subsection (2), the court must—

(a) intimate the application to the prosecutor, and

(b) before determining the application, give the prosecutor an opportunity to be heard.

(2AA) Despite subsection (2A)(b), the court may grant the application without having heard the prosecutor if the prosecutor consents.”, and

(b) in subsection (2C), in paragraph (b), for “heard” substitute “determined”.

(3) In section 31 (bail review on prosecutor’s application)—

(a) after subsection (2), insert—

“(2ZA) Despite subsection (2)(b), the court may grant the application without fixing a hearing if the person granted bail consents.”, and

(b) in subsection (3), the word “hearing” is repealed.

43 Bail condition for identification procedures etc.

In section 24 of the 1995 Act (bail and bail conditions)—

(a) in paragraph (b) of subsection (4), sub-paragraph (ii) and the word “and” immediately preceding it are repealed,

(b) in subsection (5), after paragraph (ca) insert—

“(cb) whenever reasonably instructed by a constable to do so—

(i) participates in an identification parade or other identification procedure; and

(ii) allows any print, impression or sample to be taken from the accused;”.
Prosecution on indictment

44 Prosecution on indictment: Scottish Law Officers

(1) The 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 64 (prosecution on indictment), in subsection (1), for “in name” substitute “at the instance”.

(3) In subsection 287 (demission of office by Lord Advocate)—

(a) in subsection (1)—

(i) for “by a Lord Advocate” substitute “at the instance of Her Majesty’s Advocate”, and

(ii) for “his” where it first occurs substitute “the holder of the office of Lord Advocate”,

(b) in subsection (2)—

(i) for “in name” substitute “at the instance”, and

(ii) the words “then in office” are repealed,

(c) after subsection (2), insert—

“(2A) Any such indictments in proceedings at the instance of the Solicitor General may be signed by the Solicitor General.

(2B) Subsection (2C) applies during any period when the offices of Lord Advocate and Solicitor General are both vacant as a result of the deaths of the holders of those offices.

(2C) It is lawful to indict accused persons at the instance of Her Majesty’s Advocate.”, and

(d) in subsection (4)—

(i) after “Advocate” insert “or Solicitor General”,

(ii) in paragraph (b), for “in the name” substitute “raised at the instance”, and

(iii) after that paragraph, insert—

(4) In Schedule 2, the words “A.F.R. (name of Lord Advocate),” are repealed.

Transfer of justice of the peace court cases

45 Transfer of justice of the peace court cases

After section 137C of the 1995 Act insert—

“137CA Transfer of JP court proceedings within sheriffdom

(1) Subsection (2) applies—

(a) where the accused person has been cited in summary proceedings to attend a diet of a JP court, or

(b) if the accused person has not been cited to such a diet, where summary proceedings against the accused have been commenced in a JP court.
(2) The prosecutor may apply to a justice for an order for the transfer of the proceedings to another JP court in the sheriffdom (and for adjournment to a diet of that court).

(3) On an application under subsection (2), the justice may make the order sought.

(4) In this section and sections 137CB and 137CC, “justice” does not include the sheriff.

137CB Transfer of JP court proceedings outwith sheriffdom

(1) Subsection (2) applies where the clerk of a JP court informs the prosecutor that, because of exceptional circumstances which could not reasonably have been foreseen, it is not practicable for the JP court or any other JP court in the sheriffdom to proceed with some or all of the summary cases due to call at a diet.

(2) The prosecutor shall as soon as practicable apply to the sheriff principal for an order for the transfer of the proceedings to a JP court in another sheriffdom (and for adjournment to a diet of that court).

(3) Subsection (4) applies where—
   (a) either—
      (i) the accused person has been cited in summary proceedings to attend a diet of a JP court, or
      (ii) if the accused person has not been cited to such a diet, summary proceedings against the accused have been commenced in a JP court, and
   (b) there are also summary proceedings against the accused person in a JP court in another sheriffdom.

(4) The prosecutor may apply to a justice for an order for the transfer of the proceedings to a JP court in another sheriffdom (and for adjournment to a diet of that court).

(5) Subsection (6) applies where—
   (a) the prosecutor intends to take summary proceedings against an accused person in a JP court, and
   (b) there are also summary proceedings against the accused person in a JP court in another sheriffdom.

(6) The prosecutor may apply to a justice for an order for authority for the proceedings to be taken at a JP court in the other sheriffdom.

(7) On an application under subsection (2), the sheriff principal may make the order sought with the consent of the sheriff principal of the other sheriffdom.

(8) On an application under subsection (4) or (6), the justice is to make the order sought if—
   (a) the justice considers that it would be expedient for the different cases involved to be dealt with by the same court, and
   (b) a justice of the other sheriffdom consents.
(9) On the application of the prosecutor, the sheriff principal who has made an order under subsection (7) may, with the consent of the sheriff principal of the other sheriffdom—
   (a) revoke the order, or
   (b) vary it so as to restrict its effect.

(10) On the application of the prosecutor, the justice who has made an order under subsection (8) (or another justice of the same sheriffdom) may, with the consent of a justice of the other sheriffdom—
   (a) revoke the order, or
   (b) vary it so as to restrict its effect.

137CC Custody cases: initiating JP court proceedings outwith sheriffdom

(1) Subsection (2) applies where the prosecutor believes—
   (a) that, because of exceptional circumstances (and without an order under subsection (3)), it is likely that there would be an unusually high number of accused persons appearing from custody for the first calling of cases in summary prosecutions in the JP courts in the sheriffdom, and
   (b) that it would not be practicable for those courts to deal with all the cases involved.

(2) The prosecutor may apply to the sheriff principal for an order authorising summary proceedings against some or all of the accused persons to be—
   (a) taken at a JP court in another sheriffdom, and
   (b) maintained—
      (i) at that JP court, or
      (ii) at any of the JP courts referred to in subsection (1) as may at the first calling of the case be appointed for further proceedings.

(3) On an application under subsection (2), the sheriff principal may make the order sought with the consent of the sheriff principal of the other sheriffdom.

(4) An order under subsection (3) may be made by reference to a particular period or particular circumstances.”.

Additions to complaint

46 Additional charge where bail etc. breached

(1) In section 27 of the 1995 Act (breach of bail conditions: offences), after subsection (8) insert—
   “(8A) At any time before the trial of an accused in summary proceedings for the original offence, it is competent to amend the complaint to include an additional charge of an offence under this section.”.

(2) In section 150 of that Act (failure of accused to appear), for subsection (10) substitute—
   “(10) At any time before the trial in the prosecution in which the failure to appear occurred, it is competent to amend the complaint to include an additional charge of an offence under subsection (8).”.
Remand and committal of children

47 Remand and committal of children and young persons

(1) Section 51 of the 1995 Act (remand and committal of children and young persons) is amended in accordance with subsections (2) and (3).

(2) The following provisions are repealed—

   (a) in subsection (1)—
      (i) in paragraph (a) the words from “but” to “applies”, and
      (ii) paragraph (bb),

   (b) in subsection (2A), the words “Subject to subsection (4) below”,

   (c) subsections (3) and (4), and

   (d) in subsection (4A), the words “or subsection (4) above”.

(3) In subsection (5), for “(1)(aa), (b)(ii), (bb)(ii) or (3)(b)” substitute “(1)(aa) or (b)(ii)”.

(4) In section 23 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003 (asp 7) (remand and committal of children and young persons), subsections (6) and (7) are repealed.

Prosecution of organisations

48 Meaning of “organisation”

In section 307(1) of the 1995 Act (interpretation), after the definition of “order for lifelong restriction”, insert—

““organisation” means—

(a) a body corporate;
(b) an unincorporated association;
(c) a partnership;
(d) a body of trustees;
(e) a government department;
(f) a part of the Scottish Administration;
(g) any other entity which is not an individual;”.

49 Proceedings on indictment against organisations

(1) The title of section 70 of the 1995 Act (proceedings against bodies corporate) is amended by substituting “organisations” for “bodies corporate”.

(2) Section 70 of that Act is amended as follows.

(3) In subsection (1), for “a body corporate” substitute “an organisation”.

(4) For subsection (2) substitute—

“(2) The indictment may be served by delivery of a copy of the indictment together with notice to appear at—

(a) in the case of a body of trustees—
(i) the dwelling-house or place of business of any of the trustees, or
(ii) if the solicitor of the body of trustees is known, the place of business of the solicitor,

(b) in the case of any other organisation, the registered office or, if there is no registered office or the registered office is not in the United Kingdom, at the principal place of business in the United Kingdom of the organisation.”.

(5) In subsection (3)—
(a) for “the registered office or principal place of business of the body corporate” substitute “any place”, and
(b) for “the registered office or place of business” substitute “that place”.

(6) In subsection (4)—
(a) for “A body corporate” substitute “An organisation”, and
(b) the words “of the body corporate” are repealed.

(7) In subsection (5), for “body corporate” in both places that expression occurs substitute “organisation”.

(8) In subsection (5A)(a), for “body corporate” substitute “organisation”. and

(9) In subsection (6)—
(a) for “a body corporate” substitute “an organisation”, and
(b) for “the body corporate” substitute “the organisation”.

(10) In subsection (7), for “a body corporate” substitute “an organisation”.

(11) In subsection (8), for paragraph (c) substitute—
“(ba) in the case of a partnership (other than a limited liability partnership), a partner or other person in charge, or locally in charge, of the partnership’s affairs;

(bb) in the case of an unincorporated association, the secretary or other person in charge, or locally in charge, of the association’s affairs;

(c) in the case of any other organisation, an employee, officer or official of the organisation duly appointed by it for the purposes of the proceedings.”.

(12) In subsection (9), after paragraph (b) insert—
“(c) in the case of a partnership (other than a limited liability partnership), purporting to be signed by a partner;

(d) in the case of an unincorporated association, purporting to be signed by an officer of the association;

(e) in the case of a government department or a part of the Scottish Administration, purporting to be signed by a senior officer in the department or part,.”.

Prosecution of organisations by summary procedure

(1) Section 143 of 1995 Act (prosecution of companies etc.) is amended as follows.
(2) In subsection (1), for “a partnership, association, body corporate or body of trustees” substitute “an organisation”.

(3) In subsection (2), for “partnership, association, body corporate or body of trustees in their” substitute “organisation in its”.

(4) In subsection (4), for “A partnership, association, body corporate or body of trustees” substitute “An organisation”.

(5) In subsection (5)(b), for “of the partnership, association, body corporate or body of trustees” substitute “, officer or official of the organisation”.

(6) In subsection (6), after paragraph (d) insert—

“(c) in the case of a government department or part of the Scottish Administration, purporting to be signed by a senior officer in the department or part,”.

(7) In subsection (7)—

(a) for “a partnership, association, body corporate or body of trustees” substitute “an organisation”,

(b) for “partnership, association, body corporate or (as the case may be) body of trustees” substitute “organisation”.

51 Manner of citation of organisations in summary proceedings

In section 141 of the 1995 Act (manner of citation), in subsection (2)(b), for “a partnership, association or body corporate” substitute “an organisation other than a body of trustees”.

Disclosure of convictions etc.

52 Disclosure of convictions and non-court disposals

(1) After section 101 of the 1995 Act insert—

“101A Post-offence convictions etc.

(1) This section applies where an accused person is convicted of an offence (“offence O”) on indictment.

(2) The court may, in deciding on the disposal of the case, have regard to—

(a) any conviction in respect of the accused which occurred on or after the date of offence O but before the date of conviction in respect of that offence,

(b) any of the alternative disposals in respect of the accused that are mentioned in subsection (3).

(3) Those alternative disposals are—

(a) a—

(i) fixed penalty under section 302(1) of this Act, or

(ii) compensation offer under section 302A(1) of this Act, that has been accepted (or deemed to have been accepted) on or after the date of offence O but before the date of conviction in respect of that offence,
(b) a work order under section 303ZA(6) of this Act that has been completed on or after the date of offence O but before the date of conviction in respect of that offence.

(4) The court may have regard to any such conviction or alternative disposal only if it is—
(a) specified in a notice laid before the court by the prosecutor, and
(b) admitted by the accused or proved by the prosecutor (on evidence adduced then or at another diet).”.

(2) For section 166A of that Act substitute—

“166A Post-offence convictions etc.

(1) This section applies where an accused person is convicted of an offence
(“offence O”) on summary complaint.

(2) The court may, in deciding on the disposal of the case, have regard to—
(a) any conviction in respect of the accused which occurred on or after the date of offence O but before the date of conviction in respect of that offence,
(b) any of the alternative disposals in respect of the accused that are mentioned in subsection (3).

(3) Those alternative disposals are—
(a) a—
(i) fixed penalty under section 302(1) of this Act, or
(ii) compensation offer under section 302A(1) of this Act,

(b) a work order under section 303ZA(6) of this Act that has been completed on or after the date of offence O but before the date of conviction in respect of that offence.

(4) The court may have regard to any such conviction or alternative disposal only if it is—
(a) specified in a notice laid before the court by the prosecutor, and
(b) admitted by the accused or proved by the prosecutor (on evidence adduced then or at another diet).”.

(3) In section 302 of that Act (fixed penalty: conditional offer by procurator fiscal), in subsection (2), after sub-paragraph (ii) of paragraph (e) insert—

“(iia) that that fact may be disclosed to the court also in any proceedings for an offence to which the alleged offender is, or is liable to become, subject at such time as the offer is accepted;”.

(4) In section 302A of that Act (compensation offer by procurator fiscal), in subsection (2), after sub-paragraph (ii) of paragraph (f) insert—

“(iia) that that fact may be disclosed to the court also in any proceedings for an offence to which the alleged offender is, or is liable to become, subject at such time as the offer is accepted;”.

(5) In section 303ZA of that Act (work orders), in subsection (3)—

(a) after sub-paragraph (i) of paragraph (e) insert—

“(ia) that if a work offer is not accepted, that fact may be disclosed to the court in any proceedings for the offence to which the offer relates;”,

(b) in sub-paragraph (ii) of that paragraph, for “the offer has been accepted” substitute “a resultant work order has been completed”,

(c) after sub-paragraph (ii) of that paragraph insert—

“(iia) that that fact may be disclosed to the court also in any proceedings for an offence to which the alleged offender is, or is liable to become, subject at such time as the offer is accepted;”, and

(d) in sub-paragraph (iii) of that paragraph, for “work order under subsection (6) below” substitute “resultant work order”.

Appeals: time limits

53 Time limits for lodging certain appeals

(1) The 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 74 (appeals in connection with preliminary diets), in subsection (2)(b), for “2” substitute “seven”.

(3) In section 174 (appeals relating to preliminary pleas), in subsection (1), for “two” substitute “seven”.

Crown appeals

54 Submissions as to sufficiency of evidence

After section 97 of the 1995 Act insert—

“97A Submissions as to sufficiency of evidence

(1) Immediately after the close of the whole of the evidence, the accused may make either or both of the submissions mentioned in subsection (2) in relation to an offence libelled in an indictment (the “indicted offence”).

(2) The submissions are—

(a) that the evidence is insufficient in law to justify the accused’s being convicted of the indicted offence or any other offence of which the accused could be convicted under the indictment (a “related offence”),

(b) that there is no evidence to support some part of the circumstances set out in the indictment.

(3) A submission of a kind mentioned in subsection (2) may be made after the close of the whole of the evidence only under this section.
(4) A submission made under this section must be heard by the judge in the absence of the jury.

97B Acquittals etc. on section 97A(2)(a) submissions

(1) This section applies where the accused makes a submission of the kind mentioned in section 97A(2)(a).

(2) If the judge is satisfied that the evidence is insufficient in law to justify the accused’s being convicted of the indicted offence, then—

(a) where the judge is satisfied that the evidence is also insufficient in law to justify the accused’s being convicted of a related offence—

(i) the judge must acquit the accused of the indicted offence, and

(ii) the trial is to proceed only in respect of any other offence libelled in the indictment,

(b) where the judge is satisfied that the evidence is sufficient in law to justify the accused’s being convicted of a related offence, the judge must direct the prosecutor to amend the indictment accordingly.

(3) If the judge is not satisfied as is mentioned in subsection (2)—

(a) the judge must reject the submission, and

(b) the trial is to proceed as if the submission had not been made.

(4) The judge may make a decision under this section only after hearing both (or all) parties.

(5) An amendment made by virtue of this section must be sufficiently authenticated by the initials of the clerk of court.

(6) In this section, “indicted offence” and “related offence” have the same meanings as in section 97A.

97C Directions etc. on section 97A(2)(b) submissions

(1) This section applies where the accused makes a submission of the kind mentioned in section 97A(2)(b).

(2) If the judge is satisfied that there is no evidence to support some part of the circumstances set out in the indictment, the judge must direct the prosecutor to amend the indictment accordingly.

(3) If the judge is not satisfied as is mentioned in subsection (2)—

(a) the judge must reject the submission, and

(b) the trial is to proceed as if the submission had not been made.

(4) The judge may make a decision under this section only after hearing both (or all) parties.

(5) An amendment made by virtue of this section must be sufficiently authenticated by the initials of the clerk of court.”.

Prosecutor’s right of appeal

After section 107 of the 1995 Act insert—
107A Prosecutor’s right of appeal: decisions on section 97 and 97A submissions

(1) The prosecutor may appeal to the High Court against—
   (a) an acquittal under section 97 or 97B(2)(a), or
   (b) a direction under section 97B(2)(b) or 97C(2).

(2) If an appeal is brought under subsection (1)(a), the High Court may—
   (a) make an order under section 4(2) of the Contempt of Court Act 1981 (c.49) (which gives a court power, in some circumstances, to order that publication of certain reports be postponed) as if proceedings for the offence of which the person was acquitted were pending or imminent,
   (b) exceptionally and after giving the parties an opportunity of being heard, order the detention of the person in custody or admit him to bail.

107B Prosecutor’s right of appeal: decisions on admissibility of evidence

(1) The prosecutor may appeal to the High Court against a finding, made after the jury is empanelled and before the close of the evidence for the prosecution, that evidence that the prosecution seeks to lead is inadmissible.

(2) The appeal may be made only with the leave of the court of first instance, granted—
   (a) on the motion of the prosecutor, or
   (b) on that court’s initiative.

(3) Any motion for leave to appeal must be made before the close of the case for the prosecution.

(4) In determining whether to grant leave to appeal the court must consider—
   (a) whether there are arguable grounds of appeal, and
   (b) what effect the finding has on the strength of the prosecutor’s case.

(5) If an appeal is brought under subsection (1) against a finding in relation to evidence in the prosecution of an offence of which the accused has been acquitted, the High Court may—
   (a) make an order under section 4(2) of the Contempt of Court Act 1981 (c.49) (which gives a court power, in some circumstances, to order that publication of certain reports be postponed) as if proceedings for the offence of which the person was acquitted were pending or imminent,
   (b) exceptionally and after giving the parties an opportunity of being heard, order the detention of the person in custody or admit him to bail.

107C Appeals under section 107A and 107B: general provisions

(1) In an appeal brought under section 107A or 107B the High Court may review not only the acquittal, direction or finding appealed against but also any direction, finding, decision, determination or ruling in the proceedings at first instance if it has a bearing on the acquittal, direction or finding appealed against.
(2) The test to be applied by the High Court in reviewing the acquittal, direction or finding appealed against is whether it was wrong in law.

107D Expedited appeals

(1) Subsection (2) applies where—

(a) an appeal is brought under section 107A or leave to appeal is granted by the court under section 107B, and

(b) the court is able to obtain confirmation from the Keeper of the Rolls that it would be practicable for the appeal to be heard and determined during an adjournment of the trial diet.

(2) The court must inform both parties of that fact and, after hearing them, must decide whether or not the appeal is to be heard and determined during such an adjournment.

(3) An appeal brought under section 107A or 107B which is heard and determined during such an adjournment is referred to in this Act as an “expedited appeal”.

(4) If the court decides that the appeal is to be an expedited appeal the court must, pending the outcome of the appeal—

(a) adjourn the trial diet, and

(b) where the appeal is against an acquittal, suspend the effect of the acquittal.

(5) Where the court cannot obtain from the Keeper of the Rolls confirmation of the kind mentioned in subsection (1)(b), the court must inform the parties of that fact.

(6) Where the High Court in an expedited appeal determines that an acquittal of an offence libelled in the indictment was wrong in law it must quash the acquittal and direct that the trial is to proceed in respect of the offence.

107E Other appeals under section 107A or 107B: appeal against acquittal

(1) This section applies where—

(a) an appeal brought under section 107A or 107B is not an expedited appeal,

(b) the appeal is against an acquittal, and

(c) the High Court determines that the acquittal was wrong in law.

(2) The court must quash the acquittal.

(3) If the prosecutor seeks leave to bring a new prosecution charging the accused with the same offence as that libelled in the indictment, or a similar offence arising out of the same facts as the offence libelled in the indictment, the High Court must grant the prosecutor authority to do so in accordance with section 119, unless the court considers that it would be contrary to the interests of justice to do so.

(4) If—

(a) no motion is made under subsection (3), or
(b) the High Court does not grant a motion made under that subsection, the High Court must in disposing of the appeal acquit the accused of the offence libelled in the indictment.

107F Other appeals under section 107A or 107B: appeal against directions etc.

(1) This section applies where—

(a) an appeal brought under section 107A or 107B is not an expedited appeal, and
(b) the appeal is not against an acquittal.

(2) The court of first instance must desert the diet pro loco et tempore in relation to any offence to which the appeal relates.

(3) The trial is to proceed only if another offence of which the accused has not been acquitted and to which the appeal does not relate is libelled in the indictment.

(4) If the prosecutor seeks leave to bring a new prosecution charging the accused with the same offence as that libelled in the indictment, or a similar offence arising out of the same facts as the offence libelled in the indictment, the High Court must grant the prosecutor authority to do so in accordance with section 119, unless the court considers that it would be contrary to the interests of justice to do so.”.

56 Power of High Court in appeal under section 107A of 1995 Act

In section 104(1) of the 1995 Act (which makes provision as regards the power of the High Court in appeals under section 106(1) or 108 of that Act), after “106(1)” insert “, 107A, 107B”.

57 Further amendment of 1995 Act

(1) In section 110(1) of the 1995 Act (note of appeal), after paragraph (b), add—

“(c) within 7 days after an appeal is brought under section 107A(1), the prosecutor may, except in the case of an expedited appeal, lodge such a note with the Clerk of Justiciary, who must send a copy to the judge and to the accused or to the accused’s solicitor,

(d) within 7 days after leave to appeal under section 107B(1) is granted, the prosecutor may, except in the case of an expedited appeal, lodge such a note with the Clerk of Justiciary, who must send a copy to the judge and to the accused or to the accused’s solicitor,

(e) in the case of an expedited appeal, as soon as practicable after the decision as to hearing and determining the case is made under section 107D(2), the prosecutor may—

(i) lodge such a note with the Clerk of Justiciary, and

(ii) provide a copy to the judge and to the accused or to the accused’s solicitor.”.

(2) In section 113(1) of that Act (judge’s report), after “under” insert “any of paragraphs (a) to (d) of”.
(3) After section 113 of that Act insert—

“113A Judge’s observations in expedited appeal

(1) On receiving a note of appeal given under section 110(1)(e), the judge who presided at the trial may give the Clerk of Justiciary any written observations that the judge thinks fit on—

(a) the case generally,
(b) the grounds contained in the note of appeal.

(2) The High Court may hear and determine the appeal without any such written observations.

(3) If written observations are given under subsection (1), the Clerk of Justiciary must give a copy of them to—

(a) the accused or the accused’s solicitor, and
(b) the prosecutor.

(4) The written observations of the judge are available only to—

(a) the High Court,
(b) the parties, and
(c) any other person or classes of person prescribed by Act of Adjournal, in accordance with any conditions prescribed by Act of Adjournal.”.

(4) In section 119 of that Act (provision where High Court authorises new prosecution)—

(a) in each of subsections (1) and (10), after “118(1)(c)” insert “or 107E(3) or 107F(4)”,
(b) for subsection (2), substitute—

“(2) In a new prosecution under this section—

(a) where authority for the prosecution is granted under section 118(1)(c), the accused must not be charged with an offence more serious than that of which the accused was convicted in the earlier proceedings,
(b) where authority for the prosecution is granted under section 107E(3), the accused must not be charged with an offence more serious than that of which the accused was acquitted in the earlier proceedings,
(c) where authority for the prosecution is granted under section 107F(4), the accused must not be charged with an offence more serious than that originally libelled in the indictment in the earlier proceedings.”,

(c) after subsection (2) insert—

“(2A) In a new prosecution under this section brought by virtue of section 107F(4), the circumstances set out in the indictment are not to be inconsistent with any direction given under section 97B(2)(b) or 97C(2) in the proceedings which gave rise to the appeal in question unless the High Court, in disposing of that appeal, determined that the direction was wrong in law.”, and

(d) in subsection (9), after “setting aside the verdict” insert “or under section 107E(3) or 107F(4) granting authority to bring a new prosecution”.

Retention and use of samples etc.

58 Retention of samples etc.

(1) The 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 18(7A) (meaning of “relevant physical data” for purposes of certain provisions of 1995 Act), for “19 and” substitute “18A to”.

(3) In section 18A (retention of samples)—

(a) in subsection (1)—

(i) after “to” insert “relevant physical data taken or provided under subsection (2) of section 18 and to”, and

(ii) for “section 18 of this Act” substitute “that section”;

(b) in subsection (2), after “whom” insert “the relevant physical data was taken or by whom it was provided or, as the case may be, from whom”;

(c) in subsection (3), after “the”, where it first occurs, insert “relevant physical data,”

(d) in subsection (10), after “the”, where it fourth occurs, insert “relevant physical data,” and

(e) in subsection (11), in paragraph (a) of the definition of “the relevant chief constable”, after “who” insert “took the relevant physical data or to whom it was provided or who”.

59 Retention of samples etc. from children referred to children’s hearings

(1) After section 18A of the 1995 Act insert—

18B Retention of samples etc.: children referred to children’s hearings

(1) This section applies to—

(a) relevant physical data taken from or provided by a child under section 18(2); and

(b) any sample, or any information derived from a sample, taken from a child under section 18(6) or (6A), where the first condition, and the second, third or fourth condition, are satisfied.

(2) The first condition is that the child’s case has been referred to a children’s hearing under section 65(1) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 (c.36) (the “Children Act”).

(3) The second condition is that—

(a) a ground of the referral is that the child has committed an offence mentioned in subsection (6) (a “relevant offence”);

(b) both the child and the relevant person in relation to the child accept, under section 65(5) or (6) of the Children Act, the ground of referral; and

(c) no application to the sheriff under section 65(7) or (9) of that Act is made in relation to that ground.

(4) The third condition is that—
(a) a ground of the referral is that the child has committed a relevant offence;
(b) the sheriff, on an application under section 65(7) or (9) of the Children Act—
   (i) deems, under section 68(8) of the Children Act; or
   (ii) finds, under section 68(10) of that Act, the ground of referral to be established; and
(c) no application to the sheriff under section 85(1) of that Act is made in relation to that ground.

(5) The fourth condition is that the sheriff, on an application under section 85(1) of the Children Act—
(a) is satisfied, under section 85(6)(b) of that Act, that a ground of referral which constitutes a relevant offence is established; or
(b) finds, under section 85(7)(b) of that Act, that—
   (i) a ground of referral, which was not stated in the original application under section 65(7) or (9) of that Act, is established; and
   (ii) that ground constitutes a relevant offence.

(6) A relevant offence is such relevant sexual offence or relevant violent offence as the Scottish Ministers may by order made by statutory instrument prescribe.

(7) Subject to section 18C(5) and (6), the relevant physical data, sample or the information must be destroyed no later than the destruction date.

(8) The destruction date is—
   (a) the date of expiry of the period of 3 years following—
      (i) where the second condition is satisfied, the date on which the ground of referral was accepted as mentioned in that condition;
      (ii) where the third condition is satisfied, the date on which the ground of referral was established as mentioned in that condition;
      (iii) where the ground of referral is established as mentioned in paragraph (a) of the fourth condition, the date on which that ground was established under section 68(8) or, as the case may be, (10) of the Children Act; or
      (iv) where the ground of referral is established as mentioned in paragraph (b) of the fourth condition, the date on which that ground was established as mentioned in that paragraph; or
   (b) such later date as an order under section 18C(1) may specify.

(9) No statutory instrument containing an order under subsection (6) may be made unless a draft of the instrument has been laid before, and approved by resolution of, the Scottish Parliament.

(10) In this section—
   “relevant person” has the same meaning as in section 93(2) of the Children Act;
“relevant sexual offence” and “relevant violent offence” have the same meanings as in section 19A(6) and include any attempt, conspiracy or incitement to commit such an offence.

18C Retention of samples etc. relating to children: appeals

(1) On a summary application made by the relevant chief constable within the period of 3 months before the destruction date the sheriff may, if satisfied that there are reasonable grounds for doing so, make an order amending, or further amending, the destruction date.

(2) An application under subsection (1) may be made to any sheriff—

(a) in whose sheriffdom the child mentioned in section 18B(1) resides;

(b) in whose sheriffdom that child is believed by the applicant to be; or

(c) to whose sheriffdom that child is believed by the applicant to be intending to come.

(3) An order under subsection (1) must not specify a destruction date more than 2 years later than the previous destruction date.

(4) The decision of the sheriff on an application under subsection (1) may be appealed to the sheriff principal within 21 days of the decision.

(5) The sheriff principal’s decision on an appeal under subsection (4) is final.

(6) Section 18B(7) does not apply where—

(a) an application under subsection (1) has been made but has not been determined;

(b) the period within which an appeal may be brought under subsection (4) against a decision to refuse an application has not expired; or

(c) such an appeal has been brought but has not been withdrawn or finally determined.

(7) Where—

(a) the period within which an appeal referred to in subsection (6)(b) may be brought has expired without such an appeal being brought;

(b) such an appeal is brought and is withdrawn or finally determined against the appellant; or

(c) an appeal brought under subsection (4) against a decision to grant an application is determined in favour of the appellant, the relevant physical data, sample or information must be destroyed as soon as practicable after the expiry, withdrawal or, as the case may be, determination.

(8) In this section—

“destruction date” has the meaning given by section 18B(8); and “relevant chief constable” has the same meaning as in section 18A(11), with the modification that references to the person referred to in subsection (2) of that section are references to the child referred to in section 18B(1).”.

(2) In section 18 of the 1995 Act (prints, samples etc. in criminal investigations), in subsection (3), after “subsection (4) below” insert “and to sections 18A to 18C”.

60 Use of samples etc.

(1) After section 19B of the 1995 Act insert—

“19C Sections 18 and 19 to 19AA: use of samples etc.

(1) This section applies to—

(a) relevant physical data, or any information derived from relevant physical data, taken or provided under section 18(2), 19(2)(a), 19A(2)(a) or 19AA(3)(a),

(b) a sample, or any information derived from a sample, taken under section 18(6) or (6A), 19(2)(b) or (c), 19A(2)(b) or (c) or 19AA(3)(b) or (c),

(c) relevant physical data, a sample or an impression taken from a person—

(i) by virtue of any power of search,

(ii) by virtue of any power to take possession of evidence where there is immediate danger of its being lost or destroyed, or

(iii) under the authority of a warrant, and

(d) information derived from relevant physical data or a sample or impression falling within paragraph (c).

(2) The relevant physical data, sample, impression or information may be used—

(a) for the prevention or detection of crime, the investigation of an offence or the conduct of a prosecution, or

(b) for the identification of a deceased person or a person from whom the relevant physical data, sample or impression came.

(3) In subsection (2)—

(a) the reference to crime includes a reference to—

(i) conduct which constitutes a criminal offence or two or more criminal offences (whether under the law of a part of the United Kingdom or a country or territory outside the United Kingdom), or

(ii) conduct which is, or corresponds to, conduct which, if it all took place in any one part of the United Kingdom would constitute a criminal offence or two or more criminal offences,

(b) the reference to an investigation includes a reference to an investigation outside the United Kingdom of a crime or suspected crime, and

(c) the reference to a prosecution includes a reference to a prosecution brought in respect of a crime in a country or territory outside the United Kingdom.

(4) This section is without prejudice to any other power relating to the use of relevant physical data, samples, impressions or information derived from relevant physical data or a sample or impression.”.

(2) In section 56 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003 (asp 7) (use of samples etc. voluntarily given)—
(a) in subsection (1)—
   (i) after “sample” insert “or impression”, and
   (ii) after “from,” insert “or provided by”,

(b) in subsection (2)—
   (i) after “sample”, where it first occurs, insert “, impression”, and
   (ii) for the words from “may” where it first occurs to the end substitute “, or information derived from that sample, impression or relevant physical data may be held and used—
         (a) for the prevention or detection of crime, the investigation of an offence or the conduct of a prosecution, or
         (b) for the identification of a deceased person or a person from whom the sample, impression or relevant physical data came.”,

(c) in subsection (3)—
   (i) after “sample,”, where it first occurs, insert “impression,”, and
   (ii) after “sample”, where it second occurs, insert “or impression”,

(d) in subsection (4)(a), after “sample” insert “or impression”,

(e) in subsection (5)(a), after “sample” insert “or impression”,

(f) in subsection (6)(a)—
   (i) for the words from “data”, where it first occurs, to “them” substitute “impression or data, or information derived from the sample, impression or data,”, and
   (ii) after “sample”, where it second occurs, insert “or impression”,

(g) in subsection (6)(b)(i), after “sample” insert “, impression”,

(h) in subsection (7)(a), after “sample”, in both places where it occurs, insert “, impression”, and

(i) after subsection (7) insert—

  (a) the reference to crime includes a reference to—
      (i) conduct which constitutes a criminal offence or two or more criminal offences (whether under the law of a part of the United Kingdom or a country or territory outside the United Kingdom), or (ii) conduct which is, or corresponds to, conduct which, if it all took place in any one part of the United Kingdom would constitute a criminal offence or two or more criminal offences,

  (b) the reference to an investigation includes a reference to an investigation outside the United Kingdom of a crime or suspected crime, and

  (c) the reference to a prosecution includes a reference to a prosecution brought in respect of a crime in a country or territory outside the United Kingdom.”.
Referrals from the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission

61 Referrals from Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission: grounds for appeal

In section 194D of the 1995 Act (further provisions as to references to the High Court by the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission), after subsection (4) insert—

“(4A) The grounds for an appeal arising from a reference to the High Court under section 194B of this Act must relate to one or more of the reasons contained in the Commission’s statement of reasons.

(4B) Despite subsection (4A), the High Court may, if it considers it is in the interests of justice to do so, grant leave for additional grounds of appeal to be raised.

(4C) An application by the appellant for leave under subsection (4B) must be made and intimated to the Crown Agent within 21 days after the date on which a copy of the Commission’s statement of reasons is sent under subsection (4)(b).

(4D) The High Court may, on cause shown, extend the period of 21 days mentioned in subsection (4C).

(4E) The Clerk of Justiciary must intimate to the persons mentioned in subsection (4F)—

(a) a decision under subsection (4B), and

(b) in the case of a refusal to grant leave for additional grounds to be raised, the reasons for the decision.

(4F) Those persons are—

(a) the appellant or the appellant’s solicitor, and

(b) the Crown Agent.”.

PART 4
EVIDENCE

62 Witness statements: use during trial

(1) The 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(2) After section 261 insert—

261A Witness statements: use during trial

(1) Subsection (2) applies where—

(a) a witness is giving evidence in criminal proceedings,

(b) the witness has made a prior statement,

(c) the prosecutor has seen or has been given an opportunity to see the statement, and

(d) the accused (or a solicitor or advocate acting on behalf of the accused in the proceedings) has seen or has been given an opportunity to see the statement.
(2) The court may allow the witness to refer to the statement while the witness is giving evidence.”.

(3) In section 262 (construction of sections 259 to 261 of Act)—

(a) in the title, for “261” substitute “261A”,

(b) in each of subsections (1) to (4), for “261” substitute “261A”, and

(c) in subsection (3)—

(i) in the definition of “criminal proceedings”, after “include” insert “(other than in section 261A)”, and

(ii) in the definition of “made”, after “includes” insert “(other than in section 261A)”.

63 Spouse or civil partner of accused a compellable witness

(1) For section 264 of the 1995 Act (spouse of accused a competent witness) substitute—

“264 Spouse or civil partner of accused a compellable witness

(1) The spouse or civil partner of an accused is a competent and compellable witness for the prosecution, the accused or any co-accused in the proceedings against the accused.

(2) Subsection (1) is, if the spouse or civil partner is a co-accused in the proceedings, subject to any enactment or rule of law by virtue of which an accused need not (by reason of being an accused) give evidence in the proceedings.

(3) Subsection (1) displaces any other rule of law that would (but for that subsection) prevent or restrict, by reference to the relationship, the giving of evidence by the spouse or civil partner of an accused.”.

(2) Section 130 of the Civil Partnership Act 2004 (c.33) (civil partner of accused a competent witness) is repealed.

64 Special measures for child witnesses and other vulnerable witnesses

(1) The 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 271 (vulnerable witnesses: main definitions)—

(a) in subsection (1)—

(i) for “a trial” substitute “a hearing in relevant criminal proceedings”, and

(ii) for “the trial”, wherever it occurs, substitute “the hearing”, and

(b) in subsection (5)—

(i) the definition of “trial” is repealed, and

(ii) after the definition of “court” insert—

“hearing in relevant criminal proceedings” means any hearing in the course of any criminal proceedings in the High Court or the sheriff court.”.

(3) In section 271A (child witnesses)—
(a) in subsection (1), for “a trial” substitute “a hearing in relevant criminal proceedings”,
(b) in subsection (5A)(c), for “the trial diet” substitute “the hearing at which the evidence is to be given”,
(c) in subsection (6)(a), for “the trial” substitute “a hearing in relevant criminal proceedings”,
(d) in subsection (7)(b(ii), for “the trial” substitute “the hearing at which the evidence is to be given”,
(e) in subsection (8), for “the trial diet” substitute “the hearing at which the evidence is to be given”,
(f) in subsection (10)(b)(i), for “the trial diet” substitute “the hearing at which the evidence is to be given”,
(g) in subsection (12), for “the trial diet in the case” substitute “the hearing at which the evidence is to be given”, and
(h) in subsection (13A)(c), for “the trial diet” substitute “the hearing at which the evidence is to be given”.

(4) In section 271B (further special provision for child witnesses under the age of 12)—
(a) in subsection (1)(a), for “a trial” substitute “a hearing in relevant criminal proceedings”,
(b) in subsection (1)(b), for “the trial” substitute “the hearing”, and
(c) in subsection (3)(b)(i), for “the trial” substitute “the hearing”.

(5) In section 271C (vulnerable witnesses other than child witnesses)—
(a) in subsection (1), for “a trial” substitute “a hearing in relevant criminal proceedings”,
(b) in subsection (5A)(c), for “the trial diet” substitute “the hearing at which the evidence is to be given”,
(c) in subsection (6), for “the trial diet” substitute “the hearing at which the evidence is to be given”,
(d) in subsection (10), for “the trial diet in the case” substitute “the hearing at which the evidence is to be given”, and
(e) in subsection (12)(c), for “the trial diet” substitute “the hearing at which the evidence is to be given”.

(6) In section 271D (review of arrangements for vulnerable witnesses)—
(a) in subsection (1)—
(i) for “the trial”, where it first occurs, substitute “a hearing in relevant criminal proceedings”, and
(ii) for “the trial”, where it second occurs, substitute “the hearing”, and
(b) in subsection (4)(b)(i), for “the trial” substitute “the hearing”.

(7) In section 271F (the accused)—
(a) in subsection (1)—
(i) for “the trial”, where it first occurs, substitute “a hearing in relevant criminal proceedings”, and
(ii) for “the trial”, where it second occurs (in subsection (1)(a)), substitute “the hearing”;
(b) in subsection (2)—
(i) for “the trial”, where it first occurs, substitute “the hearing”,
(ii) for “the trial”, where it second occurs (in subsection (2)(a)(iii)), substitute “a hearing in relevant criminal proceedings”, and
(iii) for “the trial”, where it third occurs (in subsection (2)(b)(i)), substitute “a hearing in relevant criminal proceedings”,
(c) in subsection (3), for “the trial” substitute “a hearing in relevant criminal proceedings”, and
(d) in subsection (5), for “the trial” substitute “the hearing”.

(8) In section 271J (live television link)—

(a) in subsection (1), for “the trial” substitute “the hearing”,
(b) in subsection (2)(b), for “the trial” substitute “the hearing”, and
(c) in subsection (5)(a), for “the trial” substitute “the hearing”.

(9) In section 271L (supporters), in subsection (2), for “the trial” substitute “that or any other hearing in the proceedings”.

(10) In section 288E (prohibition of personal conduct of defence in certain cases involving child witnesses under the age of 12), in subsection (5), for “a child witness referred to in subsection (2)(b) above” substitute “the trial”.

65 Amendment of Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003

Section 15A of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003 (asp 7) (application of certain vulnerable witness provisions in proofs) is repealed.

66 Witness anonymity orders

(1) After section 271M of the 1995 Act insert—

271N Witness anonymity orders

(1) A court may make an order requiring such specified measures to be taken in relation to a witness in criminal proceedings as the court considers appropriate to ensure that the identity of the witness is not disclosed in or in connection with the proceedings.

(2) The court may make such an order only on an application made in accordance with section 271P, if satisfied of the conditions set out in section 271Q having considered the matters set out in section 271R.

(3) The kinds of measures that may be required to be taken in relation to a witness include in particular measures for securing one or more of the matters mentioned in subsection (4).

(4) Those matters are—
(a) that the witness’s name and other identifying details may be—
   (i) withheld,
   (ii) removed from materials disclosed to any party to the proceedings,
(b) that the witness may use a pseudonym,
(c) that the witness is not asked questions of any specified description that might lead to the identification of the witness,
(d) that the witness is screened to any specified extent,
(e) that the witness’s voice is subjected to modulation to any specified extent.

(5) Nothing in this section authorises the court to require—
(a) the witness to be screened to such an extent that the witness cannot be seen by—
   (i) the judge or other members of the court,
   (ii) the jury, or
   (iii) any interpreter or other person appointed by the court to assist the witness,
(b) the witness’s voice to be modulated to such an extent that the witness’s natural voice cannot be heard by any persons within paragraph (a)(i) to (iii).

(6) An order made under this section is referred to in this Act as a “witness anonymity order”.

(7) In this section “specified” means specified in the order concerned.

271P Applications

(1) An application for a witness anonymity order to be made in relation to a witness in criminal proceedings may be made to the court by the prosecutor or the accused.

(2) Where an application is made by the prosecutor, the prosecutor—
    (a) must (unless the court directs otherwise) inform the court of the identity of the witness, but
    (b) is not required to disclose in connection with the application—
        (i) the identity of the witness, or
        (ii) any information that might enable the witness to be identified, to any other party to the proceedings (or to the legal representatives of any other party to the proceedings).

(3) Where an application is made by the accused, the accused—
    (a) must inform the court and the prosecutor of the identity of the witness, but
    (b) if there is more than one accused, is not required to disclose in connection with the application—
(i) the identity of the witness, or
(ii) any information that might enable the witness to be identified, to any other accused (or to the legal representatives of any other accused).

(4) Accordingly, where the prosecutor or the accused proposes to make an application under this section in respect of a witness, any relevant material which is disclosed by or on behalf of that party before the determination of the application may be disclosed in such a way as to prevent—
(a) the identity of the witness, or
(b) any information that might enable the witness to be identified, from being disclosed except as required by subsection (2)(a) or (3)(a).

(5) “Relevant material” means any document or other material which falls to be disclosed, or is sought to be relied on, by or on behalf of the party concerned in connection with the proceedings or proceedings preliminary to them.

(6) The court must give every party to the proceedings the opportunity to be heard on an application under this section.

(7) Subsection (6) does not prevent the court from hearing one or more of the parties to the proceedings in the absence of an accused and the accused’s legal representatives, if it appears to the court to be appropriate to do so in the circumstances of the case.

(8) Nothing in this section is to be taken as restricting any power to make rules of court.

271Q Conditions for making orders

(1) This section applies where an application is made for a witness anonymity order to be made in relation to a witness in criminal proceedings.

(2) The court may make the order only if it is satisfied that Conditions A to D below are met.

(3) Condition A is that the proposed order is necessary—
(a) in order to protect the safety of the witness or another person or to prevent any serious damage to property, or (b) in order to prevent real harm to the public interest (whether affecting the carrying on of any activities in the public interest or the safety of a person involved in carrying on such activities or otherwise).

(4) Condition B is that, having regard to all the circumstances, the effect of the proposed order would be consistent with the accused’s receiving a fair trial.

(5) Condition C is that the importance of the witness’s testimony is such that in the interests of justice the witness ought to testify.

(6) Condition D is that—
(a) the witness would not testify if the proposed order were not made, or
(b) there would be real harm to the public interest if the witness were to testify without the proposed order being made.
(7) In determining whether the measures to be specified in the order are necessary for the purpose mentioned in subsection (3)(a), the court must have regard in particular to any reasonable fear on the part of the witness—

(a) that the witness or another person would suffer death or injury, or

(b) that there would be serious damage to property, if the witness were to be identified.

271R Relevant considerations

(1) When deciding whether Conditions A to D in section 271Q are met in the case of an application for a witness anonymity order, the court must have regard to—

(a) the considerations mentioned in subsection (2), and

(b) such other matters as the court considers relevant.

(2) The considerations are—

(a) the general right of an accused in criminal proceedings to know the identity of a witness in the proceedings,

(b) the extent to which the credibility of the witness concerned would be a relevant factor when the weight of the witness’s evidence comes to be assessed,

(c) whether evidence given by the witness might be the sole or decisive evidence implicating the accused,

(d) whether the witness’s evidence could be properly tested (whether on grounds of credibility or otherwise) without the witness’s identity being disclosed,

(e) whether there is any reason to believe that the witness—

(i) has a tendency to be dishonest, or

(ii) has any motive to be dishonest in the circumstances of the case, having regard in particular to any previous convictions of the witness and to any relationship between the witness and the accused or any associates of the accused,

(f) whether it would be reasonably practicable to protect the witness’s identity by any means other than by making a witness anonymity order specifying the measures that are under consideration by the court.

271S Warning to jury

(1) Subsection (2) applies where, in a trial on indictment, any evidence has been given by a witness at a time when a witness anonymity order applied to the witness.

(2) The judge must give the jury such warning as the judge considers appropriate to ensure that the fact that the order was made in relation to the witness does not prejudice the accused.
271T  Discharge and variation of order

(1) This section applies where a court has made a witness anonymity order in relation to any criminal proceedings.

(2) The court may discharge or vary (or further vary) the order if it appears to the court to be appropriate to do so in view of the provisions of sections 271Q and 271R that applied to the making of the order.

(3) The court may do so—
   (a) on an application made by a party to the proceedings if there has been a material change of circumstances since the relevant time, or
   (b) on its own initiative.

(4) The court must give every party to the proceedings the opportunity to be heard—
   (a) before determining an application made to it under subsection (3)(a), and
   (b) before discharging or varying the order on its own initiative.

(5) Subsection (4) does not prevent the court from hearing one or more of the parties to the proceedings in the absence of an accused and the accused’s legal representatives, if it appears to the court to be appropriate to do so in the circumstances of the case.

(6) In subsection (3)(a) “the relevant time” means—
   (a) the time when the order was made, or
   (b) if a previous application has been made under that subsection, the time when the application (or the last application) was made.

271U  Appeals

(1) The prosecutor or the accused may appeal to the High Court against—
   (a) the making of a witness anonymity order under section 271N,
   (b) the kinds of measures that are required to be taken in relation to a witness under a witness anonymity order made under that section,
   (c) the refusal to make a witness anonymity order under that section,
   (d) the discharge of a witness anonymity order under section 271T,
   (e) the variation of a witness anonymity order under that section, or
   (f) the refusal to discharge or vary a witness anonymity order under that section.

(2) The appeal may be made only with the leave of the court of first instance, granted—
   (a) on the motion of the party making the appeal, or
   (b) on its own initiative.

(3) The procedure in relation to the appeal is to be prescribed by Act of Adjournal.

(4) If an appeal is brought under this section, the High Court may—
(a) postpone the trial diet for any period that appears to it to be appropriate, and
(b) direct that the period, or some part of it, is not to count towards any time limit applying in respect of the case.

(5) An appeal under this section does not affect any right of appeal in relation to any other decision of any court in the criminal proceedings.

271V Appeal against the making of a witness anonymity order

(1) This section applies where—
(a) an appeal is brought under section 271U(1)(a) against the making of a witness anonymity order, and
(b) the High Court determines that the decision of the judge at first instance was wrong in law.

(2) The High Court must discharge the order and the trial is to proceed as if the order had not been made.

271W Appeal against the refusal to make a witness anonymity order

(1) This section applies where—
(a) an appeal is brought under section 271U(1)(c) against the refusal to make a witness anonymity order in relation to a witness in criminal proceedings, and
(b) the High Court determines that the decision of the judge at first instance was wrong in law.

(2) The High Court must make an order requiring such specified measures to be taken in relation to the witness in the proceedings as the court considers appropriate to ensure that the identity of the witness is not disclosed in or in connection with the proceedings.

271X Appeal against a variation of a witness anonymity order

(1) This section applies where—
(a) an appeal is brought under section 271U(1)(e) against a variation of a witness anonymity order, and
(b) the High Court determines that the decision of the judge at first instance was wrong in law.

(2) The High Court must discharge the variation.

(3) If the High Court determines that it is appropriate to make an additional variation in view of the provisions of sections 271Q and 271R, the court may do so.

271Y Appeal against a refusal to vary or discharge a witness anonymity order

(1) This section applies where—
(a) an appeal is brought under section 271U(1)(f) against a refusal to discharge or vary a witness anonymity order, and
(b) the High Court determines that the decision of the judge at first instance was wrong in law.

(2) The High Court must discharge the order, or make the variation, as the case requires.

(3) If, in the case of a variation, the High Court determines that it is appropriate to make an additional variation in view of the provisions of sections 271Q and 271R, the court may do so.”.

(2) Sections 271N to 271Y of the 1995 Act apply to proceedings in cases where the trial or hearing begins on or after the day on which this section comes into force.

(3) Nothing in this section or sections 271N to 271Y of the 1995 Act affects the power of a court under any rule of law to make an order for securing that the identity of a witness in a trial or hearing in criminal proceedings is withheld from the accused (or, on a defence application, from other accused), where the trial or hearing begins before the day on which this section comes into force.

(4) Schedule 3 makes provision about certain appeals.

Television link evidence

(1) The 1995 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 273 (television link evidence from abroad), in subsection (1), for “solemn” substitute “criminal”.

(3) After that section insert—

“Evidence from other parts of the United Kingdom

273A Television link evidence from other parts of the United Kingdom

(1) In any criminal proceedings in the High Court or the sheriff court a person other than the accused may give evidence through a live television link if—

(a) the witness is within the United Kingdom but outside Scotland,

(b) an application under this section for the issue of a letter of request has been granted, and

(c) the court is satisfied as to the arrangements for the giving of evidence in that manner by that witness.

(2) The prosecutor or the defence in any proceedings referred to in subsection (1) may apply for the issue of a letter of request.

(3) The application must be made to a judge of the court in which the trial is to take place or, if that court is not yet known, to a judge of the High Court.

(4) The judge may, on an application under this section, issue a letter to a court or tribunal exercising jurisdiction in the place where the witness is ordinarily resident requesting assistance in facilitating the giving of evidence by that witness through a live television link, if the judge is satisfied of the matters set out in subsection (5).

(5) Those matters are—
(a) that the evidence which it is averred the witness is able to give is necessary for the proper adjudication of the trial,

(b) that the granting of the application—
   (i) in the interests of justice, and
   (ii) in the case of an application by the prosecutor, is not unfair to the accused.”.

PART 5

CRIMINAL JUSTICE

Jury service

68  Upper age limit for jurors

(1) Section 1 of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Act 1980 (c.55) (qualification of jurors) is amended as follows.

(2) In subsection (1)—
   (a) in paragraph (b), for “65 years of” substitute “the relevant”, and
   (b) the words “, civil or criminal” are repealed.

(3) After subsection (1) insert—
   “(1A) In subsection (1)(b), “the relevant age” means—
   (a) in relation to civil proceedings, 65 years of age; and
   (b) in relation to criminal proceedings, 70 years of age.”.

69  Persons excusable from jury service

In the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Act 1980 (c.55), in Schedule 1 (ineligibility for and disqualification and excusal from jury service), Part 3, Group F, for paragraph (a) substitute—

“(a) where citation for jury service would result in a person’s serving as a juror in relation to criminal proceedings—
   (i) persons who have served as a juror in the period of 5 years ending with the date on which the person is cited first to attend, and
   (ii) persons who have attended for jury service in relation to criminal proceedings, but have not served as a juror, in the period of 2 years ending with the date on which the person is cited first to attend;

(aa) where citation for jury service would result in a person’s serving as a juror in relation to civil proceedings, persons who have served, or duly attended for service, as a juror in the period of 5 years ending with the date on which the person is cited first to attend;”.

Data matching for detection of fraud etc.

70 Data matching for detection of fraud etc.

(1) The Public Finance and Accountability (Scotland) Act 2000 (asp 1) is amended as follows.

(2) In section 11 (Audit Scotland: financial provisions)—

(a) after subsection (1)(c) insert—

(b) after subsection (5) insert—

“(5A) Charges under subsection (1)(ca) may be imposed on (either or both)—

(a) persons who disclose data for a data matching exercise,

(b) persons who receive the results of such an exercise.”.

(3) After section 26 insert—

“PART 2A
DATA MATCHING

26A Power to carry out data matching exercises

(1) Audit Scotland may carry out data matching exercises or arrange for them to be carried out on its behalf.

(2) A data matching exercise is an exercise involving the comparison of sets of data to determine how far they match (including the identification of any patterns and trends).

(3) The power in subsection (1) may be exercised for one or more of the following purposes—

(a) assisting in the prevention and detection of fraud,

(b) assisting in the prevention and detection of crime (other than fraud),

(c) assisting in the apprehension and prosecution of offenders.

(4) A data matching exercise may not be used for the sole purpose of identifying patterns and trends in a person’s characteristics or behaviour which suggest the person is likely to commit fraud in the future.

26B Voluntary disclosure of data to Audit Scotland

(1) For the purposes of a data matching exercise, any person may disclose data to Audit Scotland (or a person acting on its behalf).

(2) Such disclosure does not breach—

(a) any duty of confidentiality owed by the person making the disclosure, or

(b) any other restriction on the disclosure of data.

(3) Nothing in this section authorises a disclosure—

(a) which contravenes the Data Protection Act 1998 (c.29),
(b) which is prohibited by Part 1 of the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 (c.23) (interception, acquisition and disclosure of communications data), or

c) of data comprising or including patient data.

(4) “Patient data” means data relating to an individual which is held for medical purposes and from which the individual can be identified.

(5) “Medical purposes” are the purposes of—

a) preventative medicine,

b) medical diagnosis,

c) medical research,

d) the provision of care and treatment,

e) the management of health and social care services, and

f) informing individuals about their physical or mental health or condition, the diagnosis of their condition or their care and treatment.

(6) Nothing in this section prevents disclosure of data under any other provision of this Act, another enactment or any rule of law.

(7) Data matching exercises may include data disclosed by a person outside Scotland.

26C Power to require disclosure of data

(1) Audit Scotland may require the persons mentioned in subsection (2) to disclose to it (or a person acting on its behalf) such data as it (or the person acting on its behalf) may reasonably require for the purpose of carrying out data matching exercises in such form as it (or such person) may so require.

(2) Those persons are—

a) a body or an office holder any of whose accounts is an account in relation to which sections 21 and 22 apply,

b) a body whose accounts must be audited under Part 7 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973 (c.65) (finance),

c) a Licensing Board continued in existence by or established under section 5 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 (asp 16), or

d) an officer or a member of a body, office holder or board mentioned in paragraph (a), (b) or (c).

(3) Audit Scotland must not require a person to disclose data if—

a) the disclosure would contravene the Data Protection Act 1998 (c.29),

b) the disclosure is prohibited by Part 1 of the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 (c.23) (interception, acquisition and disclosure of communications data).

(4) A disclosure made in response to a requirement imposed under subsection (1) does not breach—

a) any duty of confidentiality owed by the person making the disclosure, or
(b) any other restriction on the disclosure of data.

(5) A person mentioned in subsection (2) who without reasonable excuse fails to comply with a requirement made in accordance with this section is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale.

26D Disclosure of results of data matching

(1) This section applies to the following data—

(a) data relating to a particular person obtained by or on behalf of Audit Scotland for the purpose of carrying out a data matching exercise, and

(b) the results of such an exercise.

(2) Data to which this section applies may be disclosed by or on behalf of Audit Scotland if the disclosure is—

(a) for, or in connection with, a purpose for which a data matching exercise is carried out,

(b) to a Scottish audit agency, or a related party, for, or in connection with a function of that audit agency under—

(i) Part 2 of this Act, or

(ii) Part 7 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973 (c.65) (finance),

(c) to a United Kingdom audit agency, or a related party, for, or in connection with a function of that audit agency corresponding or similar to—

(i) the functions of a Scottish audit agency, or

(ii) the functions of Audit Scotland under this Part, or

(d) in pursuance of a duty imposed by or under an enactment.

(3) “Scottish audit agency”, for the purpose of subsections (2)(b) and (c)(i), means—

(a) the Auditor General, or

(b) the Accounts Commission.

(4) “United Kingdom audit agency”, for the purposes of subsection (2)(c), means—

(a) the National Audit Office,

(b) the Audit Commission for Local Authorities and the National Health Service in England and Wales,

(c) the Auditor General for Wales,

(d) the Comptroller and Auditor General for Northern Ireland, or

(e) a person designated as a local government auditor under article 4 of the Local Government (Northern Ireland) Order 2005 (S.I. 2005/1968 (NI.18)).
“Related party”, in relation to a Scottish or United Kingdom audit agency means—

(a) a person acting on its behalf,

(b) a body or office holder whose accounts are required to be audited by it or by a person appointed by it, or

(c) a person appointed by it to audit those accounts.

(6) If the data used for a data matching exercise includes patient data—

(a) subsection (2)(a) applies only so far as the purpose for which the disclosure is made relates to a relevant NHS body, and

(b) subsection (2)(b) or (c) applies only so far as the function for, or in connection with, which the disclosure is made relates to such a body.

(7) In subsection (6)—

“patient data” has the same meaning as section 26B(4), and “relevant NHS body” means—

(a) an NHS body as defined in section 22(1) of the Community Care and Health (Scotland) Act 2002 (asp 5),

(b) a health service body as defined in section 53(1) of the Audit Commission Act 1998 (c.18),

(c) a Welsh NHS body as defined in section 60 of the Public Audit (Wales) Act 2004 (c.23),

(d) a body to which Article 90 of the Health and Personal Social Services (Northern Ireland) Order 1972 (S.I. 1972/1265 (N.I. 14)) applies.

(8) Data disclosed under subsection (2) may not be further disclosed except—

(a) for, or in connection with—

(i) the purpose for which it was disclosed under subsection (2)(a), or

(ii) the function for which it was disclosed under subsection (2)(b) or (c),

(b) otherwise for the investigation or prosecution of an offence, or

(c) in pursuance of a duty imposed by or under an enactment.

(9) Except as authorised by subsections (2) and (8), a person who discloses data to which this section applies is guilty of an offence and liable—

(a) on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 12 months, to a fine or to both, or

(b) on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, to a fine or to both.

26E Publication of reports on data matching

(1) Audit Scotland may publish a report on a data matching exercise (including a report on the results of an exercise).

(2) Such a report must not include data relating to a particular person if—
(a) the person is the subject of any data included in the data matching exercise,
(b) the person can be identified from the data, and
(c) the data is not otherwise in the public domain.

(3) A report published under subsection (1) is to be published in such manner as Audit Scotland considers appropriate for the purposes of bringing it to the attention of those members of the public who may be interested.

(4) Nothing in section 26D prevents publication under this section.

(5) This section does not affect any powers of an auditor where the data matching exercise in question forms part of an audit under—
(a) Part 2 of this Act, or
(b) Part 7 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973 (c.65) (finance).

26F Data matching code of practice

(1) Audit Scotland must prepare, and keep under review, a code of practice with respect to data matching exercises.

(2) Regard must be had to the code in carrying out and participating in any such exercise.

(3) Audit Scotland must consult the following persons before preparing or altering the code of practice—
(a) the Information Commissioner,
(b) the persons mentioned in section 26C(2), and
(c) any other person Audit Scotland thinks fit.

(4) Audit Scotland must, from time to time, publish the code.

26G Powers of the Scottish Ministers

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by order amend this Part—
(a) to add a public body to the persons mentioned in section 26C(2),
(b) to modify the application of this Part in relation to a public body so added, or
(c) to remove a person from the persons mentioned in section 26C(2).

(2) An order under this section may include such incidental, consequential, supplementary or transitional provision as the Scottish Ministers think fit.

(3) In this section, “public body” means a person whose functions—
(a) are functions of a public nature, or
(b) include functions of a public nature.

(4) A person referred to in subsection (3)(b) is a public body to the extent only of the functions referred to in that subsection.”.
Sharing information with anti-fraud organisations

In the Serious Crime Act 2007 (c.27), the following provisions are repealed—

(a) in section 68 (disclosure of information to prevent fraud), subsections (5) and (6),
(b) in section 69 (offence for certain further disclosures of information), subsection (3), and
(c) in section 71 (code of practice for disclosure of information to prevent fraud)—
   (i) subsection (4), and
   (ii) in subsection (6), the definition of “relevant public authority”.

Closure of premises associated with human exploitation etc.

In section 26 of the Antisocial Behaviour etc. (Scotland) Act 2004 (asp 8) (authorisation of closure notice)—

(a) in subsection (1), for “and (3)” substitute “to (3B)”,
(b) in subsection (3), after “may” insert “, in a case involving antisocial behaviour,”, and
(c) after subsection (3) insert—
   “(3A) A senior police officer may, in a case involving an exploitation offence, authorise the service of a closure notice only where the senior police officer—
   (a) has reasonable grounds for believing that—
       (i) such an offence is being (or, at any time in the immediately preceding 3 months, was) committed in the premises, or
       (ii) the premises are being (or, at any time in the immediately preceding 3 months, have been) used for or in connection with the commission of such an offence, and
   (b) is satisfied that—
       (i) the local authority for the area in which the premises are situated has been consulted, and
       (ii) reasonable steps have been taken to establish the identity of any person who lives on, has control of, has responsibility for or has an interest in the premises.

(3B) Subsection (3A) is without prejudice to subsection (3) (including in so far as subsection (3) is applicable in relation to a brothel or other place where prostitution may occur).”.

In section 27 of that Act (service etc.), in subsection (2)—

(a) in paragraph (b)(i), after “section 26(3)(b)(ii)” insert “or (as the case may be) (3A)(b)(ii)”, and
(b) in paragraph (b)(ii), for “in that subsection” substitute “there”.

In section 30 of that Act (application: determination)—
Part 5—Criminal justice

(a) in subsection (1), after “subsection (2)” insert “or (2A),”

(b) in subsection (2), for “Those” substitute “Where the application is in a case involving antisocial behaviour, the”,

(c) after subsection (2) insert—

“(2A) Where the application is in a case involving an exploitation offence, the conditions are—

(a) that it appears that—

(i) such an offence is being (or was recently) committed in the premises, or

(ii) the premises continue to be (or recently have been) used for or in connection with the commission of such an offence, and

(b) that the making of the order is necessary to prevent the commission of such an offence for the period specified in the order.”,

(d) in subsection (3)(b), for the words from “engaged” to the end substitute “(as the case may be)—

(i) engaged in antisocial behaviour which has occurred in the premises, or

(ii) involved in the commission of an exploitation offence in or connected with the premises.”, and

(e) after subsection (3) insert—

“(3A) For the purpose of paragraph (b)(ii) of subsection (3), a person such as is mentioned in paragraph (a) of that subsection is not involved in the commission of an exploitation offence where that person is the victim of the offence.”.

(4) In section 32 of that Act (extension)—

(a) after subsection (1) insert—

“(1A) The sheriff may, on the application of a senior police officer and if satisfied that it is necessary to do so to prevent the commission of an exploitation offence, make an order extending the period for which a closure order has effect for a period not exceeding the maximum period.”,

(b) in subsection (2), for “subsection (1)” substitute “subsections (1) and (1A),”

(c) in subsection (3)—

(i) after “may” insert “, in a case involving antisocial behaviour,,”, and

(ii) for “this section” substitute “subsection (1)”, and

(d) after subsection (3) insert—

“(3A) A senior police officer may, in a case involving an exploitation offence, make an application under subsection (1A) only if—

(a) it is made while the closure order has effect, and

(b) the senior police officer—
(i) has reasonable grounds for believing that it is necessary to extend the period for which the closure order has effect for the purpose of preventing the commission of an exploitation offence, and
(ii) is satisfied that the appropriate local authority has been consulted about the intention to make the application.”.

(5) In section 33 of that Act (revocation), in subsection (1), for the words from “the occurrence” to the end substitute “(as the case may be)—
(a) the occurrence of relevant harm, or
(b) the commission of an exploitation offence, revoke the order.”.

(6) In section 36 of that Act (appeals), in subsection (5), after “section 32(1)” insert “or (1A)”.

(7) After section 40 of that Act insert—

“40A Exploitation offences

(1) In this Part, an “exploitation offence” is any of the following offences—

(a) so far as concerning travel or identity documentation for enabling the trafficking of people (including passports, visas and work permits)—
(ii) fraud, or
(ii) uttering a forged document,

(b) so far as concerning the trafficking of people, an offence under section 26(1)(d) of the Immigration Act 1971 (c.77) (falsification of documentation),

(c) an offence under section 52 or 52A of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 (c.45) (possession, taking or distribution of indecent images of children),

(d) an offence under sections 7 to 12 or 13(9) of the Criminal Law (Consolidation) (Scotland) Act 1995 (c.39) (offences relating to prostitution and brothels),

(e) an offence under section 22 of the Criminal Law (Scotland) Act 2003
(asp 7) (traffic in prostitution etc.),

(f) an offence under section 1 of the Protection of Children and Prevention of Sexual Offences (Scotland) Act 2005 (asp 9) (meeting a child following certain preliminary contact),

(g) an offence under sections 9 to 12 of that Act (offences relating to provision by child of sexual services or child pornography), (h) an offence under section 4 of the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc.) Act 2004 (c.19) (trafficking people for exploitation),

(i) an offence under Part 1 of the Sexual Offences (Scotland) Act 2009 (asp
00) (rape etc.),

(j) an offence under Part 4 of that Act (sexual offences involving children) other than an offence under section 27 (older children engaging in penetrative sexual conduct with each other),
Part 5—Criminal justice

(k) an offence under section 31 of that Act (sexual abuse of trust),

(l) an offence under section 35 of that Act (sexual abuse of trust of a mentally disordered person).

(2) For the purposes of subsection (1)(a) and (b), a reference to trafficking of people is a reference to a person intentionally doing something in respect of at least one other person which involves the commission of an offence mentioned in subsection (1)(c) or (h).

(3) For the purposes of subsection (1), a reference to an offence includes a reference to—

(a) an attempt to commit an offence,

(b) incitement to commit an offence,

(c) counselling or procuring the commission of an offence,

(d) involvement art and part in an offence, and

(e) an offence as modified by section 42 of the Sexual Offences (Scotland) Act 2009 (asp 00) (incitement to commit certain sexual acts outside the United Kingdom).

(4) The Scottish Ministers may by order add to or otherwise modify the specification of offences listed in subsection (1).”.

Sexual offences prevention orders

(1) In section 141 of the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 (c.4) (sexual offences prevention orders: relevant sexual offences), subsection (2) is repealed.

(2) In the Sexual Offences Act 2003 (c.42)—

(a) in section 106 (applications and grounds for sexual offences prevention orders: supplemental), in subsection (13), the words from “in their” to the end are repealed,

(b) in section 109 (interim SOPOs), in subsection (5), for “107(3)” substitute “107(2)”,

(c) after section 111 insert—

“111A  SOPO and interim SOPO requirements: Scotland

(1) This section applies in relation to a sexual offences prevention order or an interim sexual offences prevention order made, or to be made, by a court in Scotland.

(2) Such an order, in addition to or instead of prohibiting the defendant from doing anything described in the order, may require the defendant to do anything described in the order.

(3) Accordingly, in relation to such an order—

(a) the references in sections 107(2) and 108(5) to a prohibition include a reference to a requirement, and
(b) the reference in section 113(1) to a person’s doing anything which he is prohibited from doing includes a reference to his failing to do anything which he is required to do.”, and

(d) in section 112 (provisions relating to sexual offences prevention orders in Scotland), in subsection (1), after paragraph (d) insert—

“(da) a court may make an order under section 104(1)—

(i) at its own instance, or

(ii) on the motion of the prosecutor;”.

Foreign travel orders

(1) The Sexual Offences Act 2003 (c.42) is amended as follows.

(2) In section 115 (definition of “protecting children generally or any child from serious sexual harm from the defendant outside the United Kingdom”), in subsection (2), for “16” in both places it occurs substitute “18”.

(3) In section 116 (qualifying offenders: offences), in subsection (2)(d), for “16” substitute “18”.

(4) In section 117(1) (foreign travel orders: effect), for “6 months” substitute “5 years”.

(5) Before section 118, insert—

“117B Surrender of passports: Scotland

(1) This section applies in relation to a foreign travel order which contains a prohibition within section 117(2)(c).

(2) The order must require the person in respect of whom the order has effect to surrender all of the person’s passports, at a police station specified in the order—

(a) on or before the date when the prohibition takes effect, or

(b) within a period specified in the order.

(3) Any passports surrendered must be returned as soon as reasonably practicable after the person ceases to be subject to a foreign travel order containing a prohibition within section 117(2)(c).

(4) Subsection (3) does not apply in relation to—

(a) a passport issued by or on behalf of the authorities of a country outside the United Kingdom if the passport has been returned to those authorities;

(b) a passport issued by or on behalf of an international organisation if the passport has been returned to that organisation.

(5) In this section “passport” means—

(a) a United Kingdom passport within the meaning of the Immigration Act 1971 (c.77);

(b) a passport issued by or on behalf of the authorities of a country outside the United Kingdom, or by or on behalf of an international organisation;
(e) a document that can be used (in some or all circumstances) instead of a passport.”.

(6) In section 122 (breach of foreign travel order), before subsection (2) insert—

“(1B) A person commits an offence if, without reasonable excuse, the person fails to comply with a requirement under section 117B(2).”.

Risk of sexual harm orders

(1) The Protection of Children and Prevention of Sexual Offences (Scotland) Act 2005 (asp 9) is amended as follows.

(2) In section 2 (risk of sexual harm orders: applications, grounds and effect)—

(a) in subsection (7)(a), after “doing” insert “, or requires that person to do,”, and

(b) in subsection (8), after “prohibitions” insert “or requirements”.

(3) In section 4 (risk of sexual harm orders: variations, renewals and discharges), in subsection (4), after “prohibitions” in both places where it occurs insert “or requirements”.

(4) In section 5 (interim risk of sexual harm orders), in subsection (3), after “doing” insert “, or requiring that person to do,”.

(5) In section 7 (offence: breach of risk of sexual harm order or interim risk of sexual harm order), in subsection (1), after “doing” insert “, or fails to do anything which the person is required to do,”.

Obtaining information from outwith United Kingdom

(1) Where it appears to the Commission that there may be information which they require for the purposes of carrying out their functions, and the information is outside the United Kingdom, they may apply to the High Court to request assistance.

(2) On an application made by the Commission under subsection (1), the High Court may request assistance if satisfied that it is reasonable in the circumstances.

(3) In this section, “request assistance” means request assistance in obtaining outside the United Kingdom any information specified in the request for use by the Commission for the purposes of carrying out their functions.

(4) Section 8 of the Crime (International Co-operation) Act 2003 (c.32) (sending requests for assistance) applies to requests for assistance under this section as it applies to requests for assistance under section 7 of that Act.

(5) Subsections (2), (3) and (6) of section 9 of that Act (use of evidence obtained) apply to information obtained pursuant to a request for assistance under this section as they apply under subsection (1) of that section to evidence obtained pursuant to a request for assistance under section 7 of that Act.”.
Grant of authorisations for directed and intrusive surveillance

(1) The Regulation of Investigatory Powers (Scotland) Act 2000 (asp 11) is amended as follows.

(2) After section 9 insert—

“9A Authorisation of directed surveillance: joint surveillance operations

(1) Subsection (2) applies in the case of a joint surveillance operation where authorisation is sought for the carrying out of directed surveillance.

(2) The persons designated for the purposes of section 6 are those prescribed by order under section 8(1).”.

(3) In section 10 (authorisation of intrusive surveillance)—

(a) in subsection (1), for the words from “the” where it second occurs to the end substitute “any of the persons mentioned in subsection (1A) may grant authorisations (including authorisations in the case of a joint surveillance operation) for the carrying out of intrusive surveillance.”, and

(b) after that subsection insert—

“(1A) Those persons are—

(a) the chief constable of every police force,

(b) the Director General of the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency,

(c) the Deputy Director General of the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency.”.

(4) In section 11 (rules for grant of authorisations), in subsection (3), after “General” insert “or the Deputy Director General”.

(5) In section 12A (grant of authorisations in cases of urgency: Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency), in subsection (1), after “General” insert “or the Deputy Director General”.

(6) In section 31 (interpretation), in subsection (1), after the definitions of “directed” and “intrusive” insert—

““joint surveillance operation”, where authorisation is sought for the carrying out of directed or intrusive surveillance, means a case involving—

(a) at least two police forces in Scotland working together; or

(b) at least one police force in Scotland and the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency working together;”.

Authorisations to interfere with property etc.

(1) The Police Act 1997 (c.50) is amended as follows.

(2) In section 93 (authorisations to interfere with property etc.)—

(a) after subsection (3) insert—
“(3A) In the case of a joint operation, an authorising officer mentioned in subsection (3B) may authorise a person mentioned in subsection (3C) to take such action as is referred to in subsection (1).

(3B) Those authorising officers are—

(a) the chief constable of a police force—
   (i) maintained under or by virtue of section 1 of the Police (Scotland) Act 1967, and
   (ii) involved in the joint operation, or

(b) where the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency is involved in the joint operation, the Director General or Deputy Director General of that Agency.

(3C) The persons who may be authorised under subsection (1) are—

(a) a constable of any of the police forces involved in the joint operation (whether or not the authorised action is to be carried out in the area of operation of the constable’s police force),

(b) where the joint operation falls within paragraph (b) of subsection (3B), a police member of the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency.

(3D) In subsection (3A), “joint operation” means a case involving—

(a) at least two police forces in Scotland working together, or

(b) at least one police force in Scotland and the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency working together.,” and

(b) in paragraph (j) of subsection (5), after “General” insert “, or Deputy Director General,”.

(3) In section 94 (authorisations given in absence of authorising officer)—

(a) in subsection (2)(h), after “(5)” insert “or, as the case may be, subsection (6)”,

(b) in subsection (5)(a), at the beginning insert “where the case is not a joint operation,,”, and

(c) after subsection (5), add—

“(6) Where the case is a joint operation, the chief constable of a police force involved in the joint operation in the relevant area.

(7) In subsections (5) and (6)—

“joint operation” has the meaning given by section 93(3D), and “relevant area” means the area—

(a) for which the police forces involved in the joint operation are maintained, and

(b) to which the application for authorisation relates.”.

Amendments of Part 5 of Police Act 1997

Amendments of Part 5 of Police Act 1997
(1) The Police Act 1997 (c.50) is amended as follows.
After section 113B insert—

113BA Information held outside the United Kingdom

(c) “criminal record certificate” in section 113A(3),
(d) “relevant matter” in section 113A(6),
(e) “enhanced criminal record certificate” in section 113B(3).

(2) An order under subsection (1) may be made only for the purposes of, or in connection with, enabling certificates issued under this Part to include details of information held outside the United Kingdom.

(3) No order may be made under subsection (1) unless a draft of the statutory instrument containing the order has been laid before, and approved by resolution of, the Scottish Parliament.”.

In section 120ZB (regulations about registration), after subsection (2) insert—

“(2A) The provision which may be made by virtue of subsection (2)(a) includes in particular provision for—

(a) the payment of fees in respect of applications to be listed in the register,
(b) the payment of different fees in different circumstances,
(c) annual or other recurring fees to be paid in respect of registration, and
(d) such annual or other recurring fees to be paid in advance or in arrears.

(2B) Where provision is made under subsection (2)(a) for a fee to be charged in respect of an application to be listed in the register, the Scottish Ministers need not consider the application unless the fee is paid.”.

Miscellaneous

80 Assistance for victim support

(1) The Scottish Ministers may make grants for the purposes of or in connection with the provision of assistance to victims, witnesses or other persons affected by an offence.

(2) Grants under subsection (1) may be made—

(a) to such bodies, and
(b) subject to such conditions, as the Scottish Ministers consider appropriate.

81 Public defence solicitors

(1) In section 28A of the Legal Aid (Scotland) Act 1986 (c.47) (power of Board to employ solicitors to provide criminal assistance)—

(1) In section 133 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 (c.33) (compensation for miscarriages of justice)—

(a) after subsection (1) insert—

“(1A) The Scottish Ministers may by order provide for—

(a) further circumstances in respect of which a person (or, if dead, the person’s representatives) may be paid compensation for a miscarriage of justice,

(b) circumstances in respect of which a person (or, if dead, the person’s representatives) may be paid compensation for wrongful detention prior to acquittal or a decision by the prosecutor to take no proceedings (or to discontinue proceedings).”;

(b) after subsection (2) insert—

“(2AA) Such an application requires to be made within the period of 3 years starting with—

(a) in the case of compensation under subsection (1), the date on which the conviction is reversed or (as the case may be) the person is pardoned,

(b) in the case of compensation under subsection (1A), whichever is relevant of—

(i) that date, or

(ii) the date on which the person is acquitted or the relevant decision is made known to the person.

(2AB) The Scottish Ministers may accept such an application outwith that time limit if they think it is appropriate in exceptional circumstances to do so.”;

(c) in subsection (4A), after paragraph (a) insert—

“(aa) the seriousness of the offence with which the person was charged or detained (but in respect of which offence the person was not convicted);”;

(d) after subsection (4A) insert—

“(4B) The assessor must also have particular regard to any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers for the purposes of this section.”;

(e) in subsection (5)—

(i) after “quashed” insert “(or set aside)”;

(ii) the word “or” where it occurs immediately after each of paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) is repealed,

(e) under section 188(1)(b) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995.”;
(f) after subsection (6) insert—

“(6A) For the purposes of this section, a person suffers punishment as a result of conviction also where (in relation to the conviction) the court imposes some other disposal including by way of—

(a) making a probation order, or

(b) discharging the person absolutely.”.

(g) after subsection (7) insert—

“(8) The power to make an order under subsection (1A) is exercisable by statutory instrument.

(9) A statutory instrument containing such an order is subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of the Scottish Parliament.”.

(2) In Schedule 12 to that Act (assessors of compensation for miscarriages of justice), in paragraph 1—

(a) immediately after sub-paragraph (c), insert “or”, and

(b) sub-paragraph (e) and the word “or” immediately preceding it are repealed.

83 Financial reporting orders

In section 77 of the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005 (c.15) (financial reporting orders: making in Scotland), after subsection (4) insert—

“(4A) A financial reporting order may be made—

(a) on the prosecutor’s motion, or

(b) at the court’s own instance.”.

84 Compensation orders

(1) In section 249 of the 1995 Act (compensation order against convicted person)—

(a) in subsection (1)—

(i) for “Subject to subsections (2) and (4) below, where” substitute “Where”,

(ii) after “compensation” where it second occurs insert “in favour of the victim”,

(b) after subsection (1A) insert—

“(1B) Where a person is convicted of an offence, the court may (instead of or in addition to dealing with the person in any other way), in accordance with subsections (3A) to (3C), make a compensation order requiring the convicted person to pay compensation in favour of—

(a) the victim, or

(b) a person who is liable for funeral expenses in respect of which subsection (3C)(b) allows a compensation order to be made.

(1C) For the purposes of subsection (1B)(a), “victim” means—

(a) a person who has suffered personal injury, loss or damage in respect of which a compensation order may be made by virtue of subsection (3A), or
(b) a relative (as defined in Schedule 1 to the Damages (Scotland) Act 1976 (c.13)) who has suffered bereavement in respect of which subsection (3C)(a) allows a compensation order to be made.

(c) after subsection (3) insert—

“(3A) A compensation order may be made in respect of personal injury, loss or damage (apart from loss suffered by a person’s dependents in consequence of a person’s death) that was caused directly or indirectly by an accident arising out of the presence of a motor vehicle on a road if—

(a) it was being used in contravention of section 143(1) of the Road Traffic Act 1988 (c.52), and

(b) no compensation is payable under arrangements to which the Secretary of State is a party.

(3B) Where a compensation order is made by virtue of subsection (3) or (3A), the order may include an amount representing the whole or part of any loss of (including reduction in) preferential rates of insurance if the loss is attributable to the accident.

(3C) A compensation order may be made—

(a) for bereavement in connection with a person’s death resulting from the acts which constituted the offence,

(b) for funeral expenses in connection with such a death, except where the death was due to an accident arising out of the presence of a motor vehicle on a road.”,

(d) in subsection (4)—

(i) for “No” substitute “Unless (and to the extent that) subsections (3) to (3C) allow a compensation order to be made, no”,

(ii) in paragraph (b), the words from “, except” to the end are repealed,

(e) subsection (6) is repealed, and

(f) after subsection (8) insert—

“(8A) In summary proceedings before the sheriff, where the fine or maximum fine to which a person is liable on summary conviction of an offence exceeds the prescribed sum, the sheriff may make a compensation order awarding in respect of the offence an amount not exceeding the amount of the fine to which the person is so liable.”,

(2) In section 251 of that Act (review of compensation order)—

(a) paragraph (a) of subsection (1) is repealed, and

(b) after subsection (1) insert—

“(1A) On the application of the prosecutor at any time before a compensation order has been complied with (or fully complied with), the court may increase the amount payable under the compensation order if it is satisfied that the person against whom it was made—

(a) because of the availability of materially different information about financial circumstances, has more means than were made known to the court when the order was made, or
(b) because of a material change of financial circumstances, has more means than the person had then.”.

PART 6

Disclosure

Meaning of “information”

85 Meaning of “information”

(1) In this Part “information”, in relation to an accused, means material of any kind (other than precognitions and victim statements) given to or obtained by the prosecutor in connection with the case against the accused.

(2) In particular, “information” includes—

(a) information contained in precognitions,

(b) information contained in victim statements,

(c) any previous convictions and outstanding charges relating to witnesses whom the prosecutor intends to call in the proceedings against the accused, if the convictions and charges are material to the accused’s case,

(d) in solemn cases, any statements of witnesses whom the prosecutor intends to call in the proceedings against the accused,

(e) in summary cases, any statements of witnesses whom the prosecutor intends to lead in evidence, if any such statement contains information that has not otherwise been disclosed by the prosecutor.

Solemn cases: schedules of information

86 Provision of information to prosecutor

(1) This section applies where—

(a) an accused appears for the first time on petition, or

(b) an accused appears for the first time on indictment.

(2) As soon as practicable after the appearance, the prosecutor must give notice of the appearance to the investigating agency that reported to the prosecutor the matter to which the appearance relates.

(3) As soon as practicable after receiving notice under subsection (2), the investigating agency must comply with subsections (4) and (5).

(4) The investigating agency must prepare and give to the prosecutor schedules listing all the information that may be relevant to the case for or against the accused that the agency is aware of that was obtained (whether by the agency or otherwise) in the course of investigating the matter to which the appearance relates.

(5) For the purposes of subsection (4) the investigating agency must, in relation to each item of information—

(a) determine which of the categories mentioned in subsection (6) it falls into,

(b) list it in a schedule containing information falling into the same category, and
(c) set out a brief description of it.

(6) Those categories are—
(a) sensitive,
(b) highly sensitive,
(c) non-sensitive.

(7) The investigating agency need not include in a schedule prepared under subsection (4) anything that the agency has already included in a schedule prepared under that subsection in relation to the same matter (whether because the same matter has been the subject of an earlier petition or indictment or otherwise).

(8) In this section “sensitive”, in relation to an item of information, means that if the item were to be disclosed it would be likely—
(a) to cause serious injury, or death, to any person,
(b) to obstruct or prevent the prevention, detection, investigation or prosecution of crime, or
(c) to cause serious prejudice to the public interest.

(9) In this section “investigating agency” means—
(a) a police force, or
(b) such other person who—
   (i) engages (to any extent) in the investigation of crime or sudden deaths, and
   (ii) submits reports relating to those investigations to the procurator fiscal,
as the Scottish Ministers may prescribe by regulations.

87 Continuing duty to provide schedules of information

(1) This section applies where—
(a) an investigating agency has complied with section 86(3) in relation to an accused, and
(b) during the relevant period the investigating agency becomes aware that further information that may be relevant to the case for or against the accused has been obtained (whether by the agency or otherwise) in the course of investigating the accused’s case.

(2) The agency must comply with the duties imposed by section 86(3) in relation to that further information.

(3) In this section—
“investigating agency” has the same meaning as in section 86,
“the relevant period” means the period—
(a) beginning with the investigating agency’s compliance with section 86(3) in relation to the accused, and
(b) ending with the agency’s receiving notice from the prosecutor of the conclusion of the proceedings against the accused.
(4) For the purposes of this section, proceedings against an accused are to be taken to be concluded if—

(a) a plea of guilty is recorded against the accused,

(b) the accused is acquitted,

(c) the proceedings against the accused are deserted simpliciter,

(d) the accused is convicted and does not appeal against the conviction before the expiry of the time allowed for such an appeal,

(e) the proceedings are deserted pro loco et tempore for any reason and no further trial diet is appointed, or

(f) the indictment falls or is for any other reason not brought to trial, the diet is not continued, adjourned or postponed and no further proceedings are in contemplation.

88 Review and adjustment of schedules of information

(1) This section applies where by virtue of section 86(3) or 87(2) a prosecutor receives from an investigating agency schedules of information relating to an accused.

(2) The prosecutor must—

(a) review the schedules, and

(b) consider in relation to each piece of information whether the prosecutor agrees with the determination made by the agency by virtue of section 86(5)(a) or 87(2).

(3) If in relation to an item of information the prosecutor disagrees with the determination made by the agency, the prosecutor must—

(a) return the schedules to the agency from whom the prosecutor received them, and

(b) require the agency to adjust the schedules so as to include the item of information in the category mentioned in section 86(5)(a) into which the prosecutor considers that the item of information falls.

(4) As soon as practicable after receiving the schedules, the investigating agency must—

(a) adjust them in the way required by the prosecutor, and

(b) return them to the prosecutor.

Duties

89 Prosecutor’s duty to disclose information

(1) This section applies where—

(a) an accused appears for the first time on petition,

(b) an accused appears for the first time on indictment, or

(c) a plea of not guilty is recorded against an accused charged on summary complaint.

(2) As soon as practicable after the appearance or the recording of the plea, the prosecutor must—

(a) review all the information that may be relevant to the case for or against the accused of which the prosecutor is aware, and
(b) determine whether subsection (3) applies to any of the information.

(3) This subsection applies if—

(a) the information would materially weaken or undermine the prosecution case,

(b) the information would materially strengthen the accused’s case; or

(c) the information is likely to form part of the prosecution case.

(4) The following are examples of information to which subsection (3) applies—

(a) information that tends to exculpate the accused,

(b) information that would be likely to be of material assistance to the proper preparation or presentation of the accused’s defence,

(c) information that relates to a material line of the accused’s defence and which is likely to form part of the prosecution case.

(5) If subsection (3) applies to any of the information, the prosecutor must disclose that information to the accused.

(6) If subsection (3) does not apply, the prosecutor must notify the accused of that fact.

(7) The prosecutor need not disclose under subsection (5) anything that the prosecutor has already disclosed in relation to the same matter (whether because the same matter has been the subject of an earlier petition, indictment or complaint or otherwise).

Continuing duty of prosecutor

(1) This section applies where the prosecutor has complied with subsection (5) or (6) of section 89 in relation to an accused.

(2) During the relevant period, the prosecutor must—

(a) from time to time review all the information that may be relevant to the case for or against the accused of which the prosecutor is aware,

(b) determine whether subsection (3) of section 89 applies to any of the information, and

(c) comply with subsection (5) or (6) of that section.

(3) In subsection (2) “the relevant period” means the period—

(a) beginning with the prosecutor’s compliance with subsection (5) or (6) of section 89 in relation to an accused, and

(b) ending with the conclusion of the proceedings against the accused.

(4) For the purposes of this section, proceedings against an accused are to be taken to be concluded if—

(a) a plea of guilty is recorded against the accused,

(b) the accused is acquitted,

(c) the proceedings against the accused are deserted simpliciter,

(d) the accused is convicted and does not appeal against the conviction before the expiry of the time allowed for such an appeal,

(e) the proceedings are deserted pro loco et tempore for any reason and no further trial diet is appointed, or
(f) the indictment or complaint falls or is for any other reason not brought to trial, the diet is not continued, adjourned or postponed and no further proceedings are in contemplation.

91 Exemptions from disclosure

Information must not be disclosed under section 89(5) or 90(2) to the extent that it is material the disclosure of which is prohibited by section 17 of the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 (c.23).

92 Redaction of non-disclosable information by prosecutor

(1) Subsection (2) applies where—

(a) by virtue of section 89(5), 90(2)(c), 94(1)(c) or 95(3)(c) the prosecutor is required to disclose to the accused an item of information (the “disclosable information”), and

(b) the disclosable information forms part of, or contains, other information (the “non-disclosable information”) which the prosecutor is not required to disclose by virtue of any of those sections.

(2) Before disclosing the disclosable information, the prosecutor may (whether by redaction or otherwise) remove or obscure the non-disclosable information.

93 Solemn cases: additional disclosure requirement

(1) Subsection (2) applies where the prosecutor is obliged to comply with the requirement imposed by subsection (5) of section 89 in relation to an accused such as is mentioned in paragraph (a) or (b) of subsection (1) of that section.

(2) In addition to complying with that requirement, the prosecutor must also disclose to the accused any schedule of information which—

(a) relates to the proceedings against the accused, and

(b) following the making of any adjustment required by virtue of section 88(3)(b), is specified as falling into the category of non-sensitive.

(3) In this section “sensitive” has the same meaning as in section 86.

Defence statements

94 Defence statements: solemn proceedings

(1) As soon as practicable after the accused lodges under section 70A of the 1995 Act a defence statement or a pre-trial statement, the prosecutor must—

(a) review all the information that may be relevant to the case for or against the accused of which the prosecutor is aware,

(b) determine whether subsection (3) of section 89 applies to any of that information, and

(c) comply with subsection (5) or (6) of section 89.
(2) After section 70 of the 1995 Act insert—

"70A  Defence statements

(1) This section applies where an indictment is served on an accused.

(2) The accused must lodge a defence statement at least 14 days before the first diet.

(3) The accused must lodge a defence statement at least 14 days before the preliminary hearing.

(4) The accused must lodge a statement (a “pre-trial statement”) at least 7 days before the trial diet stating—

(a) in relation to the last defence statement lodged by the accused by virtue of this section, whether there has been a material change in circumstances since the defence statement was lodged, and

(b) if so, setting out details of the change and the new position.

(5) The accused may lodge a defence statement at any other time before the trial diet.

(6) In this section “defence statement” means a statement setting out—

(a) the nature of the accused’s defence, including any particular defences on which the accused intends to rely,

(b) any matters of fact on which the accused takes issue with the prosecution and the reason for doing so,

(c) any point of law in relation to disclosure which the accused wishes to take and any authority on which the accused intends to rely for that purpose,

(d) by reference to the accused’s defence, the nature of any information that the accused requires the prosecutor to disclose, and

(e) the reasons why the accused considers that disclosure by the prosecutor of any such information is necessary.”.

95  Defence statements: summary proceedings

(1) This section applies where—

(a) a plea of not guilty is recorded against an accused charged on summary complaint, and

(b) during the relevant period the prosecutor receives from the accused a defence statement.

(2) A defence statement must set out—

(a) the nature of the accused’s defence, including any particular defences on which the accused intends to rely,

(b) any matters of fact on which the accused takes issue with the prosecution and the reason for doing so,

(c) any point of law in relation to disclosure which the accused wishes to take and any authority on which the accused intends to rely for that purpose,
(d) by reference to the accused’s defence, the nature of any information that the accused wishes the prosecutor to disclose, and

(e) the reasons why the accused considers that disclosure by the prosecutor of any such information is necessary.

(3) As soon as practicable after receiving the defence statement the prosecutor must—

(a) review all the information that may be relevant to the case for or against the accused of which the prosecutor is aware,

(b) determine whether subsection (3) of section 89 applies to any of that information, and

(c) comply with subsection (5) or (6) of that section.

(4) In this section “the relevant period”, in relation to the accused, is the period—

(a) beginning with the recording of the accused’s plea of not guilty, and

(b) ending with the conclusion of the proceedings to which the plea relates.

(5) For the purposes of subsection (4), proceedings are to be taken to be concluded if—

(a) a plea of guilty is recorded against the accused,

(b) the accused is acquitted,

(c) the proceedings against the accused are deserted simpliciter,

(d) the accused is convicted and does not appeal against the conviction before the expiry of the time allowed for such an appeal,

(e) the proceedings are deserted pro loco et tempore for any reason and no further trial diet is appointed, or

(f) the complaint falls or is for any other reason not brought to trial, the diet is not continued, adjourned or postponed and no further proceedings are in contemplation.

96 Effect of guilty plea

(1) This section applies where—

(a) by virtue of section 89(5), 90(2)(c), 94(1)(c) or 95(3)(c) the prosecutor is required to disclose information to an accused, but

(b) before the prosecutor does so, a plea of guilty is recorded against the accused.

(2) The prosecutor need not comply with the requirement in so far as it relates to the disclosure of information which is likely to form part of the prosecution case.

(3) Subsections (1) and (2) cease to apply if the accused withdraws the plea of guilty.

97 Means of disclosure

(1) This section applies where by virtue of section 89(5), 90(2)(c), 94(1)(c) or 95(3)(c) the prosecutor is required to disclose information to an accused.

(2) The prosecutor may disclose the information by any means.
(3) In particular, the prosecutor may disclose the information by enabling the accused to inspect it at a reasonable time and in a reasonable place.

Confidentiality

98 Confidentiality of disclosed information

(1) This section applies where by virtue of section 89(5), 90(2)(c), 94(1)(c) or 95(3)(c) the prosecutor discloses information to an accused.

(2) The accused must not use or disclose the information or anything recorded in it other than in accordance with subsection (3).

(3) The accused may use or disclose the information—

(a) for the purposes of the proper preparation and presentation of the accused’s case in the proceedings in relation to which the information was disclosed (“the original proceedings”),

(b) with a view to the taking of an appeal in relation to the matter giving rise to the original proceedings,

(c) for the purposes of the proper preparation and presentation of the accused’s case in any such appeal.

(4) A person to whom information is disclosed by virtue of subsection (3) must not use or disclose the information or anything recorded in it other than for the purpose for which it was disclosed.

(5) In subsection (3) “appeal” includes the reference of a case to the High Court of Justiciary by the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission under section 194B of the 1995 Act.

(6) Nothing in this section affects any other restriction or prohibition on the use or disclosure of information, whether the restriction or prohibition arises by virtue of an enactment (whenever passed or made) or otherwise.

99 Contravention of section 98

(1) A person who knowingly uses or discloses information in contravention of section 98 commits an offence.

(2) A person guilty of an offence under subsection (1) is liable—

(a) on summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 12 months or to a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or to both,

(b) on conviction on indictment to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 2 years or to a fine or to both.

Disclosure to third party

100 Order enabling disclosure to third party

(1) This section applies where by virtue of section 89(5), 90(2)(c), 94(1)(c) or 95(3)(c) the prosecutor discloses information to an accused.

(2) On the application of the accused the court may make an order enabling the accused to disclose specified information to a specified person for a specified purpose.
(3) Before making an order under this section the court must give—

(a) the prosecutor, and

(b) any person appearing to the court to have an interest in the information to which the application relates, an opportunity to be heard.

(4) Section 99 does not apply in relation to information disclosed by virtue of an order under this section.

(5) In this section—

“court” means—

(a) if the proceedings in relation to which the information was disclosed to the accused are on indictment, the court hearing the proceedings,

(b) if the proceedings in relation to which the information was disclosed to the accused are petition or summary proceedings, the sheriff, and “specified” means specified in the order.

101 Contra\ntavent\ntion of order under section 100

(1) A person who knowingly uses or discloses information in contravention of an order under section 100(2) commits an offence.

(2) A person guilty of an offence under subsection (1) is liable—

(a) on summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 12 months or to a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or to both,

(b) on conviction on indictment to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 2 years or to a fine or to both.

Applications to court: orders restricting disclosure

102 Application for non-disclosure order

(1) This section applies where—

(a) by virtue of section 89(5), 90(2)(c), 94(1)(c) or 95(3)(c) the prosecutor is required to disclose an item of information to an accused,

(b) section 89(3)(a) or (b) applies to the information, and

(c) the prosecutor considers that subsection (2) applies.

(2) This subsection applies if disclosure of the item of information—

(a) would be likely to cause serious injury, or death, to any person,

(b) would be likely to obstruct or prevent the prevention, detection, investigation or prosecution of crime, or

(c) would be likely to cause serious prejudice to the public interest.

(3) The prosecutor must apply to the court for a non-disclosure order in relation to the item of information.
Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill
Part 6—Disclosure

(4) A non-disclosure order is an order under section 106 requiring the prosecutor to withhold (wholly or to a specified extent) from the accused a specified item of information—

(a) that the prosecutor would otherwise be required to disclose to the accused by virtue of section 89(5), 90(2)(c), 94(1)(c) or, as the case may be, 95(3)(c), and

(b) to which section 89(3)(a) or (b) applies.

(5) In subsection (4), “specified” means specified in the order.

103 Application for non-notification order or exclusion order

(1) This section applies where the prosecutor is required by section 102(3) to apply to the court for a non-disclosure order.

(2) If the application for a non-disclosure order relates to solemn proceedings, the prosecutor may apply to the court for—

(a) a non-notification order and an exclusion order, or

(b) an exclusion order (but not a non-notification order).

(3) If the application for a non-disclosure order relates to summary proceedings, the prosecutor may apply to the court for an exclusion order.

(4) A non-notification order is an order under section 104 prohibiting notice being given to the accused of—

(a) the making of an application for—

(i) the non-disclosure order to which the non-notification order relates,

(ii) the non-notification order, and

(iii) an exclusion order, and

(b) the determination of those applications.

(5) An exclusion order is an order under section 105 prohibiting the accused from attending or making representations in proceedings for the determination of the application for a non-disclosure order to which the exclusion order relates.

(6) Subsection (7) applies where the prosecutor applies—

(a) by virtue of subsection (2)(a) for a non-notification order and an exclusion order, or

(b) by virtue of subsection (2)(a) or (b) for an exclusion order.

(7) Before determining in accordance with section 106 the application for the non-disclosure order, the court must—

(a) in accordance with section 104, determine any applications for a non-notification order and an exclusion order,

(b) in accordance with section 105, determine any application for an exclusion order.

104 Application for non-notification order and exclusion order

(1) This section applies where the prosecutor applies for a non-notification order and an exclusion order.
(2) On receiving the application, the court must appoint a hearing to determine whether a non-notification order should be made.

(3) The accused is not to be notified of—

(a) the applications for the non-disclosure order, non-notification order and exclusion order, or

(b) the hearing appointed under subsection (2).

(4) The accused is not to be given the opportunity to be heard or be represented at the hearing.

(5) If, after giving the prosecutor an opportunity to be heard, the court is satisfied that the conditions in subsection (6) are met, the court may make a non-notification order.

(6) Those conditions are—

(a) that disclosure to the accused of the making of the application for the non-disclosure order would be likely to disclose to the accused the nature of the information to which that application relates,

(b) that it is not in the public interest that the nature of the information be disclosed to the accused, and

(c) that, having regard to all the circumstances, the making of a non-notification order would be consistent with the accused’s receiving a fair trial.

(7) If the court makes a non-notification order, it must also make an exclusion order.

(8) If the court refuses to make a non-notification order—

(a) the court must appoint a hearing to determine the application for an exclusion order,

(b) the court must give notice to the accused of the hearing, and

(c) if, after giving the prosecutor and the accused an opportunity to be heard, the court is satisfied that the conditions in subsection (4) of section 105 are met, the court may make an exclusion order under subsection (3) of that section.

105 Application for exclusion order

(1) This section applies where by virtue of section 103(2)(b) the prosecutor applies for an exclusion order (but not a non-notification order).

(2) On receiving the application the court must appoint a hearing.

(3) If after giving the prosecutor and the accused an opportunity to be heard the court is satisfied that the conditions in subsection (4) are met, the court may make an exclusion order.

(4) Those conditions are—

(a) that disclosure to the accused of the nature of the information to which the application for the non-disclosure order relates would be likely to disclose to the accused that information,

(b) that it is not in the public interest that the nature of the information be disclosed to the accused, and

(c) that, having regard to all the circumstances, the making of an exclusion order would be consistent with the accused’s receiving a fair trial.
Application for non-disclosure order: determination

(1) This section applies where—
   (a) the prosecutor applies for a non-disclosure order, and
   (b) any application for a non-notification order or an exclusion order has been determined by the court.

(2) If after—
   (a) considering the item of information to which the application for a non-disclosure order relates, and
   (b) giving the prosecutor and (if the court has not made an exclusion order) the accused the opportunity to be heard, the court is satisfied that the conditions mentioned in subsection (3) are met, the court may grant a non-disclosure order.

(3) The conditions are—
   (a) that by virtue of section 89(5), 90(2)(c), 94(1)(c) or 95(3)(c) the prosecutor is required to disclose the item of information,
   (b) that if the item of information were to be disclosed it would be likely—
      (i) to cause serious injury, or death, to any person,
      (ii) to obstruct or prevent the prevention, detection, investigation or prosecution of crime, or
      (iii) to cause serious prejudice to the public interest,
   (c) that withholding the item of information would be consistent with the accused’s receiving a fair trial, and
   (d) that the public interest would be protected only if a non-disclosure order were to be made.

(4) In determining the application, the court must consider whether the item of information could in the opinion of the court be disclosed or partly disclosed in such a way that—
   (a) the conditions in paragraph (b) of subsection (3) would not be met, and
   (b) the disclosure (or partial disclosure) would be consistent with the accused’s receiving a fair trial.

(5) For the purposes of subsection (4) the ways in which the item of information might be disclosed or partly disclosed include in particular—
   (a) providing the information after (whether by redaction or otherwise) removing or obscuring parts of it,
   (b) providing extracts or summaries of the information or part of it.

(6) Where the court determines that the item of information could be disclosed (or partly disclosed) as mentioned in subsection (4), the court may, instead of making a non-disclosure order, make an order requiring the prosecutor to disclose to the accused the item of information in the way specified in the order.
Special counsel

107 Special counsel

(1) This section applies where the court is determining—

(a) an application for—

(i) a non-notification order,

(ii) an exclusion order, or

(iii) a non-disclosure order,

(b) an application for review of the grant or refusal of any of those orders,

(c) an appeal relating to any of those orders.

(2) If the condition in subsection (3) is met, the court may appoint a person (“special counsel”) to represent the interests of the accused to whom the application, review or appeal relates.

(3) The condition is that the court considers that the appointment of special counsel is necessary to ensure that the accused receives a fair trial.

Appeals

108 Appeal by prosecutor against refusal of application for order

(1) This section applies where the court refuses an application by the prosecutor for—

(a) a non-notification order,

(b) an exclusion order, or

(c) a non-disclosure order.

(2) The prosecutor may appeal against the decision of the court.

109 Appeal by accused against making of exclusion order or non-disclosure order

The accused may appeal against an order of the court making an exclusion order or a non-disclosure order.

110 Appeal by special counsel

(1) This section applies where—

(a) the court makes a non-notification order, an exclusion order or a non-disclosure order, and

(b) special counsel was appointed in relation to the application for any of those orders.

(2) Special counsel may appeal against the making of the order.

Reviews

111 Review of grant of non-disclosure order

(1) This section applies where—

(a) the court makes a non-disclosure order, and
(b) during the relevant period—

(i) the prosecutor or the accused becomes aware of information that was unavailable to the court at the time when the order was made, and

(ii) the prosecutor or, as the case may be, the accused considers that the information is material information that the prosecutor ought to disclose to the accused by virtue of section 89(5), 90(2)(c), 94(1)(c) or 95(3)(c).

(2) The prosecutor or, as the case may be, the accused may apply to the court to review the non-disclosure order.

(3) Except in the case mentioned in subsection (4), the same persons are entitled to be heard on the application for review as were entitled to be heard on the application for the non-disclosure order.

(4) If—

(a) a non-notification order was granted in relation to the non-disclosure order which is under review, and

(b) the court is satisfied that the conditions in section 104(6) are met, the court may, where the prosecutor applies for the review, make an order prohibiting notification being given to the accused of the application for review.

(5) If—

(a) an exclusion order was granted in relation to the non-disclosure order which is under review, and

(b) the court is satisfied that the conditions in section 105(4) are met, the court may, where the prosecutor or the accused applies for the review, exclude the accused from the review.

(6) If the court is not satisfied that the conditions mentioned in section 106(3) are met, the court may—

(a) recall the non-disclosure order, or

(b) recall the non-disclosure order and make an order requiring disclosure to the specified extent.

(7) Nothing in this section affects any right of appeal in relation to the non-disclosure order.

(8) In this section—

“specified” means specified in the order of the court,

“the relevant period”, in relation to an accused, means the period—

(a) beginning with the making of the non-disclosure order, and

(b) ending with the conclusion of the proceedings against the accused.

(9) For the purposes of this section, proceedings against an accused are to be taken to be concluded if—

(a) a plea of guilty is recorded against the accused,

(b) the accused is acquitted,

(c) the proceedings against the accused are deserted simpliciter,
(d) the accused is convicted and does not appeal against the conviction before the expiry of the time allowed for such an appeal.

(e) any appeal by the prosecutor is determined or abandoned, or

(f) the accused is convicted and any appeal is determined or abandoned.

5 112 Review by court of non-disclosure order

(1) This section applies where the court makes a non-disclosure order.

(2) During the relevant period, the court must from time to time consider whether, having regard to the information of which the court is aware, the non-disclosure order continues to be appropriate.

(3) If the court considers that the non-disclosure order might no longer be appropriate, the court must appoint a hearing to review the matter.

(4) In this section “the relevant period” has the same meaning as in section 90(4).

Applications and reviews: general provisions

113 (1) This section applies in relation to—

(a) an application for an order mentioned in subsection (2), and

(b) a review relating to such an order.

(2) The orders are—

(a) a non-notification order.

(b) an exclusion order,

(c) a non-disclosure order.

(3) Except where it is impracticable to do so, the application or review is to be assigned to the same justice of the peace, sheriff or, as the case may be, judge as has been (or is to be assigned) to the trial diet in the proceedings against the accused to which the application relates.

(4) The accused is not entitled to see or be made aware of the contents of an application for—

(a) a non-notification order,

(b) an exclusion order,

(c) a non-disclosure order,

(d) a review made by the prosecutor.

Code of practice

114 (1) The Lord Advocate—

(a) must issue a code of practice providing guidance about this Part, and

(b) may from time to time revise the code for the time being in force.
(2) The persons mentioned in subsection (3) must have regard to the code of practice for the time being in force in carrying out their functions in relation to the investigation and reporting of crime and sudden deaths.

(3) Those persons are—

(a) police forces,
(b) prosecutors,
(c) such other persons who—
      (i) engage (to any extent) in the investigation of crime or sudden deaths, and
      (ii) submit reports relating to those investigations to the procurator fiscal,
as the Scottish Ministers may prescribe by regulations.

(4) The Lord Advocate must lay before the Scottish Parliament any code or revised code issued under this section.

Acts of Adjournal

115 Acts of Adjournal

The High Court may by Act of Adjournal make such rules as it considers necessary or expedient for the purposes of, in consequence of, or for giving full effect to, any provision of this Part.

Interpretation of Part 6

116 Interpretation of Part 6

(1) In this Part “prosecutor” and “procurator fiscal” have the meanings given by section
307(1) of the 1995 Act.

(2) References in the following sections to the accused include references to a solicitor or advocate acting on behalf of the accused—

(a) section 89(5) and (6),
(b) section 90(1),
(c) section 93(2) (where it first occurs),
(d) section 95(1)(b),
(e) section 97,
(f) section 98(1), and (2) and (where it first occurs) (3),
(g) section 100,
(h) section 102,
(i) section 103,
(j) section 104,
(k) section 105,
(l) section 106(2), and
(m) section 111(1), (2), (4) and (5).
PART 7
MENTAL DISORDER AND UNFITNESS FOR TRIAL

117 Criminal responsibility of persons with mental disorder

(1) Before section 52 of the 1995 Act insert—

“Criminal responsibility of mentally disordered persons

51A Criminal responsibility of persons with mental disorder

(1) A person is not criminally responsible for conduct constituting an offence, and is to be acquitted of the offence, if the person was at the time of the conduct unable by reason of mental disorder to appreciate the nature or wrongfulness of the conduct.

(2) But a person does not lack criminal responsibility for such conduct if the mental disorder in question consists only of a personality disorder which is characterised solely or principally by abnormally aggressive or seriously irresponsible conduct.

(3) The defence set out in subsection (1) is a special defence.

(4) The special defence may be stated only by the person charged with the offence and it is for that person to establish it on the balance of probabilities.

(5) In this section, “conduct” includes acts and omissions.

Diminished responsibility

51B Diminished responsibility

(1) A person who would otherwise be convicted of murder is instead to be convicted of culpable homicide on grounds of diminished responsibility if the person’s ability to determine or control conduct for which the person would otherwise be convicted of murder was, at the time of the conduct, substantially impaired by reason of abnormality of mind.

(2) For the avoidance of doubt, the reference in subsection (1) to abnormality of mind includes mental disorder.

(3) The fact that a person was under the influence of alcohol, drugs or any other substance at the time of the conduct in question does not of itself—

(a) constitute abnormality of mind for the purposes of subsection (1), or

(b) prevent it from being established for those purposes.

(4) It is for the person charged with murder to establish, on the balance of probabilities, that the condition set out in subsection (1) is satisfied.

(5) In this section, “conduct” includes acts and omissions.”.
118 Acquittal involving mental disorder: procedure

Before section 54 of the 1995 Act insert—

“Acquittal involving mental disorder

53E Acquittal involving mental disorder

(1) Where the prosecutor accepts a plea by the person charged with the commission of an offence of the special defence set out in section 51A of this Act, the court must declare that the person is acquitted by reason of the special defence.

(2) Subsection (3) below applies where—

(a) the prosecutor does not accept such a plea, and

(b) evidence tending to establish the special defence set out in section 51A of this Act is brought before the court.

(3) Where this subsection applies the court is to—

(a) in proceedings on indictment, direct the jury to find whether the special defence has been established and, if they find that it has, to declare whether the person is acquitted on that ground,

(b) in summary proceedings, state whether the special defence has been established and, if it states that it has, declare whether the person is acquitted on that ground.”.

119 Unfitness for trial

(1) In the 1995 Act, after section 53E (inserted by section 118), insert—

53F Unfitness for trial

(1) A person is unfit for trial if it is established on the balance of probabilities that the person is incapable, by reason of a mental or physical condition, of participating effectively in a trial.

(2) In determining whether a person is unfit for trial the court is to have regard to—

(a) the ability of the person to—

(i) understand the nature of the charge,

(ii) understand the requirement to tender a plea to the charge and the effect of such a plea,

(iii) understand the purpose of, and follow the course of, the trial,

(iv) understand the evidence that may be given against the person,

(v) instruct and otherwise communicate with the person’s legal representative, and

(b) any other factor which the court considers relevant.

(3) The court is not to find that a person is unfit for trial by reason only of the person being unable to recall whether the event which forms the basis of the charge occurred in the manner described in the charge.
(4) In this section “the court” means—
(a) as regards a person charged on indictment, the High Court or the sheriff court,
(b) as regards a person charged summarily, the sheriff court.”.

(2) The title of section 54 of the 1995 Act (insanity in bar of trial) is replaced by “Unfitness for trial: further provision”, the cross-heading which precedes it is omitted and the section is amended as follows—
(a) in subsection (1)—
(i) the words “, on the written or oral evidence of two medical practitioners,” are repealed, and
(ii) for “insane” substitute “unfit for trial”,
(b) in subsection (3)—
(i) for “the insanity of a person” substitute “whether a person is unfit for trial”, and
(ii) after “mental” insert “or physical”, and
(c) in subsection (5), for “insane” substitute “unfit for trial”.

(3) Subsections (6) and (7) are repealed.

Abolition of common law rules
Any rule of law providing for—
(a) the special defence of insanity,
(b) the plea of diminished responsibility, or
(c) insanity in bar of trial, ceases to have effect.

PART 8
LICENSING UNDER CIVIC GOVERNMENT (SCOTLAND) ACT 1982

121 Conditions to which licences under 1982 Act are to be subject
(1) The 1982 Act is amended as follows.
(2) In section 3(4) (automatic grant or renewal of licence where application not determined within specified period), the word “unconditionally” is repealed.
(3) After section 3 insert—
“3A Mandatory licence conditions
(1) The Scottish Ministers may by order made by statutory instrument prescribe conditions to which licences granted by licensing authorities under this Act are to be subject.
(2) Different conditions may be prescribed under subsection (1)—
(a) in respect of different licences, or different types of licence,
(b) otherwise for different purposes, circumstances or cases.

(3) A statutory instrument containing an order made under subsection (1) is subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of the Scottish Parliament.

(4) Subsection (1) does not affect any other power of the Scottish Ministers under this Act or any other enactment to prescribe conditions—

(a) to which licences granted by licensing authorities under this Act are to be subject, or

(b) to be imposed by licensing authorities in granting or renewing licences under this Act.

(5) The following conditions are referred to in this Part and Part 2 of this Act as “mandatory conditions”—

(a) conditions prescribed under subsection (1),

(b) conditions prescribed under any power referred to in subsection (4), and

(c) conditions imposed, or required to be imposed, by any provision of this Part or Part 2 of this Act.

(6) In this section and section 3B, references to licences granted by licensing authorities include references to—

(a) licences renewed by licensing authorities, and

(b) licences deemed by virtue of section 3(4) to be granted or renewed by licensing authorities.

3B Standard licence conditions

(1) A licensing authority may determine conditions to which licences granted by them under this Act are to be subject.

(2) Conditions determined under subsection (1) are referred to in this Part and Part 2 as “standard conditions”.

(3) Different conditions may be determined under subsection (1)—

(a) in respect of different licences, or different types of licence,

(b) otherwise for different purposes, circumstances or cases.

(4) A licensing authority must publish, in such manner as they think appropriate, any standard conditions determined by them.

(5) Standard conditions have no effect—

(a) unless they are published, and

(b) so far as they are inconsistent with any mandatory conditions.

(6) Subsection (1) is subject to paragraph 5(1A)(a) of Schedule 1 to this Act.”.

(4) In section 27C (conditions in respect of knife dealers’ licences)—

(a) in subsection (1)—

(i) in paragraph (b), after “prejudice to” insert “section 3B and”, and

(ii) in paragraph (c), after “that” insert “section and”, and

(b) subsection (2) is repealed.
(5) In section 41(3) (power to attach conditions to public entertainment licences), after “prejudice to” insert “section 3B of and”.

(6) In Schedule 1 (further provisions as to the general licensing system), in paragraph 5—

(a) in sub-paragraph (1)—

(i) in paragraph (a), the word “unconditionally” is repealed, and

(ii) paragraph (b) is repealed,

(b) after that sub-paragraph insert—

“(1A) In granting or renewing a licence under sub-paragraph (1)(a), a licensing authority may (either or both)—

(a) disapply or vary any standard conditions so far as applicable to the licence,

(b) impose conditions in addition to any mandatory or standard conditions to which the licence is subject.”,

(c) in sub-paragraph (2), for “(1)(b)” substitute “(1A)(b)”, and

(d) after that sub-paragraph insert—

“(2A) A variation made under sub-paragraph (1A)(a) or condition imposed under sub-paragraph (1A)(b) has no effect so far as it is inconsistent with any mandatory condition to which the licence is subject.”.

122 Licensing: powers of entry and inspection for civilian employees

(1) The 1982 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 5 (rights of entry and inspection)—

(a) in subsection (1), after “licensing authority” insert “, an authorised civilian employee”,

(b) in subsection (3)(a) and (b)—

(i) after “constable” where it first occurs insert “, an authorised civilian employee”, and

(ii) after “such an” insert “employee or”,

(c) in subsection (3)(c), after “constable” insert “, an authorised civilian employee”,

(d) in subsection (4)—

(i) after “licensing authority” insert “, an authorised civilian employee”, and

(ii) after “the officer” insert “, employee”, and

(e) in subsection (6), after “licensing authority” insert “or authorised civilian employee”.

(3) In section 8 (interpretation of Parts 1 and 2), after the definition of “appropriate relevant authority” insert—

““authorised civilian employee” means a person—

(a) employed by a police authority under section 9(1)(a) of the Police (Scotland) Act 1967 (c.77), and
(b) authorised by the chief constable for the purposes of sections 5, 11 and 29 of this Act;”.

(4) In section 11 (inspection and testing of vehicles), in subsection (2)—
(a) after “the authority)” insert “, an authorised civilian employee”,
(b) in paragraph (b), after “licensing authority” insert “, an authorised civilian employee”, and
(c) after “authorised officer” where it last occurs, insert “, employee”.

(5) In paragraph 3 (miscellaneous definitions) of Schedule 2 (control of sex shops), after the definition of “appropriate relevant authority” insert—

““authorised civilian employee” means a person—
(a) employed by a police authority under section 9(1)(a) of the Police (Scotland) Act 1967 (c.77), and
(b) authorised by the chief constable for the purposes of paragraph 20 of this Schedule;”.

(6) In paragraph 20 of that Schedule (rights of entry and inspection)—
(a) in sub-paragraph (1), after “local authority” insert “, an authorised civilian employee”,
(b) in sub-paragraph (3), after “local authority” insert “or an authorised civilian employee”, and
(c) in sub-paragraph (5)—
   (i) after “constable” where it first occurs insert “, an authorised civilian employee”, and
   (ii) after “such” insert “employee or”.

123 Licensing of metal dealers

(1) The 1982 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 9 (optional provisions)—
(a) for subsection (1) substitute—

“(1) The provisions mentioned in subsection (1A) (referred to in this section as the “optional provisions”) have effect in the area of a licensing authority only if and in so far as the authority makes a resolution in accordance with subsections
(2) to (8).

(1A) Those provisions are—
   (a) sections 10 to 27 (except section 20) of this Act,
   (b) sections 28 to 43 (except section 41A) of this Act,
   (c) any regulations made under section 20 of this Act, and
   (d) any order made under section 44(1)(a) of this Act.”.

(3) In section 29 (metal dealers’ exemption warrants)—
(a) in subsection (1)—
for the words from “a certificate” to “stating” substitute “such evidence as they may determine showing”,

(ii) for “certificate” where it second occurs substitute “evidence”, and

(iii) for the words from “£100,000” to the end substitute “such sum (including nil) as the licensing authority may determine.”,

(b) for subsection (2) substitute—

“(2) A licensing authority must publish any determinations made under subsection (1).”, and

(c) in subsection (10), the definition of “auditor” is repealed.

10 Licensing of taxis and private hire cars

(1) The 1982 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 13 (taxi and private hire car licences), in subsection (3), for “during any continuous period of 12 months” substitute “throughout the period of 12 months immediately”.

(3) In section 17 (taxi fares)—

(a) for subsections (2) to (4) substitute—

“(2) The licensing authority must fix scales for the fares and other charges mentioned in subsection (1) within 18 months beginning with the date on which the scales came into effect.

(b) in fixing scales under subsection (2), the licensing authority may—

(a) alter fares or other charges,

(b) fix fares or other charges at the same rates.

(4) Before fixing scales under subsection (2), the licensing authority must review the scales in accordance with subsection (4A).

(4A) In carrying out a review, the licensing authority must—

(a) consult with persons or organisations appearing to it to be, or to be representative of, the operators of taxis operating within its area,

(b) following such consultation—

(i) review the existing scales, and

(ii) propose new scales (whether at altered rates or the same rates),

(c) publish those proposed scales in a newspaper circulating in its area—

(i) setting out the proposed scales,

(ii) explaining the effect of the proposed scales,

(iii) proposing a date on which the proposed scales are to come into effect, and

(iv) stating that any person may make representations in writing until the relevant date, and

(d) consider any such representations.
(4B) In subsection (4A)(c)(iv) “the relevant date” is a date specified by the licensing authority falling at least one month after the first publication by the authority of the proposed scales.

(4C) After fixing scales under subsection (2), the licensing authority must give notice in accordance with subsection (4D).

(4D) The licensing authority must—

(a) set out, and explain the effect of, the scales as fixed,

(b) notify the persons mentioned in subsection (4E) of—

(i) the date on which the scales as fixed are to come into effect, and

(ii) the rights of appeal under section 18.

(4E) Those persons are—

(a) all operators of taxis operating within their area, and

(b) the persons and organisations consulted under subsection (4A)(a).”, and

PART 9

ALCOHOL LICENSING

129 Sale of alcohol to persons under 21 etc.

(1) The 2005 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 7 (duty to assess overprovision)—

(a) in subsection (1), after “statement” where it second occurs insert “(an “overprovision statement”)

(b) after subsection (1) insert—

“(1A) A Licensing Board may at any time review an overprovision statement.”.

(3) After section 7 insert—

(1) Each licensing policy statement published by a Licensing Board must in particular include a statement (a “detrimental impact statement”) as to the extent to which the Board considers that off-sales to persons under the age of 21—

(a) in its area, or

(b) in any locality within its area, are having a detrimental impact in that area or locality.

(2) In subsection (1)—

(a) “off-sales” means the sale of alcohol on licensed premises for consumption off those premises,

(b) “detrimental impact” means any adverse effect on one or more of the licensing objectives.
(3) A Licensing Board may at any time review a detrimental impact statement.

(4) In preparing a detrimental impact statement, a Licensing Board must—
   (a) ensure that the policy stated in the statement seeks to promote the licensing objectives, and
   (b) consult—
      (i) the Local Licensing Forum for the Board’s area,
      (ii) if the membership of the Forum is not representative of the interests of all of the persons specified in paragraph 2(6) of schedule 2, such person or persons as appear to the Board to be representative of those interests of which the membership is not representative, and
      (iii) such other persons as the Board thinks appropriate.

(5) At the request of a Licensing Board—
   (a) the appropriate chief constable, or
   (b) the relevant council, must provide to the Board such statistical or other information as the Board may reasonably require for the purpose of preparing a detrimental impact statement.

(6) A Licensing Board must, at the request of—
   (a) the appropriate chief constable, or
   (b) the Local Licensing Forum for the Licensing Board’s area, within 42 days of the date of receipt of the request, consider reviewing the detrimental impact statement.

(7) Where, following a review under subsection (3) or (6), a Licensing Board revises the detrimental impact statement, it must publish it in a supplementary licensing policy statement.

(8) It is for the Licensing Board to determine a “locality” within its area for the purposes of subsection (1).

(9) In subsection (2)(a) “licensed premises” does not include premises in respect of which an occasional licence has effect.”.

(4) After section 27 insert—

“27A Power of Board to vary premises licence conditions

(1) A Licensing Board may, in relation to any matter which the Scottish Ministers may by regulations prescribe, make a variation of the conditions to which a premises licence in respect of licensed premises within its area is subject.

(2) A variation under subsection (1) may apply to—
   (a) all licensed premises,
   (b) particular licensed premises,
   (b) licensed premises within particular parts of its area, or
   (c) licensed premises of a particular description.
132

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill
Part 9—Alcohol licensing

(3) A variation under subsection (1) has effect for such period as the Board may specify in it.

(4) The Board may make a variation under subsection (1) only where it is satisfied that the variation is necessary or expedient for the purposes of any of the licensing objectives.

(5) Where a Licensing Board makes a variation under subsection (1), the Board must—
(a) amend the premises licence,
(b) within the period of one month, give notice of the variation to—
(i) the appropriate chief constable, and
(ii) the holders of premises licences in respect of premises to which the variation applies,
(c) send a copy of the variation to the address of the premises to which the variation applies, and
(d) publicise the variation in such manner as the Board sees fit.

(6) A variation under subsection (1) does not have effect unless notice under subsection (5)(b)(ii) has been given.

(7) In subsection (1), the power to make a variation of the conditions to which a premises licence is subject includes—
(a) a power to make a revocation of such a variation in the same manner and subject to the same conditions, duties and limitations as the variation,
(b) a power to make a variation (or a revocation of a variation) of the conditions to which a provisional premises licence is subject.”.

(5) In section 146 (orders and regulations), in subsections (4)(b) and (5)(b), after “27(2)” insert “, 27A(1)”.

130 Premises licence applications: notification requirements

(1) Section 21 of the 2005 Act (notification of premises licence application) is amended as follows.

(2) For subsection (2), substitute—
“(2) On giving notice of an application under subsection (1), the Licensing Board—
(a) must provide the appropriate chief constable with a copy of the application, and
(b) may provide any other person to whom notice is given with a copy of the application.”.

(3) In subsection (3), the following are repealed—
(a) the word “and” after paragraph (a), and
(b) paragraph (b).

(4) In subsection (6), the following are repealed—
(a) the definition of “antisocial behaviour”,
(b) the word “and” following the definition of “neighbouring land”, and
(c) the definition of “relevant period”.

131 Premises licence applications: modification of layout plans

In section 23 of the 2005 Act (determination of premises licence application), in subsection (7)(b), after “plan” insert “or layout plan (or both)”.

132 Premises licence applications: antisocial behaviour reports

(1) The 2005 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 22 (objections and representations), after subsection (2) insert—

“(2A) The appropriate chief constable may, under subsection (1)(b), make representations concerning a premises licence application by giving to the Licensing Board a report detailing—

(a) any cases of antisocial behaviour indentified by constables as having taken place on, or in the vicinity of, the premises,

(b) any complaints or other representations made to constables concerning antisocial behaviour on, or in the vicinity of, the premises.”.

(3) After section 24 insert—

“24A Power to request antisocial behaviour report”

(1) A Licensing Board may, at any time before determining a premises licence application, request the appropriate chief constable to give the Board a report detailing—

(a) all cases of antisocial behaviour indentified within the relevant period by constables as having taken place on, or in the vicinity of, the premises,

(b) all complaints or other representations made within the relevant period to constables concerning antisocial behaviour on, or in the vicinity of, the premises.

(2) The appropriate chief constable must give the report within 21 days of the request.

(3) Where the Licensing Board requests a report under subsection (1), the Board must suspend consideration of the application until it receives the report.

(4) On receipt of the chief constable’s report under subsection (2), the Licensing Board must—

(a) give a copy of the report to the applicant in such manner and by such time as may be prescribed by regulations, and

(b) resume consideration of the application and determine it in accordance with section 23.

(5) In this section—

“antisocial behaviour” has the same meaning as in section 143 of the Antisocial Behaviour etc. (Scotland) Act 2004 (asp 8), and “relevant period” means the period of one year ending with the date of the request.”.

Schedule 4 makes further modifications of the 2005 Act (including extending police powers to object).

PART 10

Licensed premises: social responsibility levy

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make provision for the imposition on relevant licence-holders of charges for the purpose mentioned in subsection (3).

(2) In this section, “relevant licence-holders” means—

(a) holders of premises licences or occasional licences granted under the 2005 Act,
(b) holders of street trader’s licences granted under section 39 of the 1982 Act where the licence authorises the carrying on of a food business within the meaning of section 1(3) of the Food Safety Act 1990 (c.16),
(c) holders of public entertainment licences granted under section 41 of the 1982 Act, and
(d) holders of late hours catering licences granted under section 42 of the 1982 Act.

(3) The purpose referred to in subsection (1) is to meet or contribute to expenditure incurred or to be incurred by any local authority—

(a) in furtherance of the licensing objectives, and
(b) which the authority considers necessary or desirable with a view to remedying or mitigating any adverse impact on those objectives attributable (directly or indirectly) to the operation of the businesses of relevant licence-holders in the authority’s area.

(4) Regulations under this section may, in particular—

(a) specify charges or provide for them to be determined under the regulations,
(b) specify charges, or provide for them to be determined, by reference to such factors or circumstances as may be specified in or determined under the regulations,
(c) provide for annual or other recurring charges,
(d) provide for exemptions from charges,
(e) provide for the remission or repayment of charges,
(f) provide for the collection and enforcement of charges,
(g) provide for the charging of interest on overdue charges,
(h) provide for the payment of charges to be a condition of the licences held by relevant licence holders,
(i) make provision about the particular purposes for which income from charges may be applied,
(j) provide for the accounting for income from charges and the expenditure of that income,
(k) confer functions on local authorities in relation to the determination, administration, collection and enforcement of charges, or in relation to any other matter provided for in the regulations.

(5) In this section—

“business”, in relation to a relevant licence-holder, means the business comprising the activity in respect of which the licence-holder’s licence was granted,

“licensing objectives” means the objectives specified in section 4 of the 2005 Act,

“local authority” means a council constituted under section 2 of the Local Government etc. (Scotland) Act 1994 (c.39); and “area”, in relation to a local authority, means the local government area for which the authority is constituted.

(b) two persons holding the office of sheriff principal or sheriff, and

(c) one person holding the office of justice of the peace or stipendiary magistrate.

(4) The legal members comprise—

(a) one prosecutor within the meaning of section 307 of the 1995 Act,

(b) one constable,

(c) one advocate practising as such in Scotland (other than one who is a prosecutor), and

(d) one solicitor practising as such in Scotland (other than one who is a prosecutor).

(5) The lay members comprise—

(a) one person appearing to the Scottish Ministers to have knowledge of the issues faced by victims of crime, and

(b) two other persons neither of whom is qualified for appointment as a judicial or legal member.

Procedure for appointment of members

2 (1) It is for the Lord Justice General, after consulting the Scottish Ministers, to appoint the members of the Council other than the Lord Justice Clerk and the lay members.

(2) It is for the Scottish Ministers, after consulting the Lord Justice General, to appoint the lay members.

(3) The Lord Justice General may appoint a person to be a member only if the person has been nominated, or otherwise selected for appointment, in accordance with such procedures as the Scottish Ministers may by regulations prescribe.

(4) The regulations may—

(a) in particular, make provision for or in connection with enabling a person to nominate or select persons suitable for appointment,

(b) prescribe different procedures for different categories of membership.

(5) The Scottish Ministers must consult the Lord Justice General before making the regulations.
Persons disqualified from membership

A person is disqualified from appointment, and from holding office, as a member of the Council if the person is or becomes—

(a) a member of the House of Commons,
(b) a member of the Scottish Parliament,
(c) a member of the European Parliament,
(d) a councillor of any council constituted under section 2 of the Local Government etc. (Scotland) Act 1994 (c.39),
(e) a Minister of the Crown, or
(f) a member of the Scottish Executive.

Term of office

A member holds office for such period not exceeding 5 years as the Lord Justice General or, as the case may be, the Scottish Ministers may, at the time of appointment, determine.

A member ceases to hold office—

(a) on becoming disqualified from holding office as a member, or
(b) on ceasing to fall within the category of membership under which the member was appointed.

A person who has previously been a member may not be re-appointed.

Resignation and removal of members

A member appointed by the Lord Justice General may resign office by giving notice in writing to the Lord Justice General.

A member appointed by the Scottish Ministers may resign office by giving notice in writing to the Scottish Ministers.

The Lord Justice General may, by notice in writing, remove a judicial or legal member if satisfied that the member is unfit to be a member by reason of inability, neglect of duty or misbehaviour.

The Scottish Ministers may, by notice in writing, remove a lay member if satisfied that the member is unfit to be a member by reason of inability, neglect of duty or misbehaviour.

Suspension of judicial members

A judicial member is suspended from acting as such during any period in which the member is suspended from the judicial office which the member holds.

Chairing of the Council

The Lord Justice Clerk is to chair meetings of the Council.
(2) If the Lord Justice Clerk is for any reason unable to chair a meeting, the meeting may be chaired by another judicial member nominated—
   (a) by the Lord Justice Clerk, or
   (b) if the Lord Justice Clerk is unable to make such a nomination, by the Council.

(3) The Lord Justice Clerk may nominate another judicial member to chair meetings of the Council for a temporary period.

Committees

8 The Council may establish committees comprising members of the Council.

Proceedings

9 The Council may determine—
   (a) its own procedure (including the number of members required to constitute a quorum), and
   (b) the procedure (including the number of members required to constitute a quorum) of any committees established by it.

Validity of acts

10 The validity of proceedings or actings of the Council is not affected by—
   (a) any vacancy in the membership of the Council,
   (b) any defect in the appointment of a member of the Council, or
   (c) disqualification of any person from holding office as a member of the Council.

Ancillary powers

11 The Council may do anything which it considers necessary or expedient for the purposes of or in connection with its functions.

Delegation

12 (1) Any function of the Council, other than the function of preparing and publishing sentencing guidelines, may be carried out on its behalf by—
   (a) a member of the Council,
   (b) a committee, or
   (c) any other person, authorised (whether specially or generally) by it for the purpose.

(2) Nothing in sub-paragraph (1) prevents the Council from exercising any function delegated under that sub-paragraph.

SCHEDULE 3
(introduced by section 66(4))
WITNESS ANONYMITY ORDERS: TRANSITIONAL

Interpretation

1 In this schedule—

“commencement” means the day on which section 66 comes into force,

“pre-commencement anonymity order” means an order made by a court before commencement under any rule of law relating to the power of the court to make an order for securing that the identity of a witness in criminal proceedings is withheld from the accused (or, on a defence application, from other accused),

“witness anonymity order” has the meaning given by section 271N of the 1995 Act.

Pre-commencement anonymity orders: appeals

2 (1) This paragraph applies where—

(a) the High Court of Justiciary is considering an appeal against a conviction in a case where the trial began before commencement, and

(b) the court from which the appeal lies (“the trial court”) made a pre-commencement anonymity order in relation to a witness at the trial.

(2) The High Court—

(a) may not treat the conviction as unsafe solely on the ground that the trial court had no power under any rule of law to make the order mentioned in sub-paragraph (1)(b), but

(b) must treat the conviction as unsafe if it considers that, as a result of the order, the accused did not receive a fair trial.

SCHEDULE 4
(introduced by section 139)
FURTHER MODIFICATIONS OF 2005 ACT

1 The 2005 Act is amended in accordance with the following paragraphs.

EXPLANATORY NOTES

INTRODUCTION

2. These Explanatory Notes have been prepared by the Scottish Government in order to assist the reader of the Bill and to help inform debate on it. They do not form part of the Bill and have not been endorsed by the Parliament.

3. The Notes should be read in conjunction with the Bill. They are not, and are not meant to be, a comprehensive description of the Bill. So where a section or schedule, or a part of a section or schedule, does not seem to require any explanation or comment, none is given.

COMMENTARY ON SECTIONS

PART 1 - SENTENCING

Section 1 - Purposes and principles of sentencing

4. Section 1(1) sets out the purposes of sentencing and 1(2) requires the courts to have regard to these when sentencing offenders. The duty applies regardless of whether the court is imposing a sentence, making an order or disposing of the case in any other way. This is not intended to prevent courts from considering other matters when sentencing offenders.

5. The weight to be given to each of the purposes of sentencing will vary depending on the facts and circumstances of the case and no inference should be drawn from the order in which they are listed.

6. Sections 1(3) and 1(4) set out other matters that the court must have regard to when sentencing offenders - the principles of sentencing. This does not prevent courts from considering other matters when sentencing offenders. These are not to be the only matters that the courts can consider and it is not intended to limit the matters that the court can take into account. No inference should be drawn from the order in which the principles are listed.

7. Section 1(5) sets out the circumstances in which it is not appropriate to require the courts to have regard to the purposes and principles of sentencing as detailed here. This includes occasions where courts are dealing with young offenders (i.e. those under 18 years of age), where a penalty is fixed by law and where courts are dealing with mental health disposals.

Section 2 – Relationship between section 1 and other law

8. Section 2 deals with the relationship between the requirement upon the courts to have regard to the purposes and principles of sentencing under section 1 and their other duties.

9. Section 2(1) provides that the court does not have to comply with the duty to have regard to the purposes and principles in a case where another provision of legislation contains requirements which are inconsistent with those purposes and principles.
10. If sentencing guidelines published by the Scottish Sentencing Council are inconsistent with the purposes and principles, section 2(2) provides that the court need not comply with the requirement to have regard to the purposes and principles in respect of those inconsistencies.

11. Section 2(3) provides that where the purposes and principles are inconsistent with those to which the court must have regard at common law, the court need not comply with the common law in respect of those inconsistencies.

12. Section 2(4) provides that apart from the circumstances dealt with in section 2(1) to (3) the purposes and principles to which the court must have regard under section 1 do not affect any other duty or power imposed or conferred on a court in respect of sentencing an offender.

Sections 3 - 13 - The Scottish Sentencing Council

13. Sections 3 – 13 and Schedule 1 set out the provisions for the establishment of a Scottish Sentencing Council (“the Council”), which will produce sentencing guidelines for Scotland.

14. Section 3 establishes the name of the Council and its status as a body corporate.

15. Section 4 sets out the objectives of the Council, which it must seek to achieve when carrying out its functions. These are to promote consistency in sentencing, assist the development of sentencing policy and support transparency in sentencing by promoting greater awareness and understanding of sentencing policy and practice.

16. Section 5 relates to the sentencing guidelines to be produced by the Council and what they may be about. Subsection (5) requires the Council to include an assessment in each guideline of the costs and benefits of the guideline and the projected impacts on the criminal justice system, in particular prisons and community justice services.

17. Section 6 sets out the consultation procedure for the Council, ahead of publishing any guidelines. The Council must publish a draft of the proposed guidelines for comment before publishing. There is a requirement to consult the Scottish Ministers and the Lord Advocate, as well as such other persons as the Council considers appropriate. Any draft must include the cost assessments and impact assessments required by section 5(5).

18. Section 7 details the effect of the guidelines on the courts. A court must have regard to any guidelines which are applicable in a case and must state its reasons if it chooses to depart from the guidelines. The guidelines that are applicable are those in force and applicable to the case at the time the court is sentencing the offender.

19. When the High Court is dealing with an appeal and is passing a different sentence under relevant provisions in the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”), then it must have regard to the guidelines that are applicable at the time that it is considering the appeal. The provisions in the 1995 Act are as follows:

- Section 118(3) relates to the power of the High Court to quash a sentence and pass another one of equal measure when dealing with an appeal against conviction;
• Section 118(4)(b) relates to the power of the High Court to pass a greater or lesser sentence when dealing with an appeal against conviction;
• Section 118(4A)(b) relates to cases where a court has imposed a sentence other than a mandatory sentence and the High Court opts to pass a different sentence, but one that is still not the mandatory sentence;
• Section 118(4A)(c)(ii) relates to the High Court’s decision to set aside a decision and any sentence that departs from the mandatory sentence for drugs offences made under section 205B of the 1995 Act, and instead impose the mandatory minimum sentence or greater;
• Section 189(1)(b) relates to the power of the High Court, in an appeal against sentence in summary proceedings to quash the sentence and substitute another, whether more or less severe.

20. Section 7(6) is intended to prevent the revision of sentencing guidelines from becoming a ground for appeal referral by the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission. The Commission often deals with cases in which a significant period of time has lapsed between the original conviction and the appeal.

21. Section 7(7) requires the Lord Advocate to have regard to applicable sentencing guidelines when deciding whether to appeal a sentence.

22. Section 7(8) requires the prosecutor to have regard to applicable sentencing guidelines when deciding whether to appeal a sentence.

23. Section 8 gives the Scottish Ministers the power to request that the Council produces or reviews sentencing guidelines on any matter. While the Council must have regard to the request, it is not bound to comply with it. It must however, provide reasons for its decision not to comply.

24. Section 9 provides the High Court with the power to request that the Council reviews its guidelines on the occasions when it is sitting as an Appeal Court and has opted to pass another sentence under the provisions of the 1995 Act detailed in paragraph 8 above and has decided not to abide by the guidelines or has concluded that the guidelines do not deal adequately with an issue raised by the appeal.

25. The provisions require the High Court to state the reasons for its decision. The Council is required to review any guidelines referred to it under section 9(4).

26. Section 10 provides that the Scottish Court Service must provide the Council with information it may reasonably require in the form in which it requires.

27. Section 11 provides the Council with the power to publish and provide information and guidance on sentencing (in particular to the Scottish Ministers or members of the Scottish Parliament) and conduct research into sentencing. This section requires the Scottish Ministers to have regard to advice or proposals from the Council.
28. Section 12 relates to the business plan of the Council and sets out the requirements for the plan. It requires the Council to submit a 3 year plan to the Scottish Ministers describing how it plans to carry out its functions. Scottish Ministers must lay the plan before Parliament and the Council must publish it. It may also be revised at any time during its three years.

29. Section 13 relates to the annual report which the Council must submit to the Scottish Ministers and sets out the requirements for the content of the report. Each report must be laid before the Scottish Parliament by the Scottish Ministers and published thereafter by the Council.

Section 14 – Community payback orders

30. Section 14 inserts new sections 227A to 227ZK into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 to establish community payback orders.

31. Section 227A makes provision for the court to impose a community payback order (CPO) on an offender, who has committed an offence, which would otherwise be punishable by imprisonment. Subsection (2) sets out the different requirements that can be included in a CPO. Subsection (3) requires the court to be satisfied that the seriousness of the offence(s) warrant imposition of a CPO. Subsection (4) provides two exceptions to the imposition of a CPO as an alternative to custody, specifically a level 1 unpaid work or other activity requirement, or a level 1 unpaid work or other activity requirement with a supervision requirement. Subsections (5) and (6) set out the restrictions on requirements a justice of the peace court may impose. Subsection (7) requires the court to ensure that the requirements, which form a CPO, are compatible. Subsections (8) and (9) provide powers for the Scottish Ministers to amend the requirements which may be imposed by the justice of the peace court by means of statutory instrument. Subsection (10) provides definitions of court, imprisonment and a level 1 unpaid work and other activity requirement.

32. Section 227B sets out the general procedures, which a court requires to apply, before imposing a CPO. Subsection (2) provides that before making a CPO, the court requires to obtain and take account of a report from a local authority officer. A CPO cannot be made unless such a report has been secured. Subsection (3) sets out who should receive a copy of the report. Subsection (4) provides that before making the order, the court must explain in open court, to the offender the purpose and effect of the CPO and the consequences for the offender should he/she fail to comply with its terms. Subsection (5) requires the offender to confirm that he/she understands and is willing to comply with all the requirements which form the CPO.

33. Section 227C sets out the generic requirements which need to feature in a CPO. These include the need to identify the area where the offender will reside and for the relevant local authority to nominate a responsible officer within 5 days of receiving a copy of the order. The order will indicate the need for the offender to comply with any instructions given by the responsible officer including change of address if the order does not impose a residence requirement. Subsections (3) and (4) set out the duties of the responsible officer including matters of compliance by the offender. Subsection (5) provides that in calculating the period of 5 days for the local authority to nominate a responsible officer, no account will be taken of Saturdays and Sundays.
34. Section 227D sets out the duties of the offender in relation to the CPO. Subsection (2) requires the offender to comply with the instructions of the responsible officer, including where an unpaid work or other activity requirement has been made to attend as instructed, and to notify changes of address and employment and educational circumstances. Subsection (3) provides for failure to comply with any of these duties will treated as non-compliance with the order.

35. Section 227E makes further provision in relation to the CPO. Subsection (1) provides that a CPO is to be regarded as a sentence of the court. Subsection (2) provides that the court must give reasons for imposing the CPO in open court. Subsection (3) provides that the court in imposing a CPO is not prevented from taking other actions e.g. imposing a disqualification on the offender, making an order for forfeiture on the offence or ordering the offender to find caution for good behaviour. Subsections (4) and (5) indicate the arrangements to be followed by the clerk of the court with regard to those who should receive copies of the order and how they should be given. Subsection (6) provides for the form of the order to be set out in an Act of Adjournal.

36. Section 227F provides that the court in deciding on the requirements, which will form a CPO, should so far as possible avoid any conflict with the offender’s religious beliefs, or interference with the offender’s times of work or attendance at school or any other educational establishment.

37. Section 227G(1) sets out that as part of a supervision requirement and for the period specified the offender must attend as instructed for appointments with the responsible officer or his/her nominee. This indicates that the purpose of the requirement is to engage with the offender to support their rehabilitation. Subsection (2) concerns when a court must impose a supervision requirement. Subsection (2)(a) provides that a supervision requirement must be imposed on an offender under 18 years of age, subject to the court being satisfied that the local authority will be in a position to support and rehabilitate the offender. Subsection (2)(b) provides that a supervision requirement must be included in a CPO where certain other specified requirements are included or where the number of requirements amounts to two or more. A supervision requirement (subsections (3) and (4)) must be at least 6 months and not exceed 3 years.

38. Section 227H applies where a court makes a CPO and imposes a supervision requirement on the offender. Subsection (2) provides that, as part of the order, the court can also impose an obligation on the offender to pay compensation in relation to the offence(s) for which the CPO has been imposed. The compensation can be paid (subsection (3)) by a lump sum or in instalments as determined by the court. Subsection (4)(a) and (b) provide that where compensation is to be paid, it must be paid by the offender either within 18 months of the CPO being made or not later than 2 months before the end of the supervision period, whichever is earlier. The obligation to pay compensation and the time periods over which it is to be paid are to be treated as if they are part of the supervision requirement (subsection (5)).

39. Section 227I sets out the provisions the court must apply when imposing a CPO with an unpaid work or other activity requirement. Subsection (2) provides that the nature of the unpaid work or other activity requirement is not to feature as part of the order but rather to be determined by the responsible officer. Subsection (3) specifies the minimum and maximum number of hours that constitute an unpaid work or other activity requirement. Subsections (4) and (5) provide for two levels of unpaid work and other activity to be known as level 1 and level 2 and defines the range of hours within these levels. Subsections (6) and (7) provide that the Scottish Ministers have the power to make an order varying the minimum and maximum hours of unpaid work or other activity that an offender can be required to perform. Subsection (8) defines ‘specified’ as relating to the unpaid work and activity requirement in the CPO.

40. Section 227J sets out further provisions in relation to an unpaid work and other activity requirement. Subsection (1) restricts the court to imposing this requirement only on an offender aged 16 years or over. Subsection (2) provides that this requirement can only be imposed by the court, where the court considers the offender to be suitable to perform the unpaid work or other activity requirement. Subsections (3) and (4) provide for the Scottish Ministers to make regulations to allow justice of the peace courts to impose a level 2 unpaid work and activity requirement.

41. Section 227K(1) provides for the split between unpaid work or other activity to be determined by the responsible officer subject to limits set out in subsection (2) on the maximum number of hours of other activity that can count towards the requirement. Subsection (3) and (4) provide the Scottish Ministers with powers to vary the limits specified in subsection (2).

42. Section 227L sets out the maximum time limit for completion of levels 1 and 2 unpaid work or other activity requirement.

43. Section 227M (1) and (2) provide that where the offender has defaulted on a fine not exceeding £500 and where the court in disposing of the matter would otherwise have imposed a custodial sentence, the court must impose a CPO with a level 1 unpaid work and other activity requirement. Subsection (3) limits the number of hours to 50 for the requirement where the fine that has been imposed does not exceed £200.

44. Subsection (4) provides that the fine or remaining instalment is discharged when the offender completes the hours of unpaid work and other activity requirement imposed by the court. Subsection (5) provides for discharge of the order where the offender after its imposition pays in full the amount of the fine outstanding. Subsection (6) sets out the arrangements which are to apply where the outstanding amount is paid in part. Subsection (7) provides that a level 1 unpaid work and other activity requirement can be imposed on an offender without his consent. Subsection (8) does not apply the wider consent provisions in relation to a CPO in dealing with a fine defaulter under the section 227M provisions. Subsection (9) provides that the court cannot impose a level 1 unpaid work and other activity requirement on an offender aged under 16 years, or where within the context of an overall maximum of 300 hours a further requirement would breach this limit. Subsection (9) does not apply this section to the High Court.

45. Section 227N(1) indicates that this section applies to situations where a court is considering imposing an unpaid work and other activity requirement on an offender already subject to an existing such requirement(s). Subsection (2) gives the court discretion to direct that the new requirement can be concurrent to any existing requirement(s). Where a concurrent requirement is made, subsection (3) sets out that the hours of unpaid work and other activity undertaken in respect of the new requirement also count towards any existing requirement(s).
46. Where a new unpaid work and other activity requirement is to be consecutive to an existing requirement, subsections (4) and (5) provide that the total number of hours to be undertaken must not exceed 300. Subsection (6) specifies that a court cannot impose a new unpaid work and activity requirement where it would result in the maximum 300 hours figure being exceeded.

47. Section 227O gives the Scottish Ministers the power to make rules for regulating performance of unpaid work and other activity requirements including in relation to a daily maximum number of hours, calculations of time undertaken, provision for travel expenses and record keeping.

48. Section 227P requires the offender to participate in a specified programme at the place specified and on the specified number of days. Subsection (2) provides a definition of “programme”. Subsection (3) prevents the court from making a programme requirement unless recommended by a local authority officer as being suitable for the offender to take part in. If the cooperation of someone other than the offender would be necessary to ensure the compliance of an offender with the proposed programme requirement, subsection (4) provides that the court can only impose the requirement if that other person consents. If the offender is subject to a programme requirement, Subsection (6) requires the offender to comply with any instructions given by the person in charge of the programme. Subsection (7) defines “specified” in relation to the programme requirement.

49. Section 227Q(1) requires the offender as part of a residence requirement to reside at a specified place for a specified period. If the specified place is to be a hostel or institution, subsection (2) restricts the court from imposing the requirement to only if it has been recommended by a local authority officer. Subsection (3) stipulates that the specified period must not be longer than the period specified in the supervision requirement. “Specified” means specified in the requirement (subsection (4)).

50. Section 227R(1) provides a definition including purpose of a mental health treatment requirement. Subsection (2) indicates that subject to certain specified types of treatment listed in subsection (3) the nature of the treatment is not to be specified. Before imposing a mental health requirement subsection (4) requires the court to be satisfied on the basis of evidence submitted by appropriately qualified individuals that three conditions (A – C) have been met. Subsection (5) sets out the considerations in relation to Condition A in that the offender must be suffering from a mental condition, which requires and may be susceptible to treatment and that other specified orders are not appropriate. Condition B is set out in subsection (6) and requires the proposed treatment to be appropriate for the offender. Subsection (7) requires that where the proposed treatment consists of a resident patient in a hospital arrangements exists for the offender’s reception (Condition C). Subsection (9) defines the specified treatment as the mental health treatment specified by the court in the requirement.

51. Section 227S(1) provides that proof of signature or qualifications on a report from an approved medical practitioner is not necessary when the report is submitted in evidence for imposition of a mental health treatment requirement. Subsections (2) and (3) state that the offender and his/her solicitor must receive a copy of the report of the medical evidence and the case may be adjourned to give the offender further time to consider the report. Where the offender is being detained in hospital or remanded to custody, subsections (4) and (5) make provision for an examination of the offender by an approved medical practitioner for the purposes of challenging the evidence to be presented in court. Subsection (6) provides for any such examination to be undertaken in private.

52. Section 227T(1) to (3) enable the practitioner under whose direction the treatment is being carried out to make arrangements where appropriate for the offender to receive a different kind of treatment or to receive it at a different place. Subsection (4) states the treatment to be provided requires to be of a kind which could have been specified in the requirement. Subsection (5) provides for the offender as a residential patient to receive treatment in a different institution or place not necessarily specified for that purpose as part of the requirement. Subsection (6) requires the agreement of the offender and the responsible officer to the proposed changes, for the agreement of an approved medical practitioner to accept the offender as a patient and where the offender is to be a resident patient for him/her to be received as such. Subsection (7) requires the court to be informed of changes under this section and for the planned treatment to be appropriate to the mental health treatment requirement.

53. Section 227U(1) specifies the purpose of a drug treatment requirement. Subsection (2) indicates that subject to certain specified types of treatment listed in subsection (3) the nature of the treatment is not to be specified. The person who treats or directs the treatment of the offender (subsection 4) must be appropriately qualified or experienced. Subsection (5) states that the specified period must not be longer than the period of the supervision requirement. Subsection (6) requires the court to satisfy itself before imposing a drug treatment requirement that a) the offender is dependent on drugs or misuses drugs, which are defined b) his/her condition may be treatable and c) arrangements exist for the offender’s treatment. Subsection (7) defines “specified”.

54. Section 227V(1) specifies the purpose of an alcohol treatment requirement. Subsection (2) indicates that subject to certain specified types of treatment listed in subsection (3) the nature of the treatment is not to be specified. The person who treats or directs the treatment of the offender (subsection 4) must be appropriately qualified or experienced. Subsection (5) states that the specified period must not be longer than the period of the supervision requirement. Subsection (6) requires the court to satisfy itself before imposing an alcohol treatment requirement that a) the offender is dependent on alcohol, b) his/her condition may be treatable and c) arrangements exist for the offender’s treatment. Subsection (7) defines “specified”.

55. Section 227W sets out the arrangements for periodic review of CPOs. When the court makes a CPO, subsection (1) provides for it to be reviewed at the time or times stated in the Order. Such reviews are to be referred to as “progress reviews”(subsection 2). Subsection (3) allows progress reviews to be carried out by the court which made the CPO or by the appropriate court and subsection (4) for the manner of the review to be determined by the court. Subsection (5) places a responsibility on the responsible officer to the court with a written report before a progress review takes place and subsection (6) a responsibility on the offender to attend each such review. Where he/she fails to attend the progress review, subsection (7) provides for the court to (a) issue a citation for the offender’s attendance or (b) a warrant for his/her arrest. Subsection (8) defines the citation provisions. Subsection (9) provides for the court to vary, revoke or discharge the CPO on conclusion of a progress review.
56. Section 227X provides for application by the offender or the responsible officer to vary, revoke or discharge a CPO.

