Bill (As Passed) (SP Bill 49B)
Foreword

Purpose of the series

The aim of this series is to bring together in a single place all the official Parliamentary documents relating to the passage of the Bill that becomes an Act of the Scottish Parliament (ASP). The list of documents included in any particular volume will depend on the nature of the Bill and the circumstances of its passage, but a typical volume will include:

- every print of the Bill (usually three – “As Introduced”, “As Amended at Stage 2” and “As Passed”);
- the accompanying documents published with the “As Introduced” print of the Bill (and any revised versions published at later Stages);
- every Marshalled List of amendments from Stages 2 and 3;
- every Groupings list from Stages 2 and 3;
- the lead Committee’s “Stage 1 report” (which itself includes reports of other committees involved in the Stage 1 process, relevant committee Minutes and extracts from the Official Report of Stage 1 proceedings);
- the Official Report of the Stage 1 and Stage 3 debates in the Parliament;
- the Official Report of Stage 2 committee consideration;
- the Minutes (or relevant extracts) of relevant Committee meetings and of the Parliament for Stages 1 and 3.

All documents included are re-printed in the original layout and format, but with minor typographical and layout errors corrected. An exception is the groupings of amendments for Stage 2 and Stage 3 (a list of amendments in debating order was included in the original documents to assist members during actual proceedings but is omitted here as the text of amendments is already contained in the relevant marshalled list).

Where documents in the volume include web-links to external sources or to documents not incorporated in this volume, these links have been checked and are correct at the time of publishing this volume. The Scottish Parliament is not responsible for the content of external Internet sites. The links in this volume will not be monitored after publication, and no guarantee can be given that all links will continue to be effective.

Documents in each volume are arranged in the order in which they relate to the passage of the Bill through its various stages, from introduction to passing. The Act itself is not included on the grounds that it is already generally available and is, in any case, not a Parliamentary publication.

Outline of the legislative process

Bills in the Scottish Parliament follow a three-stage process. The fundamentals of the process are laid down by section 36(1) of the Scotland Act 1998, and amplified by Chapter 9 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders. In outline, the process is as follows:
• Introduction, followed by publication of the Bill and its accompanying documents;
• Stage 1: the Bill is first referred to a relevant committee, which produces a report informed by evidence from interested parties, then the Parliament debates the Bill and decides whether to agree to its general principles;
• Stage 2: the Bill returns to a committee for detailed consideration of amendments;
• Stage 3: the Bill is considered by the Parliament, with consideration of further amendments followed by a debate and a decision on whether to pass the Bill.

After a Bill is passed, three law officers and the Secretary of State have a period of four weeks within which they may challenge the Bill under sections 33 and 35 of the Scotland Act respectively. The Bill may then be submitted for Royal Assent, at which point it becomes an Act.

Standing Orders allow for some variations from the above pattern in some cases. For example, Bills may be referred back to a committee during Stage 3 for further Stage 2 consideration. In addition, the procedures vary for certain categories of Bills, such as Committee Bills or Emergency Bills. For some volumes in the series, relevant proceedings prior to introduction (such as pre-legislative scrutiny of a draft Bill) may be included.

The reader who is unfamiliar with Bill procedures, or with the terminology of legislation more generally, is advised to consult in the first instance the Guidance on Public Bills published by the Parliament. That Guidance, and the Standing Orders, are available for sale from Stationery Office bookshops or free of charge on the Parliament’s website (www.scottish.parliament.uk).

The series is produced by the Legislation Team within the Parliament’s Chamber Office. Comments on this volume or on the series as a whole may be sent to the Legislation Team at the Scottish Parliament, Edinburgh EH99 1SP.

Notes on this volume

The Bill to which this volume relates followed the standard 3 stage process described above.

The oral and written evidence received by the Local Government and Regeneration Committee at Stage 1 was originally published on the web only. That material is included in this volume after the Stage 1 Report.

The Local Government and Regeneration Committee’s Stage 1 Report did not include material relating to the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee’s consideration of the delegated powers provisions in the Bill or the Finance Committee’s consideration of the Financial Memorandum. The Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee’s report at Stage 1 is included in this volume. The Committee did not take oral evidence on the Bill and agreed its report without debate. No extracts from the minutes or the Official Report of the relevant meeting of the Committee are, therefore, included in this volume.
The Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee considered the delegated powers in the Bill after Stage 2, and agreed its report without debate. No extracts from the minutes or the Official Report of the relevant meeting of the Committee are, therefore, included in this volume.

Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

[AS INTRODUCED]

An Act of the Scottish Parliament to make provision for the licensing and regulation of air weapons; to amend the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005; to amend and extend the licensing provisions of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982; and for connected purposes.

PART 1

AIR WEAPONS

Meaning of air weapon

1 Meaning of “air weapon”

(1) This section defines the expression “air weapon” for the purposes of this Part.

(2) The expression generally has the same meaning as that given in section 1(3)(b) of the Firearms Act 1968 (“the 1968 Act”).

(3) In addition, the expression includes—

(a) the component parts of an air weapon (within the meaning of section 1(3)(b) of the 1968 Act), and

(b) any accessory to such a weapon designed or adapted to diminish the noise caused by discharging the weapon.

(4) But the expression does not include—

(a) an air weapon (within the meaning of section 1(3)(b) of the 1968 Act)—

(i) which is not capable of discharging a missile with kinetic energy of more than one joule as measured at the muzzle of the weapon, or

(ii) that is designed to be used only when submerged in water, or

(b) the component parts of an air weapon described in paragraph (a)(i) or (ii).

(5) Other words and expressions used in this Part are defined in section 40.
Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill
Part 1—Air weapons

Air weapon certificates

2 Requirement for air weapon certificate
(1) It is an offence for a person to use, possess, purchase or acquire an air weapon without holding an air weapon certificate.
(2) A person who commits an offence under subsection (1) is liable—
   (a) on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 12 months or a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum (or both),
   (b) on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 2 years or a fine (or both).
(3) Schedule 1 contains exemptions from—
   (a) the offence under subsection (1), and
   (b) certain other offences under this Part.
(4) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations amend schedule 1 so as to—
   (a) add further exemptions,
   (b) remove or modify exemptions.

3 Application for grant or renewal of air weapon certificate
(1) An individual aged 14 years or more may apply to the chief constable for—
   (a) the grant of an air weapon certificate, or
   (b) the renewal of an air weapon certificate.
(2) An application is valid only if it complies with the requirements of—
   (a) section 4 (verification of applications),
   (b) if applicable, section 7 (special requirements and conditions for young persons),
   and
   (c) any regulations under section 37 which apply to the application.
(3) The chief constable must maintain a register containing the details of each application made under this section (whether or not the application results in an air weapon certificate being granted or renewed).

4 Verification of applications
(1) An application for the grant or renewal of an air weapon certificate must be verified in the prescribed form and manner by an individual who meets the requirements of subsection (2) (“a verifier”).
(2) The requirements are that a verifier must—
   (a) have known the applicant for at least 2 years,
   (b) in the opinion of the chief constable, be of good standing in the community,
   (c) not be—
      (i) a relative of the applicant,
      (ii) a registered firearms dealer,
Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill
Part I—Air weapons

(ii) a constable or a member of police staff,

(iii) a member of, or a member of staff of, the Scottish Police Authority, or

(iv) ordinarily resident outwith the United Kingdom.

The chief constable may only grant or renew an air weapon certificate if satisfied that the applicant—

(a) is fit to be entrusted with an air weapon,

(b) is not prohibited from possessing an air weapon or other firearm under section 21 of the 1968 Act,

(c) has a good reason for using, possessing, purchasing or acquiring an air weapon, and

(d) in all the circumstances, can be permitted to possess an air weapon without danger to the public safety or to the peace.

The chief constable may, when considering an application made under section 3 by an applicant who holds a firearm or shot gun certificate, treat paragraphs (a) and (b) of subsection (1) as being satisfied in relation to the applicant.

The chief constable may, before determining an application made under section 3, require that the applicant permit a constable or member of police staff—

(a) to visit the applicant at the applicant’s usual place of residence,

(b) to inspect any place where the applicant intends to store or use an air weapon.

Every air weapon certificate is subject to any prescribed mandatory conditions.

The chief constable may, when granting or renewing an air weapon certificate, attach conditions to the certificate (and, in the case of a renewal, may attach different conditions from those attached to the certificate prior to its renewal).

The chief constable may not attach to an air weapon certificate a condition which is inconsistent with—

(a) a prescribed mandatory condition which applies to air weapon certificates, or

(b) a condition which must be attached to the certificate under this Part.

It is an offence for a holder of an air weapon certificate to fail to comply with a condition attached to the holder’s certificate.

An individual who commits an offence under subsection (4) is liable, on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale.

This section applies where an applicant for an air weapon certificate is under the age of 18.
(2) A parent or guardian of the applicant must consent in the prescribed form and manner to the applicant making the application.

(3) Where the chief constable grants an air weapon certificate to an individual under the age of 18, the chief constable must attach to the certificate—
   (a) the condition described in subsection (4),
   (b) one or more of the conditions described in subsection (5).

(4) The condition is that the holder may not purchase or otherwise own an air weapon.

(5) The conditions are that—
   (a) the holder may use and possess an air weapon only for the purposes of target shooting on private land,
   (b) the holder may use and possess an air weapon only for the purposes of participating in events or competitions,
   (c) the holder may use and possess an air weapon only for the purposes of the holder’s membership of an approved air weapon club,
   (d) the holder may use and possess an air weapon only for the purposes of protecting livestock, crops or produce on land used for or in connection with agriculture,
   (e) the holder may use and possess an air weapon only while carrying on business as a pest controller or acting as the employee of a pest controller.

(6) It is sufficient, for the purposes of section 5(1)(c), for the chief constable to be satisfied that the applicant has a good reason for using or possessing an air weapon.

(7) For the purposes of this section, “agriculture” is to be construed in accordance with section 85 of the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act 1991.

8 Duration of air weapon certificate

(1) An air weapon certificate expires (unless earlier revoked or cancelled)—
   (a) in the case of a certificate granted to an individual under the age of 18, when the individual attains the age of 18,
   (b) in any other case, at the end of the period of 5 years beginning with the date on which the certificate is granted or renewed.

(2) Where an individual has applied for the renewal of an air weapon certificate before its expiry but the chief constable has not, as at the date of its expiry, determined whether or not to grant the renewal, the certificate is to continue to have effect until the application is determined.

(3) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations amend subsection (1)(b) to specify a different period.

9 Alignment of different types of certificate

(1) Subsection (2) applies where an individual—
   (a) holds a firearm or shot gun certificate, and
   (b) makes an application for the grant or renewal of an air weapon certificate under section 3.
Part I—Air weapons

(2) Where this subsection applies, the applicant may request that the chief constable grant or renew an air weapon certificate for such shorter period than is provided for in section 8 as is appropriate to secure that it expires on the same day as the applicant’s firearm or shot gun certificate (or, if the applicant holds both a firearm and shot gun certificate, either of them).

(3) Subsection (4) applies where an individual—
   (a) holds an air weapon certificate, and
   (b) makes an application for the grant or renewal of a firearm or shot gun certificate under the 1968 Act.

(4) Where this subsection applies, the applicant may make an application under section 3 of this Act for the air weapon certificate to be renewed as from the same day as that on which the firearm or shot gun certificate is granted or renewed.

10 Variation of air weapon certificate

(1) The chief constable may, by giving notice to the holder of an air weapon certificate—
   (a) vary the holder’s certificate,
   (b) attach conditions to the certificate, or
   (c) vary or revoke a condition attached to the certificate other than—
      (i) a prescribed mandatory condition which applies to air weapon certificates, or
      (ii) a condition which must be attached to the certificate under this Part.

(2) The chief constable may give a notice under subsection (1)—
   (a) on the application of the holder of an air weapon certificate, or
   (b) of the chief constable’s own accord (at any time).

(3) The chief constable may not attach to an air weapon certificate a condition which is inconsistent with—
   (a) a prescribed mandatory condition which applies to air weapon certificates, or
   (b) a condition which must be attached to the certificate under this Part.

(4) For the purposes of this section, the chief constable may by notice given to the holder of an air weapon certificate require the holder to produce the certificate within the period of 21 days beginning with the date on which the notice is given.

11 Revocation of air weapon certificate

(1) The chief constable must revoke an air weapon certificate if—
   (a) the chief constable is satisfied that the holder of the certificate cannot be permitted to possess an air weapon without danger to the public safety or to the peace, or
   (b) the holder is prohibited from possessing an air weapon or other firearm under section 21 of the 1968 Act.

(2) The chief constable may revoke an air weapon certificate if—
   (a) the chief constable has reason to believe that the holder—
      (i) is not a fit person to be entrusted with an air weapon, or
(ii) does not have a good reason to use, possess, purchase or acquire an air weapon,

(b) the chief constable is satisfied that the holder of the certificate has failed to comply with a condition attached to the certificate, or

(c) the holder fails to produce the certificate when required to do so under section 10(4).

(3) An air weapon certificate is revoked by the chief constable giving notice to the holder of the certificate to that effect.

(4) A notice under subsection (3) must—

(a) be given at least 7 days before the date on which the revocation is to take effect, and

(b) require the holder to surrender the certificate and any air weapons that the holder possesses by such date as the chief constable may specify in the notice.

(5) It is an offence for a person, without reasonable excuse, to fail to comply with the requirements of a notice given under subsection (3).

(6) A person who commits an offence under subsection (5) is liable, on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale.

(7) In the event that the holder of an air weapon certificate makes an appeal under section 35 against a decision to revoke the holder’s certificate—

(a) the revocation does not take effect, but

(b) the holder must still surrender the certificate and any air weapons that the holder possesses in accordance with the requirements of the notice given under subsection (3), pending the determination or withdrawal of the appeal.

12 Police permits

(1) The chief constable may, on the application of an individual, grant a permit (“a police permit”) authorising the individual—

(a) to possess or acquire an air weapon without holding an air weapon certificate, or

(b) to sell (or expose for sale) an air weapon in the course of that individual’s business.

(2) A police permit must not be granted to an individual who is prohibited from possessing an air weapon or other firearm under section 21 of the 1968 Act.

(3) A police permit expires (unless earlier revoked or cancelled) on the expiry date specified in the permit.

(4) An application for a police permit is valid only if it complies with the requirements of any regulations under section 37 which apply to the application.
Visitor permits

(1) The chief constable may, on the application of a qualifying visitor, grant a permit (“a visitor permit”) authorising the visitor to use, possess, purchase or acquire an air weapon without holding an air weapon certificate for the period (or a part of it) that the qualifying visitor is in Scotland.

(2) A person may, on behalf of a group of 2 to 20 qualifying visitors, make an application to the chief constable for each member of the group to be granted a visitor permit.

(3) The chief constable may grant a visitor permit to some or all of the members of the group.

(4) The chief constable may grant a visitor permit only if satisfied—

(a) in the case of an individual application, that the qualifying visitor has a good reason for using, possessing, purchasing or acquiring an air weapon while visiting Scotland,

(b) in the case of a group application, that each qualifying visitor is to use and possess an air weapon while visiting Scotland only—

(i) for sporting purposes (including shooting live quarry) on private land,

(ii) for the purposes of target shooting on private land, or

(iii) for the purposes of participating in an event or competition,

(c) in every case—

(i) that the qualifying visitor can be permitted to possess an air weapon without danger to the public safety or to the peace, and

(ii) that the qualifying visitor is not prohibited from possessing an air weapon or other firearm under section 21 of the 1968 Act.

(5) For the purposes of subsection (4)(b)(i) and (ii) the chief constable may require the applicant to produce evidence that the owner or occupier of the land consents to the visitors’ intended use or possession of air weapons on the land.

(6) Except where section 14 applies, the chief constable must, on granting a visitor permit in respect of a group application, attach to the permit as a condition that the holder of the permit may use and possess an air weapon only for such of the purposes described in subsection (4)(b) as the chief constable may specify in the condition.

(7) A visitor permit expires (unless earlier revoked or cancelled) on the expiry date specified in the permit.

(8) No visitor permit is to be granted for a period of longer than 12 months.

(9) An application for a visitor permit is valid only if it complies with the requirements of any regulations under section 37 which apply to the application.

(10) For the purposes of this section and section 14—

“group application” means an application under subsection (2) for visitor permits made by a person on behalf of qualifying visitors in a group,

“individual application” means an application under subsection (1) for a visitor permit made by the qualifying visitor, “qualifying visitor” means an individual who is—

(a) aged 14 years or more,
Not ordinarily resident in Scotland, and visiting (or intending to visit) Scotland.

14 Visitor permits: young persons

(1) This section applies—

(a) where an individual applicant for a visitor permit is under the age of 18,
(b) in respect of any individual who is—

(i) under the age of 18, and
(ii) on whose behalf a visitor permit is applied for as part of a group application.

(2) A parent or guardian of the applicant or individual under the age of 18 must consent in the prescribed form and manner to the making of the application.

(3) The chief constable must, on granting a visitor permit in respect of an individual application, attach to the permit—

(a) the condition described in section 7(4), and
(b) one or more of the conditions described in subsection (5) of that section.

(4) The chief constable must, on granting a visitor permit in respect of a group application, attach to the permit—

(a) the condition described in section 7(4), and
(b) either or both of the conditions described in paragraphs (a) and (b) of subsection (5) of that section.

(5) It is sufficient, for the purposes of section 13(4)(a), for the chief constable to be satisfied that the applicant has a good reason for using or possessing an air weapon.

(6) The chief constable is not, in respect of a group application, to be satisfied that the individual’s use and possession of an air weapon is for the purposes described in section 13(4)(b)(i).

15 Police and visitor permits: conditions

(1) Every police permit and visitor permit is subject to any prescribed mandatory conditions.

(2) The chief constable may, when granting a police permit or a visitor permit, attach conditions to the permit.

(3) The chief constable may not attach to a police permit or a visitor permit a condition which is inconsistent with—

(a) a prescribed mandatory condition which applies to police permits or, as the case may be, visitor permits, or
(b) a condition which must be attached to the permit under this Part.

(4) It is an offence for the holder of a police permit or a visitor permit to fail to comply with a condition attached to the permit.

(5) An individual who commits an offence under subsection (4) is liable, on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale.
16  Police and visitor permits: variation and revocation

(1) The chief constable may, by giving notice to the holder of a police permit or a visitor permit—

(a) vary the permit,

(b) attach conditions to the permit,

(c) vary or revoke a condition attached to the permit other than—

(i) a prescribed mandatory condition which applies to the permit, or

(ii) a condition which must be attached to a permit under this Part, or

(d) revoke the permit.

(2) The chief constable may give a notice under subsection (1)—

(a) on the application of the holder of a police permit or visitor permit, or

(b) of the chief constable’s own accord (at any time).

(3) The chief constable may not attach to a police permit or a visitor permit a condition which is inconsistent with—

(a) a prescribed mandatory condition which applies to police permits or, as the case may be, visitor permits, or

(b) a condition which must be attached to the permit under this Part.

(4) For the purposes of paragraphs (a) to (c) of subsection (1), the chief constable may by giving notice to the holder of a police permit or a visitor permit require the holder to produce the permit within the period of 21 days beginning with the date on which the notice is given.

(5) A notice given under subsection (1) which revokes a police permit or a visitor permit must—

(a) be given at least 7 days before the date on which the revocation is to take effect, and

(b) require the holder of the permit to surrender the permit and any air weapons that the holder possesses by such date as the chief constable may specify in the notice.

(6) It is an offence for the holder of a police permit or a visitor permit, without reasonable excuse, to fail to comply with a requirement contained in a notice under subsection (1).

(7) An individual who commits an offence under subsection (6) is liable, on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale.

(8) In the event that the holder of a police permit or a visitor permit makes an appeal under section 35 against a decision to revoke the holder’s permit—

(a) the revocation does not take effect, but

(b) the holder must still surrender the permit and any air weapons that the holder possesses in accordance with the requirements of the notice given under subsection (1), pending the determination or withdrawal of the appeal.
Event permits

(1) The chief constable may, on the application of a person ("the organiser") who is organising or otherwise responsible for an event, grant a permit authorising individuals at the event to borrow, hire, use and possess air weapons while engaging in an event activity without holding an air weapon certificate ("an event permit").

(2) The chief constable may, when granting an event permit, attach conditions to it.

(3) The organiser must ensure that the event permit (or a copy of it) is prominently displayed at the event so as to be capable of being read by any person attending the event.

(4) It is an offence for the organiser—
   (a) to fail to comply with a condition attached to the event permit, or
   (b) without reasonable excuse, to fail to comply with subsection (3).

(5) A person who commits an offence under subsection (4) is liable, on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale.

(6) An application for an event permit is valid only if it complies with the requirements of any regulations under section 37 which apply to the application.

(7) For the purposes of this section, an “event activity” is an activity—
   (a) involving the use and possession of air weapons by individuals, and
   (b) which has been planned by (or on behalf of) the organiser as part of the event.

Approval of air weapon clubs

(1) The chief constable may, on the application of an air weapon club, grant or renew an approval of the club.

(2) An application for the grant or renewal of an approval of an air weapon club is valid only if it complies with the requirements of any regulations under section 37 which apply to the application.

(3) The chief constable may, at any time by giving notice to an approved air weapon club, withdraw the club’s approval.

(4) Every approval of an air weapon club is subject to any prescribed mandatory conditions.

(5) The chief constable may, when granting or renewing an approval, attach conditions to the approval (and in the case of a renewal, may attach different conditions from those attached to the approval prior to its renewal).

(6) The chief constable may not attach to an approval a condition which is inconsistent with a prescribed mandatory condition which applies to approvals.

Variation of approval

(1) The chief constable may, by giving notice in writing to an approved air weapon club—
   (a) vary the club’s approval,
   (b) attach conditions to the club’s approval, or
(c) vary or revoke a condition attached to the club’s approval other than a prescribed mandatory condition which applies to approvals.

(2) The chief constable may give a notice under subsection (1)—
(a) on the application of the approved air weapon club, or
(b) of the chief constable’s own accord (at any time).

(3) The chief constable may not attach to an approval a condition which is inconsistent with a prescribed mandatory condition which applies to approvals.

20 Duration of approval

(1) An approval of an air weapon club expires (unless earlier withdrawn) at the end of the period of 6 years beginning with the date on which the approval is granted or renewed.

(2) Where an approved air weapon club has applied for the renewal of its approval before its expiry but the chief constable has not, as at the date of its expiry, determined whether or not to grant the renewal, the approval is to continue to have effect until the application is determined.

(3) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations amend subsection (1) to specify a different period.

21 Alignment of club approvals

(1) Subsection (2) applies where an air weapon club—
(a) is approved as a rifle club under section 15 of the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1988 (“the 1988 Act”), and
(b) makes an application for the grant or renewal of an approval under section 18(1) of this Act.

(2) Where this subsection applies, the club may request that the chief constable grant or renew its approval under section 18(1) of this Act for such shorter period than is provided for in section 20(1) of this Act as is appropriate to secure that it expires on the same day as the club’s approval under section 15 of the 1988 Act.

(3) Subsection (4) applies where a club—
(a) is an approved air weapon club, and
(b) makes an application for the grant or renewal of an approval as a rifle club under section 15 of the 1988 Act.

(4) Where this subsection applies, the club may make an application under section 18(1) of this Act for the club’s approval to be renewed as from the same day as that on which the club’s application for approval under section 15 of the 1988 Act is granted or renewed.

22 Power to enter and inspect club premises

(1) The chief constable may, for the purposes of ascertaining whether the provisions of this Part or any conditions attached to an approved air weapon club’s approval are being complied with, authorise a constable or a member of police staff—
(a) to enter any club premises of an approved air weapon club, and
(b) to inspect those premises and anything on them which is relevant to the purposes for which the authorisation was granted.

(2) The power of a constable or a member of police staff under subsection (1)(b) to inspect anything on club premises includes power to require any information which is stored in electronic form and accessible from the premises to be produced in a form which is visible and legible.

(3) A constable or a member of police staff may exercise the powers of entry conferred by this section only at a reasonable time, unless it appears to the constable or member of police staff that the purposes of entering the club premises may be frustrated if the constable or member of police staff seeks to enter at a reasonable time.

(4) A constable or a member of police staff must, if asked, produce the authorisation before entering any premises under this section.

(5) The chief constable may delegate the power to grant an authorisation under subsection (1) only to a constable who holds the rank of inspector or above.

(6) It is an offence for a person to obstruct intentionally a constable or a member of police staff in the exercise of the constable’s or member of police staff’s powers under an authorisation granted under this section.

(7) A person who commits an offence under subsection (6) is liable, on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale.

(8) In this section, “club premises”, in relation to an approved air weapon club, means any premises, other than a dwelling, occupied or used by the club.

23 Requirements for recreational shooting facilities

(1) A person who operates a recreational shooting facility must—

(a) hold or (if not an individual) ensure that an individual responsible for the management and operation of the facility holds, an air weapon certificate, and

(b) at all times that the facility is in use, display the certificate (or a copy of it) prominently on the facility so as to be capable of being read by anyone considering whether to use the facility.

(2) It is an offence for a person who operates a recreational shooting facility—

(a) to fail to comply with subsection (1)(a), or

(b) without reasonable excuse, to fail to comply with subsection (1)(b).

(3) A person who commits an offence under subsection (2) is liable, on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 6 months or a fine not exceeding level 5 on the standard scale (or both).

(4) In this section, “recreational shooting facility” means—

(a) a miniature rifle range or a shooting gallery at which air weapons are used, or

(b) a facility for combat games which involve using an air weapon, which is operated with a view to making a profit.

(5) This section does not apply to an approved air weapon club.
24 Restrictions on transactions involving air weapons

(1) It is an offence for a person other than a registered firearms dealer, by way of trade or business, to—

(a) manufacture, sell, transfer, repair or test an air weapon,

(b) expose an air weapon for sale or transfer, or

(c) possess an air weapon for the purposes of its sale, transfer, repair or testing.

(2) It is an offence for a person ("A") to sell or transfer an air weapon to another person ("B") unless—

(a) B is a registered firearms dealer,

(b) B holds an air weapon certificate (without a condition attached to it preventing B from purchasing or acquiring an air weapon) and shows it to A,

(c) A is a registered firearms dealer and is satisfied that—

   (i) in a case where B is an individual, B is aged 18 years or more, and

   (ii) the air weapon is to be delivered to a place outwith Great Britain without first coming into B’s possession, or

(d) B provides evidence to A that B is otherwise entitled to purchase or acquire an air weapon without holding an air weapon certificate by virtue of the provisions of this Part.

(3) It is an offence for a person ("A") to manufacture, repair or test an air weapon for another person ("B") unless—

(a) B is a registered firearms dealer,

(b) B holds an air weapon certificate and shows it to A, or

(c) B provides evidence to A that B is otherwise entitled to possess an air weapon without holding an air weapon certificate by virtue of the provisions of this Part.

(4) A person who commits an offence under this section is liable—

(a) on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 12 months or a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum (or both),

(b) on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 2 years or a fine (or both).

25 Requirement for commercial sales of air weapons to be in person

(1) This section applies where a person ("the seller") sells an air weapon by way of trade or business to an individual in Great Britain who is not a registered firearms dealer.

(2) It is an offence for the seller, for the purposes of the sale, to transfer possession of the weapon to the purchaser otherwise than at a time when both the purchaser and the seller (or a representative of the seller) are present in person.

(3) The reference in subsection (2) to a representative of the seller is a reference to—

(a) a person who is employed by the seller in the seller’s business as a registered firearms dealer,
(b) a registered firearms dealer (“A”) who has been authorised by the seller to act on the seller’s behalf in relation to the sale, or
(c) a person who is employed by A in A’s business as a registered firearms dealer.

(4) A person who commits an offence under this section is liable, on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 12 months or a fine not exceeding level 5 on the standard scale (or both).

26 Requirement to notify chief constable of certain sales

(1) This section applies where a registered firearms dealer sells an air weapon—

(a) to an individual who—

(i) does not hold an air weapon certificate, and
(ii) is aged 18 years or more, and

(b) the air weapon is to be delivered to a place outwith Great Britain without first coming into the purchaser’s possession.

(2) The registered firearms dealer must, within 48 hours of the sale, give notice of the transaction to the chief constable.

(3) A notice given under subsection (2) must include the particulars of the transaction which the registered firearms dealer is required to enter in the register kept by the dealer under section 40 of the 1968 Act.

(4) It is an offence for a registered firearms dealer to fail to comply with subsection (2).

(5) A person who commits an offence under subsection (4) is liable, on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale.

Enforcement

27 Power of search with warrant

(1) A sheriff may, on the application of a constable or a member of police staff, grant a warrant to the applicant under this section if satisfied, by evidence on oath, that there is a reasonable ground for suspecting—

(a) that an air weapon offence has been, is being, or is about to be committed, or
(b) that, in connection with an air weapon, there is a danger to the public safety or to the peace.

(2) A warrant under this section may authorise a constable or a member of police staff—

(a) to enter at any time any place named in the warrant, if necessary by force, and to search the place and every person found there,
(b) to seize and detain anything that the constable or member of police staff may find at the place, or on any such person, in respect of which or in connection with which the constable or member of police staff has a reasonable ground for suspecting—

(i) that an air weapon offence has been, is being or is about to be committed, or
(ii) that in connection with an air weapon there is a danger to the public safety or to the peace.
Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill
Part I—Air weapons

(3) The power of a constable or a member of police staff under subsection (2)(b) to seize and detain anything found at any place, or on any person found there, includes power to require any information which is stored in any electronic form and is accessible from the place or by the person to be produced in a form—

(a) which is visible and legible and can be taken away, or
(b) from which it can be readily produced in a visible and legible form and can be taken away.

(4) It is an offence for an individual to obstruct intentionally a constable or member of police staff in the exercise of the constable’s or member of police staff’s powers under a warrant granted under this section.

(5) An individual who commits an offence under subsection (4) is liable, on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 12 months or a fine not exceeding level 5 on the standard scale (or both).

28 Production of air weapon certificate

(1) A constable may require a person whom the constable believes to be in possession of an air weapon to produce—

(a) the person’s air weapon certificate, or
(b) evidence that the person is entitled to possess an air weapon without holding an air weapon certificate by virtue of the provisions of this Act.

(2) Where a person fails to produce the air weapon certificate or evidence required under subsection (1), the constable may—

(a) seize and detain the air weapon, and
(b) require the person to provide (immediately) the person’s name and address.

(3) It is an offence for a person—

(a) to fail to comply with a requirement under subsection (2)(b), or
(b) to provide a false name or address.

(4) A person who commits an offence under subsection (3) is liable, on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale.

29 Cancellation of air weapon certificate

(1) Subsection (2) applies where an individual (“A”) holding an air weapon certificate—

(a) is convicted of—

(i) an air weapon offence,
(ii) an offence under the 1968 Act, or
(iii) an offence for which A is sentenced to imprisonment or to detention in a young offenders’ institution,

(b) has been ordered to keep the peace or to be of good behaviour and, as a condition of that, is not to possess, carry or use an air weapon or other firearm,

(c) is subject to a community payback order under section 227A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 which contains a requirement not to possess, carry or use an air weapon or other firearm, or
(d) has been ordained to find caution and as a condition of that, is not to possess, carry or use an air weapon or other firearm.

(2) Where this subsection applies, the court by or before which A is convicted, or which imposes the condition or requirement, may cancel the air weapon certificate held by A.

(3) Where the court cancels an air weapon certificate under this section—

(a) the court must notify the chief constable of the cancellation, and

(b) the chief constable must, by notice given to A, require A to surrender A’s air weapon certificate within the period of 21 days beginning with the date the notice is given.

(4) It is an offence for an individual, without reasonable excuse, to fail to comply with the requirements of a notice under subsection (3)(b).

(5) An individual who commits an offence under subsection (4) is liable, on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale.

30  Forfeiture and disposal of air weapons

15  (1) Subsection (2) applies where a person (“A”) is convicted of an air weapon offence.

(2) Where this subsection applies, the court by or before which A is convicted may make such order as to the forfeiture or disposal of any air weapon found in A’s possession as the court thinks fit.

(3) A constable may seize and detain an air weapon which may be the sub ject of an order for forfeiture under this section or which, but for subsection (5), could be the subject of such an order.

(4) A sheriff may, on an application of the chief constable, order the disposal (by any means the chief constable thinks fit) of any air weapon seized and detained by a constable under this Part.

(5) No order is to be made under subsection (2) or (4) for the forfeiture or disposal of an air weapon which is possessed for the purposes of a museum.

(6) Subsection (7) applies where—

(a) an air weapon is surrendered in pursuance of—

(i) a notice given under section 11(3) which revokes an individual’s air weapon certificate, or

(ii) a notice given under section 16(1) which revokes an individual’s police permit or visitor permit, and

(b) the individual appeals against the decision to revoke the individual’s air weapon certificate, police permit or, as the case may be, visitor permit (and does not withdraw that appeal prior to its determination).

(7) Where this subsection applies—

(a) if the appeal is successful, the air weapon must be returned,

(b) if the appeal is dismissed, the sheriff may make such order for the disposal of the air weapon as the sheriff considers appropriate.

(8) Subsection (9) applies where—

(a) an air weapon is surrendered in pursuance of—
Part I—Air weapons

(i) a notice given under section 11(3) which revokes an individual’s air weapon certificate, or

(ii) a notice given under section 16(1) which revokes an individual’s police permit or visitor permit, and

(b) the individual—

(i) does not appeal against the decision to revoke the individual’s air weapon certificate, police permit or, as the case may be, visitor permit, or

(ii) makes and subsequently withdraws an appeal against such a decision.

Where this subsection applies, the air weapon is to be disposed of—

(a) in such manner as the chief constable and the owner of the weapon may agree, or

(b) in default of such agreement, in such manner as the chief constable may decide.

(10) Where the chief constable decides to dispose of an air weapon under subsection (9)(b), the chief constable must give the owner notice of the decision.

Offences

31 Failure to keep air weapons secure or to report loss to police

(1) It is an offence for a person—

(a) to fail to take reasonable precautions for the safe custody of an air weapon possessed by the person, or

(b) to fail to report immediately to the chief constable the loss or theft of an air weapon possessed by the person.

(2) A person who commits an offence under subsection (1) is liable, on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale.

32 False statements, certificates and permits

(1) It is an offence for an individual to knowingly or recklessly make any statement which is false in any material particular for the purposes of procuring (either personally or for another person)—

(a) the grant, renewal or variation of an air weapon certificate,

(b) the grant or variation of a police or visitor permit,

(c) the grant of an event permit, or

(d) the grant, renewal or variation of an approval of an air weapon club.

(2) It is an offence for an individual, with a view to purchasing, acquiring or procuring the repair or testing of an air weapon—

(a) to produce a false air weapon certificate, police permit or visitor permit,

(b) to produce an air weapon certificate, police permit or visitor permit which has been improperly altered, or

(c) to knowingly or recklessly make a statement which is false in a material particular.
(3) An individual who commits an offence under this section is liable, on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 12 months or a fine not exceeding level 5 on the standard scale (or both).

33 Time limit for offences

Section 136 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 (time limit for certain offences) applies to an air weapon offence which is triable only summarily as if the references in subsection (1) of that section to 6 months were to 36 months (and subsection (2) of that section were omitted).

34 Offences by bodies corporate etc.

(1) Subsection (2) applies where—

(a) an offence under this Part has been committed by—

(i) a body corporate,

(ii) a Scottish partnership, or

(iii) an unincorporated association other than a Scottish partnership, and

(b) it is proved that the offence was committed with the consent or connivance of, or was attributable to neglect on the part of—

(i) a relevant individual, or

(ii) an individual purporting to act in the capacity of a relevant individual.

(2) The individual (as well as the body corporate, partnership or (as the case may be) association) commits the offence and is liable to be proceeded against and punished accordingly.

(3) In subsection (1), “relevant individual” means—

(a) in relation to a body corporate (other than a limited liability partnership)—

(i) a director, manager, secretary or similar officer of the body,

(ii) where the affairs of the body are managed by its members, a member,

(b) in relation to a limited liability partnership, a member,

(c) in relation to a Scottish partnership, a partner,

(d) in relation to an unincorporated association other than a Scottish partnership, an individual who is concerned in the management or control of the association.

35 Appeals

(1) A person aggrieved by a decision of the chief constable under a section listed in subsection (2) may appeal against the decision to the appropriate sheriff.

(2) The sections are—

(a) section 5(1) (grant or renewal of air weapon certificate),

(b) section 6(2) (air weapon certificates: conditions),
(c) section 7(3)(b) (special requirements and conditions for young person’s air weapon certificate),
(d) section 10(1) (variation of air weapon certificate),
(e) section 11(1)(a) or (2) (revocation of air weapon certificate),
(f) section 12(1) (police permits),
(g) section 13(1) or (6) (visitor permits),
(h) section 14(3)(b) or (4)(b) (visitor permits: young persons),
(i) section 15(2) (police and visitor permits: conditions),
(j) section 16(1) (police and visitor permits: variation and revocation),
(k) section 17(1) or (2) (event permits),
(l) section 18(1), (3) or (5) (approval of air weapon clubs),
(m) section 19(1) (variation of approval for air weapon club),
(n) section 30(9)(b) (forfeiture and disposal of air weapons).

(3) An appeal must be made within the period of 21 days beginning with the date on which the decision appealed against was made.

(4) An appeal under this section is to be determined on the merits (and not by way of review).

(5) The sheriff hearing the appeal may consider any evidence or other matter, whether or not it was available at the time the chief constable made the decision appealed against.

(6) On determining the appeal, the sheriff may—
   (a) dismiss the appeal,
   (b) give the chief constable such direction as the sheriff considers appropriate as respects the matter which is the subject of the appeal.

(7) The decision of the sheriff may be appealed against only on a point of law.

(8) In this section, “the appropriate sheriff” means—
   (a) in a case where the appellant resides in Scotland, a sheriff of the sheriffdom in which the appellant resides, or
   (b) in a case where the appellant resides outwith Scotland, a sheriff of the sheriffdom of Lothian and Borders, sitting at Edinburgh.

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make provision for the charging of fees by the chief constable—
   (a) in respect of applications under this Part, and
   (b) otherwise in respect of the performance of functions by the chief constable under this Part.

(2) Regulations under subsection (1) may—
   (a) specify different fees for different circumstances,
   (b) specify circumstances in which no fee is payable,
(c) provide for fees to be determined by reference to such factors (including the value of money) as may be specified in the regulations.

(3) Where regulations under subsection (1) provide for a fee to be charged in respect of an application under this Part, the application is valid only when the fee is paid.

(4) Nothing in this section limits the generality of section 75.

37 Power to make further provision

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make further provision for the purposes of this Part.

(2) Without limiting that generality (or the generality of section 75), regulations under subsection (1) may—

(a) make provision about the application processes under this Part (for example, prescribing the form and content of applications, any required supporting documentation or making further provision about the verification of applications),

(b) make provision in relation to air weapon certificates, police permits, visitor permits, event permits and approvals of air weapon clubs (for example, prescribing their form and content or the conditions which may or must be attached to them).

38 Transitional arrangements for existing certificate holders

(1) This section applies where, on the day on which section 2(1) comes into force, a person aged 14 years or more holds a firearm certificate or a shotgun certificate (“the existing certificate”).

(2) It is not an offence under section 2(1) for the person to use and possess an air weapon without holding an air weapon certificate for the duration of the transitional period.

(3) The person must, in relation to such use or possession, comply with—

(a) any prescribed mandatory conditions which apply to the use and possession of air weapons, and

(b) if the person is under the age of 18, the conditions mentioned in section 7(5).

(4) A person who fails to comply with a condition mentioned in subsection (3) commits an offence.

(5) But it is not an offence under subsection (4) for a person to fail to comply with a condition mentioned in subsection (3) if—

(a) the person is entitled to use or possess an air weapon by virtue of an exemption under schedule 1, and

(b) the failure relates to the use or possession of an air weapon in accordance with the exemption.

(6) A person who commits an offence under subsection (4) is liable, on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale.

(7) In this section, the “transitional period” means, in relation to an existing certificate, the period—

(a) beginning with the day on which section 2(1) comes into force, and
(b) ending with (the earlier of)—

(i) the day on which the existing certificate is, or falls to be, renewed, or

(ii) the day on which the existing certificate is surrendered, cancelled or revoked.

(8) For the purposes of subsection (7)(b)(i), where a person holds both a firearm certificate and a shot gun certificate, the existing certificate is the certificate which is, or which falls to be, renewed later.

(9) For the purposes of subsection (7)(b)(ii), where a person holds both a firearm certificate and a shot gun certificate—

(a) the surrender of one of the certificates does not end the transitional period, but

(b) the cancellation or revocation of either certificate ends the transitional period.

(10) For the purposes of paragraph 16 of schedule 1, this section is to be treated as if it were an exemption under that schedule.

39 Guidance

(1) The chief constable must, in exercising any function under this Part, have regard to any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers.

(2) The Scottish Ministers must publish any guidance they issue for the purposes of this Part.

(3) The Scottish Ministers may revise and revoke such guidance.

(1) The 2005 Act is amended as follows.

(2) After section 134 insert—

“134ZA Duty to acknowledge applications

(1) This section applies where a Licensing Board receive a relevant application.

(2) In a case where the Licensing Board are satisfied that the application meets the prescribed requirements they must, unless subsection (3) applies, give an acknowledgement to the applicant—

(a) confirming that they are satisfied that the application meets the prescribed requirements,

(b) listing any documents received in support of the application and the date or dates on which the documents were received by them, and

(c) informing the applicant about the period for determining the application under section 134ZB.

(3) This subsection applies where the Licensing Board consider it appropriate to determine the application on its merits without first giving an acknowledgement to the applicant.

(4) In a case where the Licensing Board are not satisfied that the application meets the prescribed requirements, they must give a notice to the applicant—
(a) indicating that they are treating the application as incomplete and not having been made, and
(b) stating their reasons for treating the application in that way.

(5) Subsection (4) does not prevent an applicant from submitting further information in support of the application if that is otherwise competent.

(6) A Licensing Board must give an acknowledgement under subsection (2) or give a notice under subsection (4) as soon as is practicable.

(7) For the purposes of this section, “prescribed requirements”, in relation to a relevant application, means the requirements (as to form, content, etc.) which are imposed by or under this Act or any other enactment in respect of the type of relevant application in question.

(8) In this section, a “relevant application” is—
(a) a premises licence application,
(b) a premises licence variation application,

134ZB Period for determination of applications

(1) A Licensing Board must determine every relevant application which meets the prescribed requirements (including an application mentioned in subsection (2)) before the end of the period of 9 months beginning with (the later of)—
(a) the date on which the Licensing Board received the application, or
(b) where the application did not initially meet the prescribed requirements, the date on which the application met the prescribed requirements.

(2) Where a Licensing Board consider it appropriate to determine a relevant application without first giving an acknowledgement under section 134ZA(2), they must determine the application as soon as is practicable.

(3) A sheriff of the appropriate sheriffdom may, on an application by a Licensing Board in relation to a relevant application, extend the period for determining the application under subsection (1).

(4) The sheriff may extend the period only if—
(a) it appears to the sheriff that there is a good reason to do so, and
(b) no previous extension has been granted in relation to the relevant application.

(5) The applicant in relation to a relevant application is entitled to be a party to proceedings on an application to a sheriff under subsection (3).

(6) In this section—

“prescribed requirements” has the same meaning as in section 134ZA,
“relevant application” has the same meaning as in section 134ZA.

134ZC Deemed grant of applications

(1) Subsection (2) applies where a Licensing Board have failed to determine a relevant application before the expiry of the determination period.

(2) Where this subsection applies—

(a) the application is deemed to have been granted on the date on which the determination period expired, and

(b) the deemed grant of the application has the same effect, for the purposes of this Act, as if the application had been granted by the Licensing Board.

(3) A Licensing Board may not impose any conditions (other than those which they must impose under this Act) in respect of an application which is deemed to have been granted under subsection (2).

(4) Subsection (5) applies in relation to an application—

(a) that is deemed to have been granted under subsection (2), and

(b) in respect of which the Licensing Board must, on granting such an application, determine the period during which the thing applied for is to have effect.

(5) The thing applied for is to have effect for the duration of the period stated in the application (subject to any limits imposed by this Act).

(6) In this section—

“determination period” means, in relation to a relevant application, the period for determining the application under section 134ZB(1) including (if applicable) any extension to that period granted under subsection (3) of that section,

“prescribed requirements” has the same meaning as in section 134ZA,
“relevant application” has the same meaning as in section 134ZA.”.

After section 33 of the 1982 Act insert—

“33A Acceptable forms of payment for metal

(1) A metal dealer or an itinerant metal dealer may pay for metal only by a method of payment specified in subsection (2).

(2) The methods of payment are—

(a) by means of a cheque which under section 81A of the Bills of Exchange Act 1882 is not transferable, or

(b) by electronic transfer of funds to an account in the name of the payee.

(3) If a metal dealer or an itinerant metal dealer pays for metal otherwise than in accordance with subsection (1), the dealer and each of the persons listed in subsection (4) (if any) commit an offence.

(4) The persons are—

(a) in a case of payment being made by a metal dealer at a place of business of the dealer, the person with day to day management of the place,

(b) in any case, any person who, acting on behalf of the metal dealer or the itinerant metal dealer, makes the payment.

(5) It is a defence for a metal dealer, an itinerant metal dealer or a person described in subsection (4)(a) who is charged with an offence under this section to prove that the dealer or, as the case may be, person—

(a) made arrangements to ensure that the payment was to be made only in accordance with subsection (1), and

(b) took all reasonable steps to ensure that those arrangements were complied with.
A person who commits an offence under this section is liable, on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding level 5 on the standard scale.

The Scottish Ministers may by regulations—

(a) amend subsection (2) so as to add, amend or remove methods of payment, and

(b) make such consequential modification of section 33B(3) as they consider appropriate.

Regulations under subsection (7) are subject to the affirmative procedure.

In this section, “place of business” means a place of business operated by a metal dealer in the ordinary course of that dealer’s business as a metal dealer.”.

Metal dealers and itinerant metal dealers: records

(1) The 1982 Act is amended as follows.

(2) Sections 30 (keeping of records) and 33 (receipts and invoices: itinerant metal dealers) are repealed.

(3) After section 33A (as inserted by section 65 of this Act), insert—

Requirement to keep records

(1) This section applies where a metal dealer or an itinerant metal dealer (“the dealer”), in the course of the dealer’s business—

(a) acquires any metal (whether or not for value), or

(b) processes or disposes of any metal (by any means).

(2) In respect of any metal acquired, the dealer must record the following information—

(a) the description and weight of the metal,

(b) the date and time of the acquisition of the metal,

(c) if the metal is acquired from another person—

(i) the name and address of the person,

(ii) the means by which the person’s name and address was verified,

(d) the price, if any, payable in respect of the acquisition of the metal, if that price has been ascertained at the time when the entry in the record relating to that metal is to be made,

(e) the method of payment of the price (if applicable),

(f) where no price is payable for the metal, the value of the metal at the time when the entry is to be made as estimated by the dealer,

(g) in the case of metal delivered to the dealer by means of a vehicle, the registration mark (within the meaning of section 23 of the Vehicle Excise and Registration Act 1994) borne by the vehicle.

(3) Where the dealer has paid for metal, the dealer must keep a copy of—

(a) the cheque, or

(b) the document evidencing the electronic transfer of funds.
(4) In respect of any metal processed or disposed of, the dealer must record the following information—

(a) the description and weight of the metal immediately before its processing or disposal,

(b) the date of the processing or disposal of the metal,

(c) in the case of metal which is processed, the process applied,

(d) in the case of metal disposed of by sale or exchange—

(i) the consideration for which it is sold or exchanged,

(ii) the name and address of the person to whom the metal is sold or with whom it is exchanged, and

(iii) the means by which the person’s name and address was verified,

(e) in the case of metal disposed of otherwise than by sale or exchange, its value immediately before its disposal as estimated by the dealer.

(5) The dealer must—

(a) keep separate records in relation to—

(i) metal acquired, and

(ii) metal processed or disposed of,

(b) record the information immediately after the metal is acquired, processed or disposed of,

(c) keep a copy of any document produced by a person to verify that person’s name or address, and

(d) retain information recorded or documents kept under this section for a period of not less than 3 years beginning with the date on which the information was recorded or document obtained.

(6) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations require further information to be recorded about any metal acquired, processed or disposed of by metal dealers or itinerant metal dealers.

(7) Regulations under subsection (6)—

(a) may make different provision for different purposes, and

(b) are subject to the negative procedure.

33C Form of records

(1) A metal dealer or an itinerant metal dealer (“a dealer”) must record the required information—

(a) in books with serially numbered pages, or

(b) by means of a device for storing and processing information.

(2) Where a dealer records the required information in books, the dealer must use separate books for recording the required information about—

(a) metal acquired, and

(b) metal processed or disposed of.
(3) Where a dealer uses a device for storing and processing information, the dealer must, by means of the device or otherwise, keep details of all modifications made in the records kept by the device.

(4) Where a dealer is required to keep a copy of a document under section 33B, it is sufficient for the dealer—

(a) to keep an electronic copy of the document, and

(b) in relation to a document verifying a person’s name or address, keep only one copy of the document.

(5) In this section, “required information” means the information about metal acquired, processed or disposed of that a dealer is required to record under or by virtue of section 33B(2), (4) or (6).

33D Metal dealer to keep records for each place of business

(1) A metal dealer must keep separate records of the required information in relation to—

(a) each place of business operated by the dealer, and

(b) any metal acquired, processed or disposed of otherwise than at such a place of business.

(2) Where a metal dealer records the required information in books, the dealer must not, at any time at a place of business, use more than—

(a) one book for recording the required information about metal acquired, and

(b) one book for recording the required information about metal processed or disposed of.

(3) In this section—

“place of business” means a place of business operated by a metal dealer in the ordinary course of that dealer’s business as a metal dealer, “required information” means the information about metal acquired, processed or disposed of that a dealer is required to record under or by virtue of section 33B(2), (4) or (6).”.

(4) In section 34 (offences relating to metal dealing)—

(a) after subsection (2) insert—

“(2A) Any metal dealer or itinerant metal dealer who fails to comply with a requirement of section 33B, 33C or 33D commits an offence and is liable, on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale.”;

(b) in subsection (3), for the words from “furnishes” to “keep” substitute “produces any information or document which the dealer is required to record or keep under section 33B which is false or misleading in a material particular”.

Public entertainment venues

Licensing of theatres etc.

(1) In section 41 of the 1982 Act (public entertainment licences)—
(a) in subsection (2)(d), the words “the Theatres Act 1968, or” are repealed,

(b) after subsection (3) insert—

“(3A) In relation to a public entertainment licence which authorises the use of premises for the performance of plays, no condition may be attached to the licence as to the nature of the plays which may be performed, or the manner of performing plays, under the licence.

(3B) Subsection (3A) does not prevent a licensing authority from attaching, by virtue of section 3B or in accordance with subsection (3) or paragraph 5 of Schedule 1, any condition which they consider appropriate on the grounds of public safety.”.

(2) In section 1 of the Theatres Act 1968 (“the 1968 Act”) (abolition of censorship of the theatre), subsection (2) is repealed.

(3) Sections 12 to 14 of the 1968 Act (licensing of premises for public performances of plays) are repealed.

(4) In section 15 of the 1968 Act (powers of entry and inspection)—

(a) in subsection (1)—

(i) the word “or” immediately following paragraph (a) is repealed,

(ii) paragraph (b) is repealed,

(iii) the words “or, in a case falling within paragraph (b) above, any police officer or authorised officer of the licensing authority” are repealed,

(iv) paragraph (ii) is repealed,

(b) subsections (2), (3), (5) and (6) are repealed.

(5) In section 18 of the 1968 Act (interpretation), in subsection (1), the definition of “licensing authority” is repealed.

(6) Schedule 1 to the 1968 Act (provision about licenses to perform plays) is repealed.

Sexual entertainment venues

68 Licensing of sexual entertainment venues

(1) The 1982 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 41(2) (definition of place of public entertainment), after paragraph (aa) insert—

“(ab) a sexual entertainment venue (as defined in section 45A) in relation to which Schedule 2 (as modified for the purposes of section 45B) has effect, while being used as such;”.

(3) After section 45 insert—

“45A Licensing of sexual entertainment venues: interpretation

(1) This section applies for the purposes of the interpretation of section 45B and Schedule 2 (as modified for the purposes of section 45B).

(2) “Sexual entertainment venue” means any premises at which sexual entertainment is provided before a live audience for (or with a view to) the financial gain of the organiser.
(3) For the purposes of that definition—

“audience” includes an audience of one,
“financial gain” includes financial gain arising directly or indirectly from the provision of the sexual entertainment,

“organiser”, in relation to the provision of sexual entertainment in premises, means—

(a) the person (“A”) who is responsible for—

(i) the management of the premises, or
(ii) the organisation or management of the sexual entertainment,

or

(b) where A exercises that responsibility on behalf of another person (whether by virtue of a contract of employment or otherwise), that other person,

“premises” includes any vehicle, vessel or stall but does not include any private dwelling to which the public is not admitted,

“sexual entertainment” means—

(a) any live performance, or
(b) any live display of nudity, which is of such a nature that, ignoring financial gain, it must reasonably be assumed to be provided solely or principally for the purpose of sexually stimulating any member of the audience (whether by verbal or other means).

(4) For the purposes of the definition of “sexual entertainment”, “display of nudity” means—

(a) in the case of a woman, the showing of (to any extent and by any means) her nipples, pubic area, genitals or anus,

(b) in the case of a man, the showing of (to any extent and by any means) his pubic area, genitals or anus.

(5) Sexual entertainment is provided if (and only if) it is provided (or allowed to be provided) by or on behalf of the organiser.

(6) References in Schedule 2 (as modified for the purposes of section 45B) to the use of any premises by a person as a sexual entertainment venue are to be read as references to their use by the organiser.

(7) The following are not sexual entertainment venues—

(a) a sex shop (within the meaning of paragraph 2(1) of Schedule 2),
(b) such other premises as the Scottish Ministers may by order specify.

(8) An order under subsection (7)(b) may make different provision for different purposes.
(9) Premises at which sexual entertainment is provided as mentioned in subsection (2) on a particular occasion (“the current occasion”) are not to be treated as a sexual entertainment venue if sexual entertainment has not been provided on more than 3 previous occasions which fall wholly or partly within the period of 12 months ending with the start of the current occasion.

(10) For the purposes of subsection (9)—
   (a) each continuous period during which sexual entertainment is provided on the premises is to be treated as a separate occasion, and
   (b) where the period during which sexual entertainment is provided on the premises exceeds 24 hours, each period of 24 hours (and any part of a period of 24 hours) is to be treated as a separate occasion.

(11) The Scottish Ministers may by order provide for—
   (a) descriptions of performances, or
   (b) descriptions of displays of nudity, which are not to be treated as sexual entertainment for the purposes of this section.

(12) An order under subsection (7)(b) or (11) is subject to the negative procedure.

45B Licensing of sexual entertainment venues

(1) A local authority may resolve that Schedule 2 (as modified for the purposes of this section) is to have effect in their area in relation to sexual entertainment venues.

(2) If a local authority passes a resolution under subsection (1), Schedule 2 (as so modified) has effect in their area from the day specified in the resolution.

(3) The day mentioned in subsection (2) must not be before the expiry of the period of one year beginning with the day on which the resolution is passed.

(4) A local authority must, not later than 28 days before the day mentioned in subsection (2), publish notice that they have passed a resolution under this section.

(5) The notice must—
   (a) state the general effect of Schedule 2 (as modified for the purposes of this section), and
   (b) be published electronically or in a newspaper circulating in the local authority’s area.

(6) For the purposes of this section, paragraphs 1 and 3 to 25 of Schedule 2 apply with the following modifications—
   (a) references to a sex shop are to be read as references to a sexual entertainment venue,
   (b) references to the use by a person of premises, vehicles, vessels or stalls as a sexual entertainment venue are to be read as references to their use by the organiser,
   (c) in paragraph 1—
in sub-paragraph (b)—

(A) the word “or immediately following paragraph (i) is omitted,
(B) paragraph (ii) is omitted, and
(ii) sub-paragraph (c) is omitted,

(d) in paragraph 7—

(i) in sub-paragraph (2), at the beginning insert “Subject to sub-paragraph (3A),”, and
(ii) after sub-paragraph (3) insert—

“(3A)If a local authority consider it appropriate to do so in relation to an application, the local authority may dispense with the requirement to publish an advertisement under sub-paragraph (2) and may instead publish notice of the application electronically.

(3B) Publication under sub-paragraph (3A) must be not later than 7 days after the date of the application.”,

(e) in paragraph 9—

(i) in sub-paragraph (5)(c)—

(A) after the word “in” insert “the local authority’s area or”,
(B) after the word “for” insert “their area or”,
(ii) after sub-paragraph (5) insert—

“(5A)For the purposes of sub-paragraph (5)(c), a local authority must—

(a) from time to time determine the appropriate number of sexual entertainment venues for their area and for each relevant locality,
and
(b) publicise the determination in such manner as they consider appropriate.”,

(iii) after sub-paragraph (6) insert—

“(6A)A local authority may refuse an application for the grant or renewal of a licence despite the fact that a premises licence under Part 3 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 is in effect in relation to the premises, vehicle, vessel or stall to which the application relates.”,

(f) in paragraph 12(2)(b), for “shorter” substitute “other”,

(g) in paragraph 19, after sub-paragraph (1) insert—

“(1A)But it is not an offence—

(a) under sub-paragraph (1)(b) for the holder of a licence for a sexual entertainment venue to employ a person under the age of 18 in the business of the sexual entertainment venue if the employee’s duties do not involve the employee being in the sexual entertainment venue at a time when sexual entertainment is being provided, or
(b) under sub-paragraph (1)(e) for the holder of a licence for a sexual entertainment venue, or the servant, employee or agent of such a person, to permit an employee under the age of 18 to enter the sexual entertainment venue at times when sexual entertainment is not being provided.”, and

(h) in paragraph 25, in each of sub-paragraphs (1)(a) and (2), for “45” substitute “45B”.

(7) In carrying out functions conferred by virtue of this section, a local authority must have regard to any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers.”.

(4) The title of Part 3 becomes “Control of sex shops and sexual entertainment venues”.

Miscellaneous and general

69 Deemed grant of applications

(1) The 1982 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In section 3 (discharge of functions of licensing authorities)—

(a) in subsection (1), for the words from “shall” to the end substitute “must—

(a) consider each relevant application made to them within the period of 3 months beginning with the date on which the application was made, and

(b) subject to the following provisions of this section, reach a final decision on the application within the period of 6 months beginning with the end of the 3 month period referred to in paragraph (a).”,

(b) in subsection (4)—

(i) the words “applied for” are repealed

(ii) for “or, as the case may be, renewed” substitute “, renewed or, as the case may be, varied”,

(iii) the words from “and” where first occurring to the end are repealed,

(c) after subsection (4) insert—

“(4A) A licence deemed to have been granted or renewed under subsection (4) is—

(a) in the case of a temporary licence, to remain in force for the duration of the period sought in the application (up to a maximum period of 6 weeks), or

(b) in any other case, to remain in force for the period of one year.

(4B) A variation of the terms of a licence deemed to have been granted under subsection (4) is to have effect for the remaining period of the licence.

(4C) Subsections (4) and (4B) do not affect—

(a) the powers of revocation under section 7(6)(a),

(b) paragraph 8(5) of Schedule 1 (which relates to renewals of existing licences),

(c) the powers of variation under paragraph 10 of that Schedule, or

(d) the powers of suspension under paragraphs 11 and 12 of that Schedule.”,
Part 3—Civic licensing

(d) for subsection (5) substitute—

“(5A) The deemed grant, renewal or variation of the terms of a licence under subsection (4) is, for the purposes of Schedule 1, to be treated as a decision of the licensing authority to grant, renew or vary the terms of a licence.

(5B) For the purposes of this section, a “relevant application” is an application under paragraph 1, 7 or 10 of Schedule 1.”.

(3) After section 45B (as inserted by section 68 of this Act) insert—

“45C Deemed grant of applications

(1) For the purpose of the discharge of their functions under this Part, every local authority must—

(a) consider each relevant application made to them within the period of 3 months beginning with the date on which the application was made, and

(b) subject to the following provisions of this section, reach a final decision on the application within the period of 6 months beginning with the end of the 3 month period referred to in paragraph (a).

(2) On an application by the local authority within the 6 month period referred to in subsection (1)(b), the sheriff may, if it appears that there is a good reason to do so, extend that period as the sheriff thinks fit.

(3) The applicant is entitled to be a party to proceedings on an application under subsection (2).

(4) Where the local authority have failed to reach a final decision on the application before the expiry of—

(a) the 6 month period referred to in subsection (1)(b), or

(b) such further period as the sheriff may have specified on application under subsection (2), the licence is deemed to have been granted, renewed or, as the case may be, varied on the date of such expiry.

(5) A licence deemed to have been granted or renewed under subsection (4) is to remain in force for the period of one year.

(6) A deemed variation of the terms of a licence deemed under subsection (4) is to have effect for the remaining period of the licence.

(7) Subsections (4) and (6) do not affect—

(a) the powers of revocation under paragraph 13 of Schedule 2, and

(b) the powers of variation under paragraph 15 of that Schedule.

(8) The deemed grant, renewal or variation of the terms of a licence under subsection (4) has the same effect, for the purposes of Schedule 2, as a decision of the licensing authority to grant, renew or vary the terms of a licence.

(9) For the purposes of this section, a “relevant application” is an application under paragraph 6 or 15 of Schedule 2.”.

(4) In Schedule 1 (licensing: further provisions as to the general system), in paragraph 10, after sub-paragraph (5) insert—
“(6) Sub-paragraph (5) does not apply to a deemed variation of the terms of a licence under section 3(4).”.

(5) In Schedule 2 (control of sex shops and sexual entertainment venues), in paragraph 15, after sub-paragraph (4) insert—

“(4A) Sub-paragraph (4) does not apply to a deemed variation of the terms of a licence under section 45C(4).”.

70 Procedure for hearings

(1) The 1982 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In Schedule 1 (licensing: further provisions as to the general system), after paragraph 18 insert—

“Power to make provision about hearings

18A(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make provision as to the procedure to be followed at, or in connection with, any hearing to be held by a licensing authority under this Schedule.

(2) Regulations under this paragraph may, in particular, make provision—

(a) for notice of the hearing to be given to such persons as may be prescribed in the regulations,

(b) about the rules of evidence which are to apply for the purposes of the hearing,

(c) about the representation of any party at the hearing,

(d) as to the times by which any step in the procedure must be taken, and

(e) as to liability for expenses.

(3) Regulations under this paragraph may make different provision for different purposes including, in particular, different types of licence.

(4) Regulations under this paragraph are subject to the negative procedure.”.

(3) In Schedule 2 (control of sex shops and sexual entertainment venues), after paragraph 24 insert—

“Power to make provision about hearings

24A(1) The Scottish Ministers may by regulations make provision as to the procedure to be followed at, or in connection with, any hearing to be held by a local authority under this Schedule.

(2) Regulations under this paragraph may, in particular, make provision—

(a) for notice of the hearing to be given to such persons as may be prescribed in the regulations,

(b) about the rules of evidence which are to apply for the purposes of the hearing,

(c) about the representation of any party at the hearing,

(d) as to the times by which any step in the procedure must be taken, and

(e) as to liability for expenses.
(3) Regulations under this paragraph may make different provision for different purposes, including, in particular, different types of licence.

(4) Regulations under this paragraph are subject to the negative procedure.”.

71 Conditions for Part 3 licences

(1) The 1982 Act is amended as follows.

(2) After section 45C (as inserted by section 69) insert—

“Conditions of licences granted under this Part

45D Mandatory licence conditions

(1) The Scottish Ministers may by order prescribe conditions to which licences granted by local authorities under this Part are to be subject.

(2) Different conditions may be prescribed under subsection (1)—

(a) in respect of different licences or different types of licence,

(b) otherwise for different purposes, circumstances or cases.

(3) An order under subsection (1) is subject to the affirmative procedure.

(4) Subsection (1) does not affect any other power of the Scottish Ministers under this Act or any other enactment to prescribe conditions—

(a) to which licences granted by local authorities under this Part are to be subject, or

(b) to be imposed by local authorities in granting or renewing licences under this Part.

(5) The following conditions are referred to in this Part as “mandatory conditions”—

(a) conditions prescribed under subsection (1),

(b) conditions prescribed under any power referred to in subsection (4), and

(c) conditions imposed, or required to be imposed, by any provision of this Part.

(6) In this section and section 45E, references to licences granted by local authorities include references to—

(a) licences renewed by local authorities, and

(b) licences deemed by virtue of section 45C to have been granted or renewed by local authorities.

45E Standard licence conditions

(1) A local authority may determine conditions to which licences granted by them under this Part are to be subject.

(2) Conditions determined under subsection (1) are referred to in this Part as “standard conditions”.

(3) Different conditions may be determined under subsection (1)—

(a) in respect of different licences or different types of licence,
(b) otherwise for different purposes, circumstances or cases.

(4) A local authority must publish, in such manner as they think appropriate, any standard conditions determined by them.

(5) Standard conditions have no effect—

(a) unless they are published, and

(b) so far as they are inconsistent with any mandatory conditions.

(6) Subsection (1) is subject to paragraph 9(1A) of Schedule 2.”.

(3) In paragraph 9 of Schedule 2 (disposal of applications for licences)—

(a) in sub-paragraph (1)—

(i) the word “unconditionally” is repealed,

(ii) paragraph (b) is repealed,

(b) after sub-paragraph (1) insert—

“(1A) In granting or renewing a licence under sub-paragraph (1)(a), a local authority may (either or both)—

(a) disapply or vary any standard conditions,

(b) impose conditions in addition to any mandatory or standard conditions to which the licence is subject.”,

(c) in sub-paragraph (2)—

(i) for “sub-paragraph” where first occurring substitute “sub-paragraphs (2ZA) and”,

(ii) for “(1)” substitute “(1A)(b)”,

(d) after sub-paragraph (2) insert—

“(2ZA) A variation made under sub-paragraph (1A)(a) or a condition imposed under sub-paragraph (1A)(b) has no effect in so far as it is inconsistent with any mandatory condition to which the licence is subject.”,

(e) in sub-paragraph (2A), for “(1)” substitute “(1A)(b)”.

72 Civic licensing standards officers

“PART 3A

CIVIC LICENSING STANDARDS OFFICERS

45F Civic licensing standards officers

(1) Each local authority must appoint for their area one or more officers (a “civic licensing standards officer”)—

(a) to exercise, in relation to the authority’s area, the general functions conferred on civic licensing standards officers by virtue of section 45G, and

(b) to exercise any other functions that may be conferred on such an officer by virtue of this or any other enactment.
(2) A civic licensing standards officer appointed by a local authority is taken to be an authorised officer of the authority for the purposes of Parts 1 to 3.

(3) A person may hold more than one appointment under subsection (1) (so as to be a civic licensing standards officer for more than one local authority area).

(4) Nothing in this section prevents an officer of a local authority other than a civic licensing standards officer from being an authorised officer of the authority for a purpose of Parts 1 to 3.

(5) In this Part, a reference to a local authority includes a reference to that authority acting as the licensing authority for their area and a reference to an authorised officer of a local authority (however expressed) is to be construed accordingly.

45G General functions of a civic licensing standards officer
(1) The general functions of a civic licensing standards officer are—
(a) to provide to any interested person information and guidance concerning the operation of Parts 1 to 3 in the officer’s area,
(b) to supervise the compliance by the holder of a licence granted under Parts 1 to 3 in the officer’s area with—
(i) the conditions of the licence, and
(ii) the other requirements of Parts 1 to 3,
(c) to provide mediation services for the purposes of avoiding or resolving disputes or disagreements between—
(i) the holder of a licence granted under Parts 1 to 3 in the officer’s area, and
(ii) any other person, concerning any matter relating to compliance with the conditions of the licence or the other requirements of Parts 1 to 3.

(2) The function under subsection (1)(b) includes, in particular, power for a civic licensing standards officer, where the officer believes that a condition to which the licence is subject has been or is being breached—
(a) to give a notice to the holder of the licence requiring such action to be taken to remedy the breach as may be specified in the notice, and
(b) to refer the breach to the local authority which granted the licence for consideration at a meeting of the authority.

(3) A civic licensing standards officer may only refer a breach of a condition under subsection (2)(b) if—
(a) the officer has given notice under subsection (2)(a) and the holder of the licence has failed to comply with it, or
(b) the officer considers that it is appropriate for the breach to be referred to the authority without such a notice being given.

(4) In this section, a reference to an officer’s area is a reference to—
(a) the local authority area for which the officer is appointed under section 45F(1), or
(b) where the officer is appointed for more than one local authority area, the area for which the officer is exercising a function at the relevant time.”.

73 Electronic communications under the 1982 Act

(1) The 1982 Act is amended as follows.

(2) In Schedule 1 (licensing: further provisions as to the general system)—

(a) after paragraph 3(3), insert—

“(3A) Where a licensing authority have determined to accept objections and representations by means of an electronic communication under paragraph 16A, an objection or representation is made for the purpose of sub-paragraph (1) of this paragraph if it is sent—

(a) to the authority by means of an electronic communication which complies with the determination, and
(b) within the time specified in sub-paragraph (1).

(3B) Sub-paragraph (3A) is without prejudice to sub-paragraph (3).”,

(b) after paragraph 16 insert—

“Electronic communications

16A(1) A licensing authority may determine to accept—

(a) applications for the grant or renewal of a licence under paragraph 1,
(b) objections or representations under paragraph 3,
(c) notifications of a change to a licence under paragraph 9,
by means of an electronic communication.

(2) Where a licensing authority make a determination under sub-paragraph (1) they must—

(a) specify in the determination—

(i) the form of electronic communication by which applications, objections, representations or notifications may be made or given,
(ii) the electronic address to be used for making or giving applications, objections, representations or notifications, and
(iii) any means of authentication (in addition to an electronic signature) that are acceptable, and
(b) publicise the determination as they consider appropriate.

(3) In relation to an application, objection, representation or notification made or given by means of an electronic communication, any requirement of this Schedule for the application, objection, representation or notification—

(a) to be in writing is satisfied if the communication is—

(i) in the form specified under sub-paragraph (2)(a)(i), and
(ii) sent to the address specified under sub-paragraph (2)(a)(ii),
(b) to be satisfied if the communication includes an electronic signature or is authenticated by a means specified under sub-paragraph (2)(a)(iii).

(4) A licensing authority may determine to—

(a) give notices under paragraphs 5, 9, 10, 11 or 12, and

(b) give reasons under paragraph 17,

by means of an electronic communication.

(5) A licensing authority may only give a notice or reasons by means of an electronic communication if—

(a) the person to whom the notice or reasons is or are to be given has agreed to receive notices and reasons by means of an electronic communication, and

(b) the communication is sent to an electronic address, and is in an electronic form, specified for that purpose by the person.

(6) In relation to any notice or reasons given by means of an electronic communication, any requirement of this Schedule for the notice or reasons to be given in writing is satisfied if the communication is sent in accordance with sub-paragraph (5).

(7) When a licensing authority gives a notice or reasons by means of an electronic communication then, unless the contrary is proved, it is to be treated as having been received by the person to whom it was sent on the second working day after the day on which it was sent.

(8) For the purposes of sub-paragraph (7), “working day” means a day which is not—

(a) a Saturday or Sunday,

(b) Christmas Eve or Christmas Day,

(c) a day which is a bank holiday in Scotland under the Banking and Financial Dealings Act 1971,

(a) after paragraph 8(4) insert—
“(4A) Where a local authority have determined to accept objections and representations by means of an electronic communication under paragraph 22A, an objection or representation is made for the purpose of sub-paragraph (2) of this paragraph if it is sent—

(a) to the authority by means of an electronic communication which complies with the determination, and

(b) within the time specified in sub-paragraph (2).

(4B) Sub-paragraph (4A) is without prejudice to sub-paragraph (4).”

(b) after paragraph 22 insert—

“Electronic communications

22A(1) A local authority may determine to accept—

(a) applications for the grant or renewal of a licence under this Schedule,

(b) objections or representations under paragraph 8,

(c) notifications of a change to a licence under paragraph 14,

by means of an electronic communication.

(2) Where a local authority make a determination under sub-paragraph (1) they must—

(a) specify in the determination—

(i) the form of electronic communication by which applications, objections, representations or notifications may be made or given,

(ii) the electronic address to be used for making or giving applications, objections, representations or notifications, and

(iii) any means of authentication (in addition to an electronic signature) that are acceptable, and

(b) publicise the determination as they consider appropriate.

(3) In relation to an application, objection, representation or notification made or given by means of an electronic communication, any requirement of this Schedule for the application, objection, representation or notification—

(a) to be in writing is satisfied if the communication is—

(i) in the form specified under sub-paragraph (2)(a)(i), and

(ii) sent to the address specified under sub-paragraph (2)(a)(ii),

(b) to be signed is satisfied if the communication includes an electronic signature or is authenticated by a means specified under sub-paragraph (2)(a)(iii).

(4) A local authority may determine to—

(a) give notices under paragraphs 8, 10, 13, 14 or 15, and

(b) give reasons under paragraph 23,

by means of an electronic communication.

(5) A local authority may only give a notice or reasons by means of an electronic communication if—
(a) the person to whom the notice or reasons is or are to be given has agreed to receive notices and reasons by means of an electronic communication, and

(b) the communication is sent to an electronic address, and is in an electronic form, specified for that purpose by the person.

(6) In relation to any notice or reasons given by means of an electronic communication, any requirement of this Schedule for the notice or reasons to be given in writing is satisfied if the communication is sent in accordance with sub-paragraph (5).

(7) When a licensing authority gives a notice or reasons by means of an electronic communication then, unless the contrary is proved, it is to be treated as having been received by the person to whom it was sent on the second working day after the day on which it was sent.

(8) For the purposes of sub-paragraph (7), “working day” means a day which is not—

(a) a Saturday or Sunday,

(b) Christmas Eve or Christmas Day,

(c) a day which is a bank holiday in Scotland under the Banking and Financial Dealings Act 1971,

(d) a day appointed for public thanksgiving or mourning, or

(e) a day which is a local or public holiday in the area to which the electronic communication is sent.

(9) A local authority may make different determinations for different purposes including, in particular, for different types of licence.

(10) In this Schedule—

“electronic communication” is to be construed in accordance with section 15(1) of the Electronic Communications Act 2000, “electronic signature” is to be construed in accordance with section 7(2) of the Electronic Communications Act 2000.”.

Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill
[AS INTRODUCED]

An Act of the Scottish Parliament to make provision for the licensing and regulation of air weapons; to amend the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005; to amend and extend the licensing provisions of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982; and for connected purposes.

Introduced by: Kenny MacAskill
On: 14 May 2014
Bill type: Government Bill
AIR WEAPONS AND LICENSING (SCOTLAND) BILL

EXPLANATORY NOTES

(CONTENT AND OTHER ACCOMPANYING DOCUMENTS)

CONTENTS

As required under Rule 9.3 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders, the following documents are published to accompany the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 14 May 2014:

- Explanatory Notes;
- a Financial Memorandum;
- a Scottish Government statement on legislative competence; and
- the Presiding Officer’s statement on legislative competence.

A Policy Memorandum is printed separately as SP Bill 49–PM.
EXPLANATORY NOTES

INTRODUCTION

1. These Explanatory Notes have been prepared by the Scottish Government in order to assist the reader of the Bill and to help inform debate on it. They do not form part of the Bill and have not been endorsed by the Parliament.

2. The Notes should be read in conjunction with the Bill. They are not, and are not meant to be, a comprehensive description of the Bill. So where a section or schedule, or a part of a section or schedule, does not seem to require any explanation or comment, none is given.

PURPOSE

3. The Bill introduces a system of licensing for air weapons in Scotland. The Bill creates a number of new offences related to possession, use and acquisition of air weapons by persons who do not hold a licence or do not act in accordance with the licensing regime. The Bill also sets out the framework through which the Police Service of Scotland may grant an air weapon licence to appropriate individuals.

4. The Bill will give local communities the power to regulate sexual entertainment venues in their areas. The Bill also amends the licensing regimes in relation to alcohol licensing, taxis and private hire cars, metal dealers, as well as making systematic changes across the civic licensing regimes contained within the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 (“the 1982 Act”).

5. A more detailed explanation of the Bill’s purpose can be found in the Policy Memorandum, which also explains the thinking and policy intentions that underpin it.

STRUCTURE AND SUMMARY OF THE BILL

6. The Bill is in four parts:

- Part 1 Air weapons sets out a new licensing system for air weapons administered by the Police Service of Scotland. Specific provisions include:
  - a definition of the air weapons that will be subject to licensing;
  - a requirement for air weapon certificates and the process for applications, grants (including conditions and duration) variations, renewal and revocation of these;
  - a system of police permits, visitor permits and event permits;
  - restrictions on the commercial sale, sale for delivery outwith Scotland, manufacture, repair, testing of air weapons and the operation of recreational shooting facilities;
  - Enforcement powers and offences;
  - Power to set fees and provide guidance;
  - Air gun clubs;
These documents relate to the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 49) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 14 May 2014

- Exemptions from the licensing regime.

Part 2 Alcohol licensing amends the existing licensing regime for alcohol licensing included within the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 (“the 2005 Act.”) Specific provisions include:

- Amendment of the licensing objective in relation to children to also include young persons;
- Amendment of the duration of a licensing policy statement to align with the term of Local Government elections;
- Inserting a fit and proper person test in relation to the issue or continued holding of a premises or a personal licence;
- Removal of the automatic requirement for a hearing to be held where a Licensing Board is notified of a relevant or foreign offence in relation to a premises or personal licence;
- Amendment of the definition of relevant offences and foreign offences to no longer disregard a matter that is spent for the purposes of the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974;
- Creation of new offences of giving, or making available, alcohol to a child or young person for consumption in a public place;
- Inclusion of the flavouring angostura bitters in the definition of alcohol for the purposes of the Act;
- Clarification that for an overprovision assessment, the whole Board area may be considered as an area of overprovision;
- For an overprovision assessment allow Boards to take account of licensed hours, among other things;
- A duty on Boards to prepare an annual financial report in respect of their licensing activities;
- Removal of the requirement for a premises licence holder to notify a change in interested parties and amendment of the definition of an “interested party” to remove premises managers;
- Changes to the personal licence holder requirements including removal of the five year restriction on re-applying for a licence revoked on grounds of failing to undertake refresher training or notifying the board of such, and other changes to the personal licence holder requirements;
- A requirement for a Licensing Board to issue an acknowledgement of complete applications, unless the Board does not consider that it would be appropriate to do so;
- Automatic grant of a licence where a Licensing Board has failed to determine an application within the required period or the extended period as granted by a sheriff. This clarifies compliance with the EU Services Directive.
Part 3 Civic Licensing amends the existing licensing regimes included within the 1982 Act:

Sexual entertainment venues
Sets out a new licensing system for sexual entertainment venues administered by local authorities. Specific provisions include:

- The definition of sexual entertainment venues;
- The power for local authorities to license sexual entertainment venues according to the existing structure set out in Schedule 2 of the 1982 Act;
- The power for local authorities to determine the number of sexual entertainment venues in their area.

Metal dealers
Amendments to the metal dealer regime. Specific provisions include:

- Removal of the exemption warrants system that allowed a metal dealer with a larger turnover to be exempted;
- Limit payment for metal by metal dealers or itinerant metal dealers to prescribed methods i.e. bank transfer or cheque;
- Amended standards for identification of customers;
- Amended standards of record keeping;
- Removal of mandatory requirement that metal dealers should not process metal for 48 hours after receiving it.

Taxis and private hire cars
Amendments to the taxis and private hire cars regime. Specific provisions include:

- The power to refuse to grant private hire car licences on grounds of overprovision;
- The extension of taxi driver testing to include private hire car drivers;
- Removal of the contract exemptions to the licensing and regulation of taxis and private hire cars, bringing hire cars used on contracts into the regime.

Public entertainment venues
Abolish ‘theatre licences’ as currently required under the Theatres Act 1968 and instead regulate theatres through the existing public entertainment licencing regime provided for in the 1982 Act.

Miscellaneous and general
Amendments to the operation of all civic government licensing regimes. Specific provisions include:

- Power for Scottish Ministers to make provision for the procedure to be followed at or in connection with hearings;
These documents relate to the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 49) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 14 May 2014

- Introduction of a new role, Civic Licensing Standards Officer;
- Where it has not already been provided for, the deemed grant of a licence where the Local Authority has failed to determine an application within the required period or the extended period granted by a sheriff.