57. Section 227Y(1) applies where a court proposes to vary, revoke or discharge a CPO following a periodic review, application by offender or responsible officer. Subsection (2) provides that the court can only revoke, vary or discharge the order where it is in the interests of justice to do so, having regard to the circumstances following the start of the order. Subsection (3) and (4) set out the options available to the court in considering variation of the order. Subsection (5) provides that where the court proposes to extend the period or time limit specified in the requirement this cannot be longer than the overall maximum period or limit allowable for such a requirement. Subsection (6) applies the same principles set out in subsection (5) to an unpaid work and activity requirement.

58. Subsection (7) provides that where the court varies a restricted movement requirement, a copy of the variation order must be provided to the responsible officer. Subsection (8) allows the court when revoking an order to deal with the offender as it could if the order had not been made. Where the court proposes to vary, revoke or discharge the order, other than on the application of the offender, subsection (9) provides that it must issue a citation requiring the offender to appear before the court. Where the offender fails to appear as cited, subsection (10) allows a warrant for his/her arrest to be issued by the court. Subsection (11) defines the unified citation provisions.

59. Section 227Z(1) and (2) require the court when considering varying a CPO to first obtain a report from the responsible officer. Subsection (3) indicates who is to be provided with a copy of the report. Subsection (4) sets out that when varying the order the court must explain in ordinary language to the offender (a) the purpose and effect of each of the proposed varied requirements, (b) the consequences of non-compliance and (c) any variations to progress review arrangements. Subsection (5) requires confirmation from the offender that he/she understands the variations and is willing to comply with each of them.

60. Where the variation imposes a new requirement, subsection (6) sets out that (a) the court cannot a new requirement which was not available at the point of imposition of the order and (b) where a new requirement is permissible undertake the necessary steps which would have applied had it been imposed at the outset. Subsection (7) reinforces the need for the court to vary a requirement, which would not have been permissible at the point of imposition of the order.

61. Section 227ZA applies to situations where the offender (a) proposes to change, or has changed address within a different local authority to that specified in the order and (b) an application to vary the order to specify the new address has been made to the appropriate court. The court (subsection (2)) may only vary the order as proposed if arrangement exist in the new local authority area for the offender to comply with the order’s requirements. Subsection (3) requires the new local authority to nominate one of its officer’s to be the responsible officer for the order.

62. Section 227ZB details the procedures and powers of the court in dealing with cases where the offender has failed to comply with the terms and conditions of a CPO and is considered to be in breach of the order. Subsections (1) to (4) set out the procedures for bringing cases to court, included issue of citations and warrants as required. Subsections (5) to (10) set out the options available to the court in dealing with cases where breach of an order has been admitted or proven. Subsection (6) indicates that where a court decides to vary the order to by imposing a new requirement this can include a restricted movement requirement.

63. Subsection (7) requires the court when imposing a restricted movement requirement to also make a supervision requirement if one is not already in place. Subsection (8) requires the restricted movement contractor to be provided with a copy of any such requirement. Subsection (9) restricts the maximum period of a restricted movement requirement to the remaining period of any existing supervision requirement or a maximum 12 months period, whichever is the lesser.

64. Subsection (10) requires the contractor supervising the restricted movement requirement to report any failure in compliance to the responsible officer. Subsection (11) requires the responsible to report incidents of failure of compliance to the court.

65. Section 227ZC details supplementary requirements in respect of evidence and penalties related to dealing with breaches of CPOs. Subsections (1) and (2) set out the custodial terms that different courts can impose for breach of a level 1 CPO. Subsection (3) provides for the evidence of one witness to be sufficient to evidence proof of breach of an order. Subsections (4) and (5) detail the evidence required to prove a breach of an order in respect of a requirement to pay compensation. Subsection (6) requires the court in dealing with cases of alleged breach to obtain a report from the responsible officer on the offender’s compliance during the order.

66. Section 227ZD defines a restricted movement requirement (RMR) which can be imposed as a requirement of a community payback order for failure to comply with that order (see section 227ZB(5)(c) and (6)) and replicates some of the provisions of section 245A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 in respect of the requirements of the RMR.

67. Subsection (2) provides that the RMR may require an offender to remain at a specified address, and/or away from a specified address during certain specified periods. Subsection (3) restricts the requirement to remain at a certain address to 12 hours in any one day. Subsection (4) restricts the maximum duration of an RMR to 12 months. Subsection (6) empowers Scottish Ministers to amend by regulation the maximum periods specified in subsections (3) and (4)(b). The regulations would follow the affirmative procedure. Subsection (5) requires the court to specify the method of compliance and the person responsible for monitoring that compliance on the RMR. Subsections (6) and (7) provide for the Scottish Ministers to prescribe by regulation changes to the restrictions set out in subsections (3) and (4). Subsection (8) defines “specified” for the purposes of the section.

68. Section 227ZE further replicates some of the provisions of section 245A of the 1995 Act in respect of requirements placed on the court. Subsection (1) requires the court to be satisfied that compliance with the RMR can be monitored in the way specified in the order – which will be by way of remote (electronic) monitoring. Failure to be satisfied means that the RMR cannot be imposed. Subsections (2) and (3) require the court to obtain a report from the local authority, usually the social work service about the specified address and the views of the people staying at that address who are likely to be affected by the enforced presence of the offender. The court may hear from the report writer if required before imposing the RMR.

69. Section 227ZF provides for the court to consider an application from the offender to vary the terms of the RMR to change the specified address. Before agreeing to the variation the court must consider a report as detailed in section 227ZE above.

70. Section 227ZG applies section 245C of the 1995 Act (remote monitoring of compliance with restriction of liberty orders) to remote monitoring requirements. In particular this provides for the Scottish Ministers to make arrangements, including contractual arrangements, to remotely monitor compliance with RMRs and to specify by regulation the devices which may be used in remote monitoring. It also provides that an offender made subject to an RMR will be required to wear a device to enable such remote monitoring and should not tamper with or damage the devices used for remote monitoring.

71. Section 227ZH makes various provisions with respect to the functions of the Scottish Ministers, replicating some provisions from section 245A and 245B of the 1995 Act.

72. Subsections (1) to (3) provide for the Scottish Ministers to prescribe by regulation the court or classes of courts which may impose RMRs, the method of monitoring which may be used to monitor compliance with the RMR and the class of offender who may be made subject to an RMR. These regulations follow the negative resolution procedure.

73. Subsections (4) and (5) require the Scottish Ministers to determine the person or persons responsible for monitoring compliance with the RMR and provides for different persons to be determined for different methods of monitoring. In practice, this is likely to be the company contracted to provide the remote monitoring service as referred to in section 227ZG.

74. Subsections (6) to (8) require the Scottish Ministers to advise the court of who is responsible for monitoring compliance with the RMR, enabling the court to specify this on the order. These subsections also require Scottish Ministers to advise the courts if there is any change in the persons responsible for monitoring compliance, and for those courts to subsequently vary the RMR to specify the new responsible persons, to send a copy of the varied order to the new responsible person and to notify the offender of the variation.

75. Section 227ZI details the documentary evidence required in order to establish in any proceedings (most likely in breach proceedings) whether the offender has complied with the RMR. It provides that a document produced by the device specified in section 245C of the 1995 Act, as applied by section 227ZG (in practice the remote monitoring system), certificated by a person nominated by the Scottish Ministers that the statement provides information on the presence or otherwise of the offender at the specified address at the date and times shown on that document is sufficient evidence of the facts.

76. Section 227ZJ(1) requires local authorities to consult prescribed persons annually about the nature of the unpaid work and other activities to be undertaken as part of a CPO within their areas. Subsection (2) defines “prescribed persons” as such persons or class or class of persons as prescribed by Scottish Ministers by regulations.

77. Section 227ZK provides definition of the term “the appropriate court” as used in relation to the provisions for the CPO.

Section 15 – Non-harassment orders

78. Section 234A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the Act”), enables a prosecutor to apply for a non-harassment order against a person convicted of an offence involving harassment towards a victim. This section makes changes to the Act to make it less onerous for prosecutors to apply for an order.

79. Subsection (a) changes the test in section 234A(1) of the Act so that an order may be applied for where a person is convicted of an offence involving misconduct towards a victim. Misconduct is defined (as per the substituted definition at subsection (d)) as including “conduct that causes alarm or distress”. This is a lower threshold than the existing reference to ‘harassment’ of the victim and will remove the need for the accused to have been convicted of an offence which in itself involved conduct on more than one occasion. It will allow criminal non-harassment orders to be considered in a greater number of cases.

80. Subsection (b) makes an associated change so that an order can be made to prevent harassment rather than merely any ‘further harassment’ therefore giving the court powers to protect victims at an earlier stage.

81. Subsection (c) inserts new subsections (2A), (2B) and (2C) into section 234A. New subsection (2A)(a) allows the court to have regard to information on other offences which involved misconduct towards the victim which the offender has been convicted of or has accepted a fixed penalty or compensation offer or work order for under sections 302(1), 302A(1) and 303ZA(6) of the 1995 Act.

82. New subsection (2A)(b) sets out the way in which the information can be given to the court and will allow the court to see the relevant details of previous convictions (rather than simply a list of previous convictions as they currently do) when deliberating on an application for a non-harassment order. This is to enable a court to have fuller details of the past offending behaviour of a person.

83. New subsection (2B) limits the court’s right to have regard to this information in accordance with the existing rules on previous convictions, offers or orders set out in sections 101, 101A (solemn proceedings) and 166 and 166A (summary proceedings) of the 1995 Act. New subsection (2C) requires the court to give the offender the opportunity to respond to the application for a non-harassment order.

84. Subsection (d) substitutes a new subsection (7) relating to definitions.
Section 16 - Short periods of detention

85. Section 169 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 permits summary courts to detain offenders at court or a police station until 8pm in lieu of imprisonment, so long as the offender can get home that day. As this section is not used and has been redundant for some time, it is being repealed.

86. Section 206(1) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 provides that a summary court cannot impose imprisonment for a period of less than five days. The time period for imposing imprisonment is being extended from less than “five days” to less than “fifteen days”. Subsections (2) to (6) permit summary courts to sentence an offender to be detained in a certified police cell or similar place for up to four days. As there are no such certified police cells in Scotland, and have not been any for some time, subsections (2) to (6) are redundant and are therefore being repealed.

Section 17 - Presumption against short periods of imprisonment or detention

87. This section amends the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 so that a court should not sentence a person to a period of imprisonment not exceeding six months unless it considers that no other method of dealing with the person is appropriate. If the court is of the opinion that no other method of dealing with the offender is appropriate, other than imposing a sentence not exceeding six months, then the court must give its reasons for that opinion. The court must enter those reasons in the record of proceedings.

88. Subsection (3) deals with sentencing of children, and provides that where the court sentences a child to a period of detention of six months or less, then it must state its reasons for the opinion that no other method of dealing with the child is appropriate and enter those reasons in the record of proceedings.

Section 18 - Amendments of Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007

89. Part 2 of the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007 (“2007 Act”) deals with the confinement and release of prisoners. These provisions of the 2007 Act have not yet been commenced. Section 18 makes amendments to a number of statutory provisions in the 2007 Act to change the framework relating to the release of prisoners from custody.

90. Subsections (2) and (3) repeal the provisions providing for custody-only sentences and prisoners in the 2007 Act and make provision for a new type of sentence called a short-term custody and community sentence. A short-term custody and community sentence is a sentence of imprisonment for less than the period prescribed in an order made by the Scottish Ministers. A custody and community sentence is a sentence of imprisonment for at the least the period prescribed by the Scottish Ministers in an order. For example a short-term custody and community sentence may be a sentence of imprisonment for less than one year and a custody and community sentence a sentence of imprisonment for a year or more. A prisoner serving a short-term custody and community sentence (a “short-term custody and community prisoner”) is released after he or she has served one-half of his or her sentence of imprisonment and is released on licence for the remainder of the sentence. Subsection (2) also makes provision for the order making power prescribing the period sentence of imprisonment that determines a short-term custody and community sentence and a custody and community sentence is subject to the affirmative resolution procedure.

91. Subsection (4) makes a consequential amendment to the chapter title in Chapter 3 of Part 2 of the 2007 Act so that it refers to short-term custody and community prisoners.

92. Subsection (5) amends section 29 of the 2007 Act to require the Scottish Ministers to include supervision conditions in a prisoner’s licence where the prisoner being released (other than one liable to removal from the United Kingdom) falls into the following categories: a life prisoner; a custody and community prisoner; a short-term custody and community prisoner released on compassionate grounds, a short-term custody and community prisoner subject to an extended sentence, a short-term custody and community prisoner who is a sex offender and is serving 6 months or more, or short-term custody and community prisoner who is a child.

93. Subsection (6) inserts a new provision relating to the licence conditions to which a short-term custody and community prisoner is to be subject to. The Scottish Ministers must include the standard conditions in the licence. The Scottish Ministers must also include the supervision conditions in the licence if the prisoner is a person to whom section 29(1) of the 2007 Act applies i.e. a prisoner released on compassionate grounds; a prisoner serving an extended sentence; a sex offender serving 6 months or more; or a child sentenced to detention. The Scottish Ministers may include other licence conditions if they consider this appropriate.

94. Subsection (7) inserts a new provision for the assessment of conditions for short-term community licences (the licence that a short-term custody and community prisoner is released on). The Scottish Ministers and local authorities are required to put in place joint working arrangements in relation the assessment and management of the risks posed by short-term custody and community prisoners. In deciding whether to include non-mandatory supervision conditions in a short-term community licence for a particular prisoner, the Scottish Ministers and the appropriate local authority must jointly assess whether any of such conditions are appropriate.

95. The appropriate local authority is defined as either the local authority in whose area the offender resided immediately prior to being sentenced or the local authority in whose area the offender intends to reside in upon his or her release on licence.

96. Subsection (8) amends section 47 of the 2007 Act to provide that Scottish Ministers may release, on a curfew licence, a short-term custody and community prisoner who is serving a sentence of 3 months or more and is of a description to be specified by the Ministers by order. Such an order is subject to the affirmative resolution procedure. Section 47(3) of the 2007 Act provides that the curfew licence must include a curfew condition, which is described in section 48 of the 2007 Act.

97. Subsection (8)(c) amends section 47 of the 2007 Act to specify the period during which a short-term custody and community prisoner may be released on a curfew licence. The Scottish Ministers may only release a short-term custody and community prisoner on curfew licence after the later of: the day on which the prisoner has served one-quarter or four weeks of the sentence (whichever is the greater), or the day falling 166 days before the expiry of one-half of the sentence. In addition, release must be before the day falling 14 days before the expiry of one-half of the sentence. So the window for release on curfew licence is between 166 days and 14 days before the expiry of one-half of the sentence so long as the prisoner has served at least one-quarter (or 4 weeks if this is more than one quarter) of his or her sentence at the proposed time of release.

98. Subsection (8)(e) amends section 47(8) of the 2007 Act to provide that a curfew licence for a short-term custody and community prisoner remains in force until the expiry of the first half of that prisoner’s sentence.

99. Paragraphs 2 to 5 of Schedule 1 make consequential amendments to sections 34, 35, 36, 37, 40 and 42 of the 2007 Act.

100. Paragraph 6 of Schedule 1 inserts a new section 42A into the 2007 Act. Section 42A applies where the Parole Board considers under section 42(3) of the 2007 Act that it is in the public interest that a recalled short-term custody and community prisoner be confined. The parole Board are required to provide the prisoner with the reasons for its determination in writing. If there is less than 4 months of the prisoner’s sentence remaining, the prisoner must remain in custody for the remainder of the sentence. If there are between 4 months and 2 years of the prisoner’s sentence remaining, the Board must fix a date when it will next review the prisoner’s case within the period mentioned in section 42A(5). Section 42A(5) specifies that the period begins 4 months after the date of the determination and ends on the expiry of the prisoner’s sentence. Subparagraph (6) provides that if no date is set under section 42A(4) the prisoner must remain in prison to the end of the sentence.

101. Section 42A(7) of the 2007 Act provides that if at least 2 years remain of the short-term custody and community prisoner’s sentence then the Parole Board must, subject to section 26, fix a date for when it will next hear the prisoner’s case within the period mentioned in section 42A(8). Section 42A(8) provides that the period begins 4 months after the date of the determination and ends immediately before the second anniversary of the determination. Section 42A(9) requires Scottish Ministers to refer the case to the Parole Board before any date set by the Parole Board under section 42A(4) or (7).

102. Paragraphs 7 to 14 of Schedule 1 make consequential amendments to sections 45, 46, 51, 55, 56 and Schedules 2 and 3 of the 2007 Act. Paragraphs 15 to 17 make minor consequential amendments to sections 167 and 210A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995.

Section 19 – Early removal of certain short-term prisoners from the United Kingdom

103. This section substitutes a new version of Schedule 6 to the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007 (“2007 Act”). The Schedule contains transitory amendments to Part 1 of the Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Act 1993 (“1993 Act”), which will have effect until the 1993 Act is repealed by the 2007 Act. Paragraph 3(a) replicates the effect of the existing version of Schedule 6.

104. Paragraph 4 inserts three new sections, 9A to 9C, into the 1993 Act. Inserted section 9A provides for a definition of prisoners who are eligible for but not liable to removal from the UK.
In order to be eligible for removal, a prisoner must be able to satisfy the Scottish Ministers that he or she has the settled intention of residing permanently outside the UK if removed from prison. If satisfied, the Scottish Ministers may release the prisoner from prison using the power under inserted section 9B.

105. Inserted section 9B provides the Scottish Ministers with a discretionary power to release short-term prisoners who are liable to or eligible for removal from the UK. This power may be exercised at any time during the 180 day period before the prisoner will have served one-half of their sentence, provided that the prisoner has already served at least one-quarter of his or her sentence. This corresponds to the existing time limits for Home Detention Curfew in the 1993 Act (inserted by the Management of Offenders etc. (Scotland) Act 2005). The Scottish Ministers also have the power to amend the 180 day period, up or down, by means of an order subject to approval by the Scottish Parliament.

106. Inserted section 9B(3) sets out conditions that must be satisfied before a prisoner can be removed from prison under the powers conferred by this section. If a prisoner removed under this section remains in the UK but has not been returned to prison, subsection 9B(4) enables the Scottish Ministers to exercise their duties and powers under sections 1(1), 1AA or 3 of the 1993 Act in relation to the prisoner as if the prisoner were in prison (i.e. duty to release the prisoner after serving one half of the sentence, and the power to release on compassionate grounds).

107. Inserted section 9C provides for the detention and/or further removal of a person who re-enters the UK within a certain time after being released from prison under section 9B.

Section 20 - Reports about supervised persons

109. This section amends section 203 of the 1995 Act (reports) to provide that where a local authority officer makes a report to the court to assist in deciding on the most appropriate sentence, a copy requires to be given to the offender, the offender’s solicitor (if any) and the prosecutor.

Section 21 - Extended sentences for certain sexual offences

110. Under the provisions of section 86(1) of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, which inserted section 210A into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, the court is able to impose an “extended sentence” on an offender who is convicted of a relevant sexual or violent offence in circumstances where the offender would, but for the extended sentence, receive a determinate sentence of imprisonment of any length in respect of a sexual offence or a sentence of 4 years or more in respect of a violent offence.

111. Imposition of an extended sentence provides for an additional period of supervision on licence in the community over and above that which would normally have been the case. An extended sentence may only be passed in indictment cases and if the court is of the opinion that the period of supervision on licence, which the offender would otherwise be subject to, would not be adequate for the protection of the public from serious harm from the offender.

112. An extended sentence is defined, by subsection (2) of section 210A, as being the aggregate of the term of imprisonment which the court would otherwise have passed ("the custodial term") and a further period, known as the "extension period", for which the offender is to be on licence (and which is in addition to any licence period attributable to the "custodial term"). The extension period shall not exceed 10 years (though subsection (5) provides that the total length of an extended sentence shall not exceed any statutory maximum for a particular offence).

113. The following example demonstrates how the extended sentence arrangements currently work in practice (i.e. from the implementation of section 15 of the Management of Offenders etc. (Scotland) Act 2005 in February 2006 which provided for sex offenders sentenced to more than 6 months in custody to be released on licence).

- Example - An offender sentenced to 3 years custodial term and 3 years extension period would be released after serving 18 months in prison but will be on licence for the balance of the custodial period ie. 18 months plus a further 3 years = 4 years and six months in total on licence.

114. Section 210A provides a definition of "sexual offence", which takes the form of listed offences, either under statute or at common law. It also defines "violent offence".

115. The new provision will allow courts in appropriate circumstances, to impose an extended sentence where a person is convicted of an offence which discloses, in the court’s opinion, a significant sexual aspect to the offender’s behaviour but which is not otherwise covered by the current definitions of "sexual offence" and "violent offence".

116. Schedule 3 to the Sexual Offences Act 2003, lists at paragraphs 36-59 the sexual offences in Scotland in relation to which the notification requirements under that Act apply. Paragraph 60 includes "an offence in Scotland other than those mentioned in paragraphs 36 to 59 if the Court, in imposing sentence or otherwise disposing of the case, determines for the purposes of this paragraph that there was a significant sexual aspect to the offender’s behaviour in committing the offence".

117. The new provision will remedy the current absence of a power for the courts to impose an extended sentence in such cases by adding a further “catch all” category to the list of offences, but this will be dependent on the offender being subject, by virtue of Schedule 3 to the Sexual Offences Act 2003, to the notification requirements of Part 2 of that Act.

Section 22 - Effect of probation and absolute discharge

118. This section makes amendments to a number of statutory provisions in order to remove unnecessary references to probation orders and to ensure that probation orders and orders for absolute discharge are treated appropriately in the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005.
119. Subsection (1) amends section 1(4) of the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974 to update references to statutory provisions which have now been consolidated twice. There is no change to the effect of the sections, and the amendment simply makes the section easier to read.

120. Subsections (2) and (3) remove redundant references to probation orders in sections 49(6) and 58(3) of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982.

121. Subsection (4) inserts a new subsection (2A) into section 96 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005. This will ensure that the court can make an exclusion order when dealing with a person who has been convicted of a violent offence and placed on probation. It displaces section 247(1), which would otherwise provide that the person would not be treated as having been convicted.

122. Subsection (5) inserts new subsections (5) and (6) into section 129 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 and specifies a number of provisions to which sections 247(1) and (2) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 do not apply. The purpose is to ensure that probation orders and orders for absolute discharge are treated as convictions for the purposes of these provisions of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005.

Section 23 - Offences aggravated by prejudice

123. Section 96 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 (“the 1998 Act”) created a statutory aggravation relating to race requiring that the court shall, on convicting a person of an offence, take the aggravation into account in determining the appropriate sentence.

124. In a similar vein, section 74 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003 (“the 2003 Act”) created a statutory aggravation relating to religion requiring that the court shall, on convicting a person of an offence, take the aggravation into account in determining the appropriate sentence.

125. This section amends both the 1998 Act and the 2003 Act to require that the courts record how an aggravation has affected a sentence (if at all) and to ensure consistency between the statutory provisions.

126. Subsection (1) substitutes subsection (5) of section 96 of the 1998 Act. This requires that, where an aggravation relating to prejudice is proved, the court must also explain how the aggravation has affected the sentence (if at all – and if not, then the reasons for this) and record the conviction in a manner which shows that the offence was aggravated by prejudice related to race.

127. Subsection (2)(a) inserts a new subsection (2A) into section 74 of the 2003 Act. This provides that the aggravation can apply even if prejudice relating to religion is not the sole motivation for the offence. This is already the case for racial aggravations and therefore ensures consistency between the two provisions.

128. Subsection (2)(b) replaces subsections (3) and (4) of section 74 of the 2003 Act with subsection (4A), which requires that, where an aggravation relating to prejudice is proved, the court must explain how the aggravation has affected the sentence (if at all – and if not, then the reasons for this) and record the conviction in a manner which shows that the offence was aggravated by prejudice related to religion.

Section 24 - Voluntary intoxication by alcohol: effect in sentencing

129. This section provides that, at the point of sentence, the Court must not consider it a mitigating factor that the offender was voluntarily intoxicated at the time the offence was committed.

PART 2 - CRIMINAL LAW

Section 25 – Involvement in serious organised crime

130. Section 25(1) makes it an offence for a person to agree with at least one other person to become involved in the commission of serious organised crime. The effect is that those who conspire to commit serious organised crime, as defined, are guilty of an offence.

131. Section 25(2) defines serious organised crime for the purpose of this section and sections 26, 27 and 28 as crime involving two or more people acting together for the principal purpose of committing or conspiring to commit one or more serious offences.

132. A “serious offence” is also defined in subsection (2). It is an indictable offence that is committed with the intention of securing material benefit for any person or a serious act of violence committed for the purpose of securing such benefit at some time in the future.

133. Section 25(3) provides that this offence will attract a maximum penalty on indictment of 10 years imprisonment, an unlimited fine or both. In summary proceedings the available penalties are a maximum of 12 months imprisonment or a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or both.

Section 26 – Offences aggravated by connection with serious organised crime

134. Section 26 makes provision about a statutory aggravation which applies in cases where an accused commits an offence connected with serious organised crime. Subsection (1) provides that section 26 applies where an indictment or complaint libels or specifies that an offence is aggravated by a connection with serious organised crime and it is subsequently proved that the offence is aggravated in that way.

135. Section 26(2) explains the circumstances in which an offence can be regarded to have been aggravated by a connection with serious organised crime. This relies on proof that the accused was motivated, in whole or in part, by the objective of committing or conspiring to commit serious organised crime. In terms of subsection (3), it is not material to the matter of establishing the accused’s motivation whether or not the accused actually enabled a person to commit serious organised crime (as defined in section 25(2)).

136. Section 26(4) specifies that the normal rules on corroboration in criminal proceedings do not apply to establishing the aggravation. Evidence from a single source is sufficient proof.
Section 26(5) sets out the steps the court must take when it is libelled in an indictment or specified in a complaint that an offence is aggravated by a connection with serious organised crime and proved that the offence is so aggravated. In addition to a number of formal matters, the court must take the aggravation into account in determining the appropriate sentence.

Section 27 – Directing serious organised crime

Section 27(1) makes it an offence to direct another person to commit a serious offence (as defined in section 25(2)) or an offence aggravated by a connection with serious organised crime under section 26.

Section 27(2) provides that a person also commits an offence where the direction he or she gives is to direct a further person to commit a serious offence or an offence aggravated by a connection with serious organised crime.

Section 27(3) and (7) set out what constitutes direction for the purposes of subsections (1) and (2). First, by virtue of section 27(3), the accused must have done something, or a series of things, to direct another person to commit an offence. Second, the accused must have intended that the thing or things done will persuade that person to commit an offence. And third, the accused must intend that the direction will result in a person committing or enable a person to commit serious organised crime. Section 27(7) provides that “directing” a person to commit an offence includes, but is not limited to, “inciting” a person to commit an offence.

Section 27(4) deals with the matter of proving the accused’s intention under section 27(3)(b) and (c). That intention may reasonably be inferred from the context in which the steps taken by the accused to direct another person to commit an offence were taken.

Section 27(5), any person directing a person to commit an offence mentioned in section 27(1) will be deemed to have done so regardless of whether that offence was in fact committed.

Section 27(6) makes provision about when a direction is to be treated as having been done in Scotland such that it comes within the jurisdiction of the Scottish courts. Where a message containing a direction is either sent or received in Scotland, the direction is to be treated as having been done in Scotland.

Section 27(8) deals with penalties. The penalty for the offences in subsections (1) and (2) when tried on indictment is a maximum of 14 years imprisonment, a fine or both. On summary conviction, the available penalties are a maximum of 12 months imprisonment, a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or both.

Section 28 – Failure to report serious organised crime

Section 28 places certain classes of individual under a duty to report to the police any knowledge or suspicion of another person’s involvement in serious organised crime. It is an offence for an individual under such a duty to fail to disclose that knowledge or suspicion.
146. Subsections (1) and (2) describe the circumstances in which section 28 applies. Subsection (1) provides that this section applies where a person knows or suspects that another person has committed an offence under section 25 or 27 or an offence aggravated under section 26 in cases where that knowledge or suspicion arises from information obtained in one of two sets of circumstances, namely: (a) in the course of a person’s trade, profession, business or employment or (b) as a result of a close personal relationship between the person holding the knowledge or suspicion and the person who has allegedly committed the offences. By virtue of subsection (2), section 28 only applies by virtue of a close personal relationship where the person holding the knowledge or suspicion has derived material benefit as a result of the commission of serious organised crime by the alleged offender.

147. Section 28(3) describes the offence. It provides that where this section applies it is an offence to fail to disclose to a constable any knowledge or suspicion described above and the information on which that is based.

148. Section 28(4) provides that it will be a defence to prove that the accused had a reasonable excuse for failing to disclose a knowledge or suspicion or the information on which it is based.

149. Subsections (5) and (6) provide that disclosure is not required by a professional legal adviser in relation to information they have received in privileged circumstances and set out what is meant by “privileged circumstances”.

150. Section 28(7) makes it clear that the reference to a constable in subsection (3) includes a reference to a police member of the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency.

151. The penalty for failing to report serious organised crime is stated in subsection (8) to be a maximum of five years imprisonment, a fine or both in proceedings tried on indictment or a maximum of 12 months imprisonment or a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or both on summary conviction.

Section 29 – Articles banned in prison

152. This section amends section 41 of the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1989 (“the 1989 Act”) to create additional specific offences in relation to the introduction, use and possession of a personal communication device (including a mobile telephone and any component part of a mobile telephone) in prisons. In addition, it provides a definition of “proscribed article” and “personal communication device”, for the purpose of this section, and inserts further provisions which define the maximum penalty that can be imposed for the introduction, use or possession of personal communication device in a prison, and provide limited circumstances where it is not an offence to have committed such an act.

153. Subsection (1)(a) substitutes section 41(1) of the 1989 Act, and provides that it is an offence for a person to introduce or attempt to introduce a “proscribed article” in a prison, without a reasonable excuse. It also provides that the maximum penalty that can be imposed for introducing or attempting to introduce a proscribed article (other than a personal communication device) into a prison is, on summary conviction, a period of imprisonment not exceeding 30 days, or a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale (or both).
154. Subsections (1)(b)-(e) make minor consequential amendments to sections 41(2), 41(2A), 41(2B) and 41(3) of the 1989 Act.

155. Subsection (1)(f) inserts two new subsections after section 41(9). The new subsection (9A) provides a definition of “proscribed article” and the new subsection (9B) provides a definition of what a personal communication device includes.

156. Subsection (1)(g) updates the definition of “offensive weapon” in section 41(10) of the 1989 Act, by substituting the reference to the Prevention of Crime Act 1953 with a reference to the definition contained in section 47 of the Criminal Law (Consolidation)(Scotland) Act 1995.

157. Subsection (2) inserts two new sections after section 41 of the 1989 Act in relation to personal communication devices; sections 41ZA and 41ZB.

158. The new sections 41ZA(1)-(3) provides that it is an offence for a person to: Give a personal communication device to a prisoner while the prisoner is inside a prison; transmit or intentionally receive any communication by means of a personal communication device in a prison; or be in possession of a personal communication device while inside a prison.

159. Offences in section 41ZA(1)-(3) are, on indictment, a period of imprisonment not exceeding two years, or a fine, or both; or, in summary proceedings, a period of imprisonment not exceeding 12 months, or to a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum, or both.

160. The new section 41ZB provides a number of exceptions in relation to communication devices. In particular, subsections (1) and (2) of section 41AB provide that it will not be an offence to introduce, use or possess a personal communication device in a designated area of a prison, or where the person has received written authorisation from the governor, director of a prison, or the Scottish Ministers.

161. Subsections (3) and (4) of section 41ZB provide that it will not be an offence for a prison officer (or other prison official) to introduce, use or possess a personal communication device if the device is one supplied to the person specifically for use in the course of the person’s official duties at the prison, or the person is acting in accordance with those duties.

162. Subsection (5) of section 41ZB provides that no offence is committed by a person, other than a prisoner, where there is a reasonable excuse for the possession. A prisoner would not have a reasonable excuse, given that personal communication devices are not permitted in prisons and they are asked as part of the reception process whether or not they have any proscribed articles on their possession.

163. Subsections (6) and (7) of section 41ZB provide that it is a defence for a person accused of introducing, using or possessing a personal communication device in a prison to show that the person reasonably believed that the person was acting with authorisation or in circumstances where there was an overriding public interest which justified the person’s actions. For example, where an individual from the emergency service had to access the prison with a communication device.

device, in an emergency situation, and there was insufficient time for the individual to receive written authorisation.

164. Subsection (8) of section 41ZB provides the circumstances where written authorisation is given. In particular it provides that written authorisation should be provided in favour of a specified person (or person of a specified description), or for a specified purpose. Written authorisation is given either by the governor or director of the prison (in relation to activities at that prison), or the Scottish Ministers (in relation to activities at a prison specified in the authorisation).

165. Subsection (9) of section 41ZB provides the definition of a designated part of a prison, where it is not an offence to introduce, use or possess a personal communication device. This is necessary because it is not illegal to use or possess a personal communication device in the community. It is not the intention to penalise a person for entering an administrative area or other designated area of a prison with a personal communication device. It should only be an offence to introduce, use or possess a personal communication device beyond the designated part of a prison i.e. in the secure part of the establishment.

166. Subsection (10) of section 41ZB provides that prison officers or other prison officials who are crown servants or agents do not benefit from Crown immunity in relation to an offence of introducing, using or possessing a personal communication device in a prison. This is to ensure that the personal communication devices are only permitted in prisons in limited circumstances e.g. with authorisation.

Section 30 - Sale and hire of crossbows to persons under 18

167. The Crossbows Act 1987 controls the sale and hire of crossbows and this section introduces new provisions to that Act. Subsection (3) introduces a new section 1A to achieve consistency with the proof of age provisions of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 by clarifying the defences a person charged with selling an article to someone underage can rely upon. Subsection (4) introduces a new section 3A which has the effect of legalising an attempt to purchase or hire a crossbow by a young person, where the young person is acting as part of an authorised test purchasing scheme. It also makes provision to ensure the safety of young people participating in such a scheme. These provisions bring the Act into line with the test purchasing provisions of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005.

Section 31 - Sale and hire of knives and certain other articles to persons under 18

168. Section 141A of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 controls the sale of knives and certain articles with a blade or point to under 18s. Subsections (2) and (3) amend the Act to close a gap in the law relating to the hiring of a knife or bladed article to an under 18. Subsection (4) amends the proof of age provisions of section 141A to ensure consistency with the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 by clarifying the defences a person charged with selling an article to someone underage can rely upon.
Section 32 - Certain sexual offences by non-natural persons

169. This section makes amendments to the Protection of Children and Prevention of Sexual Offences (Scotland) Act 2005. Subsection (2) broadens the range of penalties available for offences under sections 9(4)(b), 9(5)(b), 10(2)(b), 11(2)(b) and 12(2)(b) of the 2005 Act to include an unlimited fine. Consequently, a person found guilty of an offence on indictment under sections 9 to 12 of the 2005 Act, may be liable to an unlimited fine and/or imprisonment for up to 7 years in the case of offences to which section 9(4)(b) relate or, for the other relevant offences, for up to 14 years.

170. Subsection (3) inserts a new section 14A into the 2005 Act. Inserted section 14A provides that, where an offence under sections 10, 11 or 12 of the 2005 Act is committed by a body corporate (such as a company), a Scottish partnership, or an unincorporated association, certain officers of the body or other persons purporting to act in such a capacity may in certain circumstances be held to have committed the offence and will be liable to prosecution as well as the body.

Section 33 - Indecent images of children

171. This section extends the provisions of sections 52 and 52A of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 (“the 1982 Act”) to make it an offence to take, make, distribute, show, publish or possess etc. derivatives of indecent photographs or pseudo-photographs such as line traced and computer traced images. It also extends Schedule 1 to the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (Offences Against Children Under the Age of 17 Years to which Special Provisions Apply) to include pseudo-photographs and amends Schedule 3 to the Sexual Offences Act 2003 (Sexual offences for the purposes of Part 2 of that Act) in relation to derivatives of indecent photographs or pseudo-photographs.

172. Subsection (1)(a)(i) amends section 52(2C)(b) of the 1982 Act to make clear that indecent pseudo-photographs include data capable of conversion into a pseudo-photograph only where that conversion would result in an indecent image.

173. Subsection (1)(a)(ii) amends section 52 of the 1982 Act by the insertion of new subsections (9) and (10). Section 52(9) extends the definition of “photograph” to cover derivatives of photographs or pseudo-photographs or combinations of these. For example, it includes a computer tracing which is neither a photograph nor a pseudo-photograph but is derived from one. Section 52(10) provides that subsection 52(2B) applies to such derivatives in the same way that it applies to pseudo-photographs.

174. Subsection (2) amends paragraph 2B of Schedule 1 to the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, which lists offences against children under the age of 17 to which special provisions apply. Paragraph 2B, which concerns offences under sections 52 and 52A of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982, is amended to include offences involving indecent pseudo-photographs, as well as indecent photographs of a child under the age of 17 years.
175. Subsection (3) amends Schedule 3 to the Sexual Offences Act 2003, which lists sexual offences for the purposes of Part 2 of that Act. Part 2 of the 2003 Act makes provision for relevant offenders to be subject to the notification requirements set out in that Part of that Act.

176. Subsection (3)(a) amends paragraph 44 of Schedule 3 to the Sexual Offences Act 2003 which relates to offences under section 170 of the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979 (concerning the penalty for the fraudulent evasion of duty etc.) in relation to goods which are prohibited from being imported where they included indecent photographs of children under 16. So as to provide consistency with the entries in the Schedule relating to offences in the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 concerning the making, possessing &c of such indecent images, the entry is amended to provide that it applies only where the offender is 18 or over, or is or has been sentenced to at least 12 months imprisonment, or where the court considers it appropriate that the sex offender notification requirements should apply. While this will limit the automatic application of the notification requirements, the provisions outlined in the preceding paragraphs concerning SOPOs will mean that the restriction does not apply in relation to applications for SOPOs. Paragraph 44 of Schedule 3 to the Sexual Offences Act 2003 is also amended to include reference to pseudo-photographs of children under 16.

177. Subsection (3)(b) amends the interpretative provision in paragraph 97(b) of Schedule 3 to the 2003 Act to extend the meaning of indecent photographs and pseudo-photographs for that Act to include derivatives of such photographs and pseudo-photographs (by applying definitions in the 1982 Act which include the amendments made by subsection (1)(a)(ii), above).

Section 34 - Extreme pornography

178. This section creates a new offence of possession of extreme pornography and increases the maximum penalty for the sale etc. of obscene material of that nature. It inserts new sections 51A to 51C into the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 and amends section 51 of that Act.

179. Subsection (1) amends section 51(3) of the 1982 Act to increase the maximum penalty, on conviction on indictment, from 3 to 5 years imprisonment for the offence of displaying, publishing, selling, distributing or possessing etc. with a view to selling or distributing obscene material, where that material contains an extreme pornographic image.

180. Subsection (2) inserts new sections 51A “Extreme pornography”, 51B “Exception to section 51A offence” and 51C “Defences to section 51A offence” into the 1982 Act.

181. Section 51A creates an offence of possession of an extreme pornographic image, defines such images and specifies the maximum penalty which may be imposed for the offence.

182. Subsection 51A(2) provides that an extreme pornographic image must be “obscene”, “pornographic” and “extreme”. The test of “obscene” means that the material must be of such a nature that it would fall within the category of the material whose sale etc. is already prohibited under section 51 of the 1982 Act.
183. Subsection 51A(3) defines a “pornographic” image as one which must reasonably be assumed to have been made solely or principally for the purpose of sexual arousal. Therefore, an image is not pornographic if it can reasonably be assumed that the image has been made principally for another purpose e.g. educational purposes.

184. Subsection 51A(4) provides that where an image forms part of a series of images which can provide a context, then that context, the image itself and any associated sounds must be taken into account when determining whether the image is pornographic.

185. Subsection 51A(5) sets out an example of how subsection 51A(4) can work. Where an image forms an integral part of a narrative (e.g. a story), the whole story will be considered for the purposes of determining whether the image in question is pornographic. This could lead to the conclusion that an image is not pornographic, notwithstanding that when considered on its own, the opposite conclusion would be reached. Subsection 51A(5) is only one example of how subsection 51A(4) may operate. The reference to “context” in subsection 51A(4) not only covers a narrative, it can also, for example, include a series of images which do not tell a story, but which have a recurring theme. In addition, subsection 51A(4) may operate so as to have the opposite effect to that described in subsection 51A(5)(b): examination of an image’s context could lead to the conclusion that an image is pornographic.

186. Subsection 51A(6) provides that an image is extreme if it depicts in an explicit and realistic way any of the acts set out in subsection 51A(6)(a) to (e). The terms “explicit” and “realistic” require that the act depicted in the image must be clearly seen, lifelike and convincing and appear to a reasonable person to be real. It is not required that the act itself is real.

187. Subsection 51A(7) provides that where an image is an integral part of a narrative, the context provided by that narrative may be taken into account in determining whether an image is extreme in terms of subsection 51A(6). In addition, any description or sound accompanying the image can similarly be taken into account.

188. Section 51B makes provision to exclude images in unaltered classified works and defines the circumstances in which such images are not excluded.

189. Subsections 51B(1) and (2) provide that possession of an excluded image is not an offence under section 51A and define an excluded image.

190. Subsection 51B(3) provides that an image extracted from a classified work for the purposes of sexual arousal is not an excluded image.

191. Subsection 51B(4) provides that in determining whether an image has been extracted for the purpose of sexual arousal, account may be taken of the storage, description, accompanying sound and context of the image.

192. Subsection 51B(5) defines terms used in this section including “classified work” and thereby “excluded image” in subsection 51B(2).
193. Section 51C makes provisions for defences to the offence of possession of extreme pornography. It replicates defences provided for possession of indecent images of children under section 52A of the 1982 Act and makes specific provision in relation to extreme images.

194. Subsection 51C(1) provides that the onus is on the accused to prove the matters specified in subsections 51C(2), (3) and (4) in order to use one or more of the defences. The Crown must prove the essential elements of the offence beyond reasonable doubt.

195. Subsection 51C(2) provides that it is a defence for a person to prove that: (a) he/she had a legitimate reason for possession of the image, (b) he/she had no knowledge of the image and no awareness as to the nature of the image or (c) the image was unsolicited and disposed of promptly.

196. Subsection 51C(3) provides a defence for those who directly participated in the act depicted in an extreme pornographic image and can prove the circumstances set out in subsection 51C(4). When read with subsections 51C(4) and (5) this subsection limits the defence to those who directly participate in simulated acts and retain the images for their own private use. The defence does not extend to a person who films or watches an act depicted in an image but who does not participate directly.

197. Subsection 51C(4) provides that a direct participant must be able to demonstrate that the act depicted in the image was simulated i.e. that it did not actually:

- take or threaten a person’s life;
- result in nor was it likely to result in severe injury;
- involve non-consensual activity;
- feature a human corpse;
- feature an animal or carcase.

198. Subsection 51C(5) provides that the defence in subsection 51C(3) is not available if the image in question is shown, given or offered for sale to any person who was not a direct participant in the act depicted in the image.

Section 35 - People trafficking

199. Trafficking for the purposes of prostitution or for the making or production of obscene or indecent material is an offence under the provisions of section 22 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003, including where it is believed that another person is likely to exercise such control or to so involve the individual. Following changes made by the UK Borders Act 2007, the Bill will align the wording of the section 22 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003 with that now contained in the Sexual Offences Act 2003 by amending:

- section 22(1) (a) by extending its scope so that it refers to facilitating “entry into” the UK as well as the “arrival in” the UK
- section 22(4) by extending the extra-territorial effect so that it is not limited to British nationals and companies by providing that the offence applies to anything done whether inside or outside the UK by any person, no matter whether they are in any way connected to the United Kingdom. Section 22 (6) is also repealed.

200. The section also makes clear that the sheriff court has jurisdiction to deal with those offences by amending section 22(5) to specify in the statute that the sheriff court should have jurisdiction to deal with those offences.

201. This is consistent with section 16B of the Criminal Law (Consolidation) (Scotland) Act 1995 which deals with extra-territorial sexual offences. Similar changes are made to the offences relating to trafficking for purposes other than sexual exploitation in sections 4 and 5 of the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc.) Act 2004 by amending:

- section 4(1) by extending its scope so that it refers to “entry into” the UK as well as the “arrival in” the UK;
- section 5 by repealing subsection (1) and (2) and adding a new provision to make clear that section 4(1) to (3) apply to anything done within or outwith the UK; and
- section 5 by adding a new provision to specify that in Scotland the sheriff court has jurisdiction to deal with those offences.

Section 36 - Alternative charges for fraud and embezzlement

202. Paragraph 8 of Schedule 3 to the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 can be applied in certain cases where the evidence led in court would not support a conviction on the basis of the offence as charged but would permit conviction of a different offence. It permits this application of an alternative charge in certain offences involving dishonest appropriation of property. For example, in terms of paragraph 8(2) of Schedule 3 an accused person charged with theft may instead be convicted of reset if the evidence led would not support conviction of theft but would support conviction of reset.

203. The amendments to Schedule 3 extend this principle to cover fraud and embezzlement. As a result of these changes, it will be possible for an accused charged with “breach of trust and embezzlement” to instead be convicted of “falsehood, fraud and wilful imposition”. Similarly, an accused charged with “falsehood, fraud and wilful imposition” may be convicted instead of “breach of trust and embezzlement”.

Section 37 - Conspiracy to commit offences outwith Scotland

204. Section 11A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”) provides that conspiracy in Scotland to commit an offence outwith the United Kingdom is in itself an offence, provided that the criminal purpose being conspired would constitute an offence in the place where it was intended to be carried out. However, section 11A of the 1995 Act does not cover conspiracies formed in Scotland to commit an offence in England, Wales and Northern Ireland. This section amends the scope of section 11A of the 1995 Act to cover conspiracy in Scotland to commit an offence in other parts of the United Kingdom.
PART 3 - CRIMINAL PROCEDURE

Section 38 – Prosecution of children

206. This section implements Recommendation 2 of the Scottish Law Commission’s Report by inserting a new section 41A into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 prohibiting the prosecution of any child under the age of 12. The age limit applies at the commencement of the prosecution. In addition to the SLC’s recommendation, subsection (2) prevents persons over the age of 12 being prosecuted for an offence they committed under that age.

207. The prosecution of children between 12 and 16 would remain subject to the existing statutory provisions, requirements of the European Convention on Human Rights, and the current practices and directions of the Lord Advocate and the Crown Office. The main statutory provision limiting prosecution of children under 16 is section 42(1). This provides that no child under 16 is to be prosecuted except on the instructions of the Lord Advocate or at his instance and that any prosecution is to take place in the High Court or a sheriff court. Subsection (3) makes consequential amendments to section 42 so that it will apply to children aged between 12 and 16.

208. Subsection (4) makes a consequential amendment to section 234AA(2)(b), which provides that the criminal courts can make an antisocial behaviour order only where at the time when he committed the offence, the offender was at least 12 years of age. In light of the limit on prosecution established by section 41A, this provision is no longer necessary and is repealed.

209. The existing rule in section 41 that it shall be conclusively presumed that no child under the age of eight years can be guilty of any offence is retained.

Section 39 – Offences: liability of partners

210. Section 39 provides that where a partnership is guilty of a “corporate offence” that has been committed with the consent or connivance of a partner or attributable to the partner’s neglect that partner will also be guilty of the offence. “Corporate offences” are those where in similar circumstances statute provides for individual liability for directors of a body corporate.

211. The effect is to put partners of partnerships in the same position as directors of bodies corporate in relation to statutory criminal offences. Similar provision has already been made under the Limited Liability Partnerships (Scotland) Regulations 2001 in relation to partners of Limited Liability Partnerships, so these are excluded from the operation of section 39. As some statutes have already made provision for individual liability of partners, subsection (3) disapplies the new provisions where such provision has already been made.
Section 40 – Witness statements

212. Section 40 deals with covers witness statements and allows the Crown at any point, both before commencement and during the trial, to provide to any witness who is cited a copy of their statement or to give a witness access to it at a reasonable time and place. “Statement” is defined at (3) with reference to section 262 of the 1995 Act.

Section 41 - Breach of undertaking

213. Under section 22 (liberation on undertaking) of the 1995 Act an accused person can be released by the police on the undertaking that they will appear at court at a later date and that they will comply with certain conditions. The conditions which can be attached to a police undertaking are the same as those which can be applied to a bail order granted by a court and include, for example, a requirement not to commit further offences.

214. Section 41 adds new sections 22ZA and 22ZB to the 1995 Act. It makes provision in relation to offences committed while a person is subject to a police undertaking. These provisions are broadly similar to those that apply where an accused person commits an offence while liberated on bail.

215. Section 22ZA(1) provides that a person commits an offence where they fail to appear at court as required under an undertaking and also where they fail to comply with a condition attached to that undertaking. Subsection (2) provides for the applicable penalty levels for section 22ZA(1) offences. Subsections (3) (read with subsection (4)) provides that where a person subject to an undertaking commits a further offence, the fact that they have breached the undertaking is not to be treated as a separate offence, but is to be taken account of (along with the other listed factors in subsection (4)) by the court in determining the sentence for the further offence.

216. Section 22ZB makes provision for evidential and procedural matters in relation to offences committed or dealt with under section 22ZA.

Section 42 - Bail review applications

217. The prosecutor or the accused can apply for review of a decision to grant, or to refuse to grant, an application for bail or for review of the conditions attached to the grant of bail, e.g. for a change of address.

218. This section amends sections 30 and 31 of the 1995 Act to remove the requirement to hold a hearing in circumstances where an application for review is made but only when the other party consents to, and the court considers it appropriate to grant, the application. Section 30 is also amended to make it clear that an application for review by the accused must be intimated to the prosecutor.
Section 43 - Bail condition for identification procedures etc.

219. Section 43 introduces a new standard bail condition. This new condition provides, that whenever reasonably instructed by a constable to do so, a person released on bail should participate in an identification parade or other identification procedure, and allow any print, impression or sample to be taken from him or her. Although such a condition is not currently a standard condition, under section 24(4)(b) of the 1995 Act, the court may currently impose a further condition to this effect.

Section 44 - Prosecution on indictment: Scottish Law Officers

220. This section amends the procedures contained in the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”) for the raising of indictments in name of the Lord Advocate.

221. Section 64 of the 1995 Act currently provides that all prosecutions before the High Court of Justiciary or before the Sheriff sitting with a jury shall proceed in name of Her Majesty’s Advocate.

222. Subsection (2) amends section 64 of the 1995 Act (and subsection (4) amends Schedule 2 to the 1995 Act) to provide that indictments are to be libelled at the instance of “Her Majesty’s Advocate”, removing any requirement for the individual Lord Advocate to be named, personally.

223. Subsection (3)(b)(i) makes a similar amendment to subsection 287(2) of the 1995 Act with regard to the Solicitor General where there is no Lord Advocate in office.

224. Section 287 of the 1995 Act sets out arrangements for the situation where a Lord Advocate resigns or dies and where there is a gap in time before a new Lord Advocate is appointed. In this case indictments are raised at the instance of the Solicitor General. Section 287 makes provision for circumstances where both offices of the Lord Advocate and Solicitor General are vacant, to include where both Law Officers demit office on the same day.

225. Subsection (3)(c) provides that indictments raised by the Solicitor General may be signed by that Law Officer. It also provides that during any period where both offices of the Scottish Law Officers are vacant as a result of the deaths of the Scottish Law Officers that it shall be lawful for indictments to be raised at the instance of the Lord Advocate. Subsection 3(d) includes provision that, where an indictment is raised at the instance of the Solicitor General, that indictment continues to be valid notwithstanding that he or she has since died or otherwise left office.

Section 45 - Transfer of justice of the peace court cases

226. This section introduces new provisions into the 1995 Act relating to the jurisdiction of the JP court in relation to the commencement and transfer of proceedings. Three new sections, 137CA, 137CB and 137CC, are inserted. The purpose is to make provision for JP courts similar to that which exists for the transfer of sheriff court cases under section 137A to 137C of the 1995 Act. It should be noted that consequential amendment to section 10A of the 1995 Act is made in Schedule 5 to this Bill.
227. Section 137CA provides that where an accused person has been cited to a diet, or where citation has not taken place but proceedings have been commenced against an accused in a JP court, the prosecutor may apply to a justice to transfer the proceedings to another JP court in the same sheriffdom.

228. Subsections (1) and (2) of section 137CB provide that where the clerk of a JP court informs the prosecutor that due to unforeseen circumstances it is not practicable for that JP court or any other JP court in the sheriffdom to proceed with some or all of the cases due to call at a diet, the prosecutor may apply to the sheriff principal to transfer the proceedings to a JP court in another sheriffdom.

229. Subsections (3) and (4) provide that where an accused person has been cited to a diet, or where proceedings have been commenced against an accused person in a JP court, the prosecutor can apply to a justice to transfer the proceedings to a JP court in another sheriffdom, if there are proceedings against the accused in a JP court in that sheriffdom.

230. Subsections (5) and (6) provide that where it is intended to take proceedings against an accused person in a JP court, and there are proceedings against the accused in a JP court in another sheriffdom, the prosecutor may apply to a justice for authority to take proceedings against the accused in a JP court in the other sheriffdom.

231. Subsection (7) provides that where an application is made under subsection (2), a sheriff principal may only make the order with the consent of the sheriff principal of the other sheriffdom. Subsection (9) permits the sheriff principal who has made an order under subsection (7) to revoke or vary it, with the consent of the sheriff principal of the receiving sheriffdom.

232. Subsection (8) provides that where an application is made under subsection (4) or (6), the justice is to make the order sought if s/he considers it expedient and if a justice of the other sheriffdom consents. Subsection (10) provides that a justice who has made an order under subsection (8) (or any justice of the same sheriffdom) may revoke or vary that order, if a justice of the receiving sheriffdom consents.

233. Subsections (1) & (2) provide that where there are exceptional circumstances leading to an unusually high number of accused persons appearing from custody for a first calling in JP courts, and it is unlikely that those courts would be able to deal with all these cases, the prosecutor may apply to the sheriff principal for authority to take proceedings against some or all of the accused in a JP court in another sheriffdom. The sheriff principal may order that the proceedings are to be maintained at the receiving JP court, or at the original court. Under subsection (4), the order may be made in relation to a particular period of time, or particular circumstances.

Section 46 – Additional charge where bail etc. breached

234. This section amends sections 27 (breach of bail conditions: offences) and 150 (failure of accused to appear) of the 1995 Act.
235. The effect of these amendments is to allow a complaint to be amended to include an additional charge covering an offence committed as a result of breaching bail conditions or an offence committed in respect of a failure to appear at a diet. A similar provision to allow amendment of a complaint to include a charge of breaching an undertaking is to be found in section 22ZB(10).

Section 47 - Remand and committal of children and young persons

236. This section repeals the provisions contained in section 51 of the 1995 Act, which allow for the remand of children aged 14 and 15 years to prison.

237. Where a child under the age of 16 years is not released on bail or ordained to appear he shall instead be remanded to the local authority to be detained either in secure accommodation or a suitable place of safety.

Sections 48 to 51 - Prosecution of organisations

238. Sections 48 to 51 deal with procedural matters in relation to the prosecution of organisations.

239. Section 70 of the 1995 Act deals with proceedings on indictment against bodies corporate. It provides for how the indictment is served, appearance by a representative for certain purposes, and the recovery of fines. It does not make provision about partnerships or other unincorporated associations. In contrast, section 143 of the same Act, which deals with summary procedure, specifically provides for how proceedings may be brought against partnerships, associations, and bodies of trustees as well as bodies corporate.

240. Sections 48 to 51 clarify and extend these procedural provisions by extending them to apply to “organisations”, as defined in the new definition inserted in the 1995 Act by section 48.

241. Section 49 amends section 70 of the 1995 Act to provide for:

- how indictments may be served on different sorts of organisation;
- how organisations may appear by a representative (defined in section 70(8) and (9)) for the purpose of stating objections to the competency or relevancy of the indictment or proceedings, tendering a plea of guilty or not guilty, making a statement in mitigation of sentence;
- the trial to proceed and the case be disposed of where an organisation does not appear either by a representative or by counsel or solicitor; and
- the recovery of fines

242. Section 50 similarly amends section 143 of the 1995 Act to provide for:

- summary proceedings to be taken against an organisation in its corporate capacity for against an individual representative of the organisation;
These documents relate to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

- how organisations may appear by a representative for the purpose of stating objections to the competency or relevancy of the complaint or proceedings, tendering a plea of guilty or not guilty, making a statement in mitigation of sentence;
- the case to proceed and the case be disposed of where an organisation does not appear either by a representative or by counsel or solicitor; and
- recovery of fines

243. Section 51 amends section 141(2)(b) of the 1995 Act to provide that an organisation (other than a body of trustees) may be cited in summary proceedings if the citation is left at its ordinary place of business with a partner, director, secretary or other official or if it is cited in the same manner as if the proceedings were in a civil court. Section 141(2)(c) already deals with citation of bodies of trustees.

Section 52 - Disclosure of convictions and non-court disposals

244. This section makes provision relating to the circumstances in which convictions and non-court disposals may be disclosed to the court in summary and solemn proceedings. Two new sections, 101A and 166A, are introduced to the 1995 Act and amendment is made to the existing provisions of the 1995 Act in relation to the disclosure of non-court disposals.

245. Subsections (1) and (2) of section 101A provide that when considering sentence in solemn proceedings the court may have regard to convictions, or non-court disposals, acquired after the date of the offence with which the accused is charged but before the date of conviction.

246. Subsection (3) specifies the non-court disposals which are referred to in subsection (2). These are:
- fixed penalties under section 302(1);
- compensation offers under section 302A(1); and
- work orders under section 303ZA(6) of the 1995 Act

247. A fixed penalty or compensation offer may be disclosed only if it has been accepted (or deemed to have been accepted) before the date of conviction. Only a work order that has been completed before the date of conviction may be disclosed to the court.

248. Subsection (4) of section 101A requires the prosecutor to provide the court with a notice of the conviction or non-court disposal.

249. Section 52(2) substitutes a new section 166A into the 1995 Act. The previous version of section 166A, inserted by section 12 of the Criminal Proceedings etc. (Reform) (Scotland) Act 2007, allowed the court in deciding on the disposal of a case in summary proceedings to have regard to any convictions acquired between the date of the offence and the date of conviction. The effect of new section 166A is to expand that provision to include non-court disposals. This is in the same manner as the provision for solemn proceedings under new section 101A discussed above.
250. Subsections (3) and (4) make amendments to section 302 and section 302A of the 1995 Act. Those sections provide for the offer of a procurator fiscal fixed penalty or compensation offer respectively. The amendments extend the provisions relating to the information to be provided to an alleged offender when an offer of these disposals is made. Subsections (3) & (4) provide that an offer of a fixed penalty or compensation offer must state that if it is accepted, or deemed to have been accepted, that fact may be disclosed to a court in any proceedings to which the alleged offender is (or is liable to become) subject at that time.

251. Amendments to section 303ZA of the 1995 Act under subsection (5) make provision relating to the information that must be included in an offer of a work order.

252. In addition to the information listed in section 303ZA the offer must also state that:
- if it is refused, or not completed, that fact may be disclosed in any proceedings for the offence in question;
- if it is completed, that fact may be disclosed in any proceedings for an offence committed within two years of the date of completion;
- if it is completed, that fact may be disclosed in any proceedings to which the alleged offender is (or is liable to become) subject at that time.

Section 53 – Time limits for lodging certain appeals

253. Section 74 of the 1995 Act makes provision in solemn criminal cases to allow for appeals to be taken in respect of certain decisions made by a court at either a first diet or a preliminary hearing. Section 174 of the 1995 Act makes provision for the procedure to be followed at the “first diet” of a summary criminal case. Both sections provide for appeals to be made against certain decisions of the court and stipulate that any appeal must be lodged no later than two days after the decision. Subsections (2) and (3) of section 53 amend sections 74 and 174 of the 1995 Act, by extending the time limit for lodging these appeals from 2 days to 7 days.

Section 54 – Submissions as to sufficiency of evidence 254. This section inserts sections 97A, 97B and 97C into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. New section 97A effectively creates a statutory replacement for what is termed a "common law submission". Under the common law a submission to the court may be made by the defence at the end of all evidence in a case. If successful, it typically results in a direction, in the course of the judge’s charge to the jury, that the jury should not convict on a particular charge, or should consider only a reduced charge. This direction may be focused on the basis that the evidence in the case is insufficient in law to justify a conviction. It is in the context of the judge’s role in determining questions of law, which comes before the ultimate assessment of questions of fact by the jury.

255. At present, an accused may make a submission as of right only after the Crown speech to the jury, although the Crown commonly consents to a submission being made at the close of the evidence. Where a submission is made after the Crown speech, the Crown does not have a right of reply, on the basis that at that stage the prosecutor is functus officio (prevented from taking the matter further as a result of having fulfilled his or her official duties).
256. Subsection (1) of section 97A gives the accused the right to make certain submissions immediately after the close of the evidence. Subsection (2)(a) permits such a submission to contend that the evidence is insufficient in law to justify the accused’s being convicted of the offence (or of any other offence of which he could be convicted under the indictment). The meaning of "insufficient in law" is the same as in section 97 of the 1995 Act and is a test of technical sufficiency rather than a test as to the quality of the evidence. This permits an accused to submit that there is no case to answer. Accordingly, a submission under subsection 2(a) will succeed in two circumstances: either where there is an absence of corroborating evidence or in the rare circumstance (such as arose in HMA v Purcell 2008 SLT 44) where the indictment is irrelevant and the judge could not permit the jury to convict regardless of the evidence. Subsection (2)(b) permits a submission to be made that there is no evidence to support some part of the circumstances set forth in the indictment; for example, to support the allegation of the use of a weapon in a charge of assault.

257. Subsection (3) provides that a submission of the kind referred to in subsection (2) may only be made under section 97A (and at the close of evidence). The effect of this provison is to bypass the use of the common law submission as it applies to the matters described in subsection (2).

258. Section 97B applies where the accused makes a submission under section 97A(2)(a) that the evidence is insufficient in law to justify the accused’s being convicted of the indicted offence or of any other offence of which the accused could be convicted under the indictment.

259. Subsection (2) makes provision for where the judge is satisfied that the evidence is insufficient in law to justify a conviction for the indicted offence. It ensures that the trial will proceed only where the judge is satisfied that the evidence is sufficient in law to justify the accused’s being convicted of a related offence or where another offence is libelled in the indictment which has not itself been subject to a submission under section 97A(2).

260. Subsection (3) provides for the continuation of the trial where the judge rejects a submission under section 97A(2)(a).

261. Subsection (5) ensures that the clerk of court will check and confirm that the amendment has been properly made.

262. Section 97C applies where the accused makes a submission under section 97A(2)(b) that there is no evidence to support some part of the circumstances set out in the indictment.

263. Subsection (2) provides that the prosecutor will be directed to amend the indictment where the judge is satisfied that there is no evidence to support some part of the circumstances set out in the indictment.

264. Subsection (3) provides for the continuation of the trial where the judge rejects a submission under section 97A(2)(b).
These documents relate to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

265. Subsection (5) ensures that the clerk of court will check and confirm that the amendment has been properly made.

Section 55 – Prosecutor’s right of appeal

266. The Crown is not able under the existing law to challenge a decision by a judge that brings a criminal case to an end. The existing rights of appeal available to the Crown are highly restricted. The prosecution may be able to use a bill of advocation in relation to some aspects of the trial process, although this is normally confined to procedural errors in the preliminary stages of a case. The Crown may also appeal against sentence under section 108 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. This can be on a number of grounds, including that the disposal of the case was unduly lenient. The other option available to the Crown is not technically an appeal, but a reference made by the Lord Advocate under section 123 of the 1995 Act where the Crown wish the High Court to consider a particular point of law that arose in a criminal case. This has no effect on the disposal of the case that lead to the reference.

267. Section 107A gives the Crown a right of appeal against certain decisions by a judge that bring a criminal case to an end without a decision by a jury. These are rulings of no case to answer under section 97 and decisions under section 97A (the statutory replacement for a common law submission). Section 107B provides the Crown with a right of appeal against certain findings relating to the admissibility of prosecution evidence. These changes do not create any rights of appeal in relation to a decision by a jury.

268. Section 107A(1)(a) creates a right of appeal in relation to a decision by a judge under section 97 that, at the close of the evidence for the prosecution, the evidence led is insufficient in law to justify the accused being convicted of the offence charged. Paragraph (a) of subsection (1) also provides a right of appeal in relation to a decision taken under section 97B(2)(a), at the close of the entire evidence in the case, to acquit the accused of the indicted offence on the grounds that the evidence is insufficient in law to justify the conviction of the accused for that offence.

269. Paragraph (a) of subsection (1) creates a right of appeal in relation to a decision by a judge under section 97 that, at the close of the evidence for the prosecution, the evidence led is insufficient in law to justify the accused being convicted of the offence charged. Paragraph (a) also provides a right of appeal in relation to a decision taken under section 97B(2)(a), at the close of the entire evidence in the case, to acquit the accused of the indicted offence on the grounds that the evidence is insufficient in law to justify the conviction of the accused for that offence.

270. Paragraph (b) of subsection (1) creates a right of appeal in relation to a direction made under section 97B(2)(b). This is a direction to the prosecutor to amend an indictment and is given where the judge is satisfied that the evidence is sufficient in law to justify the accused being convicted of a related offence. Paragraph (b) also provides a right of appeal against a decision under section 97C(2) directing the prosecutor to amend the indictment to reflect a decision that there is no evidence to support some part of the circumstances set out in the indictment.
271. Section 4(2) of the Contempt of Court Act 1981 allows a court, where it appears to be necessary in order to avoid a substantial risk of prejudice to the administration of justice in any proceedings which are pending or imminent, to order that the publication of any report of the proceedings be postponed for such period as the court thinks necessary. Subsection (2)(a) of section 107A allows the court, where it appears that the prosecution appeal may result in further proceedings against a person for an offence of which he has been acquitted, to make an order under section 4(2) of the Contempt of Court Act 1981. This will avoid the risk of prejudice to those further proceedings.

272. Subsection (2)(b) permits the court, in exceptional circumstances and after hearing the parties, to order the detention of an acquitted person in custody or admit him to bail pending the hearing of the prosecution appeal.

273. Most rulings on the admissibility of evidence are made at preliminary diets or preliminary hearings. However, some evidential questions may still arise during the course of a trial, for example where an unexpected development occurs in the course of oral evidence. If a challenge to admissibility of evidence is successful and the accused is acquitted, it could be maintained that a ruling on admissibility had been fatal to the entire prosecution.

274. Section 107B gives the prosecutor a right of appeal against findings made during the course of the trial that evidence which the prosecution seeks to lead is inadmissible. Subsection (2) establishes that the leave of the trial court is required in all appeal cases involving a finding that evidence is inadmissible. Subsection (3) requires any motion for leave to appeal to be made before the close of the Crown case. Subsection (4) sets out the factors to be taken into account by the court in determining whether or not to grant leave to appeal.

275. Section 4(2) of the Contempt of Court Act 1981 allows a court, where it appears to be necessary for avoiding a substantial risk of prejudice to the administration of justice in any proceedings which are pending or imminent, to order that the publication of any report of the proceedings be postponed for such period as the court thinks necessary.

276. Subsection (5)(a) of section 107B allows the court, where it appears that the prosecution appeal may result in further proceedings against a person for an offence of which he has been acquitted, to make an order under section 4(2) of the Contempt of Court Act 1981 to avoid the risk of prejudice to those further proceedings. Subsection (5)(b) permits the court, in exceptional circumstances and after hearing the parties, to order the detention of an acquitted person in custody or admit him to bail pending the hearing of the prosecution appeal.

277. Subsection (1) of section 107C allows the High Court, in considering an appeal under section 107A or 107B, to review not only the decision appealed against but any earlier decisions which may have a bearing on the decision appealed against. So, for example, where an acquittal under section 97 is appealed, the High Court will be able to review not only the trial judge’s decision that the evidence led by the prosecution was insufficient in law to justify the conviction of the accused, but also an earlier finding by that judge that an element of prosecution evidence was inadmissible. Subsection (2) provides that the test to be applied by the High Court in considering an appeal under section 107A or 107B is whether the trial judge’s decision was wrong in law.
278. If a Crown appeal (under either section 107A or 107B) is successful, then the Crown may seek to continue the prosecution. It is likely that in the majority of cases the continuation of the existing trial would not be a realistic possibility because of the delay that would necessarily be incurred during the appeal process. Proceeding with the case in those circumstances would therefore require the Crown to raise a fresh prosecution. However, in some instances it may be considered practicable for the appeal to be heard and determined during an adjournment of the trial, allowing the trial to continue if the appeal is upheld. Such an appeal is defined as an “expedited appeal” in subsection (2).

279. Section 107D makes provision for expedited appeals to be heard and determined during an adjournment of the trial. Subsection (1) and (2) provide for the court to take steps to determine whether it would be practicable to continue the existing trial following the appeal. After hearing the views of both the Crown and the accused, the Court will decide whether the appeal should be heard during an adjournment of the trial.

280. Subsection (6) means that where an appeal against an acquittal under section 97 or 97B(2)(a) is successful; the High Court will quash the acquittal and direct that the trial is to continue in respect of the offence.

281. Section 107E makes provision for appeals against an acquittal that are not subject to the expedited appeal procedure provided for by section 107D. It applies to acquittals arising under section 97 or section 97B(2)(a) or as a consequence of a ruling that evidence that the prosecution sought to lead was inadmissible under section 107B(1). This section will apply where it would not be practicable to continue the existing trial whilst the appeal against conviction is being considered. Subsection (1) limits section 107E to appeals against an acquittal. Non expedited appeals that are not against an acquittal are dealt with under section 107F.

282. The effect of subsections (1)(c) and (2) are that where the High Court (sitting as a court of appeal) determines that the acquittal was wrong in law, it shall quash the acquittal. Subsection (3) provides for the High Court to grant authority for a new prosecution in accordance with section 119 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 for the same or any similar offence arising from the same facts. The High Court will not grant authority to bring a new prosecution where it considers that doing so would be contrary to the interests of justice.

283. Subsection (4) provides that if no motion is made for authority to bring a new prosecution, or if the High Court refuses such a motion, the High Court shall itself acquit the accused of the offence in question.

284. Section 107F makes provision for appeals made under section 107A or 107B that are not appeals against an acquittal and that are not subject to the expedited appeal procedure provided for by section 107D. This section will apply where it would not be practicable to continue the existing trial whilst the appeal against conviction was being considered. The practical effect of subsection (1) is to limit section 107F to non-expedited appeals against:

- a direction to amend the indictment to cover a related offence (where the judge is satisfied that the evidence is insufficient in law to justify the accused’s being convicted of the indicted offence) (section 97B(2)(b));
• a direction to amend the indictment (where the judge has ruled that there is no evidence to support some part of the circumstances set out in the indictment) (section 97C(2);
• a finding that prosecution evidence is inadmissible.

285. Non expedited appeals against an acquittal are dealt with under section 107E.

286. Because the appeal in question is not being expedited, the trial is unable to continue in relation to any offence to which the appeal relates. Subsection (2) therefore provides for the court to desert the diet in relation to that charge (or those charges) pro loco et tempore and, under subsection (3), the trial shall proceed only in relation to any other charges remaining on the indictment. The ordinary consequence of desertion pro loco et tempore is that the Crown is free to bring a fresh indictment (see Renton & Brown, Criminal Procedure (6th edn, R 22: Apr 2005) paragraph 18-21).

287. Subsection (4) provides for the High Court to grant authority for a new prosecution in accordance with section 119 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 for the same or any similar offence arising from the same facts. The High Court (sitting as a court of appeal) will not grant authority to bring a new prosecution where it considers that doing so would be contrary to the interests of justice.

Section 56 – Power of High Court in appeal under section 107A of 1995 Act

288. This section amends section 104 of the 1995 Act to make a number of powers available to the High Court for use in connection with appeals under sections 107A and 107B. Section 104 already confers powers upon the High Court when hearing appeals under section 106(1) or 108 of that Act, including power to order the production of documents, to hear evidence etc.

Section 57 – Further amendment of the 1995 Act

289. This section makes a number of amendments to the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. The amendments made by subsections (1) to (3) relate to the lodging of notes of appeal and the provision of the trial judge’s report. Subsection (4) makes amendments concerned with the procedure following the granting of the High Court’s authority to bring further proceedings following a successful Crown appeal.

290. Section 110 of the 1995 Act makes provision for notes of appeal. Subsection (1) of that section contains time limits for lodging such notes and provides for the transmission of copies of notes to the court and to the parties concerned in the appeal. Subsection (3) of that section requires that a note of appeal identify the proceedings, contain a full statement of the ground of appeal, and be in as nearly as may be the form prescribed by Act of Adjournal. Subsection (4) of that section provides that, except by leave of the High Court on cause shown, it shall not be competent for an appellant to found any aspect of his appeal on a ground not contained in the note of appeal.
291. Subsection (1) of section 57 inserts new sub-paragraphs (c), (d) and (e) into section 110(1) of the 1995 Act, providing for the lodging of a note of appeal within seven days of a non-expedited appeal being brought under section 107A; within seven days of the granting of leave for a non-expedited appeal under section 107B; and as soon as practicable after a decision under section 107D(2) that an appeal be expedited. An effect of this insertion is that subsections (3) and (4) (of section 110 of the 1995 Act) apply to Crown appeals as they do to appeals by a convicted person under section 106 and by the Lord Advocate against disposal under section 108. (Note, however, that while the time limits for appeals by convicted persons may be extended under either section 110(2) or 111(2), the time limit imposed upon a Crown appeal by inserted paragraphs (c) and (d) of section 110(1) cannot be extended).

292. Section 113 of the 1995 Act requires the trial judge, on receiving the copy note of appeal sent to him under section 110(1), to furnish the Clerk of Justiciary with a written report giving the judge’s opinion on the case generally and on the grounds contained in the note of appeal. It is appropriate that such a note should be provided to assist the High Court in considering a Crown appeal; but in an expedited appeal, where the appeal is to be heard during an adjournment of the trial, it will often be impractical to require a full report.

293. Subsections (2) and (3) of this section address these points. The effect of subsection (2), together with subsection (1), is to apply section 113 of the 1995 Act to non-expedited appeals: in any such appeal, the trial judge will be required to provide a full report. Subsection (3) inserts a new section 113A into the 1995 Act, permitting the trial judge in an expedited appeal to furnish the Clerk of Justiciary with such written observations as he or she thinks fit.

294. Subsection (4) of section 57 makes amendments applying section 119 of the 1995 Act (provision where High Court authorises new prosecution) to Crown appeals. Paragraph (a) inserts reference to new prosecutions authorised under section 107E(3) and section 107F(4) in relation to non expedited appeals arising under section 107A or 107B.

295. Paragraph (b) creates a replacement for subsection (2) of section 119. New subsection (2)(a) reproduces the existing law which states that a new prosecution granted where a conviction is quashed under section 118 of the 1995 Act (following a successful appeal by the defence) may not proceed upon the basis of a more serious charge than that on which the accused was convicted in the earlier proceedings.

296. New subsection (2)(b) provides, where a new prosecution is granted after a successful appeal against an acquittal under section 107A or 107B, that a new prosecution may not proceed upon the basis of a more serious charge than that on which the accused was acquitted in the earlier proceedings.

297. New subsection (2)(c) places a similar restriction in relation to a new prosecution authorised under section 107F(4) resulting from an appeal against a direction as to sufficiency, admissibility or lack of evidence. By virtue of this subsection a new indictment may not contain a more serious charge than that libelled in the original proceedings.

298. Where a successful appeal under section 107A has resulted in a new prosecution, new subsection 2A of section 119 (inserted by paragraph (c)) ensures that the circumstances set out in the new indictment are not to be inconsistent with any direction made by a trial judge to amend the old indictment under section 97B(2)(b) or 97C(2). A direction under those provisions would have been to either include a related offence within the indictment (the judge having ruled that the evidence was insufficient in law to justify a conviction under the indicted offence) or to reflect a ruling that there was no evidence to support some part of the circumstances set out in the indictment. However, this requirement does not apply if the High Court determines that the direction under section 97B(2)(b) or 97C(2) was wrong in law.

299. Paragraph (d) amends subsection (9) of section 119. The effect of this amendment is that where two months elapse following the date upon which the High Court grants authority under section 107E(3) and section 107F(4) and no new prosecution has been brought, the order granting authority to bring a new prosecution shall have the effect, for all purposes, of an acquittal.

Sections 58 – 60 - Retention and use of samples etc.

300. Sections 58 to 60 contain provisions on the retention and use of samples.

301. The law on police powers to take, retain and use DNA, fingerprints and other forensic data (such as palm prints) is predominantly set out in sections 18-20 of the 1995 Act. In general, samples and records of forensic data must be destroyed once the decision is taken not to prosecute an individual for the offence the samples and records were collected in connection with, or, if the individual is prosecuted, when the proceedings end without a conviction. If the individual is found guilty of the offence, the samples and records of their forensic data can be retained indefinitely

302. Section 18A of the 1995 Act allows an exception to this general rule where criminal proceedings have been initiated against an individual for an offence, but end without a conviction. This only applies to criminal proceedings for a list of serious sexual or violent offences set out in section 19A(6) of the 1995 Act. In these circumstances, DNA samples and records can be retained by the police for at least three years. At the end of that time, the Chief Constable can apply to a sheriff for these samples and records to be kept for up to a further two years and this process can be repeated at the end of each extended period.

303. Section 58 amends sections 18 and 18A of the 1995 Act, extending this exception to cover the retention of “relevant physical data” (which is defined in section 18(7A) of the 1995 Act as fingerprints, palm prints, prints or impressions of another external part of the body, and records of skin on an external part of the body) as well as DNA records.

304. Section 59 inserts new sections 18B and 18C to the 1995 Act. These introduce a similar exception to the normal rules governing retention of DNA, fingerprint and other physical data to that described above in relation to section 58, covering certain cases dealt with by the Children’s Hearings System. This applies where a child is referred to a Children’s Hearing on the grounds that they have committed one of a list of specified serious violent or sexual offences and has had DNA, fingerprint or other physical data taken from them under section 18 of the 1995 (upon his/her arrest or detention). The list of relevant offences will be drawn from the lists of sexual or violent offences in section 19A(6) of the 1995 Act, and set out in secondary legislation, which will need to be approved by the Scottish Parliament.

305. If the child and relevant person (a parent or person with control over the child) accepts that he or she has committed one of the relevant offences, or a sheriff establishes that they have done so, DNA, fingerprint or other physical data can be kept for at least three years.

306. As with section 58, the Chief Constable will be able to apply to a sheriff for an extension of up to two years at the end of this time, and this process can be repeated at the end of each extended period.

307. If a child is referred to a Children’s Hearing on the grounds of having committed a relevant offence and refuses to accept that such an offence was committed, any DNA, fingerprints and other physical data which has been taken from that child under section 18 of the 1995 Act must be destroyed. This also applies where the commission of a relevant offence by the child is not established by a sheriff, to whom a children’s hearing refers the case to establish the facts or who reviews the case under section 85 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995.

308. Section 60 inserts a new section 19C into the 1995 Act, setting out the general purposes for which DNA and fingerprint information can be used. This makes it clear that the police can use the DNA and fingerprint information as a tool to help prevent, detect, and investigate crime, and prosecute crime in court. It also allows the information to be used to establish the identity of a deceased person and also a person from whom DNA samples, relevant physical data and information from samples comes from, as there may be a need to identify a person from whom a body or body part where no criminal activity is suspected: for example, following a natural disaster. These purposes apply whether the crime or incident occurs or is being investigated in Scotland, elsewhere in the UK or abroad, enabling the police to assist with investigations and prosecutions wherever they take place.

309. At present, police use common law powers for the use of fingerprints and DNA in criminal investigations and prosecutions. The powers in new section 19C aim to provide clarity on the purpose for which samples and records of forensic data can be used. They are without prejudice to existing powers at common law.

Section 61 - Referrals from Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission: grounds for appeal

310. The Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission was established by section 194A of the 1995 Act, inserted by the Crime and Punishment (Scotland) Act 1997.

311. Section 194B(1) of the 1995 Act sets out the Commission’s power to refer a person’s conviction or sentence to the High Court. Where the Commission makes a reference to the High Court, the Commission is required to give the Court a statement of their reasons for making the reference, in accordance with section 194D(4).
312. The High Court is then required to consider the matter referred as if it were an appeal under Part 8 (appeals from solemn proceedings) or Part 10 (appeals from summary proceedings) of the 1995 Act.

313. Section 194C of the 1995 Act sets out the grounds on which the Commission can make a reference to the High Court. These are that the Commission believe that a miscarriage of justice may have occurred, and that it is in the interests of justice that a reference should be made.

314. The effect of a reference by the Commission is that there is no need for the applicant to seek leave to appeal under section 107 of the 1995 Act (for solemn appeals) and section 180 (for summary appeals). Where the Commission has made a reference to the High Court there is nothing to limit the appellant from raising grounds of appeal that are not related to the reasons that the Commission made the reference. Section 194D is being amended so that where the Commission make a reference, an appeal arising from this reference can only be based on grounds relating to one or more of the reasons given by the Commission in its statement of reasons.

315. If the appellant seeks to make a case based on grounds of appeal that are not related to the reasons contained for the Commission’s reference, then this will only be possible if leave is given by the High Court in the interests of justice.

PART 4 - EVIDENCE

Section 62 – Witness statements: use during trial

316. Section 62 creates a power for the court to allow a witness to refer to his statement during the giving of evidence subject to the witness statement having been made available to the Crown and to the defence in advance of the trial. Subsection (3) extends the applicability of section 262 (construction of sections on hearsay) of the 1995 Act to witness statements. Within that, subsection (3)(c) disapplies the meanings of “criminal proceedings” and “made” to witness statements.

Section 63 - Spouse or civil partner of accused a compellable witness

317. This section makes provision for the spouse or civil partner of an accused to be a competent and compellable witness. This section amends section 264 of the 1995 Act and repeals section 130 of the Civil Partnership Act 2004. The common law provisions regarding the spouse as a witness will also be overturned.

318. This section provides that the spouse or civil partner of an accused is a competent and compellable witness for the prosecution, accused or co-accused in the proceedings against the accused. Currently the law provides that a spouse is a competent witness in all circumstances. However, s/he is a compellable witness for the prosecution or a co-accused only where s/he is compellable at common law. In respect of the common law, a spouse is only compellable where the accused is charged with an offence against him or her. The operation of the common law rule is not restricted to offences of personal injury, but extends to false accusation and to offences against property, including theft and even the forgery of the spouse’s signature on a cheque.

319. It does not extend to damage to property of which the spouse is only a tenant, unless perhaps if s/he is liable to pay for the repair of the damage. If a spouse of an accused is the victim of the crime with which the accused is charged then their marital status is of no consequence. A spouse and an unmarried partner would be a compellable witness for the prosecution in such a case.

320. It is only where the spouse is not the victim that s/he can decline to give evidence for the prosecution. If the spouse of an accused is called as a Crown witness, in circumstances in which s/he is not compellable against her husband or wife, s/he has the option of declining to give evidence. But if s/he elects to give evidence against the accused, s/he cannot decline to answer questions which incriminate the spouse. An unmarried partner cannot decline to give evidence in any circumstances.

321. By the 2004 Act, a civil partner is not a compellable witnesses for the prosecutor or a co-accused. Persons in a registered civil partnership are, accordingly, never compellable against each other.

322. This provision of the Bill will provide that the spouse and civil partner of an accused will be competent and compellable witnesses for the prosecution, accused or co-accused in any proceedings against the accused. In effect they will be treated no differently to any other witness. It will also take away the common law right of an accused’s spouse to refuse to give evidence of matrimonial communings.

Section 64 – Special measures for child witnesses and other vulnerable witnesses

323. This section amends sections 271-271M of the 1995 Act to allow the special measures (listed at section 271H) that are available for vulnerable witness to be used in “any relevant criminal proceedings in the High Court or the sheriff court”, as defined in subsection 2(b)(ii).

324. Subsections (3)-(9) replace all references to “trial” in sections 271-271M with references to the relevant criminal proceedings. This allows the special measures to be used in proceedings other than trials.

Section 65 – Amendment of Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003

326. Section 65 repeals section 15A of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003. This section allowed the special measures to be used in relation to proofs in relation to victim statements. This section is no longer necessary now that the special measures may be used in any hearing in relevant criminal proceedings.
Section 66 - Witness anonymity orders

327. Subsection (1) inserts new sections 271N to 271Y into the 1995 Act and provides courts with an order-making power to secure anonymity for witnesses when giving evidence in court.

328. The new section 271N(1) sets out what a witness anonymity order is and defines the order in such a way as to grant the court a wide discretion as to how the court protects the anonymity of a witness in any particular case.

329. The new section 271N(2) refers to procedures detailed at sections 271P, 271Q and 271R which deal with how applications should be made and what conditions the court needs to consider when considering whether to make an order.

330. The new section 271N(3) and (4) lists the kinds of measures the court may use to secure the witness’s anonymity. The list is only illustrative; the court may employ other measures if it thinks fit. Technological developments and the practical arrangements in the court may affect such decisions.

331. The new section 271N(5) provides that the court may not make a witness anonymity order which prevents the judge, jury or interpreter either from seeing the witness or from hearing the witness’s natural voice. The judge, jury and interpreter must always be able to see and hear the witness.

332. The new section 271P(1) provides that applications for a witness anonymity order may be made by the accused as well as prosecutors. This reflects the position in the case of Davis, where the Court of Appeal allowed a defence witness as well as prosecution witnesses to give evidence anonymously. It is expected that defence applications are most likely to be made in multiple accused cases where one accused does not wish a witness’s identity to be known by the other accused. But this subsection does not exclude the possibility of a defence application in a single accused case.

333. The new section 271P(2) provides that, where an application for a witness anonymity order is made by the prosecutor, the identity of witnesses may be withheld from the accused before and during the making of the application. This ensures that the operation of the legislation is not impeded by procedural challenges to the power of the prosecution to withhold this information pending the court’s determination of the application for the witness anonymity order.

334. The new section 271P(2) therefore provides that prosecutors are under no obligation to disclose the witness's identity to the accused at the application stage but must inform the court of the identity of the witness. Similar provision is made for the accused in the new section 271P(3), except that the accused must always disclose the identity of the witness to the prosecutor and the court but do not have to disclose it to any other defendant.

335. The new section 271P(4) provides that where the prosecutor or the accused proposes to make an application for a witness anonymity order, information that might identify the witness can be taken out of any relevant material which is disclosed before the application has been determined. This does not, however, override the obligation to disclose the identity of the witness to the court (in the case of a prosecutor’s application) or to the court and prosecutor (in the case of an accused’s application).

336. The new section 271P(2) also enables the court to direct that it should not be informed of the identity of the witness. This provides for the possibility that, whilst in the vast majority of cases the court will require to be informed of the witness’s identity, there may be rare cases (particularly national security related cases) where even the court will neither need nor wish to know it.

337. The new section 271P(6) and (7) set out two basic principles. Subsection (6) states that on an application for a witness anonymity order every party to the proceedings must be given the opportunity to be heard. However, it may be necessary in the course of making the application to reveal some or all of the very information to which the application relates: for example, the name and address of the witness who is fearful of being identified. So subsection (7) provides that the court has the power to hear any party without an accused or the accused’s legal representative being present. This reflects the existing practice, by which prosecution applications were expected to be made in the absence of any other parties in the case, with the accused able to make representations later at a hearing with the prosecution (and possibly other accused) present.
It is expected that defence applications will be permitted without other accused being present but will always be made in the presence of the prosecution.

338. The new section 271Q(1) and (2) requires four conditions to be met before a court can make a witness anonymity order. They are described as conditions A, B, C and D.

339. The new section 271Q(3) sets out condition A, which is that the measures to be specified in the order are necessary for one of two reasons. The first is to protect the safety of the witness or another person or to prevent serious damage to property. There is no requirement for any actual threat to the witness or any other person. The second is to prevent real harm to the public interest. This will include, but will not be restricted to, the public interest in police or security service undercover officers being able to carry out future operations, whether or not they are fearful in any particular case.

340. The new section 271Q(4) sets out condition B, which is that the effect of the order would be consistent with the accused receiving a fair trial. Thus the grant of the order must be compliant with Article 6 of the ECHR.

341. The new section 271Q(5) sets out condition C, which is that the witness’s testimony is such that in the interests of justice the witness ought to testify and new section 271Q(6) provides that either the witness would not testify if the order was not made or there would be real harm to the public interest if the witness were to testify without an order being made (such harm might, for example, arise as a result of the identity of a member of the security services being made public).

342. The new section 271Q(7) specifies that in determining for the purposes of condition A whether the order is necessary to protect the safety of the witness, another person or prevent damage to property, the court must have regard to the witness’s reasonable fear of death or injury either to himself or herself or to another person (for example family members or friends) or reasonable fear that there would be serious damage to property (for example fire bombing the witness’s home).

343. The new section 271R(1) requires the court to have regard to the considerations set out in the new section 271R(2) when deciding whether to make an order. The court must also have regard to any other factors it considers relevant.

344. The considerations in new section 271R(2) are the accused’s general right to know the identity of a witness, the extent to which credibility of the witness is relevant in assessing the weight of the evidence he or she gives, whether the witness’s evidence might be the sole or decisive evidence in implicating the accused, whether the witness’s evidence can be properly tested without knowing the witness’s identity, whether the witness has a tendency or any motive to be dishonest and whether alternative means could be used to protect the witness’s identity.

345. New section 271S requires the judge to warn the jury in a trial on indictment in such way as the judge considers appropriate, so as to ensure that the fact that the order was made does not prejudice the accused.

346. New section 271T(1), (2) and (3) provide for the court that has made an order to discharge or vary it in those proceedings, either on an application by a party to the proceedings or on its own initiative. This power may be used where, for example, a witness who previously gave evidence anonymously is content for the anonymity to be lifted.

347. New section 271T(4) the court must give every party to the proceedings an opportunity to be heard before determining an application for variation or discharge of an order or before varying or discharging an order on its own initiative.

348. New subsection 271U(1) sets out the various grounds for making an appeal to the High Court in relation to witness anonymity orders. An appeal can be made by the prosecutor or the accused. New section 271U(2) states that an appeal to the High Court can be allowed by the court hearing the trial in which the witness who is subject to an application for an anonymity order is to give evidence. As well as allowing for the prosecution and the accused to seek leave to make an appeal, this section also provides that the court itself may grant leave to appeal to the High Court on its own initiative.

349. New section 271U(4) allows the High Court hearing the appeal to postpone the relevant trial for as long as it thinks appropriate and instruct that any postponement should not affect any time limit associated with the case being tried.

350. New section 271V provides that the High Court, having considered an appeal, must overturn the granting of a witness anonymity order by the court hearing the relevant trial if it decides that the decision to grant the order was wrong in law. Once this decision has been taken the trial can continue but without the witness who was the subject of the order giving their evidence anonymously.
351. New section 271W enables the High Court, having considered an appeal, to reverse the decision of a court which has refused an application for a witness anonymity order, if it concludes that the decision of the judge in that court was wrong in law. The High Court must then order that appropriate measures should be taken to preserve the anonymity of the relevant witness when he or she is giving their evidence.

352. New subsections 271X(1) and (2) enable the High Court, having considered an appeal, to reverse the decision of a court that has varied the way in which the witness anonymity order has been applied if it concludes that the decision of the judge in that court was wrong according to the law. New subsection 271X(3) provides that the High Court can decide that other variations to the order are justified under the relevant terms of the law as set out at 271Q and 271R.

353. New subsection 271Y(1) enables the High Court, having considered an appeal, to reverse the decision of a court that has refused an application made by either the prosecutor or the accused to vary or disallow a witness anonymity order if it concludes that the decision of the judge in that court was wrong according to the law. Thereafter new subsections 271Y(2) and (3) provide for the High Court to disallow an order or vary it depending on the case, and allows it make an additional variation to the order as it deems appropriate and under the relevant terms of the law as set out at 271Q and 271R.

354. Subsection (2) provides for the coming into effect of provisions for witness anonymity orders.

355. Subsection (3) provides that witness anonymity orders made under an existing rule of law in a trial or a hearing that starts before the day the new provisions come into effect are not affected by the coming into force of these provisions.

Section 67 - Television link evidence

356. This section provides that section 273 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 will be amended to allow witnesses to give evidence from abroad via live television link in all criminal proceedings in the High Court or sheriff court.

357. A new section 273A is inserted that allows witnesses to give evidence via live television link from outwith Scotland, but within the United Kingdom, from an acceptable location within the United Kingdom, thereby relieving them of the requirement to travel to Scotland and give their evidence in the Scottish court.

PART 5 - CRIMINAL JUSTICE

Section 68 - Upper age limit for jurors

358. This section provides that the upper age limit for jurors serving on criminal juries in Scotland will be extended from the current limit of 65 to 70 years of age.

359. This involves amendment to section 1 of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Act 1980. This amendment will allow individuals between 65 and 70 years of age to be cited for jury service on criminal trials Scotland. Extending the upper age limit will also require amendment of sections 2 and 3 of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Act 1980 which relate to fines for non-attendance and offences relating to jury service in that these will apply to persons between 65 and 70 years of age. The upper age limit for jurors serving on civil trials remains unchanged at 65 years of age.

Section 69 - Persons excusable from jury service

360. This section replaces paragraph (a) of Schedule 1, Part 3, Group F of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Act 1980 concerning the period of entitlement to excusal from criminal jury service in Scotland. This section makes provision to reduce the exemption period from 5 to 2 years for individuals who attend court but who are not subsequently balloted to sit on a jury. Currently the system makes no distinction between those who attend at court as required but do not then get picked from the ballot to serve, and those who attend and are selected by ballot to form part of a jury in a case.

361. It is not the intention that this should be a retrospective change; rather it will apply from the commencement date of this section of the legislation. This subsection has no impact on the power that a judge has, for example following particularly long or difficult trials, to direct that jurors be excused from service for any period up to and including excusal for life.

Section 70 - Data matching for detection of fraud etc.

362. Section 73 of, and Schedule 7 to, the Serious Crime Act 2007 provided the national audit agencies in England, Wales and Northern Ireland with the power to match data, and provides statutory provision for an existing data-matching scheme known as the National Fraud Initiative. The National Fraud Initiative is a UK-wide data matching scheme conducted for the purpose of assisting in the prevention and detection of fraud.

363. Section 70 of this Bill amends the Public Finance and Accountability (Scotland) Act 2000 to provide equivalent provisions enabling the National Fraud Initiative to be carried out in Scotland on a statutory basis. The main amendment consists of the insertion of a new Part 2A (Data Matching) of the 2000 Act consisting of sections 26A to 26G.

364. Section 26A(1) provides for Audit Scotland to carry out data matching exercises or to arrange for another organisation to do this on its behalf. Subsection (2) defines what a data matching exercise is. It involves the comparison of sets of data, for example, the taking of two local authority payroll databases and matching them. Matching exercises may identify fraudulent activity as having taken place. Subsection (3) defines the purposes for which a data matching exercise can be exercised. These purposes are assisting in the prevention and detection of fraud, assisting in the prevention and detection of crime other than fraud, and assisting in the apprehension and prosecution of offenders. Subsection (4) provides that data matching may not be used to identify patterns and trends in an individual’s characteristics or behaviour which suggest nothing more than his potential to commit fraud in future. This is designed to prevent the Audit Scotland from creating individual "profiles" of future fraudsters.
365. Section 26B(1) provides that a person may disclose data to Audit Scotland for the purposes of a data matching exercise. This could include private sector bodies such as mortgage providers who wish to be part of the exercise. There is no compulsion on any of these bodies to take part in a data matching exercise. Subsection (2) provides that the disclosure of information does not breach (a) any duty of confidentiality owed by a person making the disclosure or (b) any other restriction on the disclosure of information, however imposed. Subsection (3) provides that nothing relating to voluntary provision of data authorises any disclosure which (a) contravenes the Data Protection Act 1998, or (b) is prohibited by Part 1 of the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000, or (c) allows the disclosure of data comprising or including patient data. Subsection (4) defines patient data as meaning data relating to an individual which is held for medical purposes and from which the individual can be identified. Subsection (5) defines medical purposes. Subsection (6) provides that this section does not limit the circumstances in which data may be disclosed apart from this section. Subsection (7) provides that data matching exercises may include data disclosed by a person outside Scotland.

366. Section 26C(1) enables Audit Scotland to require the disclosure of information to conduct a data matching exercise. Subsection (2) sets out which persons may be required to disclose data under subsection (1). They are those bodies whose accounts are subject to audit by the Auditor General, or are sent to him for auditing, local authorities, Licensing Boards and their officers, office-holders or members. Subsection (5) creates an offence and accompanying penalty for non-compliance with this requirement.

367. Section 26D sets out the circumstances in which information relating to a data matching exercise, including the results of such an exercise, may be disclosed by or on behalf of Audit Scotland, and the persons and bodies to whom the data may be disclosed. Subsection (6) imposes special restrictions on the disclosure of information if it includes patient data (as defined in subsection (7). Subsection (8) places restrictions on the further disclosure of information disclosed under subsection (2) and allows the further disclosure in certain specified circumstances. Subsection (9) creates an offence of disclosing information where the disclosure is made other than as authorised by subsections (2) and (8), and sets out the penalty.

368. Section 26E(1) makes clear that Audit Scotland will be able to publish a report on its data matching exercises notwithstanding the limitation on disclosure as is provided under section 26D. Subsection (2) provides that a report that is published under section 26E may not include information relating to a particular person if (a) the person is the subject of any data included in the data matching exercise; and (b) the person can be identified from the information; and (c) the data is not otherwise in the public domain. Subsection (3) provides that Audit Scotland may publish a report in such a manner as it considers appropriate for bringing it to the attention of those members of the public who may be interested. Subsection (5) preserves the existing powers of an auditor to publish information under Part 2 of the 2000 Act or Part 7 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973.

369. Section 26F(1) provides that Audit Scotland must prepare and keep under review a code of data matching practice. Subsection (2) sets out that all those involved in this process must have regard to the code of data matching practice. Subsection (3) requires Audit Scotland to consult all those bodies or office holders who must provide data, the Information Commissioner, and such other bodies as Audit Scotland thinks appropriate before preparing or altering the code of data matching. Subsection (4) places a duty on Audit Scotland to publish the code from time to time.

370. Section 26G(1) provides for the Scottish Ministers to add public bodies to those listed in new section 26C(2) by order. The Scottish Ministers may also, by that subsection, modify the application of Part 2A to any body so added, and may remove bodies from section 26C(2). Subsection (2) provides that any order made under section 26G can include any incidental, consequential, supplemental or transitional provision the Scottish Ministers think fit. Subsection (3) defines the meaning of public body. Subsection (4) provides that a public body, whose functions are both public and private in nature, is a public body only to the extent of its functions which are public in nature.

371. Section 70(2) amends section 11 of the 2000 Act to allow Audit Scotland to impose reasonable charges in respect of the exercise of its functions in connection with a data matching exercise (such fees would currently be charged as part of any audit fee), and for these charges to be imposed on those who supply data for a data matching exercise and/or those who receive the results of such an exercise.

Section 71 - Sharing information with anti-fraud organisations

373. Sections 68 to 72 of the 2007 Act provide the framework for the scheme. The information may be information of any kind, including personal and documentary information. Sections 68(5) and (6), 69(3) and 71(4) of the 2007 Act provide that the information sharing scheme, by which certain information may be shared for the purposes of preventing fraud, shall extend to reserved but not devolved information held by Scottish public authorities. By repealing these sections of the 2007 Act, this section will allow Scottish public authorities to disclose devolved information, for the purposes of the prevention of fraud or a particular kind of fraud, to a specified anti-fraud organisation.

374. Section 68(5) and (6) of the 2007 Act, excludes Scottish public authorities from the information sharing scheme in respect of devolved information. This section repeals 68(5) and (6) and as a result will allow Scottish public authorities to disclose and share such devolved information with anti-fraud organisations in the same way as public authorities in England, Wales and Northern Ireland.

375. Section 69(1) makes it an offence for a person to further disclose protected information which had been disclosed by a public authority member of an anti-fraud organisation or otherwise in accordance with any arrangements made by such an organisation. “Protected information” is any revenue and customs information disclosed by HM Revenue and Customs which reveals the identity of the persons to whom the information relates, and specified information disclosed by other public authorities. Section 69(3) provides that this offence does not apply where the original disclosure was by a relevant public authority (ie an authority not covered by the new power in section 68) and related to devolved matters. As the power in section 68 is being extended to cover devolved information of Scottish public authorities, this exclusion can be removed and the offence in section 69(1) will apply to any protected information.

376. Section 71 of the 2007 Act provides that the Secretary of State must prepare and keep under review a code of practice with respect of the disclosure, for the purposes of preventing fraud or a particular type of fraud, of information by public authorities. This section of the Bill repeals section 71(4) of the 2007 Act so that the code of practice will apply for disclosures of devolved information made for the purposes of the prevention of fraud by Scottish public authorities. Section 71(4) of the 2007 Act provides that this does not apply in relation to disclosures, relating to devolved information, by Scottish public authorities. This section of the Bill also repeals in part section 71(6) of the 2007 Act to remove the now redundant definition of “relevant public authority”.

Section 72 - Closure of premises associated with human exploitation etc.

377. This section makes amendments to the Antisocial Behaviour etc. (Scotland) Act 2004 and provides for the closure of premises associated with the commission of “exploitation offences” such as human trafficking and child sexual abuse. Subsection (1) inserts new subsections (3A) and (3B) into section 26 of the 2004 Act. The inserted subsections (3A) and (3B) set out the grounds on which a senior police officer may authorise the service of a closure notice in cases involving an exploitation offence.

378. Subsection (2) amends the provisions in section 27 of the 2004 Act to take account of the form and service of a closure notice in cases involving an exploitation offence.

379. Subsection (3) makes amendments to section 30 of the 2004 Act and inserts new subsections (2A) and (3A). The inserted subsection (2A) sets out the conditions that must be met before the sheriff can make a closure order in respect of premises associated with the commission of an exploitation offence. The inserted subsection (3A) provides that, in determining whether or not to make a closure order, a sheriff shall have regard to any vulnerability of a victim of an exploitation offence.

380. Subsection (4) inserts new subsections (1A) and (3A) into section 32 of the 2004 Act. The inserted subsection (1A) enables a sheriff to extend the duration of a closure order for a period not exceeding the maximum period where it is necessary to prevent the commission of an exploitation offence. The inserted subsection (3A) sets out the conditions which must be satisfied before a senior police officer can make an application to extend the period for which a closure order has effect in cases involving an exploitation offence.

381. Subsection (5) amends section 33 of the 2004 Act in order to provide for the revocation of a closure order, following an application, in cases involving an exploitation offence.

382. Subsection (6) amends section 36 of the 2004 Act in order to provide for the making of appeals in respect of closure orders which have been given an extension in cases involving an exploitation offence.
383. Subsection (7) inserts a new section 40A into the 2004 Act and sets out the offences which may be considered as exploitation offences for the closure of premises under the 2004 Act.

Section 73 - Sexual offences prevention orders

384. Section 73 makes a number of amendments to the provisions of the Sexual Offences Act 2003 which relate to sexual offences prevention orders (SOPOs).

385. Subsections (1) and (2)(a) make provision concerning the criteria which currently exist in some cases before a person may become subject to the notification requirements under the 2003 Act, and before a SOPO can be made. Courts in Scotland can make a SOPO when dealing with an offender for an offence listed in Schedule 3 to the 2003 Act. For some offences listed in Schedule 3 there are conditions, which are based on the sentence or age of the persons involved in the offence, in place which currently limit the application of the scheme which provides for the making of a SOPO. Section 141 of the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 amended the 2003 Act for England and Wales and Northern Ireland to provide that these conditions do not restrict the making of a SOPO in cases where the conditions are not met. Section 73(1) and (2)(a) extends the application of the amendment made by section 141 of the 2008 Act so that it applies in Scotland.

386. Subsection (2)(b) corrects a minor error in section 109 of the Sexual Offences Act 2003. It ensures that section 107(2) will apply in applications for interim SOPOs. That section provides that prohibitions (which will, in due course, be extended by the Bill to include requirements) may be included in an order are those necessary for the purpose of protecting the public or any particular members of the public from serious sexual harm from the defendant, applies to interim SOPOs as well as full SOPOs.

387. Subsection (2)(c) inserts new section 111A into the Sexual Offences Act 2003. New subsections 111A(2)-(3) have effect of extending the permitted content of a SOPO, and an interim SOPO, so that the court can impose requirements as well as such other terms in the order, whether prohibitions, restrictions, or other terms, as it considers appropriate so as to protect the public by preventing, restricting or disrupting the involvement of the subject of the order in sexual crime.

388. Subsection (2)(d) amends section 112 of the Sexual Offences Act 2003 to provide that a SOPO may be made at the instance of the court or on the motion of the prosecutor.

Section 74 - Foreign travel orders

389. This section amends the provisions on foreign travel orders (“FTO”) in Part 2 of the Sexual Offences Act 2003 (“the 2003 Act”).

390. Subsections (2) and (3) amend sections 115 and 116 of the 2003 Act by increasing the age of a child from under 16 to under 18. The effect of subsection (2) is that a court can impose a foreign travel order on a qualifying offender if that offender is considered to pose a risk to a child who is outside the United Kingdom who is aged under 18.
391. The effect of subsection (3) is that it alters the criteria determining which sex offenders are to be regarded as “qualifying offenders”. A qualifying offender is a sex offender against whom a court may impose a FTO, provided all the other criteria set out in sections 114 to 116 of the 2003 Act are met. The amendment means that those who have committed certain sexual offences against children under 18, rather than offences against children under 16 will be regarded as “qualifying offenders”.

392. Subsection (4) amends section 117 of the 2003 Act to increase the maximum duration of any foreign travel order specified in s117(2), from six months to five years. Therefore, a court has the discretion to impose a FTO on a qualifying offender for any period of time up to a maximum of 5 years.

393. Subsection (5) inserts a new section 117B into the 2003 Act to require offenders who are subject to a FTO imposed under section 117(2)(c), that prohibits them from travelling anywhere in the world, to surrender their passports at a police station specified in the order. Such offenders must also surrender any new passports which they acquire throughout the duration of a FTO.

394. This new section also requires the police to return any passport as soon as reasonably practicable after the relevant FTO has ceased, unless that passport is a foreign passport or a passport issued by an international organisation and it has been returned by the police to the authorities outside the United Kingdom which issued the passport.

395. Subsection (6) amends section 122 of the 2003 Act to create a new offence of failing to comply with a requirement to surrender a passport.

Section 75 - Risk of sexual harm orders

396. Section 75 amends provisions of the Protection of Children and Prevention of Sexual Offences (Scotland) Act 2005 which concern risk of sexual harm orders. The amendments are similar to those provided by section 73 for sexual offences prevention orders and have the effect of extending the permitted content of a risk of sexual harm order so that the court can impose requirements on persons who are made subject to such orders. Currently, like SOPOs, risk of sexual harm orders can only impose prohibitions on such persons.

Section 76 – Obtaining information from outwith United Kingdom

397. The Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission (SCCRC) cannot currently issue, or apply for, a letter to request assistance from outwith the United Kingdom because its investigations are not within the scope of the Crime (International Co-operation) Act 2003 (“the 2003 Act”).

398. This section creates a bespoke power for the SCCRC to apply to a judge of the High Court to request assistance in obtaining information from outwith the United Kingdom for the purposes of carrying out its functions.

399. Section 7 of the 2003 Act sets out the authorities which may make requests for assistance, and in which circumstances and form requests may be made. Section 8 of the 2003 Act deals with requests for assistance from the United Kingdom and sets out to which authorities requests may be sent. Section 9 of the 2003 Act sets out what may be done with the evidence obtained in relation to a request for assistance from abroad under section 7 of this Act.

400. Subsection (4) applies section 8 of the 2003 Act to requests for assistance from abroad by the SCCRC in the same way as it applies to section 7 of the 2003 Act, so that, requests for assistance are sent to a foreign court or authority designated by government of that country, or Interpol or EuroJust in cases of urgency.

401. Subsection (5) applies provisions of section 9 of the 2003 Act to requests for assistance from abroad by the SCCRC in the same way as they apply to section 7 of the 2003 Act. The effect is that information may not without the consent of the appropriate overseas authority be used for any purpose other that specified in the request and when information is no longer required for that purpose (or any other purpose for which consent has been obtained) it must be returned to the appropriate overseas authority, unless that authority indicates that it need not be returned.

Section 77 – Grant of authorisations for directed and intrusive surveillance

402. This section amends the Regulation of Investigatory Powers (Scotland) Act 2000 (“the 2000 Act”) in relation to joint surveillance operations.

403. Subsection (2) inserts a new section 9A into the 2000 Act which makes provision about who may grant authorisations for the use of directed surveillance in a joint surveillance operation. Subsection (6) inserts a definition of “joint surveillance operation” into section 31 of the 2000 Act; such an operation is one involving at least two police forces in Scotland working together, or at least one police force in Scotland and the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency (“the SCDEA”) working together.

404. Section 9A(2) provides that the persons who are designated for the purpose of granting an authorisation for directed surveillance in a joint surveillance operation are the same people who are designated for the purposes of section 6 of the 2000 Act in terms of an order made by the Scottish Ministers under section 8(1)¹ of that Act to grant authorisations for directed surveillance where the operation is not a joint surveillance operation: in relation to the SCDEA, that person is an officer of the rank of at least Superintendant or Grade PO7 Authorising Officer (Inspector in an urgent case); in relation to a police force that person is an officer of the rank of at least Superintendent (Inspector in an urgent case).

405. Subsection (3) amends section 10 (authorisations for intrusive surveillance) of the 2000 Act in two ways. Currently, the persons who may grant authorisations for the carrying out of intrusive surveillance are the chief constable of a police force and the Director General of the SCDEA. Section 10 is amended so as to include the Deputy Director General of the SCDEA as a person who may grant an authorisation for intrusive surveillance. Secondly, section 10 is further amended so as to provide that those same persons (namely, a chief constable of a police force, the Director General and the Deputy Director General) are permitted to grant authorisations for the carrying out of an intrusive surveillance operation where it is a joint surveillance operation.

406. Subsections (4) and (5) make consequential amendments as a result of the addition of the Deputy Director General of the SCDEA as a person who may grant authorisations for the carrying out of intrusive surveillance (including a joint surveillance operation). Subsection (4) amends section 11(3) of the 2000 Act so as to make it clear that the Deputy Director General of the SCDEA can only grant an authorisation for the carrying out of intrusive surveillance where the application is made by a police member of that Agency. Subsection (5) amends section 12A(1) of the 2000 Act so as to include the Deputy Director General of the SCDEA within the ambit of that section which deals with the grant of authorisations for intrusive surveillance in cases of urgency.

407. Subsection (6) amends section 31 of the 2000 Act so as to include a definition of joint surveillance operation.

Section 78 – Authorisations to interfere with property etc.

408. This section amends section 93 of the Police Act 1997 (“the 1997 Act”) so as to make equivalent amendments in relation to authorisations for interference with property as those which have been made by virtue of section 76 in relation to authorisations for directed and intrusive surveillance.

409. Subsection (2)(a) inserts subsections (3A) to (3D) into section 93 of the 1997 Act. Subsections (3A) to (3C) make provision about authorisations to interfere with property where there is a joint operation. Subsection (3D) defines a “joint operation” in the same way as it is defined for the purposes of the 2000 Act.

410. These provisions when read together ensure that in the case of a joint operation, the chief constable of a Scottish police force involved in the operation may authorise the persons mentioned in subsection (3C) to take action under section 93(1) of the 1997 Act. The persons mentioned in subsection (3C) are constables of any of the police forces involved in the joint operation (including action which might be outwith the area of operation of the constable’s own force) and if the SCDEA are involved in the operation, a police member of that Agency.

411. Similarly, where the SCDEA is involved in the joint operation, the Director General or the Deputy Director General of the SCDEA may authorise the persons mentioned in subsection (3C) to take action under section 93(1) to interfere with property.

412. As the 1997 Act extends to England and Wales also, subsection (3B)(a)(i) is designed to ensure that the amendments will only catch Scottish police forces.
413. Subsection (2)(b) amends subsection (5)(j) of section 93 of the 1997 Act so as to include the Deputy Director General of the SCDEA alongside the Director General as an “authorising officer” who may authorise interference with property.

414. Subsection (3)(c) inserts subsections (6) and (7) into section 94 (authorisation given in the absence of authorising officer) of the 1997 Act. These two new provisions read together make it clear that where the SCDEA are the lead Agency in a joint operation and the Director General or the Deputy Director General are not available then an application for an authorisation to interfere with property may be made to the chief constable of one of the forces involved in the joint operation.

415. Subsection (3)(a) and (b) make amendments consequential upon the insertion of new subsections (6) and (7) into section 94 of the 1997 Act.

Section 79 - Amendments of Part 5 of Police Act 1997

416. This section amends Part 5 of the Police Act 1997 (“the 1997 Act”). The 1997 Act is the legislation under which criminal record certificates (basic, standard and enhanced disclosures) are issued for employment and other purposes. The day to day functions of the Scottish Ministers under Part 5 of the 1997 Act are carried out by Disclosure Scotland.

417. Section 79 makes 2 amendments to the 1997 Act: the first provides an order making power to amend 5 definitions used in Part 5 of the 1997 Act; and the second clarifies the power to charge fees in connection with registration in the register of registered persons kept under section 120 of the 1997 Act.

418. Subsection (2) inserts a new section 113BA into Part 5 of the 1997 Act that will enable Scottish Ministers, by order, to amend the definitions of the expressions: “criminal conviction certificate” (basic disclosure) in section 112(2); “central records” in sections 112(3) and 113A(6); “criminal record certificate” (standard disclosure) in section 113A(3); “relevant matter” in section 113A(6); and “enhanced criminal record certificate” (enhanced disclosure) in section 113B(3).

419. Section 113BA(2) restricts the use of the order making power. An order can only be made to enable certificates to include information held outside the United Kingdom. Section 113BA(3) provides that any order will be a class 1 instrument, i.e. it cannot be made unless it has been laid in draft and approved by resolution of the Scottish Parliament.

420. It is intended that the order making power will be used to enable disclosure certificates to include relevant information from outside the United Kingdom (e.g. information relating to convictions for offences outside the United Kingdom) where that information has been provided to the Scottish Ministers on the basis that it may be used for employment purposes.

421. The second amendment to the 1997 Act is at section 79(3) and the effect is to insert 2 new subsections into section 120ZB.
422. An application for either a standard or an enhanced disclosure certificate must be countersigned by a person whose name is listed in the register kept by Scottish Ministers under section 120 of the 1997 Act. Section 120ZB, which was inserted into the 1997 Act by section 81 of the Protection of Vulnerable Groups (Scotland) Act 2007 (not yet in force), allows regulations to be made about this registration.

423. Section 120ZB(2A) clarifies the fee charging power in section 120ZB(2)(a). It provides that, in particular Ministers may charge fees in respect of applications to be listed in the register, this will allow fees for registration itself and for the nomination of counter-signatories. Different fees may be charged in different circumstances, annual or recurring fees may be charged and fees may be charged in advance or arrears.

424. It is intended that the power will be used to provide different fees for different situations. For example, a different charge is likely to be made for inclusion in the register for the first time as compared with an application from someone already listed to have another signatory added to act on behalf of their registration entry.

425. Lastly, section 120ZB(2B) will enable Ministers to disregard an application for inclusion in the register if the fee for that application is not paid.

Section 80 - Assistance for victim support

426. This section allows the Scottish Ministers to make grants for the purposes of the provision of assistance to victims, witnesses or other persons affected by a criminal offence. This extends the power to make grants under section 10 of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968, which permits grants to be made to national organisations or innovative projects, but excludes grants to local authorities.

Section 81 - Public defence solicitors

427. This section amends section 28A of the Legal Aid (Scotland) Act 1986 ("the 1986 Act") to place the Public Defence Solicitors Office ("the PDSO") on a permanent footing. The PDSO was established in 1998 to provide criminal defence services from solicitors employed by the Scottish Legal Aid Board ("the Board") on a trial basis.

428. Section 28A of the 1986 Act currently provides for regulations to be made for the purpose of carrying out a feasibility study. It also provides for the laying of a report before Parliament by 31 December 2008. The report was laid on 23 December 2008 [SG/2008/259]. This section removes these provisions as the PDSO is to be permanent.

429. Regulations have been made under section 28A of the 1986 Act\(^2\). These regulations make provision for the employment of solicitors by the Board to provide criminal legal assistance.

\(^2\) The Scottish Legal Aid Board (Employment of Solicitors to Provide Criminal Legal Assistance) Regulations 1998 (SI 1998/1938) as amended by the Scottish Legal Aid Board (Employment of Solicitors to Provide Criminal Legal Assistance) Amendment Regulations 2008 (SSI 2003/511)
Section 82 - Compensation for miscarriages of justice

430. The Scottish Government operates two schemes for the payment of compensation as a result of a miscarriage of justice. The statutory scheme under section 133 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 (“the 1988 Act”) provides for compensation to be paid in certain circumstances. The decision as to whether compensation is payable is for Scottish Ministers but the amount of the award is quantified solely by an independent assessor. An ex gratia scheme covering other types of cases has also operated for a number of years with successful cases treated in the same way as statutory ones by the assessor.

431. Subsection (1)(a) provides an Order-making power for Scottish Ministers to specify further sets of circumstances in which compensation may be payable. This power will be used to replace the existing ex gratia scheme by placing it on a statutory footing with the existing statutory scheme. It is intended to correspond to the existing ex gratia criteria. The seriousness of the offence for which the individual was charged or detained, but not convicted, will be taken account of when assessing compensation (subsection (1)(c)). This is consistent with the way the assessor takes into account the seriousness of the offence when assessing compensation under the statutory scheme where the individual had been convicted.

432. Subsection (1)(b) inserts a new section into the 1988 Act to impose a time limit of 3 years for applications to be made for compensation. It also allows a discretionary power for the Scottish Ministers to waive that time limit where it is in the interests of justice to do so, or where there are exceptional circumstances. The 3 year time limit is consistent with civil limitation periods for personal injury claims.

433. Subsection (1)(d) makes the Independent Assessors have particular regard to any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers. It is necessary to have a statutory basis for this guidance as the assessor is discharging a quasi-judicial role. It is not intended for the guidance to impinge on the independence of the assessor when making a decision on the quantum of a claim but is designed to promote consistency in decision making.

434. Section 133(5) of the 1988 Act states that a conviction being “reversed” (one of the criteria for eligibility for compensation) shall be taken to mean as referring to a conviction being quashed in certain circumstances. Section 188 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 allows for a conviction and sentence or both to be set aside by way of a minute from the prosecutor to the court without an appeal being heard but in such circumstances this would not entitle a successful appellant to seek compensation for a miscarriage of justice. Subsection (1)(e) makes appropriate changes to the 1988 Act to allow someone who has had their conviction set aside by way of section 188(1)(b) of the 1995 Act to be considered for compensation.

435. Subsection (1)(f) makes an amendment to the 1988 Act so that those persons who are subject to a probation order or discharged absolutely are eligible to seek compensation in accordance with the Act. The order-making power in this section is exercisable by statutory instrument subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of the Scottish Parliament.

436. Subsection (2) removes a redundant reference to the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board in Schedule 12 to the 1988 Act.
Section 83 - Financial reporting orders

437. The Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005 (“the 2005 Act”) introduced the use of Financial Reporting Orders (FRO). Those persons subject to an FRO are required to report their financial dealings over a specified period of time as directed by the court. In Scotland they can only be applied when someone is convicted of the common law offence of fraud or an offence specified in Schedule 4 to the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002.

438. Section 83 amends section 77 of the 2005 Act by inserting a new subsection (4A). The inserted subsection (4A) sets out the two ways in which an FRO can be made. It makes it clear that either a prosecutor may apply to the court to make an FRO or the court may make such an order at its own instance.

Section 84 - Compensation orders

439. Under section 249 of the 1995 Act, where a person is convicted of an offence, the court may make an order requiring him to pay compensation for any personal injury, loss or damage caused directly or indirectly, or alarm or distress caused directly, to the victim.

440. A court cannot make a compensation order in respect of loss suffered in consequence of the death of any person; or injury loss or damage due to an accident involving a motor vehicle on the road, except where the damage is treated as having arisen out of the theft of the car by the convicted person.

441. The maximum amount which may be awarded under a compensation order by a sheriff or stipendiary magistrate in summary proceedings is £10,000 (“the prescribed sum”). The maximum amount which can be awarded by a Justice of the Peace is an amount not exceeding level 4 on the standard scale (£2,500). In solemn proceedings there is no limit on the amount which may be awarded.

442. Subsection (1)(a)(i) amends section 249(1) of the 1995 Act. This allows courts to make compensation orders in relation to deaths or road accidents, subject to the following amendments.

443. Subsection (1)(a)(ii) amends section 249(1) to clarify that a compensation order must be paid in favour of the victim.

444. Subsection (1)(b) inserts a new subsection (1B) into section 249, which provides that compensation may be paid to a victim or a person who is liable for funeral expenses. A new subsection (1C) is also inserted, which defines a victim as either the person who has suffered injury, loss or damage, or a relative who has suffered a bereavement caused by an offence being committed.

445. Subsection (1)(c) inserts new subsections (3A), (3B) and (3C) into section 249. Subsection (3A) allows a compensation order to be made in cases where a road accident has been caused by an uninsured driver, provided no other type of compensation is payable. Subsection (3B) provides that where a compensation order is made following damage to a stolen vehicle or an accident with an uninsured driver, then that compensation may include some or all of the cost of the loss of preferential insurance rates. Subsection (3C) provides that a compensation order may be made in respect of loss suffered as a result of bereavement and funeral expenses in connection with a person’s death, except where the death was as a result of a road accident.

446. Subsection (1)(d) amends subsection (4) of section 249. This provides that unless subsections (3) – (3C) allow a compensation order to be made, then compensation orders shall not be made in respect of loss relating to a death or, injury, loss or damage relating to a road accident.

447. In some exceptional cases, statute provides that summary courts may impose a maximum fine, the amount of which exceeds “the prescribed sum” (i.e. the statutory maximum) of £10,000 set out by section 225(8) of the 1995 Act. Subsection (1)(f) inserts a new subsection (8A) into section 249 of the 1995 Act. Section (8A) allows the sheriff, in cases where an exceptionally high fine may be imposed, to make an compensation order up to the same amount.

448. Subsection (2) amends section 251 of the 1995 Act. It repeals paragraph (a) of subsection (1) of section 251 and removes the power of the court to reduce or discharge the compensation order when the injury, loss or damage has been held in civil proceedings to be less than it was taken to be for the purposes of the compensation order. This removes any explicit link with civil proceedings.

449. Subsection (2)(b) inserts a new subsection (1A) into section 251 of the 1995 Act. Subsection (1A) allows the court to review the compensation order at any time before it has been fully complied with and gives the court the power to increase the order if materially new information about the means of the offender has become available or the offender’s financial circumstances have improved.

PART 6 - DISCLOSURE

450. This part of the Bill makes provision concerning the disclosure of evidence in criminal proceedings. It is a long established rule in the Scottish legal system that the Crown has an obligation to give the accused notice of the case against him, i.e. to tell him what charges he faces and what evidence the Crown intends to bring to prove the charges. Any exculpatory material should be identified and given/disclosed to the accused/defence. Disclosure is presently carried out on a common law basis but it is clear that there are shortcomings in the current regime. A series of high profile decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council including the cases of Holland and Sinclair, have refined that duty but have also given rise to some uncertainty about the exact requirements of the duty of disclosure.

451. Following these decisions Lord Coulsfield was invited to carry out a review on the law and practice of disclosure of evidence in the Scottish criminal justice system, which was published in August 2007. He recommended that disclosure would benefit from having a statutory framework. The provisions in the Bill seek to give effect to that recommendation and build on other recommendations made to clarify the law and practice in disclosure in criminal proceedings.
Section 85 - Meaning of “information”

452. This section defines what the term “information” covers where it is used in the provisions. It covers material of any kind (other than precognition statements and victim statements) which is given to or obtained by the prosecutor in connection with the case against the accused. It makes clear that material previous convictions and outstanding charges of those witnesses that the prosecutor intends to lead in evidence are disclosed. In solemn cases, any statements of witnesses whom the prosecutor intends to call against the accused are covered. In summary cases the statement itself need not be disclosed although any information contained in it that has not otherwise been disclosed to the accused should be disclosed. It is also designed to make clear that, although a precognition or victim statement does not require to be disclosed, where there is information contained in a precognition or victim statement which does require to be disclosed, that information should be disclosed.

Section 86 – Provision of information to prosecutor

453. This section creates a duty on an investigating officer, whether a police officer or officer of an investigating agency (as defined in subsection (9)), to create and submit schedules listing information gathered during the course of an investigation which may be relevant to cases which are brought by solemn proceedings only. As soon as practicable after the accused has appeared for the first time in the proceedings, the prosecutor will give notice of that appearance to the investigating agency to which the appearance relates. On receiving that notice, the investigating agency must prepare and give the schedule/s to the prosecutor. The information ingathered which may be relevant to the case for or against the accused will appear in one of three schedules (sensitive, highly sensitive or non-sensitive) dependant upon the nature of the information. On each schedule there will be an entry in respect of each piece of information held, together with a brief description of the information.

454. Subsection (7) provides that, where the investigating agency has previously included a reference to a piece of information on a schedule, whether that be because the same matter has been the subject of earlier proceedings or otherwise, it need not repeat that information in any subsequent schedule.

455. Subsection (8) defines “sensitive” in relation to an item of information.

Section 87 – Continuing duty to provide schedules of information

456. This section provides for a continuing duty on the investigating agency to submit further schedules to the prosecutor where additional, further information that may be relevant to the case for or against the accused is obtained during the course of the investigation. This duty continues until proceedings against the accused are concluded. Subsection (4) sets out circumstances in which the proceedings are deemed to have concluded.

Section 88 – Review and adjustment of schedules of information

457. This section provides for a duty on the prosecutor to review schedules of information, on their receipt from the investigating agency, and, in so doing, consider whether they agree with the category of sensitivity specified for each piece of information as shown on the schedule/s by the investigating body i.e. sensitive, non-sensitive or highly sensitive.

458. Subsection (3) provides that when the prosecutor disagrees with the category of sensitivity given to the information by the investigating agency, as shown in the schedule/s, the prosecutor will return the schedule/s to the investigating agency and instruct that it be amended and resubmitted to the prosecutor. Subsection (4) provides that the investigating agency must, as soon as practicable after receiving the schedule/s, then adjust the schedule/s in the way required by the prosecutor and submit a revised schedule.

Section 89 – Prosecutor’s duty to disclose information

459. This section sets out the test by which information has to be disclosed to the accused under the statutory scheme. It provides that, where the accused appears for the first time in solemn proceedings, or where a plea of not guilty is recorded against the accused charged on summary complaint that the prosecutor has a duty to consider whether all information which may be relevant to the case for or against the accused meets the test. The prosecutor must review all such information of which he is aware (i.e. all information submitted to the prosecutor by the investigating agency) and determine whether subsection (3) applies to any of the information.

460. Subsection (3) sets out the rules which determine whether the information must be disclosed by the prosecutor. If subsection (3) applies to any of that information then the prosecutor must disclose all such information to the accused. Subsection (4) gives specific, non-exhaustive examples of types of information that the prosecutor must disclose. If subsection (3) does not apply to any of that information, then the prosecutor need not disclose that information to the accused.

461. Subsection (6) ensures that where, in any case, there is no such information that the prosecutor requires to disclose to the accused the prosecutor must notify the accused that, at that point in time, there is nothing that requires to be disclosed in respect of that case.

462. Subsection (7) provides that the prosecutor need not disclose anything that he has already disclosed in respect of the same matter (whether because it has been the subject matter of earlier proceedings or otherwise).

Section 90 – Continuing duty of prosecutor

463. This section confirms that in cases where the disclosure statutory scheme is to apply that the prosecutor has a duty to proactively review information that may be relevant to the case for or against the accused of which the prosecutor is aware for the purposes of complying with the disclosure scheme, until such time as the case concluded. Subsection (5) defines when a case is considered concluded.
Section 91 – Exemptions from disclosure

464. This section sets out the information which is exempt from the statutory scheme for disclosure. Information, the disclosure of which is prohibited by section 17 of the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000, must not be disclosed.

Section 92 – Redaction of non-disclosable information by prosecutor

465. This section applies where the Crown has a document or other piece of information in its possession that satisfies the disclosure test and which contains information which is not under a duty to disclose. This provision enables the Crown to be able to redact, edit or obscure the non-disclosable information from the document.

Section 93 – Solemn cases: additional disclosure requirement

466. This section provides that in solemn cases the prosecutor must disclose to the accused a schedule of any information which relates to the proceedings against the accused and which falls into the category of non-sensitive. The disclosure of this schedule, in solemn cases, is in addition to the basic requirement of disclosure of information, which meets the disclosure test.

Section 94 – Defence statements: solemn proceedings

467. This section provides that defence statements shall be mandatory in all solemn cases and provides the timings for lodging of such statements. Subsection (1) sets out the effect of a defence statement; that is, as soon as practicable after the accused lodges a defence statement or a pre-trial statement, the prosecutor must review all of the information which may be relevant to the case for or against the accused of which he is aware for the purposes of complying with the disclosure scheme.

468. Subsection 2 amends the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 by inserting a new section 70A. That section provides that the accused must lodge a defence statement at least 14 days before the first diet, in sheriff and jury proceedings, and the preliminary hearing, in High Court proceedings. The information that the defence statement must contain is specified in subsection (6) of new section 70A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995.

469. New section 70A also provides that, at least 7 days before the trial diet, the accused must lodge a pre-trial statement. This statement must set out whether there has been a material change in circumstances since the defence statement was lodged and, if so, it must set out the details of that change and what the new position is. Subsection (5) enables the accused to lodge a defence statement at any other time before the trial diet.

Section 95 – Defence statements: summary proceedings

470. This section enables the accused to make a defence statement to the prosecutor in those summary proceedings where a plea of not guilty is recorded against the accused. The accused may do so in such cases at any time following the plea of not guilty until the conclusion of the proceedings. Subsection (5) defines when proceedings are to be taken to be concluded.
471. Subsection (2) sets out what a defence statement shall contain.

472. By subsection (3) the prosecutor must, as soon as practicable after receiving the defence statement, review all the information that relates to the proceedings of which the prosecutor is aware for the purposes of determining whether the disclosure test is satisfied. By subsection (3) the prosecutor must then either disclose any information that he is required to disclose that has, thus far, not been disclosed on account of it so far not meeting the disclosure test or inform the accused that the information has been reviewed but that no further information requires to be disclosed.

Section 96 – Effect of guilty plea

473. This section provides that where the prosecutor is required to disclose information to an accused, but before doing so a plea of guilty is recorded against the accused, that the prosecutor need not comply with the requirement in so far as it relates to the disclosure of information which is likely to form part of the prosecution case. If the accused withdraws the plea of guilty then this provision ceases to apply.

Section 97 – Means of disclosure

474. This section provides that the prosecutor may disclose information by any means including allowing the information to be viewed by the accused at a reasonable time and place. The provision is designed to make clear that the means of disclosure is entirely a matter for the prosecutor’s discretion, and will ensure that it is open to the Crown to fulfil its disclosure obligations through provision of a narrative detailing the information.

Section 98 – Confidentiality of disclosed information

475. This section covers disclosed information and restricts how the accused and others may use information that has been disclosed to him. The restrictions are set out in subsections (2) and (4). These prevent the accused and all other persons to whom the information has been disclosed, whether by the prosecutor or any other person, from using or sharing disclosed information with anyone else in any way except where subsection (3) applies.

476. Subsections (3) and (5) make provision to ensure that, notwithstanding the overall restriction, the accused may use the information disclosed to him for certain specified purposes connected with the preparation and presentation of his case or appeal and with a view to taking an appeal, including references to the SCCRC.

477. Subsection (6) ensures that other legislation is given effect to, for example Data Protection Act 1998 and any other statutory scheme which creates prohibitions or obligations of confidentiality

Section 99 – Contravention of section 98

478. This section provides that any person who misuses information or otherwise breaches the confidentiality of the information, in terms of section 98, which has been disclosed to them will commit an offence. The section provides that the maximum sentence on conviction in summary proceedings is 12 months imprisonment or a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or both and, on conviction on indictment, 2 years imprisonment or a fine or both.

Section 100 – Order enabling disclosure to third party

479. This section enables the accused to apply to the court for an order allowing him to disclose information to a third party. The accused need not make an application if the use or disclosure is for any of the purposes set out in section 98(3).

480. Before making the order the court must allow the prosecutor and anyone else with an interest in the information the opportunity to make representations.

Section 101 – Contravention of order under section 100

481. This section provides that a person who knowingly uses or discloses information in contravention of an order enabling disclosure to a third party commits an offence and the maximum sentence for that offence, on conviction, in summary proceedings, 12 months imprisonment or a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or both and, on conviction on indictment, 2 years imprisonment or to a fine or both.

482. Sections 102 through to 113 establish a procedure whereby the prosecution can seek authority of the Court not to disclose otherwise disclosable information on the grounds that disclosure would compromise a compelling public interest

Section 102 – Application for non-disclosure order

483. Section 102 provides for an application to be made to the Court by the prosecutor for an order prohibiting disclosure of information which he would otherwise require to disclose where such disclosure would create a risk of substantial prejudice to an important public interest. Subsection (2) sets out what that public interest means i.e. would likely cause serious injury, or death to any person, or would likely obstruct or prevent the prevention, detection, investigation or prosecution of crime or would be likely to cause serious prejudice to the public interest.

484. Subsection (3) provides that the prosecutor must make an application for a non-disclosure order in those circumstances.

485. Subsection (4) explains the effect of a non-disclosure order i.e. if the order is granted by the court, the prosecutor may withhold from the accused an item or items of information specified in the order which would otherwise require to be disclosed.

Section 103 – Application for non-notification order or exclusion order

486. Lord Coulsfield envisaged there being three types of procedure, broadly described as type 1, type 2 and type 3:
• Non-Disclosure application only - Crown and defence (and special counsel if appointed by the court) represented at hearing and have opportunity to make representations
• Exclusion with non disclosure applications - Crown represented at hearing and special counsel if appointed by Court. Defence may be represented only to allow them to be heard on the procedure, thereafter they are to be excluded from the hearing to decide whether the non-disclosure order is to be made
• Non-notification with exclusion and non disclosure applications - Crown represented at hearing and special counsel if appointed by Court. Accused and his/her legal representative are not present and are not notified of any of the hearings.

The provisions are designed to give effect to this.

487. Section 103 sets out the procedure where a prosecutor has applied for a non-notification order or an exclusion order. Subsection (2) provides that the prosecutor may apply for a non-notification order and/or an exclusion order in relation to solemn proceedings only.

488. Subsection (3) provides that the prosecutor can apply for an exclusion order in summary proceedings i.e. a non-notification order cannot be sought in summary proceedings.

489. Subsection (4) explains the effect of a non-notification order i.e. that it is an order prohibiting notice being given to the accused of the making of the applications for non-notification, exclusion and non-disclosure orders and also the decisions of the court in relation to any of those applications.

490. Subsection (5) explains the effect of an exclusion order i.e. that it is an order prohibiting the accused from attending or making representations in proceedings relating to the application for a non-disclosure order.

491. Subsections (6) and (7) set out the order in which the court must consider each application. Before making a decision on whether a non-disclosure should be granted the court must first make a decision in relation to any applications for non-notification and/or exclusion. This has the effect of ensuring that the court first considers whether any application for non-notification (if applied for) should be granted, then considers whether any application for exclusion should be granted (if applied for) and only then can consider whether the application for non-disclosure should be made.

Section 104 – Application for non-notification order and exclusion order

492. This section applies where the prosecutor has made an application for both a non-notification order and an exclusion order.

493. Subsection (2) requires the court, first, to fix a hearing to determine whether a non-notification order should be made.
494. Subsections (3) and (4) establish that, where an application is made for non notification the accused will not be notified of either the making of such applications or of the hearing. The accused will not be represented or appear at the hearing, also. (Although his interests may be represented by Special Counsel if one is appointed by the court).

495. Subsection (5) provides that the court must make a non-notification order if the conditions set out in subsection (6) are met. The tests in subsection (6) require the court to look at the information, and to consider what the effect will be of revealing it to the accused even where an application has been made; whilst at the same time in considering disclosure versus non disclosure, balancing the competing interests of the injury to the public interest imperative on the one side, with the private individuals interests and right to a fair trial on the other.

496. Subsection (7) provides that if the court makes a non-notification order, the court must grant the application for an exclusion order, also.

497. Subsection (8) provides that, if the court refuses to make a non-notification order, the court will then appoint a hearing to determine the application for an exclusion order and the accused will then be notified that an application for an exclusion order has been made and invited to attend at the hearing that has been appointed. At that hearing the prosecutor and accused will both be entitled to make representations, after which, the court may make an exclusion order if it is satisfied that the conditions in section 105(4) are met (see below).

Section 105 – Application for exclusion order

498. This section allows the prosecutor to apply for an exclusion order to exclude the accused from a hearing. This would result in an accused being excluded from attending and making representations at a hearing of the non-disclosure order.

499. Subsection (2) provides that on receiving an application for an exclusion order the court must appoint a hearing.

500. Subsections (3) and (4) provide for the Court to make an exclusion order providing certain conditions are met after it has given both the prosecutor and the accused the opportunity to be heard. The tests in subsection (4) require the court to look at the information, and to consider what the effect will be of revealing the nature of the information to the accused; whilst at the same time in considering disclosure versus non disclosure, balancing the competing interests of the injury to the public interest imperative on the one side, with the private individuals interests and right to a fair trial on the other.

Section 106 – Application for non-disclosure order: determination

501. This section allows the prosecutor to apply for a non disclosure order which would result in the information in question not being disclosed to the accused.

502. Subsections (2) and (3) provide for the court to make a non-disclosure order where certain conditions are met. The court must consider the information that the application relates to and give the prosecutor and, if the accused has not been excluded, the accused the opportunity to make representation to the court. The court must also consider whether the prosecutor is required to disclose the information in question and whether, if it were to be disclosed, it would be likely to cause serious injury, or death, to any person, or it would be likely to obstruct or prevent the prevention, detection, investigation or prosecution of crime or it would be likely to cause serious prejudice to the public interest. The court is required to balance the public interest against the private individual’s right to a fair trial. A further test is at subsection (3)(d) - that the public interest would be protected only by non-disclosure.

503. Subsection (4) provides that the court must consider whether the information could be disclosed or partly disclosed in such a way as to provide the accused with something rather than nothing and still achieve the correct balance between public and private interests.

504. Subsections (5) and (6) provide for ways in which the court might decide that information could be disclosed e.g. by provision of redacted or edited information or summaries of the information or any other way specified in the order.

Section 107 – Special counsel

505. This section gives a power to the court in considering an application for a non- notification order, an exclusion order or a non-disclosure order, to appoint special counsel to represent the interests of the accused in respect of the applications at a hearing on any or all of the applications. The test for such appointment is in subsection (3).

Section 108 – Appeal by prosecutor against refusal of application for order

506. This section provides for a prosecutor to be able to appeal against a court decision to refuse an application for a non-notification order and an exclusion order, or an application for an exclusion order or a non-disclosure order.

Section 109 - Appeal by accused against making of exclusion order or non-disclosure order

507. This section provides for an accused to be able to appeal against a court decision to make an exclusion order or a non-disclosure order.

Section 110 - Appeal by special counsel

508. This section provides for any special counsel appointed to be able to appeal against a court decision to make a non-notification order and an exclusion order, an exclusion order or a non-disclosure order.

Section 111 – Review of grant of non-disclosure order

509. This section entitles the prosecutor or the accused to apply to the court to seek review of a non-disclosure order. This would be on the basis that they have become aware of material information which was not available at the time the order was made.
510. Subsections (1) and (2) provide that such an application for review can be made only where the court has made a non-disclosure order, where the prosecutor or accused becomes aware of information that was unavailable to the court at the time of making that order and that the prosecutor or accused considers that the information is material information that the prosecutor ought to disclose.

511. Subsection (3) provides who can attend at a review hearing: the same parties as were heard in relation to the non-disclosure order will have the opportunity to make representations i.e. where there is a non-notification order and/or exclusion order in place, only the prosecutor and any special counsel appointed may be heard; where there are no such orders, the prosecutor, accused and any special counsel may all be heard.

512. In terms of subsection (4), where there was a non-notification order in place and the court is satisfied that the grounds for non-notification remain, the court may make an order prohibiting the accused being notified of the application, having the same effect as a non-notification order.

513. Similarly, in terms of subsection (5), where there was an exclusion order in place and the court is satisfied that the grounds for exclusion remain, the court may make an order excluding the accused from the review.

514. Subsection (6) provides that if the court is satisfied that the grounds for non-disclosure no longer remain, the court may recall the non-disclosure order, or make an order for partial disclosure.

515. Subsections (8) and (9) have the effect of allowing applications for review at any time following the making of the non-disclosure order until the conclusion of the proceedings, as defined in subsection (9).

Section 112 – Review by court of non-disclosure order

516. Section 112 provides that the court is to be under a duty to keep under review the appropriateness of a non-disclosure order made until the conclusion of the proceedings.

517. Subsection (2) provides that, where the court considers that the non-disclosure order might not be appropriate, the court must appoint a hearing to reconsider the order.

Section 113 – Applications and reviews: general provisions

518. This section sets out the procedure for dealing with applications, appeals and reviews of non-disclosure, exclusion and non-notification orders. The accused is not entitled to see or be made aware of the contents of the application for such orders or the application for the review of such orders or the information itself that the applications are designed to protect.
Section 114 – Code of practice

519. This section provides for a code of practice to accompany the legislation. It is intended that the legislation will provide the statutory framework for the disclosure scheme and the code will provide the detail on how it will operate in practice.

520. Subsections (1) and (4) provide for the Lord Advocate to prepare the code and lay it and any revisions to the code before Parliament. The intended effect of the provisions is that the code will regulate its own procedures and the date on which it, and any revised code, comes into effect.

521. Subsections (2) and (3) specify those persons who must have regard to the code namely police, prosecutors and any other investigating agency whom the Scottish Ministers prescribe, who carry out functions in relation to the investigation of crime and sudden deaths.

Section 115 – Acts of Adjournal

522. This section provides for the High Court to make such rules as it considers necessary to give full effect to these provisions.

Section 116 – Interpretation of Part 6

523. Subsection (1) clarifies the meaning of “prosecutor” and “procurator fiscal” where they appear in these provisions.

524. Subsection (2) clarifies that where there are references to the accused having information disclosed to him, or imposes any obligation on him in relation to disclosure; those references should be read as including reference to a solicitor or advocate acting on behalf of the accused.

PART 7 - MENTAL DISORDER AND UNFITNESS FOR TRIAL

Section 117 - Criminal responsibility of persons with mental disorder

525. Sections 117 to 120 and associated minor amendments in Schedule 5 implement the Scottish Law Commission’s Report on Insanity and Diminished Responsibility, published in 2004. The provisions directly reflect the draft Bill contained in the Commission’s Report, with changes only to reflect the incorporation of the provisions within the larger Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill, to deal with changes to the law since the Commission’s Report, and to correct some minor errors and omissions.

526. Section 117 introduces a new statutory defence to replace the common law defence of insanity. It does so by inserting a new section 51A into the 1995 Act. It provides for a special defence in respect of persons who lack criminal responsibility by reason of their mental disorder at the time of the offence with which they are charged.

527. Subsection (1) sets out the test for the new statutory defence. It provides that there are two elements to the test. The first is the presence of a mental disorder suffered by the accused at the time of the conduct constituting the offence. Secondly, the mental disorder must have a specific effect on the accused for the defence to be available. This effect is the inability of the accused to appreciate either the nature or wrongfulness of the conduct constituting the offence. ‘Nature’ and ‘wrongfulness’ are alternative concepts and the defence may be established by proving lack of appreciation in respect of only one of them. The concept of appreciation is wider than that of mere knowledge. Failure to appreciate the nature of conduct would not therefore be precluded by knowledge of the physical attributes of the conduct. Similarly the defence may be available to an accused who knew that his conduct was in breach of legal or moral norms but who had reasons for believing that he was nonetheless right to do what he did.

528. Subsection (2) provides that the special defence does not apply to a person who at the time of the conduct constituting the offence had a mental disorder which consisted of a psychopathic personality disorder alone. The exclusion in this subsection applies only to psychopathic personality disorder. Other forms of personality disorder may give rise to the defence provided that the effect on the accused satisfies the test in subsection (1) above. The defence would also be available where psychopathic personality disorder co-existed with another mental disorder (including other personality disorders) provided that the effect of the other mental disorder falls within the test in subsection (1).

529. Under the common law insanity is classified as a special defence. Subsection (3) provides for a similar rule in relation to the new statutory defence based on mental disorder. The main effect of the characterisation of a defence as a special defence is in relation to various procedural requirements under the 1995 Act (e.g. section 78(1) (giving of notice), section 89 (reading of the defence to the jury)).

530. Subsection (4) deals with who can raise the defence and with the relevant standard of proof. It provides that the special defence can be raised only by the person charged with the offence. It cannot be raised by the Crown or by the court of its own accord. This provision is in contrast to the common law defence, which can be raised by the Crown. The subsection also provides that the standard of proof on an accused person who states the defence is the balance of probabilities. This rule corresponds with that for the common law defence of insanity (HM Advocate v Mitchell 1951 JC 53).

531. Section 117 introduces a statutory version of the plea of diminished responsibility in place of the common law plea. It does so by inserting a new section 51B into the 1995 Act. The test for the statutory plea is modelled on the common law as set out in Galbraith v HM Advocate 2002 JC 1, subject to some variations noted below.

532. Subsection (1) provides that a plea of diminished responsibility is applicable in cases of murder but not in respect of any other crime or offence. The effect of the plea, if proved, is that a person who would otherwise be convicted of murder is to be convicted instead of culpable homicide. The main difference between the two outcomes is that the court has a discretion in sentencing a person convicted of culpable homicide which it lacks in a murder case (a person convicted of murder must be given a sentence of life imprisonment: 1995 Act, section 205(1)). The test for the plea is based on that laid down in Galbraith v HM Advocate, namely at the time of the killing the accused must have been suffering from an abnormality of mind which substantially impaired his ability to determine or control his conduct. Comments by the Court in
533. Subsection (2) makes two significant changes to the law on the plea of diminished responsibility. At common law the plea is not available where the relevant abnormality of mind falls within the scope of the insanity defence. The position is different under the Bill where the accused’s condition at the time of an unlawful killing falls within the definitions of the both the defence based on mental disorder and diminished responsibility. In this situation, the accused has the option of advancing either the defence or the plea. Secondly the subsection allows for diminished responsibility to be based on the condition of psychopathic personality disorder. At common law this condition cannot be used as a basis for the plea (Carraher v HM Advocate 1946 JC 108). The subsection makes clear that this exclusion does not apply to the statutory test for diminished responsibility.

534. Subsection (3) clarifies the effect which a state of intoxication has on the availability of diminished responsibility. In the first place, the provision re-states the rule laid down in Brennan v HM Advocate 1977 JC 38 that a person who kills whilst in state of intoxication cannot found a plea of diminished responsibility on that condition. Secondly, it states that the presence of intoxication does not preclude diminished responsibility provided that there is a basis for the plea independently of the intoxication.

535. Subsection (4) deals with the burden and standard of proof in relation to a plea of diminished responsibility. The subsection follows the same approach as that for the defence based on mental disorder. Only the accused can raise the plea, and if raised the accused has to prove diminished responsibility on the balance of probabilities. The rule is in substance the same as the common law rule (HM Advocate v Braithwaite 1945 JC 55).

Section 118 - Acquittal involving mental disorder: procedure

536. Section 118 inserts a new section 53E into the 1995 Act. The new section deals with the procedure where an accused is acquitted by reason of mental disorder.

537. Subsection (1) of the new section 53E replaces the existing statutory procedure under section 54(6) of the 1995 Act for acquittal involving mental disorder. Under section 54(6) of the 1995 Act (before its repeal by this Bill), where the defence of insanity is raised in a solemn case, there must be a verdict returned by the jury. A consequence of section 54(6) is that a jury requires to be empanelled and directed to return a verdict even where the Crown accepts a plea of insanity. This subsection provides for a different procedure for the statutory defence based on mental disorder. Where the Crown accepts a plea by the accused based on the defence, the court is to declare that the accused has been acquitted by reason of the special defence. This provision assimilates the procedure for solemn and summary cases. A declaration setting out the special nature of the acquittal is necessary in order to trigger the provisions in Part VI of the 1995 Act which deal with disposals.

538. Subsections (2) and (3) of the new section 53E provide for the situation where the Crown has not accepted a plea by the accused of the defence based on mental disorder. The defence does not become an issue for the court or jury to consider unless there has been evidence to support it. If the defence falls to be considered, in solemn cases the court must direct the jury to make a finding whether or not they accept that the defence has been established. Where the jury find that the defence has been established they must also declare whether their verdict of acquittal is based on the defence. A similar procedure applies in summary cases, where the court must state whether it finds that the defence has been established. If it has, the court must also declare whether the accused has been acquitted on that ground. The purpose of the declaration, in both solemn and summary cases, is to deal with the possibility that a jury might acquit the accused on some other ground. In this situation, even if the defence has been proved, the acquittal is not a special one triggering the disposal provisions of Part VI of the 1995 Act.

Section 119 - Unfitness for trial

539. Subsection (1) inserts a new section 53F into the 1995 Act. The new section replaces the existing common law rule on insanity as a plea in bar of trial, with a new statutory plea of unfitness based on the mental or physical condition of the accused.

540. Subsection (1) of the new section 53F sets out a general test for the new statutory plea of unfitness for trial. The effect of the provision is that a person is unfit for trial if he cannot effectively participate in the proceedings because of his mental or physical condition.

541. The Bill does not change the common law rule that the issue of an accused’s fitness for trial may be raised by the accused, the Crown, or by the court. However, this subsection makes clear that the appropriate standard of proof for a finding of unfitness for trial is on the balance of probabilities.

542. Subsection (2) of the new section 53F lists various inabilities which if proved in respect of the accused indicate his unfitness for trial. The list in paragraph (a) is illustrative, and not exhaustive, of the types of inabilities which constitute lack of ability to participate effective in proceedings. Paragraph (b) provides that other factors may be relevant to making a determination.

543. Subsection (3) of the new section 53F applies to the statutory plea a common rule laid down in Russell v HM Advocate 1946 JC 37. It makes clear that a person is not unfit for trial simply because he cannot remember what happened at the time of the offence with which he is charged. However the rule does not apply where the accused is suffering from problems affecting memory of events at the time of the trial itself.

544. Subsection (4) of the new section 53F explains the meaning of “the court” when used in the new section 53F.

545. Subsection (2) of section 119 amends the title of section 54 of the 1995 Act and introduces some amendments to that section.

546. Subsection (2)(a)(i) repeals part of section 54(1) of the 1995 Act. Section 54(1) of the 1995 Act contained a requirement that various court orders must be based on the evidence of two medical practitioners, one of whom must have been approved as having special expertise in mental health. The effect of subsection 2(a)(i) is that this requirement does not apply to a finding by a court that a person is unfit for trial.

547. Subsections (2)(b) and (c) amend section 54 to reflect the names for the new defence and plea in bar of trial. References to insanity as a plea in bar are changed to refer to unfitness for trial.

548. Subsection (3) of section 119 repeals subsection (6) of section 54 of the 1995 Act. That provision dealt with procedure on insanity as a defence. The repeal follows on from the introduction by section 118 of the Bill of the new statutory defence based on the accused’s mental disorder. By placing the defence in provisions separate from section 54, the definition of "court" in section 54(8) no longer applies to the procedure relating to the defence. The effect is to make clear that the provisions for recording an acquittal based on the defence apply to proceedings in the district/justice of the peace courts.

549. Subsection (3) of section 119 also repeals subsection (7) of section 54 of the 1995 Act. The effect is that the procedure in summary cases for the giving of notice of a plea of unfitness for trial is governed by the general rules for intimation of pleas in bar (see 1995 Act, section 144).

Section 120 - Abolition of common law rules

550. The effect of section 120 is to abolish any existing common law rules regarding the special defence of insanity, the plea of diminished responsibility and the plea of insanity in bar of trial.

PART 8 - LICENSING UNDER CIVIC GOVERNMENT (SCOTLAND) ACT 1982

551. Part 8 of the Bill makes various changes to the general licensing provisions of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 and to its specific provisions on metal dealers, market operators, public entertainment, late hours catering, and taxis and private hire cars.

Section 121 - Conditions to which licences under 1982 Act are to be subject

552. This section provides for mandatory and standard conditions to be attached to licences issued under the 1982 Act and makes consequential amendments.

553. Mandatory conditions are determined by the Scottish Ministers, or by the 1982 Act itself or other powers under other legislation to prescribe conditions. Under new section 3A(3), the order-making power for the Scottish Ministers to set mandatory conditions will be subject to the negative resolution procedure.

554. Standard conditions are determined by the licensing authorities under the 1982 Act - they must not be inconsistent with any mandatory conditions and must be reasonable. Licensing authorities have a duty (new section 3B(4)) to publish standard conditions determined by them and these can be applied to deemed grants or renewals (i.e. grant or renewal of licences where the authority has failed to reach a decision on an application within the statutory period allowed). Subsection (6) enables licensing authorities to impose further conditions, as well as omit or vary any of the standard conditions applicable to licences.
555. For both mandatory and standard conditions, different sets of conditions can be set for different types of licence (e.g. boat-hire licences or street traders’ licences under sections 38 and 39 of the 1982 Act respectively).

Section 122 - Licensing: powers of entry and inspection for civilian employees

556. Section 5 of the 1982 Act empowers a constable or ‘authorised officer’ to enter and inspect premises to ensure compliance with licence conditions. This section extends the powers of ‘authorised officers’ to include civilian staff employed by the police (under the provisions of section 9 of the Police (Scotland) Act 1967) and makes consequential amendments to other parts of the 1982 Act.

Section 123 - Licensing of metal dealers

557. Under section 9 of the 1982 Act, the provisions dealing with the regulation and licensing of metal dealers and itinerant metal dealers are mandatory for licensing authorities to operate.
Subsection (2) replaces the mandatory licensing scheme with an optional scheme, i.e. it will be open to local licensing authorities to determine whether or not a licence is required in their areas.

558. Subsection (3) repeals the exemption from the metal dealers’ licensing scheme provisions (section 29 of the 1982 Act), thus bringing all metal dealers within the scope of the scheme, and makes consequential amendments. Licensing authorities are, however, empowered by this subsection to determine whether any exemptions should apply and, if so, at what level of annual turnover. Where licensing authorities opt to provide for exemptions, they are under a duty to publish details of them.

Section 124 – Licensing of taxis and private hire cars

559. Subsection (2) amends section 13(3) of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 to provide that an applicant for a taxi or private hire car driver’s licence must have held throughout the period of 12 months immediately prior to the date of the application a licence authorising the person to drive a motor car issued under Part III of the Road Traffic Act 1988 or a licence which would at the time of the application entitle the person to such a licence without taking a test, not being a provisional licence.

560. Subsection (3) inserts new sections 17(2) – (4) which provide that a licensing authority must fix scales for the fares and other charges referred to in subsection (1) within 18 months beginning with the date on which the scales came into effect. Subsection (3) provides that in fixing the scales under subsection (2) a licensing authority may alter the fares or other charges or fix fares or other charges at the same rates. Subsection (4) provides that the licensing authority review the scales in accordance with subsection (4A) before fixing scales under subsection (2). Subsection (4A)(a) provides that a licensing authority, in carrying out a review, consult with persons or organisations appearing to be representative of taxi operators in the area.
Subsections (4A)(b) and (c) set out procedures for consultation and notification of the licensing authority’s proposals and subsection (d) provides that they consider any representations received thereon. Subsection 4B provides that a review must be completed before the end of the 18 month period beginning with the fixing of scales under subsection (2). Subsection (4D) sets out the duty to give notice as to the effect of the fare scales fixed and subsection (4E) contains the notification requirements. Subsection (4F) provides that after fixing scales they must notify all operators of taxis within their area and the persons and organisations consulted under subsection (4A)(a). Section 17(5)(a) is amended to extend the period provided for notification of a licensing authority’s decision from 5 days to 7 days.

561. Subsection (4) amends section 18(1) and introduces a new section 18(1A) to extend the right of appeal against the decision by a licensing authority in regard to the fixing of taxi fare scales or review to persons or bodies representative of taxi operators in the licensing area.

562. Subsection (5) inserts a new section 18A(1) which provides that following the fixing of scales or the carrying out of a review the licensing authority must determine the date upon which the scales are to come into effect and publish them in accordance with the terms of section 18A(3) to (5). Section 18A(2) provides that the revised scales may not come into effect earlier than 7 days after the date on which they were published. Sections 18A(3) to (5) set out the notification procedures and the timescale to be followed. Section 18(9) is repealed in consequence.

Section 125 - Licensing of market operators

563. Subsection (2) removes the exemption from the market operators’ licensing provisions for non-commercial organisations at section 40(2) of the 1982 Act. While this will bring charitable organisations etc within the scope of the licensing provisions, licensing authorities have discretion as to whether to charge reduced or no fees to such organisations.

564. Subsection (3) repeals the words “by retail” from section 40(4) of the 1982 Act. Some licensing authorities have been reluctant to use their powers to license car boot sales because of the authorities’ interpretation of those words. Removal of “by retail” should remove any restrictive interpretation and allow licensing authorities to regulate car boot sales along with other types of market operators.

Section 126 – Licensing of public entertainment

565. Subsection (2) repeals the words “on payment of money or money’s worth” from section 41(2) of the 1982 Act. This allows licensing authorities to control large-scale public entertainments that are free to enter but authorities have discretion whether to license events such as gala days or school fetes.

566. Subsection (2) also updates some references to gambling legislation for premises that are exempt from the public entertainment licensing provisions (sections 41(2)(d) and (e) of the 1982 Act refer) and empowers the Scottish Ministers to add other premises to the list of exemptions. Under subsection (3), the order-making power for the Scottish Ministers to exempt other premises will be subject to the negative resolution procedure.

Section 127 – Licensing of late night catering

567. Under section 42 of the 1982 Act, premises providing meals and refreshments between 11pm and 5am require to be licensed where licensing authorities have opted to use this provision. This section replaces the references to “meals or refreshments” with “food”, thus bringing late-night grocers and 24-hour stores within the scope of the provisions. It will continue to be for licensing authorities to determine which classes of premises actually require to be licensed.
These documents relate to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

Section 128 - Applications for licences

568. This section requires people applying for licences under the 1982 Act to provide details of their date and place of birth on the application forms. Where the applicant is not responsible for the day-to-day management of the activity being licensed, an employee or agent with such responsibility must provide such details. Similar provision is made in respect of applications on behalf of companies.

569. Subsections (2)(c), (d), (e), (f) and (g), and subsections (3)(d), (f), (g) and (h) amend various time limits of the application process to: make representations; provide reasons for decisions; give notice of hearings; and for licensing authorities to consider licence renewal applications received after the expiry date as renewals, rather than new applications.

570. Subsection (3)(e) updates paragraph 9(3) of Schedule 2 to the 1982 Act to reflect the position of the United Kingdom as a member state of the European Union and its obligations under EC law.

PART 9 - ALCOHOL LICENSING

Section 129 - Sale of alcohol to persons under 21 etc.

571. Each Licensing Board is required by section 6 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 (‘the 2005 Act’) to publish a licensing policy statement which is a statement of the policy on how it will carry out its functions. Such a statement must be prepared every three years. A Board may choose to publish a supplementary licensing policy statement during the three year period that the licensing policy statement applies. In preparing a licensing policy statement or a supplementary licensing policy statement a Board must consult with various people and ensure that the policy statement promotes the licensing objectives found in section 4 of the 2005 Act.

572. Subsection (3) inserts a new section 7A into the 2005 Act requiring Licensing Boards to include within the licensing policy statement a statement regarding the effect of off sales on those under 21 and whether this is having a detrimental effect on one or more of the licensing objectives in the whole or part of the Licensing Board’s area. For example a Board may decide that there was only a detrimental impact in certain communities.

573. The detrimental impact statement will form part of the three yearly licensing policy statement. It can also be published as a supplementary licensing policy statement in between the three year period. Subsection (6) of this new section enables the Police or the Local Licensing Forum set up by section 10 of the 2005 Act to require the Licensing Board to consider the detrimental impact assessment with a view to changing it in whole or in part. Following such consideration the Licensing Board may choose to publish a supplementary licensing policy statement.
574. In exercising its functions under the 2005 Act a Licensing Board is required to have regard to its licensing policy statement and any supplementary licensing policy statement it may have published (section 6(4) of the 2005 Act). The addition of the detrimental impact statement on off-sales to those under 21 would therefore enable a Licensing Board to have a policy of applying a condition to licensed premises which banned the sale of alcohol to those under 21 depending on the policy statement this could entail a restriction on off-sales to those under 21 in terms of geographical area, type of premises or time.

575. A Licensing Board can only impose conditions on a premises licence when it grants the licence under section 27(6) of the 2005 Act or if it reviews a premises licence under section 36 to 40 of the 2005 Act in those circumstances it may only do so on a case by case basis. Subsection (4) will enable Licensing Boards to vary all the premises in its area, or vary a category, or group of premises and apply the same conditions to all the premises in its area or the category or group of licences. A Board is only able to impose a bloc condition if the Board considers it necessary or expedient for the purposes of any of the licensing objectives (section 4 of the 2005 Act). Licensing Boards will also be restricted to imposing bloc conditions to areas set out by the Scottish Ministers in affirmative regulations under section 146 of the 2005 Act.

Section 130 - Premises licence applications: notification requirements

576. This section amends the list of those to whom the Licensing Board must send a copy of an application when undertaking its obligations under section 21(1) of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005. Previously a copy of the application was required to accompany each notice issued under section 21(1) of the 2005 Act. The section also removes the chief constable’s obligation to provide the Board with antisocial behaviour reports. A Licensing Board’s ability to request such reports is now provided for under section 24A of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005, inserted by section 132 of the Bill.

Section 131 - Premises licence applications: modification of layout plans

577. This section amends section 23(7) of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 concerning the determination of an application for a premises licence. Section 23(7) provided that a Licensing Board could propose a modification to the operating plan in circumstances where the Licensing Board would otherwise refuse the application. The Licensing Board would grant the license if the applicant agreed to the proposed modification.

578. This section extends section 23(7) so that a Licensing Board can also propose a modification to the layout plan, which is required to accompany the application under section 20(2)(b) of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005. The Licensing Board may propose a modification to the layout plan in circumstances where the Licensing Board would otherwise refuse the application. The Licensing Board grants the license if the applicant agrees to the proposed modification. The amendment allows the Licensing Board to propose modifications to either the operating plan or the layout plan, or both if necessary.

Section 132 - Premises licence applications: antisocial behaviour reports

579. This section amends the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 requirements concerning a Chief Constable’s obligation to provide the Licensing Board with an antisocial behaviour report. It would be no longer necessary for the chief constable to provide a report in respect of every application. Instead, a report will only be required if the Licensing Board requests one, or if the chief constable wishes to forward a report for the Board’s consideration.
These documents relate to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

Section 133 – Sale of alcohol to trade

580. This section adjusts an offence in the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 to enable the trade as defined by section 147(2) of the 2005 Act to purchase alcohol from a premises which holds a premises licence or occasional licence granted for the sale of alcohol under section 17 and 56 of the 2005 Act respectively. Previously the trade would only have been able to purchase from premises which supplied trade only. This section would now allow, for example, a restaurant owner to purchase alcohol from a supermarket for the restaurant without committing an offence.

Section 134 - Occasional licences

581. This section reduces the length of time a Licensing Board is required to wait for comments from the Chief Constable and the Licensing Standards Officer in respect of an application for an occasional licence by the Chief Constable and the Licensing Standards Officer from 21 days to a period of not less than 24 hours where the Licensing Board is satisfied that the application requires to be dealt with quickly. This section however restricts the ability to delegate approval of occasional licences which are “fast tracked” in this way to any member of the Board, any committee established by the Board and the clerk of the Board.

Section 135 - Extended hours application: variation of conditions

582. This section will enable Licensing Boards to amend for the first time the conditions of operation for a licensed premises for the duration of the extended period and the period that the extension applies to. For example if a premises was ordinarily open on a Saturday from 11am until 11pm and applied to extend its licence to 2am on that day, a Licensing Board would be able to vary conditions, for example, requiring door supervisors or use of plastic drinking vessels for the whole period, 11am on Saturday until 2am on Sunday, or any part of that period, not just for the extended period after 11pm.

Section 136 - Personal licences

583. Under section 76(3) of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 a personal licence is not valid if at the time it is issued the individual to whom it is issued already holds a personal licence. The 2005 Act does not prevent an applicant making a second application, it is not a criminal offence and a Licensing Board must grant the application as the 2005 Act does not enable a Board to refuse an application on the grounds that an applicant already holds one.

584. This section amends the 2005 Act by enabling the Licensing Board to enact other options than granting, these being to refuse the application or hold a hearing to decide whether or not to grant the application if the applicant already holds a personal licence or if a previous personal licence held by the applicant had been surrendered or expired in the previous three years before a new application was made.
585. This provision is to close a possible loophole where a licence holder who had an endorsement under section 85(1) of the 2005 Act could avoid the suspension or revocation provisions of section 86 of the 2005 Act by voluntarily surrendering their personal licence before the Licensing Board had had an opportunity to consider what action it might take under section 86 of the 2005 Act, and then apply for another personal licence which would be “clean”. The section also makes it a criminal offence not to surrender a void personal licence or attempt to use a void licence as a valid licence. A level 3 fine under section 225 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 presently stands at £1000.

Section 137 - Emergency closure orders

586. This section changes the rank of the constable who may request or order a closure order for licensed premises and its subsequent extension or termination under section 97 to 99 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005. The change is from a constable of or above the rank of superintendent as defined by section 147(1) of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 to a constable of or above the rank of inspector.

Section 138 – False statements in applications: offence

587. An offence is committed by any person who makes a false statement on an application. This section could be used in respect of those who apply for a second personal licence, which a personal licence holder may wish to have as a backup as their original licence being suspended or revoked for improper conduct. The personal licence form specifically asks if the applicant already hold a licence. A level 3 fine under section 225 of the 1995 Act presently stands at £1000.

Section 139 – Further modifications of 2005 Act

588. Police powers to object to the granting of licenses for the sale of alcohol under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 are extended.

589. Section 22 of the 2005 Act allows any person to object to an application for a premises licence, but subsection (2) limits the chief constable so that he can only object on the ground that he has reason to believe that the applicant is involved in serious organised crime and that refusal of the application is necessary for the purpose of the crime prevention objective (section 4(2)). Under section 21(5) the chief constable may recommend that an application be refused if necessary for the purpose of the crime prevention objective, but only where he is giving notice of any relevant or foreign offence. For occasional licences, section 57(2) allows the chief constable to recommend the refusal of an application only on the grounds of the crime prevention objective. Under section 73 of the 2005 Act, the chief constable may not object but may recommend that an application for a personal licence be refused if necessary for the purposes of the crime prevention objective, but only where he is giving notice of any relevant or foreign offence.

590. The amendments in Schedule 4 widen the grounds a licensing board may consider in refusing an application for a premises licence on receiving a notice from the chief constable, from the crime prevention objective to any of the licensing objectives listed in section 4 of the 2005 Act. This effectively widens the grounds on which a chief constable may object from purely crime prevention to securing public safety, preventing public nuisance and protecting children from harm. Paragraph 5 sees this widening in relation to an application for a premises licence and this process is repeated in paragraph 6 where an applicant or connected person is convicted during the determination of a premises licence; in paragraph 7 it concerns the transfer of a premises licence on application of the licence holder; paragraph 12 & 13 are in respect of an application for a personal licence; paragraph 14 where an applicant is convicted during the determination of a personal licence and paragraph 15 where a personal licence holder is convicted.

591. Paragraph 16 ensures that the chief constable may report a personal licence holder to the licensing board for actions which are inconsistent with the licensing objectives and that a licensing board must then hold a hearing to consider what action if any should be taken against the personal licence holder as allowed by section 84(7) of the 2005 Act.

PART 10 - MISCELLANEOUS

Section 140 - Licensed premises: social responsibility levy

592. This section gives the Scottish Ministers a power through affirmative regulations to impose a charge on certain holders of licences under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 and the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982. Money raised by the charge will be for local authorities to use in contributing towards the costs of dealing with the adverse effects of the operations of these businesses, for example extra policing or street cleaning or in furthering the licensing objectives listed in section 4 of the 2005 Act.

Section 141 - Annual report on Criminal Justice (Terrorism and Conspiracy) Act 1998

594. There were 2 main parts in the 1998 Act. Sections 1 to 4 made provision about procedure and forfeiture in relation to offences concerning proscribed organisations. Sections 5 to 7 concern conspiracy to commit offences outside the United Kingdom.

595. Section 8 requires that a statutory report on the working of the Act be laid before both Houses of Parliament on an annual basis. Although the section is drafted in such a way so as it applies generally to the working of the Act as a whole, it is understood that the requirement was directed principally at the terrorism provisions in sections 1 to 4, which have now been repealed.

596. Section 8 is now considered redundant. It has been repealed for England, Wales and Northern Ireland by the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008. This section repeals section 8 of the 1998 Act as it applies to Scotland. The effect is that the section will be repealed UK wide.
Section 142 – Corruption in public bodies

597. Section 1 of the Public Bodies Corrupt Practices Act 1889 provides that a person in public office who is involved in any form of corrupt practice in connection with their work is guilty of a crime. Offences under the Act can be triable by solemn or summary procedure. Section 8 makes provision as to the application of the Act to Scotland. It provides that the sheriff principal and sheriff shall have jurisdiction to try any offence under the Act. The effect is that section 8 excludes the district court or the justice of the peace court from being able to try an offence under the 1889 Act. Section 8 is being amended to remove the exclusion of the jurisdiction of district courts or justice of the peace courts to try offences under the 1889 Act, so that lower level offences can be dealt with in those courts.

598. The Prevention of Corruption Act 1906 makes similar provision to the 1889 Act. It provides that any employee who carries out any activity in a corrupt manner is guilty of an offence. Section 3 of the 1906 Act makes provision as to its application to Scotland, and provides that all offences which are punishable under the Act on summary conviction shall be prosecuted before the sheriff. In line with the amendment being made to the 1889 Act, section 3(2) of the 1906 Act is being repealed to allow offences under the 1906 Act to be triable not only in the sheriff court but in the district court and justice of the peace court too.

PART 11 - GENERAL

Section 143 - Orders and regulations

599. This section regulates the powers of the Scottish Ministers contained in the Act to make regulations and orders. It provides for these powers to be exercisable by statutory instrument, and provides standard powers for instruments to include ancillary provisions and to make different provisions for different purposes. It also provides for the level of Parliamentary procedure to which any instrument is to be subject.

Section 144 – Interpretation

600. This section provides short references for three enactments referred to frequently throughout the Bill.

Section 145 - Modification of enactments

601. This section introduces Schedule 5 which makes modifications to certain enactments.

Section 146 – Ancillary provision

602. This section allows the Scottish Ministers by order to make supplementary, incidental or consequential provisions in connection with any provision of the Bill.

Section 147 - Transitional provision etc.

603. This section allows the Scottish Ministers by order to make transitory, transitional or savings provisions in connection with the coming into force of any provision of the Bill.
Section 148 – Short title and commencement

604. This section provides for commencement of the majority of the Bill to be made by order. Sections 143 to 148 will commence upon Royal Assent.

Schedule 1 – The Scottish Sentencing Council

605. Schedule 1 provides for the membership of the Council. It sets out the procedures for the appointment of members and membership of the Council.

606. It also contains detailed provisions on the procedure of the Council, ancillary process and powers to delegated functions.

607. Paragraph 13 places the Council on the list of authorities subject to investigation by the Scottish Public Services Ombudsman. Paragraph 14 places the Council under the requirements of the Freedom of Information (Scotland) Act 2002.

Schedule 2 – Short-term custody and community sentences: consequential amendments

608. See section 18 above.

Schedule 3 – Witness anonymity orders

609. This Schedule deals with appeals on the granting of witness anonymity orders made under common law powers prior to the provisions under 271N to 271T coming into effect. The High Court can only treat a conviction as unsafe if, as a result of an order made under common law, the accused did not receive a fair trial. It cannot rule a conviction as unsafe simply on the basis that the trial court had no power to make a witness anonymity order under common law.

Schedule 4 – Further modifications of 2005 Act

610. See section 139 above.

Schedule 5 – Modification of enactments

Paragraph 1 – The False Oaths (Scotland) Act 1933

611. Sections 44 to 46 of the Criminal Law (Consolidation) (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”) re-enact most of the False Oaths (Scotland) Act 1933 (“the 1933 Act”). Schedule 5 to the Criminal Procedure (Consequential Provisions) (Scotland) Act 1995 which lists the repeals undertaken in the consolidation exercise does not include a reference to the 1933 Act. This is an error and should have been included at the time of the consolidation exercise was carried out. This section repeals the 1933 Act in full. Consequential amendments are required where reference is made to the 1933 Act, or a provision of that Act, in other pieces of legislation, substituting a reference to the new provisions in the 1995 Act. Paragraphs 4, 45 and 51 make the necessary consequential amendments.
Paragraph 2 – The Public Records (Scotland) Act 1937

612. Paragraph 2 amends section 14 of the Public Records (Scotland) Act 1937. Paragraph 1(a) puts beyond any doubt that references to “court records” in that Act include the Scottish Land Court as well as all the ordinary courts. Paragraph (2) provides that any question as to whether or not a document is part of the records of a particular court is to be determined by either the Lord President or the Lord Justice General.

Paragraph 3 – The Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974

613. Paragraph 3 amends section 1 (4)(b) of the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974 (c.53) to change the reference of “insanity” in that Act to refer to the new defence created by the new section 51A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, as inserted by section 117 of this Bill.

Paragraph 4 – The Evidence (Proceedings in Other Jurisdictions) Act 1975

614. This amendment is consequential on the repeal of the False Oaths (Scotland) Act 1933 by paragraph 1.

Paragraphs 5 –7 - The 1982 Act

615. Section 52(7) of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 provided that offences of taking, permitting to be taken, or making of any indecent photograph or pseudo-photograph (section 52(1)(a) of the 1982 Act) were to be included in the list of offences contained in Schedule 1 to the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975. Schedule 1 to the 1975 Act listed offences against children under the age of 17 years, to which special provisions applied. Section 52(7) of the 1982 Act also provided that section 52(1)(a) offences were included in Schedule 1 to the 1975 Act for the purposes of Part III of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968, which has since been repealed.

616. Schedule 1 to the 1975 Act has since become Schedule 1 to the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, and was later amended by the Protection of Children and Prevention of Sexual Offences (Scotland) Act 2005 to insert the offences under sections 52 and 52A of the 1982 Act in relation to an indecent photograph of a child under the age of 17 years. As section 52(7) has been overtaken by subsequent legislation, this subsection is repealed.

617. Paragraph 6 repeals a minor amendment made to section 52(7) of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 by the Criminal Justice Act 1988, consequential on the repeal of section 52 (7) by paragraph 6 of this schedule.

618. Paragraph 7 simply corrects a minor error in section 64 of the 1982 Act, which provides for appeals against orders in relation to public processions.

Paragraph 8 – The Legal Aid (Scotland) Act 1986

619. Paragraph 8 amends section 22 of the Legal Aid (Scotland) Act 1986 (c.47) which deals with the availability of criminal legal aid so as to substitute reference to the new defence and plea of unfitness for trial in place of the references to cases involving “insanity”.

Paragraph 9 – The Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1987

620. Sections 27 to 30 of the Criminal Law (Consolidation)(Scotland) Act 1995 provide for special investigating powers to be exercised by a nominee of the Lord Advocate in the event of a direction being given when a suspected offence may involve serious or complex fraud. They re-enact sections 51 to 54 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1987.

621. Schedule 5 to the Criminal Procedure (Consequential Provisions) (Scotland) Act 1995 lists the provisions which were repealed as part of the consolidation exercise. However, the schedule does not include sections 51 to 54 of the 1987 Act. This is an error and should have been included at the time of the consolidation exercise. This paragraph repeals sections 51 to 54 of the 1987 Act, and paragraphs 8 and 9 repeal amendments made to those sections by the Criminal Justice Act 1988 and the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994.

Paragraphs 12, 13 and 14 – The Criminal Law (Consolidation) (Scotland) Act 1995

622. Section 16 of the Criminal Law (Consolidation) (Scotland) Act 1995 allows any parent, relative, guardian or person acting in the best interests of a woman or girl to ask for a warrant to be issued. This warrant will authorise a named constable to enter a specified place and search for that woman or girl where they believe she is unlawfully being held for immoral purposes. If the woman or girl is found she will be delivered to her parents or guardians.

623. There is also a right afforded to the person requesting the warrant to accompany the constable when the warrant is executed. This is an outmoded provision and in practical terms the police already have the common law power to request warrants for circumstances such as this. This section repeals section 16. The power has not been used for many years, and is repealed as it is considered to be redundant.

624. Part II of the Criminal Law (Consolidation) (Scotland) Act 1995 makes provision for sporting events and specifically makes provision regarding the control of alcohol, fireworks and flares at sporting grounds and sporting events. Paragraph 14 substitutes “it” for “in” section 23 (interpretation of part 2) to correct a typographical error. The relevant provision was originally section 77 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1980 where the text was correct. Although we are not aware of any problems arising from the error in the definition we have taken the opportunity offered by this Bill to correct this mistake.

Paragraphs 15-43 – The 1995 Act

625. Paragraph 16 inserts new section 5A into the 1995 Act providing that it is competent for a sheriff to sign certain documents at any place in Scotland. As this is currently provided for under section 9A of the 1995 Act, this amendment has no effect on existing practice. However, new section 5A will become necessary upon the full repeal of section 9A (by paragraph 9(7) of the Schedule to the Criminal Proceedings etc. (Reform) (Scotland) Act 2007). Separate provision as to the signing of documents by justices of the peace and stipendiary magistrates is made in section 62 of the Criminal Proceedings etc. (Reform) (Scotland) Act 2007.
626. Paragraph 17 amends section 10A of the 1995 Act and is consequential upon section 46 of the Bill. It confers jurisdiction upon both the JP court and the procurator fiscal of the relevant court where proceedings have been initiated in or transferred to another JP court.

627. Paragraphs 18, 20, 21, 22, 23, 25, 26, 30 and 33-34 all concern the change in references to “insanity” and “insanity as a plea in bar” in the 1995 Act. References in the 1995 Act to “insanity” as a defence are changed to refer to the defence created by the new section 51A of the 1995 Act, as inserted by section 117 of this Bill. References to “insanity as a plea in bar” are changed to refer to unfitness for trial.

628. Paragraph 19 repeals parts of section 22 of the 1995 Act, in consequence of the amendments made by section 41.

629. Paragraph 24 amends section 61 of the 1995 Act. Section 61 of the 1995 Act contains a requirement that various court orders must be based on the evidence of two medical practitioners, one of whom must have been approved as having special expertise in mental health. The effect of these amendments is that this requirement does not apply to a finding by a court that a person is unfit for trial.

630. Paragraph 27 amends section 78(2) of the 1995 Act so as to provide that diminished responsibility is treated as if it were a special defence for the purpose of giving advance notice (see 1995 Act, section 78(1)). The plea is not treated as if it were a special defence for any other purpose (eg disclosure to the jury under section 89(1)).

631. Paragraph 28 removes a superfluous word from section 90D of the 1995 Act.

632. Paragraph 29 substitutes a new subsection (4) into section 102A of the 1995 Act. The effect of this is to remove from that subsection a reference to section 27(1)(a) of the 1995 Act which has no application in the context of the section 102A provision.

633. Paragraph 31 is consequential upon section 45 of the Bill. The effect is to ensure time limits for transferred and related cases apply also to relevant cases in JP courts.

634. Paragraph 32 makes an amendment to section 137B of the 1995 Act. Where a sheriff has made an order allowing the transfer of, or initiation of proceedings in, another sheriff court paragraph 28 provides that any other sheriff of the same sheriffdom may revoke or vary that order.

635. Paragraphs 35 to 37, 39 and 40 are consequential on the creation of community payback orders by section 14 of the Bill. These paragraphs repeal the provisions of the 1995 Act dealing with probation orders, community service orders, supervised attendance orders and community reparation orders, and remove references to probation orders from section 247 (effect of probation and absolute discharge).

636. Paragraph 38 amends section 245D which deals with the combination of restriction of liberty orders with other orders. It substitutes references to probation order with community payback order. The effect of this section will be to enable a restriction of liberty order to be imposed concurrently with a community payback order (as is currently possible with restriction of liberty orders and probation orders). The amendments also remove the current option to impose a drug treatment and testing order, a restriction of liberty order and a probation order concurrently, meaning that the court will only be able to impose a restriction of liberty order concurrently with a community payback order or a drug treatment and testing order but not both.

637. Paragraph 41 amends section 254 to make clear that the term “article” includes animal. A consequential rearrangement of section 254 is made.

638. Paragraph 42 inserts new subsection (4AA) into section 258. This clarifies that where an objection to a notice of uncontroversial evidence has been lodged in summary proceedings, this may be challenged at any time prior to an intermediate diet.

639. Paragraph 43 amends section 307 of the 1995 Act (which defines certain terms for the purposes of the 1995 Act) so as to provide that the meaning of "unfit for trial" is given in the new section 53F.

Paragraph 44 – The Crime and Punishment (Scotland) Act 1997

640. Paragraph 44 amends section 9 the Crime and Punishment (Scotland) Act 1997. Section 9 of the 1997 Act refers to "section 57(2)(a) of the 1995 Act (disposal where accused insane)." The effect is to substitute references to the new statutory defence and plea in bar of trial, in place of the reference to "insane".

Paragraph 45 – The Terrorism Act 2000

641. This amendment is consequential on the repeal of the False Oaths (Scotland) Act 1933 by paragraph 1.

Paragraph 46 – The Protection of Children (Scotland) Act 2003

642. Paragraph 46 amends section 10 of the Protection of Children (Scotland) Act 2003 so as to substitute reference to the special defence created by the new section 51A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, as inserted by section 117 of this Bill, in place of the reference to acquittal on the ground of “insanity”.

Paragraph 47 – The Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003

643. Paragraph 47 amends the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003 to adjust a reference in section 3 of that Act to section 57 of the 1995 Act to take account of the change of the title of section 57 by paragraph 21 of this Schedule.

644. Paragraph 48 amends section 135 of the Sexual Offences Act 2003 so that references in Part 2 of that Act (notification and orders) to a person being found not guilty of an offence by reason of insanity include reference to a person acquitted by reason of the defence created by the new section 51A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, as inserted by section 117 of this Bill.

Paragraph 49 – The Protection of Children and Prevention of Sexual Offences (Scotland) Act 2005
645. Paragraph 49 amends section 8 of the Protection of Children and Prevention of Sexual Offences (Scotland) Act 2005, which deals with persons who breach Risk of Sexual Harm Orders. It adds reference to a person acquitted of an offence of breaching an risk of sexual harm order by reason of the defence created by the new section 51A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, as inserted by section 117 of this Bill alongside references to a person being found not guilty of such an offence by reason of insanity.

Paragraph 50 – The Management of Offenders etc. (Scotland) Act 2005
646. Paragraph 50 amends section 10 of the Management of Offenders etc. (Scotland) Act 2005 so that references to persons acquitted on the ground of insanity and persons found to be insane in bar of trial are updated to reflect the new equivalents established by this Bill.

Paragraph 51 – Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005
647. This amendment is consequential on the repeal of the False Oaths (Scotland) Act 1933 by Paragraph 1.

Paragraphs 52 – 54 - The Criminal Proceedings etc. (Reform) (Scotland) Act 2007
648. Paragraphs 53 and 54 remove unnecessary references from section 7 of, and the Schedule to, the 2007 Act, in consequence of the amendments made by section 41 of this Bill.

Paragraph 55 – The Protection of Vulnerable Groups (Scotland) Act 2007
649. Paragraph 55 amends section 32 of the Protection of Vulnerable Groups (Scotland) Act 2007 so as to substitute reference to the special defence created by the new section 51A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, as inserted by section 119 of this Bill, in place of the reference to acquittal on the ground of “insanity”.

Paragraph 56 – The Counter-Terrorism Act 2008
650. Paragraph 56 amends section 45 of the Counter-Terrorism Act 2008 so as to substitute reference to the special defence created by the new section 51A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, as inserted by section 117 of this Bill, in place of the reference to acquittal on the ground of “insanity” and to update a reference to section 55 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995.

Paragraph 57 – The Coroners and Justice Act 2009
651. Paragraph 57 amends section 134 of the Coroners and Justice Bill so as to substitute references to the special defence created by the new section 51A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, as inserted by section 117 of this Bill, in place of the references to acquittal on the ground of “insanity”.

FINANCIAL MEMORANDUM

INTRODUCTION

652. This document relates to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009. It has been prepared by the Scottish Government to satisfy Rule 9.3.2 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders. It does not form part of the Bill and has not been endorsed by the Parliament.

653. The Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill contains provisions on a range of topics to improve the justice system through changes to sentencing, criminal law, criminal procedure, evidence, criminal justice, licensing under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 and alcohol licensing. The Bill also contains a number of other miscellaneous justice topics.

Methodology

654. For all the topics contained within the Bill, consideration has been given as to whether a Regulatory Impact Assessment (RIA) was required. We will publish separately a summary of the regulatory impact of the Bill as a whole along with individual RIAs.

655. There are 5 topics within the Bill that carry a significant financial impact. For the purposes of this financial memorandum, a significant financial impact is defined as a topic having a financial impact of over £0.4m per annum once implemented. These 5 topics are as follows:

• The Scottish Sentencing Council (sections 3-13 of the Bill);
• Community payback orders/presumption against short periods of imprisonment or detention/reports about supervised persons (sections 14, 17 and 20 of the Bill);
• Serious organised crime (sections 25-28 of the Bill);
• Disclosure (sections 85-116 of the Bill); and
• Sale of alcohol to persons under the age of 21 (section 129 of the Bill).

656. Chapter 1 of this Financial Memorandum draws out from the Bill and details the financial impact of the 5 topics with a significant financial impact (as listed above).

657. The other chapters of this financial memorandum presents the financial impact of the remaining provisions of the Bill (ie. those that do not have a significant financial impact). The memorandum follows the order of the Bill being splits into chapters covering the following parts of the Bill:

• Chapter 2 of the Financial Memorandum covers Part 1 of the Bill – Sentencing;
• Chapter 3 of the Financial Memorandum covers Part 2 of the Bill - Criminal law;
• Chapter 4 of the Financial Memorandum covers Part 3 of the Bill - Criminal procedure;
These documents relate to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

- Chapter 5 of the Financial Memorandum covers Part 4 of the Bill – Evidence;
- Chapter 6 of the Financial Memorandum covers Part 5 of the Bill - Criminal justice;
- Chapter 7 of the Financial Memorandum covers Part 7 of the Bill – Mental disorder and unfitness for trial (note that Part 6 of the Bill – Disclosure is covered in chapter 1 of this Financial Memorandum);
- Chapter 8 of the Financial Memorandum covers Part 8 of the Bill - Licensing under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982;
- Chapter 9 of the Financial Memorandum covers Part 9 of the Bill - Alcohol licensing; and
- Chapter 10 of the Financial Memorandum covers Part 10 of the Bill - Miscellaneous.

658. For the purposes of this financial memorandum, all figures given assume a commencement of provisions in April 2010. It should be noted this is unlikely to be the case for all provisions within the Bill with decisions as to when to commence provisions made in the future.

659. A number of topics within the Bill carry either no financial impact or a minimal financial impact. Where a section of the Bill is not mentioned within this financial memorandum, the provisions do not have any financial impact as they are merely technical changes to the law eg. a repeal of redundant provisions. There are however some sections (not technical changes to the law) that are mentioned that do not have a financial impact. These sections are included to provide an explanation as to why it is considered the particular section does not have a financial impact.

660. There are some topics which are described as having “minimal” costs/savings attached to them without specific figures being given. It is estimated that the financial impact of any of these topics is less than £3,000 per topic. An explanation is also given as to why we have been unable to provide a specific estimate of the financial impact for such topics.

661. A table providing an overall summary of the financial impact of the Bill is included at paragraph 991 of this financial memorandum.

CHAPTER 1:
PROVISIONS WITH SIGNIFICANT FINANCIAL IMPACT

SECTIONS 3-13 - THE SCOTTISH SENTENCING COUNCIL

662. The Scottish Sentencing Council (SSC) will be made up of 12 members drawn from both judicial and non judicial backgrounds. In order to carry out its functions effectively, the Council will need a dedicated team of professional support staff including lawyers, researchers, analysts and administrators. Our consultation paper on the proposed creation of a Sentencing Council suggested its administrative support might be provided by the Scottish Court Service (SCS), which could be well placed to provide the body with necessary back office functions such as IT and human resources services. The following estimates are provided on that basis.

663. Based on the running costs incurred by bodies of a likely similar size, and the assumption that administrative functions would be provided by the Scottish Court Service, we anticipate that an annual budget of approximately £1-£1.1m will be required. This would be funded by the Scottish Government as an element of our funding of the Scottish Court Service and there will be no negative impact on the SCS as a result of its new responsibilities.

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

664. We would provide funding to the Scottish Court Service in recognition of the support function which would be provided by the SCS to the Sentencing Council. These estimated costs are drawn from those incurred by the Sentencing Guidelines Council and Sentencing Advisory Panel for England and Wales and their shared secretariat and those incurred by the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission – similar organisations in terms of size to the Scottish Sentencing Council.

Members’ fees and expenses

665. Those members of the Council who are not employed on a full time basis in the criminal justice system will be entitled to claim fees for meetings of the Council. All members will be entitled to claim reimbursement of travel and subsistence expenses actually and necessarily incurred in the course of business. The daily rate of fees payable will be around £230, based on the current rate set by the Sentencing Guidelines Council for England and Wales. On the assumption that the entire SSC would meet for a day once a month, this would amount to £33,120 annually. However, it should be noted the decision on how to manage its business and how often it needs to meet will ultimately sit with the SSC itself.

Cover for Judicial Absence

666. When members of the Judiciary are not available for bench work, because of other commitments, SCS requires to backfill for them. This costs SCS £575 per day plus travel and writing time for a part-time sheriff and £774 per day and writing time for a temporary judge. Again, with the assumption that the SSC will meet once a month, this amounts to an annual cost of £32,376.

Staff salaries

667. The support office to the Sentencing Council will be headed up by a Chief Executive who it is anticipated will be supported by a secretary to the Council, four members of staff dedicated to research, analysis and statistics, two members of staff with legal expertise and an administrative support team of four. Details of costs are as follows:

- Chief Executive (Deputy Director level) – £97,055
- Secretary to the Sentencing Council – (grade B1) £28,474
These documents relate to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

- Researchers x 4 (2 x grade C1 and 2 x grade B2) - £190,462
- Legal Officers x 2 (2 x C1) - £120,652
- Admin staff x 4 – (1 x grade A4, 3 x grade A3) £82,208
- Estimated annual staff salary expenditure – £518,851

Office expenditure, training and meetings

668. The estimated annual costs are £81,000 based on those incurred by the Sentencing Guidelines Council. We estimate that an initial set up cost of £450,000 will be needed to cover the provision of office furniture, equipment and computers and library shelving.

Accommodation

669. SCS has advised that its current estate has extensive demands on it. Accommodation for the SSC in the centre of Edinburgh for 12 people, a library and boardroom would cost in the region of £165,000 annually.

Research, publications and website

670. The estimated costs for this are £270,000, based on those incurred by the Sentencing Guidelines Council.

SECTION 14 - COMMUNITY PAYBACK ORDERS

SECTION 17 - PRESUMPTION AGAINST SHORT PERIODS OF IMPRISONMENT OR DETENTION

SECTION 20 – REPORTS ABOUT SUPERVISED PERSONS

673. There are currently a number of community sentences that a court can impose. The policy intention is to replace the existing probation orders, community service orders, supervised attendance orders and community reparation orders with the new style Community Payback Order. The new Order will provide courts with a range of requirements from which those most appropriate to the individual offender will be selected.

674. Section 17 of the Bill provides for a presumption against custodial sentences of 6 months or less unless the particular circumstances of the case lead the court to believe that no other option would be appropriate. These provisions will not necessarily lead to the imposition of Community Payback Order. Courts in disposing of a case will continue to have access to certain other community penalties including Drug Treatment and Testing Orders and Restriction of Liberty Orders in addition to fines, etc.

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

675. The majority of the additional costs, which will be incurred as a result of these provisions, will fall to be dealt with under the existing funding arrangements for section 27A of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968, which provides funding to the local authorities for delivery of criminal justice social work services. This ringfenced funding is routed in the first instance through the eight Community Justice Authorities, which have responsibility for distributing available funds to the constituent local authorities within their areas. Expenditure in relation to delivery of electronic monitoring requirements is the subject of a commercial contract between the Scottish Government and its electronic monitoring contractor.

Methodology

Financial Allocations

676. In the 2007-08 financial year, funding was allocated to the Community Justice Authorities for the following purposes as part of the overall grant made available:

- Community Service Orders £13,543,144
- Probation Orders £10,754,169
- Supervised Attendance Orders £3,374,589

677. The figure for probation orders is based on the cost of delivering a standard probation order. It equates in broad terms to a Community Payback Order with merely a supervision requirement.

678. Community Reparation Orders were the subject of a restricted 2 year pilot exercise. A sum of £354,772 was allocated for part year of 2007-08 for the pilot.
Number of Orders

679. In 2007-08, courts imposed the following number of orders:

- Community Service Orders 6,202
- Probation Orders 8,751
- Supervised Attendance Orders 4,438

680. The number of Community Reparation Orders during the party operation of the pilots was minimal.

681. In broad terms this suggests that the unit costs for the individual sentences which will be replaced by the new Community Payback Order amount to:

- Community Service Orders £2,184
- Probation Orders £1,229
- Supervised Attendance Orders £760

682. The unit cost figure for Community Service Orders does not take account of those instances of where unpaid work is undertaken as a condition of a probation order. 3,053 such requirements were imposed in 2007-08. If account is taken of the latter the unit cost of delivering community service/unpaid work decreases to £1,463. It is not possible to produce a meaningful unit cost figure for Community Reparation Orders.

Requirements

683. The new Community Payback Orders will provide courts with a menu of seven requirements. In broad terms these equate to the additional conditions that are currently available to courts when imposing a probation order. 5,692 such additional conditions were made by courts in 2007-08, funding for which is provided through the ringfenced funding arrangements for criminal justice social work. In broad terms funding provided in 2007-08 for this purpose, which includes the cost of supported accommodation for offenders, amounted to £13.7m, although services/projects covered by this funding are not restricted to those on community sentences i.e. they are also used by ex-prisoners following release from custody, this figure should be taken as indicative only.

Electronic Monitoring

684. Courts can currently add an electronic monitoring condition to a probation order. In 2007-08, 113 such conditions were made. Courts will be unable to impose a condition of electronic monitoring when a person is first sentenced to a Community Payback Order, but this will be an option available to the court should the individual subsequently breach the order. The average unit costs for a 6 months period for electronic monitoring amount to approximately £3,500.

Review Hearings

685. The new Community Payback Order contains provisions for courts to periodically review the progress of an offender during the course of the order. Existing legislation in relation to probation orders allow for review hearings to be undertaken as part of that order. No data is available on the number of such review hearings carried out each year but the estimated unit cost of a hearing covering judicial salaries and Scottish Court Service running costs amounts to £23.

Additional Costs associated with introduction of Community Payback Order

686. Responsibility for sentencing decisions in individual cases rests with courts. It is difficult to predict what impact the introduction of the Community Payback Order will have on current sentencing patterns. However, there are two key aspects, which require to be addressed. First, assuming no overall increase by courts in use of Community Payback Orders compared with the existing sentences, the extent to which additional costs will be incurred as a result of the introduction of the new Order. Second, the extent to which the new order will be viewed by courts as a more attractive sentencing option leading to increased numbers of orders and associated increased costs.

Review Hearings

687. On the basis of one review hearing per order it is estimated that the Community Payback Order might generate an additional 9,000 review hearings per year. Each review hearing will require the local authority supervising officer to submit a report to assist the court in carrying out the review. On the basis of a unit cost of £100 per report, an additional £900,000 will be needed for this purpose.

688. In addition, additional annual revenue funding of £162,000 will be needed for judicial salaries and £45,000 for Scottish Court Service running costs. One-off set up costs estimated at £50,000 for IT development will also be required.

Requirements

689. There are similarities between the Community Payback Order and the single Community Order, introduced in England and Wales following commencement of the Criminal Justice Act 2003. Experience since introduction of the Community Order, which offers a menu of 12 requirements (compared with the seven with the Community Payback Order) suggests that there has been little change in the number and types of requirements being imposed. The average number of requirements per order has remained broadly constant at 1.7 per order. In Scotland, historically the average number of additional conditions per probation order is estimated at 1.2 per order. In anticipation that there will be no significant increase by courts in the use of the available requirements we are proposing no increase in the £13,700,000 currently being provided for this purpose.

690. The one area, where we have identified a need for additional funding in respect of the menu of options is in respect of the provision whereby a supervision requirement will be mandatory when a Community Payback Order is imposed on a 16-17 year old offender. In 2007-08, 387 Community Service Orders, which are restricted to the carrying out of unpaid work, were imposed on offenders of this age group. On the basis of a unit cost of £1,229 per supervision requirement an additional £475,623 will be needed for this purpose.
Electronic Monitoring for breach

691. In dealing with breach of a Community Payback Order courts will have the option of imposing an electronic monitoring requirement. This will result in additional costs beyond those currently being incurred.

692. The average length of an electronic monitoring condition when applied to a probation order amounts to 5.3 months. Approximately 13% of community penalties, where a breach application is made, are dealt with by revocation of the order and imposition of a custodial sentence. This equates to 870 offenders per year. The intention is for an electronic monitoring requirement to be added to an order in appropriate cases, where a custodial term might otherwise have been imposed, although there is a possibility of electronic monitoring also being applied in other cases. There is no available data on the extent to which courts might use the electronic monitoring option in dealing with breach and we are therefore providing figures based on assumptions of a 25% or 50% usage (as compared with custody) plus a 10% displacement in respect of other cases. This would result in additional costs for the electronic monitoring contract of £728,488 and £1,725,633 respectively. For local authorities there would be additional costs in preparing reports of £21,800 and £43,500 and because a supervision requirement is mandatory where an electronic monitoring condition has been applied further costs of £41,610 and £82,650 respectively. For the Scottish Court Service we estimate additional costs of £80,510 and £116,532 for additional diets to consider electronic monitoring reports.

693. The additional costs which will be incurred in delivering Community Payback Orders assuming no volume increases is summarised below:

Volume Increases

694. It is difficult to forecast the extent to which courts might make increased use of the new order compared with existing sentences and against the backdrop of the presumption against the use of short term custodial sentences of six months or less. Over the past 5 years the annual rate of increase of numbers of probation orders, for example, has been 2.6%. We are adopting assumptions of a 10% and 20% increase in overall volumes.

10% assumption

695. Before a Community Payback Order can be imposed a court requires to have access to a report on the offender prepared by the local authority. The unit cost of these reports, known as Social Enquiry Reports, is estimated at £250. A 10% increase in orders would therefore require an additional 1,939 reports to be prepared at a cost of £484,750.

696. We estimate the additional costs, including those of the additional Social Enquiry Reports, which will be incurred by local authorities if a 10% increase were to occur, at £4,778,000. This sum reflects the impact of a 10% increase on current expenditure on the existing community penalties and requirements, which will be replaced by the new order. For the electronic monitoring contractor there would be additional costs of £122,761 and Scottish Courts Service £30,552. In all instances these would be additional to the additional costs identified in the table at paragraph 694.

20% assumption

697. A 20% increase would lead to increased costs for local authorities of £9,538,000, £245,522 for the electronic monitoring contractor and £55,000 for the Scottish Courts Service. These would be further to the additional costs set out in paragraph 693.
COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

698. The additional costs, which will be incurred by local authorities, will be reimbursed by the Scottish Administration through the ringfenced funding arrangements for criminal justice social work.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

699. The costs of delivering the electronic monitoring requirements will be covered by a revised commercial contract between the Scottish Government and the electronic monitoring contractor.

SECTIONS 25-28 – SERIOUS ORGANISED CRIME

SECTION 25 – INVOLVEMENT IN SERIOUS ORGANISED CRIME

700. This should not involve many cases which would not currently be prosecuted under an existing offence. We anticipate around 2 new cases per year. Our figures are based on 2 cases per year in High Court proceedings, prosecution and prison costs. The average High Court costs are around £6,000 and the prosecution costs are £19,000. The average cost of imprisonment for one offender is £25,000 per year.

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

701. The anticipated additional costs for the Scottish Court Service is £12,000 and for the Crown Office is £38,000 which is based on 2 cases at the High Court per year. The anticipated additional cost for the Scottish Prison Service is £80,000 in a year which is based on 2 persons imprisoned for an average of 4 years (where the individual is released at the halfway point of sentence).

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

702. We do not anticipate any additional costs on local authorities.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

703. We do not anticipate any additional costs on other bodies, individuals or businesses.

SECTION 26 - OFFENCES AGGRAVATED BY CONNECTION WITH SERIOUS ORGANISED CRIME

704. Schedule 4 to the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 sets out the range of offences that are likely to attract the statutory aggravation. The bulk of convictions (around 800 a year) are under sections 4(3)(b) and 5(3) of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 and we expect these would be the offences the aggravation would be linked to. This will not involve any cases which would not currently be prosecuted under an existing offence. There will, therefore, be no extra court or prosecution costs.

705. In 2006-2007 there were 663 people convicted under section 4(3)(b) of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 (to be concerned in the supply of a controlled drug) who received an average sentence of 704 days. If 50% of this number receive an additional 20% added to their sentence for aggravation 330 individuals would receive an average sentence of 844 days with an additional 140 days, of which 70 will be served in custody. The average daily cost of imprisonment is £109 which gives a total of £2.5m.

706. In 2006-2007 144 people were convicted under section 5(3) of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 (an offence for a person to have a controlled drug in his possession with intent to supply) who received an average sentence of 292 days. If 50% of this number receive an additional 20% added to their sentence for aggravation. 72 individuals would receive an average sentence of 350 days with an additional 58 days, of which 29 are served in custody. The average daily cost of imprisonment is £109 which gives a total of £227,000.

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

707. The estimated additional costs for the Scottish Prison Service is around £2.7m per year which is based on 330 individuals receiving an additional 70 days imprisonment for offences under section 4(3)(b) and 72 individuals receiving an additional 29 days in custody for section 5(3). There will be non-recurring costs of £5,000 in amending Scottish Court Service (SCS) IT systems to record the new aggravation. There will also be running costs of £18,000 in recording the aggravations.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

708. We do not anticipate any additional costs on local authorities.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

709. We do not anticipate any additional costs on other bodies, individuals or businesses.

SECTION 27 - DIRECTING SERIOUS ORGANISED CRIME

710. The number of cases expected is low and we anticipate an average of 2 cases per year. These cases are likely to be at High Court level and the average cost of the court procedure is £25,000 per case: the average court costs being £6,000 and the average prosecution costs being £19,000.

711. The average cost of imprisonment is £40,000 per year. This figure is used for illustrative purposes only as it is not the marginal cost of imprisoning an offender for one year (which is substantially lower).

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

712. On the basis of 2 cases in the High Court each year the anticipated additional costs for the Scottish Court Service is £12,000 and the Crown Office is £38,000. The anticipated additional cost for the Scottish Prison Service is around £80,000 in a year, rising to £440,000 in year 5 (assuming individuals are sentenced to 7 years and are released at the 2/3 point of their sentence).

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

713. We do not anticipate any additional costs on local authorities.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

714. We do not anticipate any additional costs on other bodies, individuals or businesses.

SECTIONS 85-116 - DISCLOSURE

COSTS ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION - OVERVIEW

Police Service

719. As a result of Lord Coulsfield’s review, his recommendations, and in anticipation of the legislation, ACPOS established a steering group, implementation team and a number of working groups who examined practices and procedures within all the affected policing business areas; Criminal Justice, Crime Investigation, Sensitive and Intelligence material, Professional Standards, Forensics, Records Management, and Training. Additional costs to take this forward have already been spent and it is anticipated, will continue to accrue until at least the legislation comes into force.

720. In addition, to ensure that the Scottish Police Service is in a position to be compliant with their revelation and disclosure obligations prior to and after legislation is introduced a training strategy is being developed (Lord Coulsfield recommendation) to train staff on the principles and changes to practices and procedures that will require to be adopted as a result of the forthcoming legislation. It is estimated that approx 21,000 police officers and staff will require differing levels of training, dependant on their role (with additional costs for training materials).

721. In order to estimate the future expenditure likely to be incurred by the Scottish Police Service after the implementation of legislation covering Criminal Disclosure the following methodology was used.

Operational Policing after Legislation Implementation

722. When investigating a crime or offence and to subsequently report the circumstances to COPFS, police officers will as a result of new practices and procedures to be adopted spend additional time recording, reviewing, assessing and revealing all relevant material to COPFS to comply with their legislative requirements.

723. Dependant on the complexity, length of time, volume of material generated during an investigation, each enquiry and subsequent case reported to COPFS will determine the varying degrees of additional time spent recording, reviewing, assessing and revealing relevant material. Another contributing factor is whether the prosecution is dealt with in the summary or solemn courts, as the proposed procedures to be adopted for solemn cases are far more time consuming. It was therefore felt necessary to look at, and differentiate between investigations and prosecutions in both these areas.

724. In addition, it was felt necessary to break down the length of additional time spent conducting these processes within the solemn arena. This has been split into 2 distinct areas; Investigations which are conducted using HOLMES2/MIRSAP (manual incident rooms), usually only used in only the most serious of investigations such as murders or organised crime, and non HOLMES2/MIRSAP investigations.

725. These issues, whilst extremely difficult to quantify, have been explored using statistical information from the Scottish Government and COPFS along with operational policing data on the deployment of HOLMES 2 incident rooms across the 8 Scottish Police forces. Research was also undertaken in England on the deployment of Disclosure officers and time spent by officers on disclosure duties.

726. Excluded in the considerations are investigations where a report has been submitted to COPFS and which has resulted in either COPFS applying a direct measure or taking no proceedings. The police will have still undertaken their responsibilities in these instances. Similarly, in major crime investigations or large scale intelligence led operations, which do not come to a successful conclusion, a considerable amount of resource and time may have been spent on recording, reviewing and assessment of material for revelation purposes. Also, for HOLMES 2 major crime investigations it is relatively common (identified through research in England and Wales) for multiple officers and intelligence officers to be deployed in the disclosure process.

Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service

727. Since the Privy Council decisions in Holland and Sinclair in 2005 the COPFS has had to develop much more detailed procedures in relation to disclosure, all of which has placed a substantial additional financial burden on the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service (COPFS).

728. These detailed procedures have required staff to carry out a great deal of additional work that it did previously require to do, e.g. reconciliation in all High Court cases (checking that the Crown has received all statements submitted by the police and then ensuring that they have all been disclosed); sending out statements for all witnesses in all cases placed on petition or where the accused has pled not guilty (staffing costs to process and postage costs of sending these out); obtaining criminal history records for all witnesses (something that pre-Holland the COPFS did not obtain); considering statements and other materials to ensure that no sensitive irrelevant material about witnesses was disclosed in contravention of articles 2 & 8 of the ECHR; providing all of this new information to the defence; providing summaries of evidence in all summary prosecutions.

729. Many of the provisions to be contained in the Bill and in the associated Statutory Code of Practice, while not necessarily imposing additional work on COPFS, give these new procedures that were developed by the Crown a statutory basis.

730. In order to assess the additional costs over and above the substantial additional financial burden imposed by Holland and Sinclair, it is necessary to first consider where additional costs to COPFS might arise. In order to do this, the following questions were addressed:

- What, if any, IT changes are required as a result of the new provisions?
- What training requirements are necessary for staff that would be additional to current training provided?
- What will the Bill introduce which is new to the COPFS?
IT changes

731. On considering the proposed statutory disclosure regime, the principle IT changes will be required in relation to the transmission and completion of disclosure schedules in solemn cases.

Training

732. As a result of the changes to the disclosure regime the following one-off training will require to be given to staff:

- All staff (legal, administrative and precognition) will require to receive training on the basis changes to the system brought about by the legislation;
- All staff involved in solemn work (legal and precognition) will need to attend training on how to use and complete schedules.

733. As a result of the legislation, existing mandatory rolling-training courses will need to be updated. As such courses are always under review, it is anticipated that the additional costs of updating the mandatory courses will be negligible.

What’s new in the legislation that might incur additional costs?

734. COPFS has estimated that the principal additional costs will be in using a system of schedules in all solemn cases.

735. It is anticipated that the creation of a new offence of misuse of disclosure material would not incur any additional costs as the number of such offences is likely to be minimal and would be offset against the savings made to the COPFS by no longer requiring to prepare protective orders prior to disclosure of certain evidence to the unrepresented accused (it should also be noted that such orders have been rare to date).

736. It is anticipated that the creation of the PII system will have minimal additional costs for the COPFS. This is based on the fact that, although there is currently no statutory scheme of public interest immunity, the Crown does still, at present, have to consider public interest immunity issues of which there have been few to date.

737. Although it is possible that the system of schedules will result in an increased number of defence applications to the court for additional disclosure, it is not possible at this stage to estimate the number of these. Accordingly, it is not possible to estimate the additional costs to the COPFS of this part of the new regime.

Scottish Court Service

738. It will only be with the detail of both primary and secondary legislation of court hearings and proceedings that an exact estimation of costs for the Disclosure provisions can be made. There is no indication of the numbers of cases likely to occur at each stage of the proceedings so only a general estimation of costs per hearing can be made.
COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION – DETAILS

Scottish Police Service - Operational Policing

739. The period of comparison for this estimate is the fiscal year 2007/08 and is subdivided into Summary and Solemn procedure via the reporting of cases to COPFS. The Scottish Police service recorded 385,509 Crimes and 571,881 Offences during the fiscal year 2007/08 with a total of 306,770 crimes being reported to COPFS.

740. Behind every Standard Prosecution Report (SPR) submitted to COPFS, during the investigation and case preparation phase an officer will be required to spend additional time on recording, reviewing and assessing all material that has been obtained or generated by the investigation to ensure that all relevant material is identified and revealed to COPFS.

741. There is a potential that through the summary justice reform program that there will be a reduction in the number of cases submitted to COPFS and that more fixed penalties will be issued. This may reduce some of the additional time spent on revelation and disclosure however as there is currently no data available it is not viable to estimate any savings at this time.

742. In Solemn cases the level of recording, reviewing, assessing and revelation will significantly increase as a result of new practices and procedures to be adopted also the volume of material generated is significantly greater than in summary cases. Dedicated officer/s will be deployed in major crime investigation to deal solely with the new legal responsibilities and during an average year approximately 400 investigations are conducted throughout Scotland using HOLMES 2 and MIRSAP administration systems.

HOLMES 2 and MIRSAP Investigations

743. Police forces anticipate having to dedicate a total of 50 officers to disclosure duties. Chief Constables will wish to maintain capacity to investigate Serious and Organised Crime and will need to consider how this could best be achieved. This could be through recruitment of suitable police support staff to act as Disclosure Reviewing Officers which would reduce the additional costs involved:

50 officers @ £44,000 per annum = £2,200,000
These documents relate to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

Non Holmes2/MISRAP Investigations

744. Detective officers will routinely be required to dedicate significant time to meeting disclosure requirements for serious crimes and offences.

Training

745. At the present time all Scottish forces are undertaking an increased period of recruitment and therefore the initial training courses delivered at the Scottish Police College, Junior Division have been amended to provide an awareness of Criminal Disclosure prior to the implementation of the full Criminal disclosure process. All training packages delivered within the Junior Division have been reviewed and “disclosure proofed” as part of the normal ongoing review processes employed by the Scottish Police College. Any future training packages, although likely to incur initial development costs will ultimately form part of the normal training curriculum with the cost implications being absorbed.

746. The police figures total £5.3m for set up and training. However the majority of costs (£4m for training of police officers) will be incurred in 2009-2010 in preparation for the implementation of disclosure, so only £1.3m has been included as a non-recurring cost for training, with the possibility of a small element of recurring cost.

Administration

748. There will be an impact on admin and potentially scientific resources at each of the SPSA service centres. The SPSA estimate is that this will amount to around 1 person at each centre and a central co-ordinator.

749. This would cost in the region of £150,000 assuming 4 Assistant Scientist posts, 1 based in each laboratory (£110,000), and the co-ordinator post pitched around scientist grade, who would be used to ensure compliance with disclosure protocols and to manage cases across service areas as a single point of contact for Police and COPFS (£40,000).

Defence Access

750. Where this occurs SPSA would look to minimise the cost impact but would have to accept that, where access is necessary there will need to be some level of cost incurred, for example it would be necessary for those seeking access to be accompanied throughout the period of their visits. This is an unknown and would vary according to the cases being reviewed. Current experience suggests we would require an additional two people to supplement the main disclosure posts and provide resilience in periods of absence or during major inquiries. This would cost around £55,000 for two assistant posts. Some of the cost of this could be recovered by charging defence teams for access at an hourly rate if this was seen as acceptable. This would need to be explored further though.

751. All SPSA estimates are based on rates of pay this year (2008-09) and will likely increase marginally over time.

Scottish Crime Drug Enforcement Agency (SCDEA)

752. In relation to costs for training, this is incorporated in the police costings. The SCDEA is charged with progressing the investigation of serious and organised crime on behalf of the communities of Scotland and the Scottish Police service and as such all enquiries are deemed to have the potential to be prosecuted in either the High Court or Sheriff and Jury. As such it has been estimated that with the advent of disclosure there will be an impact on already stretched resources which it is assessed will equate to 10 persons being actively engaged with the management of Criminal Disclosure throughout the Agency. This will cover all areas of areas of Agency activity including Operations, Intelligence, eCrime, Scottish Money Laundering Unit and the Technical Support Unit and others at the 4 sites.

753. A decision as to whether the role of Criminal Disclosure Officer is performed by a Police Officer or a member of Police Staff has yet to be clarified and as such at this time associated staffing costs have yet to be determined.

Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service

IT Costs

754. Although discussions are still at a very preliminary stage on how and the format in which schedules will be transmitted between the police and COPFS, it is estimated that the development costs for making the necessary IT changes could be £200,000.

Training

755. All staff (legal, administrative and precognition) will require to receive training on the basis changes to the system brought about by the legislation. It is anticipated that this could be done through a basic training session delivered by District Fiscals which is a relatively straightforward process. It may, however, be necessary to also conduct a ½ day training event for all legal staff at the Scottish Prosecution College to ensure that the implications of the Act for COPFS are fully understood particularly in relation to public interest immunity, misuse of disclosure material, access to witness statements etc. If so, it is anticipated that the cost to COPFS for such a course could be £15-20,000 taking into account Prosecution College costs, travel and subsistence and any essential backfill.

756. All staff involved in solemn work (legal and precognition) will need to attend training on how to use and complete schedules. Based on the training required on this in England and Wales, it is likely that a one day course at the Scottish Prosecution College for all legal and precognition staff will be required and the cost to COPFS for such a course could be about £50-£60,000 taking into account Prosecution College costs, travel and subsistence and any essential backfill.

757. Accordingly, the costs for training are estimated as follows:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>

Completion of schedules in solemn cases

758. The following assumptions are being made:

- At present the average time spent on reconciliation per High Court case is 3 hours;
- The time required to consider and complete a schedule will be approx double the length of time required to complete the current reconciliation process adopted in High Court cases (based on the fact that the schedules will list all relevant information not just statements and productions and the process will include considering material that has not actually been submitted). Accordingly it is assumed that 6 hours will be spent on the scheduling process per case;
These documents relate to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

- There will be an estimated 4700 Sheriff and Jury cases and 764 High Court cases per year based on 2007/2008 statistics;
- In High Court cases, therefore, 4,584 hours per year will be spent on the scheduling process. However, 2,292 hours of that would have been spent on the old reconciliation process which will be replaced by schedules. Accordingly, for High Court cases, the additional time spent on schedules will be 2,292 hours;
- For Sheriff and Jury cases the average time spent on scheduling will be 28,200 hours;
- Accordingly, it is assumed that completion of schedules will take an average of 30,492 additional hours work for COPFS staff;
- Consideration of schedules will be undertaken by the precognoscer;
- In the majority of cases, the precognoscer will be a Band D member of staff;
- The average hourly rate for a Band D member of staff is £11.70.

Review of Disclosure on receipt of mandatory Defence Statements in Solemn Proceedings

759. The following assumptions are being made:

- It is anticipated that the average time taken to review disclosure in High Court cases following receipt of defence statements will be 6 hours.
- The anticipated time taken to review disclosure in Sheriff and Jury cases following receipt of defence statements will be 2 hours.
- There will be an estimated 4700 Sheriff and Jury cases and 764 High Court cases per year based on 2007/2008 statistics.
- In High Court cases, therefore, 4584 hours per year will be spent reviewing disclosure following receipt of defence statements.
- For Sheriff and Jury cases, 9400 hours will be spent on the same reviewing process.
- Accordingly, it is assumed that reviewing disclosure following receipt of mandatory defence statements in solemn proceedings will take an average of 13,984 additional hours work for COPFS staff.
These documents relate to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

- The reviewing process will be undertaken by the precognoser.
- In the majority of cases, the precognoser will be a Band D member of staff.
- The average hourly rate for a Band D member of staff is £11.70.

The number of solemn accused in year to March 2008 was 8,158. The difference between no. of cases and accused is 8,158 - 7,535 = 623. We assume a fee of £57.50 per accused.

TOTAL 0.556

* Based on number of cases in year to March 2008 where indictments have been served in solemn cases. Some cases will have multiple accused.

764. The following assumptions have been made:

- The solemn figures above represent the number of cases in year to March 2008 where indictments have been served. The number of accused in these cases totalled 8,158.
- Where counsel completes the mandatory defence statement SLAB are of the view that there will be no additional costs payable to the solicitor on the basis that the statutory test of taxation is that you do not make payment for the same work twice. SLAB believe that there is likely to be additional work on the solicitors’ part quite separate from the framing of the statement. However, they are of the view these costs will be subsumed within the normal communications which take place between defence agent and counsel.
- Although sanction may be granted for counsel in the sheriff court we are of the view that given the stage at which the mandatory statement must be completed, the defence statement will be the responsibility of the nominated solicitor to complete.
• This costing is based on the 2007-08 current fee structures and general profile of criminal cases. The introduction of the mandatory defence statement assumes that there will be no material changes in solicitors’ behaviour in the conduct of cases.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

765. We do not anticipate any additional costs on local authorities.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

766. We do not anticipate any additional costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses.

SECTION 129 - SALE OF ALCOHOL TO PERSONS UNDER THE AGE OF 21 ETC.

767. The impact of the provisions on businesses has been assessed by drawing on alcohol sales data, survey data and population figures in order to estimate the effect of raising the minimum age of off-sales alcohol purchases from 18 to 21. It should be noted that the provisions do not require Licensing Boards to raise the age. Rather the provisions place a duty on them to consider the detrimental impact of off-sales to those under 21 years of age, with a view to considering whether a condition should be applied to some or all licences in their Board area requiring those purchasing off-sales alcohol to be 21 or over. The actual impact on business will depend on the extent to which Boards choose to establish such conditions and the extent to which purchasers switch to on-sales.
COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

768. We do not anticipate any additional costs on the Scottish Administration.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

769. There is likely to be a marginal additional cost on Licensing Boards in considering the detrimental impact of under 21 off-sales as part of their policy statement. However, this is considered to be a small addition to the overall work of the Board and is unlikely to have any significant resource impact. Licensing Standards Officers (LSOs) would have a role in ensuring compliance with any conditions laid down by Boards in relation to raising the age of off-sales purchases to 21, however, such costs are again likely to be marginal as the condition would be one of many on licensed premises. The cost of running the licensing system, including the costs of LSOs, are generally recovered by Licensing Boards from fee income.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

770. The additional costs on individuals will be limited to those aged 18-20 who may be restricted as to whether, or where they may be able to purchase off-sales alcohol. The cost of a unit of alcohol in on-sales is approximately three times that of off-sales (£1.28 compared with 40p), so it reasonable to assume that those affected may reduce their total intake, or alternatively spend more on alcohol.

771. In terms of the impact on business of raising the age of off-sales purchases to 21, it is difficult to quantify the income that the industry derives from any particular age group. However, using data from the General Register Office for Scotland (GRO), Scottish Health Survey (SHeS) and the Nielsen Company, it is possible to generate an estimate. The latest population data from GRO shows that in Scotland, 18–20 year olds make up approximately 5% of those currently legally allowed to buy alcohol. Table 1, from SHeS, illustrates the percentage of this age group drinking and the mean number of units of alcohol reported consumed per week.

3 Data supplied to the Scottish Government by The Nielsen Company: http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Topics/Health/health/Alcohol/resources/nielson-data. 40p is the mean price per alcohol unit across all alcoholic drinks in the off trade (2007) quoted in Nielson data: by category of drink mean price per unit varied from 23p to 87p. [Link no longer operates]
7 Op cit, SHeS
772. Analysis of the Nielson Company data suggests that, on average, 63% of alcohol (expressed as units of pure alcohol,) is consumed in the form of off sales purchases. Applying that to the available SHeS data results in a market share of approximately 3% of the off trade for 18–20 year olds. In terms of value, this equates to approximately £38m per annum using 40p/unit as the average cost of a unit of alcohol from off sales.

773. Subject to paragraph 775, a ban on off sales would represent around £15m in lost sales revenue to businesses. The UK Government would also lose around £23m in lost VAT and alcohol duty.

774. If 18–20 yr olds were to be banned from purchasing alcohol from off sales, then it is reasonable to assume that there would be an increase in purchases as on sales trade. The average cost of a unit of alcohol in licensed premises is quoted as £1.28 in the Nielsen data set (2007). It is very difficult to estimate how many 18-20 year olds who previously purchased alcohol from off sales will, in future, purchase alcohol from on sales, but businesses and the UK Government are likely to recover a proportion of lost revenue in this way. If 18-20 year olds were to spend some of this £15m on other items subject to VAT, then the UK Government would, in part, still receive the VAT currently paid on off sales.

775. The figures provided represent the maximum estimated effect of the provisions. They assume that every Licensing Board introduces a ban on the off sale of alcohol to 18-20 year olds across their entire Board area. The loss of revenue to the off sales trade is equivalent to the estimate of the value of total purchases currently made by 18-20 yr olds.

CHAPTER 2:

PART 1 OF THE BILL - SENTENCING

SECTION 15 – NON-HARASSMENT ORDERS

776. Figures provided by the Scottish Court Service suggest that there is a relatively low number of non-harassment orders granted each year.

---

777. Figures for the Sheriff Courts are
- 2006 = 24 case disposals
- 2007 = 23 case disposals
- 2008 = 29 case disposals

778. This data excludes High Court and District/Justice of the Peace courts and the figures may be an undercount due to some court disposals being recorded as “text disposals” for which the SCS cannot identify what the exact disposal was.

779. The Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service has indicated that it should not entail more hours of work for COPFS if the decision is made to apply for an NHO.

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

780. Given the lack of concrete data on the “cost” of a non-harassment order, it is difficult to provide figures for the impact of the changes in the Bill. As a relatively low number of NHOs are currently granted each year, it is estimated that an increase of even 100% in the number of applications would have a minimal cost impact on the police, COPFS and Scottish Court Service.

SECTION 16 - SHORT PERIODS OF DETENTION

781. The provisions increase the minimum custodial sentence that can be imposed by a court from 5 days to 15 days. In practice, courts very rarely impose such short sentences and therefore there will be no financial impact of these provisions.

SECTION 18 – AMENDMENTS OF CUSTODIAL AND SENTENCES AND WEAPONS ACT (SCOTLAND) 2007

782. The modifications to the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007 will put in place a more proportionate and effective system for the end to end management of offenders sentenced to imprisonment. These amendments will form part of the plan for delivering a comprehensive offender management structure as set out in the Scottish Government’s plan – “Protecting Scotland’s Communities: Fair, Fast and Flexible Justice” published on 17 December 2008.

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

783. There are no direct cost implications of the amendments proposed to the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007. However the costs involved in implementing the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007 (as amended by the measures proposed in the Bill) and compared with the consequential costs of implementing the 2007 Act as enacted

http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2008/12/16132605/0
These documents relate to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

are given below. These are based on current assumptions and prisoner projections and show the (indicative) impact on applying the modified measures in measurable packages.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

784. No additional costs will have to be met by local authorities. While Criminal Justice Social Work is delivered by local authorities, they would not require to incur additional costs from within their overall budgets since the Scottish Government will fully reimburse the Community Justice Authorities the cost of the community component of the new arrangements. There are no costs on other bodies, individuals or businesses.

Summary

785. The figures are based on estimated prison population projections for 2015/16, this is indicative at this stage of the full implementation of the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007 as amended by the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill provisions. The Scottish Government has made it clear in Protecting Scotland’s Communities Fair, Fast and Flexible Justice that subject to certain modifications, the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act could provide the structure upon which to build a modern offender management regime for offenders who are sentenced to a period of imprisonment. For the purposes of the overall summary table of the financial impact of the Bill at paragraph 991, these indicative costs are excluded.

SECTION 19 - EARLY REMOVAL OF CERTAIN SHORT-TERM PRISONERS FROM THE UNITED KINGDOM

786. The provisions will provide a discretionary power to Scottish Ministers to authorise the early removal of short term foreign national prisoners held in Scottish prisons, subject to certain conditions (including that the released prisoner leaves the UK).

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

787. There will no additional costs associated with the provisions. There may be some limited savings to the Scottish Prison Service as a result of the early removal of foreign prisoners from the UK before the end of their sentence. These savings will be ad hoc and depend on the number of suitable prisoners who fit the criteria for early removal. It is expected there will be only a very small number of cases each year that will fit the criteria. For the purposes of this financial memorandum, it is estimated that this will be 6 prisoners each year that will be removed from the country an average of 60 days before the end of their prison sentence.

788. This averages out in saving 360 days each year where a prison place will not be used (6 prisoners x 60 days). The average cost of keeping a person in prison is £40,000 per year and this will be the estimated saving to SPS each year.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

789. None.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

790. None.

SECTION 21 - EXTENDED SENTENCES FOR CERTAIN SEXUAL OFFENCES

791. Extended sentences are imposed by the courts on sex and violent offenders where they consider that additional supervision is necessary to protect the public from serious harm from the offender following release. During 2007/08 there were 73 offenders being supervised in the community on extended sentences.

792. It is difficult to estimate how many more offenders would receive an extended sentence because of the new provision which would allow an extended sentence to be imposed in cases such as a breach of the peace where the offence has a significant sexual element. As the 73 offenders on extended sentences will cover both sex and violent offences we would estimate no more than 5 additional extended sentences being imposed per annum as a result of the new provision in relation to offences with a significant sexual aspect.

793. Current figures suggest that the annual unit cost of delivering statutory supervision is approximately £3,200. The additional cost of supervising 5 extra offenders on extended sentences is therefore estimated at £3,200 x 5 = £16,000.

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

794. The additional costs would fall to the Scottish Government who provide direct funding (through section 27A of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968) to local authorities for delivery of community-based supervision of offenders by criminal justice social work services. From April 2007, funding has been directed to the Community Justice Authorities (CJAs) which have responsibility for distributing funds to constituent local authorities according to the area partnership plan.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

795. Local authorities will be funded under the arrangements described in the previous paragraph.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

796. No other bodies will incur costs.

SECTION 23 - OFFENCES AGGRAVATED BY RACIAL OR RELIGIOUS PREJUDICE

797. Statutory aggravations for offences motivated by prejudice relating to race and religion are already in place. Section 96 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 provides that the court shall, when it is libelled in an indictment or specified in a complaint, and, in either case, proved that an offence has been racially aggravated, take the aggravation into account in determining the appropriate sentence. Section 74 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003 provides that when it has been libelled in an indictment or specified in a complaint, and, in either case, proved that an offence has been aggravated by religious prejudice; the court must take the aggravation into account in determining the appropriate sentence.

798. In 2006-07, 1081 persons were proceeded against for offences with a religious and/or racial aggravation. Of those, 870 had a charge proved. However, the information on whether a religious or racial aggravation was included in the final conviction and what if any impact it had on the sentence is less robust and it is sometimes that case that the information as to whether the aggravation has been taken into account in the determination of the sentence is not recorded. The provisions in the Bill require that the court must state on conviction that the offence was racially or religiously aggravated, record the conviction in a way that shows that the offence was so aggravated, take the aggravation into account in determining the appropriate sentence, and state where the sentence in respect of the offence is different from that which the court would have imposed if the offence were not so aggravated, the extent of and the reasons for that difference, or otherwise, the reasons for there being no such difference.

Police

799. There will be no new costs to the police. The provisions in the Bill do not create any new offences. Aggravations relating to race have been in place since 1998 and aggravations relating to religion have been in place since 2003. The police are already required to record these aggravations as part of a charge when a report is put forward to the Procurator Fiscal.

Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service

800. The Crown Office already produces racially or religiously aggravated charges on complaints or indictments so the provisions in the Bill will not place any new burden.
These documents relate to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

Scottish Court Service

801. The provisions in the Bill will have some cost implications for the Scottish Court Service, with the added administrative arrangements involved in taking account of the recording (and other) requirements. SCS estimates a one-off cost of £5,000 for IT development and modifications. Based on the most up-to-date figures (2006-2007) for the number of individuals in Scotland proceeded against in which a racial or religious aggravation was applied, it is estimated that ongoing annual administrative costs for the SCS will be in the region of £23,800.

Scottish Prison Service

802. The provisions in the Bill will not impact on the number of offenders convicted of an aggravated offence. As a result, there will be no new costs for the Scottish Prison Service.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

803. No additional costs to local authorities are anticipated.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

804. There are no costs for other bodies or businesses.

SECTION 24 - VOLUNTARY INTOXICATION BY ALCOHOL; EFFECT IN SENTENCING

805. The provisions set out in statute that voluntary intoxication through alcohol is not a mitigating factor in the commission of an offence. This measure codifies in statute an approach that is already generally used. The implications could include some minor savings in court time as the provision will prevent defence agents even considering pleading mitigation of a sentence due to intoxication. Any savings would however be minimal, but are very difficult to estimate.

CHAPTER 3:

PART 2 OF THE BILL - CRIMINAL LAW

SECTION 29 – ARTICLES BANNED IN PRISON

806. Offenders convicted of an offence relating to mobile phones as a prohibited article under the provisions of the Bill could potentially spend longer in custody than they otherwise would, if they are found guilty of the offence. It is difficult to estimate how many convictions may be imposed for the introduction or use of a personal communication device in prisons. The creation of a specific offence in relation to this matter progressed together with the introduction of signal blocking devices (mobile phone blockers) in prison grounds is intended to provide an effective deterrent to the introduction and use of mobile phones in prisons. We anticipate that only those individuals who are suspected of introducing, or attempting to introduce, a personal communication device and those who are suspected of having used a personal communication device for the purposes of running their criminal activities within the prison or intimidating witnesses or members of the public will be reported to the police for possible prosecution. Prisoners found in possession of a mobile phone would likely be dealt with through the internal disciplinary procedures that apply to prisoners under the Prison Rules, as possession of a prohibited article is a disciplinary offence.

807. There were approximately 800 mobile phones, or component parts of mobile phones, found in SPS prisons over the last 12 months. This figure includes all incidents involving all mobile phones, i.e. those thrown over the perimeter wall, those found in communal areas of the prison, those found in prisoners’ property and those found on individual prisoners. Of the 800 mobile phone finds, 68 were found in the possession of a prisoner. Therefore, a total of 68 individuals could have been reported to the Police and considered for possible criminal prosecution had legislation been in place. Given that the Scottish Prison Service envisages most such instances being dealt with by way of a fine or internally under the Prison Rules, and drawing on experience from HM Prison Service for England and Wales, which has had similar legislative provisions in force 1 March 2008, it is estimated that there may be around 10 prosecutions leading to convictions each year for the new offence.

Scottish Court Service/Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service

808. Given that it is expected that the majority of prisoners will continue to be dealt with by internal prison discipline and considering the very low levels of prosecutions in England and Wales, there are likely to be minimal cost implications the Crown. With around 10 prosecutions likely to be taken forward in the sheriff and jury courts, additional costs of £14,800 are likely to fall on the Scottish Court Service.

Scottish Prison Service

809. In relation to possible additional costs falling on the Scottish Prison Service, a successful conviction and custodial sentence could theoretically result in some upward pressure on the prison population. However, the low number of prosecutions anticipated makes estimating additional costs difficult. SPS estimates that the recurring annual cost per prisoner place, if additional capacity were required is £40,000. It is estimated that the average daily prison population may increase by 5 as a result of the provisions. This is calculated from 10 convictions each year, where the average sentence handed down is 1 year with time served in jail being 6 months. The theoretical cost (if additional prison capacity were needed) is £200,000.
These documents relate to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

810. We do not anticipate any additional costs on local authorities.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

811. We do not anticipate any additional costs on other bodies, individuals or businesses.

SECTIONS 30 - SALE AND HIRE OF CROSSBOWS TO PERSONS UNDER 18

SECTION 31 - SALE AND HIRE OF KNIVES AND CERTAIN OTHER ARTICLES TO PERSONS UNDER 18

812. The costs of these proposals for police forces are likely to be minimal and will depend on the number of test purchases carried out and whether they are incorporated into any wider scheme of test purchasing for offensive weapons. It should be noted that it is unlikely that a test purchasing scheme would be carried out for crossbows alone. It is not possible to provide an estimate of the costs incurred by Scottish Police Forces for mounting test purchasing programmes, because these are absorbed within operational police budgets and any test purchasing would likely form part of a wider test purchasing scheme. There are no other costs.

SECTION 32 - CERTAIN SEXUAL OFFENCES BY NON-NATURAL PERSONS

813. The provisions will broaden the range of available disposals for a solemn court where an offence has been committed under sections 9-12 of the Protection of Children and Prevention of Sexual Offences (Scotland) Act 2005 (the “2005 Act”). The court will now be able to impose a financial penalty as well as, or instead of, a custodial penalty. In 2007/08, there was one offence recorded under sections 9-12 of the 2005 Act. For the purposes of this financial memorandum, a very minimal financial impact is estimated.

SECTION 33 - INDECENT IMAGES OF CHILDREN

814. These provisions clarify offences relating to possession of indecent photographs of children to include pseudo-photographs i.e. images which are derived from actual photographs but which do not appear to be photographs themselves. It is not known how widespread possession of pseudo-photographs is among individuals in Scotland; however as this material is likely to come to light as a result of investigations into child pornography already instigated no or very minimal additional costs are expected to be incurred.
SECTION 34 - EXTREME PORNOGRAPHY

815. These provisions create a new offence of possession of extreme forms of pornographic material and increase penalties for existing offences of publicly displaying, publishing, selling, distributing and possessing for gain obscene material which is or includes an extreme pornographic image. It is not known how widespread possession of this material is among individuals in Scotland. On the one hand, it has been an offence to publish or distribute in Scotland obscene material of this nature for a number of years. However, given the developments in technology, including the emergence of the internet, which have made the production and distribution of such material faster, more convenient and anonymous, there may be a significant base of consumers. The key factor governing cost implications will be the number of investigations and prosecutions. It is impossible to quantify this but it is not expected that there will be a large number as many cases liable to be prosecuted are likely to be those that come to light as a result of investigations in other areas, including investigations into indecent images of children. In 2006-07, 71 persons were proceeded against on charges relating to possession of indecent images of children. We would not expect as many persons to be proceeded against in relation to possession of extreme pornographic material as those offences relating to indecent images of children will continue to have a higher priority for the police. For the purposes of this financial memorandum we therefore estimate that an average of 5 persons will be proceeded against for this offence in each year. It is assumed that these cases will be tried in the sheriff court under summary procedure.

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

816. In 2007 the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency’s National High Tech Crime Unit estimated that the police investigation costs relating to possession of indecent images of children were around £1,000 per case. We have assumed that the investigation costs will be similar for extreme pornography which gives an overall estimated cost of £5,000 for 5 cases. Crown Office’s prosecution costs range from £199, where a section 76 plea is made, to £676 if the case goes to trial (based on Crown Office’s average case costs for 2006-07). On the assumption that the cases are tried under summary procedure in the sheriff court the weighted average case cost would be £320 which gives an overall total of £1,600.

817. From the Scottish Legal Aid Board’s 2006-2007 annual report the average criminal case cost for a sheriff court case is £825 which gives an overall total of £4,125.

818. Costs to the Scottish Court Service range from £93 where there is a plea at first diet to £1,360 if the case goes to trial based on Scottish Court Service average criminal case costs for 2006-2007. On the assumption that the cases are tried under summary procedure in the sheriff court the weighted average case cost would be £244 which gives an overall total of £1,220.

819. It is not known in what proportion of cases the court will opt to impose a prison sentence on conviction. The Scottish Prison Service calculates that the cost of 6 months in prison is approximately £20,000. On the assumption that one offender per year receives a prison sentence of 6 months, the total additional cost to the Scottish Prison Service would be £20,000 per year.
COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

820. We do not anticipate any additional costs on local authorities.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

821. We do not anticipate any additional costs on other bodies, individuals or businesses.

SECTION 35 - PEOPLE TRAFFICKING

822. The extension to the territorial extent of human trafficking offences will have a minimal financial impact as it will affect extremely few cases each year (if any at all). Extending the jurisdiction of the sheriff court to deal with human trafficking offences will also have a minimal financial impact, with some limited savings possible through cases being heard at a lower level than otherwise would have been the case. For the purposes of this financial memorandum, a nil financial impact has been assumed given the likely extremely few cases these provisions will affect.

CHAPTER 4:

PART 3 OF THE BILL - CRIMINAL PROCEDURE

SECTION 38 – PROSECUTION OF CHILDREN

823. In the last 5 years, there has only been 1 prosecution of a child under the age of 12. The provisions will therefore have no material financial impact.

SECTION 40 - WITNESS STATEMENTS

SECTION 62 – WITNESS STATEMENTS: USE DURING TRIAL

COSTS ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service

Sending Copies of statements to witnesses

824. The following assumptions are being made:
Copies of statements will be provided by post;

Only witnesses categorised as civilian witnesses will require copies of their statement;

It is estimated that 162,490 civilian witnesses will be cited to give evidence per year, based on 2007/2008 statistics;

Statements will be posted out first class, at a cost of £0.36 per letter;

In each summary case, it will take a Band B member of staff an average of .5 hours to process the case and send out the statements;

The average hourly rate for a Band B member of staff is £7.24;

There will be an estimated 44,005 pleas of not guilty at pleading diet at Sheriff Summary level and at estimated 7119 pleas of not guilty at pleading diet at District/JP level, based on 2007/2008 statistics, giving an estimated 51,124 cases in which statements will be obtained;

Of the estimated 51,124 trials per year, it is anticipated that 25% of these will involve police witnesses only, leaving at estimated 38,343 cases in which civilian statements will require to be processed;

Thus it is anticipated that there will be 19,171.5 hours work per year processing these for summary cases;

There will be an estimated 5,464 solemn cases per year in which witness statements will be provided to witnesses, again requiring 0.5 hours work per case;

Thus it is anticipated that there will be 2,732 hours work per year processing these for solemn cases.

Postage: £0.36 x 162,490 = £58,496.40

Staffing costs: Summary £7.24 x 19,171.5 = £138,801.66

Solemn £7.24 x 2,732 = £18,779.68

Total cost per year = £216,077.74

Note: It is stressed that the costs detailed above are the upper limit of what is anticipated as COPFS will continue to consider methods of carrying out the work that will reduce the financial burden, e.g. through making effective use of IT systems.

Scottish Court Service

825. The general assumption is that copies of statements will be provided by post, however there may be the odd occasion where a court may adjourn to allow witnesses to read statement – this would be an exception as it is not recommended to have witnesses given statements on day of trial. If court adjourned to allow witnesses to read statements, the result would be a delay to proceedings in High Court or Sheriff Court. Estimated costs of such delays per 20 cases is £2,000.
COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

826. We do not anticipate any additional costs on local authorities.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

827. We do not anticipate any additional costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses.

SECTION 41 - BREACH OF UNDERTAKING

828. This is a procedural change whereby in future, rather than libelling a separate charge, the accused will instead face the original charge with an “aggravation” added. There will be no financial impact of this change.

SECTION 42 - BAIL REVIEW APPLICATIONS

829. This provision will deliver a saving through the use of less court time. In 2007/08 there were 1900 applications for bail review, of which 400 were refused. It is already the case that uncontested applications relating to a change of address do not require a hearing (and so will not be covered by this change) and 90% of bail review applications relate to a change of address. This leaves around 150 applications for bail review which do not relate to a change of address and which are granted (those that are not granted are obviously contested). The majority of these cases will be contested as they relate to the bail conditions originally deemed acceptable by the prosecutors.

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

830. For the purposes of this financial memorandum, if we estimate that around 50 cases will not be contested, then the saving in court time represented by not having to consider uncontested cases will be 10 minutes (max) @ £750 per hour x 50, or £6,250.
COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

831. There will be no additional costs for local authorities.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

832. There will be no additional costs for other bodies, individuals or businesses.

SECTION 43 - BAIL CONDITION FOR IDENTIFICATION PROCEDURES ETC.

833. The provisions introduce a new standard condition of bail to require that accused persons make themselves available: (i) to attend at an identification parade or other identification procedure; and (ii) to enable the taking of any print, impression or sample from them.

834. This new standard condition will save some court time as it will no longer be necessary for a prosecutor to have to ask the court to impose a requirement to participate in an ID procedure. At present it is relatively common (though no specific figures exist) for the prosecutor to seek such a requirement, and it is understood that the imposition of this condition is rarely, if ever, contested by the defence. The change made by the provisions therefore has the potential to achieve only a very small time saving in any individual case, but will potentially affect a substantial number of trials.

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

835. No additional costs falling on the police or the Scottish Prison Service.

836. No additional costs falling on the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service. There will be a minimal cost to the Scottish Court Service in updating their IT systems with details of this new standard condition. However, this is likely to be offset by a small cumulative saving of court (and prosecution time), as it will no longer be necessary for the prosecutor to have to ask the court to impose a requirement to participate in an ID procedure. It is not possible to estimate with any degree of certainty the amount of time that will be saved, but it is likely to be minimal.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

837. We do not anticipate any additional costs on local authorities.
COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

838. We do not anticipate any additional costs on other bodies, individuals or businesses.

SECTION 44 - PROSECUTION ON INDICTION: SCOTTISH LAW OFFICERS

839. This provision is intended simplify the change over between Lord Advocates i.e. when can indictments be issued in the new name. There will be no costs associated with this provision. There may be some minimal savings as and when the provisions are used on occasions when the holder of the post of Lord Advocate changes, but given this provision will only be used as and when the holder of the post of Lord Advocate changes, it is not possible to estimate what savings are likely with any degree of certainty.

SECTION 46 - ADDITIONAL CHARGE WHERE BAIL ETC. BREACHED

840. The provisions will allow a complaint in summary proceedings to be amended, prior to trial, to include a charge of failing to appear. This will remove the need for the prosecutor to prepare a separate complaint containing the charge of failing to appear. This change should lead minimal savings in court, COPFS and legal aid costs. It will cut down on the need for a new complaint (with associated requirements as to service), and minimal additional legal aid costs currently incurred in representing an accused in what amounts to a separate matter will also likely be reduced. It is not possible to estimate these minimal savings with any degree of certainty as it is not clear how often the provisions will be used.

SECTION 47 - REMAND AND COMMITTAL OF CHILDREN AND YOUNG PERSONS

841. Over the last three years (up to and including the year 2007/08), an average of 27 young people were remanded on judicial unruly certificates and spent an average of 17 days in prison custody (average total of 459 days). With the abolition of judicial unruly certificates it is anticipated that these young people will, instead, be remanded to secure accommodation and associated costs will move from the Scottish Prison Service to the Local Authorities.

842. 2007/08 saw a significant fall in the number of young people remanded on judicial unruly certificates, and the time spent in prison custody, compared with previous years. This was due, in part, to the availability and uptake of alternative options. As a result it is anticipated that, if the legislation was not abolished, the numbers being remanded would continue to fall. Assuming implementation of the provisions in April 2010, costs have been calculated to reflect this projected fall at 25% per annum (both number of young people and number of days) for each of the two years (2008/09 and 2009/10) until 2010/11 implementation.

843. No additional cost falling directly on the police.

844. No additional costs falling on the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service. Minor savings may be achieved based on the fact that young people are generally remanded in prison for the shortest period of time before being transferred to a suitable secure unit. For this to be achieved, the case has to be called before a sheriff to vary the remand conditions.
845. No additional costs falling on the Scottish Court Service but some minor savings may be achieved as set out above.

846. No additional costs will fall on the Scottish Prison Service but again minor savings will be achieved. The average cost of a prison place is £40,000 per annum (approx £109 per day). Therefore average total savings to the prison service can be calculated at approximately £50,500 if the provisions had been implemented in 2007/08. As per above, this saving is anticipated to reduce by 25% per annum from April 2008 and the estimated recurring saving by the year 2012/13 is £11,983.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

847. The burden will fall on local authorities to provide alternative remand accommodation, most likely in the form of secure accommodation. On average the cost per day of secure accommodation is calculated at £700 therefore the additional cost is calculated at approximately £321,500 for the year 2007/08. Additional costs will also fall on the local authority to transport young people from court to secure establishments and this has been estimated at £5,000. Total estimated cost to local authorities is approximately £326,500 for the year 2007/08. Assuming implementation in April 2010 of the provisions and the estimated 25% reduction in demand for places each year, this equates to a cost in 2010/11 of £137,742. It is projected that this cost will fall, due to the availability of alternative options to prison remand and secure accommodation, by 25% per annum, so that the recurring cost by 2012/13 is £77,480.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

848. We do not anticipate any additional costs on other bodies, individuals or businesses.

These documents relate to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

SECTION 52 - DISCLOSURE OF CONVICTIONS AND NON-COURT DISPOSALS

Convictions in solemn proceedings

849. The provisions will allow courts making sentencing decisions in solemn proceedings to take account of any conviction(s) acquired by an accused between the date of the offence which led to the current conviction and the actual date of that conviction. This change potentially allows a judge in determining sentence to consider additional convictions that might warrant a stricter sentence. This might in some cases result in an increased prison term. The extent of any increase as a result of this provision is extremely difficult to assess. It is not expected that the disclosure of post-offence convictions would be likely to have a significant impact on sentences, although there might be some slight increase in the level of sentences imposed. Ascertaining how much weight a judge is likely to give a direct measure in determining sentence is however very difficult to assess with such an appraisal (and impact of eventual sentence) likely to vary depending upon the facts of each case.

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

850. Some minimal additional costs will fall on the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service. The Procurator Fiscal will have to check the position as regards convictions/alternative disposals between the offence date and date of conviction. This is not work that is currently done. It may then be necessary to create and serve an amended schedule of previous convictions upon the accused and court. It is anticipated these costs will be minimal.

851. In relation to possible additional costs falling on the Scottish Prison Service, any impact on the prison population would depend on the extent of any increase in sentence length. It is impossible to quantify this but the effect is expected to be minimal.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

852. We do not anticipate any additional costs on local authorities.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

853. We do not anticipate any additional costs on other bodies, individuals or businesses.

Fiscal fines, compensation offers and work orders in proceedings

854. The provisions will allow courts in making sentencing decisions in both solemn and summary proceedings to take account of offers of fiscal fines, compensation offers and work orders that have arisen following the date of the offence. This change potentially allows a judge in determining sentence to consider additional factors that might warrant a stricter sentence. This might result in a limited number of cases in an increased level of fine or prison term.

855. The extent of any increase as a result of this provision is extremely difficult to assess. It is not expected that the proposed change would be likely to have a significant impact on sentences, although there may be some slight increase. Ascertaining how much weight a judge is likely to give a direct measure in determining sentence is however very difficult to assess with such an appraisal (and impact of eventual sentence) likely to vary depending upon the facts of each case.

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

856. No additional costs falling on the police or Scottish Court Service.

857. Some minimal additional costs falling on the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service. The Procurator Fiscal will have to check the position as regards convictions/alternative disposals between the offence date and date of conviction. This is not work that is currently done. It may then be necessary to create and serve and amended schedule of previous convictions upon the accused and court. It is anticipated these costs will be minimal.

858. In relation to possible additional costs falling on the Scottish Prison Service, any impact on the prison population would depend on the extent of any increase in sentence length. It is impossible to quantify this with any degree of certainty but the effect is expected to be minimal.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

859. We do not anticipate any additional costs on local authorities.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

860. We do not anticipate any additional costs on other bodies, individuals or businesses.

SECTIONS 54-57 - CROWN APPEALS

861. The provisions will allow the Crown a right of appeal against two types of judicial ruling that can bring a solemn criminal case to an end without the verdict of a jury. These are rulings of no case to answer or on the basis of a statutory replacement of a common law submission. The Crown will also gain a right of appeal against certain judicial findings relating to the admissibility of prosecution evidence.

862. It is difficult to estimate how many appeals may be taken by the Crown under the provisions in the Bill. However, the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service envisage that these rights of appeal will be used sparingly and only in cases which have been assessed by Crown Counsel as being appropriate to invoke the appeal procedure.

863. In relation to existing rights, the Crown exercises its right of appeal against an unduly lenient sentence approximately 10 times a year. The Lord Advocate’s Reference procedure, which can be used where the Crown wish the Appeal Court to consider a particular point of law that arose in a criminal case, has been used 3 times since 1998 (but none since 2002).

864. The Crown estimates that the rights of appeal provided under this Bill are unlikely to be utilised more than 3-4 times a year. Such appeals would involve consideration by the Appeal Court, and if successful might result in a retrial of the accused although that is not guaranteed. In some exceptional circumstances it might be possible for an appeal to be considered... sufficiently swiftly to allow a continuation of the original trial. This would be substantially less expensive than a retrial.

865. Although it is difficult to estimate the likely duration of a Crown appeal with any accuracy, it is assessed for the purposes of this memorandum that a Crown appeal would take approximately 4 days court time per appeal given the likely profile and size of such cases.

866. No additional costs falling on the police.

867. The average cost to the Scottish Court Service in salary terms per day for a solemn conviction appeal would be approximately £4,500. The cost to the Scottish Court Service of 4 appeal cases per annum, each lasting an average of 4 days is estimated to be approximately £72,000.

868. The Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service estimate that these appeals would be expected to involve around 40 days preparation and court time for an Advocate Depute. In addition, legal staff would have to consider a range of cases, many of which would not ultimately be subject to an appeal. This time cost is estimated at 0.25 of a full time legal post, together with 0.25 of a legal trainee. The estimate for average staffing costs for Crown Counsel and legal staff in a Crown appeal is £51,200.

869. The average prosecution costs of a High Court trial in 2005/06 was £19,300\(^\text{10}\) (adjusted for inflation £21,000). Assuming that there would be a retrial in each case and that the case would be in the High Court (neither of those assumptions are certain), the total annual expenditure to the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service for 4 retrials per annum would be £84,000. In relation to court costs for retrials, it is estimated that the average court cost for 4 High Court retrials per annum would be £78,000, with non-recurring set-up costs of £5,000.

870. This gives a total annual court and prosecution cost figure of £285,200.

871. The average cost to the legal aid budget of a Criminal appeal case in 2007-08 was £1,615. The cost to the Scottish Legal Aid Board of 4 appeal cases of unusual complexity per annum is estimated to be approximately £40,000. The average cost to the legal aid budget of a non appeal High Court case in 2007-08 was £12,900. If there were to be a retrial in each Crown Appeal case (which is thought to be unlikely), the total annual expenditure for retrials is estimated at £51,600. Together, this gives a figure for the Scottish Legal Aid Board of £91,600.

872. In relation to possible additional costs falling on the Scottish Prison Service, a successful appeal followed by a retrial ending in a conviction and custodial sentence could theoretically result in some upward pressure on the prison population. However, the low number of appeals anticipated makes estimating additional costs very difficult. The process will not necessarily result in a conviction and to have any effect on prison population, any custodial sentence would either have to result in a new term of imprisonment or extend an existing period of imprisonment. A nil financial impact has been assumed.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

873. We do not anticipate any additional costs on local authorities.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

874. We do not anticipate any additional costs on other bodies, individuals or businesses.

SECTIONS 58-60 – RETENTION AND USE OF SAMPLES ETC.

875. The Scottish Police Services Agency (SPSA) indicate that, in 2007-08, 807 DNA records were retained in respect of individuals who were been proceeded against but not convicted of a relevant sexual or violent offence. For the purposes of this financial memorandum, we have assumed that the extending these retention arrangements to fingerprints will result in a similar number of fingerprint records being retained annually.

876. In response to Professor Fraser’s review, the Scottish Children’s Reporter Administration (SCRA) indicated that 883 children were referred to the Reporter on the ground that they had committed serious sexual or violent offences in 2006-07. We understand from SCRA that, in 2007-08, 12.2% of children referred to the children’s hearings system on offence grounds either accepted those grounds or had them established. On this basis, for the purposes of this memorandum we have estimated that there would be around 100 cases per year where DNA and fingerprint data taken from children subsequently referred to the children’s hearings system for serious violent or sexual offences could be retained for a limited period.

877. SPSA indicate that it costs approximately £25 to process a DNA sample (i.e. to turn into a DNA profile and place it on the system). However, currently most samples taken are routinely processed prior to a decision on the disposal of a case, so we anticipate little additional processing cost in light of the new provisions. It costs £0.75 per annum to store DNA samples and approximately £9 per annum to maintain each fingerprint record.

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

878. We estimate that an additional 807 fingerprint records would be retained in respect of individuals who were proceeded against but not convicted of a relevant sexual or violent offence. Approximately 100 fingerprint and DNA records taken from children subsequently referred to the children’s hearings system would also be retained. The cost to SPSA of storing these additional records would be approximately £8,000 per annum. This cost will accumulate each year as another year’s worth of samples is added to those already stored. However, this would reach a ‘critical mass’ at the end of the third year once records begin to be destroyed. Once destruction of records after three years’ retention begins, approximately three years’ worth of additional data will be retained at any one time.

879. There would be one-off system change costs to SPSA of around £25,000.

880. There may be minimal additional costs to the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service associated with amendments to IT systems.

881. We do not anticipate additional costs to police forces. The provisions in the Bill provide powers to retain forensic data that has already been taken by police. Therefore, there should be no increase in the number of samples taken by the police.

882. No additional costs to the Scottish Court Service.

883. No additional costs to the Scottish Prison Service.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

884. No additional costs to local authorities

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

885. No additional costs to other bodies, individuals and businesses.

SECTION 61 - REFERRALS FROM SCOTTISH CRIMINAL CASES REVIEW COMMISSION: GROUNDS FOR APPEAL

886. The impact of the provisions concerning miscarriage of justice appeals procedures will be to reduce the scope of appeals that can follow a SCCRC referral. In general, the appellant will in future only be able to raise appeal proceedings of the basis of the SCCRC statement of reasons (subject to a court permitting an appeal on other grounds).

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

887. There may be limited costs to the SCCRC as the grounds for appeal within their reports will assume greater importance. There may be a small increase in the number of judicial reviews sought by appellants who seek to challenge the grounds laid out in SCCRC statement of reasons. It is considered this may amount to 1 additional judicial review a year at the cost of £30,000. There may be some limited savings to the Scottish Court Service and COPFS as a result of the grounds for hearing of appeals being limited. It is not possible to quantify with any degree of certainty how much these savings would be.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

888. There are no costs falling to local authorities.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

CHAPTER 5:

PART 4 OF THE BILL - EVIDENCE

SECTION 67 - TELEVISION LINK EVIDENCE

890. It is very difficult to estimate with any degree of certainty the number of cases where this provision will be used, but for the purposes of this financial memorandum an estimate of 100 cases each year is used.

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

891. The cost to Scottish Court Service based on 100 cases per annum is estimated at –

- High Court
  - Judicial salaries £8,000
  - Running costs £1,500

- Sheriff Court
  - Judicial salaries £6,000
  - Running costs £1,500
  - Court Service salaries in respect of additional court time - £30,000

One–off costs to equip 1 additional court per sheriffdom with tv links - £132,000

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

892. There are no costs falling on local authorities

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

893. There are no costs falling on other bodies, individuals and businesses.

CHAPTER 6:

PART 5 OF THE BILL - CRIMINAL JUSTICE

SECTION 68 – UPPER AGE LIMIT FOR JURORS

SECTION 69 – PERSONS EXCUSABLE FROM JURY SERVICE

894. The provisions will raise the upper age limit of jurors from 65 to 70. This would increase the juror pool in Scotland by some 200,000 individuals per annum (based on General Register of Scotland figures - June 2006).

895. The provisions do not entail any new spending. It would save in the region of £250,000 to £300,000 per year since jurors drawing pensions would claim less than most jurors claiming allowances to replace lost earnings. We have assumed that 10% of all jurors will fall into the upper age band, and that a minority of these will be drawing a salary or a wage. That minority will grow over time as increasing numbers of people over 60 continue in employment of some kind and defer their pensions. For that reason the estimated savings have been pitched cautiously at rather less than the 10% of the £3m currently allocated to allowances. Any savings will be used to implement improvements to the system of reimbursement of jurors as set out in our consultation paper “The Modern Jury in Scottish Criminal Trials”.

896. The provisions will also change the rules on exemptions in respect of those who attend for jury duty, but do not sit on a jury. There is no financial impact of these provisions.

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

897. No additional costs falling on the Scottish Court Service. Some savings likely to result for lower loss of earnings likely to be paid to those retired from work estimated at £250,000.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

898. We do not anticipate any additional costs on local authorities.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

899. We do not anticipate any additional costs on other bodies, individuals or businesses.

SECTION 70 - DATA MATCHING FOR DETECTION OF FRAUD ETC.

900. The National Fraud Initiative is designed to allow Audit Scotland to compare information about individuals held by different public bodies, and on different financial systems, to identify circumstances that might suggest the existence of fraud or error. The provisions will put on a statutory basis the work of Audit Scotland in relation to the National Fraud Initiative.

901. In 2006/07 (the last full year for which figures are available), the work of Audit Scotland in relation to the National Fraud Initiative identified fraud amounting to nearly £10m. The provisions will help safeguard the work of Audit Scotland in this area.

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

902. As the provisions will place on a statutory footing the work of Audit Scotland in relation to the National Fraud Initiative, there will be no additional costs incurred by the Scottish Administration.

903. Audit Scotland will have a power to charge fees on the costs incurred in obtaining data. This power already exists through currently used audit powers however and no changes to practice are envisaged that should alter the level of costs. The provisions should not therefore have a financial impact.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

904. Audit Scotland will have a power to charge fees on the costs incurred in obtaining data. This power already exists through currently used audit powers however and no changes to practice are envisaged that should alter the level of costs. The provisions should not therefore have a financial impact.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

905. None.

SECTION 71 - SHARING INFORMATION WITH ANTI-FRAUD ORGANISATIONS

906. The provisions will enable public authorities to share information with each other and anti-fraud organisations to help prevent and detect fraud.
COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

907. It is likely that some public bodies will use the powers to prevent and detect fraud. It is a flexible power and will be up to public bodies to decide themselves how they use this new power. It is therefore difficult to provide an estimate of what additional costs will fall on these public bodies, but it is likely that any costs incurred will be offset by the benefits of preventing cases of fraud and the resultant savings that will accrue.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

908. As above, it is likely that local authorities will use the powers to prevent and detect fraud. It is a flexible power and will be up to local authorities to decide themselves how they use this new power. It is therefore difficult to provide an estimate of what additional costs will fall on local authorities, but it is likely that any costs incurred will be offset by the benefits of preventing and detecting fraud and the resultant savings that will accrue.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

909. There will be no costs falling on other bodies, individuals and businesses.

SECTION 72 - CLOSURE OF PREMISES ASSOCIATED WITH HUMAN EXPLOITATION ETC.

910. The provisions amend the Antisocial Behaviour etc. (Scotland) Act 2004 by making explicit provision to provide for the closure of premises associated with the commission of offences in relation to trafficking of human beings and child exploitation.

911. There is likely to be a minimal financial impact as a result of the provisions. Senior police officers can already apply for similar closure powers under the 2004 Act, which provides for the service of closure notice, and making of closure orders of premises associated with antisocial behaviour. The new provisions will assist the police by widening closure powers to help the police deal with premises associated with human trafficking and child sexual exploitation. It is not expected there will be more than a 1 or 2 closure orders sought each year using this new power.

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

912. This will be a discretionary power for the police and it is difficult to estimate precisely how often the power will be used. However, it is not thought that any more than 1 or 2 closure orders a year will take place across Scotland with a minimal financial impact.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

913. There are no costs falling to local authorities.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

914. No costs will be placed on other bodies, individuals and businesses.
SECTION 73 - SEXUAL OFFENCES PREVENTION ORDERS

Extending range of cases where a sexual offences prevention order can be imposed

915. The provisions will extend the range of relevant cases where the court can impose a Sexual Offences Prevention Order (SOPO). On average, it is considered no more than 1 or 2 additional cases a year will emerge where a SOPO is imposed by the courts.

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

916. It is likely there will be some additional costs for Scottish Court Service as hearings in relevant cases will be extended slightly to consider whether it is appropriate to impose a SOPO. However, these costs will be minimal as it is only a very low volume of relevant cases where such consideration will be appropriate.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

917. None.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

918. None.

Explicit power for a prosecutor to ask the court for a SOPO/expanding content of a SOPO and Risk of Sexual Harm Order

919. The provisions will provide an explicit power for a prosecutor to apply to the court for a SOPO to be imposed at the point where the court moves for sentence. It is considered this may lead to a slight increase in the number of cases a year where a SOPO is imposed by the courts. This additional number of cases is likely to be no more than 3 cases a year.

920. The provisions will also expand the content of SOPOs/Risk of Sexual Harm Orders to allow the court to impose restrictions and obligations/requirements on an offender. This would be in addition to the court’s current power to impose conditions that the offender requires to comply with.

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

921. It is likely there will be some limited additional costs for Scottish Court Service as hearings in relevant cases will be extended slightly to consider the prosecutor’s request that a SOPO should be imposed. However, these costs will be offset as it is likely that the cases where the prosecutor applies for a SOPO will often be cases where the police themselves would have sought the imposition of a SOPO at a later date. There will be some limited savings for the police therefore in no longer having to apply to the court for a SOPO in these cases. Scottish Court Service should also benefit from a reduction in the number of police applied for SOPOs.
922. In terms of the cost of monitoring the expanded SOPO/Risk of Sexual Harm Orders, it should be noted that these Orders are essentially an extension of the wider often multi-agency management of sex offenders in the community. While a variety of monitoring techniques are used, the intensity and nature of that monitoring will be dependent on the type and degree of risk-management required in each case, the operational decisions taken in each force on how to manage the Orders, and the capacity of each force to implement the Orders. With this in mind, it is difficult to provide an estimate for any costs associated with these provisions, though it is likely to be minimal in the wider context of work to monitor sex offenders in the community.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

923. None.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

924. None.

SECTION 74 - FOREIGN TRAVEL ORDERS

925. The provisions, which mirror separate provisions in England, Wales, and Northern Ireland, will help protect vulnerable individuals by strengthening and widening the circumstances in which Foreign Travel Orders (FTOs) can be applied. In particular offenders subject to FTOs (i.e. those offenders most likely to want to travel to abuse children abroad) will have to surrender their passports. This will be of significant assistance to the police in enforcing FTOs. Increasing the maximum duration of a FTO from 6 months to 5 years will also attempt to increase the use of FTOs to prevent sex offenders travelling abroad. Between 2004/05–2006/07, only 5 FTOs were issued across the UK. No police force in Scotland has ever applied for/been granted an FTO. It is considered that these measures will lead to a slight increase in the number of cases a year where a FTO is imposed by the courts. This additional number of cases is likely to be no more than 1 or 2 cases a year.

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

926. It is likely that there will be some minimal additional costs for the Scottish Court Service in processing FTOs. However these costs will be offset since there is a further provision allowing the police to obtain an FTO for a longer period without having to obtain a renewal.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

927. None.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

928. None.
SECTION 76 – OBTAINING INFORMATION FROM OUTWITH UNITED KINGDOM

929. The provisions will provide legal authority for the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission (SCCRC) to request co-operation from other jurisdictions as they carry out investigations in alleged miscarriages of justice.

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

930. There will be no additional costs arising from these provisions. There may be some minimal savings as the process by which the SCCRC can seek information from other jurisdictions will be simplified. It is not possible with any degree of certainty to estimate these savings.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

931. None.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

932. None.

SECTION 77 – GRANT OF AUTHORISATIONS FOR DIRECTED AND INTRUSIVE SURVEILLANCE

933. Authorisation for police and SCDEA surveillance is undertaken by a number of relevant officers within these bodies under the terms of the Regulation of Investigatory Powers (Scotland) Act 2000. The provisions will allow one force to take the lead in authorising surveillance in joint operations (which could consist of two or more police forces, or the SCDEA and at least one police force). This is designed to reduce bureaucracy. The provision will not result in either more or less operations occurring; it will simply streamline the process for putting authorisations in place for joint operations.

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

934. No additional costs falling on the police. Minimal savings may accrue to the police from the reduced bureaucracy, but these will be ad hoc and depend on the number of joint operations.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

935. No additional costs falling on local authorities.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

936. No additional costs on other bodies, individuals or businesses.
SECTION 78 – AUTHORISATIONS TO INTERFERE WITH PROPERTY ETC.

937. In order to improve the effectiveness of the operation of the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency (SCDEA), the Regulation of Investigatory Powers (Scotland) Act 2000 and the Police Act 1997 are being amended to allow the Deputy Director General of the SCDEA to authorise intrusive surveillance and property interference.

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

938. No additional costs falling on the SCDEA. There will some efficiency savings as a result of freeing up some of the Director General’s time to deal with other SCDEA matters.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

939. No additional costs falling on local authorities.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

940. No additional costs on other bodies, individuals or businesses.

SECTION 79 - AMENDMENTS OF PART 5 OF POLICE ACT 1997

Requests to overseas jurisdictions

941. In 2007, Disclosure Scotland dealt with over 20,000 enhanced disclosure applications where the applicant gave a place of birth or previous address outwith the UK. This proposal gives Disclosure Scotland the power to gather information from any jurisdiction that is willing to share information for employment checking purposes. Three EU Member States have indicated a willingness to share information with the UK as has 1 other non-EU country. In 2007, Disclosure Scotland handled 7,100 applications from these countries.

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

942. It is not possible to say what charge, if any, would be levied by an overseas jurisdiction. It is also hard to predict if the number of people coming to work in Scotland from these countries will rise or fall. But assuming static application figures, and a lower charge of £5 and a higher charge of £25 per application then the annual cost to the Scottish Government would range from £35,500 to £177,500. The alternative to the Scottish Government bearing this cost would be for the additional cost of gathering information from overseas to be passed onto applicants. The issue of translating overseas information is another factor that needs to be considered.

943. The language groups involved currently have a fee of £57 and £74 per 1,000 words for translation into English (from Interdepartmental Committee on Linguistic Services Government Guideline Rates (2007-8)). If the trend for UK information is repeated in overseas information, then 90% of applications to foreign jurisdictions would result in no information being returned. So 10% (710 on 2007 figures) would require some action. Of the applications in 2007, a total of 57% (405) might require translation. There is some flexibility around how this charge is calculated. We expect that between 100 and 150 words would require translation in each case.
With aggregation, the cost to Disclosure Scotland could be between £4,000 and £6,000 annually. If the translations have to be carried out on a case-by-case basis, the annual costs could be higher at around £23,000. If Scottish Ministers are to carry out effectively their functions under the Protection of Vulnerable Groups (Scotland) Act 2007 then translation will be necessary.

944. There will be development costs falling to Disclosure Scotland to create links and these could vary depending on the solution that is devised to gather the information. These are charged on a case-by-case basis as the need arises. Because of that it is not possible to give precise figure at this time.

945. There could be some costs to the Scottish Police Service if they wish to make use of any of the information that Disclosure Scotland gather and that requires to be translated separately by the Service.

946. No additional costs falling on the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service.

947. No additional costs falling on the Scottish Court Service.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

948. There could be a cost to local authorities if there is a need for language translation.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

949. There could be a cost if there is a need for language translation.

Both the recurring and non-recurring costs are difficult to estimate accurately at this time due to a number of unknown factors. As regard recurring costs: first, the number of people from outwith the UK coming to live in Scotland; second, the number of people from that group who then go into paid or unpaid work where it is possible for their employer to have a criminal record check carried out; third, the number of people whose home country is willing to provide information to Scottish Ministers for Disclosure Scotland’s purposes; and fourth the number of people in that group whose home country provide information that has to be translated into English. As regards non-recurring costs, these will cover such aspects as IT and supporting changes that are needed for the exchange of information to happen. The timing of this expenditure will happen as and when countries sign agreements to share information. At present it is not possible to say with confidence when this is likely to happen. The table estimates 2 countries signing agreements each year and at a cost to Scottish Ministers of £50,000 per time.
But even this is speculative as getting such agreements is a prolonged process. Also, more countries particularly from within the EU could become willing to provide information in the coming years and that too would affect these costs.

Fee charging regime

950. At January 2009, Disclosure Scotland had 3,036 registered persons / bodies and 9,187 nominees included in the register held under section 120 of the Police Act 1997. A one-off charge has been paid (£150 for registered persons / bodies and £10 for each nominee). The provisions will replace this one-off charge with an annual subscription.

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

951. There will be development costs for Disclosure Scotland but as these will be an integral part of the solution to deliver the Protection of Vulnerable Groups (Scotland) Act 2007, it is not possible to separate out the costs of one small part of a much wider IT project.

952. No additional costs falling on the Scottish Police Service.

953. No additional costs falling on the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service.

954. No additional costs falling on the Scottish Court Service.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

955. There will be a charge to each Council for the annual subscription and also for nominees. It is not possible to say what these fees will be. Councils might also incur costs internally in relation to managing their registration. The policy intent will be that the total income received by Disclosure Scotland does not grow as a result of this, so income gained in subscription charges will be offset against disclosure fees.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

956. There will be a charge to each organisation for the annual subscription and also for each nominee. It is not possible to say what these fees will be. Organisations might also incur costs internally in relation to managing their registration.

957. It is not possible to provide non-recurring costs for this proposal as these costs will be part of the wider IT solution to deliver the Protection of Vulnerable Group (Scotland) Act 2007. It is also not possible to provide the future recurring costs. The determining factor, the fee to be charged for the annual subscription will be set in regulations under the Police Act 1997 to be made in the Scottish Parliament at a future date. Because of that, it is also not possible to say if any savings will arise for the bodies on which these costs will fall as comparison with the existing registration fee charging regime cannot be made now.
SECTION 80 - ASSISTANCE FOR VICTIM SUPPORT

958. The provisions introduce an enhanced power for Scottish Ministers to pay grant to victims’ organisations. This power will be discretionary and therefore there is no direct financial impact of the provisions. It is intended to use the provision to allow a wider distribution of existing funding to victims’ organisations.

SECTION 81 - PUBLIC DEFENCE SOLICITORS

959. The provisions will have the effect of confirming in statute the status of the Public Defence Solicitors’ Office (PDSO). As the provisions will not change how the PDSO currently operates on a day to day basis, there is no financial impact of the change.

SECTION 82 - COMPENSATION FOR MISCARRIAGES OF JUSTICE

Ex gratia scheme

960. The provisions will place on a statutory footing the existing ex gratia scheme for payment of compensation as a result of a miscarriage of justice, combining it with the statutory scheme under the Criminal Justice Act 1988. The ex gratia scheme has been in operation since 1986 and no changes are planned to the coverage of the scheme as a result of putting it on a statutory footing.

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

961. No additional costs will fall on the Scottish Administration. There may be some minimal administrative savings through combining the ex gratia and statutory schemes as a result of simplified processes, though it is not possible to provide a specific estimate of these savings.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

962. None.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

963. None.

Convictions which the Crown have set aside

964. The provisions will permit the possibility of compensation being paid under the statutory miscarriage of justice scheme where it is the Crown who seek to have a conviction set aside. These cases are extremely rare, but can occur when, for example, it is found that an offence contained in a statutory instrument is found to be ultra vires.

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

965. The purpose of the provisions is to ensure miscarriage of justice statute is fully comprehensive to cover all potential situations where compensation may become payable. It is not expected that these provisions will used very often, if at all. It is very difficult to estimate if any extra cases will occur where compensation is deemed payable, but it is likely to be very low (perhaps 1 or 2 a decade at most). For the purposes of this financial memorandum, no additional costs have been assumed.
These documents relate to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

966. None.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

967. None.

SECTION 83 - FINANCIAL REPORTING ORDERS

968. As a result of the provisions, we anticipate an increase in the number of Financial Reporting Orders (FROs) being imposed each year. Currently only one FRO has been imposed. Following the change, we estimate 12 cases per year will have a FRO imposed by the courts.

969. Using cost information provided by the Serious Organised Crime Agency (who administer FROs in England and Wales), we anticipate that an average of 10 working days would be required to facilitate the extra FROs each year. However, it has to be acknowledged that every case will be different in length and the amount of work involved cannot be estimated exactly. There has only been one case to date in Scotland and it is too early to work out the costs per order, therefore it is difficult to judge the average costs involved and the extent that the courts will impose these orders. However, any costs are estimated to be minimal.

SECTION 84 - COMPENSATION ORDERS

970. In 2006/07, 1,382 Compensation Orders were imposed as a main penalty. 4,870 were imposed as a secondary penalty in addition to another penalty, generally a fine. Compensation was ordered in 5 per cent of convictions in 2006/07, most frequently in convictions for vandalism (46 per cent of such convictions). The average value of compensation order awarded was £343 in 2006/07.

971. It is possible that by making Compensation Orders easier to impose, courts will move away from imposing fines as a main penalty in certain cases. In 06/07, 6,252 Compensation Orders at an average of £343 were imposed, totalling £2,144,436. Should there be an increase of, for example, 5% in the number of Compensation Orders imposed, this could represent a loss of fine revenue of £107,222 (using the average compensation award of £343).

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

972. Under the Scotland Act 1998 (Designation of Receipts) Order 2004, fine income is surrendered to the UK Consolidated Fund, so any reduction in fine income would not affect the Scottish Administration.
These documents relate to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

973. None.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

974. As noted above, fine income is surrendered to the UK Consolidated Fund so the UK Government may suffer a reduction in the amount of fine income received from Scottish courts. This is estimated to be £107,222 (as per above assumptions). As this represents a net transfer rather than a new cost, a summary table is not provided.

CHAPTER 7:

PART 7 OF THE BILL – MENTAL DISORDER AND UNFITNESS FOR TRIAL

SECTIONS 117-120 – MENTAL DISORDER AND UNFITNESS FOR TRIAL

975. The provisions will modernise the law without changing the current common law position. As such, the provisions will have no financial impact.

CHAPTER 8:

PART 8 OF THE BILL - LICENSING UNDER CIVIC GOVERNMENT (SCOTLAND) ACT 1982

SECTIONS 121-123 AND 125-128 – GENERAL CIVIC GOVERNMENT (SCOTLAND) ACT 1982

976. Most of the amendments to the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 are of a technical nature (such as altering time periods for making representations on licence applications) and will not result in extra costs. A few of the amendments could potentially lead to minimal extra costs – they enable local authorities to license any premises selling food or drink at late hours, and remove the current exemptions from the public entertainment licensing provisions for free events and from the market operators’ licensing provisions for non-commercial organisations. These are referred to below but for the reasons explained, no meaningful cost estimates can be supplied.

977. None.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

978. Where local authorities opt to introduce licensing schemes to cover any premises selling food or drink at late hours, or in respect of large-scale public entertainments (which are free to enter and were previously exempt), or non-commercial market operators (which were previously exempt), the authorities will incur some costs. However, these costs can be met from the fees the authorities will be able to charge. Paragraph 15 of Schedule 1 to the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 empowers local authorities to charge reasonable fees - they must seek to ensure that the fees are sufficient to meet their expenses in carrying out their functions under the 1982 Act. The overall impact of local authorities therefore should be neutral.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

979. As a corollary of the above, some late-night catering establishments, or previously exempt organisers of large-scale public entertainments and non-commercial market operators, will be required to pay fees to those local authorities who choose to introduce licensing schemes. But the 32 local authorities will have discretion in both determining whether to license such activities and what level of fee to charge. Consequently, no meaningful estimate of possible costs can be supplied.

SECTION 124 – LICENSING OF TAXIS AND PRIVATE HIRE CARS

980. The estimated maximum cost to Scottish licensing authorities relates to the additional cost of notifying all taxi operators when fixing any taxi scales or undertaking a review under section 17 of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982. The estimated annual costs assume that the licensee of all taxis (10,441 licensed vehicles) in Scotland will receive notification (by First Class recorded delivery @ £1.08 per letter) in terms of section 17 based on 2 notifications per 3 year period.

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH GOVERNMENT

981. There are no cost implications for the Scottish Government arising from the proposed legislative changes.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

982. The costs to local authorities are those relating to the notification of additional parties (all taxi operators) under section 17. It is anticipated that licensing authorities will choose to notify parties by means of recorded delivery as opposed to personal service and our estimate of costs are based on that assumption. Current legislation requires that licensing authorities conduct fare scale reviews at least every 18 months. For the sake of calculating the cost to local authorities we have assumed that authorities will conduct notification procedure twice during a three year period.

983. Using the methodology above we calculate that the total annual cost to licensing authorities is unlikely to exceed £7,500 per annum.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

984. The above costs will be added in to the overall expenses incurred by licensing authorities in carrying out their licensing functions in relation to such licences and will be reflected in the licence fees applied by individual authorities in terms of section 12 of the 1982 Act. We calculate using the above methodology that the cost to individual taxi operators would amount to less than £1.00 per annum.

CHAPTER 9:
PART 9 OF THE BILL - ALCOHOL LICENSING

SECTION 130 - PREMISE LICENCE APPLICATIONS: NOTIFICATION REQUIREMENTS

985. These proposals will allow police forces to make savings by reducing notification and reporting requirements. While the amount of time spent on producing anti-social behaviour reports varies from force to force depending on IT systems we estimate that a report costs a minimum of £50 to produce and savings can be made by reducing the requirement to report to only where the Licensing Board requests it or where the police deem it necessary. Any savings therefore will be minimal.

SECTION 135 - EXTENDED HOURS APPLICATIONS: VARIATION OF CONDITIONS

986. The provisions will permit the application of extra conditions on a licensee when granted an extended hours licence. The provisions may create greater expense for any business on who they are imposed. However without the ability to impose such conditions there is the possibility that Licensing Boards would refuse to grant these additional hours licences and businesses would lose the additional revenue that they would expect to gain during the additional trading period. It is very difficult to provide an estimate for the cost on business as this will be dependent on the number of businesses who seek an extended hours licence, the type of additional conditions a Licensing Board wishes to impose and the number of occasions on which such conditions will apply.

PART 10 OF THE BILL - MISCELLANEOUS

SECTION 140 - LICENSED PREMISES: SOCIAL RESPONSIBILITY LEVY

987. The provisions have no direct financial implications as they enable the Scottish Ministers to establish arrangements for a Social Responsibility Levy by way of regulations. The application of a levy to licensed premises will shift some of the burden of dealing with the consequences of alcohol misuse from the public bodies which currently meet the cost – notably the police, the health service and the ambulance service – to those who profit from the sale of alcohol. We are of course sensitive to the impact of introducing a levy during an economic downturn when many businesses are facing increased costs and reducing income. A decision to introduce regulations will not be take before autumn 2010 and consideration will be given to the prevailing economic climate at that time.

988. During the passage of the Bill through Parliament, we intend to work with stakeholders to develop the detail of the Social Responsibility Levy, including the parameters of the arrangements. Subject to the satisfactory completion of its work, a full regulatory impact assessment will be prepared and presented to Parliament with the appropriate regulations which would be subject to affirmative resolution procedure. The level or levels at which the levy may be set, and whether such levels should be set nationally or locally, will be considered on completion of the engagement process with stakeholders. Where the levy is applied some business may pass the cost onto customers.

SECTION 142 - CORRUPTION IN PUBLIC BODIES

989. The provisions will extend the jurisdiction of district/Justice of the Peace courts so they can deal with cases involving offences under the Public Bodies Corrupt Practices Act 1889 and the Prevention of Corruption Act 1906. It is unlikely that any more than a 1/2 cases (at most) each year will be dealt with in the district/JP court following this change.

COSTS FALLING ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

990. It should be noted that the number of cases prosecuted under the two Acts is very low. There may be some extremely minimal savings for Scottish Court Service as some cases are tried in a lower court than they would have been previously.

991. The following table summarises the overall financial impact of the Bill:

992. This table above does not include the financial impact of section 18 (Amendments of Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007) of the Bill. Paragraph 785 explains the rationale for excluding this section’s financial impact from the overall summary table.
EXECUTIVE STATEMENT ON LEGISLATIVE COMPETENCE

993. On 5 March 2009, the Cabinet Secretary for Justice (Kenny MacAskill MSP) made the following statement:

“In my view, the provisions of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill would be within the legislative competence of the Scottish Parliament.”

PRESIDING OFFICER’S STATEMENT ON LEGISLATIVE COMPETENCE

994. On 4 March 2009, the Presiding Officer (Alex Fergusson MSP) made the following statement:

“In my view, the provisions of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill would be within the legislative competence of the Scottish Parliament.”
CRIMINAL JUSTICE AND LICENSING (SCOTLAND) BILL

INTRODUCTION

1. This document relates to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009. It has been prepared by the Scottish Government to satisfy Rule 9.3.3(c) of the Parliament’s Standing Orders. The contents are entirely the responsibility of the Scottish Government and have not been endorsed by the Parliament. Explanatory Notes and other accompanying documents are published separately as SP Bill 24–EN.

POLICY OBJECTIVES OF THE BILL

2. It is critical our justice system is able to cope with the demands placed upon it by life in modern Scotland. A range of reforms to the justice system have been taken forward since May 2007 including:

- investing additional resources to enhance operational policing by building police capacity through increased recruitment of new police officers and improved opportunities for retention and redeployment of existing police officers to help make Scotland’s communities safer;
- committing funding in our ageing prison estate to provide facilities that are "fit for purpose" and capable of holding those serious offenders the public deserve protection from;
- taking forward a National Drugs strategy designed to promote recovery from drug problems as the focus of efforts to tackle drug use;
- taking forward the work of the National Violence Reduction Unit in tackling the scourge of violence within Scotland’s communities; and
- using funds confiscated from criminals to fund a host of initiatives that help expand young people’s horizons and steer them away from a life of crime.

3. We also need modern, effective laws that work in tackling criminals and their criminal behaviour. We want the dedicated people working in our criminal justice system to be equipped to deal with the impact of offending from the moment a crime is committed, through the police investigation and court process and then when the sentence is handed out to the offender.
4. The Bill is split into the following Parts:
   - Part 1 – Sentencing;
   - Part 2 – Criminal law;
   - Part 3 – Criminal procedure;
   - Part 4 – Evidence;
   - Part 5 – Criminal justice;
   - Part 6 – Disclosure;
   - Part 7 – Mental disorder and unfitness for trial;
   - Part 8 - Licensing under Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982;
   - Part 9 – Alcohol licensing;
   - Part 10 – Miscellaneous; and
   - Part 11 – General.

5. The provisions will assist in ensuring Scotland is a safer and stronger place for hard working families to live and work in.

ALTERNATIVE APPROACHES

6. Each topic has an explanation as to what alternative approaches would be available to achieve the policy objectives for each topic.

CONSULTATION

7. Each topic contains a summary of consultation undertaken. References to “Revitalising Justice” contained within this memorandum refer to our proposals document (Revitalising Justice – Proposals To Modernise And Improve The Criminal Justice System) published in September 2008 outlining measures to be contained within a future Criminal Justice and Licensing Bill.

PART 1 - SENTENCING

Section 1 – Purposes and principles of sentencing

Section 2 – Relationship between section 1 and other law

Policy objectives

8. To create a straightforward and transparent framework within which sentencers can base their decisions in individual cases; thereby increasing general understanding of the purposes and principles of sentencing and improving confidence in the sentencing process and the wider criminal justice system.

Key information

9. The provisions lay down in statute the purposes and principles of sentencing. This is intended to ensure that the public has a much clearer understanding of what sentencing is actually for and is clear on the key factors that every sentencer must have regard to when making decisions in individual cases.

Consultation

10. Our consultation paper “Sentencing Guidelines and a Scottish Sentencing Council – Consultation and Proposals”, outlining the detail of our proposals was published on 1 September 2008.

Alternative approaches

11. There are no alternative approaches that achieve the policy objective.

Sections 3-13 and Schedule 1 – The Scottish Sentencing Council

Policy objectives

12. To help ensure greater consistency, fairness and transparency in sentencing and thereby increase public confidence in the integrity of the Scottish criminal justice system.

Key information

13. The provisions create a Scottish Sentencing Council to provide a new sentencing guidelines regime for Scotland. This proposal originated in recommendations by the judicially-led Sentencing Commission, which examined the issue of consistency in sentencing. The central recommendation of the Commission’s 2006 report “The Scope to Improve Consistency in Sentencing” was the creation of a procedure for giving effect to sentencing guidelines.

14. At present, sentencing practice in Scotland operates mainly on a case-by-case basis in the criminal courts, with reference to the wide experience of sentencers in criminal cases and Appeal Court decisions. This is supplemented the Appeal Court’s power to issue guideline judgements. As a result, it can be difficult for the public to properly understand the sentencing process, or to see clearly the reasons behind decisions in individual criminal cases. This has created the common perception that sentencing is inconsistent, which has had a negative effect on public confidence in the criminal justice system leading, in some quarters, to criticism of the judiciary.

15. It has been argued, particularly by practitioners, that sentencing is not inconsistent but is instead tailored to the facts and circumstances of each individual case. However, the Sentencing Commission examined the available evidence and concluded that, even though there is little empirical evidence to support the contention that inconsistency is present, the public perception of that inconsistency was well founded and was in itself something that needed to be addressed.

16. Additionally, the independent Scottish Prisons Commission recommended in its July 2008 report that the Scottish Government should establish a National Sentencing Council to develop clear sentencing guidelines.

Current legislation

17. Section 118(7) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 provides that when the High Court disposes of an appeal, by an offender or by the Lord Advocate, against an offender’s sentence following conviction on indictment, the Court can pronounce an opinion on the sentence or other disposal or order that is appropriate in similar cases. Section 189(7) of the Act makes similar provision in respect of appeals following convictions in summary proceedings.

18. Section 197 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 provides that in passing sentence a court must have regard to any relevant opinion that has been given under section 118(7) or 189(7) of the Act.

19. The power of the courts to issue sentencing opinions under these provisions has not been used very often.

20. There are also some offences where the sentence is fixed by law. For example, section 205(1) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 provides that a person convicted of murder is to be sentenced to imprisonment for life.

Section 3 – The Scottish Sentencing Council

Section 4 – The Council’s objectives

21. The provisions will establish a Scottish Sentencing Council (SSC). They set out the objectives of the Council, with a focus on the promotion of consistency in and a greater understanding of sentencing.
Section 5 – Sentencing guidelines

22. The function of the Council is to prepare and publish guidelines for the courts on the sentencing of offenders. The guidelines can relate to the purposes behind sentencing and the principles to consider when sentencing. They can also relate to sentencing levels and the types of sentences that are appropriate for particular offences and offenders. They may also relate to the kinds of circumstances in which they can be departed from.

23. It will be for the Council to decide whether a guideline is general or relates to a specific type of offence or offender. Guidelines may also relate to broad matters in sentencing. The Council must assess the costs and benefits of the guidelines and their impacts on prisons, community justice services and the criminal justice system in general. This assessment will form part of the guidelines.

Section 6 – Procedure for publication and review of sentencing guidelines

24. The Council will be expected to publish draft guidelines for general comment and, in particular, consult the Scottish Ministers, the Lord Advocate and other people it considers appropriate.

Section 7 – Effect of sentencing guidelines

25. Where the SSC has published sentencing guidelines and those sentencing guidelines apply, then courts must have regard to those guidelines unless they consider that there are good reasons not to. This means that when sentencing an offender, courts must have regard to any sentencing guidelines which are relevant to the offender’s case. If the courts exercise any other functions relating to the sentencing of offenders, the courts must have regard to any guidelines which are relevant to the exercise of those functions, e.g. a decision to impose a probation order rather than sentence an offender.

26. If the court is of the opinion that it is not appropriate to apply one of more or the sentencing guidelines that are relevant to the offender’s case then in imposing a sentence the court must set out the reasons for imposing a sentence that does not follow the guidelines.

27. Under section 108 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, the Lord Advocate has power to appeal against certain disposals including a sentence passed on conviction, a probation order and a community service order. Section 108(2) sets out the grounds on which the Lord Advocate can make such appeals. In deciding whether to make an appeal under section 108 the Lord Advocate will be required to have regard to any sentence guidelines that are relevant to the matter which the Lord Advocate is considering appealing.

28. Under section 118(4)(b) of the Act, when dealing with an appeal the High Court can impose a different sentence to that imposed by the original court. In imposing a different sentence the court must have regard to any relevant guidelines that exist at the time of passing the new sentence.
Section 8 – Ministers’ power to request that guidelines be published or reviewed

29. The Scottish Ministers may at any time request that the SSC undertake to develop and publish sentencing guidelines on any matter within the SSC’s remit or review a particular guideline or guidelines. The SSC must consider the Scottish Ministers’ request but it is not bound to undertake to review that guideline or those guidelines. The SSC must include details of any such requests and its response in its annual report.

Section 9 – High Court’s power to request review of guidelines

30. If the High Court in dealing with an appeal disagrees with the content of a relevant sentencing guideline then the intention is that the court can require the SSC to review the guideline. If the High Court makes such a reference, then the SSC must review that guideline or those guidelines. The SSC must include details of any such references in its annual report.

Section 10 – Scottish Court Service to provide sentencing information to the Council

31. The SSC can require that the Scottish Court Service (SCS) provides information that the SSC requests from the SCS relating to sentencing practice, compliance with and departure from sentencing guidelines. The SSC must from time to time publish information about sentences imposed by the courts. The purpose of this is to make the sentencing process more transparent and improve public understanding of how sentencing decisions are reached. The intention is that the SSC will publish research and analyses of sentencing trends and patterns across Scotland – i.e. looking at the differences between courts in different parts of the country, highlighting trends in the types of disposal used for certain offences etc. This will help to inform the judiciary, the wider justice system and the public about how sentencing is actually being carried out and will assist in highlighting where inconsistencies lie and understanding how to tackle them or even whether they need to be tackled.

Section 11 – The Council’s power to provide information, advice etc.

32. The SSC may advise Scottish Ministers and the Scottish Parliament on sentencing practice and issues relating to sentencing. It may also submit proposals on sentencing matters. Scottish Ministers must have regard to these proposals or advice submitted by the Council. The advice can be given at the request of Scottish Ministers or the Scottish Parliament or on the SSC’s own initiative.

Section 12 - Business plan

33. Every financial year the SSC will be required to publish a business plan. The Scottish Ministers will be required to lay a copy of the business plan before Parliament as soon as reasonably practicable after they have received the business plan. The business plan must set out how the SSC intends fulfilling its functions during the year to which the business plan relates. This will include setting out the subject matters that the SSC intends preparing draft guidelines about. The SSC may choose to include other information in its business plan. In preparing the business plan the SSC must consult the Scottish Ministers and the Lord Advocate.
Section 13 - Annual report

34. Every financial year the SSC will be required to prepare an annual report. This report will have to be submitted to the Scottish Ministers as soon as practicable after the end of the financial year for which it is prepared.

35. The annual report must include information as to how the SSC has fulfilled its functions and purposes during the period to which the annual report relates. This must include:
   - details of the sentencing guidelines that have been published;
   - details of draft sentencing guidelines that have been or are being consulted upon;
   - where Scottish Ministers asked for a sentencing guideline to be prepared on a particular topic, whether that request was accepted. If accepted the report should set out the timetable for producing those guidelines and if rejected the report should set out why the request was rejected; and
   - details of references made by the High Court of the Justiciary and the Council’s response to them.

36. The SSC may also include other information in the annual report.

37. The Scottish Ministers must lay a copy of every annual report received from the SSC before Parliament and the SSC must publish the annual report as soon as practicable after the report is prepared.

Schedule 1 - The Scottish Sentencing Council

38. The SSC is to consist of a combination of judicial and non-judicial members and will be chaired by the Lord Justice Clerk. It is proposed that the Scottish Court Service would provide the property, services and staff required by the Council. The details of the membership of the Council and the approach to appointments are set out in Schedule 1.

Consultation

39. Our "Sentencing Guidelines and a Scottish Sentencing Council – Consultation and Proposals" consultation paper outlining the detail of our proposals was published on 1 September 2008. There were over 40 responses to the consultation from individuals and groups from both within the legal sphere and more broadly. A majority of response were in favour of the proposals and the long term goals of improving transparency and consistency in sentencing.

40. The responses are being analysed and will be used to inform further development and refinement of the policy.

41. A summary of the proposal was also included within the Revitalising Justice paper published in September 2008.

This document relates to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

Alternative approaches

42. There are none that meet the policy objectives.

Section 14 – Community payback orders

Section 20 - Reports about supervised persons

Paragraph 38 of Schedule 5 - Combination of restriction of liberty orders with community payback orders

Policy objectives

43. To introduce a new style easy to understand “Community Payback Order” to replace an unnecessarily complex range of sentencing options currently available which are not readily understood by the public.

Key information

44. The report of the “Review of Community Penalties” was published on 27 November 2007. One of the concerns that the review highlighted was that the range of community sentences was more complex than it needed to be. For example, reparative activities can form all or part of a community service order, supervised attendance order, community reparation order or an additional condition of a probation order. The Review concluded that a new approach to community service was needed to ensure that community service is respected as a high quality disposal which balances the requirement that offenders pay back for their crimes and also have the opportunity to improve their lives. The Review proposed that there should be a single reparative community sentence to be known as a “community service order” and that this would replace the existing community service orders, supervised attendance orders and community reparation orders. It was not proposed to amend the way in which probation orders operated.

45. “Scotland’s Choice - report of the Scottish Prisons Commission” was published on 1 July 2008 and made a number of radical proposals for how imprisonment is used in Scotland. It recommended the creation of a single community sentence to be known as the Community Supervision Sentence:

“The Commission recommends that judges should be provided with a wide range of options through which offenders can pay back in the community, but that where sentences involving supervision are imposed, there should be one single Community Supervision Sentence with a wide range of possible conditions and measures.”

46. We wish to legislate for the broad substance of this recommendation. The policy aim is for the existing community penalties - probation orders, community service orders, supervised attendance orders and community reparation orders - to be replaced with the new community payback order. In bringing together the options for judges, we are highlighting the scope for courts to punish offenders in a way which also addresses the areas of their lives which need to change. Setting out the options in this way also enables us to underline the fact that a community sentence is a punishment and not merely a supportive intervention. We prefer the term “community payback order” to “community supervision sentence” as the sentence may not include a supervision requirement.

47. There are a number of requirements which can be included in a community payback order. When imposing a community payback order on an offender it is intended that the court may include one or more of the following requirements as part of the order.

- A supervision requirement;
- An unpaid work and activity requirement;
- A programme requirement;
- A residence requirement;
- A mental health treatment requirement;
- A drug treatment and testing requirement; and/or
- An alcohol treatment requirement

48. If an offender subsequently breaches the terms of the community payback order, the court in disposing of the case will have access to imposing a requirement of electronic monitoring. This will be one of a number of options open to the court in dealing with breach cases. The community payback order will also provide judges where considered appropriate with the opportunity to carry out review hearings during the course of the order. This is in line with the Prison Commission’s recommendation for ‘progress courts’ to be held as part of the management of the sentence.

49. It is anticipated that approximately 90% of offenders, who are currently sentenced by courts to a community disposal, will in future be made the subject of a community payback order. The intention is to retain the existing specialist drug treatment and testing and restriction of liberty orders alongside the new order and these two existing disposals will deal with the remaining 10% of offenders on community sentences.

50. Ensuring sentences served in the community are robust, immediate and visible to the community will contribute to delivery of a coherent penal policy, and introduce a more structured sentence management regime tailored to the risk and needs of the offender and public safety.

Consultation

51. In formulating its views, the Scottish Prisons Commission\(^7\) took evidence from COSLA, Lothian and Borders CJA, SACRO, SPS, Scottish Prison Officers Association, Victim Support Group Scotland, ACPOS, HM Chief Inspector of Prisons, SCCCJ, Families Outside, ADSW, Labour, Liberal-Democrat and Conservative Justice Spokespersons, Risk Management

Authority, Prison Governors’ Association, Women’s Aid, and held public events in Dundee, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen and Inverness. In addition to this and in the context of conducting our Reforming and Revitalising – Report of the Review of Community Penalties, we consulted with the following: ADSW, COSLA, key voluntary sector providers including Turning Point, Phoenix Futures, NCH Scotland, Academics including researchers from the SCCCI and the Universities of Edinburgh and Strathclyde; selected interest groups including Howard league, Scottish Association for the Study of Offenders, Scottish Consortium on Crime, and the Airborne Initiative; CJA Chief Officers and Conveners; Criminal Justice Agencies – Scottish Court Service, Crown Office, Procurators Fiscal Service, Scottish Prison Service and Social Work Inspection Agency; representatives from health/employment, training and housing bodies; community service supervisors and managers. In addition to this, a consultation session was held at the National Advisory Body on Offender Management attended by representatives of APEX, ACPOS, the Criminal Justice Voluntary Sector Forum, COSLA, Crown Office, Families Outside, Includem, the Parole Board of Scotland, SACRO, Scottish Federation of Housing Associations, the Scottish Prison Service, ADSW, Victim Support Scotland and academics from the universities of Edinburgh, Strathclyde, London and Wales.

Alternative approaches

52. The alternative would be to maintain the status quo and in doing so retain an unnecessarily complex range of sentencing options, which are not readily understood by the public. We do not consider that that approach would be tenable.

Section 15 – Non-harassment orders

Policy objectives

53. To make it easier for prosecutors to obtain criminal NHOs against offenders so that victims are protected from further harassment and repeat offending.

Key information

54. The provisions in the Bill will remove the precondition for a course of conduct amounting to harassment in the consideration of criminal NHOs.

55. Section 11 of the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 (the "1997 Act") amends the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, by inserting a new section (section 234A) to allow criminal courts to make Non-Harassment Orders (NHOs) after convicting a person of a criminal offence involving harassment. This section refers back to the definition of harassment contained in section 8 of the 1997 Act (which is concerned with civil NHOs).

56. Responses to the 2001/2002 consultation on stalking and harassment in Scotland identified a number of issues relating to the usefulness and workability of criminal NHOs. This included the need for prosecutors seeking a criminal NHO to be able to provide evidence of a course of conduct which has amounted to harassment before a judge can even consider the imposition of an NHO.

57. The effect of this is that there must be evidence on the basis of at least two incidents for which an offence is being prosecuted. The offence must itself involve conduct on at least two separate occasions if, following conviction, an NHO is to be considered. For example, if an offender is charged and prosecuted for one incident of breach of the peace, then proceedings for obtaining an NHO cannot even begin because the offence for which the offender has been convicted does not in itself demonstrate a course of conduct.

58. Further provisions on the Bill will amend the legislation on criminal NHOs to ensure that courts should have regard to previous convictions and allow judges access to relevant information to assist in deciding whether to impose an NHO.

59. There is currently concern at the difficulty in using previous convictions as evidence of a course of conduct or to strengthen a case for an NHO. Information about previous convictions can be invaluable in demonstrating the propensity for an offender to commit crimes of harassment in general or to target the same victim repeatedly. Either way, it would be useful if judges were able see the pertinent details of previous convictions while deliberating on NHOs, rather than simply the list of previous convictions, which is standard practice.

Consultation

60. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

Alternative approaches

61. There are none that meet the policy objective.

Section 16 - Short periods of detention

Policy objectives

62. To tidy the law, reducing the risk of error and confusion; and to ensure the efficient use of custodial sentences.

Key information

63. Section 169 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 permits summary courts to detain an offender at court or at a police station until 8pm in lieu of imposing imprisonment, so long as the offender can get home that day. These provisions date back many years and exist in the 1995 Act as a result of consolidation of the law. In practice, the provisions in section 169 are not currently used, have not been used for a considerable number of years and are no longer of any practical use. Section 15(2) of the Bill repeals section 169 of the 1995 Act to help tidy up the law.

64. Section 206(1) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 provides that a summary court cannot impose imprisonment for a period of less than five days. Section 15(3)(a) of the Bill changes this minimum period from five days to fifteen days to reflect our policy on the efficient use of custodial sentences.
65. Subsections (2) to (6) permit the summary courts to sentence an offender to be detained in a certified police cell or similar place for up to 4 days. It is our understanding that there are no such certified police cells in Scotland, and have not been any for some time. This change will not affect “legalised police cells” under the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1989, which can be used to detain prisoners before, during or after trial for up to 30 days. Subsections (2) to (6) are, therefore, repealed by section 15(3)(b) of the Bill.

Consultation

66. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

Alternative approaches

67. There is no alternative approach available that meets the policy objectives.

Section 17 – Presumption against short periods of imprisonment or detention

Policy objectives

68. To ensure appropriate use is made by courts of short term custodial sentences.

Key information

69. We want to make it clear that sentencers should not impose a custodial sentence of 6 months or less, unless the particular circumstances of the case lead them to believe that no other option would be appropriate. We are also legislating to provide that the sentencer must explain in court the circumstances which made them conclude that only a custodial sentence could be imposed.

70. Reducing the number of custodial sentences of six months or less is a policy priority because of the strong evidence from all quarters that they are ineffective and make it harder for the Scottish Prison Service to invest the time needed in intensive rehabilitation of more serious offenders. Whilst eliminating such sentences altogether would not solve prison overcrowding, reducing their number has the potential to diminish churn and wasted activity in the prison system. We wish to steer judges away from custodial sentences while giving them options which offer real opportunities for rehabilitation but also impose effective (and tough) restrictions on offenders, and making it clear that judicial discretion remains intact.

Consultation

Alternative approaches

72. The alternative would be to maintain the status quo and to lose this opportunity to underline the importance of using a short custodial sentence only when there is no realistic alternative available, given the evidence that community sentences offer more scope both for payback to the community and for individual rehabilitation.

Section 18 – Amendments of the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007

Policy objectives

73. To help deliver a comprehensive offender management structure.

Key information

74. The provisions modify the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007 to obtain the statutory framework upon which to build, in due course, a modern regime for managing offenders who are sentenced to custody. This will form part of the plan for delivering a comprehensive offender management structure as set out in our plan “Protecting Scotland’s Communities: Fair, Fast and Flexible Justice” published on Wednesday, 17 December 2008.

75. The policy objective will be achieved by retaining the current custody and community provisions in the 2007 Act. However, there will be an order making power subject to affirmative resolution to designate the group of offenders to whom the custody and community provisions will apply eg. offenders sentence to 1 year or more.

76. The custody only provisions in the 2007 Act will be repealed and substituted with new measures to be known as the short-term custody and community sentence. The application of the short-term custody and community sentence arrangements will comprise those offenders to whom the custody and community provisions will not apply eg offenders sentenced to less than 1 year.

77. Short-term custody and community sentence offenders will be released at the halfway point of their sentence but will be subject to a licence for the entire remainder of their sentence. Conditions may be imposed on the licence and a serious breach of a licence condition could mean the offender returning to custody for the remainder of the sentence. A short-term custody and community sentence offender who has been recalled to custody will have the right to have their continued detention reviewed by the Parole Board for Scotland. If the short-term custody and community sentence offender is sentenced to a period of 6 months or more and is subject to the notifications requirements of the Sexual Offences Act 2003, supervision will be a mandatory condition of that offender’s short-term custody and community sentence licence.

78. Aside from a few consequential amendments to integrate the new proposals, there are no other changes to the custodial sentences provisions in the 2007 Act.
Consultation

Alternative approaches

80. Following the findings of the Scottish Prisons Commission, we are of the view that there is no feasible alternative approach that would achieve the objective of better sentence management for those offenders who are sentenced to imprisonment.

Section 19 – Early removal of certain short-term prisoners from the United Kingdom

Policy objectives

81. To remove criminals from the country who wish to leave when coming towards the end of their custodial sentence thus freeing up valuable prison resources.

Key information

82. While “domestic” prisoners can be placed on Home Detention Curfew and curfewed to their home address, foreign prisoners are often either subject to deportation on release, or have no address in Scotland to which they can be curfewed, and have to remain in prison until they reach the point at which they are automatically released. The Bill will give Scottish Ministers discretionary powers to release early a prisoner, subject to the requirement that they are liable for removal from the UK or have the settled intention of residing permanently outside the United Kingdom once removed from prison. This will mirror a scheme that already exists in England and Wales for prisoners liable for removal from the UK, which is being expanded by the Criminal Justice & Immigration Act 2008.

Consultation

83. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

Alternative approaches

84. There are none that meet the policy objectives.

Section 21 – Extended sentences for certain sexual offences

Policy objectives
85. To ensure courts are able to protect public safety by being empowered to impose an extended sentence (additional post release supervision) for an offence which discloses a significant sexual aspect to the offender’s behaviour.

Key information
86. Section 210A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 provides the court with the power to impose additional post release supervision on sex and violent offenders where it considers that the additional supervision is necessary to protect the public from serious harm from the offender following release. This is known as an extended sentence. The maximum extension period is 10 years. Extended sentences may be imposed only in indictment cases and on the imposition of a determinate custodial sentence of 4 years and over for a violent offence. There is no minimum determinate custodial term for sexual offences.

87. We propose to extend this power to allow the courts, in appropriate circumstances, to impose an extended sentence where a person is convicted of an offence which discloses, in the court’s opinion, a significant sexual aspect to the offender’s behaviour but which is not otherwise covered by the current definitions of “sexual offence” and “violent offence” in section 210A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995.

88. Courts are currently unable to impose an extended sentence, for example, in respect of a conviction for a breach of the peace where there was a significant sexual element to the offence.

89. The anomaly of the present situation is demonstrated by the requirement in section 21 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003, for certain reports to be produced where an offence has a significant sexual element and also by the possibility that the court may put the person on the “sex offenders’ register” by virtue of an offence with a significant sexual aspect under paragraph 60 of Schedule 3 to the Sexual Offences Act 2003.

Consultation
90. The provisions were identified by the judiciary to improve public protection. It will plug a gap and bring the provisions into line with other legislation which covers offences with a significant sexual element. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

Alternative approaches
91. There is no alternative approach that can achieve the policy objective.

Section 22 – Effect of probation and absolute discharge

Policy objectives
92. To remove unnecessary references to probation orders, and to ensure that probation orders and orders for absolute discharge are treated appropriately in the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1995
Key information
93. Since changes made in the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1995 came into force in 1996, it has only been possible for Scottish courts to make a probation order following conviction. It had previously been the case that in summary procedure probation orders were made without proceeding to conviction.

94. References in the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 to the court being able to make certain orders when it “convicts a person of an offence …. or discharges him absolutely or makes a probation order in relation to him” can be simplified to remove the reference to probation orders, which are now redundant.

95. Sections 247(1) and (2) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 provide that a conviction of an offence for which an order is made placing the offender on probation or discharging him absolutely shall be deemed not to be a conviction for any purpose other than the purposes of the proceedings in which the order is made and of laying it before a court as a previous conviction in subsequent proceedings for another offence, and that the conviction of an offender who is placed on probation or discharged absolutely shall be disregarded for the purposes of any enactment which imposes any disqualification or disability upon convicted persons, or authorises or requires the imposition of any such disqualification or disability. It is necessary to displace the effect of these provisions for the purposes of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005, to ensure that convictions resulting in probation orders or absolute discharge can be taken into account in the same way as other convictions.