- Part 4 General Provision sets out general provisions, such as for the making of ancillary provision by regulations. It also contains definitions, the short title and provisions for commencement of the Act by order.

PART 1 – AIR WEAPONS

7. The provisions in this Part establish a licensing regime in relation to air weapons.

Section 1 – Meaning of “air weapon”

8. Section 1 defines the term “air weapon” for the purposes of the Part. Subsection (2) adopts the definition from section 1(3)(b) of the Firearms Act 1968 (“the 1968 Act”). Section 1(3)(b) of the 1968 Act provides that an air weapon is an air rifle, air gun or air pistol which does not fall within section 5(1) of the 1968 Act and which is not of a type declared by the Secretary of State by rules to be “specially dangerous”. The Firearms (Dangerous Air Weapons) (Scotland) Rules 1969 (S.I. 1969/270) as amended are the applicable rules made by the Secretary of State.

9. The effect of this is that the Part applies to air weapons capable of a muzzle energy equal to or lower than 12 foot pounds (ft/lb), or 6 ft/lb for an air pistol (approximately 16.27 joules and 8.13 joules respectively). Air weapons above these thresholds – or those that come within section 5(1) of the 1968 Act, for example by being disguised as another object, or designed or adapted to use a self-contained gas cartridge system – will continue to require to be held on a Firearms Certificate issued under the 1968 Act. Note that section 48 of the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1997 provides that any reference to an air rifle, air pistol or air gun in the Firearms Acts 1968 to 1997 includes a reference to any such rifle, pistol or gun which is powered by compressed carbon dioxide and therefore such weapons also fall to be licensed by the Part.

10. Subsection (4)(a)(i) adds a lower power threshold of one joule (approximately 0.74 ft/lb) to this definition, so that air weapons with a muzzle energy of one joule or below do not require to be held on an air weapon certificate. Subsection (4)(a)(ii) also excludes air weapons designed for use only underwater, for example spear guns, from requiring a certificate. Such weapons are excluded from existing UK firearms legislation by regulation 2 of the Firearms (Dangerous Air Weapons) (Scotland) Amendment rules 1993 (S.I. 1993/1541).

11. Subsection (3) sets out that component parts and sound moderators for air weapons are included in the definition of “air weapon”, and require to be held on an air weapon certificate.
Air weapon certificates

Section 2 – Requirement for air weapon certificate

12. This section makes it an offence for a person to use, possess, purchase or acquire an air weapon (as defined in section 1) without holding a valid air weapon certificate or otherwise than in accordance with the Part. Subsection (2) specifies that this offence is triable summarily or on indictment, and sets out the maximum penalties for both. The offence attracts strict liability. A “person” includes non-natural (e.g. corporate bodies) as well as natural persons.

13. Subsection (3) introduces schedule 1, which sets out a number of exemptions from the requirement to hold an air weapon certificate, and certain other offences created by the Part. Commentary on schedule 1 begins at paragraph 222 of this paper. Subsection (4) provides the Scottish Ministers with the power to add, remove or modify exemptions in schedule 1 by regulations. Such regulations are subject to the affirmative procedure in the Scottish Parliament.

Section 3 – Application for grant or renewal of air weapon certificate

14. This section sets out the process by which an individual can apply for an air weapon certificate, or the renewal of a certificate which has previously been granted. Subsection (1) states that applications must be made to the Chief Constable of the Police Service of Scotland, and sets a lower age limit of 14 for applicants.

15. Subsection (2) provides that applications for an air weapon certificate must be made in the form specified in regulations issued under section 37 and must be verified as set out in section 4. Additionally, applicants below the age of 18 must provide information specified in section 7. If an application is not accompanied by the required information it cannot be considered by the Chief Constable. Separately, section 36(3) has the effect that where an application is made in compliance with the application processes it still cannot be considered by the Chief Constable until the fee is paid.

16. Subsection (3) requires the Chief Constable to keep a register of all applications for a new or renewed air weapon certificate, even if the application is ultimately unsuccessful.

Section 4 – Verification of applications

17. This section, combined with section 3(2)(a), requires an application for a new or renewed air weapon certificate to be verified by an appropriate individual before it can be considered by the Chief Constable. Subsection (2) sets out who can verify an application but subsection (2)(c) lists those who can never verify an application, and subsection (3) requires the verifier to confirm the accuracy of any information supplied with the application. In every case the verifier must have known the applicant personally for at least two years, but not be related to them (see the definition of “relative” in section 40) or be ordinarily resident outside the United Kingdom, or be a Registered Firearms Dealer or be a constable or member of police staff of the Police Service of Scotland or a member or employee of the Scottish Police Authority. The Chief Constable must also be satisfied that verifiers are of good standing in the community. Further detail on who can verify an application will be provided in guidance published by the Scottish Ministers under section 39.
Section 5 – Grant or renewal of air weapon certificate

18. This section allows the Chief Constable to issue a new or renewed air weapon certificate provided that the applicant is fit to be entrusted with an air weapon; is not prohibited from possessing any firearms by section 21 of the 1968 Act (which makes provision to prohibit for life or 5 years possession of firearms, including air weapons, by persons who have been convicted and sentenced to specified terms of imprisonment); has a good reason to use, possess, purchase or acquire an air weapon (for example, pest control, sporting target shooting, or being a collector); and in all the circumstances can do so without danger to the public safety or the peace (this last test is intended to allow account to be taken of factors not only directly about the applicant but beyond, such as the applicant’s wider domestic situation or acquaintances). Further clarity on how the Chief Constable should test applicants against these criteria will be provided in guidance published by the Scottish Ministers under section 39.

19. Subsection (2) allows the Chief Constable to consider applicants who already hold a firearm or shotgun certificate issued under the 1968 Act to have met the “fit” and “not prohibited” criteria without further enquiry, on the grounds that these tests will already have been met for the grant of the firearm or shotgun certificate.

20. Subsection (3) allows the police to visit an applicant’s home, or any other place where air weapons are intended to be stored or used, and conduct enquiries relating to the criteria in subsection (1) before granting or renewing an air weapon certificate.

Section 6 – Air weapon certificate: conditions

21. This section relates to conditions which are applied to air weapon certificates. Conditions are defined in section 40(1) as including requirements and restrictions and may comprise positive or negative obligations. Conditions may therefore place restrictions on the way that the certificate holder stores or uses their weapons, or may require the holder to carry out certain administrative functions (for example, informing the Chief Constable if they change address).

22. Subsection (1) sets out that all air weapon certificates will carry certain mandatory conditions, which will be specified in regulations issued under section 37. Subsection (2) allows the Chief Constable to attach additional conditions to certificates as required, and to change a certificate’s conditions at the time of renewal.

23. Subsection (3) specifies that conditions attached by the Chief Constable must not be inconsistent with or undermine the effect of any of the mandatory conditions (as required by subsection (1)), or any other condition attached as a requirement of this Part (for example, the conditions for 14-17 year olds required by section 7(3)).

24. Subsections (4) and (5) create the offence of non-compliance with any conditions attached to an air weapon certificate, and set out the maximum penalty available respectively. This offence attracts strict liability.
Section 7 – Special requirements and conditions for young persons

25. This section sets out additional requirements for applications and certificates granted where the applicant is aged under 18. When combined with the minimum age for applicants at section 3(1), this section applies to applicants aged 14-17.

26. When read with section 3(2)(b), subsection (2) of this section requires that applications for an air weapon certificate from an individual aged 14-17 must contain a statement of consent from the applicant’s parent or guardian in the form and manner prescribed by regulations under section 37. The term “guardian” is defined at section 40(1).

27. Subsections (3) to (5) set out mandatory conditions for air weapon certificates granted to 14-17 year olds. The condition in subsection (4) prohibits a 14-17 year old with an air weapon certificate from purchasing or owning an air weapon, meaning that they may only use borrowed or hired air weapons. This condition applies to all air weapon certificates granted to young persons. Subsection (5) lists the specific activities for which a 14-17 year old might be granted an air weapon certificate. The Chief Constable must apply one or more of the conditions listed at subsection (5) to the young person’s air weapon certificate, as appropriate.

28. Subsection (6) disapplies the requirement that a young applicant need satisfy the Chief Constable that the applicant has a good reason for purchasing or acquiring an air weapon because an air weapon certificate granted to a young person will not permit them to purchase or own such a weapon and therefore that aspect of the test for grant or renewal is not relevant.

29. Subsection (7) defines agriculture for the purposes of this section, specifically subsection (5)(d). The definition used at section 85 of the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act 1991 is adopted, which refers to “horticulture, fruit growing; seed growing; dairy farming; livestock breeding and keeping; the use of land as grazing land, meadow land, osier land, market gardens and nursery grounds; and the use of land for woodlands where that use is ancillary to the farming of land for other agricultural purposes: and “agricultural” shall be construed accordingly”.

Section 8 – Duration of air weapon certificate

30. Subsection (1) sets the normal duration of air weapon certificates at five years, except in the case of a certificate issued to a 14-17 year old, where the certificate expires on the holder’s 18th birthday. At this point the young person’s air weapon certificate can be renewed and the conditions required by section 7 may be removed (for example, the prohibition on purchasing a weapon).

31. Subsection (2) provides that an air weapon certificate will remain valid beyond its stated expiry date, provided that the holder has applied to the Chief Constable for a renewal before that expiry date and the Chief Constable has not yet approved or rejected that renewal. The renewal application must be valid, i.e. comply with the requirements in section 3 and section 36, for this subsection to apply. The effect of this section is that the holder neither has to surrender the holder’s weapons nor commits the offence at section 2(1) when the original certificate expires, provided that renewal is being actively considered by the Chief Constable.
32. Subsection (3) provides the Scottish Ministers with the power to change the duration of air weapon certificates other than those in relation to young people. The regulations will be subject to the affirmative procedure in the Scottish Parliament.

Section 9 – Alignment of different types of certificate

33. This section allows air weapon certificates to be made co-terminous with firearm or shotgun certificates issued under the 1968 Act. This allows for all certificates to be due for renewal at the same time, minimising the workload for the applicant and the Chief Constable. Regulations under section 36 are expected to make provision for a proportionately lowered fee where such air weapon certificates are granted or renewed for significantly shorter duration. This section does not affect the duration of firearm or shotgun certificates.

34. Subsections (1) and (2) allow an applicant who already holds a valid firearm and/or shotgun certificate to request that the expiry date on an air weapon certificate – if granted or renewed – match the expiry date on their existing firearm and/or shotgun certificate(s). Because the standard duration for firearm, shotgun and air weapon certificates are all set at five years, an air weapon certificate issued in this way will necessarily have a shorter than normal duration when it is first granted.

35. Subsections (3) and (4) allow an applicant who already holds a live air weapon certificate to request that that certificate be renewed before it has run its full five year lifespan, and re-issued on the same date that a new or renewed firearm and/or shotgun certificate is granted, so that the expiry dates on all certificates are aligned. This will necessarily mean that the air weapon certificate which they originally paid for on a five year basis will not have lasted for its full duration.

Section 10 – Variation of air weapon certificate

36. This section allows the Chief Constable to vary any of the details on an air weapon certificate after it has been granted or renewed, including adding, amending or removing conditions on the certificate (except the mandatory conditions required by section 6, and, if applicable, section 7). The Chief Constable may vary a certificate at any time, but is obliged to notify the certificate holder of the changes made.

37. Subsection (2)(a) separately allows the holder of an air weapon certificate to request that the Chief Constable make such a variation, for example to provide an updated contact address, or to request the removal or amendment of an outdated condition. Decisions whether to grant such variations are made at the Chief Constable’s discretion.

38. Subsection (3) specifies that conditions attached by the Chief Constable must not be inconsistent with or undermine the effect of any of the mandatory conditions (as required by section 6(1)), or any other condition attached as a requirement of this Part (for example, the conditions for 14-17 year olds required by section 7(3)).
39. Subsection (4) allows the Chief Constable to require an air weapon certificate holder to relinquish their certificate within 21 days, for the purpose of varying the physical certificate in any way. Failure to do so may result in revocation of the certificate under section 11(2)(c).

Section 11 – Revocation of air weapon certificate

40. This section deals with revocation of an air weapon certificate. Subsection (1) requires the Chief Constable to revoke an air weapon certificate if satisfied that there is a danger to public safety or the peace if the certificate holder continues to possess an air weapon, or that the certificate holder is prohibited from possessing firearms under section 21 of the 1968 Act. These tests reflect those at sections 5(1)(d) and 5(1)(b) respectively.

41. Subsection (2) separately provides – but in contrast with subsection (1) does not require – the Chief Constable with discretion to revoke an air weapon certificate where the Chief Constable has reason to believe that the certificate holder is no longer a fit person to possess an air weapon (for example, if the holder was convicted of a crime of violence, or there is evidence of drug or alcohol abuse that meant that they could no longer be trusted with a firearm), or that they no longer have a good reason to hold a certificate (for example, if the holder had been a member of an airgun club but had not renewed membership of it). These tests reflect those at sections 5(1)(a) and 5(1)(c) respectively.

42. Subsections (2)(b) and (2)(c) provide the Chief Constable with discretion to revoke an air weapon certificate where the holder has failed to comply with a condition on that certificate, or has failed to surrender the certificate to the police for the purpose of a variation (as required by Section 10(4)). As with subsection (2)(a), in these circumstances the Chief Constable has the power to revoke but is not required to do so.

43. Subsections (3) to (6) set out the process for the revocation of an air weapon certificate. The Chief Constable must provide at least seven days’ advance notice of a revocation, within such time the certificate holder must relinquish the certificate and any air weapons or commit an offence (unless a reasonable excuse, for example illness, prevents them from doing so). Subsection (7) provides that, should the certificate holder make an appeal against the decision of the Chief Constable to revoke under section 35, the notice period will be suspended until such time as the appeal is disposed of or abandoned. However, subsection (7)(b) requires that the certificate holder must still surrender their certificate and weapons. If an appeal is successful then the court will quash the notice. If the appeal is rejected then the notice continues to run its remaining period from the date it was suspended.

Section 12 – Police permits

44. This section makes provision for police permits, which are distinct from air weapon certificates and are intended for use in transient situations where an individual may find themselves in possession of an air weapon, but grant of an air weapon certificate would not be appropriate (for example, where the executor of an estate takes possession of an air weapon when ingathering the deceased’s property). In this respect this section is intended to perform a similar function to that of section 7 of the 1968 Act, which allows the police to issue similar permits to allow the temporary possession of a firearm covered by section 1 of that Act. This section should be read in conjunction with the exemption at paragraph 8 of schedule 1 to the Bill.

45. Subsection (1) sets out that the Chief Constable may issue a permit to allow an individual to possess or acquire and/or sell an air weapon in the course of business without requiring an air weapon certificate (or, in the case of sale in the course of business, being a Registered Firearms Dealer). These permissions may be applied or omitted from the permit at the Chief Constable’s discretion. Subsection (2) states that a police permit must not be granted to anyone prohibited from possessing firearms under section 21 of the 1968 Act, which is explained in more detail at paragraph 20 of this paper.

46. Subsection (3) allows police permits to have variable durations, set at the discretion of the Chief Constable in each case but, as reflects the transient situation for which a permit is to cater, the duration of a permit is not intended to be of the order of that for an air weapon certificate.

47. Subsection (4) provides that applications for a police permit must comply with the requirements set out in regulations made under section 37 or the application will not be treated as having been made. The effect is that an application for a permit cannot be considered by the Chief Constable if the application processes set out in the regulations are not followed. Separately, section 36(3) has the effect that where an application is made in compliance with the application processes it still cannot be considered by the Chief Constable until the fee is paid.

Section 13 – Visitor permits

48. This and the following related sections provide for a system whereby visitors to Scotland may apply to the Chief Constable for a permit to use, possess, purchase or acquire air weapons while in Scotland, without holding an air weapon certificate. This section should be read in conjunction with the exemption at paragraph 9 of schedule 1.

49. Subsection (4) sets out the criteria for grant of a visitor permit. For individual visitors, subsection (4)(a) requires the applicant to have a good reason, and subsection (4)(c) provides that the visitor must not be prohibited from possessing firearms, nor should their possession of an air weapon present a danger to the public. These requirements match those for applicants for an air weapon certificate in section 5, with the omission of the ‘fit person’ test which would be difficult to apply effectively to visitors from abroad.

50. Subsections (2) and (3) allow for applications by groups of two to 20 people to be made on behalf of the group. The Chief Constable does not have to grant or refuse every member of the group a permit en bloc and can reject some while accepting others. Subsection (4)(b) provides that the Chief Constable must be satisfied that each member of the group individually is to use and possess an air weapon only for one of the listed activities. Each member of the group individually must also not be prohibited from possessing firearms, nor should their possession of an air weapon present a danger to the public. Subsection (5) permits the Chief Constable to require proof from the person applying on behalf of the group that the group has the permission of the owner or occupier of the land in question for the activities mentioned in subsection (4)(b)(i) and (ii).
These documents relate to the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 49) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 14 May 2014

51. Subsection (6) requires the Chief Constable to attach a condition to a visitor permit granted as part of a group application which restricts the permit holder to taking part in the activity or activities listed in subsection (4)(b) for which the permit has been granted. However, subsection (6) does not apply to a visitor who is part of a group but is aged 14-17, who will be subject to the separate restrictions under section 14.

52. Subsection (7) allows visitor permits to have variable durations, set at the discretion of the Chief Constable, although subsection (8) sets a maximum duration of 12 months.

53. Subsection (9) requires that an application for a visitor permit must comply with the requirements set out in regulations issued under section 37 or it will not be regarded as having been made. The effect is that an application for a permit cannot be considered by the Chief Constable if the application processes set out in the regulations are not followed. Separately, section 36(3) has the effect that where an application is made in compliance with the application processes it still cannot be considered by the Chief Constable until the fee is paid.

54. Subsection (10) provides definitions, including specifying that applicants for a visitor permit must be aged 14 or over, and must live outside Scotland but intend to visit (or, be visiting at the time of application).

Section 14 – Visitor permits: young persons

55. This section makes provision where applications for visitor permits are from people under 18 years of age. When read with the definition of “qualifying visitor” in section 13(10) the effect is that this section applies to applicants aged 14 to 17 years.

56. Subsection (2) requires that applications for a visitor permit from an individual aged 14 to 17 years must contain a statement of consent from the applicant’s parent or guardian, set out in a form to be specified in regulations made under section 37. The term “guardian” is defined at section 40(1) and should be construed in light of the relevant jurisdiction of the applicant.

57. Subsections (3) and (4) provide that certain mandatory conditions set out in section 7 must be applied to visitor permits granted to young people, either individually or as part of a group. This means that young people with a visitor permit are subject to equivalent conditions as a young person residing in Scotland who holds an air weapon certificate.

58. Subsection (5) makes equivalent provision to that in section 7(6) as a young person with a visitor permit will not be able to purchase or acquire an air weapon while in Scotland. Subsection (6) makes it clear that a group of young visitors will not be granted a permit for the purpose in section 13(4)(b)(i) – that is for sporting purposes (including shooting live quarry) on private land, which a 14-17 year old holder of an air weapon certificate could not be permitted to do under sections 7(3) and (5).

Section 15 – Police and visitor permits: conditions

59. This section relates to conditions that are applied to police and visitor permits which have been granted under section 12 or section 13 respectively. Conditions will have the same effect as described in section 6. Subsection (1) sets out that all such permits will be subject to any mandatory conditions, which will be specified in regulations issued under section 37. Subsection (2) allows the Chief Constable to attach additional conditions to police and visitor permits as required.

60. Subsection (3) specifies that conditions attached by the Chief Constable must not be inconsistent with or undermine the effect of any of the mandatory conditions required by subsection (1), or any other condition attached as a requirement of this Part (for example, by virtue of the visitor’s age (under section 14) and/ or their being part of a group (under section 13)).

61. Subsections (4) and (5) make it an offence for the permit holder to contravene any condition attached to a permit under this section, and set out the penalty. This offence attracts strict liability.

Section 16 – Police and visitor permits: variation and revocation

62. This section relates to variation and revocation of police permits or visitor permits which have been granted under section 12 and section 13 respectively.

63. Subsection (1) allows the Chief Constable to vary any details on a police permit or a visitor permit after it has been granted, including adding, amending or removing conditions, except any mandatory condition required by section 15(1), or any conditions which must be attached to a visitor permit by virtue of the visitor’s age (under section 14) and/ or their being part of a group (under section 13). Subsection (2) provides that a variation may occur either on the application of the permit holder, or at the Chief Constable’s discretion although the Chief Constable is obliged to notify the permit holder of the changes made. Subsection (4) allows the Chief Constable to require a permit holder to relinquish their permit within 21 days, for the purpose of varying it in this way. Guidance is expected to set out that failure to surrender a permit in this way would be grounds for the permit to be revoked.

64. Subsection (3) specifies that conditions attached by the Chief Constable must not be inconsistent with or undermine the effect of any of the mandatory conditions required by section 15(1), or any other condition attached as a requirement of this Part (for example, by virtue of the visitor’s age (under section 14) and/ or their being part of a group (under section 13)).

65. Subsection (1)(d) allows the Chief Constable to revoke a police or visitor permit at any time, at the Chief Constable’s discretion. The Chief Constable must notify the permit holder of the revocation, and subsection (5) requires this notification to provide at least seven days’ notice of revocation, within which time the permit holder must relinquish the revoked permit and any air weapons possessed.

66. Subsections (6) and (7) make it an offence for a permit holder to fail, without reasonable excuse, to relinquish a permit for the purpose of revocation within the timescale specified by the Chief Constable.
These documents relate to the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 49) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 14 May 2014

67. Subsection (8) provides that when a permit holder appeals against a decision to revoke a permit, the notice period for that revocation is put on hold until the outcome of the appeal is known. However, by virtue of subsection (8)(b) the holder must still surrender the permit and any weapons to the Chief Constable. This mirrors the provision at section 11(7).

Section 17 – Event permits

68. This section provides for air weapon event permits. These are distinct from other permits as they are to be required where an event is to take place at which people may borrow, hire, use or possess an air weapon for a short timescale, without holding individual air weapon certificates. Examples of situations where an event permit might be granted would be a Highland Games with an air weapon shooting component, or a variant of modern biathlon or pentathlon. This section should be read in conjunction with the exemption at paragraph 10 of schedule 1.

69. Subsection (1) sets out that applications for an event permit should be made to the Chief Constable, by a person responsible for the event. A “person” here includes non-natural (e.g. corporate bodies) as well as natural persons. Event permits are granted at the Chief Constable’s discretion, and permit the borrowing, hiring, possessing and/or using of air weapons at a specified time and place, for the purpose of participating in a planned event activity as defined at subsection (7). Subsection (2) adds that the Chief Constable may attach conditions to an event permit as required.

70. Subsection (3) requires that an event permit – or a copy thereof – be displayed at the event to which it pertains. This requirement allows a participant at the event to confirm that a permit is in place and the exemption therefore applies when handling air weapons.

71. Subsections (4) and (5) create the offence of failing to comply with any condition attached to an event permit, or failing to display the permit as required by subsection (3) without a reasonable excuse. In either case the offence is committed by the event organiser named on the permit. The offence in subsection (4)(a) attracts strict liability.

72. Subsection (6) states that applications for an event permit cannot be considered unless they comply with the requirements set out in regulations to be made under section 37. Separately, section 36(3) has the effect that where an application is made in compliance with the application processes it still cannot be considered by the Chief Constable until the fee is paid.

Air weapon clubs and recreational shooting facilities

Section 18 – Approval of air weapon clubs

73. This section sets out the process by which an air weapon club can be approved by the Chief Constable, to allow its members to benefit from the exemption at paragraph 1 of schedule 1, as well as allowing members to put forward their club membership as evidence that they meet the ‘good reason’ criteria required by section 5(1)(c) for the grant of an individual air weapon certificate.
74. Subsection (1) states that the Chief Constable may, at the Chief Constable’s discretion, approve an air weapon club on receipt of an application from a club. Subsection (2) states that an application for an air weapon club approval cannot be considered unless it complies with the requirements set out in regulations to be made under section 37. Separately, section 36(3) has the effect that where an application is made in compliance with the application processes it still cannot be considered by the Chief Constable until the fee is paid.

75. Subsection (3) allows the Chief Constable to withdraw a club approval at any time, by giving notice to the club to that effect.

76. Subsection (4) states that all club approvals will be subject to mandatory conditions, which will be specified in regulations issued under section 37. Subsection (5) provides for the Chief Constable to attach other conditions to air weapon club approvals, which may place positive or negative obligations on the club’s secretariat and membership. But, in accordance with subsection (6), the Chief Constable may not attach any conditions which are inconsistent with any mandatory conditions.

Section 19 – Variation of approval

77. This section allows the Chief Constable to vary any of the details on an air weapon club approval after it has been granted or renewed, including adding, amending or removing conditions on the approval (except the mandatory conditions required by section 18(4)). The Chief Constable may vary an approval at any time, but is obliged to notify the club of the changes made.

78. Subsection (2)(a) separately allows the club to request that the Chief Constable make such a variation, for example to provide an updated contact address, or to request the removal or amendment of an outdated condition. Decisions whether to grant such variations are made at the Chief Constable’s discretion.

79. Subsection (3) specifies that conditions attached by the Chief Constable must not be inconsistent with or undermine the effect of any of the mandatory conditions (as required by section 18(4)).

Section 20 – Duration of approval

80. Subsection (1) sets the duration of air weapon club approvals at six years, which is consistent with approvals issued to rifle or muzzle-loading pistol clubs under section 15 of the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1988 (“the 1988 Act”).

81. Subsection (2) provides that an air weapon club approval will remain valid beyond its stated expiry date, provided that the club has applied to the Chief Constable for a renewal before that expiry date and the Chief Constable has not yet approved or rejected that renewal. The effect of this subsection is that club members can continue to benefit from the exemption at paragraph 1 of schedule 1 when the original approval expires, provided that renewal is being actively considered by the Chief Constable.
82. Subsection (3) provides the Scottish Ministers with the power to change the duration of air weapon club approvals. The regulations will be subject to the affirmative procedure.

Section 21 – Alignment of club approvals

83. This section allows air weapon club approvals to be made co-terminous with a rifle club approval issued by the Scottish Ministers under section 15 of the 1988 Act. This allows for both approvals to be due for renewal at the same time, minimising the workload for the applicant and the Chief Constable. Regulations under section 36 are expected to make provision for a proportionately lowered fee where such air weapon club approvals are granted or renewed for significantly shorter duration. This section does not affect the duration of rifle club approvals.

84. Subsections (1) and (2) allow an air weapon club which already holds a valid rifle club approval to request that the expiry date on an air weapon club approval – if granted or renewed – matches the expiry date on their existing rifle club approval. Because the standard duration for rifle and air weapon club approvals are both set at six years, an air weapon club approval issued in this way will necessarily have a shorter than normal duration when it is first granted.

85. Subsections (3) and (4) allow a club that already holds a live air weapon club approval to request that that approval be renewed before it has run its full six year lifespan, and re-issued on the same date that a new or renewed rifle club approval is granted, so that the expiry dates on both approvals are aligned. This will necessarily mean that the air weapon club approval which was originally paid for on a six year basis will not have lasted for its full duration.

86. References in this section to “rifle club approvals” include clubs approved for the use of small-bore rifles, full-bore rifles and/or muzzle-loading pistols, all of which are approved under section 15 of the 1988 Act.

Section 22 – Power to enter and inspect club premises

87. This section empowers the Chief Constable – or a delegated officer not below the rank of inspector – to authorise a police constable or member of police staff to enter and inspect any approved air weapon club premises, other than a private dwelling, to ensure that the requirements in this Part are being complied with. Subsection (3) provides that the inspection should, where possible, take place at a reasonable time, which may be any time that the club is operating including in the evenings or at weekends. Subsections (1)(b) and (2) set out that the police constable or member of police staff can inspect anything on the club premises, including requiring electronic information to be reproduced in a way that can be removed from the premises. However inspection should only be of those things for the purpose of ascertaining whether the provisions of the Part or any conditions attached to a club’s approval are being complied with.

88. Subsection (4) requires that the police constable or member of police staff must produce their authorisation if asked before entering a club premises to inspect it in accordance with this section.
89. Subsections (6) and (7) set out the offence of intentionally obstructing a police constable or member of police staff from carrying out their duties when authorised under this section – for example, by refusing them access to the club premises, or by concealing evidence from them.

Section 23 – Requirements for recreational shooting facilities

90. This section and the exemption in paragraph 12 of schedule 1 set out arrangements for commercial recreational shooting facilities where individuals who do not hold air weapon certificates will be able to borrow or hire air weapons for short durations, for a specific purpose – for example, a paintball venue.

91. Subsection (1) sets out that the operator of such a facility (or, where the operator is a non-natural person, must ensure that an individual responsible for the management and operation of the facility) must hold a valid air weapon certificate granted for this purpose, and must display this certificate (or a copy) at the venue. This requirement allows users of the facility to confirm that a certificate is in place and the exemption in paragraph 12 of schedule 1 therefore applies to them.

92. Subsections (2) and (3) make it an offence for anyone to operate a recreational shooting facility without either holding a valid air weapon certificate or ensuring that an individual responsible for the management and operation of the facility holds one for that purpose, or to fail to display that certificate at the facility without a reasonable excuse. The offence in subsection (2)(a) attracts strict liability.

93. Subsection (4) defines a recreational shooting facility for the purposes of the section as a shooting range or gallery, or a facility for combat games (such as paintball), where air weapons are used and which is run for the purpose of making a profit. Subsection (5) makes it clear that approved air weapon clubs are not subject to the requirements of the section.

Transactions involving air weapons and commercial matters

Section 24 – Restrictions on transactions involving air weapons

94. Subsection (1) makes it an offence for any person except a Registered Firearms Dealer under section 33 of the 1968 Act to manufacture, sell, transfer, expose for sale or transfer, repair or test an air weapon by way of trade or business, or to possess an air weapon for one of these purposes. This subsection makes analogous provision to that in section 3(1) of the 1968 Act and adds manufacture, repair and test of air weapons to the activities limited to Registered Firearms Dealers. This offence only applies to sales, transfers etc. by way of trade or business, and does not prohibit private sales between individuals. “Person” here includes non-natural persons (e.g. corporate bodies) as well as natural persons. The offences in this section attract strict liability.

95. Subsection (2)(a), (b) and (d) makes it an offence for anyone to sell or transfer an air weapon (including private sales) without first confirming that the recipient is entitled to have the air weapon by: showing a valid air weapon certificate; demonstrating that the recipient does not need to have a certificate; or, by virtue of being a Registered Firearms Dealer.
96. Subsection (2)(c) specifically allows a Registered Firearms Dealer to sell an air weapon to someone without requiring to see an air weapon certificate or evidence that an exemption applies, provided that the air weapon in question will be sent out of Great Britain without first coming into the possession of the purchaser. Where the purchaser is an individual (as opposed to, for example, a corporate body) the individual must also be aged 18 or over for this paragraph to apply. For example, an overseas visitor to Scotland who does not hold a visitor permit allowing purchase might have a Registered Firearms Dealer export an air weapon directly to their home country.

97. Subsection (3) broadly reflects subsection (2), and makes it an offence to manufacture, repair or test an air weapon for anyone without confirming that they hold a valid air weapon certificate or are a Registered Firearms Dealer or do not need to have a certificate.

98. Subsection (4) sets out the penalties for any of the offences committed in this section.

Section 25 – Requirement for commercial sales of air weapons to be in person

99. This section requires that commercial sales of air weapons are done face-to-face, and is intended to make analogous provision to section 32 of the Violent Crime Reduction Act 2006. Subsection (1) sets out that this section applies to all sales by way of trade or business except those between two Registered Firearms Dealers, and to those where the sale is concluded outside Great Britain (for example mail order sales).

100. Subsection (2) requires that, at the point at which possession of the air weapon(s) is/ are transferred to the purchaser, both the purchaser and the seller – or their representative – must be physically present, otherwise the seller commits an offence. Subsection (3) sets out different categories of person who may act as a representative of the seller for the purposes of this section. A “person” here means a non-natural (e.g. corporate bodies) as well as a natural person. This offence attracts strict liability.

Section 26 – Requirement to notify chief constable of certain sales

101. Subsection (1) sets out that this section applies to sales made under section 24(2)(c), where an air weapon is sold to someone who does not hold an air weapon certificate, to be sent out of Great Britain without coming first into the purchaser’s possession. Subsections (2) and (3) require the Registered Firearms Dealer who made the sale to notify the Chief Constable with the details of the sale entered into the dealer’s register, within 48 hours of the sale being made. Subsections (4) and (5) make it an offence for a Registered Firearms Dealer to fail to provide such notification. This offence applies to all types of “person” and attracts strict liability.

Enforcement

Section 27 – Power of search with warrant

102. This section relates to search warrants issued where there is a reasonable ground to suspect that an air weapon offence has been, is being or is about to be committed or there is a danger to the public safety or the peace involving an air weapon. Subsection (1) sets out that such a warrant may be granted by a sheriff on application by a constable or member of police staff. Subsections (2) and (3) set out what a constable or member of police staff may do under such a warrant – that is, enter and search premises and seize or detain anything found there in relation to the commission of an air weapon offence. This includes anything in the possession of a person on those premises, and includes the power to require that any electronic information to be reproduced in a way that can be removed from the premises.

103. Subsections (4) and (5) make it an offence for any person to obstruct intentionally a police constable while carrying out a search under this section, and set out the attached penalty. “Person” includes both natural and non-natural persons.

Section 28 – Production of air weapon certificate

104. Subsection (1) empowers a constable to require the production of an individual’s air weapon certificate, or proof that the person does not require to hold a certificate, if the constable believes that an air weapon is in that person’s possession. “Person” in this section includes both natural and a non-natural persons. Subsection (2) allows the constable to seize any air weapons held and require the person’s name and address if a certificate or exemption is not provided.

105. Subsections (3) and (4) make it an offence to fail to provide a name and address, or to provide a false one, when required by this section. This offence attracts strict liability.

Section 29 – Cancellation of air weapon certificate

106. This section allows a court to order the cancellation of an individual’s air weapon certificate when that individual is convicted of one or more of the offences, or is subject to one of the other orders, set out in subsection (1). Orders may make provision about any type of firearm as well as air weapons.

107. Subsection (3) requires the court to notify the Chief Constable of a cancellation made under this section, at which point the Chief Constable must notify the certificate holder and allow 21 days for surrender of the certificate.

108. Subsections (4) and (5) make it an offence for an individual to fail to surrender the certificate within 21 days when required by subsection (3)(b), without reasonable excuse (for example, if they were unable to comply because they were serving a prison sentence).

Section 30 – Forfeiture and disposal of air weapons

109. This section allows a court to order the forfeiture or disposal of any air weapon in the possession of someone who has been convicted of any offence introduced by this Part. Subsection (3) allows a police constable to seize the weapon(s) in question, and subsection (4) allows the Chief Constable to apply to a sheriff to dispose of the weapon(s) in any manner the Chief Constable sees fit, for example by sale at auction, destruction by scrap metal dealer, or transfer to a museum if the weapon is of historic or other significance.

110. Subsection (5) provides that a court may not order the forfeiture or disposal of an air weapon which is possessed by a museum following a conviction for an air weapon offence or where it was seized or detained by a constable. This provides for situations where, for example, a person is convicted of possession of an air weapon where he or she has stolen it from a museum, or a member of museum staff commits an offence with a museum weapon, so that the court does not inadvertently order forfeiture and thereby prevent the museum from getting return of an air weapon which may be of historic or other significance.

111. Subsections (6) and (7) set out what happens to air weapons where the Chief Constable has revoked an air weapon certificate, police permit or visitor permit on which they are held, but the holder appeals against that revocation. If the appeal is successful then the air weapons must be returned to their owner, and if it is not then the court may order their disposal as the Sheriff considers appropriate.

112. Subsections (8) and (9) set out what happens to air weapons where the air weapon certificate, police permit or visitor permit has been revoked and the holder does not appeal, or withdraws their appeal. In such a case the Chief Constable and the owner of the weapon should seek to agree arrangements for disposal (for example, transfer to someone permitted to possess air weapons, or sale through a Registered Firearms Dealer). If an agreement cannot be reached then the Chief Constable may dispose of them as he or she sees fit, which may be by one of the methods outlined in paragraph 111 above. In such a circumstance subsection (10) requires the Chief Constable to notify the owner of the method of disposal, who may then appeal against the Chief Constable’s decision under section 35(2)(n).

Offences

Section 31 – Failure to keep air weapons secure or to report loss to police

113. This section makes it an offence for a person in possession of an air weapon to fail to take reasonable precautions for its safe custody, or to fail to immediately report the loss or theft of the air weapon to the Chief Constable. This offence applies to any person who possesses an air weapon and applies to natural and non-natural persons. The offence attracts strict liability.

Section 32 – False statements, certificates and permits

114. This section creates two offences around providing false information in order to obtain an air weapon certificate, permit, or approval, or producing a falsified or improperly altered certificate or other information in order to obtain the repair or testing of an air weapon.

115. Subsection (1) makes it an offence to knowingly or recklessly make a statement which contains false information in order to procure an air weapon certificate, police permit, visitor permit, event permit, or club approval. This could include, for example, providing a false name, or declining to disclose a criminal history when asked. This offence may also be committed by the person verifying the application, if the verifier knew that the information was incorrect or was reckless in verifying false information.

116. Subsection (2) makes it an offence to produce a false or improperly altered air weapon certificate, police permit or visitor permit, or to provide any other false information, in order to purchase or acquire an air weapon, or to have one repaired or tested. This could include, for example, impersonating an air weapon certificate holder, or amending the details on an expired certificate so that it appeared to still be live.

Section 33 – Time limit for offences

117. This section provides that anyone committing a summary-only air weapon offence could have proceedings brought against them up to three years after that offence has been committed. Section 136 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995 normally sets a time limit of six months after the offence has been committed. This only applies to summary-only offences, which is all of the offences in this Part except the ones at section 2 and section 24.

Section 34 – Offences by bodies corporate etc.

118. This section provides for cases where there may be an offence committed by a non-natural person such as a body corporate, partnership or unincorporated association (e.g. an auctioneer, carrier firm, operator of a recreational shooting facility etc.). Subsection (2) states that both the individual who committed the specific offence, as well as the corporate entity on whose behalf the criminal act was done, can be proceeded against for the purpose of that offence.

General

Section 35 – Appeals

119. This section allows persons to appeal against various decisions made by the Chief Constable in administering the air weapon licensing regime. Subsection (2) lists the decisions that can be appealed.

120. Subsections (1) and (3) set out that appeals must be made to the appropriate sheriff, as defined by subsection (8), within 21 days of the decision being appealed against. Subsections (4) and (5) state that the sheriff should undertake a full consideration of the merits of the Chief Constable’s decision of new, including considering any evidence that the Chief Constable may not have been aware of at the time.

121. Subsection (6) allows the sheriff hearing the appeal either to dismiss it or to direct the Chief Constable to take whatever action the sheriff sees fit to resolve the matter under appeal (for example, ordering the Chief Constable to grant a refused certificate, or not to revoke a certificate).

122. Subsection (7) states that the decision of the sheriff may only be appealed on point of law. The effect of this is that appeals may be made on point of law ultimately to the Inner House of the Court of Session. The “appropriate sheriff” is defined as being the sheriff of the sheriffdom where the appellant resides or, where the appellant resides outside Scotland, the sheriff at Lothian and Borders. The latter is necessary because in certain circumstances an appellant may reside outside of Scotland, for example where a visitor permit has been refused.
Section 36 – Fees

123. This section allows the Scottish Ministers to set out fees for various aspects of the air weapon licensing regime in secondary legislation. Regulations under this section will be subject to the negative procedure in the Scottish Parliament. Subsection (1) provides that a fee can be set in relation to any application for a certificate, permit etc. under this Part, or to any other service provided by the Chief Constable in relation to the Chief Constable’s performance of functions under the Part. Subsection (2) provides that the Scottish Ministers may set out a range of fees taking into account different circumstances – for example, lower fees for co-terminous certificates – as well as situations where a fee may be waived entirely. Subsection (2)(c) allows fees to be raised or reduced by reference to factors specified in the regulations, such as inflation.

124. Subsection (3) provides that until the appropriate fee is tendered with an application it is not valid and this means the Chief Constable cannot consider any application under the Bill until the appropriate fee has been paid.

Section 37 – Power to make further provision

125. This section allows the Scottish Ministers to make regulations via secondary legislation setting out detailed provisions regarding the application and grant process for air weapon certificates, police permits, visitor permits, event permits, or club approvals. This would include, for example, setting out templates for application forms, granted certificates, and specifying the conditions referred to in section 6. Regulations under this section will be subject to the negative procedure in the Scottish Parliament.

Section 38 – Transitional arrangements for existing certificate holders

126. This section introduces a temporary exemption that applies to persons who are aged 14 years or over and already hold a firearm and/ or shotgun certificate issued under the 1968 Act at the point when the section 2 offence is brought into force. Under subsection (2) such persons can possess and use (but not purchase or acquire) air weapons without holding an air weapon certificate, until their existing firearm and/ or shotgun certificate expires or is renewed. When renewing the firearm or shotgun certificate the individual should apply to the Chief Constable for first grant of an air weapon certificate if it is desired to continue to possess or use an air weapon.

127. This section also applies to firearm and shotgun certificates issued in the rest of Great Britain, so someone from England or Wales who holds valid a firearm and/ or shotgun certificate could visit Scotland with an air weapon without requiring to apply for a visitor permit, subject to the restrictions set out below.

128. Subsection (3) requires that a person making use of this exemption must nonetheless comply with the mandatory conditions for air weapon certificates to be specified in regulations issued under Section 37 – and, in the case of an individual aged below 18, can only use the air weapon for of the purposes mentioned in section 7(5). Subsections (4) to (6) set out the offence, exception and penalty related to non-compliance with the conditions mentioned in subsection (3). This offence attracts strict liability.
129. Subsection (7) sets out that this transitional exemption applies from the day that the offence at section 2 comes into effect, and ends on the day that the individual’s firearm and/or shotgun certificate is renewed or expires. Subsection (7)(b)(ii) provides that should the firearm and/or shotgun certificate be surrendered, cancelled or revoked before its stated expiry date, the transitional exemption will also end.

130. Subsections (8) and (9) apply where the individual holds both a firearm and shotgun certificate, which are not co-terminous. Subsection (8) states that the transitional exemption ends on the later of the two certificate expiry dates. Subsection (9) states that should either certificate be surrendered the transition exemption continues in force until the remaining one expires or is surrendered, while if either certificate is cancelled or revoked then the transitional exemption ends immediately. Subsection (10) ensures that those making use of the exemption are also able to make use of the exemption in paragraph 16 of schedule 1.

Section 39 – Guidance

131. This section allows the Scottish Ministers to publish, revise and revoke guidance on any aspect of the air weapon licensing regime. Subsection (1) obliges the Chief Constable to take account of this guidance when carrying out his or her duties. Guidance will also be publicly available so that all stakeholders are aware of the Scottish Ministers’ view on application of the regime.

Section 40 – Interpretation of Part 1

132. This section provides definitions for various terms used throughout the Part.

133. Subsections (4) and (5) provide that where terms used in the Part are the same as those used in existing UK firearms legislation then the jurisprudence of the courts on interpretation of those terms in the existing UK firearms legislation applies equally to those terms when used in the Bill. The effect of this is to ensure that common terms are interpreted consistently across the Bill and the wider corpus of firearms legislation.

PART 2 – ALCOHOL LICENSING

134. The provisions in this Part amend the licensing regime for alcohol licensing within the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005.

 Licensing objectives

Section 41 – Licensing objectives: protecting young persons from harm

135. Section 41 amends the licensing objective at section 4(1)(e) of the 2005 Act to include young persons. The term young person is defined at section 147 of the 2005 Act and means a person aged 16 or 17. Under the current legislation, Boards must ensure that their decision making is underpinned by the five licensing objectives, including the objective ‘to protect children from harm’. This amendment expands this requirement so that Boards must also consider protecting ‘young people’ from harm.
Statements of licensing policy

Section 42 – Statements of licensing policy: licensing policy periods

136. Section 42 amends section 6 of the 2005 Act in relation to statements of licensing policy. A statement of licensing policy will generally have effect from 18 months after a local government election until 18 months after the next local government election. For example, the next local government elections are scheduled for May 2017 and May 2021 with the result that, in the usual case, the statements of licensing policy would last November 2018 until November 2022.

137. It is possible for the Licensing Board to decide that a statement of licensing policy should come into effect earlier than it otherwise would, and if they do so, then they must publish the licensing policy statement and publicise the date on which the licensing policy statement is to come into effect.

Fit and proper person test

138. The Bill introduces a ‘fit and proper person test’ into the processes for obtaining, reviewing and revoking licenses under the 2005 Act by virtue of sections 45 to 53. In each of these sections, the fit and proper test is considered with regard to the licensing objectives. It also makes some associated changes to the handling of information relating to relevant offences and foreign offences.

Section 43 – Premises licence application: ground for refusal 139. Section 43 amends section 23 of the 2005 Act in relation to the grounds of refusal for a premises licence application. Section 43 provides that it is a ground for refusal at a hearing when determining premises licence applications in section 23 of the 2005 Act, if the Licensing Board considers that, having regard to the licensing objectives, the applicant is not a fit and proper person to be the holder of a premises licence. An amendment is also made to section 23(8) so that, where the Licensing Board refuses a licence on the fit and proper person ground, the Board must state the licensing objective that the ground relates to.

Section 44 – Application to transfer premises licence: ground for refusal 140. Section 44 amends section 33 and 34 of the 2005 Act in relation to grounds for refusal for an application to transfer a premises licence (whether on the application of the current licence holder or someone else). Section 44 provides that it is a ground for refusal at a hearing when determining applications to transfer premises licences under section 33 or 34 of the 2005 Act if the Licensing Board considers that, having regard to the licensing objectives, the transferee is not a fit and proper person to be the holder of a premises licence. This section also expands the information that can be provided to the Licensing Board by the Chief Constable upon receiving notice of a transfer of a premises licence. If information is provided, the Licensing Board must hold a hearing to determine the application.

Section 45 – Ground for review of premises licence

141. Section 45 makes amendments with regards to review of a premises licence (both on an application by a third party for a review and on a proposal for a review initiated by the Licensing Board itself). Section 45 provides that it is a ground for review of a premises licence, if having regard to the licensing objectives, the licence holder is not a fit and proper person to be the holder of a premises licence. If a review is based on this ground, the review application or proposal must include a summary of the information on which the applicant or the Board based its view that the alleged ground applies.

142. If at the review hearing the Licensing Board is satisfied that the fit and proper person ground for review is established, the Board must revoke the licence. Thereafter the Board must provide notification of its determination to the licence holder and where the decision is taken in connection with a premises licence review application, the applicant. A decision to revoke the licence is added to the list of decisions in schedule 5 to the 2005 Act that are appealable to the sheriff principal.

Section 46 - Personal licence applications and renewals: ground for refusal 143. Section 46 makes amendment to sections 73, 74 and 78 of the 2005 Act in relation to personal licence applications and renewals. Section 46 provides that it is a ground for refusal at a hearing when determining personal licence application or personal licence renewal application under section 74 of the 2005 Act if the Licensing Board considers that, having regard to the licensing objectives, the transferee is not a fit and proper person to be the holder of a personal licence.

144. Subsection (2) provides that on giving a notice under subsection (3)(a) or (b) of section 73 of the 2005 Act, the Chief Constable may also provide to the Licensing Board any information in relation to the applicant that the Chief Constable considers may be relevant to consideration of the application by the Board.

145. Section 46 also inserts a new section 73A into the 2005 Act to provide that where a Licensing Board receives a personal licence application, the Board must give notice of it, together with a copy of the application, to a Licensing Standards Officer for the Board’s area. A Licensing Standards Officer may, within 21 days of the date of receipt of this notice, respond to the notice by giving the Licensing Board any information in relation to the applicant that the Officer considers may be relevant to consideration of the application by the Board. If information is supplied to the Board by the Chief Constable or by a Licensing Standards Officer, the Board may hold a hearing.

Section 47 – Personal licence holders: procedure on receipt of notice of conviction

146. Section 83 of the 2005 Act provides the procedure that a Licensing Board must follow where they receive notice of a conviction (or otherwise become aware of a conviction) of a personal licence holder. The Board must notify the Chief Constable of the conviction and, where the existence of the conviction is confirmed by the Chief Constable, the Board must hold a hearing to review the licence.
147. Section 47 of the Bill amends section 83 to enable a Licensing Board to consider at such hearings whether the licence holder is a fit and proper person to hold a personal licence. Where the Board are satisfied the person is not a fit and proper person to hold a personal licence, they must make an order revoking the licence. A decision to make such an order is added to the list of decisions in schedule 5 to the 2005 Act that are appealable to the sheriff.

Section 48 – Personal licence holders: conduct inconsistent with the licensing objectives

148. Section 84 of the 2005 Act provides the procedure that a Licensing Board must follow when, in the course of reviewing a premises licence under section 38 of the 2005 Act, they find that a personal licence holder was acting on the premises in a manner not consistent with the licensing objectives. Where the Licensing Board makes such a finding a hearing must be held where the Board can revoke, suspend or endorse the licence if they believe it necessary to do so.

149. Section 48 of the Bill amends section 84 to enable a Licensing Board to consider at such hearings whether the licence holder is a fit and proper person to hold a personal licence. Where the Board are satisfied the person is not a fit and proper person to hold a personal licence, they must make an order revoking the licence. A decision to make such an order is added to the list of decisions in schedule 5 to the 2005 Act that are appealable to the sheriff.

Relevant offences and foreign offences

Section 49 – Premises licences: procedure in relation to relevant offences or foreign offences

150. Section 49 amends section 44 of the 2005 Act so that when a Licensing Board receives a notice of conviction in relation to a premises licence holder (or a person connected to the premises licence holder) they must initiate a review of the premises licence and hold a hearing only where the Chief Constable has made a recommendation under section 44(5), namely that having regard to the conviction specified in the notice, it is necessary for the purposes of any of the licensing objectives that the premises licence should be varied, suspended or revoked. Where the Chief Constable has not made such a recommendation then the Board may either make a premises licence review proposal, (and hold a hearing), or decide to take no further action in relation to the conviction.

Section 50 – Personal licences: procedure in relation to relevant offences or foreign offences

151. Section 50 amends section 83 of the 2005 Act so that when a Licensing Board receives notice of a conviction in relation to a personal licence they must hold a hearing only where the Chief Constable has made a recommendation under section 83(5), namely that having regard to the conviction specified in the notice it is necessary for the purposes of any of the licensing objectives that personal licence should be varied, suspended or revoked. Where the Chief Constable has not made such a recommendation then the Board may either hold a hearing, or decide to take no further action in relation to the conviction.
Section 51 – Relevant offences and foreign offences: spent convictions

152. Section 51 repeals section 129(4) of the 2005 Act which prohibits any consideration of a conviction for a relevant offence or foreign offence if it is spent for the purposes of the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974. This amendment will make it possible for spent convictions to be brought to and considered by Boards as part of their decision-making.

Supply of alcohol to a child or young person
Section 52 – Offences of supplying alcohol to a child or young person

153. Subsection (1) of this provision inserts section 104A into the 2005 Act making it a criminal offence for a person, other than a child or young person, to buy or attempt to buy alcohol for or on behalf of a child or to give or otherwise make available alcohol to a child.

154. It also inserts a new section 104B which makes it a criminal offence for a person, other than a child or young person, to buy, attempt to buy, give or otherwise make alcohol available, to a young person. “Young person” is defined in section 147 of the 2005 Act as a person who is 16 or 17 years of age.

155. It is not an offence under either section however to buy alcohol for, or give alcohol to, a child or young person, a) for consumption other than in a public place or b) for the purposes of religious worship.

156. In addition, it is not an offence under section 104B – if beer, wine, cider or perry is bought, given or made available to the young person along with a meal to be consumed in relevant premises.

157. These exceptions do not apply to the offences of buying alcohol on behalf of a child or young person.

158. There is also a defence to the section 104B offence if the person who bought or gave the alcohol did not know the young person was under 18 years.

159. A person convicted of either offence may receive a fine, not exceeding level 5 on the standard scale, imprisonment for up to three months, or both.

160. In both sections, “public place” is defined as relevant premises, any place to which public have access to at the relevant time (on payment or not), and any place to which the public do not have access but which the child or young person unlawfully gains access to. The term “relevant premises” is defined in section 122 of the 2005 Act.

161. Subsection (2) repeals subsections (4), (5) and (7) of section 105 of the 2005 Act (and consequentially renames that section), as the substance of those subsections is replicated in new sections 104A and 104B.
Miscellaneous

Section 53 – Meaning of “alcohol”: inclusion of angostura bitters

162. This provision amends section 2 of the 2005 Act to include angostura bitters within the definition of “alcohol”. Angostura Bitters were exempt from Excise and were excluded from the 2005 Act definition of alcohol. However, they are now liable for Excise duty and have been brought into the definition of alcohol.

Section 54 – Overprovision

163. Section 54 amends section 7 of the 2005 Act which deals with the duty of Licensing Boards to assess overprovision, and provides that where a Board determines the “localities” for the purposes of the Act then it may determine that the whole of the Board’s area is a single locality.

164. Section 7 is further amended so that the Board may have regard to (among other things) the number, capacity and licensed hours of licensed premises in the locality. Amendments are also made to allow these wider factors to be taken into account at:

- section 23(5)(e) (refusal of a premises licence on grounds of overprovision), and;
- section 30(5)(d) (refusal to vary premises licence on grounds of overprovision).

Section 55 – Duty of Licensing Boards to produce annual financial report

165. This provision inserts section 9A into the 2005 Act requiring Licensing Boards to produce an annual financial report on their alcohol licensing activities.

166. Section 9A(1), (2) and (3) place a duty on Licensing Boards to prepare and publish the annual financial report no later than three months after the end of the financial year. It should contain details of relevant income received by the Licensing Board during the financial year; details of relevant expenditure incurred in respect of the Board’s area during the year; and an explanation of how the amounts in the report were calculated. The Board is required to break down its figures into the component sources of relevant income and expenditure. Relevant income for example would be premises licence application fees, personal licence fees or fees charged in respect of an application to vary a premises licence and relevant expenditure would for example be the salary cost of a Licensing Standards Officer in respect of his duties under the alcohol licensing regime or the costs for the Board in administering the alcohol licensing regime.

167. Section 9A (4) and (5) provide that the aforementioned annual financial report may also include such other information about the performance of the Licensing Board’s functions as they consider appropriate, and that at the request of the Licensing Board the relevant council must provide the Board with such information as the Board may reasonably require for the purpose of preparing a report under this section. Subsection (6) gives the Scottish Ministers an order making power to make further provision about reports under this section, including provision about the form and content of reports; further details on what constitutes relevant income and relevant expenditure; and the publication of reports.
Section 56 – Interested parties

168. This provision amends section 40A (Connected persons and interested parties: licence holder’s duty to notify changes,) to remove the references to interested parties, including within the section title. It also removes a requirement to notify changes of interested parties. The licence holder now only requires to provide notification in respect of connected persons.

169. It also amends the definition of an interested party at section 147(5) by permitting that a premises manager can be an interested party. This has the effect of allowing the premises manager to be subject to vicarious liability for offences under s141B.

Section 57 – Personal licences: grant, duration and renewal

170. This provision amends section 74 of the 2005 Act regarding the determination of a personal licence application. Section 74(3) provides conditions which must be met before an application can be granted. This provision amends section 74(3)(c) which currently states a personal licence cannot be granted if one has been revoked in the last five years. This provision amends section 74(3)(c) to provide that the provision is not applicable to persons who have had a personal licence revoked under section 87(3) of the 2005 Act. Accordingly, if a personal licence is revoked under section 87(3) the person will no longer have to wait for five years to elapse before applying for a new personal licence.

171. This provision also amends section 77(8) of the 2005 Act to increase the length of time prior to the expiry date of a personal licence that the relevant Licensing Board must give notice to the licence holder that the licence will cease to have effect on the expiry date unless renewed. The period of time is increased to nine months before the expiry date of a personal licence.

172. The provision amends section 78 of the 2005 Act to increase the length of the time period in which a personal licence holder may apply to the relevant Licensing Board for renewal of the licence, as well as to increase the length of the period provided for the Licensing Board’s consideration of this application. The period of time to submit an application under section 78(1) is now within the nine months period beginning 12 months before the expiry date of the licence.

173. Finally section 84A of the 2005 Act is amended to provide that if a Chief Constable reports conduct inconsistent with the licensing objectives to the relevant Licensing Board, the whole of section 84(8) now applies in relation to an order made under subsection (2) of this section as opposed to only section 84(8)(a). This means that the Board making the order must now notify the order to the licence holder, the Board who gave the original notice and the Board who issued the licence, if these are different Boards.

Section 58 – Processing and deemed grant of applications

174. Section 58 inserts a requirement for Licensing Boards to issue an acknowledgement for relevant applications, where the application meets the requirements. The requirements for an application form are those imposed under the 2005 Act or any other relevant enactment in respect of the type of application.
These documents relate to the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 49) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 14 May 2014

175. The acknowledgement must amongst other things inform the applicant of the timescale within which the application must be decided. The acknowledgement must be issued as soon as is practicable.

176. Where an application does not meet the requirements, the Licensing Board must give notice to the applicant that they are treating the application as incomplete and as not having been made, along with their reasons.

177. A Licensing Board must determine accepted applications within nine months of the date of receipt, as recorded in the letter of acknowledgement. This period of nine months can be extended, once, on application to the sheriff. The sheriff may extend the period for determining the application only if it appears to them, that there is a good reason for doing so. The applicant is entitled to be a party to proceedings to consider such an extension.

178. The Licensing Board is not required to issue an acknowledgement where it would not be appropriate to do so, however this would not alter the requirement to determine an application within nine months unless an extension has been granted by the sheriff. A Board may for example decide to grant a minor variation under subsection 30(2) without first issuing an acknowledgement.

179. If the Licensing Board fails to determine the application in this period then the licence will be deemed to have been granted and the Licensing Board must issue the licence to the applicant as soon as practicable. The Licensing Board must apply the relevant mandatory conditions, under schedule 3, or 4, including, where applicable, the Late Opening Premises Conditions, as set out in The Licensing Conditions (Late Opening Premises)(Scotland) Regulations 2007, but at time of issue, may not apply pool conditions or local conditions to a licence granted in this way.

Section 59 – Form etc. of communications under the 2005 Act

180. Section 59 expands the order making power provided at section 134 of the 2005 Act in relation to the form etc. of applications, proposals and notices to also include other communications. This means, for example, that the Scottish Ministers may make regulations expressly facilitating the use of email or other internet based systems for any type of application, notice, proposal or communication required under the 2005 Act.

PART 3 – CIVIC LICENSING

181. This Part of the Bill makes a number of amendments to the licensing provisions in the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982.

Section 60 – Refusal to grant private hire car licences on grounds of overprovision

182. Section 60 amends section 10 of the 1982 Act. This enables (but does not require) the licensing authority to refuse a private hire car licence application on the grounds of overprovision of private hire car services in a given locality or localities. It allows the licensing authority to determine the localities within their area, allowing them to either treat the whole licensing authority area as one locality or sub-divide it. The section also provides that when assessing overprovision the licensing authority must have regard to the number of private hire cars operating in the locality and the demand for private hire car services in the locality.

Section 61 – Testing of private hire car drivers

183. Section 61 amends section 13 of the 1982 Act to allow licensing authority to require testing of applicants for a private hire car driver licence, as per the current ability to do so for a taxi driver’s licence. Licensing authorities will be able to require the same testing of both taxi and private hire car drivers or different elements of testing (or no testing) of one set of drivers.

Section 62 – Exemptions from requirements of sections 10 to 21 of 1982 Act 184. Section 62 amends section 22 of the 1982 Act to remove the exemption at subsection (c) which applies to ‘any vehicle while it is being used for carrying passengers under a contract for its exclusive hire for a period of not less than 24 hours’. This brings vehicles that are being used on contract in this manner into the licensing regime for taxis and private hire cars. Examples of the type of service that could potentially be brought within the licensing regime for taxi and private hire cars are: executive hire work – where a car is hired to transport an individual between meetings over the course of a day; airport transfers – where a car is hired to transport customers on longer journeys (meaning the car can only do one job in the 24 hour period) e.g. collecting from Glasgow Airport and taking a group to Iona.

185. Subsection (4) gives the Scottish Ministers the power to specify by order further exemptions from taxi and private hire car licensing. It is assumed the definition of a hire car within the 1982 Act makes clear the type of operation that should covered: ‘…“hire car” means a motor vehicle with a driver…which is, with a view to profit, available for hire by the public for personal conveyance.’ However, if it becomes clear types of service not intended to be covered are being swept up in taxi and private hire car licensing, this power could be used e.g. where a service is providing some kind of transport as an ancillary part of the wider service, not the main focus. An example could be if child-minders are being expected to be licensed as private hire car drivers and their vehicles licensed for collecting children in their care from school by car. The power could be used to make explicit that this type of operation is not intended to be covered.

Section 63 – Removal of exemption warrants for certain metal dealers

186. This section amends section 28 of the 1982 Act and repeals section 29 of the 1982 Act to remove the current provisions that allow a metal dealer with an audited turnover in excess of a figure specified by order (currently £1 million) to be exempted from licensing requirements. This will have the effect of ensuring that all dealers are subject to licensing requirements.
Section 64 – Abolition of requirement to retain metal for 48 hours 187. This section repeals section 31 of the 1982 Act to remove the mandatory requirement that metal dealers should not process metal for 48 hours after receiving it. This would allow a dealer to process metal quickly (which may be required for the safe operation of the site).

Section 65 – Acceptable forms of payment for metal

188. This section creates a new section 33A in the 1982 Act. This specifies acceptable forms of payment that may be accepted by a metal dealer or itinerant metal dealer. The acceptable forms of payment are a cheque or electronic transfer. Cash is not an acceptable form of payment. A dealer who makes payment in a method not specified commits an offence. The offence extends to a person with day to day management responsibilities and the person who makes the payment. The metal dealer and manager are provided with a defence that they have made arrangements to ensure that payment is made by the specified methods and have taken all reasonable steps to ensure compliance. Subsection (7) gives Scottish Ministers the power by regulation to add or remove forms of payment that are acceptable.

189. This section amends the record keeping requirements for metal dealers and itinerant metal dealers. A new section 33B is inserted into the 1982 Act and provides the details that must be recorded by a dealer when metal is acquired or disposed of and supports the separate provisions stipulating acceptable forms of payment by requiring dealers to keep copies of documentation evidencing the form of payment used. Subsection (6) of section 33B provides the Scottish Ministers the power by regulation to amend the record keeping requirement.

190. The section also inserts a new section 33C into the 1982 Act to stipulate how records should be stored and a new section 33D to require records to be kept for each place of business a dealer operates from.

191. The section also creates an offence in relation to a failure to comply with the new requirements in relation to record keeping and amends the existing offence in relation to providing false or misleading information.

Public entertainment venues

Section 67 – Licensing of theatres etc.

192. This section repeals existing licensing requirements in the Theatres Act 1968 ("the 1968 Act) and supporting provisions in the 1968 Act that allow for powers of entry and inspection and prevent licensing being used to censor the content of plays.

193. The section also removes the exemption for premises licensed under the 1968 Act from the 1982 Act thereby allowing plays to fall into the activities that may be licensed under public entertainment licensing arrangements. An equivalent of the anti-censorship provisions in the 1968 Act is inserted into the 1982 Act.
Sexual entertainment venues

Section 68 – Licensing of sexual entertainment venues

194. The Section creates a new licensing regime for sexual entertainment venues.

195. This is achieved by amending the existing licensing scheme for sex shops found in Part 3 and Schedule 2 of the 1982 Act, such that it applies to sexual entertainment venues also, with modifications as necessary. The following paragraphs explain the key features of the new regime as modified.

196. The section amends section 41(2) of the 1982 Act to preclude a sexual entertainment venue from being licensed under public entertainment licences.

197. The section creates a new section 45A which establishes for the purposes of the legislation what is meant by a sexual entertainment venue and provides definitions of ‘audience’, ‘financial gain’, ‘organiser’, ‘premises’, ‘sexual entertainment’ itself and ‘display of nudity’.

198. A power is provided by the section to allow the Scottish Ministers to prescribe types of premises that are not sexual entertainment venues. Sex shops are specifically identified as not being sexual entertainment venues.

199. A further power is provided to allow the Scottish Ministers to prescribe descriptions of performances or displays of nudity that are not to be treated as sexual entertainment for the purposes of the legislation.

200. The section specifies that a venue hosting sexual entertainment very occasionally (defined as three occasions or less) would not be treated as a sexual entertainment venue.

201. A new section 45B is created which requires a resolution by a local authority in order for sexual entertainment venue licensing to have effect in their area. The section requires that a resolution under the section would not have effect until a specified date (which cannot be less than one year after the resolution is passed). A resolution must be publicised either electronically or in a local newspaper.

202. The section also allows a local authority to determine an appropriate number of sexual entertainment venues for their area. The appropriate number so determined must be publicised then the determination much be publicised in a manner considered appropriate by the local authority.

203. Section 45B also clarifies that a licence for a sexual entertainment does not have to be granted even when a premises licence under Part 3 of 2005 Act (an alcohol licence) is in place.

204. Unlike sex shops, it will be permissible for a person under 18 to enter a sexual entertainment venue or be employed by such a venue but only at times when sexual entertainment is not taking place.”
205. Section 45B also provides that local authorities must have regard to any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers.

Miscellaneous and general

Section 69 – Deemed grant of applications

206. The section modernises and expands the requirement for licensing authorities to deal with matters expeditiously. Failure to do so has the result that the application will be deemed to have been authorised. The expanded requirement also includes applications for variations to a licence so that a failure to take a decision within the specified timescale would have the effect that the variation would be deemed to have been agreed.

207. Section 3 of the 1982 Act is amended to modernise the language to provide greater clarity of the requirement to consider an application within three months and then reach a final decision within a further six months.

208. Section 3(4) is amended to include variations and to clarify the language used to describe the effect of a failure of a licensing authority to reach a decision.

209. A new subsection (4A) is inserted in section 3 of the 1982 Act to specify the duration of a licence or temporary licence granted under the ‘deemed grant provisions’.

210. A new subsection (4B) is inserted in section 3 of the 1982 Act to clarify that a licence issued under these provisions is not immune to the separate powers of a licensing authority to vary, suspend or revoke licences or to consider renewal.

211. A new section 45C is added to the 1982 Act to replicate these provisions in relation to sex shops and sexual entertainment venues.

Section 70 – Procedure for hearings

212. Section 70 amends the 1982 Act by inserting paragraph 18A, in Schedule 1 and inserting paragraph 24A in Schedule 2. The new paragraphs create an order-making power to allow the Scottish Ministers to make provision about hearings in relation to activities licensed under Part 1 to 3 of the 1982 Act. The regulations may cover notice of hearings, rules of evidence, representation, timescales for steps in the procedure, and liability for expenses. The regulations may differentiate between different purposes, for example, different types of licence.

Section 71 – Conditions for Part 3 licences

213. This section recreates powers that allow the Scottish Ministers to set mandatory conditions that would apply to all licences issued under Part 3 of the 1982 Act. The condition setting power is broad, would be specified by Order and could encompass different licences and particular purposes and sets of circumstances or cases.
214. The section also allows local licensing authorities to produce standard conditions to which licences issued by them under this Part would be subject. The conditions would have no effect until they are published and cannot be inconsistent with the mandatory conditions. Standard conditions can be varied or dis-applied for particular applications, although a variation could also not be inconsistent with a mandatory requirement.

Section 72 – Civic licensing standards officers

215. Section 72 inserts a new Part 3A into the 1982 Act. This introduces a statutory requirement for a local authority or licensing authority to appoint an individual or individuals in a new role, referred to as a ‘Civic Licensing Standards Officer’. These new Civic Licensing Standards Officers will have the same powers and duties as an ‘authorised officer’ within the 1982 Act but will also have specific functions in relation to providing information and guidance, checking compliance, providing mediation and taking appropriate action on perceived breaches of conditions to a licence provided under the 1982 Act.

Section 73 – Electronic communications under the 1982 Act

216. The section amends Schedule 1 of the 1982 Act to permit a licensing authority to determine to receive electronic communications for a variety of matters. The matters are:

(a) applications for the grant or renewal of a licence under paragraph 1,

(b) objections or representations under paragraph 3,

(c) notifications of a change to a licence under paragraph 9.

217. Where a licensing authority makes a determination to receive electronic communications they must specify the form of electronic communication, the address to be used and any means of authentication that may be used in addition to an electronic signature.

218. The section clarifies that an electronic communication meeting the requirements set out will meet any requirement under schedule 1 for a communication to be in writing and signed.

219. A licensing authority may also determine to make communications in respect of the giving of notices or the giving of reasons electronically. The giving of reasons or notices electronically would only be acceptable if the intended recipient has agreed to receive communications in such a form and has specified an address. If the requirements are satisfied then any requirement for a notice or reasons to be given in writing will be met.

220. Determinations in relation to electronic communications may be made for different purposes and for different licences.

221. Similar amendments regarding electronic communications are made to Schedule 2 in respect of sex shops and sexual entertainment venues.
PART 4 – GENERAL

Section 74 – Interpretation

222. Section 74 defines various expressions used in the Bill.

Section 75 – Regulations

223. Section 75 provides procedural requirements for orders and regulations made under the Bill.

Section 78 – Commencement

224. Section 78 provides that the provisions of the Bill (except those which come into force at the beginning of the day following the day on which the Bill receives Royal Assent) will come into force on a date or dates determined by order, made by Ministers.

Section 79 – Short title

225. Section 79 gives the short title of the Bill.

SCHEDULE 1: EXEMPTIONS

Paragraph 1 – Approved air weapon clubs

226. This paragraph exempts members of an air weapon club approved by the Chief Constable under section 18 from the requirement to hold an air weapon certificate, for the purpose of possessing or using an air weapon for target shooting at that club. The air weapon in question may be owned by the club and held on an air weapon certificate issued to the club secretary, or borrowed from elsewhere (for example another club member who holds their own air weapon certificate).

227. Sub-paragraph (b)(i) sets out that this exemption applies while the member is target shooting at other approved air weapon clubs, or at an event or competition, provided that the shooting is in connection with their club membership. Sub-paragraph (b)(ii) also allows possession and use of an air weapon in connection with club target shooting, for example to allow a club member to transport an air weapon owned by the club between shooting venues.

228. Sub-paragraph (c) requires that, where an air weapon club member is aged below 14, they must be supervised by another club member aged 21 or over for this exemption to apply. There is no lower age limit to the application of this exemption.

Paragraph 2 – Registered firearms dealers and their employees

229. This paragraph exempts firearms dealers who are registered with the Chief Constable under section 33 of the 1968 Act from requiring to hold an air weapon certificate when carrying out their business.
230. Sub-paragraph (1)(b) extends this exemption to the Registered Firearms Dealer’s employees, and sub-paragraph (2) allows this exemption to apply anywhere (i.e. not just at the dealer’s usual place of business). Sub-paragraphs (3) and (4) allow for an individual to borrow an air weapon from a Registered Firearms Dealer and use it on land the dealer occupies provided the individual is supervised by the dealer or an employee of the dealer. Where the individual is under 14 then the supervisor must be aged 21 or over.

231. Sub-paragraph (1)(b) extends this exemption to the Registered Firearms Dealer’s employees, and sub-paragraph (2) allows this exemption to apply anywhere (i.e. not just at the dealer’s usual place of business).

Paragraph 3 – Auctioneers

232. This paragraph exempts auctioneers and their employees from requiring to hold an air weapon certificate when carrying out their business. This exemption only allows the possession, acquisition and purchase of air weapons, not their use.

233. Sub-paragraph (2) extends this exemption to allow an auctioneer to sell an air weapon by way of trade or business without committing the offence at section 24, provided that the auctioneer holds a police permit issued under section 12.

Paragraph 4 - Carriers and warehouse keepers

234. This paragraph exempts carriers and warehouse keepers, and their employees, from requiring to hold an air weapon certificate when carrying out their business. This exemption only allows the possession of air weapons, not their use, acquisition or purchase.

Paragraph 5 – Artistic performers

235. This section allows an individual taking part in a theatrical performance, a rehearsal, or a film production – as defined by sub-paragraph (2) – to possess and use an air weapon without holding an air weapon certificate. This exemption only applies to the performer involved, and only for the duration of the performance. This exemption does not permit purchase or acquisition of an air weapon.

Paragraph 6 – Cadet corps

236. This paragraph exempts members of a cadet corps approved under section 54(5)(b) of the 1968 Act, and their instructors, from requiring to hold an air weapon certificate for the purposes of drilling and target shooting with air weapons.

Paragraph 7 – Bodies corporate etc.

237. This paragraph exempts corporate bodies from possessing, purchasing or acquiring an air weapon provided that a natural person who is an officer of the body listed in sub-paragraph (2) has an air weapon certificate.
Paragraph 8 – Holders of police permits

238. This paragraph sets out the specific exemption that applies to a holder of a permit issued under section 12. Sub-paragraph (2) extends this exemption to allow a permit holder to sell an air weapon by way of trade or business without committing the offence at section 24.

Paragraph 9 – Holders of visitor permits

239. This paragraph sets out the specific exemption that applies to a holder of a permit issued under section 13.

Paragraph 10 – Authorised events

240. This paragraph sets out the specific exemption that applies to attendees at an event covered by a permit issued under section 17. Sub-paragraph (1)(b) specifies that the attendee must be using the air weapon to engage in an activity at the event for the exemption to apply. Use of an air weapon at an event when not engaging in event activities is therefore not exempted from the section 2(1) offence.

Paragraph 11 – Supervised use of air weapons on private land

241. This paragraph allows a person without an air weapon certificate to borrow an air weapon from an individual who holds a valid air weapon certificate, and to possess and use it while on private land and under the supervision of the certificate holder, or their employee. Any use must be in line with the conditions attached to the relevant air weapon certificate.

242. Sub-paragraph (2)(d) provides that if the borrower is younger than 14, then the supervisor must be aged 21 or over. There is no lower age limit to the application of this exemption.

Paragraph 12 – Use of air weapons at recreational shooting facilities

243. This paragraph sets out the specific exemption that applies to participants at a commercial recreational shooting facility which complies with the requirements at section 23. Sub-paragraph (1)(b) specifies that this exemption only applies while the user is on site – thus they cannot remove air weapons from the premises. Sub-paragraph (2) extends this exemption to apply to employees working at the recreational shooting facility.

Paragraph 13 – Museums

244. This exemption relates to museums which hold air weapons as part of their collection. Sub-paragraph (1)(b) sets out that, for this exemption to apply, the museum must either be approved by the Scottish Ministers under Schedule 1 to the 1988 Act (which will be the case if it already holds section 1 or 2 firearms), or, if the only firearms held by the museum are air weapons to which section 1 of the 1968 Act does not apply, a responsible person as defined by sub-paragraph (2) must hold an air weapon certificate.
245. Provided that either of these requirements is met the employees of the museum are exempted from requiring individual air weapon certificates to possess, purchase or acquire air weapons in the course of their duties at the museum.

Paragraph 14 - Air weapons on ships

246. This exemption applies to the possession and use of air weapons while on board a ship, provided that the air weapons are part of the ship’s equipment. This might cover, for example, air weapons for pest control, or an air weapon range on a cruise liner. An air weapon certificate or police permit would be required to remove an air weapon from the ship, or to purchase or acquire new air weapons for it.

Paragraph 15 – Purchase of air weapons for delivery outwith Great Britain

247. This paragraph sets out the specific exemption that allows someone who does not hold an air weapon certificate to purchase an air weapon in the manner set out in section 24(2)(c), without committing the offence at section 2(1) of purchasing an air weapon without a valid air weapon certificate.

Paragraph 16 – Loaning of air weapons for exempted purposes

248. This exemption allows the holder of an air weapon certificate (or a person who does not hold a certificate but is entitled to possess or use an air weapon without committing an offence by virtue of another exemption) to loan an air weapon by way of trade or business to another individual who does not hold an air weapon certificate, and to possess air weapons for the purpose of loan by way of trade or business, without committing the offences at section 24(1) and (2). Section 24 otherwise limits such transactions to Registered Firearms Dealers. This exemption only applies provided that the recipient of the loaned air weapon will possess or use the air weapon in accordance with one of the exemptions in schedule 1. For example, this would allow an operator of a recreational shooting facility to loan weapons for the exemption at paragraph 12, or a theatrical armourer to loan weapons for the exemption at paragraph 5.

Paragraph 17 – Public servants carrying out official duties

249. This paragraph exempts various categories of public servants listed at sub-paragraph (3) from requiring an air weapon certificate. This exemption relates to members of the police or armed forces who may be required to use or take possession of air weapons in connection with their duties (for example, a police constable seizing an air weapon, or a police forensic examiner testing its muzzle energy). This exemption only applies while the individual is carrying out their role as a public servant, and only when they are required to handle an air weapon in the fulfilment of their duties.

Paragraph 18 – holders of certificates or permits with conditions

250. This paragraph allows an air weapon certificate, visitor or police permit holder to make use of the exemptions in the schedule notwithstanding any condition which may be attached to the certificate or permit. This means that a person who holds, for example, a visitor permit that permits use and possession, can take advantage of the exemption in paragraph 15 to purchase an air weapon for delivery to that person’s home country. Or, an air weapon certificate holder whose certificate has a condition limiting them to shooting for pest control purposes could separately be a member of an approved air weapon club, and shoot at the club under the exemption in paragraph 1.

SCHEDULE 2: MINOR AND CONSEQUENTIAL AMENDMENTS AND REPEALS

PART 1 – AMENDMENTS AND REPEALS RELATING TO PART 1

Paragraph 1 – Firearms Act 1968 (c.27)

251. This paragraph amends various provisions of the Firearms Act 1968 as it applies in Scotland. Sub-paragraph (2) repeals the offence limiting sales of air weapons to Registered Firearms Dealers, as this requirement is recreated by section 24 of the Bill. Sub-paragraph (8)(b) also extends the definition of Firearms Dealer to include anyone who manufactures, repairs or tests air weapons by way of trade or business. This brings the definition of Firearms Dealers in Scotland in line with the commercial offences being introduced at section 24 of the Bill. Sub-paragraphs (3) to (8) amend and repeal various provisions relating to use of air weapons by young people, as these provisions are superseded by the creation of an air weapons licensing regime. Sub-paragraph (9) amends the table of offences and penalties in the 1968 Act accordingly.

Paragraph 2 – Violent Crime Reduction Act 2006 (c.38)

252. This paragraph repeals section 32 of the Violent Crime Reduction Act 2006 in Scotland, which is restated by section 25 of the Bill.
FINANCIAL MEMORANDUM

INTRODUCTION

1. This document relates to the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (“the Bill”) introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 14 May 2014. It has been prepared by the Scottish Government to satisfy Rule 9.3.2 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders. It does not form part of the Bill and has not been endorsed by the Parliament.

2. The Policy Memorandum, which is published separately, explains in detail the background to the Bill and the policy intention behind the Bill. The purpose of this Financial Memorandum is to set out the costs associated with the measures introduced by the Bill, and as such it should be read in conjunction with the Bill and the other accompanying documents.

3. The purpose of the Bill is to protect public safety by creating a new licensing regime for air weapons and to improve aspects of locally led alcohol and civic government licensing in order to preserve public order and safety, reduce crime, and to advance public health. It will give local communities the power to regulate sexual entertainment venues in their areas.

4. This Financial Memorandum sets out the costs and savings associated with the Bill under the following headings:
   - Air weapons
   - Alcohol licensing
   - Civic licensing:
     - Taxis and private hire cars
     - Metal dealers
     - Public entertainment venues
     - Sexual entertainment venues
     - Miscellaneous and general.

5. Under each of these headings substantive costs are then reported against the different bodies involved.

Air weapons

6. The Bill introduces a licensing regime for air weapons, which will be administered by the Police Service of Scotland (Police Scotland).

7. The Bill sets out a licensing regime, which aims to be appropriate, recognisable and practicable both for the police, who will be the licensing authority, and for those in the legitimate shooting community.
8. The overarching policy objective of this Part of the Bill is not to ban air weapons, but to ensure that only those people who have a legitimate reason for owning and using one should have access to them.

9. There will be a long lead-in time to full commencement of the measures in Part 1 to ensure as many people as possible are aware of the new regulations in relation to air weapons and to allow for a hand-in period before the primary criminal offence comes into force. There will be no compensation scheme for old or unwanted weapons which are handed in. Once the Bill is fully in force it will be an offence to have an air weapon without a certificate or an exemption and the police will seize weapons as and when offences are detected.