Consultation
96. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

Alternative approaches
97. There is no alternative approach that meets the policy objective.

Section 23 – Offences aggravated by racial or religious prejudice
Policy objectives
98. To ensure offenders are aware of the seriousness of their racially and/or religiously motivated offending at the point of sentence and harmonise the operation of hate crime aggravations.

Key information
99. The provisions harmonise the application of hate crimes legislation across the statute book and improve the recording of racially and religiously aggravated offences and convictions. They will also ensure that it is made explicit at the point of sentence that racially and religiously aggravated crime will be punished accordingly.

100. Section 96 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 (racially aggravated offences) and section 74 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003 (religiously aggravated offences) will be amended to ensure that where the sentence is different as a result of the aggravation, the court must record that the sentence was so aggravated and state extent of, and reasons for, that difference or the reasons for there being no difference. This will harmonise the application of these aggravations with the provisions for aggravations relating to disability, sexual orientation and transgender status in the Offences (Aggravation by Prejudice) (Scotland) Bill (introduced into the Scottish Parliament on 19 May 2008).

Consultation

101. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

Alternative approaches

102. Legislation is required to take forward these changes. Inclusion of these changes in the Offences (Aggravation by Prejudice) (Scotland) (Bill) was proposed but this was considered to be outwith the scope of that Bill.

Section 24 – Voluntary intoxication by alcohol: effect in sentencing

Policy objectives

103. To make clear to offenders and courts that (voluntarily) being under the influence of alcohol cannot be an excuse for offending behaviour.

Key information

104. The provisions in the Bill will enshrine in statute that the commission of an offence while voluntarily under the influence of alcohol should not be considered as a mitigating factor by the courts when sentencing an offender.

Consultation

105. A consultation paper, (Sentencing Guidelines and a Scottish Sentencing Council – Consultation and Proposals), outlining the detail of our proposals was published on 1 September 2008.12

Alternative approaches

106. The alternative approach would be not to place on statute these provisions. We do not consider this will help meet the policy objective.

This document relates to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

PART 2 – CRIMINAL LAW

Sections 25-28 – Serious organised crime

Policy objectives

107. We have made it clear we want to tackle those involved in serious organised crime to help ensure that Scotland is a safer and stronger place for hard working families to live and work in and to send a message to those involved in such activity that Scotland does not want their business.

108. The Serious Organised Crime Taskforce was established by the Cabinet Secretary for Justice to provide strategic direction to tackling serious organised crime. The Taskforce has proposed the creation of new offences to tackle serious organised crime. These new offences will provide law enforcement in Scotland with additional tools to tackle this problem. It will also send the important message to the communities of Scotland we are committed to taking on these criminals.

109. These provisions put in place new offences to criminalise those people who direct or are involved in the commission of serious organised crime. They also criminalise certain classes of individual who fail to report serious organised criminal activity. The creation of these offences will open up the possibility of any material benefit an offender derives from such criminal activity being seized or confiscated under the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 where appropriate. We want to pursue those who work together for the purposes of committing and conspiring to commit serious crimes which are intended to generate material benefit, whether directly or indirectly.

Key information

110. Serious organised crime is often carried out by groups of individuals working together to maximise the benefits they derive from their criminal activity. By doing so it allows individuals to obtain a greater benefit from their offending than they might do if working alone and outside an established criminal network. It can also provide protection from those at the very top of such networks who can instruct or direct others to carry out activity on behalf of their network but who do not carry out criminal acts and therefore prove difficult to prosecute. We want to capture all levels of serious organised crime from those at the very top who instruct or direct others to undertake such activity to the drug dealer on the street corner who is supporting serious organised crime in our communities.

111. This will be a serious offence and attract a maximum sentence of 14 years imprisonment on indictment with an unlimited fine or both. On summary procedure the maximum sentence will be 12 months imprisonment or a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or both.

Section 25 - Involvement in serious organised crime

112. This provisions will target those who agree to become involved in the commission of serious organised crime and help to ensure that they are held criminally responsible in a way that takes account of the context of their actions. It is intended to capture those who become involved in criminal activity with at least one other person where their main purpose is to commit or conspire to commit serious offences for material gain.

113. The offence of involvement in serious organised crime is intended to capture those individuals further down the chain of command and subject to criminal penalties those individuals who are less directly involved, but who nevertheless are working in conjunction with others to commit serious organised crime. It will also provide further flexibility to the Crown and may be helpful in circumstances where it was not possible to prove beyond reasonable doubt that an individual was directing serious organised crime.

114. This offence will attract a maximum penalty of 10 years imprisonment on indictment, an unlimited fine or both. In summary procedure there will be a maximum penalty of 12 months imprisonment or a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or both.

Section 26 - Offences aggravated by connection with serious organised crime

115. In addition to the directing and involvement in serious organised crime offences we propose a statutory aggravation where an offence can be proved to have been connected with serious organised crime. We believe that criminal offences committed with the underlying purpose or motivation of committing or conspiring to commit serious organised crime are more serious on account of the context in which they take place and the motivation of the offender. Using the new statutory aggravation, the court will now have the opportunity to treat an offence committed in this context and with this underlying motivation as having been aggravated by the connection between the index offence and serious organised crime and has discretion to adjust the sentence accordingly.

Section 27 - Directing serious organised crime

116. This offence will help tackle those at the high level end of an organised crime network and help capture those who do not engage directly in criminal conduct but who direct and incite others to commit serious offences with the intention that his or her direction will result in or enable the commission of serious organised crime. Serious organised crime is for these purposes crime which involves two or more people acting together for the principal purpose of committing one or more serious offences, those being indictable offences committed with the intention of securing a material benefit for anyone or acts of serious violence committed with the intention of securing a material benefit in the future.

Section 28 - Failure to report serious organised crime

117. Serious Organised Crime groups rely on the assistance of professional associates and family members. The assistance of professional occupations such as lawyers and accountants is required when hiding the profits of criminal activity or converting illegitimate gains into legitimate assets. We want to ensure that those who have knowledge of an individual’s involvement in a serious organised crime network, whether in a professional or private capacity, should be under a duty to report it. The overwhelming majority of professionals comply with the regulatory and reporting requirements, but there are a small number who either turn a blind eye to such activity or who are benefitting from such activity - and it is those that we wish to capture. This offence will capture those who fail to report that they know or suspect such activity is taking place following information that has come to them in the course of their professional business or employment.

118. We also want to capture those whose knowledge or suspicion arises as a consequence of their close personal relationship with the alleged offender where they have derived benefit from that person’s offending when they have known or suspected that the material benefit they gained was a result of serious organised crime.

119. There will be a maximum penalty of 5 years imprisonment, an unlimited fine or both if convicted on indictment and 12 months imprisonment, or a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or both if conviction is in summary proceedings.

120. We propose that all these offences are added to Schedule 4 (Lifestyle Offences in Scotland) in the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002, which will allow for the confiscation of the criminal benefit gained from such activity or the recovery of assets gained through unlawful conduct. This would be achieved by way of an order made under the Proceeds of Crime Act and is not intended to be included in this Bill.

Consultation

121. Following the recommendations of the Serious Organised Crime Taskforce to look at bringing forward new offences for those directing or being involved in serious organised crime, we have been working closely with the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service to formulate these offences and have regularly updated the Taskforce members on progress. Our intention to create such offences was set out in the Revitalising Justice Document in September 2008.

Alternative approaches

122. We could have decided to maintain the status quo and continue to rely on the current common and statutory laws to deal with serious organised crime.

123. However, at present the common and statutory laws are not providing convictions of those individuals directing or inciting or being involved in serious organised crime. We therefore believe there is merit in making it easier to convict criminals involved in serious organised crime and to subject them to appropriate criminal sanctions. This will also send a clear message to Scottish communities that action is being taken to tackle serious organised crime at all levels.

Section 29 – Articles banned in prison

Policy Objectives

124. To provide an effective deterrent against the use (often for illegal purposes) of personal communication devices within prison.
Key Information

125. The provisions create the specific offences of introduction, use and possession of a personal communication device (including mobile phones and any component part of a mobile phone) in a prison.

126. Intelligence information available to Scottish Prison Service (SPS) suggests that mobile phones are commonly used within prisons for, amongst other purposes-

- the continuation of criminal activities within the prison;
- to intimidate witnesses; and
- to facilitate the supply of, and payment for, illegal drugs.

127. Intelligence information also suggests that prisoners who have access to a mobile phone are frequently bullied by those who do not.

128. The smuggling of mobile phones into prisons is becoming increasingly difficult to detect given that mobile phone technology is decreasing in size. This is particularly problematic bearing in mind that a very common method of smuggling a mobile phone is through packing in a bodily orifice. Other methods are used, however, for example throwing over the prison walls or, at times, introduction via a contractor carrying out work at the prison.

129. In many instances it is simply a SIM card which is introduced. A small number of handsets are shared amongst prisoners, who “take turns” at inserting their SIM cards into them. SIM cards are, of course, extremely difficult to detect.

130. Section 41 of the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1989 makes it an offence to bring or introduce, or attempt to introduce, certain items into a prison without reasonable excuse. The list of prohibited articles includes, amongst others, drugs and offensive weapons. Section 41(1)(e) provides that the prohibited items include any article which is a “prohibited article” within the meaning of the Prison and Young Offenders Institutions (Scotland) Rules 2006. The Prison Rules were amended by Scottish Statutory Instrument on 11 December 2008 to provide that personal communication devices are “prohibited articles”. This means that the effect of section 41(1)(e) is that a person who brings a mobile phone into a prison without reasonable excuse would be liable on conviction to a fine not exceeding level 3 (up to £1,000) of the standard scale or to imprisonment for a period not exceeding 30 days.

131. The provisions alter the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1989 to create additional specific offences in relation to the introduction, possession and use of personal communication devices in prisons. In addition, it will also increase the maximum penalty which may be imposed on a summary conviction to imprisonment not exceeding 12 months, or a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum, or both (the statutory maximum is currently set at £10,000). The maximum penalty on conviction on indictment is imprisonment for a term not exceeding 2 years, or an unlimited fine, or both. We consider maximum penalties of this level will prove a far more effective deterrent than those which can currently be imposed.
Consultation

132. The prohibition of mobile phones has been discussed by senior SPS colleagues and the Serious Organised Crime Taskforce, who fully supported the need to crack down on prisoners who make use of mobile phone technology to commit crimes whilst in prison. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

Alternative approaches

133. These changes will provide an effective deterrent against the use of mobile phones in prison and help tackle prisoners who continue their criminal activities from inside prison. There are no alternative approaches that help meet this policy objective.

Section 30 – Sale and hire of crossbows to persons under 18

Section 31 – Sale and hire of knives and certain other articles to persons under 18

Policy objectives

134. To allow robust police enforcement of the law in relation to age restrictions on the sale of crossbows by allowing a system of test purchasing and modernise ‘proof of age’ provisions by ensuring consistency with the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005.

Key information

135. The Crossbows Act 1987 is the only remaining statutory provision relating to age-restricted goods for which it is not legal to operate a test purchasing scheme. A test purchasing scheme allows a child or young person to carry out the purchase of an age-restricted good to check whether the retailer is applying the age restriction in the sale of the good. Crucially, the child or young person is not committing an offence when test purchasing rules are being followed. While it is unlikely that a test purchasing scheme would be established for crossbows alone, it may be desirable to do so as part of a more general scheme relating to the test purchasing of offensive weapons. The provisions proposed will allow test purchasing, following the model in Section 102 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005.

136. The Crossbows Act 1987 provides a defence to the offence of selling a crossbow to a person under 18 if the seller had ‘reasonable ground for the belief’ that the person was 18 or over. The Criminal Justice Act 1988 has a similar defence but it has a higher threshold of ‘reasonable precautions’ and ‘due diligence’. The provisions bring them into line with the standard set in the Licensing Act 2005.

Consultation

137. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

138. The provisions in relation to test purchasing are supported by ACPOS.
Alternative approaches

139. There are none that meet the policy objectives.

Section 32 – Certain sexual offences by non-natural persons

Policy objectives

140. To improve the law.

Key information

141. Sections 9 to 12 of the Protection of Children and Prevention of Sexual Offences (Scotland) Act 2005 established a number of offences relating to the sexual services of children and child pornography. The offences relate to:

- paying for sexual services of a child (section 9);
- causing or inciting provision by child of sexual services or child pornography (section 10);
- controlling a child providing sexual services or involved in pornography (section 11); and
- arranging or facilitating provision by child of sexual services or child pornography (section 12).

142. A minor difficulty has been identified with penalties for the offences under sections 9 to 12 of the Act when prosecuted on indictment. The penalty provisions provide that a person is liable on conviction on indictment to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 14 years, except for section 9 offences when involving the sexual services of a child aged 16 or over in which case the maximum term is 7 years. There is no reference to the possibility of a fine, in contrast to the position in summary procedure, and to most other penalty provisions which generally refer to the imposition of imprisonment, or a fine, or both. In the absence of a reference to a fine, there is no inherent power for the solemn courts in Scotland to impose a fine in place of imprisonment, nor to allow a fine to be imposed along with a custodial sentence.

143. Under the provisions it will be competent for the court to impose an unlimited fine following successful prosecution on indictment, instead of or as well as, imprisonment. While custodial sentences are likely to be appropriate for most offenders, the availability of a fine in solemn procedure will allow the courts to deal with corporate offenders such as companies. This will better meet our international obligations on the criminalisation of the sexual exploitation of children.

Consultation

144. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

Alternative approaches

145. There are no alternative approaches available that meets the policy objective.
Section 33 – Indecent images of children

Policy objectives

146. To help clarify the law and close a gap in existing legislation which has developed as technology advances to circumvent the controls already in place.

Key information

147. Under the provisions of sections 52 and 52A of the Civic Government (Scotland) 1982 it is an offence to make, take, distribute, publish or possess indecent photographs or pseudo-photographs of children. A pseudo–photograph is an image which, though not a photograph itself, appears to be one.

148. The definition of pseudo–photograph does not extend to cover images derived from actual photographs but which do not appear to be photographs themselves. Such images are increasingly easy to make using readily available image manipulation software.

149. The provisions extend the provisions of sections 52 and 52A of the 1982 Act to cover derivatives of indecent photographs or pseudo–photographs to include, for example, line traced and computer traced images. These derivatives will fall under the scope of sections 52 and 52A of the Act and it will therefore become an offence to make, take, distribute, publish or possess such images.

150. There are also a number of technical amendments that will clarify certain provisions concerning indecent images of children as they apply for the purposes of Schedule 3 to the Sexual Offences Act 2003. That Schedule lists offences which trigger the notification requirements in Part 2 of that Act. The amendments will remove any doubt that the provisions contained within paragraph 44 of Schedule 3, which refers to Customs legislation about prohibited goods, covers both photographs and pseudo-photographs. Changes are also intended to be made to Schedule 3 to ensure clarity in respect of age thresholds.

Consultation

151. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

Alternative approaches

152. There are none that meet the policy objectives.

Section 34 – Extreme pornography

Policy objectives

153. To help ensure the public are protected from exposure to extreme pornography that depicts horrific images of violence.
Key information

154. There have been criminal offences in Scotland for a considerable time relating to the publication, distribution and display of indecent and obscene material. The current legislation on this matter is contained in the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 and the Indecent Displays (Controls) Act 1981, which combined to replace the previous provisions in the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act 1892. Section 51 of the 1982 Act provides that it is an offence to publicly display, sell or distribute any obscene material. It also makes it an offence to make, print, have or keep obscene material with a view to its eventual sale or distribution. Section 52 of the 1982 Act makes similar provision in relation to child pornography while Section 52A provides that it is an offence to possess any indecent photograph or pseudo-photograph of a child. So, while possession of obscene material has not previously been an offence in itself (other than for child pornography), laws have long been in place to prevent obscene material being published, sold or imported to Scotland.

155. However developments in production and distribution technology, including the emergence of the internet, has offered individuals faster, more convenient and anonymous means to publish and distribute material of this type. By implementing a new criminal offence for the possession of extreme pornographic material we intend to protect society from exposure to such material, to which access can no longer be reliably controlled through existing legislation dealing with publication and distribution. These provisions will also protect those who participate in the creation of sexual material containing obscene violence, cruelty or degradation, who may thereby be the victims of crime. By closing the gap in existing legislation, which has developed as technology advances to circumvent the controls already in place, the offence will discourage interest in extreme pornographic material by breaking the demand/supply cycle.

156. This new offence will criminalise the possession of obscene pornographic images which realistically depict the following extreme acts:

- Life-threatening acts and violence likely to cause severe injury;
- Rape and other non-consensual penetrative sexual activity, whether violent or otherwise;
- Sexual activity involving a human corpse; and
- Sexual activity between a person and an animal.

157. The maximum penalty for the new offence will be 3 years imprisonment.

158. It is already illegal to publish, sell or distribute (or to possess with a view to selling or distributing) the obscene material that would be covered by this new offence. It is intended to increase the maximum penalty for publication etc. (under section 51 of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982) in respect of extreme pornographic material from 3 to 5 years to emphasise the seriousness attached to distribution of this type of material.
Consultation

159. The Scottish Executive issued a joint consultation in 2005 with the Home Office on issues relating to the possession of extreme pornography. The consultation sought to determine views on whether advances in technology, including the internet, have resulted in a need for the law in this area to be strengthened and outlined proposals to criminalise possession of obscene and explicit pornography containing actual or realistic depictions of an extreme nature. This consultation ran until December 2005 and 93 Scottish responses were received. The analysis of responses received to the consultation was published on 9 June 2006. Although the views expressed in response to the consultation document were polarised those in favour agreed that technological advances have meant that there is a need to strengthen the law as access to this type of material is now much more widespread. In 2006 a short life Working Group was set up by the then Scottish Executive to consider how an offence of possession of extreme pornographic material might be constructed in Scots law.

160. We announced in the “Revitalising Justice” proposals document in September 2008 that we would legislate for a new offence for the possession of extreme pornographic images (which are obscene, appear to a reasonable person to have been produced for the purpose of sexual arousal, are sexually explicit, realistic and depict images of an extreme nature as set out above).

Alternative approaches

161. Three broad options for progressing work on extreme pornography were considered. Option one was to legislate to create a separate Scottish offence of possession of extreme pornographic material as proposed by the short life Working Group and implemented in this Bill. The second option was to replicate the English and Welsh provisions as set out in section 63 of the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 whilst the third option was to do nothing.

162. The first option was considered most appropriate as it was considered that the definition of “extreme pornography” adopted in England and Wales was insufficiently broad. In particular, that definition does not extend to images of rape, unless they depicted activity likely to result in serious injury to the victim’s breasts, anus or genitals or to threaten that person’s life.

163. Although adopting the second option would result in legislative consistency across the UK, that is not paramount and the Working Group concluded that there was little justification for excluding images of rape from an offence intended to combat extreme pornography.

164. Given that consideration of a possession offence is intended to address the technological advances which have led to individuals being able to access material whose sale or distribution has long been prohibited under existing legislation the status quo was not considered to be acceptable.

13 http://www.homeoffice.gov.uk/documents/cons-extreme-porn-3008051/
165. The new offence is therefore similar to that at section 63 of the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008, which applies in England, Wales and Northern Ireland. The Scottish offence goes further, however, in that it will cover all obscene pornographic images which realistically depict rape or other non-consensual penetrative sexual activity, whether violent or otherwise (whereas the English offence only covers forms of violent rape).

Section 35 - People trafficking

Policy objectives

166. To improve the law.

Key information

167. The trafficking of human beings for exploitation is a criminal offence. Scottish provisions relating to those trafficked for sexual exploitation are contained in section 22 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003 with the equivalent legislation for England, Wales and Northern Ireland being contained in sections 57 to 60 of the Sexual Offences Act 2003. The provisions relating to trafficking of people for forced labour, slavery and organ harvesting are contained in sections 4 and 5 of the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc.) Act 2004 and these provisions extend to Scotland.

168. The offences in England, Wales and Northern Ireland relating to trafficking of people for non-sexual exploitation were amended by section 31(1)-(2) of the UK Borders Act 2007, which extended the provisions to include facilitating the arrival or entry into the UK of a person for the purposes of exploitation and also removed the limitations on the territorial application of the offence. Therefore, facilitating the arrival or entry into the UK of a person for the purposes of exploitation, regardless of where the facilitation took place and irrespective of the nationality of the facilitator, is caught by the offences. However, these amendments were not extended to Scotland.

169. In addition, section 31(3)-(4) of the UK Borders Act 2007 made similar changes to the provisions in the Sexual Offences Act 2003 concerning the trafficking of people for sexual exploitation. As mentioned above, these provisions do not apply to Scotland as separate provision is made in the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003.

170. The provisions in this Bill will make similar changes to those contained in section 31 of the UK Borders Act 2007 by amending and clarifying Scots law to:

- ensure that where a person outwith the UK (irrespective of his/her nationality) undertakes trafficking activities and an individual is trafficked to, within or out of the UK for the purposes of sexual or non-sexual exploitation it will constitute an offence under Scots law; and
- extend the offence provisions concerning trafficking for sexual or non-sexual exploitation so that they cover any act of facilitation of an individual into the UK following his/her arrival here (but before they have entered the UK).
171. It will also make clear that the sheriff court has jurisdiction to deal with these extra-territorial offences.

172. The changes will ensure consistency of the law on this issue across the UK.

Consultation

173. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

Alternative approaches

174. No alternative approaches were considered as these proposals are necessary technical changes to Scots law to ensure consistency of the law on this issue across the UK.

Section 36 – Alternative charges for fraud and embezzlement

Policy objectives

175. To provide an increase in flexibility for a court in reaching a verdict in prosecutions for the offences of fraud or of "breach of trust and embezzlement".

Key information

176. The provisions will ensure that where an accused is charged with the offence of "breach of trust and embezzlement" it will be possible for the court to instead convict the offender of fraud if such a verdict is more appropriate on the evidence led. In a similar way, where in future an accused is charged with fraud he or she may be convicted instead of "breach of trust and embezzlement".

177. An offender may be convicted of certain alternative offences involving dishonest appropriation of property notwithstanding the fact that the indictment or summary complaint refers to a different offence. This applies where the evidence led would not support conviction on the basis of the offence as charged but would support conviction of the alternative offence. For example, an accused person charged with theft may instead be convicted of reset if the evidence led would not support conviction of theft but would support conviction of the alternative offence of reset.

178. The provisions will provide that where an accused is charged under indictment or on complaint with "breach of trust and embezzlement" he or she may be convicted of fraud. Conversely, if charged with fraud he or she may be convicted instead of "breach of trust and embezzlement".

Consultation

179. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.
Alternative approaches

180. There is no alternative approach that can achieve the policy objective. If this measure were not to be adopted, it would perpetuate the existing situation in which a fraud conviction is not an option in a trial for breach of trust and embezzlement even though the evidence led in a trial for becomes, in the course of the case, more suggestive of fraud.

Section 37 – Conspiracy to commit offences outwith Scotland

Policy objectives

181. To provide clarity for Scottish courts to deal with conspiracies in Scotland to commit criminal acts elsewhere in the United Kingdom.

Key information

182. Section 11A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 deals with conspiracies to commit offences. This section was inserted by section 7 of the Criminal Justice (Terrorism and Conspiracy) Act 1998. In essence, it provides that conspiracy in Scotland to commit an offence outwith the United Kingdom is itself an offence, provided that the criminal purpose being conspired would constitute an offence in the place where it was intended to be carried out.

183. In light of the Glasgow and London attacks in July 2007, the law on extraterritorial offences was reconsidered. Section 28 of the UK Counter-Terrorism Act 2008 contains provisions allowing proceedings to be taken in any part of the UK for terrorist offences (including conspiracy) regardless of where in the UK the offence is committed. These new provisions will only apply to “terrorist offences”, which would be outwith the legislative competence of the Scottish Parliament.

184. In relation to non-terrorist offences, a gap in law has been identified in that section 11A does not provide statutory coverage for conspiracies formed in Scotland to commit offences in England, Wales or Northern Ireland. Scottish courts can assert jurisdiction and rely on common law to deal with conspiracy, for example, a conspiracy formed abroad where the prospective act, which constitutes a crime under Scots law, was intended be committed in Scotland. However, there is sufficient doubt that exists about the jurisdiction of Scottish courts to deal with conspiracies to commit offences in England, Wales and Northern Ireland.

185. Closing the loophole by amending section 11A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 will provide clarity for Scottish courts to deal with conspiracies in Scotland to commit offences in other parts of the United Kingdom, which in turn will mean section 11A can be used to deal with conspiracies to commit offences in any part of the world furth of Scotland.

Consultation

186. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

Alternative approaches

187. There are none that meet the policy objective.
PART 3 – CRIMINAL PROCEDURE

Section 38 – Prosecution of children

Policy objectives

188. To ensure Scotland meets international standards as regards the age at which children can be prosecuted.

Key information

189. The provisions will raise the age of criminal responsibility by prohibiting the prosecution of children under 12 while still allowing them to be referred to a Children’s Hearing on offence grounds, whilst retaining the existing rule that children under 8 are conclusively presumed not to be guilty of any offence.

190. Section 41 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 states that it “shall be conclusively presumed that no child under the age of eight years shall be guilty of an offence”. Under section 42 of that Act “no child under the age of 16 shall be prosecuted for an offence except on the instructions of the Lord Advocate, or at his instance”. The law as it currently stands therefore allows children from the age of 8 up to 16 to be prosecuted in the criminal justice system. This is considered by many to be contrary to international standards and the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (article 40(3)(a)) which suggests that 12 is the minimum acceptable age at which children should be held accountable for their actions before full (adult) criminal justice proceedings.

191. The Bill includes provision to prohibit the prosecution of children under the age of 12 (or a person over that age for an offence committed while under 12). When this takes effect it will mean that, whatever the offence committed, a child under the age of 12 can only be dealt with by the Children’s Hearings system.

Consultation

192. In 2001, the Scottish Law Commission (SLC) consulted a variety of stakeholders during their review of the age of criminal responsibility between 2000 and 2002. Wide support was received for their recommendations to raise the age at which children can be prosecuted in the criminal justice system. The provisions contained in the Bill implement the main recommendations of the SLC report “Report on Age of Criminal Responsibility15” by introducing a restriction on prosecution of children under 12, however the SLC’s recommendation to abolish the existing conclusive presumption in relation to under 8s is not taken forward.

193. On 18 December 2008, we published a consultation on our response to the 2008 concluding observations from the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child\textsuperscript{16}. This includes specific reference to the age of criminal responsibility and invites responses on this key issue.

Alternative approaches

194. The current approach to delivering this policy is for the Lord Advocate to choose not to prosecute children under the age of 12. That is a decision entirely for the Lord Advocate. (No children under the age of 12 were prosecuted between 2002/03 and 2006/07). Nevertheless, so long as Scots law continues to allow for prosecution of children under the age of 12 it will remain a possibility which will continue to contravene international standards. Provisions contained within the Bill will resolve this and ensure that children under the age of 12 who commit offences are dealt with effectively in an age appropriate system.

Section 39 – Offences: liability of partners

Policy objectives

195. To establish consistent provision for individual criminal liability of partners for offences committed by Scottish partnerships.

Key information

196. Many statutes creating criminal offences provide for individual liability of directors of corporate bodies. Where such a body corporate is guilty of the offence, and an individual director has consented or connived in the offence or his/her neglect has led to the offence, then that director is also guilty of the offence.

197. More recent statutes have sometimes also made similar provision for partners in Scottish partnerships, but this has not been done consistently. The provisions rectify this by providing that wherever statute provides for individual liability for directors of a body corporate, there will be equivalent individual liability for partners of a Scottish partnership. This will also apply to future legislation and will simplify drafting. A similar approach has already been taken with respect to Limited Liability Partnerships.

Consultation

198. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

Alternative approaches

199. The alternative approach would be to continue to make piecemeal provision for individual liability of partners for offences committed by Scottish partnerships. The approach adopted has the benefit of achieving consistency.

Section 40 – Witness statements

Section 62 – Witness statements: use during trial

Policy objectives

200. To ensure fairness for witnesses in giving evidence in criminal cases.

Key information

201. The provisions will allow witnesses to have sight of their statement(s) before giving evidence in court. Lord Coulsfield’s “Review of the Law and Practice of Disclosure in Criminal Proceedings in Scotland” was published in September 2007. The report noted that, although not strictly an issue of disclosure in criminal proceedings in Scotland, this issue is linked and that there was general support for change, to allow witnesses being able to refer to copies of their statements, in all cases where these statements have been made available to the Crown and to the defence.

202. The issue was one of fairness to witnesses who could be presented with their statement(s), or parts of their statement(s), in court for the first time which does not allow any inaccuracies or misunderstandings to be addressed and could have an inadvertent, detrimental effect on their ability to give evidence.

203. Further, with developments in the law on disclosure, witnesses now are commonly the only people in court who have not seen their own statement prior to a trial. There is concern that this is unfair and could turn the witness’s testimony into little more than a memory test.

204. The provisions will:

- enable prosecutors to provide those witnesses that will give evidence at trial with a copy of their statement(s) or otherwise make it available to them by inspection, in all cases where the statement(s) have been made available to the Crown and to the defence (but not necessarily the accused himself), in advance of a trial;

- enable witnesses to refer to their own statement(s) at trial. The Bill will not replace the existing common law on the use to which statements can be put, it is designed purely to allow witnesses to check their statement if they are unsure about anything or cannot remember something. This is something that police witnesses have been and are able to do but not civilians. This is not intended to replace parole or oral evidence given by witnesses. Parole evidence will still be taken from the witness but the court will be able to allow the witness to refer to their statement in certain circumstances; and

- Make clear that “statements” must be contained in a document or otherwise recorded before these provisions apply.

This document relates to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

205. By specifically enabling prosecutors to allow witnesses to see their statement(s) in advance of giving evidence, or to refer to them in giving evidence, through express statutory authority this should remove the risk of successful challenges to otherwise admissible evidence, purely on the basis of the witness having had access to his or her own statement – again, in the same way as police witnesses have long been assumed to be able to consult their notebooks.

206. The detail of how the system for giving witnesses access to their statements in practice will be included in the Code of Practice on Disclosure (see section 114 of the Bill).

Consultation

207. In November 2007 we published a consultation paper on proposals for legislation to implement the recommendations in the Coulsfield Report. Most respondents agreed that witnesses should be able to refer to copies of their statements when called to give evidence but caution was expressed regarding quality of statements, it being essential to ensure that witness statements are recorded or noted using the witness’s own words.

Alternative approaches

208. There are none that meet the policy objective.

Section 41 – Breach of undertaking

Policy objectives

209. To ensure consistency in law with how breaches of undertakings and breaches of bail are dealt with.

Key information

210. The provisions will allow an accused who has committed an offence after being liberated by police on an undertaking to be charged with an aggravation of the subsequent offence rather than being charged with the separate offence, as at present.

211. This change means that breach of police undertakings will be treated in the same way as a breach of bail (imposed by the court), both of which can indicate contempt for the criminal justice system.

Consultation

212. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

Alternative approaches

213. We could continue to charge for the separate offence rather than treat as an aggravation, but we consider it is preferable to have consistency in law with how breaches of bail are dealt with.
Section 42 – Bail review applications

Policy objectives
214. To save court time.

Key information
215. The provisions remove the requirement for a hearing to give consideration to an application made under section 30 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 where i) the other party consents to the application and ii) the court is minded to grant the application. An example of an application under this section would be an accused seeking to have the hours of a curfew bail condition altered (perhaps as a result of their working hours changing). Arrangements are already in place to facilitate change of domicile where both parties agree, this proposal will cover other bail conditions.

Consultation
216. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

Alternative approaches
217. There is no alternative approach that meets the policy objective. The current position could continue whereby courts consider all unopposed bail review applications, but this would continue to waste valuable court time.

Section 43 – Bail condition for identification procedures etc.

Policy objectives
218. To save court time.

Key information
219. The provisions remove the need for the Crown to seek a further special bail condition for an accused to make themselves available for attendance at any ID procedure. Such conditions are becoming more and more common and by including it in the standard conditions, this will save court time through the Procurator Fiscal not having to ask the court to impose the additional condition. The effect of the provision is that the accused will, where reasonably instructed to do so, be required to appear at any ID procedure and to give any print, impression or sample. This requirement will sit alongside the existing list of standard bail conditions.

Consultation
220. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.
This document relates to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

Alternative approaches

221. There is no alternative approach that meets the policy objective. Procurator Fiscals could continue to specifically ask the court to impose the requirement to attend an ID procedure; however this would continue to result in taking up valuable court time.

Section 44 – Prosecution on indictment: Scottish Law Officers

Policy objectives

222. To improve criminal procedure.

Key information

223. The provisions will improve the procedures for the raising of indictments in name of the Lord Advocate and, in particular, reduce the risk that proceedings fail due only to an error prompted by the timing of the appointment of the Lord Advocate or Solicitor General.

224. Section 64 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 provides that all prosecutions before the High Court of Justiciary or before the Sheriff sitting with a jury shall proceed on indictment in name of Her Majesty’s Advocate.

225. A strict reading of the provision means that the indictment requires to run in the personal name of the Lord Advocate, rather than by his or her official title as “Her Majesty’s Advocate”. Where the Lord Advocate dies or demits office and is immediately succeeded by a new Lord Advocate, without the office of Lord Advocate being vacant for any period, the correct libelling of indictments relies on knowing the precise point at which the warrant of appointment was signed. In practice, this causes administrative difficulties for the Crown in ensuring that indictments are correctly libelled, having regard to the timing of demission and succession.

226. By extension, the same issue arises where the indictment may be in name of the Solicitor General, in the event of the death or demission of office of the Lord Advocate. If the Solicitor General were then to die or demit office and be succeeded while the office of Lord Advocate remained vacant, the same administrative difficulties arise.

227. The current provisions are to be amended to make clear that accused persons should be indicted at the instance of “Her Majesty’s Advocate” but that there should be no requirement for the individual Lord Advocate to be named, personally. In addition the provisions are to be amended to ensure that where accused persons are indicted at the instance of the Solicitor General, the individual Solicitor General need not be named, personally, and that the format of an indictment need not be changed on demission and appointment of either the Lord Advocate or Solicitor General.

228. The provisions governing death and demission of office by the Lord Advocate or Solicitor General (section 287 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995) are also to be amended to cure a lacuna in the current provisions, which deal with the situation where the Law Officers demit office separately or on the same day, but not where the reason for both their offices being vacant is caused by the death of the remaining Law Officer in office or the deaths of both of the Law Officers. The provisions are to be amended to address this.

Consultation

229. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

230. In addition, the Lord President’s Office and the Crown Office were informed of the proposals and invited to comment.

Alternative approaches

231. The procedures are set down in statute and so any change to those procedures requires an amendment to the relevant legislation.

Section 45 – Transfer of justice of the peace court cases

Policy objectives

232. To enable more efficient court programming and allow the fullest use to be made of Justice of the Peace (JP) courts.

Key information

233. The unification of the summary courts under the administration of the Scottish Court Service is currently being rolled out on a sheriffdom-by-sheriffdom basis using provisions contained within the Criminal Proceedings etc. (Reform) (Scotland) Act 2007. The first three phases of unification are now complete, with district courts managed by local authorities having now been replaced by JP courts managed by the Scottish Court Service in the sheriffdoms of Lothian & Borders; Grampian, Highland & Islands; and Glasgow & Strathkelvin.

234. In sheriffdoms where unification is yet to occur, the district court may sit at various locations within the sheriffdom. The frequency of sittings is determined by the level of business in the area. Where the district court sits infrequently at a particular location, it is common practice to move cases which require to call before the next sitting to a different location.

235. While Justices of the Peace have Sheriffdom wide jurisdiction, JP courts are established by reference to a particular sheriff court district (section 59(3) of the 2007 Act). The provisions in this Bill make express provision to allow cases to be transferred between JP courts in similar circumstances as those specified in sections 137A-137C of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 for sheriff courts. The Bill provides for the transfer of proceedings to another JP court, either to another JP court within the Sheriffdom or where there are exceptional circumstances to a JP court within another Sheriffdom.

Consultation

236. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.
Alternative approaches

237. In the absence of statutory provision, the view may be taken that cases heard in the JP court could not be moved into another JP Court in the same manner as between district courts. The provisions remove any doubt as to whether or not cases may be similarly transferred between JP courts, ensuring that current practice may continue. This will facilitate the smooth operation of court business.

Section 46 – Additional charge where bail etc. breached

Policy objectives

238. To streamline the administration of justice while continuing to underline the importance to the accused of attending court when they are required to.

Key information

239. The provisions will allow complaints to be amended to include an additional charge covering an offence committed as a result of breaching bail conditions or an offence committed in respect of a failure to appear at a diet. This change will assist the Procurator Fiscal in that they will no longer have to libel a separate charge where such breaches or failures occur.

Consultation

240. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

Alternative approaches

241. There is no alternative approach that meets the policy objective. The current position could continue whereby the Procurator Fiscal libels a separate charge with respect to the failures to appear, but this would not meet the policy objectives.

Section 47 – Remand and committal of children and young persons

Policy objectives

242. To ensure children (accused of offences) no longer suffer the adverse effects of being remanded in adult prisons alongside convicted adult criminals.

Key information

243. Under section 51 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, a child aged 14 or 15 years who appears before a court charged with a crime or offence may, because of their "unruly" character, be detained in the prison system.

244. The provisions will repeal section 51. When this takes effect, it will mean that where a court remands or commits a child for trial or for sentence and does not release him on bail or ordain him to appear, the court shall commit him to an appropriate local authority to be detained in secure accommodation (where necessary) or a suitable place of safety.
Consultation

245. A consultation exercise\(^{18}\) on the implications of this change was conducted in the summer of 2008, with numerous responses from public bodies such as local authorities and the Children’s Commissioner. The responses, which were supportive of the proposed change, are being analysed and will be used to inform any need for alternative provision of accommodation. Analysis of the responses will be published on the Scottish Government website in due course.

246. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

Alternative approaches

247. In the absence of the repeal, the status quo would remain in place. However, we are convinced that the repeal will ensure that the needs and welfare of young people are best addressed through the use of more appropriate facilities designed specifically to cater for their needs.

Sections 48-51 – Prosecution of organisations

Policy objectives

248. To tidy up the law by clarifying how criminal proceedings against partnerships should operate, and ensure there is consistency between the provisions of sections 70 and 143 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995.

Key information

249. Section 70 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”) deals with proceedings on indictment against corporate bodies. It provides for how the indictment is served, appearance by a representative for certain purposes, and for recovery of fines. While limited liability partnerships are covered, section 70 does not make provision about partnerships or other unincorporated associations.

250. In contrast, section 143 of the same Act, which deals with summary procedure, specifically provides for how proceedings may be brought against partnerships, unincorporated associations, and bodies of trustees as well as bodies corporate.

251. The provisions widen the provisions of section 70 of the 1995 Act to cover partnerships, associations and bodies of trustees to bring it in line with section 143.

252. The provisions extend sections 70 and 143 to other entities not already covered, such as government departments and the Scottish Ministers.

Consultation

253. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

Alternative approaches

254. There are no alternative approaches that meet the policy objective.

Section 52 – Disclosure of convictions and non-court disposals

Policy objectives

255. To allow the court to have as full a picture as possible of an accused’s behaviour when passing sentence.

Key information

Taking account in sentencing in solemn proceedings of any conviction(s) acquired between the date of the offence and the date of conviction.

256. In summary proceedings, the court may have regard to convictions acquired by a person between the date of the offence and the date of conviction for the offence where sentence is being passed. We consider that this principle should also apply in solemn proceedings and the provisions achieve this.

Disclosure of post-offence direct measures in all proceedings

257. Where an offender is charged with an offence, and accepts, or is deemed to have accepted an offer of a direct measure in relation to a separate offence between the date of the offence being prosecuted and the date of disposal, this could not currently be disclosed to the court in passing sentence. The provisions therefore allow the court to take account of offers of fixed penalties (“fiscal fines”) and compensation offers which have been accepted (or have been deemed to be accepted) and work orders which have been completed between the date of the current offence and the date of disposal for that offence.

Changes to disclosure of Procurator Fiscal "Work Orders" to the Court

258. The provisions will ensure that accused persons will be informed that where a work offer is accepted but not completed, that fact may be disclosed to the court in any subsequent proceedings for the offence to which the work offer relates. This is in line with other direct measures such as fiscal fines and compensation offers.

259. The provisions will also ensure that a work order completed in the two years preceding the date of the offence charged can be disclosed to the court in relation to proceedings for a subsequent offence.

Consultation

260. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.
Alternative approaches

261. There is no alternative approach that can achieve the policy objective. Continuing with the status quo would mean criminal cases would proceed in the same way as at present without the court having access to as much relevant information when passing sentence.

Section 53 – Time limit for lodging certain appeals

Policy objectives

262. To improve the operation of certain appeal procedures before the courts.

Key information

263. The provisions extend the time limit for lodging appeals against decisions made at certain preliminary diets from 2 days to 7 days.

264. Sections 74 and 174 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 make provision, in solemn and summary proceedings respectively, for appeals against certain decisions of the court. Both sections provide that an appeal is to be lodged no later than two days after the decision.

265. In order to properly consider whether to appeal, parties have to examine the exact details of the decision. It is often difficult to obtain this information within the two-day time limit. By enabling both Crown and defence sufficient time to consider and lodge an appeal against a preliminary decision, the efficiency of the courts will be improved.

Consultation

266. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

Alternative approaches

267. If this change were not made, it would continue the current position where it is possible for neither the Crown nor the defence to have sufficient time to reach a decision on whether to make an appeal. The Crown might in some High Court cases be able to seek to exercise its general right to challenge any decision of the High Court by way of bill of advocation, however, that provision is a cumbersome alternative and is, in addition, not available to the defence.

Sections 54-57 – Crown appeals

Policy objectives

268. To help ensure public confidence in the legal system is maintained.

Key information

269. The provisions clarify and remove some ambiguities and flaws in the law concerning certain judicial decisions that can end a trial without a verdict of a jury. The provisions also provide the Crown with a right to appeal against those decisions.
This document relates to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

270. This right of appeal provides a safeguard for cases where the trial judge’s decision to end a trial is disputed and the Appeal Court agree that the case should have continued. Such cases are expected to be highly unusual. Enabling the Appeal Court to consider questions on sufficiency that arise in the course of a Crown Appeal is expected to promote the accurate settling of the law and its proper application to the facts of future cases. It will allow retrieval of prosecution cases which would previously have fallen as a result of an error in law by a trial judge. We accept the Scottish Law Commission’s assessment (in looking at this issue) that “public confidence in the legal system is more likely to be maintained if an erroneous ruling at first instance can be reversed” (see paras. 3.4-3.11 of the SLC’s Report for further detail).

271. The provisions are based on recommendations contained in the Scottish Law Commission’s recent report “Report on Crown Appeals”. The recommendations have largely been accepted for the reasons put forward in the report. Certain recommendations have not been accepted, as explained further below.

272. Three types of ruling can bring solemn proceedings to an end without the verdict of a jury. The first is a ruling of no case to answer, where the judge rules at the close of the Crown case that the evidence led by the prosecution is insufficient in law to justify a conviction. The second is a direction, in the course of the judge’s charge to the jury after all evidence has been led, that the jury should not convict on a particular charge, or should consider only a reduced charge. Such a direction, made following a so-called "common-law submission", may be focused on the basis of insufficient evidence. The third is a ruling in the course of a trial that an important item of prosecution evidence is inadmissible, leaving the Crown with no option but to abandon the case. As the law currently stands, the Crown has no means of appealing against any of these rulings.

273. The SLC’s Report on Crown Appeals makes 22 recommendations for changes to solemn criminal procedure. The effect of the accepted recommendations as they appear in the Bill will be:

- to introduce a statutory replacement for the "common-law submission" at the close of all (Crown and defence) evidence. However one aspect of the SLC’s recommendation on this point has not been adopted (see below).
- to provide the Crown with a right of appeal against rulings of no case to answer, decisions on the statutory replacement of a common law submission and certain findings relating to the admissibility of prosecution evidence.

274. The statutory restatement of the "common-law submission" will allow the defence to make a submission at the close of the entire evidence in a case to the effect that there is:

- (i) an insufficiency of evidence to support the charge in the indictment or any other related offence; and/or
- (ii) no evidence to support some part of the circumstances set out in the indictment.

275. It will be possible for the defence to make the submission without Crown consent, but the Crown will have a right of reply. If the judge upholds the defence submission, then the judge will either acquit the accused of the charge in question; order that the indictment be amended to reflect a related charge or order that the indictment be amended to reflect the fact that there was no evidence to support some of the circumstances narrated.

Crown Rights of Appeal

276. The Bill grants new rights of appeal to the Crown. It will in future be possible for the Crown to appeal the decision of a trial judge to acquit an accused of a charge following either a submission of no case to answer under section 97 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (the “1995 Act”) or using the new statutory formulation of the “common-law submission”. It will also become possible for the Crown to appeal against evidential rulings made by a judge during the course of a trial, for instance on the admissibility of a particular piece of evidence. The Crown already has a right of appeal in respect of evidential rulings made during pre-trial procedure, and it would seem consistent for the right to extend to all such rulings.

277. Where the Crown is to appeal a decision by the trial judge, it will be on the basis that the judge’s ruling was wrong in law. If the Crown appeal succeeds, the Appeal Court will be able to grant authority to bring a new prosecution where that is not contrary to the interests of justice. If authority is granted, it is anticipated that the normal result should be a re-trial rather than the continuation of the existing trial. This is for reasons of practicality: if it were feasible for an appeal to be heard during a continuation of the existing trial, then this will be permissible.

278. In relation to whether leave of the court should be sought for the Crown to make an appeal, we have departed from the SLC’s conclusions. Recommendation 17 of the Report proposed a leave requirement for all forms of Crown Appeal being made possible under this Bill and the draft Bill does require the Crown to seek leave to appeal certain findings relating to the admissibility of prosecution evidence. However, it has been concluded that rights of appeal under either a submission of no case to answer (under section 97 of the 1995 Act) or under the new statutory formulation of the “common-law submission” should not be restricted by a leave requirement. It is not anticipated that these rights of appeal will be used except in a very limited number of cases, and it is not considered that there is a need for a leave requirement in order to guard against overuse of the appeal procedure.

279. Where leave to appeal is required, it should be granted by the trial judge. In making the assessment, the judge should consider the arguability of the Crown appeal and the effect of the evidential ruling (or series of rulings) has had on the strength of the Crown case.

280. Where the Crown has launched an appeal against an acquittal under sections 97, 97B or as a result of evidence being found inadmissible, the Bill allows the court to remand the accused in custody or to admit him to bail. The court may only exercise this power after hearing parties. This provision is intended for use in exceptional circumstances.

281. Provision is also made to allow a trial judge to make an order under the Contempt of Court Act 1981 where an appeal is made by the Crown under sections 107A or 107B, following an acquittal. This will mean that publication of any media report of proceedings can be postponed where there is a possibility that further proceedings might be brought against the accused.

Departures from the SLC Report

282. It is outlined above that recommendation 17 (in relation to leave to appeal) has not been fully adopted. We have also departed from the SLC’s proposals in relation to two other recommendations.

283. The SLC in its first recommendation had proposed an extension of the no case to answer provision under section 97 of the 1995 Act. This extension would have allowed a judge to rule that on the evidence led by the Crown no reasonable jury, properly directed, could convict. We have decided not to adopt the proposed extension of section 97. The issue is a complex one, and there was a substantial level of opposition to the proposal recorded within the SLC’s Report. A significant factor in deciding not to adopt this proposal was the concept of allowing the court to consider all of the evidence in its totality. We consider that it is fair as a matter of principle for all evidence to be led (both by the prosecution and the defence) before the court is asked to give a view on the quality of evidence in the case. It has therefore been concluded that the balance is struck appropriately by the current provisions of section 97, and recommendation 1 is not being adopted.

284. Although recommendation 2 has to a large extent been incorporated in the Bill, one aspect of it has not been adopted. This is recommendation 2(a)(iv), which would have included within the statutory replacement for the "common-law submission" an ability for the defence to contend that on the entire evidence led in the case, no reasonable jury properly directed could convict. If it were the case that the Appeal Court handled greater numbers of appeals on the grounds that no reasonable jury could have returned a conviction, then recommendation 2(a)(iv) could be seen as a useful tool to deploy as a way of pre-empting such appeals. However, as appeals on this ground are relatively few in number we have concluded that it is not clear whether adoption of the recommendation would provide any great benefit in practice. The benefit would appear to be that juries would not be compelled to assess a small number of hopeless cases and that an even smaller number of cases would not go to the appeal court where the jury had convicted in circumstances in which no reasonable jury could have reached that conclusion (and so avoiding cost and injustice as a result).

285. Against that relatively limited benefit is to be weighed the potential impact on court time in processing “no reasonable jury” submissions. Although trial judges would be expected to follow the appeal court by maintaining “no reasonable jury” as a very high test, there is a risk that the proposal might create a negative impact on court time.

286. Considering the lack of a significant ‘mischief’ to be addressed by the proposal and the potential that it bears for disruption to court time, we have decided not to adopt recommendation 2(a)(iv) within the Bill.

Consultation

287. In November 2007 we asked the SLC to consider a reference featuring several topics, including Crown Appeals. In March 2008, the SLC published a Discussion Paper on Crown
Appeals (discussion paper no. 137) which sought views on their emerging findings on reform of the law.

288. The SLC received 14 responses to their discussion paper, which helped to inform the recommendations contained in their final report, published on 30 June 2008. A full list of those who submitted written responses to the SLC’s discussion paper can be found at Appendix B to their final report. Those making a response were typically legal academics or practitioners. The SLC also held discussions with a reference group consisting of members of the judiciary and held preliminary consultations with representatives of the Faculty of Advocates’ Criminal Bar Association, the Law Society of Scotland’s Criminal Law Committee and the Crown Office.

289. Responses to the SLC’s Discussion Paper were generally in favour of the proposed reforms. Recommendation 1 attracted the least consensus, with the judges of the High Court, the Sheriff’s Association, the Crown Office and two of the Scottish Law Commissioners not in favour. Recommendation 2, with its proposed statutory restatement of the common law submission, attracted the support of all but two respondents. One specific challenge was made to recommendation 2(a)(iv) on the grounds that it would not be appropriate for a judge to rule that on the evidence led no reasonable jury properly directed could convict of the charge libelled. This view was based on the opinion that this issue was not a question of law, but of fact and consequently should be left to the jury. The general principle of providing the Crown with a right of appeal in relation to at least some of the judicial rulings that can bring a solemn case to an end without the verdict of a jury attracted support from all the respondents who expressed a view. In relation to leave to appeal, most consultees favoured our approach of not imposing a leave requirement for rights of appeal under a submission of no case to answer or under the new statutory formulation of the “common-law submission”. Although this stance was initially proposed by the SLC itself in the Discussion Paper, the SLC decided in their report that leave should be required.

290. There were a number of additional recommendations where not all respondents were in agreement, for example in relation to the extension of a Crown right of appeal to evidential rulings. However, in general the SLC’s other proposals were broadly accepted.

291. A summary of the SLC’s principal recommendations were included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

Alternative approaches

292. There is no alternative approach that can achieve the policy objective. Continuing with the status quo would not pose great difficulty, and criminal cases would proceed in the same way as at present; without a Crown right’s of appeal as described above. However, the reforms are intended to improve the law at a low overall cost.

This document relates to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

Sections 58-60 – Retention and use of samples etc.

Policy objectives

293. To enhance public protection and improve the law in relation to the retention and use of DNA, fingerprints and other physical data.

Key information

294. Forensic evidence obtained from DNA, fingerprints and other physical data (‘forensic data’) plays an important and increasing role in the investigation of crime. It is standard practice in Scotland, as in many other countries, for the police to take forensic data from someone who is arrested or detained on suspicion of having committed criminal offences and such samples are routinely added to forensic databases. If that person is subsequently convicted, his or her forensic data may be retained indefinitely, subject to periodic weeding of records relating to old or minor offences.

295. Forensic evidence has played a key role in securing convictions in a number of serious and high profile crimes, including some which remained unsolved for a number of years. Being able to positively identify an offender at an early stage can prevent further offences being committed. Forensic evidence is, therefore, an important tool in terms of protecting the public and communities. Not only does forensic evidence play a role in establishing guilt, it can also eliminate the innocent from investigations and, in homicides, terrorist incidents and civil disasters, plays a vital role in the identification of bodies and body parts.

296. The present statutory framework in Scotland in respect of the retention of forensic data from those who have not been convicted (section 18A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”)), which has been in place since 1 January 2007, seeks to strike a balance between the undoubted benefits of retaining forensic data for future criminal investigations and the civil liberties implications of retaining forensic data (specifically DNA samples and profiles) taken from persons arrested on suspicion of having committed an offence but who are not ultimately convicted of that offence. There are some gaps in the current arrangements in Scotland: for example there are limited powers for the retention of DNA samples and profiles from persons proceeded against but not convicted of sexual or violent offences, but none in respect of fingerprint data. Against this background, Professor James Fraser, the Director of the Centre for Forensic Science at Strathclyde University and Chair of the European Academy of Forensic Science, was asked to review the operation and effectiveness of the legislative regime governing police powers regarding the acquisition, use and destruction of forensic data. In September 2008, we consulted on proposals stemming from Professor Fraser’s review. This work formed the basis of the provisions that have been introduced in this Bill.

297. The recent judgement from the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) in the case of S and Marper v UK (application Nos: 30562/04 and 30566/04) has highlighted the importance of achieving striking this balance and having measures which are proportionate for retaining forensic data which is taken. The judgement highlighted that the present arrangements in Scotland contained in section 18A of the 1995 Act, strike a balance between the public protection benefits of retaining DNA for future criminal investigations and the rights of those who have had DNA taken under suspicion of having committed an offence, but are not ultimately convicted. The current statutory framework only allows DNA which is taken from those who are not convicted, to be retained for a limited period of time. Furthermore, such material can only be retained if a person is proceeded against for a violent or sexual offence. The measures only apply to those suspected of committing serious offences.

298. With the introduction of the new powers proposed, it is the intention to ensure that this balance is maintained and, in particular, that power to retain forensic data indefinitely is only available if a person has been convicted of an offence in a court of law.

299. In Scotland, power already exists to take forensic data (DNA, fingerprints and other physical data - palm prints, prints or impressions of another external part of the body, and records of skin on an external part of the body) from any individual who is arrested and is in custody or detained under section 18 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. Therefore, there are no proposals to extend powers to take forensic data, only to retain it.

300. Where a person has been convicted in court of any offence, there is currently a power to retain his or her forensic data indefinitely. Where a person has been proceeded against but not convicted in court of a sexual or violent crime, DNA can currently be retained for a period of three years, with discretion for the chief constable to apply to a sheriff for extensions of up to 2 years at a time. The proposals outlined below seek to extend this latter arrangement to the retention of fingerprints; and to certain cases within the Children’s Hearings System.

Section 58 – Retention of samples etc.

301. This section authorises the retention of fingerprints and any other forensic data already taken from persons proceeded against but not convicted of a serious sexual or violent offence. Data does not have to be destroyed for at least 3 years, and the relevant chief constable would have discretion to apply to a sheriff for extensions of up to 2 years at a time. This would bring the law on the retention of fingerprints and other forensic data into line with current law on DNA retention. The Marper judgement comments favourably on the current Scottish position on retention of DNA in such cases. Strasbourg also recognised that DNA is classed as more sensitive personal information than fingerprints and other relevant physical data. So, if DNA can already be retained, for the reasons set out above, it is logical to retain any fingerprints and other material, which is taken upon the arrest or detention of a person, provided they meet the criteria for retention.

Section 59 – Retention of samples etc. from children referred to children’s hearings

302. This section authorises the retention for three years forensic data taken under existing powers where a child accepts or is found by a Sheriff to have committed one of certain serious violent and sexual offences, with discretion for the chief constable to apply to a sheriff for extensions of up to 2 years at a time to provide a means of managing high risk cases. This would align with current arrangements under section 18A of the 1995 Act for retention of DNA from individuals proceeded against for violent and sexual offences, but not convicted and aims to strike a balance between the need to manage risk and protect the public with regard to offending behaviour; and maintaining the core ethos of the Children’s Hearings System – to address the needs of the child. The list of applicable violent and sexual offences would be developed in consultation with interested parties and prescribed in secondary legislation, with the resulting order subject to affirmative procedure. This approach will enable full consultation on the offences to be included, ensure links into other policy developments relating to children and provide an opportunity to review arrangements at a later date if this was considered appropriate.

Section 60 – Use of samples etc.

303. This section sets in statute the purposes for which forensic data can be used. The purposes are the prevention or detection of crime; the investigation of an offence or the conduct of a prosecution; and purposes related to the identification of a deceased person or of the person from whom the material came. This is intended to provide clarity to the public as to what forensic data can be used for in light of remarks about transparency made by Professor Fraser in his report.

Consultation

304. We published our consultation paper responding to the recommendations in Professor Fraser’s review on 23 September 2008. The consultation closed on Friday 21 November 2008.

Alternative approaches

305. A range of options were considered following receipt of Professor Fraser’s review, which culminated in the options set out in our consultation paper. The proposals outlined above either reflect or strike the best balance between the views received in response to the consultation.

Section 61 – Referrals from Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission: grounds for appeal

Policy objectives

306. To ensure a more streamlined appeals procedure to assist courts in making the best use of their time in dealing with cases referred by the SCCRC.

Key information

307. The Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission (SCCRC) was established in 1999 by section 194A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. It is an independent public body which impartially reviews cases submitted by applicants convicted of a crime in a Scottish court where there may be possible grounds for considering a miscarriage of justice has occurred. The Act enables the SCCRC, if it thinks fit, to refer any conviction or sentence passed on a person to the High Court for further consideration. This covers cases where an appeal against such conviction or sentence has been heard and determined already by the High Court, but can also include cases where no appeal has been heard.

308. The grounds upon which the SCCRC may refer cases is set out at section 194C of the Act and are as follows:

http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2008/09/22154244/0
that a miscarriage of justice may have occurred; and

- that it is considered in the interests of justice that a reference should be made.

309. The SCCRC is required by section 194D(4) to provide the Court with a statement of their reasons for making the reference. The practice of the SCCRC is to consider the possible grounds for a miscarriage of justice submitted by the applicant, and any other grounds that the SCCRC may itself identify during their consideration of the case. The SCCRC’s statement of reasons is submitted which sets out the grounds on which the case is being referred alongside a referral. In practice, difficulties have emerged in that the appellant, in pursuing his appeal, can depart from the grounds on which the SCCRC has made the referral. This can include seeking to make a case on grounds that have already been discounted or rejected by the SCCRC, which in turn, can potentially have a significantly negative impact with regard to the use of court time.

310. The provisions establish a process whereby an appeal, following a reference made by the SCCRC, can only be based on the statement of reasons given in the SCCRC referral, subject to the power of the court to allow other grounds to be argued.

Consultation

311. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

Alternative approach

312. There are none that meet the policy objective.

PART 4 – EVIDENCE

Section 63 – Spouse or civil partner of accused a compellable witness

Policy objectives

313. To improve the operation of the justice system and ensure the non-diverse nature of the current law is removed.

Key information

314. The provisions amend the law in order that a spouse or civil partner of an accused is treated no differently to any other witness. This will involve replacing section 264 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 and repealing section 130 of the Civil Partnership Act 2004.

315. Under the current law, in criminal proceedings in Scotland, any person who has information about a crime may be cited as witness by either the Crown or by the accused. A witness who is permitted by law to give evidence is known as a competent witness, and any witness who can be required to attend court to give evidence is known as a compellable witness. A competent and compellable witness who fails to give evidence may be guilty of contempt of court. There is, however, an exception to this rule which can lead to a witness not giving evidence and that is where the witness is a spouse or civil partner of the accused.
316. Under section 264 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, a spouse is a competent witness in all circumstances. However, s/he is a compellable witness for the prosecution or for a co-accused only where s/he is compellable at common law. In terms of the common law, a spouse is only compellable where the accused is charged with an offence against him or her. It is only where a spouse is not the victim that he or she can decline to give evidence for the prosecution. So, for example, when the victim is a child of the couple, the spouse of the accused may be an important witness. However, s/he is not a compellable witness, whereas an unmarried partner would be.

317. The rules regarding compellability of a civil partner under section 130 of the Civil Partnership Act 2004 are similar to those for a spouse.

318. The current rules have caused difficulty, particularly where the crime libelled is a crime against a child and there is important and material evidence to be obtained from a spouse in relation to that crime. It is capable of exploitation and causing abuse of the institution of marriage and of civil partnerships. There have been cases where an accused has married their partner who is a main witness in order that the partner cannot be compelled to give evidence against them. This may result in the court being unable to consider all of the material evidence in the case.

Consultation

320. We announced plans to repeal section 264 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 and section 130 of the Civil Partnership Act 2004 on 5 May 2008. This will result in a spouse or civil partner of an accused being treated no differently to any other witness. This proposal stems from a desire to amend the non-diverse nature of the current provisions and to help protect children.

Section 64 – Special measures for child witnesses and other vulnerable witnesses

Policy objectives

321. To ensure that vulnerable witnesses benefit from “special measures” and are able to give their best evidence in all criminal proceedings (except in JP courts).

Key information

322. The provisions extend the applicability of sections 271-271M of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”) to all hearings in criminal courts (except in JP courts) where a witness could be called to give evidence. The proposed change will allow special measures to be applied to all relevant criminal proceedings, and will not be restricted to trials.

323. This approach follows the one taken by section 15A of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003 regarding proofs in relation to victim statements. Consequently, section 15A of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003 will be repealed, because the general amendment to sections 271-271M covers proofs in relation to victim statements, since such proofs will be classed as “relevant proceedings”.

324. The amendment will replace references to “trial” or “trial diet” in sections 271-271M with references to “relevant hearing” where “relevant hearing” is to mean “a hearing in relevant criminal proceedings”.

325. This general textual amendment will be sufficient in operational terms and therefore will not require consequential amendment to the substantive provisions of section 271-271M, for example the time limit provisions contained in section 271(5A), or 271(13A).

Consultation

326. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

Alternative approaches

327. Maintaining the status quo would probably lead to continued inconsistency between different levels of support for vulnerable witnesses and resultant uncertainty and probably distress for witnesses who in a trial may well have benefited from special measures but who are then expected to give evidence in open court in related proceedings.

328. Only partly extending provision to certain non-trial proceedings as opposed to others would probably result in the same confusion and uncertainty for witnesses and practitioners alike. Specifying the types of additional proceeding, even if this was a non-exhaustive list may well end up being too restrictive in practice itself leading to confusion and uncertainty amongst witnesses and practitioners.

Section 66 – Witness anonymity orders

Policy objectives

329. To ensure the interests of justice are served in allowing courts, in appropriate cases, to permit witnesses to give evidence in court using measures designed to preserve their anonymity.
Key information

330. In the case of R v Davis issued on 18 June 2008 the House of Lords had to consider whether the Courts in England and Wales at common law enjoyed a power to permit witnesses to give evidence using measures that are designed to preserve their anonymity. The Appellate Committee, in overturning the judgement of the Court of Appeal, concluded that there was no such power at common law in England and Wales.

331. In response to the decision in the Davis case the UK Government introduced legislation (the Criminal Evidence (Witness Anonymity) Bill) in July 2008 on an emergency basis to confer a power on Courts in England and Wales to grant “Witness Anonymity Orders” in appropriate cases. The resulting Act does not modify or limit the Article 6 rights of an accused to receive a “fair” trial, rather it puts on a statutory footing what was always believed prior to the House of Lords decision in Davis to be the position at common law, namely that Courts have an inherent power to permit evidence to be given anonymously in appropriate cases.

332. In the Davis case the witnesses who were permitted to give evidence anonymously were the sole eye witnesses to the offence (the murder of two individuals). The following measures were permitted at the trial:

   (i) witnesses gave evidence under a pseudonym;

   (ii) the address and personal details, and any particulars which might identify the witnesses, were withheld from the appellant and his legal advisers;

   (iii) the appellant’s Counsel was permitted to ask witnesses no questions that might enable any of them to be identified;

   (iv) the witnesses were to give evidence behind a screen so that they could be seen by the Judge and jury but not by the appellant;

   (v) the witnesses’ natural voices were to be heard by the Judge and jury but were heard by the appellant and his Counsel subject to mechanical distortion to prevent recognition by the appellant.

333. Such a range and combination of measures have rarely, if ever, been used in Scotland to preserve a witness’s anonymity, however less comprehensive measures are used and there may be circumstances where the Crown or the accused might wish to make use of the same type and combination of measures used in cases such as Davis.

334. Until now the courts in Scotland have held that they have the power at common law to permit a witness to give evidence with the benefit of measures that conceal their identity. In addition, the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 makes provision for certain measures that modify recognised practice and procedure in order to protect the interests or identity of a witness. However, the result of Davis, although not applicable to Scotland, has introduced a degree of uncertainty to this position.

335. The provisions in this Bill broadly replicate in Scotland the effect of the 2008 Act in England and Wales.
336. The District, Justice of the Peace, Sheriff and High Courts will all have the power to grant such Orders in any criminal proceedings. The power to grant the Order will only be available where the Court is satisfied that it is appropriate to make a Witness Anonymity Order. In granting an order, the Court must be satisfied that the following conditions are met:

(i) that the order is necessary to protect the safety of the witness or serious damage to property, or to prevent real harm to the public interest;

(ii) the power must be exercised in a manner that is consistent with the rights of the accused receiving a fair trial in terms of Article 6 subject to, of course, the possibly conflicting rights of the witness under Article 8;

(iii) that it is satisfied that it is in the interests of justice for this power to be exercised in the circumstances of the case before it.

337. There are likely to be two reasons why witness anonymity would be appropriate. Firstly, it may be granted on the basis that the witness’s safety or property is threatened as a consequence of their giving evidence. Secondly, it may be that there are operational reasons why it would be undesirable for the identity of the witness to be disclosed. For example those situations where evidence is given by undercover police officers or other agents whose effectiveness would be severely compromised if their identity became known.

338. The provisions seek to ensure that before granting a Witness Anonymity Order the Court would have regard to all relevant factors including the following:

(i) the generally recognised right of an accused to know the identity of a witness and to hear that witness’ evidence;

(ii) the extent to which the credibility of the witness is a relevant factor in assessing his or her evidence;

(iii) whether the evidence of the witness might be the sole or decisive evidence implicating the accused;

(iv) whether the witnesses’ evidence can be tested properly without disclosure of his or her identity;

(v) any reason to believe that the witness may be unreliable or dishonest; and

(vi) whether it is reasonable for the witness to be protected by any means other than the granting of anonymity.

339. The provisions also enable a court that grants a Witness Anonymity Order to order the implementation of such measures as are necessary, in the court’s view to give effect to the Order. It will be for the Court to determine which measures will be appropriate in any particular case.

340. Both the Crown and the accused will be able to apply for an Order for witnesses they intend to call to give evidence and both parties will have an opportunity to be heard when the court is considering and application.
341. The court will have the power to vary or discharge an Order, either in response to an application by one of the parties or at its own hand. In doing so the court will give both the Crown and the accused the opportunity to make representations.

Consultation

342. The possibility that these provisions might be included in the Bill was referred to in our “Revitalising Justice” document. No responses were received.

Alternative approaches

343. The UK Criminal Evidence (Witness Anonymity) Bill was introduced into the UK Houses of Parliament after the Scottish Parliament had risen for the 2008 summer recess. We concluded at the time that there was not sufficient urgency in Scotland in light of the Davis decision (which is not binding in Scottish law) to justify the recall of Parliament either to pass emergency legislation in Scotland or to pass a legislative consent motion that would have allowed the Westminster Bill to be extended to Scotland. Provisions have been included in this Bill as it represents the earliest suitable scheduled legislative opportunity.

344. Courts could continue to rely on Scots common law provision for witness anonymity, but with a risk that this would be subject to judicial review resulting in a similar outcome to the Davis case in England and Wales.

Section 67 – Television link evidence

Policy objectives

345. To lessen the distress, inconvenience and cost of requiring witnesses from outside Scotland, but within the United Kingdom to give their evidence in Scottish Courts.

Key information

346. The provisions will allow witnesses from outside Scotland, but within the United Kingdom to give evidence in criminal proceedings via a live television link in both solemn and summary cases (but not JP courts) from outwith Scotland. The current legislative position in Scotland regarding television link evidence is set out in section 273 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. This section, which applies to all witnesses, whether vulnerable or not, covers evidence which is given in any solemn proceedings in the High Court or the sheriff court by a witness from outside the UK. It does not cover witnesses who are outside Scotland but within the UK. Section 271(J) of the 1995 Act allows vulnerable witnesses to give evidence via a live television link; however, this power does not extend to witnesses who are within the UK but outwith Scotland.

347. Section 273(1) sets out three criteria that must be satisfied in order for a witness to be able to give evidence via a TV link:-

- the witness is outside the UK;
- an application under subsection (2) for the issue of a letter of request has been granted; and
This document relates to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

• the court is satisfied as to the arrangements for the giving of evidence by that witness.

348. The prosecutor or defence may apply to a judge under subsection (2) for the issue of a letter of request to a court or tribunal exercising jurisdiction, or an appropriate authority, in a country or territory outside the UK where a witness is ordinarily resident. This letter of request asks for assistance in facilitating the giving of evidence by that witness through a live television link.

349. In order for a letter of request to be granted, the judge must be satisfied that the granting of the application is in the interests of justice and is not unfair to the accused.

350. The requirement to travel to a Scottish court from other UK jurisdictions can present a number of difficulties for certain witnesses, both vulnerable and non-vulnerable. Extending the current powers which exist under section 273 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 would enable witnesses to give evidence from a local court or other approved location elsewhere in the UK instead of having to travel to Scotland.

351. This provision will apply to both vulnerable and non-vulnerable witnesses and cover summary (except JP courts) and solemn proceedings. It is intended that the power might be used to cover such situations where, for example, a witness is too ill to travel, or has moved away from Scotland in order to escape an abusive or violent relationship.

352. In order for a witness to be allowed to give evidence in this way, the same criteria as are currently in place under section 273(2)-(3) of the 1995 Act will have to be met. This means that the witness must be outside Scotland but within the UK, an application for a letter of request has been granted and the court is satisfied as to the arrangements for the giving of evidence by that witness in that manner.

353. An application should only be granted where the court is satisfied that the granting of the application is in the interests of justice, or, in the case of an application by the prosecutor, that it is not unfair to the accused; and that the evidence of the witness in question is necessary for the proper adjudication of the trial.

Consultation

354. There has been no formal consultation on this proposal. The Scottish Court Service and the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service are supportive of the proposal.

Alternative approaches

355. One alternative is the status quo where witnesses from within the UK but outwith Scotland continue to have to travel to Scotland to give evidence. However, this is likely to lead to significant inconvenience and disruption for witnesses which is likely to compound the distress of giving evidence and add to the costs of the Scottish criminal justice system. Another option would be to secure the evidence of a witness living in the UK, but outwith Scotland, by conveying the judge, Crown and accused to a location more convenient to the witness. Again, this presents an expensive and inconvenient alternative.
This document relates to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

PART 5 – CRIMINAL JUSTICE

Section 68 – Upper age limit for jurors

Section 69 – Persons excusable from jury service

Policy objectives

356. To improve the operation of the jury system in criminal cases.

Key information

357. We are legislating to increase the number of available jurors in Scotland. Over recent years the number of jury trials proceeding has increased and it has become increasingly difficult to ensure a sufficiently large group of potential jurors. In certain urban areas, the Scottish Court Service finds it increasingly challenging to maintain a sufficient juror pool. We are therefore legislating in two areas.

358. The provisions raise the upper age limit for sitting on a jury in criminal cases in Scotland from 65 to 70. Currently in Scotland individuals over the age of 65 are not eligible for jury duty. This present age limit fails to recognise the valuable contribution that over 65s can make to jury deliberations. The age limit for jurors in England, Wales and Northern Ireland is 70. Raising the age limit for Scottish jurors to 70 would achieve a common age limit for jurors throughout the UK. In addition, the change would ensure that, as the demographic profile of Scotland changes, juries are drawn from a wider age range. It will also bring operational benefits to the jury system, enlarging the pool of potential jurors by around 200,000.

359. The provisions also change the rules on exemption after citation to sit on a jury in a criminal case. Currently once an individual has attended court as a juror in answer to their jury citation for a criminal case, they are entitled to be excused as of right from jury duty for up to 5 years. This takes them out of the available juror pool for a substantial length of time therefore lowering the pool of available jurors which the court service may draw on. The current system makes no distinction between those jurors who attend at court as required but do not then get picked from the ballot to serve, and those who attend and are selected by ballot to form part of a jury in a criminal case. Those jurors who do not ultimately serve on a jury receive the same five year entitlement to excusal as of right as those who are selected to serve. This proposal will reduce the period of entitlement to excusal as of right from 5 years to 2 years for those jurors who attend at court but who are not selected by ballot to sit on a jury. It is not the intention that this would be a retrospective change; rather it would apply from an agreed date once appropriate legislative change was in place.
Consultation

Section 70 – Data matching for detection of fraud etc.

Policy objectives

361. To ensure Audit Scotland can continue their efforts to match data to prevent and detect fraud in the public sector.

Key information

362. The Serious Crime Act 2007 contains provisions that will place the National Fraud Initiative on a statutory footing in England, Wales and Northern Ireland. The National Fraud Initiative is a data matching exercise conducted for the purpose of assisting in the prevention and detection of fraud. Section 73 of, and Schedule 7 to, the 2007 Act contains the statutory framework within which data can be matched, but these provisions do not apply in Scotland. The National Fraud Initiative already operates on a non-statutory basis and has identified around £37m of fraud and error in Scotland and led to over 75 prosecutions.

363. The provisions broadly replicate the 2007 Act provisions for Scotland. Audit Scotland will be given the power to conduct data matching exercises on its own accord, or to arrange for such exercises to be conducted on its behalf.

Consultation

364. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

365. The Scottish Parliament Audit Committee took evidence from Audit Scotland on the National Fraud Initiative on 28 May 2008 and has indicated its support for legislation in this area.

Alternative approaches

366. The National Fraud Initiative could continue to operate on a non-statutory basis, as at present, but a statutory basis provides clearer powers, creates a unified system across the public sector and facilitates cross-border matching.

Section 71 – Sharing information with anti-fraud organisations

Policy objectives

367. To allow Scottish public authorities to play a leading role in tackling fraud by sharing information with each other and with anti-fraud organisations to detect fraudulent activity and help prevent future fraud.

This document relates to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

Key information
368. The Serious Crime Act 2007 contains provisions that enable public authorities to share information with each other and with anti-fraud organisations to help prevent and detect fraud. However, these provisions do not have effect in Scotland for those public authorities insofar as they relate to their devolved functions.

369. The provisions will extend the operation of the 2007 Act to cover all of Scotland’s public authorities, regardless of whether they operate in a reserved or a devolved area. They achieve this by repealing the restrictions in the 2007 Act.

Consultation
371. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

Alternative approaches
372. Similar powers could have been conferred on individual public authorities on a case-by-case basis, or authorities could rely on common law or statutory powers where they already exist. The approach adopted is simpler and provides a unified regime throughout the UK.

Section 72 – Closure of premises associated with human exploitation etc.

Policy objectives
373. Will assist the police in tackling the misery of human trafficking and child sexual exploitation by providing explicit powers for the closure of premises associated with the commission of offences in relation to trafficking of human beings and child sexual exploitation.

Key information
374. Article 23 of the Council of Europe Convention on Action Against Trafficking in Human Beings requires measures necessary to enable the temporary or permanent closing of premises used to carry out trafficking in human beings.

375. Article 27 of the Council of Europe Convention on the Protection of Children against Sexual Exploitation and Sexual Abuse also requires measures necessary to enable the temporary or permanent closure of establishments used to carry out the offences of child abuse, child prostitution, child pornography, child pornographic performances, corruption of children and grooming.

376. The Antisocial Behaviour etc. (Scotland) Act 2004 provides for the service of closure notices and the making of closure orders in respect of premises. Section 26 of that Act which provides for closure notices requires reasonable grounds for believing that the premises are associated with antisocial behaviour and the occurrence of relevant harm. Closure orders are provided for in section 30 and require that:
This document relates to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

- a person has engaged in antisocial behaviour on the premises;
- the use of the premises is associated with the occurrence of relevant harm; and
- an order is necessary to prevent the occurrence of such relevant harm for the period specified in the order.

377. Relevant harm is defined in section 40 of the Act and section 143 provides that a person engages in antisocial behaviour if he/she acts in a manner or pursues a course of conduct that causes or is likely to cause alarm or distress to at least one person who is not a member of the household.

378. While it may be possible to demonstrate that a person is engaging in antisocial behaviour towards a victim through causing alarm and distress it is less likely to be able to demonstrate that the premises are associated with relevant harm as neighbours and the general public may be oblivious as to the use and occupants of the premises.

379. We make explicit provision within the Antisocial Behaviour etc. (Scotland) Act 2004 for the closure of premises used to carry out the offences specified in the Council of Europe Conventions by providing a new set of circumstances where notices and orders may be invoked for relevant offences in relation to trafficking and child sexual exploitation.

380. Closure notices would require senior police officers to have reasonable grounds for believing that the premises are associated with the commission of relevant offences while closure orders would require senior police officers to have reasonable grounds for believing that the use of the premises is associated with the commission of relevant offences.

Consultation

381. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

Alternative approach

382. There are none that meet the policy objective.

Section 73 – Sexual offences prevention orders

Section 75 – Risk of sexual harm orders

Policy objectives

383. To ensure a robust criminal law in respect of the operation of Sexual Offences Prevention Orders (SOPOs) and Risk of Sexual Harm Orders (RSHOs).
Key information

384. A SOPO is a civil preventative order designed to protect the public from serious sexual harm. They were introduced in the Sexual Offences Act 2003 (the “2003 Act”) as a replacement, with some amendments, to sex offender orders.

385. A SOPO imposes prohibitions on a person who poses a risk of serious sexual harm. A SOPO could, for example, be used to prohibit a sex offender from being alone with children under the age of 16 and from loitering outside school playgrounds where his behaviour suggests that he is likely to re-offend. The granting of a SOPO makes the offender subject to the notification requirements set out in Part 2 of the 2003 Act. Breach of the prohibitions provided by a SOPO is punishable by a maximum of 5 years imprisonment.

386. Under existing arrangements, SOPOs can be imposed in the Scottish courts as set out in Part 2 of the 2003 Act. There are two ways to proceed; first, the court itself can make an order when dealing with a “defendant” for a range of specified offences. Second, the chief constable may make a summary application to the sheriff for the imposition of an order. Section 73(2)(d) of the Bill widens the application process, so that in addition to the existing power of the court to make an order, a power is given to the prosecutor to apply for a SOPO to be imposed at the point where he or she moves for sentence.

387. In reviewing the implementation of the 2003 Act, an anomaly in the law has been identified relating to the thresholds which apply in certain circumstances before a SOPO may be made. An offender who has been convicted of a sexual offence listed in Schedule 3 which is subject to age or sentence thresholds may not be made subject to a SOPO where the age or sentence thresholds are not satisfied. In contrast under paragraph 60 of Schedule 3 an offender who commits an offence which is not sexual in nature but which has a significant sexual aspect to his behaviour may be made subject to a SOPO.

388. The provisions disapply the age and sentence thresholds for the purposes of the making of a SOPO in respect of any person. This issue was very recently addressed for England, Wales and Northern Ireland by the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008. The change will provide the court with the discretion to impose a SOPO in all cases where there is evidence of a real risk of serious sexual harm.

389. The provision also expands the content of a SOPO to allow for appropriate restrictions and obligations/requirements (e.g. a requirement to produce documentation or provide information) to be imposed by the order, rather than simply prohibitions which may only currently be imposed by such an order. This would place greater responsibility on offenders to comply with certain conditions.

390. At the moment the SOPO legislation does not place any responsibility on the offender to comply with the risk assessment process. Both the Irving Report and the Report of the Expert Panel on Sex Offending (the Cosgrove Report) commented on the “lack of any requirement on individuals to comply with the risk assessment process and the potential for non-compliance to increase”. This was seen as a major weakness.
391. Adjusting the SOPO regime requiring certain positive actions on the part of offenders would address that deficiency. It would also have the potential to extend the range of information certain relevant sex offenders are required to provide as part of the requirements of the sex offenders register. A SOPO with positive provisions could be useful to the police if they wanted to know more details about a specific offender’s lifestyle, which in turn would mean that the police would have more information to assist in the investigation of offences. Accordingly, if the police wanted to know if a relevant offender was living in the same household as a child under the age of 18, or wanted to have details of their leisure activities, employment, telephone numbers, or vehicles (and/or access thereto) they could apply for a SOPO with a condition that the offender notify the police of such circumstances and/or details. If the police had concerns about a specific offender who claimed to be homeless, they could place a positive obligation on the offender to report more regularly, or at a specified time, to a prescribed police station. Again this would implement a recommendation of the Irving Report.

392. The 2003 Act also introduced RSHOs which are civil preventative orders used to protect children from the risks posed by individuals who do not necessarily have a previous conviction for a sexual or violent offence but who have, on at least two occasions, engaged in sexually explicit conduct or communication with a child or children and who pose a risk of further such harm. The provisions in this Bill bring in changes to the operation of RSHOs so that a court can when imposing a RSHO include appropriate restrictions and obligations/requirements in such an order. These changes mirror those made to SOPOs.

393. Some other minor inconsistencies in the 2003 Act are also addressed through the provisions.

Consultation

394. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

Alternative approaches

395. There are none that meet the policy objectives.

Section 74 – Foreign travel orders

Policy objectives

396. To ensure robust enforcement of the criminal law in respect of the operation of Foreign Travel Orders (FTOs).

Key information

397. A FTO is a civil preventative order designed to prevent sex offenders travelling overseas in order to commit sexual offences against children. They were introduced in the Sexual Offences Act 2003 (the “2003 Act”).
398. A FTO prohibits an offender from travelling to a particular country or countries or from travelling to any country outside the UK. Breach of the prohibitions provided by a FTO is punishable by a maximum of 5 years imprisonment.

399. Under existing arrangements, FTOs can only be imposed for 6 months, following which an application has to be made for such an order to be renewed. It is proposed to increase the maximum period for which a FTO can take effect from 6 months to 5 years. It is also proposed to increase the age of a child, located outside the United Kingdom, who a sex offender is considered to pose a risk to, from 16 to 18. At present, for the purposes of obtaining an FTO, a court must be satisfied that a sex offender poses a risk to child, outside the UK, under 16.

400. Currently there is no provision in the 2003 Act for an offender subject to a FTO to surrender their passport. It is proposed that where a court makes a FTO under s117(2)(c) of the 2003 Act prohibiting the offender from any travel outside the UK, the FTO will contain a requirement that the person to whom it applies must surrender any passports which they hold at a police station specified in the order on or before the date when the prohibition takes effect or within a period specified in the order. The surrender of a passport will ensure that a FTO which imposes a travel ban outside the UK can be effectively enforced. Whilst, a sex offender holds their passport, there is nothing to stop him or her from travelling overseas, in contravention of the order. This measure will only apply to FTOS which impose a travel ban outside the United Kingdom, as if another type of FTO is issued, a sex offender will still be able to travel to some other countries and will need their passport to do so.

401. The strengthened provisions, which mirror separate provisions being brought forward in England, Wales, and Northern Ireland, will better protect vulnerable individuals against the risks which sex offenders pose to them. If a sex offender is considered to pose a risk against children outside the UK who are under the age of 18, a court has the discretion to impose an order for a maximum period of 5 years. This will mean a sex offender is prohibited from travelling outside the UK for a longer period of time which will act as a deterrent to offending overseas.

402. Since the legislation came into force in 2004 no police force in Scotland has applied for a FTO. Only 5 FTOS have been made elsewhere in the UK.

Consultation

403. The Child Exploitation and Online Protection Centre and the police have suggested a number of reasons why FTOS are not more widely used including the fact that they only last 6 months before they have to be renewed and that the police have limited time to obtain the orders as offenders only have to notify their travel arrangements 7 days before they travel.

Alternative approach

404. There are none that help meet the policy objective.
This document relates to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

Section 76 – Obtaining information from outwith the United Kingdom

Policy objectives
405. To improve the powers of the SCCRC to investigate alleged miscarriages of justice, allowing swifter handling of complex applications.

Key information

407. The 2003 Act was limited in scope to implementation of international obligations. It did not extend Mutual Legal Assistance powers to the Criminal Cases Review Commission or the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission (SCCRC).

408. In the absence of such a power, the SCCRC have faced problems in securing co-operation from overseas. While it is anticipated that there can be no guarantee that outgoing requests from the SCCRC would be subsequently executed by all countries, it is the case that many have confirmed that they would be able and willing to assist on the receipt of a request.

409. Section 53 provides a new power for the SCCRC to apply to the High Court to request information from other jurisdictions.

Consultation
410. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

Alternative approaches
411. The alternative approach would be to continue to rely on diplomatic channels to seek information from other jurisdictions. A clear power for the SCCRC, subject to the control of the Court, helps protect the independence of the SCCRC.

Section 77 – Grant of authorisations for directed and intrusive surveillance

Section 78 – Authorisations to interfere with property etc.

Policy objectives (both section 77 and 78)
412. To simplify procedures for obtaining authorisations for specific types of surveillance. The provisions streamline the procedures for the authorisation of joint surveillance operations generally and improve the effectiveness of the authorisation processes used by the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency (SCDEA). These measures will improve the effectiveness of existing procedures, helping to prevent and detect crime in Scotland.
Key information

413. The Regulation of Investigatory Powers (Scotland) Act 2000 (the “2000 Act”) and Part III of the Police Act 1997 (the “1997 Act”) set out the legislative framework for authorising different forms of surveillance in Scotland. These provisions affect certain types of covert surveillance in Scottish police and SCDEA operations.

414. Currently, police forces are required to obtain authorisation for directed and intrusive surveillance under the 2000 Act and for property interference under the 1997 Act. Forces need to obtain authorisation from their own force command to carry out these forms of surveillance. Where an operation will involve 2 or more forces (one of which could be the SCDEA), 2 or more sets of authorisations are required (i.e. each force involved must seek their own authorisation).

415. The provisions will allow a lead force to be agreed between the participating forces who can grant a single set of authorisations which will be effective for any force (including SCDEA) involved in a joint operation. This authorisation would be limited jurisdictionally to the areas covered by the participating forces.

416. Provision is also made to allow the Deputy Director of the SCDEA to be able to routinely authorise applications for intrusive surveillance and property interference. The SCDEA is making increasing use of intrusive surveillance and property interference in a number of serious crime operations. As matters stand currently, these applications require to be authorised and reviewed by the Director General. The impact this is having on the Director General’s time is resulting in a disproportionate effect on other Agency business. It would prove helpful from an operational and practical perspective, therefore, to amend current legislation to allow both the Director General and the Deputy Director to authorise the aforementioned types of covert surveillance and the provisions achieve this.

Consultation

417. These provisions are included at the request of ACPOS and the SCDEA. The proposal to simplify the authorisation procedure for joint surveillance operations was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received. No formal consultation was considered necessary in respect of the proposal to allow the Deputy Director of SCDEA to authorise applications for intrusive surveillance and property interference as this is purely a technical change which will allow the SCDEA to operate in a more effective manner.

Alternative approaches

418. In relation to the authorisation process for joint surveillance operations it would be possible to achieve the same outcome using a collaborative arrangement under section 12 of the Police (Scotland) Act 1967. This may be explored further in conjunction with ACPOS in tandem with similar legislative developments for the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 and the Police Act 1997 being considered currently by the Home Office.

419. The status quo is the only alternative option available in respect of the proposal to allow the Deputy Director of SCDEA to authorise applications for intrusive surveillance and property interference. For the reasons mentioned above, this position is no longer considered to be sustainable.

Section 79 – Amendments of Part 5 of Police Act 1997

Policy objectives

420. To increase the ability of Scottish Ministers to gather information in response to applications for criminal record checks; and increase flexibility to the fee charging regime within section 120 of the Police Act 1997 (“the 1997 Act”).

Key information

421. Scottish Ministers carry out criminal record checks for employment and other purposes under the 1997 Act. The day-to-day work is carried out by Disclosure Scotland. At present, Disclosure Scotland can only include information held in records kept for the use of UK police forces when doing these checks (though for the enhanced disclosure only, relevant information from the Isle of Man and the Channel Islands police forces can be included at the discretion of the force’s chief officer). This is unhelpful as many people on whom the checks are done have previously lived outwith the UK. The effect of this is that relevant information could be missed.

422. In partnership with the UK Government, we are engaged in discussion with a number of countries, mainly EU Member States, about putting agreements in place for those countries to provide information to the UK for the criminal record checks under the 1997 Act. The first proposal provides Ministers with an order-making power to amend the meaning of certain definitions in the 1997 Act. This power would allow Ministers to respond to agreements with other jurisdictions and bring proposals to the Scottish Parliament to have information that results from the agreements to be regarded as relevant information for the 1997 Act.

423. Scottish Ministers currently charge a one-off fee for registration under section 120 of the 1997 Act and a separate one-off fee for nominees of the registered person. Persons listed in the register can countersign applications for standard and enhanced disclosures under the 1997 Act and will make declarations in relation to requests for disclosures under section 52 or 53 of the Protection of Vulnerable Groups (Scotland) Act 2007 once that Act is commenced. These fees are set in The Police Act 1997 (Criminal Records) (Registration) (Scotland) Regulations Scottish Statutory Instrument 2006 No 97.

424. We propose to amend the power in section 120ZB of the 1997 Act to enable Scottish Ministers to make further provision about registration fees to provide greater flexibility in the fee charging powers. This would assist Disclosure Scotland in managing the content of the register held under section 120; allow new services to be developed for registered persons that might not otherwise be cost-effective to pursue; and would enable arrangements to spread the cost of registration over the lifetime of registration rather having a one-off charge as is the case now.

Consultation

425. Both proposals were included in our “Revitalising Justice” document published in September 2008. No comments were received.
With regard to the provisions regarding registration fees, this proposal arose after different proposals with regard to managing the register held under the 1997 Act (which were in the consultation on the “Protection of Vulnerable Groups (Scotland) Act 2007”) were generally opposed by respondents. You can see the original proposal at chapter 2.5 paragraphs 90 to 94 of the consultation document.

The original proposal would have meant that low-volume users would have been removed from the register. The revised proposal will not have the effect of removing low-volume users and so responds to stakeholders’ objections. However it can be used to structure fees to provide an incentive to those listed in the register to de-register as soon as they no longer need to be in it.

Alternative approaches

An alternative to the first proposal would be to use secondary legislation powers under the European Communities Act 1972. But that would have been restrictive; it would only address information covered by European Directives and Regulations, and so that power could not be used in respect of non EU agreements.

The second proposal will help address problems with the management of the register held under the 1997 Act while not excluding low-volume users. The power will facilitate the register being used more effectively by providing an incentive, through the fee arrangements, to those no longer requiring to be registered to cancel their registration and so not incur any further charges. It is not an option to do nothing about the register as the current arrangements do not facilitate the register being used as effectively as it could be.

Section 80 – Assistance for victim support

Policy objectives

To increase the flexibility with which Scottish Ministers can fund victims’ organisations.

Key information

The provisions improve support for victims of crime by giving Scottish Ministers greater flexibility to fund a wider range of organisations or projects providing assistance to victims of crime, or to witnesses.

At present, grants to organisations providing support to victims of crime are generally made under section 10 of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968. This is usually sufficient, but it does limit grants to national organisations or to innovative projects and excludes grants to local authorities. There are occasions where more flexibility would be helpful, such as:-

- Payments to a local authority when it is providing services to victims. Victims of human trafficking often need emergency support once they are recovered. That support is sometimes provided by local authorities in the absence of any other provider, but if the victim has no recourse to public funds the local authority may not be able to support the victims unless funded by central government;

- Support for local organisations if they meet a particular need, such as support for victims of murder in areas where murder is particularly prevalent; and
- Allowing initiatives such as that being developed in England and Wales where the Ministry of Justice allows Victim Support (the equivalent in England and Wales of Victim Support Scotland) to make small payments direct to victims in certain circumstances.

433. The examples above only show potential uses of a wider power to make grants to organisations that support victims and witnesses. Decisions to support any particular initiative would be taken on a case by case basis.

Consultation

434. This is a minor technical adjustment that brings our powers to give grant to victims’ organisations in line with those available to the UK Government. Informal contacts with victims’ organisations have indicated that they would welcome this provision.

Alternative approaches

435. We make ad hoc payments to appropriate organisations, but that is not a long term solution and it would be appropriate to regularise Scottish Ministers’ powers through legislation.

Section 81 – Public defence solicitors

Policy objectives

436. To provide long term certainty for the operation of the Public Defence Solicitor’s Office (PDSO) to offer criminal legal assistance in the future.

Key information

437. The PDSO was originally established in 1998 in order to test the feasibility of providing criminal legal assistance through solicitors directly employed by the Scottish Legal Aid Board. The legislation was subsequently amended to allow the feasibility study to continue after 1 October 2003.

438. A report on the feasibility study was laid before parliament in December 2008. The policy now is to put the PDSO on a more solid statutory footing to enable it to provide criminal legal advice, assistance and representation as a matter of course rather than for the purposes of the feasibility study.

Consultation

439. A number of stakeholders from the legal profession and the criminal justice system were interviewed as part of the preparation of the feasibility study but no formal consultation on the provisions in this section has been undertaken. The proposal was included in the “Revitalising Justice” document with no comments being received.
Alternative approaches

440. It would be possible for the PDSO to continue to function as a feasibility study or for publicly funded criminal defence services to be provided solely through solicitors in private practice. Establishing that the PDSO is to continue to provide criminal legal assistance as a matter of course is intended to enhance public confidence in the PDSO and to assist in the recruitment and retention of its staff. The number of solicitors employed by PDSO represents approximately 1% of the total number registered with the Scottish Legal Aid Board to provide such services.

Section 82 – Compensation for miscarriages of justice

Policy objectives

441. To establish a single statutory scheme that is more efficient and effective in consideration of claims for compensation arising out of miscarriages of justice and to tidy the law in this area and ensure there are no gaps in the legislation.

Key information

442. We operate two schemes for the payment of compensation as a result of a miscarriage of justice: the statutory scheme under section 133 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 (“the 1988 Act”) and the ex gratia scheme.

443. Section 133 of the 1988 Act requires Scottish Ministers to pay compensation for a miscarriage of justice in certain circumstances. The statutory scheme allows compensation to be payable when a conviction is “reversed” by the High Court on the ground that a new or newly discovered fact shows beyond reasonable doubt that there has been a miscarriage of justice.

444. In addition to the statutory scheme, there also operates an ex gratia scheme. This allows compensation to be paid to individuals who have spent a period in custody following a wrongful conviction or charge if that wrongful conviction or charge resulted from “serious default on the part of a member of the police force or of some other public authority”. Compensation may also be paid in “exceptional circumstances that justify compensation in cases outside these categories”. Compensation is not paid however merely because at the trial or on appeal the prosecution was unable to sustain the burden of proof beyond reasonable doubt.

445. No changes are proposed to the scope of the ex gratia scheme but the provisions places this ex gratia scheme on a statutory footing, combining it with the existing statutory scheme.

446. Schedule 12 to the 1988 Act contains a reference to the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board. This is a redundant provision as the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board no longer exists and the reference is therefore repealed.

447. Section 133 of the 1988 Act currently allows for compensation to be paid when an individual has been convicted of a criminal offence and subsequently had that conviction reversed or they are pardoned. The condition that has to be met is that the reversal or pardon is on the ground that a new or newly discovered fact shows beyond reasonable doubt that there has been a miscarriage of justice.

448. However, section 188 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 ("the 1995 Act") allows for a conviction and sentence or both to be set aside by way of a minute from the prosecutor to the court without an appeal being heard. The provisions amend section 133 of the 1988 Act in order to allow someone who has had their conviction set aside by way of section 188(1)(b) of the 1995 Act to receive compensation.

449. Section 133(6) of the 1988 Act states that “…for the purposes of this section a persons suffers punishment as a result of a conviction when sentenced is passed on him for the offence of which he was convicted.” Section 228 and section 246 of the 1995 Act allow the court to impose a probation order or order absolute discharge instead of sentence. As disposals such as probation order and orders of absolute discharge are “sentences”, section 133(6) of the 1988 Act would not recognise the person as having been punished and compensation would not be available.

450. The provisions ensures that convictions resulting in a disposal such as a probation order or absolute discharge can be taken into account for the purposes of section 133 of the 1988 Act.

451. An issue that has come to light with recent cases is the ability to deal with applications under section 133(2) of the 1988 Act which have been made a significant time after the conviction. This has lead to difficulties in obtaining evidence to substantiate claims as court records are destroyed after a period of time. Additionally, the absence of a time limit is at odds with civil litigation procedures.

452. The provisions will limit the time in which an application can be considered to 3 years from the date the appeal is finally disposed of by the High Court with the addition of a discretionary power for Scottish Ministers to waive that where it is in the interests of justice to do so, or that there are exceptional circumstances. This is in line with civil limitation periods for personal injury claims.

Consultation

453. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

Alternative approaches

454. The UK Government has adopted a different approach. Section 61 of the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 has placed a number of restrictions on compensation payments, and the ex gratia scheme has been abolished and not replaced. We consider it preferable to establish a statutory ex gratia scheme.
Section 83 – Financial reporting orders

Policy objectives
455. To encourage the use of Financial Reporting Orders (FROs).

Key information
456. The provisions clarify the right for a prosecutor to apply to the court to consider imposing a FRO.

457. The Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005 introduced the use of FROs which requires those subject to the order to report their financial dealings over a specified period of time as directed by the court. In Scotland they can be applied for when an individual has been convicted of the common law offence of fraud or an offence listed in Schedule 4 to the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 and when the court believes that there is a sufficiently high risk that a similar offence will likely be committed in the future.

458. At present the number of FROs imposed in Scotland is limited. It is unclear whether it is for the court on its own initiative to make a FRO or whether prosecutors can ask the court to make such an order. The purpose of this provision is to make it explicit that either the prosecutor can bring to the court’s attention its power to impose a FRO or the court can make such an order at its own instance. Section 77 of the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act is amended accordingly.

Consultation
459. This proposal has been drawn up in conjunction with the Crown Office and Prosecutor Fiscal Service. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

Alternative approaches
460. We could have decided not to amend the legislation and rely on the court to take account of the possibility of imposing Financial Reporting Orders. However, as there have been so few orders imposed we felt it necessary to put it beyond doubt that a prosecutor can bring the possibility of the imposition of these orders to the courts attention. This will hopefully result in more FROs.

Section 84 – Compensation orders

Policy objectives
461. To improve courts’ flexibility to award compensation thus helping victims of crime achieve greater satisfaction.

Key information
462. The provisions widen the circumstances in which criminal courts may make compensation orders by making it more straightforward for the courts to award financial compensation back to victims of crime for any personal injury, loss or damage caused directly or indirectly; or alarm or distress caused directly to the victim resulting from that offence or any other offence which is taken into consideration by the court in determining the sentence.

463. The provisions will:

- allow compensation orders to be made in respect of bereavement and the cost of funeral expenses and make compensation orders available against an offender if they have a traffic accident and are uninsured, including covering the expenses of the preferential insurance rates lost by the victim, if applicable;
- make it easier for courts to award compensation orders by decoupling them from civil proceedings (where existing legislation allows a compensation order to be discharged or reduced if there is a subsequent civil determination that the amount awarded in the criminal case was too high);
- allow the earnings of an offender (contingent on employment on release from custody) to be taken into account when deciding compensation; and
- allow courts to review an award of compensation in cases where an offender has had a substantial increase in means.

464. Furthermore, Sheriffs and stipendiary magistrates currently have powers to impose exceptionally high maximum fines for some offences, which exceed the standard limits set for summary courts. Compensation orders are however currently restricted to standard limits and we intend to remove that restriction.

Consultation

465. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

Alternative approaches

466. There are none that allow the policy objectives to be met.

PART 6 – DISCLOSURE

Sections 85-116 – Disclosure

Policy objectives

467. To provide certainty in statute as regards how the disclosure of evidence regime should operate.

Key information

468. Effective disclosure of information to the accused in criminal proceedings by the prosecutor to the defence is recognised as necessary to ensure trials are conducted fairly.
469. In the Scottish legal system it is a fundamental principle that an accused is entitled to a fair trial. To help achieve this the Crown has an obligation to give the accused notice of the charge against him and to make available information/evidence which the Crown intends to bring to prove the charges. Any exculpatory material should be identified and given/disclosed to the defence. A series of decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council including the cases of Holland and Sinclair, have refined that duty but have also given rise to uncertainty about the exact requirements of the duty of disclosure.

470. Although disclosure is presently carried out on a common law basis, it is clear that there are shortcomings in the current regime and that disclosure would benefit from having a statutory framework.

471. The provisions in the Bill clarify what requires to be disclosed and establishes a statutory regime for material to be disclosed. They are based on the recommendations contained in Lord Coulsfield’s ‘Review of the Law and Practice of Disclosure in Criminal Proceedings in Scotland’ which was published in August 2007.

472. We consulted publicly on Lord Coulsfield’s recommendations and, subsequently, published the responses received in relation to that consultation. We also published an analysis of those responses and a statement of our intended next steps, which were committing to bringing forward legislation and to develop a statutory Code of Practice to accompany the legislation – the “Next Steps” paper.

473. Lord Coulsfield’s recommendations have, largely, been accepted for the reasons put forward in his report and in the “Next Steps” paper. Certain recommendations have not been accepted, as explained in the “Next Steps” paper, and below.

474. The Bill is designed to establish a statutory system of disclosure which, broadly, sets out:

- A continuing duty on the Crown to disclose material and relevant information for and against the accused to the defence;
- A statutory definition of that duty and provision for how and when the duty is complied with;
- A duty on the police and other agencies or organisations who investigate crimes and submit reports to the prosecutor to provide the prosecutor with schedules listing all the information which may be relevant to the case obtained during the course of the investigation.

Duty of Disclosure

475. The Bill seeks to re-state and clarify the duty of the prosecutor to disclose information and the definition of what requires to be disclosed.

476. The prosecutor will be under a duty to review all relevant and material information for or against the accused of which he is aware (i.e. all information that has been submitted to him by the police or other investigating agency). Such information will require to be disclosed if it materially weakens or undermines the prosecution case, it materially strengthens the accused’s case or it is information which is likely to form part of the prosecution case – i.e. is likely to be led at any trial. (Information that is material is, by definition, also relevant). The provisions give non-exhaustive examples of the types of information, which are designed to include the types of information set out by Lord Coulsfield in recommendation 7 of his report.

477. That duty is one that is proactive and continues, throughout the life of the case until proceedings have concluded. After the accused has been convicted, however, the duty changes and the prosecutor will not be required to disclose information which forms part of the prosecution case.

478. The prosecutor will be able to disclose information by any means. This will include providing a narrative containing the information, providing copies of documents containing the information or allowing the accused or his solicitor or advocate to inspect the information at a reasonable time and in a reasonable place. Some documents might contain information that does require to be disclosed and other information that does not. The prosecutor will be able to edit, redact or otherwise obscure any information that does not require to be disclosed in any such document.

479. Information contained in criminal history records relating to witnesses, sometimes referred to as “previous convictions and outstanding charges” will require to be disclosed only if it meets the test for disclosure.

480. In solemn proceedings, witness statements of those witnesses whom the prosecutor intends to call to give evidence at trial, as a class of documents, will require to be disclosed. The prosecutor may, however, edit, redact or otherwise obscure any part or parts of a witness statement for information that does not require to be disclosed.
481. In summary proceedings, witness statements as a class of documents will not always require to be disclosed, even where the witness is likely to give evidence. In practice, in summary proceedings, the Crown will continue to prepare a narrative containing the information that the prosecutor is aware of (sometimes referred to as a “summary of evidence”). If there is additional information, whether contained in witness statements or elsewhere, that has not previously been disclosed, the prosecutor will provide the information.

482. There will for solemn cases be a duty on the police (and other agencies or organisations who investigate crimes and submit reports to the prosecutor in relation to those investigations) to provide the prosecutor with schedules listing all the information which may be relevant to the case obtained during the course of the investigation. The schedules will list the information ingathered which may be relevant to the case for or against the accused – which schedule information is listed on will depend on the sensitivity of the information. There will be three separate schedules (sensitive, highly sensitive or non-sensitive) dependant upon the nature of the information. On each schedule there will be an entry in respect of each piece of information held, together with a brief description of the information. If the prosecutor disagrees with the categorisation of any piece of information, he will be able to direct that the schedules are amended and re-submitted.

483. In solemn cases there will be a duty on the prosecutor to disclose to the defence a schedule listing all the information that may be relevant that is categorised as non-sensitive. This is in addition to their duty to disclose all material (and therefore relevant) information for and against the accused.

484. Although it is essential that the accused receives material and relevant information for or against him in connection with his case, it is equally essential that some balance is struck to protect the privacy of witnesses. To achieve that balance, the accused will only be able to use information disclosed to him by the prosecutor for the purposes of preparing or presenting his defence, whether in the trial or at (or in deciding whether to) appeal – including any application to the SCCRC or reference by the SCCRC to the High Court of Justiciary. It will be a criminal offence for the accused, or by any other person whom the accused passes the information to, to use the information for any other purpose.

485. The accused will be able to apply to the court to seek permission to pass on the information to a third party (but, clearly, need not do so if the reason for passing the information on is for the purposes of preparing or presenting his defence), whether in the trial or at (or in deciding whether to) appeal. If the court makes an order allowing the accused to pass on information to a particular person for a particular purpose, and the accused passes information to a different person or for a different purpose, he will commit an offence.

Non-disclosure – “Public Interest immunity”

486. There will be cases where the information which the prosecutor requires to disclose is sensitive and the disclosure of it would create a risk of substantial prejudice to an important public interest. In those circumstances, and only in such circumstances, the prosecutor will apply to the court for an order prohibiting disclosure. If, and only if, the court makes a non-disclosure order, the prosecutor will be able to withhold from the accused an item or items of information.
specified in the order which would otherwise require to be disclosed (the prosecutor will retain, however, his discretion to discontinue proceedings).

487. This is not entirely novel; but as Lord Coulsfield recommended, there is a need to put in place a statutory system for such decisions to be made.

488. There is a difficult balance to be struck here between protecting the public interest at stake and the private interests of the accused. To achieve that, Lord Coulsfield envisaged there being three types of procedure, broadly described as type 1, type 2 and type 3:-

- Non-Disclosure application only - Crown and defence (and special counsel if appointed by the court) represented at hearing and have opportunity to make representations;
- Exclusion with non disclosure applications - Crown represented at hearing and special counsel if appointed by Court. Defence may be represented only to allow them to be heard on the procedure, thereafter they are to be excluded from the hearing to decide whether the non-disclosure order is to be made; and
- Non-notification with exclusion and non disclosure applications - Crown represented at hearing and special counsel if appointed by Court. Accused and his/her legal representative are not present and are not notified of any of the hearings.

The provisions are designed to give effect to this.

489. It will be possible, therefore, where the prosecutor applies for a non-disclosure order, for the prosecutor to apply to the court for a non-notification order and/or an exclusion order, also. A non-notification order will be an order prohibiting notice being given to the accused of the making of the applications for non-notification, exclusion and non-disclosure orders and also the decisions of the court in relation to any of those applications. An exclusion order will be an order prohibiting the accused from attending or making representations in proceedings relating to the application for a non-disclosure order.

490. The court will be able to appoint special counsel to represent the interests of the accused in respect of the applications at a hearing on any or all of the applications. Unlike the accused, special counsel will be able to see the applications and the information that is the subject of the application – ensuring that the accused’s interests are represented.

491. The tests that the court will apply in deciding whether to grant any of these orders are necessarily high, particularly so for non-notification orders and exclusion orders. It is anticipated that the number of applications for non-disclosure order will be small, relative to the overall number of cases prosecuted and, of those, the number of applications for non-notification will be few; but however small the number, it is vital that there are clear procedures to allow applications to be made and to make clear the procedures for their consideration.

492. In considering whether to make a non-disclosure order, even if the court is of the view that the information in question cannot be disclosed, the court will require to consider whether disclosure of the information could be made to any extent. If it considers that information could be disclosed to any extent the court will be able to specify that. This is another safeguard to ensure that only that information which absolutely must be withheld, is withheld.

493. The prosecutor will be able to appeal against a court decision to refuse an application for a non-notification order and an exclusion order, or against a decision for an exclusion order or a non-disclosure order.

494. The accused will be able to appeal against a court decision to make an exclusion order or a non-disclosure order. As the accused will not know that a non-notification order has been made, he will not be able to appeal.

495. Any special counsel appointed will, however, be able to appeal against a court decision to make a non-notification order and an exclusion order, or against a decision making an exclusion order or a non-disclosure order. This is to ensure that the accused’s interests are represented.

496. The prosecutor and the accused will be able to apply for a review of a non-disclosure order on the basis that new information has come to light which was unavailable to the court at the time when the order was made. Notwithstanding that, the trial judge will be under a duty to keep under review the appropriateness of any non-disclosure order made and, if he considers that the non-disclosure order may no longer be appropriate then he will appoint a hearing. This is critical to ensuring that, throughout the proceedings, the reasons for non-disclosure remain and, if not, information is disclosed to the accused (whether in whole or to a specified extent).

Code of Practice

497. As Lord Coulsfield recommended, there will be a statutory code of practice which will set out in more detail how the scheme will work in practice. The code will apply only to prosecutors, police forces and any other investigating agency that is specified by Scottish Ministers. The code will not apply to the accused or the defence and as such will not impose any obligations on the accused or his legal representative.

498. The code will be prepared by and laid before Parliament by the Lord Advocate; as the code will direct prosecutors, police forces and investigating agencies in relation to the exercise of their functions, it is proper that the Lord Advocate has this function. If, in future, the Lord Advocate were to revise the code, any revised code will also be laid before Parliament.

Departures from Lord Coulsfield’s report

499. The “Next Steps” paper outlined those recommendations made by Lord Coulsfield that were not being adopted, or not being fully adopted.

500. Subsequent to publication of that paper, of those recommendations that were adopted, one has been reconsidered and departed from. It was proposed that there should be a standard format for voluntary defence statements. It was proposed, also, that where, following disclosure by the Crown in accordance with the requirements, the defence wishes to request further consideration to be given to disclosure issues, it should be mandatory for a defence statement in the standard form to be submitted. That is still the intention in relation to summary proceedings.
501. In solemn proceedings it became apparent that the nature and scale of such cases are such that the prosecutor’s task in assessing what requires to be disclosed would be almost impossible without knowing some information regarding the accused’s line of defence. That risks essential information not being disclosed inadvertently and through no fault on either the prosecutor or the accused. It has been concluded, therefore, that the provision of a mandatory defence statement in all solemn proceedings by which the accused shall advise the prosecutor of the position he intends to take at trial is the only way to confidently secure disclosure to the accused of all the information which needs to be disclosed to him was for him to advise the prosecutor of the position he intended to take at trial.

502. The timing of when this requirement should be carried out is crucial: if it is required at too early a stage, the line of defence may not have become sufficiently clear, or might then change as the defence preparations develop. A balance was struck by requiring the accused to intimate and lodge his defence statement in solemn proceedings only 14 days before the Preliminary Hearing (in High Court cases) or First Diet (in Sheriff and Jury cases) and an updated statement (or where there is no update, a statement confirming that fact) 7 days before the trial diet).

503. The effect of the defence statement will be the same, regardless. On receiving it the prosecutor will require to review all of the information that may be relevant to the case for or against the accused of which it is aware. If anything further requires to be disclosed, the prosecutor will disclose it. If, and only if, the accused has sent the prosecutor a defence statement and nothing further is disclosed following that defence statement or if the accused believes that not all of the information that should have been given to him, has been disclosed, he can apply to the court (as he would at present).

Consultation

504. In November 2007, we published a consultation paper on proposals for legislation based on Lord Coulsfield’s recommendations and, following consideration and publication of the responses received, published an analysis of the responses and a statement setting out our next steps for legislation.

Alternative approaches

505. There is no alternative approach that can achieve the policy objective. Although criminal cases would still proceed, continuing with the status quo would leave the uncertainty that which Lord Coulsfield’s report was designed to address.

PART 7 – MENTAL DISORDER AND UNFITNESS FOR TRIAL

Sections 117-120 – Mental disorder and unfitness for trial

Policy objectives

506. To modernise the law in the area of mental disorders in criminal proceedings.

34 http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2008/04/24084456/0 - Scottish Government Next Steps paper
This document relates to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

Key information

507. We are taking forward legislative changes recommended by the Scottish Law Commission (SLC) in their “Report on Insanity and Diminished Responsibility”[^35] report published in 2004. Their report was drafted following Scottish Ministers giving the SLC the following remit:

“To consider-

- the tests to establish insanity (either as a defence or as a plea in bar of trial) and the plea of diminished responsibility; and
- issues of the law of evidence and procedure involved in raising and establishing insanity and diminished responsibility; and
- To make recommendations for reform, if so advised; and
- Consequent upon any recommendations for reform, to consider what changes, if any, should be made to the powers of the courts to deal with persons in respect of whom insanity (either as a defence or as a plea in bar of trial) or diminished responsibility has been established.”

508. We welcome the recommendations contained in the report and consider them to be an important modernisation of the law in this important area.

509. We accept all of their recommendations and they are included within the Bill for the reasons outlined in the SLC report.

PART 8 – LICENSING UNDER CIVIC GOVERNMENT (SCOTLAND) ACT 1982

Policy objectives

510. To modernise licensing provisions within the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 in line with the Task Group report’s recommendations.

Key information

511. A Task Group was set up by the previous administration to review the licensing provisions contained in the 1982 Act. The Group reported in December 2004[^36] and made a number of recommendations for reform. The then Scottish Executive responded to the report in August 2005[^37] agreeing with the broad thrust of the recommendations, but indicated that those requiring primary legislation would be for a new administration to introduce following the 2007 elections, in light of competing priorities. We now consider it correct to take forward the relevant recommendations within this Bill.

512. The Task Group report’s recommendations cover the general licensing provisions of the 1982 Act, and include specific provisions on metal dealers, market operators, public entertainment and late hours catering, taxis and private hire cars. The amendments to the 1982 Act are largely of a technical nature (affecting procedural aspects of the current licensing regime generally), though they also include some measures aimed at specific activities - the main amendments are listed below. The aim of the amendments is to make the 1982 Act licensing provisions fit for the 21st century in line with the Task Group report’s recommendations.

Section 121 – Conditions to which licences under 1982 Act are to be subject

Where the licensing authority has failed to reach a final decision on a grant application before the expiry of the statutory period under the 1982 Act, the licence is statutorily deemed to have been granted unconditionally on the date of expiry and remains in force for one year. The Bill retains the existing “deemed grant” provisions, but amends the Act to permit the application of standard conditions to any such licence.

In the interests of public safety, a regulation-making power in the Bill will be used to make it a mandatory condition of a licence that the licence (or a copy) be displayed on premises, vehicles (or a plate) and vessels, and where this is not practical for the licence to be carried at all times by the day-to-day manager. In the case of other activities (such as window cleaners), the regulations will require individuals to carry the licence (or a copy) on their person unless the licensing authority, under its discretionary powers, has made it a condition of licence that an identification badge be displayed or shown on demand.

Section 122 – Licensing: powers of entry and inspection for civilian employees

Constables have rights of entry and inspection under the 1982 Act for specified purposes (such as checking compliance with the terms of the licence). The Bill extends these rights to include civilian staff employed by the police under the provisions of section 9 of the Police (Scotland) Act 1967.

Section 123 – Licensing of metal dealers

The Bill replaces the current mandatory licensing scheme for metal dealers with an optional licensing scheme, i.e. it will be open to local licensing authorities to determine whether or not licences are required in their areas. The Bill repeals the current exemption from the licensing provisions (where annual turnover is over £100,000) and enables authorities to determine whether there should be any exemptions for larger businesses.

Section 124 – Licensing of taxis and private hire cars

Policy objectives

To modernise the taxi and private hire car licensing regime within the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 in line with the Task Group report’s recommendations.

Key information

The provisions amend the 1982 Act in relation to the way in which licensing authorities fix the scales for taxi fares. The provisions provide details of how the licensing authority should carry out their review of the scales including the consultation and notification procedures. The new provisions require that the review mechanism must be completed and the fares fixed within 18 months of the date on which the scales came into effect.

519. The provisions amend the 1982 Act to extend the right of appeal to the Traffic Commissioner (TC) against taxi fares fixed by a licensing authority to bodies representative of taxi operators operating in the council area as well as individual taxi operators.

520. The Task Group reported that the TC had called for extension of the existing appeal provisions under section 18. The TC considered it appropriate that representative bodies consulted under section 17 and that are required to be notified of an authority’s decision on the fixing of taxi fare scales or review should have the right of appeal. The proposal was widely supported during the Task Group’s consultation.

521. The provisions also amend the 1982 Act to clarify that a licensing authority shall not grant a taxi or private hire car driver’s licence to any applicant unless that person has held for the 12 month period immediately prior to that application a licence authorising them to drive a motor car under Part III of the Road Traffic Act 1988.

522. The Task Group took the view that the provisions as presently worded allowed a driving licence to be provided where an applicant had held a driving licence for any continuous 12 month period prior to submission of their application. The proposed amendment clarifies the original intention of the policy and was widely supported during the consultation on the Task Group review.

523. The provisions amend the 1982 Act to extend the period within which an authority is required to serve notice of its decision with regard to the fixing of taxi fare scales or of a review from 5 days to 7 days.

524. The Task Group considered that the 5 day period presently prescribed was unnecessarily tight particularly where broken by a weekend and/or public holiday. The proposed extension received almost unanimous support in consultee responses.

Section 126 – Licensing of public entertainment

525. The provisions amend the 1982 Act to remove the existing exemption for free events. The Task Group viewed it as unsatisfactory that licensing authorities are not able to control large scale public entertainments that are free to enter. It noted that authorities may not wish to license certain types of free event, such as gala days and school fetes, but considered that the decision on whether to license these events should rest with the authority.

Section 127 – Licensing of late night catering

526. The provisions extend the part of the 1982 Act covering late hours catering to ensure that licensing authorities have the power to license any premises selling food or drink at late hours. The Task Group report states that “the principal justification for licensing such premises related to the potential for large numbers of people leaving pubs, night clubs etc. late at night to cause a disturbance, and that this potential exists regardless of whether the food or drink being sold has been cooked or pre-prepared in any way”. This amendment will give licensing authorities the option of licensing all such premises if they consider it necessary to do so.

Section 128 – Applications for licences

527. The provisions make a number of amendments to Schedules to the 1982 Act, which include: extending the time allowed for making representations on any application for the grant or renewal of a licence from 21 days to 28 days; increasing the period of notice which licensing authorities must give for attendance at a hearing from 7 days to 14 days; and allowing licensing authorities to consider licence renewal applications received after the expiry date as renewals rather than applications for a new licence for up to 28 days after the expiry of the previous licence.

Consultation

528. Given the diverse range and technical nature of the licensing activities covered by the 1982 Act, the Task Group decided to draw up emerging findings first and then test these through wide consultation. The Group thus consulted very widely on its preliminary findings before firming up its recommendations. Over 70 responses were received from local authorities, the police, affected traders, legal interests, trade associations, individuals, consumer interests and trading standards officers.

Alternative approaches

529. The alternative would have been to do nothing in respect of the Task Group’s report and leave the 1982 Act unchanged. This was disregarded as there was a broad consensus that the Act would benefit from some updating and the Bill provides a legislative opportunity to do so.

PART 9 – ALCOHOL LICENSING

Section 129 – Sale of alcohol to persons under 21 etc.

Policy objectives

530. To require Licensing Boards to actively consider the detrimental effect of off-sales purchases of alcohol to people under the age of 21 within their area, or part of their area and to provide Licensing Boards with a power to impose licensing conditions restricting off-sales of alcohol to people under the age of 21. This is part of our efforts to tackle alcohol misuse and reduce alcohol-related harm.

Key information

531. Our discussion document “Changing Scotland’s Relationship with Alcohol”, issued in June 2008, set out Ministers’ strategic approach to tackle alcohol misuse and reduce alcohol-related harm. This included a proposal to raise the minimum legal age for purchasing alcoholic drinks in off-sales to 21 across Scotland, on which views were sought.

38 http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Topics/Health/health/Alcohol/strategy
532. The discussion document set out the key arguments in support of this approach:

- alcohol is much cheaper and more widely accessible in off-sales than on-sales and, therefore, the measure would be likely to generally reduce the amount of alcohol purchased by young people;
- on-sales premises offer a more controlled drinking environment than off-sales, therefore, the behaviour of 18-21 year olds is more likely to be moderated;
- it could act as a particular deterrent for drinkers under 18 who are significantly more likely to purchase their alcohol from off-sales rather than on-sales. It would also reduce the opportunity for those aged under 18 to purchase alcohol by proxy through 18-21 year olds; and
- pilot projects in Cupar, Stenhousemuir and Armadale have shown a positive impact of raising the age for off-sales. All three of these local pilots have shown a significant reduction in anti-social behaviour and offending as a result of raising the age of off-sales purchases to 21 on Friday and Saturday evenings.

533. However, there was limited support for the proposal amongst those who responded to the consultation. Amongst individuals 62% were against this proposal and 38% were in favour. Of the organisations that responded to this question, 63% were against and 27% in favour.

534. In light of the consultation responses and the difficulties of carrying such a measure through Parliament, we have decided not to pursue a blanket approach across Scotland. However, we are persuaded that there are clear arguments in support of local approaches where appropriate, as shown by the positive impact of the pilots in Cupar, Stenhousemuir and Armadale. The proposed amendments to the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 will, therefore, encourage the development of local solutions to address local problems.

535. It will do this by requiring every Licensing Board to undertake an assessment as to whether off sales of alcohol to people under 21 is having a detrimental impact on one or more of the licensing objectives (i.e. crime and disorder, public safety, public nuisance, public health and on children), within their Board area or any part of it. Boards will be required to undertake this assessment as part of their regular review of their policy statement, at least every 3 years. In addition the Police or the Local Licensing Forum will be able to ask a Board to conduct additional assessments outwith the 3 year cycle. The conclusions drawn by the Board do not have to relate to the whole geographical area covered by the Board. For example, a Board could decide that there was a detrimental impact for only certain communities.

536. The Bill will also create an enabling power for Scottish Ministers to set out in regulations specific circumstances in which Licensing Boards would be able to apply new conditions to more than one licensed premise at a time. Ministers intend to bring forward regulations which would enable Licensing Boards to impose a block restriction on all or certain premises (e.g. in a particular geographical area) from providing off-sales to those under 21, at all or at certain times. This would remove the need for Licensing Boards to hold a hearing for each individual premise to which they wish to apply this condition.
Consultation

537. As described above, we consulted on the proposal to raise the minimum legal age to 21 across Scotland between June and September 2008.

Alternative approaches

538. As described above, following consideration of the responses received, we have decided not to pursue a blanket approach to raising the minimum legal age for purchasing alcoholic drinks in off-sales to 21 across Scotland. Instead we have agreed to provide for locally flexible solutions by requiring all Local Licensing Boards to actively consider raising the age of off-sales purchases to 21 in all or part of their Board area and providing the Police and Local Licensing Forum with the powers to request the Board to review their policy.

Sections 130-139 – Alcohol licensing

Policy objectives

539. To improve the operation of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 through modifying a number of the provisions to reduce costs, shorten process times, remove unintended barriers and close loopholes, while ensuring Licensing Boards receive sufficient information on which to base their decisions concerning licences to sell alcohol.

Key information

540. The Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 (the "2005 Act") will replace the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976 in its entirety. The 2005 Act and the new licences under it come fully into force on 1 September 2009 at the end of a transition period that began in February 2008. It replaces the 1976 Act system of separate licences for pubs, restaurants etc with a single all-purpose premises licence, and a personal licence.

Section 130 - Premises licence applications: notification requirements

541. The provisions remove the need for Licensing Boards, when notifying the range of interested parties as required by the 2005 Act, to include with that notification a copy of the application, except in respect of the Chief Constable. This does not prevent the application being available for public inspection but reduces the cost and burden of notification. Similar provisions have been in use during the licensing transition period, having been put in place by Scottish Ministers using regulatory powers to make transitional modifications.

Section 131 - Premises licence applications: modification of layout plans

542. The provisions enable a Licensing Board to consider that where they would refuse an application as made, but would grant it if a modification to the layout plan, proposed by it, was made, they would be able to grant the application. The Board must, if the applicant accepts the proposed modification, grant the application as modified. Previously the Board would be required to reject the application and the applicant would need to reapply with all the associated costs that would entail.
Section 132 - Premises licence applications: antisocial behaviour reports

543. The provisions reduce the requirement for the Chief Constable to provide within 21 days a report detailing all cases of antisocial behaviour identified within the relevant period by constables as having taken place on, or in the vicinity of, the premises, and all complaints or other representations made within the relevant period to constables concerning antisocial behaviour on, or in the vicinity of, the premises.

544. The provisions state that these such reports should be required only if the Licensing Board requests one (which they may do following public objections or representations concerning a premises) or if the Chief Constable chooses to provide one. As consideration was being given to the implementation of the 2005 Act, it became clear that the 2005 Act procedure was unnecessarily onerous and bureaucratic. Using regulatory powers, Scottish Ministers made transitional modifications that reduced the requirement for the Chief Constable to provide a report on antisocial behaviour and these provisions will establish a similar situation after transition. This will ensure unnecessary costs are not entailed for the production of reports which are not required.

Section 133 - Sale of alcohol to trade

545. The provisions amend the provision in the 2005 Act whereby it is an offence for a licensed premises to sell to the trade. This is a common sense measure that corrects an unintended consequence of the 2005 Act. For example if a restaurant owner wished to buy alcohol for the restaurant from a supermarket instead of the wholesaler, the restaurant owner would under the 2005 Act be committing an offence.

Section 134 - Occasional licenses

546. The provisions will enable the fast tracking of some occasional licences where there is very limited notice of the need for such a licence e.g. a funeral. At present the statutory time requirements of the 2005 Act would prevent such functions or events from taking place.

Section 135 - Extended hours applications: variation of conditions

547. The provisions will allow Licensing Boards the flexibility to apply additional conditions when granting extended hours applications. For example where a licensed premises has listed one of its activities as showing televised sport, a Licensing Board may see no reason to apply specific conditions. However if there was a request for extended hours to enable the screening of certain football matches during a major competition (for example the World Cup), the Licensing Board may wish to see additional conditions applied to the premises, e.g. extra door staff and the use of plastic glasses while those extended hours apply (and earlier in the day).

Section 136 - Personal licences

Section 138 - False statements in applications: offence

548. The provisions in section 136 will allow the Licensing Board to refuse to process or issue a personal licence if the applicant already holds a valid personal licence. Section 138 would also make it an offence to apply for a second personal licence under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 if the applicant already held a personal licence. This prevents a person from avoiding any sanctions a Licensing Board had wished to impose for actions in relation to an existing licence which were not in accordance with the licensing objectives.

Section 137 - Emergency closure orders

549. While maintaining the need for a senior officer to take decisions about prohibiting the sale of alcohol, the provisions will amend the definition of a senior officer from being a constable of or above the rank of Superintendent to the rank of Inspector or above. These changes will accord better with the practicalities of day to day policing by making the rank of officer required to take these decisions more appropriate.

Section 139 – Further modifications of 2005 Act

550. The provisions ensure the police are able to bring a wider range of information to the attention of the Licensing Board at the time of application. The 2005 Act limits the chief constable so that he can only object on the ground that he has reason to believe that the applicant is involved in serious organised crime and that refusal of the application is necessary for the purpose of the crime prevention objective. This provision will ensure that the police have the same ability as anyone else to object to a licence on any or all of the grounds offered by the Licensing Objectives including prevention of crime and public nuisance, securing public safety and protecting children from harm.

Consultation

551. These provisions have arisen as stakeholders have considered the day to day operation of the system after implementation and following encouragement from Scottish Ministers to highlight areas of concern. Suggestions were forwarded by trade organisations, their legal representatives, Clerks to the Licensing Boards and the police.

552. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008 and were generally welcomed by those who responded.

Alternative approaches

553. The alternative would have been to do nothing in respect of stakeholders requests for changes and to leave the 2005 Act unchanged. This was disregarded as there was a broad consensus that the operation of the Act would be improved to the benefit of the local community and the trade and the Bill provides a legislative opportunity to do so.

PART 10 – MISCELLANEOUS

Section 140 – Licensed premises: social responsibility levy

Policy objectives

554. To ensure alcohol retailers and licensed premises whose activities can impact negatively on the wider community contribute towards the cost of this impact.
Key information

555. We are proposing that a levy should be applied to some alcohol retailers and certain licence holders under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 to help offset the costs of dealing with the adverse impact of these businesses or their customers. The principle that the costs associated with the wider impacts of a commercial activity should be borne by those who benefit from it is well established and already applied, for example, in respect of environmental impacts.

556. For example, alcohol misuse and overconsumption and subsequent disorder and harm places a heavy burden on our public services from policing city centres at night, treating alcohol related injuries in Emergency Departments, and providing other services to respond to the consequences of alcohol misuse. We are aware that many town and city centres face their own unique problems with regard to the effects of alcohol misuse. Licensed premises – for example, pubs, nightclubs, off-sales and takeaways – play a vital part in the night-time economy but large numbers of people using these facilities within relatively compact districts can lead to anti-social behaviour and disorder.

557. We consider it is wrong for the full burden of providing these services to continue to be met by the tax payer. Money available to Government is limited, and while businesses already pay business rates, we consider that some of the additional cost of providing services (for example, policing the night-time economy) should be met by those who profit from the sale of alcohol and profit from other types of licensed premises. The objective of a Social Responsibility Levy would be for alcohol retailers and other licensed premises to contribute financially to the furtherance of the Licensing Objectives set out in the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005.

558. We do not consider that the uses to which a Social Responsibility Levy should be put should be set out nationally. Rather, local authorities should be able to determine priorities in their areas and identify new or enhanced services, initiatives or projects where the use of additional money could best contribute to the achievement of the Licensing Objectives. The levy should not become a direct alternative to established sources of funding but should provide an opportunity for local authorities and other public bodies to be innovative and creative in finding new ways of promoting the licensing objectives.

Consultation

559. The proposal for a Social Responsibly Levy was set out in “Changing Scotland’s Relationship with Alcohol”39 published in June 2008. This document sought comments on the levy. The evaluation of the consultation process was published in February 2009.

560. Although the provisions in the Bill are for an enabling power, we will work with key stakeholders including ACPOS, COSLA, the alcohol industry and other business interests to develop the detail of the Social Responsibility Levy before considering whether to bring any regulations before Parliament.

39 http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2008/06/16084348/0

Alternative approaches

561. In the absence of a Social Responsibility Levy, the full cost of dealing with the adverse impact of licensed premises would continue to be met fully by local authorities, health boards, the police and other agencies.

Section 141 – Annual report on Criminal Justice (Terrorism and Conspiracy) Act 1998

Policy objectives

562. To tidy up the law, reducing the risk of error and confusion.

Key information

563. The Criminal Justice (Terrorism and Conspiracy) Act 1998 (the “1998 Act”) was introduced as emergency legislation following the Omagh bombing. The Act contained a package of measures designed to tackle terrorism. It also introduced section 11A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, which deals with the jurisdiction of the Scottish Courts to deal with conspiracies in Scotland to commit offences outside the United Kingdom (see also description of section 37 of the Bill within this memo).

564. Section 8 of the 1998 Act introduced the requirement for a statutory report on the working of the Act to be laid before both Houses of Parliament not less than once a year. Section 121 of the Scotland Act 1998 widened these reporting arrangements so that the requirement to lay the report became a requirement to lay the report in the Scottish Parliament too, so far as any report related to the provisions on conspiracy.

565. The UK Government considers this part of the Act to be redundant and this section has been repealed for England, Wales and Northern Ireland by the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008. The reporting requirements to Parliament on the operation of terrorism provisions is now provided for by section 36 of the Terrorism Act 2006. The majority of provisions, including section 36, of this Act apply on a UK wide basis. The reporting requirement at section 8 now relates only to the provisions on conspiracy.

566. Section 11A of the 1995 Act has never been used in practice since its enactment and there has, therefore, been nothing to report. The provisions therefore repeal section 8 of the 1998 Act as it applies to Scotland.

Consultation

567. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

Alternative approaches

568. There are none that meet the policy objective.
Section 142 – Corruption in public bodies

Policy objectives

569. To improve the operation of courts.

Key information

570. This section extends the jurisdiction of district/justice of the peace courts so that they can deal with cases involving offences under the Public Bodies Corrupt Practices Act 1889 and the Prevention of Corruption Act 1906. In simple terms, the 1889 Act provides that a person in public office who is involved in any form of corrupt practice in connection with their work is guilty of an offence. The 1906 Act provides that any employee who carries out activity in a corrupt manner is guilty of an offence.

571. The antiquated terms of the 1889 and 1906 Acts exclude jurisdiction of the district/justice of the peace courts, unlike the vast majority of other statutory offences that can be tried either summarily or on indictment. The provisions repeal these provisions so that the normal jurisdiction provisions in the Criminal Procedures (Scotland) Act 1995 can operate.

572. The choice of forum for prosecutors will remain with the prosecutor and, in practice, it is unlikely that significant numbers of cases will be dealt with in the district/justice of the peace court.

573. The provisions will remove an unnecessary restriction on which courts can deal with corruption offences.

Consultation

574. The proposal was included in our “Revitalising Justice” proposals document published in September 2008. No comments were received.

Alternative approaches

575. There are none that meet the policy objective.

SCHEDULE 5 – MODIFICATION OF ENACTMENTS

Paragraphs 1, 4, 45 and 51

Policy objectives

576. To tidy up the law, reducing the risk of confusion and error.

Key information

577. A major consolidation exercise of Scottish criminal law and procedure was carried out in 1995. The then existing law was consolidated by the combined effect of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, the Criminal Law (Consolidation) (Scotland) Act 1995, the Criminal...
This document relates to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

578. The Criminal Law (Consolidation) (Scotland) Act 1995 consolidated certain enactments creating offences and relating to the criminal law in Scotland.

579. This consolidation exercise included consolidation of the False Oaths (Scotland) Act 1933 to create sections 44-46 of the Criminal Law (Consolidation) (Scotland) Act 1995. Consequential provisions required as a result of this exercise were provided for in the Criminal Procedure (Consequential Provisions) (Scotland) Act 1995. It has emerged that a minor error occurred during this consolidation exercise. Schedule 5 to the Criminal Procedure (Consequential Provisions) (Scotland) Act, containing the list of repeals, should have included a reference to the False Oaths (Scotland) Act 1933. This was however omitted, and the 1933 Act remains in force alongside its intended replacement. The provisions therefore repeal the 1933 Act in full. Appropriate consequential amendments are also made where reference has been made to the 1933 Act in other legislation.

Paragraphs 9-11

Policy objectives

582. To tidy up the law, reducing the risk of confusion and error.

Key information

583. A major consolidation exercise of Scottish criminal law and procedure was carried out in 1995. The then existing law was consolidated by the combined effect of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, the Criminal Law (Consolidation) (Scotland) Act 1995, the Criminal Procedure (Consequential Provisions) (Scotland) Act 1995, and the Proceeds of Crime (Scotland) Act 1995.

584. The Criminal Law (Consolidation) (Scotland) Act 1995 consolidated certain enactments creating offences and relating to the criminal law in Scotland. In essence, this was a tidying up exercise, which made no changes to existing law and covered a wide range of subject matters.

585. Sections 27 to 30 of the Criminal Law (Consolidation) (Scotland) Act 1995 provide the Lord Advocate with special investigatory powers to deal with serious or complex fraud. They re-enact sections 51 to 54 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1987, as amended by the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994.
586. However, the provisions of the 1987 Act were not repealed, so they continue to exist in parallel with the 1995 Act replacements. The provisions correct this error by repealing the provisions of the 1987 Act and two later amendments to that Act.

Paragraph 13

Policy objectives

589. To tidy up the law, removing an archaic section.

Key information

590. Section 16 of the Criminal Law (Consolidation) (Scotland) Act 1995 provides a power of search or entry in respect of brothels. The section allows any parent, relative, guardian or person acting in the best interests of a woman or girl to ask for a warrant to be issued. This warrant will authorise a named constable to enter a specified place and search for that woman or girl where they believe she is unlawfully being held for immoral purposes. If the woman or girl is found, she will be delivered to her parents or guardians. There is also a right afforded to the person requesting the warrant to accompany the constable when the warrant is executed.

591. This provision was first to be found in section 10 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act 1885, which has been consolidated twice.

592. This appears to be a rather outmoded provision. In practical terms, the police already have the power to request warrants for circumstances such as this, so the power is redundant.

593. There is no need to retain this provision, as a constable has the common law power to apply for a warrant to enter and search any premises if he or she suspects that a criminal offence is being carried out. The English equivalent was repealed in 2003. The provisions therefore repeal section 16.

EFFECTS ON EQUAL OPPORTUNITIES, HUMAN RIGHTS, ISLAND COMMUNITIES, LOCAL GOVERNMENT, SUSTAINABLE DEVELOPMENT ETC.

Equal opportunities

596. The Bill’s provisions do not discriminate on the basis of gender, race, religion, disability or sexual orientation. Given the multitude of topics contained with the Bill, an overall summary of the equalities impact of the Bill will be published on the Scottish Government website (on the day of publication of the Bill). Two sections below (section 23 and section 129 of the Bill) are considered to have the most significant equalities impact.

Section 23 – Offences aggravated by racial or religious prejudice

597. There are statutory aggravations in place to require courts to consider increasing a sentence when it has been shown that a crime was racially or religiously motivated. The amendments to that legislation will ensure that it is made explicit at the point of sentence that the offence was racially and/or religiously aggravated and the impact that the aggravation has had on the sentence. These measures will harmonise the application of hate crimes legislation across the statute book in Scotland and improve the recording and application of race and religion aggravations. Evidence suggests that certain groups of people in society are much more likely to have been offended against simply because of who they are. These measures will help to ensure visible justice for the victims of crimes motivated by prejudice.

Section 129 – Sale of alcohol to persons under 21 etc.

598. Discrimination on grounds of age in relation to the purchase of alcohol in off sales is considered to be justifiable in terms of the greater good. Age restrictions currently apply to the purchase of a number of products including alcohol, tobacco and DVDs. The underlying rationale for such restrictions is the need to balance the need to protect young people and the wider community with the right of young people to purchase a legal product.

599. Alcohol is a dangerous drug when consumed irresponsibly. The impacts of misusing alcohol can be significant for both an individual’s health, well-being and life chances as well as for society more widely in terms of the costs of dealing with any health or criminal justice consequences. For this reason there are existing restrictions on the sale of alcohol to those aged under 18.

600. However, evidence from other countries suggests that increasing the legal drinking age from 18 to 21 can have substantial effects on youth drinking and alcohol-related harm, often for 40 The costs of alcohol misuse in Scotland are estimated to be £2.25 billion per annum, Costs of Alcohol Use and Misuse, Scottish Government, May 2008.

41 Section 68(1)-(3) of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976 prohibits the selling alcohol on licensed premises to under 18s, these provisions will be further strengthened when the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 comes fully into force on 1 September 2009, when it will be an offence to sell alcohol to a person aged under 18 anywhere (not just on licensed premises).
This document relates to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

well after young people reached the legal drinking age.\(^{42}\) There is also evidence that delaying the onset of drinking may be important in reducing the risk of harmful drinking.\(^{43}\)

601. Research evidence also suggests that young people who drink are more likely to be the both the perpetrators and victims of violence.\(^{44}\) In addition experience from three local pilots in Stenhousemuir, Cupar and Armadale - under which shopkeepers voluntarily raised the age of off-sales purchases to 21 on Friday and Saturday evenings - suggests that such restrictions can significantly reduce anti-social behaviour and offending.

602. It is considered that Licensing Boards should have the opportunity to thoroughly consider whether there is justification for increasing the age for off-sales purchases to 21 in all or part of their Board area, taking into account the interests both of young people themselves and the wider community.

Human rights

603. We are satisfied that the provisions of the Bill are compatible with the European Convention on Human Rights.

Part 1 - Sentencing

604. The provisions of Part 1 concerning the purposes and principles of sentencing and the creation of sentencing guidelines could give rise to issues under Article 6. The Scottish Sentencing Council will be responsible for preparing and publishing sentencing guidelines and will operate independently of Scottish Ministers. Although the Court will be required to have regard to sentencing guidelines it may in any individual case depart from the guidelines where it considers that there are reasons to do so. Consequently the guidelines will not prevent the Court dealing with an individual case in the most appropriate, ECHR compliant, manner. As a public authority the Courts are required to exercise their functions in an ECHR compliant manner and the establishment of the Scottish Sentencing Council and sentencing guidelines will not impact on that obligation.

605. The provisions regarding community payback orders could raise questions under Articles 4, 5 and 8. However, the provisions of Article 4 are not engaged as any community payback order will usually be imposed where the offender has expressed a willingness to comply with the requirements. Although the imposition of such an order may interfere with an individual’s liberty the fact that the restriction, if any, is imposed in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law and the deprivation, if there is such, is at the instigation of a Court, will ensure there is no incompatibility with Article 5. Any interference with an offender’s private and family life is in accordance with the law and necessary for the prevention of disorder or crime, consequently bringing the provisions within the scope of Article 8.2.

\(^{43}\) Newbury-Birch et al., Impact of Alcohol consumption on Young People: A Review of Reviews, UK Government Department for Children, Schools and Families, January 2009

\(^{44}\) Ibid.
606. The proposals for revocation of licences of offenders by Scottish Ministers are to be considered to be compatible with ECHR notwithstanding that there is a deprivation of liberty. Although the licences revoked at the instance of Scottish Ministers the case must be referred to the Parole Board, as at present, and the Board has the power in appropriate cases to direct re-release on licence. The Board is, by virtue of its constitution, an independent and impartial tribunal and consequently no issues under ECHR arise.

Part 2 - Criminal law

607. The Bill provides for “personal communication devices” to be banned in prisons. This could give rise to issues under Article 8 and Article 1 of Protocol 1. It is considered, however, that any interference is necessary in a democratic society and consequently the provisions of Article 8.2 apply. Deprivation of such property is in the public interest and consequently there is no infringement of Article 1 of Protocol 1.

608. The Bill also makes provision for creating offences of possession of extreme pornography. This could give rise to issues under Article 8 and Article 10. Any interference with rights protected by these Articles must be in accordance with and prescribed by law, for a legitimate aim and must be necessary and proportionate. Each of these tests is met as regards possession of extreme pornography.

Part 3 - Criminal procedure

609. The power to retain DNA and fingerprints from individuals not convicted of an offence raises issues under Article 8 ECHR. The issue was considered recently in the case of S and Marper v UK by the Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg. The Court in that case was considering the provisions of section 64 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. The Court concluded that retention of forensic data was justified under Article 8(2) for the prevention and detection of crime. However, the Court considered that there were difficulties regarding the indefinite retention of such material. The proposals for retention of DNA and fingerprints under the Bill are considered to be compatible with ECHR on the grounds that they pursue the legitimate aim of prevention and detection of crime and protection of the health and morals of others. Measures have been put in place to ensure that the proposals are proportionate to the aims pursued. DNA and fingerprints will only be retained for an initial period of 3 years. Any extension of that period would require the authority of a Court. Forensic data taken from a child may only be retained if the child accepts that they have committed, or have been found by a Sheriff to have committed, a serious offence (a violent or sexual offence). Separate and more stringent arrangements, therefore, apply as regards DNA and fingerprints taken from children than from adults. This is considered to be compatible with the provisions of Article 8.

Part 4 – Evidence

610. Provision to permit the granting of a witness anonymity order by a Court is considered to be compatible with Article 6 ECHR notwithstanding the decision of the House of Lords in the case of R v Davis (2008) UK HL 36. Under Article 6 ECHR everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law. Permitting evidence to be led under a witness anonymity order is not per se incompatible with Article 6. The obligation on a Court to ensure that any criminal proceedings are “fair” will ensure that the provisions are exercised in an Article 6 compliant manner. Under Article 8 everyone has the right to respect for his or her private and family life. Consequently a witness is entitled to protection of his or her Article 8 rights. In determining whether to grant a witness anonymity order a Court will need to balance the Article 6 rights of the accused with the Article 8 rights of a witness. There is nothing in the Bill that requires a Court to grant an order in any individual case. It is considered, therefore, that the provisions of the Bill are not per se incompatible with the Convention and the obligation will be on the Court to apply them in an ECHR compliant manner.

Part 5 - Criminal justice

611. The power to permit Audit Scotland to undertake data matching for the purpose of protection of fraud and other purposes may give rise to Article 8 issues. It is considered that any interference with the individual’s rights under Article 8 are justified and would not be disproportionate to the achievement of a legitimate aim. The onus will be on Audit Scotland as a public authority to exercise its powers in an ECHR compliant manner.

612. Provision dealing with the granting of foreign travel orders under the Sexual Offences Act 2003 may raise issues under Article 8. The maximum duration for which an FTO may be imposed is being increased but it is considered that the period specified, which is a maximum period, does not necessarily interfere disproportionately with the individual’s rights under Article 8. It is considered that the measures that would need to be exercised by a Court in an ECHR compliant manner are proportionate and necessary for the reasons set out in Article 8.2.

613. Police forces currently have the power to exercise surveillance measures and it is considered that the new proposals under the Bill, while extending these powers, will not do so in a manner that necessarily would be exercised incompatibly with ECHR. The police will be required to exercise any powers conferred on them in an ECHR compliant manner and consequently the proposals are not per se incompatible with ECHR.

Part 6 – Disclosure

614. These provisions are designed to place the Crown’s obligations to disclose information relevant to the accused’s defence on a statutory footing. The provisions requiring the accused to lodge a Defence Statement may give rise to issues under Article 6 particularly with regard to the right not to self-incriminate. It is considered however that the requirement to lodge a Defence Statement is a procedural measure designed to assist the court to identify the real issues in dispute. It does not amount to self-incrimination.

615. The provisions relating to the conduct of Public Interest Immunity Hearings and the granting of Non-Disclosure Orders, Exclusion Orders and Non Notification Orders could give rise to issues under Article 6, specifically the right of an accused to receive a fair trial in the context of certain parts of the trial process being conducted in the absence of the accused. It is noted however that the requirement in terms of Article 6 is to ensure that any trial is conducted in a manner that is “fair”. The Court as a public authority is required to have regard to that duty. In assessing whether the proceedings are “fair” the Court has to balance the interests of the accused with the interests of third parties and the general public interest in ensuring that justice is achieved by the Court. The provisions contain a series of checks and balances that give the Court the necessary power to ensure that in any individual case these interests, which may be conflicting, are given due weight. These include provision requiring the Court to determine the appropriate procedure and to keep that under review and the power to appoint independent “special counsel” in appropriate cases to represent the interests of the accused in circumstances where the accused is neither present nor represented by his or her own legal representative.

Part 7 – Mental disorder and unfitness for trial
616. The provisions dealing with mentally disordered persons raise issues under Article 5 of ECHR. The new defence is concerned with a question of criminal responsibility. Such provisions do not in themselves deprive an individual of his or her personal liberty. Instead they identify a category of persons who cannot be regarded as criminally liable for the acts in question. It is the disposal of such people within the criminal justice system, if convicted, that would give rise to issues under Article 5. Article 5(1)(a) permits the lawful detention of a person following conviction by a competent court. Any order imposed on an individual would be imposed by an Article 6 compliant court and consequently it is considered that the detention is lawful. The Court will be under a duty to exercise its powers in an ECHR compliant manner having regard to the competing demands imposed by inter alia Articles 5, 6 and 8.

Part 8 - Licensing under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982
617. The application of new conditions to be attached to existing licences could give rise to an interference with the licence holder’s rights under Article 1 of Protocol 1. The Scottish Government considers that the rights can be exercised in a manner that is compatible with the licence holder’s rights and the provisions are consequently compatible with the ECHR.

Part 9 - Alcohol Licensing
618. The power to impose variations in licensing conditions under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 could give rise to issues under Article 1 of Protocol 1 of ECHR. That is on the basis that the licence constitutes a “right” or “property”. However, the rights under Article 1 of Protocol 1 are not absolute and they may be interfered with in the public interest and in accordance with the law. It is considered that the “in accordance with the law” test is met and any decision to vary a licence would be undertaken by a Licensing Board. The Board would need to ensure that any interference is in the public interest and is proportionate. Consequently it would be in accordance with ECHR. The provisions are, therefore, not in themselves incompatible with ECHR but will need to be exercised in a manner that is so compatible.

Island communities
619. The Bill has no differential impact upon island communities. The provisions of the Bill apply equally to all communities in Scotland.

Local government
620. CoSLA and local authorities have been consulted on the provisions of the Bill that directly impact on them. We are satisfied that the Bill has no detrimental impact on local authorities.
Sustainable development

621. The Bill will have no negative impact on sustainable development.
CRIMINAL JUSTICE AND LICENSING (SCOTLAND) BILL

DELEGATED POWERS MEMORANDUM

PURPOSE

1. This memorandum has been prepared by the Scottish Government in accordance with Rule 9.4A of the Parliament’s Standing Orders, in relation to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. Its purpose is to assist consideration by the Subordinate Legislation Committee, in accordance with Rule 9.6.2 of the Standing Orders, of provisions in the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill conferring powers to make subordinate legislation. It describes the purpose of each provision and explains the reasons for seeking the proposed delegated powers. This memorandum should be read in conjunction with the Explanatory Notes and Policy Memorandum for the Bill.

OUTLINE OF BILL PROVISIONS

2. The Bill contains provisions that will deliver a series of reforms to strengthen, modernise and improve the effectiveness of the justice system in Scotland.

3. The Bill will be a very wide-ranging piece of legislation that includes provisions to reform community penalties, improve criminal law, modernise court procedures and assist victims and witnesses. It also contains measures that will help address Scotland’s drinking culture through reforms to licensing law. The Bill is split into 11 parts.

- Part 1 – Sentencing;
- Part 2 – Criminal law;
- Part 3 – Criminal procedure;
- Part 4 – Evidence;
- Part 5 – Criminal justice;
- Part 6 – Disclosure;
- Part 7 – Mental disorder and unfitness for trial;
- Part 8 – Licensing under Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982;
- Part 9 – Alcohol licensing;
This document relates to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

- Part 10 – Miscellaneous; and
- Part 11 – General.

4. Further information about the Bill’s provisions is contained in the Explanatory Notes (and Financial Memorandum) published separately as [SP Bill 24–EN] and in the Policy Memorandum published separately as [SP Bill 24–PM].

APPROACH TO USE OF DELEGATED POWERS - OUTLINE

5. The Bill contains a number of delegated powers provisions which are explained in more detail below. In deciding whether provisions should be specified on the face of the Bill or left to subordinate legislation, we have carefully considered the importance of each matter against the need to:

- strike the right balance between the importance of the issue and the need to provide flexibility to respond to changing circumstances quickly, in light of experience, without the need for primary legislation;
- make proper use of parliamentary time; and
- allow detailed administrative arrangements to be kept up to date with the basic structures and principles set out in the primary legislation.

GENERAL SUBORDINATE LEGISLATION PROVISION

6. Section 143 contains the general subordinate legislation provisions. Subsection (1) provides that all powers to make regulations or orders under the Bill are exercisable by statutory instrument. Subsection 2(a) permits the powers to be used to make, incidental, supplementary, consequential, transitional, transitory or saving provisions. Subsection 2(b) also allows for different provision to be made for different purposes or different areas.

7. The provisions containing delegated powers are listed below with an explanation of each power, why the power has been taken in the Bill and why the selected form of parliamentary procedure, if any, has been considered appropriate.

SUBORDINATE LEGISLATION POWERS - DETAIL

Section 12(2)(a) – Power to specify the submission date for the first Scottish Sentencing Council Business Plan

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative resolution of the Scottish Parliament

Provision

8. The power will allow the Scottish Ministers to specify the day by which the Scottish Sentencing Council must submit its first three year business plan. Thereafter, the day for submission of the plan will be the first day of each subsequent three year period.
This document relates to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

Reason for taking this power

9. We consider it appropriate to provide flexibility to the Sentencing Council in terms of the preparation and submission of its first business plan.

Choice of procedure

10. This is a procedural and administrative necessity and does not require a high level of scrutiny from the Parliament. Negative resolution procedure is considered appropriate.

Section 14 (new section 227A(8) of the 1995 Act) – Power to change the powers of Justice of the Peace courts to impose requirements on an offender

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative resolution of the Scottish Parliament

Provision

11. Section 227A makes provision for the court to impose a community payback order (CPO) on an offender, who has committed an offence, which would otherwise be punishable by imprisonment. Subsection (2) sets out the different requirements that can be included in a CPO. Subsection (3) requires the court to be satisfied that the seriousness of the offence(s) warrant imposition of a CPO. Subsection (4) provides two exceptions to the imposition of a CPO as an alternative to custody, specifically a level 1 unpaid work or other activity requirement, or a level 1 unpaid work or other activity requirement with a supervision requirement. Subsections (5) and (6) set out the restrictions on requirements a justice of the peace court may impose. Subsection (7) requires the court to ensure that the requirements, which form a CPO, are compatible. Subsections (8) and (9) provide powers for the Scottish Ministers to amend the requirements which may be imposed by the justice of the peace court by means of statutory instrument. Subsection (10) provides definitions of court, imprisonment and a level 1 unpaid work and other activity requirement.

Reason for taking this power

12. This power will enable Scottish Ministers to change the powers of Justice of the Peace courts to impose requirements on an offender. Subsections (5) and (6) restrict the powers of Justice of the Peace courts to three specific requirements, in contrast to the wider powers available to other courts as specified in subsection (2). The power would enable these to be varied, either extended or restricted, without recourse to primary legislation. An order making power is considered appropriate to add or remove the requirements which can be imposed by Justice of the Peace courts and can be brought forward in shorter timescales than primary legislation.

Choice of procedure

13. Changes could result in more onerous requirements being imposed on offenders by the Justice of the Peace courts and therefore we consider the appropriate level of parliamentary scrutiny should be by affirmative resolution.
Section 14 (new section 227B(2) of the 1995 Act) – Power to specify by Act of Adjournal the nature of information, to be provided in a report to the court by the local authority before imposition of a Community Payback Order

Power conferred on: High Court of Justiciary
Power exercisable by: Act of Adjournal
Parliamentary procedure: None

Provision

14. Section 227B sets out the general procedures which a court requires to apply before imposing a Community Payback Order (CPO). Subsection (2) provides that before making a CPO, the court requires to obtain and take account of a report from a local authority officer. This report must contain such information as is specified by Act of Adjournal. A CPO cannot be made unless such a report has been secured. Subsection (3) sets out who should receive a copy of the report. Subsection (4) provides that before making the order, the court must explain in open court, to the offender the purpose and effect of the CPO and the consequences for the offender should he/she fail to comply with its terms. Subsection (5) requires the offender to confirm that he/she understands and is willing to comply with all the requirements which form the CPO.

Reason for taking this power

15. Section 227B(2) precludes a court from imposing a Community Payback Order without first obtaining a report from the relevant local authority. Setting out the details of the information to be included in the report is essentially an administrative matter and would not normally be the subject of primary legislation. We therefore consider it appropriate that the High Court of Justiciary should be able to prescribe it if required.

Choice of procedure

16. Detailed matters relating to court procedure, such as the content of reports to assist with sentencing decisions, are not considered appropriate to be included in primary legislation. Such administrative matters can appropriately be dealt with by the High Court by Act of Adjournal rather than being subject to any parliamentary procedure (see section 305 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, which makes provision about Acts of Adjournal generally).

Section 14 (new section 227E(6) of the 1995 Act) – Power to provide that the form of the Community Payback Order is to be set out in an Act of Adjournal

Power conferred on: The High Court of Justiciary
Power exercisable by: Act of Adjournal
Parliamentary procedure: None

Provision

17. Section 227E(1) provides that a CPO is to be regarded as a sentence of the court. Subsection (2) provides that the court must give reasons in open court for imposing the CPO. Subsection (3) provides that the court in imposing a CPO is not prevented from taking other actions e.g. imposing a disqualification on the offender, making an order for forfeiture on the offence or ordering the offender to find caution for good behaviour. Subsections (4) and (5) set out the arrangements to be followed by the clerk of the court with regard to those who should receive copies of the order and how they should be given. Subsection (6) provides for the form of the order to be set out in an Act of Adjournal.

Reason for taking this power

18. Subsection 227(E)(6) provides for the form of Community Payback Orders to be set out by Act of Adjournal. The format of the report is essentially an administrative matter and would not normally be the subject of primary legislation. We therefore consider it appropriate that the High Court of Justiciary should be able to prescribe it if required.

Choice of procedure

19. Detailed matters relating to court procedure are not considered appropriate to be included in primary legislation. Such administrative matters can appropriately be dealt with by the High Court by Act of Adjournal rather than being subject to any Parliamentary procedure (see section 305 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, which makes provision about Acts of Adjournal generally).

Section 14 (new section 227I(6) of the 1995 Act) – Power to make an order varying the minimum and maximum hours of unpaid work or other activity requirement

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative resolution of the Scottish Parliament

Provision

20. Section 227I sets out the provisions the court must apply when imposing a CPO with an unpaid work or other activity requirement. Subsection (2) provides that the nature of the unpaid work or other activity requirement is not to feature as part of the order but rather to be determined by the responsible officer. Subsection (3) specifies the minimum and maximum number of hours that constitute an unpaid work or other activity requirement. Subsections (4) and (5) provide for two levels of unpaid work and other activity to be known as level 1 and level 2 and define the range of hours within these levels. Subsections (6) and (7) provide that the Scottish Ministers have the power to make an order varying the minimum and maximum hours of unpaid work or other activity that an offender can be required to perform. Subsection (8) defines ‘specified’ as relating to the unpaid work and activity requirement in the CPO.

Reason for taking this power

21. Subsection (3) sets out the minimum and maximum hours that constitute an unpaid work or other activity requirement and subsection (4) provides a definition of a level 1 such requirement. Subsection (6) provides for Scottish Ministers to vary the number of hours stated in subsections (3) and (4) without recourse to primary legislation. An order-making power is considered more appropriate to make such changes and can be brought forward in shorter timescales than primary legislation.
Choice of procedure

22. We consider negative resolution procedure is sufficient for the purpose of varying the number of hours. It is a matter of detail that is unlikely to require to be debated, but use of negative procedure still affords Parliament the opportunity to debate any variation they object to.

Section 14 (new section 227J(3) of the 1995 Act) – Power to make regulations to allow justice of the peace courts to impose a level 2 unpaid work and activity requirement

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative resolution of the Scottish Parliament

Provision

23. Section 227J sets out further provisions in relation to an unpaid work or other activity requirement. Subsection (1) restricts the court to imposing this requirement only on an offender aged 16 years or over. Subsection (2) provides that this requirement can only be imposed by the court, where the court considers the offender to be suitable to perform the unpaid work or other activity requirement. Subsections (3) and (4) provide for the Scottish Ministers to make regulations to allow justice of the peace courts to impose a level 2 unpaid work or other activity requirement.

Reason for taking this power

24. Scottish Ministers may at some future date wish to adjust the powers of justice of the peace courts in the light of the summary justice reforms in respect of an unpaid work or other activity requirement in excess of 100 hours but subject to the overall maximum of 300 hours.

Choice of procedure

25. Exercise of these powers by Scottish Ministers could result in more onerous requirements being imposed on offenders. For this reason it is felt that the affirmative resolution procedure would be more appropriate.

Section 14 (new section 227K(3) of the 1995 Act) – Power to vary the limits of the current balance of other activity within the unpaid work or other activity requirement

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative resolution of the Scottish Parliament

Provision

26. Section 227K(1) provides for the split between unpaid work and other activity to be determined by the responsible officer subject to limits set out in subsection (2) on the maximum number of hours of other activity that can count towards the requirement. Subsections (3) and (4) provide the Scottish Ministers with powers to vary the limits specified in subsection (2).
Reason for taking this power

27. Scottish Ministers may wish at some future date to vary in the light of experience with the new order the current balance within subsection (2) of up to 30%/30 hours of other activity (whichever is the lesser) within an unpaid work or other activity requirement.

Choice of procedure

28. In varying the existing balance between the unpaid work and other activities components of the requirement it is possible that the unpaid work element might decrease. It is a matter of detail that is unlikely to require to be debated but use of negative procedure still affords Parliament the opportunity to debate any variation they object to.

Section 14 (new section 227O(1) of the 1995 Act) – Power to make rules about the performance of unpaid work and other activity requirements in relation to a daily maximum number of hours, calculations of time undertaken, provision for travel expenses and record keeping

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative resolution of the Scottish Parliament

Provision

29. New section 227O(1) of the 1995 Act gives the Scottish Ministers the power to make rules about the performance of unpaid work and other activity requirements in relation to a daily maximum number of hours, calculations of time undertaken, provision for travel expenses and record keeping.

Reason for taking this power

30. These are essentially administrative matters and would not normally be the subject of primary legislation.

Choice of procedure

31. The negative resolution procedure is considered the appropriate level of parliamentary scrutiny for any regulations made under this section in light of the limited nature of the enabling power.
Section 14 (new section 227Z(2) of the 1995 Act) – Power to specify the nature of information to be provided by a responsible officer in a report to the court before variation of a Community Payback Order

Power conferred on: High Court of Justiciary
Power exercisable by: Act of Adjournal
Parliamentary procedure: None

Provision

32. Section 227Z(1) and (2) require the court when considering varying a CPO to first obtain a report from the responsible officer. Subsection (3) indicates who is to be provided with a copy of the report. Subsection (4) sets out that when varying the order the court must explain in ordinary language to the offender (a) the purpose and effect of each of the proposed varied requirements, (b) the consequences of non-compliance and (c) any variations to progress review arrangements. Subsection (5) requires confirmation from the offender that he/she understands the variations and is willing to comply with each of them.

Reason for taking this power

33. Section 227Z(2) provides that where the court is considering varying a community payback order, the court must not make the variation unless it has obtained and taken account of a report from the responsible officer containing such information relating to the offender as may be specified by Act of Adjournal.

Choice of procedure

34. Detailed matters relating to court procedure, such as the content of reports to assist with decisions on variation of orders, relate to matters which are not considered appropriate to be included in primary legislation. Such administrative matters can appropriately be dealt with by the High Court by Act of Adjournal rather than being subject to any parliamentary procedure (see section 305 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, which makes provision about Acts of Adjournal generally).

Section 14 (new section 227ZB(12) of the 1995 Act) – Power to amend the maximum duration of a restricted movement requirement

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative resolution of the Scottish Parliament

Provision

35. Section 227ZB(12) provides for Scottish Ministers to substitute a different number of months for the number of months specified in section 227ZB(9)(b). This links with section 227ZD which provides for the maximum duration of a restricted movement requirement and provides for Scottish Ministers to amend this by regulation.
This document relates to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

Reason for taking this power

36. The power is required to ensure that any changes made to section 227ZD(4)(b) are reflected in section 227ZB.

Choice of procedure

37. Affirmative resolution. See explanation for section 227ZD(3) below.

Section 14 (new section 227ZD(3) of the 1995 Act) – Power to specify the maximum number of hours and the maximum duration in months a restricted movement requirement may be imposed for

- Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
- Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
- Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative resolution of the Scottish Parliament

Provision

38. Section 227ZD(3) provides that a restricted movement requirement may not require an offender to remain at a specified place for more than 12 hours in any one day. Section 227ZD(4)(b) provides that the maximum duration of a restricted movement requirement is 12 months. Section 227ZD(6) confers powers on Scottish Ministers to amend by regulation both the maximum duration (in months) of a restricted movement requirement and the maximum number of hours in any one day a restricted movement requirement may be imposed for.

Reason for taking this power

39. The purpose of providing a power for Scottish Ministers to amend the maximum hours and/or months is to provide a level of flexibility, enabling the courts to impose remote monitoring requirements for longer durations or to restrict an offender to an address for longer periods in any one day. Equally, the maximum durations may be reduced.

Choice of procedure

40. Changes to the regulations could make the remote monitoring requirement more onerous for the offender. For this reason, we consider that in order to provide the necessary level of parliamentary scrutiny, any changes should follow the affirmative resolution procedure.

Section 14 (new section 227ZG of the 1995 Act) – Effect of application of section 245C of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (remote monitoring of offenders subject to restriction of liberty orders)

41. Although not strictly a new power, the Committee may wish to be aware of the effect of the amendments made by new section 227ZG on the existing power contained in section 245C of the 1995 Act. Section 227ZG applies section 245C of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (which makes provision about remote monitoring of offenders subject to restriction of liberty orders) so that section 245C and regulations made under section 245C also apply to offenders subject to community payback orders with restricted movement requirements.
Regulations made under section 245C specify the equipment which may be used to monitor compliance with the restricted movement requirement.

Section 14 (new section 227ZH(1) of the 1995 Act) – Power to specify the courts which may impose restricted movement requirements, the method of monitoring compliance with a restricted movement requirement and the class of offender who may be made subject to a restricted movement requirement

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative resolution of the Scottish Parliament

Provision

42. Section 227ZH(1) provides for Scottish Ministers to prescribe by regulations:

(a) the courts which may impose restricted movement requirements;

(b) the method of monitoring compliance with such requirements (in practice this is via electronic monitoring or “tagging”); and

(c) the class of offender in respect of whom a remote monitoring requirement may be imposed.

Reason for taking this power

43. The purpose of providing Scottish Ministers with this power is to:

(a) enable only certain courts or classes to impose a remote monitoring requirement, for example Sheriff Courts or High Court;

(b) specify the type of monitoring which can be used to monitor compliance (enabling other forms of remote monitoring to be used as the technology is improved and developed);

(c) specify upon which offenders a remote monitoring requirement may be imposed.

Choice of procedure

44. We consider that the negative procedure provides the necessary level of parliamentary scrutiny given the limited nature of these regulations which simply specify courts/monitoring/class of offender rather than the more substantive elements of the remote monitoring requirement itself.
Section 14 (new section 227ZJ(2) of the 1995 Act) – Power to prescribe the persons or class of persons with whom local authorities should consult about the nature of the unpaid work to be undertaken in their areas as part of an unpaid work or other activities requirement

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative resolution of the Scottish Parliament

Provision
45. Section 227ZJ(1) requires local authorities to consult prescribed persons annually about the nature of the unpaid work and other activities to be undertaken as part of a CPO within their areas. Subsection (2) defines “prescribed persons” as such persons or class or class of persons as prescribed by Scottish Ministers by regulations.

Reason for taking this power
46. This power is designed to enable Scottish Ministers to specify the groups and organisations local authorities require to consult about the nature of the unpaid work and other activities to be undertaken as part of a CPO within their areas. An order making power is considered appropriate for this purpose and would allow amendments if needed to be made without recourse to primary legislation.

Choice of procedure
47. The negative resolution procedure is considered the appropriate level of parliamentary scrutiny for any regulations made under this section in light of the limited nature of the enabling power.

Section 18(2) – Power to prescribe the length of sentence of imprisonment which determines meaning of “short-term custody and community sentence” and “custody and community sentence”

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative resolution of the Scottish Parliament

Provision
48. Section 18(2) enables the Scottish Ministers to prescribe by order the length of sentence of imprisonment which determines the meaning of “short-term custody and community sentence” and “custody and community sentence” to be referred to in section 4 of the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007 (“2007 Act”).

Reason for taking this power
49. The power to prescribe the period is necessary to provide Scottish Ministers with the flexibility required to accommodate changing trends in sentencing, types of offences and the management of offenders. By way of example, on the basis of future data it may be shown that the custody and community sentence is more effective for sentences of one year or more.
This document relates to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

Choice of procedure

50. An order made under this subsection must be laid in draft before, and approved, by a resolution of the Scottish Parliament. As the period of imprisonment in the definition of “short-term custody and community sentence” and “custody and community sentence” will result in potentially significant changes to, for example, the way a number of prisoners serve their sentences (by spending, longer or shorter periods in custody), it is considered that the affirmative procedure is appropriate.

Section 19 (section 9B(5)) – Power to amend the number of days before half-sentence during which a prisoner can be removed from prison

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative resolution of the Scottish Parliament

Provision

51. Section 19 inserts into the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007 a new schedule 6 which modifies certain provisions of Part 1 of the Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Act 1993 (the “1993 Act”) on a temporary basis pending the coming into force of the repeal of that Part. As modified, section 9B(5) of the 1993 Act allows the Scottish Ministers by order to amend the number of days specified in section 9B(1), that is the number of days before half-sentence during which the prisoner can be removed from prison.

Reason for taking this power

52. The early removal scheme needs to correlate to the existing provisions for Home Detention Curfew contained in section 3AA of the 1993 Act. The period during which a prisoner can be removed under the new scheme is equivalent to the period during which HDC is available for other prisoners. Were the period for HDC to be changed, as provided for by section 3AA(6)(c), it would be desirable to keep the period for the early removal scheme in line.

Choice of procedure

53. Affirmative resolution procedure (see modified section 9B(6)) is considered appropriate as this is the same procedure as for orders under section 3AA(6) of the 1993 Act in relation to the Home Detention Curfew.
Section 30(3) (inserted section 1A(3)(c)) – Power to prescribe documents valid for establishing the age of a purchaser

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative resolution of the Scottish Parliament

Provision

54. Section 30 inserts new section 1A into the Crossbows Act 1987 (the “1987 Act”) to establish a defence for a person charged with an offence under section 1 of the 1987 Act. One aspect of the proposed defence is that the accused is required to have taken reasonable steps to establish the purchaser’s or hirer’s age. A passport and European Union photocard driving licence are the two documents listed as being valid forms of documentation able to be relied upon to establish a purchaser’s or hirer’s age. The enabling power contained within inserted subsection 1A(3)(c) will allow the Scottish Ministers to prescribe any further documents that will be valid for the purpose of establishing the age of a customer.

Reason for taking this power

55. We consider the order-making power is required to prescribe other suitable means of establishing age that the Scottish Ministers may wish to add. This power follows the approach taken within section 102 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 relating to the sale of alcohol to those aged under 18.

Choice of procedure

56. Given the limited nature of the enabling power, negative resolution procedure is considered appropriate.

Section 31(4) (inserted subsection (4B)(c)) – Power to prescribe documents valid for establishing the age of a purchaser

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative resolution of the Scottish Parliament

Provision

57. Section 31 inserts new subsection 4 into section 141A of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 (the “1988 Act”) to establish a defence for a person charged with an offence under section 141A(1) of the 1988 Act. One aspect of the proposed defence is that the accused is required to have taken reasonable steps to establish the purchaser’s or hirer’s age. A passport and European Union photocard driving licence are the two documents listed as being valid forms of documentation able to be relied upon to establish a purchaser’s or hirer’s age. The enabling power contained within inserted subsection 4B(c) will allow the Scottish Ministers to prescribe any further documents that will be valid for the purpose of establishing the age of a customer.
This document relates to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

Reason for taking this power

58. We consider the order-making power is required to prescribe other suitable means of establishing age that the Scottish Ministers may wish to add. This power follows the approach taken within section 102 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 relating to the sale of alcohol to those aged under 18.

Choice of procedure

59. Given the limited nature of the enabling power, negative resolution procedure is considered appropriate.

Section 57(3) (inserted section 113A(4)(c)) – Power to specify classes of person who may have access to the trial judge’s observations in relation to an expedited appeal under sections 107A, 107B and 107D of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995

Power conferred on: High Court of Justiciary
Power exercisable by: Act of Adjournal
Parliamentary procedure: None

Provision

60. Section 55 of the Bill inserts new sections 107A, 107B and 107D into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (the “1995 Act”). These provisions permit the Crown to appeal against certain decisions by a judge that bring a criminal case to an end without a decision by a jury and against certain findings relating to the admissibility of prosecution evidence. Where it is considered practicable for the appeal to be heard and determined during an adjournment of the trial it will be possible for the appeal to be “expedited”, allowing the appeal to be considered by the High Court with the existing trial being continued and avoiding the need for the Crown to raise a fresh prosecution if the appeal succeeds.

61. Section 57(3) inserts new section 113A into the 1995 Act. This permits the trial judge to provide observations on the case and the grounds of appeal to the High Court. The written observations of the judge are available only to (a) the High Court; (b) the parties; and (c) any other person or classes of person prescribed by Act of Adjournal.

Reason for taking this power

62. In relation to existing criminal appeals, section 113 of the 1995 Act provides for the trial judge to provide the High Court with a report on the case generally and on the grounds of appeal. Section 113(4) provides that that report shall be available to the High Court, the parties and such other persons as may be so prescribed by Act of Adjournal. The same position is being adopted here in relation to access to the trial judge’s observations on an expedited appeal. The decision as to who should be able to access a copy of the trial judge’s observations is a detailed matter related to court procedure. The power is included to add some flexibility to these provisions. It is not considered necessary or desirable to compile a restrictive list that would require amendment by primary legislation if such a need for access arose. The delegation of this power to the High Court of the Justiciary reflects the proposals of the Scottish Law Commission in its Report on Crown Appeals (SCOT LAW COM No. 212).
Choice of procedure

63. Detailed matters related to court procedure, such as the access to a judge’s observations on an appeal case relate to the type of matters which are not considered appropriate to be included in primary legislation. We consider that such procedural matters can appropriately be dealt with by the High Court by Act of Adjournal rather than being subject to any parliamentary procedure (see section 305 of the 1995 Act which makes provision about Acts of Adjournal generally).

Section 59 (inserted section 18B(6)) – Power to prescribe list of relevant offences for purposes of new sections 18B and 18C of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative resolution of the Scottish Parliament

Provision

64. Section 59 of the Bill inserts new sections 18B and 18C into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. Section 18B provides that forensic data which is taken from a child upon their arrest or detention may be retained for an initial period of 3 years providing the child is referred to a children’s hearing on grounds of having committed a relevant offence, and this ground is accepted or found to be established by a sheriff.

65. New section 18B(6) provides that a “relevant offence” is a relevant sexual and violent offence which is prescribed in an order by the Scottish Ministers.

66. In accordance with the definition of a “relevant violent offence” and a “relevant sexual offence”, the Scottish Ministers may prescribe any offence which is listed in section 19A(6) as a “relevant offence” for the purposes of sections 18B and 18C of the 1995 Act.

Reason for taking this power

67. To enable full consultation with stakeholders on the type of sexual and violent offences which should be prescribed for the purpose of the new provisions. This will enable the list to be reviewed following an assessment of the initial operation of the policy.

68. Prescribing the list of relevant offences by using an order will also provide the flexibility to amend the list of relevant offences without having to amend primary legislation on each occasion a new offence is to be added or removed. Prescribing relevant offences in an order will also mean that all the offences will be contained in one place which will be more accessible and easier for the users of the legislation.

Choice of procedure

69. The order will be subject to affirmative procedure (section 18B(9)) as this is considered to provide the appropriate level of parliamentary scrutiny.
Section 66(1) (inserted section 271U(3)) – Power to prescribe procedure for an appeal against a witness anonymity order

Power conferred on: High Court of Justiciary
Power exercisable by: Act of Adjournal
Parliamentary procedure: None

Provision

70. Section 66 inserts new section 271U into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. The new section confers a right of appeal to the High Court against the making of a witness anonymity order by a court. An appeal can be made by the prosecution or the accused. The court of first instance has to grant leave to appeal, and parties to the proceedings can be heard as part of this consideration. Appeals can also be made about the varying or discharging of an order (and refusals to vary or discharge an order). Subsection (3) provides that the procedure in relation to appeals is to be prescribed by Act of Adjournal.

Reason for taking this power

71. We consider such matters of detail should not be included on the face of the Bill with the mechanics of the appeal process able to be prescribed by Act of Adjournal.

Choice of procedure

72. Such detailed matters regarding court procedures are not considered appropriate for inclusion in primary legislation. It is appropriate for the Court to regulate its own procedures in order to achieve the effective operation of the provisions (see section 305 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, which makes provision about Acts of Adjournal generally).

Section 70(3) (inserted section 26G(1)) – Power to amend the list of persons mentioned in section 26C(2) of the Public Finance and Accountability (Scotland) Act 2000 by adding or removing a public body and to modify the application of new Part 2A of that Act to a public body so added

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative resolution of the Scottish Parliament

Provision

73. Inserted section 26G(1) of the Public Finance and Accountability (Scotland) Act 2000 provides a power for the Scottish Ministers to add a public body to the list of persons mentioned in section 26C(2); to modify the application of Part 2A of the Act in relation to a public body so added; or to remove a person from that list. The list in section 26C(2) is of the persons whom Audit Scotland may require to disclose data to them for the purposes of a data matching exercise. It consists of those bodies and office holders whose accounts are audited by the Auditor General for Scotland (or sent to him for auditing), local authorities and other such bodies audited under Part 7 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973, Licensing Boards, and officers/members of such bodies &c. An order may include incidental, consequential, supplementary or transitional provisions as the Scottish Ministers think fit.

Reason for taking this power

74. While the list in section 26C is fairly comprehensive, and would automatically include any new public bodies whose accounts are audited by the Auditor General, the power is taken to allow for additional public bodies to be added in future e.g. if different audit arrangements are made for a particular body. The power to modify the application of Part 2A in relation to such a body, and to make incidental, consequential &c provision gives flexibility so that appropriate arrangements can be made for particular bodies.

Choice of procedure

75. By virtue of section 27(3) of the 2000 Act, orders under inserted section 26G(1) are subject to negative procedure.

Section 72(7) (inserted section 40A(4)) – Power to add to or otherwise modify the specification of “exploitation offences”

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative resolution of the Scottish Parliament

Provision

76. Inserted section 40A of the Antisocial Behaviour etc. (Scotland) Act 2004 specifies the “exploitation offences” in respect of which the new powers to make closure notices and orders apply. Subsection (4) provides a power for the Scottish Ministers by order to add to or otherwise modify the specification of offences. By virtue of section 141(2) of the 2004 Act, an order may make incidental, consequential &c. provision.

Reason for taking this power

77. While the list of offences already specified in section 40A(1) is comprehensive, the power allows the list to be kept up to date and for additional forms of exploitation offence to be added should they be identified.

Choice of procedure

78. By virtue of section 141(3) of the 2004 Act, orders under inserted section 40A(4) are subject to negative procedure.
This document relates to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

Section 79(2) (inserted section 113BA(1)) – Power to amend the meanings of “criminal conviction certificate”; “central records”; “criminal record certificate”; “relevant matter” and “enhanced criminal record certificate” in Part 5 of the Police Act 1997

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative resolution of the Scottish Parliament

Provision

79. Section 79(2) inserts a new section 113BA into the Police Act 1997 (“the 1997 Act”) giving Scottish Ministers a power to amend 5 definitions in the 1997 Act. Scottish Ministers will be able to bring orders to the Scottish Parliament to amend the meanings of “criminal conviction certificate”; “central records”; “criminal record certificate”; “relevant matter” and “enhanced criminal record certificate”.

Reason for taking this power

80. The reason for taking this power is to ensure that the Scottish Ministers have the flexibility to respond to any information sharing agreements between the UK and overseas jurisdictions that result in new information sources, outwith the UK, becoming available for use in connection with criminal record checks. This change will enable Ministers, in practice on a day-to-day basis Disclosure Scotland, to gather information from a wider range of sources when discharging Ministers’ functions under the 1997 Act. The power is being taken in secondary legislation through the draft affirmative procedure to enable Ministers to respond quickly and flexibly to new sources of information as and when they become available. Making use of the new source of information should help ensure that the disclosure system is as comprehensive and robust as possible.

Choice of procedure

81. Given the extent of the possible changes to the certificates provided by the order-making power we have provided that the order may only be made by draft affirmative procedure. This will afford the appropriate level of parliamentary scrutiny while still affording Ministers the speed and flexibility to respond to emerging information sharing agreements.

Section 79(3) (inserted subsection (2A)) – Power to make further provision about registration under section 120 of the Police Act 1997 by virtue of regulations made under section 120ZB

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative resolution of the Scottish Parliament

Provision

82. Section 79(3) inserts two subsections into section 120ZB of the Police Act 1997. Section 120ZB is inserted into the Police Act 1997 by section 81(2) of the Protection of Vulnerable Groups (Scotland) Act 2007 but the provision has not yet been commenced. The new subsection 120ZB(2A) clarifies the regulation-making power at section 120ZB(2)(a).
This document relates to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

Reason for taking this power

83. This amendment to the existing regulation-making power is to clarify the existing power of the Scottish Ministers to make regulations relating to fees for registration as a registered person. This amendment will ensure greater flexibility on charges regarding the register held under section 120 of the 1997 Act. The new subsection 120ZB(2A) will allow different fees to be set for applications for inclusion in the register and also for the possibility of these fees being charged annually. This approach should encourage users to manage their entries in the register more effectively.

Choice of procedure

84. Negative resolution was considered the appropriate procedure for the regulation-making power conferred by the Protection of Vulnerable Groups (Scotland) Act 2007 as the regulations relate to the detailed administrative and procedural operation of the registration system. This amendment relates to the detailed tailoring of fees in connection with registration. Given the limited nature of the amendment we consider that the negative resolution procedure continues to provide the appropriate level of parliamentary scrutiny.

Section 81 – Power to enable the Scottish Legal Aid Board to employ solicitors for the purpose of providing criminal legal assistance

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative resolution of the Scottish Parliament

Provision

85. This section does not insert a new regulation-making power. However it does amend the regulation-making power in section 28A of the Legal Aid (Scotland) Act 1986 to make the scheme set up by regulations (the Public Defence Solicitors Office) permanent rather than for a test basis only. It is not anticipated that a new set of regulations will be made in the near future.

Reason for taking this power

86. No new power is taken in this section as it amends an existing regulation-making power. The purpose of this amendment is to convert the current scheme from one run on a test basis to one of permanency.

Choice of procedure

87. As this amends an existing power it is not considered appropriate to change the procedure.
Section 82(1) (inserted section 133(1A)) – Power to specify further circumstances in respect of which compensation may be paid for a miscarriage of justice or for wrongful detention prior to the acquittal or a decision to take no proceedings or discontinue proceedings

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative resolution of the Scottish Parliament

Provision

88. Inserted subsection (1A) of section 133 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 provides that the Scottish Ministers may by order specify further circumstances in respect of which compensation may be paid for a miscarriage of justice or for wrongful detention prior to acquittal or a decision to take no proceedings or discontinue proceedings.

Reason for taking this power

89. This power will allow the existing ex gratia scheme for compensation to be combined with the statutory scheme (contained in section 133 of the 1988 Act). The ex gratia scheme operates under the prerogative and has not been subject to statutory or parliamentary control. The intention is to put that ex gratia scheme on a statutory footing. The order-making power allows that ex gratia scheme, which was set out in a parliamentary written answer, to be expressed in appropriate statutory terms. It would also permit the expansion of the scheme in future, if that were desired.

Choice of procedure

90. By virtue of inserted subsections (8) and (9) of section 133 (inserted by section 82(1)(g) of the Bill), orders under subsection (1A) are subject to negative procedure. This level of parliamentary oversight is considered appropriate given that it replaces the current ex gratia scheme for which there is no such oversight.

Section 86(9)(b) – Power to specify bodies which constitute an “investigating agency” for the purpose of creating and submitting schedules in terms of section 86

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative resolution of the Scottish Parliament

Provision

91. Section 86 creates a duty on an investigating officer, whether a police officer or officer of an investigating agency, to create and submit schedules listing information gathered during the course of an investigation which may be relevant to cases which are brought by solemn proceedings only. Section 86(9)(b) enables Scottish Ministers to prescribe by regulations which specific bodies will constitute an “investigating agency” for the purposes of section 86.
This document relates to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

Reason for taking this power

92. It is considered more appropriate that this be set out in detail in an order rather than on the face of the Bill. In addition to existing bodies which submit reports to procurators fiscal, over time, new bodies may be added, or others removed where they no longer carry out that function. Listing such bodies by virtue of an order-making power provides the flexibility to respond to such changes without the need for primary legislation. Although changes should be relatively infrequent, we consider that it would not be an effective use of parliamentary time to require that primary legislation be brought forward to amend the definition of these bodies on each occasion that changes are required.

Choice of procedure

93. We consider that the negative resolution procedure provides the appropriate level of parliamentary scrutiny given the limited nature of the enabling power. It provides only a power to specify which bodies are “investigating agencies” for the purposes of the Bill. It does not confer powers on any bodies nor substantively extend or restrict the range of persons to whom the duties set out in the Bill apply. Such matters are dealt with in the Bill itself. The specification of bodies to be regarded as “investigating agencies” is, therefore, generally administrative in character.

Section 114(3)(c) – Power to specify persons who engage to any extent in the investigation of crime or sudden deaths and submit reports to the procurator fiscal for the purpose of the code of practice in carrying out those functions, as provided for in section 114

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative resolution of the Scottish Parliament

Provision

94. Section 114 requires the Lord Advocate to issue a code of practice and specifies the persons who must have regard to the code, namely police, prosecutors and any other persons who engage to any extent in the investigation of crime or sudden deaths and who submit reports relating to those investigations to the procurator fiscal and who are prescribed by regulations made by the Scottish Ministers (section 114(3)(c)).

Reason for taking this power

95. It is considered more appropriate that this be set out in detail in regulations rather than on the face of the Bill. In addition to existing bodies which submit reports to procurators fiscal, over time, new persons or bodies may be added, or others removed where they no longer carry out that function. Listing such persons or bodies by virtue of an order-making power provides the flexibility to respond to such changes without the need for primary legislation. Although changes should be relatively infrequent, we consider that it would not be an effective use of parliamentary time to require that primary legislation be brought forward to amend the definition of these persons or bodies on each occasion that changes are required.
Choice of procedure

96. We consider that the negative resolution procedure provides the appropriate level of parliamentary scrutiny given the limited nature of the enabling power. It provides only a power to specify persons who investigate crime or sudden deaths and submit reports to the procurator fiscal for the purposes of the Bill. It does not confer powers on any bodies, or persons, nor substantively extend or restrict the range of persons to whom the duties set out in the Bill apply. Such matters are dealt with in the Bill itself. The specification of such other persons is, therefore, considered to be generally administrative in nature.

Section 115 – Power to make rules of court in relation to Part 6

Power conferred on: High Court of Justiciary
Power exercisable by: Act of Adjournal
Parliamentary procedure: None

Provision

97. Part 6 of the Bill sets out a statutory regime for disclosure in criminal proceedings. Section 115 enables the High Court to make rules of court by Act of Adjournal in relation to Part 6 of the Bill.

Reason for taking this power

98. Rules of court will be required in relation to how certain provisions are given effect to and to provide forms for applications and other court documents required under Part 6.

Choice of procedure

99. Detailed matters relating to court procedure, such as the content of court forms and administrative directions to the court are the type of matters which are not considered appropriate to be included in primary legislation. Such administrative matters can appropriately be dealt with by the High Court by Act of Adjournal rather than being subject to any parliamentary procedure. This provision mirrors similar provision in section 305 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 in relation to criminal procedure generally.

Section 121(3) (inserted section 3A(1)) – Power to set mandatory conditions for licences granted under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative resolution of the Scottish Parliament

Provision

100. This provision enables the Scottish Ministers to set mandatory conditions for licences granted under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982.
This document relates to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

Reason for taking this power

101. This power recognises that in some circumstances mandatory conditions in respect of particular activities would be better applied consistently across Scotland rather than left to local discretion.

Choice of procedure

102. An order-making power will allow conditions to be applied and updated in accordance with any changes to the types of activity licensed. The choice of affirmative procedure is consistent with the power in the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 to amend the lists of mandatory conditions for premises licences and occasional licences, and with the power in section 44 of the 1982 Act to provide for the licensing of additional activities.

Section 126(2)(e) (inserted section 41(2)(h)) – Power to prescribe premises for which a public entertainment licence is not required

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative resolution of the Scottish Parliament

Provision

103. Section 126 amends the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 so that the exemption that free-to-enter events enjoy in respect of not requiring a public entertainment licence is removed. Subsection (2)(e) inserts a new paragraph (h) into section 41(2) of that Act conferring power on the Scottish Ministers to add by order premises for which a public entertainment licence is not required.

Reason for taking this power

104. Taking an order-making power will allow the list of premises for which a public entertainment licence is not required to be updated to reflect any changes in the public entertainment market.

Choice of procedure

105. Given the limited nature of the enabling power, negative resolution procedure is considered appropriate.
Section 129(4) (inserted section 27A(1)) – Power to prescribe those areas in respect of which licensing boards may vary all or a particular group of premises licences’ conditions of operation

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative resolution of the Scottish Parliament

Provision

106. Section 129(4) inserts a new section 27A into the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005. Subsection (1) confers on the Scottish Ministers the power to prescribe by regulations the matters in respect of which Licensing Boards may vary all or a particular group of premises licences’ conditions of operation.

Reason for taking this power

107. Under new section 27A(1), Licensing Boards will be able to vary the conditions of all or a group of premises licence in their area. These conditions dictate how premises will operate. A Licensing Board can impose licence conditions when granting the premises licence or following a hearing concerning the conduct of individual premises. New section 27A(1) enables Licensing Boards to impose a condition en bloc which is a significant increase in Licensing Boards’ power. This provision enables Scottish Ministers to set out the subject matter of the variations that a Licensing Board may apply, ensuring a consistency within the national framework within which Licensing Boards operate. At present Ministers intend to make regulations enabling Licensing Boards to vary conditions relating to the restriction on the purchase of alcohol at off-sale premises for people aged under 21.

Choice of procedure

108. In those areas designated by Scottish Ministers, Licensing Boards will be able to impose conditions en bloc on licensed premises. This is a significant change in their powers from only being able to apply conditions on a premises by premises basis. It is therefore considered that the affirmative resolution procedure is appropriate.

Section 140(1) – Power to make provision for the imposition on relevant licence-holders of a social responsibility levy

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative resolution of the Scottish Parliament

Provision

109. Section 140(1) confers power on the Scottish Ministers to make regulations imposing and setting out the detail of a social responsibility levy.
Reason for taking this power

110. Taking a regulation-making power will allow the Scottish Government to discuss further with the licensed trade and other interests the detail of how the levy should be imposed, applied and collected. It will further allow flexibility for the detail of the levy to be revised in the future to keep pace with the changing nature of the licensed trade.

Choice of procedure

111. Given the scope of the power taken, affirmative resolution procedure is considered appropriate.

Section 146(1) – Power to make supplementary, incidental or consequential provision for the purposes of, in consequence of or for giving full effect to any provision of the Bill

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Generally negative resolution but affirmative resolution if modifying the text of an Act

Provision

112. Section 146(1) of the Bill confers on Scottish Ministers a power to make by order such supplementary, incidental or consequential provision as they consider appropriate for the purposes of, in consequence of or for giving full effect to any provision of the Bill. Section 146(2) provides that the power extends to the modification of any enactment (including the Bill).

Reason for taking this power

113. Any body of new law may give rise to the need for a range of ancillary provisions. For example, whilst a number of consequential modifications have been identified prior to the introduction of the Bill, it may be that not all of the consequences have been identified and as such further changes may be required. We consider the order-making power to be necessary to allow for this flexibility.

114. We consider that the power to make such provision should extend to the modification of enactments. Without the power to make supplementary, incidental and consequential provision, it may be necessary to return to Parliament, through subsequent primary legislation, to deal with a matter which is clearly within the scope and policy intentions of the original Bill. That would not be an effective use of resources by Parliament or the Scottish Government.

115. The power, whilst potentially wide is limited to the extent that it can only be used if the Scottish Ministers consider it appropriate to do so for the purposes of, in consequence of or for giving full effect to any provision of the Bill.

Choice of procedure

116. Section 143(4)(b) provides that any order made under this section will be subject to affirmative resolution procedure if it modifies any part of the text of an Act. Otherwise, it will be subject to negative resolution procedure. We consider that this provides the appropriate level of parliamentary scrutiny for the powers conferred.
This document relates to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 24) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009

Section 147(1) – Power to make transitory, transitional and saving provision necessary or expedient in connection with the coming into force of any provisions in the Bill

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Generally negative resolution but affirmative resolution if modifying the text of an Act

Provision

117. Section 147(1) of the Bill confers on Scottish Ministers a power to make by order such transitory, transitional and saving provision as they consider necessary or expedient in connection with the coming into force of any provisions in the Bill. Section 147(2) provides that the power extends to the modification of any enactment (including the Bill).

Reason for taking this power

118. We consider the order-making power to be necessary to allow for flexibility as provisions within the Bill are brought into force. Without the power, it may be necessary to return to Parliament, through subsequent primary legislation, to deal with a matter which could be dealt with through this power. That would not be an effective use of resources by Parliament or the Scottish Government.

119. The power, whilst potentially wide is limited to the extent that it can only be used if the Scottish Ministers consider it necessary or expedient to do so in connection with the coming into force of any provisions of the Bill.

Choice of procedure

120. Section 143(4)(b) provides that any order made under this section will be subject to affirmative resolution procedure if it modifies any part of the text of an Act. Otherwise, it will be subject to negative resolution procedure. We consider that this provides the appropriate level of parliamentary scrutiny for the powers conferred.

Section 148(1) – Power to commence provisions of the Bill

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: None

Provision

121. Section 148(1) of the Bill provides that with the exception of sections 143-148, the Scottish Ministers may by order bring the provisions of the Bill into force. The provisions in the Bill can be commenced at different times. Section 143(3) has the effect that any such commencement orders will not be subject to parliamentary procedure.
Paragraph 2(3) of schedule 1 – Power to specify the procedures for the nomination and appointment of members of the Scottish Sentencing Council

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative resolution of the Scottish Parliament

Provision

122. Paragraph 2 of schedule 1 sets out the procedure for appointment of members of the Scottish Sentencing Council. Paragraph 2(3) enables the Scottish Ministers to set out in regulations the procedures for the nomination and appointment of members.

Reason for taking this power

123. It is considered more appropriate that the details of the nominations and appointment procedures be set out in regulations rather than on the face of the Bill.

Choice of procedure

124. Given the limited enabling power, negative resolution procedure is considered appropriate.

Paragraph 10(3) and (4) of schedule 2 – Power to prescribe the length of periods of detention for those under 21 years of age for the purpose of determining if they are serving “short-term custody and community sentences” or “custody and community sentences”

Power conferred on: The Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by statutory instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative resolution of the Scottish Parliament

Provision

125. Paragraph 10(3) and (4) of schedule 2 enables the Scottish Ministers to prescribe by order the length of periods of detention for those under 21 years of age which will determine when Part 2 of the 2007 Act applies to such a person as a “short-term custody and community sentence” and when Part 2 applies to such a person as a “custody and community sentence”.

Reason for taking this power

126. A person under 21 years of age cannot be sentenced to imprisonment, but will instead be sentenced to a period of detention. The provisions in Part 2 operate by reference to the term of imprisonment that a person is sentenced to and so do not apply to people under 21. Section 55 of the 2007 Act sets out how Part 2 is to apply to people under 21. The reason for taking the power is to allow the Scottish Ministers to take account of changes in the length of period of imprisonment that determines when a sentence of imprisonment is a custody and community sentence and when it is a short-term custody and community sentence (as provided for in the definitions of those terms in section 4 of the 2007 Act).
Choice of procedure

127. An order made under this provision must be laid in draft before, and approved, by a resolution of the Scottish Parliament. As the period of detention in the definition specified in the regulations will result in potentially significant changes to, for example, when a person aged under 21 is released from detention, it is considered that the affirmative procedure is appropriate.

INTRODUCTION

1. The Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill was introduced in the Parliament on 5 March 2009 by Kenny MacAskill, Cabinet Secretary for Justice. The Parliament designated the Justice Committee as the lead committee to consider and report on the general principles of the Bill.

2. The Subordinate Legislation Committee (SLC) considered the delegated powers proposed in the Bill and reported to the Parliament on 4 June 2009. The SLC report refers to 14 provisions in relation to which it raised concerns with the Scottish Government. The outcome was that it accepted in eight of those instances the Scottish Government’s response – which, in five cases, included a commitment to bring forward amendments at Stage 2 to address the Committee’s concerns. In relation to two of the provisions identified by the SLC, the Scottish Government is committed to lodging Stage 2 amendments to remove entirely the sections in which they arise (sections 129 and 140). The remaining four provisions are drawn to the attention of the Justice Committee and the Parliament as raising more substantial issues, or issues that the Subordinate Legislation Committee does not consider to have been satisfactorily resolved. These outstanding issues are considered in this report in the context of those sections to which they relate. The report of the Subordinate Legislation Committee is contained in Annexe A to this report.

3. The Finance Committee considered the Bill’s Financial Memorandum and reported to the Justice Committee on 21 May 2009. The Committee afforded this Bill “level three” scrutiny, that is, it considered written and oral evidence from affected organisations\(^3\) and from the Scottish Government before finalising its report.\(^4\) The Finance Committee’s recommendations and observations are considered in this report in the context of those sections to which they relate. The report of the Finance Committee is contained in Annexe B.

4. Standing Orders require the lead committee to consider and report on the Bill’s Financial Memorandum, taking into account any views submitted to it by the Finance Committee, and to consider and report on the Policy Memorandum. The Committee has no general comments to make on these documents at this stage, although there are some specific points (for example, on the figures relating to anticipated take-up of community payback orders) that are addressed at relevant points later in this report.

BACKGROUND AND CONSULTATION

5. In his statement to the Parliament on 3 September 2008 on the Scottish Government’s programme, the First Minister announced the Scottish Government’s intention to introduce the Bill as follows—

“The criminal justice and licensing bill will ensure that prison remains the correct disposal for serious and violent offenders and will ensure that they are dealt with firmly and effectively in prison. Building on the recommendations of the Scottish Prisons Commission, it will reform the community punishments that are available to the courts and reform criminal law and criminal court procedures. Consolidated by the creation of a sentencing council, the bill will ensure that there is public confidence in sentencing decisions.

“As members know, we are consulting on a wide range of measures to challenge Scotland’s relationship with alcohol. The consultation, which ends later this month, outlines proposals in several key areas: to prohibit off-sales to under-21s; to set a minimum price for alcoholic drink; and to introduce a social responsibility fee. We will reflect on the results of the consultation and use the bill to effect those proposals which require primary legislation.”\(^5\)

6. Following this announcement, the Government published Revitalising Justice – Proposals to Modernise and Improve the Criminal Justice System\(^6\) which summarised the proposals to be included in the Bill as “measures to improve criminal law; take forward sensible sentencing reforms; modernise criminal procedures; develop licensing laws; and assist victims and witnesses.” A total of 66 measures were listed, of which ten were described as “major reforms”. For each one, the document outlined the main proposal and indicated where consultation was already underway or about to commence.

7. By the time the Bill itself was finalised, further measures had been added, beyond those outlined in Revitalising Justice. The Bill, as introduced, consists of 148 sections and five schedules, grouped into 11 parts, the main ones covering sentencing, criminal law, criminal procedure, evidence, criminal justice, disclosure, mental disorder and unfitness for trial, licensing under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 and alcohol licensing.

8. In all, the Bill implements more than eighty distinct policy proposals. Some of these – most notably the establishment of a Scottish Sentencing Council and the creation of a statutory presumption against short-term prison sentences – are Scottish National Party manifesto commitments. Others originate from the work of independent bodies or take forward reforms initiated by the previous administration. The opportunity has also been taken to make a number of technical changes such as repealing spent enactments or correcting errors in existing statutes.

9. The principal non-governmental sources for the proposals implemented in the Bill are:

- Professor James Fraser’s review of police powers in relation to forensic data taken from adults prosecuted for sexual or violent offences but not convicted, and from children who have committed similar offences;
- Lord Coulsfield’s review of the law and practice of disclosure in criminal proceedings;
- the report of the Scottish Prisons Commission, chaired by Henry McLeish;
- various reports by the Sentencing Commission for Scotland;
- reports by the Scottish Law Commission, including on a Crown right of appeal in criminal cases, on the age of criminal responsibility and on insanity and diminished responsibility;
- a joint Scottish Executive and Home Office consultation on the possession of extreme pornographic material.

EVIDENCE RECEIVED BY THE COMMITTEE

10. With such a wide-ranging Bill it has been impossible, in the time available to the Committee, to take evidence and consider in detail each and every proposal. It has also become clear from the written and oral evidence that there is a much more limited number of proposals that raise particularly complex issues or have generated significant controversy, and to which the Committee has therefore devoted most attention.
11. The Committee issued its call for written evidence on the Bill in March 2009 and has since received more than 90 submissions.\(^7\)

12. The Committee took oral evidence over eight meetings in May, June and August. The principal individuals and organisations who attended were—

- the Lord President of the Court of Session and Lord Justice General (Lord Hamilton) and the Lord Justice Clerk (Lord Gill)
- the Sheriffs’ Association
- the Scottish Justices Association
- the Royal Society of Edinburgh
- Henry McLeish (chair of the Scottish Prisons Commission)
- representatives of three Community Justice Authorities (Fife and Forth Valley, North Strathclyde, Lanarkshire)
- the Association of Directors of Social Work
- Howard League for Penal Reform
- the Scottish Consortium on Crime and Criminal Justice
- the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland
- the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency
- Victim Support Scotland
- the office of Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People
- Children 1st
- Children in Scotland
- the Law Society of Scotland
- the Faculty of Advocates
- Professor Jim Fraser (Centre for Forensic Science, University of Strathclyde)
- Scottish Police Services Authority
- Lord Coulsfield (author of the independent review of the law and practice of disclosure in criminal proceedings in Scotland)

13. As always, the tight timescale for the Committee’s Stage 1 scrutiny resulted in a relatively short deadline, particularly given the breadth of this Bill, for those interested to give their views. The Committee is very grateful to those who were able to contribute to the process.

14. The Committee would also like to thank the staff at Alloa Town Hall and the members of the public who attended the Committee’s meeting there on 19 May 2009, as well as the witnesses who gave evidence on that occasion. This meeting enabled the Committee, amongst other things, to gain a local perspective on some of the changes proposed in the Bill. The Committee is also grateful for the assistance provided by its two advisers, Professor Peter Duff of Aberdeen University (on the criminal procedure aspects of the Bill) and Robert Millar, principal solicitor at City of Edinburgh Council (on the licensing provisions).

PART 1 – SENTENCING

15. Part 1 of the Bill covers issues relating to sentencing including the purposes and principles of sentencing, the creation of a Scottish Sentencing Council, community payback orders, and a presumption against short periods of imprisonment.

Sections 1 and 2: Purposes and principles of sentencing

Background

16. The Sentencing Commission for Scotland (the Commission) recommended that, as a useful step to promoting consistency in sentencing, the purposes of sentencing should be enshrined in statute. In its report, the Commission stated that the purposes of sentencing “commonly accepted by most jurisdictions are punishment or retribution, protection of the public or incapacitation, deterrence and rehabilitation or reform. To these are sometimes added denunciation, reparation, crime reduction and economy of resources”.9

17. Section 1 sets out the purposes of sentencing as: the punishment of offenders, the reduction of crime (including its reduction by deterrence), the reform and rehabilitation of offenders, the protection of the public, and the making of reparation by offenders to persons affected by their offences.

18. Section 1(3) lists other matters to which a court must have regard in sentencing an offender, namely the seriousness of the offence, any information before the court about the effect of the offence on any person (other than the offender), the range of sentences available to the court in dealing with the offence, the desirability of ensuring consistency in sentencing in respect of the same type of offence, and any other information before the court about the circumstances and attitude of the offender.

19. By setting down the purposes of sentencing, Scottish Ministers intend—

“that the public has a much clearer understanding of what sentencing is actually for and is clear on the key factors that every sentencer must have regard to when making decisions in individual cases.”10

Evidence received

20. Victim Support Scotland agreed with the Bill’s proposals in this regard and said—

“We believe that the introduction of a statutory definition of the aim of sentencing will help create more consistency in sentences ... More consistency will subsequently make the criminal justice process more transparent, enabling parties to foresee and understand why a particular verdict is given.”11

21. The Law Society of Scotland was broadly supportive of the purposes and principles as set out in the Bill, but suggested that—

11 Victim Support Scotland. Written submission to the Justice Committee.
“the purpose as outlined at section 1(1)(b) should be the deterrence of crime as opposed to the reduction of crime (including its reduction by deterrence). The Society also believes that one of the main principles of sentencing is to serve the interests of justice and that should be reflected in the Bill.”

22. Both the Faculty of Advocates and the Judges of the High Court of Justiciary flagged up a concern about section 2(2), according to which a court need not comply with the purposes and principles of sentencing where they are inconsistent with sentencing guidelines. As Lord Hamilton put it—

“If the principles are to be recognised as being applicable in the criminal justice system, they should also be applicable to the sentencing council. It should not be free to deal with the matter without regard to those principles.”

23. The High Court judges, the Sheriffs’ Association and the Scottish Centre for Criminal Justice Research all questioned why (under subsection (5)(a) of section 1), the purpose and principles of sentencing (subsections (2) and (3)) do not apply to offenders under the age of 18. The judges recognised that it would be necessary to take account of a child’s age, but suggested that “the considerations referred to in subsections (2) and (3) appear to be equally apt for the sentencing of any person who has attained the age of criminal responsibility”.

24. The Sheriffs’ Association accepted that the principles set out in section 1(3) are not intended to be exclusive or exhaustive, but suggested denunciation (the expression of “society’s abhorrence of a particular crime”) as an additional purpose of sentencing and the nature or character of the offence (in addition to its seriousness) and local circumstances as additional matters to be taken into account. It also questioned section 1(3)(d), which provides that a court must have regard to “the desirability of ensuring consistency in sentencing in respect of the same type of offence”—

“Consistency in sentencing is not stated in the Bill as a purpose of sentencing. This provision assumes a purpose that is not stated. Under the proposal, if the court considers that consistency is not desirable, it may be ignored. How is a court to ascertain what the consistent sentence is if there is no guideline published? ... This provision should be removed as containing no principle that can be applied in practice.”

25. Overall, the Association’s view was summarised by Sheriff Nigel Morrison QC—

“The purpose of setting out the principles in the Bill was not simply to set them out. As the policy memorandum indicates, the purpose was to achieve consistency, transparency and confidence. However, we do not think that that purpose has been achieved.”

26. In its written submission, the Royal Society of Scotland (RSE) said that the purposes of sentencing are already well known and there is no need for them to be embodied in statute. In the RSE’s view, the extent to which any of the purposes listed in the Bill would apply depends on the nature and circumstances of the case and hence on the judgement of the sentencer, and that listing the purposes in statute “serves no practical purpose”.

27. In later oral evidence, Lord Cullen for the RSE was asked whether there was anything that should be added to the list, were it to remain in the Bill. He replied—

“The trouble is that that would be like adding one unnecessary thing to a lot of other unnecessary things. However, I can think of a few additions. For example, we mention in our submission the absence of any reference to the significance of a guilty plea, which is a potent factor.”

28. Professor Neil Hutton (Centre for Sentencing Research, University of Strathclyde) drew attention to the English sentencing guidelines which included “overarching principles of seriousness” and advocated a similar approach for Scotland, consistent with the recommendations of the Scottish Prisons Commission. This would involve the level of penalty being set by reference to the seriousness of the offence, both in terms of the culpability of the offender and the harm caused to the victim, while the precise amount and form of penalty would be decided by the judge according to the facts and circumstances of the offence and the offender. In this way, fairness would take priority over other purposes of sentencing—

“Arguably, fairness is one thing that a systematic approach to sentencing can deliver and fairness is valued by the public. It is not so easy to make this claim about other purposes.”

29. The Scottish Consortium on Crime and Criminal Justice (SCCCJ) welcomed a statutory statement of the purposes of sentencing, but believed it could go further. In particular, it could include reference to the larger purpose of making society more just and safer for its citizens, thus providing some basis for choosing between the stated purposes and principles when they conflict—

“The difficulty with the way in which the bill is drafted is that it simply lists a range of purposes that sentences might serve. The list is familiar, covering exactly what is found in similar legislation or in the relevant textbooks in various jurisdictions. It provides no coherent rationale that a sentencer might employ when thinking about which principles should apply or have priority in

30. Professor Fergus McNeill of the SCCCJ rejected the idea that reducing reoffending could be regarded as an overarching principle—

“It is a laudable objective for the system to pursue, but if adhering to the principle allowed disproportionate sentences – perhaps even incapacitating sentences of a duration that was not merited by the gravity of the crime – to be applied, that would be contrary to the interests of justice. ... A better approach than putting the reduction of reoffending first is to try to approximate to fairness and justice in the first instance, before thinking about the specific outcomes that we might pursue through a properly proportionate penalty.”21

31. The SCCCJ also suggested that the first purpose listed in section 1(1), “the punishment of offenders”, could be omitted on the grounds that punishment would serve no purpose if it did not secure any of the other purposes listed. Instead, it advocated a principle of “parsimony”, namely “that any sentence should be the least oppressive and intrusive consistent with the other aims of sentencing”.22

32. This approach was strongly supported by the Scottish Centre for Crime and Justice Research, which also wanted the Bill to—

“make it explicit that each of the stated purposes of sentencing should serve a larger purpose, i.e. the production of a more just and safer society for all of its citizens.”23

33. The Cabinet Secretary was not convinced that any overarching purpose was needed—

“We think that sections 1 and 2 are clear and easy to understand. They set out the purposes and principles of sentencing, and we think it essential to do that. Sentencing does not have just a single purpose – that of punishment – and the lack of hierarchy in section 1 is quite deliberate. In trying to get the balance right, fairness is important, and setting out purposes and principles will contribute to achieving that.”24

Committee conclusions
34. The Committee believes that the purposes or principles of sentencing, as established by common law, are already well understood by the courts. The common law has the advantage that it can more easily evolve and develop in response to changes in social attitudes; fixing this common-law understanding in statute carries a risk of unintended consequences, and may also lose some of the nuances of case-law jurisprudence. What is more, it is generally understood to be a principle of legislative drafting to make provision only where it is necessary to do so – and, indeed, this has often been articulated by Ministers (both of the current and previous administrations) as a reason to resist backbench amendments.

35. Considering section 1 in isolation, therefore, we are not convinced that a sufficiently good case has been made for its inclusion. However, we recognise the Scottish Government’s view that an opening section setting out in broad terms what sentencing is for may be a useful preliminary to the creation of a Scottish Sentencing Council. Accordingly, we invite the Scottish Government both to justify the necessity for setting out the purposes and principles of sentencing in the Bill and to provide assurance that the provisions in sections 1 and 2 do not inadvertently change the law. Without adequate justification and assurance, we are liable to conclude that retaining these sections in the Bill may be problematic.

36. We acknowledge that all the purposes listed in subsection (1), and the “other matters” to which the courts must have regard listed in subsections (3) and (4), have a part to play in sentencing decisions. We believe it is important that, if these are to be listed in statute, they are regarded as non-exhaustive and unranked lists, with the order not implying any general priority of earlier items over later ones. We also note that, while the section title refers both to “purposes” and “principles”, only purposes are actually listed. In our view, principles of fairness, justice and proportionality are at least as important as the purposes already included, and we therefore invite the Scottish Government to consider including these principles within the section (or removing reference to “principles” from the section title).

37. The Committee is also uncertain as to why subsections (2) and (3) of section 1 are disapplied in relation to persons under the age of 18. Our presumption would be that the matters listed in subsection (3) are still relevant in that context, albeit in a context where the offender’s age is also a significant factor. We are also unclear what status subsection (1) is meant to have in relation to a young offender – it is not disapplied, but the court is under no obligation to have regard to it in sentencing that offender. We would invite the Scottish Government either to provide a better justification for its drafting approach here, or to bring forward amendments to clarify the application of section 1 to under-18 offenders.

38. The Committee has also found difficulty with the relationship between the purposes of sentencing in section 1 and the sentencing guidelines to be issued by the Scottish Sentencing Council (SSC). Specifically, the SSC does not appear to be required to reflect the purposes in preparing guidelines, but the courts are obliged to give precedence to the guidelines should they and the purposes of sentencing come into conflict (section 2(2)). We do not see the logic of creating a statutory Sentencing Council and, at the same time, setting out the purposes of sentencing in statutory form if that Council is not itself made subject to those purposes in carrying out its work. That way, there should be no question of the council issuing guidelines that are inconsistent with the purposes of sentencing. We recognise that the Scottish Sentencing Council is likely, in practice, to follow the purposes in any event, and there may also be reasons for not having this as a statutory obligation on the Council. Nevertheless, we believe the Scottish Government needs to do more to explain its thinking on these matters, so that the Committee can either satisfy itself that the relationship is an appropriate one, or consider how it might be amended at Stage 2.

Sections 3-13 and schedule 1: The Scottish Sentencing Council

Background

39. At present, sentencing mainly operates on a case-by-case basis in the criminal courts, supplemented by the power of the Appeal Court to issue guideline judgements under the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, a power that has so far been little used.

40. The Sentencing Commission for Scotland, set up by the previous administration in 2003, was tasked with considering what scope there was for improving consistency in sentencing, and reported on this topic in 2006. The report recommended that the Appeal Court should consider making greater use of its power to issue guideline judgements and that a sentencing advisory body, to be known as the Advisory Panel on Sentencing in Scotland (APSS), should be set up. With members from each level of the judiciary, the law enforcement agencies, the prosecuting authorities, the legal profession, offender management services and organisations working with victims and the wider community. The APSS would be responsible for drafting guidelines for consideration by the Appeal Court on general topics related to sentencing, on new sentencing disposals introduced by legislation and on particular categories of crimes and offences. The Appeal Court would then approve the draft guidelines, refer them back to the APSS for further consideration, or decline to approve them.

41. The Scottish Prisons Commission, in its report Scotland’s Choice, published in July 2008, supported the establishment of a body to develop clear sentencing guidelines applicable nationwide to aid consistency and improve the effectiveness of sentencing.

42. The Scottish Government agreed that there was a need for a statutory body to produce sentencing guidelines and in September 2008 its proposals for a Scottish Sentencing Council were published for consultation. Over 40 responses were received and, although the majority were in favour of the proposals, some concerns were raised about the proposed relationship between the Sentencing Council and the Appeal Court. In particular, the High Court Judges said that the proposed relationship between the Sentencing Council and the Appeal Court was unsatisfactory, unworkable and unacceptable. In the Judges’ view the proposals would have significant impact on the independence of the judiciary and would fundamentally alter the position of the Appeal Court in its role of controlling the development and application of sentencing policy.

The proposals

43. Section 3 of the Bill establishes a Scottish Sentencing Council (the Council). Its functions, under section 4, are to prepare and publish sentencing guidelines and, in doing so, promote consistency in sentencing practice, assist the development of policy in relation to sentencing, and promote greater awareness and understanding of sentencing policy and practice.

44. Section 5 provides that sentencing guidelines may relate to the principles and purposes of sentencing, sentencing levels, the particular types of sentence that are appropriate for particular types of offence or offender and the circumstances in which the guidelines may be departed from. Guidelines must include an assessment of the relevant costs and benefits and an assessment of the likely effect on the number of persons detained in prisons or other institutions, the number of persons serving sentences in the community, and the criminal justice system generally.

45. The Scottish Government’s overall policy objective in creating the Council is—

“to help ensure greater consistency, fairness and transparency in sentencing and thereby increase public confidence in the integrity of the Scottish criminal justice system.”

46. Before publishing any sentencing guidelines, the Council is required to publish a draft and consult the Scottish Ministers, the Lord Advocate and such other persons as the Council considers appropriate. When finalising a guideline, the Council must have regard to any comments made on the draft.

47. Courts must have regard to any final guideline which is applicable to a case before them. If the court decides not to apply any relevant guideline, it must state its reasons for not doing so.

48. The Council will comprise twelve members: the Lord Justice Clerk, as chairing member, four other judicial members (one other High Court judge, two sheriffs or sheriffs principal and one JP or stipendiary magistrate), four legal members (one prosecutor, one constable, one advocate and one solicitor) and three lay members (one of whom must have knowledge of the issues faced by victims).

49. The Lord Justice General, after consulting the Scottish Ministers, will be responsible for appointing the judicial and legal members. The Scottish Ministers, after consulting the Lord Justice Clerk, will be responsible for appointing the lay members.

Evidence received – general comments

50. Most witnesses from whom the Committee took evidence were supportive of the aims behind the proposals for the Council – to contribute to greater consistency, fairness and transparency in sentencing and thereby increase public confidence. Many witnesses also recognised that a sentencing council could contribute to a greater knowledge base, the development of public policy and better research into public attitudes to sentencing.

---

29 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 12.

51. In support of the proposals, Professor Neil Hutton commented —

“The Council provides an institutional space for judges to work with others to develop sentencing policy. Crime and punishment have become such sensitive political issues that many jurisdictions have found it helpful to develop an institution which provides an opportunity to develop a more rational, evidence-based approach to policy-making which can be pursued away from the media glare of the world of electoral politics. Guidelines will provide a clear and transparent structure within which judges can exercise their discretion at the level of the individual case. This will help the public to understand sentencing decisions and, over time, lead to enhanced public confidence in the courts.”30

52. Victim Support Scotland also expressed support and said—

“It is about the need to build public confidence in our sentencing processes, so that there is demonstrably a greater understanding of consistency in sentencing. That is required in the 21st century. The sentencing guidelines will be an important tool for judges and other sentencers. The proposal is a win-win for communities, victims and the criminal justice system.”31

53. The Scottish Police Federation (SPF) said it supported the establishment of the Council and its aim of ensuring greater consistency in sentencing. It considered however that the requirement on the Council to include in any guidelines “an assessment of the likely effect of the guidelines on the number of persons detained in prisons or other institutions” was incompatible with the principle of the punishment fitting the crime.32

54. The Scottish Centre for Crime and Justice Research said that the Council had the potential to make sentencing practice more consistent and just, although that would depend on its powers and how it was organised.33

55. The Scottish Consortium on Crime and Criminal Justice (SCCCCJ) was unable to reach a consensus view on the merits of the Council as proposed, saying “the case for and likely effects of a Sentencing Council are far from clear”.34 It drew attention to some of the arguments it had considered: that retaining judicial control over sentencing provides a necessary independence from political intervention; that prison populations have risen in most US states which have developed sentencing guidelines; that guidelines can reduce judicial discretion and can carry the risk of unjust sentences being imposed in individual cases; but that on the other hand it is legitimate for governments to set a sentencing policy to make the most effective use of scarce criminal justice resources and that the current system of individualised sentencing does not make provision for consistency in sentencing.

56. Professor Spencer, representing the SCCCJ, said—

“the proposal for a sentencing council is a case of using a sledgehammer to crack a nut. I am not sure that I completely favour a sentencing council, because we have to get the number of people in prison down, and judges have to fit in to that framework.”

57. Other witnesses, most particularly sentencers, did not feel they could support the Sentencing Council as proposed in the Bill.

58. Lord Gill, the Lord Justice Clerk, agreed that there was a role for a sentencing council in Scotland but not the role as envisaged in the Bill. He said—

“We need hard research to establish the effects of sentencing. The courts have before them a wider range of disposals than they have had at any stage in history. We need to know how to measure the success of those disposals and, if a criterion exists for their success or failure, to know what is happening out there in the field. Useful research could be done on that.”

59. For those who did not feel able to support the creation of a Sentencing Council as envisaged in the Bill, four main areas of concern were expressed in evidence: firstly, that the proposals were founded on an unproven claim of inconsistency in sentencing; secondly, that the Sentencing Council as proposed would undermine the independence of the judiciary by taking decision-making away from the Appeal Court; thirdly, about the composition of the Council and in particular its lack of a judicial majority; and, fourthly, about cost in a time of budget pressures.

Inconsistency in sentencing

60. One of the main policy objectives behind the proposal to create a Sentencing Council is to improve consistency in sentencing. The question of what evidence exists of a lack of consistency was one that arose repeatedly throughout the evidence taking.

61. In his foreword to the Sentencing Commission’s report, Lord McFadyen (the Commission chairman) had concluded—

“While there is little research evidence measuring the extent to which there is inconsistency in sentencing in the courts in Scotland, there is a public perception that such inconsistency exists, and the Commission has concluded that that perception is in some measure well founded.”

62. The Lord Advocate endorsed this view, saying that—35 Scottish Consortium on Crime and Criminal Justice. Written submission to the Justice Committee.

38 Sentencing Commission for Scotland. The Scope to Improve Consistency in Sentencing.
“it can be difficult to assess whether there is inconsistency in the sentencing process because of the absence of data and, indeed, of a system that is open to examination. I have been a practitioner in the courts over the years and I can tell you that there is anecdotal evidence across the board that some sentences surprise practitioners and that in certain circumstances it is difficult to predict what the sentence will be … On days when a particular judge is known to be on duty, there might be a queue of enthusiastic guilty pleas, but on other days the court can be a veritable desert as far as guilty pleas are concerned.”

63. Henry McLeish, the Chair of the Scottish Prisons Commission, said that there was sufficient evidence from various sources to suggest that there are inconsistencies in sentencing throughout Scotland. He cited publicly recorded cases that generate public debate, court decisions and anecdotal evidence.

64. Community Justice Authorities (CJAs) also felt that there was inconsistency in sentencing. Tony McNulty of Lanarkshire CJA referred to court statistics and said—

“in some courts 22 per cent of the sentences that are imposed are custodial, whereas in other courts custodial sentences account for 11 per cent of sentences. There seems to be no rhyme or reason for such variations in sentencing.”

65. However Dr Cyrus Tata of the Centre for Sentencing Research at the University of Strathclyde cautioned against drawing such inferences directly from “bald statistics”, since they did not take account of possible differences in the cases that come before different courts. As he put it, the statistics “do not control for input. If you do not control for input, you are unable to control for output.” Nevertheless, Dr Tata cited a range of studies which had been carried out which together provided some limited evidence of inconsistency, together with evidence of consistency: “The overall picture is rather like a bell curve, with a lot of consistency and some variation.”

66. Professor Fergus McNeill of the Scottish Consortium on Crime and Criminal Justice agreed that it was impossible to establish conclusively whether there was inconsistency through research. However, he believed there was “variance in sentencing that seems to be beyond what is defensible”. He based this view on statistical evidence, research studies and anecdotal evidence, including the fact that—

“At intermediate diets, some people will plead guilty instantly if the judge whom they are going to appear before is deemed to be a relatively lenient sentencer. If a harsher or more punitive sentencer is on the bench, the person will not plead guilty in the hope that, when they return to court later, they will face a different judge. Judges know that this happens. It is called judge shopping and … it goes on to a significant degree in our system.”

67. Victim Support Scotland said that in its view, there was little evidence of inconsistency, but even less evidence of consistency and added—

“People have the right to understand why a particular sentence was given in a particular case. That is what sentencing guidelines can do for us.”

68. For Professor Neil Hutton of the Centre for Sentencing Research at the University of Strathclyde, demanding evidence of inconsistency got things the wrong way round—

“The onus is on the judiciary to tell us what they mean by consistency, and to explain that in a transparent way to the public. They do not have a language – that is a criticism not of judges but of the structure in which they work – that enables them to talk about consistency. That is why we need guidelines, and the sentencing council.”

69. The judiciary, however, was not convinced. Lord Hamilton said that he was not aware of, and no one had brought to his attention, any empirical evidence to suggest that there is inconsistency of sentencing in Scotland. He offered access to court records to allow an empirical exercise to be carried out, saying that—

“we should want to know that there is truly an inconsistency in sentencing before undertaking the very expensive exercise of setting up a body of the kind envisaged in the Bill, with operating funds that have been identified of more than £1 million a year.”

70. This view was supported by Ian Duguid QC, of the Faculty of Advocates, who said that he had not seen “an inconsistency in sentencing to the point at which another body would be required to set guidelines.”

71. Bill McVicar from the Law Society of Scotland questioned whether consistency in sentencing is, in fact, desirable—

“We are concerned to understand what is meant by consistency in sentencing. Two apparently similar cases may attract different sentences for reasons that are particular to those cases; that is the difficulty in applying strict guidelines. The question is whether we want uniform sentences or consistent sentences – and what is meant by consistent sentences. It seems to me that such matters are not properly dealt with in the Bill.”

72. The Lord Justice Clerk felt that a definition of consistency was essential if sentencing was to be a stated aim of the legislation—

---

“The consultation paper started off by talking about inconsistency and then spoke about a perception of inconsistency, which is rather a different thing. It is not quite clear yet what the legislation seeks to achieve. There is no definition of consistency in the draft, and it seems to me that those who would form a sentencing council would find some difficulty in knowing exactly what they were trying to do unless the legislation gave them a clear definition by which to judge their own views and decisions.”

73. The Cabinet Secretary for Justice explained the rationale for the provisions in the Bill as follows—

“We have founded our approach on the conclusions of the Sentencing Commission for Scotland, which was an august body that contained senior figures, including senior members of the judiciary. We are building on their comments. ... Factors other than inconsistency are involved. However, we think that there is disquiet among the public about inconsistency in sentencing, which must be tackled, whether it is based on anecdotal evidence or reality.”

The powers of the Council and the independence of the judiciary

74. While most witnesses were generally supportive of sentencing guidelines, there was significant disagreement on whether a new Sentencing Council was needed and whether its role should be more than advisory.

75. In their written submission, the High Court judges observed that the Council will prepare guidelines “which will have direct legal effect thus restricting the sentencing discretion and power not only of all courts, including the High Court sitting as a court of appeal (section 7(1)(a)), but also of that court when carrying out its other function of issuing guideline judgments (section 7(1)(b)).” The Council will also have the power to prescribe when its guidelines may (and presumably may not) be departed from (section 5(3)(d)).

76. In the judges’ view, the Bill’s proposals—

“strike directly at the independence of the judiciary (and in particular of the High Court) as the arm of Government essentially responsible for the setting of sentencing policy. The proposals (as framed) are fundamentally unacceptable both on domestic constitutional grounds and because mandatory directions to the court by a non-judicial body undermine the judicial independence required of courts by Article 6 of the European Convention on Fundamental Rights and Freedoms.”

77. In his oral evidence, Lord Hamilton expanded on these objections—

“One has to recognise the radical difference between the proposals now made and the proposals that were made by the Sentencing Commission for Scotland, chaired by Lord Macfadyen. The commission recognised the importance of the High Court of Justiciary, as the senior criminal court in Scotland, being the ultimate body responsible for laying down sentencing guidelines. It saw the advantage in there being an advisory body with a research facility for undertaking exercises and putting matters before the appeal court for endorsement or otherwise. However, I think a situation in which an outside body that is not itself elected and which comprises, as the present proposals indicate, a majority of non-judicial office-holders impinges on the independence of the judiciary, if that body is to lay down what are, in effect, prescriptive guidelines.52

51 Judges of the High Court of Justiciary. Written submission to the Justice Committee, paragraph 10.

78. While Lord Hamilton accepted that any guidelines published by the Sentencing Council would not be binding, the requirement on the court to “have regard to” them would be “constraining to a significant extent, as I think it is intended to be”. This would not be welcome in the context of guidelines laid down by a sentencing council as opposed to the Appeal Court.53

79. The Royal Society of Edinburgh (RSE) pointed out that, while the Policy Memorandum cited the Sentencing Commission as the origins of the proposals in the Bill, it did not mention that the Commission had only been in favour of an advisory body and against a sentencing guidelines council; nor did the Memorandum explain why the Scottish Government had taken a different view. In the Society’s view—

“the purpose of the Sentencing Council is open to grave objection on constitutional grounds. Sentencing policy is, and should remain, a matter for the Parliament on the one hand and the Appeal Court on the other, following, we may say, a public hearing. It is fundamentally wrong that sentencing policy should be determined by a Sentencing Council, for which it appears that the executive have disproportionate influence on the procedure for appointment of members.”54

80. However Professor Neil Hutton did not accept that a Sentencing Council undermined judicial independence—

“Judicial independence means that a judge makes a decision in an individual case. It is entirely appropriate for a body such as a sentencing council to develop a broader sentencing policy or to decide what sentencing should be for particular types of cases. I do not think that interferes with judicial independence at all.”

81. Indeed, he suggested, well-crafted guidelines, by “giving judges something to argue about” would bolster judicial independence—

“If they decide to depart from the guidelines in a particular case, they can set out the range of penalties for the crime and then give a clear reason in public for their decision. Unlike the present situation, such a move blends

54 Royal Society of Edinburgh. Written submission to the Justice Committee. consistency and individualised sentencing in a way that is transparent to the public."

82. Nor, in his view, did judicial independence require the sentencing council to have only an advisory role—

“If we have a sentencing council whose task is to devise guidelines, it is appropriate that it should have final authority. That preserves judicial independence at a sufficient level, as it allows the appeal court to make decisions in individual cases.”55

83. Dr Cyrus Tata agreed that “in principle, a sentencing council can ... be a way of buttressing the judicial independence rather than detracting from it”, but it depended on the detail. He had some concerns that the council as proposed in the Bill “appears to report mainly to the Scottish Ministers and, to some extent, the Lord Advocate. I would want it to be more distanced from the Executive and perhaps a little more accountable to the Parliament.”56

84. John Scott, representing the SCCCJ and the Howard League for Penal Reform, was concerned that the Council might be exposed to undue political pressure, or pressure from the media. He was not wholly opposed to such a body, suggesting that it could play a useful role if it was an advisory body rather than one that issues guidelines.57

85. However, David McKenna of Victim Support Scotland was opposed to a Sentencing Council that was purely advisory—

“I am not sure whether that arrangement would be as effective in demonstrating sentencing consistency to the public as the approach that is set out in the Bill. An advisory group might just disappear into the background and never be heard from again.”58

86. Henry McLeish downplayed the significance of a sentencing council, suggesting that the arguments on both sides were in danger of becoming polarised. He saw no threat to the independence of the judiciary, described the establishment of a sentencing council as “a modest measure that should not get too many people too excited” and said that he had no strong views on how it operated. His only concern was—

“that the sentencing council should not appear as an ultra-quasi-legal body that looks like it is imposing its individual judgments on the work of the courts.”59

87. James Chalmers (Edinburgh University) said that, as the Bill makes clear that the final decision on sentencing is still left to judges, he did not see how independence would be undermined.\textsuperscript{60} Similarly, the Lord Advocate said it was “quite clear that it will not be the council’s role to provide prescriptive mandatory guidelines or to interfere with judges’ independence in individual cases.”\textsuperscript{61}

88. The Cabinet Secretary for Justice explained why he felt there was no substance to fears that the Sentencing Council would undermine the independence of the judiciary. He pointed to the fact that the Parliament had only recently enshrined the independence of the judiciary in statute and that there was no intention to go against this—

“We have made it as clear as we can do that we will not interfere with the ultimate responsibility of each sheriff or judge to make the decision that they think is appropriate to the specific offence of the individual offender who appears before them. … I just cannot see the basis on which the sentencing council could be viewed as unconstitutional. It will not interfere with the independence of the judiciary and it is clearly intra vires.”\textsuperscript{62}

89. He also argued that—

“the sentencing guidelines must be more than advisory. The judiciary will have the opportunity to say that the guidelines do not fit in the particular circumstances of an individual offender or individual offence. … However, in the main, the guidelines will apply.”\textsuperscript{63}

90. On a related point, a number of witnesses expressed concerns about section 5(3)(d) of the Bill, which allows the Sentencing Council to specify the circumstances in which sentencing guidelines may be departed from. The Sheriffs’ Association described this as “an unwarranted restriction on sentencing in individual circumstances” and suggested it ran counter to section 7(2) of the Bill, which allows a court not to follow guidelines (so long as it states its reasons for doing so).\textsuperscript{64} Lord Cullen, speaking for the RSE, agreed that section 5(3)(d) enabled the Sentencing Council to restrict the scope of the court to depart from its guidelines, noting that the court in turn could not force the Council to review guidelines: “We are dealing with a constitutional point – whether the court remains in charge of its original and proper constitutional responsibility to determine sentences.”\textsuperscript{65}

91. The Sheriffs’ Association also expressed concerns about section 5(5), which requires the sentencing guidelines to include “an assessment of the costs and benefits to which the implementation of the guidelines would be likely to give rise, and an assessment of the likely effect of the guidelines on the number of persons detained in prisons or other institutions, the number of persons serving sentences in the community and the criminal justice system generally”. According to Sheriff

Fletcher, it would be inappropriate for sentencers to take such matters into account—

“We think that the person who is being sentenced is entitled to be sentenced by someone whose attention is not directed at whether there is a place available for them”.66

Sentencing Council – membership

92. A closely related issue was about the composition of the Council and, in particular, the fact that it is to have only a minority of judicial members. The High Court judges, the Sheriffs’ Association, the Scottish Justices Association, the Faculty of Advocates and the Royal Society of Edinburgh all argued that the Council should have a judicial majority – particularly if it was to have more than a purely advisory role.

93. Lord Hamilton set out the changes in membership he would like to see—

“It would be inappropriate merely to have the Lord Justice Clerk as the chairman and one other judge – in effect, a first-instance criminal judge – as the only senators on the council. I would be minded to double that to four senators. I would leave the number of sheriffs and justices the same, but I would remove the constable, because I do not recognise the function of the constable in that regard. I would reduce the provision in paragraph 1(5)(b) in schedule 1 from “two other persons” to “one other person” which would mean council membership of 12, with judicial office-holders being seven of the 12.”67

94. The Sheriffs’ Association said that it would be difficult for sheriffs, or the public, to have confidence in a body that did not have a judicial majority.68 The RSE said it could not support a Council with only a minority of people having experience of sentencing. John Scott said he would “lean towards having a majority of judges on the sentencing council, if it were going to be more than just advisory”.69

95. Professor Fergus McNeill was less concerned about an overall judicial majority than with the balance among the judicial members, arguing that the focus should be on including more sheriffs rather than senior judges.70

96. There were also some specific concerns about the drafting of the provisions for judicial members of the Council. The Sheriffs’ Association was concerned that the drafting could allow there to be two sheriffs principal and no sheriffs, given that sheriffs principal have no active role in sentencing. Similarly, the Scottish Justices Association questioned the provision requiring one Council member to be either a justice of the peace or a stipendiary magistrate. Pointing out that there were hundreds of JPs doing a great deal of criminal work across Scotland and only a handful of stipendiary magistrates, all based in Glasgow, the Association said it would be “extremely concerned if we did not have a say or a place on the sentencing council”.71

68 Sheriffs’ Association. Written submission to the Justice Committee.

97. There were also arguments about the legal and lay membership of the Council. The Scottish Justices Association questioned the need for the police or the legal professional bodies to be represented and suggested that, if they were to be represented, so too should the Scottish Prison Service and perhaps COSLA.72 The Joint Faiths Advisory Board on Criminal Justice said that it would be preferable to draw membership of the Council from a wider range of professions involved in the justice system, and suggested additional lay members from the Scottish Prison Service, criminal justice social work teams and community justice authorities.73 Action for Children Scotland suggested that the membership should include a representative from an agency working directly in the rehabilitation of offenders.74

98. However Mike Ewart, Chief Executive of SPS did not agree that his organisation should be represented on the Council, for two reasons—

“First, we are required to discharge the lawful warrant that is the outcome of a sentence. Secondly, unlike some other organisations that take part in such discussions, we are part of Government and could be seen to be directed by ministers. I do not think that such a position would be helpful for us or for the sentencing council.”75

99. The Community Justice Authorities said they were relaxed about the proposed membership of the Council so long as lay people and victims were represented.76 But Professor McDonald of the Royal Society of Edinburgh disagreed—

“There is very little point to involving non-experts in making expert decisions. If the problem is public perception, and we then involve members of the public without improving public perception, perhaps we need to educate our masters, if such they are to be.”77

100. The Cabinet Secretary for Justice explained the rationale for the composition that was proposed in the Bill—

“The council will be judicially led. We accept that that is important. We are open to persuasion, but our view is that it is important that the council also has representatives of broader society … it is important that we take into account others who have an interest, such as the police, the prosecution service or Victim Support Scotland.”78

Sentencing Council – cost and resourcing

101. The Bill’s Financial Memorandum states that establishing the Scottish Sentencing Council is one of the proposals in the Bill that carries a significant financial impact and estimates the annual budget at between £1 million and £1.1 million, plus one-off set-up costs of £0.45 million. These costs are to be met entirely by the Scottish Government as part of its funding of the Scottish Court Service.

102. The Judges of the High Court of Justiciary questioned whether this cost could be justified—

“We are profoundly concerned that, at the present time of financial stringency, when the justice system has other very pressing demands for funding – not least of judicial training and of the provision of judicial manpower – the Government is promoting and the Parliament is contemplating such expenditure on such a Council.”

103. Similar doubts were expressed by the Faculty of Advocates and by the Scottish Consortium on Crime and Criminal Justice (SCCCJ), who suggested that, “given the pressures on the criminal justice budget, the sum required for the establishment of a Sentencing Council could be spent more effectively in other ways.”

104. Asked to expand on this in oral evidence, Professor Fergus McNeill pointed out that the estimated £1 million annual running cost of the Council could buy 25 prison places for a year, or nearly 1,000 community penalties. However, his personal view was that—

“investing £1 million in producing a coherent and rational approach to sentencing would be an excellent use of taxpayers’ money—as long as a coherent and rational approach was indeed the outcome.”

105. In its report, the Finance Committee notes that the Scottish Court Service agreed that cost estimates for the Scottish Sentencing Council were “in the right ballpark” but that it could not be expected to meet the costs of running the Council without receiving additional funding from the Government. The Finance Committee’s report also draws attention to the £97,000 costs associated with the post of the Sentencing Council’s chief executive, and to ongoing discussions about the extent to which support services for the Council could be provided by the body that will shortly replace the Scottish Court Service.

Committee conclusions

106. The Committee recognises that some degree of inconsistency in sentencing is probably inevitable in any system that respects the independence both of the judiciary as a whole and of individual sentencers. We also accept that there is a perception, both among people working in the justice system and among the wider public as well, of at least a degree of inconsistency in the sentences given out by different judges or in different locations for similar offences. We have not been convinced that there is clear objective evidence – as opposed to anecdotal and circumstantial evidence – to substantiate this perception, no doubt partly because of the inherent difficulties involved in comparing individual sentencing decisions on a like-for-like basis.

107. We regard any actual – or indeed perceived – inconsistency as a problem, in that it runs counter to the principle of fairness that must be central to any justice system. We therefore support the aim of minimising inconsistency in sentencing. However, that aim cannot be an over-riding one, and must clearly be balanced against other considerations – including cost, and the potential for compromising other principles of justice. A majority of the Committee is not yet convinced that a Scottish Sentencing Council, as proposed in the Bill, can be justified in terms of its capacity to reduce inconsistency beyond what might be achieved using existing mechanisms (such as the existing power of the Appeal Court to issue guideline judgments). On the other hand, we are also conscious that there are other aims for the Council, including the consideration of wider sentencing issues, and the promotion of relevant research. We accept that there may be a case for the setting of guidelines for sentencers, but recognise that there are issues as to how such guidelines are approved and promulgated. Overall, taking account of the other aims that it may serve, which we support, we recognise that there could be merit in a Sentencing Council.

108. A Sentencing Council will inevitably have some influence on judicial discretion (indeed, there would be little point in having it if it did not), and there is a tension between that and the principle of separation of powers.

109. There was no consensus view in the Committee on how that tension is best addressed. A majority of members would prefer a structure in which sentencing guidelines developed by any Sentencing Council would take effect only after formal endorsement by the Appeal Court. These members argue that such endorsement would no doubt be forthcoming in the large majority of cases, but such a structure would also enable there to be a constructive dialogue in cases where the Court questioned some aspect of the guidelines proposed. These members also believe that having any guidelines issued with the authority of the Court itself is the best means of resolving the constitutional concerns about the role of the Sentencing Council that some witnesses have raised.

110. An alternative view within the Committee is that, to the extent that any adjustment to the provisions of the Bill is needed to address those concerns, it would be preferable to adjust the composition of the Council to provide a judicial majority. On this view, any structure that leaves the courts with the final say on sentencing guidelines would not represent a sufficient advance over the present arrangements.

111. In that context we regard the safeguard in the Bill – that any court can decide not to follow a sentencing guideline so long as it states its reason for doing so – as essential, and the minimum necessary to preserve judicial independence. We will keep an open mind during Stage 2 as to whether further such safeguards are necessary, particularly whether the Council’s composition should be adjusted to ensure there is a judicial majority.

112. On other aspects of the Council’s composition, we can be more definite. We do not believe that a constable should be included among the “legal members” (although it will of course be important for the police to have a proper input in other ways to the Council’s deliberations). We also think there is at least a question whether a prosecutor should be included. We do not support any of the various suggestions made to us for additional members (such as a representative of the Scottish Prisons Service, or of local authorities). We do, however, have sympathy with concerns made in evidence that the Bill would allow – at least in principle – the appointment of two sheriff principals but no sheriff, or two stipendiary magistrates but no JP – thus unbalancing the judicial composition of the Council. This may be unlikely in practice, but we suggest that some redrafting would address these concerns – perhaps by amalgamating what are currently separate requirements into a single requirement for three judicial members holding (any of) the offices of sheriff, sheriff principal, JP or stipendiary magistrate, of whom at least one must be a sheriff and at least one a JP.

113. We note the concerns of some witnesses as to the costs of establishing a Sentencing Council, and ask the Scottish Government to consider further whether this cost is still a priority for the use of scarce Justice Department resources at a time of financial stringency.

Section 14: Community payback orders

Background and proposals

114. The Scottish Government’s 2007 report Reforming and Revitalising: Review of Community Penalties recommended a single community sentence to replace the existing probation orders, community service orders, supervised attendance orders and community reparation orders.

115. The Scottish Prisons Commission recommended that prison “should be reserved for those people whose offences are so serious that no other form of punishment will do and for those who pose a threat of serious harm to the public.” Accordingly, “to move beyond our reliance on imprisonment as a means of punishing offenders”, the Commission recommended that “paying back in the community should become the default position in dealing with less serious offenders”. The Commission wanted there to be a single community sentence, with judges provided with a wide range of “payback” options through which offenders could make good to the victim and/or the community whether by unpaid work, engaging in rehabilitative work that benefited both victims and communities by reducing re-offending, or some combination of these and other approaches.83

116. Taking forward these recommendations, section 14 of the Bill inserts 37 new sections into the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 in order to provide the statutory basis for community payback orders (CPOs). These orders (CPOs) are intended to be easy to understand in contrast to “the unnecessarily complex range of sentencing options currently available which are not readily understood by the public.” However, CPOs will not replace two existing orders – Drug Treatment and Testing Orders (DTTOs) and Restriction of Liberty Orders (RLOs), which the Policy Memorandum anticipates will continue to be used for around 10% of community disposals.

117. A CPO is defined (by inserted section 227A(2)) as an order imposing one or more of the following requirements on the offender: a supervision requirement, an unpaid work and activity requirement, a programme requirement (a course or planned set of activities designed to address the behavioural needs of the offender), a residence requirement, a mental health treatment requirement, a drug treatment and testing requirement, and an alcohol treatment requirement.

General response of witnesses

118. Many witnesses were broadly supportive of the proposed new CPOs. For example, the Scottish Consortium on Crime and Criminal Justice welcomed them as implementing recommendations of the Scottish Prisons Commission that put the emphasis on “flexibility, reparation and ‘problem solving’ sentencing”, and as an effective approach to reducing imprisonment. But many witnesses argued that for these proposals to be effective, they would need to be properly resourced. Many also emphasised the importance of ensuring that the nature of the community payback work needed to be properly explained to the public.

119. The Wise Group said that it supported the new CPOs and advocated a more holistic approach to addressing offenders’ needs and reducing reoffending. In its experience, programmes to support offenders are better provided in the community than in prisons.

Terminology

120. Some witnesses were critical of some of the terminology used in relation to the new orders. The Faculty of Advocates said that it would be “particularly inappropriate” to describe those requiring mental health treatment or alcohol treatment as undertaking community payback, suggesting that a more general title such as “community involvement orders” would be preferable.

121. The Scottish Children’s Reporter Administration pointed out that the term “supervision requirement”, used in section 14 for one of the requirements of a CPO, is also the name given to an order made by a children’s hearing under section 70 of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995—

“As it is possible that both types of supervision requirement might apply to an individual child or young person, SCRA suggests that another name is found for the order created under section 14 to avoid confusion.”

Consequences of non-compliance

122. For Yvonne Robertson of the Association of Directors of Social Work (ADSW), a particular advantage was that—

“The new order will also provide an opportunity for the imposition of electronic monitoring, if someone is taken back to court for breach. ... If an offender is in breach currently, the court either allows the order to continue or considers sending them to prison. The imposition of electronic monitoring, with the support that the community payback order will provide, may be sufficient to help some offenders to move away from non-compliance towards compliance.”

123. Victim Support Scotland also supported the CPO provisions, but wanted greater clarity from the outset about the consequences of non-compliance. It therefore suggested that—

“an alternative (suspended) sentence should be set out by the court alongside the community payback order, which would announce what sentence would be given if the offender breaches the payback order”.91

124. Challenged on how compliance with CPOs would be managed, the Cabinet Secretary pointed to local monitoring mechanisms that were in place, the introduction of progress courts and the option of electronic monitoring. He also argued that it was—

“not simply about keeping people on a tight leash and berating them; sometimes it is about encouraging them, and saying how well they have done. We are giving sheriffs the flexibility to encourage people who are doing well to overcome their addictions, to become less of a nuisance in their communities and to contribute as net taxpayers who function manageably in our communities, rather than their being a drain on taxpayers.”92

Drug treatment and testing orders

125. Drug Treatment and Testing Orders (DTTOs) are generally used as a high tariff disposal for drug-misusing offenders who might otherwise receive a custodial sentence. They have two objectives: to reduce the amount of acquisitive crime to fund drug misuse, and to reduce the level of drug misuse itself. A DTTO includes a requirement for regular reviews by the court to enable sentencers to monitor progress and a requirement that the offender consent to regular, random drug tests during the period of the order.

126. Although the Bill does not replace DTTOs, it includes a drug treatment requirement as one of the options available to the courts when imposing a CPO.

127. Cosla saw a potential difficulty with this, suggesting there was “potential for confusion” between DTTOs and CPOs that included a drug treatment requirement. A similar point was made by the Community Justice Authorities.93

Resourcing
128. The Financial Memorandum estimates that CPOs, together with the presumption against short periods of imprisonment or detention and reports about supervised persons, will cost £10.67 million per year (the mid-point figure between the costs associated with a 10% or 20% increase in community sentencing) plus one-off costs of £50,000. The majority of these additional costs will fall to be dealt with under the existing ring-fenced funding arrangements for local authority criminal justice social work services.94

129. The Financial Memorandum explains that, as it is difficult to predict sentencing practice, it is difficult to forecast what the take-up of the new CPO will be, when compared to existing sentences and against the backdrop of the new presumption against the use of prison sentences of six months or less. For indicative cost purposes therefore, the memorandum uses two assumptions – an increase of 10% and an increase of 20% in community sentences or community payback orders. In oral evidence, Wilma Dickson of the Criminal Justice Directorate explained that although around 12,000 sentences of less than six months were imposed each year, this translated into only around 6,000 individuals entering prison each year. A 10% increase in community sentences, representing 1,931 CPOs, was therefore equivalent to 31% of the current number of short-term prison receptions, while a 20% increase in community sentences was equivalent to 62% of those receptions.95

130. Councillor McGuigan of COSLA argued that, in order to make the new CPOs effective, there needed to be—

“a willingness to redistribute resources between the set of agencies – not just the Scottish Prison Service, but local authorities and the national health service ... I simply do not think that the bill will work if the necessary resources are not in place. Local authority budgets are not as abundant as you might believe, and we are making considerable efficiency savings – cuts, if you like – in many services. ... The provisions for community payback orders, which involve reviews, putting in place responsible officers and meeting other responsibilities, will cost the local authority a fair amount, which I cannot quantify at the moment.”96

131. Henry McLeish said that, in its report, the Prisons Commission had—“made it clear that no one should be under the impression that the proposed changes could be made without considerable input of new resources – the statement was as bald as that. There must be new 94 Financial Memorandum, paragraphs 675, 991.

resources. If we are successful in the long term, there could conceivably be a transfer of resources from prisons to the community, but that cannot happen in the short term.\textsuperscript{97}

132. Mike Ewart, Chief Executive of the Scottish Prison Service, agreed that greater use of community penalties would not necessarily result, at least in the short term, in a significant reduction in prison populations or expenditure—

“During the period in which effective community disposals and interventions are built up and crucial confidence in them is developed, so that we collectively feel that that is the appropriate route, we will still have to maintain the required resource for keeping more or less the current population running through the prison system. There will not be a major shift of population until that confidence is established.”\textsuperscript{98}

133. Victim Support Scotland presented a different perspective, arguing that there were “plenty of resources” in the system; the challenge was to find new ways of thinking about them. It wanted to see more use made of compensation orders to victims or, where no individual victim is discernible, to pay for improvements to the communities that suffered from the offending behaviour.\textsuperscript{99}

134. Many witnesses drew particular attention to the resource implications for criminal justice social work. For example, the view of Aberdeenshire Council was that—

“Whilst both elements of the new community payback orders have positive elements, their introduction is likely to have a significant impact on criminal justice social work resources; in particular, the need to identify, and supervise, additional work placements. There will also be an increase in the number of reports that will be required by Progress Courts.”\textsuperscript{100}

135. The Association of Directors of Social Work (ADSW), while supporting CPOs “as an alternative to expensive and ineffective short sentences of imprisonment”, said it was necessary to acknowledge “that this will place increased demands on a range of specialist and mainstream services including local authority social work, housing and education services; health; Jobcentre Plus and others.”\textsuperscript{101}

136. In evidence to the Finance Committee, Community Justice Authorities—

“expressed concern about the assumption in the Financial Memorandum that current funding for probation, social enquiry reports (SERs), community service orders and supervised attendance orders is adequate. They indicated that six of the eight authorities have this year asked for approval to move money from non-core funding to core funding, citing this as evidence that existing core funding is not sufficient for purpose and told the Committee, ‘we are concerned that, if we have a large increase in the number of CPOs, we may have to vire further moneys from non-core to core funding’.”

\textsuperscript{101} Association of Directors of Social Work. Written submission to the Justice Committee.

137. The Finance Committee also heard concerns that Scottish Government funding for local authority core criminal justice functions had not kept pace with inflation, and that the funding formula was sometimes based on out-of-date activity levels and did not take account of the additional costs of service delivery in rural areas. Perth and Kinross Council made specific reference to the unit cost used for probation orders, saying that it is unrealistic and does not take account of people who require ever-higher levels of support and supervision if they are to escape the cycle of reoffending. The Community Justice Authorities suggested that the Financial Memorandum might underestimate the number of additional social enquiry reports (SERs) that would be required; in response, the Scottish Government confirmed that costings for additional SERs had not been included and that this would need to be kept under careful review.

138. In its report, the Finance Committee notes that funding for full implementation of the Bill has not been confirmed. It also notes that it has not received any evidence “to allow it to understand whether the estimated uptake of CPOs, of between 10 and 20 per cent, is accurate or whether this figure is likely to increase year-on-year, along with the cost implications” and drew attention to “the apparent disconnect” between the creation of a statutory presumption against short-term custodial sentences and the assumptions in the Financial Memorandum concerning the expected uptake of CPOs.

139. The Cabinet Secretary said that the Scottish Government had already invested an additional £2 million in community service – “£1 million to get orders under way and completed more quickly, and a further £1 million in recognition of underlying workload pressures”. He said this represented a 15% increase between 2008-09 and 2009-10.

140. Mr MacAskill agreed that resources were required, for local authorities, for courts in respect of progress hearings and for the additional electronic monitoring capacity in order to deliver the approach envisaged by the Bill, and he announced that he would make a further £5.5 million available over the next two years – £1.5 million this year and £4 million the next. Wilma Dickson, for the Scottish Government, added that all of the £1.5 million going out this year would be distributed to local authorities on the normal distribution formula so that they could begin to clear current backlogs, and it was hoped that by the end of the second year, some funds could be redirected into CPOs.

Availability of programmes and timescales for commencement and completion

141. For Raymund McQuillian of ADSW, one of the big advantages of the new CPO was that—

---

“It provides for a substantial tightening of timescales, which sends an important message from the courts to the public and to offenders about the commencement of new orders. We support the view that orders should be started and should finish quickly. The current arrangements provide for the work to commence within three weeks; under the new arrangements, that period would be reduced to one week. Current legislation allows one year for completion of a community service order; the new guidelines suggest that orders should be completed within three to six months.”

142. The Cabinet Secretary confirmed in evidence that the target was “that unpaid work should start within seven days”.

143. Victim Support Scotland wanted to tighten the legislation to make such a timescale enforceable. In its view, a CPO should not be made unless the relevant treatment or activity “is available at the time of sentencing. This will ensure that the offender will start the disposal straight away, instead of for instance waiting several months to begin a particular treatment, which gives a signal to the victim that nothing has happened.”

144. But for Professor Neil Hutton, this was not the most important consideration relating to timing—

“If punishment is to be effective, the important issue is probably not immediacy after the decision to punish but immediacy after the commission of the offence, which is a different story altogether. How long do people have to wait before they come to court? That is a resource issue.”

145. For Turning Point Scotland, the availability of programmes was crucial—

“When a Community Payback Order is made, and an offender is subject to its requirement, it is clear that the appropriate services must be in place if the goals of the Order are to be achieved. When they are not, or when the offender is forced into the wrong services, it is far more likely that they will be unable to address their issues, or even comply with the requirements. In this case they would be seen as having failed to meet the requirements under the order, when in reality the system has failed them.”

146. However, when Councillor Harry McGuigan of COSLA was asked about current availability of existing community programmes, he said—

“I doubt very much whether there are sufficient programmes available for community sentences, especially if we move towards an increased demand or call on services that are to be delivered locally. The quality of such programmes is another matter, too. We need to question whether current...”
resources are sufficient to enable quality, effectiveness and credibility in community sentences." 111

Progress reviews

147. An important element of the new regime is the option for courts to require periodic “progress reviews” of CPOs, which the offender must attend. On conclusion of a progress review, the court may vary, revoke or discharge the CPO (inserted section 227W).

148. The Association of Directors of Social Work supported the introduction of progress reviews, but said they should be “targeted rather than universally applied to all offenders”. 112 The Community Justice Authorities and COSLA also welcomed the provision, but suggested that in order to ensure consistency in the operation of the reviews, further guidance on the purpose and practice for reviews should be issued, following consultation with stakeholders. 113

149. The Scottish Centre for Crime and Justice Research was critical of the fact that, under the Bill, progress reviews would be optional rather than mandatory, and would be conducted by the mainstream criminal courts rather than by specialised “progress courts”—

> “In our view this represents a missed opportunity. The Prisons Commission, based on clear evidence, highlighted that because the business of desisting from crime (and complying with both community supervision and the law in general) is complex and challenging for offenders, the management of that process might be better remitted to a court in which specially trained judges and court social workers could better support it. In our view, removing that function from already busy generic criminal courts and placing it within a more specialised progress court made considerable sense and merits re-examination.” 114

150. But the decision to make progress reviews optional was greeted “with some relief” by the Sheriffs’ Association, who said that “for them to be mandatory would be unduly burdensome to the system financially and take up already precious court time.” 115

Other suggestions in relation to community payback orders

151. The Scottish Centre for Crime and Justice Research said that for the new CPO to be effective, changes to the Bill would be required to take account of existing research on effectiveness—

> “As a disposal, its effectiveness will be improved by acting on the research evidence about how to increase both public support for community penalties and behavioural change in offenders. The two key factors are clarity (as to what a community punishment is) and speed (with which the order is made and fulfilled). This evidence suggests careful consideration and some re-drafting is required of provisions on conditions (to prevent ‘condition loading’), progress reviews, the role of Responsible Officers, and continuing to have separate community orders (like RLOs and DTTOs)."\textsuperscript{116}

152. Victim Support suggested that the existing requirement to explain in ordinary language the purpose of the CPO requirements, and the consequences of non-compliance, to the offender should also be extended to the victim (unless he or she did not wish to receive this information).\textsuperscript{117}

153. On a similar theme, Sacro suggested that individual victims or communities affected by offenders’ behaviour should be given a direct input into the nature of community payback activity undertaken (“reparative tasks”). Without such a facility, the Bill would—

“miss an important opportunity to gain widespread support for a refocussing of the objectives of our criminal justice system to give increased attention to repairing the harm caused by offending together with reducing the likelihood of re-offending”.\textsuperscript{118}

154. The Joint Faiths Advisory Board on Criminal Justice said that it would like to see restorative justice included as part of the community sentencing, with a focus not just on the offender but on the victim and the community.\textsuperscript{119}

\textbf{Mental health treatment requirement}

155. The Scottish Association for Mental Health (SAMH) noted that instead of imposing a sentence of imprisonment, a court may instead impose a CPO which could include a “mental health treatment requirement”. They said—

“SAMH has long argued that people who have mental health problems should receive treatment rather than being imprisoned, and we hope that this Bill might present a mechanism for this. However, we are unsure about how this system would work in practice and specifically seek clarification about the role of judges.”

156. SAMH sought clarity on who would make the decision to seek the view of a medical practitioner, how this regime would relate to the existing Mental Health Tribunal and asked whether there was a risk of a parallel system being set up. It also questioned whether the new regime would be subject to the same principles as underpin the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) Act 2003, without which there could be “an unfair disparity which would cause SAMH great concern”.\textsuperscript{120}

157. The Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland (MWC) said that it had significant concerns about the provision for a “mental health treatment requirement” in a CPO (under inserted section 227R), and that it was not clear what status an individual subject to such a requirement would have in the context of hospital or outpatient treatment. The MWC highlighted some specific concerns, including that there does not appear to be any requirement for a report from a Mental Health Officer or a social work report to assist with decisions; that there does not appear to be any consideration of the individual's ability to consent to treatment; and that the individual would have no automatic recourse to independent or statutory review or to the safeguards that are available to people who are otherwise subject to compulsion in respect of mental disorder. 121

Committee conclusions

158. The Committee broadly supports the creation of community payback orders (CPOs) on the grounds that they should simplify and strengthen the current range of community sentences, allowing more focus on offenders’ needs.

159. However, we are also convinced that CPOs will not deliver the benefits envisaged for them unless they are adequately resourced – and we find it difficult or impossible to be sure at this stage whether sufficient funds have been or will be made available.

160. We are conscious that the level of take-up of CPOs will be closely linked to the views of sentencers on their effectiveness and the impact of any new statutory presumption against short-term custodial sentences, and that the Scottish Government itself cannot forecast with any confidence how many CPOs are likely to be made. What does seem clear is that there is very little prospect of any significant savings being made, in the short to medium term, in the largely fixed costs of running Scotland’s prisons even if the Bill succeeds in its aim of diverting a substantial number of offenders from custodial to community disposals. Therefore, even though community sentences are generally cheaper than imprisonment, there will be a need for additional resources to make this approach work. (We also recognise, however, that if nothing is done to address rising prison populations, it will at some point become necessary to increase prison capacity, and that this will also have significant resource implications.)

161. We strongly believe that, if CPOs are to gain credibility with the public, and with the victims of crime in particular, they must begin (and be seen to begin) very shortly after sentence is declared – either on the day of sentence or (where this is not practicable, as we accept will sometimes be the case) as soon as possible thereafter. This is on the same principle that judgment should be given as soon as possible after an offence is committed – namely that justice delayed is justice denied.

162. The Cabinet Secretary has already announced some additional resources for existing community sentences, but until we know what the level of take-up will be, it is difficult or impossible to say whether current budgets will be sufficient. It is clear that many witnesses are concerned about this issue, and equally clear that an increased take up of CPOs of 10% or 20% (as postulated by the Scottish Government in the Financial Memorandum) will require additional resources. We welcome the additional resources already committed, but note that they require to be used both to eliminate barriers to the speedy commencement of the orders, and to address issues of quality. There may also be issues about the adequacy of the unit cost calculation used in this context. Further, it is evident that the programme, residence, mental health treatment, drug treatment or alcohol treatment requirements that may be applied to the new orders will require additional resourcing. The Committee asks the Scottish Government to provide further assurance as to how such costs are to be met. Thereafter we need a commitment by Ministers to keep the level of take-up under review, and to bring forward additional funding as required.

163. In this connection, we are conscious that, while the main impact will be felt by criminal justice social work services, there will be resource implications for other areas. For example, there will be additional costs for the Scottish Court Service as a consequence of the progress reviews, and for voluntary sector bodies involved in the delivery of the new CPOs. Appropriate consideration must be given to these wider resource implications.

164. We do not agree with those witnesses who argued that progress courts should have been established as specialist courts, as the Prisons Commission recommended. We believe this should be a matter for individual sheriffs principal to consider in the light of local circumstances. We also believe the Bill gets it right in making progress reviews optional, so that the resources involved in them can be targeted to where they are most needed.

165. The Committee also recommends that the Scottish Government reconsider some of the terminology used in the Bill, specifically whether an alternative name might be considered to avoid confusion over the term “supervision requirement”. We also invite the Scottish Government to consider making the rehabilitative element in community payback orders clearer.

Section 16: Short periods of detention

Background and evidence received
166. Section 16 repeals section 169 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 which permits summary courts to detain an offender at a court or police station until 8 pm instead of imposing imprisonment. As the provisions have not been used for a number of years they are considered no longer to be of any practical use.

167. This section also extends the current minimum period of imprisonment that can be imposed by a summary court from five to 15 days and repeals the provision whereby the summary courts can sentence an offender to be detained in a certified police cell or similar place for up to four days. According to the Explanatory Notes, this provision is redundant as there are no certified police cells in Scotland and have not been for some time. However, the Scottish Police Federation said that certified police cells are still used in the Orkney, Shetland and
Western Isles and are essential, when, for example, severe weather conditions prevent transfer to mainland Scotland.122

Committee conclusions
168. There is clearly uncertainty from the evidence about whether there are, in fact, any police cells in remote parts of Scotland that are certified for use for short-term detention. The Committee invites the Scottish Government to provide clarification on this point, and also to explain more fully how the process of certification operates. We would also suggest that further consideration be given to whether, even if no police cells are currently certified, this is a sufficient basis to repeal the provision that enables them to be so certified. We can envisage circumstances in which the facility to detain people in such cells, as an alternative to a long journey to the nearest prison, could continue to be useful.

Section 17: Presumption against short periods of imprisonment or detention

Background
169. Section 17 amends the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 to create a presumption against prison sentences of six months or less, so that they may be imposed only where the court considers that no other method of dealing with the offender is appropriate. Where such a short sentence is imposed, the court must state its reasons for that opinion, and enter them in the record of proceedings.

Evidence received
170. Many witnesses expressed support for this proposal on the grounds that short-term prison sentences are generally regarded as expensive and ineffective, both in terms of protecting communities and in terms of rehabilitating offenders and reducing crime.123

171. In its written submission, Scottish Women’s Aid said that a presumption against short custodial sentences “may have a positive impact on certain offenders with chaotic lifestyles for whom prison is a ‘revolving door’”, but that perpetrators of domestic abuse do not fall into that category. The presumption could therefore “have a negative impact on women, children and young people experiencing domestic abuse”.124

172. Clydebank Women’s Aid Collective agreed, saying that a presumption against sentences of six months or less would be “gendered in its impact. For women facing sentencing themselves it is likely to be positive. However, women affected by crimes committed against them by men may be affected detrimentally.”125

173. Professor Alec Spence of the Scottish Consortium on Crime and Criminal Justice said: “The use of short-term and very short-term sentences is complete eye-wash. It has no effect at all on reducing crime.”\(^{126}\) Indeed, he cited international research suggesting that where prison was used on its own, crime actually increases slightly.

174. Professor Spencer said that 81 per cent of prison sentences are for six months or less, and two-thirds of those are for three months or less; and that people sentenced to six months or less subsequently spend, on average, only around 23 days in prison. This did not allow time for prison staff to obtain the relevant information about the prisoner, assess them and arrange for appropriate interventions. As a result, he said, short sentences are a cause of frustration to prison staff, who have to spend a lot of time and effort accommodating people, but without the opportunity to help them address their offending behaviour.\(^{127}\)

175. His colleague Professor Fergus McNeill added—

“three things help people to stop offending: getting older and becoming more mature; developing social ties that mean something to them; and changing their view of what they are about as a person. Short periods in prison do not help with any of those three things.”\(^{128}\)

176. Dr Sarah Armstrong (University of Glasgow) referred to the Scottish Prisons Commission’s finding that many people in prison are repeatedly serving short sentences, in effect completing a life term by instalments but without access to the programmes and services available to those who are given a life sentence. She drew attention to research suggesting that short prison terms are not only ineffective but can be counter-productive, since people are more likely to engage in worse offending after they have been imprisoned than before.\(^{129}\)

177. Rona Sweeney, for the Scottish Prison Service, confirmed that for prisoners sentenced to a short period of custody, there was very little that could be done beyond meeting health care needs: “During those very short sentences we focus on undoing the harm that imprisonment has caused, because we know that many of the protective factors that support someone in not reoffending are damaged by imprisonment”.\(^{130}\)

178. Representatives of Community Justice Authorities said that while there were occasions when short prison sentences was justified they were being used “far too frequently” and sometimes only because sentencers felt they had no alternative disposals available.\(^{131}\)

179. In its report, the Scottish Prisons Commission recommended a legislative presumption against custodial sentences of six months except where the judge is satisfied that a custodial sentence should be imposed having regard to one or more of the following: violent and sexual offences that raise significant concerns about serious harm; offences that constitute a breach of bail conditions; offenders already subject to a community sentence and/or with a significant history of failing to comply with community or conditional sentences; offenders subject to a release licence; offenders who do not consent to rehabilitative elements in a community sentence; and other sentences of imprisonment then being served by the offender.

180. Henry McLeish said that the Bill aimed to strike the same balance that the Scottish Prisons Commission had done. The Commission had considered the option of a statutory ban on custodial sentences of less than six months but—

“to preserve the independence of the judiciary and to take a commonsense approach, we rejected that option. Of the people who go to prison for less than six months, a small group have committed what I would regard as serious offences, one of which is domestic violence.”

181. Some witnesses questioned the basis upon which the six month dividing line had been selected. Cyrus Tata of the Centre for Sentencing Research (University of Strathclyde) said it was “not harmonious with the new summary powers for sentences of up to 12 months”, but that a more appropriate way to make the distinction would rely on the nature of the offence—

“If the argument behind the bill is that we should not imprison non-violent, non-dangerous offenders who might simply be feckless, we should focus on those types of cases. We should specify those cases, rather than a limit of six months, because the group of prisoners on sentences of six months or under will include—this will give the tabloids a field day—people who are convicted of dangerous and violent offences.”

182. Similarly, the Scottish Police Federation described the six month cut-off as “arbitrary”, pointing out that there are many habitual offenders who have no desire to comply with any court disposal and hence that short periods of imprisonment may well be necessary for even minor offences.

183. The experience of the High Court judges was that—

“under existing arrangements courts resort to short custodial sentences only where there is no realistic alternative ... we doubt whether the proposed legislative changes will in practical terms achieve much.”

184. The Sheriffs’ Association went further, saying that arguments about the ineffectiveness of short prison sentences misunderstood their point. A custodial sentence was unavoidable, whereas community disposals “without the option of custody for breach, would be rendered voluntary”. Noting that a 30-day sentence was to be an option for breach of a level 1 CPO, the Association concluded—

135 Scottish Police Federation. Written submission to the Justice Committee.
136 Judges of the High Court of Justiciary. Written submission to the Justice Committee.
“As a means of dealing with breaches of court orders, as a sharp reminder to some offenders of the consequences of breaking the law for repeated offending when all else has been tried, or to give the public some measure of relief from their activities, short prison sentences have a purpose.”

185. Mike Ewart of the Scottish Prison Service disagreed. In terms of giving relief to the community, his view was that a short-term sentence could do more harm than good in terms of recidivism and hence community safety. In terms of being the only alternative for offenders who have repeatedly breached community service orders or reoffended, he said that—

“If a community disposal was appropriate four or five times for a particular offender in particular circumstances, that disposal might still be appropriate if the only factor that has changed is the irritation of the criminal justice system with that character’s reappearance.”

186. Henry McLeish said that the Scottish Prisons Commission had considered the argument about community respite but rejected it—

“What people want in communities throughout Scotland is a long-term future in which the crime figures go down and people are less afraid of crime and can have a sense of security. The respite approach is no more than a short-term consideration.”

187. Dr Cyrus Tata also questioned the argument that custodial sentences are sometimes appropriate where a court has lost patience with an offender who has repeatedly breached the conditions attached to community sentences. Recent research challenged the assumption that such breaches were wilful, suggesting instead that many of those subject to such sentences had significant learning difficulties and simply failed to understand the conditions.

188. The Scottish Justices Association noted that, whereas the Scottish Prisons Commission had listed six circumstances in which a short sentence could be justified, no such list was included in the Bill, and it suggested that these should at least be set out in sentencing guidelines. Sheriff Fletcher, speaking for the Sheriffs’ Association, suggested that, with a statutory requirement to state reasons for imposing a short sentence, “the unintended result might be to slow down the court system while the judge makes up the short statement that he has to make.”

189. Professor Neil Hutton (Centre for Sentencing Research, University of Strathclyde) suggested that judges already recognise the need to impose custodial sentences only when non-custodial options are inappropriate. In his view, making it more difficult to impose prison sentences of six months or less could create a temptation for judges to impose sentences of seven months or more—

“This will produce the unintended consequence of a rise in the overall prison population. ... A more appropriate way of reducing the use of short sentences would be to ask the Scottish Sentencing Council to develop a comprehensive inaugural set of guidelines which paid particular attention to defining the custody threshold in a way which reduced the overall use of short sentences of imprisonment.”

190. The Scottish Consortium on Crime and Criminal Justice said that the only sure way to achieve a reduction in short sentences would be to cap the number of places available for sentences of less than six months, so that, when the cap is reached, those given short sentences would be placed on a waiting list and their sentences suspended until a place becomes available.

191. The Cabinet Secretary for Justice said that Scottish Ministers would fully support any sheriff who feels it appropriate to use a short term prison sentence as a last resort. However, the problem of prison overcrowding had to be tackled, and he also wanted to “end the free-bed-and-board culture” in which “far too many people go to prison and sit there twiddling their thumbs” at taxpayers’ expense and to the frustration of the communities who have suffered from their behaviour. Through the Bill, he wanted to see people convicted of less serious offences given community payback orders in order to “free up our prisons to deal with the people who have to be there because they are a danger to our communities”.

192. Asked for clarification of the term “less serious offenders” and the types of crimes such offenders would have committed, the Cabinet Secretary said that ultimately that would be left to the Sentencing Council given the variable nature of common-law offences in Scotland and the need for flexibility.

Committee conclusions

193. The Committee agrees that there is a need to strike a proper balance between the imposition of short custodial sentences and effective community disposals. Additionally, the Committee agrees that there is a need to develop a range of community sentences in which the public can have confidence and which present the best chance of long-term rehabilitation of offenders. However, members were unable to agree on whether it was either necessary or desirable to create a statutory presumption against custodial sentences of six months or less in order to achieve that balance.

194. All Committee members recognise that the priority is to imprison offenders who (as the Prisons Commission said) commit offences so serious that no other form of punishment will do or who pose a threat of serious harm to the public. Committee members also recognise that those who have persistently failed to respond to non-custodial disposals may also have to be imprisoned. We acknowledge that this is, to a significant extent at least, what sentencers already aim to do, and that they do not lightly send people to prison if this is unlikely to benefit either them or those affected by their offending behaviour. We accept that short prison sentences do not normally achieve much by way of rehabilitation, that while they provide respite for victims and communities, this is only for a limited period, and that high re-offending rates tend to demonstrate that they have limited effect as a deterrent. Finally, we all recognise that the Bill, although undoubtedly intended to shift sentencing behaviour, leaves the final decision in any individual case to the court, thus allowing a short-term prison sentence still to be given where the court is convinced that that is the best option in the circumstances.

195. Where Committee members do not agree is on how far short-term custodial sentences should continue to be regarded as an appropriate disposal (other than in exceptional circumstances), and on whether they are currently being overused, or inappropriately used.

196. Some members point to the weight of evidence, particularly from academics, suggesting that short sentences involve only “warehousing” of offenders and provide no real opportunity to engage them in programmes to tackle their offending behaviour or address their other problems – and indeed that imprisonment itself may make those problems worse. These members also cite Scotland’s high incarceration rate, and the re-offending statistics, in support of the view that current sentencing policy is not working.

197. However, other members question that evidence, pointing out in particular that, since the people the courts imprison are likely to be the more persistent or serious offenders, it is hardly surprising that their re-offending rates are higher than those given community disposals. These members also cite examples referred to by witnesses, where a short prison sentence has had a salutary effect in persuading an offender to change his or her behaviour, even where previous community disposals had failed to do so. They also question the assumption that short-term sentences are currently given out where better alternatives exist, and hence doubt that a statutory presumption will make any real difference.

198. At least one member of the Committee questions whether, in the context of a provision aimed at discouraging sentencers from imposing short custodial sentences, a six-month threshold is the right one to use. On this view, reducing this to (say) three months, at least initially, would focus the provision on those cases where there is the least chance of rehabilitation in prison and which are least likely to involve serious or violent offences.
199. Overall, the Committee did not agree with the proposal in the Bill to create a statutory presumption against short-term custodial sentences.\textsuperscript{147}

Section 18: Amendment of the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007

Background and proposals

200. Part 2 of the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007, which makes provision for the imprisonment and release of prisoners, has not yet been commenced. Section 18 of the Bill amends some of the statutory provisions in the 2007 Act relating to the release of prisoners from custody.

201. The 2007 Act makes provision for two different categories of sentence for an offence: a custody and community sentence (a sentence of imprisonment for a term of 15 days or more) and a custody-only sentence (a sentence of imprisonment for a term of less than 15 days). Where a custody and community sentence is imposed, the court must make an order specifying the custody part of the sentence. If the court intends to specify a custody part of more than one-half of the total sentence, it must state publicly its reasons for doing so.

202. The Scottish Government has expressed support for the offender management principles contained in the 2007 Act but believes that, “as enacted, the process would not work and would place an intolerable burden on the Scottish Prison Service and the Local Authorities that would undermine the core intentions of the legislation”\textsuperscript{148}.

203. Section 18 repeals the custody-only provisions of the 2007 Act and replaces them with new measures to be known as the short-term custody and community sentence. The current custody and community sentence provisions, as set out in the 2007 Act, are retained.

204. The Bill provides for an order-making power, subject to affirmative resolution, to designate the length of sentence that will distinguish short-term custody and community sentences from (other) custody and community sentences. The Explanatory Notes and Policy Memorandum make reference, by way of example, to a threshold set at one year, while the Financial Memorandum considers the cost implications both of that and a two-year threshold.\textsuperscript{149} Short-term custody and community prisoners will be released on licence at the halfway point of their sentence, and the licence conditions must include the standard conditions in every case and supervision requirements in specified cases (prisoners released on compassionate grounds, those with extended sentences, sex offenders serving six months or more, and child offenders). Local authorities and the Scottish \textsuperscript{147} This conclusion was reached by a division on the question whether to agree with the principle of a statutory presumption against short-term custodial sentences. The Committee divided Yes 4 (Robert Brown, Angela Constance, Nigel Don, Stewart Maxwell), No 4 (Bill Anthon, Bill Butler, Cathie Craig, Paul Martin); the question was disagreed to on the Convener’s casting vote.

Government are required to establish joint arrangements for assessing the risks involved in the release of short-term custody and community prisoners on licence.

Evidence received

205. Mike Ewart, Chief Executive of the Scottish Prison Service, said that the 2007 Act, as enacted, would have increased the number of prisoners serving longer sentences, and he was concerned about “the inevitable impact ... on an already overcrowded prison system”. In relation to the changes now proposed, Rona Sweeney, of the SPS, added that until the SPS knew what the threshold was to be and what the risk assessments would involve, it could not assess the likely impact on resources.

206. The Association of Directors of Social Work (ADSW) said that “introducing the new custody and community licenses and extending formal supervision to all prisoners sentenced to more than 12 months will have massive implications for local authority criminal justice social work services”.

207. The Sheriffs’ Association were critical of this provision, in particular the new provisions for early release on “curfew licence”—

“It hardly makes public sentencing decisions of the courts clear to the public, or enhances its confidence in the system, if the public has no idea what the time served will be and if the actual time served bears no resemblance to [the] sentence imposed in public by the court. It involves an unseen, unaccountable exercise of executive discretion in contrast to public sentencing in open court.”

208. The Scottish Centre for Crime and Justice Research said it had “great reservations” about implementing the 2007 Act at all, and could only consider supporting it if the threshold was set at two years – as the Scottish Prisons Commission had recommended. It noted that (according to the Financial Memorandum) the annual estimated cost of implementing the 2007 Act, as amended by the Bill, was around £45 million with a one-year threshold, but only £32 million with a two-year threshold. The Centre’s concern was not simply “the enormous costs of implementation” but also the minimal returns expected, as it was aware of no research which would justify blanket pre-release risk assessment. To limit the “potentially disastrous consequences” for criminal justice services, the SCCJR urged the Parliament to drop the provisions entirely or at least raise the threshold to two years, or to implement them only after “there has been an observable trend in reduced use of prison for short sentence prisoners.”

209. According to Professor Fergus McNeill of the Scottish Consortium on Crime and Criminal Justice—

“The 2007 Act is a dreadful piece of legislation, which will have very negative consequences for the operation of the prison service and criminal justice social work. The money that it will cost to implement it would be far better spent on making community payback work … and not on a peculiarly muddled and ill-considered set of release reforms."155

210. John Scott, speaking for the Consortium and for the Howard League on Penal Reform, said the provisions would make Scotland less safe because of the “waste of professional resources” that would be involved.156

211. In its written submission, ACPOS said that “the good work achieved to date in relation to the deterrence of knife crime would be lost if knife crime is not separated from this legislation”. Invited to clarify this, ACPOS said it was not seeking to argue that knife crime should be treated differently from other crimes, but was trying to highlight a possible unintended consequence of the proposal for automatic early release of short-term custody and community prisoners. This, it suggested, could be seen as inconsistent with recent initiatives to combat knife crime, which included sending a message that people caught carrying a knife could expect a custodial sentence.157

212. The Scottish Police Federation said that the provision for automatic early release of short-term custody and community prisoners “will not be readily understood or accepted”, since it did not take into account “the conduct and contrition of the offender whilst imprisoned”. The Federation wanted it to be a standard condition of any licence that the offender provide a home address at which he or she may be contacted by the police, and that the police should have the power to search the premises without a warrant.158

213. The Cabinet Secretary emphasised that he was building on the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007 and the recommendations of the Scottish Prisons Commission, thus replacing a system of “arbitrary unconditional automatic early release” with a system in which the sentence is explained publicly in court and where release, when it happens, is based on conditions. He went on—

“Letting people out early is not necessarily a bad thing if they show remorse and have been dealt with, but there is something wrong with a system in which people get out after the same period of time whether they show no remorse for what they have done or whether they have recanted and reformed and will be an exemplary citizen.”159

214. Philip Lamont of the Scottish Government explained that the cost of implementing the 2007 Act as amended by the Bill (estimated in the Financial Memorandum as £51.45 million) will be lower than implementing it unamended (estimated as £45.75 million if the “prescribed period” is set at one year, and £32.73 million if set at two years). These costs, according to Mr Lamont, would “require financial commitment at a future stage", but since that would be covered by a future spending review, it would be “premature to pre-empt that outcome”.160

215. The Subordinate Legislation Committee (SLC) questioned the scope of the power being given to Scottish Ministers in section 18(2) to prescribe the threshold that distinguishes short-term custody and community sentences from custody and community sentences – in particular, why the delegated power required to be drawn so widely as to enable any period at all to be substituted for the period of 15 days in the existing legislation.161 In its response to the SLC, the Scottish Government said that it would consider this power again and whether the scope could be narrowed by setting minimum or maximum limits.

Committee conclusions
216. The Committee has found this a particularly difficult provision to assess, because of the complex interface between the current law, the regime that would be introduced by commencing relevant provisions of the 2007 Act as it was enacted, and the version of that Act that would result from the amendments made by the Bill. We are grateful to Scottish Government officials and to SPICe for providing the Committee with additional briefing on this section at a late stage in our Stage 1 consideration.

217. We understand the general intention of the 2007 Act to move away from a system of automatic and unconditional early release to a system that allows appropriate conditions to be imposed. However, we also recognise the serious concerns that have been raised about the complexity and cost involved in implementing that Act unamended, given the number of prisoners who would be subject to supervision and assessment requirements. We therefore agree that the Bill represents some improvement on the current law, as it will result in more prisoners being subject to statutory supervision on release and fewer to automatic unconditional early release, while avoiding the more onerous requirements of the 2007 Act. We understand that the intention is to set the threshold at sentences of one or two years’ duration, and we note the significant difference in the resource implications according to which of these is chosen. We also note the Subordinate Legislation Committee’s concerns about the unlimited nature of the power delegated by this provision, and welcome the Scottish Government’s commitment (in response to that Committee) to consider whether appropriate parameters might be specified in the Bill.

Section 24: Voluntary intoxication by alcohol – effect in sentencing

Background and evidence received
218. Under section 24, courts must not consider the fact that an offender is voluntarily intoxicated by alcohol at the time of the offence as a mitigating factor in 160 Scottish Government. Supplementary written submission to the Justice Committee, 29 September 2009.

sentencing. The Scottish Government considers that there “is a very strong link between alcohol and offending” but that intoxication can often be presented by the defence as “an excuse or reason for offending behaviour.”

219. The provision was supported by Victim Support Scotland and the Joint Faiths Advisory Board on Criminal Justice. ACPOS also backed the provision, but suggested that it should be widened “to include all intoxicants, whether legitimate, prescribed or otherwise” – a suggestion backed by the Law Society of Scotland.

220. However, both the Faculty of Advocates and the Sheriffs’ Association considered section 24 unnecessary, since it was already understood in common law that intoxication is not a mitigating factor. The Faculty also suggested that the provision as drafted could lead to “unforeseen consequences”, since it was not clear whether it applied to an alcoholic who could not control their consumption and so could be regarded as involuntarily intoxicated (and for whom a defence of diminished responsibility might be available under common law). The Sheriffs’ Association was concerned that the provision was inflexible, and would not allow intoxication to be a mitigating factor even where someone had, for example, had their drink “spiked with stronger liquor” before committing a breach of the peace. The Association suggested that the test should not just be whether someone had consumed alcohol voluntarily, but also whether they had done so “knowingly.”

221. The Lord President questioned whether the “sentencer would be allowed to take into account background circumstances such as a personal tragedy”, for example, bereavement. He conceded that it might be possible to allow mitigation by reference to the tragedy itself rather than directly by reference to the intoxication, but felt the provision “gives rise to an ambiguity that ought to be addressed.”

222. Responding to these points, the Lord Advocate acknowledged that most judges would not currently accept voluntary intoxication as a mitigating factor but said that solicitors continued to advance the argument, particularly in domestic abuse cases. She believed that—

“An important message would be sent out if we codified what is already known in our common law, which is that alcoholic intoxication is not a mitigating factor and that defendants who have imbibed alcohol will not have their sentences reduced because of that.”

223. She defended the decision to include only alcohol in the scope of the provision, on the basis that it featured far more frequently than drugs in cases that prosecutors dealt with, and was much more liable to be associated with violence.

She also argued that the provision would not prevent the underlying cause of intoxication (such as bereavement or alcoholism) being treated as a mitigating factor even if the intoxication itself could not be.\textsuperscript{168}

Committee conclusions
224. The Committee fully supports the principle that voluntary intoxication by alcohol should not be regarded as a mitigating factor in sentencing, but most members are less convinced of the case for codifying this principle in statute. The evidence suggests the principle is already well understood by sentencers, and there may be a risk that a statutory provision will confuse the legal position instead of clarifying it. This is partly because of uncertainty about the meaning of “voluntary” intoxication, and about the distinction between the intoxication itself and any underlying circumstances which might properly be regarded as mitigating. It could also be inferred from the fact that the provision mentions only alcohol in the context of what is not to be regarded as a mitigating factor, that the position in respect of other forms of intoxication must be intended to be different. It would be unfortunate if one of the consequences of this well-intentioned provision was to make it easier to advance an argument for mitigation in the context of voluntary intoxication by drugs. We would therefore be grateful for further explanation from the Scottish Government about the rationale for this provision and its response to these concerns.

PART 2 – CRIMINAL LAW

Sections 25-28: Serious organised crime

Policy objectives
225. In the Policy Memorandum, the Scottish Government explains that the provisions creating a series of new offences derive from recommendations by the Serious Organised Crime Taskforce. The objective is—

“to tackle those involved in serious organised crime to help ensure that Scotland is a safer and stronger place for hard working families to live and work in and to send a message to those involved in such activity that Scotland does not want their business.”\textsuperscript{169}

226. The Bill proposes the creation of three new offences—

- involvement in serious organised crime (section 25);
- directing serious organised crime (section 27); and
- failure to report serious organised crime (section 28).

227. There is also to be a statutory aggravation (section 26) “where an offence can be proved to have been connected with serious organised crime.”\textsuperscript{170}

\textsuperscript{169} Policy Memorandum, paragraph 107.
\textsuperscript{170} Policy Memorandum, paragraph 115.
228. A number of witnesses raised concerns about the interaction or overlap with the existing common law, the definitions and other aspects of these offences.

Interaction with the common law

229. The Judges of the High Court of Justiciary observed in their written submission that “a person who agrees to become involved in serious organised crime under our existing law commits the offence of conspiracy to commit a crime.” They sought further explanation of what section 25 would achieve which is not already provided for by the existing common law.

230. The SCCJR also questioned this apparent overlap with the common law—

“It is not clear whether these new sections really add anything to existing offences such as conspiracy or incitement, or simply constitute a rather muddy overlap and ‘legislative creep’.”

231. Responding to the point about overlap, the Solicitor General accepted that the new statutory provision would duplicate the common law to some extent – as was already the case with, for example, vandalism and malicious mischief – but argued that specific statutory provision could provide a useful framework for prosecutors and investigators seeking to address serious organised crime.

232. However, the main argument advanced in support of the new provisions was that they would make it easier to secure a conviction than the existing law of conspiracy. According to Gordon Meldrum, Director General of the SCDEA—

“The current criminal law does not completely fail us – we can use the charge of conspiracy – but it is difficult to prove that such individuals have been involved in a specific offence, whereas the provisions in the Bill will create the specific offences of being involved in and directing serious organised crime.”

233. Similarly, the Lord Advocate accepted that “with creativity” the common law could be used to prosecute most of the behaviour aimed at by the new provisions, but section 25 in particular takes matters “a stage back” compared with the existing law on conspiracy—

“We are talking about the stage of preparation and the stage of perpetration. In many cases, we have evidence that does not quite show that the person was at the actual conspiracy stage; rather, it relates to their becoming involved in a conspiracy.”

234. The Cabinet Secretary backed this up by saying—

“The Crown has made the point that proving conspiracy can be difficult. It is therefore appropriate that we have an additional statutory basis that allows us, while keeping the appropriate balance in the scales of justice, to ensure that it is not as difficult to convict someone of involvement in serious organised crime as it is to convict them of conspiracy, and to send a message that society will take serious organised crime extremely seriously.”

235. Later in the same evidence session, he added that—

“The job of our Government is to ensure that the appropriate legislative framework is put in place to allow the police and the prosecution service to do their job. They have told us that they do not believe that the current law of conspiracy is appropriate.”

Definition of serious organised crime

236. Section 25 of the Bill defines “serious organised crime” as—

“crime involving two or more persons acting together for the principal purpose of committing or conspiring to commit a serious offence or a series of serious offences” and then defines “serious offence” as “an indictable offence—

(a) committed with the intention of securing a material benefit for any person, or

(b) which is an act of serious violence committed with the intention of securing such a benefit in the future.”

237. The Committee notes that the definition of “serious offence” covers all indictable offences aimed at securing a material benefit (for instance any common law theft or fraud) rather than being restricted to offences involving serious violence, drugs trafficking and firearms, for example. The Committee also notes that the definition of “organised” as involving two or more people conspiring together would cover much ordinary criminal activity.

238. The Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency (SCDEA), the body responsible for tackling serious organised crime in Scotland, welcomed the new offences but expressed a number of concerns about the definitions and the difficulties of securing evidence in order to prove the offences. The Agency said that it would be preferable if the term “serious offence” could be applied to any crime capable of being indicted which would enable instances of minor crime, motivated by serious organised crime, to be dealt with more effectively.

239. The Scottish Centre for Crime and Justice Research (SCCJR) was one of a number of witnesses concerned about the potential breadth of the definition of serious organised crime. It observed that the definition “sets a very low threshold for what might constitute serious organised crime” and that “much of what would be captured by the definition given here is ‘crime that is comparatively organised’ not serious organised crime.”

240. The SCCJR also noted that there is no standard UK definition of organised crime, although there are various informal working definitions in use. It argued, therefore, that—

> “Whilst such definitions may be appropriate in the context of policing, it is not appropriate for a statutory definition. Given the lack of a standard definition it seems inadvisable to frame legislation that introduces one that is so over-inclusive.”

241. In their written submission, the Judges of the High Court of Justiciary said that these provisions risked including a wider range of offenders than is appropriate—

> “If this is correct, we doubt that it is a principled approach in the criminal law simply to leave it to the discretion of the prosecuting authorities when to invoke provisions which are themselves unduly wide in their scope.”

242. Ian Duguid QC, representing the Faculty of Advocates, also questioned the scope of the definition—

> “If the Bill is trying to pursue persons who have a remote connection with serious organised crime, that is a perfectly laudable objective. That aspect of the provisions is well founded; the issue is whether enough care has been taken in the drafting and whether the Bill will create more difficulties than it is trying to solve. Who is envisaged to be ‘involved in serious organised crime’? Is it every person across the board?”

243. Using an extreme example to illustrate the same point, the Sheriffs’ Association pointed out that “if two people agree to steal a meat pie from a shop to give it to a starving beggar, they commit the offence of being involved in serious organised crime.”

244. However, in oral evidence, the Lord Advocate refuted the suggestion that such a crime would be prosecuted on indictment—

> “Of course, if two people conspire to steal a meat pie, I can – theoretically – indict them for that. Currently, that is under the common law. However, I would not do so, because if I did, I would receive criticism – and not delicate criticism – from the judiciary and others. I would be seen as having lost all common sense.”

245. The Cabinet Secretary for Justice re-emphasised the point—

“The Crown will not libel such matters on a whim or fancy. Indeed, if any such matter were so libelled, I would expect our judiciary to treat the charge with the contempt that it deserved by dismissing it fairly summarily.”¹⁸⁶

246. The Lord Advocate explained to the Committee why she considered that a wide definition of serious organised crime was appropriate—

“With the jurisprudence of the European Convention on Human Rights, particularly Article 7, there is a drive towards greater certainty about what constitutes a crime … The benefit of having a wider definition is that it gives us the capacity to indict immediately, without having to wait for legislation, when an innovative new business is created that should clearly be struck at in the context of serious organised crime, as opposed to the simple commission of fraud. Even emergency legislation can miss that opportunity.”¹⁸⁷

247. Chief Constable Stephen House, representing ACPOS, also argued against tightening the definition—

“If we tighten the definition too much we will miss issues and new crimes. Criminals might even exploit the definition to ensure that activity does not fall within the definition of ‘serious organised crime’ and therefore cannot attract the powers that we are talking about. Definitions have been exploited in that way in the past.”¹⁸⁸

248. The Cabinet Secretary said he was willing to consider narrowing down the scope of the provision to concentrate more clearly on serious organised crime, but pointed out that “the fail-safe of judicial interpretation” should ensure that the provisions are not used inappropriately.¹⁸⁹

Serious violence
249. In addition to these concerns that the definitions are too widely drawn, there was also a suggestion that including the term “serious violence” in the definition of serious offence risked being too restrictive. According to the Scottish Crime and Drugs Enforcement Agency (SCDEA)—

“It is unclear what would constitute an act of serious violence ... those involved in organised crime may achieve their objectives through fear and intimidation without necessarily resorting to serious violence, albeit it is acknowledged that violence may well occur. The use of the term appears to be unnecessarily restrictive and should be widened to include any behaviour which is used to further the activity of organised crime.”¹⁹⁰

250. Expanding on the point in oral evidence, Gordon Meldrum argued—

¹⁹⁰ Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency. Written submission to the Justice Committee.
“In witness statements or through intelligence, we pick up on the fact that serious and organised crime groups operate through a culture of fear, intimidation and threats. On occasions, there might not be a physical act of violence but there will be threats, intimidation and all sorts of other non-violent abuse. That is how those groups manipulate people from all walks of life in order to get their own way.”

251. In response, the Lord Advocate explained that—

“Threats and intimidation are indictable offences; the outcome depends on the situation in which they take place. I could indict a threat or extortion in the High Court—indeed, we have done so.”

Offences aggravated by connection with serious organised crime

252. In the Policy Memorandum, the Scottish Government sets out its view that—

“criminal offences committed with the underlying purpose or motivation of committing or conspiring to commit serious organised crime are more serious on account of the context in which they take place and the motivation of the offender.”

253. Accordingly, under the Bill, where a criminal offence has been committed with the underlying purpose or motivation of committing or conspiring to commit serious organised crime, this could be treated as an aggravating factor and the court would have the discretion to adjust the sentence accordingly.

254. The Sheriffs’ Association, however, questioned this reasoning—

“It is not always appreciated that courts can take aggravating circumstances into account in sentencing without there having to be a statutory aggravation as in [section] 26. There may be a desire for statutory aggravations for statistical purposes, but they are not necessary.”

255. Nevertheless, the Lord Advocate said that she believed the new provisions would be “very useful”—

“I hope that, in addition to dealing with the crime itself, the courts will clearly show and reflect the seriousness with which engagement in serious organised crime, intimidation, the exploitation of human beings for human trafficking or sexual purposes, or engagement in drug trafficking are treated in Scotland by reference to the aggravation and by having the particular offences available.”

256. The Scottish Centre for Crime and Justice Research (SCCJR) accepted that this may be an appropriate aggravation to recognise in law but considered that the broad definition of serious organised crime meant that the aggravation could be “too easily applied or proved”. It also questioned why, under section 26(4), the normal requirement for corroborating evidence is disapplied, so that evidence from a single source is sufficient to prove aggravation by a connection with serious organised crime—

“Given the potential severity of the penalty it is not clear why this requirement is being relaxed, or that the relaxation is justified.”197

Failure to report serious organised crime

257. The Policy Memorandum explains the rationale for section 28 of the Bill as follows—

“Serious Organised Crime groups rely on the assistance of professional associates and family members. The assistance of professional occupations such as lawyers and accountants is required when hiding the profits of criminal activity or converting illegitimate gains into legitimate assets. We want to ensure that those who have knowledge of an individual’s involvement in a serious organised crime network, whether in a professional or private capacity, should be under a duty to report it.”198

258. This offence will carry a maximum penalty of 5 years imprisonment, an unlimited fine or both for conviction on indictment and 12 months imprisonment, a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or both for summary conviction.199

259. In oral evidence, Gordon Meldrum, Director of the SCDEA, explained that the provision was designed to catch individuals whom he described as consultants and facilitators—

“They oil the wheels of organised crime but do not necessarily get close to the front-end criminality – they might be involved in the banking profession, the legal profession, the accounting profession, the haulage industry and so on. ... Often, they have a knowledge of the business of serious organised crime, if not necessarily the daily transaction of the criminality. The fact that they fail to report that knowledge often inhibits us. Having an offence around failure to report knowledge of serious and organised crime would be helpful with regard to those people.”200

260. The Solicitor General gave the example of an estate agent who factors a number of flats for a client and then notices they are paying huge monthly amounts for electricity: “That would tip off anyone with any semblance of common sense … that the flats were being used as cannabis farms”. Such a person might be tempted not to report their suspicions because of the large fees they are getting — and while this would not be covered by existing money-laundering legislation, the Bill would, he argued, provide a useful tool to address the situation.201

198 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 117.
199 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 119.
261. But the Sheriffs’ Association expressed concern about the terms of the offence—

“Having regard to the wide definition, the offence of failure to report serious organised crime under [section] 28 is a frightening prospect. It is of some concern that a person may unwittingly fall foul of this provision.” 202

262. The Judges of the High Court of Justiciary also expressed “considerable concerns as to how these provisions will work”, referring specifically to—

- the level of suspicion needed to render criminal any failure to disclose such a suspicion;
- the implications for this offence of the width of the definitions of “serious organised crime” and “serious offence” in section 25; and
- the breadth and lack of definition of some of the concepts used in defining this offence, such as “material benefit” in subsection (2) and “reasonable excuse” in subsection (4). 203

263. Sir Gerald Gordon expressed similar reservations—

“As it stands it could require children to report their parents just because the latter pay their school fees. The whole idea of making it an offence not to report a crime has its problems, but this section (which does not define ‘material benefit’) goes too far. It could perhaps be cured, and could certainly be improved, by some limitation on ‘material benefit’. If it is indeed intended only to apply to a direct share in the proceeds of the crime, such an amendment might help to avoid the apparent creation of a society which encourages denunciation. As it stands it has totalitarian overtones.” 204

264. On a similar theme, the Law Society of Scotland raised the issue of compatibility with the European Convention on Human Rights. It drew to the Committee’s attention a German case where the European court held that there had been a breach of Article 8 (respect for privacy and family life)—

“In this case, which involved the unlawful search of a lawyer’s office in Germany to find documents revealing the identity of a supposed associate of the lawyer, the court held that the search was a violation of Article 8 and commented that the notion of “private life” should not be taken to exclude activities of a professional or business nature. The Society questions whether the provisions of section 28 comply with Article 8.” 205

265. In oral evidence, Alan McCreadie of the Law Society concluded—

“Perhaps section 28 is too widely drafted and has unintended consequences. It must be properly considered who the provision is intended to capture.”

266. Other witnesses raised more specific concerns. Her Majesty’s Revenue and Customs (HMRC) argued that, since the offence was defined in terms of failing to report knowledge or suspicion to “a constable” it would be appropriate for this to cover relevant officers of HMRC—

“We think it should, as the obvious route for reporting tax-related offending in particular would be to HMRC directly. It would seem to us to be wrong in such cases for a person to be criminalised for reporting to HMRC instead of the police.”

267. The SCDEA expressed concern that professional legal advisers employed by an organised crime group could escape prosecution under the provisions of section 28, since “by virtue of the defence afforded under subsections (4) and/or (5) a legal adviser could continuously evade prosecution.”

268. However, according to the Lord Advocate, the protection provided for legal privilege “should not be used as a cover by solicitors or other professionals who would facilitate crime”. For her, the new offence was important—

“because a lot of organised crime can take place only with the acquiescence of certain professionals, be they estate agents, solicitors or others, who allow activity to take place through what are ostensibly legal and legitimate activities. We must ensure that we tackle that route. … I am not concerned that the provision is too widely drawn, but if that is seen to be the case, we can consider whether amendments might provide reassurance.”

269. Chief Constable Stephen House, ACPOS, argued that the new offence was necessary—

“simply because we have to get at serious and organised crime in any way that we can. The people who choose to become involved in it make a conscious choice. Therefore, they are ready for it and are getting into a defendable position. … In section 28, we are saying that, if such people have suspicions or knowledge, they need to step forward and, if they do not, they commit an offence.”

270. In a joint supplementary submission, SCDEA and ACPOS gave several examples of how the new provisions could make a difference to the prosecution of serious organised crime, including the following—

“During a recent investigation it became apparent that a number of persons were identified as having knowledge of the business of a serious organised crime group. There was however insufficient evidence to charge them with offences in connection with the primary activity of the group. Had the provisions of section 28 been available then they most certainly would have been charged under those provisions. As it was, whilst a number were charged with other offences, some of those involved could not be charged and therefore evaded prosecution.”

271. The Cabinet Secretary for Justice acknowledged that the offence of failure to report serious organised crime was targeted widely, but said it was “about allowing discretion and judgment to be used by the police, the SCDEA, HMRC and, ultimately, the Crown and the courts”, and was “a backstop, to an extent”. He went on—

“It is not so much the person whom we might ask, ‘Where did you think the money was coming from?’ whom we are targeting; we are targeting the people whom we know to be working as the scribes or authors of inventive schemes to take money that has been bled from our community to make themselves ever richer.”

Committee conclusions
272. We strongly support the underlying intention of these sections of the Bill to provide additional tools for the police and the courts to tackle those involved in serious organised crime. We are less certain, however, that the Bill gets the detail right.

273. While there was contradictory evidence and most members are not entirely clear on what sections 25 and 27 add to the existing common law on conspiracy and incitement, and while we have some concern that the key terms of “involvement” and “direction” are insufficiently clear, on balance we support the creation of these new offences. We also support the new aggravation provided for in section 26, although we are not wholly convinced of the case for removing the normal requirement for corroborating evidence. We would therefore welcome a clearer justification for this element of the provision from Ministers.

274. We have considered carefully the evidence we have received about the definitions underpinning these new offences, namely the definitions of “serious organised crime” and “serious offence”. The main concern is that they are too widely drawn, and in this context we note that there is some dispute about whether offences need to be widely drawn in statute to ensure that the courts can apply them as intended. The Lord Advocate advanced this view, suggesting that ECHR case-law has made it increasingly difficult for the courts to “expand” on a narrowly-drawn statutory definition in deciding what constitutes an offence. However, the Committee’s criminal justice adviser (Professor Peter Duff) has suggested that the European Court of Human Rights extends a considerable “margin of appreciation” to domestic courts, and that if the serious organised crime offences were more tightly defined, the Court “would grant the Scottish courts considerable leeway in interpreting the legislation creatively to extend to all the types of mischief it was intended to cover”. Accordingly, we invite the Scottish Government to re-examine the extent to which it may be possible to tighten the definitions in the light of the evidence we have received.

275. Of the provisions on serious organised crime, the one that has given us most difficulty is the section 28 offence of failure to report serious organised crime. It would clearly aid the fight against serious organised crime if people who come into contact with it, even quite innocently or inadvertently, were more prepared to report their suspicions to the police – but it is much less clear that a criminal sanction for not doing so is a fair or indeed effective way of encouraging this. People may be reluctant to report suspicions to the police for quite understandable reasons.

276. We also think more allowance should be made for the nature of a person’s role if they are to be held liable for not reporting suspicions arising from information gained in the course of their business or employment. For example, if unusually large amounts of cash are banked by a small business and this prompts suspicion among bank staff, it is one thing to hold liable for not reporting this a senior manager or trained professional, but another to hold liable a junior cashier. Similar concerns may arise about information gained through a “close personal relationships” from which a “material benefit” is derived, as this could apply to the teenage child of a gangster who has begun to understand where the family income comes from.

277. While we do not agree with Sir Gerald Gordon that section 28 has “totalitarian overtones”, we do agree with his view that the provision could certainly be improved. For the time being, we invite the Scottish Government either to provide a better justification for this provision, or to bring forward amendments that will address the concerns raised.

Section 34: Extreme pornography

278. Section 34 of the Bill inserts into the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 new provisions to criminalise the possession of obscene pornographic images which explicitly and realistically depict various “extreme acts”.

279. The policy objective is to “help ensure the public are protected from exposure to extreme pornography that depicts horrific images of violence”.213 The maximum penalty for the new offence will be three years imprisonment or a fine or both.214

280. The Policy Memorandum explains that it is already illegal to publish, sell or distribute the obscene material that would be covered by this new offence. Section 34(1) increases the maximum penalty for these activities from three to five years “to emphasise the seriousness attached to distribution of this type of material”.215

213 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 153.
214 Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill, section 34(2) inserting section 51A(8)(b)
215 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 158.
281. The new offence is similar to that in section 63 of the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008, which applies in the rest of the UK. The proposed Scottish offence goes further, however, as—

“it will cover all obscene pornographic images which realistically depict rape or other non-consensual penetrative sexual activity, whether violent or otherwise (whereas the English offence only covers forms of violent rape).”

282. Provisions to establish a category of excluded images and defences to a charge of possession of an extreme pornographic image are also included within section 34.

283. Most of those who commented on this section supported the creation of an offence of possessing extreme pornography, although some argued that there is no evidence that pornography increases sexual offending and opposed these provisions as an unjustifiable intrusion into the private lives of citizens.

Definition of extreme pornography

284. A number of concerns were expressed about the definition of the new offence, either arguing that it is too wide or that it should be extended in various directions.

285. In his written submission, James Chalmers of Edinburgh University School of Law noted that the provisions in the Bill go significantly beyond the definition canvassed in a consultation exercise carried out by the Scottish Executive and Home Office in 2005 and subsequently implemented for the rest of the UK in the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008. He noted that the Policy Memorandum says only that this definition was “insufficiently broad” without giving any further explanation—

“The Policy Memorandum observes that the English legislation does not cover rape per se, but this is hardly an accident of drafting: there was a clear desire to limit the legislation to extremely serious cases.”

286. Mr Chalmers argued that the Scottish Government had “at no stage explained its rationale for criminalising such possession. It can hardly be the simple fact that the activity depicted is criminal: murder is regularly depicted on terrestrial television without objection.”

287. On the other hand, several respondents expressly supported the use of the wider definition in the Bill.

288. Ian Duguid QC, representing the Faculty of Advocates, expressed strong support for an offence of possessing extreme adult pornography—
“It is only proper that the law deal with such images, including computer-generated images. The difficulty that I can envisage concerns policing the internet, but I have no difficulty with the full weight of the law being applied when a fruitful investigation is undertaken that reveals images of that type. If the law requires to be amended as is proposed so that it reflects the public’s attitude, that is perfectly reasonable as far as I am concerned.”

289. In its written submission, the Crown Office explained how it would approach enforcement of the new offence—

“Although the offence is broad in its terms and allows for a wide latitude of discretion in determining what amounts to a prohibited image, careful consideration will be given, if it is enacted, to the development of clear guidance for police and prosecutors to ensure that it is enforced consistently and fairly.”

290. In oral evidence, the Lord Advocate was asked whether the new offence was drawn widely enough. She commented—

“We already have the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982, which includes the wider definition of, or the fundamental platform of, obscenity. … The difficulty in respect of pornography is that we come up against the ECHR rights of freedom of expression and the article 8 rights to privacy in the context of sexual activity. It is important to derive some certainty in that area in order to show a balance – to show not only that what is being done in engaging article 8 is proportionate, but that it has a degree of certainty in that area of criminality.”

Definition of obscene

291. Several respondents questioned whether the word obscene should form part of the definition. For example, the Women’s Support Project argued that—

“the inclusion of ‘obscene’ in the criteria for extreme pornography dilutes the focus of the new proposals, retains a ‘moral’ judgement and suggests that the intention behind the proposals is to prevent depravity or corruption. The WSP believes that the Scottish Government should not rely on the 1982 Act for a definition of obscenity but develop a definition based on an understanding of the broad cultural harm to which pornography contributes.”

292. Other respondents also argued for a definition focused on “cultural harm”. Professor Clare McGlynn and Dr Erika Rackley, Durham Law School, offered a justification for this approach—

225 Women’s Support Project. Written submission to the Justice Committee.
226 Engender; Women’s Support Project; Professor Clare McGlynn and Dr Erika Rackley; Violence Against Women Strategy Multi-Agency Working Group. Written submissions to the Justice Committee.
“Legislative action against extreme pornography is justified because of the ‘cultural harm’ of such material, by which we mean that the existence and use of extreme pornography contributes to a society which fails to take sexual violence against women seriously.”

293. Professor McGlynn and Dr Rackley urged the Committee to reconsider the use of the language and concept of “obscenity”, partly because “the definition of ‘obscene’ is vague and opaque” and leads to “a great level of discretion and lack of clarity”. In addition, the term—

“has been used to cover the depiction of activities which are not in themselves unlawful, yet may be viewed by some as morally wrong or disgusting (such as images of coprophilia). The criminal law should not be used to proscribe the depiction or viewing of acts which are not unlawful in themselves to carry out.”

294. However, they also argued that the use of the term “obscene” alone was preferable to the “exceptionally vague and undefined reference in the English provisions to material which is ‘grossly offensive, disgusting or otherwise of an obscene character’ [section 63(6) of the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008]”.227

295. For ACPOS, the problem was that while “pornographic” and “extreme” were defined in the Bill, “obscene” was not, and it suggested it could be defined as “abhorrent to morality or virtue; specifically designed and intended to incite lust or depravity”.228

296. The Committee notes the evidence presented regarding the inclusion of the term “obscene” as part of the definition of extreme pornography. The Committee understands that the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 already includes reference to obscene material but notes that the word obscene is not defined in that Act.