Alcohol licensing

10. Alcohol licensing, along with Minimum Unit Pricing and NHS investment in prevention, treatment and support measures, is part of the broader Government Strategy “Changing Scotland’s Relationship with Alcohol (2009)”. There is a significant social and financial cost of problem drinking. It is estimated that alcohol misuse costs the Scottish economy around £3.6 billion every year particularly in terms of alcohol related crime, mortality and hospital admissions.¹

11. It is vital that police and Licensing Boards have the powers they need to reduce crime and preserve public order so that people can lead productive lives within safe and secure communities.

12. Alcohol licensing is not however intended to prohibit responsible consumption nor to undermine the economic interests of the alcohol trade.

13. The Bill seeks to improve the effectiveness of the alcohol licensing regime set out in the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 (“the 2005 Act”) as added to by the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010, the Alcohol etc. (Scotland) Act 2010 and the Alcohol (Minimum Pricing) (Scotland) Act 2012, as well as secondary legislation.

Summary of provisions

14. Under the current licensing regime, it is not an offence for adults to supply alcohol to someone under the age of 18 outwith a licensed premises. This allows outdoor drinking dens of young people where those in the group who are aged 18 or over buy alcohol for younger members. The Bill closes this loophole and gives the police the powers they need to disrupt these drinking dens. This fulfils a manifesto commitment.

15. The Bill will provide Licensing Boards with powers to consider a broader range of information when making licensing decisions. It will re-introduce a ‘fit and proper’ test into alcohol licensing. This is intended to give Boards a greater ability to tackle crime, particularly serious organised crime, by allowing the consideration of a wider range of information including police intelligence. The 2005 Act currently focuses on the use of relevant offences and foreign offences to assess the suitability of applicants and licence holders. It will also, in time, allow Boards to consider spent convictions although the existence of spent convictions would not necessarily bar an applicant from being granted a licence. The Boards will consider each case on its own merits as they currently do with unspent convictions for relevant offences.

16. Licensing Boards charge fees for a range of services such as applications for premises licences, payment of annual fees for premises licences, applications for personal or occasional licences, and transferring or varying existing licences. Some of these are set by local Licensing Boards and others are centrally set by the Scottish Ministers.

17. The fees regime is intended to reflect the Scottish Government’s intention to make the system self-funding. There is, however, currently no transparent accounting statement of the direct and indirect costs of Licensing Boards and the level of fees have therefore been a source of dispute with the trade. The Alcohol Fees Review Group, including representatives of both the trade and Licensing Boards, recommended in 2013 that Boards should be under a duty to produce an annual financial report. The Bill includes provision for this. Boards should be transparent about these costs to demonstrate that the fees they set are based upon cost recovery (unless they choose to operate to a deficit). As Licensing Boards are already under an obligation to ensure their fee income is broadly equivalent to their costs, this duty will simply require them to make public the calculations that are already being carried out.

18. The Bill will also take forward a range of technical recommendations to clarify and improve the operation of the current alcohol licensing legislation to ensure effective regulatory processes and to reduce unnecessary burdens on business. Included in this is the automatic granting of an application that has not been considered within a set period. This confirms compliance with the EU Services Directive\(^2\).

Civic licensing

19. The Bill seeks to improve the effectiveness of the civic government licensing regimes administered by local authorities, adjusting the regimes for taxi and private hire cars and metal dealers, addition of theatre licensing to the public entertainment venue licensing regime and the creation of a new licensing regime for sexual entertainment venues.

Sexual entertainment venues

20. There are a number of concerns around venues offering sexual entertainment such as lap dancing. There has been some suggestion that sexual entertainment may be associated with a risk of criminality and, as with other forms of public entertainment (licensed under a separate regime), there are also risks of adverse impacts on neighbours and general disorder. There is also concern regarding the working conditions in sexual entertainment venues and the possible financial exploitation of dancers. Finally, there is the view of violence against women stakeholders that sexual entertainment is a form of commercial sexual exploitation and is, therefore at odds with the Scottish Government’s position on violence against women.

21. A specific system of licensing for sexual entertainment was considered by the Scottish Parliament as part of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010, through an amendment proposed by Sandra White MSP. Whilst the Scottish Government supported these proposals, they were rejected by the Scottish Parliament due to concerns around the effect of operating a dual licensing system, with sexual entertainment being regulated under a regime of its own as well as under the alcohol licensing system. In addition, there was concern that as the proposals were introduced late in the Bill process they had not had the opportunity for appropriate scrutiny.

22. However, since 2010, court judgements have called into question the ability of Licensing Boards to set conditions beyond the tight focus on the sale of alcohol. This leaves uncertainty in the regulation of sexual entertainment, with many Licensing Boards believing that the alcohol licensing system is not, as currently constructed, able to provide adequate control, and that there is no effective alternative in place.³

23. A specific licensing regime for sexual entertainment venues offers local licensing authorities the ability to consider local circumstances and develop approaches appropriate to those circumstances. This would include the ability to set a desired number of sexual entertainment premises for their area (and for that number to be zero). It would also include the ability to set conditions that control the conduct of activities on premises in their area.

24. The Bill creates a new licensing regime for sexual entertainment venues. The new regime falls into the civic licensing arrangements under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 (“the 1982 Act”) and uses, in part, the architecture of existing provisions for the control of sex shops.

25. The provisions of the Bill require a licence for premises operated as sexual entertainment venues for financial gain. Definition is provided as to what is meant by sexual entertainment both to capture what is intended to be licensed, such as lap dancing, strip shows, peep shows, live sex shows, but to avoid licensing what is not, such as artistic performances. Powers are included to specify exceptions from the licensing requirement to remedy any unanticipated activity falling within the licensing ambit.

Metal dealers

26. Metal theft has been a growing problem in recent years. A variety of measures have been taken to tackle the problem including a dedicated task force which has been established by The British Transport Police, the announcement of a tougher prosecution policy by the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service and the establishment of a national metal theft working group to co-ordinate action against metal theft.

27. An important feature of metal theft is that the consequences of a metal theft are out of all proportion to the scrap value of the metal stolen. The costs of metal theft include the cost of replacement and repair, wider economic costs through delay and disruption to business and members of the public and in some cases there are emotional costs. At the extreme, metal thefts have resulted in loss of life and serious injury.

28. Scrap metal dealers provide a valuable service to the community by providing a means for unwanted metal to be recycled into a useful raw material for manufacturers. Nevertheless, the scrap metal industry does provide a route by which a metal thief can convert stolen goods into cash.

29. The Bill seeks to improve the current regulation of metal dealers under the 1982 Act as part of the broader strategy to combat the significant disruption, danger and costs associated with metal theft, whilst supporting the legitimate scrap metal trade.

30. The Bill removes the exemption warrant system that exempted dealers with a larger turnover from the licensing requirements. It will limit payment for metal by metal dealers to prescribed methods i.e. bank transfer or cheque. By removing the option of paying in cash it seeks to ensure that a metal thief is not attracted by the possibility of being paid in an anonymous fashion. Instead, transactions will be traceable and auditable. It also makes provisions designed to improve standards for identification of customers and record keeping.

31. The Bill also removes the mandatory requirement that dealers should not process metal for 48 hours after receiving it. It is felt that this step is impractical for many dealers and should not be a compulsory requirement (though local licensing authorities could impose it on a case by case basis).

32. Taxis and private hire car services are licensed to preserve public safety and order and to prevent crime. Local authorities are responsible for the taxi and private hire car licensing regimes following the framework provided for in the 1982 Act. They have discretion in applying a local regime that best meets the specific requirements of their local area and can take account of the views of both customers and trade.

33. The Bill aims to bring greater consistency between and within taxi and private hire car licensing regimes as well as expanding the scope of the licensing regime and tightening the regulation. This is with a view to addressing concerns that the legitimate trade is being unfairly challenged in some areas by businesses and individuals circumventing the current licensing regime with a consequential effect on public safety.

34. The provisions of the Bill will give local authorities the power to refuse to grant private hire car licences on grounds of overprovision. It extends taxi driver testing to include private hire car drivers and removes the ‘contract exemption’, bringing hire cars used on contracts into the licensing regime. These provisions, in part, acknowledge that in parts of the country, taxis, private hire cars and contract hire cars are essentially operating in a very similar market. Some of the distinctions between their mode of operation - for example pre-booking versus ranks and hailings – have been blurred with changes in technology.
Public entertainment venues

35. The Bill abolishes ‘theatre licences’ as currently required under the Theatres Act 1968 and instead regulates theatres through the existing public entertainment licencing regime provided for in the 1982 Act. This simplification intends to see theatres transferred to a lighter touch licensing regime which still ensures public safety.

36. Currently theatre licensing (under the 1968 Act) is a mandatory licence that requires all premises at which public performances of a play are staged to hold a licence. No allowance is made for the size of the premises or the potential audience. This contrasts with other forms of public entertainment (licensed under the 1982 Act) which is a flexible system that allows local licensing authorities to determine in a local context how licensing should be regulated in their area. By bringing theatre under the public entertainment licencing arrangements greater flexibility will be allowed. It will be open to a local licensing authority to exclude premises offering plays only to very small audiences from the licensing requirement. It also allows greater consistency and legislative clarity by bringing theatres within the same public entertainment licencing arrangements as other forms of the arts such as concerts and comedy shows.

Miscellaneous and general

37. The Bill includes a number of provisions aimed at improving the operation of all civic government licencing regimes. This includes the power for the Scottish Ministers to make provision for the procedure to be followed at or in connection with hearings. This power will provide Ministers with the ability, if considered necessary and appropriate, to bring a level of consistency in the way hearings are conducted both across local licensing authorities and across civic and alcohol regimes. The Bill also includes a new role of civic licensing standards officer (CLSO) with specific functions in relation to providing guidance and checking compliance. This is modelled on the successful licensing standards officer (LSO) role within the 2005 Act and is intended to ensure a statutory minimum in the support local authorities provide in relation to licensing regimes under the 1982 Act. The Scottish Government is aware that many local licensing authorities already have in place high quality support of this kind and the Scottish Government’s intention is to not disrupt good practice where it is happening.

38. The Bill adds to the situations where an application for variation of a licence is deemed to be granted in circumstances where the local authority has not decided on an application or sought an extension from the sheriff within a set period. This is intended to ensure compliance with the EU Services Directive.

PART 1 – AIR WEAPONS

INTRODUCTION

39. Part 1 of the Bill makes provision for a licensing and regulatory regime for the acquisition, possession, use and disposal of low-powered air weapons in Scotland. These weapons have not previously been subject to licensing in Scotland or the rest of Great Britain. However, the scheme to be introduced follows, to a broad extent, the existing systems for licensing more powerful firearms under the Firearms Acts. That legislation, and responsibility for policy and legislation on the majority of firearms, remains reserved to the UK Parliament. Air weapons in Northern Ireland are licensed as part of the separate firearms regime in that country.
40. Given that the provisions in this Part of the Bill are broadly based on existing legislation and systems, it is important to emphasise that much of the infrastructure, knowledge and experience required to set up and administer air weapons licensing is already in place. This is true not only of Police Scotland, but amongst established shooting organisations and members of the legitimate shooting community. This part of the Memorandum is largely concerned with setting out estimates of the new or additional costs which will fall to agencies or individuals as a result of the licensing regime.

Where the costs will fall

41. The licensing authority for air weapons, as for the majority of firearms and shotguns, will be the chief constable of Police Scotland. Day-to-day responsibility for managing and administering the service is delegated to firearms licensing officers and staff across Scotland. As such, the majority of the costs involved in setting up and maintaining the licensing service will fall to Police Scotland.

42. Certain central costs will fall to the Scottish Administration. It is anticipated that these will fall into two broad areas: firstly, providing funding to help to meet initial set up costs; and secondly, to promote information and education, both in Scotland and further afield, on the new licensing requirement for air weapons. In addition, there will be costs to the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service, Scottish Court Service, Scottish Prison Service and other agencies, arising from the enforcement of the new provisions. Costs at a lower level will also fall on a number of other government departments and agencies, other stakeholders and businesses including registered firearms dealers.

43. The Bill also provides powers for a tariff of fees to be charged at the point at which a person applies for an air weapons certificate (AWC) or, in certain cases, for a permit or other approval. Fees will be collected by Police Scotland and will help to offset the costs of providing the service. The fees will be payable by the individual applying for a certificate or, as appropriate, by air weapons clubs or other corporate bodies. Unlike other firearms applications, the fee will be charged whether the application is successful or not. The broad structure of the fee tariff will follow that in place for other firearms and shotguns. The actual fee amounts payable in each case will be set out in secondary legislation.

Consultation and source of figures

44. In November 2011 the Cabinet Secretary for Justice convened the Scottish Firearms Consultative Panel (SFCP) to discuss and advise on developing the new regime. Following the work of the Panel, the Government undertook a public consultation exercise on the principles of the proposed licensing regime between December 2012 and March 2013.

45. The Government has discussed the costs which may arise as a consequence of the licensing scheme with key stakeholders to prepare this Memorandum. The estimates of the numbers of weapons and owners, the value of weapons and business transactions, and the costs of the new system used throughout this part of the Memorandum are therefore based on estimates made by the Scottish Government, informed by discussions with stakeholder individuals and organisations. In particular, the Scottish Government has developed these estimates in discussion with representatives of Police Scotland and the Scottish Police Authority, the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service (COPFS), the Gun Trade Association / Airgun...
These documents relate to the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 49) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 14 May 2014

Manufacturers and Traders Association, and other members of the SFCP. The figures provided below do not, however, represent the views of those organisations, which may wish to comment separately.

General assumptions made

Number of air weapons currently held in Scotland

46. Given that air weapons have not previously been subject to licensing in Scotland it has been difficult to make an accurate assessment of the number of air weapons currently held.

47. The issue of the number of weapons was raised again during meetings of the SFCP during 2011 and 2012. It was agreed by the Panel that there was no definitive count of air weapons held, nor any way of assessing that number completely accurately. However, work done by the member from the Gun Trade Association on behalf of the Panel examined sales figures for air guns over a 20-year period to 2011. This confirmed a sales pattern which was broadly consistent with an overall estimate of some 500,000 weapons in circulation.

48. A number of stakeholders who are opposed to the principle of licensing have argued that a much higher figure, perhaps as many as 700,000 air weapons, would be a more appropriate estimate. The Scottish Government has not, however, seen or been provided with any objective evidence to support a significantly higher figure than the 500,000 weapons discussed by the SFCP.

49. Given these discussions the Scottish Government has adopted the figure of 500,000 air weapons as the core estimate for the purposes of this memorandum and other calculations.

Estimated number of certificate applications

50. Taking a base estimate of 500,000 air weapons in Scotland it is accepted by all parties to the discussions and consultation that there will, in fact, be a much lower level of applications for AWCs. There are a number of reasons for this including:

- A significant number of air weapons are likely to be inoperative or broken, or may have been disposed of by the owners already.
- A large number are likely to be held unused. This may be because a person no longer shoots, because the weapon has been inherited and held as a family item, or simply because they have been put aside at some stage in the past and left unwanted or, in many cases, forgotten.
- A significant number of people in possession of an air weapon are likely to possess more than one. This may arise as a result of shooting over a long period and purchasing newer or better guns over time, owning a variety of weapons for different purposes, or because air weapons are used by more than one member of the household. An AWC will be valid for any number of air weapons held by the certificate holder.
- As of December 2012 there were some 60,000 holders of firearm or shotgun certificates in Scotland, who possess approximately 213,000 weapons. Many of these existing certificate holders will also hold and wish to retain air weapons. The Bill includes, as a transitional measure, provision for those people to continue to possess and use those air weapons, subject to conditions, until such time as their existing certificate expires. At that stage it will be open to them to seek to obtain co-terminous certificates for all of the guns they possess.

51. Alongside all of these factors, the Scottish Government accepts that there will be a number of air weapons in circulation which do not, at least in the short term, come to the attention of the licensing regime. This will occur for a number of reasons. For example, a number of people may not be aware of the new legislation from the outset. In addition, it is possible that a number of people will seek to avoid or ignore the new requirements. Such a decision would represent an offence in terms of the legislation and the Bill empowers the police to seize any unlicensed weapons discovered and charge the person with the relevant offence(s).

52. Given the above, it is impossible to provide any firm number of applications which are likely to be received by Police Scotland. In discussions around the SFCP and elsewhere with stakeholders, estimates range from a very small number of “new” applications (i.e. from individuals without an existing firearm or shotgun certificate) to around 75% of air weapon owners.

53. The Scottish Government believes that the figures above are likely to be at the extremes of the range of actual applications, and that it is appropriate to set out the main estimates of costs based on a range of potential new applications – that is, applications from those who hold only air weapons and are currently unknown to police firearms licensing departments. Following discussions with Police Scotland and others the Scottish Government considers that a range of 10,000, 20,000 and 30,000 new applications provides a suitable estimate of such applications in the first licensing round. The costs and fee income figures below are calculated on this basis.

54. As noted above, it is accepted that there is likely to be a large number of existing firearm and/or shotgun certificate holders who wish to obtain an AWC. The Government estimates that this could be in the region of 40,000 existing certificate holders. Furthermore, as serious competitive or professional shooters, many of these individuals are likely to own several air weapons meaning that they will account for a considerable portion of the estimated 500,000 air weapons in circulation. The costs of processing applications from existing certificate holders will, however, be relatively small as the necessary background checks on such applicants will already have been carried out. It is envisaged that a lower fee for such applications should be sufficient to cover such costs, making the processing of these applications cost-neutral.

COSTS ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

Scottish Government

55. Air weapons licensing will be administered by Police Scotland alongside the existing licensing systems for more powerful firearms and shotguns. However, it is anticipated that some costs will be borne centrally by the Scottish Administration.

Guidance

56. The Scottish Government is mindful of the need to support the legislation with detailed guidance for the police, for registered firearms dealers and others affected by the changes and for owners and users of air weapons. That guidance will follow the terms of the legislation and the aim is to draw on the existing, recently reviewed Home Office Guide on Firearms Licensing
These documents relate to the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 49) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 14 May 2014

Law, which was published in full in November 2013, as well as consolidated guidance for police and shooters in Scotland currently being prepared by Police Scotland, and on existing material produced by the shooting organisations. All of the main shooting organisations, and other stakeholders, have expressed their willingness to work with the Government to ensure as many people as possible are aware of the new requirements.

57. The preparation of the guidance will be a matter for the Scottish Government as part of the normal business of the Safer Communities Directorate.

Public information

58. The Scottish Government has given a firm commitment, throughout the discussions and consultation on the air weapons provisions of the Bill, to ensuring that as many people as possible are aware of the new licensing requirements. It is anticipated that there will be a substantial lead-in period to full commencement of Part 1 of the Bill, to allow people to take decisions on whether they intend to apply for an AWC or dispose of weapons they hold. As part of this, the Government will undertake a high-profile media campaign to explain the new legislation. This will draw on the experience of the highly successful 2009 campaign to raise awareness of the danger of air weapons and is likely to use printed materials, the internet and possibly local radio to ensure the information reaches a wide audience. As noted above, all of the main shooting organisations have committed to working with the Government to ensure as many people as possible are aware of the new requirements.

59. The Government has estimated that the initial costs of such a campaign would be in the region of £225,000, spread over two years. Ongoing costs would be met from within existing resources.

Police Service of Scotland and Scottish Police Authority

60. The cost estimates set out below are, as far as possible, expressed in terms of the cost per certificate application process. The figures are drawn from three main sources:

- Knowledge of the costs of operating the existing firearms licensing service. These costs were provided by the former Scottish police forces, prior to April 2013, as part of the discussions at the SFCP and from additional, more recent material from Police Scotland;

- Figures provided by Police Scotland in an internal briefing paper dated September 2013, and shared to inform discussions with the Scottish Government; and

- Figures under discussion between the Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO) Firearms and Explosives Licensing Working Group (FELWG) and the Home Office, in the context of revising the existing fee tariff. A Home Office working group, which includes a representative from Police Scotland, is currently examining this issue in detail. While no firm decisions are expected for some time, both Police Scotland and the Scottish Government have been kept informed of progress and of the assumptions used.
Set up costs

61. Police Scotland’s Licensing and Violence Reduction Division is well established and includes trained, experienced officers and police staff who operate the existing firearms licensing function. The new air weapons regime will build on this function and should be capable of being introduced without significant disruption. There are, however, likely to be some set up costs associated with introducing the new regime. The Scottish Government’s best estimates of these costs are set out below.

62. Staffing - The current licensing service employs some 66 administrative staff and 25 police officers, in order to service the 60,000 certificate holders. The Government proposes that the new system will not be unduly burdensome in terms of the application process, background checks on the applicant, home visits, etc. (see below). In addition, the provisions include transitional measures which will allow an existing certificate holder to “delay” application for an AWC until their existing certificate expires. Given this, the Scottish Government does not believe that there will be a need for significant additional staffing to process new applications. It is acknowledged, however, that staffing may be subject to the normal peaks and troughs of the certification cycle, and that there is likely to be a particular impact in the first 12 to 24 months of the licensing process. The calculations on application processing costs set out below reflect the anticipated staff time involved in each of the main processes, and therefore translate to staffing impacts.

63. Training – As noted above, Police Scotland already operates a full licensing service. The air weapons regime is based on the current firearms regime and will use the same or familiar forms, processes and considerations. The additional training of staff for the new legislation is therefore expected to be relatively low impact and will, over time, be built into the current training programme. Following discussions with Police Scotland, it is anticipated that it will be possible to absorb any additional training requirement within existing resources.

64. ICT – Police Scotland uses the SHOGUN IT system for processing and recording firearms and shotgun applications, certificates and other information. The system was used by several of the legacy forces prior to April 2013 and is expected to be fully rolled out across Scotland by the second half of 2014, under a five-year maintenance and development contract. Discussions with Police Scotland indicate that it will be possible to build onto the existing systems to include air weapons certification within SHOGUN and Police Scotland have confirmed this in principle with the software contractor. This allows for familiarity in the processing function, and ensures that all certification and related systems – such as the Criminal History System – will operate smoothly together. At this stage, no formal discussions have taken place with the company responsible for SHOGUN and it is not possible to state likely development costs with any certainty. However, initial discussions indicate that the costs of software development built on existing systems and any additional hardware capacity should not be high. An allowance of up to £50,000 has been made at this stage.

65. A summary of anticipated set up costs is therefore:

Processing costs

66. The main costs falling to Police Scotland will arise from the initial certification of air weapons holders, and ongoing checks and renewals of certificates once the main regime is in place. To a great extent all of the main elements of the regime are already in place, so that the impact of any new work and costs will be reduced as far as possible. In addition, it is not the intention to repeat or duplicate background and other checks unnecessarily where a firearms or shotgun certificate is already held. More generally, it is expected – and has been agreed with Police Scotland - that extensive, detailed background checks and home visits will be necessary only in a very small proportion of cases. This is reflected in the calculation of costs below.

67. Work done by ACPO in 2012, to inform fee discussions with the Home Office, suggested that processing of the grant of a firearms or shotgun certificate could involve more than five hours of a police enquiry officer’s time, with almost two further hours of administrative officer time for each process, on average. This level of resource would lead to a total cost of some £196 per certificate granted. Timings and charges at this level were not agreed by the shooting lobby or by the Home Office at the time. Further work has been done since, and is continuing, to reassess these workloads, and to estimate processes and timings involved in a system which could operate through an online regime, and which draws out greater efficiencies in the service overall.

68. For the purposes of the air weapons regime, the Scottish Government believes that an appropriate level of checking and processing could be achieved at significantly lower costs than the figures set out above. Experience of “disclosure” style background checks under other legislation – for example, when dealing with the protection of vulnerable groups – has shown this to be both achievable and successful. In discussion, Police Scotland agrees that this level of check would be appropriate for air weapons in the vast majority of cases. Relatively few air weapons applications would require a significantly higher level of background check and inquiry, perhaps including a home visit for the purposes of checking location, security, etc..

69. Drawing all of these considerations together, and taking into account latest (March 2014) ACPO/Home Office discussions around processing times for online applications, the Scottish Government believes that the tables below represent a reasonable estimate of the costs of processing new air weapons applications. The unit staff costs used are those set out in a Police Scotland briefing paper dated 11 December 2013 and are derived from unit costs currently being used to inform the wider examination of firearms fees by the Home Office.

70. This results in total estimated processing costs of new applications (i.e. from individuals without an existing firearm or shotgun certificate):

- 10,000 applications - £855,500
- 20,000 applications - £1,711,000
- 30,000 applications - £2,566,500

71. These costs would be spread across the normal five-year licensing period but it is intended that air weapons holders will be able to apply for their first licence in advance of full commencement. Transitional arrangements also mean that existing firearm or shotgun certificate holders do not have to apply for a new AWC until their existing certificate is being renewed. For the purposes of this memorandum it is anticipated that commencement of the main provisions of Part 1 would come into effect on 1 April 2016. Given this, the estimated profile of application costs is set out in the following table:

72. In addition to the above, there will be a significant number of existing holders seeking co-terminous certificates. The costs of processing such certificates will be greatly reduced, as much of the required information and checking will already have been done for the firearms or shotgun process. The Scottish Government estimates that the additional costs involved would amount to some £10 per certificate. It is assumed, for the purposes of this memorandum, that there would be some 40,000 such applications over the period. This would amount to some £400,000 over the five-year licensing period, averaged out to £80,000 per year. However, it is anticipated that these costs could be fully recovered by way of a fee charged for the co-terminous procedure. The net financial impact on Police Scotland is therefore nil.
Other processes

73. The above estimates relate to the initial five-year period when almost all applications will be for new AWCs. For Year 6 onwards, many of the certificate applications will relate to renewals of existing authorities and processing costs should generally be lower as much of the data would already exist and Police Scotland would have knowledge and experience of the applicant at that stage. While this memorandum does not detail estimates beyond the first five-year cycle, the relevant costs for processing a renewal application could be estimated at:

75. As there has been no previous experience of licensing such weapons, or of issuing permits for specific activities, it is not possible to provide any robust estimates of the numbers of applications likely to be received and processed. However, the Scottish Government considers that the fee to be charged for these processes can and should be set at a cost-recovery level, offsetting the costs of each process – see table of potential fees at paragraph 104. Fees set at these levels should not be prohibitive when measured, in the case of visitor permits for example, against the costs of travel to or holidaying in Scotland, or could be recovered by the applicant through entrance or membership fees. The fee tariff will be set in secondary legislation and detailed discussion of the potential fee levels is set out at paragraph 101 below.

Compliance costs

76. In line with the Scottish Government approach to regulating air weapons, the Scottish Government envisages that the majority of existing firearm and shotgun certificate holders will properly apply for a new AWC at the appropriate point in time. For those not already within the firearms licensing systems, it is not the intention that Police Scotland should pursue unlicensed air weapons as a significant new priority. Rather, the regime will allow the police to identify and regulate legitimate air weapons holders, and to identify and seize unlicensed weapons as part of their wider responsibility for policing. Detection and enforcement of the new provisions will, therefore, form part of existing operations in the majority of cases. In line with this approach, no additional police officers should be required as a consequence of the new legislation.

77. Police Scotland and the Head of Firearms at the Scottish Police Authority have sought to estimate the costs involved in recording and reporting cases where an air weapon is retrieved by officers in the course of their investigation, and the costs of testing any such weapon to assess its specification, power, etc.. The Scottish Government accepts their stated estimate that each case would involve an average of around two hours of work, costing some £180 per case, if a full court report is required. The Government also noted that the development and use of a simpler, standardised reporting format could reduce this unit cost to as low as £100.

78. As above, it is difficult to make any firm estimate of how many air weapons would fall to be tested as a result of the new legislation. However, taking account of the 171 offences involving air weapons recorded in 2012-13 and allowing for new cases and seizures arising from the new provisions Police Scotland considers that some 500 new tests could be needed each year – broadly 10 cases a week.

79. The estimated maximum additional enforcement, testing and reporting costs are therefore:

500 cases @ £180 per case = £90,000 per annum.

Hand-ins and disposals

80. One of the effects of the introduction of the new legislation will be to encourage people to consider whether they wish to license weapons held, or to dispose of them. Many such disposals could be through sales, etc., but it is anticipated that many old or unwanted air weapons could be handed in to the police for disposal and destruction. Police Scotland would collect such weapons and make arrangements, either locally or nationally to have them held securely then destroyed. This would build on existing arrangements for the handling of firearms generally.

81. As with other aspects of the proposals, it is not possible to estimate accurately how many such air weapons could be involved, nor what the disposal arrangements are likely to cost in total. The Scottish Government notes, however, that a long lead-in period is anticipated before the licensing provisions are fully commenced, and that Police Scotland already has in place arrangements to dispose of firearms. Such arrangements include “no cost” agreements with companies to securely destroy the weapons with the private company benefitting from any scrap value resulting. At this stage, the Government’s best estimate of the additional hand-in and disposal costs arising from the Bill provisions is some £30,000 spread over the initial years of the licensing regime. Thereafter, it is believed that the costs of ongoing disposals, forfeitures, etc. would be absorbed within existing resources.

82. A summary of the additional ongoing costs anticipated is:

Scottish Court Service / Scottish Prison Service

83. As noted above, it is not the intention that Police Scotland should pursue unlicensed air weapons as a significant new priority. Prosecutions for licensing offences are therefore likely, in the majority of cases, to be pursued in parallel with other offences, whether these relate to offences of assault, vandalism, threatening behaviour, animal cruelty etc.. There were some 171 offences involving air weapons in the year 2012-13 and the additional costs of reporting and pursuing any associated licensing offence in such cases would, for the most part, represent a marginal addition to the policing and prosecution costs involved. This memorandum is therefore mainly concerned with estimating the number and costs of new, stand-alone licensing offences under Part 1 of the Bill, as unlicensed air weapons are identified and seized in the course of other investigations and police operations.

New cases

84. Given this background, the Scottish Government anticipates that the new measures will lead to a very small additional number of the most serious licensing offences, for example in relation to repeat offenders, being prosecuted in the sheriff courts under solemn procedure, with the expectation that a custodial sentence and/or substantial fine would be imposed on conviction. It is difficult to predict exact levels of activity at this stage, but the Scottish Government estimates that between two and five additional cases would be tried each year in solemn proceedings in the sheriff court.

85. There will also be a higher number of less serious cases, for example failure to comply with conditions on an AWC. In addition, Police Scotland has stated that it currently encounters a large number of low-value air weapons in the course of its operations which it would be likely to seize once the new legislation comes into force. Such cases would most probably be dealt with by way of summary procedures. The Scottish Government considers that a realistic estimate of new summary prosecutions under the licensing provisions of the Bill would, in the early years of the regime, lie between 50 and 100 additional cases detected per annum. Given that the majority of such cases would relate to licensing offences, it is estimated that a very small proportion would result in custodial sentences, perhaps as low as 2%, with an assumed sentence length of six months (with three months served).

Costs arising

86. Estimates have been made about the “unit costs” associated with pursuing prosecutions through both the solemn and summary court procedures. These estimates are based on assumed average costs in each case and have been calculated by the Scottish Government in consultation with stakeholders. Similarly, assumptions about potential disposals, whether custodial or by fine have been estimated, based on existing experience of court disposals.

87. In summary, the assumptions made in the relevant sections below are:

89. In each case, the estimated number of new cases arising directly from the provisions of Part 1 of the Bill, and the costs associated with such cases, do not translate to any significant new burden on the courts or prison services. The Scottish Court Service Annual Report 2011-12 showed that there were some 1,128 solemn trials and 6,846 summary trials where evidence was led. In addition, the average daily prison population in Scotland in 2012-13 was 8,014. The likely impacts of air weapons licensing, therefore, represent a very small percentage of the total costs of these organisations and should be accommodated within existing workloads and likely fluctuations therein. The relevant costs have, therefore, been classed as opportunity costs.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

90. The licensing authority for air weapons in Scotland will be Police Scotland. The Scottish Government does not propose any formal role for local authorities within the new regime. This is in line with the present firearms and shotgun licensing arrangements. As a result, the Scottish Government does not anticipate any new costs falling on local authorities as a result of Part 1 of the Bill.
COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

Registered firearms dealers

91. The Gun Trade Association Ltd (GTA) is the UK's officially recognised body representing the legitimate sporting, recreational and professional gun trade. It has over 700 members and its mission is to promote and protect the industry at all levels. The GTA (and the Airgun Manufacturers & Trade Association Ltd (AMTA)) were represented on the Scottish Government’s SFCP and provided or confirmed a number of the main figures and assumptions used in developing this memorandum.

92. Scottish Government statistics showed that there were 353 registered firearms dealers (RFDs) in Scotland at December 2012. Many of these are involved in trading air weapons, with GTA/AMTA servicing around 114 air weapon outlets. Figures provided by the GTA/AMTA in October 2012 (and confirmed in March 2014) estimated that retail sales of air weapons at that time amounted to approximately three guns per week per outlet, with a total estimated retail value of some £2.4 million per annum. An additional £2 - 3 million per year was estimated as being attributable to “related” products and sales, including clothing, targets, scopes, etc..

93. The Scottish Government understands that GTA/AMTA members at the time reported a small downturn in sales in the period 2010 to 2012, against a background of the general economic downturn, as well as unfounded speculation about an “air weapons ban” in Scotland. However, this had to be seen against a longer term trend of a rise in sales over a nine- or ten-year period. This rise has occurred despite the introduction of greater controls over the possession and sale of air weapons in the Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003, the Violent Crime Reduction Act 2006 and the Crime and Security Act 2010.

94. Overall, the Scottish Government accepts that there may be an adverse impact on sales figures as a result of this legislation coming into force. However, this is not expected to be large. The licensing regime is designed to ensure that a reasonable person with a legitimate reason for possessing an air weapon should be able to obtain a certificate and continue to shoot. Gun sales to this customer base will, in many cases, be focused at the higher value end of the market, along with sales of related products. Sales of lower powered weapons are, therefore, likely to reduce as a proportion of all sales and the Government believes that such a reduction is justified in terms of the wider benefits to public safety.

95. In terms of ongoing costs, the new legislation places two main responsibilities on air weapons traders. Firstly, the dealer will be required to ensure that a person buying an air weapon holds a valid AWC. That check should be relatively simple and builds on existing requirements with regard to the conduct and recording of air weapons sales, introduced by the Violent Crime Reduction Act 2006. Secondly, dealers will be required to notify the chief constable of any air weapon sold for delivery outwith Great Britain. Again this builds on existing procedures for firearms and shotguns and will not represent any significant new burden for RFDs.

Shooting clubs

96. There is already a small network of air weapon clubs across Scotland, many of which are affiliated with recognised shooting organisations such as the Scottish Air Rifle and Pistol Association (SARPA), UK Association for Hunter Field Target (UKHAFT), and National Small-bore Rifle Association (NSRA). Such clubs should have appropriate premises which can be inspected and approved by Police Scotland. The Bill sets a framework for such an approval process and the Scottish Government will supplement this with detailed guidance, following the model of the current Home Office guidance on the approval of rifle clubs and muzzle-loading pistol clubs, which are governed under section 15 of the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1988.

97. A fee will be payable by the club to help meet the costs of this approval process. While such fees will represent a cost to the club and to members, the Scottish Government believes that the overall impact should be very small when viewed against the overall costs of providing suitable premises or a shooting range, and the wider costs involved in air weapon shooting.

Shooting organisations

98. As with air weapons clubs, the Scottish Government does not consider that there will be any significant impact on shooting organisations. It is likely that the majority of existing legitimate and serious air weapons shooters are, and will continue to be, members of or subscribe to one or more of the main organisations. Conversely, those who should not possess weapons or who possess them with the aim of causing mischief are unlikely to be members of shooting organisations.

Tourism

99. The Bill provides for a system of visitor permits for those who wish to visit Scotland with their own air weapons, or to shoot in Scotland, for example on private land or at an organised event. This will draw on the well-established system of visitor permits for firearms and shotguns under the current firearms legislation. The applicant for such a permit will be required to pay a fee at the point of application. The exact level of fees has not yet been set: the current fee for a firearms visitor permit is set at £12, whereas the estimates of processing costs set out above suggest that a fee of around £20 may better reflect the actual costs of dealing with an application. In any event, a fee set at or close to this level would represent a small addition to the costs of a visit to Scotland, particularly where that visit includes significant travel and accommodation costs. The Scottish Government considers that such additional costs are not material and would be unlikely to lead to any significant impact on tourism in Scotland.

Recreational shooting

100. The Bill also provides for event permits, to allow the applicant to organise and promote specific events at which air weapons shooting is to take place. Such events could, for example, include fairs and other situations where it is possible for those who do not normally shoot in a competitive environment to hire or borrow air weapons; specific shooting competitions; or other events which include recreational shooting. The costs of processing an application for a permit to operate such an event are estimated at paragraph 74 above and may amount to some £60 - £70 per event. Such a cost is likely to be small in comparison to the overall costs of staging and promoting such events and could be recouped by the organisers through entry fees or other remuneration. The Scottish Government considers that any impact on the costs of organising recreational shooting events is, therefore, likely to be marginal.
These documents relate to the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 49) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 14 May 2014

Fees

101. As noted above, the Bill enables a tariff of fees to be charged at the point at which a person applies for an AWC, a permit or for other approvals. The fee will be payable regardless of whether or not a certificate is granted. Fees will be collected by Police Scotland and will help to offset the costs of providing the service. The fees will be payable by the individual applying for a certificate or, as appropriate, by air weapons clubs or other corporate bodies.

102. The broad structure of the tariff will follow that in place for other firearms and shotguns. Those fees are set by the UK Government under reserved legislation. The actual fee amounts payable in each case will be set out in secondary legislation and are likely to be set at levels which strike a balance between the current tariff for firearms, at least in the initial years of the regime, and the estimated average costs of processing each application. The Scottish Government believes it would be inequitable to set an air weapons fee tariff which is greater than that for other guns. This could also encourage ownership of more powerful weapons. The Scottish Government’s aim, however, is to move towards a level of fees set at full cost recovery levels.

103. The following table sets out the current (March 2014) fee levels for firearms and shotguns, and shows indicative fees for the equivalent main air weapons processes. The proposals are set at different levels for the purposes of illustrating potential impacts on overall costs. It is also important to note a number of general points:

- Firstly, the existing tariff charges fees for the grant of the certificate. The Scottish Government proposes that it is more appropriate to require payment of a fee at the point of application, and that the fee is not returnable in the event of a refusal of the application. This better reflects the true costs of running the licensing service, as the processing checks and administration have to be carried out regardless of the final decision made;

- Secondly, there are a number of processes (police permits and events permits) where the Scottish Government intends to set a fee, which have no direct equivalent in the current firearms legislation; and

- Thirdly, much of the current tariff has been in place since 1 January 2001 (fees for clubs and museums have been unchanged since 1988). There has been considerable pressure from a number of stakeholders, in particular the police, calling for fees to be increased in line with inflation and to better represent the costs of providing the licensing service. As noted above, work is currently underway in a Fees Working Group, convened by the Home Office and including representation from Police Scotland, to consider an increase in the firearm and shotgun tariff. This work is not yet complete, and it is unclear as to whether a full cost recovery fee level is likely to be set, either from the point of change or on a phased basis.

104. In the table below, two indicative fee levels have been shown, for estimation purposes. These are:

OVERALL COSTS OF PART 1

105. Drawing together all of the above information and given the assumptions made, the following sets out the Scottish Government’s best estimates at this stage of the potential costs arising from the air weapons provisions as set out in Part 1 of the Bill.

106. As noted at paragraph 53 the Government estimates that the number of new applications for AWCs will fall in the range 10,000, 20,000 or 30,000 with the mid-range estimate of 20,000 new applications considered the most likely scenario. Applications will be spread in the run up to full commencement and over the first five-year licensing period. Many applications are likely to arise in the first years, but transitional measures and other factors mean that the application rate is likely to be spread over the whole period. The estimated profile is set out in the table at paragraph 71 above. The costs of new applications on this basis are set in the table below. Assumed fee levels are calculated at Level 1 (i.e. existing fee tariff).

PART 2 - ALCOHOL

INTRODUCTION

108. There are nineteen separate provisions in relation to alcohol licensing in the Bill. The main amendments are listed below it is believed that their overall financial impact is likely to be close to neutral. The more significant financial impacts on stakeholders are described throughout this section of the Financial Memorandum

109. Part 2 of the Bill amends the system of alcohol licensing by:

- The creation of a new offence of supplying alcohol to children or young people for consumption in a public place. This fulfils a manifesto commitment;
- Amendment of the licensing objective in relation to children to also include young persons;
- Amendment of the duration of a licensing policy statement to better align with the term of Licensing Boards;
- Inserting a fit and proper person test in relation to the issue or continued holding of a premises or a personal licence;
- Removal of the automatic requirement for a hearing where a Licensing Board is notified of a relevant or foreign offence in relation to a premises or personal licence;
- Amendment of the definition of relevant offences and foreign offences to no longer disregard a matter that is spent for the purposes of the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974;
- Inclusion of the flavouring angostura bitters in the definition of alcohol for the purposes of the Act;
- Clarification that for an overprovision assessment, the whole Board area may be considered as an area of overprovision, and allow Boards to take account of licensed hours, among other things;
- Imposition of a duty on Boards to prepare an annual financial report;
- Removal of the requirement for a premises licence holder to notify a change in interested parties and removal a premises manager from the definition of interested party;
- Removal of the five-year restriction on re-applying for a licence revoked on grounds of failing to undertake refresher training and other changes to the personal licence holder requirements;
- Introduction of a requirement for a Licensing Board to issue an acknowledgement, unless it would be impractical;
- Provision for the automatic grant of a licence (or its variation) where a Licensing Board has not either decided on an application or sought an extension from the sheriff within a set period. This clarifies compliance with the EU Services Directive.
COSTS ON THE SCOTTISH ADMINISTRATION

Scottish Government

110. Alcohol licensing will continue to be administered locally by local authority Licensing Boards so centrally borne costs will continue to be minimal.

111. The Scottish Government already produces and updates guidance in relation to alcohol licensing. The production of guidance on the alcohol licensing aspects of the Bill, would form part of this existing work and, therefore, be met from within existing budgets. No additional costs to the Scottish Government have been identified in respect of Part 2 of the Bill.

Police Service of Scotland

112. In 2007, the overall estimate for the cost of alcohol-specific offences and alcohol-specific crimes and offences was estimated £727.1 million.4

113. Police Scotland is very supportive of these measures in the Bill, which will improve departmental effectiveness with no anticipated impact on policing demands or financial outlay. Police Scotland has stated that the measures may actually save money and prevent it having to manage particular problems in certain premises which is a time-consuming and more expensive option.

114. Under the Bill, police responsibility will remain broadly the same with responsibility for conducting checks on licence holders, enforcement and offering views on complaints. However with the introduction of the ‘fit and proper’ test and the consideration of spent convictions, the police will have powers to provide a wider range of information to Boards.

115. No additional police costs are anticipated in this regard. The background work is already carried out for every new applicant and/or transferee and in response to incidents occurring which are linked to licensed premises and holders of personal licences. Spent convictions are automatically checked when the police undertake background checks in their role as statutory consultee so there will be no additional burden in this regard.

116. Police Scotland has welcomed the new offence of supplying alcohol to young people/children for consumption in a public place. It is not clear that policing the offence would be an additional cost to Police Scotland as the police are already committing resource to dealing with the behaviour to which it relates. Police Scotland feels that this offence will prove to be a deterrent and useful preventative measure as well as an additional tool to tackle the source of alcohol to young persons, underage drinking, and associated antisocial behaviour and disorder. Ultimately, these changes should reduce the pressure on police resource caused by this behaviour which has come to blight the evening economies of towns and cities, especially at the weekend.

117. In common with similar offences under the 2005 Act, the Scottish Government anticipates that Police Scotland will use it to encourage compliance, with only a relatively small number of prosecutions being taken where necessary to protect public safety. The actual number of prosecutions under this offence would, however, depend on the approach taken by Police Scotland. The estimated cost involved in processing a summary case from the point at which the crime is committed to the point at which a suspect is charged is £439. 5 A similar offence under section 105 of the 2005 Act was the basis of 50 prosecutions in 2012/13. Together these provide a possible indicative cost to Police Scotland of around £21,950 per annum for this offence although, as noted above, a proportion of this cost is already spent in policing the behaviour to which it relates.

Scottish Court Service / Scottish Prison Service

118. It is anticipated that the majority of disposals for incidents of supplying alcohol to a child or young person in a public place will be through early intervention or by means of fixed penalty notices, and as such it is less likely that there will be a significant impact on procurators fiscal or indeed custody provision.

119. The alcohol licensing regime relies on Licensing Boards, made up by local authority councillors. In the main, any punitive action is taken in relation to the relevant licence. The 2005 Act provides a right of appeal for certain Licensing Board decisions. It is not anticipated that the Bill will make significant changes to the number of appeals that are made.

120. There are, however, also a number of existing offences within the legislation, and this Bill provides an additional offence in relation to the supply of alcohol to a child or young person in a public place. It is not anticipated that this new offence will lead to substantial numbers of additional prosecutions. A person who commits this offence is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding level 5 on the standard scale, imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months or both.

121. The average estimated cost of a summary case is £2,148.5 This figure includes not just prosecution costs, but also police costs and court costs involved in a case being taken through Scottish summary courts. Excluding the costs incurred up to the point that the suspect is charged, which will fall largely to the police, the average estimated cost of a summary case is £1,709.

122. As set out above in paragraph 117, in common with similar offences under the 2005 Act, the Scottish Government anticipates that Police Scotland will use it to encourage compliance, with only a relatively small number of prosecutions being taken where necessary to protect public safety. Nevertheless, on the basis of the number of prosecutions under section 105 of the 2005 Act in 2012/13, a possible indicative cost of about £85,450 per annum can be derived.

COSTS ON LOCAL AUTHORITIES

123. The alcohol licensing regime is administered at local authority level by Licensing Boards. The Bill will not change this. Local authorities will continue to bear the costs of administering the licensing process, and they recoup their costs through the licensing fees.

124. The Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 section 136 enables the Scottish Ministers to make provision for the charging of alcohol licensing fees by Licensing Boards in a range of situations such as applying for premises licences/paying annual fees, applying for personal licences, occasional licences, and transfer or variation of licences.

125. Licensing Boards are empowered to set their own fees as long as they do not exceed the maximum limits, where appropriate, outlined in the Licensing (Fees) (Scotland) Regulations 2007 (“the 2007 Regulations”). The fees are intended to reflect the Scottish Government’s intention to make the system self-funding i.e. to cover both direct and indirect costs incurred by Licensing Boards. As stated in the 2007 Regulations, regulation 13:

“a Board is to have regard to the desirability of ensuring that the total fees payable under these Regulations to that Board in respect of any period are likely to be broadly equivalent to the expenses incurred by the Board and the council for the area of that Board, in administering the Act generally during that period.”

126. Most of these fees, such as those charged for occasional licences or variations, are the same for all licensees regardless of the size of their business. Premises applications/annual fees are linked to the business’s rateable value, with a number of exceptions such as members clubs, visitor attractions etc., detailed in the 2007 Regulations.

127. In addition to the payment for premises licence applications, personal licence holder applications etc., it is a mandatory condition of the premises licence that holders pay an annual fee to ensure that the system is sufficiently resourced. Licensing Boards are empowered to set their own annual fees for premises licences, as long as they do not exceed the maximum limits outlined in the 2007 Regulations. Licensing Boards will be put under a statutory duty to report their income and expenditure. This will provide a better understanding of their costs and, if demonstrated to be necessary, the maximum limits within the 2007 Regulations will be amended.

Review of alcohol licensing fees

128. It is for local Licensing Boards to determine the level of appropriate fees, subject to any prescribed level, and to ensure that the licensing regime is self-funding. The recent Review of Alcohol Licensing Fees carefully considered these issues but determined that there was insufficient information to determine whether Licensing Boards were recovering their costs, or making a surplus/deficit, and therefore it was not possible to make firm recommendations on the level of fees. The review, therefore, recommended that Licensing Boards be put under a statutory duty to report on their income and expenditure. The lack of transparency as to Licensing Board costs has also significantly restricted the possibility of accurate costs being developed for the purpose of this memorandum.

129. To increase transparency, this Bill, therefore, puts a duty on Licensing Boards to provide an annual report of their income and expenditure from the fees regime so it is clear that the fees are being set at appropriate levels to cover the Board’s costs.

130. The ultimate fees regime in an area will, therefore, reflect the unique circumstances faced in the local authority, and the impact of many factors such as demography, geography and health of the local economy, it is inevitable that there is variation between the licensing fees charged in different local authorities.

Licensing objectives and statements of licensing policy

131. The Bill amends the licensing objective ‘protecting children from harm’ to ‘protecting children and young people from harm’. There will be administration costs associated with updating written materials, websites, training materials etc. The bulk of these materials is online and subject to periodic review. The Scottish Government would, therefore, expect such costs to be low.

132. The Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 requires Licensing Boards to produce and consult on a statement of policy every three years regarding licensing within their areas, as well as creating an overprovision assessment. This process prompts Boards to pro-actively assess what policies are suitable for their area and provides the licensed trade with a visible record of the Board’s planned approach which helps them to plan over a three-year period.

133. Creating robust, evidence-based licensing policy statements and overprovision assessments imposes an administrative cost on Licensing Boards and their consultees such as police and health bodies. The amount of time spent on work related to policy statements varies between Boards, some of which spend hundreds of staff hours on the accompanying processes such as engagement, Board meetings, liaising with Licensing Forums, sending letters etc.

134. The Bill amends the 2005 Act to require these policy statements within 18 months of an ordinary election of councillors from local government areas which takes place under section 5 of the Local Government etc. (Scotland) Act 1994. In practice this will usually mean every five years. Reducing the frequency of licensing policy statements will reduce costs for some local authorities. Some Boards may wish to update their policy statements more regularly and they will be able to do by preparing a supplementary policy statement.

135. Reducing the frequency of reviewing the Licensing Policy Statement from every three years to better align with local government electoral terms will potentially result in a 40% saving from existing costs in relation to reviewing their Licensing Policy Statement for Licensing Boards. It will be for individual Boards to determine whether a five-year review is appropriate, and certain Boards may wish to review their Licensing Policy Statement more frequently. It is, therefore, impossible to arrive at an accurate estimate of savings, but the Scottish Government would expect many Boards to find a five-yearly review more proportionate.

Greater powers for Licensing Boards and the police

136. The Bill provides greater powers for Licensing Boards to consider whether applicants or licence holders are ‘fit and proper’ persons, as well as allowing them to consider spent convictions.

137. It is difficult to estimate any additional costs for Boards because it largely depends on the manner in which they deploy these powers within the exercise of their existing functions. While it is possible that these greater powers could result in more reviews by Licensing Boards and a more detailed consideration of applications, these functions will form part of the business conducted at the regular Board meetings. It is, therefore, anticipated that any additional cost is likely to be minimal. If their fees are below the maximum levels, Licensing Boards could cover any additional costs by raising their alcohol licensing fees.

138. A more detailed consideration of individual licences and applications will improve the existing licensing regime and improve compliance over the long term.

139. Under the current regime, Licensing Boards are compelled to review a premises licence if they receive a notice from the chief constable confirming that the premises licence holder or connected person has gained a conviction for a relevant or foreign offence. The current regime also compels Boards to hold a hearing if they receive a notice or become aware that a personal licence holder has gained a conviction for a relevant or foreign offence.
140. Many licensed premises have outlets across the whole of Britain. Under the current legislation, if a premises licence holder or connected person is convicted of an offence, for example, in England, there must be a hearing in every Board area in which the person has a premises. This may be appropriate if the offence is sufficiently severe, but Boards do not currently have the power to make that decision and must hold a hearing for every offence no matter how minor.

141. Hearings are usually dealt with as part of the regular business at Licensing Board meetings held monthly or quarterly.

142. The Bill allows Boards to determine whether a review/ hearing is necessary, and provides them with the power to take no further action. This will provide Boards with some cost and time savings. Anecdotal evidence and consultation responses suggest that a significant number of such hearings currently take place across Scotland, serving little purpose. Removing the automatic requirement for such hearings will lead to ongoing resource savings for Boards.

Duty of Licensing Boards to produce annual financial report

143. The Bill requires each Licensing Board to prepare and publish an annual financial report setting out their income and expenditure from the alcohol licensing fees regime. As set out in paragraphs 128 and 128 above, Licensing Boards are already required to base their fees on cost recovery but there is a lack of clarity as to what these costs are. While in theory publishing these calculations should not require significant additional resource, it is recognised that some changes may need to be made to some Boards’ financial and accounting practices to enable this. It is anticipated that any additional costs arising from this should be minimal. The annual financial reports will inform the Scottish Government on appropriate maximum fee levels.

COSTS ON OTHER BODIES, INDIVIDUALS AND BUSINESSES

Trade

144. The 2005 Act only came into force in September 2009 and the regime is still settling in. It is the Scottish Government’s view that in the main it is working well. Therefore, rather than proposing any radical overhauls of the regime, the Bill is intended to improve the existing system and reduce burdens on trade.

145. As explained in paragraphs 139 to 142 above, when a Licensing Board receives notice or becomes aware of the existence of a conviction for a relevant or foreign offence in relation to a premises licence holder or a connected person, they must hold a hearing. For businesses who operate in multiple local authorities, this means that for a relatively minor conviction, they may have to attend many different Licensing Board reviews as there is at least one Board in every local authority. Some businesses may be represented by legal agents at these hearings with associated costs.

146. This is considered to be a disproportionate burden on businesses, so the Bill amends the 2005 Act to allow individual Boards to determine whether a review is necessary. This will save money and time for those businesses which may be affected by this, but the extent of this saving...
These documents relate to the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 49) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 14 May 2014 to each of these will depend, amongst other things, on the number of local authority areas the business operates in. Cost savings by the Board should result in lower alcohol licensing fees.

147. The 2005 Act provides that if a personal licence holder does not meet the deadline for providing evidence to the relevant Licensing Board that the holder has undergone the refresher training, the holder’s personal licence must be revoked. Once revoked, a person cannot apply for another personal licence for five years. The consequences of the revocation of a personal licence could include the sale of alcohol no longer being permitted in the holder’s premises, unless appropriate steps are taken to name an alternative personal licence holder as the designated premises manager. In addition, personal licence holders who have their licences revoked will no longer be allowed to authorise sales of alcohol or conduct the mandatory staff training and will be unable to obtain another personal licence for a period of five years.

148. The cost for some businesses and individuals could be disproportionate. The Bill amends the legislation so that if a personal licence is revoked for failure to meet this deadline under s87(3) of the 2005 Act, the person can apply for another licence again immediately. As the circumstances which this provision seeks to address have not yet arisen, it is difficult to quantify possible savings to businesses and individuals. However, substantial business disruption will be avoided, and individuals who might otherwise have had to leave their employment will be able to sit refresher training and remain in the sector.

TAXIS AND PRIVATE HIRE CARS

149. There are three provisions in relation to taxi and private hire car licensing. The provisions in the Bill are part of a larger body of work which aims to create greater consistency as well as widening and tightening the licensing regime. Specific provisions include:

- The power to refuse to grant private hire car licences on grounds of overprovision;
- The extension of taxi driver testing to include private hire car drivers;
- Removal of the contract exemptions to the licensing and regulation of taxis and private hire cars, bringing hire cars used on contracts into the regime.

150. The anticipated financial impacts on stakeholders are detailed below. As general background, according to the most recently published figures, there are 10,603 taxis and 10,208 private hire cars licensed in Scotland. There are also 24,600 licensed taxi drivers and 11,349 licensed private hire car drivers. Figures are not collected for booking office licences. However, according to an informal request for snapshot figures (completed by 23 out of 32 local authorities), there were 224 booking offices licenced in the period October/November 2013.

REFUSAL TO GRANT PRIVATE HIRE CAR LICENCES ON GROUNDS OF OVERPROVISION

Costs on the Scottish Administration

Scottish Government

151. There will be a nil to minimal additional cost in terms of providing guidance on this provision to local licensing authorities. The Scottish Government already publishes guidance and a more general update of this will be due once the Bill is law.

Costs on local authorities

152. This provision is discretionary and will not result in any automatic costs to local authorities. However, if a local licensing authority introduced an ‘overprovision’ policy in relation to private hire car services, there will be associated costs. As there is no previous experience of this specific power, the Scottish Government has based some costs on an equivalent power available to local licensing authorities to limit numbers of taxi vehicle licences. This power allows a taxi vehicle licence to be refused on the basis that there is no significant demand for taxi services that is unmet. Based on recent research, cited above, approximately 44% of local licensing authorities who responded currently limit taxi vehicle licence numbers. Indicative costs for the provision in relation to private hire car services will include the costs described in paragraphs 153-155 below.

Costs to assess the current provision of private hire car services

153. The legislation does not prescribe a method to assess provision and establish overprovision. The method used for assessing ‘unmet demand’ has largely been settled by practice over the years. Local licensing authorities can contract out these assessments and a figure of £15,000 to £20,000 has been quoted for the cost by the Transport Research Institute at Napier University, Edinburgh. However, authorities can also conduct an assessment using internal resources. There is also no legislative basis for the frequency with which such assessments should take place, but guidance from the Scottish Government in relation to taxis states that ‘licensing authorities should carry out a survey sufficiently frequently to be able to respond to any challenge to the satisfaction of a court’. This follows various cases where a licensing authority has been challenged on the accuracy of its assessment in relation to the application being currently considered. A policy of restriction cannot be inflexible and each application should be assessed on its own merits and in reference to the current context. It is difficult, therefore, to establish exactly how often a licensing authority should conduct an assessment but may be approximately every three years. If a licensing authority chose to carry out an assessment of private hire car services, then the costs would be in the region of £15,000 to £20,000 every three years. These costs would be recovered through licence fees. It would be reasonable to assume that the bulk of licensing authorities will not choose to carry out such an assessment, only carrying one out where they perceive problems arising from the overprovision of private hire car services.

Developing a policy on overprovision

154. Licensing authorities will develop a policy in relation to overprovision which will require input from officials as well as time of elected members considering and agreeing to the policy. There will likely be a need to conduct a public consultation on any proposed policy. The cost of a public consultation could vary significantly depending on the detail it covers and the methodology used. As an indicative figure, a recent Scottish Government policy consultation on a civic licensing regime cost in the region of £10,000.

Defending refusals

155. It is currently the case that where a licensing authority refuses a licence application, this can be challenged by the applicant in court. The cost of defending such a case varies depending on the facts of the case. While the Bill will provide licensing authorities with an additional ground for possibly refusing applications and this may in turn result in more appeals, it is not anticipated that this will be a significant number.

156. Scottish Government would expect any costs on local authorities to be met by the fees recovered from licence holders. Section 12 of the 1982 Act empowers local licensing authorities to charge fees that are sufficient to meet their expenses in carrying out their functions in relation to taxi and private hire car licensing under the 1982 Act. The overall cost impact for local authorities as a result of this proposal should, therefore, be neutral.

157. There would also be potential savings for local licensing authorities in being able to better manage the trade and a reduction in complaints related to issues with an overprovision of private hire car services.

Costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses

158. There will be potential costs on licence holders (both individuals and businesses) if fees are increased as a result of the increased costs on local authorities detailed above. As the new provision will only be applied to new applications, an existing licence holder could not lose a licence on renewal as a result of this provision. However, new licence applicants will lose any money spent on the application if it is refused and they may face additional costs if they chose to challenge this refusal. Costs would include any legal advice obtained and representation if appearing at court.

159. It is assumed that if a licensing authority introduces an overprovision policy, it has recognised that the current market for private hire car services in its area is not functioning effectively. Evidence of over-supply might include private hire cars attempting to work illegally either out of area or by picking up passengers without a pre-booking. In such situations it is likely that a viable, legal livelihood may be difficult to achieve for all private hire service providers and, therefore, a refusal would be in the interests of the applicant as well as others already providing the service. The quality of service for the consumer may also suffer as a result of overprovision. The potential for an increase in illegal activity alongside a drop in quality both have clear public safety risks attached. The Scottish Government believes that, although this measure might restrict new entrants to the private hire car trade, it would ensure that those within the trade can operate a viable business while complying with laid down requirements.
TESTING OF PRIVATE HIRE CAR DRIVERS

Costs on the Scottish Administration

Scottish Government

160. The production of guidance on testing of private hire car drivers would form part of the Scottish Government’s existing work and would, therefore, be met from within existing budgets.

Costs on local authorities

161. This provision is discretionary and there are, therefore, no automatic costs to local authorities. If a local licensing authority decides to introduce testing of private hire car drivers, there could be costs associated with:

- Developing a policy on the testing of private hire car drivers;
- Developing or adapting an appropriate test and any associated training materials;
- Administering tests and associated training.

162. The extent of these costs would depend entirely on the design and detail of testing regime but the licensing authority would be able to recover them from fee income. Section 12 of the 1982 Act empowers local licensing authorities to charge fees that are sufficient to meet their expenses in carrying out their functions in relation to taxi and private hire car licensing under the 1982 Act. Any overall increase in costs for local authorities as a result of this proposal, therefore, should be capable of being recouped through fees.

163. If a local licensing authority decides to require testing of private hire car drivers, the Scottish Government would assume this is as a result of a concern at the level of skills and knowledge of the trade. The costs will, therefore, be offset by an improvement in the service provided to customers and an increase in the professionalism of the trade. Introducing a requirement for testing of private hire car drivers may also be introduced as a first step to tackle concerns with an overprovision of vehicles, prior to the use of the power to limit discussed above. This could therefore save the local licensing authority from the costs associated with that provision. There will also be potential cost savings from a reduction in complaints against the trade that need to be addressed by the local licensing authority. The Scottish Government would only expect a local licensing authority to introduce testing of private hire car drivers where they believed that there was a need or that it would make a positive impact on the trade. It would be possible for licensing authorities to draw upon existing training for taxi drivers, or work jointly with other licensing authorities to reduce the costs of developing new materials.

Costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses

164. There may be a cost attached to taking a test, particularly if an applicant needs to re-take a test. These will vary between local authorities but may be in the region of £50. Any new requirement for testing may also result in existing licence holders having to take time off from work to take the test.

165. Private hire car drivers are often seen as being less professional than their taxi driver counterparts in some areas due to the lack of a testing requirement. Licence holders who are required to undergo any testing may benefit from the improvement in perception of their professionalism.

EXEMPTION FROM REQUIREMENTS OF SECTIONS 10 TO 21 OF 1982 ACT

Costs on the Scottish Administration

Scottish Government

166. The costs associated with updating guidance and potentially making regulations in relation to further exemptions forms part of the Scottish Government’s existing work and will be met within existing budgets.

Costs on local authorities

167. There will be costs for local licensing authorities in terms of preparation for the licensing of a new set of drivers, vehicles and booking offices and then the processing and ongoing administration of the increased number of licences. The current cost of existing taxi and private hire car licenses, which should represent the costs incurred in administering those licences, give an indication of what these costs might be.

168. Section 12 of the 1982 Act empowers local licensing authorities to charge fees that are sufficient to meet their expenses in carrying out their functions in relation to taxi and private hire car licensing under the 1982 Act. Any overall increase in costs for local authorities as a result of this proposal therefore should be minimal.

Costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses

169. There will be costs for the individuals and businesses who currently work under the contract exemption. As this is an area that is currently unlicensed, there are no figures on numbers of operators in Scotland. The potential range of services affected will be wide – from individual operators, e.g. working as part of a council contract to transport school pupils, to large executive hire firms with a fleet of luxury vehicles offering high-end chauffeur services.

170. The cost of driver, vehicle and booking office licences vary according to the local licensing authority. There may also be additional costs for testing vehicles and testing drivers, as well as various fees for approving signage, substituting vehicles, approving wheelchair accessible vehicles etc. In order to give an indicative value of the cost to driver, vehicle and booking offices, examples of the fees associated with the three levels of licence in five licensing authority areas are outlined below:

METAL DEALERS

171. The Bill contains proposals for the reform of licensing arrangements for metal dealers. These proposals are aimed at reducing levels of metal theft by tightening the existing licensing regime for metal dealers that operates under the 1982 Act. The measures include steps to tighten record keeping and customer identification requirements. In addition exemptions are removed that allowed some larger dealers to avoid licensing requirements. A new prohibition is created that would prevent a dealer from paying for metal in cash – thus removing the incentive of ready cash for a potential metal thief.

Costs falling on the Scottish Administration

Scottish Government

172. No costs are anticipated. Once enacted, the costs of administering the licensing regime will fall on local authorities.

Costs on local authorities

173. Paragraph 15 of Schedule 1 to the 1982 Act empowers local authorities to charge reasonable fees - they must seek to ensure that the fees are sufficient to meet their expenses in carrying out their functions under the 1982 Act. The overall impact on local authorities of the proposal in relation to metal dealer licensing therefore should be neutral. Costs are explored further below but, given that the number of metal dealers is not especially large and given that the current fees for a metal dealer’s licence and an exemption warrant are not dissimilar, the impact on licensing authorities should be manageable. The best estimate of the actual costs incurred can be provided by reference to the fees that are charged by licensing authorities for metal dealer and itinerant metal dealer licences. These are detailed in the costs on business section below and range from just over £100 for a three-year licence to as much as £500 a one-year licence.
These documents relate to the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 49) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 14 May 2014

Costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses

174. The cost to the UK economy of metal theft has been estimated in a report commissioned by the ACPO at £220 million to £260 million per annum. Higher figures have been suggested but it is very hard to measure the consequential costs of many of these thefts. The figure of £220 million to £260 million suggests about £100 million of direct costs to conduct repair and replacements and a further £120 million to £160 million of indirect costs through, for example, commuters being delayed and businesses losing internet connections. Specific data for Scotland is more limited, though it is clear that the cost to Scotland amounts to many millions. A more recent study was conducted by the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland and for the first time looked at the situation specifically in Scotland. It estimated the value of metal theft in Scotland at £6.9m for 2011/12 and a further £4.1m for 2012/13. These figures relate purely to the value of the metal stolen and do not look at the indirect costs and collateral damage of these thefts. The measures in the Bill are aimed at bearing down on these costs.

175. There are believed to be 142 metal dealers in Scotland (around 280 licences exist but about 130 of these have ceased trading or are not actively dealing / processing scrap metal despite being in receipt of the relevant licence to do so). The Scottish Government believes around half of these are currently licensed with the remainder exempt from licensing requirements by being in possession of an exemption warrant granted because they are higher turnover businesses. The Bill proposes the abolition of the exemption warrant system so, therefore, around 72 additional businesses will fall into the licensing regime. A further 146 itinerant metal dealers licences are believed to be in existence.

176. The costs to these businesses will vary depending upon the approach taken by the local licensing authority. Dealers would be required to pay a licensing fee (although they will already be paying a fee for an exemption certificate) and to face costs required in order to comply with licensing conditions. The licensing fee is hard to predict since variations in licensing fees and structures from local authority area to local authority area are common. Local licensing authorities operate on a cost recovery basis so that fee income should cover the cost of licensing, without making a profit. Currently the fee for a metal dealers licence for one year in Edinburgh is £504 (the fee for exemption is £1500 for three years). Glasgow City Council charges £124 for one year and £298 for three years (an exemption warrant is £121). Angus Council is £83 for a new application and £69 for renewal. Dumfries and Galloway Council charges £390 for an annual licence and £205 for an annual exemption. North Ayrshire Council’s charge is £105 for a three-year licence. Whilst fees will vary, in most cases the change from paying for an exemption warrant to paying for a full licence will not result in significant extra costs.

177. The costs that may be incurred in complying with licensing conditions could also vary considerably depending upon the nature of the conditions imposed. Conditions that affect hours of operation could potentially have a serious impact. Potentially cost requirements could also include CCTV requirements and improved security. These costs could vary widely depending upon the exact specification. For example CCTV ranges from as little as £200 to several thousand for more extensive and sophisticated systems that may be required for larger premises.

178. Whilst there will be variation due to differences in how licensing is administered locally, many of the costs will be evenly applied due to mandatory requirements being introduced by the Bill. Foremost of these will be the requirement that payment for metal can only be made by prescribed means (these being cheque or bank transfer).

179. With cash no longer being an acceptable form of payment, this will have significant impact on all dealers. England and Wales, amongst several other countries, have already gone ‘cashless’ although it is still too early to consider all the impacts. An informal industry assessment from the British Metals Recycling Association (BMRA) of the impact in England and Wales commented,

“There are many variables at play (e.g. scrap supply/demand, scrap prices, seasonality, merchant geography and outreach, currency fluctuations etc.) that will have an effect on the amount of trade a merchant will have. Therefore it is very difficult to say precisely what changes to a merchant’s business can be attributed to the ban on cash for scrap metal purchases. However, merchants of varying sizes report a loss of around 20% of their previously-cash trade. For small merchants where perhaps 80% of their business was cash-based this equates to 16% of the total (20% of 80%). Larger merchants where fewer cash transactions were made – around 20% - this equates to 4% of the total. Moreover, speaking to the very largest operators, it is apparent that the materials are not coming in to their businesses via alternate routes (e.g. civic amenity contracts etc.) but ‘lost’ in their entirety. However, what cannot be determined is whether this loss of business can be attributed solely to the cash ban or wider market forces (scrap supply has been weak for the past few months despite high prices, tradesmen stockpiling scrap for fewer, larger deliveries etc.). There have been some gains for merchants, particularly from the small factories/engineering works that previously sold materials for cash to the ‘highest bidder’ now moving to reputable dealers for payment using electronic or cheque-based means. Despite these gains, business does appear to be depressed for the majority of merchants.

Overall, we believe there has been a reduction in trade of around 5%. Were this to be replicated in Scotland, total potential business loss could be £25 million (assuming total value of the industry in Scotland is around £470 million).”

180. It is clear that there may be serious impacts, particularly falling on the generally smaller dealers, who are trading to a significant degree in cash currently.

181. Costs associated with removing cash would include start-up costs such as installing card readers and increased banking costs in writing cheques more frequently. A 2012 estimate suggested that two-thirds of industry transactions were already cashless. Within that figure there are wide variations from business to business in what proportion is cashless. As noted in the industry assessment above, some smaller dealers may be conducting 80% of their business in cash.
These documents relate to the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 49) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 14 May 2014

182. It should be noted that, apart from the main focus of these measures which is tackling metal theft, HM Revenue and Customs considers the scrap metal industry to contain an unidentified “tax gap” – driven in large part by the use of cash.

183. Dealers will also be faced with costs in relation to meeting the record keeping and identification of customer requirements that are being proposed in the Bill. Of themselves, the Scottish Government does not believe that the changes being rolled out to all dealers will result in significant costs. Some smaller dealers may be impacted by the costs of, for example, obtaining photocopiers, scanners and computers. Nevertheless these may be regarded as one-off costs. There is concern that the additional measures may result in businesses being adversely affected by the time needed for compliance.

184. In relation to this aspect of the changes, the BMRA said,

“We estimate there to be around 180,000 cash transactions taking place in Scotland per year.

The amount of time each transaction would take to complete with ID checks and enhanced record keeping on the weighbridge would increase by around 10%. Based on an informal survey of salaries, we predict this additional time would add around £1.40 cost per transaction.

In addition, if a cheque is raised there is a cost of, on average, £0.40 per transaction. There is also a material cost to recording and/ or photocopying ID we estimate to be around £0.30.

Therefore, we predict a total additional cost per transaction to be £2.10 or £378,000 for all currently-cash transactions in Scotland.”

185. It should be noted that dealers in precious metals, e.g. cash-for-gold businesses, are also affected by the changes within the Bill. These types of businesses are already within the definition of a metal dealer so to that extent they are no more affected than any other dealer. Given the proposed change to ensure that all dealers are licensed, there may be higher turnover businesses of this type brought within licensing for the first time.

186. Clearly the costs to industry need to be seen in the context of the very substantial costs to society of metal theft.

PUBLIC ENTERTAINMENT VENUES

187. The Bill will abolish ‘theatre licences’ as currently required under the Theatres Act 1968 and instead regulate theatres through the existing public entertainment licensing regime provided for in the 1982 Act.

Costs on the Scottish Administration

Scottish Government

188. No costs are anticipated. Once enacted the costs of administering the licensing regime will fall on local authorities
These documents relate to the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 49) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 14 May 2014

Costs on local authorities

189. Paragraph 15 of Schedule 1 to the 1982 Act empowers local authorities to charge reasonable fees - they must seek to ensure that the fees are sufficient to meet their expenses in carrying out their functions under the 1982 Act. The overall impact on local authorities of the proposal in relation to theatres, therefore, should be neutral. The actual cost of dealing with an application can best be estimated with reference to the fees currently charged. These vary widely depending on the size of the venue (details provided in section on costs on business below).

Costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses

190. There will be some local variation in how the changes to licensing of plays impact upon individual theatre groups. The proposal represents a decrease in regulatory burden overall as it replaces a mandatory regime which required all performances of a play to be licensed with a discretionary regime which would allow a flexible approach to be taken. For example, a licensing authority could determine to exempt all performances of free-to-enter plays or plays with a potential audience of under a specified level. This would allow smaller-scale performances to avoid having to pay licensing fees and also avoid any costs that may be required to ensure compliance with licensing conditions.

191. As there is wide variation in licensing fees from one authority to another, it may be that any theatrical performances that are subject to public entertainment licensing requirements may find themselves subject to fees that differ significantly from those paid in a neighbouring authority (although that is not different to the current situation). It is also possible that the cost of a licence for public entertainment may be less or more than that currently paid.

192. Current theatre licence fees vary widely. For example, Edinburgh City Council already operates a sliding scale depending on the size of capacity with, at the maximum, venues operating commercially with a venue size of over 1000 facing fees of £2,702 for a new application followed by £1,801 for a renewal. A charitable/community organisation pays a fee of £112 a year. Glasgow City Council charges a flat fee of £597. Argyll and Bute Council charges fees of £139.90. In Clackmannanshire the application fee payable is £85, with no fee payable on an application for grant or transfer of an occasional theatre licence if the play(s) to be performed is/ are of an educational or similar character or are to be performed for a charitable or similar purpose. There is, therefore, a wide variety of fee levels and approaches. It would be for licensing authorities to integrate their current fee charging structure into their public entertainment regime.

SEXUAL ENTERTAINMENT VENUES

193. The Bill contains proposals for the establishment of a licensing regime for sexual entertainment venues.
These documents relate to the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 49) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 14 May 2014

Costs on the Scottish Administration

Scottish Government

194. No costs are anticipated. Once enacted, the costs of administering the licensing regime will fall on local authorities.

Costs on local authorities

195. Paragraph 18 of Schedule 2 to the 1982 Act empowers local authorities to charge reasonable fees - they must seek to ensure that the fees are sufficient to meet their expenses in carrying out their functions under Schedule 2 to the 1982 Act. The overall impact on local authorities, therefore, should be neutral. The actual cost to the local authority of dealing with an application can best be estimated with reference to the fees currently charged. These do vary significantly from a few hundred to over a thousand pounds, with one authority charging in excess of £12,000 (details in the cost on businesses section below).

196. A particular issue for local authorities is that there is a risk that a decision to refuse a licence, particularly in the case of an application from an operator already working in the sector, may result in costly legal challenge. This would raise particular issues given the very limited number of premises operating in this area. Were a local authority to set the appropriate number of premises for an area as zero, then there would be no fee income from which to recoup the costs of any legal challenges. The costs of a legal challenge would vary significantly depending upon how far a challenge was taken through the legal process but costs of tens of thousands of pounds could reasonably be expected.

Costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses

197. The proposed regime is discretionary, relying upon a resolution of a local authority for it to have effect in a particular local authority area. That being the case it is hard to estimate with confidence how many premises might be subject to licensing. The Scottish Government would anticipate that those urban authorities that have existing lap dancing bars are likely to contemplate a licensing scheme for their areas. Whilst the licensing requirement is wider than lap dancing it would, therefore, expect that at a minimum around twenty premises would be subject to licensing.

198. The costs to these businesses could vary dramatically depending upon the approach taken by the local licensing authority. At the most extreme possibility, as the Bill includes a power for a local authority to set an appropriate number of premises for its area (and for that number to be zero) then potentially existing premises could be closed. Short of that, venues would be required to pay a licensing fee (in addition to the fee already payable for an alcohol premises licence) and to face costs required in order to comply with licensing conditions. The licensing fee is hard to predict since wide variations in licensing fees from one local authority area to another are common. Local licensing authorities operate on a cost recovery basis so that fee income should cover the cost of licensing without making a profit. The closest current equivalent licence is for sex shops. A one-year sex shop licence is £1,329 in Edinburgh. The fee for the same period in Glasgow is £12,798. In Dundee the equivalent fee is £235. The costs that may be incurred in complying with licensing conditions would also vary considerably depending upon the nature of the conditions imposed. Conditions that affect hours of operation could potentially have a serious impact. Potentially costs requirements could also include required CCTV, door security and improved facilities for workers such as changing and rest areas. These costs could vary widely depending upon the exact detail and specification. For example CCTV ranges from as little as £200 to several thousand for larger more sophisticated systems.

199. Changes to working conditions enforced through licensing are likely to be beneficial to dancers who are currently regarded as self-employed contractors and do not benefit from employment protections. Clearly, if the licensing scheme results in the closure of premises then the resultant loss of employment would be severe for the individuals involved.

200. There may be some economic impact as a result of fewer premises operating although this may be mitigated by the possibility of premises converting to other uses within the night-time economy.

MISCELLANEOUS AND GENERAL

201. There are five provisions, namely:

- Where it has not already been provided for, the deemed grant of a licence where the local authority has failed to determine an application within the required period or the extended period granted by a sheriff;
- Allow a licensing authority to determine to receive electronic communications for a variety of matters.
- Powers in relation to licence conditions in Part 3 of the 1982 Act to clarify that mandatory and standard licence conditions can be set by the Scottish Ministers and local licensing authorities respectively in relation to licences under this part of the Act;
- Power for the Scottish Ministers to make provision for the procedure to be followed at or in connection with hearings;
- Introduce a new role, civic licensing standards officers (CLSOs);

202. The Scottish Government believes that additional costs in relation to the first three provisions will be nil or minimal. Commentary is provided below on the last two provisions.

Procedure for hearings

Costs on the Scottish Administration

Scottish Government
203. Were the Scottish Government to decide to use this power, the costs associated with updating guidance and preparing regulations would form part of the Scottish Government’s existing work and would be met within existing budgets.

Police Service of Scotland
204. There may also be costs for Police Scotland if regulations instigate any changes to its procedures. The extent of these would depend on the detail of the regulations. A key aim of any new requirements on the system would be to bring a consistent approach across Scotland, potentially leading to a simplification of police involvement in hearing processes and, therefore, savings to Police Scotland.
These documents relate to the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 49) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 14 May 2014

Costs on local authorities

205. Any changes to local practice that result from new regulations will incur costs in relation to changes to policies and updating processes. The extent of these will depend on the detail of the regulations. These costs can be met from fee income. There is a possibility that, after initial costs to change processes, over time processes become more efficient as a result of regulations brought in. There is, therefore, a potential for longer-term savings.

206. Paragraph 15 of Schedule 1 and paragraph 18 of Schedule 2 to the 1982 Act empowers local authorities to charge reasonable fees – they must seek to ensure that the fees are sufficient to meet their expenses in carrying out their functions under the 1982 Act. Any overall increase in costs for local authorities as a result of this proposal, therefore, should be minimal as it can be recouped from fee income.

Costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses

207. Any changes to local licensing authority costs as a result of changes brought in will affect fees paid by applicants and licence holders. This will depend on the detail of the regulations and could vary between local licensing authorities. However, there are consistent calls from legal agents and trade representatives for more consistency and greater standardisation of local authority procedures. The Scottish Government, therefore, believes that ultimately this provision will lead to savings for legal agents and the trade as it becomes more straightforward to operate across different licensing authority areas.

Civic licensing standards officers

Costs on the Scottish Administration

Scottish Government

208. Costs associated with updating guidance will form part of the Scottish Government’s existing work and will be met within existing budgets. The provisions do not include powers for the Scottish Ministers to set any requirements for training or to make any further regulations in relation to CLSOs. The Scottish Government does not, therefore, anticipate any ongoing costs for the Scottish Administration in relation to CLSOs.

Costs on local authorities

209. Costs in relation to meeting this requirement will depend on the current provision of this kind of support within the local authority.

210. While the Bill introduces a statutory requirement for a local authority or licensing authority to appoint CLSOs, some local authorities will already have officers employed in similar roles. Their costs will therefore relate to amending job descriptions and providing appropriate training for any additional duties and functions. It is anticipated that this cost is likely to be minimal.

211. Where there is a requirement to recruit new officers, additional costs will be incurred for advertising the post and the total pay package. A similar role was brought in for alcohol licensing under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005, the licensing standards officer. Current job advertisements for this type of role offer a salary of £30,000-£35,000 per annum.
212. While some local licensing authorities and COSLA have expressed concern at the possible impact on resourcing, the Bill is sufficiently flexible to allow a local authority to meet the requirement in a manner that best meets its needs and circumstances. In general, local licensing authorities have been supportive of the creation of such a role.

213. Paragraph 15 of Schedule 1 and paragraph 18 of Schedule 2 to the 1982 empowers local authorities to charge reasonable fees – they must seek to ensure that the fees are sufficient to meet their expenses in carrying out their licensing functions under the 1982 Act. Any overall increase in costs for local authorities should, therefore, be minimal as they can be recouped from fee income.

Costs on other bodies, individuals and businesses

214. Any changes to local licensing authority costs as a result of changes brought in will affect fees paid by applicants and licence holders. This will vary between local licensing authorities and could lead to an increase in fees. There should, however, be a benefit to applicants and licence holders in receiving a consistent level of support and scrutiny under the local licensing regime.

Offence of supplying alcohol to a child or young person in a public place – In common with similar offences under the 2005 Act, the Scottish Government would expect Police Scotland to use it to encourage compliance, with only a relatively small number of prosecutions being taken where necessary to protect public safety. Actual costs would depend on the approach taken by Police Scotland. On the basis of the number of prosecutions under section 105 of the 2005 Act in 2012/13, a possible indicative cost of about £21,950 per annum can be derived.

Scottish Court Service / Scottish Prison Service

A variety of costs have been identified over the first five years. These are broken down as follows:

- For solemn cases, £176,000;
- For summary cases, £523,000;
- For Scottish Prison Service £240,000.

Local authorities

No additional costs identified.

Licensing objectives and statements of licensing policy – reducing the frequency of Boards reviewing their Licensing Policy Statement, could potentially result in a 40% saving from existing costs. It will be for individual Boards to determine whether to review their licensing policy statement more often than every five years.

Greater powers for Licensing Boards and Police – it is difficult to estimate any additional costs for Boards because it largely depends on the manner in which they deploy these powers within the exercise of their existing functions. It is anticipated that any additional cost is likely to be minimal. A more detailed consideration of individual licence and applications will improve the existing licensing regime and improve compliance over the long term.

Relevant offences and foreign offences- removal of automatic requirement for a hearing – Removing the requirement will lead to ongoing savings to Boards.
Duty of Licensing Boards to produce annual financial reports – Boards already base their fees on cost recovery so publishing these calculations should not require significant additional resource. It is anticipated that any additional costs arising from this should be minimal.

Refusal to grant private hire car licences on grounds of overprovision – no automatic costs, but where used, an assessment is likely to cost in the region of £15,000 to £20,000 each three years. There would also be costs in developing and considering a policy and defending decisions. Costs could be recovered through fees.

Testing of private hire car drivers – the Scottish Government would only expect a local licensing authority to introduce testing of private hire car drivers where they believed that there was a need or that it would make a positive impact on the trade. It would be possible for licensing authorities to draw upon existing training for taxi drivers, or work jointly with other licensing authorities to save on the costs of developing new materials.

Exemption from requirements of section 10 to 21 – the costs of processing additional applications would be recouped from the fees.

The actual cost to the local authority of dealing with an application can best be estimated with reference to the fees currently charged. These do vary significantly from a few hundred to over a thousand pounds, with one authority charging in excess of £12,000. There may be costs if it is decided to refuse a licence, and this is appealed, particularly if the limit is set at zero and there is no fee income. The costs of a legal challenge would vary significantly depending upon how far a challenge was taken through the legal process but costs of tens of thousands of pounds could reasonably be expected.</td>

SCOTTISH GOVERNMENT STATEMENT ON LEGISLATIVE COMPETENCE

On 14 May 2014, the Cabinet Secretary for Justice (Kenny MacAskill MSP) made the following statement:

“In my view, the provisions of the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill would be within the legislative competence of the Scottish Parliament.”

PRESIDING OFFICER’S STATEMENT ON LEGISLATIVE COMPETENCE

On 14 May 2014, the Presiding Officer (Rt Hon Tricia Marwick MSP) made the following statement:

AIR WEAPONS AND LICENSING (SCOTLAND) BILL

POLICY MEMORANDUM

INTRODUCTION

1. This document relates to the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 14 May 2014. It has been prepared by the Scottish Government to satisfy Rule 9.3.3 of the Parliament’s Standing Orders. The contents are entirely the responsibility of the Scottish Government and have not been endorsed by the Parliament. Explanatory Notes and other accompanying documents are published separately as SP Bill 49–EN.

POLICY OBJECTIVES OF THE BILL

2. The principal policy objectives of this Bill are to strengthen and improve aspects of locally led alcohol and civic government licensing in order to preserve public order and safety, reduce crime, and to advance public health. This is being achieved through reforms to the existing systems to alcohol licensing, taxi and private hire car licensing, metal dealer licensing and; giving local communities a new power to regulate sexual entertainment venues in their areas. The Bill will also protect public safety by creating a new licensing regime for air weapons.

3. A number of the provisions will also improve the efficiency of the operation of the licensing regimes contributing to the creation of a better regulatory environment for business.

4. The Bill contributes to the Scottish Government’s purpose of focussing public services on creating a more successful country with opportunities for all to flourish.

5. The key national outcome which the Bill will support is that we live our lives safe from crime, disorder and danger. It will also support our living longer, healthier lives; our public services being high quality, continually improving, efficient and responsive to local people’s needs, and our living in a Scotland that is the most attractive place for doing business in Europe.

6. The key justice outcomes that the Bill will contribute to are: that we are at a low risk of unintentional harm; that we experience low levels of fear, alarm and distress; that we experience low levels of crime, and; that our institutions and processes are effective and efficient.

Air weapons

7. The Bill creates a licensing regime for air weapons. The Scotland Act 2012 gave the Scottish Government the powers to introduce a licensing system for air weapons in Scotland. The regime provided for in this Bill recognises the need to protect and reassure the public in a way which is proportionate and practicable. The Bill will help ensure that only people with a legitimate reason for possessing and using an air weapon will have access to them in future, as well as taking air weapons out of the hands of those who would use them illegally. Air weapons licensing will be administered by the Police Service of Scotland.

Alcohol licensing

8. The Bill improves the effectiveness of the alcohol licensing regime laid out in the 2005 Act ("the 2005 Act"). It makes it an offence to supply alcohol to people aged under 18 for consumption in a public place as well as taking forward a range of technical recommendations to clarify and improve the operation of the current alcohol licensing legislation to ensure effective regulatory processes and to reduce unnecessary burdens on business.

Civic licensing

9. The Bill improves the effectiveness of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 ("the 1982 Act") licensing regimes with a variety of reforms. The Bill will include provisions to extend the reach of taxi and private hire car licensing to protect the public and legitimate trade; the tightening of the licensing of metal dealers to ensure more effective regulation of the industry and to make it more difficult for metal thieves to dispose of stolen metal; as well as a range of cross-cutting additional amendments to improve the various civic licensing regimes and ensure effective regulatory burdens and reduce unnecessary burdens on business.

10. The Bill also creates a new licensing scheme for sexual entertainment venues. The Scottish Government considers it appropriate that sexual entertainment venues should be licensed in order that the risk of adverse impacts on neighbours, general disorder and criminality is reduced and both performers and customers can benefit from a safe, regulated environment. Central to this proposal is the belief that local communities should be able to exercise appropriate control and regulate sexual entertainment venues that operate within their areas. Local licensing authorities are best placed to reflect the views of the communities they serve and determine whether sexual entertainment establishments should be authorised and under what conditions. The Scottish Government believes that communities should be able to limit the number of these licences in their area.

BACKGROUND

11. The purpose of licensing is to limit or control activities which, while legitimate and permitted, are considered to have the potential to be harmful or disruptive. Licensing protects the public interest, for example in supporting public safety, as with air weapons and taxi and private hire car licensing, supporting public order and public health, as with alcohol licensing, or reducing the risk of criminality infiltrating legitimate commercial activity, as with scrap metal dealer licensing.

12. The Scottish Government believes that it is important that people have a say in the decisions that impact on the safety, health and amenity of their local communities. The existing licensing regimes set out in the 2005 Act and the 1982 Act, where local authority councillors are directly responsible for making key decisions in relation to licensing works well. Provisions of this Bill in respect of alcohol and civic licensing are designed to be complementary to this overall approach. The Scottish Government does, however, also recognise the value of consistency across licensing regimes for both businesses and the broader public. Specific provisions in this Bill as well as existing licensing legislation and the provisions of the Regulatory Reform (Scotland) Act 2013 are aimed at promoting regulatory consistency where this is practical and appropriate.

13. The Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill draws upon a wide range of engagement and consultation exercises across the various existing licensing regimes. While, the Scottish Government believes that the existing legislation, the 2005 Act and the 1982 Act, continue to serve the people of Scotland well, those involved in licensing, such as councillors, trade, police and lawyers, have made a range of suggestions in relation to extant licensing regimes. This Bill therefore amends the existing legislation to take forward those which were considered to be most effective and practical.

14. It is in keeping with the Scottish Government’s objective of a Scotland that is the most attractive place for doing business in Europe that the Scottish Government ensures that the regimes avoid imposing undue financial or administrative burdens on business. There are a wide variety of provisions that seek to deliver this aim. In relation to alcohol licensing, undue delay will be avoided because licences will be granted automatically after a period of nine months; local authorities will be obliged to publish financial accounts in relation to their licensing activities which inform the licensing fees charged to businesses; national businesses will no longer be compelled to attend hearings in every Board area if a connected person is convicted of a relevant offence; and they will have to engage less frequently if policy statements are updated less frequently. In relation to scrap metal dealers the Bill will remove the mandatory 48 hour restriction on the processing of scrap.

15. The Bill also creates two new licensing regimes.

16. Proposals for a separate licensing regime for sexual entertainment venues were first brought to the Scottish Parliament in 2010 as a Stage 2 amendment to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. A key argument for rejecting these proposals was that the sexual entertainment activities were already regulated under the alcohol premises licences. Since then, the regulatory context has changed with recent court judgements calling into question the ability of Licensing Boards to set conditions that stray from a tight focus on the sale of alcohol. This has created some uncertainty as to the continued regulation of sexual entertainment, with many Licensing Boards believing that the alcohol licensing system is not, as currently constructed, able to provide adequate regulation. The view of the Scottish Government is that a specific licensing regime for sexual entertainment venues is the best solution to provide clarity for future regulation of the industry. It offers local licensing authorities the ability to consider local circumstances and develop approaches appropriate to those circumstances.

17. The Scottish Government has a long standing commitment to modernise the law around air weapons, to better protect Scotland’s communities. Powers to regulate air weapons were transferred to the Scottish Parliament by the Scotland Act 2012, on 3 July 2012. The Scottish Government has developed a regime for air weapons which is related to the existing licensing regime in relation to firearms administered by the police. The licensing regime for air weapons will likewise be administered by the Police Service of Scotland. It has been developed by working closely with the police and the Scottish Government consider the regime will protect and reassure the public while being proportionate and practicable.

CONSULTATION

18. The content of the Bill is predicated on the results of five separate public consultations conducted between November 2012 and September 2013:

Air weapons

19. In preparation for the powers to regulate air weapons being transferred to the Scottish Parliament the Cabinet Secretary for Justice established, in November 2011, the Scottish Firearms Consultative Panel (SFCP) which met four times to consider how best to develop a scheme to license air weapons. Membership of the Panel consisted of the police, the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service, the British Association for Shooting and Conservation, the Scottish Target Shooting Federation, the Gun Trade Association, the British Shooting Sports Council, the Scottish Air Rifle and Pistol Association, the Gun Control Network, the Scottish Community Safety Network, the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities and the Scottish Government.

20. Following the work of the SFCP a public consultation ran from 14 December 2012 to 15 March 2013 on methods by which air weapons licensing could operate. 1,101 responses were received and all non-confidential responses were published on the Scottish Government website on 3 May 2013, followed by an independent report analysing these responses on 19 July 2013. The consultation paper itself, along with the responses and an independent analysis of them can be found at the following link:
http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Topics/Justice/crimes/Firearms/governmentaction/airweaponlicensing

21. While generating considerable opposition to the general principle of regulating air weapons the consultation was a valuable exercise in highlighting many practical issues and drawing out concerns around the high-level proposals set out in the consultation paper. While the Scottish Government was clear that the consultation was not designed to discuss the overall, and clearly stated principle of introducing licensing for air weapons, it has taken account of all the views submitted in developing the Bill provisions. In particular, the Scottish Government welcomed and has built on many of the constructive comments received.

22. The Scottish Government consulted on Further Options for Alcohol Licensing between 19 December 2012 and 21 March 2013, with the summary of responses being published on 11 October 2013 http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/12/8130. The consultation asked for views on twenty one different proposals, largely raised by stakeholders, and attracted over one hundred responses. On the basis of these responses officials have taken forward a variety of proposals balancing the different stakeholder interests and aims of the licensing regime: that it is clear and operates effectively; that it protects public health and that it prevents crime and disorder.
23. In addition to the proposals consulted on there was also significant support for removing the automatic requirement for a hearing where notified of a relevant or foreign offence. The Scottish Government has responded to these views by focusing on addressing existing concerns within the licensing regime and removing the automatic requirement for a hearing where notified of a relevant or foreign offence.

24. The responses made clear that people do not want to see a root and branch review of licensing legislation. The 2005 Act only came into force 4 years ago and the regime is still settling in. Many aspects of it are working well\(^1\). However, there are areas that are not working as effectively as they should be. Therefore, rather than proposing radical overhauls of the regime, the Scottish Government has looked at these areas to find ways to improve the existing system.

25. There has been a long history of attempts to improve regulation in this area. In 2005, the then Scottish Executive set up a Working Group on Adult Entertainment to review the scope and impact of adult entertainment activity and make recommendations to Ministers on the way forward. This followed concerns expressed about the lack of controls on adult entertainment activity. The Group made a number of recommendations aimed at improving standards in the industry, ensuring the safety of performers and customers, regulating the impact on the community.

26. A consultation on legislative proposals was conducted between April and September 2013 http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2013/06/3607. The consultation attracted a significant response, albeit 90% of the responders were near identical returns sent as part of an organised campaign of opposition to a licensing scheme. Whilst these responders did not identify the nature of their interests in sexual entertainment it can be inferred that it is likely that they either work in the industry or are customers.

27. Amongst the other responders (local authorities, Police Service of Scotland and violence against women and gender groups principally) there was wide support for the principle of a new licensing regime. Some concern was raised by some arts organisations about possible inadvertent impact on their activities.

Metal dealers

28. An initial consultation on a limited proposal to increase the number of metal dealers falling into the licensing regime was conducted between November 2011 and February 2012 http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2013/04/5185. This consultation concluded that a wider package of proposals was required. A further consultation was conducted between April and July 2013 and included many of the proposals that are now being taken forward within the Bill.

\(^1\) Monitoring and Evaluating Scotland’s Alcohol Strategy Third Annual Report
29. The consultation showed widespread support for a toughening of the licensing regime for metal dealers. This support derived from local authority regulators, the police and many of the organisations and businesses that find themselves regular victims of metal theft.

30. Dealers were for the most part accepting of the need for more effective regulation but were keen to ensure that their businesses were not damaged by excessive or inappropriate requirements.

31. Since the end of 2011, officials have been reviewing information produced on the taxi and private hire car licensing regime to date and have had fresh discussions with stakeholders, including a public consultation which ran from 28 November 2012 to 15 March 2013 http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/11/2484. Sixty eight responses were received during the public consultation from a wide variety of interests including: trade, local licensing authorities, police, passenger groups, disability organisations, the Law Society of Scotland, the Information Commissioner’s Office and the Office of Fair Trading. In addition, officials attended a number of meetings to discuss the consultation. Representatives at these meetings included, passenger groups (primarily focussed on passengers with disabilities) local authority officials with responsibility for licensing, police and trade (taxi, private hire and contract hire).

32. Proposals on extending testing to private hire car drivers gathered the most wide-spread support. The removal of the contract exemption was largely welcomed by the currently licensed trade, most local authorities and police. However, those working under the current contract exemption were concerned about the detail of how local licensing regimes would develop. The Scottish Government intends to delay commencement to prepare for a smooth transition for all those involved. Views on the introduction of a power to refuse private hire car licences on the basis of overprovision received a mixed response. In general, local licensing authorities which currently restrict taxi licenses were largely in favour while those who do not, were not in favour. However, the Bill will introduce a power for local licensing authorities to refuse an application, it will not require them to do so.

33. Discussions have taken place over a number of years with stakeholders regarding the implications for licensing of the European Services Directive. This Directive is transposed into UK legislation by the Provisions of Services Regulations 2009 and places requirements on how licensing schemes in the internal market should operate. These discussions with stakeholders have led these proposals which ensure compliance with the Directive and address matters such as electronic communications and the tacit authorisation of licences that are not dealt with promptly.

34. Discussions have been held with representatives of the arts groups most impacted by changes to theatre licensing regimes. The Scottish Government expects them to be generally welcoming of efforts to reduce disproportionate oversight.
35. Questions on the creation of the Civic Licensing Standards Officer (CLSO) role and the power to make regulations on hearings were included within the consultation on taxi and private hire car licensing. The CLSO proposal received support from a number of local authorities largely on the basis of the perceived success of the Licensing Standards Officer (LSO) model under alcohol licensing. Some concerns were raised in relation to resource and flexibility. The Scottish Government has taken account of these concerns in the drafting and provided local authorities with a great deal of discretion in how they meet the new requirement. The order making power to enable the Scottish Ministers to make regulations on the conduct of hearings under the 1982 Act was largely welcomed. It was felt this could bring advantages in terms of consistency in approach across licensing regimes and across licensing authorities.

Effects on equal opportunities, human rights, island communities, local government, sustainable development etc.

36. Information on these issues is provided in relation to each Part of the Bill. The Bill as a whole is expected to have a positive effect on the wellbeing of communities generally, including island communities. Its provisions do not have any adverse effect on human rights or sustainable development. Where the Scottish Government believes that a particular group will not be significantly affected, they have not been referred to in these sections.

BILL CONTENT

37. The Bill is structured in the following Parts:

Air weapons

38. Part 1 – sets out a new licensing system for air weapons administered by the Police Service of Scotland. This will better protect our communities by ensuring that only those people who have a legitimate reason for owning and using air weapons should have access to them and that those persons are properly licensed. Specific provisions include:

- meaning of air weapon;
- air weapon certificates;
- permits;
- approved air weapon clubs and recreational shooting facilities;
- commercial matters;
- enforcement;
- keeping air weapons secure;
- false statements;
- time limits for offences;
- appeals;
- fees;
- regulations;
This document relates to the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 49) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 14 May 2014

- arrangements for existing certificate holders;
- guidance;
- exemptions.

Alcohol licensing

39. Part 2 – amends the system of alcohol licensing by:

- The creation of a new offence of supplying alcohol to children or young people for consumption in a public place. This fulfils a manifesto commitment;
- Amendment of the licensing objective in relation to children to also include young persons;
- Amendment of the duration of a licensing policy statement to better align with the term of Licensing Boards;
- Inserting a fit and proper person test in relation to the issue or continued holding of a premises or a personal licence;
- Removal of the automatic requirement for a hearing where a Licensing Board is notified of a relevant or foreign offence in relation to a premises or personal licence;
- Amendment of the definition of relevant offences and foreign offences to no longer disregard a matter that is spent for the purposes of the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974;
- Inclusion of the flavouring angostura bitters in the definition of alcohol for the purposes of the Act;
- Clarification that for an overprovision assessment, the whole Board area may be considered as an area of overprovision, and allow Boards to take account of licensed hours, among other things;
- Imposition of a duty on Boards to prepare an annual financial report;
- Removal of the requirement for a premises licence holder to notify a change in interested parties and removal a premises manager from the definition of interested party;
- Removal of the five year restriction on re-applying for a licence revoked on grounds of failing to undertake refresher training and other changes to the personal licence holder requirements;
- Introduction of a requirement for a Licensing Board to issue an acknowledgement, unless it would be impractical;
- Provision for the automatic grant of a licence (or its variation) where a Licensing Board has not either decided on an application or sought an extension from the sheriff within a set period. This clarifies compliance with the EU Services Directive.

40. Part 3 - amends areas of the civic licensing regimes:
Sexual entertainment venues

- Creating a new licensing regime for sexual entertainment venues. Provisions will include:
  - The definition of sexual entertainment venues;
  - The power for local authorities to license sexual entertainment venues according to the existing structure set out in Schedule 2 to the 1982 Act;
  - The power for local authorities to determine the number of sexual entertainment venues in their area.

Metal dealers

- Metal Dealer provisions will strengthen the existing licensing regime. Specific provision will be made to:
  - Remove the exemption warrants system that allowed a metal dealer with a larger turnover to be exempt from the licensing and regulation of metal dealers;
  - Limit payment for metal by metal dealers or itinerant metal dealers to prescribed methods i.e. bank transfer or cheque. By removing the option of paying in cash it will be ensured that a metal thief is not attracted by the possibility of being paid in an anonymous fashion. Instead, transactions will be traceable and auditable;
  - Improve standards for identification of customers;
  - Improve standards of record keeping;
  - Remove mandatory requirement that metal dealers should not process metal for 48 hours after receiving it. It is felt that this step is impractical for many dealers and should not be a compulsory requirement (though local licensing could impose it case by case).

Taxis and private hire cars

- The provisions in the Bill are part of a larger body of work which aims to create greater consistency as well as widening and tightening the licensing regime. Specific provisions include:
  - The power to refuse to grant private hire car licences on grounds of overprovision;
  - The extension of taxi driver testing to include private hire car drivers;
  - Removal of the contract exemptions to the licensing and regulation of taxis and private hire cars, bringing hire cars used on contracts into the regime.

Public entertainment venues

- The Bill will abolish ‘theatre licences’ as currently required under the Theatres Act 1968 and instead regulate theatres through the existing public entertainment licencing regime provided for in the 1982 Act.
Miscellaneous and general

- The Bill will also include a number of provisions aimed at improving the operation of all civic government licensing regimes and clarifying compliance with the EU Services Directive. Specific provisions include:
  - Power for the Scottish Ministers to make provision for the procedure to be followed at or in connection with hearings;
  - Introduce a new role, Civic Licensing Standards Officer, with broadly the same powers and duties as an ‘authorised officer’ within the 1982 Act but with specific functions in relation to providing information and guidance, checking compliance, providing mediation and taking appropriate action on perceived breaches of conditions to a licence provided under the 1982 Act;
  - Where it has not already been provided for, the deemed grant of a licence where the Local Authority has not either decided on an application or sought an extension from the sheriff within a set period. As with the similar provision in relation to alcohol, this provides clear compliance with the EU Services Directive.

41. Part 4 – makes supplementary and final provisions.

PART 1 – AIR WEAPONS

Overview

42. The Scottish Government has long campaigned for the UK Government to review all firearms legislation, or to devolve responsibility for firearms legislation to the Scottish Parliament so that Scottish needs can be at the forefront of a distinct Scottish approach to regulating firearms within our communities. In particular, Ministers are committed to introducing a robust system of air weapon licensing. This will better protect our communities by taking these potentially lethal weapons out of the hands of those who would misuse them. Following a recommendation by the Calman Commission in 2009, these powers on air weapons were transferred via the Scotland Act 2012.

43. The history and complexity of existing firearms legislation, and the fact that there are numerous anomalies in the current law – for example, differences between licensing requirements for firearms and shotguns – leads to some complex issues for air weapons. The Scottish Government has sought to set out a licensing regime which is appropriate, recognisable and practicable both for the police, who will be the licensing authority, and for those in the legitimate shooting community.

Background

44. There are estimated to be approximately 500,000 air weapons currently in circulation in Scotland. This number was arrived at with the aid of the Gun Trade Association and other stakeholders, and was approved in discussion with the SFCP.
45. Recorded offences involving firearms in Scotland fell by 32 per cent, from 535 in 2011/12 to 365 in 2012/13. This represents the lowest total recorded in Scotland since comparable records began in 1980. Air weapons offences also fell in the same period, although at 47 per cent they accounted for almost half of all incidents in 2012/13, a rise of 10 per cent on the previous year’s figure.

Policy Proposals

46. The overarching policy objective of this part of the Bill is not to ban air weapons, but to ensure that only those people who have a legitimate reason for owning and using an air weapon should have access to them and that such persons are properly licensed. The principles underpinning the system are:

- Clearly define the air weapons to be subject to licensing;
- Broadly follow the principles and practices of existing firearms legislation;
- Set out the main principles of the Scottish regime in primary legislation, with detailed provisions – for example, on fees, procedures, forms, conditions, etc. – being provided for in future secondary legislation supported by detailed guidance;
- Enable a fit person to obtain a licence to own, possess and shoot an air weapon in a regulated way, without compromising public safety;
- Prevent those persons who are unfit, or who have no legitimate reason for holding an air weapon from obtaining a licence;
- Have as its objective the removal of unwanted, unused or forgotten air weapons from circulation;
- Ensure appropriate enforcement of the new regime with suitable offences and penalties available within our justice system to deal with any person who contravenes the new regime.

Defining air weapons and what is covered

47. Section 1 of Part 1 of the Bill provides a clear statement of the types of air weapon which will be covered by the licensing regime, by defining the lower and upper power limits of the weapons themselves. The regime applies to all air weapons which, when fired, are capable of developing a muzzle energy between 1 joule (0.737 ft.lbs.) and 6 ft.lbs for air pistols or 12 ft.lbs for other air guns. Weapons below the 1 joule limit are not generally considered to be lethal (the Home Office Firearms Consultative Committee agreed in 2002 that 1 joule was the minimum threshold at which a firearm could be considered lethal – http://www.official-documents.gov.uk/document/hc0102/hc05/0501/0501.pdf), while the upper levels are set by the Firearms Act 1968, which remains reserved to Westminster. Air weapons above the upper energy level, those disguised as other objects such as a walking stick, are designated under existing Rules as “specially dangerous” and their regulation remains reserved to the UK Parliament. By linking the definition in the Bill to the 1968 Act the Scottish Government ensures that, should the UK Government ever change the upper power levels, no gap opens up between the licensing regimes of the Bill and the Firearms Act 1968 to allow a person to have an air weapon without a licence of some sort.
The requirement for an air weapon certificate

48. The fundamental requirement of the Bill is set out in section 2 and will require a person over 14 years of age to apply for and obtain a licence should they wish to possess, purchase or acquire and/or to use an air weapon in Scotland. A person under 14 years of age may shoot air weapons in suitable circumstances if appropriately supervised, but they may not hold a certificate in their own right. A person will commit an offence if they do not have a certificate and are not subject to an exemption, as set out in the schedule to the Bill. The Bill will impose the licensing requirement on the individual or person involved, with appropriate background checks being made, rather than seek to license individual weapons. Air weapons are not generally identified individually, for example by serial number or other mark, and it would therefore be impracticable to control their movements under a licensing scheme.

49. The offence of using, possessing, purchasing or acquiring a weapon without a certificate is not expected to be commenced until some time after the licensing provisions of Part 1, to allow for a hand-in period. During that period unwanted weapons can be handed in to the police, or otherwise disposed of, for example by sale (since such weapons will remain able to be sold within and outside the UK and therefore will continue to have market value). The interim period between commencement of the licensing provisions and the offence will be used to ensure as many people as possible are aware of and have the opportunity to comply with the new regime in relation to air weapons.

Certificates for people aged 14 to 17

50. A lower age limit of 14 was selected because it is broadly consistent with existing firearms legislation. This is the minimum age, for example, where a young person can shoot an air weapon on private land unsupervised under existing UK legislation (section 23 of the Firearms Act 1968). It is also the minimum age for the grant of a section 1 firearms certificate. The Scottish Government therefore consider this is a suitable age to obtain a certificate.

51. There is currently no minimum age for the grant of a shotgun certificate, although you must be aged 18 or over to purchase a shotgun and anyone aged 14 or younger must be supervised by someone aged 21 or over to be in possession of an assembled shotgun in a public place. The Scottish Government believes that the lack of a minimum age limit for shotgun certificates is an anachronism of the existing UK firearms legislation which should not be replicated in the air weapon licensing regime.

52. More generally, the Scottish Government is committed to ensuring that the use of air weapons by young people is properly and closely regulated. Consistently, more than 45% of recorded crimes and offences involving air weapons are committed by persons aged 20 and under. Similarly, over 50% of those victims injured in offences in which a firearm was alleged to have been fired were aged 20 or under in each of the past three years. (Source: Recorded Crimes and Offences Involving Firearms, Scotland, 2012-13).

53. Specific provisions are made in the Bill, therefore, which set particular requirements and conditions around the types of shooting which may be undertaken by certificate holders of 14 to 17 years of age. Section 7, for example, requires that any application by a young person must be counter-signed by a parent or guardian, and that the certificate should specify the type(s) of shooting which that person may undertake. These include target shooting on suitable private land or at an approved club, pest control or the protection of crops or livestock, and for participation in events and competitions. In line with existing legislation on firearms, the Scottish Government believes that the purchase and ownership of air weapons should continue to be restricted to those aged 18 and over.

54. The Scottish Government believes that these requirements and conditions strike a suitable balance between the need to control shooting by young people, and recognising the traditions of shooting and the need to allow young people to shoot in the right circumstances. Consequently, these requirements are mirrored in other provisions of the Bill which relate to young people including, for example, provisions around the need for visitors to Scotland to hold a temporary permit.

Applying for and granting a certificate

55. The Bill makes provision, at sections 3 to 5 and elsewhere, for the processes involved in applying for an air weapon certificate, and for verifying and granting or refusing such a certificate. In line with the existing firearms licensing regime, the licensing functions for air weapons will be carried out by the Police Service of Scotland. As with other firearms and shotguns, the Chief Constable will keep a register of all applicants, in order to maintain a long term record of applications made and of any information relevant to the grant or refusal of the application. This will allow the Police Service of Scotland to ensure that decisions are taken on the best available information, to maintain consistency and protect public safety. Detailed provisions around these processes will be subject to further discussions with stakeholders, including the Police Service of Scotland, and will be set out in secondary legislation. The Scottish Government’s aim is to mirror, where appropriate, existing procedures, records and forms used under the Firearms Act 1968. This allows for a familiar system for both the police and for existing certificate holders, minimising the impact of the new regime.

56. The tests for grant or renewal of an air weapon certificate are broadly in line with those for more powerful weapons under section 1 of the Firearms Act 1968: it may be granted where the Chief Constable is satisfied that the applicant is fit to be entrusted with an air weapon, is not prohibited from possessing an air weapon, has a good reason for having it his possession, or for using, purchasing or acquiring an air weapon, and can be permitted to have an air weapon in his possession without danger to public safety or the peace. The Scottish Government believe that these are the appropriate checks for requests to obtain an air weapon licence.

57. To avoid unnecessary duplication of effort, the police may accept that the first two of these criteria have been met if the applicant is already in possession of a firearm and/or shotgun certificate. This should help alleviate the amount of work done by the police on checks which have already been undertaken, and reduces the costs of the application or renewal process both to the police and to the applicant.

58. The Chief Constable is not required to grant a certificate even if all criteria are met, but the tests are sufficiently stringent that the Scottish Government would expect the Chief Constable would exercise discretion to grant/renew if the criteria are met. Refusals can be appealed to the Sheriff.
59. Certificates will, unless revoked or cancelled, normally last for a period of 5 years. Applicants who also hold a firearms or shotgun certificate may, however, apply for a co-terminous air weapons certificate, allowing for greater convenience to themselves, and allowing the police to conduct all processes at the same time. Fees for a co-terminous application would therefore be reduced. Special provision is made for young people whose certificate will, by definition, be of shorter duration (a maximum of 4 years) as it will only apply between 14 and 17 inclusive. It will therefore expire on the attainment of 18 years of age. The holder will then be eligible to apply for a full certificate.

60. As part of the process of determining an application, the police will be able to visit an applicant’s home or other places where the weapons may be used or stored. This will ensure that any concerns the police may have about the safety of the location where shooting is to take place can be checked. In practice, the Scottish Government believes that such checks should only be required in a small number of cases, provided that other considerations can be satisfied.

Applying conditions to a certificate

61. Each licence which is granted, varied or renewed should be subject to a set of mandatory conditions which will be prescribed by the Scottish Ministers in subordinate legislation. The Government does not intend this to be a long list, but would include standard requirements such as the need to keep air weapons securely when not in use, and the need to inform the Chief Constable of a change of address or other circumstances.

62. In addition, and in line with existing firearms legislation, the Chief Constable will be able to impose further conditions at the time of grant, renewal or variation. Guidance on the imposition of conditions, including standard wording for common conditions, for example relating to target shooting or pest control, or around the suitability of land on which to shoot, will be prepared and published by the Scottish Government, in consultation with other stakeholders. The Chief Constable will also be able to vary or revoke any condition or to impose a new one at any time if deemed necessary or appropriate.

63. As with other aspects of the licensing regime, a person will be able to appeal to the Sheriff with regard to the imposition of or changes to conditions.

64. One of the primary aims of the licensing regime is to prevent the use of air weapons in unsuitable or unsafe areas, or where their use may cause concern or alarm. Such areas may include the use of air weapons for “plinking” in gardens or other urban or highly populated settings. The Scottish Government accepts that this has been a common pastime for many, and is seen as an “entry level” for many young shooters who go on to take up the sport on a more regular, organised basis. However, the Scottish Government has a wider responsibility to the community to reduce alarm and protect public safety. Against this background, Ministers do not believe that target shooting in such an environment should generally be acceptable unless the applicant can satisfy the Chief Constable as to the safety and other arrangements in place to ensure that shooting can be carried out without risk to the public. Shooting at properly operated and approved air weapon clubs will be encouraged as a matter of policy, and specific provision is made in the Bill to approve air weapons clubs in future.
Variation of air weapon certificate

65. The Bill allows for the details on a certificate to be varied. This may be necessary where a certificate holder moves house, where they wish to change or add to the uses for their air weapons, or where other circumstances change. If a condition has been placed on the certificate by the Chief Constable then it should be possible to apply to have that condition removed or amended by an application for a variation. Similarly, the Chief Constable may vary a certificate as he sees fit.

Revocation of air weapon certificate

66. The Bill includes provisions to revoke an air weapons certificate so that anyone who is misusing, or likely to misuse an air weapon, can be prevented from doing so. It also ensures that anyone who becomes unfit to possess an air weapon can have it taken from them. The Chief Constable would issue a revocation notice to the certificate holder.

67. Revocation is to occur at least 7 days from the date of issue of the notice and the notice must specify that. However, the notice must also require the holder to surrender any air weapons in the holder’s possession and the air weapon certificate within a specified date – which can be sooner than the date specified on the revocation notice. The Scottish Government believes that it would not be appropriate for the Chief Constable to have to wait 7 days before seeking surrender of any air weapons if he believed that this could compromise public safety. Any revocation will be subject to appeal and, if that appeal is successful, the holder will get their certificate and air weapon returned. Where a certificate holder has his certificate revoked, provision is made to allow the holder to reach agreement with the Chief Constable on the disposal of the weapons. This will allow the certificate holder to realise the value of the air weapons, should they wish to sell them or make similar disposal arrangements.

Permits

68. The Scottish Government acknowledges that there is a limited range of circumstances where a person may need to possess or otherwise deal with air weapons on a temporary basis without being a certificate holder. In line with existing firearms legislation, the Bill makes provision for such circumstances.

69. Under section 12 of the Bill a police permit may be granted by the Chief Constable for transient situations such as executors or trustees in sequestration etc. who find themselves in possession of air weapons, or to allow the removal of an air weapon from a ship, or their sale by an auctioneer. A police permit will permit a person to possess or acquire an air weapon without an air weapon certificate, as the Chief Constable sees fit. It should not allow use of an air weapon. Permits issued to auctioneers will also allow them to sell an air weapon without being a Registered Firearms Dealer.

70. Sections 13 and 14 make provision for temporary visitor permits for those who wish to come to Scotland to shoot air weapons, either their own or those borrowed or hired while in the country. Such certificates will be time limited and will last no longer than 12 months. The Chief Constable may grant a permit to the applicant only if satisfied that it would not present a danger to public safety or the peace and that the visitor is not prohibited from possessing one. This approach should introduce a simple, pragmatic regime which is transparent to those coming to Scotland with air weapons, while providing an appropriate level of control about their movement and use in Scotland.

71. As with full air weapons certificates, the Bill makes provision with regard to both mandatory and discretionary conditions which can be attached to a permit, and for their variation or revocation where appropriate.

72. Section 17 provides for a specific type of permit so that, where the Chief Constable has approved the time and place of an event, an individual may borrow, hire, use and possess an air weapon at that event without requiring to hold an air weapon certificate. The intention is that people attending organised events, e.g. a fair or local gala, pony club tetrathlon or bicycle biathlon may compete without necessarily requiring an air weapon certificate. Guidance will set out how and when the Chief Constable should exercise the discretion to approve. In order that individuals may know whether the Chief Constable has approved the event the person who has requested approval of the event must display the approval prominently so that those who may possess an air weapon at it are aware that they may so possess without an air weapon certificate.

73. The Scottish Government considers that properly operated air weapons clubs can provide a suitable, safe environment which air weapons users, for example target and hobby shooters, should be encouraged to attend. The Bill makes provision which allows such clubs to apply for a formal approval from the Chief Constable, similar to approvals for rifle clubs under the existing legislation. People who wish to join such clubs, and to possess or use air weapons at the club may do so without holding their own certificate. This is one of the exemptions from the general requirement for a certificate, set out in schedule 1 to the Bill. Detailed guidance will set out the security and other considerations which should be considered by the Chief Constable in processing an application for approval.

74. An air weapon club licence may be varied on the application of the club or by the Chief Constable, to reflect changed circumstances, and will expire, unless revoked earlier, after 6 years. This matches the duration of rifle club approvals under the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1988, thereby creating a familiar regulatory system for clubs. The Bill also makes provision for an air weapon club approval to be granted co-terminously with that of an existing approved rifle club. This is designed to make things easier for both clubs and the Police Service of Scotland so that approvals can be arranged for renewal all at the same time.

75. Under section 22 the Police Service of Scotland will be able to enter any approved air weapon club premises and inspect them and anything in them but only for the purposes of ascertaining compliance with their approval or the wider terms of the Bill. This includes information in electronic form. Only an officer of the rank of inspector or above may grant an authorisation. The power to enter and inspect may normally only be exercised during reasonable times of the day, for example when the club is operating. The constable or police staff member must produce the authorisation if asked. An offence will be committed if any person intentionally obstructs a constable or member of police staff in the exercise of these powers.

76. These enforcement powers reflect existing powers in respect of approved rifle clubs while also updating them and the Scottish Government consider this to be the correct approach...
This document relates to the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 49) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 14 May 2014 for air weapon clubs. Separately, as a single club may well have both types of approval and the difference between a section 1 air weapon and an air weapon subject to the Bill is not easily discernible, the Scottish Government thinks there is sense in having complementary inspection powers for approved air weapon clubs.

Recreational shooting facilities

77. A person who operates a recreational shooting facility, such as a Paintball venue or miniature rifle range, where individuals who do not hold certificates use air weapons, must hold an air weapon certificate and have it on display. This will ensure that a suitable, identified person is responsible for the possession, security and use of the air weapons at the facility. That person would be subject to the normal process for determining an air weapons certificate application.

Restrictions on transactions involving air weapons

78. The Scottish Government strongly believes that the commercial manufacture, sale, repair and testing of air weapons should be properly regulated, in line with other controls being introduced over air weapons in Scotland, to ensure that the public at large are protected from the misuse of air weapons. Provisions at sections 24 to 26 of the Bill therefore govern commercial transactions in air weapons.

79. Any person who by way of trade or business manufactures, sells, transfers, repairs or tests an air weapon or who exposes one for sale or transfer, or who possesses one to repair or test must therefore be a Registered Firearms Dealer under the Firearms Act 1968. This is broadly in line with present provisions around commercial transactions, although adds manufacture, test and repair of air weapons to the list of commercial activities restricted to Registered Firearms Dealers. The Scottish Government believes that this provides a proper regime under which to deal in air weapons for the future.

80. It will be an offence to sell or transfer to any person, other than a Registered Firearms Dealer, any air weapon unless the person it is being sold or transferred to produces a valid air weapon certificate or shows that they are otherwise entitled to purchase or acquire it without holding an air weapon certificate. It will be an offence to provide a false certificate or statement.

81. The Bill also requires that sales of air weapons are carried out face-to-face. It replicates the current requirements of section 32 of the Violent Crime Reduction Act 2006. The Scottish Government considers that this provides a reasonable level of control and check on commercial transactions, with checks to ensure that the individual buyer holds a valid air weapon certificate, where necessary.

82. The Scottish Government does not wish to undermine proper trade in air weapons, and acknowledges the importance of sales of such weapons to people from outwith Scotland. Section 26 of the Bill enables a person to purchase an air weapon from a Registered Firearms Dealer in Scotland if the air weapon is purchased for delivery outside Great Britain without first coming into the purchaser’s possession. As with existing firearms and shotgun sales of this kind, a Registered Firearms Dealer who sells an air weapon to someone so entitled to purchase must send a notice to the Chief Constable of the transaction within 48 hours.
Enforcement

83. The Bill includes a number of detailed provisions to allow for the robust and effective enforcement of the new licensing regime for air weapons. This includes provisions (at section 27) for a sheriff to grant a warrant for a constable or member of police staff to enter and search premises, or persons found there where it suspected that an offence has been, is being, or is about to be, committed or that in connection with an air weapon there is a danger to public safety or to the peace, and to seize and detain anything which may be found on the premises or any person there. This includes information in electronic form. These enforcement powers largely mirror existing powers for firearms and shotguns. Section 28 provides the power for a constable to require any person to present their air weapon certificate for inspection. Failure to produce a certificate or to permit the constable to read it or to show entitlement to have the air weapon without holding a certificate will allow the constable to seize and detain the air weapon. The Scottish Government considers that this provision will help to take illegally held air weapons off the streets, helping to protect public safety.

84. Provision is also made to give a court the discretion to cancel any air weapon certificate held by the person on conviction of certain offences or breach of orders, or to order the forfeiture and disposal of any weapon found in the possession of the offender, or disposal if the weapon has already been seized by the Police Service of Scotland. This gives courts the power to remove air weapons from those the courts do not think should have them. Specific provision is made for museums because the Scottish Government do not want air weapons which are museum exhibits to be forfeited just because they have been taken or used unlawfully. In such cases it is appropriate that the museum gets the exhibit returned to it.

Keeping air weapons secure

85. The Bill requires any person to take reasonable precautions for the safe custody of any air weapon which they have in their possession, and to report immediately to the Chief Constable the loss or theft of any such air weapon then they commit an offence. This provision seeks to keep air weapons in safe control at all times and ensure that steps can be taken to track them down if lost or stolen. Guidance will be prepared by the Scottish Government and will include advice on appropriate security for the keeping and storage of air weapons. This will build on existing good practice promoted by the gun trade and shooting organisations.

False statements, certificates and permits

86. Where a person knowingly makes a statement with a view to procuring an air weapon certificate, or police, visitor, or event permit which is false in any material detail, or uses a certificate they know to be false, then they commit an offence. This will help to guard against fraudulent applications and purchases.

Time limit for offences

87. Summary proceedings must ordinarily be instituted within six months after an offence is committed but, under section 33, for air weapon offences under the Bill they may be instituted at any time within three years of the offence. This is to ensure that summary offences which come to light sometime after commission can still be tried. The Firearms Act 1968 makes equivalent provision in relation to offences under that Act, albeit for four years.
Offences by bodies corporate etc.

88. Section 34 relates to offences by corporate bodies. It is intended to deal with the few cases where there may be an offence committed by a non-natural person such as a company, partnership or unincorporated association (e.g. an auctioneer, carrier firm owner of a recreational shooting facility etc.). Where the offence is committed by an officer of the body with that officer’s consent or connivance then this section allows the officer to be prosecuted as well as the body. The aim is to ensure that corporate status does not allow individuals to escape liability where it would otherwise fall on them.

Appeals

89. As noted earlier in this Memorandum, the Bill makes provision for appeals against the decision of the Chief Constable in a number of instances. Any appeal will be to a sheriff who will consider any evidence or other matter whether or not it was available when the Chief Constable took the decision in question. The sheriff with jurisdiction is to be the one for the area in which the appellant resides. Where a person resides outside of Scotland the sheriff at Edinburgh is to have jurisdiction. This is necessary because a certificate holder may not reside in Scotland but will need to know which court to appeal to against a relevant decision of the Chief Constable. An appeal is to be brought no later than 21 days after the date of the decision was received by the appellant.

90. The sheriff may dismiss the appeal or give the Chief Constable such direction as he thinks fit. The decision of the sheriff may only be appealed on point of law, ultimately to the Inner House of the Court of Session. The Courts Reform (Scotland) Bill proposes changes to the sheriff court system and the policy in this Bill has been formulated so as to ensure that any changes which may arise out of that one do not affect these appeal provisions.

91. These processes ensure that a fair and open system is in place and that the administrative discretion of the Chief Constable is overseen by a fully independent and impartial judicial authority with full fact and law review.

Fees

92. Firearms licensing is a service provided by the Police Service of Scotland and comes at a cost in terms of processing the application itself, carrying out background checks and home visits, issuing certificates, monitoring existing certificate holders and prosecuting those who contravene the law.

93. As such, it is right that the process for obtaining a certificate should incur a fee. Under the current firearms regime, fees are generally only charged on issue of a firearms or shotgun certificate following a successful application. The Scottish Government believes, however, that it is more appropriate to charge applicants regardless of the outcome of their application as costs are incurred considering unsuccessful applications as well as successful ones. This better reflects the costs of providing the service overall and is in line with comparable processes.

94. The Scottish Government considers that existing fees for firearms and shotguns certificates are very low and has pressed the Home Office to raise these on a regular basis. The existing tariff has been in place since 2001 and does not reflect the cost of providing the service.
Under the present tariff, for example, it costs just £50 for a five year firearms licence. In addition, the Scottish Government believes that the present levels of fees do not reflect the responsibility or safety implications of possessing and using a potentially dangerous weapon. The Scottish Government will, along with a number of other stakeholders, continue to press for significantly increased fees under the firearms legislation.

95. In the meantime, it is acknowledged that it would be inequitable to set an initial air weapons fee tariff at a higher level than those for more powerful weapons. Such a move could, for example, encourage people to move towards the ownership and use of higher powered guns, with implications for safe shooting and public safety more generally. The Scottish Government’s overarching policy in this area is, however, to move towards a full cost recovery model for fees, for air weapons and other types of firearm. Against this background, illustrative fee levels are set out and discussed in the Financial Memorandum which accompanies the Bill.

96. The scale of fees will be set out in subordinate legislation. Fees will be set for different circumstances and in relation to visitor permits and any other licensing activity under the Bill.

Power to make further provision

97. Section 37 of the Bill provides for the Scottish Ministers to make regulations on conditions, application forms and documents to be submitted for permits and licences. The intention here is to provide flexibility in the regime by allowing process changes to be done quickly through subordinate legislation. This is a wide power and it is intended that it will enable a single set of regulations to be made for the processes underpinning the regime (other than fees, which will be in separate regulations to permit Parliamentary consideration of that issue in isolation).

Transitional arrangements for existing certificate holders

98. Those who have an existing firearms and/ or shotgun licence that are already in possession of an air weapon, will not be required to obtain an air weapon certificate to continue possessing or using their air weapon until their existing licence expires (the later expiry date takes precedence if both a firearm and shotgun are held). They will, however, still be required to adhere to any mandatory conditions and will be committing an offence if they fail to do so. The cancellation of one or both existing certificates ends the transitional period.

99. An existing certificate holder who wishes to acquire a new air weapon during this transitional period will be required to apply for and obtain an air weapon certificate prior to the purchase or other acquisition. This will ensure that the seller can check that the person holds a valid certificate, simplifying the process in particular for Registered Firearms Dealers.

100. These provisions are designed to assist in the smoothing process in dealing with the influx of new applications. Tests will already have been carried out in relation to persons who have existing certificates and this will avoid duplication of effort.
Guidance

101. Just as with the extant Home Office Guidance Guide on Firearms Licensing Law around the Firearms Acts, the Scottish Ministers will publish guidance on this Part of the Bill. This guidance will be prepared by the Scottish Government working closely with the Police Service of Scotland and other stakeholders. It will have to be taken into account by the Chief Constable when exercising functions conferred by the Bill. That is important as there is considerable discretion conferred on the Chief Constable and guidance will ensure that the discretion is exercised consistently with Ministers’ vision. Guidance may also be issued more generally about anything to do with the Part and can provide the Scottish Ministers’ view on how the Bill should operate in practice so that all stakeholders understand the operational model.

Exemptions

102. There will be a category of exemptions in relation to situations where no certificate is necessary to possess, use, purchase or acquire an air weapon. The Scottish Ministers will be able to amend exemptions to react to changes in circumstances around licensing. Schedule 1 sets out these exemptions.

103. Certain public servants are exempted in their capacity as such. This includes the police as well as other public servants who could come into contact with air weapons as part of their duties. The list is able to be adjusted by the power in section 2 of the Bill should other public servants need to be included or any removed. The approach taken in the Firearms Act 1968 relies on the rule of law whereby Acts do not bind the Crown unless and to the extent that they so provide. The Interpretation and Legislative Reform (Scotland) Act 2010 reverses that position so that Acts of the Scottish Parliament bind the Crown unless and to the extent of any exemption. The Scottish Government thinks that a narrow list of exempted public servants is appropriate as a blanket one would result in unduly broad exemption.

Minor and consequential amendments

104. Schedule 2 to the Bill lists the minor and consequential amendments as a consequence of the Bill.

Alternative approaches

105. Stricter control over and licensing of air weapons has been a long-standing commitment for the Scottish Government. This was a clear Manifesto commitment in advance of both the 2007 and 2011 elections to the Scottish Parliament. The Scottish Government considers licensing of such weapons is the most appropriate way of improving public safety and reducing the potential for harm within our communities. With this principle clearly established, the Scottish Government’s consultation on this issue did not seek debate on the principle. Instead, views and contributions were invited on how best to implement a robust, proportionate and practicable system of licensing. Nevertheless, a number of alternative approaches were available in principle.

106. The first alternative option is to do nothing. As noted above, this is not considered a viable option and would not meet the Scottish Government’s aim of introducing stricter controls over the availability and use of air weapons. Although a significant number of air weapons stakeholders do not consider it necessary to license air weapons, the tragic consequences that airgun misuse can have in our communities means that the Scottish Government cannot stand back and do nothing.

107. The second option would be to provide widespread training to air weapon users, which is the approach supported by many sections of the shooting community and raised in responses to the public consultation. Under such arrangements, the Scottish Government would roll out training across the country. However, such an approach would appeal most to those who already use airguns safely and with good reason. It seems unlikely that individuals who misuse airguns would engage with a training programme. Nor would it help to identify the estimated large number of unused and forgotten air weapons which the Scottish Government seeks to remove from circulation.

108. The third alternative would be to continue to press for full devolution of firearms legislation, and to frame the licensing of air weapons in the context of fully revised legislation on all firearms. While it would be easier and more coherent to update all firearms legislation in one all-encompassing Act, the UK Government continues to resist further devolution and the Scottish Government does not consider that it is prudent to wait for that uncertain outcome when powers exist to regulate these weapons now.

109. A fourth alternative is to introduce a minimal registration scheme with no approval process, simply registering at a location such as a post office. Although this would entail minimal disruption and cost, it would essentially mean everyone could automatically obtain authorisation and would do very little to prevent misuse. It would allow everyone who has registered to hold air weapons regardless of their fitness to do so, and their intentions in using the weapons.

110. A fifth alternative option is to have a complete ban on air weapons in Scotland. Although there was some support in the responses to the consultation exercise for this course of action, the Scottish Government does not consider this to be a proportionate response to the issue of air weapons misuse, and would be unfair to the many legitimate shooters who currently use air weapons safely and may continue to do so under a licensing regime. Those who do misuse such weapons may be likely to ignore such a ban. In addition, there is the potential unintended consequence that those who currently shoot air weapons within the law may decide to continue shooting with other weapons, including shotguns and more powerful firearms.

Effects on equal opportunities, human rights, island communities, local government, sustainable development etc. of the air weapons provisions in the Bill

Equal opportunities

111. An Equality Impact Assessment (EQIA) has been carried out and the results will be published on the Scottish Government website at: http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/Recent.

112. In relation to the licensing of air weapons, the Scottish Government considers that the Bill does not discriminate on the basis of maternity and pregnancy, marriage and civil partnership, gender reassignment, race, disability, religion and belief, sex or sexual orientation.
Specific provisions are made with regard to young people, allowing those aged 14 to 17 to possess and use air weapons under certain conditions, and requiring the use of air weapons by anyone under 14 to be supervised by an appropriate adult. The Scottish Government considers these restrictions to be justifiable and proportionate in order to help protect young people, who are disproportionately the victims of gun crime, and reduce firearms offences committed by young people, while enabling them to shoot air weapons in a safe and properly regulated manner.

113. The age limits proposed in the Bill are consistent with current (unlicensed) airgun age limits, and provisions in Northern Ireland. These take into account risks to public safety.

Human rights

114. The Scottish Government considers that the Bill has limited impact on the human rights of individuals. Although current gun users may believe that their human rights are infringed by the introduction of a licensing system, the ownership and use of air weapons will still be permitted if the conditions set out in the legislation are met. There is no ban so no deprivation of property and the weapons retain market value by virtue of still being capable of being lawfully held and sold and the presence of an open market in England and Wales as well as the rest of the world. While the Chief Constable has considerable discretion in the performance of functions in relation to air weapons, that discretion is subject to a fully Article 6 compliant appeal mechanism. Any deprivation of property occurring in relation to cancellation of certificates and forfeiture occurs only temporarily in those narrow situations where it is necessary to do so to protect public safety and affected individuals can appeal to the court about the deprivation. The Bill does not discriminate against individuals and the policy has been carefully formulated to balance the rights of the individual with the safety of the wider populace.

Rural/island communities

115. During the consultation process many respondents raised concerns that air weapon licensing would be disproportionately restrictive on rural and island communities, with air weapon misuse seen as a distinctly urban problem. While misuse can take place anywhere, the Scottish Government has been clear that one of the main objectives of licensing is the removal of unnecessary air weapons from the urban environment, and the Scottish Government recognise that these weapons can be important tools in many aspects of rural life.

116. Essential rural activities such as pest control and protection of crops and livestock will be considered good reasons to be granted an air weapon certificate, provided that the other application criteria are met. Individuals in rural and island communities are also more likely than their urban counterparts to have access to suitable land for safe shooting, whether that shooting is in connection with business or leisure. The Scottish Government therefore does not consider that licensing will be unduly restrictive for rural or island communities.

Local government

117. The Bill has no direct impact on local authorities in discharging their duties.
Sustainable development and environmental issues

118. The Scottish Government do not anticipate that the Bill will have any negative impacts on sustainable development or environmental issues. Legitimate gamekeepers, pest controllers and the like – including more casual shooters who, for example, help to keep rabbit populations down on local farmland – will be able to apply for a certificate and continue their work with minimal impact.

119. In the case of larger wildlife – such as swans or foxes – which can often be the target of air weapon misuse, licensing will help to protect such creatures by preventing those who would commit such crimes from accessing an air weapon in the first place.

PART 2 – ALCOHOL LICENSING

120. Alcohol licensing, along with Minimum Unit Pricing and NHS investment in prevention, treatment and support measures, is part of the broader Scottish Government Strategy “Changing Scotland’s Relationship with Alcohol” (2009). There are significant social and financial costs associated with problem drinking. It has been estimated that alcohol misuse costs the Scottish economy around £3.6 billion every year particularly in terms of alcohol related crime, mortality and hospital admissions. It is vital that the police and Licensing Boards have the powers they need to reduce crime and preserve public order so that people can lead productive lives within safe and secure communities.

121. Alcohol licensing is not, however intended to prohibit responsible consumption nor to undermine the economic interests of the alcohol trade.

122. The Bill will improve the effectiveness of the alcohol licensing regime set out in the 2005 Act as added to by the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010, the Alcohol etc. (Scotland) Act 2010, the Alcohol (Minimum Pricing) (Scotland) Act 2012, as well as secondary legislation.

123. There are a number of substantive provisions within the Bill and these have been arranged here under the following themes:

- Reducing crime and preserving public order and safety;
- Providing Boards with powers to consider a broader range of information;
- Advancing public health;
- Improvements to the existing system and reducing burdens on trade and Licensing Boards.

REDUCE CRIME AND PRESERVE PUBLIC ORDER AND SAFETY

Policy objective

124. It is vital that police and Licensing Boards have the powers they need to reduce crime and preserve public order so that people can lead productive lives within safe and secure communities. Within this Bill there are a range of provisions to help ensure that people live their lives safe from crime, disorder and danger. These measures include:-
This document relates to the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 49) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 14 May 2014

- Creation of new offences of supplying alcohol to children or young people for consumption in a public place.
- Providing Boards with powers to consider a broader range of information such as:
  - a fit and proper test;
  - spent convictions;
  - connected persons.

Supply of alcohol to a child or young person

125. Under the current licensing regime, adults can legally supply alcohol to someone under the age of 18 outwith a licensed premises. This facilitates outdoor drinking dens of young people where those in the group who are over 18 buy alcohol for younger members. The measures within the Bill will close this loophole and give the police the powers they need to disrupt these drinking dens.

126. The police are currently able to confiscate alcohol from children and young people drinking in public places, as well as from adults who are supplying alcohol to children and young people for consumption in public places. They describe this approach as ‘putting out the fire by removing the fuel’. During these campaigns, the former Strathclyde Police Force found the majority of outdoor drinking dens consisted of small clusters of people ranging in ages from 14 to 21. In many cases, those over 18 were the suppliers of alcohol to those under 18.

127. When Strathclyde Police confiscated alcohol from children and young people in public places they found that they were powerless to stop those over 18 simply buying and sharing more alcohol. It is not, in itself, against the criminal law to give alcohol to someone under 18 for consumption in a public place, although it is an offence to buy alcohol for those under the age of 18. Consequently there is a continuing cycle of confiscation and purchasing.

128. There are existing offences under the 2005 Act, see section 105 that cover buying alcohol on behalf of a child or young person or for consumption on licensed premises. Local byelaws, set by local authorities, can also make it an offence to drink in public, however these do not apply across all of Scotland and they operate differently in different areas.

129. The Scottish Government believes that the law should make it illegal to supply alcohol to a person under 18 both inside and outside of a licensed premises. In the Bill this is achieved by making it an offence for a person other than a child or young person to buy or attempt to buy alcohol for a child or young person for consumption in a public place.

Consultation

130. In the Scottish Government consultation on Further Options for Alcohol Licensing, this proposal attracted overwhelming support. Out of the 100 responses to this question, 94 were in favour of making it illegal for adults to supply alcohol to an under 18 for consumption in a public place.

Alternative approaches

131. Various alternative approaches to establishing this offence were considered. Numerous definitions of what constitutes a ‘public place’ were considered as well as alternative drafting of the offence itself. The approach taken was considered to be the most proportionate and workable offence as well as the most effective at tackling the problem of drinking dens.

PROVIDING BOARDS WITH POWERS TO CONSIDER A BROADER RANGE OF INFORMATION

Policy objective

132. The Bill provides Licensing Boards with powers to consider a broader range of information when making decisions regarding the alcohol licensing regime. These additional powers help Boards to protect the public by ensuring that only appropriate persons can gain a personal or premises license. To this end, the Bill expands the remit of what Boards may consider by taking forward provisions to:

- introduce a ‘fit and proper’ test;
- allow Boards to consider spent convictions.

The ‘fit and proper’ test

133. Many licensing regimes rely on a ‘fit and proper’ test to determine whether someone is suitable to hold a licence. However, the ‘fit and proper’ test that applied under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976 was not included in the 2005 Act. Instead, the 2005 Act focused on the use of relevant offences and foreign offences to assess the suitability of candidates and licence holders, as well as providing the ability for people to object based on matters connected to the licensing objectives.

134. Since the 2005 Act came into force there has been considerable debate and serious concern expressed regarding the impact of removing the ‘fit and proper test’ from the alcohol licensing regime in Scotland, and the lack of a ‘fit and proper person’ test has been much criticised by the police, Licensing Boards and those within the alcohol trade.

135. There is a widespread view amongst stakeholders that limiting consideration to relevant offences is unduly constraining to Boards who may have no choice but to grant licences to applicants that they consider to be a risk to the public.

136. The introduction of the ‘fit and proper’ test in this Bill will provide greater scope to present information to Boards, and give them the ability to consider a greater breadth of relevant information when making decisions about applicants, licence holders and connected persons. It will also provide Licensing Boards with greater powers to tackle crime, particularly serious organised crime, by allowing the consideration of a wider range of information including police intelligence and any associations with those deemed to be unsuitable.
A definition of ‘fit and proper’ is not necessary as Licensing Boards are familiar with the ‘fit and proper’ determination from other licensing regimes and there is sufficient experience and case law to guide decision making. This is in accordance with various other Acts that use the test. Furthermore, a definition of ‘fit and proper’ could limit the range of information local authorities can consider and fetter their discretion. Each application should be considered on its own merits.

138. Under the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974, spent convictions are defined as convictions where a specified period of time has elapsed which allows an individual not to have to tell people about their previous criminal activity. For example, someone receiving a fine from a court conviction will be required to advise potential employers about their court fine for 5 years (an unspent conviction). Once 5 years have passed, this conviction becomes spent and it is no longer required to be disclosed.

139. The 2005 Act provides that spent convictions cannot be considered in any part of a Licensing Board’s deliberations, such as considering whether to grant personal or premises licences, or in hearings once the licence has been granted.

140. Key stakeholders have argued that it is imperative that Boards have as much information as possible at their disposal to allow them to make a considered decision on an application. Limiting Boards to the consideration of a definitive and restricted list of convictions for relevant offences permits unsuitable persons to operate within licensed premises and may contradict the five licensing objectives upon which the Act is founded (particularly ‘preventing crime and disorder’).

141. Consequently, this Bill repeals section 129(4) of the 2005 Act to allow Boards to consider spent convictions. Although the proposed changes would enable Licensing Boards to consider spent convictions for relevant offences, the existence of such convictions would not necessarily prevent an applicant from getting a personal licence. The fact that an applicant has convictions, whether spent or otherwise, may or may not act against them and this will be dependent on the nature and timing of the offence. The Board will consider each case on its own merits as they do with unspent convictions for relevant offences. To allow the consideration of spent convictions for relevant offences it will also be necessary to make amendments to the rehabilitation of offenders legislation. This is being taken forward outwith the Bill.

Consultation

142. In the Scottish Government consultation on Further Options for Alcohol Licensing, one of the most frequently received suggestions in this section of the consultation was that Licensing Boards should have greater powers to tackle crime, particularly serious organised crime, by allowing the consideration of a wider range of information. Over two thirds of respondents felt that legislation should be amended so that Boards may consider whether an applicant is a ‘fit and proper’ person. Less than ten per cent answered ‘no’ to this question.
Alternative approaches

143. During the Scottish Government consultation on Further Options for Alcohol Licensing, many stakeholders suggested that there should be a definition of fit and proper, and that this would apply consistency across Scotland and between different Licensing Boards. The Scottish Government is however concerned that any definition would unduly constrain Licensing Boards, making them unable to consider new or novel concerns. Local Authority councillors and clerks are already familiar with successfully applying the ‘fit and proper’ test in other regimes, and there is sufficient experience and case law to guide decision making so it is not necessary to further define it.

ADVANCING PUBLIC HEALTH

144. The 2005 Act brought in a range of provisions to ensure that public health is at the heart of the alcohol licensing regime in Scotland. A public health objective was created to ensure that Licensing Boards’ decisions are underpinned by the goal of protecting and improving public health. Furthermore, a duty was put on Boards to formulate a statement of licensing policy every 3 years and make an assessment of overprovision in any locality within the Board’s area.

145. The consultation process made clear that since the 2005 Act came into effect relatively recently in 2009, and Minimum Unit Pricing is still the subject of legal dispute, this is not the time for further substantial changes regarding public health. Instead, the Bill contains provisions to maximise the impact of the existing public health measures, particularly with regard to:

- protecting children and young persons from harm;
- statements of licensing policy; and
- overprovision.

Protecting children and young persons from harm

146. The 2005 Act has five objectives, one more than the Licensing Act 2003 for England and Wales which does not include an objective in relation to public health.

147. The licensing objectives are the engine that drives the 2005 Act. They are a key feature of Licensing Board policy statements, the basis for refusal of a premises or occasional licence, the attachment of conditions, sanctions on a personal licence holder or a competent ground for review of a premises licence.

148. The 2005 Act includes the objective ‘protecting children from harm’. The Act defines a child as “a person under the age of 16” and a young person as “a person aged 16 or 17”. Consequently, the ‘protecting children from harm’ objective does not apply to 16 and 17 year olds.

149. Young people are particularly vulnerable to the effects of alcohol, whether they are drinking themselves or being affected by the drinking of other people in their lives. Underage drinking can cause short and long term harm to health, as well as put young people in dangerous situations when drunk. The scientific evidence is clear that an alcohol-free childhood is the healthiest and best option. The earlier a young person begins to drink alcohol, the more likely they are to drink in ways that can be risky later in life. For these reasons, it is vital that the health interests of young persons are at the heart of the licensing regime.

150. Furthermore, the distinction between children and young persons creates difficulties for Licensing Boards when dealing with issues around young persons and has the effect that issues around 16/17 year olds cannot be considered in relation to the ‘protecting children’ objective.

151. It is not envisaged that expanding this licensing objective will create adverse consequences, or affect the considerations that Boards undertake. The broadening out of the objectives within the Bill will give Licensing Boards greater scope to protect young persons.

Statements of licensing policy

152. The 2005 Act introduced a duty on Licensing Boards to issue a statement of licensing policy, before the beginning of each 3 year period, setting out their general approach to licensing decisions and outlining how the Board intends to promote the five licensing objectives.

153. This requirement constituted a fundamental change to how Licensing Boards operate and transformed licensing from an application-driven process to a policy-driven one. Since this legislation came into force, licensing decisions have become part of a wider policy context and a stated policy position can be used as grounds to refuse an application for a licence.

154. The Bill amends the legislation to provide that a new Board has to prepare a new policy statement within eighteen months of being appointed, and once agreed the policy has a duration of up to five years, although Boards would retain the ability to make changes during the life of a policy statement by way of a supplementary statement and to publish an earlier licensing policy statement.

155. Linking these statements of licensing policy to local authority elections will ensure that the Licensing Policy Statement better reflects the views of the current Board, and increasing the potential duration of the statement to five years both reduces the burdens on Licensing Boards, and by providing more time to prepare the statement, helps ensure that the statements are more robust, evidence-based and capable of withstanding legal challenge.

Overprovision

156. The 2005 Act places a duty on Boards to make an assessment of overprovision and include a statement regarding this in their licensing policy statement. This policy provides Boards with powers to consider the unique circumstances of their area and decide whether, based on local needs, it is appropriate to restrict access to alcohol through limits on new licences, licences of a particular type, or variations of existing licences.
157. Where it is assessed that there is overprovision a rebuttable presumption is created against granting new licences although each case is judged on its own merits and there is always the possibility of exceptions.

158. It is important that the overprovision assessment is an effective and robust tool for Licensing Boards. However, to date only a few Boards have assessed that there is overprovision in a particular area. It has been argued that Boards are wary of making use of overprovision policies through fear of legal challenge.

159. The approach adopted in the 2005 Act has the effect that the area for the assessment of overprovision arguably relates to localities within the Board area rather than the entire Board area. As a result of this, Boards have experienced difficulty in determining suitable localities and establishing sufficient evidence to support overprovision for small areas. Frequently, health indicators can only be demonstrated over larger areas. This presents an obstacle when considering the wider scope of the ‘protecting and improving public health’ objective and prevents Boards from considering the availability of alcohol across their whole geographical area.

160. The Bill addresses these issues by providing Boards with powers to assess overprovision for entire Board areas. Furthermore, the Bill makes clear that increased capacity can be considered separately from an increase in the number of licensed premises in terms of overprovision and that opening hours should also be considered. Even if there is no increase in total number of alcohol outlets, the overprovision assessment is relevant if existing premises attempt to increase their capacity and/or opening hours.

Consultation

161. All of the provisions to advance public health contained within the Bill were consulted on as part of the Further Options for Alcohol Licensing consultation exercise that ran from 19 December 2012 to 22 March 2013. A majority of respondents agreed with all of the proposed provisions regarding protecting children and young persons from harm, statements of licensing policy and overprovision.

Alternative approaches

162. The alternative approaches suggested by stakeholders to improve public health were considered, at the current time, to be unduly onerous on the licensed trade. There have been suggestions such as reducing off-sales opening hours, introduction of alcohol only checkouts in large multiple retail outlets, and placing a statutory duty on Boards to promote the licensing objectives and provide annual reports on how they did so.

163. The provisions contained in the Bill are those which were most effective at improving public health while remaining proportionate and relatively straightforward to implement.
IMPROVEMENTS TO THE EXISTING SYSTEM AND REDUCING BURDENS ON TRADE AND LICENSING BOARDS

Policy objective

164. A key goal of this Bill is to improve the performance of the licensing regime for the wide range of stakeholders who interact with it including Licensing Boards, police and the trade. This Bill takes forward a number of opportunities to reduce the burdens on trade and Boards without requiring a radical overhaul of the system. These measures are related to:

- Personal licences;
- Duty of Boards to produce annual financial report;
- Processing of applications and deemed grant;
- Relevant offences and foreign offences.

Personal licence

165. The 2005 Act requires those who authorise the sale of alcohol to possess a personal licence. All premises managers (also known as designated premises managers or DPMs) must possess a personal licence. To gain the personal licence, applicants must undergo training and gain a licensing qualification so this process plays an important role in ensuring that licence holders have appropriate knowledge of licensing matters.

166. Under the current licensing legislation, a personal licence has effect, subject to conditions, for 10 years from the date on which it is issued. If they wish to continue as a personal licence holder they must apply to the relevant Licensing Board for renewal of the licence, in ‘the period of 2 months beginning 3 months before the expiry date of the licence’.

167. The Bill extends the period in which personal licence holders may apply to renew their licence to 9 months, beginning 12 months before the expiry date of the licence. This change makes the personal licence administration more effective and trade-friendly as well as allowing the Boards a longer period of time to process applications.

168. Under the existing arrangements, where a personal licence is revoked for any reason, the person who held the licence may not apply for another one for five years. It is possible that some personal licence holders will fail to submit evidence of the refresher training within the time limit, for example as a result of forgetting about the deadline and consequently will have their licences revoked. If they cannot get another personal licence for five years this may result in them losing their jobs. Furthermore, it is good practice for licensed premises to have multiple personal licence holders and the current policy could lead to less personal licence holders.

169. The Bill amends the legislation so that if a personal licence is revoked under section 87(3) of the 2005 Act (for failure to comply with the training requirement), the licence holder will not have to wait 5 years to reapply for a personal licence, although they would still have to go through the cost and inconvenience of applying for a new licence, thus serving as a deterrent to those who may consider not undergoing the refresher training. This amendment provides a more proportionate incentive for the licensed trade and facilitates licensed premises’ best practice.

Duty of Boards to produce annual financial report

170. The 2005 Act enables the Scottish Ministers to make provision for the charging of alcohol licensing fees by Licensing Boards in respect of applications under the Act, and otherwise in respect of the performance of functions by Licensing Boards, councils and Licensing Standards Officers under the Act.

171. Licensing Boards charge fees for a range of activities such as applying for premises licences, annual fees for premises licences, applying for personal or occasional licences, and transferring or varying existing licences.

172. The fees regime is intended to reflect the Scottish Government’s intention to make the system self-funding i.e. to cover both direct and indirect costs incurred by Licensing Boards. In other words, the money raised by fees should be broadly equivalent to the expenses incurred by the Board and the council for that area of the Board, in administering the licensing regime during that period.

173. After the fees regime came into effect in 2009, stakeholders in the licensed trade queried the disparities between fee levels in different local authorities and suggested that Boards should be transparent about these figures to demonstrate that their fees regime are based upon cost recovery (unless they choose to make a deficit).

174. Consequently, this Bill creates a duty on Licensing Boards to produce an annual financial report and provides for what information should be included in such a report. As Licensing Boards are already under an obligation to ensure their fee income is broadly equivalent to their costs, this duty will require them to make public the calculations that are already being carried out.

Processing applications, and deemed grant

175. The Bill includes provisions to ensure that licensing applications are processed more efficiently and brings these timescales in line with those in the Civic Licensing regime. It will require Boards to issue a letter of acknowledgement to applicants, unless it is impractical to do so, setting out the timescale within which the application must be decided. Where an application does not meet the laid down requirements, the Board must give notice to the applicant that they are treating the application as incomplete. The Board must determine every application within nine months of the date of receipt, unless this period has been extended by the Board applying to the sheriff for an extension. If the Board fails to determine the application within the permissible period then it will automatically be deemed to have been granted and the Board will be obliged to issue the licence/appropriate authorisation. Although these provisions set a limit on how long a Licensing Board may consider an application for, the Scottish Government would expect all applications to be considered as quickly as possible and not to be unduly delayed.

176. These amendments will provide greater clarity for the licensed trade over the consideration of applications and the timescale for granting an application.
Relevant offences and foreign offences

177. During the consultation on Further Options for Alcohol Licensing that ran from 19 December 2012 to 22 March 2013 the most consistent suggestion for reform was for the Scottish Government to revisit the automatic requirement for Licensing Board to hold hearings when notified of relevant or foreign offences. This suggestion for reform was supported by both Licensing Boards and the licensed trade. The automatic requirement to have a hearing on every occasion a relevant or foreign offence is notified to the Boards, even if it is of little significance for the business being carried on and is of little consequence to the business or the licensing objectives, is considered to place an undue burden on Licensing Boards and the trade who may have to provide representation and obtain legal advice for multiple hearings across the different Scottish Boards.

178. Under the 2005 Act as it currently stands, when a Licensing Board receives notification of a conviction of the personal/premises licence holder or a connected person they must notify the Chief Constable of the notification. The Chief Constable must then provide the Licensing Board with a notice either i) advising that they are unable to confirm the existence of the convictions or that it is not a relevant or foreign offence; or ii) confirming the existence of the convictions and that it is a relevant or foreign offence. If the Licensing Board is notified that the conviction does exist and is for a relevant or foreign offence then they must make a personal/premises licence review proposal in respect of the licence. Where a Licensing Board makes such a proposal then the Board must hold a hearing for the purposes of considering and determining the proposal.

179. This Bill amends the 2005 Act so that if the Chief Constable merely confirms the existence of either a relevant or foreign conviction and does not recommend that the licence should be varied, suspended or revoked, then the Licensing Board are not obliged to make a review proposal or hold a hearing and can decide this based upon their own view as to whether the hearing/proposal is or is not necessary for the purposes of the licensing objectives. If a sanction is to be considered then a hearing/proposal is required.

180. If the Chief Constable recommends that, having regard to the conviction, the licence should be varied, suspended, revoked or endorsed then a licence review proposal must be made and a hearing must be held.

181. This amendment provides Boards with greater autonomy to make decisions as well as making their processes more streamlined and effective. It also reduces the burden and costs for trade.

Consultation

182. The Scottish Government consulted on a range of potential further options for alcohol licensing from December 2012 to March 2013. The responses made clear that although people do not want to see a root and branch review of licensing legislation, there are areas that are not working as effectively as they should be. Therefore, these provisions make the regime more effective for the trade and Licensing Boards.
183. The duty of Boards to produce an annual financial report was recommended by a group made up of representatives from the on and off trade as well as Licensing Board clerks, established to make recommendations to the Scottish Ministers about the fees system and the level of fees.

184. During the Scottish Government consultation on Further Options for Alcohol Licensing a number of alternative approaches were suggested that, although they may have helped progress other goals such as improving public health, would arguably be unduly onerous on the trade and Boards. One of the main goals of the Bill is to improve the existing system and reduce burdens, rather than bringing in radical new changes. Consequently, alternative approaches such as the introduction of separate alcohol only checkouts in large multiple retail outlets and placing a statutory duty on Boards to promote the licensing objectives and provide annual reports on how they did so, were not taken forward.

Effects on equal opportunities, human rights, island communities, sustainable development etc. of the alcohol provisions in the Bill

185. The provisions on the alcohol licensing regime are not discriminatory on the basis of gender, race, age, disability, sexual orientation, marital status or religion. The regime has no specific implications for island communities or sustainable development.

186. The Scottish Government considers that the Bill does not impact on the human rights of alcohol licence holders. Although current alcohol licence holders (both premises and personal licence holders) may believe that their human rights are infringed as the introduction of the fit and proper person test may result in their licence being revoked. The revocation would be done by the Licensing Board and not by Scottish Ministers. It will be for the Licensing Board to ensure that their actions are convention right complaint and that any revocation only occurs where the Board is satisfied, after having regard for the objectives, that the licence holder is no longer a ‘fit and proper person’ to hold the licence.

187. The Scottish Government also considers that the Bill does not impact on the licence holders right to fair trial. On each occasion where a licence holder may lose a licence or is being considered for refusal of a licence under the 2005 Act, on the grounds of not being a ‘fit and proper person’, there will be a hearing as per the existing hearing system provided in the 2005 Act. Where a licence is revoked or refused, a right to appeal exists to an appropriate sheriff principal or sheriff in an appropriate sheriffdom.

188. As such it is the Scottish Government view that the Bill does not discriminate against individuals and the policy seeks to balance the rights of the individual with public safety.
PART 3 – CIVIC LICENSING

TAXIS AND PRIVATE HIRE CARS

Background

189. Taxi and private hire car services play an essential part in local transport networks, providing an invaluable service for both residents and visitors to Scotland. The aim of a licensing regime is the preservation of public safety and order and the prevention of crime. The Scottish Government needs, therefore, to have a licensing regime for taxis and private hire cars that can meet this aim and provide customers with a safe, reliable and accessible service.

190. Local authorities are responsible for the creation, management and enforcement of the local taxi and private hire car licensing regime following the framework provided for in the 1982 Act. In general this local process works well. Local authorities have discretion in applying a local regime that best meets the specific requirements of their local area and can take account of the views of both customers and trade.

191. However, the Scottish Government has been aware of a number of concerns with the taxi and private hire car licensing regime for some time. These have been highlighted by stakeholders during informal discussion and reinforced during the public consultation which closed last year. Concerns were largely based around 2 main elements:

192. Creating greater consistency within the regime and across different licensing regimes, in particular:
   - Addressing issues with the variability in how legislation is interpreted and implemented;
   - Encouraging a consistent approach to local authority practice where this is beneficial, while maintaining appropriate local flexibility;
   - Amending legislation to take account of the changes to the current market for hire car services.

193. Widening the scope of while tightening the regulation of licensing regime. In particular:
   - Addressing concerns that the legitimate trade is being unfairly challenged in some areas by businesses and individuals circumventing or abusing/ignoring the licensing regime. This then has an effect on public safety;
   - Improving compliance checking within the regime.

194. Both prior to and during the consultation there have been calls for a thorough and radical review of the 1982 Act. However, the Scottish Government believes that the 1982 Act allows local authorities sufficient and appropriate flexibility to adapt their local licensing regimes to their local circumstances. This is an important aspect of the licensing regime and the Scottish Government is keen to maintain the elements of the system that work well.
Policy objective

195. While the provisions within this Bill aim to partly address the concerns raised, this is part of a wider body of work that will be undertaken following the legislative process including updates to secondary legislation and guidance.

Creating greater consistency

196. A significant element of the purpose of the provisions allowing licensing authorities to refuse private hire car licences on the basis of overprovision and to test private hire car drivers, is to bring a degree of consistency in the way local licensing authorities can manage taxis and private hire cars if they so wish. They are not requirements and can be used alongside or independently from the similar powers in relation to taxis. This is, in part, an acknowledgement that in parts of the country, both taxis and private hire cars are essentially operating in a very similar market. Some of the distinctions between their mode of operation – pre-booking versus ranks and hailings – have been blurred with changes in technology.