Definition of extreme image

297. The Bill defines an image as extreme “if it depicts, in an explicit and realistic way any of the following—

(a) an act which takes or threatens a person’s life,

(b) an act which results, or is likely to result, in a person’s severe injury,

(c) rape or other non-consensual penetrative sexual activity,

(d) sexual activity involving (directly or indirectly) a human corpse,

(e) an act, which involves sexual activity between a person and an animal (or the carcase of an animal).”229

227 Professor Clare McGlynn and Dr Erika Rackley. Written submission to the Justice Committee.
228 ACPOS. Supplementary written submission to the Justice Committee.
229 Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill, section 34(2).
298. Some respondents, including the Zero Tolerance Charitable Trust and the Violence Against Women Strategy Multi-Agency Working Group, suggested that the definition of an extreme image set out at (b) above should be changed from an act which is “likely” to result in severe injury to “threatens” to cause this result. They argued that this would increase the scope to cover acts of rape which could be said to threaten severe injury, but are not likely actually to result in severe injury.230

299. The SCDEA suggested there might be “practical difficulties” with the definition of an extreme image—

“The use of the terminology ‘depicts, in an explicit and realistic way’ would seem to include all images where such acts are depicted but are subsequently shown to have been staged or acted out. For example, a realistic depiction of a rape or sexual murder, which is undoubtedly pornographic but where the ‘victim’ is shown to have suffered no harm and to have been a willing participant in actions depicted, would appear to be included in the definition.”231

300. Subsequently, in a joint submission with SCDEA, ACPOS suggested that a better approach to defining extreme image could be to replace the list of specified acts with a more general definition that would capture “all images of illegal acts committed with a sexual motivation (subject to the exclusions currently outlined within the Bill).” 232

Computer-generated images
301. Several respondents suggested that non-photographic representations of extreme acts should be covered, in particular computer generated images of the sort found in virtual reality games.233 Rape Crisis Scotland explained the basis for its concern about this issue—

“We believe that it is a missed opportunity to not include non-photographic representations of extreme acts in the Bill. This means that the provision in the Bill will not cover depictions of extreme pornography on virtual worlds such as Second Life or games online or other digital platforms, where the pornography is violent, extreme and interactive, but where the images are not photographic. Similarly, we would like to emphasis that there is still a need to enact similar legislation in relation to child pornography, as proposed by the Scottish Executive in early 2007.”234

302. Tom Roberts, representing Children 1st, commented on the effect such images may have on children—

“Given that computer-generated images can be used to groom children by suggesting to them that something that happens on their computer must be acceptable, the distribution of such images can cause harm or distress to children and can be just as bad as the other type of material that circulates on the internet. We need to ensure that our laws can deal with that appropriately.”

303. ACPOS considered this issue in a supplementary written submission—

“The use of the phrase ‘in an explicit and realistic way’ is worthy of debate when considering the definition of ‘extreme’ in respect of cartoon images, etc. It may be argued that cartoon (or other) images with gross distortions are not ‘realistic’. However these may well portray extreme pornographic images which are clearly understood.”

304. ACPOS suggested that it may be more appropriate to address the action rather than the realistic portrayal of the image, for example by referring to any image that “depicts in an explicit manner a representation of an event of a sexual and pornographic nature”.

305. But for James Chalmers, it was “clear” that section 34 already covers computer generated images—

“The only limiting factor is that an image must be ‘realistic’ to fall within the scope of the provisions. The Bill is not limited to particular types of image. In this respect, it is rather wider than the offence of possessing indecent photographs of children, which is restricted to ‘photographs or pseudo-photographs’, including photographs comprised in films. A ‘pseudo-photograph’ is ‘an image, whether produced by computer-graphics or otherwise howsoever, which appears to be a photograph’ [Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982, sections 52 and 52A].”

Incest

306. A number of organisations argued in favour of extending the definition of “extreme pornography” to cover incest. Rape Crisis Scotland argued that the provisions in the Bill would not necessarily cover pornography which glorifies incest, unless it is clear that the woman depicted is not old enough to consent—

“We believe serious consideration must be given to extending the definition of extreme to include depictions of incest (which is in itself an illegal activity) to ensure these types of materials are covered by the legislation.”

Possession

307. Various questions about the definition of “possession” were raised by respondents to the Committee’s call for evidence.

308. The SCCJR argued that for reasons of clarity, it would be better if the provisions were to clearly define the meaning of possession—

“Since, as is acknowledged in the Policy Memorandum, this is aimed at material produced and distributed in electronic form, it is important to be specific about what amounts to possession in these circumstances. Viewing an image online means that it is downloaded and (usually) stored on the hard drive of the computer of the viewer. Does possession extend to all images cached on the computer hard-drive?”

309. The National Gender-based Violence Programme Team, part of the Healthcare, Strategy and Policy Directorate, Scottish Government, submitted that there was a need to clarify whether possession would cover repeated viewings of extreme pornography, whether or not the material was actually downloaded.

310. According to Professor McGlynn and Dr Rackley—

“The concept of possession is key to this offence. It is not defined in the Bill (nor in the English provisions). This is a serious omission. We suggest the legislation include a definition of possession to clarify exactly what will be covered.”

311. However, ACPOS and the SCDEA said they were “content that existing legislation and case law would provide sufficient definition around the term ‘possession’.”

Excluded images and defences

312. Under the proposed section 51B of the 1982 Act, images that would otherwise qualify as extreme pornography are excluded from the scope of the offence (under proposed section 51A) if they are from a “classified work” – which is defined as a video work which has been classified by a “designated authority” such as the British Board of Film Classification (BBFC). In addition, section 51C provides a series of defences to a charge of possession of an extreme pornographic image, including a defence for those who directly participated in the act depicted.

313. The Consenting Adult Action Network, which opposes making possession of extreme pornography a criminal offence, questioned whether the provision for “excluded images” was appropriate—

“If the material in question causes demonstrable harm, then it is totally utterly irresponsible on the part of government to insert the BBFC exemption – and suggests a bowing to commercial (film) pressure in preference to a genuine desire to protect members of society. Further, would not most BBFC material fail the ‘realistic’ or ‘pornographic’ test once it is known that the material is from a film? There is no reason for this section to be in there.”245

314. The Judges of the High Court of Justiciary also questioned the provisions regarding excluded images and the defence of direct participation—

“We question the policy of allowing a designated body to exclude from the scope of the criminal law an image which meets the definition of extreme pornographic image. Why should such a body, in the context of criminal law, decide that such material, the possession of which would otherwise be criminal, is acceptable as a part of or as being in its entirety a work of art?

“We are also at a loss to understand the defence in proposed section 51C of the 1982 Act protecting the persons who directly participated in the act depicted. If the depiction is unacceptable as amounting to extreme pornography, we do not see why the participant who retains the material for private use should have the defences available in subsection (4) of section 51C when other possessors, for good policy reasons, do not.”246

Committee conclusions
315. The Committee shares the Scottish Government’s aim to protect the public from extreme pornography, but has noted a range of concerns raised in evidence about the parameters of the new offence proposed. There are various points on which we would seek further clarification from the Scottish Government. The first is why the definition of “extreme image” includes a much broader reference to depictions of rape than was suggested in consultation and is provided for in the equivalent England and Wales legislation. Secondly, we would be grateful for further explanation about why that definition refers to “realistic” depictions of sexual acts, and how that relates to cartoons or other images that have been distorted or have a fantasy element. Thirdly, we would seek clarification on the rationale for using the term “obscene” as part of the definition of extreme pornography, when that term is itself undefined in the Bill, and whether any consideration was given to alternative definitions in terms of the cultural harm that pornography can cause. Finally, we would be grateful for clarification of what is meant by “possession” of extreme pornography, and whether, in the absence of any definition in the Bill, what understanding of that term would be relied on by the courts (particularly where images come into someone’s possession through electronic transmission).

316. The Committee accepts the rationale for excluding from the offence of possessing extreme pornography images that form all or part of a classified work, such as a film granted a certificate by the British Board of Film Classification. However, we are uncertain about some of the practical implications, for example whether it offers protection from prosecution to the film-maker who is in possession of a film that the BBFC has not yet been able to consider for certification.

317. We are satisfied with the defences that are provided in inserted section 51C. In particular, while we note the concerns raised in evidence, we agree that the Bill is right to distinguish between the possession of an image by those who participated in the sexual activity depicted and the onward transmission of that image to third parties.

Section 35: People Trafficking

Background

318. Section 22 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003 makes it an offence to engage in trafficking for the purposes of prostitution. UK-wide provisions making it an offence to engage in trafficking for purposes of exploitation (including slavery, forced labour and organ harvesting) are contained in sections 4 and 5 of the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc.) Act 2004. Amendments to the 2004 Act to clarify the application of those offences were made by the UK Borders Act 2007, but these amendments only apply in England, Wales and Northern Ireland.

319. Section 35 of the Bill is intended to clarify Scots law and ensure consistency across the UK. Accordingly, it amends section 22 of the 2003 Act to make clear that the existing offence of trafficking for the purposes of prostitution applies whether the trafficking is into, within or out of the UK, and whether it is directed from inside the UK or from outside the UK, and it specifies in which sheriff court districts an offender may be proceeded against. The section also makes similar changes to the 2004 Act to ensure consistency across the UK.

Evidence received

320. ACPOS was supportive of the proposed changes but sought clarification that any new offences created would apply to those who traffic from within the UK and would not be limited to those who orchestrate trafficking from outwith the UK. It also suggested that the definition of facilitation should include related activity such as the procurement of travel documents, transport and offers of work and accommodation. Finally, ACPOS argued that “it is vital that further consideration should be given to extending the legislation to include labour exploitation, sexual exploitation and domestic servitude rather than being exclusive to prostitution.”

321. Care for Scotland also welcomed the proposals but said it missed an opportunity and that “until the root causes of sex trafficking and other forms of sexual exploitation through prostitution are sufficiently addressed, attempts to diminish the phenomenon will be limited.” It warned that, unless Scottish legislation in this area kept pace with that in the rest of the UK, the numbers of people trafficked into Scotland for the purpose of sexual exploitation would continue to grow.

Committee conclusions

322. The Committee has no difficulties with this provision as far as it goes, but it would be useful to get a clearer indication of what else the Scottish Government is doing to tackle trafficking issues, particularly in view of the absence so far of convictions for sexual exploitation under the 2003 Act (notwithstanding suggestions that Glasgow has the highest number of trafficked persons outside London).249 We are sympathetic to the concerns expressed by ACPOS that the legislation should be sufficiently broad to cover all forms of trafficking. We are particularly concerned that the problem may be exacerbated during the Commonwealth Games in 2014. We would therefore welcome assurances from the Cabinet Secretary that the changes made by the Bill will contribute meaningfully to addressing this problem.

PART 3 – CRIMINAL PROCEDURE

Section 38: Prosecution of children

Background

323. Section 38 of the Bill amends the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 so as to prohibit the prosecution of children under the age of 12 years in the criminal courts. As a result, whatever the offence committed, a child under the age of 12 will in future only be able to be dealt with by the children’s hearing system.250

324. The UN Committee on the Rights of the Child carried out a periodic examination of the UK in September 2008 to see how well it was protecting children’s human rights. It made more than 100 concluding observations (recommendations) about where the UK must do more to put the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) fully into practice. Among its recommendations on youth justice, the UN Committee said that the age of criminal responsibility (currently eight in Scotland) must be made higher.251

325. Article 40(3)(a) of the UNCRC requires States to establish “a minimum age below which children shall be presumed not to have the capacity to infringe the penal law”.252 The UN Committee considers it not to be internationally acceptable for a minimum age of criminal responsibility to be set below the age of 12 years.253

326. In December 2008, the Scottish Government published a consultation on its response to the UN Committee’s concluding observations. This included specific

---

250 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 191.
reference to the age of criminal responsibility and invited responses on this issue.254

327. In October 2000, the Scottish Law Commission (“the SLC”) was asked by the Scottish Ministers to look at the rules on the age of criminal responsibility, including the rule (contained in section 41 of the 1995 Act) which presumes that a child under the age of eight cannot be guilty of any offence. In its report, published in January 2002, the SLC made the following principal recommendations—

“1. Any rule (whether at common law or statutory) on the age at which children cannot be found guilty of an offence should be abolished.

“2. The existing statutory provisions which place restrictions on the prosecution of children under 16 should be retained subject to an amendment to the effect that a child under the age of 12 cannot be prosecuted.

“3. It should be competent to refer a child to a children’s hearing under section 52(2)(i) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 notwithstanding that because of his age the child cannot be prosecuted for the offence.

“4. None of the provisions in the Act shall apply in respect of the conduct of a child committed prior to the date on which the Act comes into force or to any prosecution commenced prior to that date.”255

328. The Policy Memorandum claims that the Bill implements the main recommendations of the SLC report by introducing a prohibition on the prosecution of children under 12 in the criminal courts. However, “the SLC’s recommendation to abolish the existing conclusive presumption in relation to under 8s is not taken forward”; nor is the current age-limit increased.256

329. The result is that, under the Bill, children aged between eight and 11 will continue to be treated as capable of committing criminal offences but will not be capable of being prosecuted in the criminal courts. Instead, they will, where appropriate, be referred to a Children’s Hearing. The prosecution of children aged between 12 and 15 will remain a decision entirely for the Lord Advocate.

Evidence received
330. The Committee received several written submissions which expressed support for the proposal to raise the minimum age at which children may be prosecuted.257

257 Action for Children Scotland; Children in Scotland; COSLA; ADSW. Written submissions to the Justice Committee.
331. Children 1st welcomed the proposed increase to 12 but commented that this was “the bare minimum and still leaves Scotland with a low age in comparison to many other European states.”

332. Dr Jonathan Sher of Children in Scotland argued that 16, not 12, should be both the age of criminal responsibility and the age of criminal prosecution—

“That would dovetail with other things that already exist. The children’s hearings system, by and large, operates until the age of 16. Polmont young offenders institution starts to take offenders at the age of 16. Looked-after and accommodated children continue to be so until they age out at 16. Even if 16 is somewhat arbitrary, it is at least consistent with other laws relating to age and the perception of responsibility.”

333. The Scottish Centre for Crime and Justice Research (SCCJR) generally welcomed the changes proposed, but noted that they fell short of the Scottish Law Commission’s recommendations—

“The Bill proposes that 8 years would be retained as the age below which children are incapable of committing crime; 12 would be introduced as the age below which children can no longer be prosecuted and 16 would remain as the (usual) age of automatic referral to the adult system. The only difference, then, is the inability to prosecute those children aged eight, nine, ten and eleven.”

334. James Chalmers described as a “surprising omission” the decision not to implement the Scottish Law Commission recommendation to abolish the rule that no child under the age of eight can commit a criminal offence—

“This is because there might be circumstances in which a child under that age had committed a crime, ought therefore to be referred to a children’s hearing, and could not be referred on any other ground (as in Merrin v S 1987 SLT 193). The Commission noted that virtually all consultees who had responded to the proposals in their Discussion Paper on this point agreed with this proposal (Report, para 3.24).”

335. Mr Chalmers concluded that “in the absence of good reason to the contrary – this recommendation should be implemented in the Bill.”

336. The Scottish Children’s Reporter Administration (SCRA) expressed its support for the Scottish Government’s proposals on the grounds that the children’s hearings system is able to ensure that children get the most appropriate form of intervention and support, while addressing concerning behaviour. However, the SCRA cautioned that—261 James Chalmers. Written submission to the Justice Committee.

“if the [children’s hearings] system is to deal with the small number of very serious offences committed by 8-12 year olds it must be properly resourced and interventions must be focused and effectively delivered.”

337. The office of Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People (SCCYP) was also generally supportive, but with reservations—

“We believe that the Bill in its current form would continue to allow for children between 8 and 11 years of age to face ‘criminal’ consequences despite the new minimum age for prosecution set at 12. With section 41 [of the 1995 Act] retained in its present form, disposals of the welfare-based Children’s Hearing relating to this age group count as a conviction for the purposes of the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974.”

338. Maire McCormack, for the SCCYP, explained further—

“If a child accepts an offence ground or that is established, there are serious implications under section 3 of the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974. Our office has evidence that there are implications later in life for children who accept such grounds, because the information is still carried when they are looking for employment or want to go to college. The fact that they accepted a ground as a young child can come back to haunt them.”

339. A child dealt with by the welfare-based Children’s Hearing System could therefore still “have a criminal record if they and their relevant adult accept an offence ground or an offence ground is established by a Sheriff”. As a result, “questions would therefore remain as to whether the age of criminal responsibility has actually been raised – it could be argued that in terms of the criminal consequences for children who commit offences this remains at the unacceptably low level that is at present.”

340. SCCYP suggested that section 41 of the 1995 Act should be repealed and “a new non-offence ground should be introduced to allow for children under 12 to be referred to the Children’s Hearing so that their behaviour and their needs can be addressed without the prospect of ‘criminal’ consequences.”

341. The Law Society of Scotland also proposed the creation of a new non-offence ground for referral to a Children’s Hearing, suggesting it could be—

“along the lines of ‘the child has behaved in such a way as to cause (or risk causing) harm to himself/herself or another person or damage to property’ … The benefits of this proposal would be that the child would not carry the taint of criminality for the rest of his or her life and that he or she would receive early intervention.\footnote{Law Society of Scotland. Written submission to the Justice Committee.}

\textbf{Committee conclusions}

342. The Committee recognises that there are various ways of addressing concerns about the fact that Scots law allows children as young as eight to be regarded as criminally liable and prosecuted through the courts, when a minimum age of 12 is recommended by the UN Committee. However, we remain unclear why the Scottish Government has opted for raising the minimum age at which a child may be prosecuted, rather than also abolishing the rule of law on the age at which children cannot be guilty of an offence (as the Scottish Law Commission recommended). An alternative, suggested by SCCYP, would have been to raise that age from eight to 12, and then to provide for a new “non-offence” ground to enable children below 12 to be referred to a Children’s Hearing in cases where other grounds for referral do not apply. We find it difficult to assess whether the approach adopted in the Bill is the best available option without a fuller explanation of the Scottish Government’s reasoning. While we recognise that the difference between the various approaches may be mostly theoretical, it would be useful to know how far the Scottish Government’s choice of approach was based on practical considerations, such as whether it would permit retention of children’s forensic data, or how offences committed by children would be recorded (and what implications this might have for their future prospects).

343. We recognise that children under 12 can sometimes do terrible things, and if there is to be a statutory ban on criminal prosecution in all such cases, it would be useful to have an assurance from the Cabinet Secretary that there is a sufficient range of disposals available within the children’s hearings system.

344. We note that the Bill does not change the existing situation in which the option of referring children to a Children’s Hearing on the ground that they have committed an offence is unavailable for a child under the age of eight. We note that the Scottish Government intends to bring forward a Children’s Hearings Bill in the near future and we trust that this issue will be properly and fully considered in that context.

345. On the question of whether 12 is the appropriate age threshold (either for being deemed capable of committing a crime, or for being liable to prosecution), we have no settled view. We recognise that any age is, to some extent, arbitrary, but there may be merit in having some consistency with age-limits in other relevant statutory contexts. We are conscious, in particular, that the new Sexual Offences (Scotland) Act sets an age threshold of 13 for the definition of various sexual offences against young children, and we suggest that the Scottish Government could do more to explain why the same age was not adopted in the current context.
Sections 58-60: Retention and use of samples etc.

Background

346. Sections 58-60 of the Bill extend the powers of the police to keep forensic (primarily, DNA and fingerprint) data in a way that is consistent with the European Convention on Human Rights.

347. The Policy Memorandum explains that where a person has been convicted in court of any offence, there is currently a power to retain his or her forensic data indefinitely. In addition, since January 2007, where a person has been proceeded against but not convicted in court of certain sexual or violent crimes, the person’s DNA can be retained for a period of three years, with discretion for the chief constable to apply to a sheriff for extensions of up to two years at a time. The Bill extends this latter arrangement to the retention of fingerprints and to certain cases within the children’s hearings system.

348. In the recent case of S and Marper v. the United Kingdom, the European Court of Human Rights held that the DNA retention policy in England and Wales, which allows indefinite retention of DNA and fingerprint data taken from a suspect, regardless of whether the suspect was convicted or even charged, was incompatible with Article 8 of ECHR (respect for privacy and family life). In so doing, the court contrasted this with the present arrangements in Scotland, on which it commented favourably.

349. In 2007, the Scottish Government asked Professor James Fraser, the Director of the Centre for Forensic Science at Strathclyde University and Chair of the European Academy of Forensic Science, to review the operation and effectiveness of the legislative regime governing police powers regarding the acquisition, use and destruction of forensic data. In September 2008, the Scottish Government published the Fraser report together with a consultation on the issues it raised. This work formed the basis of the provisions that have been included in the Bill.268

350. Section 58 authorises the retention of fingerprints and any other forensic data already taken from persons proceeded against but not convicted of a serious sexual or violent offence. Data would not have to be destroyed for at least three years, and the relevant chief constable would have discretion to apply to a sheriff for extensions of up to two years at a time. This would bring the law on the retention of fingerprints and other forensic data into line with current law on DNA retention.

351. Section 59 would authorise the retention of forensic data taken from children who are dealt with by the children’s hearing system for committing relevant violent or sexual offences, again for a period of three years with the possibility of subsequent extensions of up to two years if authorised by a sheriff. The list of relevant offences is to be prescribed by statutory instrument made under the affirmative procedure.

352. In addition, section 60 specifies that retained forensic data may only be used for the prevention or detection of crime, the investigation of an offence or the conduct of a prosecution; or for the identification of a deceased person or a person from whom the data originated. This is to provide clarity and better comply with the ECHR.

Evidence received – general responses

353. Responses to the proposals contained in the Bill were few and generally favourable, although some specific issues were raised.

354. The Nuffield Council on Bioethics supported the proposal to bring the law on the retention of fingerprints and other forensic data into line with existing law on DNA retention.

355. GeneWatch argued that samples should be destroyed once DNA profiles have been obtained and loaded onto the DNA database because it is only the profile that is necessary for the purposes of future identification. GeneWatch also urged the Committee to consider putting the weeding rules for records relating to old and minor offences on a statutory basis, “with a view to improving public trust in the system of oversight for police records and linked forensic data”.

356. Professor Fraser, in oral evidence to the Committee, said that he was satisfied that the proposals in the Bill achieved an appropriate balance between law enforcement and the rights of individuals—

“The main issue relates to the retention of samples from unconvicted people. Proportionality is a tricky issue, because there are not many data to allow detailed analysis. However, when I considered the three-year period, the available data showed that a considerable number of people reoffended during the period. That was a fairly short period, and the study related to serious offences, so the retention struck me as reasonable and balanced.”

Alternatives to prosecution

357. ACPOS was concerned that the Bill failed to address what ACPOS saw as an oversight in the current law, which allows samples to be retained only where “criminal proceedings … were instituted” but no conviction was obtained. Since no criminal proceedings are instituted in cases where offenders are offered alternatives to prosecution (such as fiscal fines or fixed penalty notices), it is currently not possible for forensic data taken from such offenders to be retained.

358. Asked to comment on this, Professor Fraser said—

“The issue of direct disposals came up, and was referred to in my report, but I did not feel that I had the data to make any real sense of that. It strikes me that the purpose of such disposals is the speedy administration of justice. That purpose had not previously taken DNA into account, and I felt that the..."
issue merited more research and more consideration, so I did not express a view.”

359. Tom Nelson, Scottish Police Services Authority, supported Professor Fraser’s view and added—

“An opportunity may have been missed; we need to be careful, and more work is needed. If more cases take the road of alternatives to prosecution, I will be concerned about losing opportunities to get people’s DNA profile and check it against the DNA database. A lot more work needs to be done in this area.”

360. When asked about the same issue, the Cabinet Secretary for Justice said that the Scottish Government was considering whether there was a case for an amendment at Stage 2 to address this issue.

Retention of samples etc. from children
361. The Nuffield Council on Bioethics recommended that, when considering requests for the removal of children’s DNA profiles and the destruction of their samples, “there should be a presumption in favour of the removal of all records, fingerprints and DNA profiles, and the destruction of samples”. Children 1st also argued in favour of a strong presumption against the retention of samples from children.

362. The Law Society of Scotland submitted that it was not appropriate as a matter of principle to retain DNA and fingerprints from children who are dealt with by Children’s Hearings as opposed to the criminal courts.

363. The Information Commissioner’s Office said that, while its preferred position was for no change to the current position, it recognised that—

“an element of retention would provide a balance between the public interest in retaining relevant material of those who have committed violent or sexual crimes and the recognition that offences committed by children may not be replicated in adulthood. The proposal contained within section 59 of the Bill reflects that balance.”

364. Professor Fraser explained the basis for his conclusion on this issue—

“My recommendation was that a sample should be retained if the child accepted that he had committed, or was found by a sheriff to have committed, an offence in the narrow category of serious sexual and violent offences. Because the numbers involved are small, and because the offences are serious and involve some sort of judicial proceedings—that is, some process whereby the child is represented—I feel that the recommendation strikes a good balance between looking after the welfare of the very small number of children involved and public protection.”

365. The Scottish Children’s Reporter Administration accepted that it may be necessary to retain DNA and other forensic evidence from a child but considered that there should be a judicial process, separate from the children’s hearings system, to determine whether there is a clear and justifiable reason for doing so.

366. Similarly, the office of Scotland’s Commissioner for Children and Young People (SCCYP) argued that the automatic retention of the DNA profile of children dealt with by a Children’s Hearing for a qualifying offence was “disproportionate” and that a sheriff should only approve retention subject to the following five conditions—

“(1) the child has been referred on an offence ground; (2) the offence is one of a list of ‘trigger offences’ to be specified in the Bill; these should be serious violent and sexual offences; (3) the child and their relevant adult have accepted the ground, or it has been established by a sheriff; (4) the police or another relevant agency has made an application to the sheriff for an order to retain the child’s DNA for a period of up to three years; and (5) the sheriff makes a decision based on the risk that the child poses to public safety.”

List of specified offences

367. Maire MacCormack, representing SCCYP, expressed concern that the Bill itself did not specify those offences that would trigger retention of children’s samples—

“The Bill talks about ‘sexual and violent offences’, but that is a broad spectrum and it does not define what those offences are. I know that a working group will be set up to look into that, but we need to consider the definitions.”

368. The Law Society of Scotland also expressed concern that the list of prescribed offences is to be made by statutory instrument, albeit under affirmative procedure, “rather than placed on the face of the Bill.”

369. The SCRA submitted that if a list of relevant offences is to be produced, it should be developed by an expert working group “representing all interests, including those of children and young people themselves”.

370. Questioned on this point, the Cabinet Secretary said that the Scottish Government would consult the forensic data working group and would ensure that “appropriate people from a variety of backgrounds” were involved in drawing up the list of relevant offences.

Committee conclusions

371. The Committee agrees with the Scottish Government that it is sensible to enable fingerprint data and other forensic data to be subject to the same ECHR-compatible retention regime as DNA data.

372. We are less certain about whether the current provisions in the Bill should be extended to cover forensic data taken from people who are then offered alternatives to prosecution. We certainly would not support any change that would result in the police being required or expected routinely to take samples in situations where, at present, fixed penalties or fiscal fines can be imposed with minimal time and bureaucracy. However, we also recognise the logic of saying that, where a sample has already been taken from an individual in connection with an offence, the decision to offer an alternative to prosecution rather than institute criminal proceedings should not be sufficient to determine whether the forensic data can subsequently be retained. We would therefore look forward to a Stage 2 amendment that would allow for the retention of data in such circumstances. However, in considering the terms of any such amendment, particularly the duration of retention provided for, we would wish to ensure that an appropriate balance was struck between considerations of consistency and proportionality.

373. In relation to the retention of forensic data taken from children referred to a Children’s Hearing, we are sympathetic to the broad outline of what is proposed, but uncomfortable with the fact that the Bill leaves unspecified the sexual or violent offences that would enable the retention of data in such cases. We take the view that retention of DNA and other data from children would be required only in a small proportion of cases, probably involving serious violent or sexual crimes. We note both the evident difficulties the Scottish Government has in defining the list of relevant offences satisfactorily and concerns that the children’s hearing system is not equipped to determine such questions. It would be helpful if the Scottish Government would provide us with its view of the suggestion by SCCYP that retention should only be on application to a sheriff.

374. The Committee is conscious that the retention of DNA and other evidence, particularly from children and from persons not convicted of significant crimes, can raise issues under Article 8 of ECHR and requires a proportional approach. We note both the suggestion by the Nuffield Council on Bioethics that there should be a presumption in favour of the removal of all records, fingerprints and DNA profiles, and the argument by Genewatch that DNA samples should be destroyed once DNA profiles have been obtained, and would seek the comments of the Scottish Government on these matters.

375. We would therefore expect the Scottish Government to report in the Stage 1 debate on its position on these matters and on progress with the forensic data working group and, ideally, commit to providing us with a draft list of proposed relevant offences before Stage 2.

PART 4 – EVIDENCE

Section 62: Witness statements: use during trial

Background and evidence received

376. Under section 62, courts would be able to allow witnesses to refer to prior statements while giving evidence. This is related to section 40, which allows the prosecutor to give the witness a copy of his or her written statement in advance of giving evidence in court. The Policy Memorandum explains that it is intended “to ensure fairness for witnesses in giving evidence in criminal cases” and that it had been generally supported by those who contributed to Lord Coulsfield’s review of the law and practice of disclosure.287

377. The provision was supported by the Solicitor General for Scotland who said it would reduce the length of trials by reducing time spent on questioning witnesses, and would improve the criminal justice process by enabling witnesses to point out any inaccuracies in their statements. He also argued that many trials can become “a memory test for witnesses”, pointing out that witnesses are often questioned in court on statements they may have made many years earlier—

“If they cannot remember precisely what they said or if they say something slightly different, they will be accused of being inconsistent. It seems unfair that the only person in a prosecution who cannot see the statement before the trial is the witness who gave the statement in the first place.”288

378. The Solicitor General also explained that police officers are already allowed to refer to their notebooks, which may contain their own statements, while giving evidence, and that this provided a precedent for allowing witnesses also to refer to their statements during trials. Similar arrangements were also made in other jurisdictions, including England and Wales.

379. However, the Judges of the High Court of Justiciary said that section 62 gave “real cause for concern”. They explained that prior statements given by civilians (as opposed to police officers or expert witnesses) are written down by the investigating police officer and may not accurately reflect what the witness actually said; partly for this reason, the Scottish courts have normally accorded them much less weight than oral evidence given from the witness box.

380. In the judges’ view, there was “a real danger that the new provision will encourage a greater reliance to be placed on the contents of police statements, as opposed to a witness’ recollection of what happened and that this may complicate and lengthen trials.”289 They also suggested the provision was unnecessary—

“In our opinion, the limited circumstances in which the common law and the provisions of section 260 of the [1995] Act enable the Court to allow reference to prior statements are more than sufficient to ensure that a witness can be questioned as to the contents of a prior police statement should the interests of justice require that to happen.\textsuperscript{290}

381. The Sheriffs’ Association noted that there are at present four situations in which prior statements of witnesses other than the accused may be used during a trial—

“One is where the evidence of the witness is inconsistent with a prior statement (s. 263(4) of the 1995 Act). The purpose is at least to challenge the credibility and reliability of the witness and also in the hope that the witness might accept the truth of the prior statement. Any part of the prior statement becomes evidence only in so far as the witness accepts it to be the truth. The second is where the witness adopts a prior statement in a document of which the witness was the originator as his or her evidence in court (s. 260). The third is where a witness cannot remember everything, accepts that he or she made a prior statement to someone and accepts that if he or she said what he or she is alleged to have said, it must be the truth. In that case the person to whom the statement was made may give evidence of it and it becomes part of the evidence of the witness: Jamieson v. HM Advocate, 1994 J.C. 251; 1994 S.C.C.R. 610. The fourth is where the statement was recorded by the witness at the time of the incident to which it relates and is used to refresh the memory of the witness.”\textsuperscript{291}

382. According to the Association, section 62 “will lead to a number of appeals to define its parameters”. Its view was that, if the present common law position is to be changed, then this should be in accordance with Lord Coulsfield’s recommendation – namely, that witnesses should only be supplied with prior statements taken by the police that they read and signed at or close to the time when the statement was taken.\textsuperscript{292}

383. The Law Society of Scotland was also opposed to the proposals, largely because of concerns about the accuracy of prior statements and because “material discrepancies between statements given to the police and evidence given in court at a later date can call into question the credibility and reliability of a witness”.\textsuperscript{293} As Bill McVicar of the Society put it in oral evidence—

“The problem is that the statement will not be the words of the witness. Having asked witnesses countless times about the statements that they have given to the police and whether what is contained in those statements is right, I can say that, unless almost every witness in the universe is telling lies about it, the police tend not to write down exactly what the witness has said.”\textsuperscript{294}

384. Ian Duguid, representing the Faculty of Advocates, expressed complete opposition to the provisions. He explained that although a statement recorded by a police officer is admissible in court, a statement taken by a legally qualified solicitor from a witness for the defence is called a precognition, which is inadmissible in accordance with the practice of the courts—

“The difficulty immediately arises that the prosecution is placed at an extreme advantage over the defence. The question arises whether the provision will ever be sustained as a matter of fairness to the accused. If prosecution witnesses can have a statement in front of them and read it out, and defence witnesses have no such facility, is that a recognition that defence witnesses are in a different position to prosecution witnesses? Of course it is not.”

Committee conclusions

385. The Committee was unable to reach consensus on the merits of this provision. On the one hand, we can understand why it seems anomalous that a witness, almost alone among those taking part in a trial, does not have access to the statement he or she made at the time the offence was investigated (which may have been months or even years previously). On the other hand, we understand the concerns expressed in evidence about the accuracy of these statements, and the risk of exacerbating a difference of treatment between prosecution and defence witness statements. We would therefore appreciate clarification from the Scottish Government on its justification for this provision, particularly in view of the strong reservations expressed in evidence from the legal profession and the judiciary.

Section 63: Spouse or civil partner of accused a compellable witness

Background

386. Under section 264 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, the spouse of an accused person is always a competent witness, but is only a compellable witness for the prosecution or for a co-accused where (by virtue of the common law) he or she was a victim of the offence charged. As a result, a married parent can, for example, decline to give evidence against a spouse accused of abusing their child. Civil partners are given similar protection against compellability by section 130 of the Civil Partnership Act 2004.

387. Section 63 of the Bill replaces these existing provisions with a new section in the 1995 Act specifying that the spouse or civil partner of an accused is both a competent and a compellable witness in all circumstances. The Policy Memorandum states that the current law has caused difficulty, particularly where the crime is against a child and there is important and material evidence that could have been obtained from a spouse. It says that, in some cases, accused persons have married partners in order to ensure they cannot give evidence against them.

Evidence received

388. ACPOS was supportive of the change, saying that many offences where spouses or civil partners are competent witnesses occur in the family home where their evidence could be crucial for a conviction. This provision, in ACPOS’s view, will ensure that children are better protected by the criminal justice system.297

---

296 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 318.

389. Victim Support Scotland supported the principle, particularly in cases of serious and organised crime, but suggested that the value of using evidence from a spouse or partner should be subject to a test of proportionality and risk assessment in order to “protect the integrity of the family”.298 South Lanarkshire Council was also supportive in principle but sought assurances that sufficient safeguards would be put in place to protect individuals who may be subject to abuse or threat by a spouse or partner.299

390. North Lanarkshire Council went further, arguing that compelling people to give evidence against their spouses or partners could place them at greater risk. Pointing out that the vast majority of currently “non-compelled” witnesses are women experiencing domestic abuse, the Council said that if a woman in those circumstances is compelled to give evidence and refuses, she could be held in contempt of court and be classed as an offender herself. In the Council’s view, this would present her with a “Hobson’s choice” that had no place in a modern justice system.300

391. The Law Society of Scotland also opposed the provision, primarily because it ignored the “long-established purpose behind the rule on compellability … which attaches to the status of marriage and the risk of perjury by the spouse”. Experience suggested that people were only rarely prepared to give evidence against their spouses or partners even when compelled to do so by law. The Society suggested that a fairer approach would be to bring the law in Scotland in line with that in England and Wales, where the spouse or civil partner of an accused is a compellable witness for the prosecution only where the offence is one of personal violence against the spouse or civil partner or a child under the age of 16, a sexual offence against such a child, or related offences of attempt, conspiracy etc. in relation to those offences.301

Committee conclusions
392. The Committee understands the underlying rationale for this provision, but acknowledges the concerns raised in evidence that removing entirely the current limits on compellability, and hence making persons who refuse to give evidence against their spouses or partners liable to a charge of contempt of court, risks putting them in an invidious position in certain circumstances. We therefore invite the Scottish Government to explain further its approach in the light of the evidence received.

Section 66: Witness anonymity orders

Background and evidence
393. The purpose of section 66 is to replicate the regime established in England and Wales by the Criminal Evidence (Witness Anonymity) Act 2008, which enables the courts to grant “witness anonymity orders” in appropriate cases. The Bill for this Act was introduced by the UK Government on an emergency basis in response to the decision of the House of Lords to quash the conviction in the case of R v Davis [2008] UKHL 36, on the basis of its concerns over the use of anonymous witnesses.302

394. In their written submission, the Judges of the High Court of Justiciary agreed that it was appropriate to provide a statutory basis for the powers of Scottish courts to permit witnesses to give evidence anonymously—

“It would be unsatisfactory to leave the matter to be governed by the common law in Scotland when the House of Lords has held that no such common law power exists in England and Wales. Although not directly applicable in Scotland, the decision in Davis may be thought to have introduced a measure of uncertainty about the position here.”303

395. According to the Crown Office, protective measures such as those referred to in section 66(4) of the Bill had been used before in Scotland; nevertheless, following the House of Lords decision, “the current position is that no guarantee can be given to witnesses that there are steps which can be taken to protect their identity.”304

396. Questions were also raised about the drafting of this section of the Bill. The Judges of the High Court of Justiciary queried one of the tests for a witness anonymity order set out in inserted section 271Q, namely that “the witness would not testify if the proposed order were not made” (Condition D)—

“Taken literally, this condition might be thought to be almost impossible to satisfy since any witness is obliged to testify when validly cited and called upon so to do. The point might be met by making it clear that the condition is to the effect that the witness would not willingly testify if the proposed order were not made.”305

397. The SCDEA also had concerns about the drafting of condition D—

“It would appear however, from the way in which this condition is framed, that it may present a barrier to those willing witnesses who may be denied anonymity only because they are willing to testify.”306

Committee conclusion

398. The Committee accepts the rationale for this provision, but would invite the Scottish Government to reflect on the drafting in the light of the points raised by witnesses.

PART 5 – CRIMINAL JUSTICE

Section 68: Upper age limit for jurors

Background and evidence
399. Section 68 raises the upper age limit for sitting on a jury in criminal cases in Scotland from 65 to 70, bringing the position in Scotland in line with the rest of the UK. The aim is to enlarge the pool of potential jurors by around 200,000 and ensure that, as the demographic profile of Scotland changes, juries are drawn from a wider age range.\(^{307}\)

400. Although the Judges of the High Court of Justiciary supported this move, they pointed out that the upper age limit for jurors in civil trials would remain unchanged at 65—

“While we appreciate that the scope of the Bill does not extend to civil as opposed to criminal procedure, we would observe that it may be thought to be anomalous to have different age limits for jurors in criminal and civil cases.”\(^{308}\)

401. The Law Society of Scotland also raised no objection to the proposal, while stressing the importance of considering the age balance of jury composition.\(^{309}\)

Committee conclusion
402. We endorse this provision, so far as it goes, but note that it will create an inconsistency in terms of the upper age limit for jurors in criminal and civil trials. While we recognise that this cannot be addressed through the present Bill, we recommend that the Scottish Government address this through separate legislation at the earliest practical opportunity.

Section 70: Data matching for detection of fraud etc.

Background
403. The National Fraud Initiative is a data matching exercise conducted for the purpose of assisting in the prevention and detection of fraud. It already operates on a non-statutory basis in Scotland and has identified around £37 million of fraud and error in Scotland and led to over 75 prosecutions. The Serious Crime Act 2007 provided a statutory basis for the National Fraud Initiative in England, Wales and Northern Ireland, and the purpose of section 70 is to make similar provision for Scotland. This involves giving Audit Scotland the power to conduct data matching exercises on its own accord, or to arrange for such exercises to be conducted on its behalf.\(^{310}\)

404. Data matching involves the use of computerised techniques to compare information about individuals held by different public bodies, and on different financial systems, to identify circumstances (matches) that might suggest the existence of fraud or error.\textsuperscript{311}

405. An Audit Scotland report on the National Fraud Initiative was considered by the Audit (now Public Audit) Committee in May 2008. The Committee agreed to note the report and to write to the Cabinet Secretary for Justice to request that legislation providing explicit data matching powers for Audit Scotland be brought forward at the earliest opportunity.\textsuperscript{312}

Evidence received
406. In evidence to the Committee, Audit Scotland explained that data matching exercises have been carried out by the Audit Commission in England for some years using auditors’ powers to obtain information from audited bodies and others for the purposes of their audit—.

“Without similar explicit powers in Scotland, Audit Scotland would have to continue to rely on its existing powers to obtain the relevant information. These powers are not consistent across the different parts of the public sector and do not allow for cross border matching. ... In the absence of similar clear legislation in Scotland it will undoubtedly be the case that fraud and error will be less likely to be detected in the public sector in Scotland than elsewhere in the United Kingdom and cross border cases will not be detected at all.”\textsuperscript{313}

407. The proposals were also supported by the Information Commissioner’s Office (ICO)—

“We welcome the clarification of practice in Scotland and note the attention paid to protection of privacy within this section of the Bill which is particularly important given the breadth of information which may be sought by Audit Scotland in fulfilment of this function. We also welcome the requirement that Audit Scotland produce a data matching code of practice and that the ICO must be consulted prior to its publication and subsequent amendments.”\textsuperscript{314}

Background
408. Section 133 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 provides for a scheme of compensation for miscarriages of justice which, in Scotland, is operated by the Scottish Ministers. There is also a non-statutory \textit{ex gratia} scheme dating from 1986, and the main purpose of section 82 of the Bill is to put that on a statutory footing by making provision for it within the existing statutory scheme. Accordingly, Scottish Ministers are given the power, by order, to provide for the circumstances in which compensation may be paid for a miscarriage of justice (or for wrongful detention, or a decision by the prosecutor not to take or to discontinue proceedings).

Subordinate Legislation Committee report

409. The Subordinate Legislation Committee (SLC), in its report on the Bill, questioned why the ex gratia scheme was to be provided for in subordinate legislation, when the existing scheme was provided for directly in the 1988 Act. It also questioned the scope of the delegated power, which in its view went beyond what was required to achieve the Scottish Government’s stated purpose for the provision. The Scottish Government told the SLC that it wished to have flexibility in relation to how it gave statutory effect to the ex gratia scheme, but the SLC concluded that “no adequate justification has been given by the Scottish Government for the power to extend the scheme beyond that currently operating”.

Committee conclusion

410. The Committee notes and endorses the concerns expressed by the Subordinate Legislation Committee about the scope of the delegated power proposed. We therefore invite the Scottish Government either to justify that scope by reference to any changes of substance it might wish to make to the existing ex gratia scheme in the course of putting it on a statutory basis, or to limit the scope of the delegated power to what is required to replicate the existing scheme without substantial change.

PART 6 – DISCLOSURE

411. Part 6 of the Bill establishes a statutory framework for disclosure of evidence in criminal proceedings in Scotland.

Background

412. In November 2006, the then Justice Minister, Cathy Jamieson MSP, appointed Lord Coulsfield to review the law and practice of disclosure of evidence in the Scottish criminal justice system. This was prompted by a number of decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and of the High Court which redefined and expanded the duty of disclosure, the most important being McLeod v HMA (No. 2) [1998] JC 67, Holland v HMA [2005] SC(PC) 3 and Sinclair v HMA [2005] SC(PC) 28.

413. Lord Coulsfield’s final report was published in September 2007. Having consulted on Lord Coulsfield’s recommendations, the Scottish Government published a statement of its intended next steps, including a commitment to bring forward legislation and to develop a statutory Code of Practice.317

414. According to the Policy Memorandum the purpose of this Part of the Bill is to “provide certainty in statute as regards how the disclosure of evidence regime should operate”, in place of the existing common law system. In particular, the new regime provides—

- “a continuing duty on the Crown to disclose material and relevant information for and against the accused to the defence;

- a statutory definition of that duty and provision for how and when the duty is complied with;

- a duty on the police and other agencies or organisations who investigate crimes and submit reports to the prosecutor to provide the prosecutor with schedules listing all the information which may be relevant to the case obtained during the course of the investigation; and a duty on the prosecutor to disclose to the defence in solemn cases a schedule listing all the information that may be relevant that is categorised as non-sensitive;

- provision for defence statements;

- provision for applications to the court for orders restricting disclosure. In other jurisdictions, these are sometimes referred to as Public Interest Immunity (PII) procedures, designed to allow material which falls within the definition of what requires to be disclosed to be withheld on public interest grounds;

- a new offence of misuse of disclosed information; and

- provision for a statutory code of practice to support the legislative provisions.”318

Fairness, certainty and clarity

415. The Law Society of Scotland was largely positive about the disclosure provisions—

“The Society’s position is that a full and fair system of disclosure to the accused is an essential element of a fair trial and without such a system there can be no guarantee of an accused person receiving a fair trial.”319

416. For the Solicitor General for Scotland, the key benefit of the Part 6 provisions was to provide certainty to those involved—

318 Policy Memorandum, paragraphs 467, 474.
319 Law Society of Scotland. Written submission to the Justice Committee.
“The Bill gives us a comprehensive set of rules so that the police and the prosecutor know that if they comply with those rules, they will comply with their disclosure obligations, which will ensure a fair trial in accordance with article 6 of the European convention on human rights.”

417. The Crown Office, similarly, described the Bill as providing “for the first time, a clear procedural and legal framework for disclosure within which the police, the Crown and the accused can operate with certainty.” This would be complemented by a code of practice which would—

“set out publicly the procedures to be adopted by investigators and prosecutors which might be thought to be less appropriate for primary legislation such as the conduct of lines of enquiry during an investigation, the detailed responsibilities of key roles in the investigation and prosecution and the consequences for completion of reports and witness statements.”

418. The Committee was advised that work had already started in preparing a draft code of practice, and that a copy will be provided as soon as it is available.

419. However, others were doubtful about the level of detail included in the primary legislation. The Judges of the High Court of Justiciary described the style and structure of the drafting of Part 6 as “often unnecessarily complicated and ‘user unfriendly’”, while the Sheriffs’ Association warned of “detailed, complicated and time-consuming rules about disclosure that will further delay trials.”

420. Lord Coulsfield had similar doubts. For him, the key was “to state the fundamental duty of the prosecution clearly and in a simple and memorable form at the start of the relevant part of the statute”. Instead, he believed that “the provisions of the Bill are much too elaborate and diffuse and tend to confuse rather than clarify the statement of the fundamental duty.” He would prefer to see sections 85 to 90 replaced by one or possibly two fairly short and simple sections.

421. The Solicitor General, however, argued that the Bill already contained a clear statement of principle in section 89(3) which requires the prosecutor to review all relevant information and disclose it to the accused where—

“(a) the information would materially weaken or undermine the prosecution case,
(b) the information would materially strengthen the accused’s case, or
(c) the information is likely to form part of the prosecution case.”

422. According to the Solicitor General—

“That is a statement of principle—it is our disclosure obligation. It takes into account the most up-to-date and authoritative jurisprudence on the matter from the Privy Council, and it is enshrined in the Bill.”

Sections 86 to 88: Solemn cases: schedules of information

423. Sections 86 to 88 of the Bill create a duty on the police (and other agencies or organisations who investigate crimes and submit reports to the prosecutor) in solemn cases to provide the prosecutor with schedules listing all the information which may be relevant to the case obtained during the course of the investigation. The schedules need to distinguish between information that is “sensitive”, “highly sensitive” and “non-sensitive”, although only “sensitive” is defined in the Bill. If the prosecutor disagrees with the categorisation of any piece of information, he or she will be able to direct that the schedules are amended and re-submitted.

424. Although Lord Coulsfield had recommended a practice, similar to that employed in England, of listing the material to be disclosed in various categories set out in schedules, he was sceptical about how this had been effected in the Bill—

“The Bill makes the provision of schedules, both by the police to the prosecutor and by the prosecutor to the accused, a statutory requirement. That was not my intention and it is, I think, a serious error. The use of schedules is only a method of carrying out the duty of disclosure. It is an inconvenient and cumbersome method. One should not exclude the possibility that, with experience, better methods may be devised. If any prescription is required, it should be done by a code of practice or by regulation: it is easy to amend a code of practice but much harder to amend a statute. There may even be cases in which it is inconvenient or harmful to use schedules even where adequate disclosure could be made in a different form. In England, the statute does not include any requirement for schedules.”

425. The Judges of the High Court of Justiciary agreed, saying it was not appropriate or necessary to include in the Bill detailed provision about schedules of information, which would be better dealt with administratively—

“To attempt to address such practical, administrative arrangements by means of detailed provision in primary legislation risks creating an undesirable lack of flexibility and the possibility of raising objections and questions of a highly technical nature.”

426. These points were acknowledged by the Scottish Law Officers. The Lord Advocate said “I certainly agree with the desire to make things as straightforward and simple as possible”, while the Solicitor General accepted that the schedules of

327 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 482.
329 Judges of the High Court of Justiciary. Written submission to the Justice Committee.
evidence “could reasonably be taken out of the Bill and put into subordinate legislation or a code of practice”. However, he added—

“I am a great advocate of simplicity, but as I said, disclosure is a complex matter. When you look at the number of relevant provisions and sections in comparison with our disclosure manual from which we operate, they are not overly long or detailed and they give us a comprehensive set of rules or provisions. We know that if we comply with them, we will ensure a fair trial and comply with our disclosure obligations.”

427. Chief Constable House, on behalf of the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland, said that his main concern in relation to these provisions was the level of police resources that would be required. He cited his experience of the English and Welsh system where “disclosure was a massive drain on police resources” and “it was a monster, to be frank, and one from which England and Wales have stepped back significantly.”

428. The Cabinet Secretary agreed to consider whether elements of the provisions could be dealt with in rules of court or in the code of practice, but expressed caution on the grounds that “the duty to disclose is a critical duty and if we were to remove too many provisions we would deprive [the] Parliament of its role in scrutinising the proposals”.

429. A separate point raised by the Sheriffs’ Association concerned the need for a distinction between “sensitive” and “highly sensitive” information in section 86. The Sheriffs foresaw delays “created by information having to be categorised, the information having to be described, and with inevitable arguments between the prosecutor and the investigating authorities over the correct categorisation”.

Committee conclusions
430. We support the general policy of clarifying the rules of disclosure, and accept that these provisions are motivated by good intentions. However, we agree with Lord Coulsfield that the way in which his recommendations have been given effect in the Bill is too complex and detailed, and risks losing sight of the underlying principle. We would prefer to see the basic duty of disclosure elevated to greater prominence.

431. The Committee invites the Scottish Government to review, in the light of Lord Coulsfield’s comments, where the line has been drawn between what is set out in the Bill (including provision about schedules of information in solemn cases) and what is to be included the proposed code of practice (or in guidance). We welcome the Crown Office’s commitment to provide a copy of the draft code, and look forward to being given sight of it in advance of Stage 2.

333 Letter from Cabinet Secretary for Justice, 22 October 2009.
334 Sheriffs’ Association. Written submission to the Justice Committee.
432. We also note the evidence by the Sheriffs’ Association questioning the need for a distinction between “sensitive” and “highly sensitive” information, particularly when the latter is not separately defined. It would be helpful if the Scottish Government could provide a fuller justification for why this distinction is considered necessary and how it is to be applied.

Sections 94-95: Defence statements

Background and evidence received

433. Under sections 94 and 95 of the Bill, the accused (or the accused person’s defence team) must (in solemn cases) or may (in summary cases) provide the prosecution with a “defence statement” setting out certain details of the planned defence. It is intended that this will assist the prosecution in determining what evidence must be disclosed to the accused.

434. However, there was significant scepticism amongst practitioners about how well the defence statement regime would work and whether it would add very much to the present position.335

435. Lord Coulsfield, in his report, said that the experience of English practitioners was that “in the majority of cases, defence statements are late, unspecific and unhelpful”, and that it would be difficult to make the system work better through more rigorous enforcement without “either causing delay or prejudicing a legitimate defence or both”. In his view, in Scotland the well-established rules for notification of special defences and the relatively new mechanisms for holding pre-trial hearings fulfilled most of the functions expected of defence statements. He was therefore not convinced that a general requirement for defence statements “would give any significant, additional benefit to justify the additional work and cost which would be generated”.336 He maintained this view in evidence to the Committee, saying that—

“Requiring the preparation of defence statements would have a cost in time and expense, and they could cause confusion and delay and add to complexity in the conduct of trials.”337

436. For the Law Society of Scotland, a key concern was about the requirement on the accused to lodge a defence statement at least fourteen days before the first diet and at least fourteen days before the preliminary hearing, given the requirements about what such a statement should include—

“14 days before a preliminary hearing or first diet in the sheriff court, we do not always know the facts that the prosecution will seek to establish. It is difficult to know how the defence will be able to deal with a requirement to set out ‘matters of fact on which the accused takes issue with the prosecution’. Furthermore—others have said this and I agree—the danger is that, if the 335 Judges of the High Court of Justiciary; Law Society of Scotland. Written submissions to the Justice Committee.

437. The Sheriffs’ Association were also concerned about the proposal to make defence statements compulsory in solemn procedure, rather than voluntary as Lord Coulsfield had envisaged. They argued that the timing requirements envisaged could lead to the accused being required to lodge a defence to an indictment before the prosecution has provided any information about the prosecution case, and that this “will no doubt be regarded as repugnant to our legal system” and, as well as being unnecessary, was “contrary to the principles of our law, the right to silence and article 6 of the European Convention of Human Rights”.

438. Ian Duguid, for the Faculty of Advocates, was also sceptical, saying that defence statements “are a concept that is particular to the law of England and Wales and are required there because they do not have the procedures that we have”. In particular, the Bonomy reforms of 2004 had already put in place a range of procedures, such as a requirement for advance intimation of special defences—

“We have gone some way towards addressing the issues that defence statements were designed to address in England … so I am curious as to whether a defence statement will do anything over and above what we have, other than increase expenditure.”

439. However, the Lord Advocate argued that recent statutory amendments and changes in practice in England and Wales – details of which were later provided in a supplementary submission by the Crown Office – meant that the experience with defence statements was now quite different from that encountered by Lord Coulsfield. Referring to the thousands of documents that can be involved in High Court cases, she argued—

“To understand what might be relevant or of interest to the defence, it is of considerable help—in establishing the rights of the accused to a fair trial under article 6 of the ECHR—to be able to anticipate in what the defence might be interested. It is not just about assisting the prosecution; it is also about assisting the accused. It’s not about prosecution by ambush or surprise – we now disclose all relevant information – but nor should it be about defence by ambush or surprise.”

440. The Solicitor General referred to cases he had been involved in where he believed a defence statement would have assisted the prosecution to effectively discharge its duty of disclosure. He argued strongly in favour of making defence statements mandatory—

“A trial is a test of the prosecution evidence and the defence case, if the defence wants to put forward a case. One would want to identify issues in advance of the trial because that, in my view, makes for a much better trial. It means that it will not be simply a case of taking a scattergun approach to the evidence: there will be focus to assist the court and the jury, and there will be no excessive delays or long trials. A defence statement is a good thing: it should be mandatory rather than discretionary in order to achieve the purposes that I have articulated.”

441. For John Logue of the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service, the Bill’s provisions reflected an important point of principle, namely—

“That it is difficult to conceive of a reason why the defence would, at the stage of being ready to go to trial, be unable to advise anyone of what its case is. After all, as a result of the recent changes, the defence now has fair notice of the entirety of the Crown case to the extent that is required under the law, and the accused is the only person in the process who is able to say at that stage what the defence case potentially is.”

Committee conclusions
442. This is another provision on which the Committee has not been able to reach an agreed and settled view. We understand the rationale presented by the Scottish Government, but we also recognise the concerns expressed by some witnesses. However, the Committee is not currently persuaded that there is merit in the proposal to make defence statements compulsory in solemn cases, as it appears that the timing of their production may risk jeopardising important principles of justice. Some further explanation of the Scottish Government’s thinking would therefore be appreciated, including on its reasons for departing from Lord Coulsfield’s recommendations on this issue.

Sections 102-106: Applications to court: orders restricting disclosure

Background
443. Under sections 102-106 the prosecutor may apply to the court for orders to withhold certain information from the accused on the grounds that the information is sensitive. This is sometimes referred to as “public interest immunity”. The three categories of order proposed – “non-disclosure orders”, “non-notification orders” and “exclusion orders” – are intended to give effect to recommendations made by Lord Coulsfield in his report.

444. A non-disclosure order allows the prosecutor to withhold from the accused an item or items of information specified in the order which would otherwise require to be disclosed. An exclusion order prohibits the accused from attending or making representations in proceedings relating to the application for a non-disclosure order, while a non-notification order prohibits notice being given to the accused of the making of the applications for non-notification, exclusion and non-disclosure orders and also the decisions of the court in relation to any of those applications. An exclusion order may be made with or without a non-notification order also being made, but if a non-notification order is made, an exclusion order must also be made.

Evidence received

445. Ian Duguid, for the Faculty of Advocates, recognised that there would be situations when information would have to be withheld in the public interest, and that a framework had to be provided for this situation. He questioned, however, whether the proposals were balanced, and whether there were enough safeguards for the withholding of information.346

446. Speaking for the Law Society of Scotland, Bill McVicar suggested that the provisions “might – unfortunately – complicate the system more than is necessary”, and that they adopted an English system that “would not fit terribly well with our procedures”.347

447. The Sheriffs’ Association expressed strong reservations about the provisions in the Bill—

“In a democratic society such provisions are likely to be regarded as disturbing. We anticipate time taken up with challenges under the European Convention of Human Rights.”348

448. The Association also questioned why one of the tests for granting a non-notification or exclusion order was lower than that required for a non-disclosure order—

“It is simply whether “it is not in the public interest that the nature of the information be disclosed”, instead of “likely to cause serious prejudice to the public interest”. We are not clear why the test is lower for non-notification and exclusion orders.”349

449. Lord Coulsfield argued in favour of setting out the detail in subordinate legislation—

“In my view, issues to do with orders, such as the procedure for making them, the terms of orders and what kind of orders can be made, should all properly be found in subordinate legislation, because one hopes that, with experience, it will be possible to simplify and improve the procedure, so it should be easy to change.”350

Committee conclusions

450. The Committee accepts the case made by the Scottish Government, following Lord Coulsfield, for having a statutory process to allow non-disclosure of information in certain circumstances. However, we also recognise the inherent difficulties in achieving this objective while continuing to secure adequate protection for the rights of the accused. We are also concerned about the amount of detail set out in these sections of the Bill, and agree with witnesses that some of this provision would be better dealt with in subordinate legislation (subject to appropriate Parliamentary control) to allow them to be refined and developed over time.

Section 107: Special counsel

Background and evidence received

451. Section 107 allows the court, when considering an application for a non-notification, exclusion or non-disclosure order, or a review or appeal in relation to such an order, to appoint “special counsel” if the court considers it necessary to ensure that the accused receives a fair trial.

452. Commenting on this, the Sheriffs’ Association said—

“We think that such an appointment may be inevitable for an application for a non-notification order, an exclusion order or a non-disclosure order where either of the first two has been granted. The task of special counsel will be difficult because he or she will not be familiar with the details of the defence case and because the accused is not to be made aware of the contents of these applications.”351

453. In their written submission, the Judges of the High Court of Justiciary noted that nothing is said in the Bill about the funding of special counsel.352

454. Bill McVicar, representing the Law Society of Scotland, questioned whether the proposed special counsel system – which he described as being about “hiding information from the defence” – was compatible with human rights.353

455. When asked about compatibility with ECHR, Lord Coulslfield drew to the attention of the Committee a House of Lords appeal case concerned with control orders under terrorism legislation, under which there is a procedure for the use of special counsel to consider information that is thought not to be suitable for public disclosure. He explained that a decision in that case was still awaited. He commented—

“If we are asking ourselves whether the proposed system would be compatible with ECHR, the response must be that the system as it has been operating in England has so far survived all the challenges that have been made to it, but one cannot say whether it will continue to do so.”354

456. The Lord Advocate acknowledged that the issue of special procedures and non-notification had been looked at by the House of Lords recently. She commented—

“I am satisfied that, so far as is possible, the Bill sets a framework that will be compatible with the ECHR as we understand it in the United Kingdom, and

351 Sheriffs’ Association. Written submission to the Justice Committee.
352 Judges of the High Court of Justiciary. Written submission to the Justice Committee.
that much will depend on the facts of individual cases. It will ultimately be for judges to determine whether the provisions, as they operate in practice, can allow fair trials in that respect. That judicial role will be important.”

457. On 10 June in Secretary of State for the Home Department v AF and others [2009] UKHL 28 on the use of secret evidence in control order hearings, nine Law Lords (including two Scottish judges, Lords Hope of Craighead and Rodger of Earlsferry) unanimously agreed that the procedure that resulted in the making of the control orders in relation to the three individuals concerned did not amount to a fair trial, and accordingly allowed their appeal.

458. However, the Cabinet Secretary said that the House of Lords judgment “does not apply to the procedures that we operate in Scotland” because of the checks and balances that are built into the non-disclosure provisions. He added that—

“The fundamental differences between the circumstances of the AF case and the provisions of the Bill are that, in control order cases, the non-disclosed information is the incriminatory evidence used by the court in deciding whether to grant the order whereas, in our proposed scheme, it is only the exculpatory evidence which is not disclosed (and, even then, only where rigorous tests are met) and, therefore, the court has to entirely disregard information which is the subject of a non-disclosure order in reaching its verdict. As such, Special Counsel within the scheme proposed in Scotland for non-disclosure orders in criminal proceedings do provide an additional safeguard in ensuring that the accused’s rights are protected.”

Committee conclusions
459. The Committee is satisfied that the provision for special counsel in this Bill do not fall foul of the human rights objections raised by the House of Lords in relation to control orders, and are appropriate in the context of a non-disclosure regime. However, we would be grateful for clarification about how special counsel would be paid for, and in particular whether any changes to legal aid regulations will be required.

Section 115: Acts of Adjournal

Background
460. Under this section, the High Court is empowered to make “such rules as it considers necessary or expedient for the purposes of, in consequence of, or for giving full effect to” Part 6 of the Bill. Any such rules would be in the form of “Acts of Adjournal” – a form of subordinate legislation made directly by the High Court and not subject to any Parliamentary procedure or control.

358 Letter from Cabinet Secretary for Justice, 22 October 2009.
Subordinate Legislation Committee report
461. The Subordinate Legislation Committee (SLC), in its report on the Bill, questioned the width of the delegated power involved and even whether a new power was necessary in addition to the existing power of the High Court to make Acts of Adjournal under section 305 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995. It concluded that “insufficient justification” had been given for a power in these terms, or for the decision not to limit its scope to “matters of criminal practice or procedure or other matters within the remit of the High Court”.

Committee conclusion
462. The Committee notes the concerns of the Subordinate Legislation Committee, and invites the Scottish Government to provide a fuller justification of the scope of the proposed power, and indeed why it is considered necessary in addition to existing powers to make Acts of Adjournal.

PART 7 – MENTAL DISORDER AND UNFITNESS FOR TRIAL

Background

464. The principal recommendation of the Commission’s report was that the common law test for insanity as a defence should be abolished in favour of a statutory special defence, provable on the balance of probabilities, that the accused lacks criminal responsibility by reason of mental disorder (defined to exclude psychopathic personality disorder). It also recommended a statutory basis for the plea of diminished responsibility, available only in cases of murder, which should, if successful, reduce any conviction to one of culpable homicide; and that the common law plea of insanity in bar of trial should be replaced by a statutory plea on the basis of “unfitness for trial”.

Evidence received
465. The Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland welcomed the introduction of the new statutory defence to replace the common law defence of insanity and the removal of outdated and inappropriate terminology. However, it questioned the exclusion of psychopathic personality disorder from the defence of mental disorder, pointing out that the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003 defines “mental disorder” to include all forms of personality disorder.

466. The Commission also questioned the lack of reference to individuals with a learning disability or cognitive impairment, pointing out that their ability to understand and give informed consent to participation in community programmes may be limited and hence that they may be “set up to fail”.

361 Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland. Written submission to the Justice Committee.
467. A further issue was that the proposed defence depends on whether the offender was able to “appreciate the nature or wrongfulness of the conduct”. For the Commission—

“a mental disorder may not just impair an individual’s ability to appreciate the wrongfulness of the conduct but may also impair their ability to control their behaviour even though they may appreciate that their actions are wrong.”

468. Very similar concerns were raised by the Law Society of Scotland and the Scottish Association for Mental Health (SAMH). SAMH also suggested that “abnormally aggressive or seriously irresponsible conduct” needed to be further defined, but other witnesses did not think that further definitions would necessarily help.362

469. The Law Society of Scotland, in explaining its concern about the terms of the “mental disorder” defence, suggested that it might not be available to “a person who kills his or her children while suffering from a depressive illness [and who] may be able to appreciate what he/she is doing and understand that it is wrong in the eyes of the law, but nonetheless be driven to commit the crime by his or her illness.” However, James Chalmers, from the University of Edinburgh, thought the Society had misunderstood the position and was wrongly assuming that the Bill relied on “the much criticised English position” according to which “no defence of insanity is available to a person who knows their actions to be legally wrong, but – due to mental disorder – does not appreciate that they are morally wrong”. Scots law, he said, already recognised a defence of insanity based on circumstances similar to those outlined by the Law Society, and the defence provided under the new section 51A would not change that, since it “encompasses a failure to appreciate either legal or moral wrongfulness”. He added that the Law Society’s arguments for a defence of “volitional insanity” had already been fully considered by the Scottish Law Commission in its report and rejected “for cogent reasons which have not been challenged”.363

470. However, where Mr Chalmers did see a problem was with subsection (4) of the new section 51A(4) which allows only the accused to advance the special defence of mental disorder. He gave various examples of situations in which there could be a dispute about whether an offender had a mental disorder or suffered instead from diminished responsibility and where, without the ability of the Crown also to advance the special defence, the court could find itself unable to reach the appropriate verdict.364

471. The Committee broadly supports this provision insofar as it implements the Scottish Law Commission’s recommendations. However, we are not yet confident that the proposed special defence of mental disorder has been appropriately defined, given the concerns raised in evidence and the differences of interpretation between Mr Chalmers and other witnesses.

about whether the special defence would be available to people who know their conduct is wrong, but are driven by their mental illness to do it anyway. We therefore invite the Scottish Government to consider carefully and respond to the points raised. We support the suggestion by James Chalmers that it should be open to the Crown as well as the accused to advance the special defence. We also invite the Scottish Government to comment on the issues raised by the Mental Welfare Commission relating to people with learning disability or cognitive impairment.

PART 8 – LICENSING UNDER CIVIC GOVERNMENT (SCOTLAND) ACT 1982

Introduction

472. Part 8 of the Bill—

“makes various changes to the general licensing provisions of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 and to its specific provisions on metal dealers, market operators, public entertainment, late hours catering, and taxis and private hire cars.”

473. These changes are based on recommendations made by a Task Group set up to review the licensing provisions contained in the 1982 Act. The Task Group’s remit was to—

“re-examine the principles and mechanisms of licensing as they are set out in the 1982 Act and, having done so, review the existing provisions and any proposals for change submitted to the Executive.”

474. When the Task Group’s report was published in 2004, the then Scottish Executive stated that it was not in a position to bring forward the necessary legislative changes prior to the 2007 Scottish Parliament elections.

475. According to the Policy Memorandum, the amendments to the 1982 Act taken forward in the Bill are “largely technical”, although they include some more substantive changes. Overall—

“The aim of the amendments is to make the 1982 Act licensing provisions fit for the 21st century in line with the Task Group report’s recommendations.”

The 1982 Act and the Task Group recommendations

Evidence received

476. Aberdeenshire Council said that, rather than further amendments to the 1982 Act, it would prefer to see an overhaul of the Act as a whole. Midlothian Council, while generally welcoming the provisions, noted that no explanation had been given for why some of the recommendations made in the Task Group’s report had not been taken forward in the Bill.\textsuperscript{370}

477. The Scottish Taxi Federation went further, suggesting that only “a few” of the Task Group’s recommendations were implemented by the Bill, and that “if the efforts of the Task Group are not to be lost and the 1982 Act properly updated, then much more needs to be included.”\textsuperscript{371}

478. However, responding to these claims, the Cabinet Secretary said that all but two of the Task Group’s recommendations that required legislation were being implemented by the Bill, and that the aim was to improve an Act that had served Scotland well, rather than making change for its own sake.\textsuperscript{372}

Committee conclusion

479. The Committee accepts the Cabinet Secretary’s explanation, and recognises that the Task Group recommendations provide a sound general basis for the provisions in this Part of the Bill.

Section 121: Conditions to which licences under 1982 Act are to be subject

Background and evidence received

480. The 1982 Act allows for the automatic and unconditional grant or renewal of a licence where the licensing authority has failed to reach a final decision on an application within a specified period.

481. Section 121 of the Bill removes the term “unconditionally” and instead allows for mandatory and standard conditions to be applied to any such licence issued by a licensing authority. Mandatory conditions will be determined by Scottish Ministers while standard conditions will be determined by licensing authorities.

482. The proposal was generally welcomed. North Ayrshire Council called it “a good proposal”\textsuperscript{373} and Aberdeenshire Council said—

“While normally all licences are processed and issued within 28 days, there are occasions where problems arise that make it difficult to issue a licence within the permitted six months. To be able to issue a licence by default with the same standard conditions that all other licences issued under the Act have makes the licence enforceable where there are problems. This provision is long overdue.”\textsuperscript{374}

483. In order to have effect, a licensing authority will be required to publish any standard conditions determined by them. The Law Society of Scotland suggested that a transitional period should be set to allow local authorities “time to draft, consider, publish and determine standard conditions for all licence types.”\textsuperscript{375} The

Cabinet Secretary for Justice said that he recognised the need for a transitional period and that it would be considered carefully as part of implementation.\textsuperscript{376}

484. The Faculty of Advocates welcomed the intention to remove the term “unconditionally” from the 1982 Act, but described the introduction of mandatory licensing conditions as “a radical departure from the current approach which is to leave the attachment of specific conditions to licensing authorities.”\textsuperscript{377} In the Faculty’s view, mandatory conditions would not allow licensing authorities to take into account local circumstances and it said that no explanation had been given for this change.

485. Mr MacAskill, when questioned by the Committee on the potential inflexibility of mandatory conditions, said—

“We accept that the setting of mandatory conditions has the potential to limit local flexibility. Whenever they exercise the power, ministers will need to be aware of that. We are seeking an appropriate balance between matters that require to be dealt with uniformly and those that require to be dealt with on a much more localised basis.”\textsuperscript{378}

486. George Burgess, for the Scottish Government, explained that the inclusion in the Bill of a power to set mandatory conditions for licences was seen as the easiest way of addressing the Task Group recommendation that all licence holders should be required to display or carry their licences. Given the variety of licences covered by the 1982 Act, he said it was considered preferable to create a power rather than “write directly into the 1982 Act a different type of condition for each type of licence”; but he added: “We do not have a long list up our sleeve of other mandatory conditions that we are looking to insert by way of the power.”\textsuperscript{379}

Committee conclusion

487. The Committee is satisfied with the Scottish Government’s justification for seeking a power to set mandatory conditions, and accepts its explanation about the conditions it envisages determining.

Section 123: Licensing of metal dealers

Background and evidence received

488. The 1982 Act provides for a mandatory licensing scheme for all metal dealers. Section 123 of the Bill replaces this with an optional scheme by which it will be “open to local licensing authorities to determine whether or not licences are required in their areas.”\textsuperscript{380}

489. Again, the Committee received evidence\textsuperscript{381} requesting transitional provisions in order to afford licensing authorities time to decide whether or not to retain a licensing requirement for metal dealers. Some witnesses questioned the need to relax the regime. Dumfries and Galloway Council said it was an “odd time”\(^{382}\) to introduce an optional scheme when the “theft of metal is regularly reported in the press.” Aberdeenshire Council shared this view, saying that—

“The price of metal is currently very high and many communities are experiencing random theft of metal. This activity should remain mandatory.”\(^{383}\)

490. However, the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland (ACPOS) was content for the decision on whether or not to licence metal dealers to rest with local authorities, saying that—

“The theft of metal has been an issue in the past. Our local experience is that it has been curtailed to a large extent, probably due to the economic downturn.”\(^{384}\)

Committee conclusions

491. The Committee notes the concerns raised by some witnesses about theft of metals and the implication that a mandatory system of licensing may have a role to play in tackling this problem. We recognise that tackling criminality is only one factor to be taken into account in deciding on an appropriate licensing regime, but we are also uncertain about the Scottish Government’s rationale for proposing moving to an optional system of licensing in this area. We therefore invite the Cabinet Secretary to provide a fuller justification of this aspect of its policy intention.

Section 124: Licensing of taxis and private hire cars

Background

492. The Task Group made over 20 recommendations in its report on the licensing of taxis and private hire cars, noting that—

“of all the licensing activities contained in the 1982 Act, this was the one that had over the years attracted the most criticism, particularly from the trade who had been pressing for a review for some time. In view of this, and given the number of people involved in the trade, it was not surprising that this was the activity which attracted most responses from our consultation.”\(^{385}\)

493. According to the Policy Memorandum, the purpose of section 124 of the Bill is to—

\(^{382}\) Dumfries and Galloway Council. Written submission to the Justice Committee.

\(^{383}\) Aberdeenshire Council. Written submission to the Justice Committee.

“modernise the taxi and private hire car licensing regime within the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 in line with the Task Group report’s recommendations.”

Applications for taxi and private car licences
494. The 1982 Act requires applicants for taxi or private hire car licences to have held a driving licence for any continuous period of 12 months. Under the new proposals, all applicants for taxi and private hire licenses must have held a driving licence for 12 months immediately prior to the application.

495. The Policy Memorandum states that this new provision “clarifies the original intention of the policy and was widely supported during the consultation on the Task Group review.”

496. Aberdeenshire Council strongly supported this proposed change in the interests of public safety, while North Ayrshire Council stated that it “clarifies a grey area of law”. Dumfries and Galloway Council generally supported the change but suggested that some discretion be granted to local authorities to allow an applicant’s individual circumstances to be taken into account – a view supported by the Law Society of Scotland, which gave the example of someone disqualified from driving on a “totting up” basis (i.e. where the disqualification is triggered by the most recent of a series of driving offences committed over a period of time). The Bill would prevent that person applying for a taxi licence until a year after the end of the disqualification period, something that both the Society and Glasgow City Council suggested would amount to a double penalty for the individual.

497. Responding to these concerns, the Cabinet Secretary said that the purpose of section 124(2) “is to ensure that an applicant has a proven record of unblemished recent driving experience to the benefit of public safety and confidence”. He wanted to see “a uniform approach throughout all areas”, and on this basis did not support giving discretion to licensing authorities.

Fixing scales for taxi fares
498. Section 17 of the 1982 Act specifies how licensing authorities should fix the scales for taxi fares. The Bill updates these provisions to include a requirement to review and then fix scales within an 18-month period.

499. Glasgow City Council and the Law Society of Scotland both suggested that the 18-month deadline could prove difficult to meet, given the time sometimes required for consultation. The Scottish Taxi Federation believed that such reviews should be completed annually and suggested a method to make this possible—

“If a cost formula were agreed between trade representatives and the local authority, such a review would simply be a case of checking the figures against the previous figures and calculating any percentage increase which may apply.390

500. According to the Federation, section 17 will be ineffective as there are no sanctions for local authorities should a review of fares be late. They suggested the section be amended to include a right of appeal by taxi operators against an authority’s failure to carry out a fares review within the prescribed timescale.

501. The Cabinet Secretary did not see why the 18-month timescale should be a problem, since most local authorities interpreted the existing legislation on a similar basis. He also did not think it was necessary for the Bill to provide sanctions against a licensing authority that fails to review fares within the set period. His experience was that “the taxi trade is not shy in coming forward if it thinks there are matters that are prejudicial to its financial wellbeing”, so there is “an inbuilt mechanism for local authority accountability”. Nevertheless, he was willing to consider a statutory sanction if it was thought necessary.391

Appeals in respect of taxi fares

502. Taxi operators can currently appeal against a licensing authority’s review of taxi scales. Section 124 of the Bill will amend the 1982 Act to widen this right of appeal to include representatives of taxi operators.

503. While the Scottish Taxi Federation supported this amendment,392 Glasgow City Council considered that the right to appeal decisions should only be extended to those who responded to the original consultation.393

504. However, the Scottish Government said it was appropriate to give all representative bodies a right of appeal, since these groups already require to be consulted by licensing authorities when they review taxi scales and then notified of the outcome.394

Publication and coming into effect of taxi fares

505. Section 124(5) requires licensing authorities, once they have fixed taxi fare scales, to publicise the scales in a newspaper circulating in the relevant area. The Law Society of Scotland and Glasgow City Council both commented on this provision, pointing out that newspaper advertisements are expensive and that it would be more consistent with the “modern approach” of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 which allows advertising via a website.395 John Loudon from the Law Society of Scotland also pointed out that people can find information on a website at any time, whereas they will only see a newspaper advertisement if they happen to read the relevant edition.396

394 Scottish Government. Supplementary written submission to the Justice Committee.

506. The Cabinet Secretary said the aim was simply to follow existing practice, which appeared to have worked well, with no specific concerns about cost having been raised. He noted the point about the use of websites, but said that making a change in this context “would have potential implications for other parts of the 1982 Act.”

Other issues
507. The Committee also received evidence suggesting further provisions in relation to the licensing of taxis and private hire cars. For example, the Scottish Taxi Federation suggested that local authorities’ power to limit the number of taxi licences should be extended to cover private hire licences.

508. While not considering this an issue to be considered in the context of the Bill, the Cabinet Secretary for Justice added—

   “we do anticipate that we may need to look more widely at the existing powers once we have a clearer understanding of where the current consultation on vehicle accessibility is proceeding.”

509. Both the City of Edinburgh Council and West Lothian Council also proposed additional restrictions for non-UK residents who applied for taxi and private hire car driver licences. According to the City of Edinburgh Council—

   “Taxis and private hire cars often carry children and vulnerable adults, mostly without incident. However, licensing authorities and the police wish to ensure that all drivers are subject to rigorous background and criminal checks. These checks cannot be carried out effectively on persons who reside outwith the United Kingdom.”

510. The Scottish Government said that it had received no evidence of such concerns from either licensing authorities or the police.

Committee conclusions
511. The Committee supports the proposal to require all applicants for taxi licences to have held a driving licence for the year immediately prior to their applications. We agree with the Cabinet Secretary that discretion for licensing authorities would not be appropriate in this context.

512. We also agree with the Cabinet Secretary that provision for sanctions against authorities that fail to review fares within the set period is unnecessary, given existing mechanisms to enable authorities to be held accountable.

513. While we would not wish to undermine the distinction between taxis that are entitled to ply for trade and private hire cars that are not, we accept that there may be a case for allowing local authorities to limit the number of private hire cars operating in their areas, just as they can limit the number of taxis. However, we agree that this is not a matter for the current Bill, not least because of the shortage of evidence we have taken on this issue and the fact that the Task Group did not address the point in its report.

514. Finally, we are surprised that the Scottish Government is unaware of concerns about the ability of licensing authorities to carry out appropriate checks on non-UK residents applying for a taxi or private hire car driver's licence. Members of the Committee have, individually, heard such concerns expressed, and we would encourage the Scottish Government to adopt a more active approach to establishing whether this anecdotal impression is borne out by the evidence.

Sections 125 and 126: Licensing of market operators and licensing of public entertainment

Background

515. Section 125 of the Bill removes the exemption from holding a market operators' licence currently given to non-commercial organisations. The new provisions will bring charitable, youth, religious, community, political and other organisations within the scope of the new provisions and "licensing authorities [will] have discretion as to whether to charge reduced or no fees to such organisations."\(^{402}\) Licensing authorities will be able to regulate car boot sale organisers as well as other types of market operators.

516. Section 126 of the Bill removes the existing exemption in section 41 of the 1982 Act from the need to hold a public entertainment licence if an event is free to enter. This will allow licensing authorities to control large-scale free events but will give them discretion whether to require licences for certain events such as school fetes or gala days.\(^{403}\)

Evidence received

517. East Lothian Council supported the removal of both statutory exemptions, as it believed that events held outwith the licensing framework could "easily be to the detriment of the public with regard to safety and lack of measures for public protection."\(^{404}\)

518. Aberdeenshire Council took a similar view, saying the removal of the exemption was "long overdue"—

"Many large scale events regularly get round licensing requirements by being ‘free’. This often means that essential health and safety checks are not carried out and the applicants do not have the proper measures in place to ensure the safety of the events. Likewise, the ability to be able to exclude small events is welcomed."\(^{405}\)

\(^{405}\) Aberdeenshire Council. Written submission to the Justice Committee.
519. Dumfries and Galloway Council was concerned that sections 125 and 126, by removing the statutory exemptions for non-commercial organisations, will take up local authorities’ “valuable time and resources” and “will impact on local community groups”. They argued that authorities would have to publicise the new arrangements and process additional applications, and that (given their obligation to secure cost recovery) it would unfairly increase fees for other applicants if they exercised their discretion to waive or reduce the fees for non-commercial organisations.

520. Other written submissions questioned whether the potential costs of obtaining a market operators’ licence or a public entertainment licence would be prohibitive for not-for-profit organisations. Midlothian Council said that volunteers who organise events such as gala days and fetes need to be supported rather than potentially have obstacles placed in their path. Both the Law Society of Scotland and ACPOS questioned whether there was sufficient evidence of a current problem to justify this change in the law – “what is the mischief that we are trying to resolve?”

521. Frank Jensen, speaking for Fife Council, pointed out that local authorities currently only had discretion either to license all market operators in their area, or none. He suggested that—

“It would be highly desirable if there were explicit provision that gave local authorities discretion to determine which categories of market in their area they wished to license, control or regulate ... through assessment of perceived risk, numbers and so on. Such explicit provision would allow local authorities to decide whether to license small-scale markets, or car-boot sales by church groups, and so on.”

522. Alan McCreadie, Deputy Director Law Reform of the Law Society of Scotland, questioned the statements in the Policy Memorandum and the Explanatory Notes that local authorities already have discretion either to charge reduced or no fees to non-commercial organisations or exempt them from licensing requirements. He did not see how such discretion was provided for by the Bill, and therefore concluded that the reference must be to authorities’ existing discretion under section 9 of the 1982 Act (according to which the licensing of market operators and public entertainment applies only where an authority has so resolved). He described it as a “curious situation” in which authorities, by invoking section 9, would be able to “circumvent” the intention of these sections of the Bill.

523. In oral evidence, the Cabinet Secretary insisted that the removal of exemptions would not prevent local authorities from creating their own exemptions for some or all of the organisations presently entitled to exemptions. He said it was appropriate that these decisions should be made by locally-accountable politicians rather than centrally, by Scottish Ministers. 413 In a supplementary submission, the Cabinet Secretary further explained the basis for his view, asserting that—“If section 125 is approved and a licensing authority did subsequently decide to licence non-commercial market operator activities, the 1982 Act affords licensing authorities full flexibility in deciding whether to charge reduced or no fees to non-commercial organisations. For example, a licensing authority could decide to license non-commercial market operators but charge no fees to applicants.” 414

Licensing of lap dancing clubs

524. The Committee understands that local authorities regulate lap dancing clubs primarily through the alcohol licensing system (although such clubs could also be regulated under section 41 of the 1982 Act which requires a “public entertainment licence” in order to operate legally). Both the Trafficking Awareness Raising Alliance and Glasgow City Council said that the Bill “provides a valuable opportunity to reassess the current licensing of lap dancing venues”. 415 The Alliance added that it would “strongly welcome” any move to re-categorise such clubs as sex shops for licensing purposes, in order to “give local authorities greater powers to apply conditions and restrictions on such clubs.” 416

525. However, the Cabinet Secretary said that the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 “enables local authorities to take what action is required in this area”, although he did not give details of the existing powers in question. 417

526. The Committee shares concerns raised in evidence that the potential costs for non-commercial groups to obtain a market operator’s or public entertainment licence might prove prohibitive. We recognise that the Bill gives local authorities discretion over whether to charge for such licenses, but we can also understand concerns that where the power to charge exists, it may in practice be used.

527. The Committee also recognises the public safety concerns surrounding large-scale events that are free to enter, and hence currently do not require a public entertainment licence. We believe that it is important that community and charitable groups are able to hold small-scale events easily while also ensuring that licensing authorities have the power to control these large-scale events. The Committee therefore invites the Scottish Government to consider the alternative of basing the requirement for a public entertainment licence on the scale of the event (recognising that this will require authorities that choose to impose a licensing regime also to exercise discretion in relation to the size of events that would then require to be licensed).

528. In relation to lap-dancing clubs, the Committee is strongly in favour of local authorities having sufficient powers under licensing legislation to be able to control the numbers of such venues in their area – including to the extent of setting zero as the appropriate number of such venues. We would be grateful for an assessment by the Scottish Government of whether it considers those powers to be sufficient for this purpose. Subject to that, we are not convinced that re-categorising these venues for licensing purposes would necessarily be beneficial.

Section 127: Licensing of late night catering

Background

529. The 1982 Act provides that premises providing meals and refreshments between 11 pm and 5 am are to be licensed if licensing authorities so decide.

530. Section 127 of the Bill replaces “meals and refreshments” with “food”, bringing late-night grocers and 24-hour stores within the scope of the provisions, although licensing authorities will still have the power to determine which types of premises require a licence. This change implements a recommendation of the Task Group, which believed that—

“the potential for large numbers of people leaving pubs, night clubs etc. late at night to cause a disturbance … exists regardless of whether the food or drink being sold has been cooked or pre-prepared in any way”.418

Evidence received

531. South Lanarkshire and East Lothian Councils supported this provision on the grounds that it removes current uncertainty about whether certain types of premises, such as those selling kebabs, require to be licensed.419

532. ACPOS fully supported the provision as a useful tool in licensing premises which can be a source of disorder late at night, although it also pointed out that there could be “fairly significant” resource implications for the police.420

533. However, the Law Society of Scotland said that—

“Section 42 of the 1982 Act was enacted in order to regulate the sale of meals or refreshments from take-away establishments located in the main in city centres and in residential areas with potential for disturbance. The Society would therefore question why late night grocers, 24-hour stores and motorway service stations etc. should be brought within the scope of these provisions and questions whether the regulation and cost is proportionate to the perceived benefit.”421

534. In his response to the Committee, the Cabinet Secretary for Justice reiterated that section 127 of the Bill takes forward a Task Group recommendation and believed that it was appropriate to give licensing authorities the discretion to licence such premises “as they are best placed to decide what subset of food and drink retailers need to be licensed.”

Committee conclusion

535. The Committee considers that there is a case for broadening the definition for late night catering but supports local authorities retaining discretion in determining which types of premises require a licence.

Section 128: Applications for licences

536. Section 128 of the Bill makes various changes to Schedules 1 and 2 to the 1982 Act, including some of the time-limits that apply to applications for and the issuing of licences.

537. South Lanarkshire Council pointed out that some of these changes would have both advantages and disadvantages – for example, extending from 21 to 28 days the period within which people may object to licence applications “will cause delay for people wishing to obtain a licence although it may make it easier for partner organisations to submit timeous reports.” However, Dumfries and Galloway argued that increasing the length of the objection period is unnecessary as most applications are unopposed and there is already provision allowing authorities to consider objections outwith the time-limit.

538. The Cabinet Secretary for Justice accepted that the existing time period of 21 days for objections is “usually sufficient”. However, he pointed out that the police, for example, often have much less than 21 days to object once they have received notice of the application, and that lengthening the objection period would “ease such problems considerably.”

Statement of reasons time limit

539. Under Schedule 1 (paragraph 17) to the 1982 Act, a person applying for a licence has 28 days from the date of the decision to request a written statement of reasons from the licensing authority. Section 128 of the Bill reduces the time which an applicant has to request a statement of reasons from 28 to 21 days.

540. Dumfries and Galloway Council supported this change as being—

“of advantage to the authority especially in relation to issuing of a licence where an objection has been lodged. It is presently unfortunate that the period during which a statement of reasons can be requested equates with the period for lodging an appeal.”

Renewal applications after the expiry of a licence

541. Section 128 will allow licensing authorities, “on good cause being shown”\(^{427}\), to treat renewal applications received up to 28 days after the expiry of the previous licence as having been made on time, rather than treating them as new applications. While this amendment was welcomed by the Faculty of Advocates,\(^{428}\) the Committee received a number of critical comments.

542. Dumfries and Galloway Council pointed out that, since a decision on any such late application would require the exercise of discretion, it would have to be taken by councillors rather than delegated to staff; but that the timescales demanded an “almost immediate response” if the advantage of the provision was not to be lost.\(^{429}\)

543. Midlothian Council regarded the proposal as “a backward step” that was likely to lead to confusion and make enforcement more difficult.\(^{430}\) Glasgow City Council also cautioned against the change, saying it was “very concerning from a regulatory perspective” as, presumably in an attempt to protect licence-holders from the consequences of forgetting to renew, it risked undermining the importance of expiry dates. It also questioned what was meant by “good cause shown” and whether a hearing would be required to decide.\(^{431}\)

544. The Law Society of Scotland expressed similar concerns.\(^{432}\) John Loudon, convener of the Society’s licensing law sub-committee, said he could—

> “see the logic and the fairness of having a bit of leeway. However, what happens if, for example, an offence occurs or someone applies for an extra taxi during the 28-day period?”\(^{433}\)

545. In a supplementary submission, the Society suggested that a shorter period of leeway, perhaps seven days, would be better than the 28 days proposed, although it also felt that the leeway provision was unnecessary. In its view, if the provision is to remain, a licensing authority should convene a hearing to determine whether there had been cause shown for a late renewal.\(^{434}\)

546. According to the Cabinet Secretary—

> “If the licensing authority allows a late renewal application, trading will be legal, in the same way that it will be when the renewal application is made on time. If there has been no renewal application, or if the licensing authority does not recognise good cause for a late application, offences concerning trading without a licence will apply as normal. ... licensing authority to recognise honest mistakes and to allow a licence holder to continue to trade, even if the renewal application is made late.435

 Applicants’ personal information
547. The 1982 Act requires people applying for licences to provide their address. Section 128 of the Bill will additionally require them to provide their date and place of birth.

548. South Lanarkshire Council welcomed the new provision and said that it is a practice which they have already adopted. Punch Taverns had no objection to this information being provided to licensing boards, the police and other statutory bodies but said that “this information must not be available in the public domain.”436

549. The Cabinet Secretary for Justice said that, while applicants for licences would continue to be required publicly to display notices containing certain information, this did not include the additional information being required by the Bill (i.e. date and place of birth). He would expect local authorities only to use this additional information to assist the relevant authorities and not to publish it.437

Committee conclusion
550. The Committee recognises that these amendments are based on the Task Group’s recommendations and considers them as sensible proposals.

PART 9 – ALCOHOL LICENSING

Introduction
551. The provisions in this Part of the Bill make changes to the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 in order to—

“reduce costs, shorten process times, remove unintended barriers and close loopholes, while ensuring Licensing Boards receive sufficient information on which to base their decisions concerning licences to sell alcohol.”438

552. The 2005 Act came fully into force on 1 September 2009, replacing the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976 in its entirety. There was a transitional period, beginning in February 2008, aimed at giving existing licence holders and licensing boards sufficient time and information to enable them to adapt to the new system, with Ministers putting in place by subordinate legislation (using powers under the 2005 Act) some of the legislative changes proposed in the Bill.

553. Despite this, there were widespread reports in the immediate run-up to the 1 September date about problems relating to the new regime, with many councils reported to be late in issuing many of the new personal licences applied for. In June, the Law Society of Scotland outlined the extent of the problems being encountered by licencees and trade bodies, and suggested an extension to the

1 September deadline for processing applications to enable those who had put in applications in good time to continue trading lawfully beyond the deadline.439

554. Responding to these and similar concerns, the Cabinet Secretary made further use of the “transitional provisions” power in the 2005 Act to allow a personal licence to be deemed to be in effect in relation to a premises manager from 1 September 2009 provided an application for personal licence for that manager had been made by 31 August. Licensing boards must process all such personal licences by 1 November 2009.440

Sections 129 and 140

Background
555. Section 129 of the Bill is intended—

“to require Licensing Boards to actively consider the detrimental effect of off-sales purchases of alcohol to people under the age of 21 within their area, or part of their area, and to Licensing Boards with a power to impose licensing conditions restricting off-sales of alcohol to people under the age of 21.”441

556. Section 140 enables Scottish Ministers to impose a “social responsibility levy” for alcohol retailers and certain licence holders “to help offset the costs of dealing with the adverse impact of these businesses or their customers”.442

557. On 24 March 2009, following the introduction of the Bill but before the Committee had started its oral evidence-taking, Bruce Crawford, the Minister for Parliamentary Business, advised the Committee that the Scottish Government intended to introduce a new health bill to take forward a range of alcohol measures including minimum pricing, restrictions on the sale of alcohol to persons under 21 and a social responsibility levy. As a consequence, the Scottish Government would be lodging amendments to remove sections 129 and 140 of the Bill at Stage 2. In light of this announcement, the Justice Committee decided not to consider further these sections of the Bill.443

Committee conclusion
558. The Committee welcomes the Scottish Government’s commitment to remove these sections of the Bill at Stage 2.

Wider issues relating to the 2005 Act

559. As the Committee’s consideration of the Bill overlapped with the period immediately preceding full commencement of the 2005 Act, it was perhaps not surprising that some of those who commented on the Bill also offered comments on the commencement process as well.

Licence fees

560. The submission from the Scottish Licensed Trade Association (SLTA) concentrated on the fees set by licensing authorities to cover the costs of the new licensing system introduced by the 2005 Act. The SLTA said it was “absolutely absurd” that the major supermarkets – which accounted for 73% of off-sales alcohol purchases – would pay fees that were equivalent to “only 7.5% of the total running costs for the transitional period”. In the SLTA’s view, the supermarkets should “make a far greater contribution to the running of the new licensing regime”. It also argued that the fees set by licensing boards “will lead to inconsistency and confusion throughout the country” and the new system was “a money making exercise for Local Councils who we are sure will find some way of justifying the fees set.” The SLTA was particularly concerned that the fee structure proposed unfairly burdened the on-trade and that small, independent pubs were being targeted disproportionately.\(^{444}\)

561. John Loudon from the Law Society of Scotland was asked how an appropriate balance should be struck between reflecting in the fee structure the volumes of sales between different outlets, while at the same time equating fees to the administrative costs of processing applications (on the principle of full cost recovery). He acknowledged that—

“With the judgment of Solomon. It is very difficult to strike the balance. You will never get it right, because whatever you plump for, there will always be people who are caught fairly – or unfairly. ... I appreciate what the SLTA is saying. I am glad that I am not the one who has to make the decision on the fees, because it is not easy.”\(^{445}\)

562. The Cabinet Secretary for Justice, while stating that the Parliament had already agreed that the licensing regime must be self-financing, wrote—

“Fees are set by the local authorities within capped bands and those bands ensure a small corner shop pays less than a large supermarket. This is unlike the current arrangements where everybody pays the same. It is easy to say the costs should be loaded onto the biggest retailers but we believe the system has to be fair to everyone, including the council tax payer. The fees are charged for the cost of processing the application (a position that will be reinforced by the forthcoming EU Services Directive). Any Board which collects an excess is expected to reduce the coming year’s annual fee.”

563. The Cabinet Secretary added that the Accounts Commission had been asked to consider these issues and that the Scottish Government will consider its recommendations.\(^{446}\)

564. The Committee acknowledges that concerns raised on the structure of alcohol licence fees, as defined in the 2005 Act, are outwith the scope of the current Bill. However, the Committee is of the view that there are some inequalities in the present system, including the difference in fees paid by different sized outlets, on-sales and off-sales premises and discrepancies across licensing boards. The Committee therefore welcomes the Scottish Government’s decision to ask the Accounts Commission to consider these issues and would encourage the Commission to look in particular at the cost implications for smaller outlets in rural areas. The Committee looks forward to receiving the Scottish Government’s response to the Commission’s recommendations in due course.

Appeals procedure
565. The Committee received a number of representations about the appeal procedures introduced by the 2005 Act, which replaced a system of appeal by summary application with a system of application by way of stated case. The City of Edinburgh Licensing Board considered the new system “cumbersome” and suggested that “thought should be given to reverting to the arrangements for summary appeals under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976.”

Fife Licensing Board described the stated case appeals process as “time consuming” as they “deal in facts and while in liquor licensing cases there are indeed findings in fact by the Board, a considerable amount of what they do is founded on possibilities and probabilities.”

566. John Loudon from the Law Society of Scotland said that there were widespread concerns in the profession about the stated case appeals procedure—

“We have the rare situation that almost every lawyer – if not every lawyer – whom I have met agrees that the new appeal procedures are cumbersome, expensive and not working in practice. That is what the private sector, the public sector and sheriffs have said.”

567. Mairi Millar, Senior Solicitor and Assistant Clerk to the City of Glasgow Licensing Board, agreed, saying that—

“the stated case procedure does not work for licensing appeals and a straightforward return to the summary application is welcomed by all.”

568. In his evidence, the Cabinet Secretary advised that the concerns had been recognised and that the appropriate amendments would be lodged at Stage 2.

569. The Committee welcomes the Cabinet Secretary’s commitment to lodge amendments at Stage 2 to reinstate the summary appeals procedure.

Provisional premises licenses and site-only application procedure
570. A further area of criticism of the 2005 Act focused on the procedures under section 45 for obtaining a new provisional premises licence, and the lack of a “site-only application” process like that under section 26(2) of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976. Under the 1976 Act, according to the Law Society of Scotland, “an applicant could make an application to the board having obtained only planning permission”, whereas under the 2005 Act, “applicants require to incur the expense of an operating plan, a layout plan and all statutory consents before the Board can consider the application for premises licence.” Giving oral evidence for the Society, John Loudon acknowledged that “the mischief under the 1976 Act was that the board had no control over the detail once someone got to the affirmation stage”, but that there was nevertheless “a desperate need” for a similar procedure under the 2005 Act. He gave the example of a major hotel project that was not going ahead because of the cost involved in preparing the detailed plans required for an application, saying “that represents the loss of a major inward investment to Scotland, which is crackers.”

571. Mr Loudon also highlighted the two-year period within which a provisional premises licence under the 2005 Act was valid:

“A project of any size will take longer than two years. If the project is not completed within two years and the board does not grant an extension, the developer might have spent heaven knows what and still have no licence. Developers are simply not going to do that. Bankers or financiers will not lend someone the money to do that.”

572. In his view, increasing the period to five years would be sensible, especially for bigger projects.

573. The Scottish Beer and Pub Association (SBPA) was also critical of the changes made to site-only applications in the 2005 Act, describing the new process as “time consuming, complex and very expensive”. The SBPA acknowledged that once the provisional premises licence is granted, the applicant has the ability to make subsequent changes to the premises “but that is process akin to a new licence application and may easily take another three to six months in addition to the time already spent in applying for planning and licensing.” The Association also said that the two year maximum length of the provisional licence was “completely unrealistic for any major development.” The Scottish Late Night Operators Association echoed these concerns, arguing that the costs of the 2005 Act application process were deterring much-needed investment and development.

574. The Committee shares the concerns raised in evidence about the procedures for obtaining a provisional premises licence under section 45 of the 2005 Act, and believes that there is a case for modifying these procedures within the current Bill. We therefore invite the Scottish Government to consider bringing forward suitable amendments at Stage 2. These amendments might re-introduce something similar to the site-only application procedure under the 1976 Act while also extending the current two-year time limit for provisional licences.

Licence transfers
575. The Law Society of Scotland highlighted a potential difficulty with the 2005 Act regarding transferring licences to court-appointed administrators. The Law Society wrote—

“In terms of the 1976 Act [Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976], there was no requirement for the licence to be transferred. The position now is that the administrator would be required to become the premises licence holder in his own right as opposed to as an agent of the insolvent company (and apply within 28 days of their appointment) and may be reluctant to do so.”

454

576. Asked to comment on this, the Cabinet Secretary said he was unaware of the details, but was prepared to consider it further.

577. The Committee welcomes the Cabinet Secretary’s willingness to address this potential difficulty and trusts that an appropriate solution can be found.

Section 130: Premises licence applications: notification requirements
Background and evidence received
578. Under the 2005 Act a licensing board, when notifying a required list of interested parties, must provide a copy of the application along with the notification. Section 130 of the Bill amends this requirement so that licensing boards must provide copies only to the appropriate chief constable, and may provide copies to “any other person”. According to the Policy Memorandum, this “does not prevent the application being available for public inspection but reduces the cost and burden of notification.”

455

579. This change was generally welcomed. However, the City of Glasgow Licensing Board considered that it should also be a requirement to provide a copy of the application to the relevant fire authority, while the City of Edinburgh Licensing Board suggested extending the requirement to include Licensing Standard Officers.

580. Fife Licensing Board suggested making it clear that the requirement to provide a “copy” of the application was understood to include electronic transfer of the information contained in an application forms an not necessarily the form itself. North Ayrshire Council pointed out that it may be difficult for some persons who have received a notice of an application to view the application if they live some distance from a council office.

458 City of Edinburgh Licensing Board. Written submission to the Justice Committee.
459 Fife Licensing Board. Written submission to the Justice Committee.
460 North Ayrshire Council. Written submission to the Justice Committee.
581. Doubts were also expressed about the value of providing copies of applications to “any other person”, suggesting this could lead to uncertainty over what is being proposed and therefore generate a large number of objections. The City of Edinburgh Licensing Board suggested that any notice of an application sent to interested parties should include a broad outline of the application, while the City of Glasgow Licensing Board asked whether a standard form of notification would be developed.

582. During oral evidence, Mairi Millar of the City of Glasgow Licensing Board, said—

“A balance must be struck. Given the length of such documents, it would be overburdensome for boards to have to provide copies of the application form, the operating plan and the layout plan for neighbourhood notification and various other consultations. ... My experience throughout the transition period for the 2005 Act coming fully into force is that people who have received letters of notification have had no idea as to what was proposed, because of the lack of information that I have described. In all honesty, I think that even providing them with a copy of the application form, operating plan and layout plan would take them no further. I find it difficult to understand what is proposed in applications, because the generic operating plan has little or no information about what will happen on the premises.”

Committee conclusions

583. The Committee believes that a balance must be struck between the cost and burdens of notification and providing appropriate information. The Committee therefore recommends that the minimum notification required should consist of a summary of what is being proposed along with information on how to view the application in full.

Section 131: Premises licence applications: modification of layout plans

Background and evidence received

584. Section 131 enables a licensing board to propose a modification to the layout plan provided with an application for a premises licence if that modification would enable it to accept an application that would otherwise be refused.

585. While this was welcomed by some local authorities, the City of Glasgow Licensing Board and the Law Society of Scotland both highlighted potential difficulties in practice and suggested that the proposal be clarified. The City of Glasgow Licensing Board noted that a modified application would not be able to be granted “there and then” as any such amended plan would require further consultation with other interested parties such as building control officers and the fire authority.

586. The Law Society also commented on the potential for the licensing board to refuse “applications accompanied by layout plans which had received the appropriate statutory consents.”

Alan McCreadie of the Law Society of Scotland expanded—

“For want of a better phrase, we would end up with a catch-22 situation. Once the technical consents have been given, if the board is not happy with something, which is then fixed—if the applicant is happy to do so—the premises might then no longer meet the technical consents.”

587. The Scottish Beer and Pub Association (SBPA) and Punch Taverns were both opposed to the provision. The SPBA stated—

“We do not believe this is proportionate and we are concerned the clause could lead if passed to Licensing Boards effectively having the power to ‘micro manage’ the actual operation of a licensed premises, with significant likely cost and other implications such as planning, listed building consent and building warrant requirements.”

588. SBPA Chief Executive Patrick Browne expanded on the point in oral evidence—

“We have no issue with an applicant and a board mutually agreeing that a course of action is appropriate for an application, with a consequent change to a layout plan. … Our concern is that if boards are given the power to make changes, they might try in some cases to do so without agreement and leave it for the applicant to seek a remedy.”

589. Paul Smith, Vice-Chairman of the Scottish Late Night Operators Association, added—

“I am worried that licensing boards, which sometimes have only five or 10 minutes to decide on an application, could suggest a change that might seem right to them but which would destroy a building’s layout and design. I am greatly concerned that if an applicant were presented with a fait accompli – we should remember that the decision whether to grant the licence on the day might be critical for the applicant to secure options on buildings or funding – they might be forced to accept it.”

590. But Mairi Millar from the City of Glasgow Licensing Board said she was not aware of her Board ever intervening on “cosmetic” grounds—

“Any attempts to modify the layout or operating plan have been the result of concerns raised by building control officers or licensing standards officers.”

---

464 The Law Society of Scotland. Written submission to the Justice Committee.
466 The Scottish Beer and Pub Association. Written submission to the Justice Committee.
591. Councillor Thomas from the City of Edinburgh Licensing Board agreed, saying that her board “would change plans only if officials reckoned that we needed to do so.”

592. According to the Cabinet Secretary—

“The provision was included following a request from licensing boards, which saw it as being helpful, rather than something that would stifle businesses – it should enable applications to be progressed, rather than rejected.”

593. However, he said that he was more than happy to discuss the issue again with the trade.

Committee conclusions
594. While acknowledging the concerns raised in evidence about giving licensing boards the power to suggest modifications to layout plans, the Committee is not convinced that this would be a problem in practice. The Committee nevertheless welcomes the Cabinet Secretary’s commitment to discuss the matter further with the licensed trade.

Section 132: Premises licence applications: antisocial behaviour reports

Background
595. The 2005 Act requires chief constables to provide an antisocial behaviour report to the licensing board within 21 days for every application. The report is required to describe “all cases of antisocial behaviour identified within the relevant period by constables as having taken place on, or in the vicinity of, the premises, and all complaints or other representations made within the relevant period to constables concerning antisocial behaviour on, or in the vicinity of, the premises.”

596. Section 132 of the Bill amends the 2005 Act to require that chief constables only have to provide such a report if requested by the licensing board, although they may also choose to provide one. According to the Policy Memorandum, it had become clear, when considering the implementation of the 2005 Act, that the existing procedure was “unnecessarily onerous and bureaucratic.” Scottish Ministers used secondary legislation to introduce a similar provision for the duration of the transitional period prior to the implementation of the 2005 Act.

Evidence received
597. This proposal has been welcomed by some respondents, such as the SBPA and Punch Taverns. North Lanarkshire Council also supported the proposal—

“Allowing the Chief Constable if he sees fit to produce such reports or the Board at any time prior to determining applications to request such reports from the Chief Constable will avoid any unnecessary work being undertaken regarding the preparation of such reports.\footnote{North Lanarkshire Council. Written submission to the Justice Committee.}

598. ACPOS, although welcoming the provision, was concerned about the usefulness of the reports because incidents of antisocial behaviour cannot always be directly attributed to individual premises. Assistant Chief Constable Barker explained—

“The provisions that were put in place during transition have been helpful. The amount of work that would be involved in producing an antisocial behaviour report for every premises is considerable. ... Where there are clusters of licensed premises in a town or city centre, it would be difficult in a general report to attribute antisocial behaviour to particular premises, but we can say that a group of premises has caused concern.”\footnote{Scottish Parliament Justice Committee. \textit{Official Report, 16 June 2009}, Cols 2117-2118.}

599. The Committee received evidence questioning whether there was any merit in retaining this provision. For example, the City of Glasgow Licensing Board stated that, in relation to antisocial behaviour reports, “their content adds no value to a Board’s consideration of an application.”\footnote{City of Glasgow Licensing Board. Written submission to the Justice Committee.}

600. Similarly, Mairi Millar of the City of Glasgow Licensing Board, was concerned that antisocial behaviour reports offered “no tie-in with the applicant premises”. She added—

“I would be reluctant to advise a board that it could refuse an application based on an antisocial behaviour report, because that report will display no evidence of culpability on the part of the applicant.”\footnote{Scottish Parliament Justice Committee. \textit{Official Report, 16 June 2009}, Col 2146.}

601. That view was supported by Fife Council, whose Legal Team Leader Frank Jensen said—

“So far, the antisocial behaviour reports that our board has viewed have been of very limited value, essentially because of that point about culpability. The reports do not contain a great deal of information that can be used, although they might paint a picture of the area. The information in antisocial behaviour reports might be used more beneficially in larger areas such as town centres, where the details could be reported to licensing forums, which can make general recommendations to the licensing board on terminal hours and other issues. However, that option is available already.”\footnote{Scottish Parliament Justice Committee. \textit{Official Report, 16 June 2009}, Col 2147.}

602. North Ayrshire Council said that antisocial behaviour reports, as presently prepared, contain fundamental flaws and that much more information requires to be given to the Board.\footnote{North Ayrshire Council. Written submission to the Justice Committee.} This was echoed by the City of Edinburgh Licensing...
Board who emphasised “the need for consideration of the type of report that would be of most value.”

603. The Cabinet Secretary for Justice said that Scottish Ministers supported the view taken by police and that the Bill seeks to—

“strike the appropriate balance between the needs and wants of our communities, the requirements of our police and the amount of information that can be dealt with by the board that is charged with the ultimate responsibility of deciding whether to grant the application.”

604. The Cabinet Secretary added that as licensing standards officers are now in place, a variety of checks and balances exist.

Committee conclusions
605. The Committee was unable to reach consensus on the merits of this provision. Some members of the Committee considered the current measures within the 2005 Act requiring chief constables to provide an antisocial behaviour report to licensing boards for all applications still to be appropriate. Other members felt that such reports should only be provided by chief constables if requested to do so by the licensing board or if they choose to provide one, so as to target resources more effectively. The Committee specifically notes that, now that all premises licences are subject to the requirements of the 2005 Act, antisocial behaviour reports are required only in respect of applications for new licences. We also note that the provisions in the 2005 Act allowing a premises licence to be reviewed provide an opportunity for a licensing board to consider any evidence on antisocial behaviour associated with a particular licensed premises, or indeed to request an antisocial behaviour report itself.

606. While we note the evidence suggesting that antisocial behaviour reports are often not specific enough to aid a licensing board’s consideration of an individual application, we do not consider this to demonstrate a problem with the legislation, and is something that should be addressed by better communication between boards and the police on the information required.

Section 133: Sale of alcohol to trade

Background and evidence received
607. Section 133 of the Bill amends section 63 of the 2005 Act, so that it is no longer an offence for licensed premises to sell to the trade. The Policy Memorandum describes it as—“a common sense measure that corrects an unintended consequence of the 2005 Act. For example if a restaurant owner wished to buy alcohol for the restaurant from a supermarket instead of the wholesaler, the restaurant owner would under the 2005 Act be committing an offence.\(^{482}\)

608. North Lanarkshire Council\(^{483}\) was supportive of the change as providing clarity to section 63 of the 2005 Act. The Law Society of Scotland\(^{484}\) also welcomed the provision.

Committee conclusion

609. The Committee welcomes this as a sensible amendment to the 2005 Act.

Section 134: Occasional licences

Background

610. Section 134 of the Bill reduces the length of time, from 21 days to not less than 24 hours, that a licensing board is required to wait for comments from the chief constable and the licensing standards officer. The Policy Memorandum explains—

“The provisions will enable the fast tracking of some occasional licences where there is very limited notice of the need for such a licence e.g. a funeral. At present the statutory time requirements of the 2005 Act would prevent such functions or events from taking place.”\(^{485}\)

611. The licensing board must be satisfied that the application requires to be dealt with quickly while the provision also restricts the approval of such applications to “any member of the Board, any committee established by the Board and the clerk of the Board.”\(^{486}\)

Evidence received

612. This proposal was generally welcomed. The SPBA, Punch Taverns, City of Edinburgh Licensing Board and the Law Society of Scotland all supported the provision but suggested that the procedure should also include applications for extended hours. John Loudon from the Law Society of Scotland explained—

“Under the 1976 Act, occasional extensions, as they are known, are common. It is very rare for there to be a problem with an occasional extension: you put in your application and it is processed and granted. Some boards turn such applications round within two or three days, although others take a couple of weeks. … Relatively few issues have arisen. I therefore cannot see any good reason for not replicating that system in the 2005 Act. That would be in the interests of the public, business and councils. We could be creating a time problem when none exists at present.”\(^{487}\)

613. North Ayrshire Council, North Lanarkshire Council and South Lanarkshire Council also welcomed the change but questioned why the power was not also delegated to members of staff employed to assist the Clerk. North Lanarkshire Council said that not extending the power to such staff “could, on occasion, cause unnecessary delay.”

614. The City of Glasgow Licensing Board feared that the reduction in the reporting period could be abused by applicants who were “seeking to have the reduced reporting period in less than exceptional circumstances” and suggested that the provisions need to be tightened to avoid such abuse. It also considered it unsatisfactory that any concerns from the chief constable or licensing standards officer might not be highlighted to the board before the application is granted. Dumfries and Galloway Council, meanwhile, was concerned about the “vastly detailed procedure” for occasional licences within the 2005 Act, and suggested that the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976 contained a much simpler and more effective procedure. Mairi Millar, Senior Solicitor and Assistant Clerk to the City of Glasgow Licensing Board agreed.

615. The Cabinet Secretary said that in light of the concerns expressed he would be happy to look again at this provision. Responding further in writing, the Cabinet Secretary pointed out that the 2005 Act for the first time gives the local community affected an opportunity to comment and believed that any “simplification of the procedure as suggested would remove that community involvement.”

Committee conclusions
616. While the Committee acknowledges the need for fast-tracking of some occasional licence applications, in light of points raised by witnesses it has some concerns that the procedure might be open to abuse. The Committee therefore seeks assurances from the Scottish Government that the procedure will minimise the scope for such abuse and notes the Cabinet Secretary’s willingness to look again at the provision.

617. The Committee also recommends that the power to approve such applications should be capable of being delegated to licensing authority officials.

Section 135: Extended hours applications: variation of conditions

Background and evidence received
618. Section 135 enables licensing boards to apply additional conditions to extended hours licences for the period that the extended hours apply or for the whole period of the licence. The Policy Memorandum provides a practical example—

\[488\] North Lanarkshire Council. Written submission to the Justice Committee.
\[489\] City of Glasgow Licensing Board. Written submission to the Justice Committee.
\[490\] Dumfries and Galloway Council. Written submission to the Justice Committee.
\[491\] Mairi Millar. Supplementary written submission to the Justice Committee.
\[492\] Scottish Government. Supplementary written submission to the Justice Committee.
“where a licensed premises has listed one of its activities as showing televised sport, a Licensing Board may see no reason to apply specific conditions. However if there was a request for extended hours to enable the screening of certain football matches during a major competition (for example the World Cup), the Licensing Board may wish to see additional conditions applied to the premises, e.g. extra door staff and the use of plastic glasses while those extended hours apply (and earlier in the day).”494

619. This provision was broadly welcomed.495 For example Dumfries and Galloway Council said it—

“will allow the Board to address concerns arising from the use of the additional hours without reviewing the premises licence and is therefore a positive step.”496

620. North Lanarkshire Council497 also welcomed the provision but said it was unclear whether a licence holder would be given a hearing into whether the variations proposed are necessary for the purposes of the licensing objective. Aberdeenhire Council was concerned that there could be room for legal argument about exactly what additional conditions licensing boards had power to impose.498

621. According to the Cabinet Secretary for Justice, it is a matter for a licensing board to decide whether to hold a hearing. When questioned on what powers licensing boards had to impose such additional conditions, Mr MacAskill stated that “the position on enforcement is no different from any other licence”.499 Philip Lamont added that the Scottish Government would re-examine the provisions in the light of the comments by Aberdeenhire Council to ensure the powers assigned are clear.500

Committee conclusions

622. While generally content with the provision, the Committee notes that extended hours applications might increase the potential for irresponsible drinking. The Committee therefore seeks clarification from the Scottish Government as to how it envisages licensing boards ensuring they take health and public order concerns into account when considering such applications.

Section 136: Personal licences

Background and evidence received

623. Section 136 of the Bill amends the 2005 Act to allow a licensing board to refuse an application for a personal licence on the grounds that the applicant already holds one, or that a previous licence held by the applicant expired or was surrendered during the past three years. The section also makes it a criminal offence, subject to a fine of up to £1,000, to pass off as valid or fail to surrender a void personal licence. The purpose is—

“to close a possible loophole where a licence holder who had an endorsement under section 85(1) of the 2005 Act could avoid the suspension or revocation provisions of section 86 of the 2005 Act by voluntarily surrendering their personal licence before the Licensing Board had had an opportunity to consider what action it might take under section 86 of the 2005 Act, and then apply for another personal licence which would be “clean”.”

624. Both the City of Edinburgh Council Licensing Board and Dumfries and Galloway Council welcomed the provision. However, the Scottish Beer and Pub Association considered it unlikely that a person would apply for a second personal licence to avoid sanctions, given the vigilance of licensing boards and the existence of a National Personal Licence Database. Similarly, Punch Taverns said that the 2005 Act is still in its infancy, no problems concerning second personal licences have so far arisen and there are “sufficient safeguards to prevent the issues which appear to cause the Government concern.”

625. The City of Glasgow Licensing Board, although supportive of the change, said it was unclear how licensing boards would know whether an applicant already holds, or previously held, a personal licence issued by a different licensing board, since the National Personal Licence Database was not used by all boards, and was not always updated quickly. In oral evidence, Mairi Millar, Assistant Clerk of the Board, added that “the Bill will cure many of the problems that we have identified with personal licences” and that the database would be “useful in the future”, once the Bill had taken effect. At present, she said, there is no point in checking the database because boards have no right to refuse an application for a personal licence on the ground that the applicant already holds or previously held one.

626. The Law Society of Scotland also supported the change, and suggested that all licensing boards should be required to update the national database.

627. The Society also questioned the requirement in the Bill that an application must be signed by the applicant, arguing that the applicant’s agent should also be able to sign the application. However, Frank Jensen of Fife Council suggested that the provision could be interpreted so as to allow an agent to sign, since “the person making the application” need not be the person who would benefit from it. He believed that the correct interpretation would be influenced by the EU Services Directive, which is intended to remove certain barriers to trade. Mairi Millar also referred to the Directive, suggesting that it would require licensing boards to accept online and hence unsigned applications, although this might not apply directly to personal licences.\(^{508}\)

628. Section 73 of the 2005 Act requires chief constables to be notified of all personal licence applications and allows them to recommend to the board that a particular application be refused by reference to the applicant’s relevant previous offences. ACPOS suggested that chief constables should, in addition, be able to make formal representations to boards that would be relevant to the board’s consideration of an application even though they did not merit a recommendation to refuse it.

629. Aberdeenshire Council noted that section 136 includes provision apparently aimed at tackling a “possible black market in personal licences”, but suggested this would be more effective if personal licences issued by a particular licensing board were only valid in that board’s area, rather than throughout Scotland.\(^{509}\)

630. The Cabinet Secretary confirmed that the Scottish Government was in the process of ensuring that all provisions within both the Bill and the 2005 Act meet the requirements of the EU Services Directive, but he acknowledged that there were some technical difficulties with the National Personal Licence Database which were being “tackled”.\(^{510}\) He confirmed that all local authorities had signed up to participate in the Database but that if this participation was not realised, he would consider making it mandatory.

Committee conclusions

631. The Committee supports these provisions for tightening the rules on applications for personal licences. We recognise the importance of the national database to make the provision effective, and accept the Cabinet Secretary’s assurances about the practical measures being taken in this connection. We also support ACPOS’s suggestion that chief constables should have wider powers to make representations to licensing boards in relation to personal licence applications, and would invite the Scottish Government to give this serious consideration.

Section 137: Emergency closure orders

Background and evidence received

632. The 2005 Act allows “a senior police officer” (defined as a constable of or above the rank of superintendent) to make an “emergency closure order” requiring licensed premises to close for up to 24 hours in the interests of public safety, and then to extend or terminate the order. Section 137 of the Bill changes this to a constable of or above the rank of inspector so as to “accord better with the practicalities of day to day policing.”\(^{511}\)

The Scottish Beer and Pub Association and Punch Taverns both welcomed this clarification,\(^512\), North Lanarkshire Council described the provisions as “helpful,”\(^513\) and the Law Society of Scotland considered it a “sensible proposal.”\(^514\) However, while accepting that the amendment may assist the police on an operational level, Dumfries and Galloway Council believed that “keeping it at a higher rank would underline the importance of what is being sought or imposed.”\(^515\)

Committee conclusion

634. The Committee welcomes the changes made by this section of the Bill.

Section 138: False statements in applications: offences

Background and evidence received

635. Section 138 of the Bill makes it an offence, punishable by a fine of up to £1,000, knowingly to make a false statement in an application under the 2005 Act. The Explanatory Notes suggest this might be used to deter people from applying for a second personal licence as a precaution against the original such licence being suspended or revoked for improper conduct.\(^516\)

636. In its written submission North Lanarkshire Council considered the creation of the offence “an incentive for applications to be completed honestly and accurately.”\(^517\) The provision was also welcomed by the City of Edinburgh Licensing Board and the City of Glasgow Licensing Board, although the Glasgow Board sought clarification on how the offence would be established if the application was submitted electronically without a signature.\(^518\) Further clarification of the provision was also sought by the SPBA and Punch Taverns who sought an assurance that “honest oversights or mistakes would not be caught by this provision”.\(^519\)

637. On the point about electronic applications, the Cabinet Secretary said that the Scottish Government was “in the process of ensuring” that the 2005 Act and the Bill fully complied with the EU Services Directive. On the point about oversights or mistakes, the Cabinet Secretary said that—

“A defence is afforded in that the person must knowingly make a false statement before an offence is committed.”\(^520\)

Committee conclusion

638. The Committee accepts the policy rationale for the changes proposed.

Section 139 and schedule 4: Further modifications of 2005 Act

Background and evidence received

639. The 2005 Act allows any person to make an objection to a premises licence. However, the chief constable is limited to making an objection on the grounds of crime prevention if there is reason to believe that the applicant is involved in serious organised crime. Schedule 4 to the Bill (introduced by section 139) makes various changes to the 2005 Act to widen the grounds on which a chief constable can raise objections in relation to a premises or personal licence. The Policy Memorandum states that—

“This provision will ensure that the police have the same ability as anyone else to object to a licence on any or all of the grounds offered by the Licensing Objectives including prevention of crime and public nuisance, securing public safety and protecting children from harm.”

640. The proposed changes were welcomed by the City of Edinburgh Licensing Board and also North Lanarkshire Council, which said—

“There was always a feeling that the Board’s powers were unnecessarily restricted in this area with the legislation as it was originally drafted. … The proposed new power of the Chief Constable to report conduct inconsistent with the licensing objectives will, of course, be welcomed by the police and it is a positive measure since it allows for the ongoing monitoring of the operation of premises and personal licences and is a clear indicator to those involved in the licensed trade that if the police in their monitoring of matters have concerns regarding anything inconsistent with any licensing objectives there is provision for them to refer the matter, as they see fit to the Licensing Board.”

641. Aberdeenshire Council, Dumfries and Galloway Council and the City of Glasgow Licensing Board each suggested minor amendments, sought clarification or highlighted possible drafting errors within schedule 4. All three, however, generally welcomed the changes.

642. Both Punch Taverns and the SBPA, however, described the provisions as “very wide ranging” and questioned whether they were necessary, given that the police would already be fully consulted on licence applications, and would have carried out criminal records checks. They went on—

“We would suggest that allowing the police to comment on applications solely on the basis of the objective of ‘preventing crime and disorder’ is entirely appropriate, adequate and proportionate. Extending this to all of the other licensing objectives risks the police acquiring the status of the catch all objector of last resort. We do not believe this would be appropriate nor reasonable and it could lead to the police commenting on matters which are more appropriately dealt with by other agencies with more relevant, or indeed the only, expertise. We would suggest that this could only weaken the status

521 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 549.
522 North Lanarkshire Council. Written submission to the Justice Committee. of the police in the process and indeed the credibility of their objections on legitimate criminal matters.\textsuperscript{523}

643. In response, the Cabinet Secretary argued that the police had the same right to comment on all licensing objectives as members of the public, and that it would be for “the Licensing Board to weigh the information before reaching a decision”.\textsuperscript{524}

Committee conclusions

644. The Committee accepts the case made by the Scottish Government for this provision. We are not persuaded by the objections raised, and accept the Cabinet Secretary’s argument that chief constables should have greater powers to object to applications for a premises or personal licence.

ADDITIONAL ISSUE: NON-INVASIVE POST-MORTEM

Background and evidence received

645. The Scottish Council of Jewish Communities (SCoJeC) made a written submission to the Committee urging the Parliament to take the opportunity presented by the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill to provide that “a post-mortem carried out by non-invasive methods such as Magnetic Resonance Imaging (MRI) is acceptable for all purposes for which a surgical post-mortem is generally accepted”. As this topic is not currently addressed in the Bill, SCoJeC asked that consideration be given to an amendment to add this new subject-matter within the overall scope of the Bill.

646. The submission explained that Halachah (Jewish Law) regards the human body (including all body parts and tissue) is sacrosanct, and requires that it should always be treated with dignity. Although fully accepting that there may be occasions when it may be necessary for a post-mortem examination to take place, SCoJeC pointed out that, since MRI scanning was made available in Manchester in 1997, the number of surgical post mortems carried out in the Jewish community there has fallen from around 100 to fewer than ten per annum. However, SCoJeC had been told that MRI is not currently recognised as a form of post-mortem examination in Scotland.

647. SCoJeC also explained that the Coroners and Justice Bill, currently before the UK Parliament, included a provision that would permit a coroner to specify the kind of post-mortem examination that should be made, the Explanatory Notes for which made specific mention of MRI.\textsuperscript{525}

648. In response, the Lord Advocate made clear that she had no objection in principle to the introduction of non-invasive post mortems in Scotland but that “it would depend on the nature of the death”. John Logue, Head of Policy at the Crown Office, said that following representations from the Jewish community the matter was being considered closely. However, he cautioned that there might be relatively limited scope for using MRI in Scotland, given the difference between the \textsuperscript{523} Punch Taverns and the Scottish Beer and Pub Association. Written submissions to the Justice Committee.

\textsuperscript{524} Scottish Government. Supplementary written submission to the Justice Committee.

\textsuperscript{525} Scottish Council of Jewish Communities. Written submission to the Justice Committee. role of procurators fiscal in investigating deaths in Scotland and the role of coroners in England. He also suggested that it was unclear whether legislation was necessary to enable MRI to be used in post-mortem examinations in Scotland.526

Committee conclusions

649. The Committee acknowledges the importance of this issue to the Jewish community and potentially other faith groups in Scotland. However, we are unclear whether an amendment of the sort sought by the Scottish Council of Jewish Communities is necessary to enable MRI to be used where appropriate. It must also be doubtful whether such an amendment would be within the scope of the current Bill, given that the issue of post-mortem examination is not directly a matter of criminal justice.

650. Nevertheless, since the matter has been raised with us, it would be helpful if the Scottish Government or the Crown Office could give us a more definitive view on whether it supports SCoJeC’s case for a change to the system of post-mortems in Scotland, whether legislative change would be required and, if so, when that legislation might be forthcoming.

651. We would certainly wish to ensure that a full range of techniques for the conduct of post-mortems is available in Scotland, so that non-invasive methods can be considered in appropriate circumstances. We accept that many relatives will understandably prefer such non-invasive methods where possible, but accept that this must always be a decision for the procurator fiscal, acting in the public interest.

CONCLUSION

652. As will be evident from this report, the Justice Committee has scrutinised in considerable depth the many complex issues raised by this Bill. Some of the more significant provisions are controversial, and it was predictable that we would not be able to agree on those. Many raise difficult issues in terms of legal principle, effectiveness and cost, and we have found it challenging to reach a clear view based on the often strong and diverse evidence we have received.

Recommendation

653. Notwithstanding the differences of view on specific provisions set out earlier in this Report, the Committee agrees to recommend to the Parliament that the general principles of the Bill be agreed to.

ANNEXE A: SUBORDINATE LEGISLATION COMMITTEE REPORT

Subordinate Legislation Committee Report on the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

The Committee reports to the Parliament as follows—

Introduction

1. At its meetings on 5 May\(^1\), and 26 May\(^2\) 2009 the Subordinate Legislation Committee considered the delegated powers provisions in the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill at Stage 1. The Committee submits this report to the Justice Committee as the lead committee for the Bill under Rule 9.6.2 of Standing Orders.

2. The Scottish Government provided the Parliament with a memorandum on the delegated powers provisions in the Bill.\(^3\)

3. The Committee’s correspondence with the Scottish Government is reproduced in the Appendix.

Delegated Powers Provisions

4. The Committee considered each of the delegated powers provisions in the Bill.

5. The Committee determined that it did not need to draw the attention of the Parliament to the delegated powers in the following sections: 5, 12(2)(a), 13(2), 14 (inserted sections 227A(8), 227B(2), 227E(6), 227J(3), 227O(1), 227Z(2), 227ZD(6), 227ZG, 227ZH(4) and (5) and 227ZJ(2)), 19 (inserted section 9B(5)), 30(3) (inserted section 1A(3)(c)), 31(4) (inserted subsection (4B)(c)), 57(3) (inserted section 113A(4)(c)), 59 (inserted section 18B(6)), 66(1) (inserted section 271U(3)), 72(7) (inserted section 40A(4)), 79(2) and (3) (inserted sections 113BA(1) and 120ZB(2A)), 81(1), 86(9)(b), 114(1) and (3)(c), 126(2)(e) (inserted paragraph (h)), 148(1) and schedule 1 paragraph 2(3) and schedule 1 paragraph 4.

Section 14 (Community payback orders) (inserting section 227I(6) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 – power to vary the minimum and maximum hours of unpaid work or other activity requirement)

6. New sections 227I to 227O of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (“the 1995 Act”) concern the “unpaid work or other activity requirement” which may be imposed on an offender in a community payback order. Section 227I(1) defines “unpaid work or other activity requirement” as a requirement that the offender must, for a specified number of hours, undertake unpaid work or another activity. Section 227I(3) sets minimum and maximum hours which may be

---

1. Official Report 5 May
2. Official Report 26 May
3. Delegated Powers Memorandum (‘DPM’) specified in an unpaid work or other activity requirement; namely at least 20 hours, and not more than 300 hours.

7. The effect of the power at section 227I(6) is that the Scottish Ministers may vary by order the minimum and maximum numbers of hours of unpaid work or other activity which may be specified in the requirement. They may also vary the number of hours at which a requirement is considered to be level 1 or level 2. (Level 1 being a requirement to work for 100 hours or less, level 2 more than 100 hours.)

8. The Committee asked why this power could not be expressed as a power to vary within defined maximum and minimum limits. The response indicates that the Government will bring forward Stage 2 amendments to provide limits to the extent to which the minimum and maximum hours stated can be varied, and to provide limits to the extent to which the "100" figure can be varied. The Committee welcomes this undertaking in relation to the extent of this delegated power. The Government does not indicate in its response the likely range of the limits that will be in such amendments. However, given that finite limits shall be put in the Bill, the actual limits themselves may be considered a policy matter for the lead committee and Parliament.

9. While the Committee is of the view that generally modifications amending the text of the Act should be subject to affirmative resolution procedure, this is not an absolute rule and in this case the power is to be quite strictly defined, so far as it only allows changing the minimum and maximum number of hours in the requirement, and the “100” figure which distinguishes a level 1 requirement from level 2.

10. Accordingly, the Committee is content with the exercise of the power being subject to negative procedure.

11. The Committee welcomes the confirmation provided by the Government in its response that it shall bring forward amendments at Stage 2, to provide limits to the extent to which the minimum and maximum number of hours stated in section 227I(3) can be varied, and to provide limits to the extent to which the “100” figure in section 227I(4) and (5) can be varied.

Section 14 (Community payback orders) (New section 227K(3) – power to vary the limits of the balance of activity within the unpaid work or other activity requirement)

12. Section 227K deals with the split of hours between unpaid work and other activity in relation to an unpaid work and other activity requirement. It will be for the responsible officer (an officer of the relevant local authority) to specify the allocation of activity between unpaid work activity and other activity. This is subject to subsection (2) - the number of hours allocated to undertaking an activity other than unpaid work must not exceed whichever is the lower of, 30% of the total number of hours specified in the requirement, and 30 hours. This means that the number of hours allocated to non-work activity cannot exceed 30 hours.
Subsection 227K(3) permits the Scottish Ministers to amend subsection (2) by regulations subject to negative procedure.

13. The Committee asked for further explanation as to why the power is required to amend subsection (2) in any respect instead of a power to specify different figures in subsection (2)(a) or (b) and given that this is a “Henry VIII power” how negative procedure can be justified.

14. The response confirms that the Government proposes to bring forward amendments at Stage 2 to address the issues raised in the Committee’s questions. The reply also confirms that the amendments will apply affirmative resolution procedure to these powers.

15. The Committee welcomes the Government’s confirmation that it shall bring forward amendments at Stage 2 to vary the powers as drafted in section 14 (so far as inserting new section 227K(3) of the 1995 Act). The Committee understands this to mean that instead of the power permitting the amendment of subsection (2) in any respect, it shall be a power to specify different figures in subsection (2)(a) or (b). The Committee notes that the response also confirms that the amendments at Stage 2 shall provide for the application of affirmative resolution procedure, rather than negative procedure.

Section 14 (Community payback orders) (Inserting section 227ZB(12) – power to vary the maximum number of months in which a restricted movement requirement can have effect

16. Section 227ZB(9) restricts the maximum period for which a restricted movement requirement can have effect. The period must not exceed whichever is the lesser of—

(a) the period for which the supervision requirement has effect, and

(b) the period of 12 months. So the maximum period for which a restricted movement requirement can have effect is 12 months. A supervision requirement may be between 6 months, and not more than 3 years.

17. The power at section 227ZB(12) permits the Scottish Ministers to substitute the number of months specified in subsection (9)(b) with another number of months. This allows Ministers to vary (up or down) the maximum number of months in which a restricted movement requirement can have effect.

18. A related provision is section 227ZD(4)(b), which provides that a restricted movement requirement “has effect for such period of not more than 12 months as is specified.” The Scottish Ministers’ have power at section 227ZD(6) to modify section 227D(4)(b).

19. The Committee asked for confirmation whether the intention is that there is a single overall maximum period of 12 months for which a restricted movement requirement may last (subject to the ability to modify that period). If that is the case, the Scottish Government was asked why the maximum is specified in two places, with a separate power to change each figure, rather than providing the maximum in one place only – albeit that cross-reference to the maximum may be appropriate elsewhere. The Committee considered that the provision of two separate powers gives rise to the risk that they may not be used to maintain parity.

20. This power has significant consequences, in that it will affect the duration of the period in which an offender can be subject to restrictions on his or her movement under a restricted movement requirement. The response confirms that it is intended there is a single overall maximum period of 12 months for which a restricted movement requirement may last.

21. The response confirms that the Government accepts the Committee’s concerns and will address the issue raised by the Committee’s question, by amendment at Stage 2.

22. The Committee welcomes the Government’s confirmation in relation to the delegated powers specified in section 14 of the Bill (inserting new section 227ZB(12) of the 1995 Act) that it shall bring forward amendments at Stage 2 to address the issue raised by the Committee’s question. This would provide for a single overall maximum period of 12 months for a restricted movement requirement (subject to the ability to modify that period by affirmative regulations).

Section 18(2)(a)(iii) of the Bill (so far as amending section 4(1) of the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (S) Act 2007– power to prescribe by order the “prescribed period” for the purposes of certain sentences under Part 2 of that Act

23. Section 18(2) introduces various revised definitions of sentences for the purposes of Part 2 of the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007. The Committee understands that Part 2 of the 2007 Act has still to be commenced. The 2007 Act’s existing regime for offender release depends on whether an individual is serving a “custody-only” sentence (less than 15 days), or a “custody and community sentence” (15 days or more).

24. The amendments in section 18(2) remove the 15 day period which is specified in the 2007 Act for the purposes of defining custody-only and custody and community sentences. The 15 days is replaced with a “prescribed period”, defined as “such period as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify”.

25. The amendments in section 18 also replace the “custody-only sentence” with a “short-term custody and community sentence”. A revised section 5 of the 2007 Act is inserted at section 18(3) of the Bill. It replaces the unconditional release of custody-only prisoners on completion of their prison term. Under that revised provision, short-term custody and community prisoners will generally be released on a short-term community licence on completion of one-half of their sentence.

26. The amendment at section 18(2)(a)(iii) empowers the Scottish Ministers to specify the prescribed period for the purposes of defining, and distinguishing between, short-term custody and community sentences, and custody and community sentences. Previously the relevant time period (15 days) had been specified on the face of the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007. This time period has significant consequences, as different release regimes flow from a prisoner being categorised as serving a short-term custody and community sentence; or a custody and community sentence.

27. The Committee understands that the distinction between the two types of sentence can impact on the length of time an offender spends in prison. In the case of a short-term custody and community sentence a prisoner is released, subject to licence conditions, on serving one half of his sentence. In the case of a custody and community sentence, release on serving one half of a prison sentence is not automatic – it depends on a number of other requirements being met.

28. The Committee asked questions on the scope of this power, particularly why the delegated power requires to be drawn as wide as to enable any period at all to be substituted for the period of 15 days in the existing legislation. The Committee accepts the further explanation offered by the Government on this apparently significant power. Any future decision on a change to this period involves matters of sentencing policy, and therefore the Committee considers that the responses on this power should be drawn to the attention of the Justice Committee.

29. The Committee considers that it is appropriate this power is subject to affirmative procedure. The power may have significant effects, and it will textually amend the Act.

30. The response also confirms that the Government is considering if the scope of this power could be narrowed by setting a limit beyond which the demarcation line could not be moved. Further consideration will be given to what that demarcation point might be. The Committee agreed to re-visit the provisions after the Bill has been amended at Stage 2.

31. The Committee reports to the lead committee, in relation to the delegated power in section 18(2)(a)(iii) of the Bill—

- that the Government has indicated in its response that it will reconsider whether the power requires to be taken to prescribe any new period of custody, instead of 15 days, for the purposes of that section, and will consider whether the scope of this power could be narrowed by setting minimum or maximum limits;

- otherwise, the Committee draws its questions and the Government responses on the scope of, and reasons for, this delegated power to the lead committee in connection with its consideration of the Bill;

- the Committee is content that this power shall be subject to affirmative resolution procedure.

Paragraphs 10(3) and (4) of Schedule 2 (amending section 55 of the 2007 Act) – Power to prescribe the length of periods of detention for those under 21 years of age for the purpose of determining if they are serving “short-term custody and community sentences” or “custody and community sentences”

32. The Delegated Powers Memorandum explains that a person under 21 cannot be sentenced to imprisonment, but will instead be sentenced to a period of detention. The provisions in Part 2 (confine ment and release of prisoners) operate by reference to the term of imprisonment that a person is sentenced to, so do not apply to people under 21. Section 55 of the 2007 Act sets out how Part 2 is to apply to people under 21. The reason for taking this power is to allow the Scottish Ministers to take account of changes in the length of a period of imprisonment that determines when a sentence of imprisonment is a custody and community sentence, and when it is a short-term custody and community sentence.

33. The questions raised here were similar to those raised in relation to section 18(2)(a)(iii) of the Bill, above.

34. The Government provided a similar response as for section 18(2)(a)(iii) of the Bill.

35. Therefore, the Committee reports to the lead committee—

• that the Government has indicated in its response that it will reconsider whether the power requires to be taken to prescribe any new period of custody, instead of 15 days, for the purposes of that section, and will consider whether the scope of this power could be narrowed by setting minimum or maximum limits;

• otherwise, the Committee draws its questions and the Government responses on the scope of, and reasons for, this delegated power to the lead committee in connection with its consideration of the Bill;

• the Committee is content that this power shall be subject to affirmative resolution procedure.

Section 70(3) (inserted section 26G(1))-power to amend list of persons mentioned in section 26C(2) of the Public Finance and Accountability (Scotland) Act 2000 by adding or removing a public body and to modify the application of new Part 2A of that Act to a public body so added

36. Section 70(3) of the Bill inserts a substantial new Part (Part 2A, encompassing inserted sections 26A to G) into the Public Finance and Accountability (Scotland) Act 2000 (‘the 2000 Act’) in relation to data matching. This covers such matters as the power to carry out data matching exercises; voluntary disclosure of data to Audit Scotland; power to require disclosure of data; disclosure of results of data matching; publication of reports on data matching, and provisions for a data matching code of practice.

37. It was accepted that there may, from time to time be a need to adjust the list set out in section 26C(2), whether to add a public body to it, or to remove a person from it, and the Committee recognises that it would be considered desirable to be able to do so by means of subordinate legislation.
38. The Committee noted the list to be of some importance, in respect that persons (or public bodies) named on it may be required by Audit Scotland to disclose data to them for the purposes of a data matching exercise. That being so, the Committee raised the issue of whether it would be appropriate that the exercise of a power to add a public body to the list, or to remove persons from it, should be subject to more rigorous parliamentary scrutiny than that afforded by negative procedure. The Committee questioned whether a higher level of scrutiny might be required where the power is used to modify the application of Part 2A to the body specified. The power to modify is not restricted to administrative matters. On one view, the power could be used to amend the purposes for which the data matching is to be conducted set out in section 26A(3).

39. In addition, very limited justification had been provided within the DPM in respect of the related power, under section 26G(2) for such an order to include incidental etc. provision as the Scottish Ministers may think fit. It was stated that this is required to give flexibility ‘so that appropriate arrangements can be made for particular bodies’. The provision itself is quite a wide one and the Committee asked why an unlimited power to modify Part 2A in respect of new bodies added to the list was necessary. It sought clarification of the reason for there being provision for an order under inserted section 26G(1) being able to include such incidental etc. provision as the Scottish Ministers think fit and how that ancillary power might be used. The Committee also sought clarification as to the choice of procedure, and in particular why negative procedure had been preferred to affirmative.

40. The response seeks to justify the use of negative procedure on the grounds of the narrowness of the power. It has been provided in order to allow for additional public bodies to be added in future. The response goes on to emphasise that it can apply to a limited range of bodies. It can apply only to those whose functions are of a public nature, or include such functions, but which are not such as to be automatically covered by virtue of having their accounts added by the Auditor General. Accordingly, in view of that narrowness, the Government considered that negative procedure was appropriate.

41. The Committee sought clarification as to why it was considered that there was a need for an unlimited power to modify Part 2A of the Act (which deals with ‘data matching’). The question also noted and sought comment on the apparent ability of the provision to modify the purposes for which data matching may be conducted.

42. The response indicates that this is required for reasons of flexibility and also so that appropriate arrangements can be made for particular bodies. The response goes on to acknowledge the power which exists, to modify Part 2A, so that data cannot be used for certain data matching circumstances.

43. It was also noted that the limited range of bodies in respect of which the power could be used are stated as being those which are effectively at the fringes of the public sector. These are bodies with functions of a public nature, or including such functions, but which are not automatically covered by virtue of having their accounts audited by the Auditor General. For such bodies the full data matching provisions might not be appropriate.
44. However, in the absence of a power to be able to modify the application of Part 2 in regard to a body which has been added to it, and which has only limited public functions, such a body might be unwilling to come within the scope of section 26C. Reliance might therefore require to be made on data being provided under section 26B, under which disclosure is only on a voluntary basis.

45. It was noted that there may be circumstances where it would be preferable by means of section 26G, to add a body to the list of those required to disclose data to Audit Scotland. It was also acknowledged that it may be appropriate to have the flexibility to be able to modify Part 2A in relation to such bodies, given that the full data matching functions might not be appropriate.

46. The Committee also asked why it is thought necessary for provision for an order under inserted section 26G(1) being able to include such incidental etc. provisions as the Scottish Ministers think fit. And, with further reference to that matter, the Committee sought further explanation as how and in what circumstances the ancillary power under section 26G(2) might require to be used.

47. The Government responded that provision has been made for reasons of flexibility. Adding a body to the list of those under section 26C which are required to disclose data involves a disapplication of the ‘normal’ restrictions on disclosure of data. The power to make incidental or consequential provision could therefore be useful to remove any apparent inconsistencies in other legislation or instruments.

48. The Committee concluded that the further information provided by the Government was of assistance in terms of setting out why powers in this particular form have been taken and how they might be used. In relation to procedure, having regard to the narrowness of the power and in terms of the limited range of bodies which might be affected, the Committee agreed that negative procedure should provide an appropriate level of scrutiny. Similarly, the Committee is satisfied with the further justification provided in relation to the power for an order to include incidental provision etc.

49. It was considered that some reassurance could therefore be taken from the response in relation to why the provision is in the terms set out, and in regard to how the Government would envisage this power being used. The power to modify could, on the face of it, be used in order to expand the purposes for which data matching could be conducted in relation to new bodies, as well as limiting those purposes as the Government suggests. However, this might represent an unusual use of the power given that it would go beyond the primary scheme set out in the Bill itself. As such it would at least attract comment and negative procedure would allow Parliament the remedy of annulment.

50. Having obtained further explanation and justification from the Government, the Committee finds the proposed power under section 70(3), in regard to inserted section 26G(1) of the Public Finance and Accountability (Scotland)Act 2000, to be acceptable in principle, and also that it is subject to negative resolution procedure.
Section 82(1)(a) – Amendment to section 133 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 - Power to specify further circumstances in respect of which compensation may be paid for a miscarriage of justice or for wrongful detention prior to the acquittal or a decision to take no proceedings or discontinue proceedings

51. Section 82(1)(a) inserts a new subsection (1A) into section 133 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 (‘the 1988 Act’). Section 133 currently provides for a statutory scheme of compensation for miscarriages of justice. In addition to the statutory scheme an ex gratia scheme covering other types of cases has operated for a number of years. The ex gratia scheme operates under the prerogative and has not been subject to statutory or parliamentary control. The intention of this provision is to put the ex gratia scheme on a statutory footing and to combine it with the statutory scheme under section 133.

52. The Policy Memorandum states that no changes are proposed to the scope of the ex gratia scheme other than to place it on a statutory footing and to combine it with the scheme under section 133. However, no details of the ex gratia scheme are given in the DPM or in the Explanatory Note.

53. In order to take a view, the Committee asked for an explanation as to the scope of the current scheme and an explanation as to whether the powers sought extend beyond what is necessary to replicate the current non-statutory arrangements. Given that the scope of the existing statutory scheme was set out in primary legislation the Committee also asked the Scottish Government to explain why it was considered necessary to use delegated powers for the extended scheme.

54. Details of the ex gratia scheme are given in the first two paragraphs of the Scottish Government’s response. Although the DPM states (para. 89) that the intention is to put the ex gratia scheme on a statutory footing, the third paragraph of the response acknowledges that the power is not limited to this.

55. The response states that the provisions of the existing statutory scheme are required to meet international obligations. The inference is that these obligations cannot be changed and that flexibility (with respect to the provisions of the existing statutory scheme) is not required. However, in placing the ex gratia scheme on a statutory basis, the Scottish Ministers wish to retain flexibility in terms of what any new provisions may provide (in so far as they go beyond the international obligations as reflected in the provisions of the existing statutory scheme). The response points out that an order making power will allow for flexibility while at the same time introducing an element of parliamentary control which is currently absent.

56. The committee is content with the principle of putting the ex gratia scheme on a statutory basis. This allows for Parliamentary accountability. However, the Scottish Government acknowledged in its response that the power goes beyond what is required to put the ex gratia scheme on a statutory basis. The Committee considers that the power is too wide. The Scottish Government claim that flexibility is required, but the Committee considers that there has been no adequate justification of the breadth of the power and of the need for the power to go beyond what is required to put the ex gratia scheme on a statutory basis.

57. As the question of whether there should be wider compensation schemes of this kind is essentially a policy matter the Committee simply draws this issue to the attention of the lead committee and of the Parliament.

58. The Committee draws to the attention of the lead committee and of the Parliament that the proposed power goes beyond what is strictly necessary to achieve the objective stated in the Scottish Government’s Delegated Powers Memorandum, namely to put the ex gratia scheme on a statutory basis, and that, in the opinion of the Committee, no adequate justification has been given by the Scottish Government for the power to extend the scheme beyond that currently operating.

Section 82(1)(d) - New section 133(4B) Criminal Justice Act 1988 - Guidance to assessors

59. Section 133(4) of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 (‘the 1988 Act’) provides that where the Scottish Ministers determine that there is a right to compensation for a miscarriage of justice, the amount of the compensation shall be assessed by an assessor appointed by the Scottish Ministers. Section 134(4A) specifies certain matters which an assessor is required to have regard to in assessing the amount of compensation payable. The new section 133(4B) requires an assessor to have particular regard to any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers.

60. The committee asked whether the guidance to be issued under this new subsection should be laid before Parliament, and whether such provision is or is not appropriate given Parliament’s interest in ensuring the independence of assessors and the proper use of public funds.

61. The Government responded that it does not consider that a statutory requirement to lay guidance before the Parliament is necessary, but gave a commitment that any such guidance will be laid before Parliament.

62. The Committee welcomes the commitment from the Scottish Government that any guidance issued under this power will be laid before the Parliament. The Committee finds the proposed power acceptable in principle and that it is subject to no parliamentary procedure.

Section 115 – Power to establish rules of court in relation to Part 6

63. Part 6 of the Bill creates a statutory regime for disclosure in criminal proceedings. Section 115 enables the High Court to make rules as it considers necessary or expedient for the purposes of, in consequence of, or for giving full effect to Part 6 of the Bill by Act of Adjournal. Para. 99 of the DPM explains that rules of court will be required in relation to how certain provisions are given effect to and to provide forms for applications and other court documents required under Part 6.
64. The Committee was concerned that the power was potentially too wide in scope, having regard to the manner in which the power is expressed. It was not clear that the power was restricted to making rules of court or regulating practice and procedure in relation to criminal proceedings in which part 6 is engaged.

65. The Committee asked the Scottish Government why the power was an open one and was not restricted to regulating practice and procedure in relation to criminal proceedings or otherwise clearly restricted to matters for which the courts are responsible.

66. The response acknowledged that the provision does not ‘mirror’ section 305 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, as stated in the DPM. Having regard to the terms of section 305(1)(a) and (b) the committee was surprised that it was considered necessary and appropriate to create a new power. The Scottish Government had considered whether or not section 305 was sufficient for their purposes but had taken the view that it was not. No explanation was given for the Scottish Government taking this view. It was unclear to the committee why section 305 is not sufficient or why there was a need to create a new power.

67. As presently expressed, the Committee remains concerned that the power in section 115 could permit matters addressed by Act of Adjournal to stray beyond the realms of criminal procedure into areas of substantive law. Had the words ‘in relation to criminal procedure’ appeared at the end of section 115, the committee would have been content with the power as expressed.

68. The Committee takes the view that the Scottish Government has not justified the width of the power, particularly given that it is intended that rules are to be made by the High Court without any form of parliamentary procedure or control and that there is no restriction on the exercise of the power by reference to criminal procedure.

69. The Committee draws the breadth and scope of the proposed power to the attention of the lead committee and of the Parliament. The Committee considers that insufficient justification has been given by the Scottish Government for the need for a power in these terms, or why the scope of the proposed power should not be limited to matters of criminal practice or procedure or other matters within the remit of the High Court given that this is a power which is not subject to parliamentary procedure.

Section 121(3) – Power to set mandatory conditions to licences granted under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982

70. This provision enables the Scottish Ministers to set mandatory conditions which are applicable to licences granted under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982. Local authorities are the licensing authorities under the 1982 Act in relation to a number of activities listed in that Act. These include taxis, second hand dealers, knife dealers, metal dealers, street traders, markets, public entertainment, window cleaners and sex shops.

71. The Committee noted that it is the Government’s intention that the power to prescribe mandatory conditions in respect of licences under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 should be subject to affirmative procedure in line with the approach taken to alcohol licensing under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005, but that new section 3A(3) provides for such orders to be subject to annulment. The committee therefore sought clarification on this matter.

72. The Government confirmed that this was an error and that they will bring forward an amendment to remedy this at Stage 2.

73. The Committee welcomes the Government’s undertaking to bring forward an amendment at Stage 2 which will require the power setting mandatory conditions in respect of licences under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 to be subject to affirmative procedure.

Section 129(4) – new section 27A Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 -Power to prescribe those areas in respect of which licensing boards may vary all or a particular group of premises licences’ conditions of operation

74. Section 129(4) introduces a new section 27A(1) into the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 which confers on the Scottish Ministers the power to prescribe by regulations the matters in respect of which licensing boards may vary all or a particular group of premises licences’ conditions of operation.

75. There was no justification provided in the DPM as to why it is considered appropriate to use subordinate legislation to enable licensing boards to vary certain licence conditions. The Scottish Government was asked to explain why this cannot be achieved through primary legislation alone.

76. The Government informed the committee that it intends to bring forward a separate Bill to take forward alternative measures on alcohol. The Government will therefore seek to remove section 129 at Stage 2. The Committee is content for present purposes to note the intention to remove this power and to return to the Bill after Stage 2.

77. The Committee draws the attention of the lead committee to the Government’s confirmation that it intends to remove section 129 at Stage 2.

Section 140(1) – Power to make provision for the imposition on relevant licence-holders of a social responsibility levy

78. Section 140 provides a power for the Scottish Ministers to make regulations imposing and setting out the detail of a social responsibility levy. Under the levy charges are to be imposed on the persons mentioned in subsection (2) for the purposes set out in subsection (3). The Explanatory Notes state that (para 592) “money raised by the charge will be for the local authorities to use in contributing towards the cost of dealing with the adverse effects of the operation of those businesses, for example extra policing or street cleaning or furthering the licensing objectives [under the 2005 Act].” Subsection (4) sets out in more detail what the regulations may include.
79. The Scottish Government was asked why it is not considered appropriate for the general principles of the proposal to be set out in primary legislation leaving only administrative detail for subordinate legislation.