197. The Scottish Government does not consider it appropriate or proportionate at this time to consider a change to the current structure of a two-tier licensing regime that makes a distinction between taxis and private hire cars. However, the Scottish Government understands that some local licensing authorities can experience difficulty with managing local provision without explicit tools such as an ability to limit numbers of private hire cars or require testing of private hire car drivers.

198. While the Scottish Government recognises that there will be benefits in bringing a more consistent approach to licensing taxis and private hire cars, significant distinctions remain between the two types of service. With the introduction of a power to refuse a private hire car licence on the basis of overprovision, the Scottish Government chose not to extend the provisions already in place in section 10(3) in relation to taxis using an assessment of ‘unmet demand’. Because private hire cars can only be pre-booked ‘demand’ for them cannot be measured in the same way e.g. waiting times. An over-supply of private hire cars manifests differently e.g. private hire cars attempting to pick up passengers without a pre-booking. The Scottish Government intends to provide updated guidance to local licensing authorities to share best practice in developing relevant policies.

199. The Scottish Government would expect local authorities to exhaust other means of controlling the negative impacts of overprovision before considering the use of this power, e.g. increasing enforcement activity against private hire cars attempting to pick up passengers without a pre-booking or ensuring stringent training is undertaken by drivers before being granted a licence to increase professionalism and legal operation.

Widening the scope and tightening the regulation of the licensing regime

200. The main provision in the Bill that will extend the licensing regime for taxis and private hire cars is the changes to section 22 of the 1982 Act which removes the exemption at subsection (c) that applies to ‘any vehicle while it is being used for carrying passengers under a contract for its exclusive hire for a period of not less than 24 hours’. This effectively brings hire cars that are being used on contract within the licensing regime for taxis and private hire cars. There is a view expressed by representatives from the police, local authorities and the currently licensed trade, that there are some types of work currently being undertaken under the section 22(c) exemption that are effectively private hire work. This area of licensing has been described as a ‘grey area’ and that there is a need for clarity to ensure the travelling public are benefitting from the same levels of scrutiny of the service as those travelling in taxis and private hire cars.

201. A similar exemption was removed from private hire licensing legislation in England and Wales, coming into effect in January 2008. A ‘Review of the Impact of the Repeal of the Private Hire Vehicle Contract Exemption’ was published in November 2009. This highlighted a number of lessons learned, particularly around the difficulty in estimating numbers of those who would be affected and the level and quality of guidance provided in advance of the repeal coming into effect. There had also been concerns that a wide variety of activities would be significantly affected by the repeal although this was not generally found to have happened. Taking account of the experience in England and Wales, the removal of the ‘contract exemption’ form the 1982 Act will not come into effect immediately. The Scottish Government has also taken the precaution of adding an order-making power which allows the Scottish Ministers to make regulations specifying further exemptions from taxi and private hire car licensing. This is to help address any issues with the removal of the exemption if it becomes clear there are significant unintended consequences affecting some types of operation.

202. The Scottish Government has had representations from companies currently operating under the exemption who have expressed concern at the impact of being brought within the licensing regime. This was not overwhelmingly against such an extension but explained the nature of their business and the difficulties they would face depending on how the exemption was introduced. The Scottish Government will use the time before this provision comes into effect to ensure all individuals and businesses that will be affected have an opportunity to clarify their own position and local authorities have an opportunity to develop appropriate policies and conditions to incorporate the new licence holders successfully.

Consultation

203. Since the end of 2011, officials have been reviewing information produced on the licensing regime to date and have had fresh discussions with stakeholders, including a public consultation which ran from 28 November 2012 to 15 March 2013. Sixty eight responses were received during the public consultation. In addition, officials attended a number of meetings to discuss the consultation. Representatives at these meetings included, passenger groups (primarily focussed on passengers with disabilities) local authority officials with responsibilities for licensing, police and trade (taxi, private hire and contract hire).

Alternative approaches (and role/place of legislative changes)

204. The provisions included within the Bill are part of a wider package of work that will be undertaken following this legislative process. This includes amendments to secondary legislation and updating guidance. The main elements that will be addressed via secondary legislation are an update to the Booking Office licensing regime and a consideration of mandatory conditions for all taxi and private hire car licence types.

205. The first alternative approach to the provisions presented here would be to do nothing. The 1982 Act provides a broad framework and local licensing authorities have a relatively high degree of flexibility in how they administer their local licensing regime. The licensing of taxis and private hire cars could continue without changes to primary legislation. However, the changes the Scottish Government is introducing recognise that there are some limitations on how licensing authorities can manage their local regimes.

206. The second alternative approach would be to radically overhaul the 1982 Act. Under this approach the Scottish Government could move to a fundamentally different approach e.g. a national licensing system or change fundamental elements of the current system e.g. moving to single tier licensing (merging taxis and private hire cars). The Scottish Government has stated that the Scottish Government believes the 1982 Act continues to serve the people of Scotland well and allows local authorities sufficient and appropriate flexibility to adapt their local licensing regimes to their local circumstances. This is an important aspect of the licensing regime and the Scottish Government is keen to maintain the elements of the system that work well. Any radical overhaul would also clearly require a very high level of resource and would cause significant disruption for the trade, local authorities, police and ultimately the travelling public.

207. The third alternative approach would be to rely solely on non-legislative activity and changes to secondary legislation. This will have some effect, but the Scottish Government believes it has been proportionate in selecting elements that will have a significant impact without dramatically changing the nature of a system that it believes is working well.

Effects on equal opportunities, human rights, island communities, sustainable development etc. of the taxi and private hire car provisions in the Bill

208. The provisions on taxi and private hire car licensing are not discriminatory on the basis of gender, race, age, disability, sexual orientation, marital status or religion.

209. The Scottish Government considers that the Bill does not impact on the human rights of those previously exempt from the taxi licensing regime via the exemption in section 22(c) of the 1982 Act. Although those currently exempt under section 22(c) may believe that their human rights are infringed by the application of the existing licensing system, the continued ability to provide transportation services will still be permitted if the conditions set out in the legislation are met. The Bill does not discriminate against individuals and the policy seeks to balance the rights of the individual with public safety of passengers and general crime prevention.

210. The regime does not have specific implications for island communities and the important elements of local flexibility are maintained within the licensing regime. The new provisions are flexibly drafted to allow different local authorities to tailor their approach to suit their needs and circumstances. The Scottish Government does not anticipate any implications for sustainable development.

METAL DEALERS

Background

211. Metal theft has been a growing problem in recent years. This has been driven in large part by rising prices for scrap metal in international commodity markets. There is therefore a correlation between rising international levels of construction and the incentive for criminality in Scotland. This has meant that whilst metal theft offences were relatively low in line with the economic slowdown of 2008-09, they have increased dramatically as the world economy has picked up.

212. Metal thefts have manifested in a variety of different forms ranging from low level opportunistic offences through to serious organised crime crossing international boundaries. Offences at the lower level have included theft of brass plaques and door knockers and removal of street furniture such as signage and benches. Rising up the scale there have been numerous examples of roof lead being taken from public buildings such as churches and schools and plant machinery being taken from hospitals. At the higher end there have been large scale thefts of miles of railway cable and electricity sub-stations that have caused significant disruption. There has also been an organised crime dimension with scrap metal appearing in container transports destined for abroad.

213. An important feature of metal theft is that the consequences of a metal theft are out of all proportion to the scrap value of the metal stolen. The costs of metal theft include the cost of replacement and repair, wider economic costs through delay and disruption to business and members of the public and in some cases there are emotional costs. At the extreme metal thefts have resulted in loss of life and serious injury.

214. For example the costs of a cable theft from a railway include delayed commuters being unable to reach places of work. The costs of attacks on the electricity networks have resulted in homes and businesses losing electricity for substantial periods. Loss of telephony and broadband services has a cost to business and causes real inconvenience to members of the public. There has also been widespread outrage caused by the theft of war memorial plaques and damage to churches and other historic buildings.

215. Particular examples include:

- Thieves cut power to 280 homes in Greenock and caused four house fires after stealing copper wire worth about £40 from an electricity substation. The wire theft from substation led to a dangerous power surge in some homes. Four fires have been reported, with one family having to flee their home. (BBC – 19 November 2013);

- In Milnathort bronze war memorial plaques were created as part of a £13,000 restoration of the memorial. They were stolen from the stone structure within hours of protective fencing being removed for its official unveiling. (BBC – 5 August 2013);

- Three separate incidents of cable theft on the same seven mile section of line between Huntly and Kennethmont on the Aberdeen to Inverness route. Engineers replaced over a mile of cable after it was stolen on three successive evenings from the Aberdeen to Inverness railway line. The theft caused the cancellation of trains between Inverurie and Huntly for a period of days (BBC – 31 July 2013);

- St Mary’s cathedral in Edinburgh suffered nine attacks on its roof in the space of two and a half years resulting in £40,000 of costs. (Scotsman – 10 April 2013);
• Since 2011 Scotland has seen 605 attacks on electricity sub-stations. The average direct cost of each attack is £2500 (labour and material costs) (Industry briefing paper 2014).

216. Because the costs of metal theft fall in such a widespread fashion covering both direct and indirect costs they are extremely difficult to measure. As explained above the costs go beyond the cost of replacing stolen metal and making good repairs, they extend to the costs of delayed commuters and lost services. Clearly the cost to a community of the loss of a war memorial or a local landmark such as a statue cannot adequately be expressed in monetary terms.

217. An earlier consultation by the Scottish Government on metal dealer regulation relied upon UK wide figures to estimate the cost to the economy of metal theft. A report commissioned by the Association of Chief Police Officers in 2010 estimated the UK wide costs at £770 million. A study by Deloittes posited a lower figure of £220 - £260 million. This suggested about £100 million of direct costs to conduct repair and replacements and a further £120 million to £160 million of indirect costs. A more recent study has been conducted by the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland and has for the first time looked at the situation specifically in Scotland. It estimated the value of metal theft in Scotland at just under £11 million over a two year period from 2011-2013. These figures relate purely to the value of the metal stolen and do not look at the indirect costs and collateral damage of these thefts. The true costs are therefore far higher.

218. Since metal theft emerged as a growing problem a variety of measures have been taken to tackle the problem. A dedicated task force has been established by The British Transport Police with a focus on visiting metal dealers and roadside stops amongst other activity.

219. The Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service has established a tougher prosecution policy which means there will be a strong presumption for prosecution of offenders at Sheriff Court level; the social and cultural impact of metal theft will be considered in addition to the financial impact; and victim impact statements will be submitted to the Court.

220. The Scottish Environment Protection Agency has been involved in action to ensure compliance with all aspects of environmental legislation with regard to the transportation of waste metal and its processing. This included possession of appropriate Waste Carriers Registrations, Scrap Metal Dealers licensing/ exemptions and delivering the expected duty of care.

221. A national metal theft working group has been established involving key players charged with reducing metal theft as well as frequent victims of metal theft such as infrastructure companies. The group has co-ordinated action against metal theft as well as sharing best practice in efforts to prevent and detect the crime by, for example, better labelling of metal, smart water technology, improved security etc..

222. In spite of this activity the Scottish Government is convinced that legislation is required to strengthen the current licensing regime for metal dealers that can no longer be regarded as fit for purpose.
Policy objective

223. The Scottish Government believes that efforts to reduce metal theft need to be supported by legislative action. Metal Dealers provide a valuable service to the community by providing a means for unwanted metal to be recycled into a useful raw material for manufacturers. The industry is a significant employer and is valued by industry estimates at £470 million. Nevertheless the scrap metal industry does provide a route by which a metal thief can convert their stolen goods into cash.

224. The industry has been regulated for over 30 years under the 1982 Act. A review of this legislation is now long overdue to ensure appropriate, robust and effective regulation of metal dealers and to close down the trade in stolen metal. The Bill therefore includes a number of proposals aimed at modernising the licensing regime and ensuring better oversight of dealers, improved record keeping and reliable identification of those selling metal for scrap. It also proposes that selling metal in exchange for cash would be prohibited so as to ensure an auditable, traceable transaction is established. These proposals support the aims of tackling areas of weakness in the current licensing scheme, providing a tighter licensing regime with stronger inspection and scrutiny of metal dealers and dealing with the perception that stealing metal and selling it to a scrap metal dealer is a crime that is unlikely to be detected. Improving detection and deterring thefts are at the heart of the proposals.

225. The Bill proposes specific steps to improve licensing arrangements; in particular:

- The removal of an exemption warrant system that allowed a metal dealer with a larger turnover to not be subjected to licensing requirements and therefore to be operating without appropriate levels of scrutiny;
- The limiting of payment for metal by metal dealers and itinerant metal dealers to prescribed methods i.e. bank transfer or cheque. By removing the option of paying in cash it will be ensured that a metal thief is not attracted by the possibility of being paid in an anonymous fashion. Instead, transactions will be traceable and auditable with a proper paper trail, thus deterring theft and increasing chances of detection;
- Improved standards for identification of customers by ensuring that proper ID is seen and recorded;
- Improved standards of record keeping by specifying the records that must be retained for inspection. These include details of the customer, details of the metal being bought or sold and documentation supporting the cashless payment;
- The removal of a mandatory requirement that dealers should not process metal for 48 hours after receiving it. It is felt that this step is impractical for many dealers and should not be a compulsory requirement (though local licensing could impose it case by case).

Consultation

226. An initial consultation on a limited proposal to increase the number of dealers falling into the licensing regime was conducted between November 2011 and February 2012. This consultation concluded that a wider package of proposals was required. A further consultation was conducted between April and July 2013 and included many of the proposals that are now being taken forward by the Bill.

227. The consultation showed widespread support for a toughening of the licensing regime for metal dealers. This support derived from local authority regulators, the Police and many of the organisations and businesses that find themselves regular victims of metal theft.

228. Dealers were for the most part accepting of the need for more effective regulation but were keen to ensure that their businesses were not damaged by excessive or inappropriate requirements.

Effects on equal opportunities, human rights, island communities, local government and sustainable development etc. of the metal dealers provisions in the Bill

229. The provisions on the metal dealers licensing regime are not discriminatory on the basis of gender, race, age, disability, sexual orientation, marital status or religion.

230. The Scottish Government considers that the Bill does not impact on the human rights of those previously exempt from the metal dealer licensing regime via the exemption provided in section 29 of the 1982 Act. Although those currently exempt under section 29 may believe that their human rights are infringed by the application of the existing licensing system, the continued ability to carry on the business of a metal dealer will still be permitted if the conditions set out in the legislation are met. The Bill does not discriminate against individuals and the policy seeks to balance the rights of the individual with public interest argument to minimise the potential for selling illegally obtained metal in order to address the harm caused by instances of metal theft.

231. The regime has no specific implications for island communities or sustainable development.

PUBLIC ENTERTAINMENT VENUES

Background

232. Licensing arrangements should be proportionate and appropriate to what is being regulated. In light of that the Scottish Government believes that less onerous licensing requirements for theatres may in some circumstances be appropriate.

233. Currently, theatres are licensed under the Theatres Act 1968. This is a mandatory licence that requires all premises at which public performances of a play are staged to be hold a licence. No allowance is made for the size of the premises or the potential audience. This contrasts with other forms of public entertainment which are licensed under the public entertainment licensing regime under the 1982 Act. This is a flexible system that allows local licensing authorities to determine in a local context how licensing should be regulated in their area. Authorities might, for example, use the current system to determine that concerts should require a public entertainment licence but not concerts with an audience of under 20 people.
By bringing theatres under the public entertainment licensing arrangements greater flexibility will be allowed. It will be open to a local licensing authority to exclude premises offering plays only to very small audiences from the licensing requirement.

It also allows greater consistency and legislative clarity by bringing theatres within the same public entertainment licensing arrangements as other forms of the arts such as concerts, comedy shows etc..

Policy objective

The Scottish Government proposes to repeal the licensing requirement for theatre under the Theatres Act 1968. It will therefore be possible to allow local licensing authorities to flexibly licence plays under local licensing requirements.

In addition the Bill replicates the anti-censorship provisions contained within the 1968 Act in the 1982 Act.

Consultation

Informal discussions have been held with those representing licensing authorities and arts groups.

Alternative approaches

It would be possible to continue with existing arrangements but that would not deliver the benefits of greater flexibility that will be delivered by the bill proposals.

The provisions on the public entertainment licensing regime are not discriminatory on the basis of gender, race, age, disability, sexual orientation, marital status or religion.

The Scottish Government considers that the Bill does not impact on the human rights of current theatre licence holders. Theatre licences have a maximum duration of one year. Ancillary provisions will provide that those in possession of a theatre licence will be allowed to carry out performances under that licence until such point as it expires. Thereafter theatres will be regulated through the public entertainment licensing regime in the 1982 Act.

The regime has no specific implications for island communities and the important elements of local flexibility are maintained within the licensing regime. There are no effects on sustainable development.
SEXUAL ENTERTAINMENT VENUES

Background

243. The Scottish Government is determined that appropriate licensing arrangements are put in place to regulate venues offering sexual entertainment such as lap dancing. Existing arrangements are no longer effective and our preferred way forward is to establish a dedicated licensing regime specifically for sexual entertainment venues.

244. It has long been recognised that licensing is required in this area. There are also concerns that the nature of sexual entertainment may associate with risk of criminality. As with other forms of public entertainment there are also risks of adverse impacts on neighbours and general disorder. There is also concern regarding the conditions in sexual entertainment venues. Evidence points to specific issues such as financial exploitation of dancers through too many dancers paying a fee to organisers but then finding not enough customers are attending to allow a return and physical issues such as inadequate changing areas.

245. Additionally, the Scottish Government’s definition of violence against women includes commercial sexual exploitation which encompasses the activities covered by this licensing regime. Local licensing authorities are best placed to reflect the views of the communities they serve and determine whether sexual entertainment establishments should be authorised and under what conditions. Where a venue is approved, licensing conditions and enforcement should assist in protecting the safety and wellbeing of both staff and customers and the wider public.

246. There has been a long history of attempts to improve regulation in this area. In 2005, the then Scottish Executive set up a Working Group on Adult Entertainment to review the scope and impact of adult entertainment activity and make recommendations to Ministers on the way forward. This followed concerns expressed about the lack of controls on adult entertainment activity. The Group made a number of recommendations aimed at improving standards in the industry, ensuring the safety of performers and customers, regulating the impact on the locality, improving local accountability and control and ensuring that there was no inadvertent impact on artistic freedoms. The full recommendations and post consultation work can be found in the Group’s reports:

247. At the time, it was felt that as sexual entertainment venues also sold alcohol and therefore required alcohol licenses, it was best left to local Licensing Boards to regulate adult entertainment via the licensing system of alcohol. It would be up to local boards to consider the situation in their locality and set policies accordingly. They would have the discretion to use the recommendations of the Working Group as a template.

248. A specific system of licensing for sexual entertainment was considered by the Scottish Parliament in 2010 as part of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010. These proposals largely mirrored those that had been introduced in England and Wales by the Policing and Crime Act 2009. Whilst the Scottish Government supported such a move, the Scottish
This document relates to the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 49) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 14 May 2014

Parliament rejected these proposals due to concerns around the effect of operating a dual licensing system with sexual entertainment being regulated under a regime of its own as well as under the alcohol licensing system. In addition, there was concern that the proposals were introduced late in the Bill process and had not had the opportunity for scrutiny.

249. However, the regulatory context has changed since 2010. Recent court judgements (see Brightcrew Ltd v The City of Glasgow Licensing Board [2011] ScotCS CSIH_46 (12 July 2011)) have called into question the ability of Licensing Boards to set conditions that stray from a tight focus on the sale of alcohol. This leaves uncertainty in the regulation of sexual entertainment, with many Licensing Boards believing that the alcohol licensing system is not, as currently constructed, able to provide adequate control, and that there is no effective alternative in place.

250. The view of the Scottish Government is that a specific licensing regime for sexual entertainment venues (of which the Scottish Government believes there are around 20 in Scotland) is the best solution for future regulation of the industry. It removes uncertainty around attempting to regulate under alcohol licensing matters that go beyond the remit of that scheme. It offers local licensing authorities the ability to consider local circumstances and develop approaches appropriate to those circumstances. This would include the ability to set a desired number of sexual entertainment premises for their area (and for that number to be zero). It would also include the ability to set conditions that control the conduct of activities on premises in their area.

251. The proposals put forward by the Scottish Government create a new licensing regime for sexual entertainment venues. The new regime falls into the civic licensing arrangements under the 1982 Act and uses in part the architecture of existing provisions for sex shops.

252. The provisions require a licence for premises operated as sexual entertainment venues for financial gain. Definition is provided as to what is meant by sexual entertainment both to capture what is intended to be licensed but to avoid licensing what is not. Definition is also provided for “nudity” to avoid the use of minimal or transparent garments to avoid circumvention of the licensing intent.

253. The proposals also allow for greater local control over the provision of sexual entertainment venues in an area. There are provisions for a local licensing authority to set an appropriate number of sexual entertainment venues for their area (and for that number to be zero). It would be grounds to refuse an application if the number of venues in an area or locality already meets the appropriate number.

254. Whilst it is expected that the licensing scheme will encompass lap dancing venues, depending upon the exact nature of the activities taking place a number of other activities could be included e.g. strip shows, peep shows, live sex shows. Powers are taken to specify by order exceptions from the licensing requirement. These could be used if it transpires that some unanticipated activity is falling within the licensing ambit.
255. It is intended that any premises that holds activities falling within licensing on less than four occasions in a twelve month period should not be licensed. Whilst the number is arbitrary, it is not intended that very occasional activity should be licensed e.g. a pub which allows a birthday party with some sort of performance. Whilst there is no distinction in the activity, frequency makes a qualitative difference and to not allow a de minimis level of activity would significantly increase the scope of the scheme. The de minimis level has not been set so high so as to allow a loophole to emerge whereby frequent activity is unlicensed.

Consultation

256. A consultation on legislative proposals was conducted between April and September 2013. The consultation attracted a significant response, albeit 90% of the responders were near identical responses sent as part of an organised campaign of opposition to a licensing scheme. Whilst the responders did not identify themselves it can be inferred that they were from those who either work in the industry or those who are customers.

257. Amongst the other responders (local authorities, Police and violence against women and gender groups principally) there was wide support for the principle of a new licensing regime.

258. Concern was raised by some arts organisations about possible inadvertent impact on their activities.

Alternative approaches

259. It would be possible to continue to regulate sexual entertainment venues through existing alcohol licensing arrangements. As discussed above, however, this no longer offers an effective means of regulation. Licensing Boards are too circumscribed in their ability to set conditions or to refuse licence applications where they deem it necessary.

Effects on equal opportunities, human rights, island communities, and sustainable development etc. of the sexual entertainment provisions in the Bill

260. The provisions on licensing of sexual entertainment are not discriminatory on the basis of gender, race, age, disability, sexual orientation, marital status or religion.

261. The Scottish Government considers that the Bill does not impact on the human rights of those who operate sexual entertainment venues. Although current owners of sexual entertainment venues may believe that there human rights are infringed by the introduction of a specific entertainment venue licence. Where a local authority decides that the licensing of sexual entertainment venues should apply to their area, the continued ability to carry on the business of a sexual entertainment venue will still be permitted if the conditions set out in the legislation are met.

262. There is however a possibility that a local authority will decide that whilst licensing of sexual entertainment venues should apply to their area, they may also determine that the appropriate number of said venues for their area is less than the number present (or zero). In such circumstances, an existing venue may not be granted a licence. The Scottish Government considers that sexual entertainment venue legislative provisions are capable of being compliant with the convention rights on the basis of being legitimate means of reducing serious criminality. However, the local authority in implementing the provisions shall have to ensure that they give effect to the provisions in a manner likewise complaint with the convention rights and do not put in place a blanket ban or rigid policies which take no consideration of the merits of each case.

263. The Bill does not discriminate against individuals and the policy seeks to balance the rights of the individual with public interest of reducing serious organised crime.

264. The regime has no specific implications for island communities and the important elements of local flexibility are maintained within the licensing regime. There are no effects on sustainable development. Whilst the proposals are not discriminatory per se there is a clear gender based impact given the overwhelming majority of those employed in the industry are female.

MISCELLANEOUS AND GENERAL

Background

265. In addition to the amendments to specific regimes within the 1982 Act, there are additional provisions that will have effect across the licensing Parts of the 1982 Act and aim to create greater consistency and clarity in the licensing regime.

Policy objectives

Creating greater consistency

266. The Bill includes the power for the Scottish Ministers to make provision for the procedure to be followed at or in connection with hearings. This power will provide Ministers with the ability, if considered necessary and appropriate, to bring a level of consistency in the way hearings are conducted both across local licensing authorities and across civic and alcohol regimes. There are some similarities in the needs of participants in hearing processes across alcohol and civic regimes. If any issues are being resolved in relation to hearings under alcohol licensing, using the similar power, it would be helpful to be able to transfer any useful practice across to the civic regimes.

267. The Bill creates a new role of ‘Civic Licensing Standards Officer’ (CLSO). The purpose of this is to provide a mandatory element of capacity to check compliance and provide guidance within the civic regimes. The provisions introduce a statutory requirement for a new role with the same powers and duties as an ‘authorised officer’ within the 1982 Act but with specific functions in relation to providing information and guidance, checking compliance, providing mediation and taking appropriate action on perceived breaches of conditions to a licence provided under the 1982 Act. This is modelled on the successful Licensing Standards Officer (LSO) role within the 2005 Act. The Scottish Government is aware that many local licensing authorities already have in place high quality support of this kind and it is not intended to not disrupt good practice where it is happening.
Providing clarity

268. Where it has not already been provided for, the Bill will provide for the deemed granting of a licence where the Local Authority has not either decided on an application or sought an extension from the sheriff within a set period. It is already the case that civic licensing decisions need to be reached within a period of nine months, with three months being allowed for a licensing authority to consider an application and a further 6 months being allowed for a final decision to be reached. If a decision is not reached then the application is deemed to have been granted. This procedure enables an applicant to be confident that a decision making process cannot be allowed to drag on indefinitely. The Bill proposes extending the deemed authorisation procedure beyond applications to other matter such as applications for variations and temporary licences.

269. The Scottish Government believes that businesses and individuals should be able to interact with licensing authorities in the way that is most efficient and convenient. For most people, that means being able to submit applications and other communications electronically. Whilst many licensing authorities already accept applications in that fashion, the Bill takes the opportunity to make clear that electronic applications are acceptable.

Consultation

270. Questions were asked in relation to the provisions on hearings and CLSOs in the consultation to proposed changes to the licensing regime for taxi and private hire cars. Additionally, the Scottish Government has had informal discussion with stakeholders, primarily with representatives from local licensing authorities in order to refine our understanding of the impact these provisions may have.

271. There were some proposals consulted on that either did not receive a great deal of support and/or were not considered to have a sufficiently significant impact to justify legislative change. These include: the introduction of licensing objectives to the 1982 Act; a change to the structure of the consideration of ‘fit and proper’ in a licence application; and the introduction of a time limit within which police should provide information in relation to an application.

272. An alternative approach to the selected provisions would be to do nothing and make no changes to the primary legislation. The 1982 Act provides a broad framework and local licensing authorities have a relatively high degree of flexibility in how they administer their local licensing regime. This is a key feature of the 1982 Act. However, this would mean the Scottish Government would be unable to bring any consistency or clarity to significant elements of the Act where it has received representation that this would be beneficial or indeed necessary in order to ensure compliance with the EU Services Directive. In relation to hearings, it is seen as a proportionate response to provide an order-making power to enable us to make regulations at an appropriate time after further engagement rather than provide detailed prescription at this point.

273. Another alternative approach would be to provide more prescriptive requirements e.g. in relation to the CLSO role. However, the Scottish Government recognises that, in the case of
This document relates to the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 49) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 14 May 2014

CLSOs, local authorities require a reasonable degree of flexibility to ensure they can respond in a way that best suits their circumstances.

Effects on equal opportunities, human rights, island communities, sustainable development etc. of miscellaneous and general provisions in the Bill

274. The provisions are not discriminatory on the basis of gender, race, age, disability, sexual orientation, marital status or religion.

275. The Scottish Government considers that the introduction of CLSOs in the Bill does not infringe on the human rights of those who operate in the areas subject to a licensing regime provided in Part 2 & 3 of the 1982 Act. The powers of entry, inspection, testing of vehicles, search, seizure and forfeiture conferred on CLSOs, are already conferred on authorised officers of the licensing authority in the 1982 Act.

276. The Scottish Government considers that the addition of CLSOs to exercise these existing functions does not raise any additional questions regarding an interference in the possessions or right to respect for private and family life of those who operate in the areas subject to a licensing regime provided in Part 2 & 3 of the 1982 Act. The Bill does not discriminate against individuals and the policy seeks to balance the rights of the individual with the public interest argument of ensuring that all those who work in the areas subject to a licensing regime provided in Part 2 & 3 of the 1982 Act, would be subject to the enforcement provisions provided by existing authorised officers and by the new CLSOs.

277. The regime has no specific implications for island communities and the important elements of local flexibility are maintained within the licensing regime. There are no effects on sustainable development.

AIR WEAPONS AND LICENSING (SCOTLAND) BILL

DELEGATED POWERS MEMORANDUM

PURPOSE

1. This memorandum has been prepared by the Scottish Government in accordance with Rule 9.4A of the Parliament’s Standing Orders, in relation to the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. It describes the purpose of each of the subordinate legislation provisions in the Bill and outlines the reasons for seeking the proposed powers. This memorandum should be read in conjunction with the Explanatory Notes and Policy Memorandum for the Bill.

2. The contents of the Memorandum are entirely the responsibility of the Scottish Government and have not been endorsed by Parliament.

Outline of Bill provisions

3. The purpose of Part 1 of the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill is to protect public safety by creating a new licensing regime for air weapons. Parts 2 and 3 of the Bill aim to strengthen and improve aspects of locally led alcohol and civic government licensing in order to preserve public order and safety, reduce crime, and to advance public health. A number of the provisions in Parts 2 and 3 are directed at improving the efficiency of the operation of the licensing regimes contributing to the creation of a better regulatory environment for business.

4. Alongside the regulation of air weapons, the Bill amends the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 (‘the 2005 Act’, licensing alcohol) and the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 (‘the 1982 Act’, covering other local licensing regimes). The key provisions include:

- Giving local authorities the power to regulate sexual entertainment venues in their areas so that both performers and customers benefit from a safe, regulated environment;

- Closing a loophole allowing adults to supply under-18s with alcohol for consumption in a public place;

- Extending the breadth of information available to Licensing Boards to enable them to make better alcohol licensing decisions;
This document relates to the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (SP Bill 49) as introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 14 May 2014

- Removing an exemption from licensing for metal dealers with a larger turnover; banning cash payments for metal by metal dealers or itinerant metal dealers; Removing the mandatory requirement that metal dealers should not process metal for 48 hours after receiving it;

- Allowing licensing authorities to refuse private hire car licences on the basis of overprovision and to require testing of private hire car drivers. The Bill will also remove an exemption from licensing for hire cars used on contract;

- The creation of a new role - the ‘Civic Licensing Standards Officer’ - with specific functions to provide information and guidance, check compliance, provide mediation and take appropriate action on perceived breaches of conditions to a licence provided under the 1982 Act.

Rationale for subordinate legislation

5. In deciding whether provision should be set out in subordinate legislation rather than on the face of the Bill, the Scottish Government has considered the need to:

- Strike the right balance between the importance of the issue and providing sufficient flexibility to respond to changing circumstances without the need for primary legislation;

- Anticipate the unexpected, which might otherwise frustrate the purpose of the provision in primary legislation approved by the Parliament;

- Make proper use of valuable parliamentary time;

- Allow detailed administrative arrangements to be kept up to date within the basic structures set out in the Bill; and

- Take account of the likely frequency of amendment.

6. The relevant provisions are described in detail below. For each provision, the memorandum sets out:

- The person upon whom the power to make subordinate legislation is conferred and the form in which the power is to be exercised;

- Why it is considered appropriate to delegate the power to subordinate legislation and the purpose of each such provision; and

- The parliamentary procedure to which the exercise of the power to make subordinate legislation is to be subject, if any.
DELEGATED POWERS

Part 1 – Air Weapons

Section 2(4) – Power to add or modify exemptions

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations made by Scottish Statutory Instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative Procedure

Provision

7. Section 2 makes it an offence for a person to use, possess, purchase or acquire an air weapon (as defined in section 1) without holding a valid air weapon certificate. Subsection (3) introduces schedule 1, which sets out a number of exemptions from the requirement to hold an air weapon certificate, and certain other offences created by the Part.

8. Subsection (4) provides the Scottish Ministers with the power to add, remove or modify exemptions in schedule 1 by regulations.

Reason for Taking Power

9. The list of exemptions from the requirement to hold an air weapon certificate (as well as certain other offences) in schedule 1 is drawn from a number of sources, primarily existing UK firearms legislation, as well as views put forward by members of the Scottish Firearms Consultative Panel and consultation respondents regarding suitable air weapon use. The Scottish Government considers that the schedule currently captures all of the detailed situations where air weapon possession and use without a certificate should be permissible. However, it is possible that the list may require to be amended in the future, for example to reflect changing practices, new technologies or events in general. It is considered appropriate to have the flexibility to make any such changes – which are likely to be detailed in nature and could be needed quickly – by subordinate legislation, rather than requiring further primary legislation.

Reason for Choice of Procedure

10. Amending the schedule of exemptions would change the provisions of the Act as agreed by Parliament and, separately, might potentially have significant impacts on certain individuals or businesses (for example, by criminalising certain activities if an air weapon certificate is not held). The Scottish Government therefore considers it appropriate that changes be subject to the affirmative procedure, to ensure that full consideration can be given by Parliament to them and their potential impact.
Section 8(3) – Power to modify duration of air weapon certificate

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations made by Scottish Statutory Instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative Procedure

Provision

11. Section 8, subsection (1)(b) sets the normal duration of air weapon certificates at 5 years, except in the case of a certificate issued to a 14-17 year old, where subsection (1)(a) provides that the certificate expires on the holder’s 18th birthday.

12. Subsection (3) provides Scottish Ministers with the power to change the 5 year duration of air weapon certificates in subsection (1)(b).

Reason for Taking Power

13. The 5 year duration for most air weapon certificates matches current arrangements for firearm and shotgun certificates issued under the 1968 Act, which remain reserved to Westminster. It is considered appropriate to have the flexibility to change this duration to mirror future changes to the arrangements for firearm or shotgun certificates by the Westminster Government or to reflect changing policy, for example following devolution of all firearms powers to the Scottish Parliament. This would ensure that all types of certificate can continue to be issued co-terminously.

Reason for Choice of Procedure

14. It is considered appropriate that such an amendment be subject to the affirmative procedure, to ensure that full consideration can be given to the potential impact and because any change would amend the text of the Act directly.

Section 20(3) – Power to modify duration of approval of an air weapon club

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations made by Scottish Statutory Instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative Procedure

Provision

15. Section 20, subsection (1) sets the duration of air weapon club approvals at 6 years. The Chief Constable may approve an air weapon club and in doing so impose conditions. Such approval allows members of these clubs to benefit from the exemption in paragraph 1 of schedule 1 and allow them to put forward approved club membership as evidence that they meet the good reason test in section 5(1)(c).
16. Subsection (3) provides Scottish Ministers with the power to amend subsection (1) to specify a different period.

Reason for Taking Power

17. As with certificate durations set out above, the 6 year duration for air weapon club approvals matches current arrangements for rifle club approvals under the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1988, which remain reserved to Westminster. Again, the Scottish Government considers it is appropriate to have the flexibility to mirror changes made by the Westminster Government, or to reflect changing policy, for example following devolution of all firearms powers to the Scottish Parliament. This would ensure that approvals for rifle clubs and air weapon clubs can continue to be issued co-terminously.

Reason for Choice of Procedure

18. It is considered appropriate that such an amendment be subject to the affirmative procedure, to ensure that full consideration can be given to the potential impact and because any change would amend the text of the Act directly.

Section 36(1) – Power to prescribe fees

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations made by Scottish Statutory Instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative Procedure

Provision

19. Section 36 allows Scottish Ministers to set out fees for various aspects of the air weapon licensing regime in secondary legislation.

Reason for Taking Power

20. The Chief Constable will be able to charge a fee for a wide range of functions relating to the administration of the air weapon licensing regime, including considering an application for an air weapon certificate or permit, varying or renewing a certificate that has previously been granted, and replacing lost or damaged certificates. Fees will also be different depending on individual circumstances: for example, a reduced fee for an air weapon certificate that is co-terminous with a firearm or shotgun certificate; or a reduced fee for a short-term air weapon certificate granted to an under-18 that expires on their 18th birthday. In order to allow sufficient flexibility to take account of future changes in practice and cost, it is considered appropriate that the detailed tariff of fees be set out in secondary legislation, rather than on the face of the Bill.

21. Separately, it will be necessary from time to time to adjust this tariff of fees, for example in line with inflation, to maintain consistency with wider firearm and shotgun licensing fees (which are currently set by the Westminster Government), or to reflect other changes to the air weapon licensing regime such as the adoption of new licensing processes.
Reason for Choice of Procedure

22. The setting and adjustment of fees in relation to the air weapon licensing regime is likely to reflect, directly, practical factors such as inflation and police operational costs. The fees are also likely to be detailed and technical in subject-matter. Regulations setting fees are typically made by negative procedure, e.g. fees under section 25 of the Marine (Scotland) Act 2010, section 136 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005, Schedule 10 to the Gambling Act 2005 and section 43 of the Firearms Act 1968. It is therefore considered appropriate that the negative procedure be used, to allow for speed and flexibility and to provide the balance required between scrutiny and the use of valuable parliamentary resources.

Section 37(1) – Power to make further provision

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations made by Scottish Statutory Instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative Procedure

Provision

23. Section 37 allows Scottish Ministers to make regulations for the purposes of the Part and in particular for setting out detailed provisions regarding the application and grant process for air weapon certificates, police permits, visitor permits, event permits, or club approvals.

Reason for Taking Power

24. This is a broadly framed power to allow the administrative minutiae of the air weapons licensing regime to be set out in secondary legislation. This will include, for example, setting out application forms for air weapon certificates, permits, and air weapon club approvals, as well as setting out the standard format that these certificates, permits and approvals must take if granted. Regulations may also set out details such as mandatory conditions to be attached to all air weapon certificates, permits and club approvals, and information that must accompany applications (e.g. photographs).

25. Because these regulations will contain a considerable level of administrative detail, it is considered appropriate that they be dealt with through secondary legislation rather than on the face of the Bill. It may also be necessary to amend the administrative arrangements set out in the regulations from time to time, which is more efficiently achieved through secondary legislation.

Choice of Procedure

26. As with delegated powers for air weapon licensing fees, air weapon licensing regulations are likely to be detailed and administrative in nature, and may require to be amended periodically and potentially at short notice. It is therefore considered appropriate that the negative procedure be used so as to achieve the best balance between use of parliamentary time on the one hand and the nature of the content of the regulations on the other.
Part 2 – Alcohol

Section 55 – Power to make provision about annual financial reports

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations made by Scottish Statutory Instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative procedure - where regulations contain provisions which amend section 9A(3). Negative procedure – where the regulations do not amend the primary legislation.

Provision

27. Section 55 inserts section 9A into the 2005 Act requiring Licensing Boards to produce an annual financial report on their alcohol licensing activities.

28. Section 9A(6) gives Scottish Ministers a regulation making power to make further provision about reports under this section, including provision about the form and content of reports; further details on what constitutes relevant income and relevant expenditure; and the publication of reports.

Reason for Taking Power

29. Rather than set out a definitive list of what can be included in the annual financial report on the face of the Bill, it is considered appropriate to provide such detail in subordinate legislation. This will allow Scottish Ministers the flexibility to modify the details of such financial reports without amending primary legislation. However, it is also recognised that there might be situations where it is appropriate to adjust the definitions in section 9A itself and accordingly the provision caters for that possibility.

Choice of Procedure

30. Where the regulations will amend the text of primary legislation it is considered appropriate to allow Parliament to have a greater level of scrutiny as afforded by affirmative procedure. However where the regulations are merely technical requiring publication of the report or specifying the format of such, then it is considered that such will be of limited effect and impact and therefore negative procedure would provide the appropriate balance between scrutiny and the use of valuable parliamentary resources.

Section 59 – Extension of powers to make provision about forms of applications etc.

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations made by Scottish Statutory Instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative Procedure

Provision

31. Section 59 slightly expands the regulation making power already provided for at section 134 of the 2005 Act in relation to the form etc. of applications, proposals and notices to also include other communications. For example, Scottish Ministers may make regulations expressly facilitating the use of email or other internet based systems for any type of application, notice, proposal or communication required under the 2005 Act.

Reason for Taking Power

32. Section 134 of the 2005 Act allows the Scottish Ministers to make regulations in respect of applications, proposals and notices under the Act. This has been broadened slightly to also include ‘other communications required’ to enable the Scottish Ministers to make regulations to provide explicit compliance with the requirements of the EU Services Directive in relation to the EU Services Directive, Article 8, ‘Procedures by electronic means’, namely that all procedures and formalities relating to access to a service activity and to the exercise thereof may be easily completed, at a distance and by electronic means.

Choice of Procedure

33. This regulation making power is subject to negative procedure as per section 146(4) of the 2005 Act. The changes made to its breadth are not such that the procedure needs to be revisited. As these regulations relate to practical and administrative matters, the negative procedure continues to provide the appropriate balance of scrutiny and use of parliamentary resource.

Part 3 – Civic Licensing

Taxis and Private Hire Cars

Section 62 – Power to specify exemptions to the licensing regime for taxis and private hire cars

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations made by Scottish Statutory Instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative Procedure

Provision

34. Section 62 amends section 22 of the 1982 Act to remove the exemption currently provided in paragraph (c) which applies to ‘any vehicle while it is being used for carrying passengers under a contract for its exclusive hire for a period of not less than 24 hours’. This amendment brings vehicles that are being used on contract in this manner into the licensing regime for taxis and private hire cars.

35. Subsection (4) inserts section 22(2) into the 1982 Act to provide the Scottish Ministers with the power to specify by regulations further exemptions from taxi and private hire car licensing regime.
Reason for Taking Power

36. By removing the ‘contract exemption’ from taxi and private hire car licensing, the Bill is widening the scope of types of operation that could be covered by taxi and private hire car licensing. England and Wales repealed a similar exemption in 2008 and a review of that process highlighted as one of the unintended consequences a degree of confusion in what should be covered by the licensing regime (following the repeal). The Scottish Government intends to address this prior to commencement with clear guidance. However, if it transpires that types of service not intended to be covered are routinely being swept up in taxi and private hire car licensing (with the removal of this exemption), this regulation making power will be used to specifically exempt them.

37. An example would be where a service is providing some kind of transport as an ancillary part of the wider service where the transport aspect is not the main focus. It is considered appropriate to have the flexibility to make any such additional exemptions by subordinate legislation, rather than requiring further primary legislation. Additional exemptions may require to be made quickly in order to provide that individuals or businesses not intended to be covered by the licensing regime are not inadvertently faced with the requirements of complying with the licensing regime.

Choice of Procedure

38. The regulations are subject to negative procedure which is considered appropriate. It is not intended that the regulations will change the provisions of the Act. Instead they will provide the flexibility to provide additional exemptions to the taxi and private hire car licensing regime as a need to do so is identified. It is anticipated that further exemptions from licensing which may be provided by this regulation making power are unlikely to be disputed and consequently it should not be necessary to require a debate on each occasion that it is used. As such, it is considered that the use of negative procedure would be appropriate here bearing in mind the balance required between scrutiny and the use of valuable parliamentary resources.

Metal Dealers

Section 65 – Power to make provision about acceptable forms of payment for metal

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations made by Scottish Statutory Instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative Procedure

Provision

39. Section 65 creates a new section 33A in the 1982 Act. This specifies acceptable forms of payment that may be accepted by a metal dealer or itinerant metal dealer. The acceptable forms of payment are a cheque or electronic transfer.

40. Section 33A(7) provides Scottish Ministers the power by regulation to add, amend or remove forms of payment that are acceptable. It also enables the Scottish Ministers to make appropriate consequential modifications to the record keeping requirements specified in section 33B(3).

Reason for Taking Power

41. The purpose of section 33A is to specify the types of payment methods permitted for the purchase of metal in order to make metal transactions more traceable and provide an effective audit trail. The overall intention is to combat instances of metal theft. However, methods of payment are subject to change due to rapidly changing technology and consumer habits. It is considered appropriate to have the flexibility to add to, amend or remove the specified payment methods by subordinate legislation, rather than requiring further primary legislation. There may be a need to respond quickly if currently specified methods of payment no longer achieve the overall intention of section 33A and/or where new methods of payment provide the appropriate level of traceability and audit. This will ensure the legislation can keep pace with these types of change and ensures metal dealers and itinerant metal dealers can keep pace with appropriate new technology.

Choice of Procedure

42. Amending the new section 33A(2) would change the provisions of the Act as agreed by Parliament and, separately, might potentially have significant impacts on certain individuals or businesses. The Scottish Government therefore considers it appropriate that changes be subject to the affirmative procedure, to ensure that full consideration can be given by Parliament to them and their potential impact.

Section 66 – Power to make provision about metal dealers’ records

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations made by Scottish Statutory Instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative Procedure

 Provision

43. Section 66 amends the record keeping requirements for metal dealers and itinerant metal dealers. A new section 33B is inserted into the 1982 Act and provides the details that must be recorded by a dealer when metal is acquired or disposed of and supports the separate provisions stipulating acceptable forms of payment by requiring dealers to keep copies of documentation evidencing the form of payment used.

44. Subsection (6) of section 33B provides the Scottish Ministers with the power to amend the record keeping requirement by regulations.
Reason for Taking Power

45. The power allows for the requirement of additional information to be recorded by metal dealers or itinerant metal dealers. This could be used, for example, to specify particular forms of identification as being acceptable. It is considered appropriate to have the flexibility to make any such additional requirements by subordinate legislation, rather than requiring further primary legislation.

Choice of Procedure

46. The regulations are subject to negative procedure which is considered appropriate. It is not intended that the regulations will change the provisions of the Act. Instead they will provide the flexibility to require additional information to be recorded by metal dealers and itinerant metal dealers. It is not anticipated that this additional information, such as specification for acceptable forms of identification, will be controversial and consequently it should not be necessary to require a debate on each occasion that it is used. As such, it is considered that the use of negative procedure would be appropriate here bearing in mind the balance required between scrutiny and the use of valuable parliamentary resources.

Sexual Entertainment Venues

Section 68 – Power to specify premises that are not sexual entertainment venues

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish Statutory Instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative Procedure

Provision

47. Section 68 creates a new licensing regime for sexual entertainment venues by inserting section 45A into the 1982 Act. Section 45A establishes what is meant by a sexual entertainment venue and provides definitions of ‘audience’, ‘financial gain’, ‘organiser’, ‘premises’, ’sexual entertainment’ itself and ‘display of nudity’.

48. Sex shops are specifically identified as not being sexual entertainment venues at section 45A(7)(a). A power is provided at section 45A(7)(b) to allow Scottish Ministers to prescribe other types of premises that are not sexual entertainment venues.

Reason for Taking Power

49. The inclusion of this power allows the Scottish Ministers to respond quickly and flexibly in circumstances where venues are inadvertently caught under the legislation and it was not intended that such venues would be subject to this licensing regime.
Choice of Procedure

50. It is considered that this power has a very narrow focus and will be used in very limited circumstances. Accordingly it is considered that negative procedure would be appropriate to provide the balance required between scrutiny and the use of valuable parliamentary resources, particularly given that the Scottish Government would like to be able to act swiftly to avoid inappropriate venues being required to apply for licences.

Section 68 – Power to provide for descriptions of performances or descriptions for displays of nudity which are not to be treated as sexual entertainment.

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish Statutory Instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative Procedure

Provision

51. A further power is provided for in section 45A(11) of the 1982 Act to allow Scottish Ministers to prescribe descriptions of performances or displays of nudity that are not to be treated as sexual entertainment for the purposes of the legislation.

Reason for Taking Power

52. This power allows the Scottish Ministers to respond quickly and flexibly if types of performance are being inadvertently included within the sexual entertainment venue licensing regime that were not intended to be covered.

Choice of Procedure

53. Again, as in paragraph 50, it is anticipated that the use of this power will have a very narrow focus and be utilised only in very limited circumstances. It is to be used swiftly to avoid the unnecessary licensing of certain performances which were not intended to be caught under the regime and therefore it is considered that negative procedure is appropriate here to provide the balance required between scrutiny and the use of valuable parliamentary resources.

Miscellaneous and general

Section 70 – Power to make provision about hearings of licensing authorities

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations made by Scottish Statutory Instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Negative Procedure

Provision

54. Section 70 amends the 1982 Act by inserting paragraph 18A, in Schedule 1 and inserting paragraph 24A in Schedule 2. The new paragraphs create regulation making powers to allow the Scottish Ministers to make provision about hearings in relation to activities licensed under Parts 1 to 3 of the 1982 Act. The regulations may cover notice of hearings, rules of evidence, representation, timescales for steps in the procedure, and liability for expenses. The regulations may differentiate between different purposes, for example, different types of licence.

Reason for Taking Power

55. These powers will provide Ministers with the ability, if considered necessary and appropriate, to bring a level of consistency in the way hearings are conducted. There is a similar power in the 2005 Act to cover alcohol licensing. There are some similarities in the needs of participants in hearing processes under alcohol and civic regimes. If any issues are being resolved in relation to hearings under alcohol licensing, using the similar power, it would be helpful to be able to transfer any useful practice across to the civic regimes.

Choice of Procedure

56. It is anticipated that the making of regulations in relation to hearings is unlikely to be controversial. They will primarily be used for regulating and standardising procedure. The detailed preparation of the regulations will be done in consultation with relevant bodies, including local authorities and consequently it is considered that the use of negative procedure would be appropriate here bearing in mind the balance between scrutiny and the use of valuable parliamentary resources.

Section 71 – Power to prescribe mandatory conditions

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish Statutory Instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative Procedure

Provision

57. This section allows Ministers to set mandatory conditions that would apply to all licences issued under Part 3 of the 1982 Act, including the regime for sexual entertainment venues (inserted by section 69). The condition setting power is broad, would be specified by order and could encompass different licences and particular purposes and sets of circumstances or cases.

Reason for Taking Power

58. This recreates powers that already exist in respect of other activities licensed under Part 2 of the 1982 Act. The ability to set conditions is a core element of most licensing regimes. This will allow Scottish Ministers to set mandatory conditions to ensure that licensing is able to achieve objectives such as ensuring public safety.

Choice of Procedure

59. A similar power in respect of Part 2 licences is subject to affirmative procedure. It is considered that such procedure would also be appropriate here as the power may have a fairly significant impact on licence holders and as such full consideration of it should be available to Parliament.

Part 4 – General Provision

Section 76 – Ancillary provision

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Regulations made by Scottish Statutory Instrument
Parliamentary procedure: Affirmative procedure - where regulations amend primary legislation. Negative procedure - where the regulations do not amend primary legislation.

Provision

60. Section 76 confers on the Scottish Ministers a power to make incidental, supplementary, consequential, transitional, transitory or saving provision for the purposes of, or in consequence of, or for giving full effect to, any provision of this Act or any provision made under it.

Reason for Taking Power

61. Any body of new law or regulatory regime may give rise to a need for a range of ancillary provisions. Without the power to make incidental, supplementary and consequential provision it may be necessary to return to the Parliament, through subsequent primary legislation, to deal with minor matters which require to be dealt with to give full effect to the original Bill. That would not be an effective use of either the Parliament’s or the Government’s resources. The power itself is circumscribed by being entirely ancillary to the provisions of the Bill and any such provision must be for the purposes of the Bill or in consequence of it or for giving full effect to it. In addition, with the introduction of new regulatory regimes and the adjustment of several existing licensing regimes, it is considered possible that significant transitional, transitory or savings provision may be required to ensure that the regimes are introduced (or continue to function) smoothly with the minimum of disruption to both the licensing authorities and the licensees. It is appropriate for significant transitional, transitory or saving provision (as opposed to routine provision connected to commencement) to be subject to parliamentary procedure.

Choice of Procedure

62. Section 75(3) of the Bill provides that any regulations made under section 76 will be subject to affirmative procedure if it contains provisions which make textual changes to an Act. Otherwise, it will be subject to negative procedure. This provides the appropriate level of parliamentary scrutiny for the textual amendment of primary legislation while ensuring that other ancillary provision is still subject to appropriate scrutiny by Parliament.
Section 78 – Commencement

Power conferred on: Scottish Ministers
Power exercisable by: Order made by Scottish Statutory Instrument
Parliamentary procedure: No parliamentary procedure

Provision

63. This section provides that all of the provisions of the Bill, except certain provisions in Part 4 containing definitions and subordinate legislation making powers, shall come into force on a day specified by the Scottish Ministers by order.

Reason for Taking Power

64. In a Bill of this nature which makes a number of reforms, the decision on when and to what extent the Bill is commenced is best determined by the Scottish Ministers, particularly as Ministers may wish (or find it appropriate) to commence provisions at different times. Transitional, transitory and saving provision may be made by a commencement order and the Scottish Government considers that those ancillary powers are required to ensure that, for example, pre-existing situations may be dealt with appropriately when Bill provisions are commenced.

Choice of Procedure

65. Section 78 has the effect that any such commencement order will not be subject to parliamentary procedure. This is typical of commencement powers and is justified having regard to the administrative nature of commencement of the Bill provisions which have been agreed to by the Scottish Parliament.
Dear Quentin

Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill: Clarification and elaboration on detail in the Policy Memorandum

The Local Government and Regeneration Committee agreed its approach to the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill at its meeting on 19 June, and will launch its call for evidence on the Bill on Tuesday 1 July.

As part of its approach, the Committee has agreed I write to you seeking clarification on a number of issues relating to the Policy Memorandum (“PM”) which accompanies the Bill (see annex). The questions are designed to seek elaboration on the information contains in the PM to inform the Committee scrutiny, and make it easier to meet the challenging parliamentary timetable for consideration. Full responses should significantly reduce the information the Committee will require to gather during the Stage 1 process.

Given the above the Committee have requested that a response to all questions together with any other information you consider relevant should be provided by 1 September 2014. This will also assist those who will be wishing to provide written evidence to the Committee.

Yours sincerely

David Cullum
Clerk to the Committee

CC: Joe FitzPatrick MSP – Minister for Parliamentary Business
    David McGill – Head of Chamber Office, Scottish Parliament
    Susan Duffy – Head of Committees and Outreach, Scottish Parliament
    Tracey White – Head of Legislation Team, Scottish Government
    Jim Johnstone – Clerk to the Finance Committee, Scottish Parliament
    Euan Donald – Clerk to the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee, Scottish Parliament.
In general, whenever there is reference to guidance and regulations it would be helpful if an indication can be given of what is to be contained in each. In addition, in each instance please indicate whether and when drafts of such guidance and regulations will be available for the Committee to consider in support of Stage 1 scrutiny.

Part 1 Air Weapons

In general terms the information provided in this section is detailed and helpful. The Committee have only a few questions under this section.

Q1. Paragraph 45 of the PM provides statistics relating to offences. Please confirm that the number of offences relating to air weapons dropped over the period referred to by 27 in number and around 14%.

Q2. Paragraph 46 of the PM stated that one of the policy objectives of the new licensing system is to “prevent those persons who are unfit, or who have no legitimate reason for holding an air weapon from obtaining a licence”. Can you provide clarity on the tests upon which the decision for fitness to hold an air weapons licence will be based? Will this be modelled on the tests for a firearms licence or a shotgun licence, we note each differs from the other?

Q3. Paragraph 52 on the PM suggests that “consistently” more than 45% of recorded crimes involving air weapons are committed by persons aged 20 and under. However the source provided refers to 2012/13. Please confirm the statistics also record historical information.

Q4. In a number of places reference is made to regulations and guidance. Please indicate when the terms of that guidance will be available to the Committee to enhance their consideration of these measures.

Q5. The argument in paragraph 107 of the PM is noted, please indicate the reasons why the Government believes those who use air weapons illegally will apply for licenses.

Q6. When will the EQIA (paragraph 111 of the PM) be published?

Q7. From the point the system comes into force (commencement), how will the initial system operate in relation to a first certificate linked to the commission of an offence. What transitional measures are intended and how will they operate.

Q8. Given that air weapons do not carry serial numbers, in what way will a certificate be linked to the specific weapon(s) held.

Q9. How will the public be able to make arrangements for weapons to be disposed of before the licensing regime comes into force.
Q10. Paragraph 64 of the PM states “shooting at properly operated and approved air weapon clubs will be encouraged as a matter of policy, and specific provision is made in the Bill to approve air weapons clubs in future.” Can you provide clarity on the number and location of shooting clubs which exist in Scotland, and what variations in regulations would apply to ‘air weapon only’ shooting clubs over and above existing firearms clubs?

Q11. Can you provide clarity on what transitional provisions, if any, will be made to allow for the alignment of the current 5-year cycle of expiration of existing firearms and shotgun licenses with applications for air weapons licenses?

Part 2 Alcohol Licensing

Q12. The layout of the PM relation to Part 2 on alcohol licensing is interesting and challenging to follow, particularly given the restricted use of section numbers to describe provisions. No information is provided covering sections 44 to 48 of the Bill and also for sections 56 and 59 of the Bill. While section 59 might be self-explanatory, the other sections are not. Equally the Explanatory notes for these sections are little more than a repeat of the text of the Bill itself. Please provide a clear policy detail which underpins these provisions.

Q13. In relation to section 56 of the Bill please also include detail of the thinking behind the removal of “interested parties”.

Q14. Paragraph 120 of the PM notes it is vital police and licensing boards have powers “to reduce crime and preserve public order”. That phrase is not used elsewhere in this part of the PM (although paragraph 188 does refer to public safety which does not appear to be an aim). Please explain which measures contribute to giving the police and licensing board these powers, and how. (see also paragraph 124 of the PM - see Q16 below)

Q15. Is there a consolidated version of the current alcohol licensing legislation available for the use of the Committee?

Q16. As indicated please provide the detail to support the statement in paragraph 124 of the PM about crime, disorder and danger.

Q17. The Committee is interested in how powers requiring information on spent convictions (see comments in the memorandum paragraphs 132, and 138 to 141 regarding this) and connected persons will assist in delivering the above objectives.

Q18. Can you explain the reasons for the exclusion of a child as set out in paragraph 129 of the PM (section 52 refers).

Q19. Paragraph 131 of the PM mentions alternative approaches were considered in relation to the offence of supplying children with alcohol in a public place. What were these alternatives and why were they rejected?
Q20. Please elaborate the policy thinking set out in paragraph 136 of the PM which seems to suggest that police intelligence and associations are now to be considered as seriously as previous convictions. Given intelligence will not have led to conviction, please explain how that is consistent with ECHR and what recourse applicants have to challenge what may be unsubstantiated “intelligence”. Can you also point to other pieces of legislation which adopt a similar approach.

Q21. Please indicate which other licensing regimes are being referred to in paragraph 137 of the PM.

Q22. Please give some examples of what might be restrictions as a consequence of using the “fit and proper” test.

Q23. The second sentence of 140 has some text or explanation missed out which might help to explain how unsuitable persons are allowed to operate.

Q24. What are the relevant offences covered by the repeal to section 129(4) of the Bill.

Q25. Given the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974 differentiates between types of conviction what is the policy justification for altering the approach of that act as proposed? Please also provide other examples of legislation amending the original policy in this way.

Q26. Please provide detail of any consultation on the above and also details of comments received in opposition.

Q27. Are there any exemptions to the offence provision re supplying to children to take account of cultural and religious customs, differences and practices which might involve the consumption of alcohol?

Q28. Paragraph 147 of the PM uses the 5 objectives set out in the 2005 Act in an entirely negative way, is that symptomatic of the approach in this part of the Bill?

Q29. Can you provide links to the scientific evidence mentioned in paragraph 149 of the PM please.

Q30. Paragraph 151 of the PM seems to directly contradict the suggestion in paragraph 150. Could you elaborate on the thinking here please.

Q31. Please indicate whether an existing statement of licensing policy will subsist until replaced.

Q32. In paragraph 161 of the PM please provide detail of the majority and also information from the minority views.
Q33. Paragraph 161 of the PM suggests various suggestions were considered unduly onerous. Please indicate in what way each of these undermines the economic interests of the alcohol trade as specified in paragraph 121.

Q34. It might also be useful in responding to the above to indicate why the economic interests of the trade are considered paramount, or at least more important than public health measures.

Q35. Given the size of this Bill, and indeed the complexity of parts, the suggestion of the test in paragraph 163 of the PM (relatively straightforward to implement) could benefit from specific detail in relation to the measures not being implemented.

Q36. Can you confirm if the detail on fee income to be reported will require to be subdivided by category (paragraph 174 of the PM).

Q37. Paragraph 175 of the PM refers to the “Civil Licensing regime”, could you indicate what that encompasses.

Q38. Paragraph 182 of the PM is vague as to what the reference to “these provisions” is. Can you be specific here.

Q39. Please indicate who was represented on the Board referred to in paragraph 183 of the PM and provide links to their findings.

Q40. Is there any difference intended between the phrases in paragraphs 8 (unnecessary burdens) and 184 (burdens) in the PM?

Q41. Can you confirm all the measures in Part 2 of the Bill fall into the category of improving the existing system or reducing burdens?

Q42. Given the changes made by section 41 of the Bill to youths, please explain the statement that nothing is discriminatory on the grounds of age.

Q43. Is paragraph 186 pf the PM suggesting that as revocation is undertaken by licensing boards ECHR considerations do not apply?

Q44. Paragraph 188 of the PM refers to balancing rights with public safety yet that is not mentioned elsewhere as being a consideration for this Part of the Bill. Please indicate which measures in this Part address public safety.

Part 3 Civic Licensing
Taxis and Private Hire Cars

Q45. To aid understanding of this Part of the Bill could you provide a summary of the primary legislation, secondary legislation and guidance that comprises the current regime under which taxis and private hire cars are licensed. The summary could helpfully show where the regimes for taxis and private hire cars differ and where the same or similar provisions apply. In addition, the summary should show where changes are proposed, whether in the Bill or through separate changes to secondary legislation or guidance. As much detail as possible should be provided of planned changes to secondary legislation or guidance (if little detail is currently available, please say when further information is expected to become available).

Q46. Regarding paragraph 190, please provide examples of how different local authorities apply discretion under the current regime to produce local regimes that meet the specific requirements of different local areas.

Q47. It is extremely difficult to understand the proposals in the Bill with reference to the existing regimes. To assist understanding please provide examples of—

- variations in the way in which the current legislation is interpreted and implemented;
- areas in which a more consistent approach would be beneficial and areas where local flexibility is still more appropriate;
- the unfair challenges and abuse referred to in the first bullet-point of paragraph 193 (and also say what effects these have had on public safety).

In addition, please describe—

- the recent changes to the market for hire car service (including the significant distinctions that remain between taxis and private hire cars, as referred to in paragraph 198);
- current compliance checking measures.

Q48. It would enable members to follow the proposed changes if you would state which of the changes listed in the summary provided in responses to the first question in this set of questions on taxis and private car hires contribute to each of the points mentioned in the bullet-points in paragraphs 192 and 193.

Q49. Paragraph 195 of the PM refers to the Bill being part of a wider body of work to address concerns relating to taxi/private hire car licensing. Later on, this work is described as relating to the regulation of booking offices and the consideration of mandatory licensing conditions. Please give us an indication of what action is proposed in these areas – or a timescale for when such information will be available?

Q50. Please indicate which authorities are experiencing difficulties as referred to in paragraph 197 of the PM.

Q51. Paragraph 199 of the PM refers to the Scottish Government expecting local authorities to use limits on licence numbers for private hire cars as a last resort. There does not appear to be any mechanism to enforce this position. Please clarify thinking in this area?

Q52. Paragraphs 200 to 202 of the PM deal with removing the exemption to private hire car licensing for vehicles on contract for 24 hours or more. Concerns are noted about the impact of this on those currently exempt. Please clarify which types of business may face difficulties as a result, and what options are under consideration to change the way the exemption is introduced to address this?

Q53. Paragraph 204 of the PM refers to proposed secondary legislation, please indicate what the proposed provisions are designed to achieve. Please also indicate what are the difficulties that would be faced (and by what types of business) and in what ways would those difficulties vary depending on how the proposed change is introduced?

Metal dealers

Q54. The Committee would appreciate some general background information here. You provide a value for the industry and the Financial memorandum provides numbers of licensed and exempt dealers. Any information you can provide on the geographical spread of where the dealers are based would assist the Committee.

Q55. What are the current arrangements for licensing and maintaining a record of metal dealers in Scotland and how, if at all, will this change under the proposed legislation?

Q56. In relation to the enforcement of licensing requirements, who is responsible for scrutinising dealers’ records and are there any guidelines on how often this should be done, to whom are returns made and what is the role of local authorities once a licence has been granted?

Q57. What special arrangements are made in relation to licences for itinerant dealers and will such licensees continue to be able to operate across Scotland under a single licence?

Q58. Can you specify what you see as the benefits of removing the 48-hour retention period before dealers can process metal in terms of the objectives of the Bill?

Q59. What forms of identification will be considered acceptable for the purposes of verifying the name and address of a customer?

Q60. What other proposals have been suggested during the consultation phase, which are not being taken forward (such as an accreditation scheme for metal dealers or enhanced licensing requirements like CCTV)?

Public Entertainment Venues
Q61. Please provide detail of what the Bill does and how, with the repeal, theatres will be licensed in future.

Q62. In what circumstances might less onerous licensing requirements be required? Is this intended to refer to venues with a limited capacity? How will that provision work in practice?

Q63. What is the effect of the repeal of the powers of entry provisions?

Q64. Who was consulted by the Government, on what, and what was their reaction to these proposals. Why was no wider consultation held?

Sexual Entertainment Venues

Q65. Paragraph 250 of the PM indicates around 20 sexual entertainment venues exist, please provide information about where these venues are i.e. cities, the central belt etc. or the sort of venues they are e.g. lap dancing, strip clubs etc.

Q66. Please provide detail on how the licensing regime will work—i.e. local authority licensing statements, conditions, enforcement, consultation, objections, duration of a licence, transfer of a licence, refusal of a licence, appeal, offences etc. The Committee are concerned that respondents may not fully understanding what the “architecture” of the 1982 Act is in relation to sex shops, and therefore whether the framework for sex shops is suitable for sexual entertainment venues.

Q67. Please explain the thinking behind the main definitions “sexual entertainment”, “organiser” or “audience”.

Q68. Please explain how the new licensing scheme will dovetail with the alcohol licensing if the venues sells alcohol, or with any other relevant licensing scheme.

Q69. In relation to enforcement explain how it will be possible to determine whether sexual entertainment has happened on 4 or more occasions – will a licence be needed under another regime for those occasions? Is there a penalty for breach of this condition?

Q70. Are there any transitional provisions for existing venues or any other transitional arrangements needed for local authorities? What about existing licence conditions? Does the commencement period (coming into force of the Bill) take account of these issues?

Q71. Local authorities need to comply with Article 9 of the EU Services Directive 2006/123/EC as implemented by the Provision of Services Regulations 2009 (SI 2999/2009), in particular in relation to setting application fees, processing applications and granting licences operating the new regime – please explain how this is achieved.

Q72. Paragraphs 256 to 258 of the PM repeat paragraphs 25 to 27 but neither indicate who was consulted or details around the number of responses received. Please provide that information.

Q73. Please provide a summary of the nature of the responses from local authorities, police or women’s groups, or those that work in the industry.

Q74. Please detail the concerns raised by arts organisation and whether/how the Bill addresses these.

Q75. The PM does not say whether any alternative approaches were considered, other than the existing approach of using the alcohol licensing system. Were any other options considered and why were they not pursued.

Q76. Please provide detail to substantiate the comment in paragraph 264 of the PM where it states “there is a clear gender impact given the overwhelming majority of those in the industry are female”.

Q77. One of the main areas of contention may be setting the number of venues at zero within a licensing board area, which also raises potential human rights issues, please provide the policy thinking behind this approach, together with detail in support of the option.

Miscellaneous and General

Q78. The provisions covered by this part are extremely difficult to follow given the absence of reference to the Bill. It would be helpful if this could be provided for each part covered by this portion of the notes.

Q79. Paragraph 266 of the PM suggests the Bill (at section 70?) provides Ministers with powers to direct procedure and mandatory conditions. This is a broad power and it would be helpful to have examples of how it might be used, referring to each licensing regime.

Q80. Given the above power can you indicate how this part of the Bill will avoid impinging on local democracy.

Q81. Section 70 of the Bill also provides powers to local licensing authorities to produce standard conditions. Some detail underpinning this power should be provided covering what might be included, who currently adopts such an approach and the derivation of the policy thinking. Please also confirm this has been consulted upon and provide relevant details.

Q82. Please also indicate with relevant examples the thinking behind the final sentence which seems to suggest that “practices” will be covered by the order making powers.
Q83. Paragraph 267 of the PM relates to section 72 of the Bill. Please provide detailed background information covering the powers and duties of the Civil Licensing Standards Officers (“CLSO”). The information should also indicate what reviews have been taken of current practices of the authorised officer and LSO both of whom appear to be the model. Please also indicate the extent etc. of consultation and views received etc. on this provision (para 270).

Q84. Can you elaborate how existing good practice will not be disrupted by the imposition of a new regime, with its statutory powers and duties.

Q85. Please confirm that paragraph 268 of the PM refers to only those licenses covered by this Bill.

Q86. Paragraph 271 of the PM suggests other proposals were not “sufficiently significant” to warrant action. Please explain this further, providing detail of the main proposals rejected and the areas within your paragraph 2 of the PM which they did not meet.

Q87. Please also explain what is meant by the phrase “a change to the structure of the consideration of “fit and proper” in a licence application” What changes were considered, what were the alternative approaches considered and why were they not considered appropriate.

Q88. Please provide the policy thinking behind the lack of a time limit for police information, particularly given the time-limits being introduced and the effect of section 69 of the Bill. Perhaps this is an example of grounds for extension of overall time to consider?

Q89. Please indicate which measures are introduced to satisfy the EU Services Directive.

Q90. Given the subject matter of the Bill and the recent report “Empowering Scotland’s Island Communities” please indicate the extent to which the Bill has been “island proofed” as set out on page 24 of that report.
Dear David,

Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill: Clarification and elaboration on detail in the Policy Memorandum

I am writing in response to your request of 27 June for clarification and elaboration on the detail of the Policy Memorandum which accompanies the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill.

The Policy Memorandum is intended to provide a succinct and broad overview of the policy underlying the Bill as a whole and each Part individually, but it is, of course, only one of the suite of documents that accompany the Bill. Taken with the additional detail in the Explanatory Notes, the Delegated Powers Memorandum and the Financial Memorandum, we believe that stakeholders have access to information they need to help them understand the Bill’s policy aims and detailed provisions. The Scottish Government Website also includes links to a series of consultations published between November 2012 and September 2013 on the topics that now make up the substance of the Bill, as well the responses to these.

In your letter you specifically ask about the details of guidance or regulations. Details of the purpose of secondary legislation are provided in the Delegated Powers Memorandum. We do not anticipate drafts of guidance or regulations being available during Stage 1. These will be developed with the participation of stakeholders following the passage of the Bill through Parliament. This will allow us to take account of comments made at Stage 1 and any amendments made to the Bill during Stages 2 and 3.
The Bill covers a number of topics and, as one might expect, your questions range over all of these. We have attempted to provide the information requested in as straightforward a format as possible, cross referencing where necessary. We would welcome further comment from the Committee and from stakeholders during the process of Stage 1.

Yours sincerely

Quentin Fisher
Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill Team Leader
Part 1 Air Weapons

Q1. Paragraph 45 of the PM provides statistics relating to offences. Please confirm that the number of offences relating to air weapons dropped over the period referred to by 27 in number and around 14%.

The National Statistics Bulletin - Recorded Crimes and Offences Involving Firearms, Scotland, 2012-13 (which can be found at http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Resource/0043/00438302.pdf) show that the number of offences relating to air weapons dropped by 26 (13%).

Air weapons accounted for 47% (171) of all offences involving the alleged involvement of a firearm in 2012-13, compared to 37% (197) in 2011-12. While the number of reported offences involving an air weapon are falling, they still represent almost half of all firearm offences in Scotland, and the official statistics cannot reflect the many low-level incidents that go unreported every year.

Q2. Paragraph 46 of the PM stated that one of the policy objectives of the new licensing system is to “prevent those persons who are unfit, or who have no legitimate reason for holding an air weapon from obtaining a licence”. Can you provide clarity on the tests upon which the decision for fitness to hold an air weapons licence will be based? Will this be modelled on the tests for a firearms licence or a shotgun licence, we note each differs from the other?

Detailed provisions around these processes will be subject to further discussions with stakeholders, including the Police Service of Scotland, and will be set out in secondary legislation and guidance. The intention is that tests for grant or renewal of an air weapon certificate will be in line with section 1 of the Firearms Act 1968. This is highlighted in paragraph 56 of the PM.

The test for a shotgun certificate is slightly less stringent, in that it does not require the applicant to provide a “good reason” for requiring a shotgun, but rather requires the police to demonstrate the absence of “good reason”. The Scottish Government believes that putting the onus on the police is inappropriate, and that it should be for the applicant to show good reason for holding an air weapon.

Q3. Paragraph 52 on the PM suggests that “consistently” more than 45% of recorded crimes involving air weapons are committed by persons aged 20 and under. However the source provided refers to 2012/13. Please confirm the statistics also record historical information.
Table 13 of Recorded Crimes and Offences Involving Firearms, Scotland, 2012-13 sets out detailed information on offences by type of firearm and age of the main accused. There are equivalent tables in each previous year of the annually published statistics.

The table below summarises the percentage of air weapon offences committed by persons aged 20 or under from previous years, drawn from the annual bulletin.

Q4. In a number of places reference is made to regulations and guidance. Please indicate when the terms of that guidance will be available to the Committee to enhance their consideration of these measures.

Q5. The argument in paragraph 107 of the PM is noted, please indicate the reasons why the Government believes those who use air weapons illegally will apply for licenses.

The Government recognises that those who knowingly misuse air weapons, or who would not be able to show that they had a legitimate reason for possessing and using such weapons, may be unlikely to apply for a certificate. In many cases it seems likely that such people might instead seek to keep their weapons illegally, that is, without having the appropriate certificate. In such a case, the person would be committing an offence under the terms of the new legislation and for the first time the legislation enables the police to remove those weapons.

Q6. When will the EQIA (paragraph 111 of the PM) be published?

The EQIA accompanying the Bill was published on 15 May 2014 and can be found here: http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2014/05/3617
Q7. From the point the system comes into force (commencement), how will the initial system operate in relation to a first certificate linked to the commission of an offence. What transitional measures are intended and how will they operate.

As set out in paragraph 49 of the Policy Memorandum certain offences in the Bill and in particular the primary offence of having an air weapon without a certificate (section 2(1)), will be commenced at a later date than the rest of the licensing regime. During the interim period air weapon users will be able to apply to the police for an air weapon certificate to be granted before the offence at section 2(1) comes into force.

Additionally we anticipate that a large number of unwanted air weapons will be disposed of during this interim period. The introduction of licensing will be accompanied by a public information campaign running prior to and throughout the interim period to make sure that everyone is aware of their responsibilities and options.

Q8. Given that air weapons do not carry serial numbers, in what way will a certificate be linked to the specific weapon(s) held.

One of the core principles of air weapon licensing has always been that certificates will relate to the individual or person involved, not their weapons. This is set out at paragraph 48 of the Policy Memorandum, where we recognise that the lack of serial numbers or other distinguishing marks on many air weapons would make requiring each certificate to list the individual weapons held onerous and impractical.

Air weapon certificates will therefore follow a similar approach to existing shotgun certificates, with a single document covering all applicable weapons held by the certified individual. The exact format of air weapon certificates and application forms will be specified in secondary legislation which is currently in development and will take on board the views of stakeholders.

Q9. How will the public be able to make arrangements for weapons to be disposed of before the licensing regime comes into force.

There will be a variety of options available to members of the public who wish to dispose of their air weapons prior to the introduction of licensing. We will be discussing the practicalities of the various options with stakeholders and, again, there will be a public information campaign at the time to inform people of their choices. These are likely to include:

- surrendering the weapon to Police Scotland, either by visiting a police station or making arrangements with their local police firearms licensing department;
- selling the weapon either privately or via a registered firearms dealer; transferring the weapon to an individual who intends to apply for an air weapon certificate;
• selling the weapon for destruction by a scrap metal dealer.

Q10. Paragraph 64 of the PM states “shooting at properly operated and approved air weapon clubs will be encouraged as a matter of policy, and specific provision is made in the Bill to approve air weapons clubs in future.”
Can you provide clarity on the number and location of shooting clubs which exist in Scotland, and what variations in regulations would apply to ‘air weapon only’ shooting clubs over and above existing firearms clubs?

The following table shows the number of approved rifle clubs in Scotland at the end of July 2014, broken down into the former 8 police force areas.

Because clubs which use air weapons are not currently required to be authorised it is not possible to identify how many of the above clubs also offer air weapon shooting facilities. Some airgun clubs are affiliated with organisations such as the National Smallbore Rifle Association or the Scottish Air Rifle and Pistol Association but this is not a requirement. We are therefore currently unable to establish a national picture of airgun clubs in Scotland.

As the Policy Memorandum states, however, we believe that air weapon clubs provide the ideal safe and supportive environment for shooters and in particular new shooters to learn the sport. We will work with stakeholders to encourage the development of a network of air weapon clubs across Scotland.

The Bill outlines a licensing system for air weapon clubs, as well as an exemption to allow members to shoot at an approved club without requiring their own certificate, which is very similar to the position which currently exists for rifle clubs. As with other elements of the Bill, detailed regulations and guidance on how the police should process applications for club approval and the conditions under which club approvals will be granted will be developed in the coming months, taking into account discussions with and advice from stakeholders. We would expect regulations that apply to ‘air weapon only’ shooting clubs to be very closely aligned with those which apply to existing rifle clubs.
Q11. Can you provide clarity on what transitional provisions, if any, will be made to allow for the alignment of the current 5-year cycle of expiration of existing firearms and shotgun licenses with applications for air weapons licenses?

Paragraph 50 of the Financial Memorandum sets out the Government’s estimates of the number of air weapons which are likely to be subject to the new licensing regime. In particular, we expect that a significant proportion of air weapons in Scotland are in the hands of the approximately 60,000 established shooters who already hold a firearm or shotgun certificate, and are therefore already known to Police Scotland. In that memorandum, we set out a range of estimates for the number of new applications which may come forward (that is, where no firearm or shotgun certificate is in place), and base main cost estimates on an assumption of 20,000 in the first licensing round.

In addition, section 38 of the Bill includes a transitional arrangement whereby an individual who owns air weapons and already holds a valid firearm or shotgun certificate when the air weapon licensing regime comes into force will be exempted from requiring a separate certificate for their air weapons until their firearm or shotgun certificate requires to be renewed. At the time of renewal they may apply to the police for an air weapon certificate, to be granted on the same date as their renewed firearm and/or shotgun certificate. We estimate that around 40,000 air weapon certificate applications might come from existing firearm or shotgun certificate holders.

This arrangement will mean that a large proportion of new air weapon certificates will fit into the existing 5-year renewal cycle for firearm and shotgun certificates. Section 5(2) of the Bill also allows the police to consider the ‘fit person’ and ‘not prohibited’ tests as satisfied when processing an air weapon certificate application from an existing firearm or shotgun holder as these tests will already have been met for the grant of their existing certificate. Finally, under section 9 of the Bill, air weapon certificates may be made coterminous with existing firearm and/or shotgun certificates, reducing the paperwork and processing costs involved for the police and shooter alike.

We believe that these arrangements, combined with the interim period between the commencement of the licensing regime and its related offences described at question 7, will help to smooth the introduction of air weapon licensing.
Part 2 Alcohol Licensing

Q12. The layout of the PM relation to Part 2 on alcohol licensing is interesting and challenging to follow, particularly given the restricted use of section numbers to describe provisions. No information is provided covering sections 44 to 48 [fit and proper] of the Bill and also for sections 56 [interested parties] and 59 [form of communication] of the Bill. While section 59 [form of communications] might be self-explanatory, the other sections are not. Equally the Explanatory notes for these sections are little more than a repeat of the text of the Bill itself. Please provide a clear policy detail which underpins these provisions.

Sections 44 to 48 – fit and proper

Paragraphs 132 to 143 of the Policy Memorandum reflect the policy underpinning these sections. The Bill provides that not being ‘fit and proper’ with regards to the licensing objectives constitutes a ground for refusal for:

- a premises licence application;
- an application to transfer a premises licence;
- a review of a premises licence;
- a personal licence application; and a
- a personal licence renewal.

The Bill also provides that a Licensing Board may apply a ‘fit and proper’ test to a personal licence holder if they receive a notice that they have had a conviction, or their conduct has been inconsistent with the licensing objectives.

It would not be sufficient to have this test only for initial premises licence applications as this would allow premises licences to be attained by a ‘fit and proper’ person and then transferred to someone who is not considered to be ‘fit and proper’ to hold a licence, thus undermining the purpose of the test. Restricting the ‘fit and proper’ test to premises licence holders would also allow people who are not considered to be ‘fit and proper’ to gain a personal licence and sell alcohol to vulnerable people as long as they did not apply to become a premises licence holder themselves.

This broad based approach allows Licensing Boards to consider whether premises or personal licence holders/applicants are ‘fit and proper’ at the appropriate stages. It is envisaged that this will provide Licensing Boards with greater powers to tackle crime, particularly serious organised crime, by allowing the consideration of a wider range of information including police intelligence and any associations with those deemed to be unsuitable.
Section 56 – interested parties

See the response to question 13.

Q13. In relation to section 56 of the Bill please also include detail of the thinking behind the removal of “interested parties”.

This issue was consulted upon in the Further Options for Alcohol Licensing Consultation and the summary sets out the position and the responses and it may be useful to quote it in detail.

“The Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010, at section 184, proposed that a premises licence holder be under a duty to notify their licensing board if a person becomes or ceases to be a connected person or interested party. This was to respond to concerns that the holders of premises licences were failing to advise Boards of connections with, for example, organised crime. Criminal sanctions would apply for a failure to notify. However the Law Society raised concerns that this provision is too vague and too broad to be practical. If the premises licence is held by a tenant of large chain such as Punch Taverns and there is a change on the Board of Punch does that have to be notified? If, as happens in the current economic circumstances, the ownership passes from a defaulting company to the bank who then sell it on to a private equity firm who parcel it up in a property portfolio that is sold to a pension fund, is a tenant going to keep up and notify at every stage?"

“In order to respond to these concerns the Scottish Government have held off commencing this provision into law. Concerns have also been raised by ACPOS about a conflict with another provision within the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010. These are not yet an issue, as the provision for interested parties has not yet been brought into law. However if it were commenced as currently drafted then it would have the unintended consequence that a premises manager would no longer have vicarious liability. Vicarious liability is where a person is deemed to be liable for the offences committed by employees. “

“Those who argued that the duty was currently unworkable, agreed with the arguments put forward in the consultation, and also cited the cumbersome nature of the proposals, the overly wide definition of interested parties, difficulties around enforcement, and concerns over whether anyone would actually notify the Board of inappropriate persons. Some also argued that as currently drafted it would be too complicated and onerous for many licence holders to understand.”
“Finally a number of respondents suggested that this entire approach was flawed, and that it would be better to start again from scratch to achieve the desired policy goal, or that the reintroduction of the ‘fit and proper’ test would address the underlying concerns.”

http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2013/10/9066/downloads

Accordingly, in view of these responses and on further consideration, the Scottish Government have decided to revoke these provisions as far as they refer to ‘interested parties’.

Q14. Paragraph 120 of the PM notes it is vital police and licensing boards have powers “to reduce crime and preserve public order”. That phrase is not used elsewhere in this part of the PM (although paragraph 188 does refer to public safety which does not appear to be an aim). Please explain which measures contribute to giving the police and licensing board these powers, and how. (see also paragraph 124 of the PM - see Q16 below)

Paragraphs 124 to 131 of the Policy Memorandum deal with the theme of reducing crime and preserving public order and safety. Within this Bill there are a number of provisions that provide police and Licensing Boards with additional powers to assist them in their aim to “reduce crime and preserve public order” and thereby helping ensure that people live their lives safe from crime, disorder and danger. These measures are:

- The creation of new offences of supplying alcohol to children or young people for consumption in a public place.
- Providing Boards with powers to consider a broader range of information, namely the ‘fit and proper’ test and consideration of spent offences

Creation of new offences of supplying alcohol to children or young people for consumption in a public place.

Paragraph 125 to 131 of the Policy Memorandum sets out the policy underpinning the relevant sections in the Bill.

There are existing offences under the 2005 Act (section 105) that cover buying alcohol on behalf of a child or young person or for consumption on licensed premises. Local byelaws, set by local authorities, can also make it an offence to drink in public, however these do not apply across all of Scotland and they operate differently in different areas.

Consequently, under the current licensing regime, while they cannot buy alcohol on behalf of a child or young person, adults can legally supply alcohol to someone under the age of 18 out with licensed premises. This facilitates outdoor drinking dens of young people where those in the group who are over 18 buy alcohol for younger members. The police are currently able to confiscate alcohol from children and young people drinking in public places, as well as from adults who are supplying alcohol to children and young people for consumption in public places. However the Police feel they are powerless to stop those over-18s repeating their behaviour. Consequently a continuing cycle of confiscation and purchasing can develop.

The measures within this Bill give the police the powers they need to disrupt drinking dens and thus reduce crime and preserve public order, by making it an offence for a person other than a child or young person, to buy or attempt to buy alcohol for or on behalf of a child or young person or to otherwise make available alcohol to a child or young person. It is not an offence under this provision, to buy alcohol for, or to give alcohol to, a child or young person, a) for consumption other than in a public place, or b) for the purpose of religious worship

Paragraphs 132 to 143 in the Policy Memorandum sets out the policy underpinning the relevant sections in the Bill.

The Bill provides Licensing Boards with powers to consider a broader range of information when making decisions regarding the alcohol licensing regime. These additional powers help Boards to protect the public by ensuring that only appropriate persons can gain and retain a personal or premises license. The Bill expands the remit of what Boards may consider by taking forward provisions to:

- introduce a ‘fit and proper’ test;
- allow Boards to consider spent convictions.

The ‘fit and proper’ test

Many licensing regimes rely on a ‘fit and proper’ test to determine whether someone is suitable to hold a licence. However, the 2005 Act focused on the use of relevant offences and foreign offences to assess the suitability of candidates and licence holders, as well as providing the ability for people to object based on matters connected to the licensing objectives.

The introduction of the ‘fit and proper’ test in this Bill will provide greater scope to present information to Boards, and give them the ability to consider a greater breadth of relevant information when making decisions about applicants, licence holders and connected persons. Also see the response to question 12.

Spent convictions

Under the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974, spent convictions are defined as convictions where a specified period of time has elapsed which allows an individual not to have to tell people about their previous criminal activity. For example, someone receiving a fine from a court conviction will be required to advise potential employers about their court fine for 5 years (an unspent conviction). Once 5 years have passed, this conviction becomes spent and it is no longer required to be disclosed.

The 2005 Act provides that spent convictions cannot be considered in any part of a Licensing Board’s deliberations, such as considering whether to grant personal or premises licences, or in hearings once the licence has been granted.

Key stakeholders have argued that it is imperative that Boards have as much information as possible at their disposal to allow them to make a considered decision on an application. Limiting Boards to the consideration of a definitive and restricted list of convictions for relevant offences permits unsuitable persons to operate within licensed premises and may contradict the five licensing objectives upon which the Act is founded (particularly ‘preventing crime and disorder’). Consequently, this Bill removes a restriction on Boards’ ability to consider spent convictions.

By allowing Licensing Boards to use a ‘fit and proper’ test and consider spent convictions, the Bill gives police and Licensing Boards additional powers to assist them in the aim “to reduce crime and preserve public order”.

Q15. Is there a consolidated version of the current alcohol licensing legislation available for the use of the Committee?

The Greens Annotated Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 Third Edition by Jack Cummins was recently published. Commercial services such as Westlaw also provide access to a consolidated version of the Act.

Q16. As indicated please provide the detail to support the statement in paragraph 124 of the PM about crime, disorder and danger.

See response to question 14

Q17. The Committee is interested in how powers requiring information on spent convictions (see comments in the memorandum paragraphs 132, and 138 to 141 regarding this) and connected persons will assist in delivering the above objectives.

See response to question 14

Q18. Can you explain the reasons for the exclusion of a child as set out in paragraph 129 of the PM (section 52 refers).

The new offences in section 52 of the Bill, inserting section 104A and section 104B into the 2005 Act, should be read in conjunction with section 105 of the 2005 Act.
Under section 105 of the existing licensing legislation, it is already an offence for children and young people to buy alcohol whether for themselves or for others. A child or young person guilty of this offence is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding level 1 on the standard scale (currently £200).

Q19. Paragraph 131 of the PM mentions alternative approaches were considered in relation to the offence of supplying children with alcohol in a public place. What were these alternatives and why were they rejected?

A number of alternative approaches of the construction of this offence were considered. These primarily centred on the need to specify that the alcohol was supplied for consumption in a public place. Not doing so would make it an offence to supply (or make available) alcohol to children or young people at home. It was felt that this would be a disproportionate approach to the issue and going beyond the policy intention. There is also the question as to how it could be adequately and consistently policed.

We also considered the need to specify that the alcohol be consumed in a public place rather than rely on the intention of the person making the alcohol available. However as the offence attaches to the person making the alcohol available rather than the person consuming it, this approach could see individuals commit an offence despite them not having the intention to do so.

After considering the advantages and disadvantages of these approaches it was felt that the offence as drafted in the Bill was the most effective way of addressing the main issues while striking an appropriate balance between concerns such as public health and parental freedom.

Q20. Please elaborate the policy thinking set out in paragraph 136 of the PM which seems to suggest that police intelligence and associations are now to be considered as seriously as previous convictions. Given intelligence will not have led to conviction, please explain how that is consistent with ECHR and what recourse applicants have to challenge what may be unsubstantiated “intelligence”. Can you also point to other pieces of legislation which adopt a similar approach.

At present the existence of relevant offences or foreign offence is not an automatic bar to obtaining a personal licence. In addition police intelligence and associations can be considered by Licensing Boards under the current legislation. It is up to Licensing Boards to determine at hearing whether this information is relevant and what reliance should be placed upon it. The applicant/licence holder can appeal the Licensing Board’s decisions to the sheriff or the sheriff principal as appropriate.

In future the Board will continue to reach its decision on the basis of the material before it. If the Board is presented with police intelligence or spent convictions then they will have to determine whether they are relevant and what reliance should be placed upon them.

This approach is common in other licensing regimes, for example the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 utilises a similar approach. Police may provide details of police intelligence and associations for Licensing Authorities’ consideration and it is up to those Authorities to decide what to consider, and to justify their decision making.

Q21. Please indicate which other licensing regimes are being referred to in paragraph 137 of the PM.

There are a wide variety of regimes that make use of a ‘fit and proper’ test, we would expect that local authority clerks and those sitting on Licensing Boards would for example be familiar with the following:

The Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 includes a ‘fit and proper’ test at Schedule 1, paragraph 5 and this includes regimes for:

- Taxi and Private Hire Licence;
- Second Hand Dealers Licence;
- Metal Dealers Licence;
- Boat Hire Licence;
- Street Traders Licence;
- Market Operators Licence;
- Public Entertainment Licence;
- Indoor Sports Entertainment Licence;
- Late Hours Catering Licence and
- Window Cleaners Licence.

The previous alcohol licensing regime, the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976 included a ‘fit and proper’ test at section 17.

Within housing the Landlord Registration scheme within the Antisocial Behaviour etc. (Scotland) Act 2004 includes a ‘fit and proper’ test at section 85 and the regime for Houses in Multiple Occupation within the Housing (Scotland) Act 2006 includes a ‘fit and proper’ test at section 130.

Q22. Please give some examples of what might be restrictions as a consequence of using the “fit and proper” test.

The lack of a ‘fit and proper’ test has been much criticised by the police, Licensing Boards and those within the alcohol trade. The Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010 went some way to address these concerns by removing the limit on the chief constable to only make comments / reports with regards to merely the crime prevention objective, to allowing comments/ reports on all of the licensing objectives. This has sometimes not been sufficient to allow the Licensing Boards to consider a broader range of matters, in order to ensure that only those that are suitable are involved in the sale of alcohol in Scotland.

In addition to the existing ‘relevant offences and foreign offences’ the introduction of ‘fit and proper’ makes it clear that Boards should be prepared to consider a range of material in reaching their decisions. It is appropriate that existing and future case law will help inform this. We would envisage that Boards may wish to consider issues such as:

- spent convictions;
- police intelligence;
- licensing history;
- financial details;
- criminal associations;
- other relevant issues.

This is not intended to be an exhaustive list. New issues will arise so it is important that the legislation is not unduly prescriptive.

Q23. The second sentence of 140 has some text or explanation missed out which might help to explain how unsuitable persons are allowed to operate.

There is no text missing from para 140. The legislation sets out the grounds for refusal of a licence, we are expanding these to include a consideration of whether a person is not a fit and proper person to be a holder of a premises or personal licence.

Q24. What are the relevant offences covered by the repeal to section 129(4) of the Bill.

The relevant offences referred to in the 2005 Act are provided in the Licensing (Relevant Offences) (Scotland) Regulations 2007

Q25. Given the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974 differentiates between types of conviction what is the policy justification for altering the approach of that Act as proposed? Please also provide other examples of legislation amending the original policy in this way.

The proposed policy approach is consistent with the way the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974 (“the 1974 Act”) currently operates and does not alter any aspect of that legislation.

Currently Boards cannot consider spent convictions for two reasons:
1. They are specifically forbidden from doing so by section 129(4) of the 2005 Act.

2. Under the terms the 1974 Act, when a conviction or alternative to prosecution (AtP) becomes ‘spent’ an individual does not have to reveal it and cannot be prejudiced by it. This means that if an ex-offender whose convictions or AtPs are all spent is asked by a licensing board whether they have a criminal record, they do not have to reveal or admit its existence. Moreover, the person questioned shall not be subjected to any liability or otherwise prejudiced in law by reason of any failure to acknowledge or disclose the spent conviction or AtP.

Exclusions and Exceptions to protection under the 1974 Act

However, there are some categories of employment and proceedings to which the 1974 Act does not apply as it is considered appropriate that access to spent conviction information continues to be available for the purposes of public protection. The 1974 Act provides an order making power to specify the types of employment and proceedings that are excluded from the 1974 Act and therefore where disclosure of spent convictions is required.

There are already a wide range of occupations and proceedings excluded from the 1974 Act such as taxi and private hire car drivers, as well as any occupation which requires a licence from the Gambling Commission, or any occupation requiring a licence from the Security Industry Authority. The list of exclusions from the 1974 Act is updated from time to time and the most recent update was made in 2013 when proceedings under the Children’s Hearings (Scotland) Act 2011 were included.

We consider it appropriate for an increased level of scrutiny of a persons’ background to be undertaken where an individual is seeking an alcohol licence. We think this is appropriate given the likely responsibilities of a licence holder, for example in relation to potentially vulnerable people.

In due course, the Scottish Government intends adding premises and personal licence holders to the list of exclusions from the 1974 Act. This will mean that Boards will be able to consider certain relevant spent convictions that an individual applying for a liquor licence might have. This will ensure that liquor licences will be treated in the same way as gaming licenses, taxi licenses and Private Security Industry licenses etc. under the 1974 Act.

Q26. Please provide detail of any consultation on the above and also details of comments received in opposition.

There was no specific question asked about spent convictions in the published public consultation on Further Options for Alcohol Licencing. However, for the question, ‘Should the legislation be amended so that Boards are asked to consider whether an applicant is a ‘fit and proper’ person?’ one of the most frequently received suggestions was that Licensing Boards should have greater powers to tackle crime, particularly serious organised crime, by allowing the consideration of police intelligence and ‘spent’ offences.

Over two thirds of respondents felt that legislation should be amended so that Boards would be able to consider whether an applicant is a ‘fit and proper’ person. Key stakeholders such as Licensing Forums, Boards, and Alcohol and Drugs Partnerships argued that it is necessary for Licensing Boards to consider more than just convictions for relevant offences when deciding whether to grant a personal licence.

Police Scotland have also stated that it is imperative that Boards have as much information at their disposal as possible to allow them to make a considered decision on an application. They believe that limiting Boards to the consideration of a definitive and restricted list of relevant offences could permit unsuitable persons to operate within licensed premises and may contradict the five licensing objectives upon which the Act is founded (particularly ‘preventing crime and disorder’).

There were some concerns outlined by both those in favour of ‘fit and proper’ and those against it. The main one of these was that introducing a ‘fit and proper’ test might give Licensing Boards and police too much power and see licences refused based upon poor quality evidence.

On balance the Scottish Government took the view that the benefits of this outweighed this risk particularly in light of the existence of robust appeals processes.

Q27. Are there any exemptions to the offence provision re supplying to children to take account of cultural and religious customs, differences and practices which might involve the consumption of alcohol?

The drafting provides for two offences, one in relation to children (under 16) and another in relation to young persons (16 and 17 years olds).

In both offence provisions, the Bill provides an exemption, it is not an offence to buy alcohol for, or give alcohol to, a child or young person for the purposes of religious worship.

Q28. Paragraph 147 of the PM uses the 5 objectives set out in the 2005 Act in an entirely negative way, is that symptomatic of the approach in this part of the Bill?

The Scottish Government views the five licensing objectives as the engine of the 2005 Act, making clear to Boards, the trade and other stakeholders the intention of the licensing regime. The licensing regime reflects a general view that it would be inappropriate for alcohol to be sold in an entirely unrestricted manner. As such we view the licensing objectives as offering clarity and direction.
Every decision made about licensing must be made with reference to these objectives.

Q29. Can you provide links to the scientific evidence mentioned in paragraph 149 of the PM please.

The phrase ‘alcohol-free childhood’ was used by the Chief Medical Officer for England in his 2009 guidance:

There is a wealth of research showing the harmful effects of alcohol on 18 and how early onset drinking can lead to problems in later life:

- Early drinking age linked to risk of alcoholism:
  http://alcoholism.about.com/od/tipsforparents/a/early_age.htm

- Predictors of risky alcohol consumption in schoolchildren and their implications for preventing alcohol-related harm:
  http://www.substanceabusepolicy.com/content/2/1/15

- Alcohol and adolescence briefing by SHAAP:

Q30. Paragraph 151 of the PM seems to directly contradict the suggestion in paragraph 150. Could you elaborate on the thinking here please.

Section 147 of the 2005 Act defines a child as “a person under the age of 16” and a young person as “a person aged 16 or 17”. Thus the ‘protecting children’ objective does not apply to 16 and 17 year olds. These concerns were highlighted in the joint report ‘Re-thinking alcohol licensing’ by Alcohol Focus Scotland and Scottish Health Action on Alcohol Problems (SHAAP). The distinction between children and young persons creates difficulties for Licensing Boards when dealing with issues around young persons. For example it means that any action the Board take in relation to test purchase failures have to be considered in regards the crime prevention objection as opposed to the children objective. Equally when considering areas set aside for children and young persons within premises, it is difficult to relate to this to the objectives especially in respect of young persons. Looking at the Nicholson Report there is no obvious justification for the licensing objective excluding young persons and therefore it is presumed that this was inadvertent.

The broadening out of the objective would give Licensing Boards greater scope when considering the wider implications of young persons’ access to alcohol. Despite the wide ranging role of the licensing objectives, it is not envisaged that expanding this particular licensing objective will create unintended consequences, or adversely affect the considerations that Boards undertake

Q31. Please indicate whether an existing statement of licensing policy will subsist until replaced.

The provisions at section 42 of the Bill amend the existing regime. Under the existing regime a licensing policy statement is valid for a period of three years. The Bill provision amends this to better align with the tenure of Licensing Boards. They are to be given eighteen months in which to prepare a licensing policy statement. It is open to them to publish a policy statement more quickly. This would then come into effect when published. During that eighteen month period the previous licensing policy statement would remain valid. We could expect Boards to prepare their licensing policy statements within this period. If a Board fails to prepare a licensing policy statement within the laid down period, then it is appropriate for the courts to consider its validity.

Q32. In paragraph 161 of the PM please provide detail of the majority and also information from the minority views.

A summary of the responses to the Further Options for Alcohol Licensing is available on the Scottish Government website at http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2013/10/9066

Q33. Paragraph 161 of the PM suggests various suggestions were considered unduly onerous. Please indicate in what way each of these undermines the economic interests of the alcohol trade as specified in paragraph 121.

Paragraph 162 of the Policy Memorandum notes that certain policy proposals related to public health were considered to be unduly onerous. Looking at the proposals specifically listed in that paragraph:

- Reducing off-sales hours

  This proposal from the joint Alcohol Focus Scotland (AFS) / Scottish Health Action on Alcohol Problems (SHAAP) report Re-Thinking Alcohol Licensing was not included within the Further Options for Alcohol licensing consultation. It was felt that the impact on the public and trade would be to create considerable inconvenience to the responsible trade and responsible drinkers, without strong evidence that it would reduce alcohol misuse.

- Introduction of alcohol only checkouts

  This proposal from the joint AFS/SHAAP report was not included within the Further Options for Alcohol licensing consultation. Similarly it was felt that the impact on the public and trade would be to create considerable inconvenience to the responsible trade and responsible drinkers, without strong evidence that it would reduce alcohol misuse.

- Placing a statutory duty on Boards to promote the licensing objectives and to provide annual reports on how they had done so

These proposals were consulted on. Consultation responses suggested that rather than leading to a change in attitude or practice, this proposal would simply lead to additional reporting. Further details are available in the summary of the Further Options for Alcohol Licensing consultation (http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2013/10/9066).

Q34. It might also be useful in responding to the above to indicate why the economic interests of the trade are considered paramount, or at least more important than public health measures.

The economic interests of the trade are not considered paramount, nor are public health measures. The Scottish Government fully recognises the social and economic benefits to production of wines, spirits and beers, as well as of the on and off-trade. However we are not complacent about the very real public health and public order issues associated with alcohol misuse.

In considering reform it is necessary to balance the likely negative cost and inconvenience to trade and public against the likely positive impact in improving public health and reducing crime and disorder.

Q35. Given the size of this Bill, and indeed the complexity of parts, the suggestion of the test in paragraph 163 of the PM (relatively straightforward to implement) could benefit from specific detail in relation to the measures not being implemented.

Further Options for Alcohol Licensing consultation responses raised concerns about the practicality and impact of some proposals. Proposals to place statutory duties on Licensing Boards to promote the licensing objectives, to report each year on how the Board has fulfilled its duty to promote each of the licensing objectives and to gather and assess information on each of the five licensing objectives in the 2005 Act in the preparation of their statement of licensing policy, were considered by many to impose additional work on Licensing Boards but would have little positive impact.

Similarly the majority of consultation responses were opposed to the proposal that a national licensing policy statement be developed which local Licensing Boards would be required to have regard to when drawing up their own policies. This was considered likely to be too general to be of any great value to Boards.
Q36. Can you confirm if the detail on fee income to be reported will require to be subdivided by category (paragraph 174 of the PM).

Boards will be required to report on their income and expenditure with an explanation of how the amounts in the statement have been calculated. We would expect local Licensing Boards to work together, for example along with COSLA, to ensure that information was provided to a common and useful format. However, if necessary, the Bill provides an order making power for secondary legislation to require certain details to be provided.

Q37. Paragraph 175 of the PM refers to the “Civil Licensing regime”, could you indicate what that encompasses.

By the civic licensing regime we mean the licensing regimes within Part 2 and Part 3 of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982, as amended elsewhere in this Bill. Section 3 of the 1982 Act sets out that every licensing authority shall consider each application within 3 months and reach a final decision within 6 months, along with providing for an extension on summary application to the sheriff and the automatic granting of an application. The provisions at Section 58 of the Bill are intended to broadly reflect the provisions at Section 3 of the 1982 Act.

Q38. Paragraph 182 of the PM is vague as to what the reference to “these provisions” is. Can you be specific here.

In the Policy Memorandum we grouped together provisions that particularly demonstrated an underlying theme. In relation to paragraph 164 onwards, and improvements to the existing regime and reducing burdens on trade and licensing boards, the specific provisions that are covered are:

- Personal licences Section 57;
- Duty on boards to produce annual financial report Section 55;
- Processing of applications and deemed grant Section 58;
- Relevant offences and foreign offences Section 49, Section 50.

Q39. Please indicate who was represented on the Board referred to in paragraph 183 of the PM and provide links to their findings.

The Review of Alcohol Licensing Fees - Steering Group: Recommendations to Scottish Ministers are available on the Scottish Government website at

http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2014/02/6340/0

The steering group consisted of

- William Boyack - Wine and Spirit Trade Association (WSTA)

- Patrick Browne - Scottish Beer and Pub Association (SBPA)
- John Drummond - Scottish Grocers' Federation (SGF)
- Morag Leck - Depute Clerk to Renfrewshire Licensing Board (attended the steering group as representatives of the SOLAR Licensing Group)
- Robert Millar - Depute Clerk to City of Edinburgh Licensing Board (attended the steering group as representatives of the SOLAR Licensing Group)
- Paul Waterson - Scottish Licensed Trade Association (SLTA)
- Chair - Quentin Fisher - Head of Licensing - Scottish Government

Q40. Is there any difference intended between the phrases in paragraphs 8 (unnecessary burdens) and 184 (burdens) in the PM?

No

Q41. Can you confirm all the measures in Part 2 of the Bill fall into the category of improving the existing system or reducing burdens?

The Scottish Government intends to improve the existing regime, and that is the intention of all the provisions in Part 2. A number of provisions will make a particular impact on reducing unnecessary burdens, for example:

- Section 42 statements of licensing policy
- Section 49 premises licences: procedure in relation to relevant offences or foreign offences
- Section 53 personal licences: procedure in relation to relevant offences and foreign offences
- Section 56 interested parties
- Section 57 personal licences: grant, duration and renewal
- Section 58 processing and deemed grant of applications

Other provisions will improve the overall clarity, effectiveness and transparency of the regime, and are likely to reduce the burden on Boards which could be reflected in the fees charged to the trade.

For example section 55 Duty of Licensing Boards to produce annual financial report has been broadly welcomed by the trade as increasing the transparency of local Licensing Board income and expenditure, an issue that has concerned members of the licensed trade for some time.

Q42. Given the changes made by section 41 of the Bill to youths, please explain the statement that nothing is discriminatory on the grounds of age.

The provision at section 41, to add young persons to the licensing objective protecting children from harm, makes it clear that Boards should consider the interests of sixteen and seventeen year olds. While the word discrimination can relate to the act of making any distinction, we were using it in the other sense of making a distinction that is contrary to a person’s interest, such as racial or sexual discrimination.

Q43. Is paragraph 186 of the PM suggesting that as revocation is undertaken by licensing boards ECHR considerations do not apply?

No, the intended meaning is that Boards will need to ensure that their actions are ECHR compliant. Boards already take account of issues outwith the immediate licensing legislation, for example case law and equalities, and we would expect them to continue to draw upon the legal advice provided by their clerks.

Q44. Paragraph 188 of the PM refers to balancing rights with public safety yet that is not mentioned elsewhere as being a consideration for this Part of the Bill. Please indicate which measures in this Part address public safety.

We agree that the reference to public safety in this paragraph is potentially confusing, and a reference to the licensing objectives that underpin the Act might have been more appropriate.
Part 3 Civic Licensing

Taxis and Private Hire Cars

Q45. To aid understanding of this Part of the Bill could you provide a summary of the primary legislation, secondary legislation and guidance that comprises the current regime under which taxis and private hire cars are licensed. The summary could helpfully show where the regimes for taxis and private hire cars differ and where the same or similar provisions apply. In addition, the summary should show where changes are proposed, whether in the Bill or through separate changes to secondary legislation or guidance. As much detail as possible should be provided of planned changes to secondary legislation or guidance (if little detail is currently available, please say when further information is expected to become available).

Current Regime
The Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 (the 1982 Act), as amended, provides the legal framework from which local licensing authorities create and administer their local licensing regimes. Sections 10 to 23 and Schedule 1 refer. There is a series of secondary legislation which provide more details, including:-

- Licensing & Regulation of Taxis (Appeals in Respect of Taxi Fares) (Scotland) Order 1985 (SI 1985/2025) (as amended)
- Licensing & Regulation of Taxis and Private Hire Cars and their Drivers (Prohibited and Required Conditions) (Scotland) Regulations 1986 (SI 1986 / 1238).
- Local Services (Operation by Taxis) (Scotland) Regulations 1986 (SI 1986/1239)
- Taxi Drivers (Carrying of Guide Dogs and Hearing Dogs) (Scotland) Regulations 2003 (SSI 2003/73)
- Private Hire Car Drivers (Carrying of Guide Dogs and Hearing Dogs) (Scotland) Regulations 2004 (SSI 2004/88)

There is also Best Practice Guidance which the Scottish Government provides for local licensing authorities - http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/04/3534/0.

This legislation provides for a range of licences, the taxis licence, the private hire car vehicle licence, the taxi driver licence and the private hire car licence, and the taxis and private hire car booking office licence brought in by the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 (Licensing of Booking Officers) Order 2009.

Similarities
- If a licensing authority makes a resolution to introduce taxi licensing, then they must also licence private hire cars. Both taxis and private hire cars are required to have vehicle licences. Both types of vehicles must be suitable in type, size and design for use as a taxi or private hire car. Both drivers of private hire cars and taxis have to be licensed, as do booking offices where there are four or more cars. Both taxis and private hire car drivers may have to undergo a medical examination. A taxi driver may use their taxi driver licence to operate a hire car however the reverse does not apply.

- The Taxi Drivers (Carrying of Guide Dogs and Hearing Dogs) (Scotland) Regulations 2003 and the Private Hire Car Drivers (Carrying of Guide Dogs and Hearing Dogs) (Scotland) Regulations 2004 place a duty on taxi drivers and private hire car drivers to carry a disabled passenger’s guide dog, hearing dog, or assistance dog. The drivers may apply for an exemption if they have a permissible reason to refuse.

Differences

- A taxi can be hailed in public, or use a taxi rank, whereas a private hire car must be pre-booked.

- The 1982 Act allows that the grant of a taxi licence may be refused by a licensing authority for the purpose of limiting the number of taxis if they are satisfied that there is no significant unmet demand for the services of taxis in their area. This does not currently apply to private hire cars.

- A licensing authority can charge separate fees for taxi and private hire car licences and should ensure the fees are sufficient to cover their expenses.

- A licensing authority can require a taxi driver applicant to take a test of his or her knowledge of an area to which the licence relates, of the layout of roads and other matters relating to the operation of a taxi as the authority may consider desirable. This does not currently apply to private hire car drivers.

- A private hire car cannot display a word, sign, notice, mark, illumination or other feature which may suggest that the vehicle is available for hire as a taxi.

- Licensing authorities fix maximum fares in relation to taxis, but this does not apply to private hire cars.

- Licensing authorities can appoint taxi stances (or ranks) but there is no similar provision for private hire cars.

- Offences are similar in that to pick up a passenger where a licence is required, without either taxi or private hire licence, where the statutory exemptions do not apply, is an offence. Permitting an unlicensed driver to use a taxi or private hire car is an offence. However, there are also offences specific to a category, for example if a vehicle other than a taxi waits at a taxi stance it is an offence. It is an offence for a private hire car to pick up a passenger without a pre-booking.

The Bill
There are 3 provisions in the Bill that relate specifically to taxi and private hire cars:

- Refusal to grant private hire car licence on grounds of overprovision – This will enable the licensing authority to refuse a private hire car licence application on the grounds of overprovision of private hire cars in a given locality or localities:

- Testing of private hire car drivers – Allows licensing authority to require testing of applicants for a private hire car driver licence, as per the current ability to do so for taxi driver licences:

- Removal of contract hire exemption – bringing hire cars used for contracts into the taxi and private hire car licensing regime.

Secondary Legislation - There are also options we intend to take forward via secondary legislation. See responses to questions 49, 52 and 53 for further details.

Guidance – We intend to work with our stakeholders to update the best practice guidance. See response to question 49 for further detail.

Q46. Regarding paragraph 190, please provide examples of how different local authorities apply discretion under the current regime to produce local regimes that meet the specific requirements of different local areas.

The taxi and private hire car trade operates very differently across the diverse geography and economy of Scotland. As might be envisaged the trade in a small rural authority is very different from a large urban authority. The legislation offers licensing authorities scope to tailor the regime to their area. We feel that this is an important facet of the regime and we are not seeking to change this.

The Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 provides the legislative framework for local authorities, functioning as the licensing authority, to create and manage an appropriate local licensing regime. Despite the fact they are discretionary, all local authorities have a regime for licensing drivers and vehicles.

Interpretation of the legislation is a matter for each local licensing authority and ultimately the courts, where any appeals against local licensing decisions are finally settled.

There are no national standards or statutory guidance for taxi and private hire car licensing (although, as above, the Scottish Government publishes best practice for local licensing authorities). Licence conditions have also been suggested to local authorities http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2012/04/2261/0.

However we understand that not all local authorities apply these conditions, and that there is variation in the licence conditions that they do apply. Much of the actual detail resides in the licence conditions that are applied to individual licences, rather than in the legislation itself. This means local licensing authorities have a very wide discretion on the setting of licence conditions.

Whilst there may be similarities in the way that licensing authorities license taxis and private hire cars, there are also often substantial differences, including:

- The minimum requirements in application processes for driver and vehicle licences. Some authorities will request completed application form, fees and certificates of insurance, roadworthiness and registration in case of vehicle licences, whilst others will require vehicle inspection at their premises prior to issuing a licence. There are differences in how authorities choose to do initial checks. These can vary from underlying checks to both the driver and vehicle. All will have police check, criminal record check and a vehicle standard check but some authorities will also require an occupational health check as well.

- Duration of licences issued can vary, as per the provisions in Schedule 1 of the 1982 Act.

- Grounds for refusal – there are variations in the reasons for refusing a licence, e.g. failure to respond to requests for information, not presenting a vehicle for inspections, objections from medical report etc.

- Some authorities, particularly in the cities, will limit the number of taxi licences they award if they consider there to be an excess in that locality.

- Some local authorities have a policy that of their taxi vehicles, a certain number at the very least must be wheelchair accessible vehicles. Other local authorities do not have any requirements over set numbers of wheelchair accessible vehicles.

- The fees charged vary between local authorities. Some will charge different fees for a taxi driver licence compared to a private hire car licence, whilst others will charge a set fee for both.

- Some local authorities will require their drivers to undertake topographical knowledge tests before issuing a taxi driver licence, whilst others do not require this test.

- Standards and procedures for the testing of vehicles also vary greatly throughout the country.

- Some licensing authorities bring vehicles such as chauffeur driven businesses, vehicles used for airport transfers, stretch limousines and ‘novelty’ vehicles within the taxi and private hire regime using the discretion available to them to determine the size, type and design of such vehicles that can operate in their area.
Q47. It is extremely difficult to understand the proposals in the Bill with reference to the existing regimes. To assist understanding please provide examples of—

- variations in the way in which the current legislation is interpreted and implemented;

See response to question 46.

- areas in which a more consistent approach would be beneficial and areas where local flexibility is still more appropriate;

Responses to the public consultation Taxi and Private Hire car Licensing – Proposals for Change suggested the following aspects where a more consistent approach could be beneficial:-

- Rules on conduct of hearings – for example fair hearing procedure; criteria for adjournments etc
- Removal of contract exemption. This will ensure the same level of scrutiny for the public using these services as there is in place for taxi and private hire car drivers.

It is felt that the number of taxi licences is best decided at a local level, as there will be differences in requirement, for example, depending on whether it is a rural or urban authority. Specific grounds for refusal and length of licence are also best decided locally as local licensing authorities are best placed to decide what suits the local circumstances.

- the unfair challenges and abuse referred to in the first bullet-point of paragraph 193 (and also say what effects these have had on public safety).

Issues raised by stakeholders include the fact that special events vehicles and contract hire vehicles generally fall outwith the current licensing regime for taxis and private hire cars, the lack of testing facilities and testing standards for custom built or imported vehicles and businesses run from mobile numbers with no clear evidence of where they are operating from. There have also been allegations of businesses getting round the requirement for booking office licences by claiming to be below the threshold for registration.

The overall impact of this is that individuals and businesses that are not properly regulated are transporting members of the public potentially in vehicles that are not properly checked. Some of these vehicles may be transporting vulnerable people, including children.
• In addition, please describe—the recent changes to the market for hire car service (including the significant distinctions that remain between taxis and private hire cars, as referred to in paragraph 198);

When the original legislation was drafted the taxi and private hire car market was broadly categorised by two differing market operations; the taxi fleet which is able to ‘ply for hire’, pick up on street and at taxi stances, as well as responding to pre-booked trips; and the private hire car market which is able to pick up in response to pre-booked trips only. The latter was considered to have a greater degree of premeditated choice associated with it and consequently a lesser degree of regulation was required.

However since then mobile phones and the use of apps on smart phones to book a taxi or private hire car have blurred the lines prompting calls for greater consistency.

However, sufficient operational differences remain such that it is not appropriate to simply apply the same unmet demand test for private hire cars as there is for taxis. That is because all private hire cars require to be pre-booked, so demand cannot be measured in waiting times. Instead the test has been drafted in terms of overprovision. Similar provisions exist in relation to houses in multiple occupation, within the Housing (Scotland) Act 2006 and for alcohol premises licences, in the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005.

• current compliance checking measures.

Most authorities will make reference to a Scottish Criminal Records Office (SCRO) check prior to granting a licence (commonly known as disclosure checks).

The resources devoted by licensing authorities to enforcement will vary according to local circumstances and frequent liaison between licensing authorities and the police through information and intelligence sharing can help authorities gauge the level and type of enforcement activity required. Some authorities have successfully carried out joint operations with the police, for example targeting known problem spots where instances of breaches of licensing have been reported. Some local licensing authorities use enforcement staff to check a range of licensed activities (such as market traders) as well as the taxi and private hire trades, to make the best use of staff resources.

A range of compliance checking takes place including:

- roadside safety inspections
- licence status checks
- investigation of complaints
- scrutiny of licence applications and inspection records
- Inter-authority working group
Q48. It would enable members to follow the proposed changes if you would state which of the changes listed in the summary provided in responses to the first question in this set of questions on taxis and private car hires contribute to each of the points mentioned in the bullet-points in paragraphs 192 and 193.

Addressing issues with the variability in how legislation is interpreted and implemented;
- Removal of contract exemption

Encouraging a consistent approach to local authority practice where this is beneficial, while maintaining appropriate local flexibility;
- Removal of contract exemption
- Overprovision of private hire cars

Amending legislation to take account of the changes to the current market for hire car services.
- Overprovision of private hire cars
- Testing of private hire car drivers
- Removal of contract exemption
- Testing of private hire car drivers

Addressing concerns that the legitimate trade is being unfairly challenged in some areas by businesses and individuals circumventing or abusing/ignoring the licensing regime. This then has an effect on public safety;
- Removal of contract exemption

Improving compliance checking within the regime.
- Testing of private hire car drivers

Q49. Paragraph 195 of the PM refers to the Bill being part of a wider body of work to address concerns relating to taxi/private hire car licensing. Later on, this work is described as relating to the regulation of booking offices and the consideration of mandatory licensing conditions. Please give us an indication of what action is proposed in these areas – or a timescale for when such information will be available?

It is our intention to convene a working group to consider the creation of updated licensing conditions for taxi and private hire car drivers, vehicles and booking offices. Part of this work will explore whether booking office regulations should be extended to all booking offices, rather than just those with four cars or more. There will also be scope to see if the booking office licence would benefit from expanded mandatory conditions. This could cover for example more detailed record-keeping. As well as secondary legislation to tighten up the regulation of booking offices we will explore creation of further mandatory conditions, and updated guidance to share and encourage best practice.
The use of mandatory conditions could be used to clarify expectations in the way private hire cars can operate. Issues that may be covered by mandatory conditions are standards for vulnerable people, duty to assess and respond to needs of those with disabilities (not just wheelchair users), accessibility requirements for vehicles, vehicle inspection, cross border hiring etc, training in equalities and diversity, customer care, passenger safety, road safety, awareness of licensing requirements, communication skills, health and safety, and driving skills.

It is also proposed to convene a working group to refresh guidance for licensing authorities, to potentially include: updated, improved guidance on how to assess overprovision and unmet demand; good practice case studies on testing & training, enforcement and compliance work; guidance on the licence application process to ensure licensing authorities are using their full powers to deter and weed out unsuitable applicants; widen guidance to cover other statutory duties related to taxi and private hire cars including the Climate Change Public Sector Duty and duties in relation to the Equality Act 2010; include an updated set of recommended conditions for each level of licence.

This work will be progressed within an appropriate timescale in accordance with overall priorities and the resources available.

Q50. Please indicate which authorities are experiencing difficulties as referred to in paragraph 197 of the PM.

In the consultation, a number of reasons were offered to support the creation of a power to restrict numbers of private hire car licences. The main ones were to provide consistency across the licensing regime between taxi and private hire cars and for licensing authorities to have flexibility in addressing concerns related to the number of vehicles on the road.

Views were expressed that a saturated market could lead to lower standards. It was thought that restriction will improve standards of entry to trade and maintain high standards within the trade. Increases in illegal pick-ups and cross borderhirings were both cited as negative impacts of an oversupply of vehicles on the road. It was felt that quantity restriction would provide licensing authorities with tools to better manage local supply and demand. It was recognised that there may be circumstances in which it would be appropriate to have a quantity restriction; namely in the interests of public safety, and reducing congestion or pollution.

Q51. Paragraph 199 of the PM refers to the Scottish Government expecting local authorities to use limits on licence numbers for private hire cars as a last resort. There does not appear to be any mechanism to enforce this position. Please clarify thinking in this area?

The Scottish Government intends to provide updated guidance to local licensing authorities to share best practice in developing relevant policies. However, as the power is discretionary it will allow authorities to decide when local circumstances best suit the cap on private hire cars being applied. The overprovision limit for taxis, already in the 1982 Act, is discretionary therefore the new provision is in line with this.

Q52. Paragraphs 200 to 202 of the PM deal with removing the exemption to private hire car licensing for vehicles on contract for 24 hours or more. Concerns are noted about the impact of this on those currently exempt. Please clarify which types of business may face difficulties as a result, and what options are under consideration to change the way the exemption is introduced to address this?

As noted in the policy memorandum, a similar exemption was removed from private hire licensing legislation in England and Wales. A review of the impact of the repeal of the private hire vehicle contract exemption highlighted a number of lessons learned, particularly around the difficulty in estimating numbers of those who would be affected and the level and quality of guidance provided in advance of the repeal coming into effect. There had also been concerns that a wide variety of activities would be significantly affected by the repeal although this was not generally found to have happened. Taking account of the experience in England and Wales, the removal of the contract exemption from the 1982 Act will not come into effect immediately.

The provision creates an order-making power which allows Scottish Ministers to make regulations specifying further exemptions from taxi and private hire car licensing. This will allow the Scottish Government to consider, identify and exempt types of vehicle or supply that it would be inappropriate to register. Commencement of this provision in the Bill will be delayed to ensure those affected by the removal of exemption (both trade and local authorities) have time to prepare for licensing. This is to help address any issues with the removal of the exemption if it becomes clear there are significant unintended consequences affecting some types of operation.

The Scottish Government will use the time before this provision comes into effect to ensure all individuals and businesses that will be affected have an opportunity to clarify their own position and local authorities have an opportunity to develop appropriate policies and conditions to incorporate the new licence holders successfully.

Where driving is an ancillary service (for example, child-minding) there may be an issue around how licensing authorities would treat vehicles and drivers. The Scottish Government recommends that at a detailed assessment of activity should be undertaken by the licensing authority to determine whether a licence is required.

Council contracts would also likely be affected, particularly in remote areas where there is a high demand for school transport services and demand for private hire car services is low. It can be difficult to attract competition for these tenders already and requiring a licensed vehicle and driver would increase costs and reduce available operators.

The provision of community transport services was specifically mentioned in the consultation as being vulnerable to increases in costs if they are required to be licenced.

Q53. Paragraph 204 of the PM refers to proposed secondary legislation, please indicate what the proposed provisions are designed to achieve. Please also indicate what are the difficulties that would be faced (and by what types of business) and in what ways would those difficulties vary depending on how the proposed change is introduced?

Booking Office
Also see response to question 49.
The main concerns with extending the provisions of the booking office order were: over-burdening small businesses particularly sole traders, difficulty and cost of enforcement (particularly around extending to non-premises based booking systems), lack of need for this in rural areas where issues of criminality are not considered so relevant. The booking office regime is currently mandatory so it would be difficult to give discretion to local authorities over what booking offices they licence.

The benefits of extending the booking office regime are: providing a level playing field for all businesses, facilitating competition, adapting to realities of increasing use of new technologies, allowing greater scrutiny of businesses that are currently sitting out with the licensing regime – specifically businesses that appear to run fewer cars but in fact have a far larger pool of cars working for them, enhance enforcement (particularly if improved mandatory conditions are put in place related to record keeping and accessing financial records).

Mandatory Conditions
Also see response to question 49.

If the provisions for mandatory conditions are included in secondary legislation it will ensure they can be reviewed and refreshed as required.

Contract Exemption
See response to question 52.

Chauffeur services may be particularly affected by the proposed secondary legislation on removal of the contract exemption. If particular vehicles are used to suit particular clients, and sometimes have to be outsourced, this will pose difficulties if only licensed vehicles can be used. As noted previously, the Scottish Government will look into issues for all operators and businesses before bringing this provision in to force.
Hearings

A power to issue secondary legislation on the conduct of hearings (to ensure good practice) will also be included.
Metal dealers

Q54. The Committee would appreciate some general background information here. You provide a value for the industry and the Financial memorandum provides numbers of licensed and exempt dealers. Any information you can provide on the geographical spread of where the dealers are based would assist the Committee.

In December 2012 the British Transport Police conducted an assessment of dealerships. It broke down the figures by the then Police Force areas:

<thead>
<tr>
<th>Force Area</th>
<th>Count</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Central</td>
<td>28</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dumfries &amp; Galloway</td>
<td>15</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fife</td>
<td>18</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Grampian</td>
<td>34</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lothian &amp; Borders</td>
<td>50</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Northern</td>
<td>20</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Strathclyde</td>
<td>95</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total</td>
<td>285</td>
</tr>
</tbody>

The figures should be caveated that subsequent work identified that some of the businesses were no longer operating. Nevertheless it still provides the best available estimate of the spread of dealers.

Q55. What are the current arrangements for licensing and maintaining a record of metal dealers in Scotland and how, if at all, will this change under the proposed legislation?

Metal Dealers are currently licensed under a regime provided for under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982. This will continue to be the case. Each local licensing authority is responsible for licensing metal dealers in their area and keeping a record of all licences issued. That will also continue to be the case under the proposed legislation. The new arrangements will result in more dealers needing a licence given the proposed abolition of the exemption category.

Additionally SEPA keep a record of metal dealers as they also require a waste carrier’s licence.

Q56. In relation to the enforcement of licensing requirements, who is responsible for scrutinising dealers’ records and are there any guidelines on how often this should be done, to whom are returns made and what is the role of local authorities once a licence has been granted?

These arrangements are already set out in the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982. The Bill will not change these arrangements. Under section 5 of the 1982 Act an authorised officer of the licensing authority or a constable can enter and inspect premises and records. There is no guidance on how often records should be inspected but licensing authorities and the Police have long experience of this type of activity. Intelligence or evidence of problems (either with a specific premises or in a locality generally) may give rise to a heightened level of inspection for certain premises. Other premises which are regarded as well run and operated to a high standard may not require the same level of scrutiny.

Q57. What special arrangements are made in relation to licences for itinerant dealers and will such licensees continue to be able to operate across Scotland under a single licence?

Itinerant licences will continue to be applicable throughout Scotland. Such licences will have to comply with the tougher conditions imposed on all dealers such as the proposed ban on dealing in cash and the changes in relation to identity checking and record keeping.

Q58. Can you specify what you see as the benefits of removing the 48-hour retention period before dealers can process metal in terms of the objectives of the Bill?

The Scottish Government sees the Bill as delivering an effective, proportionate system of licensing metal dealers. Whilst there is a need for greater rigour in licensing arrangements, we also accept that regulation needs to be practical.

Our engagement with the industry has convinced the Scottish Government that the 48 hour requirement is impractical for many operators. There are two reasons for this. Firstly, some operators turn round metal extremely quickly in order to respond to price changes on commodity markets. In addition, and perhaps more compellingly, there are physical constraints on many dealers’ premises that would prevent them operating the 48 hour rule. A busy dealer taking over a hundred deliveries a day may simply lack the capacity to leave them all individually separated and unprocessed for 48 hours. SEPA also imposes requirements on metal dealers limiting the amount of metal that can be retained on site.

Having said this, it would be possible for a Sheriff or licensing authority to impose a period for which metal must be retained in individual cases where necessary.

Q59. What forms of identification will be considered acceptable for the purposes of verifying the name and address of a customer?

The proposed legislation does not specify the particular forms of identification that will be considered acceptable. It is likely that commonly held documents such as passports and driving licences will be used, supported by bank statements and utility bills as proofs of address. We have not prescribed this as we do not wish to limit the customer base of metal dealers by excluding those who do not hold passports or driving licences. Any dealer accepting proofs of identification that are inadequate may find this reported to the licensing authority.

Q60. What other proposals have been suggested during the consultation phase, which are not being taken forward (such as an accreditation scheme for metal dealers or enhanced licensing requirements like CCTV)?

While proposals such as an accreditation scheme for dealers and tougher requirements such as CCTV have not been specifically included within the legislative proposals, it is not the case that they will not necessarily be taken forward. Tougher licensing requirements can be imposed as a licensing condition on a case by case basis. In dealing with each application (or at any subsequent review) a licensing authority can add conditions to a licence so it could, for example, add a CCTV requirement as a condition. An accreditation scheme could be taken forward without legislation. The trade or some other body could set up such a scheme and operate it with dealers joining on a voluntary basis.

There were no other metal dealer licensing proposals that enjoyed widespread support that have not been progressed.
Public Entertainment Venues

Q61. Please provide detail of what the Bill does and how, with the repeal, theatres will be licensed in future.

The Bill removes the mandatory licensing requirement for theatres by repealing both the provision for this in the Theatres Act 1968 and the exemption from public entertainment licensing in the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982. This will allow local authorities to licence theatres alongside other forms of public entertainment.

Q62. In what circumstances might less onerous licensing requirements be required? Is this intended to refer to venues with a limited capacity? How will that provision work in practice?

Local licensing authorities enjoy considerable discretion in how they licence public entertainment. They already use this flexibility to remove the licencing requirement from venues with lower capacity. A good practical example is already provided by Glasgow City Council which provides that venues with capacity of under 500 do not need to be licensed provided other requirements are met. Their policy is copied below.

“Spectator Entertainment

Performances

Performance of (i) Dance; (ii) Live Music (amplified or unamplified); (iii) Recorded Music; or (iv) a Play taking place to an audience and for the primary purpose of entertaining that audience.

Exhibitions

The public exhibition of an object such as a painting, sculpture, drawing, installation or historic artefact.

Public Shows

Public shows and similar events such as Festivals, Fairs, Sporting Events, Circuses and Firework Displays held primarily for the purpose of providing entertainment.

Exemption for Spectator Based Entertainment

A Public Entertainment Licence shall not be required for spectator based entertainment events that satisfy all of the following conditions:
a) the event is provided to an audience of less than 500 persons at any one time and the organiser of the event takes appropriate steps to monitor and control capacity during the event; and

b) in planning and delivering the event the organiser takes cognisance of HSG195 - the Health and Safety Executive Event Safety Guide (also known as the Purple Guide) or any further additional or replacement guidance specified by the Licensing Authority; and

c) the organiser carries out a risk assessment of the proposed event and determines that no aspect of the event presents a high risk to the safety of spectators."

The changes proposed would allow theatres to benefit from the same flexibilities that already exist for other forms of public entertainment.

Q63. What is the effect of the repeal of the powers of entry provisions?

There is no practical effect. The powers of entry provisions in the 1968 Act are effectively redundant given the removal of the licensing requirement. Equivalent powers are contained within section 5 of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 and will be applicable when theatres are licensed under the public entertainment provisions of that Act.

Q64. Who was consulted by the Government, on what, and what was their reaction to these proposals. Why was no wider consultation held?

We have held discussions with Creative Scotland, the Federation of Scottish Theatre and others arts bodies on the proposals as well as some licensing specialists on the specific proposal to remove the mandatory licensing requirement under the 1968 Act and allow theatres to be licensed under the public entertainment regime set out in the 1982 Act.

Those representing arts bodies were generally supportive of the additional flexibility and discretion provided by the proposals and in particular the possibility of ‘lighter touch’ licensing for smaller theatres. There was some concern about what the changes might mean for fee levels, however the Scottish Government has no evidence that fee levels for theatres would in fact change significantly under the new arrangements.

A full public consultation was felt to be disproportionate to the scale of the changes. Theatres were licensed and will continue to be licensed – albeit in a more flexible way. The public at large is unlikely to see significant change as a result of this change.
Sexual Entertainment Venues

Q65. Paragraph 250 of the PM indicates around 20 sexual entertainment venues exist, please provide information about where these venues are i.e. cities, the central belt etc. or the sort of venues they are e.g. lap dancing, strip clubs etc.

The 20 venues referred to are located in Edinburgh, Dundee, Glasgow and Aberdeen and are lap dancing clubs. The greatest concentrations can be found in Edinburgh and Glasgow.

Q66. Please provide detail on how the licensing regime will work—i.e. local authority licensing statements, conditions, enforcement, consultation, objections, duration of a licence, transfer of a licence, refusal of a licence, appeal, offences etc. The Committee are concerned that respondents may not fully understanding what the “architecture” of the 1982 Act is in relation to sex shops, and therefore whether the framework for sex shops is suitable for sexual entertainment venues.

The scheme would operate in what might be regarded as a “typical” civic licensing procedure covering most of the matters raised above. A licensing authority can grant a licence unconditionally, refuse it, or grant it subject to conditions. Conditions must be reasonable and may include (non-exhaustively) matters such as hours of operating, window displays and visibility from the street. Enforcement is a matter for the licensing authority and the Police, both of whom have rights of entry and inspection. If a matter is brought to the attention of the Police then they would determine what action to take. Actions could include reporting the matter to the Fiscal for possible prosecution or referring the matter to the licensing authority for potential action such as revocation of the licence or the imposition of additional conditions. Public notice of any applications shall be made and objections and representations can be made by any member of the public prior to the licensing authority taking its final decision. There is no process for transferring a licence. A right of appeal to the Sheriff exists for applicants unhappy at a decision of a licensing authority. A licence will run for one year or for a shorter period determined by the licensing authority. There is no requirement for a licensing policy statement, however a local authority may choose to prepare one. Typical licensing offences exist e.g. operating without a licence or operating in breach of the conditions of a licence.

Q67. Please explain the thinking behind the main definitions “sexual entertainment”, “organiser” or “audience”.

Underpinning the definitions provided for in the Bill is the intent that we should licence what we intend to licence and avoid licensing that which we don’t. The definitions are therefore crafted to capture what would be understood to be sexual entertainment and to avoid inadvertently capturing any other activity.

Specifically, ‘an audience’ is defined as including an audience of one to ensure that private dances in a booth of some sort is captured by the licensing scheme.

The definition of sexual entertainment has been crafted to be clear that the entertainment must be intended to sexually stimulate. It is the intention that is important. The mere fact that an audience member may be sexually stimulated is irrelevant. Thus, a play involving nudity would not be covered by this if there was no intention to sexually stimulate the audience.

‘Organiser’ is defined broadly to include any person who is responsible for the organisation or management of the relevant entertainment or the premises and any person who gains at arm’s length such as an owner. Thus, even if the financial gain is going to a 3rd party owner, not directly involved in the management of the premises, the licensing requirement is engaged.

The definitions are closely aligned to existing legislation from England and Wales (Policing and Crime Act 2009)

Q68. Please explain how the new licensing scheme will dovetail with the alcohol licensing if the venue sells alcohol, or with any other relevant licensing scheme.

Were a sexual entertainment venue to also sell alcohol, two licences would be necessary – a premises licence to sell alcohol under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 and a licence under the proposed new regime for sexual entertainment venues. The licences would co-exist with conditions set by the Licensing Board relating to the sale of alcohol and the local authority in respect of it being a sexual entertainment venue.

The alcohol licensing system already regulates, to a limited extent, sexual entertainment through, for example, the Licensing Conditions (Late Opening Premises) (Scotland) Regulations 2007. It is anticipated that some amendment will be required to secondary legislation to ensure consistency of definitions and to avoid overlap in regulation. These controls will continue to be necessary for premises which offer sexual entertainment on fewer than four occasions per year and therefore will not be licensed under the new sexual entertainment venue licensing arrangements. (Also see response to question 69.)

Q69. In relation to enforcement explain how it will be possible to determine whether sexual entertainment has happened on 4 or more occasions – will a licence be needed under another regime for those occasions? Is there a penalty for breach of this condition?
A licensing authority will use enforcement and sanctions proportionately. A premises that hosts sexual entertainment events on more than 4 occasions without a licence will be committing an offence under section 7 of the 1982 Act. Clearly the risk of detection rises with the frequency with which sexual entertainment is taking place.

As noted in the response to question 68, a premises such as a pub, offering sexual entertainment on less than four occasions would still have to comply with the requirements of the alcohol licensing regime.

Q70. Are there any transitional provisions for existing venues or any other transitional arrangements needed for local authorities? What about existing licence conditions? Does the commencement period (coming into force of the Bill) take account of these issues?

Following commencement of the legislation it will be open to a local licensing authority to introduce a sexual entertainment licensing regime for their area. They cannot specify a date for which the scheme to come into effect any less than one year from the date of the resolution. This will allow existing venues a full year’s trading (which is also the proposed duration of the licence) and a year in which to submit an application to be licensed under the new scheme.

The new licensing scheme stands alone so any venue which currently holds an alcohol premises licence will become dual licensed if it wishes to continue serving alcohol and offering sexual entertainment. The venue operators would therefore have to comply with conditions under both licensing regimes. It is expected that Licensing Boards will focus on the sale of alcohol and Licensing Committees would licence sexual entertainment.

As mentioned in the response to question 68 the Scottish Government will consider if any amendment is needed to the Licensing Conditions (Late Opening Premises) (Scotland) Regulations 2007 to ensure that the two regimes do not conflict. It will be for the venue to ensure compliance with requirements with both regimes.

Q71. Local authorities need to comply with Article 9 of the EU Services Directive 2006/123/EC as implemented by the Provision of Services Regulations 2009 (SI 2999/2009), in particular in relation to setting application fees, processing applications and granting licences operating the new regime – please explain how this is achieved.

We believe that the proposed legislation will ensure that the 1982 Act is compliant with the Directive. It is therefore for local licensing authorities to ensure that their local practices are also compliant. In practice this means, for example, that local licensing authorities should ensure that the fee levels are appropriate and decisions are fully reasoned.
Q72. Paragraphs 256 to 258 of the PM repeat paragraphs 25 to 27 but neither indicate who was consulted or details around the number of responses received. Please provide that information.

A summary report of the consultation can be found at http://www.scotland.gov.uk/Publications/2014/06/4470

Q73. Please provide a summary of the nature of the responses from local authorities, police or women’s groups, or those that work in the industry.

The proposals were generally supported by women’s groups who welcomed the additional control on sexual entertainment, although some were clear that they would have preferred an outright ban. Local licensing authorities and the Police also welcomed the prospect of a dedicated, more effective licensing regime although a large number of practical concerns were raised. Those who work in the industry were opposed to the plans, generally believing that existing arrangements were adequate. Details can be found in the summary report referenced in the response to question 72 above.

Q74. Please detail the concerns raised by arts organisation and whether/how the Bill addresses these.

The principal concern held by arts organisations is that plays and other artistic performances could be held to be sexual entertainment thus inadvertently drawing theatres into the licensing regime. The Scottish Government believes these fears are unfounded since the definition of sexual entertainment would exclude activity that isn’t intended for sexual stimulation.

Q75. The PM does not say whether any alternative approaches were considered, other than the existing approach of using the alcohol licensing system. Were any other options considered and why were they not pursued.

The Scottish Government believes that sexual entertainment venues need to be licensed. Given this, the only viable possibilities were to use the existing alcohol licensing regime, use an alternative existing regime specifically public entertainment or to create a new regime. The existing alcohol licensing regime would have required significant amendment and this would have been antithetical with the concept of the alcohol licensing being essentially about regulating the sale of alcohol. Ultimately it was felt that local authorities were likely to want to approach sexual entertainment venues in a way that was sufficiently distinct from other forms of public entertainment to warrant a separate licensing regime as proposed in the Bill.

Q76. Please provide detail to substantiate the comment in paragraph 264 of the PM where it states “there is a clear gender impact given the overwhelming majority of those in the industry are female”.

While we recognise that sexual entertainment venues employ people of all genders, the performers are predominately female. We therefore acknowledge that the measures regulating sexual entertainment in the Bill could bear disproportionately upon females.

Q77. One of the main areas of contention may be setting the number of venues at zero within a licensing board area, which also raises potential human rights issues, please provide the policy thinking behind this approach, together with detail in support of the option.

It is at the heart of the proposals that local communities, through their elected representatives serving on the licensing committees, should have greater influence over sexual entertainment activities conducted in their areas. We have seen that where local licensing authorities are circumscribed in their ability to reject licences, such as is the case in betting shops, communities can feel disempowered and overwhelmed by the presence of those premises. For that reason, the Bill gives local licensing authorities a very broad power to limit the number of sexual entertainment venue licences. Any decision to refuse an application, for whatever reason could be subject to appeal. Such an appeal could be founded upon the exercise of the discretion in an unreasonable manner or it being contrary to ECHR. The Scottish Government considers that the Bill provisions per se are ECHR compliant. It is expected that the licensing authorities will implement them in a likewise compliant manner.
Miscellaneous and General

Q78. The provisions covered by this part are extremely difficult to follow given the absence of reference to the Bill. It would be helpful if this could be provided for each part covered by this portion of the notes.

The initial paragraphs refer to specific provisions and the policy memorandum then goes on to make more general points.

Para 266 – refers to section 70 on procedure for hearings.

Para 267 – refers to section 72 on civic licensing standards officers.

Para 268 – refers to section 69 on deemed grant of applications.

Para 269 – refers to section 73 on electronic communications under the 1982 Act.

Q79. Paragraph 266 of the PM suggests the Bill (at section 70?) provides Ministers with powers to direct procedure and mandatory conditions. This is a broad power and it would be helpful to have examples of how it might be used, referring to each licensing regime.

Mandatory conditions can be applied to an individual licence and impose requirements or restrictions on the licence holder. Section 172 of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010 provides an order making power to impose conditions in relation to licences granted under Part 1 and Part 2 of the 1982 Act. Section 71 of the Bill provides a similar order making power in relation to Part 3 of the 1982 Act. This would apply to sex shops and the proposed new regime for sexual entertainment venues.

Section 70 of the Bill provides an order making power in relation to hearings under the civic licensing regimes. This would allow Scottish Minister to introduce secondary legislation to make provision as to the procedure to be followed at, or in connection with, any hearing to be held by a licensing authority under Schedule 1 or Schedule 2.

Schedule 1, covers such licensing regimes as taxis and private cars, second-hand dealers, knife dealers, metal dealers, and miscellaneous licences including boat hire, street traders, market operators, public entertainment, indoor sports entertainment, late hours catering and window cleaners. Schedule 2 covers sex shops and the proposed regime for sexual entertainment venues.

The regulations may make provision for:

- notice of the hearings to be given to such persons as may be prescribed by the regulations;
- the rules of evidence which are to apply for the purposes of the hearing;
• the representation of any party at the hearing;
• the times by which any step in the procedure must be taken;
• liability for expenses.

The regulations may make different provision for different purposes, including, in particular, different types of licence.

Q80. Given the above power can you indicate how this part of the Bill will avoid impinging on local democracy.

In relation to both powers, hearings and mandatory conditions, we would work closely with local licensing authorities prior to any legislation to ensure that what we proposed did not unduly impinge on local democracy. The setting of mandatory conditions in regulations would not prevent local licensing authorities from setting additional conditions of their own.

Q81. Section 70 of the Bill also provides powers to local licensing authorities to produce standard conditions. Some detail underpinning this power should be provided covering what might be included, who currently adopts such an approach and the derivation of the policy thinking. Please also confirm this has been consulted upon and provide relevant details.

The power for licensing authorities to specify standard conditions already exists in relation to licences granted under Part 1 and Part 2 of the 1982 Act (section 172 of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010). Section 71 of the Bill will also create a similar power in respect of Part 3 licences (sex shops and the new sexual entertainment regime). The power is useful where an authority wants to impose a blanket requirement such as setting a uniform closing time, setting a no-touching rule, or requiring the presence of door stewards.

Q82. Please also indicate with relevant examples the thinking behind the final sentence which seems to suggest that “practices” will be covered by the order making powers.

See response to question 81 in relation to standard conditions.

In relation to hearings, we understand that there is considerable variation in local authority practice. There was majority support for further Scottish Government regulation or guidance in relation to hearings. Concerns were expressed about practices such as the treatment of some witnesses, notice periods for hearings, and standards of evidence. However concern was also expressed that the regime should not become unduly formal.
Q83. Paragraph 267 of the PM relates to section 72 of the Bill. Please provide detailed background information covering the powers and duties of the Civil Licensing Standards Officers (“CLSO”). The information should also indicate what reviews have been taken of current practices of the authorised officer and LSO both of whom appear to be the model. Please also indicate the extent etc. of consultation and views received etc. on this provision (para 270).

The powers and duties of a civic licensing standards officer (CLSO) are set out in section 72 of the Bill. The CLSO will have the same powers and duties as an ‘authorised officer’ within the 1982 Act but will also have specific functions in relation to providing information and guidance, checking compliance, providing mediation and taking appropriate action on perceived breaches of conditions to a licence provided under the 1982 Act.

This proposal was consulted on within the consultation on Taxis and Private Hire Car Licensing – Proposals for Change and attracted broad support.

The role of the Licensing Standards Officer (LSO) in the alcohol licensing regime was looked at as part of the Evaluation of the implementation of, and compliance with, the objectives of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 http://www.healthscotland.com/documents/21321.aspx

This study reported favourably on the role of the LSO, reporting it to be one of the most positive impacts of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005. LSOs were reported as providing excellent support and assistance to Boards, having developed good working links with the trade and were said to be dealing with issues of non-compliance at source.

Q84. Can you elaborate how existing good practice will not be disrupted by the imposition of a new regime, with its statutory powers and duties.

Section 72 has been drafted to give the CLSO the same powers and duties as an authorised officer and to add specific functions. It also makes clear that an officer of the local authority other than a CLSO may be an authorised officer. We therefore do not believe that the creation of CLSOs will disrupt existing good practice.

Q85. Please confirm that paragraph 268 of the PM refers to only those licenses covered by this Bill.

There is already a ‘deemed grant’ procedure for most licences covered by the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982. Paragraph 268 refers to the small number of licences that do not already have such a procedure. These are the new licensing regime for sexual entertainment venues introduced by this Bill and the existing regime for sex shops.
Q86. Paragraph 271 of the PM suggests other proposals were not “sufficiently significant” to warrant action. Please explain this further, providing detail of the main proposals rejected and the areas within your paragraph 2 of the PM which they did not meet.

Although mainly focussed on the taxis and private hire car regimes, Taxis and Private Hire Car Licensing – Proposals for Change consultation posed a number of questions that could have led to changes across the various civic regimes. It was decided not to proceed with the following proposals at this time:

- Refocus the role of the police within the 1982 Act – The Act already provides that the police have 28 days to respond to an application. The general view amongst those responding was that the existing arrangements seemed to be working well; that they offered the police reasonable flexibility and the licensing authorities generally reported that their relationship with the police was effective. Therefore it was not apparent that such changes would strengthen or improve the existing regime.

- Introduce licensing objectives to the 1982 Act – the consultation attracted mixed views on the proposal to introduce licensing objectives to the 1982 Act. It was argued that this was unnecessary as the purpose of the Act was already clearly stated in the preamble to the Act. On balance it was not clear that such changes, in themselves, would strengthen or improve the existing regime.

- Require the applicant to prove they are fit and proper – this proposal is covered in more detail below.

Q87. Please also explain what is meant by the phrase “a change to the structure of the consideration of “fit and proper” in a licence application” What changes were considered, what were the alternative approaches considered and why were they not considered appropriate.

One of the proposals that was consulted on as part of the Taxis and Private Hire Car Licensing – Proposals for Change consultation was to require applicants to prove that they are ‘fit and proper’. This attracted mixed views. Those who disagreed with the proposal argued that it would fundamentally change the nature of the system – which is that a licence is granted unless there are grounds for refusal – and that it would mean that a hearing would be required for every application. There were concerns that relying too heavily on hearings could lead to applicants being overwhelmed by the process and not being able to defend their application. There were also concerns expressed that this system could encourage applicants to provide false documentation and that licensing authorities would have difficulty verifying documentation.

On balance it was decided not to proceed with this proposal.
Q88. Please provide the policy thinking behind the lack of a time limit for police information, particularly given the time-limits being introduced and the effect of section 69 of the Bill. Perhaps this is an example of grounds for extension of overall time to consider?

The Police are subject to the same time limits as any other person objecting or making a representation. The limit is set at 21 days for Part 2 licences (see paragraph 3 of Schedule 1) and at 28 days for Part 3 licences (see paragraph 8 of Schedule 2).

Q89. Please indicate which measures are introduced to satisfy the EU Services Directive.

In relation to the civic licensing regimes, there are a number of measures that are introduced to clarify that the 1982 Act is fully compliant with the EU Services Directive and ensure that compliance is consistent. For example there is already a requirement for timely disposal of applications in the 1982 Act for Part 2 licences. The current Bill (at section 69) extends that requirement to Part 3 licences as well as extending the requirement throughout the Act to matters beyond a new application i.e. temporary licence applications and variation applications.

The Bill also takes the opportunity to put beyond doubt that electronic submissions are acceptable i.e. applications, notifications and renewals.

Q90. Given the subject matter of the Bill and the recent report “Empowering Scotland’s Island Communities” please indicate the extent to which the Bill has been “island proofed” as set out on page 24 of that report

Under the alcohol and civic licensing regimes day to day responsibility for decisions rest with the licensing authority made up of local authority councillors. This approach is fundamental to these licensing regimes and this Bill seeks to maintain this.

In preparing the provisions within the Bill and in any subsequent secondary legislation we will take care to engage widely and to ensure that sufficient flexibility is maintained within the regime to cater for all of Scotland’s communities, from urban to rural, mainland to island.

The Committee reports to the Parliament as follows—

INTRODUCTION

Introductory chapter

1. This report covers the scrutiny of the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (“the Bill”) by the Local Government and Regeneration (LGR) Committee.

2. The Bill\(^1\) was introduced in the Parliament on 14 May 2014 and the Parliamentary Bureau referred the Bill to the LGR Committee to consider and report on the general principles. No secondary committee was appointed to scrutinise the Bill.

3. Prior to introduction the Scottish Government undertook a number of consultations on the constituent parts of the Bill (apart from public entertainment licensing) these were published between November 2012 and September 2013 on its website.\(^2\)

Parliamentary scrutiny

4. We agreed our approach to consideration of the Bill at Stage 1 at our meeting on 19 June 2014. A call for views\(^3\) on the general principles of the proposed Bill was subsequently issued and closed on 29 September 2014. As part of our approach, we agreed to write to the Scottish Government seeking clarification on a number of issues relating to the Policy Memorandum.\(^4\)

5. During the summer to autumn period of 2014 we arranged for one-off meetings with academics, legal and industry representatives to provide us with sufficient background understanding of the main issues to assist us with undertaking the scrutinising task before us. We would like to express our gratitude to all those who spoke to us. These informal sessions assisted in our early engagement with the issues in what is a technical and diverse Bill.

Witnesses
6. We held nine evidence sessions with a wide range of stakeholders, on a themed basis, based on the parts of the Bill (air weapons; alcohol licensing; metal dealers; taxi and private hire cars; public entertainment venues and sexual entertainment venues; and civic licensing).

7. Minutes of all the meetings at which the Bill was considered can be found online and links to the Official Report of the relevant meetings can also be found online. Along with links to all written submissions, including supplementary written submissions and correspondence.

8. We extend our thanks to all those who gave evidence on the Bill. The detailed and wide-ranging submissions have enabled us to properly appreciate and understand the issues involved and to report to Parliament our views on the Bill.

Background to and purpose of the bill
9. The purpose of a licensing system is to regulate activities which although legal and legitimate, are considered to have the potential to be harmful or disruptive to society. Licensing protects various aspects of the public interest, such as public order and safety; public health or reducing the risk of criminality.

10. The pre-existing licensing regimes are set out in the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 ("the 1982 Act"), and the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 ("the 2005 Act"). In the accompanying documents to the Bill, the Scottish Government states that the current licensing system works well, allowing local authority councillors direct responsibility for making key decisions in relation to licensing in their communities.

11. There are a range of bodies responsible for licensing under the Bill. These are: Police Scotland, for Air Weapons under Part 1 of the Bill; Licensing Boards for Alcohol Licensing under Part 2; and Licensing Committees (or other local authority entities) in relation to the various civic licensing covered in Part 3.

Difference between Licensing Boards and Licensing Committees
12. In order to understand the Report more fully, we set out some background to the latter two licensing authorities.

Licensing Boards
13. Licensing boards are constituted under section 5 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005. A local authority can have one licensing board covering its whole area, or it can choose to sub-divide its area into divisions and have a licensing board for each division. Licensing boards carry out various functions in relation to alcohol licensing. They also have a role in the gambling licensing process, although their discretion is very limited. Importantly, a licensing board has a separate legal identity to the local authority: it therefore sues and is sued in its own name.

Licensing Committees

14. Many local authorities have licensing committees which deal with applications for licences under the 1982 Act although there is no requirement to establish such a committee.

15. Local authorities have broader powers under the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973 (section 56) to arrange for any of their functions to be carried out by a committee, sub-committee, officer of the authority or, indeed, another local authority. There are some specific exceptions to this (for example, setting the council tax rate). However, broadly, local authorities are able to arrange their administrative affairs as they see fit.

16. Thus, many local authorities have decided to delegate their licensing functions under the 1982 Act to a committee. Indeed, it is common for the licensing function to be delegated even further – to council officers – where there is perceived to be nothing controversial about the application, or where the situation is catered for in council policy on the matter.

17. Licensing committees in Scottish local authorities are different to licensing committees in English local authorities. In England, licensing committees deal with alcohol licensing under the Licensing Act 2003.

18. The Policy Memorandum which accompanies the Bill states the primary policy objective of the Bill is to—“[...] strengthen and improve aspects of locally led alcohol and civic government licensing in order to preserve public order and safety, reduce crime, and to advance public health. This is being achieved through reforms to the existing systems to alcohol licensing, taxi and private hire car licensing, metal dealer licensing and; giving local communities a new power to regulate sexual entertainment venues in their areas. The Bill will also protect public safety by creating a new licensing regime for air weapons.”

19. The Bill establishes two new licensing regimes—

- a new licensing regime for owing and using an air weapon in Scotland, and
- a new separate licensing regime for the operation of sexual entertainment venues in Scotland.

20. The Bill also amends the current licensing regime in relation to the sale of alcohol under the 2005 Act. The Bill proposes to make it an offence to supply alcohol to people under 18 for consumption in a public place. The Bill also takes forward a number of technical changes to the licensing system for alcohol sales.

21. Finally, the Bill amends the existing civil licensing regime in relation to the licensing of taxis and private car hires; scrap metal dealerships and public entertainment venues.

8 Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill, Policy Memorandum (SP Bill 49, Session 4 (2014))
22. In addition the Bill addresses some general and miscellaneous provisions, such as to provide for greater consistency across civic licensing regimes in relation to issues such as hearings. The Bill also establishes a new role of Civil Licensing Standards Officers (“CLSO”), modelled on the Licensing Standards Officers (LSO) created under the 2005 Act.

Contents of the Bill

23. The Bill is presented in 3 parts as follows—

- Part 1 – Air Weapons
- Part 2 – Alcohol licensing
- Part 3 – Civic Licensing (including taxis and private hire cars, metal dealers, public entertainment venues, sexual entertainment venues, and miscellaneous and general)

24. Our report mirrors for ease of reference the structure of the Bill as detailed above.

25. Each part of the Bill is comparatively self-contained and we considered them and report upon them individually, extending this approach to the four discreet civic licensing regimes within Part 3 of the Bill. We have included an additional section looking at general issues germane to the civic licensing regimes covered by Part 3. Notwithstanding this approach we also ensured we did not lose focus on common strands and enquired about these whenever they arose.

26. Before moving to the general principles of the Bill and our detailed consideration of issues we report upon the common themes which arose during our scrutiny.

Common themes

27. In spite of the wide ranging subject matter, the differing licensing authorities or the activity or premises to be licensed, a number of thematic issues emerged from our deliberations.

The Brightcrew decision

28. What could be described as the most important impetus for change to licensing in recent years is the Brightcrew decision⁹. This case cast significant doubt on the ability of licensing boards’ to control sexual entertainment through alcohol licensing. The Court of Session held that a licensing board is only permitted to consider the licensing objectives as they relate to the sale of alcohol rather than in relation to more general considerations. This has left sexual entertainment venues unregulated which has necessitated the new regime proposed under this Bill.

29. We also learned the court decision has made some Licensing Boards take a more cautious approach to other factors which are considered as being not directly concerned with the sale of alcohol. Matters such as noise complaints, fights, and other disturbances occurring in or around venues holding or seeking alcohol licences.

30. The consequences of the Brightcrew decision underpinned many of the submissions we have received and are considered in detail at Part 2 Alcohol Licensing, and at Part 3 Sexual Entertainment Venues, of this Report.

Review of civic licensing

31. The Bill is what could be described as a ‘pick and mix’; including within it new licensing regimes, amendment of a relatively recent licensing regime, and further changes to various existing civic licensing regimes.

32. This latter category gave rise to many discussions during the examination of the Bill. A number of witnesses suggested that a wider review of the licensing regime was required to ensure it remains fit-for-purpose and reflects modern circumstances.

33. SOLAR Licensing Group said—

“We would re-iterate that the Act is now over 30 years old and it is becoming increasingly difficult to address modern business activity within the structure of the Act. In addition, penalties for civic offences are not generally commensurate with other licensing regimes e.g. liquor, private landlord registration, HMO licensing.”

34. Many submissions which commented on the detail of the civic licensing regimes also took the opportunity to advise the Act was both out-dated and piecemeal having been amended a number of times. City of Edinburgh Council commented “continued amendment of the Act is not helpful”.

35. Two of the largest councils in Scotland went further stating the 1982 Act was not fit for purpose. Peter Smith of Glasgow City Council said “consolidation or revision of the Act is required to improve the licensing service that is delivered to businesses and communities we serve”. Andrew Mitchell of the City of Edinburgh Council had a similar view stating “the 1982 Act has probably passed its sell-by date”.

36. The Minister told us he had no plans to fundamentally review the 1982 Act as it was “reviewed only some 10 years ago and found fit for purpose”.

Interaction between the licensing regimes

37. Also worthy of note is the interaction between the various licensing regimes. Some regimes provided exemptions where licences had been granted for other purposes, a case being the exemption for a public entertainment licence where an alcohol licence is in place and the activity is included in a venue’s operating plan. On the other hand, a venue might need dual licences to cover its activities, for example if a venue sells alcohol and provides sexual entertainment then two licences will be required. These subtleties make it difficult for the public to engage with the various licensing regimes; it also makes it problematic achieving consistency across licensing regimes, which in turn makes enforcement more difficult. To further complicate the situation other licensing regimes can apply, e.g. planning in relation to signage.

Opportunity to future proof legislation

38. One of the key reasons presented to us for change to the 1982 Act was to keep pace with modern business activity. Peter Smith of Glasgow City Council advised the 1982 Act regulates “obvious things such as taxis and private hire cars to more obscure things such as window cleaners and boat hire licences”. Andrew Mitchell expanded on this saying Edinburgh Council use the street-trading provisions to license pedicabs explaining there is an issue with the volume of pedicabs which causes significant community concern. He told us “we are struggling to use the powers in the 1982 Act to control the collective impact of those licences.” Glasgow City Council on the other hand took the view there was no power under the 1982 Act which could be used to license such an activity.