80. Again, the Government confirmed that it will remove section 140 at Stage 2. While the Committee’s concerns with the proposed approach remain unanswered, the Committee is content to note the intention to remove this power and to return to the Bill after Stage 2.

81. The Committee draws the attention of the lead committee to the Government’s confirmation that it intends to remove section 140 at Stage 2.

Section 146(1) – Power to make supplemental, incidental or consequential provision appropriate for the purposes of, or in connection with the Bill

Section 147 – Power to make transitory, transitional and saving provision necessary or expedient for the purposes of, or in connection with, the coming into force of any provisions in the Bill

82. Section 146(1) confers on the Scottish Ministers a power to make by order such supplemental, incidental, or consequential provision as they consider appropriate for the purposes of, or in connection with, giving full effect to any provision of the Bill. Section 146(2) provides that the power extends to the modification of any enactment.

83. Section 147(1) confers on Scottish Ministers a power to make by order such transitory, transitional and saving provision as they consider necessary or expedient in connection with, the coming into force of any provisions in the Bill. Section 147(2) provides that the power extends to the modification of any enactment.

84. In each case section 143(4) provides that an order under either section which makes textual amendments to an Act is subject to affirmative procedure. Otherwise the power is subject to negative procedure.

85. In this Bill the normal group of ancillary powers has been split in two. Section 146 contains the ancillary powers which may make additional provision which could augment the provisions in the Bill or the subordinate legislation made under the Bill permanently. Section 147 deals with the ancillary powers which are intended to make temporary provision of a transitional or transitory nature or which save the existing law as required.

86. The committee accepts the Government’s argument that ancillary powers are necessary in a substantial Bill like this. Given the breadth and complexity of the measures in this Bill, it is to be anticipated that not every fine detail of what is required to integrate these new provisions fully with the existing law may have been identified. The Committee agrees that it would not be sensible to require further primary legislation in order to deliver minor additional measures which are subsequently found to be necessary in order for the Bill to work properly or to have full effect.
87. However, the Committee also considers that the availability of ancillary powers should not be taken for granted. Their scope and the manner in which they can be used should still be tested on the merits of each case, as should the Parliamentary procedure to which they should be subject. Care should be taken to ensure that they are appropriate for the individual Bill concerned according to its scope, complexity and the sensitivity of the subject matter.

88. Having accepted that ancillary powers are necessary here, the Committee noted that the Government seeks the ability to use them to modify enactments. It is proposed that only textual amendments will be subject to affirmative procedure. As this Bill concerns provisions relating to criminal justice which frequently affect the liberty of persons and have the potential to impact significantly on the individual. In this context the Government was asked to explain why it is not thought appropriate to provide that any modification of the statute book in this context should not be subject to affirmative procedure.

89. In relation to section 146 the Committee welcomes the Government’s undertaking to bring forward an amendment so that the exercise of ancillary powers under section 146 that make consequential, incidental or supplementary provision will be subject to affirmative procedure in any case where enactments are modified whether by textual amendment or otherwise.

90. In relation to section 147, the Government explained that it has reviewed its position and considers that given that these ancillary powers are temporary in nature, where they make modifications which do not textually amend acts then they will remain subject to negative procedure.

91. These kinds of powers are by their nature intended to have only temporary effect. However, measures in the area of criminal justice can have significant effects on individuals and their rights and liberty. Transitional provisions which deal with the application of the new measures to cases in progress when provisions are commenced could have a significant impact on accused persons.

92. There may be occasions when temporary provision is made as a textual amendment but it may be more likely to be made by modification which “sits” in separate subordinate legislation – and which would not attract affirmative procedure.

93. The Committee accepts that providing a subjective test in section 147 of “significance” or other similar description would introduce unwanted uncertainty and therefore accepts the Government’s proposal but on the understanding that the Committee would expect the Government to bring forward measures in a form that attracts affirmative procedure where the measures impact on individuals’ rights or liberty.

94. The Committee welcomes the Government’s undertaking to amend section 146 so as to provide that any modification of enactments is subject to affirmative procedure.

95. The Committee accepts section 147 and that only textual amendments will be subject to affirmative procedure but on the understanding that the Committee would expect the Government to bring forward measures in a form that attracts affirmative procedure where the measures impact on individuals’ rights or liberty.

Response from Scottish Government

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill at Stage 1

Section 14 (Community payback orders) so far as inserting section 227I(6) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 – power to vary the minimum and maximum hours of unpaid work or other activity requirement

The Committee asks the Scottish Government to provide further explanation of the following—

- why the scope of the power requires to be drawn to permit any variation of either the minimum and maximum hours stated in section 227I(3), and the “100” figure in section 227I(4) and (5), rather than a power to vary within defined maximum and minimum limits

SG response

We accept the Committee’s observations and will bring forward amendments at Stage 2 to provide limits to the extent to which the minimum and maximum hours stated in section 227I(3) can be varied and to provide limits to the extent to which the "100" figure in section 227I(4) and (5) can be varied.

- given that this is a Henry VIII power and such a power where justifiable would usually be exercisable by affirmative procedure – particularly where concerned with levels of maximum penalty – why it is justifiable that negative resolution procedure should apply here?

SG response

We consider that the variation of the number of hours within the defined minimum and maximum number of hours is a matter of detail which is unlikely to require a debate. However, the negative procedure instrument would still afford the Parliament the opportunity to debate variations if they had objections.

Section 14, so far as inserting section 227K(3) of the Criminal Procedure (S) Act 1995 – power to vary the limits of the balance of activity within the unpaid work or other activity requirement

The Committee asks the Scottish Government to provide further explanation of the following—

- why the power is required to amend subsection (2) in any respect instead of a power to specify different figures in subsection (2)(a) or (b); and
SG response

We accept the Committee’s observations and will bring forward amendments at Stage 2 to provide that these powers, as to be amended, will be exercisable by affirmative resolution procedure.

• given that this is a Henry VIII power enabling amendment of primary legislation which affects a type of sentencing why negative procedure is considered appropriate rather than affirmative procedure.

SG response

Variation of the existing balance between the unpaid work and other activity requirement components of the order is a matter of detail and it was not considered that a debate in the Parliament would be required. However, the use of negative procedure still affords the Parliament the opportunity to debate any variation that they were opposed to.

Section 14, so far as inserting section 227ZB(12) of that 1995 Act – power to vary the maximum number of months in which a restricted movement order can have effect

The Committee asks for confirmation whether the intention is that there is a single overall maximum period of 12 months for which a restricted movement requirement may last (subject to the ability to modify that period). If that is the case, the Scottish Government is asked why the maximum is specified in two places with a separate power to change each figure rather than providing the maximum in one place only – albeit that cross-reference to the maximum may be appropriate elsewhere. Does the provision of two separate powers not give rise to the theoretical risk that they may not be used to maintain parity?

SG response

We accept the Committee’s observations and will bring forward an amendment at Stage 2 so that the maximum is provided for in one place only.

Section 18(2)(a)(iii) – power to prescribe by order the “prescribed period” for the purposes of certain sentences under Part 2 of the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007

The Committee asks for an explanation, in relation to the width of the delegated power in section 18(2)(a)(iii) of the Bill—

• why the power is required to be taken to prescribe any new period whatever, instead of 15 days, and why the parameters of any new period could not be drawn within a minimum and maximum set out in primary legislation?
Schedule 2, paragraphs 10(3) and (4) – power to prescribe the length of periods of detention for those under 21 years of age for the purpose of determining if they are serving “short-term custody and community sentences” or “custody and community sentences”

The Committee asks for an explanation, in relation to the width of the delegated power in paragraphs 10(3) and (4) of Schedule 2—

- why the power is required to be taken to prescribe any new period whatever, instead of 15 days, and why the parameters of any new period could not be drawn within a minimum and maximum set out in primary legislation?

SG response

The intention behind these powers is to set the length of sentence where the custody and community sentence provisions apply. It may prove, on the basis of future data (and in the light of the benefits of the investment in the prisons estate and the community payback strategy), that custody and community sentences are more effective for sentences of a longer period than the 15 days currently prescribed for. The power allows the demarcation line to be set on the basis of evidence but without the need for new primary legislation to allow the Scottish Ministers to respond effectively and promptly to changing circumstances in sentence management. The powers will also allow the Scottish Ministers to make changes, if required, to respond effectively to trends.

The affirmative resolution will require a full Parliamentary debate before the period, which would be evidence-based, could be prescribed. On that basis, we accept that this power could be narrowed without losing the desired effect by setting a limit beyond which the demarcation line could not be moved. Further consideration will be given to what that demarcation point might be. This maintains the desired degree of flexibility whilst we hope answering the Committee’s concern about the breadth of the power.

Section 18(2)(a)(iii) – power to prescribe by order the “prescribed period” for the purposes of certain sentences under Part 2 of the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007

The Committee asks for an explanation, in relation to the width of the delegated power in section 18(2)(a)(iii) of the Bill—

- could the Government explain the “potentially significant” effects of the use of this power in relation to the sentencing of offenders, given that the period could be prescribed at less than 15 days, or substantially more than 15 days – as the DPM suggests?
Schedule 2, paragraphs 10(3) and (4) – power to prescribe the length of periods of detention for those under 21 years of age for the purpose of determining if they are serving “short-term custody and community sentences” or “custody and community sentences”

The Committee asks for an explanation, in relation to the width of the delegated power in paragraphs 10(3) and (4) of Schedule 2—

- could the Government explain the “potentially significant” effects of the use of this power in relation to the sentencing of offenders, given that the period could be prescribed at less than 15 days, or substantially more than 15 days – up to a year as the DPM suggests.

SG response

The powers would have no effect in relation to the sentence handed down to offenders. It is not about introducing a new sentencing option but rather is about managing offenders from the beginning of their sentence through to the end. It will provide a workable and proportionate sentence management regime that will reflect the risk and needs of all offenders and focus on reducing reoffending. The new measures will see all offenders subject to some form of restriction for the full length of the sentence whether it is being served in custody or in the community on licence.

In practice this will mean that offenders who receive a sentence of below the demarcation line will be released on licence at the halfway point of their sentence but will be restricted and supported in the community for the second part of the sentence. For offenders who receive a sentence above the demarcation line, their suitability for release at the end of the custody part of the sentence will be informed by the joint risk assessment and on release he or she will be subject to statutory supervision by a criminal justice social worker. The level of supervision and intervention will vary from offender to offender and will be informed, as above, by the nature of the offence and the offender’s response to work begun in custody.

Section 70(3), so far as inserting section 26G(1) of the Public Finance and Accountability (Scotland) Act 2000 – power to amend list of persons mentioned in that Act

The Committee seeks clarification from the Scottish Government as to (a) the choice of procedure in relation to this power, and in particular why negative procedure has been preferred to affirmative, having regard to the terms of this power, including the consequences of being on the list, (b) the need for an unlimited power to modify Part 2A in respect of new bodies added to the list (including it would appear the ability to modify the purposes for which data matching may be conducted); and (c) why it is thought necessary for provision for an order under inserted section 26G(1) being able to include (in terms of 26G(2)) such incidental, consequential, supplementary or transitional provision as the Scottish Ministers think fit, and in particular to provide further explanation as to how and in what circumstances it is envisaged that the ancillary power under section 26G(2) might require to be used.

SG response

As noted in the Delegated Powers Memorandum, the list of bodies in section 26C is fairly comprehensive, and would automatically include any new public bodies whose accounts are audited by the Auditor General. The power is a narrow one to allow for additional public bodies to be added in future. It can apply to a limited range of bodies, ie those whose functions are functions of a public nature, or include such functions, but which are not automatically covered by virtue of having their accounts audited by the Auditor General. In light of that narrowness, negative procedure is considered appropriate. We note that the related powers for England, Wales and Northern Ireland inserted by the Serious Crime Act 2007 are subject to draft affirmative procedure. However those powers are wider, and include power to add further purposes for which data matching can be used.

The power to modify the application of Part 2A in relation to bodies that are added, and to make incidental, consequential &c provision gives flexibility and is considered necessary so that appropriate arrangements can be made for particular bodies. As the Committee has identified, this would include power to modify Part 2A so that data cannot be used for certain data matching circumstances. As noted above, the limited range of bodies in respect of which the power could be used are effectively those at the fringes of the public sector, for which the full data matching provisions may not be appropriate. Without this power a body which has only limited public functions may not be willing to come within the scope of section 26C, requiring reliance instead on the voluntary provision of data under section 26B. While section 26C disapplies restrictions on disclosure of data, the power to make incidental or consequential provision could be useful to remove any apparent inconsistencies in other legislation or instruments.

Section 82(1)(a) – Amendment to section 133 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 - Power to specify further circumstances in respect of which compensation may be paid for a miscarriage of justice

The Committee asks the Scottish Government the following questions—

- The DPM simply states that the purpose of the power is to enable a statutory basis for the existing ex gratia payment scheme to be established. The Committee requests an explanation as to the scope of the current scheme and an explanation as to whether the powers sought extend beyond what is necessary to replicate the current non-statutory arrangements.

The Scottish Government has not explained why it seeks to use delegated powers to provide a statutory basis for the extended scheme. Given that the scope of the existing statutory scheme is set out in primary legislation the Government is asked to explain why it considers it necessary to use delegated powers for the extended scheme.
SG response

The circumstances in which an individual may be eligible for compensation under the ex gratia scheme were set out in a statement by the then Secretary of State (Malcolm Rifkind) in a Written Answer to a Parliamentary Question in January 1986 (Hansard, 23 January 1986, cols 237-8). This statement is similar in its content to the one made by the then Home Secretary in November 1985 (Hansard, 29 November 1985, cols 689-90).

The Secretary of State stated that he was-"prepared to pay compensation to people who ... have spent a period in custody following a wrongful conviction or charge, where I am satisfied that this has resulted from serious default on the part of a member of a police force or of some other public authority; and there may be exceptional circumstances that justify compensation in cases outside these categories. I will not, however, be prepared to pay compensation simply because at the trial or on appeal the prosecution was unable to sustain the burden of proof beyond reasonable doubt in relation to the specific charge that was brought."

As set out in the Explanatory Notes, this power will be used to replace the ex gratia scheme by placing it on a statutory footing with the existing statutory scheme. It is intended to correspond to the existing ex gratia criteria. Strictly, the power is not limited to placing the ex gratia scheme on a statutory basis, and no need has been identified to do so – Ministers may in future wish to recognise further circumstances in which compensation should be available, and without some flexibility in the power the only way to do so would be through the creation of another ex gratia scheme.

We anticipate that in preparing an order under this power, detailed consideration will have to be given to the terms used in the 1986 Written Answer, eg what constitutes a “public authority” and “exceptional circumstances”, rather than simply repeating the terms of the written answer verbatim. That might better be done in secondary legislation. A distinction can also be drawn between the provisions of the existing statutory scheme, which are required to meet international obligations, and those of the ex gratia scheme which, to the extent that they go beyond the statutory scheme, are not required by international obligations and which could currently be modified or revoked by Ministers at will. Placing the ex gratia scheme on a statutory basis by way of an order making power retains some of this flexibility, but introduces an element of Parliamentary control that is currently absent.

Section 82(1)(d) - New section 133(4B) Criminal Justice Act 1988 - Guidance to assessors

The Committee asks the Scottish Government whether it has considered whether the guidance to be issued under this sub-section should be laid before Parliament, and to comment on whether such provision is or is not in its view appropriate given Parliament’s interest in ensuring the independence of assessors and the proper use of public funds.
SG response

We do not consider that a statutory requirement to lay guidance before the Parliament is necessary. As set out in the Explanatory Notes, it is necessary to have a statutory basis for this guidance as the assessor is discharging a quasi-judicial role. Doing so provides greater transparency. We are however content to give a commitment that any guidance that is issued under this power will be laid before the Parliament.

Section 115 – Power to establish rules of court in relation to Part 6

Given that the Scottish Government refers to section 305 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 as the model for the power to be conferred on the High Court, why the power is an open power to make rules as may be considered necessary or expedient and not restricted to making rules of court or otherwise provision to regulate practice and procedure in relation to criminal proceedings?

SG response

We have reflected on our comment that section 115 “mirrors similar provision” in section 305 of the 1995 Act. It does not actually “mirror” that provision, and on reflection we consider that this is potentially misleading.

In preparing the draft Bill, we considered whether section 305 was sufficient for our purposes and considered that it was appropriate to create a new power. We required to consider what powers would be necessary given that this is the first time the Disclosure scheme has been put into statute and concluded that we needed flexibility to enable the High Court to do everything we thought it would be likely to require to do in ensuring the statutory scheme worked efficiently. In any event we consider that section 115 is not an entirely open power in that it is limited by the wording of section 115 to only those aspects required in consequence of or giving full effect to, only Part 6 itself, which deals only with the Disclosure of information in criminal matters.

Section 121(3) – Power to set mandatory conditions to licences granted under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982

The DPM states that it is the Government’s intention that the power to prescribe mandatory conditions in respect of licenses under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 should be subject to affirmative procedure in line with the approach taken to alcohol licensing under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005. However, the Committee notes that new section 3A(3) provides for such orders to be subject to annulment. Can the Government clarify its intention and if the power is not to be subject to affirmative procedure to explain why it takes that view?

SG response

We can confirm that it is our intention that the affirmative procedure should apply and we will bring forward an amendment at Stage 2.
Section 129(4) – new section 27A Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 - Power to prescribe those areas in respect of which licensing boards may vary all or a particular group of premises licences’ conditions of operation

- No justification is provided in the DPM as to why it is considered appropriate to use subordinate legislation to enable licensing boards to vary certain licence conditions. If consistency of application is the policy objective can the Scottish Government explain why this cannot be achieved through primary legislation alone?

The DPM explains that the present policy intention is to enable the restriction of the sale of alcohol at off-sales premises to persons under 21. If such a restricted policy objective is in view why is a broad discretionary power required? No justification for the breadth of the power is provided in the DPM. Can the Scottish Government provide such justification to the Committee?

Section 140(1) – Power to make provision for the imposition on relevant licence-holders of a social responsibility levy

Given that the power in section 140 is a significant revenue raising measure, why is it not considered appropriate for the general principles of the proposal (including how the levy is to be calculated and by whom it is proposed to be administered) to be set out in primary legislation leaving only administrative detail for subordinate legislation?

SG response

In a letter to the Justice Committee and Health Committee on 24 March 2009, we advised of our intention to introduce a new health bill to take forward provisions on a range of measures, including those currently set out in sections 129 and 140 of the Bill. As a consequence, we intend to seek to remove these sections from the Bill at Stage 2.

Sections 146(2) and 147(2) – ancillary provision

The Committee asks the Scottish Government for the following additional information—

- To give its reasons for considering negative procedure as a sufficient level of parliamentary control in respect of modifications of the statute book using these powers where there is no textual amendment, particularly in the context of the subject matter of the Bill which impacts on individual rights and liberty.

SG response

We can appreciate the Committee’s concern that the Bill deals with the rights and liberty of individuals. We have considered again the question of the appropriate level of parliamentary scrutiny in relation to orders under sections 146 and 147 which would modify the effect of – but not textually amend or repeal – enactments.
Given the subject matter of this Bill we acknowledge that the effect of a modification could be just as significant as the effect of a textual amendment. We think that there is a case for adjusting the level of scrutiny in relation to section 146 and we will bring forward amendments at Stage 2 to increase the level of parliamentary scrutiny in any case where an enactment is modified.

In our view, however, the position is different in relation to section 147. In that case, the modification is made in the context of a move from the old law to the new. The modification is temporary in nature and it is very focused and tightly drawn. The power is exercisable only for transitory, transitional or saving purposes and it is clearly linked to the coming into force of a particular provision of the Bill. We consider that, for these reasons, the current level of parliamentary scrutiny is appropriate.
ANNEXE B: FINANCE COMMITTEE REPORT

Finance Committee Report on the Financial Memorandum of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

The Committee reports to the Justice Committee as follows—

INTRODUCTION

1. The Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (“the Bill”) was introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009. The Justice Committee has been designated as the lead committee on the Bill at Stage 1.

2. Under Standing Orders Rule 9.6, the lead committee at Stage 1 is required, among other things, to consider and report on the Bill’s Financial Memorandum. In doing so, it is required to consider any views submitted to it by the Finance Committee (“the Committee”).

3. At its meeting on 10 March 2009, the Committee agreed to adopt level three scrutiny in relation to the Bill.1 At its meeting on 21 April, the Committee took evidence from the following organisations—

   • Panel 1: Criminal Justice Authorities (CJAs), North Lanarkshire Council and Perth and Kinross Council;
   • Panel 2: Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service (COPFS), Scottish Court Service (SCS), Scottish Police Services Authority (SPSA) and Scottish Prison Service (SPS); and • Panel 3: Scottish Government Bill Team.

All of the organisations represented on the first two panels also provided written evidence.

4. In addition, the Committee also received written evidence from—

   • Dumfries and Galloway Council
   • East Ayrshire Council;
   • Orkney Islands Council; and
   • Scottish Legal Aid Board.

5. All written evidence received is published in the electronic version of this report.2 The Official Report of the oral evidence session on 21 April can be found on the Parliament’s website.3

3 Scottish Parliament Finance Committee, Official Report, 21 April 2009 available at:
6. The Bill provides for various changes under the general headings of criminal justice and licensing. The Bill contains around 85 distinct topics and is split into the following 10 main parts—

- Part 1 – Sentencing: creates a Scottish Sentencing Council and places on statute for the first time the purposes and principles of sentencing; introduces a Community Payback Order to replace the existing range of community penalties; and establishes a presumption against short periods of imprisonment;

- Part 2 – Criminal law: creates new serious organised crime offences and a new offence of possessing communication devices within prison; and creates new offences in relation to extreme pornography;

- Part 3 – Criminal procedure: raises the age of criminal responsibility of children from eight to 12 years old; implements Scottish Law Commission proposals on Crown right of appeals; and changes the system of retention and use of forensic samples, e.g. allowing fingerprints to be kept on the same basis as DNA;

- Part 4 – Evidence: confirms in statute that courts are able to allow witnesses to give evidence anonymously and via TV link (under certain circumstances); and allows all persons to be compelled to give evidence, ending the restriction that exempted spouses or civil partners could not be compelled;

- Part 5 – Criminal justice: increases the maximum age that someone is able to sit on criminal juries from 65 to 70; permits the police to close down premises associated with human exploitation; and permits public bodies to share information for the purpose of detecting fraud;

- Part 6 – Disclosure: provides in statute a regime for the disclosure of evidence in criminal cases;

- Part 7 – Mental disorder and unfitness for trial: modernises the law in the area of mental disorders in criminal proceedings;

- Part 8 – Licensing under Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982: makes various changes to the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 to improve the licensing of a number of businesses including metal dealers, entertainment operators and taxi and private hire firms;

- Part 9 – Alcohol licensing: places a duty on Licensing Boards to consider the detrimental impact of off-sales to under-21s, with a view to considering whether to apply a condition to some or all of the licences in their Board area requiring those purchasing off-sales alcohol to be aged 21 or over; and

• Part 10 – Miscellaneous: gives Scottish Ministers an enabling power to introduce a ‘Social Responsibility Levy’ to ensure that alcohol retailers and licensed premises whose activities can impact negatively on the wider community contribute towards the cost of this impact.

SUMMARY OF COSTS AND SAVINGS AS OUTLINED IN THE FINANCIAL MEMORANDUM

7. The Financial Memorandum estimates the total annual financial cost of implementing the Bill at £58.405 million, with a total non-recurring start-up cost of £2.633 million. In arriving at these figures, the Financial Memorandum identifies five topics in the Bill that carry a “significant financial impact” – defined as those estimated as costing over £0.4 million per year. These topics are dealt with in Chapter 1 of the Financial Memorandum and are as follows—

• creation of a Scottish Sentencing Council (costing £1.1 million per year, plus one-off costs of £0.45 million);

• introduction of Community Payback Orders, presumption against short periods of imprisonment or detention, and reports about supervised persons (costing £10.67 million per year, plus one-off costs of £50,000);

• new serious organised crime offences (costing £3.654 million per year, plus one-off costs of £5,000);

• placing on statute a regime for the disclosure of evidence in criminal cases (costing £4.105 million per year, plus one-off costs of £1.816 million); and

• provisions regarding the sale of alcohol to persons under the age of 21 (costing £38 million per year). (The Scottish Government has subsequently announced that it will seek to remove this proposal from the Bill at Stage 2.)

8. The Financial Memorandum estimates that other provisions in the Bill will also have cost implications, although each carrying a lesser financial impact than £0.4 million per year. These topics are described in Chapters 2 to 10 of the Financial Memorandum.

9. The Financial Memorandum contains substantial cost information, and explanation of policy background and assumptions underpinning the cost estimates. A brief summary of the cost implications is included in this report.

Provisions with significant financial impact

Scottish Sentencing Council

10. Based on the running costs incurred by bodies of a likely similar size, and the assumption that administrative functions will be provided by the Scottish Court Service (SCS), the Financial Memorandum estimates that an annual budget of

---

£1.1 million will be required. These costs include fees and expenses for Council members; cover for judicial absence (Council membership will include a practising judge, two sheriffs and one justice of the peace); support office costs including staff salaries; and research, publications and website costs. One-off set up costs of £450,000 are also anticipated.

11. These costs will be met entirely by the Scottish Government as an element of its funding of the SCS. The Financial Memorandum states that no costs will fall on local authorities or other bodies, individuals or businesses.

Community Payback Orders etc.
12. The new Community Payback Orders will replace the existing court disposals of probation orders, community service orders, supervised attendance orders and community reparation orders. The Financial Memorandum estimates the likely cost of these Orders as £10.67 million per year, based on assumptions about the rate of change in sentencer behaviour away from imposing short prison sentences. This figure is given as the mid-point between an additional cost per year of £8.237 million (where there is a 10% increase in usage of Orders compared with existing sentences) and £13.103 million (where there is a 20% increase in usage of Orders). It is also anticipated that there will be one-off costs of £50,000 relating to IT development.

13. These additional costs will be incurred by local authorities (although the cost will be reimbursed by the Scottish Government through its ring-fenced funding arrangements for criminal justice social work); the Scottish Court Service; and the electronic monitoring contractor (although the additional cost will be covered by a revised commercial contract to be met by the Scottish Government).

Serious organised crime offences
14. The Financial Memorandum estimates that the new serious organised crime offences will incur total eventual additional costs of £3.654 million per year. These costs will fall upon the Scottish Court Service, the Crown Office and Procurators Fiscal Service (COPFS) and the Scottish Prison Service. These costs will, therefore, ultimately be met by the Scottish Government. The Financial Memorandum states that the Government does not anticipate any costs falling on local authorities or other bodies, individuals or businesses.

Disclosure
15. According to the Financial Memorandum, additional costs are expected to fall on the Scottish Government as follows—

- Scottish Police Service – additional operational and training costs as a result of the principles and changes to practices and procedures that will require to be adopted as a result of the legislation. The recurring costs are estimated at £2.2 million per year, with non-recurring costs estimated at £1.3 million;

- Scottish Police Services Authority – additional staff costs relating to training, administration and defence access to SPSA sites are estimated at £205,000 per year, with £143,000 in non-recurring costs;
• Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency – 10 additional Criminal Disclosure Officers. The cost is estimated £495,000 per year. However, the cost could vary from £340,000 – £650,000 per year, depending on whether police officers or field officers undertake these roles;

• Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service – costs relating to IT development, staff training, time taken to complete a schedule and the review of disclosure following receipt of defence statements are expected to be £485,000 per year, with non-recurring costs of £273,000;

• Scottish Court Service – additional court hearings are estimated to costs £164,000 per year and one-off IT development costs of £100,000;

• Scottish Legal Aid Board – the introduction of mandatory defence statements is estimated to cost £556,000 per year.

16. The Financial Memorandum states that the Government does not anticipate any costs to fall on local authorities or other bodies, individuals or businesses.

Sale of alcohol to persons under the age of 21

17. The Government has indicated to the Committee that it will seek to remove this proposal from the Bill at Stage 2.⁵

18. The maximum estimated costs contained in the Financial Memorandum assume that every Licensing Board introduces a ban on the off-sale of alcohol to 18-20 year olds across their entire Board area. It is anticipated that no costs will fall on the Scottish Government, but it is likely that there will be financial implications for local authorities and for other bodies, individuals and businesses.

19. The Financial Memorandum states that additional costs are expected to fall on local authorities in respect of the cost to Licensing Boards of considering the detrimental effect of alcohol sales to under-21s; and the cost of Licensing Standards Officers (LSOs) to ensure compliance with any conditions laid down by Boards. The Financial Memorandum states that these costs are likely to be marginal and suggests that the cost of running the licensing system, including costs of LSOs, is generally recovered by Licensing Boards from fee income. No further details on possible costs or specific estimations are provided.

20. The Financial Memorandum suggests that individuals aged between 18 and 21 who are restricted in buying off-sales may be affected to the extent of reducing their total alcohol intake, or alternatively spending up to three times more on alcohol purchases. The average cost of a unit of alcohol in on-sales purchases is £1.28, compared with 40p in off-sales.

21. The financial impact on business will depend on the extent to which Boards choose to establish such conditions and the extent to which purchasers switch to on-sales. The Financial Memorandum estimates that these provisions will result in a financial impact of £38 million per year, which represents a loss of 63% of alcohol purchases made by 18-20 year olds. This figure includes £15 million in lost annual sales revenue to business and £23 million in lost VAT and alcohol duty per year to the UK Government.

Provisions with a lesser financial impact

22. The Financial Memorandum refers to the following provisions in the Bill as not having a significant financial impact—

- Extended supervision sentences for certain sexual offences: the estimated annual cost of £16,000 will be met by local authorities, which would be reimbursed by the Scottish Government through the criminal justice social work services funding;

- Offences aggravated by prejudice: annual recurring costs falling on the Scottish Court Service are estimated at £24,000, plus one-off costs of £5,000 for IT development;

- Articles banned in prison: the cost to the Scottish Prison Service is estimated at £215,000 per year;

- New offence of possession of extreme pornography: the estimated annual cost of £27,000 is expected to impact on the Scottish Crime and Drug Enforcement Agency, Scottish Legal Aid Board, Scottish Court Service and Scottish Prison Service;

- Witness statements and their use during trial: estimated annual cost to the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service and Scottish Court Service of £218,000;

- Remand and committal of children and young people: eventual recurring costs of £65,000 are expected to fall on local authorities;

- Crown appeals: an estimated annual cost of £377,000 across the Scottish Court Service, Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service and Scottish Legal Aid Board;

- Retention and use of DNA and fingerprint samples: an estimated eventual annual recurring cost to the Scottish Police Services Authority of £25,000, plus one-off system change costs of £25,000;

- Limiting grounds for appeal on referrals from the Scottish Criminal Cases Review Commission: annual costs to the SCCRC are estimated at £30,000;

- Enabling evidence to be provided by television link: estimated annual cost to the Scottish Court Service of £47,000, plus one-off set up costs of £132,000 to equip courts;

- Amendments to Part V of the Police Act 1997: annual costs to Disclosure Scotland are estimated at £120,000, plus non-recurring costs of £150,000; and
• Taxi and private hire car licenses: annual cost to local authorities’ licensing authorities is estimated at £8,000; and the cost to individual taxi firms is anticipated as being less than £1.00 per year.

Savings

23. The Financial Memorandum states that the Government anticipates overall cost savings in relation to the provisions on early removal of certain short-term prisoners from the UK; bail review applications; and jury service. These savings are estimated at £40,000; £6,000; £250,000 per year, respectively.

SUMMARY OF EVIDENCE

Community Payback Orders and presumption against short prison sentences

24. Evidence highlighted the potential impact that the twin proposals to introduce Community Payback Orders (CPOs) and a presumption against short term prison sentences will have on criminal justice social work. There was also some discussion about the potential impact of the proposals on the prison population, and in relation to whether the assumptions about social enquiry reports (SERs) are correctly identified in the Financial Memorandum. This evidence is summarised below.

25. While, on the whole, witnesses accepted that the assumptions in the Financial Memorandum were appropriate, some concerns were raised. Some evidence illustrated the difficulty in predicting sentencing behaviour and the extent to which the courts would use CPOs instead of short term prison sentences. Other evidence criticised the amount of core funding available for criminal justice social work and suggested that additional funding would be required in order to meet the management needs of offenders who would currently receive short custodial sentences.

Uptake of Community Payback Orders (CPOs)

26. Government officials confirmed that, in relation to the implementation of the Bill, the costings in the Financial Memorandum have been made on the assumption that all proposals will come into force in April 2010. Officials stated, however, that “at this stage, we have not set an implementation timetable for the whole Bill.”6 Officials referred to the spending constraints in the context of the current economic climate which affected prioritisation across Government and were unable to comment in any further detail about the resources that might be available to the Justice Department in order to implement the measures in the Bill.7

27. Specifically, in relation to the proposals introducing CPOs and a presumption against short-term prison sentences, Government officials explained that the Financial Memorandum makes two assumptions—

“that the number of CPOs will essentially derive from a reduction in the number of short sentences, and that our best estimate of the extent of that shift in the initial years is between 10 and 20 per cent.”

28. The figures contained in the Financial Memorandum (and as confirmed in supplementary evidence) reflect an increase in the number of orders imposed by the courts of between 1939 (10% increase) and 3878 (20% increase), based on 2007-08 court figures. Officials stated that, in the context of the number of prison receptions, these assumptions reflect a reasonable range of increases.

29. East Ayrshire Council stated that, in estimating a 10 to 20 per cent increase in the use of CPOs over the course of the years 2010-11 and 2011-2012, the Financial Memorandum accurately reflects the margins of uncertainty about costs and timescales.

30. Perth and Kinross Council stated that, based on the additional demand that might be expected, the costings in the Financial Memorandum “are not inaccurate.” However, it recognised that the additional impact of 170 offenders currently serving sentences of six months or less receiving CPOs would be a significant additional cost. In supplementary evidence, the Council added that—

“although the prospective sum seemed realistic in relation to the number of additional staff who may be required on the ground to deliver the enhanced services, I do not think that sufficient allowance has been made for management, accommodation, clerical support and transport costs. These costs are equally important, have not always been accounted for in the past and impact directly on our ability to deliver fast and effective services.”

31. In written evidence, the Community Justice Authorities (CJAs) referred to the estimated increase of up to 20 per cent in the use of CPOs and stated that “there is no evidence to suggest whether this will meet margins of uncertainty.” However, in oral evidence to the Committee the CJAs stated that—

“What the Government has done in the [Financial] Memorandum is probably the best that it could do. It has made some reasonable assumptions. However, if the bill is passed, it will be necessary to monitor closely the first year or 18 months of implementation, because I am not sure that anyone really understands yet how some of the measures will affect others. At this stage, it is difficult to predict that.”\textsuperscript{17}

32. With regard to the projected increase by courts in their use of CPOs, the CJAs accepted that although “it is a bit of a leap in the dark and it is difficult to come up with a figure... 20 per cent would not be an unreasonable figure for the sheriff courts.”\textsuperscript{18} It was suggested, however, in relation to justice of the peace courts that the 20 per cent figure might represent an underestimation of how JPs will use the power.

33. Although Government officials accepted that it is difficult to predict with any certainty changes in sentencer behaviour, they stated that “past experience suggests that sentencers are cautious in making changes to their sentencing behaviour” and considered that sentencing shift would be gradual.\textsuperscript{19} Officials confirmed that if there is a larger than expected shift in sentencing behaviour then the costings in the Financial Memorandum would be exceeded\textsuperscript{20}; and took the point made by the CJAs\textsuperscript{21} about the need to monitor the usage of CPOs.\textsuperscript{22}

34. When questioned on whether the cost estimates should be based on diverting 100% of short-term sentences to CPOs, officials referred to the Scottish Prison Commission’s recommendation that there would have to be exceptions to any presumption against imposing a prison sentence. Such exceptional cases might involve sex offenders, violent offenders and multiple repeat offenders. Officials stated that they have examined this and concluded that around 50% of offenders likely to receive short sentences would not be subject to the presumption against imposing imprisonment.\textsuperscript{23}

\textit{Impact on criminal justice social work and related costs}
35. The Committee also heard evidence from the CJAs and Perth and Kinross Council about current core funding for criminal justice social work and, specifically, whether current levels could effectively meet a potential increase in demand for services.

36. The CJAs expressed concern about the assumption in the Financial Memorandum that current funding for probation, social enquiry reports (SERs), community service orders and supervised attendance orders is adequate. They indicated that six of the eight authorities have this year asked for approval to move money from non-core funding to core funding, citing this as evidence that existing core funding is not sufficient for purpose and told the Committee, “we are concerned that, if we have a large increase in the number of CPOs, we may have to vire further moneys from non-core to core funding.”\textsuperscript{24}

37. Perth and Kinross Council also expressed concern that Government funding for local authority core criminal justice functions has not kept pace with inflation and criticised the funding formula as “sometimes based on activity levels that are four, five or six years out of date and do not reflect current or immediately projected activity levels.” It also stated that costs of delivering services in rural areas can be considerably higher.

38. The Council also reflected on the specific needs and associated costs of providing an increased number of community disposals, most of which, as Government officials confirmed, “will be attributable to down-tariffing from short sentences.” It highlighted “the complex needs of those in the churn of short-term adult imprisonment” most of whom “require well-constructed care and supervision arrangements.” In supplementary evidence, the Council referred to the unit cost of probation orders and stated that—

“The unit cost allowed for delivery of such services is unrealistic now and will become more-so as we endeavour to supervise people in the churn of short terms prison sentences who require ever higher levels of support and supervision if they are to escape the cycle of re-offending.”

39. In view of the complex needs of such offenders, the Council further suggested that, in some cases, the number of requirements attached to individual CPOs might need to be increased. The Financial Memorandum states that, in Scotland, the average number of additional conditions imposed per probation order is estimated at 1.2 and that, because no significant increase by courts in the use of the available requirements is anticipated, proposes no increase in the core funding currently provided for this purpose.

40. Government officials confirmed the assumption in the Financial Memorandum that no additional requirements will be imposed per CPO. On the wider point about current levels of funding for criminal justice social work, the Government stated in supplementary evidence that “whether the existing baseline is sufficient is, we believe, a separate issue and outwith the scope of the [Financial] Memorandum.” East Ayrshire and Perth and Kinross Councils suggested that any potential shortfall in funding for criminal justice social work could be met, to some extent, by transferring savings from the prisons service.

Impact on prison population and related costs

41. In relation to the specific proposals for CPOs and a presumption against short custodial sentences, the Scottish Prison Service considered that there could be some long-term benefits. It suggested that these could materialise in two ways—

28 Supplementary written evidence from Perth and Kinross Council.
30 Financial Memorandum, paragraph 689.
32 Supplementary written evidence from the Scottish Government.
33 Written evidence from East Ayrshire and Perth and Kinross Councils.
“If the measures contained in the bill have an impact on the average prison population such that they reduce the average prison population to a point at which structural changes could be made, which would allow us to save significant amounts in relation to the prison estate or people, cash savings would materialise. We are not at that point yet, however – it is a long way off.

“The second area where there would be benefits, and where those benefits would be much closer, lies in reducing the churn in the prison population... There would be benefits there, not in cash savings but in a better use of resources and a better sentence management regime.”

42. The CJAs suggested that the Financial Memorandum provides an incomplete picture because it does not capture any potential savings from the intended reduction in short term prison sentences. The SPS stated, however, that a 50 per cent reduction in the number of short term prison sentences "would probably result, in the longer term, in some 300 prisoner places no longer being required." However, a reduction of 500 prison places would be required before the prison service would be operating at design capacity, and SPS stated that a significant reduction on top of that would be required before it would be possible to close an establishment or a substantial part of one. On this basis, the SPS suggested that, until an establishment opens or closes, the changes in costs will be marginal. The unit cost of imprisonment per prisoner per year is, therefore, simply indicative and not an illustration of savings that can be realised immediately.

43. East Ayrshire Council stated that there is uncertainty about the impact that the Bill will have on short term prison sentences to reduce the prison population. In written evidence, it stated that its “experience over the past few years is that there has been a considerable increase in the use of community sentences/ requests for reports, without making any significant impact on the levels of custodial sentencing.”

44. Government officials agreed with the evidence from SPS and confirmed that, while a reduction in short sentences would reduce churn and free up prison officer time, this would not save a huge number of prison places. Officials suggested that, on average prisoners serving short sentences spend about three weeks in a prison cell and on this basis a 10 per cent reduction in the number of sentences of six months or less would only free up around 50 prison places.

Social Enquiry Reports (SERs)
45. In evidence, the CJAs suggested that the Financial Memorandum may underestimate the number of additional social enquiry reports (SERs) that might be requested by the courts as a result of the Bill. They suggested that—
“Given the presumption against short sentences, we are a bit concerned that sheriffs might ask for social enquiry reports in most cases. They might do that to have the full information about the community options that are available in order to make up their minds that none of those options is suitable, which would mean moving on to a short term prison sentence. If that were to happen, many additional social enquiry reports that have not been costed in the financial memorandum might be required.”

46. Government officials confirmed that costings for additional social enquiry reports have not been built into the Financial Memorandum, and acknowledged that the Government will need to keep that under careful review.

Scottish Sentencing Council

47. The SCS considered that the cost estimate for the establishment of the Scottish Sentencing Council shown in the Financial Memorandum is “in the right ball park”. It stated, however, that due, for example, to the costs involved with integrating the district courts into its operations, it could not be expected to meet the costs associated with running the Council without additional funding from the Government.

48. The SCS also agreed with the statement in the Financial Memorandum that it had not been confirmed whether or not it would actually provide the administrative functions for the Council. It suggested that it will be for the new statutory body which will replace the SCS, under the Judiciary and Courts (Scotland) Act 2008, to discuss this with the Scottish Government in due course.

49. The Financial Memorandum states that the Government “will provide funding to the SCS in recognition of its support function.” Government officials confirmed that the costs in the Financial Memorandum are illustrative, “based on the assumption that the Scottish Sentencing Council will be grafted on to the new, reformed Scottish Court Service”, but “do not say that the SCS will definitely provide the functions concerned.”

50. Officials also referred to the costs associated with the post of the Council’s Chief Executive (the Financial Memorandum shows this as £97,055 per year). Officials confirmed that the cost as set out in the Financial Memorandum indicates the total cost to the Government rather than the total salary to the post-holder, but that, ultimately, it will be for the Council to decide at which level it pitches its chief executive post. With regard to location, officials suggested that the bulk of the Council’s staff could be based in most places in Scotland and need not necessarily result in expensive accommodation and running costs. However, they suggested... that Council meetings would most likely need to take place in Edinburgh or Glasgow.\textsuperscript{47}

\section*{Remand and committal of children and young people}

51. In written evidence, East Ayrshire Council referred to the proposals regarding the remand and committal of children and young people (section 47 of the Bill). The Council stated that it “remains unclear about the financial implications surrounding the additional burden that might fall on local authorities through increased demands for alternative remand accommodation most likely in the form of secure accommodation.”\textsuperscript{48} Perth and Kinross Council also stated that, although it makes minimal use of secure accommodation, where there is no available facility for a young offender to go to a secure unit the burden of finding an alternative way of supervising the person will fall on local authorities.\textsuperscript{49}

52. Government officials stated that, under section 47, there will be a transfer of responsibility from the Scottish Prison Service to local authorities and that, as identified in the Financial Memorandum, there will be a cost to local authorities. Officials confirmed that, as a result, the provisions “will increase the demand for local authority secure accommodation” and at the same time, would produce a saving to the Scottish Prison Service (although see paragraph 42 on the realisation of savings in the prison service).\textsuperscript{50}

\section*{Licensing provisions}

53. Officials confirmed that it is the Government’s intention to seek to remove two alcohol licensing measures from the Bill at Stage 2: section 129 (sale of alcohol to persons under the age of 21 etc.); and section 140 (licensed premises: social responsibility levy).\textsuperscript{51} As a result of the Government’s proposal to remove these provisions, the Committee has not considered the related financial assumptions in any detail.

54. From the evidence received, local authorities appeared to be largely content with the other licensing provisions in the Bill. In written evidence, North Lanarkshire Council suggested that the impact of the proposals in Part 8 of the Bill “is likely to be minimal in cost terms and would, in any event, be recovered through license application fees.”\textsuperscript{52}

55. Additional costs were anticipated, however, in relation to the administration process for licensing of taxi and private hire cars\textsuperscript{53}, and in relation to the associated consultation costs of making new licensing resolutions for premises selling food or drink, large-scale public entertainments and non-commercial market operators.\textsuperscript{54} Also, Orkney Islands Council referred to the difficulties experienced by \textsuperscript{48} Written evidence from East Ayrshire Council.

\textsuperscript{52} Written evidence from North Lanarkshire Council.
\textsuperscript{54} Written evidence from Dumfries and Galloway Council.
small, rural locations in absorbing the costs of the provisions, due to the existence of fewer traders resulting in smaller fee incomes.\(^{55}\)

56. Government officials stated that with the removal of sections 129 and 140, “the licensing provisions that remain in the Bill are of a much smaller order in terms of finances”.\(^{56}\) Officials confirmed that the Government’s intention is for the remaining provisions to be self-financing out of fees and suggested that “quite a few will lead to a more efficient licensing system and potential savings for the licensing boards and police in operating it”.\(^{57}\)

CONCLUSIONS

57. The Committee acknowledges the detailed level of information contained in the Financial Memorandum to the Bill. On the basis of evidence received, however, the Committee wishes to draw the lead committee’s attention to a number of specific matters relating to the financial assumptions.

58. With regard to the Bill as a whole, the Committee notes that funding for full implementation has not been confirmed and suggests that the lead committee seeks further detail from the Cabinet Secretary on the proposed timetable for implementation and the source of funding for the measures.

Community Payback Orders and presumption against short prison sentences

59. The Committee recognises the difficulty in estimating the rate of change in sentencing behaviour from imposing short term custodial sentences to imposing Community Payback Orders (CPOs). The Committee has not, however, received any evidence to allow it to understand whether the estimated update of CPOs, of between 10 and 20 per cent, is accurate or whether this figure is likely to increase year-on-year, along with the cost implications. As far as the Committee understands, the legislation provides for a statutory presumption against short-term custodial sentences. The Committee draws the apparent disconnect between this and the assumptions in the Financial Memorandum to the attention of the lead committee.

60. Nonetheless, the Committee notes the potential financial impact on local authorities’ criminal justice social work services of dealing with the complex needs of offenders who would otherwise receive custodial sentences, particularly in the event that the volume of CPOs is above the estimates in the Financial Memorandum. The Committee, therefore, recognises the vital importance of monitoring the uptake of CPOs and the number of social enquiry reports requested by the courts and the associated financial impact on criminal justice social work services.

61. In relation to the potential impact of the proposals on the prison population, the Committee notes that the Financial Memorandum does not include any assumptions about potential savings resulting from these proposals. The Committee acknowledges that any savings will depend on the rate of change in sentencing behaviour, and accepts that a significant decrease in the prison population would have to take place before any sizeable cost savings would be likely to occur. If any savings were to occur, however, the Committee notes the concern of the Community Justice Authorities that Scottish Government should consider transferring additional funding to reflect the shifting demand.

62. The Committee recommends that the lead committee should consider these issues and, in particular, the methodology underpinning the assumptions about the expected take-up of CPOs, in greater depth in evidence with the Cabinet Secretary.

Scottish Sentencing Council
63. The lead committee may wish to seek further clarification from the Cabinet Secretary on the costs associated with the Scottish Sentencing Council, and the scope to minimise these as far as possible through, for example, the co-location of offices.

Remand and committal of children and young people
64. The Committee recognises that, as a result of the proposals regarding the remand and committal of children and young people, there will be an additional cost impact for local authorities, while there will be a saving for the Scottish Prison Service. The lead committee may wish to pursue with the Cabinet Secretary whether the SPS saving will be passed on to local authorities to ensure that sufficient resources are available for the provisions to be enacted successfully.

Licensing provisions
65. Subject to the Government's commitment to remove sections 129 and 140 from the Bill, the Committee does not wish to raise any significant concerns with regard to the financial implications of the licensing provisions. The lead committee may, however, wish to pursue with a wider representation of local authorities the issues raised in evidence to the Finance Committee.

Record of division in private: In relation to section 17 of the Bill, the Convener proposed inserting a new paragraph expressing the Committee’s disagreement to a statutory presumption against short custodial sentences. The Committee divided: For 4 (Bill Aitken, Bill Butler, Cathie Craigie, Paul Martin); Against 4 (Robert Brown, Angela Constance, Nigel Don, Stewart Maxwell); Abstentions 0; amendment agreed to on Convener’s casting vote.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Mike Smith

I notice that the anomaly of Sunday morning alcohol off-sales does not appear to be addressed in the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. Under present legislation we have had for a considerable number of years a situation where, in addition to general restrictions on off-sales, there is a further restriction preventing off-sales on Sunday mornings. I don't know the history of this particular clause but it may be a hangover from the days when public houses were not permitted to open on Sundays but hotel bars could open to the public. It certainly seems to date from the days of Church influence over such matters. The number of regular churchgoers in Scotland will soon be exceeded by the number of regular mosque attenders, who may have a legitimate complaint that the churches wield undue influence. We clearly couldn't pursue a course of inviting suggested restrictions from every religious group, particularly when they are all out numbered by those make no regular religious devotions. It seems to me that the common-sense solution would be to simply remove the Sunday morning off-sales restriction.

I look forward to your views and proposals on this matter.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Aberdeenshire Council

Part 1 - Sentencing

Scottish Sentencing Council
A judicially led Sentencing Council which will develop and review sentencing policy, and which will support transparency in sentencing is welcome.

Resource Implications
The proposed legislation on changes to sentencing has the potential to impose a significant impact on criminal justice social work resources. Examples of new costs include reports for Review Courts, community sentencing also prison sentences and release arrangements.

The Financial Memorandum, issued along with the Explanatory Notes, indicates that the majority of additional costs incurred by local authorities will be met through existing Section 27A funding. However the estimated future costs of core services appear to be based on 2007/08 costs and do not take account of cost of living increases.

Section 14 Community Payback Orders
This new sentence will provide court with an increased range of disposals that will combine restrictions, including payback to communities as the punishment element, along with activities which will support positive change.

Progress Reviews will allow courts closer monitoring of the offenders progress and will allow early intervention before formal breach proceedings

Comment: Whilst both elements of the new community payback orders have positive elements their introduction is likely to have a significant impact on criminal justice social work resources. In particular the need to identify, and supervise, additional work placements. There will also be an increase in the number of reports which will be required by Progress Courts.

Where the offender is less than 18 years of age, a Community Payback Order will include supervision where the court is satisfied the local authority can provide support and rehabilitation

Comment: This will require greater commitment from young offenders and may then result in an increase in their risk of failing to comply, however it may also be positive in that it will provide support to address other relevant issues.
The legislation aims to reduce the time limit for completion of unpaid work to 3 months for level 1 (up to 100 hours) and 6 months to complete up to 300 hours.

Comment: The Community Payback Order has the potential to require a significant increase in the number of work placements required. Whilst Criminal Justice staff can promote the benefits of unpaid work, the availability of placements is determined by the willingness of community groups and statutory and voluntary agencies taking responsibility for offering suitable group and individual placements.

The time taken to complete unpaid work is also determined by the availability of community service staff and other resources, also offenders availability (particularly relevant in areas of high employment and where offenders are employed as offshore workers and fishermen). Importantly the time taken for courts to progress breach proceedings also has a significant impact on the overall length of time to complete unpaid work hours.

For example - in order to complete the proposed maximum number of 300 hours within six months offenders will be required to undertake 12 hours of unpaid work each week. Whilst this is not unreasonable, the Scottish average over the past three years is between 3.3 – 3.5 hours per week over a 12 month period. Without substantial increases in resources and more support from other agencies, the proposed reduced timescale is setting offenders and criminal justice staff a target that the majority will fail to achieve.

Section 17 Presumption against short periods of imprisonment
This will introduce a presumption against custodial sentences of less than 6 months.

Comment: It is widely accepted that, in general, short sentences do little to achieve rehabilitation however the draft legislation makes no comment about possible alternative court disposals or the potential impact on community resources.

PART 3 Criminal Procedures

Section 47 Remand and committal of children and young persons
Children under the age of 16 years not released on bail or ordained to appear will be remanded to the local authority to be detained in either secure accommodation or a suitable place of safety.

Comment: It is positive that the legislation will end the remand of children to prison. Although it is estimated there will be a fall in the number of children requiring secure accommodation, the Financial Memorandum notes that the burden to provide alternative remand accommodation will fall on local authorities.
Section 66 Witness anonymity orders
Comment: The introduction of measures whereby court can grant discretion to protect the anonymity of a witness in any particular case is welcome progress in addressing the rights of witnesses. In order to ensure parity for all witnesses national guidance should be introduced, also all witnesses should be given clear information regarding their right to anonymity where they have concerns for their own or other people’s wellbeing.

Proposals under Part 8
Licensing under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982

General
We would prefer to see an overhaul of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 as a whole instead of further amendments to parts of the existing framework.

Boat Hire Licensing should be removed from the remit of local authorities and given to the Department for Transport who regulate all other forms of licensing for boats and yachts. They have the expertise to deal with this form of licensing.

Clarification is required as to whether standard conditions require to be set of new when the proposed changes are introduced. Also, whether Licensing Authorities will require to pass new resolutions to adopt licensing systems under the parts of the Act that licence optional activities.

We were disappointed to note that proposals to make display of licences mandatory do not appear to have been carried through to the Criminal Justice Bill proposals.

We would also like to see the introduction of a legal requirement for enforcement officers to be employed in the same way that the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 provided for licensing standards officer.

Mandatory licence conditions
This is welcomed. While normally all licences are processed and issued within 28 days, there are occasions where problems arise that make it difficult to issue a licence within the permitted six months. To be able to issue a licence by default with the same standard conditions that all other licences issued under the Act have, makes the licence enforceable where there are problems. This provision is long overdue.

Standard licence conditions
No comment.

Powers of entry and inspection for civilian employees
No comment.

Licensing of metal dealers
Aberdeenshire Council does not agree with making metal dealer’s licensing an optional licensing scheme. The price of metal is currently very high and many communities are experiencing random theft of metal. This activity should remain mandatory.

Licensing of taxis and private hire cars

Aberdeenshire Council strongly supports the amendment to Section 13. The ethos behind the 1982 Act is public safety. The amendments to this section clarify the situation and act in the interests of public safety. This clarification is long overdue.

With regard to the proposed changes for setting and reviewing taxi fares, Aberdeenshire Council reviews fares on an annual basis. All the proposed changes are part of the process already carried out in practice as part of the fares review. These proposals are achievable.

Licensing of market operators

The definition of market should be extended to include car boot sales.

Licensing of public entertainment

This is long overdue. Many large scale events regularly get round licensing requirements by being “free”. This often means that essential health and safety checks are not carried out and the applicants do not have the proper measures in place to ensure the safety of the events. Likewise the ability to be able to exclude small events is welcomed.

The legislation also requires to remove the exemption from the requirement to have a public entertainment licence where a liquor licence is held under the 2005 Act. An occasional licence cannot be controlled in the same way that a public entertainment licence can and both should be required for an event.

Licensing of late night catering

This is welcome in a time where licensing authorities are increasingly being required to look at the management of the night time economies within their localities and the effect that the night time economy has on the wider community.

Applications for licences

The proposed changes reflect the information that is now required to enable background checks to be carried out by the Police.

The extended processing time will slow down the issue of licences slightly but the longer time for responses to be lodged is welcomed as consultees sometimes struggle to meet the current 21 day deadline.

We note that it is proposed to insert a section (2A) into paragraph 5 of Schedule 1 to the Act. In the version of the Act we work to the following Section (2A) already exists –

“(2A) The conditions referred to in sub-paragraph (1)(b) above shall not relate to any matter in relation to which requirements or prohibitions are or could be imposed by virtue of Part 3 of the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005 (asp 5).”
Some clarification is required as to numbering or as to whether the proposed Section replaces the existing section.

Appeals under Schedule 1 and Schedule 2

Civic Government appeals invariably proceed on a detailed criticism of the terms of the Statement of Reasons. Furthermore, there is no provision allowing the Statement to be amended to address criticisms or otherwise clarify the licensing authority’s reasoning. As a matter of law, then, the authority only has one opportunity to “get it right”, and must be given sufficient time to compile reasons in sufficient detail. For that reason, we oppose the reduction in the time limit to produce the Statement of Reasons under the Bill.

Proposals under Part 9

Alcohol Licensing

General

We are disappointed that no effort is being made to amend the appeal provisions in response to criticisms already made (including criticisms from the sheriff bench) in order to better reflect Nicholson’s intentions. As outlined above, this opportunity should also be taken to harmonise the appeal provisions in the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982.

With regard to the Bill provisions, it is not clear if the drafter intends to confer on the chief constable a general right to object. That would benefit from being clarified.

Opportunity should also be taken to amend and clarify the provisions within the Act relating to applications for variation as the Act as it currently stands poses more questions than answers.

Variation of premises licences procedures require to be completely re-written and the author of this response has provided the Scottish Government with views on what needs to be addressed.

Further, the appeal provision under the Act require to be revised. We are in agreement with the general consensus of opinion that the provisions under the 1976 Act require to be reinstated, with some thought to harmonising the approach with the appeal procedures given under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982. The only provision that we would not wish to see repealed is the immediate imposition of a suspension or revocation of a licence pending an appeal.

Sale of alcohol to persons under 21 etc.

No comments

7A Duty to assess impact of off-sales to persons under the age of 21

Assuming this proposal remains in the current Bill, if it is the Scottish Government’s intention to raise the minimum age for off sales, then it should do so within the primary legislation. It is unfair to devolve to Licensing boards a power that the Parliament itself is not willing to wield.
We see the proposals providing an opportunity for “booze cruises” across Board boundaries.

27A Power of board to vary premises licence conditions
It is difficult to comment on this without knowing what type of situation the subordinate legislation is to cater for.

130 Premises licence applications: notification requirements
This proposals under Subsection (2) clarifies an anomaly.

131 Premises licence applications: modification of layout plans
No comments

132 Premises licence applications: antisocial behaviour reports
No comments

133 Sale of alcohol to trade
No comments

Occasional licences
No comments.

135 Extended hours applications: variation of conditions
No specific comment. However we feel that the enthusiasm to define precisely when, and where, a Licensing Board is to impose or vary a condition is inevitably going to lead to arguments that, in the absence of an express power, then a Board has no power and thus the Board has no implicit authority. We are not confident about the Court's attitude on this issue.

136 Personal licences
The proposals outlined at Section (2)(c) – inserting new sub-paragraphs (7) and (8) into Section 74 – would appear to reduce personal licence applications to a mathematical exercise.
The proposals in subsection (4) seem to seek to address the possible black market in personal licences. This would be better achieved if personal licences were made specific to a Board and not Scotland-wide.

137 Emergency closure orders
No comments

138 False statements in applications: offence
No comments

139 – Further modifications of 2005 Act under Schedule 4
Paragraph 2 - This makes sense.

Paragraph 3 – No comments
Paragraph 4 – does this mean that the chief constable now has the same locus to object as “any person?” This needs clarification

Paragraph 5 – No comments

Paragraph 6 (1) & (2) – no comments
(3) – This should be dealt with along with the substantive amendments rather than being relegated to Schedule 4

Paragraph 7 - no comments

Paragraph 8 – no comments

Paragraph 9 - we hope this has been repealed because it has been superceded. This is not clear.

Paragraph 10 - we hope this has been repealed because it has been superceded. This is not clear.

Paragraph 11 – no comment

Paragraph 12 – no comments

Paragraph 13 – no comments

Paragraph 14 – no comments

Paragraph 15 – no comments

Paragraph 16 – no comments

Paragraph 17 – no comments

Paragraph 18 – we assume that this reflects an intention that the chief constable will now have the same locus as “any person” to make formal objection to an application.

140 – Licensed premises: social responsibility levy
We believe that these provisions are being transferred to the Health Bill.
Justice Committee
Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill
Written submission from the City of Glasgow Licensing Board
In relation to the draft provisions within the Criminal Justice & Licensing (Scotland) Bill ("the Bill") relating to the licensing of alcohol and the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 ("the Act"), the City of Glasgow Licensing Board has the following comments to make:-

Section 130: Premises Licence Applications: Notification Requirements
In relation to the proposed new notification requirements, in terms of the definition of “premises licence application” contained within section 20 of the Act, the appropriate Chief Constable will require to be sent a copy of the application form, operating plan and layout plan. This is not immediately clear on reading the amended wording proposed for section 21.

Given that the Fire Authority requires to be notified that an application for a premises licence has been received, it is advisable that they should also be provided with the same documentation as the Chief Constable in order that there is meaningful consultation. So as to avoid any issues arising as to whether or not there is a conflict with the role of the Fire Authority under the Fire (Scotland) Act 2005, the requirement to provide a copy of the premises licence application (which includes the operating plan and layout plan) should be expressly included within the new notification provisions as opposed to being left for individual Boards to make arrangements with the appropriate Fire Authority.

With regard to those persons and bodies who receive only “notice of an application”, is any standard form of notification to be developed? One of the difficulties with the generic form of premises licence is that it is impossible to provide any meaningful information as to the nature of the proposed premises. The practice of the Glasgow Board has been to state whether the application is for on or off-sales, or both, and to specify the forms of activities indicated on the operating plan. However it has been very much evident that those persons receiving the notification do not understand the nature of the licence applied for, or are concerned as to the precise meaning of wide ranging terms such as “live performances” or “indoor/outdoor sports”. One particular Community Council has objected to every single premises licence application in its area, and the majority of issues raised in their objections relate to uncertainty as to what is being proposed. In the view of the Glasgow Board the inherent uncertainty caused by the notification process has to be addressed, requiring a review of the fundamental aspects of the generic premises licence and the prescriptive, yet vague, form of operating plan.
Presumably it is intended to amend, or remove, paragraph 9 of the Licensing Procedure (Scotland) Regulations 2007 (SSI 453) which would contradict the terms of the proposed new section 21(2).

With regard to the deletion of the provisions contained in section 21(3)(b) regarding the provision of anti-social behaviour reports, the experience of the Glasgow Board has been that these reports are of little or no value in assessing the suitability of new premises licence applications given that there can be no causal link between anti-social behaviour which has occurred in the last 12 months and the future operation of premises which are the subject of the application. The deletion of this provision is welcomed by the Glasgow Board.

Section 131: Premises Licence Applications: Modification of Layout Plans

The effect of this amendment to section 23 of the Act would be that an application must be granted if the applicant accepts a modification to the layout plan suggested by the Licensing Board. However, in practical terms such an application cannot be granted “there and then” as amended plans would require to be lodged to reflect the modification. It is likely that any modification to the layout plan, for example, a change to the proposed alcohol display areas, would have an effect on the capacity figure to be included within the operating plan. Any such amended plan would require to be the subject of consultation with Building Control Officers, and possibly the Fire Authority, before it can be granted by the Licensing Board. It could be the case that the proposed modification, following such consultation, raises an issue which either the Licensing Board or the applicant would have a difficulty with, but the Act would require the application to be granted given the “must grant” provision. This proposal requires to be revisited so as to avoid this potential difficulty.

Section 132: Premises Licence Applications: Antisocial Behaviour Reports

It is noted that under the terms of proposed new section 22 (2A), the Chief Constable will have the ability to make representations concerning a premises licence application by providing the Licensing Board with an anti-social behaviour report in identical terms to the content of the current reports. For the reasons outlined above under section 130, the Glasgow Board would question whether there is any merit in retaining the Chief Constable’s ability to provide such reports as their content adds no value to a Board’s consideration of an application.

Similar comments are adopted in relation to new section 24A in relation to a Board’s power to request an antisocial behaviour report.
Section 133: Sale of Alcohol to Trade

The Glasgow Board has no comments to make.

Section 134: Occasional Licences

The Glasgow Board accepts that the procedures set out in Part Four of the Act make the process of applying for occasional licences more complex and time consuming. However, it is concerned that the proposed additions to section 57 to allow the reporting period to be reduced down from 21 days “where the Licensing Board is satisfied that the application requires to be dealt with quickly” will be abused by applicants seeking to have the reduced reporting period in less than exceptional circumstances, with Clerks being accused of being “unreasonable” where they do not choose to exercise their discretion. It is not immediately apparent as to what type of event would require the shortened reporting procedure, other than funeral parties, which tend to be by way of an application for extended hours at licensed premises rather than at unlicensed premises. These provisions require to be tightened so as to avoid abuse.

The suggested amendments do not rest well with the requirement contained within section 59(2) that a Board “must grant” an application for an occasional licence where it has not received an adverse notice from the Chief Constable or a Licensing Standards Officer as there could be any number of reasons why the Police or a Licensing Standards Officer may not have been able to comply with the reduced timescale. It could be the case that they may have wished to visit the subject premises or interview the applicant but have been unable to do so, and intended to make a recommendation of refusal to the Board, or provide adverse comments or suggest appropriate conditions. However, despite these circumstances, the absence of such a report within the shortened timescale would require the Licensing Board to grant the application. This is not satisfactory.

It is not clear from the regulations how this provision will work in practice. For example, is the applicant to be advised of the reduced period? Can it be extended after it has been reduced? Can the Police or Licensing Standards Officers argue against the reduced period? Further guidance on these issues is required.

Furthermore, it is noted that the decision as to whether the reporting period should be reduced can only be taken by the Clerk and not any other member of staff employed to assist the Clerk, such as a Depute Clerk or an Assistant Clerk. This is impractical given the other pressures placed on Clerks’ time together with short term periods of absence on holidays or on sick leave, etc. It is unclear why this particular decision making power cannot be capable of delegation in the same manner as other, arguably greater, responsibilities under the Act.
Section 135 – Extended Hours Applications: Variation of Conditions

The Glasgow Board has no comments to make.

Section 136: Personal Licences

The Glasgow Board welcomes the amendments to the personal licence provisions which generally deal with the issues of concern raised by its Clerk, Stewart Ferguson, since the Act itself was first drafted. It would, however, wish the following comments to be noted:

The proposed amendment to section 74 of the Act would require the applicant to sign the application form. It is unclear how this could be achieved if alcohol licensing is determined to be within the scope of the EU Service Directive which would require Licensing Boards to accept applications submitted online. The Glasgow Board respectfully suggests that this provision should be considered alongside the terms of the EU Service Directive so as to prevent another anomaly occurring.

With regard to the proposed addition of section 74(7)(c) which requires the Licensing Board to hold a hearing to determine a personal licence application where the applicant has held a personal licence which has either expired in the last three years or was surrendered by the applicant within that period, it is unclear how a Licensing Board will know that information where such a licence may have been issued by another Board. The Glasgow Board understands that the development of the National Personal Licence Database is not the subject of 100% uptake by all Licensing Boards in Scotland, and nor is there any time-limits by which information has to be uploaded - therefore there will be no way in which a Board can properly satisfy itself as to whether or not there has been a previous licence. Further clarification on this issue is sought.

Proposed section 74 (8) is badly drafted in that it could be interpreted so as to suggest that a hearing is held after the application has been granted or refused, rather than that a hearing may be held to determine whether the application should be granted or refused.

Section 137: Emergency Closure Orders

The Glasgow Board has no comments to make.

Section 138: False Statements in Applications: Offence

While the Glasgow Board welcomes the introduction of an offence provision in relation to applicants who knowingly make a false statement in an application, it is unclear how this would be established if applications are to be submitted electronically, without a signature, as per the terms of the EU Service Directive referred to above. Further clarification of this issue is required.
Schedule 4 – Further Modifications of the 2005 Act

In relation to the proposed amendment to section 23 (determination of a premises licence application) while the Glasgow Board welcomes the widening of the grounds on which the Chief Constable may object to a premises licence application, it is concerned that this provision could be interpreted by the Courts as implying that in the absence of a conviction notice, Licensing Boards would have more difficulty in establishing that the granting of the application would be inconsistent with one or more of the licensing objectives given the reference to "must in particular take into account any conviction".

The reference to section 22(2) in the proposed amendment to section 23(6)(b) should be removed as this subsection would be deleted in terms of the proposed amendment at paragraph 4 of schedule 4.

In relation to paragraph 13 of schedule 4, amendments are proposed to section 74 (2) which have already been proposed under section 136 of the Bill. It would also appear that a further subsection 74(2)(c) is being introduced when a new section 74(2)(c) has already been proposed under section 136. These errors in drafting require to be rectified.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from the Scottish Taxi Federation

As you are no doubt aware, a task group was set up in 2001, by the previous Government and given the responsibility of reviewing the Licensing provisions of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982. Their report was delivered during 2004, following more than 3 years of deliberations. While a few of their recommendations have been included within the abovementioned Bill, it is the view of the Scottish Taxi Federation that if the efforts of the task group are not to be lost and the ‘82 Act properly updated, then much more needs to be included. We suggest the following should be considered.

Section 10 (3)

This section is discretionary and not mandatory. It allows LA’s, if they so choose, to impose a limit on the number of Taxi licences they issue provided they are satisfied that there is no significant current unmet demand. In view of the present Governments concerns with alleged criminality in the private hire sector of the Taxi/ Ph Car industry, the Federation believes this provision should be extended to include the right to limit the number of Private Hire Licences. At present not all LA’s limit the number of Taxi Licences, it is therefore reasonable to assume that if the provision remains discretionary, not all LA’s will impose a restriction on the number of Private Hire Car Licences. The Federation believes that the continuing unfettered growth of the Private Hire industry has made it simple for that section of the trade to be infiltrated by undesirable elements.

Attached in the Appendix to this submission is a letter from Tayside Police to Anderson Fyfe Solicitors who act on behalf of the Scottish Taxi Federation. In the circumstances of the letter, Anderson Fyfe Solicitors were acting for Dundee Taxi Association as members of the STF.

Additionally, no guidance is given in the Act or elsewhere, as to how LA’s should assess demand. As a result, a range of practices are followed by those LA’s who operate limits and regular legal challenges are made in respect of decisions by LA’s to refuse applications for Taxi Licences on the basis that there is no unmet demand.

The Federation believes that LA’s operating best practice is those, which instruct independent third party organisations to carry out surveys to assess demand every 2/3 years and supplement these with assessments carried out by licensing officials the intervening period.

This will assure consistency of approach whilst preserving a LA’s power to determine what limit to impose taking into account the result of surveys and local circumstances.
Section 10 (6)

This section should be amended to make specific provision for the transfer of licences in the event of death or permanent incapacity of the licence holder, particularly where the licence holder leaves behind dependants. Some LA’S have demonstrated that the current legislative provisions are inadequate and open to interpretation.

Section 12- fees for Taxis and Private Hire Cars

This section should be amended to make it clear that LA’s should only charge such fees as are sufficient to cover their expenses.

Section 14- Signs on vehicles other than Taxis

It is the view of the Federation that roof signs of any kind on Private Hire Cars should be expressly prohibited. This section should be so amended.

Section 17- Taxi Fares

Section 17 (1) should be amended to make it clear that any administrative charge made by the Taxi Company for extending credit facilities to account customers does not fall within the powers of LA’s to control. It is the Federation’s view that the Act does not give power to LA’s to impose arrangements for credit since this is not a charge relating to the hire or arrangement for hire of the Taxi. As such Section 21 (5) does not apply.

The Federation is of the view that taxi fares scales should be reviewed annually. If a cost formula were agreed between trade representatives and the LA, such a review would simply be a case of checking the figures against the previous figures and calculating any percentage increase, which may apply.

In general it is not considered that Section 17 is effective since LA’s regularly carry out reviews late in the knowledge there is no sanction, which can be imposed in the event that the review is not carried out timeously. Therefore, the Federation propose this section should be amended to allow an appeal by the taxi trade to an independent arbiter if a LA fails to carry out a fares review within the prescribed timescales.

Section 18 – Appeals in respect of Taxi fares

The Federation supports the proposed amendment that representative bodies should be allowed submit an appeal. Such an amendment would not in our opinion be to the detriment of the individual. However, it is felt that the proposed amendment to cause LA’s to consult with every individual Taxi operator in respect of a fares scale review, will be administratively burdensome and time consuming for LA’s.
Section 19-Taxi Stances

This section should place a responsibility on LA’s to provide sufficient taxi stance places to accommodate at least two thirds of the taxis it licences. There should also be an obligation to ensure stances are placed and constructed in such a manner as to be easily accessed by the general public and to disabled persons in wheelchairs in particular. As an example Glasgow City Council currently provides approximately 350 taxi stance spaces to accommodate 1430 licensed Taxis.

Section 20- Regulations relating to Taxis and Private Hire Cars

It is submitted that fitness of the vehicle should be the only criteria for determining whether or not a vehicle can remain in service as a taxi.

Section 21-Offence Provisions

The Federation is aware of a growing problem involving taxi drivers being detained for abduction when dealing with non-paying passengers. Traditionally drivers could rely upon Police assistance and consequently would drive such passengers to the nearest police station. Police assistance can no longer be relied upon as they now take the view that the driver may be guilty of the offence of abduction. The Federation’s view is, that drivers require some form of statutory protection to allow them to take a non-paying passenger to a police station when the driver has reasonable grounds for believing a crime has been committed.

It is also our view that a new offence for non-payment of taxi fares based upon the balance of probabilities is most definitely required.

In general terms the offences provisions contained in section 21 are adequate. The difficulty that arises is that the burden of proof required “beyond reasonable doubt” is such that convictions are almost impossible to obtain. It is the Federation’s view that proof required in terms of section 21 should be on the balance of probabilities.

Section 133- Definition of Public Places

The terms of section 133 appear to be clear and unambiguous. However, certain LA’s have managed to consider areas such as bus stations, supermarkets etc which have unrestricted public access, to fall out with the definition of a public place. It is therefore clear that some guidance and clarification is urgently required.

Enforcement

The task group’s comments embody all that enforcement is or at least ought to be. In reality, however, neither effective enforcement nor indeed the principles of the Enforcement Concordat are to any real extent evident in the licensing of taxis or private hire cars through Scotland.
There are numerous examples of how enforcement or the responsibility for enforcement has entirely failed. Since the introduction of the '82 Act, no real attempt has been made by LA’s to recruit and properly train enforcement officers despite the obvious need for such a service. LA’s generally speaking have instead preferred to identify the Police as the agency with responsibility for enforcing the provisions of the 1982 Act. The police for their part have a tendency to reciprocate and highlight the LA’s as the bodies responsible for enforcement. This situation is replicated throughout Scotland and is detrimental amongst other things to public safety. I am enclosing a copy of a recent letter from Tayside Police, which highlights the difficulties in getting to the bottom of who is responsible for enforcement.

It is the Federation’s view that something stronger than mere guidance is required and that guidelines require to be issued which should be followed by LA’s when dealing with enforcement. It is also the Federation’s view that civilian enforcement will only really be effective if the enforcement officers operate under the jurisdiction of the Police.

I would have included further comment but the need to remain within 4 pages prevents my doing so.

Letter from Superintendent C. MacKay, Deputy Divisional Commander of Tayside Police, to Mr T. McEntegart, Anderson Fyfe Solicitors

Complaint against the Police

I refer to the above subject and your letters of 10 February and 25 March 2009 in which you raised a number of concerns regarding the actions of the police in dealing with complaints made by Dundee Taxi Association in respect of the operation of the private hire company Dundee Private Hire Ltd. Having now met with representatives of the Scottish Taxi Federation, including members of the Dundee Taxi Association, and reviewed the actions of Tayside Police to date, I would now comment as follows.

This whole matter has now been ongoing for a considerable length of time and I would firstly like to take the opportunity to apologise to you and your clients for any delays encountered which have either been the responsibility or have been perceived to have been the responsibility of Tayside Police. I would point out however that on previous occasions when both Chief Inspector Robbie and Chief Inspector Richard have responded to you, they have first had consultations with the local Licensing Authority and/or the Procurator Fiscal.

In respect of the initial complaint relating to Dundee Private Hire Ltd cars illegally picking up passengers from the yard in South Ward Road, Dundee who had not pre-booked a private hire car, I would advise you that Chief Inspector Richard previously wrote to Dundee City Council as the local Licensing Authority to establish their position on this matter. I would advise you, as previously confirmed in an e-mail to Mr Bill McIntosh of the Scottish Taxi Federation, that the position of the local Licensing Authority, as to the arrangements between Dundee Private Hire Limited and the various nightclubs in South Ward Road for making available private hire cars for the patrons of these establishments, is that these arrangements are sufficient to comply with the terms of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982. I would advise you that I have also discussed this matter with the District Procurator Fiscal who is of the view that while the local Licensing Authority considers the operation is legal then the Procurator Fiscal would not be of a mind to bring such matters before a court. Whilst you may not be happy with this decision, I am sure you can also understand that in such circumstances it would not be possible for the police to take any alternative action against any of the drivers you have alleged are committing offences.

As your clients have previously been advised by the local Licensing Authority, if they do not agree with the position adopted by them, then the way to challenge this is by submitting a formal complaint under Paragraph 11 of Schedule I to the 1982 Act alleging that Dundee Private Hire Ltd are not fit and proper persons to continue to hold licences. If the Committee agrees with this complaint, Dundee Private Hire Ltd would have a right of appeal to the Sheriff and, conversely, if the Committee does not uphold the complaint, your clients could complain to the Sheriff and that way a formal legal ruling could be obtained.
In respect of private hire drivers who are found to be illegally plying for passengers who have not come from one of the night-clubs with whom a “block booking” arrangement exists, I can assure you that the police have and will continue to take enforcement action against such persons. I would point out however that although these persons are committing an offence under terms of Section 21(1)(a) of the said 1982 Act I cannot provide you with a guarantee that all such offences will be reported to the Procurator Fiscal. All such offences will be considered on their own merits and if appropriate the drivers may be reported to the Local Licensing Authority for them to consider the matter and take what action they deem necessary. I have also spoken to the Procurator Fiscal regarding this approach and it is one he is entirely comfortable with. I would advise you that all of the drivers as a result of the action undertaken by the firm of investigators recently engaged by your clients, were indeed reported to the local Licensing Authority. I can assure you that Tayside Police do not condone any illegal activity or breach of licence conditions by private hire drivers. I can also give you an assurance that if a driver who has already been reported to the Licensing Authority offends again in the same manner, or in instances where there is some other significant criminality or associated offence then these instances will be reported to the Procurator Fiscal for consideration.

If any person is found to be plying for trade without a taxi or private hire licence then such a person will be reported to the Procurator Fiscal on every occasion.

In respect of the point you highlight regarding possible contraventions of the Road Traffic Act in respect of driving without insurance, this is noted and I can assure you that on each occasion an offence under Section 21(1) (a) is detected a check will be made with the relevant insurance company to confirm or otherwise the validity of any insurance cover that exists. Any relevant offences detected will indeed be reported to the Procurator Fiscal. I would advise you that such checks were made in respect of the drivers identified by the investigators engaged by your clients and in each case they were found to have sufficient cover to meet the requirements of the Road Traffic Act.

I regret that you have found the actions or previous responses of Tayside Police, in general, or Chief Inspectors Robbie or Richard in particular, to be in any way unsatisfactory and can only apologise for this. I can assure you that we have no wish to have anything other than a positive relationship with Dundee Taxi Association and hope that the content of this letter clarifies our position for you.

I would like to thank you for taking the time to bring these matters to my attention and providing me with the opportunity to explain our position I trust you have found the information provided helpful.

Yours sincerely

Superintendent C MacKay
Deputy Divisional Commander
16 April 2009
Further to my letter of 23 March 2009 please find below the response from Dumfries and Galloway Council in respect of the above. Unfortunately it does not include comments on Parts 8, 9 and 10 and these will be sent directly to you by W Taylor from the Council’s Court and Licensing Service.

The Council welcomes the broad principles of the Bill, in particular the framework for sentencing, the new Community Payback orders, the presumption against short sentences, the proposed changes to the age of criminal responsibility, the strengthening of the response to sex offenders and sections referring to Mental Disorder. In addition the following more detailed comments are offered.

The Proposed Sentencing Commission and associated Sentencing Guidelines should provide a more consistent and transparent system of sentencing. Whilst there may be some concerns about the possible impact on the independence of sentencers and their capacity to reflect the individual circumstances of offences and offenders in the sentences of the court there is also a clear need for the public to understand and have confidence in the criminal justice system. In addition the power of Scottish Ministers and the High Court to request a review of the guidelines should provide some scrutiny by the legislature and the courts. However there will still be a need for those agencies involved in the criminal justice system to promote a greater understanding of their roles in ensuring that the legislation is enacted not only to ensure the smooth running of the system but also in terms of good outcomes for communities and individuals.

The other sections of the Bill that relate to sentencing in respect of Community Payback orders and short sentences are welcomed. The new name for community sentences may find greater support amongst members of the public and at the same time the underpinning policy promotes good outcomes for both communities and offenders. As with the other challenges for Social Work contained within Changing Lives more of the same will not do.

This Council is committed to promoting changes in Social Work practice that promote good outcomes and the development of a confident and competent work force. The changes in community sentences, the above Social Work principles and the accreditation of Criminal Justice Social Work interventions should promote an environment where courts have the confidence to use alternatives to short sentences. However there is a need to ensure that the sections in relation to time limits for serving and managing orders are reflected in procedures and guidance for both Criminal Justice Social Work and the Scottish Courts Administration.
The increase in the Grant Allocation to Criminal Justice Social Work outlined in Financial Memorandum should also provide additional resources to Criminal Justice Social Work, other Council services and the third sector, however it is hoped that the particular issues faced in delivering services in a rural community are recognised in the disbursement of these new funds.

The creation of post custody supervision for shorter sentences may also create an environment where some of the challenges facing those returning to their communities might be addressed. However whilst the Bill indicates the need for Scottish Ministers to negotiate with Local Authorities about the terms of these licences this would have to be supported by clear guidance and additional financial resources. Further it needs to be recognised that services other than Criminal Justice Social Work may have to be accessed and this may be difficult at a time of conflicting demands on limited resources.

Parts 2 (sale and hire of crossbows and knives) and Part 3 (Prosecution of children, Remand and committal of children and retention of samples etc. from children referred to the Children’s hearing) may all have an impact on Children, Young People and their Families.

The proposals regarding the sale of knives and crossbows whilst generally welcome also raise concerns about the potential to demonise Children and Young people. The possible use of Young people as part of an investigation will require clear guidance to ensure that the Young People involved are not put at risk.

The changes to the age of criminal responsibility are to be welcomed. However this may lead to changes in Grounds of Referral to Children’s Hearings and also create more appearances in court by Children and Young People for proof hearings. This may not only delay interventions but will also require clear guidance and training for Sheriffs and court staff in managing such appearances.

The change to the age of criminal responsibility and the changes to remand and committal may also create additional demands on Children and Families Social Work resources through supporting families through court appearances and the cost of secure accommodation. The Financial Memorandum only seems to reflect part of this potential demand on Council resources.

Finally in respect of Children and Young people the proposed retention of samples in the view of this Council creates a cultural shift from a focus on work with Children and Young people based on needs to one with a greater focus on their deeds. This of concern and may be contrary to the principles set out in getting it Right for Every Child where the Child or Young Persons needs should be at the centre of interventions.

The proposed sections relating to Sexual Offences Prevention Orders, Foreign Travel Orders and Risk of Sexual Harm Orders would appear to further strengthen the response to sexual offending. However as with other parts of the Bill there is a need to ensure that these new sections are reflected in revised guidance, particularly in respect of Multi Agency Public Protection Arrangements as they reflect the terms of the management of offenders (Scotland) Act 2005.

Dumfries and Galloway has always supported the development of Victim support services and the suggested improvements in victim services will allow the Council to sustain this and should allow the Council and other services to meet the strategic objective to improve victim support set by the South West Scotland Community Justice Authority.

Whilst the impact of the public Defence Solicitor’s office in Dumfries and Galloway has been limited the stated objective to provide long term certainty for its operations is welcomed. The sections relating to disclosure of information by prosecutors is also welcomed and should add to the transparency of the criminal justice system.

The sections relating to Mentally Disordered Offenders would appear to further strengthen the terms of the Mental Health Care and Treatment (Scotland) Act 2003.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Dumfries and Galloway Council

Further to my letter of 20 April 2009 in relation to the above, please find below the response from Dumfries and Galloway Council in respect of Part 8 Civic Government Licensing.

1.1 The proposal contained in Paragraph 121 would empower Scottish Ministers to issue standard licence conditions which would be attached to licences granted by each local authority. Although this would have the advantage of consistency across Scotland with advantages for enforcement over Council areas it appears to fly in the face of current Scottish Government thinking. A Scottish Government consultation on the introduction of the licensed activity of non domestic knife dealing has recently been concluded where it was suggested to Scottish Ministers that fundamental aspects such as need for CCTV, locked cabinets, storage of knives under the counter or in display cabinets should be incorporated into national conditions. The response was “this should be a discretionary condition for authorities to consider at a local level” and “We consider it important to give local licensing authorities the discretion to establish schemes appropriate to their area and that have the flexibility to deal with the peculiarities on an individual applications. Therefore we intend to keep mandatory conditions to a minimum and leave most matters to local resolution via discretionary conditions”.

1.2 The proposal to make a deemed licence have the licence conditions attached is welcome. At present where the local authority fail to determine an application within the required time limit a deemed one year licence comes into effect with no conditions. For example a late hours catering licence would be for the full 11pm to 5am until the local authority made a decision at a hearing to vary the licence by imposing conditions including times.

1.3 This paragraph also proposes that the licensing authority can itself approve standard conditions which would have to be published and could not be consistent with Scottish Ministers’ conditions. Local authorities presently have “standard conditions”. This would appear therefore to be formalising of present practice. However the provision that “Standard conditions will have no effect unless they are published” could have massive repercussions for licensing authorities and police. Consideration should be given to lightening this burden as the omission might be due to inadvertence or failure of communication in ensuring that the conditions remain on the Council’s website.

1.4 Paragraph 123 would withdraw metal dealing from a mandatory licensed activity to one which the authority must agree to license (option or activity). It appears an odd time to introduce this provision during a downturn in the economy where opportunities to make “easy” money will be sought and also at a time when theft of metal is regularly reported in the press. In any event as it takes over 1 year to introduce a new optional licensed activity it must be guaranteed that those authorities wishing to retain the licensing of metal dealers will not experience a gap during which the activity would be unlicensed.

1.5 Paragraph 124 relates to taxi and private hire cars.

1.5.1 Presently an application for a taxi or private hire driver licence must have held a driving licence for any continuous period of 12 months. The proposal is to tighten this – “throughout the period of 12 months immediately prior to the application”. This is generally to be welcomed. However perhaps there might be discretion granted to the authority for example where a totting up disqualification followed several offences over a long period or a relatively short period of disqualification has been imposed over the last 12 months.

1.5.2 The Bill also proposes to amend the provisions relating to review of the maximum fare structure by:
   - Clarifying that the review must be completed within 18 months of the last review
   - Requiring the authority to advise all taxi operators of the new scales not only those organisations consulted. This reflects present practice
   - Giving the authority 7 rather than 5 days to advise consultees and taxi operators of the coming into effect of the new scales.

1.5.3 Local taxi operators presently are entitled to appeal to the Traffic Commissioner in respect of a review of the Maximum Fare Structure. This would be widened to representative organisations.

1.6 Paragraph 125 withdraws a statutory exemption from the need of a market operator’s licence. Where the function is held by charitable, religious, youth, recreational, community, political or similar organisation a licence is not required. Withdrawal of this will necessitate publicity to make sure that local organisations are aware of the new licensing requirement. Locally this might be undertaken by fliers, notices in libraries and other Council buildings, the Council’s website, through Event Co-ordination and press advert. This will take up valuable time and resources. The Scottish Governments’ Explanatory Notes for the Bill states that “licensing authorities have discretion as to whether to charge reduced or no fee to such organisations”. Although impossible to calculate, specifically because they have been exempt, it is likely that the number of such markets will be substantial. Exactly the same consultation will be needed as for any other market operator’s application. Reduced, or waiver of fees would put an unfair burden on other applicants as the local authority must seek to cover costs by application fees.

1.6.1 By deleting “by retail” from the definition of private market (“a market, whether covered or not, carried on by any person other than a local or public authority at which goods are offered by more than one seller for sale BY RETAIL to the public”) makes it clear that it covers car boot sales where the participants are private individuals who are selling surplus household items. This clarification is constructive.

1.7 Paragraph 126 relates to licensing of places of public entertainment. The present provisions define places as only those where admittance is “for money or money’s worth”. The proposal is to withdraw this part of the definition. It will therefore relate to free events such as, locally, outdoor music events and firework displays. This will impact on local community groups. As the original resolution was based on the definition incorporating money or moneys’ worth a review may have to be undertaken to identify events which might be excluded. Again this will require detailed research, consultation and publicity with consequent need for time and resources. The publicity would be for any new resolution and for organisers presently exempt. The possibility of reduced or waived fees has been discussed under market operators.

1.8 Paragraph 127 would require a licence where food as defined in Section 1 of the Food Safety Act 1990. This is an extremely wide definition. However the present wording “meals or refreshments” has been considered imprecise and this proposal should be positive.

1.9 Schedule 1 to the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 sets out the procedural framework for processing and determining applications. The following amendments are proposed:-

- The application form should include the date and place of birth of the applicant
- The period for objections to be extended from 21 to 28 days. Twenty one days is a reasonable time. This is backed up by a provision allowing the authority to consider objections outwith that time. From the applicants point of view it must be appreciated that the vast majority of applications do not attract objections and are dealt with under delegated powers. The licence can only be issued after the period for objections has expired, this proposal extends this period by 7 days during which time the applicant cannot operate. This proposal is unnecessary.
- The period of notice for a hearing would increase from 7 to 14 days. This will reduce flexibility where committee dates are set in advance rather than arranged as necessary
- If someone has a licence and applies for renewal before its expiry that existing licence will continue on until the renewal is fully dealt with. If the licence has expired any application purporting to renew it is an application for a new licence. The proposal is to give discretion to the licensing authority to deem a late renewal on time if up to 28 days late but only “on good cause being shown” “good cause” is a matter of judgement. The use of the word “may deem an application…… made up to 28 days after the expiry……to be an application made before the expiry” involves discretion. These are matters best determined by Members rather than delegated to officers whereas timescale would demand an almost immediate response otherwise the advantage of the new provision would be greatly diminished.
• The period of notice to the licence holder for a suspension hearing would reduce from 21 to 14 days. This would be of great advantage to the authority when setting Committee meetings.

• The period during which a statement of reasons may be requested would be reduced from 28 days to 21 days. This would be of advantage to the authority especially in relation to issuing of a licence where an objection has been lodged. It is presently unfortunate that the period during which a statement of reasons can be requested equates with the period for lodging an appeal.

2 Part 9 Alcohol Licensing
2.1 The proposal to allow the Board to review its over provision statement at any time remedies an omission within the original drafting of the 2005 Act. A similar amendment is required to Section 6(2) relating to the Board’s Statement of Licensing Policy as it only allows one Supplementary Report. The Board should be entitled to review its Statement of Licensing Policy when the Board deems it necessary.

2.2 A duty is imposed to make an impact assessment of off sales on persons under the age of 21. It is suggested that this is a kneejerk reaction to recent publicity and would merely add to the Board’s workload and indeed may threaten to make infeasible the off sales premises affected. An added power would entitle the

2.2.1 This Impact Assessment would form part of the Board’s Licensing Policy Statement (in fact would entail a supplementary report). As the legislation only allows ‘a’ supplementary report within the 3 year period and the proposal empowers the Chief Constable and the Local Licensing Forum to seek a review of the Impact Assessment it is difficult to see how this fits in with the restriction to one Supplementary Statement set out in Section 6.

2.2.2 Otherwise the power to vary premises licences en bloc in relation to matters determined by Scottish Ministers would be an important part of the Board’s resource.

2.3 Paragraph 134 seeks to address an issue raised regarding occasional licences. Under the 1976 Act the procedure is simple and applications can be turned around in a few days and, where necessary, a matter of hours. The 2005 Act introduces a vastly detailed procedure including notification to the Chief Constable and the Licensing Standards Officer with each given 21 days to submit a response and a requirement to give notice of the application of the Boards’ website. Any one may object within 7 days of the notice. It need not be a neighbour or other local person. If there is an objection or representation a hearing must be arranged for the Board to determine the application. This could all take at least 6 weeks. Representations have been made especially by local organisations that 6 weeks notice renders many events impossible to organise. The Bill’s solution is to give the Board discretion to reduce the time for the Chief Constable’s report and the LSOs report to 24 hrs. No mention is made of the need to advertise on the website and the right of anyone to object. This is not within the Act but is in Secondary Legislation (The
2.4 Paragraph 135 would allow the Board to vary any Extended Hours Applications granted. This will allow the Board to address concerns arising from the use of the additional hours without reviewing the premises licence and is therefore a positive step.

2.5 In respect of personal licences it has been noted that the existing legislation would not prohibit the applicant applying for a personal licence from more than one Board: if the applicant is 18 or over, possesses a licensing qualification, has not recently had a personal licence revoked and has no convictions for a relevant offence the Board must grant the personal licence. This provision seeks to address this lacuna.

2.6 Paragraph 137 relates to closure orders. The present wording of the section empowers a police officer of the rank of superintendent or above to apply to the Board for an order closing licensed premises or himself to make an emergency closure order. The Bill would reduce the qualifying rank to inspector. Although operationally this will assist the police, keeping it at a higher rank would underline the importance of what is being sought or imposed.

2.7 Paragraph 140 sets out the skeletal framework for a social responsibility levy – promoted as “the polluter pays”. The full detailed system would be set out in regulations. Licence holders would not be restricted to liquor licensed premises but would include street traders, food businesses, holders of public entertainment licences and late hours catering premises.

The way the paragraph is presently phrased could force the local authority into introducing the levy. Subparagraph (1) empowers Scottish Ministers to make regulations for the imposition on relevant licence holders of changes for the purpose mentioned in subparagraph (3). This purpose is to meet or contribute to expenditure incurred or to be incurred by any local authority in furtherance of the licensing objectives and which the authority considers necessary or desirable with a view to remedying or mitigating adverse impact on those objectives attributable to the operation of the businesses described. This has to be read with subparagraph (4)(K) which states that the regulations may confer a wide range of functions on the local authority.

This will impose a very stressful, inexact, unpopular and perhaps unenforceable levy on the hospitality industry which will unanimously advise that the economic down turn has hit it harder. The situation may feasibly arise where the administration for enforcement will outweigh the cost of addressing the deleterious impact on the licensing objectives. It could also be a vehicle for the police to seek reimbursement/resourcing for what would be ordinary policing duties.

2.8 Schedule 4 sets out amendments to the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 very few of which are consequential to the terms of Part 8 of the Bill.
• Section 4 which sets out the licensing objectives makes specific reference to the crime prevention objective. Representations have been made especially on behalf of the police that they are restricted to this objective whereas their role covers public nuisance, public safety, public health and protecting children from harm. The power of the Chief Constable to recommend refusal would therefore extend to the basis of any of the objectives and not merely “the crime prevention objectives”

• Of crucial importance to the police Section 22(2) would be repealed. This restricts the Chief Constable’s objection to the grounds of involvement in serious organised crime. The Chief Constable would therefore be entitled to object under any relevant ground.

• In respect of transfers of premises licences the Chief Constable may recommend refusal if the transferee has been convicted of a relevant offence. The Bill would widen this to allow the Chief Constable to make such a recommendation even if the transferee has not been convicted of a relevant offence. This appears to fly in the face of the philosophy of the Nicholson Report and the 2005 Act where reference should be made only to convictions. It is odd that this change of emphasis is not carried through to the determination of premises licences (S23). Although this section is amended no reference is made to the Chief Constable recommending refusal where there is no conviction for a relevant offence. Bizarrely the proposed amendment to Section 23 refers to reports by the Chief Constable under Section 22(2) – which would be repealed by the immediately previous paragraph - or Section 24A(2). Perhaps the reference should be to Section 22(2A)

• Paragraph 7 of the Schedule 4 purports to repeal S57(2) relating to the power of the Chief Constable to recommend refusal of an occasional licence application notwithstanding that paragraph 134 of the Bill in a new subsection (5) refers to subsections (2) and (3) having effect

• Paragraph 10 purports to repeal S.59(2)(a) which provides that inter-alia if the Board has not received an adverse report from the Chief Constable it must grant the application for an occasional licence and subsection (7) which refers to the Board’s duty to consider the Chief Constable’s notice under section 57(2). The main text of the Bill (Part 9) does not otherwise seek to amend this section.

• Paragraph 12, similar to the proposal regarding transfer of a premises licence, widens the police powers to recommend refusal of a personal licence not only where the applicant has a conviction for a relevant offence and not only where refusal is considered necessary for the purposes of the crime prevention objective. This is a vast move from the original legislation. Although the present legislation following Nicholson which depends on a conviction flies in the face of the current policy of direct measures, with prosecution only seen as one option, the wording is extremely vague. What will be the basis of the Chief Constable’s recommendation – intelligence, direct measures? This should be clarified at least within guidance. Also it may be the re-introduction of “fit and proper person” criterion without that language. If so this should be made absolutely clear. If this is the case it must be questioned why it is being re-introduced around the time when the new licensing system will be coming into effect, and most personal licence applications determined on the present legislation. The police have been seeking a continuation of the “fit and proper person” criterion since the issuing of the Nicholson Report.

- Paragraph 16 would introduce Section 84A giving the Chief Constable power to report a personal licence holder to the Board for conduct inconsistent with the licensing system. This power would address an awkward restriction imposed by Section 84 which would only allow the Board to consider such conduct if it was uncovered during a review hearing for a premises licence. It is therefore a positive proposal.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from the Association of Scottish Neighbourhood Watches

Background to evidence gathering

In order to ensure that our evidence represented the views of Neighbourhood Watches across Scotland, we e-mailed individual coordinators giving them a link to the Bill and asking them to complete a questionnaire which highlighted some of the main proposals of the bill. Due to timescales and logistical considerations, only coordinators who had registered an e-mail address were polled.

Respondents were asked to Agree or Disagree with the 15 statements given as it was felt that this was the best way to gauge people’s broad reactions to the proposals. They were also given the opportunity to submit additional comments on the bill. Respondents were asked, where possible, to consult with other members of their Neighbourhood Watch schemes, again to bring in as many views as possible.

Respondents

The questionnaire was sent to over 500 Neighbourhood Watch coordinators. We received 85 responses, covering the views of 256 people. Responses were received from 6 of the 8 police regions. Most responses were received from Lothian & Borders, although the responses from Strathclyde covered the views of more people.

Additional Comments

Would be in favour of forensic data being kept longer than 3 years if possible.

1) Community service should be much more high profile, there appears to be no shame factor, and therefore no penalty in the tariff
2) Some feel that 12 is an unevenly balanced age. ie. some children know the difference between right and wrong, some have no idea, because of their background
3) Pornography (Hot potato !!) Across the board ban, with maximum penalties for possession or distribution
4) Licensing: Comment made, and I can support this having been in the licensed trade for thirty years: Many fundamental by laws controlling liquor licenses were lost in the reorganisation for Regions and Districts. These included " special offers, regular drinks promotions other than new products, serving alcohol in anything other than a glass (eg. jugs, pails, bottles), mixing two spirits in the same glass. (UKBG handbook 1974: no cocktail should contain more than one base spirit)
5) Another comment referred to the sale of computer games, music dvd's and films. some felt that the sale of these should be licensed to control piracy in order to prevent trading of same between inappropriately aged children

Definitely need more discipline on the under 16 age groups. When they get to 16 and come under the Justice system, they do not suddenly become model citizens. They have served their apprenticeship and are quite good at it and their knowledge of the Law.

More prison spaces

Discussion

The proposals which the majority of respondents disagreed with were:

- Creating a presumption against custodial sentences of 6 months or less
- Replacing the custody-only provisions in the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007 with short-term custody and community sentences
- Raising the age of criminal responsibility to 12

Views were split on:

- Allowing the retention, for at least three years, of fingerprints and other forensic data taken from persons proceeded against but not convicted of a serious sexual or violent offence
- Making a spouse or civil partner a compellable witness

The other proposals were agreed with on the whole by Neighbourhood Watch members who responded to the questionnaire.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from the Sir Gerald Gordon

I wish to make it clear that I associate myself with the comments made by the Royal Society of Edinburgh, having been involved in their preparation.

I appreciate that one of the aims of s 1 may be to restrict the number and length of prison sentences, but there seems to be no reason in principle for not applying the principles of subss (2) and (3) to persons under 18, or indeed to non-custodial sentences.

This may be a question of principle or merely of presentation, but the phrase ‘community payback order’ seems to me to be inept. Why not just call them ‘community orders’. I should add that I am strongly in favour of replacing all the separate provisions for non-custodial orders by one set of provisions.

I am unhappy on principle with s 28(2). I appreciate that it is restricted to persons who have obtained a direct benefit, such as a share of the proceeds, from the criminal activity involved, but I doubt if it achieves that object. As it stands it could require children to report their parents just because the latter pay for their school fees. The whole idea of making it an offence not to report a crime has its problems, but this section (which does not define ‘material benefit’) goes too far. It could perhaps be cured, and could certainly be improved, by some limitation on ‘material benefit’. If it is indeed intended only to apply to a direct share in the proceeds of the crime, such an amendment might help to avoid the apparent creation of a society which encourages denunciation. As it stands it has totalitarian overtones.

For somewhat similar reasons, I do not like the removal of ‘matrimonial’ privilege. The problem of people getting married in order to avoid giving evidence can be dealt with in narrower terms.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Professor Clare McGlynn and Dr Erika Rackley
Durham Law School, Durham University

1. Justifications for action

1.1 Cultural harm:
Legislative action against extreme pornography is justified because of the ‘cultural harm’ of such material; by which we mean that the existence and use of extreme pornography contributes to a society which fails to take sexual violence against women seriously.

1.2 Our argument is not that the person who views extreme pornography, such as pornographic rape websites, will then go on to commit rape. Such arguments of direct, causal links between pornography and violence are over-simplistic. Rather, it is the proliferation and tolerance of such sites and the messages they convey which contributes to a climate in which sexual violence is condoned, a form of entertainment even. This in turn leads to a societal failure to take sexual violence seriously which is manifested in, for example, the continued prevalence of rape myths and the low conviction rate for rape.

1.3 Targeting demand and recognising responsibility:
We welcome the fact that these proposals place some responsibility for the harms of extreme pornography on the user. However, the effectiveness of this approach will require a pro-active prosecutorial policy.

2. Definitions of extreme pornography

2.1 The Bill defines an ‘extreme pornographic image’ (s51A(2)) as one which is obscene, pornographic and extreme.

2.2 Obscene
2.2.1 It appears that this part of the definition is included to limit the scope of the measures to material which is already prohibited by s51 of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982.
2.2.2 The use of the term ‘obscene’ alone is preferable to the exceptionally vague and undefined reference in the English provisions to material which is ‘grossly offensive, disgusting or otherwise of an obscene character’ (s63(6) Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 (CJIA)). However, we urge the Committee to reconsider the use of the language and concept of ‘obscenity’. Obscenity laws have long been criticised on two main grounds:

2.2.2.1 the definition of ‘obscene’ is vague and opaque. Thus, including this in the new measures, purportedly to limit the scope of the offence, still means that there is a great level of discretion and lack of clarity.

2.2.2.2 the term is typically deployed to capture material which is not only harmful, but which also causes offence or disgust. Thus, obscene has been used to cover the depiction of activities which are not in themselves unlawful, yet may be viewed by some as morally wrong or disgusting (such as images of coprophilia). The criminal law should not be used to proscribe the depiction or viewing of acts which are not unlawful in themselves to carry out.

2.3 An extreme image

2.3.1 Severe injury:
We welcome the definition of extreme which encompasses ‘serious injury’ to any part of the body. The English legislation limits ‘serious injury’ to the anus, breasts and genitals (CJIA s63(7)(b)). This restriction may lead to potentially absurd results whereby the likelihood of prosecution and conviction will depend on which body part is depicted as being harmed. It also demonstrates the English legislature’s lack of appreciation of the real harms of extreme pornography, which are not in the depiction of injury to specific, sexualised parts of the body, but in the justification and reproduction of sexual violence.

2.3.2 Depictions of rape:

2.3.2.1 This is a welcome addition to the definition of ‘extreme’. Pornographic rape websites, which are easily and freely available\(^1\), are paradigmatic examples of the material which should be covered by this proposed legislation.

2.3.2.2 The English measures only cover pornographic images of rape if they also depict life-threatening harm or serious injury to the anus or genitals. This is a serious and unjustifiable lacuna in the English law, as we have

---

\(^1\) Access to pornographic rape websites is straightforward and simple. No passwords, payments or other limitations are placed on access. A simple search can display thousands of such sites. It is not therefore true to suggest that one only finds this material if undertaking a persistent search and/or if one pays money.

2.3.3 Other non-consensual penetrative sexual activity:

2.3.3.1 This category covers a very broad range of images. Its inclusion brings within the scope of the measures the depiction of acts which may be extremely harmful. It will help to ensure that certain forms of sexual violence are not given greater protection than others.

2.3.3.2 However, although its remit is limited to that material which is also ‘obscene’ (s51A(2)(a)), it could be seen to extend the scope of the Bill too far. Moreover, as stated above in 2.2, we have reservations over the use of the term ‘obscene’ and would prefer not to rely on such a concept.

2.3.3.3 If the obscenity terminology is removed from the bill (as we suggest), pornographic depictions of ‘non-consensual penetrative sexual activity’ should not be included within the Bill to ensure that its scope is not overly broad.

2.3.4 Bestiality and necrophilia

The Bill covers a very wide range of pornographic images of bestiality and necrophilia. As with the English legislation, this means that the measures cover the depiction of acts which are not in themselves unlawful to carry out. This is regrettable: if there are not good reasons for criminalising the actual act itself, it is difficult to find a justification for proscribing the depiction of such an act. We have further concerns over including images of bestiality within the scope of such measures, as detailed in our (2009) Criminal Law Review article.

3. Targeting Extreme Pornography – not ‘art or Shakespeare’

3.1 Claims have been made in the Scottish press that the Bill will encroach on popular, mainstream films and even Shakespeare or other works of art such as Leda and the Swan. These claims are simply false. Recordings of Shakespearean work will be neither pornographic, nor explicit, nor realistic and will be excluded works. Paintings/drawings are not covered as they are not realistic. One further example will suffice:

3.1.1 A Clockwork Orange: This film includes an infamous rape scene. However, this film, and others like it, will clearly not be covered for the following reasons:
  - BBFC classification: this film is classified as a certificate 18. It will therefore be defined as an ‘excluded image’ (s51B(2)) and an offence under s51A will not be committed (so long as the image (here the rape scene) has not been extracted for pornographic purposes: s51B(3)); and

---

• Pornographic: this film is extremely unlikely to be interpreted as being ‘pornographic’ under s51A(3); and
• Explicitness: an image is only ‘extreme’ if its depiction is ‘explicit and realistic’ (s51A(6)). In A Clockwork Orange there is no explicit display of the sexual activity involved; it is simulated and not shown clearly.

4. Context of the image

4.1 We welcome the inclusion of sections 51A(7) and 51B(4) which provide that when determining whether material is extreme, the overall context of the image, including accompanying words or sounds, are to be taken into account. There is no such provision in the English legislation.

4.2 The context of image is crucial in determining whether pornographic images are of consensual sexual activity (whether simulated or real). This provision will, therefore, be particularly relevant to the rape and non-consensual penetrative sexual activity provisions. Images on pornographic rape websites are typically accompanied by banners and text which glorify rape. The narrative of the ‘story’ similarly conveys such meaning, as do the sounds. Without them, the ‘rape’ becomes an image of sexual intercourse. That is, it may not be clear that it is a non-consensual act which is being depicted. The non-consensual aspect, or what makes it rape, comes from this overall context.

4.3 The provision is essential and makes prosecutions in relation to such images more realistic and possible.

5. Defences

5.1 Direct participant in material:
Section 51C(3)-(5) provides a defence for someone who is a direct participant in the acts depicted. This defence is withdrawn if the material is shown, given or offered for sale. This legitimate restriction on the defence, which is not included in the English legislation, will ensure that its aim - privately made materials for private use - is met.

5.2 Inclusion of a public good defence:
We recommend the inclusion of a public good defence. There is such a defence in the English Obscene Publications Act 1959 which provides a defence where the material in question is ‘justified as for the public good in that it is in the interests of science, literature, art, learning or of other objects of general concern’ (s4). The introduction of such a defence would further demonstrate that there is no intention to bring educational, legitimate artistic or similar works within the scope of the legislation.
6. Defining possession
The concept of possession is key to this offence. It is not defined in the Bill (nor in the English provisions). This is a serious omission. We suggest the legislation include a definition of possession to clarify exactly what will be covered. In particular, it will be important to determine whether an offence is potentially committed when images are viewed on screen (and stored in the cache), as opposed to being actively downloaded and saved, the impact of deletion (and potentially recoverable materials) and what is the requirement of knowledge on the part of the user. In practice, under English law, the person’s technical computer knowledge determines the scope of the offence, even though all those who view and/or download images, even if later deleted, ‘feed the trade’.

Criminalising Extreme Pornography: A Lost Opportunity

By Clare McGlynn and Erika Rackley

Durham Law School, Durham University

Summary: This article considers provisions criminalising the possession of “extreme pornography” in the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008. It begins by outlining the current criminal law regime governing pornography, before considering the new measures in detail. We highlight the areas which are most likely to witness challenges, and the areas about which confusion seems inevitable. We close by considering the arguments for proscribing the possession of extreme pornography and possible ways forward, while recognising that, regrettably, the legislative opportunity to take action in this field has most likely now been lost.

Introduction

In May 2008, the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act (CJIA) received Royal Assent and a new offence criminalising the possession of “extreme pornography” was created. This new offence, expected to come into force in January 2009, is a pale imitation of that originally proposed, with the final measure representing a lost opportunity to take much bolder, and intellectually more defensible, steps towards proscribing extreme forms of pornography. In the face of sustained criticism from arch-liberals and “sexual freedom” organisations, the Government lost sight of the real harm in extreme pornography and failed to justify its actions in terms acceptable to constituencies beyond the moral-conservative. Further, last-minute amendments were introduced which all but erode the potential benefits of this legislation.

This article begins by outlining the current criminal law regime governing pornography, before considering the new measures in detail. We highlight the areas which are most likely to witness challenges, and the areas about which confusion seems inevitable. We close by considering the arguments for proscribing the possession of extreme pornography and possible ways forward, while recognising that, regrettably, the legislative opportunity to take action in this field has most likely now been lost.

Policing pornography

Prior to the CJIA, pornography itself (extreme or otherwise) was not directly regulated. Rather it fell within the remit of measures governing obscenity and indecency, principally the Obscene Publications Act 1959 (OPA). The OPA makes... it a criminal offence, punishable by up to three year’s imprisonment,\(^1\) to publish, or possess for gain, obscene articles (defined very broadly). The OPA thus targets those who produce and disseminate obscene materials; simple possession for private use is not covered. Obscenity is defined as being material which, “if taken as a whole”, is such “as to tend to deprave and corrupt persons who are likely, having regard to all relevant circumstances, to read, see or hear . . . it”.\(^2\) The focus on depraving and corrupting the consumers of obscene materials clearly highlights the moralistic nature of this regulation. There is no requirement to demonstrate harm (other than (presumably) moral harm to the consumer) and no further elucidation as to exactly what types of material might have this effect. Notwithstanding such potentially sweeping coverage, material can be “saved” if it is “justified as for the public good in that it is in the interests of science, literature, art, learning or of other objects of general concern”.\(^3\)

We have three broad criticisms of the OPA which are relevant to the current discussion. First, the offence itself is notoriously opaque. No one really knows what constitutes obscene material. Only a jury decision provides certainty and with the number of obscenity trials drastically reducing in recent years,\(^4\) there is little to go on. The “deprave and corrupt” phraseology comes from Lord Cockburn’s proscription of material which contained “thoughts of the most impure and libidinous kind” in Hicklin in 1868,\(^5\) which has been given precious little precision since. While guidance provided to the CPS and customs and excise officials provides some clarity regarding the scope of the offence, the point still stands.

This leads us to the second main criticism of the obscenity legislation, namely that the material which is generally thought to be covered ranges from exceptionally violent and misogynistic pornography to material which depicts perfectly lawful activities. There is no clear rationale behind the approach to what constitutes obscene material and the arguments for including some material can only come from notions of disgust and offence (which are considered further below). For example, the CPS guidance states that it is “impossible to define all types of activity which are suitable for prosecution”, but lists the following as those most commonly appropriate: sexual acts/assaults with children; incest; buggery with an animal; rape; drug taking; flagellation; torture with instruments; bondage (especially where gags are used); dismemberment or graphic mutilation; cannibalism; activities involving perversion or degradation (such as drinking urine or smearing excreta on a person’s body).\(^6\) A study by Susan Edwards showed that in addition to materials depicting unlawful and extremely violent acts, obscenity prosecutions were also brought in relation to depictions of lawful and (typically) harmless activities, such as “fisting”.\(^7\) The problem is that if an activity is not unlawful in itself, then

\(^1\) The CJIA increases this to five years: OPA 1959 s.2(1), as amended by CJIA s.71 (not yet in force).

\(^2\) OPA s.1.

\(^3\) OPA s.4.

\(^4\) The number of prosecutions has fallen from 131 in 1999 to 35 in 2005 (Ministry of Justice, Criminal Justice and Immigration Bill Regulatory Impact Assessment (2007), p.90).

\(^5\) Hicklin (1868) L.R. 3 Q.B. 360 QB.

proscribing its depiction raises serious issues of clarity and coherence and raises the question of where is the harm.

This brings us to the third criticism; that the obscenity legislation is inspired and underpinned by conservative and conventional views of “appropriate” sexuality. Thus, whereas once the OPA covered depictions of oral sex, as noted above, it now appears to include images of sexual activity which may not be that common, or advisable, but is not unlawful, such as coprophilia. It is a paternalistic legislative regime, which seeks to protect the consumers of the obscene materials from themselves. Nowhere in the legislation or practice of the OPA is concern expressed regarding harm to any other constituency.

Accordingly, when the Government proposed a new free-standing provision to address the “increasing public concern” about the availability of extreme pornography, particularly one which moved away from the universally criticised obscenity provisions and focused instead on the links between pornography and sexual violence against women, there were grounds for a cautious welcome. However, while this may have represented the Government’s ambition in 2005, by the time the legislation had been adopted in 2008, things were very different.

Criminalising the possession of “extreme pornographic images”

The new measures in the CJIA are radical to an extent, for instance in the introduction of a possession offence, and yet, at the same time, antiquated in their reliance on the language of “disgust” and “obscenity”. In addition, they differ considerably from the original proposals in 2005, the amended versions in 2006 and the Criminal Justice and Immigration Bill (CJIB) as first presented to Parliament in 2007. Indeed, as is perhaps all too familiar, last-minute amendments to the legislation, purportedly in order to clarify, in fact obscure and render some parts of the final Act very unclear.

The CJIA provides that it is “an offence for a person to be in possession of an extreme pornographic image”. An image is one that is “moving or still”, or is in the form of data capable of conversion into such a form. The image must also be “explicit and realistic”, thereby excluding cartoons, drawings and written work. There are three principal issues here: what are “pornographic”, “extreme” and “possession”?

9 To the extent that the harm is conceived as harm to children viewing the material, then the paternalism is likely to be justified. But the principal criticism here of paternalism is its focus on the users of pornography rather than on others who might be harmed.
13 CJIA s.63(1).
14 CJIA s.63(8).
15 CJIA s.63(7).
What is “pornographic”?

An image is “‘pornographic’ if it is of such a nature that it must reasonably be assumed to have been produced solely or principally for the purpose of sexual arousal”.17 In determining whether an image satisfies this test, the overall context or narrative of the image will be relevant.18 In its original form, the definition of pornographic had been based on the producer's intention. The Government, however, amended this, replacing it with a requirement that the material can be “reasonably assumed” to have been produced for pornographic purposes. This was based on the idea that it would be more certain than an inquiry into the mind and intention of the producer.19 This may not be the case, but it may still be a better test. In order to make such a determination, the jury or magistrate will be taking into account more than just the expressed intention of the producer, for example the overall context of the material, such as the nature and form of publication. The downside is that there is likely to be considerable variance between juries as to what can be “reasonably assumed” to be pornographic, but it is difficult to see how this can be avoided.

What is an “extreme image”?

A pornographic image is “‘extreme’ if it is “grossly offensive, disgusting or otherwise of an obscene character”20 and portrays, in an explicit and realistic way, any of the following,

“(a) an act which threatens a person’s life,
(b) an act which results, or is likely to result, in serious injury to a person’s anus, breasts or genitals,
(c) an act which involves sexual intercourse with a human corpse, or
(d) a person performing an act of intercourse or oral sex with an animal (whether dead or alive) and a reasonable person looking at the image would think that any such person or animal was real”.21

Life-threatening and serious injury

These provisions gave rise to considerable debate and their current form reveals much about the legislative process. In the 2005 consultation, the Government proposed taking action against “‘serious violence in a sexual context’ and “‘serious sexual violence’”.22 There were many objections to these proposals, the most successful being the charge of imprecision.23 Accordingly, by 2006, the Government had amended its proposals to cover life-threatening and “‘serious, disabling’” injury, further amended in the original Bill to life-threatening images or those resulting (or likely to result) in serious (but no longer disabling) injury to the “anus, breasts and genitals”.

In pursuit of clarity and precision, much had changed. Images will now fall within the scope of the measures if they are of life-threatening acts (such as depictions of suffocation or hanging), or of acts which result, or are likely to result, in serious injury (for example the insertion of a sharp object) to the anus, breasts or genitals.24 In practice, these provisions are likely to capture the depiction of many sado-masochistic practices, such as asphyxiation. While the intention of those involved in such activities is not to threaten or endanger life (though this may not be apparent when the images are viewed in isolation), such images are likely to be deemed depictions of life-threatening acts since serious injury or death could result.

Beyond images of life-threatening acts, s.63 also includes images of acts resulting or likely to result in “serious injury to a person’s anus, breasts or genitals”. “Serious injury” remains undefined, though images of “mutilation” of the genitals or breasts are likely to be covered.25 It is important to stress the specificity of this provision: it does not include serious injury to any other part of the body. Pornographic images of harm to the buttocks, for example, will not be covered, nor will people having their limbs broken or suffering other lasting disabling injuries (unless they can be considered life-threatening) to other parts of the body.

Many criticisms can be levelled at this provision. The specificity of body parts can only lead to potentially ludicrous results with some images being proscribed, but others not, simply because of the possible injury to specific body parts, rather than due to the nature of the images as a whole, their harm and impact. As we shall argue below, this is, at least partly, a result of the Government’s failure to set out and address directly the nature of the harm in extreme pornography.

Moreover, although non-statutory guidance on the sorts of images to be covered by these provisions will provide greater clarity, as will CPS charging standards, there remains uncertainty about what images will be covered. This could have been avoided, at least to some extent, had greater clarity been expressed regarding the real target which should not be average depictions of consensual sado-masochistic activity but what might be seen as the really problematic pornographic images—that is images which normalise, even glorify sexual violence through, for example, the deliberate, misogynisticvalorisation of rape.

For instance, it is unlikely that pornographic pro-rape websites,27 which are freely and easily accessible online,28 will be covered by these measures. This is lamentable,

28 A number of times in debate, it was stated that the type of material under discussion is very difficult to access. For example, Baroness Howarth stated that “one cannot get to it by accident; a determined effort has to be made” (Hansard, HL Vol.699, col.905 (March 3, 2008)). In fact, what is disturbing is how easy it is to access much of the material being called extreme. It is entirely straightforward to access, for free, without giving any personal not least because the “extensive availability of sites featuring violent rape” was within the initial purview of the Government. Although some “violent” rapes may be covered (what is “non-violent” rape?), if they involve weapons or result in serious injury to the anus, breasts or genitals, this excludes many pornographic rape images.

While many of the “rapes” on pornographic rape websites may not be “real”, but staged, they nonetheless are often presented as real and certainly presented to valorise forced sex. Indeed, one deeply ironic aspect of the exclusion of pornographic rape websites from the scope of the CJIA is that the apparent evidence of a causal link between exposure to violent pornography and a propensity to commit acts of sexual violence (deployed by the Government) is based on research which invariably deploys images of rape as the basis for investigation.

Rape sites, such as those described above, should have been brought within the scope of these measures, whether or not the rape involves additional physical violence, and their exclusion reveals the extent to which the Government has strayed from its initial ambition and lost sight of the harms to be addressed by these measures.

Bestiality and necrophilia

The incongruity of pro-rape websites not being included is all the more evident, and deplorable, when consideration is given to the generally accepted inclusion of images of bestiality and necrophilia. While debate has largely focused on life-threatening and seriously harmful acts, the bestiality and necrophilia provisions attracted little critical attention and slipped into the Act largely unnoticed. Although this may be explained on the grounds that these measures are, perhaps, of less significance than the others in terms of the number of people and images affected, their inclusion raises significant questions about the aim and scope of the new measures and has, it is suggested, paved the way for a full-on retreat to the disgust-based justifications of the OPA.

Both the necrophilia and bestiality provisions cover acts which are not in themselves unlawful to perform. Section 70 of the Sexual Offences Act 2003 details, large amounts of material covering bestiality, necrophilia and other forms of violent pornography. Sometimes there are front web pages, warning of the nature of the content, but there is no mechanism to prevent further access.

30 Such focus on body parts excluding any possibility of bringing psychological harm within “serious injury”.

32 It is worth noting here that the Criminal Justice and Licensing Bill (due to be introduced into the Scottish Parliament in January 2009) will include measures which will criminalise the possession of extreme pornographic material which realistically depict “Rape and other non-consensual penetrative sexual activity, whether violent or otherwise” (Scottish Government, Revitalising Justice—Proposals To Modernise And Improve The Criminal Justice System (September 2008), p.18, http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2008/09/24132838/0 [Accessed January 30, 2009].

(SOA) proscribes sexual penetration of a dead person, while the CJIA extends to include “sexual interference with a human corpse”.34 In relation to bestiality, the Act criminalises the possession of pornographic material depicting “intercourse or oral sex with an animal (whether dead or alive)” which goes further than the SOA which proscribes only penile penetration of the vagina or anus of, or by, a live animal.35 That it will be lawful to perform certain sexual acts with a corpse or animal, but not to view images of such acts is clearly anomalous. It is this sort of inconsistency between provisions which should have been ironed out in the legislative process, with either the SOA being amended or the extreme pornography provisions changed to mirror the current law.

It is likely that the Government’s intentions were to capture as much pornographic material depicting acts of bestiality and necrophilia as possible. In the area of bestiality, in particular, depictions of oral sex are common and would not be caught if the provisions did not go beyond the SOA. However, equally common are images of manual masturbation of or by an animal, yet these are not covered. Users of such materials, particularly online, will have to take care to avoid encountering proscribed “extreme” images among those which fall outside the scope of the measures.

This only serves to raise another concern with the inclusion of the bestiality images. Sexual acts with animals may be viewed as disgusting and considered degrading or perverted by some people, but this alone should not be enough for the possession of such images to be criminalised.36 There may be an issue of animal cruelty, but this is not best dealt with by pornography laws. There may also be an issue of participants’ consent, but unless one is willing to say that there is no true consent in any pornographic images, it is difficult to single out bestiality. Finally, if the purpose of the new measures is justified on the basis of a concern about sexual violence, as we would suggest, then it is not always clear that the bestiality provisions fit within this paradigm.

Grossly offensive, disgusting or otherwise obscene

One further threshold must be satisfied before an image is considered to be “extreme”: the image must be “grossly offensive, disgusting or otherwise of an obscene character”.37 This provision was added during the final stages of the parliamentary process as a response to criticisms and was acknowledged by the Government to constitute the “most significant” change to the original proposals.38 This new clause taken, apparently, from a dictionary definition of what constitutes “obscene”, is intended to “clarify the alignment between this offence and the Obscene Publications Act” and ensure that “only material that would be caught by” the OPA is caught by the new Act.39

34 This was the focus of much criticism after the 2005 consultation, but the Government remained with its original proposal in its 2006 document without specifying why (Pt II, para.12).
35 SOA s.69
36 It has been a continuing source of irony, and dismay, to us that while there has been a general consensus about including the bestiality provisions within the Act, this has not extended to the images of sexual violence against women and that people appear to find images of bestiality more abhorrent than forced sex or extreme violence against women.
37 CJIA s.63(6)(b).
This intention was not new. The Government had often stated that only those materials which were already included within the scope of the OPA would be covered by the new extreme pornography measures. However, until this clause was introduced there was no explicit link in the text to the existing obscenity provisions and, given the malleability of the OPA, it was unclear exactly what would be covered. Its inclusion is retrograde for many reasons.

First, it makes an express link to the OPA, by its use of the terminology “obscene character” which is likely to be interpreted by reference to the current obscenity legislation. This is regrettable for all the reasons set out above regarding the current problems with the OPA. Thus, whereas there was potential for the CJIA to move from the OPA's disgust and offence-based terminology toward a harm-based standard, this has been lost. Secondly, while this threshold was, in all apparent honesty, introduced to provide clarity, it does nothing but obscure. We already know that what constitutes “obscene” material is notoriously vague, but there is even less clarity regarding what might be “grossly offensive” or “disgusting”. Further, not only are such terms highly subjective and vague, they clearly import an offence-based charge. While offence is a basis for legal regulation of sexually explicit material, this is generally confined to zoning or shielding measures, keeping sexual imagery confined to specific spaces. It is not generally a sufficient basis for a criminal possession offence. Disgust, as Martha Nussbaum has clearly argued, is a wholly inadequate basis for law-making. Liberty expressed similar sentiments stating that: “Extreme caution should be exercised when new criminal laws are imposed with the intention of imposing a subjective opinion of what is morally acceptable.” The focus should be on harmful, not disgusting, material.

What constitutes possession?

The concept of possession is key to the offence. However, the development of computer technology has, unfortunately, given rise to much complexity in determining when an individual will be held to be in “possession” of the particular image. What appears to be the case from Porter, concerning possession of child abuse images, is that the answer depends on the extent to which the image is in the defendant's “custody and control”. Where, for example, images have been deleted, though retrievable with specialist software (as in Porter), defendants will not be in possession of the image so long as they do not have the relevant software and/or the capability to carry out the retrieval. As Yaman Akdeniz explains, this “introduces a subjective element into the concept of physical possession in the context of computer images”, as well as raising the question, posed by David Ormerod, of whether a “defence” of deletion should really be available to the computer illiterate but not to the knowledgeable.

42 Liberty, Liberty’s Committee Stage Briefing on the Criminal Justice and Immigration Bill in the House of Commons (2007), p.16.
This leads onto the issue of whether there is possession when an individual is “just looking” at images on a computer screen. When viewing internet images on screen, the hard drive of the computer keeps a record of those images, what is known as a “cache”. Ormerod states clearly that, following Atkins,46 “any images that remain in the internet cache on a computer are in D’s possession” and such a defendant can be convicted of the possession offence, subject to proof of knowledge.47 Thus, unless it can be established that they knew about the existence of the cache (for example by admission or proof that they have accessed the temporary internet file off-line), computer illiterate defendants are able to “just look” at as many images of extreme pornography as they wish.48

This is in contrast to those who browse images of child abuse. The Court of Appeal in Smith and Jayson held that, following Bowden,49 “the act of voluntarily downloading an indecent image from a web page on to a computer screen is the act of making a photograph or pseudo-photograph”.50 Although contentious,51 this interpretation recognises the act of “just looking” for what it is: active participation in the abuse and sexual exploitation of children. Similar arguments can be made in relation to (some) extreme pornography (discussed further below). However, unlike in relation to child abuse images there is no corresponding “making” offence to catch the computer illiterate.52 Thus, we would argue that “possession” should be interpreted broadly by the courts, and in line with the motivations of Bowden, to include images unknowingly stored in the defendant’s “cache”. These images remain in the “possession” of the defendant in that they are stored on their computer.

We recognise that our argument for a broad understanding of possession—to include those who are “just looking”—will mean that more people may be liable to prosecution under the extreme pornography measures. To the extent that this is unwarranted, the problem, and indeed remedy, lies not in the definition of “possession” but rather in what is considered an “extreme” pornographic image (which we would argue is in some respects too broad).

Excluded and extracted images

The provisions on excluded and extracted images both limit the scope of the measures and extend them far beyond what might have been thought reasonable.

46 Atkins v DPP [2000] 2 Cr. App. R. 248 DC.
48 The Spanner Trust in its information leaflet about the new measures suggests that “just viewing an image or video on a web site does not constitute ‘possession’. So you can browse the Internet quite legally” (Spanner Trust, Is Your Porn Collection Still Legal, http://www.spannertrust.org/documents/possessionofextreme_pornography_share.pdf [Accessed January 30, 2009]). The leaflet goes on to suggest that what remains in the individual’s cache “does not constitute possession”. As we have seen, this is not necessarily the case. Not least because reading the leaflet (and its guidelines on how to delete a computer’s hard drive) will, presumably, give the reader the requisite knowledge for the offence.
52 The OPA does not extend this far.

In terms of excluded images, s.64 provides that films classified by the British Board of Film Classification (BBFC) will be exempt. This means that images of, for example, necrophilia shown in a classified film will not constitute an extreme pornographic image. This is because in classifying the film, the BBFC will have made a determination that the nature of the image, in the overall context of the film, was not pornographic nor contravened the OPA. This is a sensible limit on the scope of the measures.

However, the provisions on extracted images take the measures off in wholly new and uncharted directions. An extract of a classified film may fall within the scope of the measures if it has been extracted for pornographic purposes. Where the extract is one of a series of images the question of whether it is pornographic will be determined by reference to the image itself and the context within which the image appears. In other words, many classified films contain images which may depict life-threatening acts, or acts of necrophilia, for example, but which by virtue of being in a classified film are exempt from the extreme pornography provisions. However, when the particular image is extracted from the overall film, and particularly when placed alongside other such extracts, this exemption is lost and it may fall foul of the CJIA if the collection of extracted images is deemed to have been produced for the purposes of sexual arousal.

No real explanation of this provision has been given by the Government justifying its inclusion and it has been subject to severe criticism and ridicule, especially by those against the measures more generally. Despite the Justice Minister Lord Hunt’s confident assertion that this measure will not capture “mainstream films”, presumably because the extracted image is unlikely to be sufficiently “explicit” or “obscene”, much will turn on what is understood by these terms. Broadly construed, it is feasible that it could capture extracts of scenes from BBFC films, widely available on YouTube and similar websites (assuming they were extracted for pornographic purposes). This may not be a bad thing. Context works both ways. Devoid of their original narrative, these scenes become a ubiquitous, possibly more acceptable, and certainly more accessible, parallel of images found on pornographic websites. As Martha Nussbaum argues, what matters is the “overall context of the human relationship”. The “salient issue” is the degree of “harm, humiliation and subordination”. It is precisely for this reason that we can accept depictions of female sexuality in texts such as Lawrence’s Lady Chatterley’s Lover or Henry James’s The Golden Bowl, whilst expressing rather greater doubt about rapedbitch.com.58

Defences

The defences for this new offence mirror those available in respect of child abuse images,59

“(a) that the person had a legitimate reason for being in possession of the image concerned;
(b) that the person had not seen the image concerned and did not know, nor had cause to suspect, it to be an extreme pornographic image;
(c) that the person—
   (i) was sent the image concerned without any prior request having been made by or on behalf of the person, and
   (ii) did not keep it for an unreasonable time”.60

The “legitimate reason” defence is designed to protect the police and prosecutors from falling foul of these provisions when carrying out their duties. It will also likely cover organisations such as the Internet Watch Foundation which acts as a portal for the reporting of obscene material. While it will be a matter of fact for the magistrate or jury to determine whether there is a legitimate reason, the courts have generally looked sceptically upon the claims of the necessity of possession of child abuse images for “academic research”.61 The “knowing possession” defence means what it says in that there can be no conviction if the defendant did not know, nor had cause to suspect, that the images were of the proscribed nature.62 In relation to the unsolicited defence, the question of reasonableness is one for the jury or magistrate.

In addition, one new defence was added, as a last minute sop to the Bill’s objectors, covering “participation in consensual acts”.63 This defence applies where the defendant participated in the acts depicted (excluding images of bestiality) and those acts did not involve infliction of any “non-consensual harm on any person” and that if the image is of a human corpse, that it was not in fact an actual corpse.64 The relevant threshold here is that in Brown wherein it was held that an individual cannot lawfully consent to harm which constitutes actual bodily harm.65 As a result, the defence will have a relatively narrow remit. While images of so-called “rape-play” or “vampirism” will be protected, it will not apply to other common images such as those involving sexual asphyxiation, or cutting (where the cut is minor but not superficial), severe whipping or beating.

Penalties

Listening to the concerns of those who have campaigned against the measures, particularly from the sexual freedom organisations, it is possible to fear that large numbers of people will suddenly be made criminals. In practice, this seems unlikely. Proceedings for an offence may not be instituted without the consent of the DPP, as is the current position under the OPA and other similar forms of legislation. While in the case of prosecutions of child abuse images this requirement has not halted large numbers of such actions, there is a different climate surrounding such images which makes it more acceptable for public prosecution. The same cannot be said at this time over images of adult pornography. Indeed, the Government’s regulatory impact assessment suggested that the measures would cost little, largely because there would be so few prosecutions. The effect (if any) of the measures may ultimately prove to be more symbolic than real.

Nonetheless, for those who are prosecuted, the maximum prison term following conviction on indictment for possessing images which portray acts that are life-threatening acts or serious injury is three years and/or a fine. This decreases to two years in relation to images of bestiality and necrophilia and, at least initially, to six months in England and Wales in relation to all images covered by s.63 of the CJIA upon conviction by a magistrate. Sentencing guidelines will be published in due course which we hope will mirror the sentencing regime in relation to child abuse images and differentiate between the possession of images of real acts of violence and those which are staged.

Justifying action: cultural harm, direct harm and disgust

The Government lacked clarity in its attempts to justify its actions. Three different, and somewhat contradictory, arguments were offered by the Government during the legislative process: the cultural context of sexual violence, arguments of direct harm, and those grounded in disgust. We suggest that as the Government came under pressure, it lost sight of the nature of the harm it was seeking to legislate against and reverted to the weakest possible justification for action, disgust. This has important effects not just in how the legislation is received, but also led to the last-minute introduction of problematic clauses and will affect enforcement and interpretation.

When first introducing the proposals to criminalise the possession of extreme pornography in 2005, the Government appeared keen to emphasise that extreme pornography may contribute to a cultural context in which violent sexual activity is encouraged or legitimated, what we would call a form of “cultural harm”. Thus, at this stage, it was not making a claim that there was a direct link between viewing extreme pornography and committing acts of sexual violence. Indeed, it was upfront... in noting that no "definite conclusions" could be reached as to the "likely long term impact of such material on individuals generally".\(^{71}\) Rather its argument was that extreme pornography "may encourage" an interest in "violent or aberrant sexual activity"\(^{72}\) and, in so doing, contribute to a climate in which sexual violence is not taken seriously. This was closely aligned with other justifications offered at the time including a concern over images of "the torture of (mostly female) victims who are tied to some kind of apparatus or restrained in some other ways and stabbed with knives, hooks and other implements" presented in a "sexually explicit context"\(^{73}\) as well as "material containing sexualized images of women hanging by their necks from meat hooks, some with plastic bags over their heads".\(^{74}\) Further, the Government was also keen to "protect those who participate in the creation of sexual material containing violence, cruelty or degradation, who may be the victim of crime in the making of the material whether or not they notionally or genuinely consent to take part".\(^{75}\)

This is the basis on which we would justify taking action in this field. It is a concept of harm which moves beyond arguments of immediate cause and effect and develops Martha Nussbaum's declaration that much pornography "directly conflicts with the ideas of equal worth and equal protection that are basic to a liberal social order".\(^{76}\) It also considers again the classic liberal idea of harm taken from John Stuart Mill's work, deploying instead his Subjection of Women, which David Dyzenhaus argues shows us that "Mill would have been surprisingly sympathetic to the procensorship feminist case".\(^{77}\) These arguments reflect on the harm which extreme pornography may cause indirectly, as suggested by the 1986 US Attorney General's commission which concluded that,

"... substantial exposure to sexually violent material leads to a greater acceptance of 'rape myth' in its broader sense—that women enjoy being coerced into sexual activity, that they enjoy being physically hurt in a sexual context, and that as a result a man who forces himself on a woman sexually is in fact merely acceding to the 'real' wishes of the woman, regardless of the extent to which she seems to be resisting".\(^{78}\)

They continued that, accordingly, they had "little trouble concluding that this attitude is both pervasive and profoundly harmful, and that any stimulus reinforcing or increasing the incidence of this attitude is for that reason alone properly designated as harmful".\(^{79}\) Cass Sunstein describes this type of harm as harms to society through social conditioning which foster discrimination and other unlawful activities. It is these types of harm which the extreme pornography provisions should be seeking to reduce.

However, in the face of sustained criticisms of its proposals by arch-liberals demanding evidence of physical harm and direct, causal links, the Government retreated from the argument about cultural harm to one of direct harm. Just prior to the Bill being published in the summer of 2007, the Government published The Evidence of Harm to Adults Relating to Exposure to Extreme Pornographic Material: a Rapid Evidence Assessment (REA), which investigated the possible causal connection between viewing extreme pornography and committing acts of sexual violence. This research found “evidence of some harmful effects from extreme pornography on some who access it” including “increased risk of developing pro-rape attitudes, beliefs and behaviours and committing sexual offences” which were more significant for “men predisposed to aggression, or [who] have a history of sexual or other aggression”. The REA, and the material on which it is based its conclusions, has been subject to much academic debate. Indeed, the whole premise of there ever being a research method that could reveal “direct” links is disputed by those both for and against the regulation of pornography. Nonetheless, the Government did utilise this research on a few occasions to justify its proposals. To us, what this reveals is the Government’s lack of belief in its purpose which should be about changing the cultural and social environment in which sexual violence is marginalised, in which rape conviction rates are at an all time low and in which pornography is becoming (if possible) even more ubiquitous. The Government was succumbing to the arguments of arch-liberals that the only form of harm to justify criminal action is that which, to use Vanessa Munro’s phraseology, is concerned with “specifying a particular injury, typically inflicted upon the body, which can be identified independently of both the context in which it takes place and the understanding of the experience from the point of view of the people involved”. Further, arguments about privacy and free speech can equally be met with arguments about the freedom of expression of women which may be circumscribed in a society which condones extreme pornography and in which their privacy is invaded by unwanted sexual violence or objectification.

Ultimately however the Government fell back on the easy tradition of the conservative-moralistic and disgust-based arguments which consume the OPA. This was nascent in the 2005 consultation, with references to “aberrant” sexuality, but was arguably not a primary plank of the Government’s justifications.

Regrettably, however, it came to the fore as the legislative process wore on.87 When introducing the Bill, Secretary of State for Justice Jack Straw referred to the “vile material” which the measures were seeking to address.88 Others speaking in support of the measures referred to “obscene and disturbing material” 89 “nasty, horrible and unpleasant stuff”,90 and to material that “most people find abhorrent”.91 The Government appealed to exactly those sentiments underpinning the OPA and eschewed any vaguely “feminist” idea that regulating pornography was part of a programme to achieve equality for women.

Conclusion

Catharine MacKinnon has remarked that in the US porn debates, “discussion has increasingly regressed to its old right/left, morality/freedom rut, making sexual violence against women once again irrelevant and invisible”.92 This is precisely what happened during the parliamentary debates over extreme pornography in the United Kingdom. This was, at least in part, due to a failure of the Government to specify exactly where the harm lies in extreme pornography and, as a result, parliamentary debate became mired in assumed Millean ideas of harm and paternalistic standards of morality.93 Aside from a few references by the Government to the REA, debate in Parliament failed to consider the broader arguments of harm, extreme pornography and sexual violence and to specify exactly where the harm lies in extreme pornography. As a result, the CJIA provisions on extreme pornography are both over- and under-inclusive. In allowing for a retreat to the moralistic and disgust-based justifications of the OPA, they include much within their scope which—though perhaps distasteful to many—is not harmful (and not even unlawful to perform), while, at the same time, failing to recognise and address material which contributes to cultural harms in our society which contribute to the prevalence and maintenance of sexual violence.

The final Act is therefore a lost opportunity to have taken bolder steps towards proscribing extreme pornography which has at its core a concern with the valorisation and legitimisation of cultural harms, particularly to women. It is a lost opportunity to make a break from the moralistic and paternalistic concerns of the OPA, though the measures should have included a public good defence along the lines of that in the obscenity legislation. It also represents a lost opportunity to reflect on the regulatory regime for pornography more generally. There is now, more than ever, an urgent need to review all legislation and practice regarding pornography.

and child abuse images, both in terms of the ever-advancing technology and the ubiquity of the images. The fact that the Government specifically wishes to retain the OPA, largely due to its “flexibility”, and has indeed strengthened it by means of these measures, demonstrates a profound lack of understanding about pornography, its harms and the need for clarity in the criminal law.
Introduction

This evidence is focused on the provisions of the Bill which relate to sentencing and does not relate to other provisions relating to licensing or other matters of criminal justice procedure.

I support the introduction of a Scottish Sentencing Council and the development of sentencing guidelines. The Council provides an institutional space for judges to work with others to develop sentencing policy. Crime and punishment have become such sensitive political issues that many jurisdictions have found it helpful to develop an institution which provides an opportunity to develop a more rational, evidence based approach to policy making which can be pursued away from the media glare of the world of electoral politics. Guidelines will provide a clear and transparent structure within which judges can exercise their discretion at the level of the individual case. This will help the public to understand sentencing decisions and, over time, lead to enhanced public confidence in the courts.

The following comments refer to paragraphs in the Bill.

Part I Sentencing

   (1) Paragraphs (a) to (e) list the traditional purposes of sentencing, retribution, deterrence, rehabilitation, protection of the public and reparation. There is no explicit mention of restorative justice although it could be argued that this is a reparative approach.

The central aim of a principled approach to sentencing should be to help judges to achieve an appropriate balance between attending to the facts and circumstances of the individual case and seeking a consistent approach to sentencing. It should also assist judges in balancing the sometimes contradictory purposes of sentencing.

To this end I would propose a revised approach to the articulation of the principles of sentencing. This approach ensures that the principle of fairness takes priority over other purposes of sentencing. Why should fairness take priority? Arguably, fairness is one thing that a systematic approach to sentencing can deliver and fairness is valued highly by the public. It is not so easy to make this claim about other purposes. The research evidence should cause us to be sceptical about the capacity of sentencing to deliver deterrence, rehabilitation or any other of the more substantive purposes. There is nothing wrong with trying to achieve these worthy aims, but because we cannot guarantee the delivery of any of them with an acceptable degree of certainty, we should ensure that at least our sentencing system is fair and consistent. Within the broad boundaries set by fairness, judges should be able to exercise their discretion to pursue what they judge to be appropriate purposes in individual cases, supported by information and advice from relevant experts. This approach is known in the technical literature as “limiting retributivism” and is generally attributed to Professor Norval Morris.

The approach to sentencing proposed in the McLeish Report (para 3.31) is a contemporary articulation of Morris’s ideas. The appropriate level of penalty should be set by reference to the seriousness of the offence (culpability of the offender and the harm caused to the victim). This will normally be set by a comprehensive set of sentencing guidelines. This answers the question “How much payback?” Within this broad level of penalty, a judge takes into account all of the facts and circumstances of the offence and the offender to decide the precise amount of penalty and the appropriate form of punishment. This answers the question, “What kind of payback?”.

This provides an overarching structure based on seriousness (as provided in England and Wales by the Overarching Principles of Seriousness guideline issued by the Sentencing Guidelines Council) which ensures a consistent approach to sentencing which will deliver consistency and fairness. Judges can make decisions about the appropriate nature of punishment to achieve particular penal purposes based on their judgement about the facts and circumstances of the case at hand. Of course the current Bill would allow the proposed Scottish Sentencing Council to produce such a guideline. My interpretation of section 2(2) of this Bill is that such a guideline would take precedence over section 1.

5. Sentencing Guidelines

The assumption underpinning the Bill is that guidelines will be produced incrementally. In my view there are significant advantages in establishing an initial comprehensive set of guidelines. This is not ruled out by the Bill. The SSC could in principle make a bid for resources to allow it to produce such a set of guidelines.

A comprehensive set of guidelines allows for proportionality across the full range of crimes and offences to be established. Thus for example, the relative severity of crimes against the person can be set with reference to crimes against property and regulatory offences.

A comprehensive set of guidelines sends a clear and transparent message to the public about the importance of consistency and fairness across the full range of crimes and offences. It would take many years for an incremental approach to guidelines to cover the full range and the intervening period would offer the media a clear opportunity to highlight apparently anomalous sentencing practices.
A comprehensive set of guidelines will allow the Sentencing Council to make reasonably accurate predictions about the use of penal resources. Guidelines can be adjusted, as they are in a number of US jurisdictions, to maximise the efficient use of penal resources.

It will be difficult to monitor compliance to guidelines produced incrementally. There is no data available on compliance with guidelines produced by the Sentencing Guidelines Council in England and Wales. We simply do not know whether the production of guidelines has had an impact on consistency in sentencing. If information on compliance rates is not available, it is difficult to see how guidelines can help to improve public confidence in sentencing,

5(5)

I support the requirement for the SSC to address the impact of its guidelines on penal resources. However, the SSC will require significant administrative support to enable it to address the potential impact of guidelines on prison and community sentence populations. This will require baseline data on existing sentencing patterns and estimates of future patterns based on guidelines. It is by no means clear whether existing data sets will be able to provide the necessary information. A recent pilot project in England and Wales showed that the desired sentencing information was not reliably available. A similar caveat applies to the possibility of monitoring judicial adherence to or departure from guidelines (see 10 below).

7. Effect of Sentencing Guidelines

(2) This paragraph allows judges to depart from the guideline sentence. Judges are required to state their reasons for departure, but no guidance is given in the Bill as to the nature of these permissible reasons. What kinds of reasons are judges likely to give? The obvious sources of information to address this question would come from the reports written by judges when a judgement is subject to appeal and the decisions of the Appeal Court itself. At the risk of caricature, a typical report or Appeal Court judgement will narrate all of the facts and circumstances of the case and conclude that under these circumstances the sentence of the court was either acceptable or not. Eminent legal scholars have noted that it has not been possible to develop a jurisprudence of sentencing in Scotland from the decisions of the Appeal Court. It would therefore be open to the judiciary to give a similar reason for departure from a guideline, namely that the guideline sentence range was not appropriate for the full facts and circumstances of the individual case. This would not necessarily help either the public, nor other judges, to understand what particular factors distinguished the case from the general guideline case and would not necessarily help to develop a jurisprudence of sentencing based on the guidelines. There is of course no reason why judges could not provide the sorts of explanation which would allow a jurisprudence of sentencing to develop and which would at the same time enhance the capacity of the SSC to develop useful guidelines.

One might look to England and Wales to examine the impact of guidelines on sentencing practices. Unfortunately, there is no data available on the extent to which judges follow guidelines nor on what reasons they give when they decide to depart from the guideline range. This data is simply not routinely collected. One would hope that the SSC require SCS to collect data on adherence to and departure from guidelines issued by the SSC (see section 10).

8. This section ensures that the SSC is politically independent from the Scottish Ministers. This independence is vital to provide necessary distance between politicians and sentencing policy.

9. This section describes the relationship between the SSC and Court of Appeal. The SSC must review a guideline when asked to do so by the Court of Appeal when that court decides not to follow a guideline or decides that the guideline does not deal adequately with an issue raised by the appeal. It is not clear whether “must review” means “must change” the guideline, or simply “must have regard to” the reasoning of the court [(9) (5) ]. Is the Court of Appeal or the SSC the final authority in sentencing?

10. The Bill states that SCS must provide the Council with such information relating to the sentences imposed by courts as the Council might reasonably require for the purposes of its functions. Not in the Bill, but in the accompanying Policy Memorandum (para 31), this information is defined as “compliance with and departure from sentencing guidelines”.

A key policy objective for the Government is to improve public confidence in the courts by providing “a straightforward and transparent framework within which sentencers can base their decision in individual cases”. (Policy memorandum para 8). In my view, public confidence is unlikely to be enhanced if the government is not able to provide information on the extent to which judges are adhering to and departing from the guidelines. Why have guidelines if we do not know whether they are being observed?

In my view it is important that the SSC have the power to collect data on compliance (through SCS). This will not necessarily be straightforward given the way in which data is currently collected. There will have to be changes to the way in which data is recorded and collected and there will be significant resource implications. The experience of the Sentencing Information System project in Scotland and the recent pilot study of sentencing data collection in England and Wales http://www.sentencing-guidelines.gov.uk/docs/pilot_report_update.pdf provide important lessons here.
227A Community Payback Orders

There is merit in the idea of replacing a wide range of community sanctions with a single community payback sanction (although DTTOs and RLOs remain separate). This arguably makes the sanction clearer to the public and reinforces the message that community sentences all involve punishment in the form of some sort of payback to the community. One disadvantage is the threat to proportionality posed by the potential to “pile up” conditions. The principle of proportionality states that punishment should be proportionate to the seriousness of the offence. As noted above, many would argue that proportionality should set upper limits for punishment beyond which additional constraints should not be introduced to satisfy other penal aims such as rehabilitation. (An exception is habitually accepted for public protection from serious violence or sexual offending). The community payback sanction carries the risk that sentencers will be tempted to combine a number of conditions in the hope of addressing multiple penal purposes (though without evidence as to the likelihood of any of these being successfully achieved). This is a difficult issue which should be subject to an early piece of work by the SSC.

The other issue which derives from the “piling up of conditions” is the significantly increased likelihood of breach. The more conditions which have to be observed by an offender, the greater the chance that one will be breached. This will be a serious issue for the courts when reviewing the progress of court orders. There is a significant risk that the prison population will increase as a result of offenders being given a custodial sentence for failing to observe one or more of the conditions of their community payback order.

Section 17

Judges are already required to use custody only when no other non-custodial option would be appropriate. If judges are not permitted to use sentences of six months or less, there will be a temptation for judges to use a sentence of seven months or more. They will do so because they take the view that only a custodial sentence is appropriate. This will produce the unintended consequence of a rise in the overall prison population. Where this happens, it is unclear what impact this might have on public perceptions of the effectiveness of criminal justice and the courts.

A more appropriate way of reducing the use of short sentences would be to ask the SSC to develop a comprehensive inaugural set of guidelines which paid particular attention to defining the custody threshold in a way which reduced the overall use of short sentences of imprisonment.

Professor Neil Hutton
Centre for Sentencing Research, University of Strathclyde
I have serious concerns regarding the release of evidence proposed by Kenny MacAskill and Crown Office in criminal cases.

I would propose Crown Office not be allowed to Cherry Pick what it releases and that an FOI Officer like England has should be put in place to decide what Is Exculpatory.

Who should be gatekeeper of all the evidence?

What Crown Office decides is not Exculpatory the Defence might see otherwise so how do we even the playing field?

Simple: Disclose all material gathered by Police, Defence and Crown Office.

Make all the material available to the “Defendant” (Not the Defence Team) which is regularly not done in this country (Scotland) Speaking through experience, it was only after I was wrongly convicted did I see all the material my Solicitor held in connection with my case. This is totally unacceptable in today’s society of openness and accountability. To ensure a fair hearing surely all evidence produced must be made available to the Accused.

How can it presently be said with confidence that every accused has seen all the evidence produced.

There are people in our prisons at present who cannot read or write.

What safeguards does the Parliament propose to protect such people? Surely every Lawyer does not read out every statement to people in these situations, yet they have the right to know all the evidence against them to afford equality of arms.

I have never known a Lawyer yet to read or even show the accused every statement against them.

I would also propose that section 194 have additional amendments to include that when SCCRC review a case: If competent arguable grounds exist, SCCRC must refer such case.

At the moment and clarified in Razza, SCCRC can refuse to refer a case even if Prima-Facie Competent and Arguable grounds exist.

I am sure Parliament when they legislated under section 194 which created SCCRC, they never intended such abuse.
If competent and arguable grounds exist or are apparent in any case lodged with the sift panel at the High Court then the Court are duty bound to allow such case to proceed, Why should SCCRC be any different?

It is suggesting that even when no grounds exist SCCRC can refer such case which is preposterous as any case reaching the High Court without Competent and Arguable grounds must surely be rejected.

I would also propose that section 194 incorporates a new “body” to investigate complaints levelled against any member of SCCRC for Misconduct, Malpractice and Dereliction of Duty.

Presently even our Justice Minister refuses to look at such complaints.

This safeguard should be set in motion to enhance Public Confidence in this body (SCCRC) to function properly, How can we have a public funded body with no-one to complain about their conduct?

I would also propose that Like England our Criminal Justice Bill incorporates a practice of allowing Accused people access to a Solicitor while being Interviewed by Police.

To refuse such, Like England has, is a Breach and Abuse of Human rights and section 6 to a fair hearing.

Why should we be different from the rest of the UK.

At present this is only afforded to People south of the border in the UK, so I would propose this be changed to bring Scotland up to date with human rights regarding fair hearings.

I would also suggest that the proposed Law Change regarding abuse of disclosed material is a breach of our right to Freedom Of Speech and should not be allowed.

I object strongly to this proposed change of law as Oppressive.

I would also ask the Justice Secretary to confirm exactly what he would consider a breech of such?

And why he feels it necessary to Propose Jailing some of these cases for up to 2 years. Surely a fine would be sufficient?

In light of recent Publicity here:

Will the Justice Secretary rush Emergency Legislation to stop this human rights breach?

People must be allowed access to Solicitors while being questioned by Police.

SCCRC hold their meetings in private and do not inform any Appellants who has made the decisions in their cases (Though it is widely accepted that Gerard Sinclair sits on every case) This is not compatible with section 6 and the right to a Fair, Independent and Impartial review.

At present and this has been said many times to me by people who have had cases rejected by SCCRC, No-One represents the interests of the Appellants.

Their legal officers are always at pains to point out they do not represent the Appellants so at present when a case comes before SCCRC board the appellants rights are not protected.

No One is allowed to be present to protect the interests of Appellants which in itself is Oppressive.

At the very least I would suggest to protect these rights A Solicitor be allowed to sit and protect his clients interests at any future board meetings of SCCRC.

All such meetings should be suspended at SCCRC till such safeguards are in place as to protect the interests of Appellants.