39. This was not the only matter raised with us regarding modernising licensing law. In relation to the licensing of taxi and private hire cars we were made aware of the implications of new smartphone “apps” which could be used to book transport. We were reassured by the Cabinet Secretary this did not pose a problem in terms of the Act, as drivers would still have to comply with the legislation and, if they did not, they would be subject to enforcement action. This does however illustrate how quickly new business models and developments in technology can impact on licensing authorities’ ability to regulate activities.

40. Nor was future proofing the sole domain of the 1982 Act. Issues were also raised with regard to the Licensing (Scotland) 2005. We heard concerns around home delivery services from police witnesses. While alcohol for home delivery must be purchased during licensing hours it can be delivered out-with these hours by licence holders. “Dial-a-booze” it was suggested is becoming a significant problem which requires legislation to be tightened.

41. The Bill provided an opportunity for the Scottish Government to bring forward more comprehensive provisions which seek to address developments in the business environment; we consider this opportunity has not been taken.

42. We believe the time is right for a review of the 1982 Act as it is not designed for the modern age and, some witnesses suggested it struggled to be fit for purpose. We recommend the Scottish Government consider and report back to us within this Parliamentary term on undertaking a review of the 1982 Act, with a particular focus on where it can be modernised as well as considering harmonisation and streamlining across the various licensing regimes.

43. In the short term we recommend the Scottish Government considers the submissions we received on the Bill which suggest changes to the Bill to improve the operation of the 1982 Act and bring forward appropriate amendments at Stage 2.

44. Given the dual licensing issues and our recommendation at paragraph 42 we also recommend the Scottish Government consider and report back to us within this Parliamentary term on bringing all licensing in Scotland under a single regime.

Accompanying Documents

Policy Memorandum

45. It was necessary to seek additional detail to supplement that supplied in the Policy Memorandum ("PM"). We wrote to the Scottish Government on 27 June\(^\text{18}\) seeking elaboration on the information contained in the PM to inform the Committee’s scrutiny, and make it easier to meet the challenging Parliamentary timetable for consideration. Full responses would also assist those who wished to provide us with written evidence to the Committee. The Scottish Government responded\(^\text{19}\) on 1 September providing full responses on each of the questions posed.

Financial Memorandum

46. Standing Orders Rule 9.6, require us, as the lead committee at Stage 1, to consider and report on the Bill’s Financial Memorandum ("FM"). In doing so we are required to consider any views submitted by the Finance Committee. That Committee reported to us on 18 February 2015.\(^\text{20}\)

47. The FM sets out the costs associated with each Part of the Bill (including for the individual civic licensing regimes covered under Part 3 of the Bill) and after page 84 includes a table summarising the additional costs expected to arise as a result of the Bill’s provisions.

48. The Finance Committee came to a number of conclusions throughout their report, and invited us to seek clarification, confirmation and detail from the Minister on some aspects of the FM and costs arising from them. These points are addressed under the appropriate part of our Report.

Delegated Powers Memorandum

49. The remit of the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee (DPLR Committee) includes “to consider and report on proposed powers to make subordinate powers in legislation including whether any proposed powers are appropriate”. DPLR Committee considered the proposed powers in the Bill and reported to us on 20 January 2015.\(^\text{21}\)

50. The Committee brought to our attention concerns about the powers under section 36 and 37 relating to Part 1 Air Weapons and new sections 45A and new section 45B of the 1982 Act which relate to sexual entertainment venues. We note the issues raised by the DPLR Committee in its report and we have sought to reflect these in this report.

THE GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF THE BILL

51. The Committee reports to Parliament it is content with the general principles of the Bill although asks Parliament to note the comments made throughout this report.

52. Having provided this overview, the remainder of this report considers each Part of the Bill in turn.
PART 1: AIR WEAPONS

Background

Legislative competence

53. Section 10 of the Scotland Act 2012 transferred to the Scottish Parliament the legislative competence to make law relating to the use and regulation of most air weapons in Scotland.\(^\text{22}\)

Air weapons

54. For the purpose of Part 1 of the Bill, the owner of an air weapon classified as 'specially dangerous' will be subject to a certificate system. The Bill defines such weapons as—

“…any air weapon is “specially dangerous” if it is capable of discharging a missile so that the missile has, on being discharged from the muzzle of the weapon, kinetic energy in excess, in the case of an air pistol, of 6 foot pounds or, in the case of an air weapon other than an air pistol, 12 foot pounds”.\(^\text{23}\)

55. In 2011 the Scottish Government established the Scottish Firearms Consultative Panel ("the SFC Panel") to advise the Scottish Ministers on firearms policy.\(^\text{24}\) The SFC Panel consisted of representatives from the police, prosecution services, shooting organisations, campaign groups for gun safety as well as representatives of the gun trade industry. The proposals in the Bill follow on from the recommendations of the SFC Panel.

56. Based on the work of the SFC Panel, the Scottish Government has estimated that there are approximately 500,000 air weapons currently owned by people living in Scotland.

57. Part 1 would allow the Chief Constable to attach such conditions to an air weapons certificate as seem appropriate to him for the operation and use of an air weapon. This could cover aspects such as where an air weapon could be used, how it should be carried or transported (e.g. in a case or other covering) and how it should be stored by the owner. The accompanying documents to the Bill recognise there are many valid reasons why an individual may own and use an air weapon. The Bill seeks to regulate the ownership and use of air weapons in by way of an air weapons certificate system operated by Police Scotland. In this way the Bill treats the ownership and use of air weapons in a similar way to the ownership and use of other forms of firearms.

Scrutiny of Part 1

58. Following our call for written evidence on the Bill the Committee received 144 written submissions. Of these, 50 made specific reference to Part 1 of the Bill. In addition during the policy development of the Bill, the Scottish Government undertook an extensive consultation on the air weapons provisions. The Government received 1,101 written responses.\textsuperscript{25}

59. We have carefully considered all of the formal and informal submissions we have received from witnesses and members of the public. This body of information has helped shape our recommendations on Part 1 as set out in paragraphs 135 to 140 of this report.

Bill proposals

60. Part 1 of the Bill proposes a certificate system for the ownership and use of air weapons in Scotland.

61. The Policy Memorandum states the Scottish Government’s overarching policy objective is not to ban air weapons, but to ensure only those people who have a legitimate reason for owning and using an air weapon should have access to them. Such persons are to be properly licensed. The principles underpinning the proposed certificate system, as set out by the Government, are to—

- clearly define the air weapons to be subject to licensing;
- broadly follow the principles and practices of existing firearms legislation;
- set out the main principles of the Scottish regime in primary legislation, with detailed provisions — for example, on fees, procedures, forms, conditions, etc. — being provided for in future secondary legislation supported by detailed guidance;
- enable a fit person to obtain a licence to own, possess and shoot an air weapon in a regulated way, without compromising public safety;
- prevent those persons who are unfit, or who have no legitimate reason for holding an air weapon, from obtaining a licence;
- have as its objective the removal of unwanted, unused or forgotten air weapons from circulation;
- ensure appropriate enforcement of the new regime with suitable offences and penalties available within the justice system to deal with any person who contravenes the new regime.

The case for introducing air weapons certificates

Rationale

62. The Scottish Government’s rationale is principally based on the issue of preventing crime, ensuring public safety and preventing fear and alarm. This position the Government states, is grounded on two key elements, which can be summed up as follows—

- regulating the ownership and use of a specific category of firearm which can cause serious or fatal injuries, but which is not currently provided for in existing regulations;
- preventing public fear and alarm which may be caused by the use, or misuse, of air weapons.

63. Various stakeholders opposed to the introduction of an air weapons certificate system have questioned this rationale, and whether introducing a compulsory certificate system is a proportional response to the number of incidents of fatal or serious harm which have been caused by air weapons in Scotland in recent years.

64. All of the main representative organisations from the shooting community in Scotland have opposed the Government’s decision to introduce this legislation.

Reducing crime and the misuse of air weapons

65. The public debate on the use of guns and other firearms in British society, and the way in which this drives the policy response from government has been shaped, in part, by various incidents where members of the public have been killed or injured as a result of firearms misuse.

66. Instances of firearms misuse which have resulted in mass casualties are, thankfully, extremely rare in the UK. However, there have been four high profile incidents over the last 30 years in which large numbers of people were either killed or injured as a result of firearms misuse: Hungerford in Berkshire in 1987; Whitley Bay in North Yorkshire in 1989, Dunblane in Perthshire in 1996, and most recently in Cumbria in 2010. All of these instances involved the use of firearms or shotguns for which licensing provisions already existed in law.

67. Police Scotland highlighted the murder of Andrew Morton to us as a key point in the debate around the use of air weapons in Scotland—

“As far as Police Scotland is concerned, the bill is about ensuring that inappropriate people do not get access to lethal barrelled weapons that can, by definition, kill. The case of Andrew Morton, who was a two-year-old toddler when he was shot in the head by a man with an airgun in 2005, is a tragic example of what can happen when the wrong people have access to lethal barrelled weapons. Thankfully, such tragic incidents are very rare, but on most days the police and animal welfare groups have to deal with the results of air weapons being misused. Legislation that allows for responsible ownership of air weapons is to be welcomed. Air weapons in irresponsible hands are dangerous, and keeping people safe is the priority for Police Scotland.”

Opposing view

68. Several witnesses pointed to the fact that firearms related crime is currently falling in Scotland and that to introduce a dedicated certificate for air weapons ownership is an unnecessarily burdensome step for the Government to take. Generally, they expressed the view that the Bill will not serve to reduce crime or increase public safety.

69. The view that the Bill will do little to reduce criminality was widely held by witnesses representing the shooting community. For example, Graham Ellis of the Scottish Air Rifle and Pistol Association (“SARPA”) told us that his members were “concerned that [the Bill] does little or nothing to address the criminal element who would misuse airguns.”

David John Penn of the British Shooting Sports Council agreed, cautioning that the Bill would do little to tackle the misuse of air weapons—

“…plenty of law exists now to prosecute effectively people who misuse air weapons. The licensing of air weapons would not help very much. It would provide another stick to beat people with, but a raft of sticks is already available.”

70. All of the witnesses we heard from acknowledged the vast majority of air gun and firearms users are responsible and law abiding citizens. Dr Colin Shedden of the British Association of Shooting and Conversation (“BASC”) stated “the only people who will submit themselves to the licensing system will be those who are already law-abiding.”

71. We also received numerous submissions from private individuals. Many argued the introduction of an air weapons certificate scheme would have no effect on those who chose to misuse such weapons and would simply penalise law-abiding owners who would almost certainly comply with the legislation.

Supporting view
72. Groups supporting the proposals took a differing view of its potential to reduce the level of misuse of air weapons.

73. Dr Mick North of the Gun Control Network (“the GCN”), spoke of what he saw as an underlying causal effect to many of the incidents of air weapons misuse which has led to serious or fatal injury as being “the casual way in which air weapons are treated” in Scotland. He told us—

“A number of the more serious incidents, particularly those involving young people, have occurred when someone has come across an airgun in the house that has been kept rather casually by the owner, who may be a parent, and has been playing around with it. We believe that, if the owner had to have a licence for that weapon, they would think seriously about whether it ought to be there.”

“…one of the problems has been a rather lax and casual attitude towards air weapons, and we feel strongly that registration will send out the right message and will reflect the degree of dangerousness of air weapons. We believe that a licensing system will make anyone who wants to use an air weapon think seriously about their need to have one, which will lead to a subsequent reduction in the number of weapons and, therefore, the number of serious incidents.”

30 Amongst others, Callum Chesshire, Morag and Tim Liddon, Alex Pearson and Steven Wolf.
31 As above.
Both the League Against Cruel Sports ("the LACS") and the Scottish Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals ("the SSPCA") spoke of the level of air weapon misuse directed towards both domestic animals and wildlife. The LACS noted that Police Scotland recorded 68 air weapons attacks on animals between 2010 - 2012, and the SSPCA recorded 178 attacks in a single year. Both organisations believed the true level of air weapons attacks on animals in Scotland is underreported. Cats Protection also welcomed a certificate scheme and expressed hope the scheme would result in fewer crimes being committed against animals.

While the SSPCA accepted there are lawful purposes for individuals to own and use air weapons, they said a certificate system should ensure that such individuals have a legitimate reason for using an air weapon and a lawful place to use it, be that a gun club or on land with landowners’ permission.

Speaking about the use of air weapons in criminal activity in Scotland, Assistant Chief Constable (ACC) Wayne Mawson of Police Scotland told us—

“We have identified that recorded offences in Scotland involving all firearms fell in 2012-13 by 32 per cent to 365, compared with 535 offences in 2011-12. Of those 365 offences, almost half—171 offences—involving air weapons. That is the lowest figure that has been recorded in Scotland since comparable records began in 1980.”

He added that between April and July 2014, police records show that—“…there were 84 offences specifically involving air weapons: 75 of those offences were in public places, six involved injuries to animals, nine involved injuries to humans—one of which was an attempted murder, when a man was shot in the head—nine were in a private dwelling or a garden, and so on.”

Police Scotland spoke about the potential value Part 1 of the Bill could add in further reducing the risk of harm to the public, as well as members of Police Scotland, as about half of all recent firearms incidents involved air weapons.

Scottish Government

We heard from the Cabinet Secretary for Justice, Michael Matheson, on 25 February 2015. He set out the view of the Government that the certificate system would provide new powers to assist in reducing crime.—

“…as a result of creating the licensing provision, we require individuals who wish to have, or have, an air weapon to have a licence for it […] It is clear that there will be people who will choose not to have a licence. If they choose not to have a licence, they will be committing an offence […] the police will have powers to take action if an individual holds a licence and uses the air weapon inappropriately or in an unsuitable way.\(^{40}\)

80. While scrutinising Part 1 of the Bill, we noted recent media reports relating to the serious criminal misuse of air weapons. One case occurred in Shetland in September 2014,\(^{41}\) another in County Durham in England in November 2014,\(^{42}\) and most recently an attack on a rail worker in High Bonnybridge near Falkirk on 22 February 2015.\(^{43}\) This latter incident was referred to by the Cabinet Secretary in his oral evidence to us.\(^{44}\)

81. We find it reasonable and justifiable for the Scottish Government to legislate for the ownership and use of air weapons in Scotland.

The application process

Background

82. Police Scotland stated there are currently about 53,000 firearms certificate holders in Scotland under the current UK legislation. The firearms certificate system is administered through an ICT system called Shogun.\(^{45}\) It is intended Shogun will also be used to administer the air weapons certificate system. Police Scotland also confirmed Shogun will interlink with their new integrated national ICT system for key policing functions\(^{46}\), called i6, which is currently under development.

83. While police officers in Scotland have long and detailed experience in administering and operating firearms legislation in Scotland, this Bill will see the first occasion on which police in Scotland will be administering two different firearms certificate systems.

84. Inevitably, a major question is how these separate systems will interact with each other, and what the implications will be for Police Scotland, firearms and air weapons owners, and other associated stakeholders (such as the gun trade sector).

Resourcing and smoothing

85. A key topic which emerged during scrutiny concerns the administrative and resource issues Police Scotland may face. This is as a result of the cyclical nature of firearms and air weapons certificate application/renewal process, as well as the varying verification processes and conditions which must be carried out for each regime. Ways in which difficulties or pinch-points in the operation and administration of these two certificate regimes could be alleviated has been referred to as smoothing.

\(^{46}\) The i6 project is intended to deliver a national integrated IT system for Police Scotland for 6 key policing areas: crime, custody, case reporting, vulnerable persons, missing persons and productions/property management.
86. Police Scotland highlighted the need for smoothing provisions to be provided in order to facilitate the efficient introduction of the new air weapons certificate system—

“...It is vitally important, from a processing perspective to balance the monthly demand of applications on the police [...] the Bill states that an [air weapons certificate] shall last for five years [...] the proposed legislation allows for a certificate holder to align their [air weapons certificate] to conclude with their Firearm or Shot Gun Certificate, which may be of a period of less than five years. In order to smooth the demand, Police Scotland would wish, that for the first [air weapons certificate] only, that the Chief Constable can decide the length of the Certificate. Accepting that there will be a wave of new applications when the legislation is enacted, the current proposals would mean that the same wave is replicated at five year intervals thereafter, causing undue pressure on the police to manage the resources to satisfy the demand.”

87. Police Scotland also suggested an alternative option to this proposal would be to allow “the Chief Constable to have the ability to vary the length of the first certificate” for a period less than five years, so as to stagger the impact of the introduction of the air weapons certificate system vis-à-vis the current firearms licensing system. Following this, Police Scotland suggest, “the renewal of the first certificates would revert to five years.”

88. The Scottish Police Federation (“SPF”) also expressed concerns about the workload and resource implications for their members in terms of the new air weapons certificate system. Calum Steele, referred to what he saw as the lack of evidence in the Financial Memorandum to support the belief that about 40,000 air weapons in Scotland may be owned by existing firearms or shotgun certificate holders. He questioned this as a basis for estimating the potential workload in terms of initial air weapons certificate applications—

“Given our experience and the number of [police] staff who undertake such activities on a day-to-day basis, we have real difficulty in understanding how that translates into a limited number of inquiries based on there being a small number of individuals, when no guidance has been prepared on what will be required by way of background checks and supporting evidence before an air weapon certificate is granted [...]The impact of adding the burden of potentially having to deal with up to 500,000 air weapons—although it is questionable whether that number would ever fall under the licensing regime—needs to be properly understood.”

89. The BASC also flagged concerns around the impact the new air weapons certificate system will have on the way in which Police Scotland will administer the work to be carried out. They told us—

48 As above.
“Police Scotland will provide the resource for administering a licensing scheme but will not prioritise resources for identifying those who illegally possess airguns. If resources and police numbers were not an issue, it would be ideal if we could have licensing and police investigation into those who were committing an offence by illegally possessing an air weapon. However, we are not in that position.”

90. Other witnesses, such as the GCN, also recognised the need for smoothing.

Scottish Government

91. The Cabinet Secretary acknowledged the cyclical nature of the workload for Police Scotland in managing applications for shotguns and firearms under the existing certificate system, which are renewed on a 5-year basis. This, he said had “significant peaks and troughs in firearms and shotgun registrations” which impact on the ability of Police Scotland to manage workloads. The Cabinet Secretary recognised the potential timing of this Bill might exacerbate this effect as “the 2015 to 2017 period is when there is a peak in the re-registration of firearms” under the current certificate system. He informed us—

“We have discussed with the police how we can shift much of the air weapons stuff to the periods when they are quieter, and part of the work that we are doing with them is looking at how we will commence implementation of the bill, including the lead-in time for people needing a certificate. We want to move the registrations to a quieter period for the police in order to level out their workload […] Some of the provisions on the commencement of different aspects of the bill can assist us in achieving that as well, through setting a lead-in time. I am open to working with the police on that.”

92. The Cabinet Secretary highlighted the need to ensure a comprehensive public information campaign is put in place to inform air gun owners of the forthcoming air weapons certificate system. This, he said, would be important in ensuring—

“…the owners of the potentially half a million air weapons […] are aware that they have a responsibility to have their weapons licensed—and, if they do not, that they could be committing an offence and could find themselves prosecuted.”

The application fee for a certificate

Background

93. The Financial Memorandum to the Bill provides estimates of potential fees for air weapons certificates. It suggests a fee of around £50 which is close to the current firearms/shotgun application fee. It also suggests an indicative level of £85, if it were based on estimates of the full cost of processing each type of air weapon application.
Current fees for firearms applications

94. The 1968 Act forms the basis of the statutory regime for the regulation of firearms. This also sets out the mechanism by which the UK Government sets the fees charged to those who wish to obtain a certificate to own and use a firearm. Currently, the UK Home Office has responsibility for setting the fees payable for anyone wishing to seek a firearms certificate. Since 2001, the fee for a firearms certificate is £50 per application. The standard period for which a certificate is valid is five years. Therefore, in essence, it costs £10 per year.

95. Between 27 November and 29 December 2014, the UK Home Office undertook a public consultation on a proposed increase in the firearms licensing fees. There is currently no indication when outcomes from this consultation will be available. Following the launch of the consultation, we asked Police Scotland for its views. In response they told us—

“It is the position of Police Scotland that a fee increase is well overdue, the last increase being in 2001. Police Scotland welcome an increase, but recognise that the proposed fees for Firearm and Shot Gun Certificates and other associated certificates remain under the true cost of firearms licensing to the police at this time […] using an activity based costing approach, suggested that the true cost to the police of a grant of a Firearm or Shot Gun Certificate was £189. The increase in fees is a step in the right direction, and it should remain under review until the fees reflect a full cost recovery basis.”

96. Part 1 of the Bill proposes to replicate the existing firearms certificate system for the application, processing, granting and monitoring of air weapons certificates. As it is the person making the application who is being certified, and not the air weapon (or weapons) they own, a single certificate may cover the ownership of multiple air weapons.

97. Two key themes emerged in terms of the fee level set at for an air weapons certificate—

- whether the fee to the applicant should be sufficient to fully cover the costs to the police in terms of administering the system, or whether the public should bear some part of the cost in recognition that having a safe and regulated air weapons certificate system benefits all;
- whether any disparity between the fee for an air weapon certificate (set by the Scottish Ministers), and a lower fee for a certificate for a more powerful firearm, such as shotgun or rifles (set by UK Ministers) may encourage people to opt for more powerful firearms, referred to as ‘trading up’.

Fees for air weapons certificates

98. Discussing the role of the certificate fee in the potential success of the air weapons certificate system, the Gun Trade Association ("GTA") told us—

54 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 94.
55 A proposal to increase firearms licensing fees administered by the police, UK Home Office consultation.
56 Police Scotland, Written submission, 9 January 2015.
“We must take into account the fact that a considerable proportion of the air weapons that are held in Scotland are probably worth less than £100. If the certificate is enormously expensive and security requirements are more than described in the bill, there will perhaps be a temptation for some people not to register voluntarily at the start of the scheme. The cost will have an influence on how many people register.”

99. The BASC argued—

“As has been the case with firearm and shotgun certificates in the past, a proportion of the cost that the police face will be paid for by the applicant and the rest should be paid for by society because society benefits in relation to safety.”

100. This view was, however, rejected by Police Scotland. ACC Mawson stated—

“If people want to own a firearm of any kind, whether it is a shotgun, a rifle or an air weapon, they should pay the costs that are associated with that. We are not out to make any kind of profit from it; we just want the costs to be recovered.”

101. This opinion was shared by the SSPCA, who said, “In this country, we do not have a right to bear arms. If someone wants something that can potentially kill, they should be willing to pay for it.”

102. When asked if the current £50 fee fails to cover the costs of administering the firearms certificate system, ACC Mawson stated—

“In short, yes it does, at the moment. We do a lot of work to ensure that only fit and proper people receive firearms or shotgun licences. A huge amount of work is involved in that, including visits, follow-up visits and checking gun cabinets. To be frank, the cost of that work is not covered by the existing fees.”

103. In December 2013 Police Scotland stated “the cost to Police Scotland in carrying out proportionate checks in respect of air weapon certification would be approximately £85 per application.”

Trading up

104. Another issue raised is the risk that if an air weapons fee is set at a higher value than the fee for a more powerful firearms or shotguns (currently £50), people may be tempted to opt for owning a more powerful firearm as the lower certificate fee would act as an economic incentive.

63 Police Scotland. Written submission, 9 January 2015.
105. Referring to this point, the BASC pointed out that—

“…people who have in the past had air weapons because they were unlicensed and who would now be exposed to a licensing regime may think to themselves, “I have a low-powered air weapon but if I need to get a licence I might as well get a licence for a more powerful rifle or a shotgun.” A number of people may move from unlicensed air weapon shooting into licensed firearm and shotgun shooting.”

64

106. The BASC stated they believed ‘trading up’ would be a welcome by-product of the legislation as it would, in their view, encourage more people to move to more regulated shooting activities, which carry a higher level of scrutiny and regulation. This, in turn, would serve the interest of ensuring public safety.

65

107. The GCN were sceptical of this view, believing those involved in shooting have overestimated the degree of interest airguns only users actually have in shooting.

Scottish Government
108. The Cabinet Secretary confirmed that Scottish Ministers were making the case to the UK Home Office for a significant increase in the fees for shotgun and firearms certificates. The Cabinet Secretary said it would not be desirable to have a major disparity between the air weapons certificate applications fee, and the revised fees for shotgun and firearms certificates.

109. Speaking about the Government’s intention for the air weapon fee to fully fund the air weapons certificate system, the Cabinet Secretary told us—

“…we would like to get as close to full cost recovery as we can, but we have to wait to see how far we can pursue that, as it will be dependent on the approach that the Home Office takes to setting fees for firearms and shotguns.”

110. However, he informed us—

“The checks that will be undertaken for the purposes of licensing an air weapon will not be of the same degree as those for the licensing of a firearm. The work that the police will do will not be as onerous as it is when someone applies for a firearms certificate […] The process is unlikely to involve to any great extent home visits, inspection of the device’s location and so on […] Therefore, it is reasonable to expect that the cost will be significantly less as a result.”

Other issues

Age restrictions in relation to air weapons

111. The Bill allows anyone who is aged 18 or over to apply for a certificate to own an air weapon. The Bill includes special requirements and conditions for people aged 14 to 17 who wish to acquire an air weapons certificate. Currently, 14 is the minimum age where a young person can shoot an air weapon on private land unsupervised under the 1968 Act. Fourteen is also the minimum age at which a young person can be granted a section 1 firearms certificate under the 1968 Act.\(^{70}\)

112. There is currently no minimum age for the grant of a shotgun certificate in the UK, although a person must be aged 18 years or over to purchase a shotgun. Anyone aged 14 or younger must be supervised by someone aged 21 or over to be in possession of an assembled shotgun in a public place.

113. Under the Bill, a certificate granted to a young person between the ages of 14 and 17 would expire when that person became 18. A certificate application made by a young person must be counter-signed by a parent or guardian, and any certificate issued would specify the types of shooting which the young person may undertake. The Policy Memorandum stated this would include—

- target shooting on suitable private land or at an approved club;
- pest control;
- protection of crops or livestock;
- participation in events and competitions.

114. The BASC considered the provision for 14 to 17 year olds may effectively make a certificate for a young person proportionately more expensive than one for an adult. The requirements may also, in their view, lead to delays in making applications.\(^{71}\)

115. SARPA also raised concern over the potential impact of the variations in age restrictions in Part 1 of the Bill—

“There are a number of issues around youth shooting [such as] Scottish tetrathlon, but there is also the Pony Club, the air training corps and the scouts. A whole plethora of youth organisations use shooting as a pastime or a sport. The regulation of facilities is fine where a dedicated facility is used, but a lot of events—for example, the tetrathlon—take place over various places.”\(^{72}\)

116. Commenting along similar lines, Police Scotland raised the issue of potential restrictions on under 18 year olds, and the difficulties which may arise—

“...the proposed conditions under which someone under 18 will be able to use an air weapon, one of which is that the person is employed to carry out pest control. That means that an individual under 18 who wanted legitimately to engage in pest control in an area where they were allowed to shoot would not be able to do so unless they were employed”.

\(^{71}\) BASC. Written submission 76.

Sale of air weapons to people who reside outside Scotland

117. The GTA pointed out what they saw as an anomaly in the drafting of the Bill in relation to people living in other parts of the UK—

“A particular complication that we deal with in Scotland relates to what we call remote sales or, in other words, those in which a registered firearms dealer in Scotland sells an air weapon to somebody who is a visitor to Scotland and who has neither a certificate nor a visitors permit. The Bill as it is drafted says that the dealer in Scotland may send that air weapon “outwith Great Britain”. The way in which that is written means that the dealer will not be able to send it to someone in England; they will have to send it elsewhere.”

Unique weapons identification mark

118. Some discussion took place around the benefits, and practical feasibility, of placing a unique identifying mark, such as a sticker or label on an air weapon as part of the certificate process. Such a system would have the advantage of replicating some of the benefits of the unique serial number which all firearms and shotguns must carry, such as linking the weapons to a specific certified owner.

119. Discussing the effectiveness of the Bill in meeting the stated aim of addressing criminality in Scotland, the BASC pointed out that the lack of serial numbers on air weapons could pose a problem for the operation of a certificate system—

“We are faced with the problem that there is an estimated minimum of 500,000 airguns in Scotland. The vast majority of them do not have a serial number, unlike the vast majority of shotguns and other firearms. Consequently, introducing a licensing regime from scratch is unlikely to be successful because the only people who would submit themselves to it would be law-abiding people who wish to remain law-abiding.”

120. Responding to the suggestion that a unique identifier system might be advantageous, Police Scotland stated—

“As far as we understand the bill, there would not be a mechanism for identifying, for instance, that the weapon is a .22 air rifle. As you say, a lot of the [air] weapons do not have identification numbers on them, so we would not be able to identify them.”

Scottish Government

121. The Cabinet Secretary acknowledged various issues around the use of air weapons for people aged 14 to 17, and various activities in which they may be legitimately required to use and air weapons, such as activities with pony clubs triathlons or tetrathlons etc. The Cabinet Secretary and his officials confirmed they are discussing these issues with relevant stakeholders in order to ensure the Bill does not impede young people from undertaking such activities.\textsuperscript{77}

122. On developing a unique identifier for specific weapons, the Cabinet Secretary was more circumspect—

“The challenge is to create [an identifier] system that does not lend itself to being misused […] It would be a much wider issue for us to try to deal with air weapons by having serial numbers embedded into them. That would go well beyond Scotland and would probably have to be taken forward on a Europe-wide basis, because there are also European regulations on firearms.”\textsuperscript{78}

Financial Memorandum

123. The Finance Committee’s report to us on the Financial Memorandum asked us to—

- “seek further detail of how the FM’s expected number of home visits corresponds to the BASC’s suggestion that a large proportion of applicants’ “good reason” will be informal target shooting in their gardens”;\textsuperscript{79}
- “invite the Cabinet Secretary to confirm whether the Government intends to revisit the issue of possible costs arising from appeals”.\textsuperscript{80}

124. Police Scotland said it had no budgetary provision to deal with the proposed legislation and that costs would be incurred in the handing in of air weapons. This includes any home visits Police Scotland carry out to assess the circumstances where the reason for seeking a certificate includes informal target shooting within the bounds of their own domestic residence, referred to as plinking.

125. Referring to the detail set out in the Financial Memorandum, Calum Steele of the SPF told us—

“…there is a suggestion that [Police Scotland] should not pursue air weapons as a significant priority but deal with issues as and when they occur. Costs should be broken down into three areas: the financial cost; the human cost, in terms of the impact on communities and individuals; and, of course, the cost of the time that police officers spend dealing with such cases […] what will inevitably contribute to that cost will be the increase in the number of licensing offences identified and, undoubtedly, reported to the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service.”\textsuperscript{81}

126. The BASC told us of difficulties which, in their view, the effective restriction of informal target shooting, or plinking, may cause—

“…the British Shooting Sports Council has identified that the vast majority of people who use air weapons in Scotland and the rest of the UK use them for informal target shooting in gardens, otherwise known as plinking. Although the bill does not prohibit plinking, the policy memorandum states that ministers would not normally accept shooting in domestic gardens as a good reason to grant a licence. It concerns us enormously that a significant number of owners of air weapons could be prohibited from getting a licence because they cannot provide a good reason, they do not have access to a large area of ground or they are not members of clubs.

\textsuperscript{79} Finance Committee \textit{Report}, paragraph 37.
\textsuperscript{80} Finance Committee \textit{Report}, paragraph 44.

127. It is clear the Government does not wish informal target shooting, or plinking to be considered as the sole valid reason for a certificate to be granted. This being the case, the only way to assess whether it is suitable to grant a certificate to an applicant who states that they wish to use an air weapons for informal target shooting on their property would be to visit the premises in question and assess the physical circumstances for target shooting. Such checks will add substantially to the costs incurred in processing air weapons certificate applications.

128. We accept it may be difficult to assess the potential costs of the certificate system at this stage, in the absence of information on the number of people undertaking informal target shooting at their place of residence, who may go on to seek an air weapons certificate on that basis. Nevertheless, we suggest the Scottish Government keep these costs under review and, if required, make appropriate adjustment to the fee payable by applicants to cover any additional costs to the police.

129. We note the views expressed by the Scottish Government Bill Team to the Finance Committee who recognised it was difficult to estimate the number of possible appeals on refusals to grant an air weapons certificate. They suggested the proposed “light-touch system” along with the “very small” number of refusals under the existing firearms regime led the Government to expect there would not be many appeals.

Delegated Powers

130. In its report to us on delegated powers in respect of Part 1 of the Bill, the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee (“DPLR”) highlighted two specific areas. Firstly, in relation to the powers conferred by Section 37(1) regarding further provision for the application and approvals process for air weapon certificates, police permits, visitor permits, event permits, or club approvals. This includes prescribing the mandatory conditions that will attach to certificates, permits, or air weapon club approvals.

131. The DPLR Committee felt the powers set out in 37(1) went beyond the aim of the section as explained in the Delegated Powers Memorandum, namely to enable the “administrative minutiae” of those processes to be set out in regulations. The DPLR Committee called for such provisions to be set out in the Bill without the need for the “broad power” provided by 37(1).

132. Secondly, the DPLR Committee expressed concern in relation to Section 76 of Part 4 of the Bill (on general provisions). This section confers powers on the Scottish Ministers to make ancillary provisions in standalone regulations for any provision of the Act or any provision made under it. As such this relates to all Parts of the Bill, including Part 1 on air weapons.

133. The DPLR Committee expressed concern at the use of the words “or any provision made under it” as a highly unusual power. They considered this to be too broad. The response from the Scottish Government did not, in the DPLR Committee’s view, justify the use of such broad wording in Section 76. It recommended the section be amended at Stage 2 to remove this wording.

134. We support the view of the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee in relation to both provisions.

Recommendations

The application process

135. In order to ensure all owners and users of air weapons are ready for the introduction of the system, a clear and comprehensive public information campaign will be vital. Many people may only own an air weapon, and no other form of firearm, and therefore be unaware of the conditions for applying for, and holding a firearms certificate. Therefore, we recommend the Scottish Government should work closely with the shooting community, Police Scotland, and other key stakeholders to design and implement a comprehensive public information campaign. This should begin well in advance of the commencement of any certificate system to allow enough time for those who wish to lawfully dispose of any air weapons to do so.

136. The Government and Police Scotland should develop a dedicated website for the air weapons certificate system. This should contain, amongst other things, clear information about what air weapons owners must do to obtain a certificate, information on how to dispose of an air weapon they no longer wish to retain, as well as the relevant timescales for applying for a certificate etc.

137. The Bill should be amended to give the Chief Constable of Police Scotland a degree of latitude in the rollout of the air weapons certificate system to address future application peaks and troughs.

The fee for the application process

138. The Scottish Ministers should continue to make the case to the UK Government for a fee for shotguns and firearms which will ensure full cost recovery.

Sale of air weapons to people who reside outside Scotland

139. The Scottish Government should ensure Part 1 of the Bill does not prevent remote sales outside Scotland to people who reside in all other parts of the UK.

Unique weapons identification mark

140. The Scottish Government consider whether it might be feasible to include some form of identifier mark as part of the design of the air weapons certificate system. The Government should also take the opportunity to engage the UK
Government and the European Commission, on the possibility of introducing suitable EU regulations in this area.
PART 2: ALCOHOL LICENSING

Background

141. Part 2 of the Bill contains provisions which are intended to improve the effectiveness of the alcohol licensing regime laid out in the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005. That Act only came into force 4 years ago and according to the Policy Memorandum “the regime is still settling in. Many aspects of it are working well. However, there are areas that are not working as effectively as they should be. Therefore, rather than proposing radical overhauls of the regime, the Scottish Government has looked at these areas to find ways to improve the existing system.”

142. The 2005 Act contained a number of policy innovations, including:

- licensing objectives – section 4 of the 2005 Act sets down five specific objectives which are intended to guide all licensing decisions

- licensing policy statements – licensing boards are required to consult on and publish statements detailing their approach to their functions under the 2005 Act

- mandatory conditions – the Scottish Government can set mandatory conditions which apply to all alcohol licenses. These can be used to take forward national policy priorities – for example, tackling irresponsible drinks promotions

- overprovision – licensing boards are required to assess whether there is “overprovision” of licensed premises in their areas. A finding of overprovision creates a presumption against issuing new licenses

- licensing standards officers – this role is responsible for supervising compliance with the alcohol licensing regime and providing support to resolve complaints

143. The Bill proposes to make a number of changes to the current regime with the policy objectives of “preserving public order, reducing crime and advancing public health”. Following consultation, a range of suggestions were made in relation to the licensing regimes. This Bill amends the existing legislation to take forward those suggestions which were considered to be most effective and practical. The Scottish Government has suggested that people do not want a root and branch review of licensing legislation and restricted proposed changes in the Bill to ones designed to improve the existing system.

Bill proposals

144. The main proposals in Part 2 are:

- The creation of a new offence of supplying alcohol to children or young people for consumption in a public place and amendment of the licensing objective in relation to children to also include young persons;
- Amendment of the duration of a licensing policy statement to be more aligned with the term of Licensing Boards;
- Re-inserting a fit and proper person test in relation to the issue for continued holding of a premises or a personal licence;
- Amendment of the definition of relevant offences and foreign offences to no longer disregard a matter that is spent for the purposes of the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974;
- Clarification that for an overprovision assessment, the whole Board area may be considered as an area of overprovision, and to allow Boards to take account of licensed hours, among other things;
- Imposition of a duty on Boards to prepare an annual financial report;
- Removal of the requirement for a premises licence holder to notify a change in interested parties and creation of vicarious liability for a premises manager for various offences;
- Removal of the five year restriction on re-applying for a licence revoked on grounds of failing to undertake refresher training and other changes to the personal licence holder requirements;
- Provision for the automatic grant of a licence (or its variation) where a Licensing Board has not either decided on an application or sought an extension from the sheriff within a set period. This will enable compliance with the EU Services Directive.

Committee submissions

145. In addition to the above areas submissions suggested a number of others which should be legislated upon. The principal additional areas covered in submissions were:

- Occasional licenses
- Members clubs
- Transfer of licenses
- Surrender of licenses
- “Site only” licenses
- Variations of conditions on premises licenses
- Home deliveries

146. Each of the areas covered by the main proposals and the additional areas above are considered in turn.

147. We sought to consider submissions against the statement in paragraph 123 of the Policy Memorandum—

“all provisions in the Bill need to be tested against the following themes:
Reducing crime and preserving public order and safety;
Providing Boards with powers to consider a broader range of information;
Advancing public health;
Improvements to the existing system and reducing burdens on trade and Licensing Boards.”

148. We also considered the contribution the licensing system and licensing policy makes to supporting community planning in preventing and reducing harm.

Section 52 - Supplying alcohol to children or young people

149. While it is illegal to buy alcohol on behalf of a child, it is currently legal to buy alcohol to share with a child. The Bill proposes to close this loophole by making it an offence for a person aged 18 or over to share alcohol with a person under 18 in a public place (including private property which the drinkers have accessed illegally).

150. The proposal is designed to tackle outdoor drinking by groups of children and young people. However, it would also criminalise behaviour which some respondents to the Scottish Government’s consultation characterised as “responsible”, such as parents introducing children to alcohol at a family picnic. Other respondents called for the supply of alcohol to children to be illegal in any circumstances.

Section 57 – Personal licences: grant, duration and renewal

151. Section 57 of the Bill amends the 2005 act by removing the five year restriction on re-applying for a personal licence revoked on grounds of failing to undertake refresher training and other changes to the personal licence holder requirements.

152. At present when a personal licence is revoked for any reason, the person who held the licence may not apply for another one for five years. Thus, for example, some personal licence holders who fail to submit evidence of the refresher training within the time limit, for example as a result of forgetting about the deadline, will have their licences revoked.

153. The Bill amends the legislation so that if a personal licence is revoked under section 87(3) of the 2005 Act (for failure to comply with the training requirement), the licence holder will not have to wait 5 years to reapply for a personal licence. They will still have to go through the cost and inconvenience of applying for a new licence, thus serving as a deterrent to those who may consider not undergoing the refresher training.

Section 58 Processing and deemed grant of applications

154. Section 58 of the Bill makes provision for the automatic grant of a licence (or its variation) where a Licensing Board has not either decided on an application or sought an extension from the sheriff within a set period.

155. This provision is designed to ensure applications to the Licensing Board for licences are processed more efficiently and seeks to bring timescales in line with the 1982 Act.
156. The provision requires the Licensing Board to determine every application within nine months of the date of receipt, unless this period has been extended by the Board applying to the sheriff for an extension. If the Board fails to determine the application within the permissible period then it will automatically be deemed to have been granted and the Board will be obliged to issue the licence/appropriate authorisation.

157. Notwithstanding comments to the Scottish Government consultation respondents to us indicated general agreement on the addition of the above three provisions. Having considered the submissions received and the information contained in the Accompanying Documents, including written exchanges thereon with the Scottish Government we are content with each of the above three provisions.

Section 56 – Interested parties

158. This section removes the requirement for a premises licence holder to notify a change in interested parties and the creation of vicarious liability for a premises manager for various offences.

159. The Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010, at section 184, proposed that a premises licence holder be under a duty to notify their Licensing Board if a person becomes or ceases to be a connected person or interested party. This was to respond to concerns that the holders of premises licences were failing to advise Boards of connections with, for example, organised crime.

160. However the Law Society of Scotland raised concerns the provision was too vague and too broad to be practical. For example, if the premises licence is held by a tenant of large chain and there is a change on the parent board of directors they suggested notification might be required.

161. Other concerns were raised by the Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland (ACPOS) that the provision would have the unintended consequence of a premises manager no longer having vicarious liability for the offences committed by employees. Others suggested the re-introduction of the ‘fit and proper’ test would address these concerns.

162. The Bill therefore revokes the provisions in section 184 of the 2010 Act, which have never been commenced, as far as they refer to requirements on premises licence holders to notify information about ‘interested parties’. The definition of “interested parties” would also be amended to include premises managers.

163. Police Scotland however wished to see section 184, which inserted new section 40A into the 2005 Act, commenced to provide them with “greater opportunities …to identify and disrupt serious and organized crime’s involvement in the licensed trade.”87 This would apply only in relation to persons tenanting premises.

Section 42 - Statements of licensing policy: licensing policy periods

164. This section deals with the duration of licensing policy statements, bringing them more in alignment with the term of Licensing Boards.

165. A Licensing Board is a quasi-judicial body consisting of locally elected councillors, with support from local authority staff, including a qualified solicitor who provides legal advice. A Board is an entirely separate legal entity from a local authority and its responsibilities are set out in the 2005 Act.

166. To ensure their independence Boards do not formally report to local authorities or Scottish Ministers on the exercise of their functions, although their decisions are subject to review by the courts. Decisions made by Boards on individual licence applications are made within the context of their licensing policy statement and overprovision assessments.

167. The 2005 Act introduced a duty on Licensing Boards to issue a statement of licensing policy, before the beginning of each three year period. The report is required to set out the Board’s general approach to licensing decisions and outline how it intends to promote the five licensing objectives.

168. The Bill amends the legislation to provide that a new Board has to prepare a new policy statement within eighteen months of being appointed. Once agreed the policy has a duration of up to five years, although Boards will retain the ability to make changes by way of a supplementary statement.

169. Responses from Alcohol Focus, the Wine and Spirit Trade Association and the Scottish Retail Consortium, COSLA and Midlothian Licensing Forum all agreed this was an appropriate approach to take. The Institute of Licensing said “it was helpful that the term of the policy will be linked to council terms instead of being triennial”.

170. However Dumfries and Galloway Council while noting an immediate attraction set out a couple of concerns. It wondered whether a 5 year statement covered too long a period during which the views of community stakeholders and the trade would not be taken. They noted the period mirrored the political cycle of local authority elections and wondered whether by so doing it gave an impression the Board could reflect on the Board’s quasi-judicial status and if it could be considered as not being politically neutral.

Sections 43-48 – Fit and proper person test

171. These sections re-insert a fit and proper person test in relation to the continued holding of a premises or a personal licence.

172. The Bill would allow Licensing Boards to consider if an applicant, or those connected with an organisation, were “fit and proper” persons to hold an alcohol licence. The Policy Memorandum envisages that this would allow Boards to take into account a wider range of information about an applicant’s character when reaching a decision, including police intelligence. The proposals would also allow the consideration of spent convictions.

173. There was a general welcome for the reintroduction of this test although with reservations. The Co-operative Retail Trading Group\(^90\) were against it seeing no particular need to re-introduce.

174. Renfrewshire Licensing Board,\(^91\) amongst a number of others had a concern around the linkage of the test to the licensing objectives and were worried this would be subject to litigation to clarify its meaning.

175. Part of the reservations from both the Law Society of Scotland\(^92\) and the Institute of Licensing\(^93\) centred on the proposals around spent convictions and the use of police intelligence. These are covered in a later section of this report. The Institute of Licensing had a further concern referring to a decision in the case of Brightcrew\(^94\) by the Inner House of the Court of Session which according to the Glasgow Licensing Board\(^95\) had placed “limitations and constraints” on them.

176. Glasgow Licensing Board indicated they routinely received submissions that criminal conduct by applicants unconnected to the sale of alcohol should not be considered by them and noted their concern such submissions “have found favour in the courts”. They went on to suggest that—

“if the Board is not explicitly given the ability to deal with issues it considers to be of relevance to one or more of the licensing objectives but do not necessarily flow directly from the sale of alcohol, the Board considers that it will be unable to fully tackle issues relating to crime and public disorder, and therefore always unable able to act in the public interest.”\(^96\)

177. Police Scotland expressed similar concerns noting a frustration in both their and Licensing Boards’ ability to tackle issues not directly related to the sale and supply of alcohol in licensed premises.\(^97\)

178. The Law Society of Scotland were concerned the reintroduced test would lead to an increase in objections being made without admitted facts and/or proof although they accepted re-introduction could “strengthen the Board’s ability to exclude unsuitable persons from becoming holders of premises or personal licences”\(^98\)

179. We note the subject of the Brightcrew decision was covered in the Scottish Government consultation.\(^99\) The case having “potentially important implications for the operation of the licensing system.” However it has been argued the decision does not apply to alcohol provisions as it centred on the ability of the Board to refuse an application for a premises licence from a lap dancing club and did not relate to the sale of alcohol.

180. The Scottish Government consultation stated the implications of the Brightcrew decision—

“are open to dispute, and further court judgements would be required to provide greater clarity of interpretation of the existing legislation. Some argue that Brightcrew does not have profound implications as long as Boards have clear and evidenced licensing policy statements.”

181. The Cabinet Secretary in evidence went further stating—

“Our general view about the Brightcrew decision was that it confirmed the purpose of an alcohol licence for premises. There was clearly an issue about the way in which the case was conducted and about how the licensing board of Glasgow City Council sought to use the licence for other entertainment that was taking place within the establishment.”

182. However, it was clear in submissions that some Boards are now cautious about taking cognisance of factors such as noise complaints, fights, and other disturbances because they are not directly concerned with the sale of alcohol.

183. Glasgow Licensing Board also wished to see the test applied to the transfer of licence provisions as well as to anybody benefiting from the business or being involved in the management of the business.

Section 54 - Overprovision

184. Licensing policy statements must contain a statement as to whether there is overprovision of licensed premises in any locality within the Licensing Board’s area. The Bill would change the definition of overprovision to enable Licensing Boards to take into consideration licensed hours as well as the number and capacity of licensed premises. It would also clarify that the whole of a board’s area can be classed as a “locality” for the purposes of carrying out the assessment.

185. There was a clear split on this aspect with trade bodies firmly opposing these changes and questioning their proportionality, and Health Boards along with Alcohol and Drug Partnerships being strongly supportive. Submissions highlighted a fundamental difference in approach with health organisations highlighting a clear link between access to alcohol and poor health outcomes.

186. Trade bodies considered the assessment of overprovision should be linked to specific licensed premises. This was a particular problem for the health boards who pointed out data covering health outcomes tended to only be available at board wide level. We noted the guidance on overprovision indicated the point is only to establish a general link between a concentration of licensed premises and disruption. In

Glasgow we heard policy on overprovision is based on where there is most harm not where there are most premises. Glasgow has specified some eight or nine areas as being overprovided.\(^{103}\)

187. The Co-operative Retail Trading Group and the Scottish Grocers Federation were particularly concerned about the proposal allowing the whole of a board area to be classified. We heard how this could impact on investment with consequential stifling of job creation and competition. It was suggested that outlets should be subdivided into further categories including large supermarkets and convenience stores separately.

188. The Scottish Licensed Trade Association suggested this would exacerbate a current situation which saw inaction in relation to overprovision by boards for fear of being challenged through the courts. This it was suggested by some was a particular concern when considering applications by large retail outlets which had led to a two tier approach with smaller, less resourced applicants being more liable to have their applications refused.

189. The trade bodies were also concerned about boards considering trading hours when considering overprovision. Their fear was of potential unintended consequences to the detriment of more rural or outlying areas when any overprovision problems that might actually exist would be concentrated in conurbations.

190. A number of respondents observed that members clubs were not included in overprovision calculations, some observing that in the Borders 22% of all licensed premises held members club licenses. Similarly occasional licences were not included. We look more widely at members clubs and the granting of occasional licenses later in this report.

191. We heard suggestions local residents and communities were handicapped in lodging objections to applications with Licensing Boards on the grounds of overprovision as a consequence of there not being publicly available data showing the density and locality of licenced outlets.\(^{104}\) Similar issues arose in relation to the proposal to include trading hours, a concern echoed by Society Of Local Authority Lawyers and Administrators in Scotland (SOLAR) “because not every premises trades to the full hours that they have on their licence”.\(^{105}\) A point echoed by Jack Cummins along with concerns around measuring the storage capacity and shelf space within premises.\(^{106}\)

192. John Lee from the Scottish Grocers Federation thought the provision “could inhibit trade and be anti-competitive” particularly for more independent operators. He suggested any proposal to take account of sales areas could affect expansion and investment plans. Paul Waterson from the Scottish Licensed Trade Association thought there was an existing two tier system in effect in operation—

“Licensing boards are also under great pressure from the bigger operators and they certainly operate a two-tier decision-making system in relation to overprovision. They are very worried about the financial problems that would occur if a decision was appealed. They know that the bigger companies will appeal and that the independent trade perhaps does not have the finance to appeal, so they look upon the bigger developments more favourably than they do on others.”

193. We also heard similar concerns from Paul Waterson about Licensing Boards endeavouring to secure jobs and employment and how objectors can suffer from exhaustion as applications are withdraw and re-lodged over a period of time. And we were told one Board considered the health benefits from employment as a significant factor in considering applications.

194. Equally we heard how some Licensing Boards (Highland, East and West Dunbartonshire in particular were mentioned) had taken considerable evidence on overprovision from a range of interests including Health Boards in formulating policy. We asked all Health Boards about their relationships with Licensing Boards as we wanted to understand the extent of their involvement in providing evidence to Boards.

195. Health practitioners suggested Licensing Boards struggle with the concept of overprovision and what information should be taken into account. While Audrey Watson, managing solicitor West Lothian Licensing Board, advised her board had difficulty in getting evidence including from NHS Lothian. The absence of evidence precluded them from taking health issues into account.

196. The responses we received from Health Boards were mixed. Some set out the detail of their involvement in depth while others provided minimal information. There were clearly different approaches being followed across Health Boards and Licensing Boards and while the quasi-judicial nature of the Licensing Board means they are free to set their own policies (subject to the provisions in the Act and the guidance) some Health Boards suggested their submissions were routinely ignored. Others commented favourably on relationships.

197. The Cabinet Secretary noted the variable approach by Licensing Boards and suggested the Bill provided greater scope and flexibility for Licensing Boards to “consider a wide range of issues relating to overprovision.” He added—

“…..I would like to see more progress being made. Some licensing boards have been enlightened and much more proactive than others; I would like to see more of them being proactive. It is important to make sure that local licensing policies are more reflective of public health.”

198. In relation to the role of Health Boards he indicated a desire to—“ensure that local territorial health boards are proactive in the local licensing forum and in responding to the new applications or major variations that they must be consulted on. They should make their positions very clear and respond appropriately in order to inform licensing boards.”

Licensing Objectives
199. Section 41 of the Bill amends one of the licensing objectives to add “young persons” to the existing Board objective “to protect children from harm”. This change was welcomed by all who commented on it. We also heard the licensing objectives do not require the policy of boards to include the reduction of consumption. It was also suggested each of the five objectives could be viewed as contributing to wellbeing with a specific objective of “protecting and improving public health”.

Section 51 – Relevant offences and foreign offences: spent convictions
200. The effect of this section is that certain criminal convictions will in future no longer be regarded as spent for the purposes of the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974 and can thus be considered by Licensing Boards. It also allows for the consideration of police intelligence by Licensing Boards.

201. Section 51 of the Bill proposes to remove the restriction on licensing boards considering spent relevant or foreign convictions when deciding on licence applications. The Policy Memorandum states such a change is necessary in order to prevent unsuitable people from working in licensed premises.

Spent convictions
202. Currently, a licensing board is only able to consider relevant or foreign convictions which are not “spent” for the purposes of the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974 (“the 1974 Act”). Under the 1974 Act, convictions can be considered spent after a certain amount of time has passed since conviction. More serious offences (those where an individual was sentenced a term exceeding two and half years in prison) are never spent. Where a conviction is spent, a person would not usually have to reveal it if asked about their criminal record.

203. Certain professions covering for example lawyers, police, healthcare workers and teachers, are exempt from the provisions of the 1974 Act, meaning that people applying for those roles do have to declare convictions which would otherwise be considered spent. Applicants for taxi, private hire car and gambling licenses are also exempt from the provisions of the 1974 Act.

117 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 140.
204. Relevant offences are specific offences prescribed in subordinate legislation and generally require violent or dishonest behaviour, foreign offences and similarly grave offences committed in foreign countries.

205. The Scottish Licensed Trade Association suggested these were matters for the Licensing Board and police to determine and thought “whether the 1974 Act should apply depends on the severity of the crime”\textsuperscript{118}

206. City of Edinburgh Council supported this section indicating “it was important public confidence in the system was maintained” and noting other applications already required such disclosure. Glasgow Licensing Board also welcomed this section as allowing them to “come to an informed view” although they sought clarification as they considered they were bound by a judicial decision stating they could only do this if it were in the interests of justice.\textsuperscript{119}

207. The Law Society of Scotland questioned this approach while recognising each case would require to be considered in its merits by Licensing Boards. In relation to the Rehabilitation of Offenders provisions they noted that Act was passed “in order to allow people to move on with their lives and not have to disclose what may be a relatively minor offence from some stage in their past”.\textsuperscript{120}

208. The Institute of Licensing suggested there was no evidence “the licensed trade had fallen into disrepute as a result of boards not being able to consider spent convictions.”\textsuperscript{121}

\textit{Police intelligence}

209. The provisions also propose to introduce new sources of information which a licensing board can consider when deciding whether an applicant for a licence is fit and proper. At present, a Licensing Board is able to look at “relevant” and “foreign” convictions when considering an application. The board can also consider whether granting the application would be consistent with the licensing objectives.

210. Under the Bill’s proposals, a Licensing Board will also be able to consider information which “the chief constable considers may be relevant to consideration by the Board of the application”. The Policy Memorandum\textsuperscript{122} envisages this may include police intelligence and information on associations with people deemed to be unsuitable. Unlike convictions, such allegations may not have been evidenced to a standard accepted by the courts.

211. We asked the Scottish Government to explain this provision further\textsuperscript{123} and it indicated it became a matter for boards to determine whether the material is “relevant and what reliance to place upon it.” While our concerns about ECHR issues were not addressed in the Scottish Government’s response a number of witnesses expressed concerns centred on the concept of natural justice. The Institute of Licensing stated—

\textsuperscript{119} O'Docherty v Renfrewshire Council 1998 SLT 327.
\textsuperscript{120} Consultation submission number 114.
\textsuperscript{122} Policy Memorandum, paragraph 136.
\textsuperscript{123} Scottish Government. \textit{Written submission}, 27 June 2014, Q&A 20.
“The proposal that the police may be able to produce "intelligence evidence" without specifying what that evidence is seems to the Institute to be at odds with principals of natural justice and convention rights such as the right to a fair trial.”

212. Stephen McGowan on behalf of the Institute of Licensing amplified the concern that “unknown and unseen evidence as to whether a person is unfit” would be presented to Licensing Boards. His contention was that such evidence could be presented by the police but it would be difficult for the Licensing Board to legitimately take it into account unless there is full disclosure to the applicant and the opportunity to challenge. He added—

“We do not believe that it is correct for an applicant to be faced with an allegation that is not substantiated or evidenced and to have their prospective livelihood held in the balance at a hearing without knowing what the evidence is.”

213. Finally he noted recent circumstances which had led to a recent case being overturned on appeal by the sheriff because of a lack of “sufficiency and probativity of the evidence”

Section 55 - Duty on Boards to prepare an annual financial report

214. Section 55 of the Bill requires all Licensing Boards to produce an annual report detailing their expenditure on alcohol licensing functions as well as the income raised from licensing fees.

215. The provision was generally welcomed although some respondents wanted further financial information to be produced.

216. We also heard suggestions that the accountability of Licensing Boards should be increased. These included that the annual report should also include outcomes data including Boards measuring themselves against their policy statements and objectives. We note proposed new section 9A(4) allows for the report to include “such other information about the exercise of the Licensing Board’s functions as they consider appropriate.”

217. We are aware the Scottish Government consulted on such a proposal in response to which licensing boards were unanimously against and Alcohol and Drug Partnerships (“ADP”) were unanimously supportive. Reasons for opposing were given as “needless duplication of existing reports” and “an additional burden on Boards.” It was also suggested reporting could “skew Board actions and decisions to allow them to provide a more favourable report on their performance.”

128 Official Report 10 December 2014 column 16
218. Alcohol Focus Scotland were particularly keen to improve the accountability of Boards—

“A requirement to produce an annual report would bring licensing boards in line with other bodies undertaking public functions, such as regulators, judicial and quasijudicial bodies, and with the local planning process.”

219. We were also told boards are not all publishing the reports, policies, data and statements currently required by them—

“We know that licensing boards are required to produce a policy, an overprovision statement and a public register of licensing data. Six months after the deadline, 11 of the 40 licensing boards still had not published statements and 17 had not published overprovision statements. More recently, using standard online searching mechanisms, we found 13 public registers of licensing data out of a possible 40.”

220. A number of submissions also sought increased transparency from Boards particularly to show the extent to which they are following their policy statements and the licensing objectives. Borders ADP were among those seeking this.

221. The following aspects are not covered by the Bill but are matters raised with us through submissions.

222. It is necessary for a venue to apply for an occasional licence if there is an intention to sell alcohol for a particular event (e.g. a wedding, or a fair) and the venue is not otherwise licensed. The application process is quick and cheap as it is envisaged it will mainly be used by community groups and non-traditional venues.

223. Several respondents to our call for evidence expressed concern that this process is being abused by professional organisers putting on large scale events, such as music festivals. This is because, if an occasional licence to sell alcohol is in place, then any other activity is exempt from the requirement to have a public entertainment licence. The process is also significantly cheaper than applying for a public entertainment licence, although local authorities may incur large costs in dealing with the application.

224. A range of concerns were raised about the use of occasional licences. It was suggested “the current rules create a loophole enabling legal requirements of fully licensed premises to be bypassed.”

225. Specific concerns were that:

- The exemption from the requirement to obtain a Public Entertainment Licence if an alcohol licence is in place should be removed as occasional liquor licences are increasing being used to licence events which would otherwise be licensed under the 1982 Act. For example large music events. This issue is exacerbated by the fact that Boards cannot enforce any conditions upon an occasional licence that are not connected to the sale of alcohol.

- An occasional licence allows groups to compete on an unfair basis with mainstream licensed premises where the same legal regulations are not required e.g. staff having completed basic training.
- Application of the fit and proper person test does not apply to applications for occasional licenses.
- The absence of a restriction on the number of occasional licences which can be granted for any premises in any 12 month period (unless the application relates to a voluntary organisation). Premises which would not be able to obtain the required Section 50 certificates are operating with occasional licences almost on a weekly basis. It was suggested some premises are utilising in excess of 70 occasional licences per year, meaning that while alcohol is sold in these premises on a regular basis they remain unlicensed premises.
- Large scale public events may take place under an occasional licence to sell alcohol because this removes the need to have a public entertainment licence too. This could mean such events are not properly regulated and the cost of an occasional licence (£10) can be a long way short of covering the licensing authority's costs in considering it.

226. Others were concerned that occasional licences can add to the provision of alcohol in an area and should be included in assessments of overprovision.

227. In relation to members clubs it was noted that a voluntary organisation can apply for an occasional licence for its premises. The effect of that is to circumvent the requirement for guests to be signed in thus allowing members of the public access to such premises.

228. It was suggested a more restricted definition of occasional licence should be provided to ensure that such licences are only available for specific “occasions”. Also the exemption from the requirement to obtain a Public Entertainment Licence if an alcohol licence is in place should be removed where the sale of alcohol is ancillary to the public entertainment taking place.

229. The Cabinet Secretary was clear “There is absolutely no reason why local licensing boards cannot take action if they believe that occasional licences are being he added that the purpose of the occasional license “was to provide flexibility for local licensing boards.” He indicated that if clear evidence of misuse was presented the Scottish Government would consider whether further guidance was required.

Members clubs

230. Submissions highlighted a variety of concerns relating to members clubs. In particular, concerns some are operating in direct competition with local licensed premises. The other main complaints were that some clubs are acting commercially by allowing entry to non-members, selling to the underage and not applying for occasional licenses for public events. It general it was thought they have an advantage over the mainstream licensed trade.

231. Boards also expressed concern that the 2005 Act prevents them from dealing effectively with the minority of members’ clubs that appear to be abusing the system.

232. The Scottish Government’s consultation on further options for alcohol licensing at proposal 12 asked a series of questions around concerns raised about members’ clubs.

233. The summary of responses suggested the reasons clubs have special arrangements under the 2005 Act remain valid. They exist principally for the benefit of their members and are not commercial enterprises are open to members of the public. They also play a valuable part in community life in providing a range of sports and social activities.

234. One Local Authority Licensing Standards team’s submission summarised most of the concerns that exist around clubs:

"Current legislation has been shown to be ineffective in dealing with some aspects of the operation of members' clubs. Some clubs appear to operate on a commercial basis in direct competition to licensed businesses. This is particularly in relation to members' clubs admitting non members. Clubs pay less annual fees, rates and have no requirement for a trained manager (License holder) saving all that expense which trade members have to comply with. A club must not operate for profit, however, a club has overheads and needs to modernise. This is financed by their takings, so when does that become profit?"

235. The summary further noted the absence of any sanction for clubs operating in what would appear to be a commercial nature and that there are no grounds upon which to call for a review of the premises' licence. The majority of respondents agreed with the above concerns, with the only main dissent coming from clubs themselves.

141 Scottish Government. Further Options for Alcohol Licensing Consultation Paper, proposal 12.
142 Scottish Government. Further Options for Alcohol Licensing – Summary of Consultation Responses.
143 As above.
236. It was suggested in the consultation that minor changes to legislation might allow Boards to discharge their duty more effectively. This could be done by incorporating the constitution into the main operating plan or making adherence to the constitution a mandatory condition in terms of the mandatory club’s provisions. Any breach of the relevant provisions within the constitution relating to the sale of alcohol would then be a breach of licence and subject to review. Whilst this would in effect make clubs more accountable it was noted it would also generate more work for Boards.

237. In the event no provisions in this area have been brought forward in the Bill as introduced.

238. We received submissions raising issues broadly in-line with those to the Scottish Government consultation. Renfrewshire Licensing Board thought the provisions surrounding club licensing are open to abuse and argued for additional restrictions on the operation of members’ clubs. They suggested a breach of the provisions of a club constitution should become a breach of licence allowing a Board to review the licence.144

239. Edinburgh Licensing Board made similar points noting the operation of clubs enjoy less restrictions than other premises. They also wished to see amendments to their constitutions being notified to prevent amendments that breach the Regulations.145 They were concerned to ensure clubs were not becoming primarily commercial operations.146

240. Both Borders Licensing Board and Alcohol Focus Scotland were concerned about the exclusion of members clubs from overprovision assessments observing that in the Borders some 22% of all licensed premises are members clubs.147

241. Paul Waterson from the Scottish Licensed Trades Association was clear “Many clubs simply run as pubs”148 while Stephen McGowan from the Institute of Licensing suggested—

“...a number of club premises have varied their licences, in effect to make them full public-access pub premises, albeit that they have a constitution and appear on the face of it to be members’ clubs. Because they have changed the conditions of their licence, they are allowed full public access. A number of premises in Edinburgh and throughout the country, which were historically club premises that were open to members and bona fide guests, have varied their licences and are allowed public access without those rules applying.”149

242. Police Scotland had no issues with the operation of club licences\textsuperscript{150} although in later correspondence they suggested they be included within overprovision assessments.\textsuperscript{151}

243. The Cabinet Secretary while recognising some issues existed, noted the earlier views of Parliament when passing the 2005 Act that members’ clubs should be given some exemptions. He indicated care was required to avoid unintended consequences if changes were made.\textsuperscript{152}

Transfer of licences (sections 33 and 34 2005 Act)

244. The Law Society of Scotland expressed concern on the provisions in the 2005 Act covering the transfer of licences\textsuperscript{153} and the Institute of Licensing after commenting on this matter in response to the Scottish Government consultation\textsuperscript{154} made a supplementary submission\textsuperscript{155} in relation to difficulties practitioners have been experiencing with the provisions for transfers of licence:

- The Act does not deal with dissolution of companies. It may well be the case that company "A" holds the licence but company "B" is trading the venue. In such circumstances company B or the individual is left without a livelihood in the event that company “A” is dissolved as a licence held by a dissolved company cannot, on the face of it, be transferred at all. They wished to see a mechanism to deal with this.

- The Act does not reflect common practice such as the completion of sales taking place dependent on the grant of a transfer of a licence. The purchase and sale or leasing of licensed premises can involve a large number of premises where transfer processing times vary across Scotland and it is impossible to agree on one “date” for the sale to complete. These difficulties can be more complicated when deals relate to properties in England as well as Scotland, such as a company buying pubs on both sides of the border.

- The Act does not provide for an interim or deemed grant. This creates problems in relation to new buildings which might be commercially relying on a licence such as a supermarket or club. (The position under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976 (“the 1976 Act”) where there was a two-stage "temporary" and "permanent" transfer; allowing the temporary transfer to take effect immediately whilst the permanent was considered was not included in the 2005 Act. This was previously the position prior to the 2005 Act and is the position in the English Licensing Act 2003.)

- Difficulties over who can apply for a transfer of licence: the 2005 Act sets out certain circumstances where only certain parties can make an application. This includes where a "business" is to transfer (section 34(3)(d)). However, if the premises are not trading for whatever reason, there is doubt as to whether there is a "business" to transfer with some licensing boards refusing to accept transfers where the business is not a "going concern".

\textsuperscript{153} Consultation submission number 114.
\textsuperscript{155} Institute of Licensing. Supplementary written submission, 22 December 2014.

- The 28 day deadline for transfers under certain circumstances is overly prescriptive: the Act imposes a 28 day deadline for lodging certain transfer requests i.e. when the licence holder dies, becomes mentally incapable or declared insolvent. This time period is too short particularly in the case of insolvency. This quite often can result in a trading business and the jobs and livelihoods that the business represents being closed because the licence is "lost".

- The Act does not deal with certain types of insolvency.

- The Act does not make it clear who is liable for licensing offences where a transfer of licence is pending: The Act does not deal with this. The outgoing owner may still be on the licence and therefore liable yet no longer involved in the premises.

245. We asked the Scottish Government for their views on teach of the above issues and they said they "continued to consider the concerns raised".

Surrender of licences

246. The Institute of Licensing following their appearance on 10 December 2014 made a supplementary submission in relation to difficulties practitioners have been experiencing with the provisions for surrender of licences. This was similar to the points made by the Law Society of Scotland in their written submission. Section 28 of the 2005 Act says that a licence which has been surrendered "ceases to have effect".

247. It was suggested licences can be surrendered out of spite. There are numerous examples of this across Scotland where in a landlord/tenant relationship the tenant holds the licence and surrenders the licence to spite the landlord following a fall-out over unpaid rent or any other dispute they may be having. This leaves the landlord with a public house or other type of premises with no licence and the only way back is to apply for a new one.

248. The premises would be subject to modern building regulations and in some cases might not be capable of getting a licence back due to the exorbitant cost of works. Examples were given of a Scottish castle or large country house. It may now be very difficult for such premises to meet current regulations and therefore no new licence could be granted.

249. Under the 1976 Act the licences could be brought back to life by way of a transfer application. It was, the Institute of Licensing suggested necessary to clarify whether surrendered licenses continue to exist or not and whether they can be restarted or reactivated in some way.

157 Consultation submission number 114.
250. We asked the Scottish Government for their views on this issue and they said the proposal had the “potential to undermine facets of the existing regime”. They considered the proposal would not be widely supported by others.\(^\text{159}\)

“Site only” licences

251. The 2005 Act does not allow for provisional licences where premises are yet to be built or under construction. The Institute of Licensing having discussed this with us on 10 December 2014 when they indicated “the current system puts off investment” \(^\text{160}\) made a supplementary submission in relation to difficulties practitioners have been experiencing with the provisions for “site only” licences. This was similar to points made by the Law Society of Scotland in their written submission.\(^\text{161}\)

252. This issue arises because applicants and developers need the commercial certainty of knowing a licence will be granted before a multi-million pound investment can be finalised and premises built. Applications are generally lodged very early in the process to secure the commercial certainty of the licence with the same level of detail for a provisional licence being required as for a full licence. This, it was suggested, causes difficulties because applicants have to lodge layout plans for premises which may not even be built resulting in applicants “lodging fictitious plans just to get the application in the system”.

253. The suggestion was to re-introduce the old ‘site only’ provisional licence route which would allow a new licence application to be lodged without the full detail of layout. It was suggested this would not jeopardise consideration because planning permission needs to be in place even where a provisional licence application is lodged. The Licensing Board would still see the general location of the premises, they would still see the operating plan detailing matters such as trading hours, activities, description of the premise. The only thing they would not see is a plan of the premises.

254. We asked the Scottish Government for their views on this issue and they indicated the proposal had the “potential to undermine facets of the existing regime”. They considered they would not be widely supported by others.

Major v Minor variations

255. Under the alcohol licensing regime the premises licence includes a large volume of information. This includes the application form, as well as the operating plan and layout plan. It is an offence to trade not in accordance with the premises licence. If the licence holder wants to operate in a manner which differs from the details originally approved, a variation is required. Variations are classed as either minor or major variations.

\(^{161}\) Consultation submission number 114.
256. Variations which are considered minor are set out at section 29(6) of the 2005 Act, and further minor variations are provided for in regulations. Minor variations must be granted by the Licensing Board for a small fee. If a variation is not a minor variation then it will be a major variation. Major variations are subject to requirements to notify neighbours, health board and police, with it being open to anyone to lodge an objection. All major variations must be considered by the Board at a hearing.

257. West Lothian Licensing Board raised concerns with us about types of variations classified as minor about which members of local communities have no opportunity to object. They gave a practical example of the effect of the rules on what amounts to a minor variation. A variation to on-sales premises wishing to extend premises and increase the size of their outside area is treated as a minor variation. This is because the application stipulates no increase in capacity and as they are operating in the same manner as the information contained in their operating plan they are able to apply for a minor variation, which must be granted.162

258. Another example related to an off-sales premises which has maximum trading hours for the sale of alcohol from 10 am until 10 pm and store opening hours of 8 am until 10 pm. To increase store opening hours from 7 am until 10 pm they have to make a major variation application to open although it has no effect on the hours they can sell alcohol. This is a change to information contained in the operating plan and is considered to be major.

Home deliveries and the licensing hours

259. We heard concerns around home delivery services from police witnesses. While alcohol for home delivery must be purchased during licensing hours it can be delivered out-with these hours by license holders. Known as “Dial a booze” it was suggested this is becoming a significant problem which requires the legislation to be tightened.163

Additional enforcement powers - gambling premises

260. CoSLA suggested the Bill could be amended to close a loophole in the current law. The Gambling Commission submission explained the Gambling Act 2005 ("the Gambling Act") has three licensing objectives:

- preventing gambling being a source of crime and disorder
- ensuring gambling is conducted in an open and fair way
- protecting children and vulnerable people from being harmed or exploited by gambling

Currently, section 304(2) of the Gambling Act, (a section which empowers licensing officers in England and Wales), refers to ‘officers’ of licensing authorities. Scottish Licensing Boards do not have employees or officers as such. Consequently the Commission’s understanding, is that the enforcement powers under the Gambling Act cannot be exercised ‘as of right’ by a Licensing Standards Officers (LSOs).\textsuperscript{164}

Recommendations

Duration of policy statement

261. We support the extension of the period to a maximum of five years although we consider, given its importance, the new statement should require to be in place within 12 months of a new Board being appointed.

Fit and Proper Person Test

262. We welcome the reintroduction of this test. We consider the test should also be applied to connected persons.

Whole Board areas for overprovision determinations.

263. We welcome the additional flexibility this provision will give Licensing Boards although we have concerns about the inflexibility of Licensing Boards based in large measure upon a fear of challenge. We recommend the guidance be revised as a matter of priority and the guidance make clear Boards have the maximum flexibility to make different policy decisions relating to individual localities, types of license and types of premises.

264. We also recommend club licenses and occasional licenses require to be included by Boards when considering their overprovision statements.

265. We see a clear role for Health Boards and Alcohol and Drug Partnerships as well as the Police in providing evidence to Boards to assist them in reaching their determinations. We expect all Health Boards to be proactive in presenting and championing health inequalities to Boards. Our later recommendations around reporting should also assist in this regard.

266. We recognise the quasi-judicial status of Licensing Boards. In our opinion this should allow them to be more robust in setting out their policy on overprovision and less inclined thereafter to “hide” behind the prospect of review by the courts. A well developed and rigorous policy should prevent Licensing Boards from the risk that decisions will be successfully reviewed.

267. We also expect Boards to involve their local communities and recommend in line with other empowerment initiatives Boards be required to consult local communities before and during their consideration of overprovision determinations.

Licensing Objectives

268. We welcome the amendment to the licensing objectives to include “young persons”.

269. We also recommend, given the overwhelming evidence we received of harm and links to disorder from overconsumption, an additional objective be added to include the reduction of consumption.

\textsuperscript{164} The Gambling Commission. Written submission 144.
Spent convictions and police intelligence

270. We accept the rationale for adding spent convictions as proposed.

271. We also recommend, given the nature of crimes that can now result in alternatives to prosecution (ATP’s), that Boards be advised of all ATP’s.

272. We do not consider that police intelligence in a raw form should be made available to Boards. It is a matter for the Police to make available relevant information to Boards in a manner consistent with ECHR considerations.

Duty on Boards to prepare an annual financial report

273. We welcome this provision and also recommend Boards, in order to become more accountable to the public prepare annual reports. We draw to the attention of the Scottish Government the suggestions in this regard contained in the letter to us from Alcohol Focus dated 15 January 2015.165 As a minimum we expect to see the report containing information on how the board has delivered in relation to the licensing objectives and its policy statements including overprovision. We also expect a sufficient amount of data to be contained showing the number and type of each licensed premises within the Board area along with details of the number of occasional licenses granted during the period. We would expect the Bill to set out as a minimum the above along with a requirement to report within 6 months of the end of each reporting year.

Occasional Licenses

274. We expect to see section 57 of the Bill commenced without delay.

275. When applying to club premises provision should be made that these do not have the effect of circumventing other requirements generally applying to the club, for example the requirement for the signing in of guests.

276. We recommend that a licence to sell alcohol should not automatically cover the provision of public entertainment. If no public entertainment licence exists one must be sought, if required, as part of the occasional licence application.

Members Clubs

277. The Scottish Government requires to satisfy us the existing legislation is adequate to prevent the abuses of club licences identified during our evidence sessions. Failing which we recommend appropriate provision is made to incorporate the club’s constitution into the main operating plan.

278. We recommend the fit and proper person test applies to all transfers.

Surrender of Licenses

279. We do not support the suggestions made for change in this area. We have heard no evidence to convince us that businesses should be able to avoid current regulations designed for safety or other reasons through this method.

165 Alcohol Focus Scotland. Supplementary written submission, 15 January 2015.
Site Only Licenses
280. We do not support the suggestions made for change in this area. We consider greater clarity within overprovision statements and procedures thereunder should provide the necessary information required by developers. We note for example the effect of recent business decisions made by large retail groups not to develop sites. They could under these proposals hold these types of licenses for a considerable period before trading commences. This could impact on other businesses seeking licences during the interim period between a grant and sales commencing.

Major v Minor variations
281. We recommend the Scottish Government urgently review the types of applications falling into each of these categories with a view to ensuring local residents have adequate opportunity to make representations about variations which might adversely affect them. We expect the revised guidance to enhance the rights of residents to make representation and remove existing anomalies as reported to us.

Home Deliveries
282. The Scottish Government should confirm existing legislation is adequate to deal with any issues arising around home deliveries, so called “Dial-a-booze” arrangements.

Additional enforcement powers - gambling premises
283. We recommend the Scottish Government amend the Bill to close a loophole which prevents Licensing Standards Officers from undertaking an important public protection role in gambling which they currently fulfil in relation to alcohol.
PART 3: CIVIC LICENSING: TAXIS AND PRIVATE CAR HIRE

Background

284. Sections 60-61 of the Bill cover taxis and private hire vehicles. They seek in part to provide greater consistency within the licensing regime while tightening regulation.\textsuperscript{166} The proposals follow a consultation carried out by the Scottish Government at the end of 2012.

285. A framework of licensing of taxis and private hire cars by local authorities is set out in sections 10 to 23 of the 1982 Act. This regime although optional has been adopted by all local authorities in Scotland.

286. The framework provides for the issue of taxi licences and private hire car licences (which relate to a particular vehicle) and for the issue of taxi drivers’ licences and private hire car drivers’ licences (which relate to drivers). The regime is essentially a two-tier system, with different rules applying in certain respects in relation to taxis and private hire cars. Some principal differences are:

- taxis can be hailed on the street or use a taxi rank or be pre-booked, whereas private hire cars must be pre-booked;
- local authorities are able (but not required) to limit the number of taxi licences that they grant (on the ground of there being no significant unmet demand), but not the number of private hire car licences;
- local authorities are able (but not required) to require applicants for taxi drivers’ licences, but not applicants for private hire car drivers’ licences, to undergo a knowledge test and other training;
- local authorities are required to fix maximum fares that may be charged by taxis, but are not able (or required) to specify fares for private hire cars.

287. Some vehicles fall outwith the licensing regime. For example, vehicles that are exclusively hired for a period of not less than 24 hours do not require to be licensed (nor do their drivers require a taxi driver’s licence or a private hire car driver’s licence). The types of service that fall within this “contract exemption” vary widely, from chauffeur driven cars hired for business purposes or for sightseeing to cars contracted by local authorities or health boards to transport school pupils or patients.

288. In addition to the above, regulations have been made under the 1982 Act requiring licensing authorities to license the use of premises used for the taking of bookings for taxis and private hire cars.\textsuperscript{167} These were made “in the interests of public safety and crime prevention”.\textsuperscript{168} We comment on the appropriateness of this provision in its current form, standing the development and use of mobile technology, later in this section.

289. The changes to the 1982 Act proposed in the Bill bring the two tiers of licensing closer together in term of local authorities’ ability to impose quantity restrictions and testing of drivers.

\textsuperscript{166} Policy Memorandum, paragraphs 192-4.
\textsuperscript{167} The Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 (Licensing of Booking Offices) Order 2009.
Bill Proposals

290. The Bill proposes three changes in the licensing regime:

- section 60 introduces a power (not a requirement) for local authorities to limit the number of private hire car licences granted. In contrast to that for taxis (see above) the grounds under this section are that there is (or would be) overprovision of private hire car services in the localities in which the private hire car would operate;
- section 61 introduces a power (not a requirement) for local authorities to require applicants for private hire car drivers’ licences to undergo a knowledge test and other training (which may or may not be the same as any knowledge test that the local authority requires applicants for taxi drivers’ licences to undergo);
- section 62 removes the “contract exemption” in relation to vehicles exclusively hired for a period of not less than 24 hours, with the effect that vehicles used to provide such services will require to be licensed, as will their drivers. Section 62(4) introduces a new power for the Scottish Ministers to specify in regulations circumstances in which licences will not be required.

291. In many places in the world, the market in which taxis and private hire cars operate has been significantly changed by recent technological developments, mainly through the use of smartphone “Apps” to book vehicles. In addition to the three changes above we heard from Dr James Cooper that parts of Scotland at least are on the brink of entering this “transformed market”. In view of these global changes, we also considered the rationale behind taxi and private hire car licensing from first principles and asked in our call for evidence for views on what benefits licensing should deliver for consumers.

Committee Submissions

292. We received 16 submissions on this aspect of the Bill. Following the release of our video, and its publicity on social media, in which we asked the public for their views on taxi and private hire car licensing, we received a number of responses from the general public as well as the taxi and private hire car trade.

Reasons for regulation

293. The submissions gave a number of reasons why regulation is necessary. A particularly common advantage cited was safety standards. West Lothian Council commented—

“The benefits which hire car licensing should deliver for customers are a system of public transportation within taxis and private hire cars which offers high standards of safety, accessibility, comfort, reliability and customer service.”

294. Renfrewshire Council saw the power to determine the type of vehicles used, as way of enabling the promotion of equality via accessible cars, and to encourage the 169 West Lothian Council. Written submission 51.

use of greener vehicles.\textsuperscript{170} Police Scotland considered another main advantage of regulation to be it ensured “legitimate business thrives and provides opportunity to prevent organised crime groups from gaining a foothold in this industry”.\textsuperscript{171}

\textbf{Is the current two-tier licensing system such a framework?}

295. We considered the appropriateness of maintaining a two-tier system. Dr Cooper, an international academic expert on taxi licensing was pessimistic, contending that “the Bill fails to address the needs of the transformed market that is likely to emerge in the very near future.”\textsuperscript{172}

296. The issue, he pointed out, is not that the current two-tier system is without justification or has not served its purpose well in the current market, but that the tiers may become irrelevant if new business models ignore the tiers altogether.

297. Taxi and private hire car operators were more sanguine about possible changes in the market. Les McVay of City Cabs stated “it is up to us to pull up our socks and be on our toes to provide a better service”\textsuperscript{173}, while Kevin Woodburn of Edinburgh City Private Hire said “the public will decide what they want.”\textsuperscript{174}

298. Overall it was argued, in submissions from the licensing authorities and taxi companies, that the two tier system both delivers and increases choice (especially re accessibility) and reliability for consumers. It also provides safety for passengers, value for money, the ability for the authorities to target regulation where needed (i.e. public hire), competition and overall a better quality service.

299. Two licensing authorities disagreed about the continuation of a two tier system arguing there would be long term advantages from a single regime including savings to the authorities from the streamlining of processes.\textsuperscript{175}

300. The taxi and private hire car industry has also been the subject of investigation by the Office of Fair Trading which made a number of recommendations, particularly around the power to issue licences on the basis it was a restraint of trade. Both the Scottish Government and the Westminster Government rejected the proposal to deregulate in relation to the setting of numbers of licences.\textsuperscript{176}

301. According to the Policy Memorandum, the aim of a licensing regime is the preservation of public safety and order and the prevention of crime.\textsuperscript{177} It is against this objective we have considered the proposals in the Bill and the existing regimes that apply.

302. We believe it is important to take a long-term view when considering how to ensure the main policy objective underlying the licensing of taxis and private hire cars is achieved. Choice can be an important contributor, along with licensing, towards guaranteeing quality of service at a reasonable price and so innovation in the market is to be welcomed. But a situation where a near-monopoly emerges due, for example, to existing operators being unable to compete on price against new market entrants, might lower quality of service and threaten passenger safety in the longer term. We therefore welcome the level of awareness amongst operators, and potential operators, of the need to provide a quality service and note the widespread views that the current two-tier licensing system contributes to choice and quality of service, particularly in relation to the accessibility of vehicles.

Section 60 power to limit the number of private hire car licences granted

303. There were mixed views in submissions with some arguing for local flexibility on numbers and others for consistency across the country. The difference between the approach proposed for private hire car drivers (over provision), to that existing for taxis (unmet demand), was commented upon. Bill McIntosh, Scottish Taxi Federation, wondered how this could operate “because there is no measurement of which I am aware that councils can use to ascertain whether there is an appropriate number of private hire cars or not.”

304. We heard about surveys to ascertain demand and were told West Lothian had done away with any limits on taxis to allow the market to work. In particular they were seeking to address disabled access and a shortage of vehicles while also addressing the creation of a market in taxi licences which can happen when a cap is in place. We note such a market exists in other areas in relation to black cab licence plates.

Section 61 power to require applicants for private hire car drivers’ licences to undergo a knowledge test

305. In general this provision was welcomed by those who responded to us. The City of Edinburgh Council welcomed the ability to set a minimum standard of training for drivers and Aberdeen City Council considered all should be treated equally. West Lothian Council referred to the use of existing training modules covering customer service, accessibility, pricing and the law, which the Council helped to develop with the Scottish Government and could be rolled-out to other authorities.

306. We received some suggestions as to the differences with private hire vehicle drivers, who are pre-booked, having the ability to prepare for journeys in advance and utilise satellite navigation facilities. Set against that we are aware of limitations in such systems particularly in urban areas and the need for a degree of flexibility in routes to take account of ongoing conditions and traffic problems.

Section 62 removal of the “contract exemption” for vehicles exclusively hired for a period over 24 hours.

307. Almost all local authority respondents welcomed this provision suggesting it created a level playing field and would make enforcement easier. However, COSLA noted a division between urban and rural authorities, with the latter concerned the need to be licensed might cause operators to withdraw from the market, reducing services and increasing costs for activities like cars to take children to school.

308. Highland Licensing Board suggested the exemption be removed for services to the general public but kept for public authority contracted services as they are able to enforce contract terms for the latter.\(^{181}\)

309. Others were concerned the removal might bring a large number of services within the licensing regime, pointing to England and Wales where removal had resulted in services as diverse as ambulances and child minders requiring to be licensed. Some called for specific licences for stretch limousines and “party” buses although some already license such vehicles.

310. The Cabinet Secretary indicated he was alive to issues surrounding public authority contracted services and before commencing this provision the Scottish Government “will take forward some aspects [of concerns] that will allow local authorities to provide exemptions as they see fit.”\(^{182}\)

Booking Offices

311. A taxi or private hire company with more than 3 cars, requires a booking office licence to operate. We heard from taxi companies and a local authority solicitor who disagreed the need for a booking office to be physically located in every local authority area in which a company operates. It was suggested to us by Audrey Watson of West Lothian Licensing Board, that no booking office need be situated in Scotland.\(^{183}\) In Renfrewshire a local condition exists preventing the control office being out-with the local authority area.\(^{184}\)

312. Scottish Government officials confirmed the need for a booking office to be “licensed where the order was taken.”\(^{185}\) Officials recognised the existing approach “does not translate quite so well to a smartphone app existing in the ether.”\(^{186}\)

313. We are content the requirement for booking offices is not a barrier to technological advances and therefore recommend no change to this aspect of the licensing regime.

Cross-authority licensing co-operation

314. We also considered a recent example of complaints against a licence holder not being available or considered by a neighbouring authority. We wondered how such information could be better shared between licensing boards. While boards have a great deal of discretion in the questions they ask of applicants there are opportunities for greater information sharing across boundaries. The existence of a national police force should assist to a degree in this respect.

Technological advances

315. We heard a lot of evidence around the changes that have taken place and will take place in the way the industry operates. Dr Cooper in particular gave us considerable background and international detail around the use of smartphones and Apps in relation to booking and the hiring of taxis and private hire vehicles.\(^{187}\) We heard about difficulties in other countries and the ways operators had sought to evade licensing regimes.

316. We heard how the market was changing in London and other cities with price being more linked to demand and the opportunities for differentiation in the level of the service focussing on the luxury of the vehicle provided. We heard from taxi operators\(^ {188}\) about forthcoming applications which allow users to receive detailed information about the vehicle, driver and time of arrival in advance. We also heard about the technology allowing others to monitor the journey of passengers linked to the use of satellites. The safety advantages of the latter were self-evident to us.

317. After hearing from witnesses we received a submission from UBER\(^{189}\) explaining how its approach provided more choice for consumers and drivers and also advised of its focus on safety.

318. Maximum fares vary across the country and are fixed locally. We understand in some countries the price of a fare can be linked by new technological functions to the demand being experienced by the operator. This, we learned, has varied at different times of the day by up to seven fold. We further observed that section 17 of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 (on taxi fares) does not prevent fares being set at a lower level than the maximum and understand some companies currently offer discounted rates to corporate users. We heard about attempts in Edinburgh to match demand with supply with one operator referring to a tariff review and indicating “At a time of year when our customers most need us, we are overpricing.”\(^{190}\)

Recommendations

319. In our opinion the principal reason for licensing taxis and private hire cars must be to ensure the safety of passengers. The separate licensing of vehicles and drivers both contribute towards delivery of this objective. Changes in the market must therefore take place within a framework that does not allow this fundamental requirement to be evaded. Further reasons must include the delivery of an accessible, reliable and affordable service to customers whilst also preventing opportunities for criminal activity.

320. We are in no doubt that if a licensing system was being designed now it would be a single regime applying to both taxis and private hire vehicles and their respective drivers. We accept the majority view that change would be disruptive to operators and the licensing authorities nor do we consider change should be made without full consideration of all factors and detailed consultation. That said we are clear the licensing regime requires review and we recommend the Scottish Government consider a full review of all aspects of taxi and private car licensing and report back to this Committee within this Parliamentary term; see our recommendation at paragraph 42.

321. We have discrimination concerns around two aspects of the existing regime. With the advent of the smartphone technology the difference between taxis and private hire cars, at least in the minds of the user, has been significantly eroded. Provided the service is safe, responses to our video suggested users saw little difference between the two types. However, for those who do not own, or those who cannot operate a smartphone the benefit could be limited. Equally, for reasons of infirmity or disability, some people may be more restricted in their use of modern technology and some private hire cars may not be accessible for their needs. Secondly on price, in the event demand sees price rise, as has been the case in other countries, there will be an adverse impact on the less well off. We therefore ask the Scottish Government to address both of these concerns at stage 2.

322. On section 60 we are unclear why the overprovision test for private hire vehicles should be different or how that “creates greater consistency within the regime”\(^{191}\) to an extent which would be recognised by users. We ask the Scottish Government to reassess their approach here and unless this can be achieved through guidance amend accordingly at stage 2.

323. We recommend the same knowledge test should apply to all drivers regardless of their vehicle. Again an appropriate amendment to avoid local authorities applying internally different tests for the two regimes should be made.

324. We have no recommendations on section 62, being content with the proposed course of action set out by the Cabinet Secretary.

325. We recommend greater sharing of information between licensing authorities. This should cover the operation of firms within areas as well as information about licence holders and their vehicles. We expect the Scottish Government to encourage and facilitate through appropriate legislation, if necessary, the sharing of information between authorities.

\(^{191}\) Policy Memorandum, paragraph 196.
PART 3: CIVIC LICENSING: METAL DEALERS

Background

326. Sections 63 to 66 of the Bill cover metal dealer licensing. They seek to modernise and improve the existing licensing regime for metal dealers as set out in the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 (the 1982 Act). The aim is to “ensure more effective regulation of the [metal dealing] industry and to make it more difficult for metal thieves to dispose of stolen metal”\(^\text{192}\). Ultimately, the Scottish Government hopes the proposals will help to reduce metal crime across Scotland.

Bill Proposals

327. Specifically, the Bill proposes the following reforms—

- removing the exemption warrant system (currently metal dealers with over £1m annual turnover are exempt from the licensing regime);
- removing the requirement that dealers should not process metal within 48 hours of receiving it;
- banning cash payments for metal; and
- improving standards for identification of customers and record keeping.

328. These proposals are consistent with recent legislative reforms\(^\text{193}\) and non-legislative measures (including the launch of the National Metal Theft Taskforce\(^\text{194}\) and Operation Tornado\(^\text{195}\)) aimed at targeting metal theft in England and Wales.

329. The British Transport Police (BTP), which has lead responsibility for metal crime in the UK and leads the National Metal Theft Taskforce, told us that the results of the suite of measures introduced in England and Wales speak for themselves: in 2012-13, England and Wales saw an overall 43 per cent reduction in metal theft.\(^\text{196}\) A recent Home Office study (January 2015) analysed the data in more detail and concluded: “the interventions themselves can be credited with a fall [in metal theft incidents] of around 30 per cent, with the rest being attributable to falling prices and other downward pressures on acquisitive crime.”\(^\text{197}\).

\(^{192}\) Policy Memorandum, paragraph 9.

\(^{193}\) Cashless payments were introduced in England and Wales by the Legal Aid, Sentencing and Punishment of Offenders Act 2012, in December 2012. The Scrap Metal Dealers Act 2013, which came into force from October to December 2013, established a licensing regime administered by local authorities.

\(^{194}\) The National Metal Theft Taskforce, established in January 2012, is a multi-agency group that develops intelligence, coordinates activity and targets and disrupts criminal networks.

\(^{195}\) Operation Tornado required participating scrap metal dealers in England and Wales to request identification documentation for every cash sale and retain copies for 12 months. It was piloted in the police forces in North East England in January 2012 before being rolled out on a phased basis across England and Wales by September 2012.

Committee Submissions

330. We received 28 written submissions on this aspect of the Bill. Respondents included licensing authorities, the metal dealing industry, enforcement agencies and victims of metal theft.

Compliance and enforcement

331. The significant success of the interventions in England and Wales was reflected in the widespread support for the proposals for Scotland. In particular, the proposals to remove the exemption warrants system, ban cash payments and enhance record keeping requirements were regarded as central to the success of the Bill. These are discussed later.

332. While the metal dealing industry supported the measures in the Bill, it called for them to be further strengthened. The British Metals Recycling Association (BMRA) – the representative body for the metal dealing industry – told us its members actively supported the intentions and principles in the Bill, but believed it could be made clearer and more practical to implement and enforce.198 These comments are also discussed in more detail later.

333. Of particular concern to many was that the licensing regime in Scotland needed to be consistent with the standards already set in England and Wales. Many felt that a weaker regime in Scotland would simply attract criminals to take advantage of the system here, referred to as ‘regime shopping’.

334. This concern was borne out, to some extent, in the Home Office study. Over the period when the interventions were made in England and Wales, the study found “tentative evidence of some displacement of offences to Scotland”199. The graph below shows metal theft incidents in Scotland began to increase from around the time when the ban on cash payments was introduced in England and Wales in late 2012. This trend contrasts with a steady decline in such incidents in England and Wales.

199 See footnote 197.
335. The BTP described the legislative measures in England and Wales as “hugely important”, but said they were only part of the activity undertaken. As part of Operation Tornado and through the National Metal Theft Taskforce, the BTP worked closely with the metal dealing industry to ensure activity to combat metal theft was joined up between the Home Office and other agencies such as the Environment Agency and local authorities.

336. The importance of non-legislative interventions was highlighted by the Motor Vehicle Dismantlers’ Association, which stated “legislation on its own is not sufficient to drive compliance, and it is absolutely essential that a robust compliance and enforcement programme is implemented”.

337. We strongly support the Scottish Government’s intention to strengthen the licensing regime for metal dealers in Scotland to combat metal crime. Similar legislation in England and Wales has been effective in helping to reduce metal crime south of the border. This view reflects the support for the Bill from enforcement agencies, victims of metal crime and the metal dealing industry.

338. Also, we believe it is important that the licensing system in Scotland is similarly robust to that in England and Wales. This consistency is important because we do not want Scotland to be seen as an easy option for criminals who deal in stolen metal.

Removal of exemption warrant system

339. Under current licensing arrangements, a metal dealer with an annual turnover of more than £1m is eligible to receive an exemption warrant. This excuses the metal dealer from the requirement to hold a metal dealers’ licence and, therefore, the existing requirements placed on metal dealers in the 1982 Act, such as record keeping.

340. We understand that the vast majority of metal dealers that currently operate from fixed premises hold an exemption warrant. So, the proposal to revoke the warrant system is a significant move and will ensure the same high standards apply industry-wide.

341. There was universal support for the proposal to remove the system of exemptions and require all metal dealers to hold a licence irrespective of their size. The BMRA supported taking such a consistent approach across the whole industry, and the BTP and Police Scotland said the proposals would afford greater scrutiny and regulatory oversight.

342. It was also welcomed by licensing authorities. For example, Highland Council said it would result in an “unambiguous system”. A number of other councils noted the proposal in the Bill would allow them to charge all metal dealers a licence fee (the cost of issuing an exemption warrant is non-recoverable).

343. We support the proposal to remove the exemption warrant system, which will rightly ensure all metal dealers require a licence. All metal dealers will, therefore, have to comply with the other proposals in the Bill that will together help to strengthen the licensing regime.

Banning cash payments for metal

344. In line with the licensing regime in England and Wales, the Bill seeks to ban cash payments for metal. The Bill proposes that payment should be limited to either bank transfer or cheque. The intention is to ensure transactions for scrap metal are “traceable and auditable with a proper paper trail, thus deterring theft and increasing chances of detection”.

345. Cashless trading for metal was introduced in England and Wales in December 2012, which has been shown to have played a part in reducing metal theft. The BTP and Police Scotland supported a similar ban in Scotland and argued it was crucial to removing the incentives for metal theft by requiring traceable transactions. Others, such as Glasgow City Council, wanted to see a similarly robust system in place in Scotland to stop metal thieves being attracted north of the border to take advantage of cash payments.

346. Apart from Stephen Dalton Scrap Metal Merchants, which considered that everybody had the right to be paid in cash if they wanted, the metal dealing industry was generally supportive of the proposal. Metal dealers told us that banning cash payments would remove some of the incentive for metal crime and expected the ban to stop 95 per cent of metal thefts.

347. However, metal dealers also raised some concerns about how the ban would operate. Rosefield Salvage Ltd was concerned that banning cash payments from Metal dealers would simply mean people would go elsewhere to get cash for their scrap metal, such as going to a garage to sell a catalytic converter. This, it said, would mean the “properly licensed scrapyard will be hurt, but people will still be being paid cash”. To resolve this, John R Adam & Sons Ltd suggested that the definition of a metal dealer needed to be “tightened up dramatically” (this is discussed in more detail later in this Part).

348. Metal dealers also expressed concern that a cash ban would impact on their business by discouraging private householders from scrapping metal and could result in increased fly-tipping. However, we heard from the BTP that the experience of implementing the measure in England and Wales had shown such fears to be “unfounded” and that, since the introduction of the Scrap Metal Dealers Act 2013 (2013 Act), there had been “no complaints”. The BTP also told us – although it does not have a completely definitive picture - it had approached a number of local authorities to ascertain whether there was any anecdotal, historical or statistical data linking a cash-ban with fly-tipping and reported none had any evidence of this.

349. The BMRA, along with Scottish Power Energy Networks, considered the payment methods permitted by the Bill were poorly defined and unclear. For example, they were critical that the Bill did not appear to restrict the person to whom a cheque may be made out; it did not need to be the seller or any person whose identity had been verified.

350. A number of others suggested steps should be taken to prevent cheque cashing facilities being opened at metal dealers’ premises to circumvent the cash ban. However, the BTP did not appear to be concerned about this issue. It said that the ‘know your customer’ regulations and requirements in place at such businesses tended to be much more stringent than those imposed on the metal dealing industry.

351. We also invited comments on whether an alternative approach that allowed small cash payments below a certain threshold could be effective. It was felt that allowing some cash into the system would create a loophole and leave the system open to exploitation by criminals. Calor, for example, was concerned that gas cylinders could potentially fall within a definition of a small transaction and felt such an allowance would do nothing to deter the theft of such items. The National Metal Theft Taskforce argued a blanket ban would relieve metal dealers of any pressure from unscrupulous customers to make a series of payments under a threshold.

352. The Cabinet Secretary acknowledged the cash ban in England and Wales had appeared to have made a significant impact in reducing metal crime. Removing the cash element, he said, made it much more difficult for people to dispose of metal that had been received illegally.217

353. We welcome the proposal to ban cash payments for metal. However, we are concerned about suggestions it could encourage traders to obtain cash for selling metal to, for example, vehicle dismantlers. We discuss the issue of defining a metal dealer later in this report, at paragraphs 377 to 382.

Improved standards of record keeping and customer identification
354. The Bill seeks to improve the standards of record keeping by metal dealers, and to create a universal system for itinerant dealers and metal dealers that operate from fixed premises.

355. The Bill proposes that a metal dealer must verify the name and address of a person from whom they have acquired metal or to whom they have disposed of metal. In each case, a metal dealer would have to record the means by which they verified the name and address of the person, and to keep a copy of the relevant document. A copy of the document showing payment would also have to be kept, which is connected to the proposal to ban cash payments for metal.

356. Metal dealers would be required to retain these records in either hard copy or electronic format for three, rather than the current two, years.

357. There was wide support for these measures, which were regarded as proportionate and pragmatic. There was particular support for standardising record keeping across the industry, which the BTP reported had been successful in England and Wales in terms of deterring low level criminality.218 The National Metal Theft Taskforce referred to the requirement to verify a customer’s name and address as “one of the key tenets of the legislation”, removing the opportunity for thieves to dispose of stolen metal anonymously.219

358. However, several organisations felt there needed to be greater clarity about the types of ID that would be deemed acceptable for verification purposes. Police Scotland220 wanted photo ID and proof of address, such as a utility or council tax bill, to be specified in the Bill itself, while others said they would be content with a suitable definition included in regulations. Aberdeen City Council pointed to existing requirements in section 102 of the 2005 Act as a suitable example that could be reproduced for metal dealers.221

359. While metal dealers supported strengthening the record keeping requirements, they had a specific concern about the requirement to record the date that metal was processed. This was due to the fact that metal is sorted and consolidated with other similar material.222 We note that while this is not a new requirement (it is currently included in the 1982 Act), most metal dealers that operate from a fixed premises are currently exempt from holding a licence. Many metal dealers have, therefore, been unaffected by this requirement to date.

360. We put this view to the Scottish Government, which replied that it saw the “force of these arguments” and that it would consider amending the Bill at Stage 2.

361. Other suggestions to strengthen the Bill related to electronic record keeping. Police Scotland felt this type of record keeping could lend itself to data manipulation and concealment and wanted metal dealers to be required to retain hard copy duplicates. Aberdeen Council suggested the Bill should require metal dealers to have appropriate means to back up their electronic records.

362. We support the enhanced record keeping requirements and, particularly, the move to impose the new conditions on itinerant metal dealers. These measures will establish an audit trail, making it easier to investigate metal crime and acting as a deterrent to criminals.

Removing the requirement to retain metal
363. The Bill proposes the removal of the mandatory requirement that metal dealers should not process metal for 48 hours after receiving it (known as tag-and-hold). The Scottish Government considers such a requirement to be “impractical for many dealers”.

364. There were contrasting views on this proposal. Metal dealers strongly supported the Scottish Government’s view that retaining the tag-and-hold provision would be impractical. Rosefield Salvage Ltd suggested a metal dealer with an acre-sized yard would run out of space by the end of a working day if it had to keep the material and not move it for 48 hours. John R Adam & Sons Ltd agreed and said SEPA – the national regulator for waste management licensing – would have huge issues with the amount of metal being left unprocessed. We saw, first hand, some of the practical issues to do with storage limits and space constraints that a metal dealer would face if the Bill did not remove tag-and-hold when we visited William Waugh Ltd scrap metal yard in Edinburgh.

365. We asked SEPA about this issue and it acknowledged that on many metal dealers’ sites space was constrained. SEPA explained that for environmental protection reasons, it often imposed conditions, such as maximum quantity and storage limits and storage conditions. It recognised tag-and-hold could result in a potential conflict with waste management licensing conditions, which could cause metal dealers “some difficulties”. SEPA said it was “comfortable with the current proposal in the Bill”.

366. However, others saw the benefits of the tag-and-hold provision and felt it should be kept. The National Metal Theft Taskforce said it had seen “no convincing commercial argument for not retaining metal for 48 hours”\textsuperscript{229}. To keep the requirement, it said, would assist the identification of stolen metal and deter metal dealers from accepting metal that they thought may have been stolen.

367. The Police was also against removing the provision, but appeared to recognise there needed to be a balance between the needs of enforcement agencies and what is practical for metal dealers.\textsuperscript{230}

368. The BTP said “in an ideal world, we as enforcement agencies would have everything in place that we possibly could ... the 48-hour rule would help considerably”.

369. However, it also said it understood the business objections from metal dealers and recognised that, in addition to the environmental regulations imposed by SEPA, the 48-hour requirement “could prove very onerous” for metal dealers. The BTP also acknowledged there would be ways in which metal dealers could, if they wanted, get round the 48-hour rule “by not having the 48-hour stock in the 48-hour pile”.

370. BTP also accepted that other measures in the Bill – such as enhanced record keeping and verification of customers – would strengthen the licensing regime and help enforcement agencies trace stolen metal.

371. The Cabinet Secretary stated the Bill seeks to balance the burden on metal dealers with the need to ensure a reasonable enforcement regime. He recognised the possibility that requiring metal dealers to retain metal for 48 hours could “push the burden so far that, for many metal dealers, it would become unsustainable”.\textsuperscript{231}

372. We agree with the balanced approach taken by the Cabinet Secretary in the Bill. While we accept that the requirement for metal dealers to retain metal for 48 hours would benefit enforcement to some degree, we believe the Bill strikes the right balance between tightening up the licensing regime and minimising the burden placed on legitimate metal dealers. We recognise that the other measures in the Bill – cashless trading and enhanced record keeping – should lead to significant improvements in enforcement.

373. We also received a number of comments about whether the tag-and-hold requirement would be available as a condition that licensing authorities could impose on a case by case basis. Although the Policy Memorandum\textsuperscript{232} states that licensing authorities would be able to impose such a condition if they wanted, Police Scotland\textsuperscript{233} suggested that, if the requirement was removed at a national level, it may not be possible to impose it at a local level.

374. Renfrewshire Council appeared to make a similar point and suggested licence holders could potentially challenge discretionary conditions as onerous, leaving the courts to decide on such matters.\textsuperscript{234} While the Council was specifically referring to CCTV requirements, it suggested that by including conditions in the Bill as voluntary conditions would enable licensing authorities to adopt them, or not, at a local level.

375. Although we do not regard the tag-and-hold requirement as an appropriate mandatory requirement for licensees, we would want licensing authorities to have the freedom to impose the condition locally.

Further strengthening and new measures

376. While there was strong support for the intention of the Bill, we heard that new measures could be added that would make the Bill more effective at reducing metal theft.

Definition of a metal dealer

377. A large number of bodies raised concerns about the definition of a metal dealer under the 1982 Act.

378. Section 37 of the 1982 Act states that a metal dealer is a person who “carries on a business which consists wholly or partly of buying and selling [metal]”. Along with the metal dealing industry, the Police called for this definition to be amended to specify persons who ‘buy or sell’ metal. The BTP suggested such a change would allow it to catch itinerant dealers who often uplift scrap metal (without paying for it) and then sell it. There was considerable evidence, the BTP said, that an element of itinerant dealers was to blame for stolen metal entering the trade chain.

379. In addition, it was suggested that skip hire operators, demolition contractors and car breakers would also escape the licensing regime. The BMRA told us that “a clear and comprehensive” definition of metal dealer, which included vehicle dismantlers and other businesses generating a significant proportion of their income from sale of scrap metal, was “essential”.

380. We asked the Scottish Government to respond to these suggestions. It told us that the aim of the Bill was to “modernise and strengthen the regulatory regime of those currently defined as metal dealers or itinerant metal dealers”. However, the Government also said it was aware of the arguments that expanding the definition of a dealer to include those at the periphery of the industry may assist enforcement, and was considering the implications of widening the definition in this way.

381. When they gave evidence to us, Scottish Government officials confirmed that people who were on the margins, such as itinerant dealers who collected metal without paying for it and sold it, were not currently covered by the licensing regime. They said they would consider whether the definition could be changed without capturing people who were “very peripheral”, such as a plumber.

382. We are concerned that the current definition of a metal dealer may not extend far enough and we welcome the Scottish Government’s offer to consider how it could be widened.

236 Scottish Government. Written submission, 6 February 2015.
National regulation of itinerant metal dealers

383. The regulation of itinerant dealers was of particular concern to many who submitted their views on the Bill. This is reflected in the specific call to widen the definition of a metal dealer to include itinerant dealers who collect metal for free and then sell it. It is further illustrated by the views of the Police, SEPA and the metal dealing industry by calling for the introduction of a national register that would provide oversight of itinerant dealers who can operate Scotland-wide. These specific issues are covered later, at paragraphs 391 to 398.

384. Currently, in Scotland, people can apply to any licensing authority for an itinerant metal dealer’s licence, which would allow them to operate as an itinerant metal dealer anywhere in Scotland. The Bill does not propose any changes to this arrangement. The position in England and Wales is slightly different, as itinerant metal dealers (or collectors, as they are termed) are required to hold a licence for each local authority in which they operate.

385. We discussed with Glasgow City Council how it oversaw the activities of its licensees who could be operating as itinerant dealers across Scotland. Speaking hypothetically, the Council explained that it would not always know what the itinerant dealer was doing in other parts of the country and would rely on Police Scotland to be the enforcement agency and to take action. If, the Council said, a breach of the licensing conditions was found to have taken place then Police Scotland would be able to bring a complaint to the Glasgow licensing committee.

386. Given the obvious difficulties licensing authorities faced in overseeing itinerant dealers, we were interested to know whether a national licensing system would make enforcement easier. SEPA said it recognised the benefits of local decision making for local licensing considerations. It was, however, open-minded about what the best option would be: “itinerant dealers could be registered with a local authority, if that system could be made to work, or directly with a national body, such as SEPA”. Overall, SEPA considered a full options appraisal of the various options would be necessary.

387. Police Scotland drew a comparison with the way in which the peddler’s certificate system operated. These certificates, which are issued by the Police, allow a peddler to operate throughout Scotland. Police Scotland keeps records of those who have been issued with certificates.

388. We asked the Scottish Government to comment on the matter and it replied as follows:

“Any licensing system balances effective regulation against disproportionate administrative burden. In the case of itinerant metal dealers, the Parliament, in passing the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982, felt that the balance fell in allowing an itinerant dealer to work nationally as opposed to having to seek up to 32 different licences to operate across local authority boundaries."

238 Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982. Section 32.
239 Scrap Metal Dealers Act 2013. Section 2.
We accept that enforcement may be strengthened by limiting the scope of a licence. That said, we would not regard it as an insuperable problem. If an individual comes to the attention of either a licensing authority or the Police then they can check the position with the issuing authority."

389. We also raised this issue with the Cabinet Secretary when he gave oral evidence to us. While the Cabinet Secretary stated it would be possible to set up such a national licensing system, he did not think the problem was particularly extensive and emphasised the importance of taking a proportionate approach. He also felt that, rather than a move to a national licensing scheme, the regime in the Bill would allow local authorities to be able to take things forward in a way that best fits their areas.

390. The Scottish Government should consider the merits of a national licensing scheme and report back to the Committee in this Parliamentary term.

391. There were also calls for the Bill to be strengthened by requiring a public register of metal dealers in Scotland. Equivalent registers for England and Wales were introduced by the Scrap Metal Dealers Act 2013.

392. Again, this was an issue on which there was general agreement from the enforcement agencies and the metal dealing industry.

393. The BTP said such a register would be “really helpful” from the point of view of the general public “if they were able to identify recognised, bona fide scrap metal dealers”. It also considered that, from an enforcement point of view, a register would assist sharing information and intelligence among the key agencies (Police, local authorities and SEPA) on a business-by-business basis. It would also be “very useful to have clarity and visibility around who has registration and licensing in which local authority areas”.

394. The BMRA highlighted that metal trading was far from a localised activity – metal dealers may well be buying from businesses or suppliers from all over Scotland and they will be selling all over Scotland and beyond. The BMRA saw particular benefit in having a national register of itinerant dealers who, it said, were highly mobile and worked in multiple authority areas.

395. From a business perspective, Scottish Power Energy Networks suggested it would be helpful as it could require its contractors to work within the register and to go to registered scrap dealers. It also considered there had been problems establishing the register in England and emphasised the importance of ensuring that responsibilities for managing the register were “absolutely clear”.

244 The Environment Agency manages the register in England and Natural Resources Wales has responsibility for the register in Wales.
396. Given the role of the Environment Agency, which manages the register in England, we asked SEPA to comment on whether it thought a Scottish register would be of benefit and if it could host such a register. SEPA’s view was that a national register could deliver benefits and improvements:

“That is the kind of system that we operate. That would allow better co-ordination and multi-agency efforts to tackle metal theft, and it could improve information sharing between the authorities, Police Scotland and the British Transport Police. It could also help to address some of the concerns around the control and oversight of itinerant metal dealers.”

397. However, SEPA emphasised that any move to a national register would require a thorough evaluation of options, costs and benefits, and would need to be considered alongside the licensing process. There were, it said, a range of potential options that would need to be explored.

398. We acknowledge the licensing regime in England and Wales places a duty on relevant bodies to maintain a public register of metal dealers in their particular area. We heard there is a lot of support for an equivalent Scottish register. We believe such a register would promote transparency and assist businesses and members of the public to find legitimate metal dealers, as well as allowing enforcement agencies to maintain closer oversight of itinerant dealers.

Requirement to display a licence

399. The BTP suggested the Bill could be strengthened to require a metal dealer to clearly display a copy of its licence at its premises, or in the case of an itinerant dealer, from inside its vehicle. Current legislation, the BTP said, allowed five days for the production of a licence, which could hinder police investigations.

400. A similar requirement had been seen as important enough to be inserted in the Scrap Metal Dealers Bill at the amending stage and is now in force in England and Wales.

401. The BMRA supported BTP’s suggestion, which it described as a “useful measure to assist enforcement agencies in identifying illegal dealers”.

402. We asked the Scottish Government whether it would consider including the provision in the Bill. The Government said it was considering the merits of the suggestion, and that its current view was such a requirement could be delivered by existing secondary powers and did not require provision to be made in the Bill.

Penalties

403. A number of organisations called for the maximum penalty for an offence under the legislation to be increased. For example, Scottish Power Energy Networks felt the maximum penalty of £5,000 was “disproportionate given the implications that the theft of metal can cause‖, and suggested an increase was required to have any "meaningful impact". 253

404. We asked SEPA how the fine level compared with environmental offences. It said the proposed penalty provisions in the Bill were the same as the penalties for ‘duty of care’ offences, which included failing to adhere to certain record keeping requirements 254. By contrast, the penalties for failing to obtain a waste management licence 255 were much higher, at up to £40,000. 256

405. When the Scottish Government gave oral evidence to us on the Bill, officials stated the fine level was “probably inadequate” and was something that they “may seek to address at Stage 2”. 257

Recommendations

Compliance and enforcement
406. Experience in England and Wales has shown that non-legislative interventions – Operation Tornado and the establishment of the National Metal Theft Taskforce – have had a significant impact in reducing metal crime and strengthened the impact of the legislation. We urge the Scottish Government to continue to work with the British Transport Police and Police Scotland to ensure the legislation is supported by a robust compliance and enforcement programme.

Banning cash payments for metal
407. We ask the Scottish Government to respond to comments we heard that the payment methods are poorly defined in the Bill, and to consider whether further clarification is needed.

Improved standards of record keeping and customer identification
408. We welcome the commitment from the Scottish Government to consider amending the Bill to remove the need for metal dealers to record the date on which metal was processed.

409. We ask the Scottish Government to respond to the suggestions made to us about the need to clarify the types of ID that would be deemed suitable to verify customers' identity and in relation to keeping digital records.

Removing the requirement to retain metal
410. We ask the Scottish Government to respond to the suggestion that revoking the requirement to retain metal would make it difficult for licensing authorities to impose this locally.

Definition of a metal dealer
411. We welcome the Scottish Government’s commitment to consider expanding the definition of a metal dealer. The Bill represents a good opportunity to modernise the definitions in the 1982 Act and we urge the Government to work with the metal dealing industry and enforcement bodies to find a suitable form of words that captures the industry as a whole and has limited unintended consequences.

National register of metal dealers
412. We recommend the Scottish Government considers options for establishing a national register of metal dealers in Scotland.

Requirement to display a licence
413. We welcome the Scottish Government’s commitment to consider how best to introduce the requirement that metal dealers must display their licence.

Penalties
414. We believe the maximum penalty liable under the legislation for breaching any of the licensing conditions should be uprated to take account of the substantial impact metal theft can have in terms of disruption to services and risk to life. Such a move would emphasise the seriousness of metal theft and act as a deterrent to criminals. We recommend that the Scottish Government consider bringing forward amendments at Stage 2 to increase the scale of fines liable under the legislation.
PART 3: CIVIC LICENSING: PUBLIC ENTERTAINMENT

Background

416. The Bill contains additional proposals which would impact on the way the 1982 Act operates. The Scottish Government argues “licensing arrangements should be proportionate and appropriate to what is being regulated. In light of that the Scottish Government believes that less onerous licensing requirements for theatres may in some circumstances be appropriate”.258

417. Theatres are currently licensed under the Theatres Act 1968 (“the 1968 Act”). This is a mandatory licence that is required by all premises where a public performance of a play is to be held. No allowance is made for the size of the premises or potential audience, or if the performance is free.

418. “Play” is defined in the 1968 Act as “any dramatic piece, whether involving improvisation or not, which is given wholly or in part by one or more persons actually present and performing and in which the whole or a major proportion of what is done by the person or persons performing, whether by way of speech, singing or action, involves the playing of a role”.259 The performance of ballet also requires a theatre licence.

419. Currently, theatre cannot be separately licensed under the public entertainment provisions of the 1982 Act.

Bill proposals

420. The Bill proposes to abolish the requirement for a theatre licence instead allowing theatres to be licensed under the public entertainment provisions of the 1982 Act.

421. The Bill intends to allow greater flexibility by moving theatre licensing from a mandatory to an optional regime. It would therefore be up to licensing authorities to decide whether or how to license theatres.

422. The Scottish Government also states that consistency will be enhanced as theatre licensing will be brought into the same regime as other forms of public entertainment. The licensing requirements of the 1968 Act will be repealed, with other parts, for example dealing with obscenity offences and public records of scripts, remaining in force.

423. The Scottish Government has not consulted on proposals contained in the Bill.

Committee submissions

424. We received 12 submissions relating to public entertainment licensing. Of these, the majority came from local authorities.

---

258 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 232.
259 Theatres Act 1968.
425. Respondents to the call for submissions were largely non-committal on the issue of moving theatre licensing into the regime for public entertainment licences. A number of local authorities stated that as public entertainment licensing was part of the ‘optional’ licensing regime in the 1982 Act, it would be local authorities’ decision whether to licence theatres.

Impacts during transitional period

426. Authorities that decide to licence theatres with a public entertainment licence would have to pass a new resolution or amend existing resolutions to cover theatres as a form of public entertainment. Under section 9 of the 1982 Act, they are required to allow at least nine months between the passing of a resolution and the coming into force of any new licensing requirements.

427. The vast majority of submissions echoed the need for a suitable transition period to allow these changes to take place. The Federation of Scottish Theatre stated—

“…we would ask that all licensing authorities and licensed premises are given sufficient time and guidance in advance of the transition to make any necessary adjustments in order to comply with the change in licensing arrangements.”²⁶⁰

428. Renfrewshire Council suggested that, for local authorities that will require a change in resolution “it would be useful to those authorities where this is an issue for there to be transitional provisions put in place, so that such premises can remain licensed between the adoption of a new public entertainment resolution and the acceptance and processing of new applications²⁶¹.” They further suggest a resolution to incorporate theatres would require consultation along with a nine month period for introducing that resolution.

429. An issue was highlighted by the City of Edinburgh Council that the proposal to licence theatres under public entertainment makes the assumption that local authorities will make the necessary amendments to their Public Entertainment resolution.

“There is a risk that Theatres will be unlicensed if a particular licensing authority does not include these premises within its public entertainment resolution.”²⁶²

Cost implications

430. In written evidence we received mixed views on the issue of additional costs. Where venues hold both a Theatre Licence and Public Entertainment Licence, owing to their nature of operation, it was suggested that these venues would expect to see a reduction in cost.

²⁶⁰ Federation of Scottish Theatre. Written submission 86.
²⁶² City of Edinburgh Council. Written submission 49.
431. SOLAR Licensing Group suggested there would be “conversions costs to theatres in obtaining new licences and costs associated with updating resolutions for licensing authorities.”

432. The cost of Public Entertainment Licences varies across the country. Jon Morgan from Federation of Scottish Theatre told the Committee—

“In one local authority area, it will cost £140 for a year if the venue is up to 5,000 seats and, in another, it will cost £1,855 for the same size of venue. There is a huge discrepancy.”

Alcohol licensing

433. Premises that have a licence to sell alcohol do not require a public entertainment licence where entertainment takes place during licensed hours. However, currently for theatres, a theatre licence is required regardless of an alcohol licence being in place at the venue.

434. It was brought to our attention that licensing authorities’ ability to exert control over theatre venues which held alcohol licences would be minimal due to the Brightcrew decision.

Recommendations

435. We are of the view that the proposals in this section of the Bill are non-contentious and are in general agreement with them. We recognise the concerns around transitional timescales and recommend the Scottish Government allow suitable timescales and provide guidance to deal with this transition.

436. We recognise concerns around costs and, while we would not expect a need for current costs of Public Entertainment licences to increase, we understand this would be a matter for licensing authorities.

263 SOLAR Licensing Group. Written submission 33-38.
PART 3: CIVIC LICENSING: SEXUAL ENTERTAINMENT VENUES

Background

437. The Bill will introduce a licensing regime for sexual entertainment venues (SEVs) based on the current system in place for sex shops. This is achieved by amending the existing licensing scheme for sex shops found in Part 3 and Schedule 2 of the 1982 Act, so it applies to sexual entertainment venues also, with modifications as necessary.

438. Currently, live sexual entertainment is not an activity which is licensed of its own accord. Conditions attached to alcohol licences issued under the 2005 Act were deemed sufficient to regulate this type of business because all known live sexual entertainment venues had an alcohol licence.

439. The Policy Memorandum\(^{265}\) indicates around 20 SEVs exist in Scotland. In response to our letter, the Scottish Government advised these venues are located in Edinburgh, Dundee, Glasgow and Aberdeen and are lap dancing clubs, with the greatest concentrations to be found in Edinburgh and Glasgow.

Adult Entertainment Working Group

440. In March 2005, Scottish Ministers set up a Working Group on Adult Entertainment to review the scope and impact of adult entertainment activity and make recommendations to Ministers on the way forward. This followed concerns expressed about the lack of controls on adult entertainment activity. The report of the Adult Entertainment Working Group\(^{266}\) recommended sexual entertainment should be regulated regardless of where it occurred, which necessitated a specific regime. Regulation was not taken forward at that time.

441. The Working Group also made other recommendations, including a requirement for all performances to take place in public and improved conditions for performers. A number of licensing boards incorporated the recommendations into conditions which they applied to premises’ licences of venues offering sexual entertainment.

Proposed amendments to Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010

442. In response to the lack of a specific licensing regime for sexual entertainment venues Sandra White MSP proposed an amendment to the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill (which became the 2010 Act). This is in the same terms as the system proposed in the Bill. Her amendment was supported by the Scottish Government at Stage 3 but was not agreed to by the Parliament. The reasons for opposing her amendment were broadly, dual licensing was undesirable and, insufficient consideration had been given to the proposal to rule out unintended consequences.

Need for a specific licensing regime for sexual entertainment venues

443. A 2011 court case cast significant doubt on licensing boards’ ability to control sexual entertainment through alcohol licensing. In the case of Brightcrew Ltd. v The \(^{265}\) Policy Memorandum, Paragraph 250.

City of Glasgow Licensing Board\textsuperscript{267}, the Court of Session held that a Licensing Board is only permitted to consider the licensing objectives as they relate to the sale of alcohol rather than in relation to more general considerations. The case involved Glasgow Licensing Board’s refusal to renew an alcohol licence on the basis of evidence that the licensing conditions it had applied to the venue had been breached. The venue was used for sexual entertainment. The breaches included contact between customers and performers. The court held that it was beyond the Licensing Board’s powers to try to regulate matters which did not relate to the sale of alcohol.

\textit{Approach in England and Wales}

444. The Policing and Crime Act 2009 introduced SEV licensing in England and Wales. The arrangements are very similar to those proposed in this Bill with one key exception, in England and Wales venues can host sexual entertainment up to 11 times in one year without requiring a licence.

\textit{Bill proposals}

445. Section 68 of the Bill sets out a new licensing system for SEVs to be administered by local authorities.

446. A licensing authority can grant a licence unconditionally, refuse it, or grant it subject to conditions. Conditions must be reasonable and may include (non-exhaustively) matters such as hours of operating, window displays and visibility from the street. The Scottish Government expects Licensing Boards will focus on the sale of alcohol and Licensing Committees would licence sexual entertainment.\textsuperscript{268}

447. Enforcement is a matter for the licensing authority and the police, both of whom have rights of entry and inspection. If a matter is brought to the attention of the police then they would determine what action to take. Actions could include reporting the matter to the Fiscal for possible prosecution or referring the matter to the licensing authority for potential action such as revocation of the licence or the imposition of additional conditions.

448. Public notice (either electronically or in a local newspaper) of any applications for a SEV is required no later than 7 days after the application is received. Objections and representations can be made by any member of the public prior to the licensing authority taking its final decision. There is no process for transferring a licence. A right of appeal to the Sheriff exists for applicants unhappy at a decision of a licensing authority.

449. A licence will run for one year or for a shorter period determined by the licensing authority. There is no requirement for a licensing policy statement, however a local authority may choose to prepare one.

\textit{Committee submissions}

450. We received 49 submissions on this aspect of the Bill, mainly from those who worked in the industry or licensing authorities, but also from businesses, equality bodies, health organisations and an arts group.

\textsuperscript{267} Brightcrew \textit{-v-} City of Glasgow Licensing Board [2011] CSIH 46.

\textsuperscript{268} Scottish Government. \textit{Written submission on Policy Memorandum}, 1 September 2014.
Licensing of the sexual entertainment industry

451. A new licensing regime was welcomed by those responding to our call for evidence. It was generally recognised the Brightcrew decision had created uncertainty about the regulation of sexual entertainment and therefore a specific regime would be required going forward. On the merits of licensing SEVs, and in response to Sandra White MSP comments on the need for premises to be licensed, Mairi Millar from Glasgow City Council said—

“It strikes me that we have licensing legislation and regulations to cover everything from window cleaning to selling burgers from a van or selling chewing gum at 3 o’clock in the morning under late hours catering regulations, but adult entertainment activity is currently not regulated.” 269

452. ACC Telfer of Police Scotland said the Bill “will provide the police and the local authority with greater scope to ensure compliance in this business area” he went on to say it would also better enable “the police and partners to ensure the safety and wellbeing of those who work in such premises”. 270 The focus of the responses we received was around the detail of the proposed licensing regime and how it impacted on owners of sexual entertainment businesses, those working in the sexual entertainment industry, and licensing and enforcement authorities tasked with implementing and enforcing the scheme. Issues raised centred around seven main areas:

- Definition of a sexual entertainment venue
- Exemption for venues holding no more than four performances a year
- Power to set an “appropriate” number of sexual entertainment venues for an area
- Appropriateness of a discretionary regime
- Responsibility for licensing sexual entertainment venues
- Location and advertising of sexual entertainment venues
- Young people working in sexual entertainment venues

453. In many ways, the differing attitudes towards sexual entertainment, is fundamental to considering the policy approach taken by the Scottish Government, and the views presented to us by stakeholders.

454. It is therefore worthwhile exploring briefly the import of these views before considering the detailed issues associated with the creation of a specific licensing regime.

455. Some respondents who had worked in the sexual entertainment industry advised they did not view the entertainment on offer as sexual. A few respondents, including Grant Murray Architects Ltd 271, considered sexual entertainment a necessary facility for attracting business conventions etc. to a city. While Kelvin Smith Insurance Brokers Limited said these venues were “merely light hearted entertainment and a far cry from anything underground or seedy”. 272 A number of 271 Grant Murray Architects. Written submission 24.

272 Kelvin Smith Insurance Brokers Ltd. Written Submission 71.
performers commented on the fact that they had always felt safe and respected; that performing gives them a flexible way to make money; and that venues (at least the ones they’ve experienced) were well run.

456. While others such as Zero Tolerance, a charity working to tackle the causes of men’s violence against women, made a specific link, on the basis of academic research, between sexual entertainment, prostitution and, in both cases, women who are vulnerable to violence. In their view, sexual entertainment harmed all women and controls therefore benefitted society. Zero Tolerance said—

“In a civilised society in which ‘our people and communities support and respect each other’ (SG Strategy for Justice in Scotland, 2012) some choices are curtailed in the interests of all. It is interesting and disappointing that men’s choices to watch women perform in a sexualised manner are being protected here.”

457. The Scottish Government’s policy on violence against women defines stripping, lap dancing and pole dancing as commercial sexual exploitation and therefore violence against women. This is because “these activities have been shown to be harmful for the individual women involved and have a negative impact on the position of all women through the objectification of women’s bodies.”

458. When the Cabinet Secretary was asked why sexual entertainment venues had not been banned by the Scottish Government given the harm caused by commercial sexual exploitation of women, he said—

“What we are doing is giving local authorities the power to license the venues and to determine what the number of them should be. If a local authority believes that the desirable number is zero, there is a process that it can go through in order to achieve that.”

Definition of a Sexual Entertainment Venue

459. The Bill proposes a number of fairly complicated definitions in order to capture the sort of activities which it is intended to license, such as lap dancing, strip shows, peep shows, live sex shows, but to avoid licensing, for example, artistic performances. The main definitions are:

- sexual entertainment venue – “any premises at which sexual entertainment is provided before a live audience for (or with a view to) the financial gain of the organiser”
- sexual entertainment – “any live performance or any live display of nudity which is of such a nature that, ignoring financial gain, it must reasonably be assumed to be provided solely or principally for the purpose of sexually stimulating any member of the audience (whether by verbal or other means)”

460. The Bill’s proposals only license sexual entertainment taking place on premises. This leaves out sexual entertainment taking place in private property and may also exclude other types of performance. In addition, sexual entertainment must be provided by or on behalf of the “organiser” (the controller of the venue or the sexual entertainment). This means that sexual entertainment provided without the knowledge of the organiser (e.g. a strip-o-gram booked to attend a group in a pub) is not included.

273 Zero Tolerance. Written submission 68.

461. A number of those who had worked in the sexual entertainment industry objected to the term ‘sexual entertainment’. In their view, the performances were not necessarily sexual, and there was also concern that the term led to an assumption that other sexual services were on offer.

462. Equality groups, were also critical of the term, for example, Highland Violence Against Women Partnership criticised the term as a euphemism for commercial sexual exploitation and saw it as legitimising violence against women. Most equality groups did support further regulation of sexual entertainment – although reluctantly – as a way of reducing harm. Zero Tolerance was disappointed about the emphasis on licensing law in the proposals, and felt the focus should have been on gender equality and community safety issues. It stated:

“The current Bill appears to have been written with a view to ironing out legal technicalities in the regulation of sexual entertainment and alcohol, rather than with a consideration of the more important themes of gender equality, women’s safety, child protection and the rights and safety of communities. The final Bill must cohere clearly with Scottish Government policies on gender equality, child protection and violence against women and girls, including Equally Safe.”

463. Local authorities noted various technical issues about the definitions. One area of concern was that the requirement for an ‘organiser’ and/or ‘financial gain’ may allow venues to circumvent regulation. City of Edinburgh Council explained a venue could argue the entertainment is provided for the financial benefit of any self-employed entertainer as opposed to the organiser. The Scottish Government provided us with reassurance the definition was robust and the same principle of ‘indirect gain’ would apply to someone facilitating self-employed performers. The Scottish Government shared the view of Professor Hubbard of the University of Kent given to us in evidence—

“The provisions clearly refer to direct or indirect financial gain. There has been no case in England in which anybody has challenged the idea that somebody providing free striptease entertainment may not be benefiting indirectly from increased patronage, which results in increased alcohol sales. I think that the definition is adequate in that sense.”

464. Several local authorities wanted private clubs to be specifically covered and one local authority suggest temporary structures should also be included. We also heard from the Association of Licensed Adult Entertainment Venues Scotland (“the ALAEVS”). Its particular concern was about unregulated sexual entertainment, Janet

276 Zero Tolerance. Written submission 68.
277 City of Edinburgh Council. Written submission 49.
278 Scottish Government. Written submission, 6 February 2015.
Hood representing ALAEVS told us groups of young men could engage the services of a stripper to come to their house or hotel room without the woman being accompanied by a chaperone, she said “those are the people who are being seriously exploited in Scotland”.\footnote{Local Government and Regeneration Committee, \textit{Official Report}, 14 January 2015, Col 13.}

465. Another area of concern was a lack of clarity about what forms of sexual entertainment would be covered. Edinburgh Council highlighted that venues which charged an entrance fee and then allowed customers to engage in sexual activity among themselves (e.g. fetish clubs or swingers’ clubs) may be covered. Professor Hubbard suggested that massage parlours (where massages were given by naked or partially dressed staff) and gay saunas (where men stripped off for the titillation of others) could also be covered. Although Scottish Government officials advised us—

“if they meet the licensing definition in terms of the activities conducted on the premises and the need for financial gain, then the Scottish Government is content for them to be licensed. We note that nothing in the licensing regime would serve to permit or mitigate illegal activity if offences are being committed e.g. brothel keeping, trading in prostitution or use of premises for unlawful intercourse.”\footnote{Scottish Government. \textit{Written submission}, 6 February 2015.}

466. Jon Morgan of the Scottish Federation of Theatres wanted the Bill’s definition to be reconsidered on three counts, firstly “the potential misinterpretation or misapplication of sexual entertainment venue licensing to restrict unreasonably their legitimate artistic performances”, secondly “the potential for individual members of the public to make vexatious complaints, perhaps on the ground of taste or decency rather than on the ground of a performance being an example of sexual entertainment” and lastly, “self-censorship by our own sector: out of fear of falling foul of the legislation, people may simply choose not to put on a particular performance or production.”\footnote{Local Government and Regeneration Committee, \textit{Official Report}, 14 January 2015, Cols 23-24.} He went on to suggest a solution would be to create an exemption for those venues which hold a Public Entertainment Licence\footnote{Local Government and Regeneration Committee, \textit{Official Report}, 14 January 2015, Col 26.} and also to look to the 1968 Act which contains a definition of “play” which would cover legitimate theatrical performances.\footnote{Local Government and Regeneration Committee, \textit{Official Report}, 14 January 2015, Col 26.} Aberdeen City Council believed that exotic or burlesque dancing might also be caught in the definition.

467. The Scottish Government believed these fears were unfounded since the definition of sexual entertainment would exclude activity that isn’t intended for sexual stimulation.\footnote{Scottish Government. \textit{Written submission on Policy Memorandum}, 1 September 2014.}

468. The Minister did however acknowledge concerns in this area and sought to provide reassurance on the matter. To this end he advised the Scottish Government would “produce guidance to give specific direction about the premises and productions that would be exempt”.\footnote{Local Government and Regeneration Committee, \textit{Official Report}, 25 February 2015, Col 34.}
Exemption for venues holding no more than four performances a year

469. The vast majority of those responding to the call for evidence did not support this proposal. It was generally considered, if an activity needed to be licensed, it needed to be licensed every time it occurred.

470. According to the Policy Memorandum, “frequency makes a qualitative difference and to not allow a de minimis level would significantly increase the scope of the scheme”. It was also considered the level is set “so as not to allow a loophole to emerge whereby frequent activity is unlicensed”. 287 Eric Anderson, Aberdeen City Council however argued the provision did create a loophole—

“Instead of having a permanent premises with a licence and proper facilities for performers, they could simply transfer the activity to different venues where there are no such facilities or protection. Such an exemption could therefore mean defeating the aims and purposes of the amendments to the 1982 Act.” 288

471. Those who had worked as performers in the sexual entertainment industry commented that they would rather work in properly licensed premises. Scottish Women’s Convention considered “an organiser using several venues throughout a Local Authority to provide sexual entertainment, with each venue being used no more than three times, and all the while avoiding being subject to specific sexual entertainment licensing”. 289

472. Police Scotland and several local authorities also noted that allowing an exemption would make enforcement tricky as it would be very difficult to demonstrate how many times a venue had hosted sexual entertainment in the past year. Aberdeen City Council believed this could be an issue, Eric Anderson commented “itinerant type of entertainment, which moves from place to place—here one day and gone the next—that makes monitoring, control and keeping tabs very difficult”. 290 Mairi Miller, Glasgow City Council, considered it almost impossible to enforce, she stated—

“Licensing boards or licensing standards authorities simply would not know how many times it had happened, because there would be no requirement for them to know.” 291

473. Highland Council drew our attention to the potential anomalous position whereby if a local authority had resolved to have no venues in its area, this would not prevent sexual entertainment taking place under the exemption. 292

474. In its letter to the Committee, the Scottish Government advised the alcohol licensing system already regulates, to a limited extent, sexual entertainment through, for example, the Licensing Conditions (Late Opening Premises) (Scotland) Regulations 2007. It anticipated that some amendment would be required to secondary legislation to ensure consistency of definitions and to avoid overlap in regulation. These controls would continue to be necessary for premises which offer sexual entertainment on fewer than four occasions per year and therefore will not be licensed under the new sexual entertainment venue licensing arrangements.\textsuperscript{293}

475. The Cabinet Secretary explained why an exemption had been created under the Bill’s SEV provisions—

“The exemption was included largely to reflect the fact that there could be unintended occasions on which a venue finds that it might have required an additional licence. It would be difficult for us to regulate such situations or to understand the full extent of that activity, and the exemption provision is an attempt to strike a balance.”\textsuperscript{294}

\textit{Power to set an “appropriate” number of sexual entertainment venues for an area}

476. Under the Bill, it will be open to a local licensing authority to introduce a sexual entertainment licensing regime for their area. They cannot specify a date for the scheme to come into effect any less than one year from the date of the resolution. This will allow existing venues a full year’s trading (which is also the proposed duration of the licence) and a year in which to submit an application to be licensed under the new scheme.

477. This aspect of the licensing of SEVs policy was the most contentious. Local authorities and COSLA generally welcomed this power, however, concerns were expressed, both about the impact on existing businesses if the limit was set at zero and about technical issues with assessing an appropriate number.

478. Siobhan Murphy, who had worked in a lap dancing club had concerns if Glasgow’s licensing authority set the number of venues at zero then “dancers would be forced to travel to Edinburgh or Newcastle to work, perhaps even further afield”.\textsuperscript{295} Andrew Cox also told us of his employment concerns, “if there is a ban or zero licences in Glasgow. I will get put out of a job”.\textsuperscript{296}

479. Mairi Millar of Glasgow City Council clarified although local authorities should have the power to set the number of venues in their area she explained before setting the number at zero “each local authority would have to gather a significant amount of research evidence to determine the appropriate number in its area. It is not my position, on behalf of my local authority, that the number would automatically be zero. Such a decision would have to be based on wide-ranging consultation and evidence gathering.”\textsuperscript{297} Licensing authorities would welcome guidance from Scottish Ministers in making these decisions.

480. Professor Hubbard argued strongly that a nil limit should be removed from the legislation, saying it “is legally unreasonable and indefensible” and urged the Bill is amended to “make it clear that every case should be decided on its merits and in relation to the facts of the case”.

481. In addition, a number of local authorities called for clarity in the Bill on the treatment of businesses already operating as SEVs. The ALAEVS called for ‘grandfather’ rights (in other words, legal protection for those venues which are already operating). Other business respondents, such as the Federation of Small Businesses felt it was unfair that local authorities could shut down overnight “hitherto legitimate businesses” and suggested either grandfather rights or a transitional period be provided. Several local authorities called for Scottish Government guidance on the treatment of existing clubs in order to head off protracted legal battles.

482. Equality groups (which usually favoured a zero limit) also called for clarity.

483. The Cabinet Secretary highlighted licensing authorities must go through a number of stages before they set a limit and they must consider a range of factors. He gave a commitment to provide guidance which will assist local authorities in their interpretation of this provision.

484. In relation to grandfather rights, the Cabinet Secretary confirmed licensing authorities would need to go through the proper process to set the level at nil, otherwise “they will find themselves the subject of a legal challenge for applying a measure for no rational reason or for not considering the issue proportionately”.

485. Several local authorities noted that a resolution was necessary before sexual entertainment could be licensed. They feared that this would create cost and administration, as well as attracting adverse publicity. This seemed unnecessary if the chance of a venue offering sexual entertainment opening was not high. North Ayrshire Council and North Ayrshire Licensing Board suggested that it would make more sense for the law to require sexual entertainment to be outlawed unless the council had passed a resolution to licence it.

486. Professor Hubbard believed lessons could be learned from the implementation of similar legislation in England and Wales. He explained to us how one local authority adopted a licensing regime while a neighbouring authority did not. There was also disparity in the fees charged by licensing authorities, these ranged from £300 to £26,000. What was permitted under the regime also varied with some authorities banning nudity and others not. His concern for Scotland was—

“This situation had given rise to a range of appeal cases and litigation in which legal unreasonableness and inconsistency have been raised as valid concerns. Some of those appeals have been upheld”.

299 Association of Licensed Adult Entertainment Venues Scotland. Written submission 105.
300 Federation of Small Businesses Scotland. Written submission 124.
487. Police Scotland also felt licensing should be a mandatory requirement on local authorities. ACC Telfer said a discretionary approach “would encourage regime shopping whereby there might be a disproportionate presence of sexual entertainment venues in an area where they are not a licensed activity”.

Laura Tomson from Zero Tolerance considered a discretionary approach would allow local authorities to ignore important issues such as child protection, saying “it should not be up to local authorities to decide whether those issues are relevant to them”.

488. The Cabinet Secretary however advised—

   We were trying to strike a balance. In our approach to licensing sexual entertainment venues, we recognise that such facilities operate in only a handful of local authority areas—about four or five. We want to take an approach that will allow them to develop policy in a way that best reflects their local circumstances. That is why we have made the provision discretionary rather than mandatory."

Responsibility for licensing of SEVs

489. We also received calls to address the interplay between alcohol licensing and sexual entertainment venue licensing. Several local authorities highlighted it was not clear how venues currently licensed to provide sexual entertainment under an alcohol licence should be treated. Police Scotland was concerned a situation might arise where a liquor licence is revoked and an SEV licence remains in effect. The need to co-ordinate, for example, the conditions attached to both licences, was also highlighted. ACC Telfer also emphasised the need for conditions to drive up standards in the industry and some should be mandatory to promote a consistent approach across Scotland. Laura Tomson of Zero Tolerance believed having a multitude of planning or licensing authorities made it confusing for people and suggested everything concerned with SEVs should be dealt with under the new proposed regime to make it easier for communities to complain or object to planning or advertising issues.

490. The Law Society of Scotland, the Institute of Licensing, the ALAEVS Scotland and Edinburgh Licensing Board believed Licensing Boards would be more appropriate bodies to license SEVs. It was argued that they had experience already in this area and could deal with potential conflicts between the two forms of licence. Janet Hood from the Association of Licensed Adult Entertainment Venues Scotland told us “the licensing board is undoubtedly the appropriate place to deal with such venues” because “dual licensing will confuse the issue and make it harder for the public to know where to bring their complaints”.

491. A number of witnesses who attended our roundtable session were also concerned under the current system there was insufficient control over the advertising of SEVs. Laura Tomson explained “if you walk down Lothian Road—what is called the pubic triangle by locals—in Edinburgh, you will see that it is very clear that very sexualised, very obvious signage is being used”, she went on to say “the signage is within one or two streets of at least three schools”. Professor Hubbard told us there was significant evidence that people were anxious about venues being located close to homes, places of worship, schools and other community facilities. Janet Hood advised the 2005 Act took account of the location, character and condition of the proposed venue and therefore local government, either the licensing board or the planning committee could comment on its unsuitability.

492. In relation to advertising, Professor Hubbard considered moving control of advertising under the new regime “would have flexibility through annual renewal to look at what had been happening and to impose new conditions on signage and advertising in, on, or in the vicinity of particular premises”.

493. When asked about bringing together all the aspects of sexual entertainment licensing and advertising under the remit of one body so that the public knew where to go if they have a complaint about a venue, the Cabinet Secretary replied—

“I am inclined to retain the current approach, although that is not to say that there is no scope for improving how the system operates. When an individual wants to complain to a local authority—whether about alcohol or some form of entertainment—they should be put through to the relevant officer, who will pursue that for them. That applies to any matter in a local authority. I do not think that having one committee or board to deal with all the issues would necessarily improve that process.”

494. The Cabinet Secretary further argued—

“We would have to go right back and redo licensing for alcohol and for civic purposes if the idea was that we should move to a single unified piece of legislation for both aspects. That would be a significant piece of work and a significant undertaking, and it would be well outwith the scope of the bill that we are considering.”

Young People
495. According to the Explanatory Notes, unlike sex shops, it will be permissible for a person under 18 to enter a sexual entertainment venue or be employed by such a venue but only at times when sexual entertainment is not taking place.

496. Zero Tolerance and Spittal Street Women’s Clinic called into question this approach; they argued that this could lead to the further sexualisation of children and may risk their exposure to pornographic images. Laura Tomson said “There is an issue with the images in such premises and, I would argue, with the attitudes and daily work of most of the people who work in them. It is not appropriate for under-18s to be in such premises.” Janet Hood of the ALAEVS confirmed her clients do not have anyone under the age of 18 working in the premises.\(^{318}\)

497. In response to this issue, the Cabinet Secretary advised the suggestion amounted to “banning under-18s from being cleaners in venues that are used for sexual entertainment” and “given the nature and intended purpose of such a provision, we would have to consult more widely on what the implications would be” as such he did not think it was something that could be addressed within the scope of the Bill.\(^{319}\)

Delegated Powers

498. The DPLR Committee highlighted two specific areas. Firstly in relation to powers conferred at 45A(7)(b) which enables Ministers to prescribe other types of premises, that are not SEVs (apart from sex shops which are separately regulated), and also, new section 45A(11) of the 1982 Act which allows the Ministers to prescribe descriptions of performances or “displays of nudity” that are not to be treated as “sexual entertainment” for the purposes of the licensing regime.

499. The Committee asked the Scottish Government why it was not possible to avoid the need for this power by using more appropriate or clearer definitions in the new section 45A of the 1982 Act, to remove the possibility that certain types of performance or display could inadvertently be caught within the licensing regime.

500. The Scottish Government explained the number of premises that are expected to be subject to the new licensing regime is very limited – around 20 across Scotland. It was not expected that the power to exempt particular types of premises would either be extensively used or required beyond “very limited circumstances”. It was considered the exact circumstances where an exemption might arise in future would be hard to define, in advance of the scheme becoming fully operational. It also advised of its concern if theatrical and other forms of artistic performance were caught by the provisions.

501. We note the Scottish Government’s response to the DPLR Committee, but consider the definition should be refined to explicitly exclude plays from the definition (see our recommendation at paragraph 503).

502. Secondly, in relation to section 45B which provides that local authorities (in carrying out functions conferred by the section), must have regard to any guidance issued by the Ministers. The DPLR Committee considered, in relation to the new section 45B(7), that the Bill should provide that any guidance issued by the Scottish Ministers to local authorities must be published, and a copy laid before the Parliament on issue.

503. We support the view of the Delegated Powers and Law Reform Committee in relation to second provision.

Recommendations

Definitions
504. We welcome the Scottish Government’s commitment to provide guidance to assist licensing authorities in interpreting the definition and to utilise subordinate legislation to make specific provision to exclude an activity should it become necessary. Given the sustained concerns on this matter we recommend the Scottish Government amends the definition to exclude plays as defined in the Theatres Act 1968 from the licensing regime.

Exemption for venues holding no more than four performances a year
505. It is clear from the evidence we have received from all quarters a provision to exempt four occasions from the SEV licensing regime creates a loophole whereby those who wish to circumvent the licensing regime could move from venue to venue avoiding regulation. We believe all SEVs should be regulated to safeguard the performers and therefore we recommend the exemption provision should be removed from the Bill.

Power to set an “appropriate” number of sexual entertainment venues for an area
506. We acknowledge licensing authorities when implementing the provision will have to give consideration to all the factors in their area as the power is not unfettered. This will require careful determination otherwise there is potential for legal challenge from existing businesses. We therefore welcome the Scottish Government’s commitment to provide guidance which will assist licensing authorities with their interpretation of this provision.

Appropriateness of a discretionary regime
507. The Committee acknowledges the Scottish Government’s reasoning for adopting a discretionary approach to licensing of SEVs, however the overwhelming opinion of those who submitted evidence, including importantly enforcement authorities, was the licensing regime should be mandatory. We recommend the SEV regime should be mandatory not least to avoid the potential for “regime shopping”.

Responsibility for licensing sexual entertainment venues
It was clear from the evidence we took from those who are pro-sexual entertainment, and those who are anti-sexual entertainment, it would be more appropriate to bring all the elements of licensing SEVs (including advertising and alcohol) under the control of a single body. This would allow dual licensing issues to be dealt with more easily and simplify the complaints route for the public. We recommend The Scottish Government should identify the most appropriate body to carry out this role in light of the experience of the previous regime and, taking into account the need to have oversight to deal with any dual licensing issues, bring forward amendments at Stage 2.
PART 3: CIVIC LICENSING: CIVIC LICENSING GENERAL

Background

508. The Bill contains additional proposals which would impact on the way the 1982 Act operates. The Scottish Government argues these proposals will provide greater consistency and clarity across the licensing regime. They could also be argued to improve the regulatory environment for businesses.

Bill proposals

509. The proposals include:

- deemed grant of licences and variation requests where the licensing authority has failed to process the application within nine months. The licensing authority can apply to the sheriff for an extension to this time period. The proposals apply to general licences under the 1982 Act as well as licences issued under the specific regime for sexual entertainment venues and sex shops (section 69)
- regulation-making powers for Scottish Ministers to set standard requirements, if considered necessary, for licensing hearings under the 1982 Act (section 70)
- the ability for Scottish Ministers to set mandatory conditions applying to sexual entertainment venue or sex shop licences. Such conditions can apply to all such licences or specific types of licence (section 71)
- the ability for licensing authorities to set standard conditions applying to sexual entertainment venue or sex shop licences. As above, such conditions can apply to all such licences or specific types of licence (section 71)
- the creation of a mandatory job of civic licensing standards officer, modelled on licensing standards officers under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 (section 72). This is discussed in more detail below
- clarification of the law to ensure that applications can be made and dealt with using electronic means (section 73)

Committee Submissions

510. Responses concerning these sections of the Bill were primarily from local authorities as the body tasked with operating licensing activities under the 1982 Act.

511. The main areas of discussion focussed on:

- the proposals in the Bill to create a new role of civil licensing standards officer; and
- the effectiveness of the 1982 Act.

Requirement to appointment a civil licensing standards office

512. One of the main proposals which gave rise to discussion was the proposal to require local authorities to appoint a civil licensing standards office (“CLSO”).

320 Policy Memorandum, paragraph 265.
513. Section 72 of the Bill proposes to create a new local authority role of civil CLSO. The Bill would require each local authority to appoint at least one CLSO (although local authorities can also share a CLSO). The job would include the following functions:

- to provide information and advice on the operation of licensing regimes created by the 1982 Act
- to supervise compliance with the requirements of the 1982 Act by licence holders
- to provide mediation in disputes between licence holders and other parties (eg. neighbours or customers)

514. The CLSO would be a new role, created by the Bill. It is modelled on the job of the “licensing standards officer”, who performs a similar function in relation to alcohol licensing under the 2005 Act.

515. The licensing standards officer is generally considered to be one of the success stories of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005. Research commissioned by NHS Scotland (2013)\(^{321}\) into the implementation of the 2005 Act found that the role was viewed positively by all stakeholders. The key strengths of the role were considered to be in building up good working relationships with stakeholders – including the licensed trade and licensing boards – and in taking a proactive approach to resolving issues. However, licensing standards officers themselves reported a desire for greater support. They also noted that their perceived association with the licensing board could make relationships with the trade difficult.

516. Advantages of the new post proposed under the Bill were seen to be the creation of a single point of contact for communities, Peter Smith of Glasgow City Council said “at the moment, officers in councils are spread across different teams, such as trading standards and environmental health, and they deal with aspects of activities that are regulated under the Act”, however he was not confident all authorities would create a role and may instead split responsibility across other licensing roles.\(^{322}\)

517. On disadvantages, CoSLA suggested in its response to us that the creation of CLSO posts should be discretionary for local authorities. This was due to concerns around costs, especially for local authorities where enforcement was carried out across a number of different departments.\(^{323}\) In terms of costs, the Financial Memorandum notes\(^{324}\) local authorities which require to recruit CLSOs will face additional costs. However, in some cases, staff will already be in place in similar roles, so there will be no need for new recruitment. The Financial Memorandum\(^{325}\) also highlights local authorities are able to recoup their costs under the 1982 Act by way of licence fees.

\(^{323}\) COSLA. Written submission 133.

\(^{324}\) Financial Memorandum, paragraphs 210-211.

\(^{325}\) Financial Memorandum, paragraph 213.
518. Another perceived disadvantage was there would be an expectation that CLSOs could deal with ongoing issues between licence holders and communities – eg. public nuisance matters. Whereas, Peter Smith explained actually they would only be able to take enforcement action if there was a breach of licence conditions.

326 However, Andrew Mitchell of City of Edinburgh Council welcomed the introduction of mediation as a means for CLSOs to resolve issues.

Effectiveness of the 1982 Act
519. Most of those who responded about specific civic licensing regimes also raised overarching concerns about the 1982 Act, this central theme is dealt within the introduction to this report.

520. In recognising a review of the 1982 Act is a time intensive process and not an option for the Bill currently being considered, licensing authorities drew our attention to a few specific issues, which impeded licensing officers from carrying out their roles. The following matters were singled out as needing to be addressed in the short-term:

- the setting of licensing objectives for the 1982 Act;
- the introduction of neighbourhood notification; and
- the power to review and revoke a licence, based on an assessment of its contribution to the licensing objectives as mentioned above.

521. Concerns were raised that, without aims clearly articulated in legislation, it was not possible for officers to review licence holders’ performance or impact. They could only take action when a condition was breached, even though it might be obvious the licensed activity was causing a problem in the community.

522. Peter Smith provided an example to assist us in understanding the impact—

“For example, with scrap metal dealers, we might be given the power to condition a licence for non-cash payments, but that is not backed by a requirement for the licence holder to meet objectives such as preventing crime and disorder and securing public safety.”

328

523. He explained the disadvantage was if a business was creating a public nuisance licensing authorities could only deal with a breach of a specific condition as there was no overriding objective to which businesses had to adhere.

524. In relation to creating licensing objectives for the 1982 Act, the Cabinet Secretary questioned what the existence of objectives would lead licensing authorities to do differently.

525. For Andrew Mitchell, one of the flaws of the current licensing system under the 1982 Act was the lack of any requirement to notify neighbours of a licence application. He explained the 2005 Act, and planning legislation, had “quite a sophisticated system for neighbour notification” adding one of the most common complaints from the public was they have very little chance to engage in the licensing process before the premises opened.331 A statutory requirement for neighbourhood notification was also welcomed by Peter Smith as it would improve engagement which would in turn help the application process.332 When asked why legislation was required to enable notification, Peter Smith advised “we run the risk of seeking objections and overstepping boundaries” He explained—

“There is legislation that instructs licensing authorities on what they should do. If an authority goes beyond what it should do, an assessment has to be made about whether that authority is seeking objections.”333

526. On the suggestion of a neighbour notification process, Scottish Government officials recognised the current system was “quite archaic and the requirement is currently met by publishing a notice in the local library or something like that. It is not terribly fit for purpose in the modern world.” A commitment was given to look at any proposal put forward. The Minister however added, “there is nothing to prevent local authorities from being more proactive in the way in which they engage with local communities that are affected.”334

527. Another aspect of the licensing system which we were told needed to be addressed in the short term was the need for a power to review and revoke licences, Andrew Mitchell said—

“We can revoke a licence under liquor legislation, we can revoke a house in multiple occupation licence and we can even revoke a sex shop licence, but there is no power to revoke a licence under the 1982 Act. A council can suspend a licence for the unexpired portion but, even if someone can say that there is a problem or that there has been serious misconduct by the applicant, there is no power under the act to revoke a licence, which is fairly fundamental. That shows how far that act has drifted behind other pieces of legislation.”335

528. Peter Smith considered communities should have the right, where a business is causing a definable public nuisance, to bring the issue to the licensing authority, in much the same way as with licensed premises under the 2005 Act.336 He went on to say a review process would have the ability to deal with frivolous or vexatious complaints.337

529. In response to this proposal, the Cabinet Secretary reminded us that “although a local authority cannot revoke someone’s licence, it can suspend it, which can have the same effect”. He did however consider further measures could be taken in relation to revoking licences, and advised he would consider suggestions for improvement of the system.

Recommendations

Effectiveness of the 1982 Act

530. We recommend the Scottish Government amends the Bill to create licensing objectives for the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 in order to assist licensing authorities to deal with, for example, public nuisance. Allied to this recommendation, we recommend the bill should be further amended to provide for a system to review and revoke licences having regard to these licensing objectives.

531. From our earlier work on community empowerment, we are only too well aware local authorities can be risk averse, however they are also fearful without legislation notifying communities might lead to legal challenge; we therefore recommend a framework to enable neighbour notification with regard to licence applications, in a similar manner as the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005, is added to the Bill to increase community participation in the licensing process.

John Wilson (Deputy Convener)

Mark McDonald
Alex Rowley
Kevin Stewart (Convener)

Apologies were received from Stuart McMillan.

Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill: The Committee considered its approach to the forthcoming Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill and agreed the following—

- its general approach to scrutiny of the Bill;
- to write to the Scottish Government Bill Team seeking further information on the Policy Memorandum on the Bill, seeking a written response by end of the public call for written evidence period, to make this exchange public and to consider the response as part of a scene setting round-table session at the start of oral evidence;
- a public engagement protocol for handling representations made to members about the Bill;
- a timetable for scrutiny of the Bill;
- an online call for written evidence, to run for 14 weeks, with agreed questions;
- to issue a targeted call for written and oral evidence from specific key stakeholders;
- to consider what witnesses its wishes to take oral evidence from after the conclusion of the public call for written evidence;
- to request SPICe provide suitable analysis, briefing and advice on the various policy sections of the Bill;
- to utilise any external meetings, or fact-findings visits, undertaken by the Committee for the purposes of engaging with community groups and others on the Bill;
to delegate to the Convener and the clerks responsibility for formulating a media strategy on the Committee scrutiny of the Bill;

to delegate to the Convener and the clerks responsibility for agreeing any claims made under the SPCB’s witnesses expenses policy; to hold discussions on oral evidence, in private, at future meetings, and to consider any further approach to scrutiny of the Bill, along with all drafts of the Stage 1 report to the Parliament, in private, at future meetings.

Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener (Kevin Stewart): Good morning and welcome to the 29th meeting in 2014 of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee. I ask everyone present to switch off mobile phones and other electronic equipment because they affect the broadcasting system. Some committee members will use tablets during the meeting because we provide the meeting papers in digital form.

Our first item of business is our first oral evidence session in our stage 1 scrutiny of the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. We are starting the process by holding a round-table session with key stakeholders to set the scene for that work.

We appreciate that some of the groups that are represented today may have an interest in only certain aspects of the bill, but the witnesses should feel free, please, to talk about the other parts of the bill as they come up during the discussion, because the discussion is intended to consider how licensing impacts on communities in general.

I invite the witnesses and members to introduce themselves; we will then discuss the bill.

I am the convener of the committee.

John Wilson (Central Scotland) (Ind): I am the deputy convener of the committee.

Cameron Buchanan (Lothian) (Con): I am an MSP for Lothian.

Dr Graham Wightman (Abertay University): I am from Abertay University.

Alex Rowley (Cowdenbeath) (Lab): I am the MSP for the Cowdenbeath constituency.

Jack Cummins (Law Society of Scotland): I am representing the Law Society of Scotland’s licensing law committee.

Anne McTaggart (Glasgow) (Lab): I am an MSP for Glasgow.

Fiona Stewart (Society of Local Authority Lawyers and Administrators in Scotland): I am representing the Society of Local Authority Lawyers and Administrators in Scotland licensing working group.

Stuart McMillan (West Scotland) (SNP): I am a Scottish National Party MSP for West Scotland.

Calum Steele (Scottish Police Federation): I am the general secretary of the Scottish Police Federation.

Mark McDonald (Aberdeen Donside) (SNP): I am the MSP for the Aberdeen Donside constituency.

Sandra White (Glasgow Kelvin) (SNP): I am the MSP for Glasgow Kelvin.

Dr Niamh Shortt (University of Edinburgh): I am a senior lecturer in human geography at the University of Edinburgh.

The