Talking from my own experiences with SCCRC:

I have no way of knowing who made the decision not to refer my case.

I Have no way of knowing if the Legal Officer presented my case in full to the board when they debated my case.

This is also not compatible with section 92 (1) of the criminal procedure (Scotland) act 1995 in that part of the trials are taking place outwith the presence of the Accused and they know not what is being discussed. (Andrew Page Drummond V HMA)

If the Legal Officers are not representing Appellants then their rights are not being properly protected, this culture must change to bring SCCRC into line with the courts who are not permitted to act in such a fashion.

It is imperative that Appellants feel comfortable that their full grounds will be debated, at present I have no confidence my case was properly debated because they ignored some of my issues completely which our High Court sift panel would have been duty bound to accept.

If the Appellants have no confidence how do we expect the public to have confidence?
I hope my concerns are placed before the board when they next sit to discuss the proposed changes.
Justice Committee

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from the Scottish Beer and Pub Association

The Scottish Beer and Pub Association (SBPA) was originally formed in 1906. Our members are Scotland’s brewing and large pub companies representing the licensed trade industry in Scotland. The main aim of the Association is to contribute to the economic and social well being of Scotland through employment, investment and training. Our members operate 1,500 of the 5,200 licensed public houses in Scotland.

The SBPA has been closely involved with the process of licensing reform and the policy aspects of tackling alcohol misuse in Scotland and served on the Nicholson Committee, which was established in May 2001. SBPA served on the Expert Reference Group (ERG), which was created by the Scottish Executive to advise it on the procedural aspects of the licensing reform and on the National Training Forum. SBPA has welcomed the opportunity to play an active and constructive role in the Scottish Government’s consultations on licensing reform and continued that involvement through the Scottish Parliament’s deliberations on the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005, “the 2005 Act.”

The SBPA is a member of the Scottish Government’s Alcohol Industry Partnership.

The Association has considered the content of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill and would submit the following comments. We are content for our views to be made public.

Section 128 - Applications for licences

Whilst we have no objection to applicants’ personal information and addresses, etc, being provided to Boards, police, and other statutory bodies this information must not be available in the public domain. This has already caused difficulties during transition.

Section 131 - Premises licence applications: modification of layout plans

We are opposed to this proposed amendment other than in the limited circumstances of doing so with the agreement of the applicant to tidy up anomalies and such like as arose during licensing transition. Under the 2005 Act Licensing Boards have the power to amend the detailed Operating Plans for licensed premises. This clause would also give Boards the power to amend the Layout Plan for a premises, and therefore effectively the physical layout of the premises. We do not believe this is proportionate and we are concerned the clause could lead if passed to Licensing Boards effectively having the power to “micro manage” the actual operation of a licensed premises, with significant likely cost and other implications such as planning, listed building consent and building warrant requirements.

We note the Scottish Government’s expressed view that this would not be the case, nor is it their intention, but we cannot unfortunately concur with the view of Government on this issue given the experience of our members during the process of licensing transition. We would highlight that every Licensing Board has the powers to reject an application for a range of reasons if it feels the application relating to a premises is unacceptable, as such we would question what positive benefit the change proposed in this clause would actually bring.

Section 132 - Premises licence applications: antisocial behaviour reports

We would support this proposed change. Indeed we would comment at the time that the 2005 Act was being considered by the Scottish Parliament in 2005 we commented that the proposed obligatory “anti-social behaviour reports” for all licensed premises were unnecessarily onerous. This has now been recognised by the Scottish Government, although we would still appreciate clarification as to the extent of the “vicinity” intended by the clause.

Section 134 - Occasional licences

We would support this change, which seeks to resolve a problem with the 2005 Act, which we commented on in 2005, and request that consideration be given to extending this process to occasional extensions also.

Section 136 - Personal licences

We would question whether some of the provisions in this clause are required. We would comment specifically on the following sub-section within the clause:

(b) in subsection (3)—
   (i) the word “and” immediately following paragraph (b) is repealed, and
   (ii) after paragraph (b) insert—
     “(ba) the applicant does not already hold a personal licence, and”

We note the intention of creating a situation where an applicant can only hold one Personal Licence under the terms of the 2005 Act. We are not sure why anyone would wish to hold more than one Personal Licence, especially in light of the Scottish Government’s intention of creating a National Database of Personal Licence Holders where it would be readily evident where there was duplication. We note the Scottish Government’s suggestion that someone would be able to avoid sanctions on one Personal Licence by having more than one Licence, however we do not believe that this would be very likely given the vigilance of Boards and a National Database. We would therefore question the relevance of this provision and whether it is needed.
Section 137 - Emergency closure orders

We welcome the clarification as to the rank of officer who can sanction these Orders.

Section 138 - False statements in applications: offence

We would appreciate some clarification during the course of the Justice Committee’s consideration of this clause as to what is meant by “knowingly.” We would highlight that it is possible that an applicant may make a statement in good faith in an application which is later proved to be incorrect, although the declaration was “knowingly” made at the time. We would hope that honest oversights or mistakes would not be caught by this provision and assurances to this effect would be welcome.

Section 139 – Further modifications of 2005 Act

We note the apparent intention of the Scottish Government to reintroduce the so-called “fit and proper” person test, which exists under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976 “the 1976 Act” using the detail of this clause. We would highlight that the implications of this clause if passed, although not on the face of the legislation, are very wide ranging and that these are subsequently developed over four pages in Schedule 4 of the Bill.

We would question whether some of the provisions in this clause are required, given the powers, which the police already have under the 2005 Act. By 1st September 2009 all Personal Licence Holders (PLHs) and holders of Premises Licences under the terms of the 2005 Act will have had to have been licensed and the police will have been fully involved and consulted during this process. Indeed they will have carried out criminal records checks on applicants. This seems to allow for the duplication of a process, which has already been undertaken.

Our primary concern is that the current provisions of the 2005 Act, which allow the police to make representations solely on the basis of the “preventing crime and disorder” objective, are to be extended to “any” of the five licensing objectives within the legislation.

Whilst our members have become accustomed to the novelty of senior police officers commenting during licensing transition at hearings by Licensing Boards on the lack of baby changing facilities within specific licensed premises or on other matters arguably within the competence of local councils, we must question the competence of the Police to comment on a very wide range other matters using other of the licensing objectives:

- preventing crime and disorder,
- securing public safety,
- preventing public nuisance,
- protecting and improving public health, and
- protecting children from harm.
We would suggest that allowing the police to comment on applications solely on the basis of the objective of “preventing crime and disorder” is entirely appropriate, adequate and proportionate. Extending this to all of the other licensing objectives risks the police acquiring the status of the catch all objector of last resort. We do not believe this would be appropriate nor reasonable and it could lead to the police commenting on matters which are more appropriately dealt with by other agencies with more relevant, or indeed the only, expertise. We would suggest that this could only weaken the status of the police in the process and indeed the credibility of their objections on legitimate criminal matters.

Section 143 - Orders and regulations

We note that the terms of this section are extremely wide and we have a concern that subsequent changes could be made to the Act and/or regulations made there under without proper and full public debate – simply by a resolution of Parliament.

Conclusion

Our Association welcomes the opportunity to comment on the proposals in the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. We would however note that major pieces of the legislation, Sections 129 and Sections 140 of the draft Bill, have effectively been withdrawn by the Scottish Government and will appear in a new Health Bill that will be considered by the Parliament’s Health Committee. We will of course comment on the detail of these in due course. However, we would suggest that the Justice Committee may wish to consider further changes, which it could make to the detail of the operation of the 2005 Act that have not yet been suggested by the Scottish Government in proposing the Bill.

There are a number of areas where we feel that the 2005 Act is deficient, indeed we highlighted a number of these at the time and since, and where we feel the Justice Committee could by tabling its own amendments to the Bill actually improve the operation of Scotland’s licensing regime going forward. There are a number of possible proposals for further change and are more than willing to supply further information if the Committee feels it would be appropriate to act. We would highlight some issues for initial consideration.

Under the current provisions of the 1976 Act, applications to Licensing Boards normally had to be made not less than 5 weeks before a Board sitting and on most occasions a decision was taken at that meeting. For new applications this was additional time on top of the planning process that was, and remains, a prerequisite to a licensing application.

Under the 2005 Act, there is a target of six months for a Licensing Board to reach a decision on an application, so in effect a timescale of up to six weeks has become six months, and much worse from our perspective, even if a Board goes beyond this target there is no sanction on the Board from having failed to reach this decision and no deemed grant such as is provided for in the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 on other matters.

We would suggest in the interests of fairness and certainty for applicants, that there needs to be some form of similar deemed grant in the 2005 Act where Boards have been unable, or perhaps unwilling, to reach a decision. At the very least there need to be further safeguards to ensure Boards are actually required to reach a decision on an application within a reasonable timescale. This would help ensure more effective administration by Boards.

This is not an academic point. It has become evident during the current process of licensing transition that where Boards have six months to reach a decision many of them will take this time, and that some have been willing to “continue” applications beyond this target processing time using other administrative methods. The issue we would suggest needs to be addressed.

Another concern to our members is the time consuming, complex and very expensive procedures for obtaining a new provisional premises licence. There is no comparable application in the 2005 Act to the Section 26(2) provisional site only application in the 1976 Act. This means that once planning is secured, even just outline planning, detailed layout and operating plans require to be prepared to lodge for licensing. This is major and expensive task and may have to be done without the detailed knowledge of the final layout required or of the actual operators specific requirements. Once granted there is the ability to apply for a major variation but that is process akin to a new licence application and may easily take another three to six months in addition to the time already spent in applying for planning and licensing.

Likewise it is normally the case that during construction or conversion of premises, even small ones, that changes require to be made and whilst under the 1976 Act this could normally be dealt with at finality, under the 2005 Act these will again require a major variation with all the time cost and risk involved.

This is bad for our industry and indeed for the Scottish economy as it is a major disincentive to either invest in new projects or to improve existing facilities.

Further only having a two-year window (Section 45) from the provisional grant of licence to confirmation is completely unrealistic for any major development. Where it may take four to five years from planning to opening. It is our view that once the implications of Section 45 are understood, in particular by those providing funds for developments, that we will find that neither the trade nor their funders will reasonably be able to take the risk of not securing an extension of time to complete a development.

A practical and close to home example of the problems would have been the Parliament building which is licensed. If this were happening now and the funding for the project had been dependent on the liquor licence. The Government would first to have secured planning consent, then have the detailed drawings for the layout plan prepared in accordance with the regulations (a costly and time consuming exercise and next to impossible as the final design of the building had not been confirmed), have a detailed operating plan drafted and have these approved by the Licensing Board all before building works began - another three to six months.

As the building grew there were constant changes to the layout and design. These would have required one or more major variation applications another three to six months for each. Unless the Licensing Board agreed to an extension of the two-year period from the date of grant the licence would have been revoked.

The Holyrood project started in July 1997 and opened in around August 2004 and whilst large and complex it rather underlines the problems our industry faces in adhering to a two-year cut off and some of the lack of practicalities of the new licensing regime.

There are a number of similar issues where the Justice Committee could facilitate further sensible changes such as some standardisation of application forms and improving procedures and we would be willing to comment further on these. If the Committee requires further information then please do not hesitate to contact me.

A personal view challenging the competence of section 34

While there is no doubt that many people regard pornography as distasteful and even morally wrong, it is generally recognised that this is nothing more than subjective opinion. Legislation on the other hand must be objective and evidence based. When the government proposed to criminalise the possession of extreme pornography it gave its reasons or objectives for doing so. Principal among those, and that most often stated by the Justice Secretary is that the new laws are necessary to "protect society". As far as I'm aware there has been no explanation as to the way society is suffering or likely to suffer from "extreme" pornography being available. However the implication is that "extreme" pornography is somehow regarded as a danger or risk factor and the legislation is to be justified primarily on those grounds.

So, is there any evidence on the dangers of "extreme" pornography? Well, there has indeed been research on a variety of sexually violent material but certainly not on the full range of "extreme" images which have been selected for proscription. The general thrust of much of the research on pornography, violent or otherwise, is the attempt to link pornography with sexual offending. So essentially the evidence against extreme porn is the same as the evidence against pornography in general. Either attempts are made to correlate sexual offending with porn use, in which case, even if a correlation is found, there remains a question over cause and effect; or behavioural studies are carried out in a controlled laboratory environment. These often result in claims that negative attitudes to women or increased aggression can be measured in some individuals immediately after viewing pornography, and the suggestion is that these changes may make an individual more likely to sexually offend. Unfortunately these studies lack the depth which human behavioural research demands and the overall results remain inconclusive.

"A direct link between exposure to sexually violent media material and sexually aggressive behaviour has not been proven, and is unlikely to be proven in the near future given the nature of the problem and the research methodology available. A vast array of methodological problems are evident in the literature. These problems include the questionable applicability of the laboratory studies to the real world, the use of unrepresentative subjects (usually university students), material presented to subjects out of context and the use of laboratory measures of aggression not equivalent to sexual assault."

Australian Institute of Criminology, Trends and Issues No.9
It has to be said that many researchers do find the tentative links between pornography and sexual offending compelling evidence that there exists a potential risk from pornography use. However there is also the very significant problem that many of these studies are motivated by an anti-porn agenda; they are conducted not by the dispassionate sex researcher or psychologist, but by feminist academics ideologically opposed to pornography, and investigator bias is one of the most significant factors in reducing the reliability of any research.

Regretably politicians have a habit of developing a policy and then looking for evidence to support it, being comfortable to not only use poor quality and impartial evidence, but also to specifically commission it with the aim of justifying their own viewpoint. The Rapid Evidence Assessment on the effects of viewing extreme pornography, commissioned by the UK government, is a perfect example of this. It was commissioned after the extreme porn legislation was conceived and in response to demands for the government to justify its plans. So the government simply selected researchers with known anti-porn views and asked them to provide the evidence the government needed. The result was never in doubt, the evidence selected for assessment was almost exclusively suggestive of porn being dangerous to view, and evidence to the contrary was either absent or included simply to be criticised. This approach makes a nonsense of the concept of evidence based legislation.

Regardless of laboratory results, theories exist in order to make predictions. The theory presented is that pornography creates negative changes in attitude towards women, and that this will lead to more sexual crime. If there was any time that pornography was going to have an observable impact on sexual crime it would have been over the last decade, due simply to the internet allowing easy and cheap access to pornography. In other words the internet provided us with a natural experiment on a vast scale. The evidence from crime statistics matched with internet uptake in the USA, conducted by Todd Kendall 2006 does does not support the theory that pornography leads to sexual offending.

"The evidence that we have now ten years later, the most recent study of the correlation, for example, between crime and Internet adoption across the 50 US states, is interesting. It shows that, by and large, the Internet has a positive effect or a beneficial effect in that it reduces some crimes, crimes of sexual violence and crimes of prostitution, which are assumed to be linked with the increasing availability of pornography to young males."

Oral evidence taken by Home Affairs Committee 12/6/07, Part answer to Q192 on the effect of the internet http://www.publications.parliament.uk/pa/cm200607/cmselect/cmhaff/uc508-iii/uc50802.htm

So the use of pornography as a risk factor is certainly unproven and even if it is a risk factor it may not be a significant one. It's therefore irrational to credit it with dangers which require punitive treatment for its users. Compare it for example with alcohol. Both may be used safely, but alcohol has proven links to serious health problems, anti-social behaviour, child neglect, domestic violence, sexual violence and truly horrendous levels of inter-male violence. The government's response is to suggest a few pennies onto the price of a pint but demand the porn user be imprisoned for years.

That is a staggeringly inconsistent and unjust philosophy. The government, fearful of unproven dangers, may argue that it is only extreme pornography being targeted but there's really no more evidence against extreme porn than there is against normal porn or indeed non-pornographic violence. Without further evidence there is no justification for picking out certain images, labelling them "extreme" and legislating against the possession of those alone. These "extreme" images naturally appeal to certain fetish groups or sexual minorities. The government should not apply evidence selectively and exclusively to target those groups.

It's an unfortunate fact that it's almost impossible to understand another person's sexual tastes if they differ markedly from your own. That lack of understanding finds expression as a distaste for those individuals. So, even today we still have significant homophobia: because homosexuality is harmful to those involved, because it doesn't belong in a decent society, because it's perverse, because it's ungodly, because it's a danger to vulnerable people. Always the same deluded reasoning founded entirely on a lack of empathy for people whose sexuality is different from the norm. It is sad to see our politicians fail so completely to rise above that pattern of thought. The message of an inclusive society appears to be abandoned for those whose sexuality is a bit weird.

Despite its proposals the government insists that it is not targeting peoples sexuality:

"The proposed offence is not about individual sexual practices, it is about tackling the possession and circulation of extreme pornographic material which is a separate matter."

Sexual Offences Law Team, Criminal Justice Directorate

The reality is that a person's sexuality and their use of pornography are intrinsically linked, particularly so for sexual minorities who may find compatible partners somewhat thin on the ground. The suggestion that possession of an image of an act is immoral but the act itself need not be, is also nonsensical. The Justice Secretary Kenny MacAskill was perfectly clear when he said the purpose of the offence was to send a message that both the pornographic images and "the people who look at them have no place in a civilised society". Even the government's consultation document demonstrated this ostracise and shame mindset; it not only rued the fact that the internet allowed fetish groups to access their "extreme" pornography without the risk of public humiliation but stated that two of the aims of the legislation were to discourage abnormal sexual practices and reinforce "national norms of behaviour". Individual sexual practices are clearly being targeted, and without just cause.

Some will argue that the "extreme" images in question are those of sexual acts which are illegal, and therefore they should not be tolerated on that basis. But the problem with that argument is the clear case of double standards; after all, non-sexual criminal acts, however realistic or horrific, can be portrayed and viewed as legitimate entertainment. There is a tendency among opponents of pornography to promote the idea that the pornographic image actually portrays genuine victims of rape or violence. These are claims without evidence to back them up. Of course there remains the possibility that such things may occur, just as there remains the possibility that "snuff" movies may one day cease to be urban myth and become reality. There may well be a good enough argument to say legislation is necessary to prepare for that possibility. However, what is proposed makes no distinction between what is real and what is not. It will treat the person who owns an image of a real rape no differently than one who possesses one of a staged rape. That makes no sense, in fact it is simply wrong to regard them as moral equivalents.

The Scottish Law Commission also recommended that consent should be a defence for assault in order to free sado-masochists from the threat of prosecution. It recognised that society has become more liberal in its attitudes. Yet, the government refused, supposedly because of concerns that the defence could be exploited, but it was also likely that it knew such liberalism would drastically weaken its case for legislation on pornography. Ignoring the significance of consent, when it is otherwise accorded supreme importance in matters of sexual behaviour is probably the most appalling aspect of the proposals. Reviewing the moral basis of the legislation it's difficult to avoid the impression that it's the legislators who have lost touch with reality rather than the people who use porn.

Most of the pornography covered by the legislation is either simulated or consensual, and so the same basic argument applies to it all. By all means legislate against possession of genuine non-consensual acts; nobody would have a problem with that. It would be legislation with the same rationale as that for child porn and be entirely ethical. The one exception to the consent argument is beastility porn. The notion of consent does not apply to animals in any area of human/animal interaction. And rightly or wrongly, society is comfortable with the exploitation of animals. What does concern people is needless cruelty to animals. So legislation should be based on the dispassionate assessment of whether an animal suffered during the making of a pornographic image. With these amendments the proposed legislation would be free of the problems which currently beset it. It would be legislation based on actual harm, not imaginary risk factors.
Pornography allows people with unusual sexualities to understand that there are many just like them. That rather than the dangerous perverts often portrayed in the media, that they are simply normal people with unusual sexual tastes, and are therefore part of society just like everyone else. One would have thought that positive aspect of porn would be appreciated. It must be preferable than encouraging the self perception of being a dangerous freak; negative thoughts which could become self-fulfilling, as we now know that individuals can adopt the behaviour patterns which are attributed to them by other people. Yet depressingly, this "normalisation" as it appears to be called, is regarded with horror by opponents of "extreme" pornography. For them, the perverts must never be allowed to think of themselves or their sexuality as normal.

"We've always had people with heavy-duty sexual inclinations and perversions and fantasies, but years ago they were out of the mainstream. If someone was a sexual pervert, they were ostracized from society; they were avoided; they were shunned. Now, all of a sudden, the most inadequate personality, with the most outrageous sexual predilections, can meet online and validate the invalidatable. "Oh, look, I'm not so screwed up. I met a bunch of people like me. We're perfectly normal." So the Internet proliferates the perversion and sexual homicide...."

"....So when the ACLU touts "scientific data", I talk about and reference actual events. Some folks call my evidence "anecdotal," which means some Ph.D. didn't crunch a bunch of numbers together to obtain it. The bottom line is, I have actual cases and I know what I'm talking about...."

Vernon J Geberth,  NYPD rtd, author of "Sex related Homicide and Death Investigation" interviewed by Mediawatch UK

Legislation will not change the people who use "extreme" porn and the damage to their lives is easy to predict. Being convicted, even arrested, for a sexual offence is no small thing and the discrimination they face will make their lives more dangerous, fearful and isolated. Peoples lives could easily be wrecked simply on the whim of politicians who are too lazy to rationalise the laws they create. Even if politicians are indifferent to the fate of those individuals, they have to recognise that there are few benefits to be had from this legislation. Airy dreams of changing human sexuality are unlikely to be achieved, and nor should they. A new law will at most send a message, abet a confused puritanical message, that the Scottish government doesn't like some types of sexual imagery. And for this the cost will be police, court and prison resources, an increasingly irrelevant sexual offenders register, sexual,artistic and individual freedoms, and finally Scotland's reputation for liberalism, which frankly needs all the help it can get. The benefits are nebulous, the potential costs are high.

In summary, the rationale behind the legislation on "extreme" pornography is so questionable that's it's impossible to escape the conclusion that it's basis is entirely ideological. Whether that comes from religious belief, or radical feminism or simple subjective morality, it has no place in the design of Scottish Law. Legislation should be based on solid evidence. That evidence must be reliable by being strictly objective and impartial. It should then be applied by government, again impartially, to create laws which do not unfairly impact minority sections of the community. Ignoring those principles, the government has instead chosen to legislate on the basis of weak evidence and has used it selectively to construct legislation of a discriminatory nature. It is legislation with ill-defined benefits but potentially great costs, both to society and the individual. Thus the proposed legislation fails on all points and the Justice Committee should reject these proposals from the Criminal Justice Bill.
Introduction

The Scottish Government’s Criminal Justice & Licensing (Scotland) Bill contains provisions to criminalise the possession of material that is considered to be extreme pornography. Engender supports the introduction of these provisions, and welcomes the opportunity to submit written evidence, to the Justice Committee, with specific regard to said provisions.

The proposals

Section 34 of the bill – if passed by Parliament – will make it illegal to possess extreme pornographic material. For material to fit this definition it must be all of the following:

(a) Obscene
Subsection 51A (2) provides that an extreme pornographic image must be “obscene”, “pornographic” and “extreme”. The test of “obscene” means that the material must be of such a nature that it would fall within the category of the material whose sale etc. is already prohibited under section 51 of the 1982 Act.

It is our understanding that there is no definition of obscene, although courts apply a common law test of whether the material is ‘calculated to deprave or corrupt persons open to depraving or corrupting’.

(b) Pornographic
Subsection 51A(3) defines an image as being “pornographic” if it is of such a nature that it must reasonably be assumed to have been made solely or principally for the purpose of sexual arousal.

(c) Extreme
Subsection 51A(6) provides that an image is extreme if it depicts, in an “explicit” and “realistic” way any of the following—
(a) an act which takes or threatens a person’s life,
(b) an act which results, or is likely to result, in a person’s severe injury,
(c) rape or other non-consensual penetrative sexual activity,
(d) sexual activity involving (directly or indirectly) a human corpse,
(e) an act, which involves sexual activity between a person and an animal (or the carcass of an animal).
Engender’s response to the proposals

Engender takes a clear stance on pornography and indeed views ALL pornography as violence against women because it is a systematic practice of exploitation and subordination based on sex, which differentially harms women.

In terms of being both a cause and a consequence of violence against women pornography is central in creating and maintaining sex as a basis for discrimination. The bigotry and contempt it produces with the acts of aggression it justifies, harms women’s opportunities for equality and rights of all kinds (Scottish Women against Pornography 2004).

We are aware that there is already legislation in place which criminalises the display, publishing, selling and distribution of extreme pornography, and possession with a view to onward sale or distribution. However, unlike child pornography, there is currently no legislation in place which makes it an offence simply to possess extreme pornography.

The proposed legislation sends a clear message to both pornography users and the wider public that accessing this material is unacceptable and is certainly not harmless. Engender holds that this legislation is needed to reduce the potential for broad cultural harm and address the demand for extreme pornography, which has led to the proliferation of rape pornography, in particular across the internet. Such sites are easily accessible for anyone, including young people, to find and because pornography is so incredibly powerful in creating and maintaining the distorted thinking, rape myths and child abuse myths that exist in society, these sites contribute to a culture where rape is not only condoned but validated.

Our objections to extreme pornography are based on cultural harm and its abusive and degrading portrayal of females and female sexuality and not simply on its sexual content or explicitness. In extreme pornography, sex is presented as abusive and violent towards women and sexualises their abuse, systematically exploits and portrays them as objects to be abused, degraded and bought. It perpetuates the myths that women are sexually available, can be persuaded or forced to have sex and are subordinate to men.

Pornography’s presentation of violence and sexual abuse can support an environment in which the perpetrators of rape are rarely convicted (according to Scottish Government figures for 2006/07 only 2.9% of rapes recorded by the police led to a conviction). Pornography perpetuates myths about rape exist which can make it hard for sex offence victims to be believed or seen as credible and makes it more difficult for them to come forward and be treated with fairness.

Engender welcomes the specific reference to rape and other non-consensual penetrative sexual activity within the definition of extreme pornography. Unlike similar legislation in England & Wales, the bill does not make a distinction between ‘violent’ rape, and rape in general, a distinction which is extremely unhelpful and which we are glad to see is being rejected in Scotland.

Specific comments / recommendations for amendments to the proposals

Engender endorses Rape Crisis Scotland’s and the Women’s Support Project’s proposals that consideration should be given to the following changes / additions to the bill, which Engender agrees would make it stronger and more effective in tackling the proliferation of this type of material:

(1) Amendment to definition of extreme

Change wording to:-
(b) an act which results, or threatens to result, in a person’s severe injury,
The use of “threatens to” instead of “likely to” would increase the proposals scope to cover all acts of rape which could all be said to threaten severe injury but not all are likely to result in severe injury.

(2) Broaden the scope of material covered to include non-photographic visual depictions of extreme pornography

As the bill is currently written, to meet the definition of ‘extreme’, the material in questions must be explicit and realistic. The terms “explicit” and “realistic” require that the act depicted in the image must be clearly seen, lifelike and convincing and appear to a reasonable person to be real. It is not required that the act itself is real.

There is a strong feeling that there is a missed opportunity in not including non-photographic representations of extreme acts in the bill. For example, depictions of extreme pornography on virtual worlds such as Second Life, where the pornography is violent, extreme and interactive, but where the images are not photographic. Engender also agrees that it would be vitally important to enact similar legislation in relation to child pornography.

(3) Broaden the definition of extreme to include depictions of incest

Although the legislation will cover depictions of rape and non consensual penetrative sexual activity which fit the definition of obscene and pornographic, this will not necessarily cover pornography which glorifies incest, unless it is clear that the young woman depicted is not of an age to consent. Serious consideration must be given to extending the definition of extreme to include depictions of incest which is an illegal activity to ensure these types of materials are covered by the legislation.

(4) Ensure a clear definition of possession

Clarity is required as to what “possession” covers. Will it cover those people who access pornography without downloading files? Although the bill does not criminalise accidental or single viewing, we believe it must cover repeated viewings of this type of material, whether or not the material was actually downloaded.

General comments

Engender welcomes the provisions in the bill which we believe are a good starting point for action to address the harm caused by pornography. There is little doubt that Scotland has set the standard in the UK for violence against women work yet it must be acknowledged that we cannot identify real progress in making women safer.

What is objectionable about pornography is its abusive and degrading portrayal of females and female sexuality and not simply about how ‘extreme’ it is, in sexual content or explicitness.

Further reform is certainly needed in order to change our culture. It must be widely recognised and accepted that pornography is a form of violence against women, a violation of their human rights and is intrinsically linked with the inequality of women in our society. Engender holds that there is a real and urgent requirement do something meaningful to address the issues of both cause and consequence.

Public education is a vitally important part of this, which includes public education on the introduction of the proposed legislation but also a broader public education campaign on the realities of accessing internet pornography. This is a ‘live’ issue at Engender and we are currently preparing to consult with our members on their thoughts and indeed awareness around issues of accessibility and the ‘normalisation’ of such material and related activities within our society today.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from the Scottish Council of Jewish Communities

The Scottish Council of Jewish Communities would urge Parliament to take the opportunity presented by the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill to clarify that a post-mortem carried out by non-invasive methods such as Magnetic Resonance Imaging (MRI) is acceptable for all purposes for which a surgical post-mortem is generally accepted. This is not currently part of the published Bill, but we would ask that consideration be given to an amendment that could be incorporated among its miscellaneous provisions.

Background

Halachah (Jewish Law) regards the human body – including all body parts, and tissue – as sacrosanct, and requires that it should always be treated with dignity. According to Halachah, there should be as little interference with a dead body as possible, and burial should take place as early as possible, preferably before sunset on the day that death occurred. Any delay, or procedures such as a post-mortem examination, are therefore likely to be particularly distressing to the family of the deceased. In addition, the shivah (initial period of mourning) cannot begin until after the burial has taken place, and consequently any postponement will delay the grieving process, and inevitably cause great psychological stress to the bereaved. Much of this is also true of other faiths.

Post-mortem examination

We fully accept that there may be occasions, on which it may be necessary for a post-mortem examination to take place, for example, if the death is unexpected and the cause unclear, to ascertain whether there is any risk to public health, or to determine whether the death may have resulted from a criminal act.

At present all post-mortem examinations taking place in Scotland are conducted surgically (often referred to as "intrusive pathology" (IP)). There is, however, an alternative that has been employed in the Manchester area and elsewhere since 1997, namely the use of MRI. In those cases when a post-mortem examination is unavoidable, an MRI scan is much more acceptable to Jewish (and, we understand, to Muslim and other) families since the body remains intact. We have, moreover, been informed that it is frequently preferred by coroners since it can on occasion be even more informative than a surgical post-mortem – for example, deaths resulting from pneumothorax are instantly recognisable as such using MRI, but since the trapped air is immediately released when the chest cavity is opened, these are difficult if not impossible to diagnose by surgical methods.

We have been advised that prior to the introduction of this system there were approximately one hundred surgical post-mortems per annum in the Manchester Jewish community, but that this has fallen to fewer than ten per annum since the introduction of MRI post-mortem examinations.
The current situation in Scotland
We took the opportunity to raise this matter last year directly with the Lord Advocate who was sympathetic to the introduction of MRI post-mortem examinations and advised us to follow the matter up with Crown Office. We have since spoken to a number of members of the Procurator Fiscal Service, and have found that they too are sympathetic to the needs of the Jewish community. However, we have been informed on a number of occasions that they are powerless to assist since MRI is not currently recognised as a form of post-mortem examination in Scotland, and also that they have no authority to request anyone other than a pathologist to conduct a post-mortem examination. Since pathologists are generally not trained in the interpretation of MRI scans, this has prevented Procurators Fiscal from acceding to requests from Jewish families for their use as an alternative to a surgical post-mortem.

The legislative situation in England and Wales
At a recent meeting with faith leaders\(^1\), the UK Justice Minister, Bridget Prentice, said: "We have listened carefully to bereaved families and are pleased to propose these reforms which will allow coroners to consider the wishes of the family and faith issues and where possible conduct an MRI scan in place of an invasive post-mortem." The reforms to which she refers are the inclusion in the Coroners and Justice Bill\(^2\) currently before the UK Parliament of a measure permitting a coroner to specify the kind of post-mortem examination that should be made (clause 16). According to the Explanatory Notes\(^3\):

148. The term "post-mortem examination" is not defined but it will include any examination made of the deceased including non-invasive examinations, for example, using Magnetic Resonance Imaging (MRI).

150. [the Bill] defines a suitable practitioner as either a registered medical practitioner or where a particular form of examination is required, such as an MRI Scan, a practitioner who the Chief Coroner has designated is suitable to carry out such examinations.

Furthermore, in discussing compliance with the European Convention on Human Rights, the Explanatory Notes state:

810. A coroner may ask a suitable practitioner to make a post-mortem examination of the deceased (clause 16). This would include any examination made after the death of the deceased, whether invasive or non-invasive, for example, using MRI since an invasive post-mortem involves dissection of the body it runs counter to certain religious beliefs and could therefore engage the deceased's family members’ right to manifest religious belief under Article 9. The Government considers that an invasive post-mortem examination would be justified, even where it infringes their religious belief, where it contributes to the purpose of an investigation in promoting and protecting public safety and health.

811. In any event the Government considers that the provision is not disproportionate in effect. Regulations made under the Bill will enable the deceased’s family members to make representations to the coroner about whether a post-mortem examination should take place. A coroner will be required to take into account representations from family members to use non-invasive procedures at a post-mortem although the final decision will be for the coroner."

The Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill
The Criminal Justice and Licensing Bill currently before the Scottish Parliament provides an opportunity to enact a similar provision to recognise MRI as a form of post-mortem examination, and permit Procurators Fiscal to request relevant practitioners to conduct such examinations where appropriate. An amendment to the current draft Bill in similar terms to the Westminster proposal would provide great comfort to the Scottish Jewish community, and we believe it would also be welcomed by the Scottish Muslim community and other faith communities.

We would welcome the opportunity to discuss this possibility in more depth with the committee and to provide more detailed information about the successful Manchester scheme and its potential impact if adopted in Scotland.

Note: The Scottish Council of Jewish Communities (SCoJeC) is the representative body of all the Jewish communities in Scotland comprising Glasgow, Edinburgh, Aberdeen, and Dundee as well as the more loosely linked groups of the Jewish Network of Argyll and the Highlands, and of students studying in Scottish Universities and Colleges. SCoJeC is Scottish Charity SC029438, and its aims are to advance public understanding about the Jewish religion, culture and community. It works with others to promote good relations and understanding among community groups and to promote equality, and represents the Jewish community in Scotland to government and other statutory and official bodies on matters affecting the Jewish community.
Costs

Q4 No account appears to have been taken of the additional costs associated with operating in island, rural or remote environments. The same base costs would be incurred and in such localities the turnover is not there to cover the base costs that must be incurred to provide the service. This should be recognised and the appropriate funding provision addressed.

Q5 The financial costs on the licensing side which is already affected cannot be met without further funding being made available.

Wider Issues

Q7 Not known

Q8 Yes – as with all new legislation future costs regularly arise and this should be recognised. One example on the criminal justice side is that there appears to be no indication of additional funding mentioned to address the training requirements of those involved in CJSW and related bodies.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Scottish Borders Council

This submission has been prepared by officers of Scottish Borders Council and approved by the Council Leader.

Section 14 – Community Payback Order

General

The introduction of the Community Payback Order will replace Probation, Community Service and Supervised Attendance Orders with one order – Community Payback. New performance standards and performance outcomes will be set. The focus is on a range of sentencing options designed to support and compliment each other. The main elements are the supervision of an offender within the community and/or the offender completing unpaid work or other activity in the community.

Detailed guidance is included within the proposed legislation and new National Objectives and Standards for criminal justice social work with supporting guidance are being developed.

The Court will not be able to impose a CPO without “taking account of a report from an officer of a local authority”. Given the possible conditions/requirements that can be imposed through a CPO the nature of the assessment undertaken by the officer of a local authority will be different to our current SER assessment practices. Staff will require additional training and guidance.

Definitions

There is no guidance within the Bill regarding the qualifications/skill set etc of the “officer of the local authority”. Given the complexity of the assessment required and the potential to deprive an offender of their liberty I would suggest that the author of such a report/assessment should be a qualified social worker.

The Bill states that the “offender must attend appointment with the responsible officer” and that “the nature of the unpaid work or other activity to be undertaken by the offender is to be determined by the responsible officer”. There is no guidance offered within the Bill as to the qualification levels of the “Responsible Officer”. At the moment only social workers are recognised as supervising officers of probationers. Non social work qualified staff can and do act as supervising officers for offenders on community service and supervised attendance orders. It would be helpful to have guidance which allows for a combination of social work qualified and non social work qualified staff to be Responsible Officers for the supervision requirement of a CPO.
Unpaid work or other activity

The Bill proposes that unpaid work can also include “another activity”. This is a significant change as traditionally CS only allowed for unpaid work and is seen as a great improvement on the previous position. We anticipate being able to use social skills training, education and agreed programmed activity to increase the opportunities for offenders to improve their personal circumstances and to build on the skills development opportunities inherent in traditional CS placements. We hope this will eventually lead to an opportunity for offenders to gain SVQs whilst on a CPO. The introduction of this will have significant implications for staffing levels and training.

Supervision requirement

The Bill identifies various options available to the Court when considering a supervision requirement. This includes residence requirement, mental health requirement, drug treatment requirement and alcohol treatment requirement. An offender can only be made subject to certain requirements or elements of the CPO if they will also be subject to supervision. This will ensure that an offender with complex needs is not made subject to an unpaid work requirement and a mental health requirement without the appropriate support from CJSW.

The drug or alcohol treatment requirement might pose some issues around access to services particularly local NHS services as the current policy and principles of services is to engage with service users on a voluntary basis. This may compel offenders to engage with treatment and if they fail to do so their will be legal sanctions. Discussion will be required to explore this with NHS colleagues.

The Sentencing Council (Section 3 - 13)

The Bill includes the proposal to set up a Sentencing Council to give guidance to Courts regarding sentencing levels. The political aspiration is to significantly reduce the use of short custodial sentences and to ensure any the need for any short custodial sentences is clearly demonstrated within Court. It's difficult to address this specifically but the implication of the introduction of such an organisation is likely to mean more offenders sentenced to a CPO than are currently sentenced to CS/SAO or Probation.

Implications

The new NOS will state offenders have to be seen more quickly, to complete unpaid work more quickly and to be seen according to the risk (re-offending or harm to others) they pose. The Sentencing Council will issue guidance to Court on the use of short custodial sentences. This has serious implications for staffing. Although there will be some efficiency savings we can make, we can only really deliver significantly more quickly if we have additional resources. CJ would need additional staff and additional office space etc and it is unclear if there will be any additional resources allocated. The assessments required for a CPO will be different to the current SER assessments and in some ways will be more complex. A great deal of training will be required for all staff.

Whilst these are important considerations the introduction of a CPO will hopefully simplify the sentencing options, ensure greater consistency of requirements for community based sentences and reduce the number of short sentences imposed. Obviously an infrastructure is required to support this but the principle of reducing short sentences is positive one as offenders and offender’s families lives are disrupted by short sentences often to the detriment of the family and in the longer term to the community and the victims. The re-offending rate of offenders sentenced to custody is far higher than those where probation or CS is imposed.

Part 8

Part 8 of the Bill makes various changes to the general licensing provisions of the Government (Scotland) Act 1982, and to it’s specific provisions on metal dealers, market operators, public entertainment, late hours catering, and taxis and private hires.

A review of the legislation is overdue as the current legislation has been on the Statute Book since 1982. Any modernisation of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 is to be welcomed.

The provisions relating to licensing of taxis and private hire cars, in particular, are in need of urgent review.

The Bill contains helpful provisions relating to standard licence conditions.

With regard to licensing of taxis and private hire cars, there are helpful clarifications relating to review of fares. These are to be welcomed.

The Bill provides for licensing authorities to regulate car boot sales along with other types of market operators. Licensing authorities will have discretion as to whether to charge reduced or no fees to charitable organisations.

The Bill makes provision for licensing authorities to control large scale public entertainments that are free to enter but authorities will have discretion whether to licence events such as gala days or school fetes. They will also update some references to gambling legislation for premises which are exempt from the public entertainment licensing provisions.

With regard to licensing of late night catering, the Bill brings late night grocers and 24 hour stores within the scope of the licensing provisions. It will continue to be for licensing authorities to determine which classes of premises actually require to be licensed.

In general, the review of Part 8 of this legislation is to be welcomed.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from the Violence Against Women Strategy Multi-Agency Working Group

The Justice Committee has requested views on the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. The Violence Against Women Strategy Multi-Agency Working Group, as part of the Community Planning structure in Highland, is responding to a specific portion of this Bill - clause 34, “Extreme Pornography”.

We welcome the inclusion of Extreme Pornography as part of this Bill. The proposed legislation sends a clear message to both pornography users and the wider public that accessing this material is unacceptable and is certainly not harmless. We believe that this legislation is needed to reduce the potential for broad cultural harm and to address the demand for extreme pornography, which has led to the proliferation of rape pornography, in particular, across the internet.

Our objections to extreme pornography are based on cultural harm and its abusive and degrading portrayal of women and girls and female sexuality and not simply on its sexual content and/or explicitness. In extreme pornography, sex is presented as abusive and violent towards women and sexualises their abuse, systematically exploits and portrays them as objects to be abused, degraded and bought. It perpetuates the myths that women are sexually available, can be persuaded or forced to have sex and are subordinate to men.

Whilst we welcome this legislation, we have the following concerns and request clarification on these:

- The use of the term ‘obscene’ without definition
- Amendments to definition of ‘extreme’
- Classification of the image being in someone’s possession
- Non-photographic images
- In relation to images and sounds, text is not mentioned
- The image not being pornographic taken by itself, but would be if forming part of a wider narrative

Terminology – ‘Obscene’

We request a definition to be included as to what would constitute ‘obscene’ material.

We are also concerned that the Scottish Government has opted to choose to use the term ‘obscene’ within this Bill. Using this type of terminology comes across as moralistic and we would recommend focusing instead on the cultural harm the acceptance of pornography in Scotland causes. The fact that these images are created in the first place normalises sexual violence against women and feeds myths about rape which are pervasive in society.
Pornography is not only harmful to those involved in its creation and consumption but also to wider society.

Definition – ‘Extreme’
We would recommend a change of wording in this section from “an act which results, or is likely to result in, a person’s severe injury” to “an act which results in, or threatens to result in, a person’s severe injury” – this would increase the scope to cover all acts of rape which could be said to threaten severe injury, but are not all likely to result in severe injury.

We would also welcome an extension to the definition of ‘extreme’ to include depictions of incest as these may not be captured under the legislation as currently drafted. There are many pornographic websites which glorify incest, but are unlikely to be caught by current legislation as they feature women who are 18, according to the information on the websites. We believe that serious consideration must be given to extending the definition of ‘extreme’ to include depictions of incest, which is an illegal activity.

Possession of Images
We would welcome clarity on how an image could be in ‘someone’s possession’. We would assume that this would include print and electronic format and, therefore, would include images that had been viewed on the internet or sent as phone messages. However, this is not clear in the Bill as currently written. We hope that repeated viewing of material even if it was not downloaded would be covered by the legislation.

We urge the Scottish Government to ensure accessing internet sites that promote ‘extreme pornography’ is covered by this legislation. Many of these sites are identifiable as extreme pornography simply by their titles, which regularly include references to sexual violence and/or child sexual abuse.

Content of Images – Non-Photographic
We are concerned that the Bill as currently written will not cover the images of extreme pornography that are available on-line, but are not photographic. Images of extreme pornography are available on the website “Second Life, amongst others, and includes interactive content in violent and extreme pornography. We feel this Bill should be extended to clearly include this type of material.

Content of Images – Text
Mainstream pornography regular includes graphic sounds and accompanying text that is offensive to and derogatory about women. We would expect that under Sections 4 & 5 that not only sounds relating to the images be included, but that accompanying text (whether on a website or embedded in the image) also be included.

Image as Pornographic by Itself, but not as part of narrative
We would like more clarity on this section. Is the intention that, for example, images of ‘extreme pornography’ could be shown as part of anti-pornography campaigns or to raise awareness of what ‘extreme pornography’ constitutes and that this would not be an offence? Whilst we support these images being available for training and awareness purposes and we agree that this should not constitute an offence, we must still be wary that people can obtain images from a variety of sources and may use material not intended to provide any form of sexual arousal (because of the context in which it was produced), however, a third party may use the images for precisely this.

Conclusion
We welcome this Bill, which includes measures to tackle extreme pornography, but we must also be cautious that this remains the initial step in challenging the demand for pornographic material in Scotland.

Pornography is only one aspect of commercial sexual exploitation and we welcome the focus that this Bill has on the consumption of such material.

The Consortium is a body which brings together leading voluntary sector organisations in Scotland concerned with crime and criminal justice and also leading academics and individuals working in the field. It organises conferences and seminars and publishes research and discussion papers. The Convenor of the Consortium is Baroness Vivien Stern.

The Consortium is not commenting on all the provisions of the Bill but only on those provisions, mainly in Part 1, which are closely related to its interests.

Part 1

Section 1: Purposes and principles of sentencing

The purposes of sentencing set out in Section 1 are those generally used in discussing sentencing. However, they raise almost as many questions as they answer. For instance, what happens when there is conflict between purposes? For example, rehabilitation of an individual might suggest one sentence, protection of the public another. What is the priority or precedence between the purposes when they are in conflict? There may, unintentionally, be a suggestion that the list is in some sense in order of priority. It would, therefore, be helpful if it were clearly stated that the order was in no sense to be seen as a hierarchy. It is also questionable what the purpose of punishment is if it serves none of the other four objectives in the list. For this reason, it could be dropped as a purpose. It is also suggested that a principle of ‘parsimony’ should be considered, that is, any sentence should be the least oppressive and intrusive consistent with the other aims of sentencing.

Section 3: The Scottish Sentencing Council

The Consortium does not have an agreed position on the merits of a Sentencing Council. The arguments are as follows.

Sentencing guidelines transfer some of the power over sentencing away from an independent judiciary and into the hands of state prosecutors and politicians. Unless proper checks and balances are introduced, it is possible for politicians to make very significant adjustments to the severity levels of sentences through the guidelines and this could have a great impact on the prison population. Critics of guidelines believe that retaining judicial control over sentencing provides a vitally necessary independence from greater political intervention in sentencing.
Prison populations have risen in most US states which have developed sentencing guidelines. However, one authoritative review of the research argues that guidelines may in fact have worked to slow down the rise in the rate of imprisonment in many of these state jurisdictions, particularly in comparison with the rates of imprisonment in jurisdictions without guidelines. A comprehensive system of guidelines does allow prison populations to be predicted more accurately and thus allows populations to be more effectively manipulated by politicians and policy makers. This could in theory be either upwards or downwards. However, in the current climate the establishment of a comprehensive system of guidelines runs the risk of the prison population being increased.

Critics of guidelines argue that they reduce judicial discretion and therefore carry the risk of unjust sentences being imposed in individual cases. Judges may feel obliged to pass a sentence which they feel is unjust because their desired sentence falls outside the guideline range. Critics also argue that guidelines are insufficiently sophisticated to take account of the wide range of factors which are relevant for sentencing, although most guideline systems make provision for departures.

It can be argued that it is legitimate for governments to set a sentencing policy designed to make the most effective use of scarce criminal justice resources. It may be preferable for government to seek to achieve this through a Sentencing Council which brings together judges and others with relevant knowledge and expertise, provided the body is sheltered from short term political pressures and has the time and resources to deal with the considerable complexities of sentencing.

All Western jurisdictions have seen a steep rise in rates of imprisonment over the last twenty years. In most of these jurisdictions, judges have retained a considerable control over sentencing levels. Thus, judges are at least partly responsible for the rise in prison populations. Even if they wanted to reverse this trend, there is currently in Scotland, no institutional capacity for judges to act together to achieve a change. There is therefore a lack of public accountability for the size of the prison population. Questions about the proper aims, levels and modes of criminal punishment (as distinct from questions about the proper sentence in individual cases) are not legal questions on which judges can claim sole authority: they are political questions that should arguably be decided by appropriate public debate of the kind that a Sentencing Council could make possible.

Sentencing has to balance two contradictory objectives: the desire to take into account the facts and circumstances of each individual case and the desire to ensure that similar cases receive a similar sentence. The current system of individualised sentencing does not provide specific provision for consistency in sentencing (although the ability to appeal against sentence and for the Appeal Court to issue guideline judgements does make some provision for this). A comprehensive system of guidelines, with provision for judicial departure from the guidelines so long as appropriate justification is given, could provide a better and more defensible balance between individualised sentencing and consistency.

The case for and likely effects of a Sentencing Council are far from clear. It is noted that it is estimated that a sentencing council would cost £1 million a year. Given the doubts, this does not seem the right time to introduce a Sentencing Council. Given the pressures on the criminal justice budget, the sum required for the establishment of a Sentencing Council could be spent more effectively in other ways.

If the Government does proceed to establish a Scottish Sentencing Council and sentencing guidelines, the Consortium would make the following recommendations:

- The Council should be funded to develop a comprehensive set of inaugural guidelines.
- The guidelines should be mandatory but judges should be able to depart from the guideline sentence and should be required to provide an explanation for their departure.
- The Council needs to have members with the skills, knowledge and experience to develop a comprehensive set of guidelines. Legal qualifications and experience do not necessarily provide the full range of necessary skills. Non-legally qualified people would bring an essential perspective and additional relevant skills.
- The Council should be independent and should not be used as a political instrument to react to short term political problems.
- There should be regular monitoring of the Council’s effect, effectiveness and level of compliance with its guidelines.

Section 14: Community payback orders

The Consortium welcomes this implementation of recommendations by the Prisons Commission with their emphasis on flexibility, reparation and "problem solving" sentencing. It is also welcomed as an effective approach to reducing imprisonment. For this advance to work well, it will need to be properly resourced. In terms of penal effectiveness, resources spent in this area will have much greater beneficial impact in terms of the stated purposes of sentencing than increasing the prison population through the implementation of the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007. This is discussed more fully below.

For this reform to work well, it will need to be fully explained to the public and appropriate publicity given to the payback work carried out. This should not be done by identifying reparation work and those doing it while it is being carried out. Publicity should follow completion of the work, publicising through the press and signs at the site where appropriate, what benefit the community has got through the payback activity. This would build up public support for the sentence. It is recommended that there should be a requirement on the Criminal Justice Authority (CJA) to explain to the public locally the nature of the new sentence and to report regularly on tasks carried out, publicising the benefits to the community. There are already examples of CJAs doing this but it needs to be a continuous process and aimed particularly at the local press where the related offences are already fully reported.

It is important that there should not be a philosophy of “only one shot” at a community payback order. It should be seen as the proper sentence for use whenever it is proportionate and appropriate for an offence regardless of whether and how often it has been used before on an individual.

The voluntary sector has an important part to play in the provision of reparative work as part of payback orders in view of their experience in this field

Section 16: Short sentences

The Consortium supports the objective of reducing the number of short sentences which clog up the prisons and which allow little scope for work on changing behaviour. It has a concern about the unintended consequences which may result from the proposals in the Bill. Sentencers may make use of the provision to continue to impose short sentences by developing a set of reasons which would satisfy the statutory requirements. A precedent is the provision which required community service only to be used as an alternative to prison. However, in practice it became an alternative to fining to a much larger extent. Another unintended consequence might be the greater use of sentences of just over 6 months with a consequent increase in the prison population. A key to managing the reduction of short sentences is consultation with sentencers on the introduction of community payback orders and their proper resourcing. This is to deal with the constant complaint that community sentences are not available sufficiently quickly or adequately resourced. In this process Community Justice Authorities will have a key role and need to be properly resourced for this purpose.

The only assured way to achieve a reduction in short sentences is to cap the number of places available for sentences under, say, 6 months. When the cap was reached those sentenced to below 6 months would be put on a waiting list and their sentence suspended until a place was available. If the sentence was completed before a place was available, they would not need to serve the sentence. This too could have unintended side effects.

Section 18: Amendments to the Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007

This is the provision of the Bill which most concerns the Consortium and it would recommend that Section 18 of the Bill be dropped entirely and the relevant sections of the 2007 Act be repealed. The objectives of clarity of sentencing and better supervision can be better achieved in other ways and without incurring the huge expense estimated through these proposals and the consequent large expansion in the prison population.

During the passage of the Custodial Weapons and Weapons (Scotland) Bill the Consortium submitted representations on the proposals for release and supervision of prisoners. The Consortium pointed out the impracticality, high cost and ineffectiveness of the proposals. Many other organisations did the same. However, since the Bill was going through Parliament just before an Election, no party opposed the proposals and they became law. They have not been implemented so far.

In its report, the Prisons Commission expressed their concerns about the 2007 Act, strongly echoing many of the points previously made by the Consortium and other organisations. The Commission recommended that if the 2007 Act was to be implemented, its implementation should only take place following the implementation of the Commission’s other recommendations and the achievement of a reduction in the short sentence prison population. Clearly that point has not yet been reached and may not be for a few years. The Commission opposed its application to sentences below two years.

What is now proposed is an order making power which would allow the original provisions of the 2007 Act to be introduced, not at the 15 day sentence point, but at some other unspecified point, such as the one year sentence or some other sentence length. Although assured during the passage of the 2007 Act that the proposals which applied from the 15 day sentence point were workable, it has now clearly (but not explicitly) been accepted that the original proposals were unworkable. However, the order making power is open ended and there are no undertakings about the point at which the 2007 Act provisions would be implemented nor any way of knowing if they would be implemented initially at one level e.g. the one year sentence, and then at a future date be reduced to a sentence length below that.

The objections to the 2007 Act thus remain in relation to the provisions in the current Bill with the added objection of uncertainty.

The objections are:

- Practicality – prison governors would have to carry out risk assessments on a large (but so far unspecified) number of prisoners who at the moment have no such assessment. This extra task would distract from other work with prisoners. If the governors played safe (the usual course when considering risk), and refused release at the half way point in many cases, the cases would have to be considered by the Parole Board. This would involve a large increase in work by the Board which is already under considerable pressure dealing with more dangerous prisoners. The shorter the sentence, the less time to carry out the risk assessment in any meaningful way. The Parole Board would without significant extra resources find it difficult to carry out the proposed procedures within the time limits of short sentences leading to the risk of delays and injustice.

- Negligible effect on public safety - the difference between letting someone out on licence at the half way point or the three quarters point of a one year sentence is 3 months which is negligible in terms of public protection. At two years the difference is 6 months, again not very significant in terms of public protection. Yet the effect, in aggregate, on the prison population is very significant.

- Cost - the financial memorandum estimates the annual cost of full implementation of the combined sentence applied at the 1 year point as £45.75m. The figure for applying the combined sentence at 2 years is £32.73m. These are very substantial sums and by far the largest part (82%) is additional prison costs, reflecting a rise in the prison population to 9,600. This money could be used on community payback, youth clubs, more police, community courts, drug and alcohol programmes to much greater effect. It is interesting to note that a community court proposed for Glasgow – a valuable development - has been cancelled on cost grounds although it would cost a fraction of the cost of implementing the 2007 Act.

- Lack of evidence on effectiveness – there is no evidence that this increase in the prison population will increase public safety when compared with spending the same very substantial sum on developing programmes and penalties in the community. The Bill proposes the development of payback orders. If instead of spending extra resources on more imprisonment (to implement the 2007 Act), the money went on community payback (as provided for in the current Bill) the overall benefit would be much greater. The Scottish prison population is already almost the highest in Western Europe. The change would almost certainly make Scotland the Western European country which imprisoned the highest proportion of its citizens. To increase Scotland’s already high prison population in pursuit of an impracticable policy is poor value.

The Commission accepts that there is still an issue of public understanding of sentences. This should be taken seriously by explaining the nature of current sentences which are already “community sentences” although not called that. Sentences are already served in part in the prison, in part in the community with the risk of recall (although not a significant risk under 4 years). The community sentence of the 2007 Act does not abolish automatic release. Better explanation to the public and better supervision and support of all prisoners on release within the present framework would be much more likely to be effective.

Part 2

Section 25: Involvement in serious organised crime

Section 25 is headed ‘involvement in serious organised crime’ but the definition of the offences requires only an agreement to become involved. There is therefore a mismatch between label and offence, and an offence whose over-broad definition revives all the familiar worries about the law of conspiracy. At least some overt conduct towards becoming involved should be required.
Part 3

Prosecution of children

The Consortium supports the proposal reflected in Section 38 that no child under 12 can be prosecuted but further suggests that the discretion allowed to the Procurator Fiscal to prosecute children under 14 should be withdrawn. It is assumed that a child can still require a referral to a Children’s Hearing on offence grounds which is denied to be proved according to the criminal standard of proof. However, it is noted that this change falls short of actually changing the age of criminal responsibility and the Consortium would press for the age of criminal responsibility to be increased to 12.

Part 9

Alcohol licensing

The Consortium does not comment in detail on the licensing proposals other than to strongly support measures to tackle the misuse of alcohol which lies behind so much of crime. The Consortium would hope that the protection of the public from alcohol-related crime would be given its proper weight against the commercial interests of the drinks industry. Robust measures to tackle alcohol misuse will be much more effective in protecting the public than a continuing increase in the prison population. Indeed, less alcohol misuse will reduce the need for prison.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill
Written submission from Victim Support Scotland

1. Introduction

Victim Support Scotland is the largest agency providing support and information services to victims of crime in Scotland. Established in 1985, the organisation currently employs around 180 staff and 900 volunteers. In 2007-2008 our community based victim services and court based witness services supported around 175,000 people affected by crime. With the interest of victims and witness at heart, we are pleased to be given a change to provide a response to this important consultation. We have divided our comments below in accordance with the sections of the Bill.

2. Victim Support Scotland’s comments

Section 1-2 Purpose and principles of sentencing

Victim Support Scotland agrees with the proposed purpose and principles of sentencing. We believe that the introduction of statutory definition of the aim of sentencing will help to create more consistency in sentences, as stated in section 1(3)(d), which would benefit the whole justice sector, including victims and witnesses of crime. More consistency will subsequently make the criminal justice process more transparent, enabling parties to foresee and understand why a particular verdict is given.

Section 3-13 Scottish Sentencing Council

Victim Support Scotland agrees with the establishment of a Scottish Sentencing Council. For more details, see our previous consultation response on this matter.

Section 14 Community payback orders

Victim Support Scotland supports the introduction of payback orders and the aims set out in the bill. In addition, we would like to introduce the two following requirements:

a) an alternative (suspended) sentence should be set out by the court alongside the community payback order, which would announce what sentence would be given if the offender breaches the payback order. This would give more clarity to the victim, offender and the general community about the content of the sentence and what will happen if the order is not fulfilled.
b) a community payback order can only be given if the chosen treatment/activity is available at the time of sentencing. This will ensure that the offender will start the disposal straight away, instead of for instance waiting several months to begin a particular treatment, which gives a signal to the victim that nothing has happened. Confidence in the criminal justice system has been shown to form an important part in the recovery process for many people affected by crime; the belief that justice has been made greatly aids recovery. The effects of unclear and disproportionate sentences undermine this concept and have a damaging effect on both victims and communities. It is therefore of vital importance, both to the victim and for society as a whole, that the community payback order will provide an adequate and proportionate response to the crime and that each disposal will fulfil all the purposes of sentencing as set out in section 1(1) of the Bill.

Regarding the court’s communication of the order, section 227B(4) states that “before imposing the order, the court must explain to the offender in ordinary language –

(a) the purpose and effect of each of the requirements to be imposed by the order,

(b) the consequence which may follow if the offender fails to comply with any of the requirements imposed by the order”

Victim Support Scotland believes that this information should also be given to the victim, unless they have stated they do not want to receive this information. As an alternative, information can also be given to a representative of the victim. Keeping the victim informed is important for two reasons. Firstly, in order for the victim to feel justice has been done and that the offence has been given an appropriate sentence, it is important that he/she fully understands the community payback order and any associated requirements. Secondly, the victim is often in a very good position to report certain breaches of the order, for instance a requirement to not contact the victim. Similarly, section 227E(4) states that a copy of the order imposing the community payback order should be given to the offender and to the local authority within whose area the offender resides. We believe this information should also be given to the victim, unless they have stated they do not wish to receive this type of information. The victim has a right to be kept informed, and giving the victim a full explanation of the decision will also increase the likelihood of him/her accepting the decision and being more content with the overall justice process.

Section 17 Presumption against short periods of imprisonment or detention Victim Support Scotland supports this section when suitable alternative disposals are immediately available.

Section 23 Offences aggravated by prejudice

Victim Support Scotland supports this change.

Section 24 Voluntary intoxication: effect in sentencing

Victim Support Scotland supports the introduction of this section.

Section 38 Prosecution of children

Victim Support Scotland supports this change.

Section 40 Witness Statements

Victim Support Scotland supports this modification.

Section 42 – 43 Bail

Victim Support Scotland supports these changes, including the demand on a person released on bail to participate in an identification parade. In reference to section 42(2)(2A) and 42(2)(2AA) we believe it is important to keep the victim fully informed of the possibility for the prosecutor to be heard. The victim should also receive full explanations of all implications where the prosecutor consents to the bail review application without having a hearing.

Appropriate attention should be given to the views and fears of the victim when deciding on whether or not to grant bail; there should be provisions to take account of the impact the crime has had on the victim. Bail conditions such as, for instance, abstaining from contacting the victim should if appropriate be set. It is also critical that bail conditions are communicated to the victim in a timely and appropriate manner. Being informed of the bail conditions could also help to reduce fear and concerns regarding the victim’s personal safety.

Section 63 Spouse or civil partner of accused a compellable witness

Victim Support Scotland supports the legal principle of this suggestion, particularly in cases of serious and organised crime. However, when applying this section, we ask that the Crown Office considers the wider issue of maintaining family relations. We recommend the introduction of a test of proportionality, including a risk analysis, balancing the value of the evidence with the risk of not accessing the evidence statement to protect the integrity of the family. We believe that to access the witness statement, the Crown must be convinced it would improve the quality of justice. Guidance should be developed regarding how to balance the need to access witness statements without causing more distress than is necessary to the families involved.

Section 66 Witness anonymity orders

Victim Support Scotland supports the introduction of witness anonymity orders, but would initially recommend limited application to only include witnesses employed in information security service who will be put at risk if the anonymity orders were not available.

Section 80 Assistance to victim support

In addition to standard funding streams, Victim Support Scotland can see the value of section 80, making funds available for services in particular areas for particular crimes and circumstances. We see this section as an addition to current funding schemes and not a change in policy direction regarding the matter in which victim services are funded.

Section 84 Compensation orders

In principle, we support the possibility for courts to make a compensation order requiring the convicted person to pay compensation in favour of the victim or a person who is liable for funeral expenses. We recognise that the use of these orders require the cooperation and approval of the individual victim and family involved. However, we believe the provisions need further development and we would want to be involved in policy discussions and the set up of the orders.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from the Scottish Police Federation

I refer to the above and thank you for inviting the Scottish Police Federation (SPF) to take part in this consultation. For ease of reference our response follows the numerical sections of the proposed legislation. There are numerous areas of the consultation on which the SPF has not commented. On such areas, the SPF has, at this time, no strong objections.

Part 1 Sentencing

The SPF welcomes the general proposal for the courts to consider ‘the effect of the offence on any person …’ ¹ and believes this requires to be carefully interpreted to exclude pressure and lobby groups or individuals whilst ensuring recognised representative bodies or organisations fall within the general definition of ‘any person’. For example the Scottish Police Federation itself may wish the courts to consider the impact of serious assaults on our members, on the wider membership, prior to sentence being passed.

The SPF is supportive of the establishment of the Scottish Sentencing Council and believes its aim of bringing consistency in sentencing is long overdue. None the less and whilst recognising the significant challenges posed to Scotland’s prison estate, believe consideration within the guidelines ‘of the likely effect … on … the number of persons detained in prisons …’ ² to be incompatible with the wider and longstanding principle of ensuring the punishment fits the crime. Whilst on the face of it, having one of the highest incarceration rates in Europe is alarming, it is our view this is the incorrect test and what should be considered is the prison population as a percentage of the overall criminal and not the general population.

The draft Bill proposes a fine defaulter with a fine of up to £500 will have that sentence replaced with a Community Payback Order (CPO) at level 1 unpaid work (i.e. not in excess of 100 hours) ³ and that such a disposal can be imposed without the offenders consent. ⁴ It is the view of the SPF this approach will result in significant disregard for the provisions of the CPO and ultimately lead to a widening of the gap between commission of crime and the date on which justice is seen to be done and sentence served. It is our view that a fine should not be considered an appropriate disposal in any case in which an offender has previously defaulted on a fine and for a CPO to have any chance of being successfully completed, the offender must consent.

² Section 5(b)(1)
³ Section 14 [227M (1) and (2)]
⁴ Section 14 [227M (7)]
In our consideration of the provisions governing restricted movement requirements, it is our view that it would be an appropriate response to compel an offender subject to such an order to make himself available to a constable, at the place to which such a restriction applies at any reasonable time, in order that a constable can confirm adherence to the restricted movement requirement and that such a failure to make himself available in such circumstances be considered a breach of the restricted movement requirements in its own right. In addition it should be open to a constable to inspect without warrant such a place subject to the same criteria surrounding reasonableness.

When considering the matter of short term prison sentences, the accompanying explanatory note, at paragraph 86, suggests that there are no certified police cells in Scotland. This is at complete variance with the understanding of the SPF on this matter and it is our information that certified police cells exist in the Orkney, Shetland and Western Isles areas. Indeed such cells are essential to deal with persons sentenced to periods of imprisonment where for example, severe weather prevents their transfer to the prison estate on mainland Scotland. In light of our understanding on this matter the SPF can not support repealing of section 206 Paragraphs (2) to (6) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995.

On the wider subject of short term prison sentences the SPF questions the appropriateness of an arbitrary figure, for example, six months (allowing for the necessary considerations) as the minimum period of imprisonment which should be considered. Clearly we recognise the evidence which supports the position of the relative ineffectiveness of short term prison sentences but do not believe this approach to present a logical solution. It is an unfortunate truth that there are many habitual offenders who have no desire to comply with any court disposal which may well render short periods of imprisonment necessary for even minor offences.

It is our view the consideration ‘as soon as a short term custody and community prisoner has served on half of the prisoner’s … sentence …the Scottish Ministers must release the prisoner on … licence’ as a stand alone provision will not readily be understood or accepted. Any presumption for early release must only be with due consideration as to the conduct and contrition of the offender whilst imprisoned. It would seem illogical for a badly behaved or disruptive prisoner serving a short term sentence to automatically be released from prison. In addition it is our view the standard conditions of license should include the requirement to notify of the address at which the offender is to reside and that such an offender makes himself available to a constable at a reasonable time at that address, in order to confirm adherence to the license. In addition it should be open to a constable to inspect without

6 Section 16(3)(b)
7 Section 18(3)
8 Section 18 [29A]
warrant such an address subject to the same criteria surrounding reasonableness.

Part 2 Criminal Law

Part 3 Criminal Procedure

The SPF believes the standard bail conditions \(^9\) should be extended to include 'that the accused makes himself available to a constable at any reasonable time and at any place as may be specified by the court for the purpose of ensuring adherence to such bail conditions'. For example, bail conditions should specify an accused person must reside at a specific location between certain times and it would seem logical a constable should be able to confirm adherence to such a condition. In addition it should be open to a constable to inspect without warrant such a location subject to the same criteria surrounding reasonableness.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from the City of Edinburgh Council
Regulatory Committee

This response to the call for written evidence relates to those provisions in Part 8 of the Bill which is the responsibility of the Council’s Regulatory Committee. Time has not permitted formal discussion of these proposals with the Committee itself, but the views of the Committee’s Convenor, Councillor Colin Keir, have been sought, as have those of licensing and enforcement officers.

A separate response has been provided by the City of Edinburgh Licensing Board in relation to liquor licensing.

The opportunity to modernise licensing provisions currently provided by the 1982 Act is welcomed and will assist Councils to exercise their statutory responsibilities effectively.

(1) Section 128(3)(e) – Residence Requirement for Sex Shop Licence holders.

Paragraph 9(3)(e) of Schedule 2 of the 1982 Act presently prohibits the grant of a Sex Shop licence to a person who has not been resident in the United Kingdom for the 6 months immediately preceding the date of their application.

The Bill proposes to include residence in any member states of the European Community.

It is appreciated that there are European Community Treaty requirements to allow freedom of movement and the ability to work to all citizens within the European Community. We understand that reasonable restrictions can be imposed on the grounds of public policy, public security or public health. The restrictions on obtaining a Sex Shop licence would presumably be justifiable on the grounds of public safety so that persons operating such premises do not pose a threat to the public, particularly vulnerable groups, such as children.

(2) Proposed additional licensing restrictions for taxi and private hire car driver licences.

We would ask that some thought be given to introducing a similar but expanded restriction for non UK residents wishing to obtain taxi and private hire car driver licences.

Taxis and private hire cars often carry children and vulnerable adults, mostly without incident. However, licensing authorities and the police wish to ensure that all drivers are subject to rigorous background and criminal checks. These checks cannot be carried out effectively on persons who reside out with the United Kingdom. The 1982 Act requires the local authority to have evidence as to whether a person is not a fit and proper person to hold a licence. The onus is not on the applicant to show that he is a fit and proper person. If the applicant has not resided in the United Kingdom for a reasonable period of time, the police would not be able to check their criminal records and the licensing authority would be bound to grant the licence.

It may be possible for licensing authorities already to refuse to grant taxi or private hire car driver licences on the “other good reason” grounds set out in Paragraph 5(3) (d) of Schedule 1 to the 1982 Act. However, it would be preferable (to avoid legal challenge and to introduce uniformity across Scotland) if a specific provision could be entered into the Bill prohibiting the grant of taxi or private hire car driving licences to persons who have not resided continuously in the United Kingdom for a reasonable period, say, 5 years.

It is suggested that the period of 5 years would be sufficient to allow potential applicants to demonstrate a “clean record” so that they could safely be allowed to carry unaccompanied passengers. It is also suggested that only residence within the United Kingdom would be relevant, due to the present lack of comprehensive and uniform criminal record keeping system within the European Community.

It is suggested that making such a restriction applicable to non UK Residents would be compatible with the right of movement and employment within the European Community. This would be reasonable restrictions designed to ensure protection of the public and wholly appropriate, given the special nature of a taxi or private hire car driver’s duties.

It is appreciated that this would represent a significant change in taxi/private hire car driver licensing legislation. However, this proposal would bring this element of taxi/private hire car licensing in line with the principles of the proposed legislation. It may be considered more appropriate to consult further rather than include it in the present Bill. It is intended that a more detailed letter on this issue will be sent to the relevant ministers in due course.

If it is considered appropriate to include such a provision in the present Bill, we would suggest the following amendment to S 124 of the Bill, by insertion after 124(2) –

(3) In section 13 (taxi and private hire car driving licences) insert the following subsection after subsection (3) –

“(3A) A licensing authority shall not grant a licence under this section to a person who is not resident in the United Kingdom or was not so resident throughout the period of five years immediately preceding the date when the application was made.”
(3) Minor Error in S 124(2).

Reference in this sub-section to “taxi and private hire car licences” should be changed to “taxi and private hire car driving licences”.

I hope this is of assistance. Should you have any further queries please do not hesitate to contact me.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Rape Crisis Scotland

1. Introduction
1.1 Rape Crisis Scotland welcomes the opportunity to provide written evidence on the Criminal Justice & Licensing (Scotland) Bill. The bill covers many issues, but we have focused our consideration on 2 areas: the criminalisation of the possession of extreme pornography and the provisions relating to disclosure.

2. Criminalisation of the possession of extreme pornography
2.1 Rape Crisis Scotland supports the move to criminalise the possession of extreme pornography. We believe that this legislation is needed to reduce the potential for broad cultural harm and address the demand for extreme pornography, which has led to the proliferation of rape pornography, in particular across the internet. These are sites with descriptions such as "innocent teen girls face their worst sex related nightmares", "these girls say no but we say yes", "here you will find only REAL rape pictures" and "it is time to become Tough Guys, Right now". These sites are easily accessible for anyone - including young people - to find. They glorify rape and in doing so contribute to a culture where rape is condoned and validated. The increasing availability of pornography online means that many teenagers are getting information about sex through accessing pornography – and sometimes pornography is their only source of information. We have grave concerns about what impact this has on young people’s views of sexuality and of women. The American Psychological Association Taskforce on the Sexualisation of Girls\(^1\) found significant evidence of harm to young women caused by the use of sexualized images of women and girls.

2.2 Rape Crisis Scotland strongly supports the inclusion in the bill of specific reference to rape and other non-consensual penetrative sexual activity within the definition of extreme pornography. Unlike similar legislation in England & Wales, the bill does not make a distinction between ‘violent’ rape, and rape in general, a distinction which is extremely unhelpful and which we are glad to see is being rejected in Scotland.

2.3 Non-photographic visual depictions of extreme pornography
As the bill is currently written, to meet the definition of ‘extreme’, the material in questions must be explicit and realistic. The terms “explicit” and “realistic” require that the act depicted in the image must be clearly seen, lifelike and convincing and appear to a reasonable person to be real. It is not required that the act itself is real.

\(^1\) Report of the APA Taskforce on the Sexualization of Girls, 2007

2.4 We believe that it is a missed opportunity to not include non-photographic representations of extreme acts in the bill. This means that the provision in the bill will not cover depictions of extreme pornography on virtual worlds such as Second Life or games online or other digital platforms, where the pornography is violent, extreme and interactive, but where the images are not photographic. Similarly, we would like to emphasis that there is still a need to enact similar legislation in relation to child pornography, as proposed by the Scottish Executive in early 2007.

2.5 Depictions of incest
Although the legislation will cover depictions of rape and non consensual penetrative sexual activity which fit the definition of obscene and pornographic, this will not necessarily cover pornography which glorifies incest, unless it is clear that the young woman depicted is not of an age to consent. For example, one pornography website is headed ‘Welcome to Daddy’s Whore’, and sub-titled ‘there is no stronger feelings than father’s love to his daughter’. This is unlikely to be caught by the legislation because there is a note on the website that the young women featured are ‘18 year old daughters’. We believe serious consideration must be given to extending the definition of extreme to include depictions of incest (which is in itself an illegal activity) to ensure these types of materials are covered by the legislation.

2.6 Further consideration of the harms of pornography
While RCS welcomes the provisions in the bill, which we believe are much needed, we are firmly of the view that this must be a starting point for action to address the harm caused by pornography. Pornography has the potential to cause serious harm in distorting people’s views of sexuality, and contributes to what has been called a ‘rape culture’. Further reform is needed.

3. Disclosure
3.1 RCS is very concerned by the increase in the frequency with which the medical records of complainers’ of sexual offences are accessed in the course of criminal trials. The introduction of such records is a serious breach of women’s privacy and can significantly exacerbate the extent to which they are exposed to spurious and idle speculation on many irrelevant (and highly private) aspects of their health, including sexual history and mental health. We believe the question of what protection complainers have in this regard under Article 8 (right to privacy) of the European Convention on Human Rights must form part of the consideration of any legislation on disclosure. We know that most women do not report rape (the British Crime Survey estimates that only between 1 in 5 and 1 in 8 women have reported rape to the police) and often the reason women give rape crisis for not reporting is fear of the justice system. We have grave concerns that the increasing use of medical records in sexual offence trials will act as another deterrent to people reporting rape. 7 out of 10 women are virtually guaranteed to be asked about their sexual history or character during a rape trial\textsuperscript{2}, and at the same time are facing the very real possibly of having their medical records scrutinised by the prosecution and potentially brought up in court by the defence. It is no wonder so many women are reluctant to report rape.

3.2 If the disclosure provisions of the bill are passed in their current form, there is a strong argument for complainers of sexual offences to have independent legal representation, to ensure they are able to access any legal protection offered under Article 8.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from the Consenting Adult Action Network

About CAAN

CAAN (Consenting Adult Action Network) was born in April 2008, in response to the present Government’s legislation concerning extreme pornography. This may be found in sections 63 to 67 of the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 and in section 34 of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill 2009. CAAN believes in the right for consenting adults to enjoy their sexuality without fear of interference from the government. We support adults involved in consensual activities such as BDSM (bondage, discipline, domination and submission, sadomasochism), lap-dancing, pornography, sex toys, polyamory, and sexual equality between men and women, LGBT (Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transgender) and heterosexuals, and between heteronormative sexualities and all others. We are against all non-consensual violence and sexual acts.

CAAN welcomes the opportunity to present these arguments in person for oral evidence.

CAAN’s statement

'We believe in the right of consenting adults to make their own sexual choices, in respect of what they do, see and enjoy alone or with other consenting adults, unhindered and unfettered by government.'

'We believe that it is not the business of government to intrude into the sex lives of consenting adults.'

Summary

The proposed new law presented in section 34 of the Criminal Justice and Licensing Bill is incompetently researched, without any proper foundation, ill thought-out, bigoted and likely to have the opposite effect that its proponents claim it will have. We reject it entirely.

The likely effect of this law will be to increase – not reduce – death and injury associated with sexual play and we call on those supporting this law to accept responsibility for this horrific outcome.

Poorly researched

The two major pieces of “research” which the government seems to enjoy referencing, the joint Home Office/Scottish Executive 2005 “Consultation on the Possession of Extreme Pornographic Images” and the Home Office’s 2007 “Evidence of harm to adults relating to exposure to extreme pornographic material (rapid evidence assessment)”, are biased, ill-founded, un-representative, and should be dismissed from consideration.

Of the first 2005 Consultation, it is often quoted that most of the respondents agreed that the law should be strengthened.

These numbers hardly suggest an overwhelming majority in favour of the law as the Scottish Government has repeatedly asserted. The fact that individuals were more likely to be against the law suggests that this law is dominated by special interest groups rather than representation of the people’s wishes.

The consultation was misleading in its construction. The original wording did not include non-violent rape as the current law proposes, and thus does not reflect views on that particular section. Questions about penalties assumed that a penalty was necessary. But most importantly, repeated references to child porn and harm to children encouraged people to equate the material with child porn, encouraging more emotional responses. Child porn is a red herring. This law is not about children, nor does it affect paedophiles. The entire consultation is tainted by these emotive hateful references.

In 2007 the Home Office rushed out a “rapid evidence assessment” that was even more flawed than the original consultation. This study has been severely criticised for flaws in its methodology. First, it was put together by three female academics with a known agenda around this issue. Questions of academic independence and evidence of objective scientific research have haunted this study since it was published. Second, it was based on a false and dishonest premise: the question that the academics were charged to answer was whether there was any evidence for harm resulting from watching certain images.

Such a biased question was capable of only one answer: yes. Just as a study looking for evidence of harm resulting from use of ladders or eating kebabs would also find evidence of harm, so this report found evidence of harm from pornography. The unasked responsible question was whether there was any evidence for net harm or overall harm.
Were the researchers to use balanced data, they may have found that countries with low levels of censorship appear to have lower levels of sex crime than those with greater censorship; countries that lighten their censorship burden appear to show an improvement in the net harm that individuals suffer.

In addition, it was very clear, from remarks made by the Sexual Offences Team that they had not truly understood the nature of the BDSM scene, the role that imagery plays within it, or the difference between commercially produced images, and images produced between consenting adults for personal use or educational purposes. They had not considered people with multiple partners, nor that people sometimes share pictures of past encounters with new partners. They seem to regard all images as commercial ones where the photographer is not a participant in the scene. This is ludicrous in amateur homemade images, and this commercially-focused "defence" in section 51C is useless.

To be honest, we would expect government to have a better grasp of the subject it was legislating on, and if not, to obtain balanced, objective, scientific research.

Ill thought-out

The fact that government have not truly thought through either the justification for or the consequences of this proposal lie in the BBFC exemption and the couples defence.

If the material in question causes demonstrable harm, then it is totally utterly irresponsible on the part of government to insert the BBFC exemption – and suggests a bowing to commercial (film) pressure in preference to a genuine desire to protect members of society. Further, would not most BBFC material fail the "realistic" or "pornographic" test once it is known that the material is from a film? There is no reason for this section to be in there.

Again, if government genuinely believes in the "slippery slope" concept (soft core porn leads to hard core porn leads to extreme porn leads to child porn leads to abuse and murder), as their justification for this legislation implies – we reject this theory as being, again, without good academic foundation and unsubstantiated - they will no doubt have come across the hypothesis that individuals move from fantasy toward acting out. The closer individuals are to acting out, on this model, the more dangerous they become.

Yet the government proposes to ban possession of pictures, whilst inserting a defence that pretty much encourages couples to act out their fantasies with one another and record the result for posterity. If there were any basis to the slippery slope argument, or genuine belief in it, this defence would suggest a total lack of joined-up thinking on the part of government. If the government truly abhors pornography and believes it will eventually lead people to violence, let's start at the beginning with Page 3, shall we?
Overall, the proposal is an exercise in elegant hypocrisy.

Bigoted

The Scottish government has refused to recognise that this law will affect the BDSM community in negative ways, and has on the contrary quite aggressively attacked the idea that BDSM between consenting adults is a legitimate sexuality. In both official releases and political pronouncements, government spokespeople have on several occasions gone to some lengths to equate the material in question with paedophile material (as mentioned above in the consultation and the impact inquiry, as well as comments made during the deliberations of the 2009 Sexual Offences (Scotland) Bill).

Either government spokespeople are unable to distinguish images of adults with leather and chains from those of children – and possibly raises other questions about their fitness on this issue – or that the alignment of the two issues is a cynical manoeuvre to justify their hatred toward individuals of a different sexuality.

The same techniques have been used in the past by homophobes. Homosexuals have frequently had to put up with slurs along the lines of: “but are they safe to employ as teachers?” and “don’t ask, don’t tell”. In words of one syllable: this has nothing to do with child abuse. There already exist more than adequate laws to deal with that issue – and therefore any mention of paedophilia in this debate is plain bigotry.

Unintended (and opposite) consequences

Expert consultations on the issue of BDSM, such as Scottish Law Commission’s latest recommendation, have argued strongly against use of criminal law in respect of this sexuality. The effect of such legislation is likely to be a blackmailer’s charter, as well as increase alienation between the BDSM community and proper authorities such as the police and health professionals.

Like other minorities, sexual minorities suffer from both perceived and actual persecution, which can have devastating effects on their mental health. Several studies have been done on the health problems associated with perceived and actual homophobia. Homosexuals, a more widely tolerated sexual minority, have been shown to feel alienated from the medical establishment, “reducing utilization of screening modalities, risking higher morbidity and mortality from infections, cancers, and heart disease”. These feelings can also internalised, where the individual turns on him or herself, which leads to socially negative attitudes towards the self, bringing on more mental distress. Perceived victimization, even if it is not actual victimization causes undue mental stress which causes distrust in institutions such as health care and public safety as well as personal health issues.

Large commercial producers will continue producing material within a whisker of the law, making money and promoting themes in ways government believes to be unhealthy and exploitative. Yet individuals will be unable to share pictures of themselves with their current partner under this law – an absurd proposition in an age where everything is made available to the world on Facebook.

As far as we are aware, government has made no provision for BDSM safety or sexual educational material. The Sexual Offences Team refused to state if such educational material would be legal. Although extreme play linked to, say, asphyxia (what happens when you do breath play wrong), and will carry on as ever, there will be a dearth of good films showing participants how to carry out the practice safely. There will however, be many commercially inspired films egging on people to experiment.

Only in government fantasy-land could this destruction of educational material and its supplanting by titillation be considered to be a positive thing.

The moral calculus

There has been a distinctly dishonest taint to many arguments for this law: when challenged for evidence, government spokespeople have tended toward the argument that there may not be evidence but given the risk of potential harm, they have a duty to take action. They assert that if even one life is saved, then the law would be valid.

This is deeply flawed argument, made more so by three aspects of the current debate: first, that there is some evidence that the availability of the material government is now seeking to ban actually reduces violence overall; second that a ban on this material will also damage educational efforts; and third that oppressing a section of society will cause mental health and relationship issues among that minority.

Government has relied in the past on an argument based on asymmetry: that legislation will either reduce some notional social harm, or have no effect. They have not considered the fact that this law may be harmful. There is a growing body of evidence that this legislation may well have a seriously negative outcome, to be measured in serious injury and death to innocent victims. If even one life is saved, then not passing the law would be valid.

We urge you to address this issue and err on the side of freedom rather than on the side of oppression.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from SAMH

SAMH

SAMH is Scotland’s leading mental health charity and is dedicated to mental health and wellbeing for all. SAMH provides an independent voice on all matters of relevance to people with mental health and related problems (including homelessness and addictions) provides advice and guidance to a wide range of national bodies and delivers direct support to over 3000 people through 80 services across Scotland.

The SAMH Centre for Research, Influence and Change lobbies for the development of legislation, policy and practice that is based on the real life experiences of people with mental health and related problems and that respects their human rights. The Centre also provides a range of information, training and consultancy on mental health and mental health problems.

SAMH is committed to challenging the stigma and discrimination experienced by people who live with mental health problems. SAMH provides direct line-management to respectme (Scotland’s anti-bullying service) and seeme (Scotland’s anti-stigma campaign).

Comments

SAMH is grateful for the opportunity to provide evidence to the Justice Committee on the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. Our interest in the Bill lies specifically in sections 14 and 17 of Part 1 which deal with Community Payback Orders and Presumption Against Short Periods of Imprisonment or Detention respectively, and in Part 7, Mental Disorder and Unfitness for Trial.

Section 14 of Part 1 of the Bill states that where a person is convicted of an offence punishable by imprisonment, the court may, instead of imposing a sentence of imprisonment, impose a community payback order in respect of the offender. These orders can include the imposition of an order requiring mental health treatment. This provision seems to overlap with the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003. Section 227R of the Bill acknowledges this and sets out the conditions that must be met in order for a mental health treatment requirement to be imposed. SAMH has long argued that people who have mental health problems should receive treatment rather than being imprisoned, and we hope that this Bill might present a mechanism for this. However, we are unsure about how this system would work in practice and specifically seek clarification about the role of judges. The Bill makes clear that the decision on whether an offender requires mental health treatment should be based on the opinion of medical practitioners. However, it is not clear who would make the decision to seek such opinions: would this rest with the defence, or would it be triggered by particular circumstances? What role would a judge then have in deciding whether treatment was required, and whether the offender should see a psychologist or other professional? Additionally, how would this option differ from a probation order with a condition of psychiatric treatment, an option that is already available to the court?

We are also unsure how this new system would relate to the existing Mental Health Tribunal, which deals with detentions and orders under the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act 2003. Is there a danger that Community Payback Orders would risk setting up a parallel system? Finally and most importantly, the Mental Health (Care and Treatment) (Scotland) Act is based on a set of principles such as reciprocity and least restrictive alternative. These principles underpin the Act and give it much of its credibility. Would mental health treatment ordered under these new Community Payback Orders be based on the same principles? If not, this would seem to create an unfair disparity which would cause SAMH great concern.

We would like to emphasise that at this stage, we are not necessarily against this new system: indeed it may be that it presents an opportunity to divert people from prison if they require support for a mental health problem. However, there are a number of areas where clarity is required before we can properly form an opinion on this area of the Bill.

SAMH welcomes the presumption against short periods of imprisonment or detention and would like to emphasise the benefits to mental health that this change could bring about. People with mental health problems are disproportionately found within the criminal justice system. The final report of the UK Equalities Review\(^1\) states, ‘in such cases the encounter with the criminal justice system can become a trigger for a series of further traumatising disadvantages which are the basis for persistent and damaging inequalities.’

A thematic review of the care and support of prisoners with mental health needs carried out in England and Wales\(^2\) pointed out that the need for mental healthcare in prisons will always remain greater than the capacity, unless mental health and community services outside prison are improved and people are appropriately directed to them: before, instead of, and after custody.

National standards require prison-based social workers to prioritise prisoners who have mental health problems. But those on remand or on short sentences are often not able to access social work services, because of the high demand for these services. As well as the lack of consistent mental health services within prisons, prisoners’ mental health can also be affected by their situation. Loss of social acceptance, of material possessions and separation from family, friends and other social supports can all have an impact. The UK Joint Parliamentary Committee on Human Rights stated in 2004 that “prison actually leads to an acute worsening of mental health problems”\(^3\).

For all of these reasons, SAMH commends the presumption against short-term sentences, and hopes that this will be accompanied by appropriate investment in and signposting to community-based mental health services both for current prisoners and those who in future may be diverted from prison. We are aware that NHS Scotland is due to take on responsibility for healthcare in prisons and we believe that this presents an opportunity to greatly improve the mental health of current and future prisoners.

Turning to part 7 of this Bill, we recognise that the proposals in this section appear to stem in part from the Scottish Law Commission’s 2004 Report on Insanity and Diminished Responsibility. In general we see no difficulties with these changes and welcome the move to a more modern form of language.

However we wish to seek clarification of section 117 in Part 7 of the Bill, which proposes to amend section 51 of the 1995 Act to include the text

“But a person does not lack criminal responsibility for such conduct if the mental disorder in question consists only of a personality disorder which is characterised solely or principally by abnormally aggressive or seriously irresponsible conduct”.

Given that this section of the law would mean that people with one particular type of mental health problem would have criminal responsibility where people with a different type of problem would not, it is important to be clear about the definitions used here. Therefore SAMH would like to see:

- a definition of “abnormally aggressive or seriously irresponsible conduct”; and

- clarification of the process that will be used to identify a personality disorder which is characterised in this way and in particular, who will be responsible for making this decision.

SAMH wishes to offer one final comment which relates to the perceived credibility of people with mental health problems within the criminal justice system. Although this Bill makes some provisions for vulnerable witnesses, it does not address the problem that people with mental health problems are too often assumed to be unreliable witnesses. The Mental Welfare Commission produced an excellent report highlighting this issue in 2008. The report, Justice Denied, set out the experience of a woman with a learning disability who was the victim of repeated assaults. No-one was ever prosecuted for these offences, in part because it was assumed that she was not a credible witness. Experiences like these are all too common for people with both mental health problems and learning disabilities and SAMH believes that this problem must be addressed.

SAMH trusts this evidence is of use and would be pleased to discuss it further with the Committee.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Margaret Curran MSP
Member of the Scottish Parliament for Glasgow Baillieston

I am writing to you to submit my views to the consultation process on the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill, which was introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 5 March 2009.

I am making this submission in my capacity as Member of the Scottish Parliament for Glasgow Baillieston constituency and my submission concerns a change to the current charges that can be imposed, allowing public prosecutors to place charges that reflect the severity of a crime, based on the context of the crime as well as the nature.

I am particularly interested in the Bill following a case that was brought to me by a constituent. On 11 August 2007, Stuart Baillie was stabbed to death in Glasgow by Ian Lowrie, who has been convicted of Culpable Homicide and sentenced to 11 years and 4 months imprisonment. However, as Stuart lay on the ground, bleeding to death, there is sufficient evidence to suggest that Christopher Spence began kicking him in the head. It cannot be ascertained what actual part this played in Stuart's death but it is most likely that it did not contribute to his death. Therefore, Christopher Spence was merely charged with Breach of the Peace and a custodial sentence of 9 months' imprisonment was imposed.

Stuart Baillie’s mother, my constituent, Christine Halley, is devastated and insulted that Christopher Spence has not been more severely reprimanded by the judicial system for his barbaric actions. Unfortunately, the offence with which Christopher Spence was charged only reflected the direct damage he inflicted on those around him at the time and not the savage context in which he committed the crime.

It is virtually impossible for victims such as Christine Halley to lodge an appeal under circumstances such as these because, according to the Court, “It is clear that a person is not to be subjected to the risk of an increase in sentence just because the appeal court considers that it would have passed a more severe sentence than that which was passed in the first instance.”

It is so important that we create the scope for fair application of the law and that prosecutors are given the means to charge criminals with offences that reflect the barbarity of the crime and not simply the inadequate parameters of criminal law. This would then allow judges to pass more severe sentences in the first instance.
GeneWatch UK welcomes the opportunity to comment on the general principles of the Bill. Our comments are restricted to Sections 58 – 60 - Retention and use of samples etc.

In general we welcome the provisions in the Bill, however we note a number of areas where safeguards could be improved in order to ensure better governance and accountability and improve public trust.

In this context, we note that Scotland has a unique opportunity to set high international standards for the governance of forensic databases. The UK Government is committed to holding a consultation on a proposed Forensics White Paper before the summer, and members of the Westminster Parliament and the public are likely to draw on any examples of best practice set by Scotland. Further, the provisions already adopted by Scotland in relation to retention of forensic data are becoming a matter of debate across the globe in countries seeking to expand DNA databases (such as the USA and Australia) or establish new DNA databases (such as Ireland, South Africa, Malaysia, Tanzania, Jamaica, Russia, Uzbekistan and China). GeneWatch UK would therefore welcome any initiatives that the Committee takes to improve safeguards in this important area.

1. GeneWatch welcomes the Scottish Government’s adoption of the principle that, in general, samples and records of forensic data must be destroyed once the decision is taken not to prosecute an individual for the offence the samples and records were collected in connection with, or, if the individual is prosecuted, when the proceedings end without a conviction. This principled stance has been vindicated by the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights in the case of S. and Marper v. UK, in which the UK Government’s legislation was found to be in violation of Article 8 of the Convention. The Scottish Government’s position on this issue was noted by the Court and is now supported by both main opposition parties at Westminster. The inventor of DNA fingerprinting, Professor Sir Alec Jeffreys, has warned that, in contrast, the UK Government is putting at risk public support for the National DNA Database by continuing to hold the genetic details of hundreds of thousands of innocent people.1

2. GeneWatch accepts that temporary retention of forensic data from a small number of individuals following acquittal may be appropriate. We support the principles on which these exceptions are based, namely: retention is limited to persons proceeded against in connection with serious violent or sexual offences; is time limited; requires judicial oversight after the initial 3 years and allows a right of appeal. GeneWatch accepts that there is in principle no reason to prevent retention of fingerprint and other forensic data in circumstances where retention of DNA profiles is allowed, and that the Bill rightly seeks to achieve consistency in this.

3. GeneWatch accepts that the retention of some forensic data from children is appropriate, provided due attention is paid to children’s rights and the special circumstances that pertain. We regard as proportionate the provisions in the Bill for the retention for three years of forensic data taken under existing powers where a child accepts or is found by a Sheriff to have committed one of certain serious violent and sexual offences, with discretion for the chief constable to apply to a sheriff for extensions of up to 2 years at a time to provide a means of managing high risk cases. However, we agree with the Children’s Commissioner and others that care should be taken in regard to criminalising consensual sex between children who are both under the age of 16, or where there is a small age difference, and that the category of relevant sexual offence should therefore not be defined too broadly.

4. GeneWatch notes that if person is convicted, his or her forensic data may be retained indefinitely, subject to periodic weeding of records relating to old or minor offences. In England and Wales, similar weeding rules were abandoned without any parliamentary oversight of this decision, so that permanent records, linked to forensic data, are now retained for all recordable offences (until age 100). In GeneWatch’s view this is disproportionate and open to abuse. Indefinite retention would be of particular concern in relation to minor offences committed by children and young people and/or protest-related offences (such as Breach of the Peace), in view of the fact that DNA profiles may be used to track individuals or their relatives, and retained records can lead to erosion of individuals’ rights (for example, refusal of visas or employment). We therefore urge the Committee to consider putting the weeding rules for records relating to old and minor offences on a statutory basis, with a view to improving public trust in the system of oversight for police records and linked forensic data. Such an approach would also ensure consistency with the principles enshrined in the Data Protection Act, namely that personal data should not be retained for longer than is necessary, and with the provisions contained in Recommendation No. R (92) of the Council of Europe Committee of Ministers.²

5. We note that, consistent with the principles enshrined in the Data Protection Act, personal data should not be retained for longer than is necessary, in relation to the purpose for which it has been obtained. We therefore question the lack of any provision in the Bill for the destruction of DNA samples once the computerised DNA profiles needed for identification purposes have been obtained. The Marper judgment states: “Given the nature and the amount of personal information contained in cellular samples their retention per se must be regarded as interfering with the right to respect for the private lives of the individuals concerned”. DNA samples are destroyed immediately following analysis in some EU countries (Germany, Lithuania, Sweden and Belgium), reinforcing the view expressed by GeneWatch and others – including the Human Genetics Commission - in previous consultations that their retention is unnecessary.³ In view of the sensitive nature of the genetic information held in samples, and the high cost of storing them, GeneWatch recommends that all DNA samples should be destroyed once the DNA profile has been loaded onto the Database, or after a temporary retention period specified in legislation, if this is deemed necessary for quality assurance procedures.

6. In principle, GeneWatch supports the proposal to restrict uses of forensic data. However, we are concerned that “the prevention or detection of crime” has been broadly interpreted in England and Wales to include a wide variety of research and operational uses of the database, some of which raise serious concerns, such as predicting ethnic appearance or other characteristics from an individual’s DNA. GeneWatch therefore recommends that research using the database should be clearly restricted to assessment of its performance (for example, identifying false match rates etc.) and that legislation should explicitly outlaw attempts to correlate DNA profiles with individual characteristics or any other stored data (such as category of offence). There is no scientific or ethical justification for such studies to take place.

7. Further, we are concerned that the phrase “identification of a person” is also open to abuse, in circumstances where there is no reason to believe that such identification is necessary to enable the prevention or detection of crime.

8. The National DNA Database now benefits from the existence of a Forensic Regulator, supported by a Forensic Science Advisory Council (FSAC), the membership of which includes a representative of the Scottish Police Services Authority, and an Ethics Group. These bodies consider quality assurance standards and ethical standards for the storage and use of forensic data, respectively. GeneWatch recommends that the Committee considers the extent to which these or similar arrangements might be put on a statutory basis, bearing in mind the need to consider governance of both the Scottish DNA Database, and the National DNA Database (to which unmatched DNA profiles from Scotland are exported).

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Helen McGregor

I wish to add my support to the Criminal Justice & Licensing (Scotland) Bill which is being discussed in Parliament today. As a supporter of any cause which addresses any form of violence against women and prevents abuse of any kind, I wish my views to be noted.
I am writing in response to the publication of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill: Criminalising the possession of extreme pornography.

I welcome the proposals to criminalise the possession of material that is considered to be extreme pornography. I believe that this legislation is required urgently in order to address the increasing amount of 'extreme' pornographic material which exists in the context of the prevalence and normalisation in popular culture of all forms of pornographic material.

The 'pornification' of our society means that women are increasingly treated as sex objects and the resulting harm to women is immeasurable.

The proliferation of the internet, coupled with the sex object culture in which we live, now means that many young people are getting their first information on sex and sexuality from internet pornography. The implications of this are that images shown in pornography become normalised and young people grow up with the distorted view around men and women and sexual acts, whereby men are dominant and violent and women are submissive and aroused by violence.

Pornography perpetuates myths about rape which can make it difficult for victims of sexual offences to be believed or seen as credible, and makes it harder for them to come forward and be treated fairly. In Scotland, we face a shameful 2.9% rape conviction rate; we must question what role pornography plays in feeding into a culture where sexual violence is normalised.

This legislation is the first steps in addressing the most extreme forms of pornography. However, I view the existence of this material as being enabled by the existence of all other pornography.

My views on this issue are not based on any moralistic judgements. My concerns are around the harm pornography causes to women and men, and how our 'sex object culture' underpins gender-based violence and discrimination.

Written submission from Zero Tolerance

About Zero Tolerance

The Zero Tolerance Charitable Trust is pleased to have the opportunity to comment on this Bill. We are a small national charity promoting innovative policy and practice to address the root causes of male violence against women and children. We pioneered the 3 P’s approach to tackling male violence – protection, provision and prevention. Of these, we believe that the prevention of violence through education is the key to changing the culture of endemic violence in which we live.

Since we began our work in 1992, we have run a number of campaigns to raise awareness about the prevalence of domestic abuse and child sexual abuse, the excuses people use for this violence, the failings of the criminal justice system in addressing these, and the need for people (and particularly young people) to develop respect as one way of eradicating this violence and preventing a new generation of abusers.

We continue to aspire to a world free of male violence against women and are working on a range of projects and initiatives towards that goal. Our ‘Respect’ programme teaches children how to develop healthy relationships, to understand concepts such a power, violence and control and to deconstruct gender stereotypes, through a teaching pack used in the majority of Scotland’s local authorities and many across the rest of the UK. We are also developing a new violence prevention network to enable people working in this field to work more effectively together and to develop new violence prevention campaigns. As such, we take a keen interest in any legislative changes which impact on violence against women and this Bill in particular is of great interest.

Our views on this Bill

Zero Tolerance welcomes the government’s proposals to criminalise the possession of material that are considered to be extreme pornography. Legislating on this issue is an important part of publicly naming this material as totally unacceptable, indeed harmful, and we are pleased that this first step has been taken to address the nature and prevalence of these images.

The acts considered to be ‘extreme pornography’ in this bill are defined as such when they can be identified as obscene, pornographic and extreme.

These are defined as:

(a) Obscene
The test of “obscene” means that the material must be of such a nature that it would fall within the category of the material whose sale etc. is already prohibited under section 51 of the 1982 Act.
There is no definition of obscene, but courts apply a common law test of whether the material is ‘calculated to deprave or corrupt persons open to depraving or corrupting’.

(b) Pornographic

(3) An image is pornographic if it is of such a nature that it must reasonably be assumed to have been made solely or principally for the purpose of sexual arousal.

(c) Extreme
An image is extreme if it depicts, in an explicit and realistic way any of the following—
(a) an act which takes or threatens a person’s life,
(b) an act which results, or is likely to result, in a person’s severe injury,
(c) rape or other non-consensual penetrative sexual activity,
(d) sexual activity involving (directly or indirectly) a human corpse,
(e) an act, which involves sexual activity between a person and an animal (or the carcass of an animal).

Why is this legislation needed?

Zero Tolerance believes that this type of legislation is urgently needed in order to address the increasing volume of what is referred to in this bill as ‘extreme’ pornographic material, which exists in the context of the prevalence and normalisation in popular culture of all forms of pornographic material.

In daily newspapers and in both male and female orientated magazines, women’s bodies are routinely portrayed as sexualised and available through the proliferation of homogenous images of the ‘ideal’ female form. This sexualised ‘ideal’ is at its most extreme in pornography and there is deep concern that these images are feeding directly into what young girls in particular, understand as expectations of how their bodies should be and what it means to be ‘sexual’. Men are also being sold a very narrow, prescriptive and extreme form of masculinity, where male dominance and control can be maintained through male sexuality, as depicted in pornography. We believe that this pressure and the expectations implied through the cultural prevalence of pornographic sexuality are harmful to men as well as women.

Our analysis of pornography is that is represents sex as domination, humiliation and as a way of pushing the female body to its physical limits. Women in pornography are not represented as individuals or sentient beings-they exist anonymously, purely for male sexual gratification where the focus of the images is male sexuality. In pornography, sex is depicted through violence; in the acts themselves- for example double vaginal and anal penetration is standard practice in mainstream pornography; and in the language used to describe the acts and the women they are enacted upon. (See Robert Jensen ‘Pornography and the End of Masculinity’, 2007)

Pornography also celebrates under-age sex and sex with young ‘barely legal’ girls. Those women that are not especially young are portrayed as so, in schoolgirl outfits and through the language used to address them. For example, on one site: "innocent teen girls face their worst sex related nightmares."

Not only are men in control in front of the camera in pornography, it is predominantly men who direct pornographic films, who view pornography and who make profit from pornography. As a cause and a consequence of wider gender inequality, we view all pornography as violence against women; not only in the acts that are played out on the bodies of individual women, but in terms of the effects the normalisation of this violence and degradation has on the unequal status of all women.

There is much evidence to demonstrate that many women who are involved in the sex industry, including in pornography, have personal histories of sexual and other abuse, poverty, social and economic deprivation and exclusion. We believe that society has a responsibility to protect vulnerable groups and individuals; in the sex industry we see the opposite – vulnerable women being groomed and exploited for the profits of big business.

In the contemporary social and political climate, where rape conviction rates are as low as 2.9% in Scotland, (Scottish Government figures for 2006/07) we have to ask what role pornography plays in feeding into a culture where sexual violence is normalised and even glamorised. Pornography perpetuates myths about rape, which can make it hard for sex offence victims to be believed or seen as credible, and makes it more difficult for them to come forward and be treated fairly.

This legislation takes the first step in addressing the most extreme forms of pornography; specifically, those depicting rape and acts that are viewed as being without question, totally degrading and unacceptable to society. We view the existence of this material as being enabled and supported by all other pornography, which is in itself characteristically violent. We understand ‘violent’ in terms of the full meaning of the word; often physical violence, but also as violation; violation of the integrity and dignity of wider society, in the way pornography compromises wider gender equality, as well as violation of the individuals appearing in the images themselves.

Our objections are not based on a moralistic, religious, prudish or anti-sex perspective; they are focused on harm; and we would urge the committee to keep harm at the centre of its discussion on these provisions.

Specific comments

As well as drawing attention to the existence of such material, an important part of this legislation is turning the burden of responsibility onto those people who demand, consume and possess the material. There is already legislation in place which criminalises the display, publishing, selling and distribution of this type of material, and possession with a view to onward sale or distribution, but these new provisions will send a message that individual possession of such material is harmful, damaging and unacceptable.

We believe that this makes a clear connection between those who use extreme pornography and the actual acts perpetrated within the material. This recognises that demand for such material increases its production but also, that the very consumption and viewing of such material is fundamentally harmful to society as a whole, in its celebration of the inhuman and violent treatment of women.

We welcome the specific reference to rape and other non-consensual penetrative sexual activity within the definition of extreme pornography. Unlike similar legislation in England & Wales, the bill does not make a distinction between ‘violent’ rape, and rape in general, a distinction which is extremely unhelpful and which we are glad to see is being rejected in Scotland. All rape is violent.

Along with sister organisations in our sector we believe that consideration of the following amendments to the bill would strengthen the legislation and make it more effective in tackling the type of material it seeks to control.

(1) Amendment to definition of extreme

Change wording to:-

(b) an act which results, or threatens to result, in a person’s severe injury,

The use of “threatens to” instead of “likely to” would increase the proposals’ scope to cover all acts of rape, which could all be said to threaten severe injury but not all are likely to result in severe injury.

(2) Broaden the scope of material covered to include non-photographic visual depictions of extreme pornography

As the bill is currently written, to meet the definition of ‘extreme’, the material in questions must be explicit and realistic. The terms “explicit” and “realistic” require that the act depicted in the image must be clearly seen, lifelike and convincing and appear to a reasonable person to be real. It is not required that the act itself is real.

There is a strong feeling that there is a missed opportunity in not including non-photographic representations of extreme acts in the bill. This means for example that the provision in the bill will not cover depictions of extreme pornography on virtual worlds such as Second Life, where the pornography is violent, extreme and interactive, but where the images are not photographic. Similarly, we would like to emphasise that there is still a need to enact similar legislation in relation to child pornography, as proposed by the Scottish Executive in early 2007.

(3) Broaden the definition of extreme to include depictions of incest

Although the legislation will cover depictions of rape and non-consensual penetrative sexual activity, which fit the definition of obscene and pornographic, this will not necessarily cover pornography which glorifies incest, unless it is clear that the young woman depicted is not of an age to consent. For example, one pornography website is headed ‘Welcome to Daddy’s Whore’ and other similar sites are easily found through search engines. This type of content is unlikely to be covered by the legislation because these sites usually state that the young women featured are over 18.
We believe serious consideration must be given to extending the definition of extreme to include depictions of incest, which is an illegal activity, to ensure these types of materials are covered by the legislation.

(4) Ensure a clear definition of possession
Clarity is required as to what “possession” covers. Will it cover those people who access pornography without downloading files? Although the bill does not criminalise accidental or single viewing, we believe it must cover repeated viewings of this type of material, whether or not the material was actually downloaded.

General comments

Zero Tolerance believes that this piece of legislation is a very important step in what we hope will be the beginning of a process to address the harm caused by pornography. It is a sad reality that many of our young people are getting their first pieces of information and experience on sex and sexuality from internet pornography. The implications of this on both their self-esteem and understanding of the nature of sex, sexuality and its place in their lives is massive. Most worrying is the message it gives to young people about the normative roles men and women act out during sex, men dominant and women passive; men violent and brutal, women aroused by violence and brutality.

Sex in pornography is portrayed through testing the physical boundaries of the female body and dressing this up as erotic and sexual; it is never about human relationships or intimacy. We believe there is a real case to be made for government’s attention to this, in terms of the consequences pornography is having on society as a whole, but particularly the next generation, the largest users of pornography and whose access to this material is virtually unchecked.

We also urge the Committee to consider the need for public education. This includes public education on the introduction of the proposed legislation to ensure people understand the new onus on tackling demand; but also a broader public education campaign on the realities of pornography. We know from the training and awareness raising work that we do that many parents/carers are completely unaware of the type of material that young people can very easily gain access to, and that they are horrified once they know the reality of how easily available extreme pornography is and what it contains.

The youth workers, children’s outreach workers and teachers we speak to about this issue are beginning to understand the realities of contemporary pornography, and that it is a world away from the soft-focus films they used to know about, but we believe the wider public and especially parents need and deserve to know what is widely and easily available. We can offer an education session to the Justice Committee if members wish to gain further information about the realities of pornography and its saturation of popular culture, and hope that this offer might be taken up.
I would like firstly to indicate my support for the general principles of this Bill, which your Committee is considering.

In particular I wish to raise with the committee the importance of developing a sentencing policy which takes into account the best interests of any children of offenders when sentencing an offender who is a primary care giver.

As you may be aware, a decision last year by the South African Constitutional Court held that all sentencing courts must give specific consideration to how a custodial sentence will impact on any children that the convicted person has under their care. Thus, if a non custodial sentence is considered appropriate by the courts, this will be implemented in order to punish the perpetrator without unduly disrupting the family life of any children involved.

Adopting a similar policy in Scotland would have a number of benefits for Scottish society. Most importantly, it would reduce the severely negative impact on children when their sole parent or guardian is incarcerated. The disruption to the life of a child this can cause is harmful and often irreversibly damaging a child’s prospects for later life. Non custodial sentences for primary care givers in certain cases would keep a family unit together while also punishing the adult for the crime committed.

In addition, a change in sentencing policy along these lines could help tackle Scotland’s alarmingly high rate of imprisonment, in line with Government policy in this area and the general principles of the Bill. In particular, given that the majority of convicted criminals with dependent children are female this policy could help cut the female prison population which has almost doubled in the last decade.

I must stress that I am not advocating that convicted criminals who are also primary care givers should not be properly punished. Any person, whether they have children or not, that poses a threat to the public should be incarcerated.

However, imprisoning low level offenders who have children has a wider social impact as families are broken up. Through punishing such offenders in the community, justice could be served and Scottish society would not have to deal with the long term social consequences of family breakdown.

I have raised this issue directly with the Scottish Government, and with a range of organisations which support children in such situations, all of whom have indicated the importance of recognising this issue. I have also made a submission to the Sentencing Council outlining these points, and have mentioned it in discussion on the Education, Lifelong Learning and Culture Committee.

I hope the Justice Committee will be able to give due consideration to this suggestion as it examines the broader scope of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from the Joint Faiths Advisory Board on Criminal Justice

The Joint Faiths Advisory Board on Criminal Justice brings together various strands of the engagement between Scotland's faith communities and the criminal justice system. Members are appointed to the Board by the main churches, by Action of Churches Together in Scotland and by the Scottish Inter Faith Council.

This submission relates only to the provisions on sentencing in Part 1 of the Bill.

Part 1: Sentencing

Sections 3-13 - the Scottish Sentencing Council

We welcome the creation of a Scottish Sentencing Council and broadly support the proposals made in this Bill.

However, we continue to recommend that in order to give the SSC the best chance of success it would be preferable to draw membership of the Council from a wider range of the professions involved in justice system. We would particularly welcome additional lay members from the Scottish Prison Service, criminal justice social work teams and Community Justice Authorities.

More detailed views on the establishment of a Scottish Sentencing Council are available in the Joint Faiths Advisory Board on Criminal Justice response to the Scottish Government’s Consultation on Sentencing Guidelines and A Scottish Sentencing Council.

Section 14 – Community Payback Orders

"Payback" as a concept could be closely allied to Restorative Justice. We believe that "unpaid work and other activity" will have most meaning for all concerned when it is demonstrably restorative to the community or persons affected by the offending behaviour.

We would like to see restorative justice included as a possible part of the sentencing system and community programmes. At the heart of restorative justice is a focus not just on the offender but on the victim and the community. It creates the possibility for the victim, if they wish to do so, to have personal contact with the offender and for the offender to truly understand the consequences of their actions. Restorative Justice also allows the community to participate in the restoration of its own peace.

Section 17 – Presumption against short periods of imprisonment or detention

We strongly support the proposals to create a presumption against short periods of imprisonment or detention. We concur with the assessment of the of “Scotland’s Choice: Report of the Scottish Prison Commission” July 2008 that in order for this change to be effective it is necessary that there be dialogue between the Scottish Sentencing Council and judges to ensure that Community Payback Orders provide a practical and beneficial alternative to prison and that longer prison terms are used appropriately. We maintain that this dialogue will be more effective if there is a greater lay representation on the Scottish Sentencing Council.

Section 24 – Voluntary intoxication by alcohol: effect in sentencing

We support the provisions in the Bill to ensure that being voluntarily under the influence of alcohol cannot be considered a mitigating factor.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from the Church of Scotland

This response covers 2 of the 3 sections: Sentencing (alternatives to custody) and Criminal Procedure (prosecution of children)

Part 3: Criminal Procedure

Section 38 – Prosecution of Children

The Church of Scotland welcomes provisions in the Bill to raise the age of criminal responsibility by prohibiting the prosecution of children under 12 while still allowing them to be referred to a Children’s Hearing on offence grounds. We are pleased that these provisions acknowledge the 2008 recommendations by the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child and hope to see the Government acting on the other recommendations of this report in due course.

However, we note with that these provisions in effect bring Scotland up to the minimum accepted international standards and that such a low aspiration creates inconsistencies with other current legislative changes. These provisions, when read in parallel with the provisions on Older Children in the Sexual Offences (Scotland) Bill, mean that a child aged 13 could be subject to criminal prosecution under the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill provisions for sexual behaviour which, under the Sexual Offences (Scotland) Bill that child is deemed incapable of consenting too. We hope that the Justice Committee will review this issue and bring forward an appropriate resolution.

Part 1: Sentencing

The Church of Scotland engages with the Criminal Justice system through the work of prison chaplains, of local congregations, and of its Church & Society Council. All of these strands of work are brought together in the Joint Faiths Advisory Board on Criminal Justice, in which we share with other churches and faith communities.

The Church is therefore happy to endorse the response from the Board to the consultation on Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill.

In particular, we believe that these proposals broadly reflect the concerns expressed in a report "What’s the Alternative?", presented to the General Assembly of 2007 and since then widely discussed in the Church.
Clydebank Women’s Aid has been supporting women, children and young people who are experiencing domestic abuse since 1981. We provide refuge accommodation and drop in information and support, follow on and outreach support in the Clydebank area but accommodate women from all over. Women, children and young people and workers’ experiences inform this response. We are part of the West Dunbartonshire Violence Against women partnership and campaign against domestic abuse and all forms of violence against women.

We also campaign to improve legislation and services so that the barriers that women and children face in trying to flee domestic abuse and live in safety are reduced and ultimately removed.

We are particularly interested in two aspects of the new Criminal Justice and Licensing Bill: Parts 16 and 17, Short sentences and section 34, Sexual offences, extreme pornography.

Parts 16 & 17, short sentences

As a women’s organisation, we understand that the above proposals may have a progressive impact on women’s lives. For example, the very many women who are imprisoned for non payment of fines through being abused by prostitution or women with drug or alcohol dependency who receive short sentences for financial crimes do not benefit at all from short sentences. Much evidence is available to show that women in prison consistently have life histories that involve many forms of abuse including child sexual abuse, sexual violence and domestic abuse. When considering sentencing policy, we wish to emphasise that the Governments’ gendered analysis of these crimes should be reflected.

An assumption against sentences less than 6 months will be gendered in its impact. For women facing sentencing themselves it is likely to be positive. However women affected by crimes committed against them by men may be affected detrimentally.

Currently, in the minority of situations where a man is successfully prosecuted for domestic abuse, even a short sentence can provide women and children the opportunity to obtain safe accommodation and protective legal orders with the rare certain knowledge that their abuser is not living in the community. It is likely, given the evidence of what generally happens that most men are unlikely to be at risk of receiving a sentence of more than 6 months. So, the policy would have the effect of removing prison as a consequence of perpetrating domestic abuse unless the conviction was very serious. This could increase the risks to safety for women, children and young people.
Abusers, who often even now have little fear of the criminal justice system, may well calculate accurately that they can continue to abuse with relative impunity and actually use this legislative change as a further tool of control. Specifically, it could undermine the work of the Domestic Abuse Courts.

For these reasons, Clydebank Women’s Aid are opposed to a presumption against sentences of less than 6 months where there is violent crime and/or a background of domestic abuse. Courts should instead be obliged to consider context, past history and behaviour, evidence of patterns of abuse and controlling behaviour. This is particularly important as looking just at individual incidents does not always reflect the reality of the gendered nature of domestic abuse as a pattern of coercive control. Taking this approach would not be new but would join up Government policy on Domestic Abuse and ‘Getting It right for every child’. It may be useful to consider what role and what impact the use of the ‘data capture tool’ may have in sentencing when there is domestic abuse.

Section 34; Extreme pornography

Generally, we associate with the submissions from Rape Crisis and The Women’s Support Project. This legislation gives the opportunity to mainstream and imbed Government policy and strategy in the area of violence against women, children and young people. This violence is overwhelmingly (93%) perpetrated by men. The links between all forms of violence against women: domestic abuse, rape and sexual assault are now well understood and documented. Pornography’s role in perpetuating that violence needs to be recognised more widely. This legislation could assist in raising awareness about the harm pornography causes to the women, children and young people directly abused in its production and to women, children and young people more generally in society as a whole. Andrea Dworkin commented “pornography is the theory, rape is the practice.” Challenging pornography is integral to effectively challenging the attitudes that perpetuate inequality and the oppression of women, children and young people. The Scottish Government has defined pornography as violence against women. The law relating to pornography should reflect that.

We hope our comments are useful and that this legislation will be pivotal in the struggle against violence against women, children and young people.
Justice Committee
Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill
Written submission from Ayrshire Criminal Justice Social Work Partnership

From a Criminal Justice Social Work perspective the implications of the Part 1 of the Bill are generally welcomed. The emphasis on reducing the unnecessary use of custody and increasing the use of community disposals, which was highlighted in Scotland’s Choice, is to be commended. Part 1 of the Bill proposes a range of actions to achieve this and the following specific comments are made.

The presumption against custodial sentences of less than 6 months (Section 17) is particularly welcomed and could be described as the basis on which the rest of the Bill relevant to Criminal Justice Social Work is built. Criminal Justice Social Work have been tasked since the introduction of National Objectives and Standards for Social Work Services in the Criminal Justice System eighteen years ago with reducing unnecessary custody through well targeted community disposals. However, this was completely premised on Criminal Justice Social Work through Social Enquiry Reports being able to persuade the judiciary that a community sentence would be appropriate in the circumstances. The introduction of a resumption against imposing custodial sentences of under 6 months, whilst clearly not restricting the judiciary’s use of custody, should improve targeting of community disposals.

The establishment of a Scottish Sentencing Council (Section 3) is also welcomed. The aims of the sentencing Council of promoting consistency of sentencing, developing sentencing policy and promoting greater awareness and understanding in the public of sentencing policy and practice is much needed. In terms of consistency it had historically been the experience of Criminal Justice Social Work in the Ayrshire Partnership that sentencing at the two Sheriff Courts could be at odds with the rest of Scotland. There is a need to improve and develop sentencing practice and the introduction of sentencing guidelines by the Sentencing Council should minimise any sentencing lottery.

The major implication of the Bill for Criminal Justice Social Work will be the introduction of a Community Payback Order (Section 14). It is recognised that following the Government Review of Community Sentences and the Reforming and Revitalising Report there were concerns regarding the public’s understanding of community sentencing. The ending of probation, community service and supervised attendance and replacement with a single Community Payback Order, with 7 possible conditions that can be added, may well be more understandable to the public, whether this improves the sentencing process is perhaps more difficult to answer. There are some concerns regarding the introduction of the unpaid work condition to District Courts [Sec 14, 227A(5)]. Community Service is currently not available to District Courts and potentially this important resource could be diluted through use with lower tariff offenders.
It is assumed that should this legislation be passed and Part 1 of the Bill implemented there will be significant costs incurred. The financial memorandum by using 10% to 20% assumptions of increases in workload reflects uncertainties of costs. Part 1 of the Bill’s focus is the reduction of short custodial sentences and a commensurate reduction in the daily prison population. In order for this to be successful there will be a need to increase the amount of funding Criminal Justice Social Work receives. It is recognised that a reduction in custody would allow the transfer of resources from the prison to the Community.

Other aspects of the Bill in relation to targeting serious crime and changes in criminal justice procedures are also welcomed.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Punch Taverns

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill – Justice Committee Call for Evidence

Punch Taverns is the largest Pub Company in Britain and has over 450 licensed premises in Scotland.

We have expressed on many occasions, our views relating to licensing reform in Scotland. We welcome this opportunity to comment on The Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill in so far as it impacts on licensing.

We have considered the Bill and would submit the following comments on it:

Section 128 - Applications for licences

Whilst we have no objection to applicants’ personal information and addresses etc. being provided to Boards, police, and other statutory bodies this information must not be available in the public domain.

Section 131 - Premises licence applications: modification of layout plans

We are strongly opposed to this proposed amendment.

The proposed amendment would enable Licensing Boards, when considering an application, to amend layout plans. This would mean that Boards could impose alterations to premises, thereby altering their physical layout. This could result in Boards effectively obliging applicants to incur significant building/development costs and to obtain, if they could, the necessary permissions/warrants (planning, building, etc.).

Boards already have the ability to reject applications for premises licences based on “the location, character and condition of premises...” (Section 23 (5) (d) (ii) Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005, “the 2005 Act”).

Section 132 - Premises licence applications: antisocial behaviour reports

We support and welcome the proposed change in so far as it intends to remove the obligation on the Police to provide “Anti Social Behaviour Reports” in respect of all applications for premises licences but do note the obligation imposed on the Police by virtue of Section 21 (3) (b) of “the 2005 Act”.

Section 134 - Occasional licences

We would support this change, which seeks to resolve a problem with the 2005 Act, and request that consideration be given to extending this process to occasional extensions also.

Section 136 - Personal licences

We are somewhat concerned that while Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 is still in its infancy, amendments of this type are being considered. We say this with regard to the proposed intention of preventing a person from holding more than one personal licence. We are not aware that in the early stages of the current licensing reform there exists an issue in this regard. We believe there exists sufficient safeguards to prevent the issues which appear to cause the Government concern.

Section 137 - Emergency closure orders

We welcome the clarification as to the rank of officer who can sanction these Orders.

Section 138 - False statements in applications: offence

We would appreciate some clarification during the course of the Justice Committee’s consideration of this clause as to what is meant by “knowingly.” We would highlight that it is possible that an applicant may make a statement in good faith in an application which is later proved to be incorrect, although the declaration was “knowingly” made at the time. We would hope that honest oversights or mistakes would not be caught by this provision and assurances to this effect would be welcome.

Section 139 – Further modifications of 2005 Act

We note the apparent intention of the Scottish Government seeking to reintroduce the so-called “fit and proper” person test, which exists under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976 “the 1976 Act” using the detail of this clause. We would highlight that the implications of this clause if passed, although not on the face of the legislation, are very wide ranging and that these are subsequently developed over four pages in Schedule 4 of the Bill.

We would question whether some of the provisions in this clause are required, given the powers, which the police already have under the 2005 Act. By 1st September 2009 all Personal Licence Holders (PLHs) and holders of premises licences under the terms of the 2005 Act will have had to have been licensed and the police will have been fully involved and consulted during this process. Indeed they will have carried out criminal records checks on applicants. This seems to allow for the duplication of a process, which has already been undertaken.
Our primary concern is that the current provisions of the 2005 Act, which allow the police to make representations solely on the basis of the “preventing crime and disorder” objective, are to be extended to “any” of the five licensing objectives within the legislation.

We would suggest that allowing the police to comment on applications solely on the basis of the objective of “preventing crime and disorder” is entirely appropriate, adequate and proportionate. Extending this to all of the other licensing objectives risks the police acquiring the status of the catch all objector of last resort. We do not believe this would be appropriate nor reasonable and it could lead to the police commenting on matters which are more appropriately dealt with by other agencies with more relevant, or indeed the only, expertise. We would suggest that this could only weaken the status of the police in the process and indeed the credibility of their objections on legitimate criminal matters.

As mentioned above, “the 2005 Act” is still in its infancy and we would question the apparent belief that existing provisions within that act, need to be altered at this stage.

Section 143 - Orders and regulations

We note that the terms of this section are extremely wide and we have a concern that subsequent changes could be made to the Act and/or regulations made there under without proper and full public debate—simply by a resolution of Parliament.

We have seen the views expressed by the Scottish Beer & Pub Association in connection with the Bill under consideration. We are, as you may know, members of the Association. We support and endorse the views they have expressed about time scales Boards have been granted to determine applications for premises licences and variations of premises licences. We believe they are much longer than is required or necessary.
The Scottish Grocers’ Federation (SGF) thanks you for the opportunity to provide written evidence to the Justice Committee on the general principles of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill.

SGF has limited its comments to matters relating to Section 130 to Section 139 which refer to alcohol licensing. SGF agrees with the modifications to the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 included within this section of the Bill. We believe the measures included within the Bill will continue to drive up standards and promote responsible retailing.

John Drummond
Chief Executive

SGF is the trade association for the Scottish Convenience Store Sector. It is the authoritative voice for the trade to policy makers. The SGF brings together retailers throughout Scotland, from most of the Scottish Co-operatives, SPAR, Keystore, Nisa and local independents who are our largest category of members. Our members sell a wide selection of products and services throughout local town centre, rural and community stores. According to recent statistics (2007) there are just over 5,600 convenience stores throughout Scotland, with annual sales in excess of £3.2 billion.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from SM Dykes Manchester

Evidence in respect of Section 34 of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Who we are

SM Dykes Manchester is a local community group who aims to support lesbian and bisexual women through meetings, workshops and play parties. We are based in Manchester England but have supported women from across the world.

Why we oppose this legislation

A strong focus of our group is enabling women to enjoy a consensual BDSM sexuality in the safest way possible. We believe that this legislation stigmatises people with a BDSM (bondage and discipline, dominance and submission and sadism and masochism) sexuality, showing a very poor understanding of consensually produced imagery depicting BDSM fantasy and/or reality.

The law is poorly written and difficult to understand which we believe will create fear within our community amongst people who have no desire to break the law but recognise that images depicting expressions of our sexuality may fall foul of it. Fear and suppression of expression will not help to keep members of our community safe.

We are also concerned that vital BDSM educational material may become illegal, which will put people's welfare and even lives at risk. Far from preventing harm we believe that harm will be caused.

We write to express our solidarity and agreement with the more detailed arguments presented by CAAN (The Consenting Adult Action Network).

I cannot urge you strongly enough to consider the harmful effects this law may have.

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Noctis

About Noctis

Noctis represents businesses operating in the UK late night economy. We draw our membership from night clubs, bars, live and student venues. We have been established since the 1950s and were previously known as the Association of British Ballrooms, the British Entertainment and Discotheque Association and the Bar Entertainment and Dance Association. In February 2008 we changed our name to Noctis after an extensive consultation with our committee and our members.

Noctis (in all its incarnations) has always engaged constructively with government, police and local authorities. We aim to find workable partnership solutions to the many challenges which are part of a vibrant late night market. We believe that the late night sector is an extremely important and valuable asset to the UK economy.

Background

Noctis worked with all the key stakeholders during the framing and implementation of the Licensing Act 2003 which came in to England and Wales in November 2005. Noctis continues to work very closely at a local and national level on issues relating to licensing. We believe our insight working with a number of UK operators, councils and police, give us a broad insight into the issues surrounding the implementation of the Licensing (Scotland) Act.

The trend in UK drinking patterns over recent years has been from principally on-trade consumption to one where the growth is all in the off-trade, whilst the on-trade consumption now continues to declines year-on-year. Noctis and many other organisations have argued that this is partly due to the high pricing differential between the off and the on-trade.

Clearly the twin factors of low pricing and the over-supply of venues are both going to be crucially important issues in this debate in Scotland as they have been elsewhere in the UK. Both of these issues are exacerbated by the below cost or heavily discounted selling of alcohol in the off-trade.

Issues around over-supply and discounted off-trade alcohol may have contributed to the widespread challenges we have seen in a number of English cities over the last couple of years. Recently we have seen particular issues in Warrington and Oldham where the council and police have piloted extreme solutions to deal with problems.
Shape of the Scottish market (CGA figures):

Circuit Young People’s venues/nightclubs:
2003 (1,326/267), 2004 (1,322/277) 2005 (1,359/271) 2006 (1,486/275), 2007 (1,342/252), 2008, (1,353/245) 2009 (1,323/241). Please note that circuit bars and nightclub venues are both in decline over recent years.

“Pre-loading”

Another feature of “liberalising” licensing hours is that it has fostered an increase in pre-loading of off trade alcohol. It is true that pre-loading has been a factor in the night out for many years before the Licensing Act, but inevitably the Act, since it has given longer hours to some venues, has encouraged customers not to venture out until later. This has meant that customers are generally arriving at late night venues 1 -2 hours later than before the Licensing Act 2003. It is estimated (from CGA figures) that an astonishing 83% of people now pre-load alcohol before they go for a night out.

Obviously the late night venue (by its very nature) has always been the final destination for the evening and our sector has, for decades, been the most challenging in terms of managing difficult customer behaviour. Now however, according to other CGA statistics, people are consuming a greater number of (home poured) measures and this is making the management of the door a more difficult than ever.

Often the late night venue operator is the unfortunate recipient of these individuals – people who will not be admitted to the venue, but who nonetheless present problems and may commit offences. The difficulty for some late night venues is that they may be targeted as a problem venue for issues which are entirely beyond their control.

The creation of later licensing without a proper understanding of the local shape, size and scope for extending trading within the licensed trade market could lead to greater difficulties – not least relating to policing and public transport. We are supportive of the Licensing Scotland proposal to introduce cumulative impact policies.

In certain locations in England (where the number of premises has increased dramatically and the terminal hour is later for a large number of premises) this has led to additional pressures. For the premises owners this encouraged customers to venture out late into the night time economy. In turn this has prompted a need to produce attractive discounted offers to compete with the off-trade offers.

It might be perceived that this additional pressure on the licensee might lead to a reduction in the levels on corporate social responsibility. In practice, for most operators, these additional operational and financial burdens have been imposed at a time when there has been much higher levels of CSR activity. For instance, here are some of the refusal figures from some of our members during the summer last year.
Refusal figures

One UK high street pub company during August 2008 checked 89,234 people and refused service to 5910 people who were drunk and 4,908 refused as underage. One high street bar operator refused (or removed from the premise) over 23,000 people during August 2008. One UK night club operator with over a dozen venues refuses on average 3,900 people a week for being drunk, underage (or both).

One Scottish operator in one venue over the period of one month last year recorded these refusal figures:

On the Friday nights at the above venue, the door staff are refusing 40% of those who present themselves. This very high figure is partly because once refused, some people will re-join the end of the line to try again, since there is effectively no sanction against them not to do so. One London club operator says his refusal rates are nearer 1 in 17 over the last few months, although he states that he is refusing many more drunks, than two years ago.

These refusal figures are generally reasonably high, although as the Noctis member (who runs a chain of high street bars mentioned above) notes that his company’s underage refusal figures are actually dropping - largely because of the reduced footfall generally, yet also because customers are now well aware that they require valid ID to enter premises and this will be rigorously checked.

Other reasons for a reduction in footfall, include a shift in consumer choice from on to off trade, the credit crunch and the smoking ban. Nonetheless even with reduced footfall problems of customers being too young/inebriated to be admitted - or needing to be removed from the premise - continue to play a significant part in the organisation of late night venues.

It is also important to note that Noctis operators regularly report back that door staff at their venues see people who are trying to gain admittance, consuming alcohol in the queue for the venue.

The difficulty for on trade retailers in the late night sector is that, even though they know from the conversations they are having with their customers and would be customers, that a very large percentage of alcohol is purchased from the off-trade and consumed before heading to our members venues, it is very hard to produce accurate statistics.

Cheap on trade alcohol is also beginning to force late night operators into the invidious and highly unhelpful situation of having to also deep discount in order to compete.

The smoking ban

The smoking ban was originally planned as a public health measure. However it is clear after a few years that it also represents significant additional challenges for operators in terms of managing customers in and out of premises. Our members tell us that managing customers who wish to exit the venue for a cigarette, can and sometimes does cause problems – despite the best endeavors of the venue staff.

For instance, when it takes a long time before customers are allowed out for a cigarette, because the venue staff are managing the flow of customers in and out, and when smokers outside engage in banter with those who are trying (and sometimes failing) to get in, problems can occur.

We would argue that operators should not be unduly penalised under one set of legislation for simply complying with another.

CSR/partnership schemes

The late night sector (as with the licensed trade as a whole) has seen an unprecedented number of pressures and a high degree of scrutiny, it has also seen a massive rise in Corporately Socially Responsible activity over the last 3 years. Good partnership at local level has been key to the success of the Licensing Act where there have been successes. For this reason we would ask that there may be a further conversation around slightly changing the remit and focus of the Licensing Standards Officers to be more focused towards the kind of role of council employed nightlife economy coordinators. This role has been particularly successful in a number of English locations, notably Bournemouth through the good work of John Shipp – the town's own NTE Coordinator.

We have included a section here outlining some of these CSR schemes. It is worth pointing out that many of these schemes pre-date the Licensing Act, although Best Bar None and Shine have reached much greater prominence in the last 3 years.

Shine

Shine is a corporate social responsibility initiative we have been running with Diageo for the last five years. Originally conceived as an award at our annual award ceremony, it was rolled out last to concentrate on community engagement. Diageo and Noctis produced a good practice guide to help other areas of the UK (including Glasgow) to devise best practice in partnership and community engagement.
Simon O Brien, from the Association of Chief Police Officer lead on licensing said of the guide: "The good practice guide cuts to the heart of where a joined up approach need to be, it starts with communication and ends with communication. It is clear that it is in everyone’s interest that we all work together to create safe environments for many customers to enjoy a night time economy.

NOCTIS has been communicating with and working closely with The Association of Chief Police Officers(ACPO) for some time to ensure we work together in delivering end to end solutions and the good practice guide is but one example of this good working relationship”.

Best Bar None
This Home Office backed scheme has been in operation now for several years with over 70 schemes now running throughout the UK. The aim of the scheme is to raise standards of operating practice.

Pub/Clubwatch
This voluntary organization, which currently has over 400 UK schemes in operation, continues to play a major part in delivering safe venues.

Conclusions

There are significant learnings which can be gleaned from the implementation of the Act in England and Wales.

- Over-supply and off-trade deep-discounting need to be take into account
- An enlargement of the late night market needs to be managed
- Police and services such as late night public transport need to be factored in
- There needs to be a proper understanding of the local market for the sale of alcohol
- Partnership between the various parties needs to be a key factor in delivering the Licensing (Scotland) Act effectively
Community Justice Authorities

The then Scottish Executive established 8 Community Justice Authorities (CJAs) in Scotland in April 2007 under the Management of Offenders etc. Scotland Act (2005). The role of the CJAs is to provide locally a co-ordinated approach to the planning, monitoring and reporting on the delivery of offender services. Their aim is to reduce re-offending, improve the management of offenders and create safer communities by delivering the National Strategy for the Management of Offenders in their local area. CJAs are statutory bodies consisting of members who are councillors nominated from the constituent local authorities within the CJA area. CJAs have a wide range of statutory and other partners including local authorities, the Scottish Prison Service, Police, NHS and voluntary sector agencies.

Introduction

CJAs welcome the opportunity to provide views on the general principles of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. Our response contains comments on the aspects of the Bill which are relevant to the CJAs:

i. Section 3 – The Scottish Sentencing Council
ii. Section 14 – Community Payback Orders
iii. Section 17 – Presumptions Against Short Periods of Imprisonment or Detention
iv. Section 18–Amendments of Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007
v. Section 73 – Sexual Offences Prevention Orders

Section 3 – The Scottish Sentencing Council

CJAs have previously provided feedback to the consultation on “Sentencing Guidelines and a Scottish Sentencing Council” and welcome the establishment of a body for the purposes of promoting consistency, improving transparency and public understanding about sentencing in Scotland.

Section 14 – Community Payback Orders

CJAs broadly welcome the introduction of Community Payback Orders (CPOs), in particular, the focus on visibility, immediacy and speed and the general principle that allows the tailoring of the sentence to the needs and risks of individual offenders to tackle re-offending. The CJAs further welcome the clarity around support and compliance set out in the Bill.

We do note that while the CPO is designed to replace most existing community sentences, this does not include the DTTO and RLO which remain in place. We believe there may be potential for confusion particularly between the DTTO and CPO with requirement of drug treatment.

227B – Community Payback Order: further Provision

The CJAs consider the Bill to be unclear with regard to the information to be provided to the author of the required Social Enquiry Report where a court is considering imposing a CPO with an unpaid work requirement. The CJAs suggest that the Sheriff or Justice of the Peace should give clear direction on whether the court is considering a level 1 or level 2 order when referring the matter for a Social Enquiry Report.

227C – Community Payback Orders: responsible officer

CJAs welcome the clarity in the Bill around accountability and the distinction between the responsibilities of the Chief Social Work Officer and nominated responsible officer with the specific duty to promote compliance.

227K – Allocation of Hours Between Unpaid Work and Other Activity

CJAs welcome the introduction of the ability to combine unpaid work with tackling criminogenic need. The 30% non work activity will allow for preparation for employability for example. Careful consideration will need to be given to the combination of requirements placed on a CPO to ensure that they meet individual needs.

227P – Programme Requirement

CJAs welcome the requirement for offenders to participate in specified programmes aimed at addressing offending behavioural needs. However, the Bill does not make reference to the availability or prioritisation of programmes. This concern is extended to sections 227R – Mental Health Treatment Requirement, 227U – Drug Treatment Requirement and 227V – Alcohol Treatment Requirement. Suitable programmes to meet individual offender needs would need to be available to meet the requirements of the CPO.

227W – Periodic Review of Community Payback Orders

CJAs welcome the inclusion of reviews within the legislation but think further guidance on the purpose and practice for reviews should be issued following consultation with stakeholders. This should ensure consistency in the operation of reviews. We look forward to further discussion to clarify:
• the purpose of the review; and
• an expectation of frequency in relation to reviews.

227ZD – Restricted Movement Requirement

CJAs welcome the opportunity for the Bill to impact on offending behaviour by sanctions that fall short of imprisonment.

227ZJ – Local Authorities: annual consultations about unpaid work

CJAs welcome the requirement to consult prescribed persons on the nature of unpaid work and other activities and welcome further involvement in the mechanisms to achieve this. We would support the specific inclusion of victims in this consultation as well as the wider community and stakeholders.

Section 17 – Presumptions Against Short Periods of Imprisonment or Detention

CJAs are disappointed that the Scottish Government did not take account of the Scottish Prisons Commission’s recommendations in full i.e. the abolition of short sentences and hold the view that the text within section 17 needs to be strengthened in order to endorse the title. For example at 17(2)(4A) the CJA view is that the text should read ‘the court may not pass a sentence of imprisonment for a term not exceeding 6 months’. The text as it stands within the Bill is at odds with the text within the accompanying policy memorandum which states at Page 12, section 17, point 69:

“We want to make it clear that sentencers should not impose a custodial sentence of 6 months or less, unless the particular circumstances of the case lead them to believe that no other option would be appropriate. We are also legislating to provide that the sentencer must explain in court the circumstances which made them conclude that only a custodial sentence could be imposed.”

CJAs are also concerned that Section 17 of the Bill may have results that have not been foreseen and need further clarification, for example, the section has the potential to result in a significant rise in the number of Social Enquiry Reports requested or an increase in up-tariffing.

Section 18 – Amendments of Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act 2007

CJAs broadly support and welcome the Amendments of Custodial Sentences and Weapons (Scotland) Act, particularly, as it extends the ability to support people in the community. However, the CJAs hold the view that there needs to be clarity within the Bill on ‘prescribed periods’.
Section 73 – Sexual Offences Prevention Orders

111A – SOPO and Interim SOPO Requirements: Scotland

CJAs welcome the move away from simply prohibiting the defendant from doing anything described in the order to requiring the defendant to do anything described in the order and believe that this will strengthen our ability to positively influence offender behaviour.

Additional Comments – Victims Issues

In addition to the comments noted above on specific areas of the Bill, the CJAs believe that there was a missed opportunity to recognise victim issues within the Bill. We are aware that the accredited programmes and many other programmes address the understanding of victim issues but suggest that this could be a standard requirement of a CPO.
Justice Committee

Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

Written submission from Scottish Justices Association

General

1. The Scottish Justices Association (“SJA”) represents the majority of Justices of the Peace in Scotland. It wishes to offer written evidence on the following areas of concern:

   - the status of the purposes and principles of sentencing (cl 1, 2)
   - the composition and role of the Scottish Sentencing Council, and the applicability of sentencing guidelines to non-judicial disposals (cl 3-13)
   - the resourcing of “Community Payback Orders” (“CPOs”), and seeming conflicts of aims in relation to them, potentially producing restrictions in the information available before imposing them and an incentive to breach them (cl 14)
   - what constitute “appropriate reasons” for imposing a short prison sentence (cl 16, 17)

The status of the purposes and principles of sentencing (cl 1, 2)

2. The SJA considers that there should be a declaratory provision in the Bill, similar to that in s1 of the Judiciary and Courts (Scotland) Act 2008, expressing the Cabinet Secretary’s welcome declaration in the Sentencing Guidelines and a Scottish Sentencing Council consultation paper that the “complete independence of the judiciary” was at “the heart of the criminal justice system in any society which considers itself free and fair”.

3. It finds the lists of “purposes of sentencing” (cl 1(1), which it notes reproduces that for England & Wales in the Criminal Justice Act 2003, s 142) and of “other matters” (cl 1(3),(4)) appropriate, as is the requirement to “have regard to” them (cl 1(2),(3)) and the lack of prioritisation between them. Both provisions are considered conducive to judicial independence.

4. It also recognises the right of the legislature to lay down broad penal policy, within the boundaries of devolution (including human rights concerns). It is principally concerned that individual sentencing decisions should be taken freely within the constitutionally appropriate limitations.

The composition and role of the Scottish Sentencing Council, and the applicability of sentencing guidelines to non-judicial disposals (cl 3-13)
5. The SJA looks forward to the creation of a Scottish Sentencing Council. However, it considers that the membership of the Council should be 50% judicial, and doubts the need for representation of ACPO(S), or even of the legal professional bodies. It also observes that if they are to be represented, so should be the Prison Service (as it has responsibility for those sentenced to imprisonment) and perhaps COSLA (as local authorities have responsibilities in relation to “community sentences”).

6. Schedule 1, para 1(5) considers that [the Council should comprise] “one person holding the office of justice of the peace or stipendiary magistrate”. Considering that JPs preside over cases throughout most of Scotland (while stipendiary magistrates are in Glasgow), the lower sentencing limits of JPs, and the characteristics of the JP benches, the SJA consider it essential that there be a person holding the office of justice of the peace as a member of the Scottish Sentencing Council.

7. It also notes that the characteristics required of the “lay members” are very broadly drawn (Sch 1, para 1(5)) and further, that no provision is made for payment of those members who are not professional judges.

8. The SJA is pleased to see, however, that no provision is made for a Scottish Government observer. Such a person could not be regarded as independent, and the Council should be able to generate “evidence-based” guidelines free from the appearance of political pressure. This concern arises against the background firstly, of one of the “objectives” of the Council being to “assist the development of policy in relation to sentencing” (cl 4(b)), and secondly the requirements upon the Council (i) to consult the Scottish Ministers (cl 6(b)(ii)) without a reciprocal obligation upon them to consult it when considering relevant legislation; (ii) to accompany sentencing guidelines with assessments of both the “costs and benefits” likely to be incurred and “the likely effect” on the number of persons in prison (cl 5(5)); (iii) to give reasons for declining to issue a guideline requested by the Scottish Ministers (cl 8); and (iv) to produce for the Scottish Ministers a triennial “business plan” including “details [of proposed] sentencing guidelines” (cl 12).

9. In relation to the Council’s “function(s)” and “objectives”, the SJA notes its first-mentioned “objective” is to promote “consistency in sentencing practice” (cl 4). It is hoped that the requirement to produce guidelines on “the principles and purposes of sentencing” (cl 5(3)) means that the guidelines will also address “appropriateness”.

10. In any event, the SJA considers that sentencing guidelines will be of particular use to JPs who are lay judges, and may sit infrequently and would value guidelines promoting “consistency”.

11. It is not clear that the sentencing guidelines will apply to “fiscal fines”, “fiscal compensation orders” “fiscal work orders” or any other form of “conditional offer”. The SJA strongly feels that, since more sentences are imposed by these means than by the courts, in principle, such non-judicial disposals should be informed by sentencing guidelines. It notes the apparent anomaly of the desire to publish judicial sentencing guidelines, while the internal Crown Office guidelines on “fiscal fines”, etc, remain firmly confidential.

12. The “objective” of “promot[ing] greater awareness and understanding of sentencing policy and practice” (cl 4(c)) is applauded as a means of reducing any “democratic deficit” in sentencing policy, but it is observed that sufficient funds for this purpose, and for training, will be required.

The resourcing of “Community Payback Orders” (“CPOs”), and seeming conflicts of aims in relation to them, potentially producing restrictions in the information available before imposing them and an incentive to breach them (cl 14)

13. The SJA can see that there may be value in the policy of, in effect, amalgamating Community Service Orders, Probation Orders and Supervised Attendance Orders into a single form of order. It notes three things, however. Firstly, it is unclear why Restriction of Liberty Orders, as such, and Drug Treatment and Testing Orders are not included. Secondly, more precise comment may be appropriate at a later stage in respect of the relationship of the proposed provisions to the existing equivalents. Thirdly the success of the policy will depend heavily upon the resources made available and detailed non-legislative arrangements made by Social Work Departments. It is assumed that the substance of the existing “community” disposals available to JP Courts will remain available.

14. It also recalls that the evidence base for the success of CPOs as alternatives to imprisonment, the target population, and the sentencing purpose, at least as revealed in the Reforming and Revitalising: report of the review of community penalties consultation paper, seemed uncertain. In particular, aims such as “immediacy” and “effectiveness” might conflict. For example, Reforming and Revitalising (p12) declares that, in the interests of immediacy, “it will not be necessary to a court to obtain a Social Enquiry Report before imposing a sentence of under 100 hours”. In other words, the price of a rapid decision is an uninformed decision.

15. It further notes possible confusion in the role of the CPO and its enforcement. Imposition of such an order requires that the offence be “serious enough to warrant [a CPO]” (cl 14/s 227A(3), which must be read in the light of the proposals in relation to “short [prison] sentences”). This clearly indicates that a CPO is intended to be used for the upper range of summary offences only. Unsurprisingly, therefore, where a CPO is breached, the court may “deal with the offender … as it could have dealt with the offender had the order not been imposed” (cl 14/s 227ZB(5)(b)).

16. For an offence in the upper range, in the case of the JP Court, this would normally include the maximum of 60 days imprisonment. However, it is specifically provided that, in the case of this Court, the maximum sentence of imprisonment for breach of a CPO is reduced to 20 days (cl 14/s 227ZC(2)(a)). Thus, a JP Court, in respect of a person who might otherwise have received a sentence of any period of imprisonment greater than 20 days, would be obliged (in the absence of “appropriate” circumstances in terms of cl 17/s 204(4A)) to impose a CPO instead. But, if the CPO were breached that court would be restricted to a sentence of, at most, 20 days, seemingly providing an incentive to breach the CPO.

What constitute “appropriate reasons” for imposing a short prison sentence (cll 16, 17)

17. The SJA accepts that the Bill fulfils the Scottish Government’s policy that (because the principal aim of imprisonment should be rehabilitation) there should only be prison sentences of six months or less “where the court considers that no other method of dealing with the person is appropriate” (cl 17/s 204(4A)), which appears to recognise that retributive or deterrent sentences of this magnitude may be used in “appropriate” circumstances. It also notes that where a court does pass such a sentence it must “state its reasons” which reasons are to be minuted (cl 17/s 204(4B)).

18. However, it further notes that the legislation gives no indication as to what an “appropriate” reason might be, but that Scotland’s Choice: report of the Scottish Prisons Committee (the intellectual source of the proposal), at para 3.36, listed six circumstances in which it considered such a sentence would be justified (that is: violent and sexual offences; breaches of bail; failure to comply with an existing “community” disposal; existing release licence; non-consent to a “community” disposal; and existing imprisonment).

19. If this list is intended are intended to constitute the list of “appropriate reasons”, the legislation should say so (though presumably, sentencing guidelines might be developed).
Summary

- The RSE considers that the proposals for the Scottish Sentencing Council are in conflict with the principle of judicial independence. That independence refers to both the independence of the individual judge and to the institutional independence of the judiciary. Both are indispensable if there is to be a fair trial in accordance with article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights.

- We consider that the purpose of the Sentencing Council is objectionable on constitutional grounds. Sentencing policy is, and should remain, a matter for the Parliament on the one hand and the Appeal Court on the other.

- It would be inappropriate and unconstitutional for the Scottish Ministers or the Lord Advocate to be seen to be influencing the way in which sentences are imposed.

- It is wrong that in reaching its decisions any court should be subject to the determinations of a lay body such as the Sentencing Council. This would be a gross derogation from the independence of the judiciary and entirely unwarranted.

- We see the composition of the Sentencing Council as extremely important, and do not consider the proposed membership of the Council to be appropriate.

- While the purposes and principles of sentencing, as set out in the Bill, are well known, it is clear from the context that they may be affected by the sentencing guidelines issued by the Sentencing Council, and accordingly they should not be looked at in isolation. How they may be affected is not transparent.

- As regards the objective of consistency, we remind the Committee that the Sentencing Commission found that there was little empirical evidence of inconsistency in sentencing in Scotland. This consideration indicates that sentencing guidelines should, at most, be no more than advisory. We are also concerned that the public will assume that “transparency” means that there should be a “correct” sentence in any given case. Sentencing is not an exact science. It involves the exercise by a judge of his independent discretion in regard to the circumstances of the individual case.
1. The Royal Society of Edinburgh (RSE), Scotland’s National Academy, welcomes the opportunity to comment on the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (hereinafter referred to as “the Bill”). This paper is concerned with the provisions of the Bill in regard to the purposes and principles of sentencing and the Scottish Sentencing Council. In preparing this paper the RSE has drawn on relevant parts of its response in November 2008 to the Scottish Government's consultation paper, Sentencing Guidelines and a Scottish Sentencing Council (hereinafter referred to as “the consultation paper”) which foreshadowed these provisions. We have taken account of the extent to which the proposals in the consultation paper have been modified. We would be pleased to discuss the issues raised in this response.

Purposes and Principles of Sentencing (sections 1 and 2)

2. According to paragraph 8 of the Policy Memorandum the policy objectives of these sections are: “To create a straightforward and transparent framework within which sentencers can base their decisions in individual cases; thereby increasing general understanding of the purposes and principles of sentencing and improving confidence in the sentencing process and the wider criminal justice system.” The RSE remains of the view that the purposes of sentencing are well known and do not require to be embodied in statute. How far the individual purposes listed in section 1(1) apply in the particular case will obviously depend on its nature and circumstances, and hence on the judgment of the sentencer. It appears, therefore, that the listing of such purposes in statute serves no practical purpose. A public information leaflet would suffice. Making that information available in electronic and hard copy format might have merit.

3. The same comment may be made in regard to section 1(3) and (4), which presumably are intended to set out “principles” of sentencing. The RSE makes two further comments. First, we note that section 1(3) creates what appears to be an open-ended statutory duty, since it states that “Other matters to which a court must have regard in sentencing an offender…include”, What are the other matters to which a sentencer is to have a statutory duty to have regard? The potential extent of a statutory duty should surely be clear. Secondly, we note that among the matters listed in section 1(3) there is no mention of the significance of a plea of guilty. It may be said that this is covered by section 2(4), or possibly section 1(3)(e), but the omission of a factor which may have a significant effect on sentence is surprising. The omission demonstrates the fact that these provisions deal with sentencing in a superficial manner, and do not facilitate public understanding.

4. While the purposes and principles of sentencing, as set out in the Bill, are well known, it is clear from the context that they may be affected by the sentencing guidelines issued by the Sentencing Council (see paragraph 6.1. below), and accordingly they should not be looked at in isolation. How they may be affected is not transparent.
The Scottish Sentencing Council (sections 3 – 13 and schedule 1)

5. The RSE considers that these proposals are in conflict with the principle of judicial independence. That independence refers to both the independence of the individual judge and to the institutional independence of the judiciary. Both are indispensable if there is to be a fair trial in accordance with article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights. Institutional independence requires that the judiciary should be independent of the executive. The Commonwealth (Latimer House) Principles, which were endorsed by the Commonwealth Heads of Government in 2003, states in section IV: “An independent, impartial, honest and competent judiciary is integral to upholding the rule of law, engendering public confidence and dispensing justice.” Among the steps to be taken to secure this aim is the following: “Interaction, if any, between the executive and the judiciary should not compromise judicial independence” (paragraph (d)).

6. It is our view that these proposals involve the kind of interaction between the executive and judiciary which would compromise the independence of the judiciary. We will set out our views in more detail below, by reference to certain salient features of the Bill.

6.1. The Sentencing Council would set sentencing policy, both as applied in its sentencing guidelines and more generally, with which courts would have to comply (see sections 4(b) and 5 (3) and (4)). Sentencing guidelines may relate not only to sentencing levels but also the principles and purposes of sentencing (section 5 (3)(a) and (b)). The powers of the Sentencing Council are so generally expressed as to enable it to lay down guidelines as to how statutory rules in regard to sentencing should be interpreted.

6.2. Before publishing sentencing guidelines the Sentencing Council must consult with the Scottish Ministers and the Lord Advocate (section 6(1)(b)), presumably in regard to their respective interests. Of particular interest to the Scottish Ministers would be the resources implications of sentencing guidelines, which the Sentencing Council must assess (section 5(5)).
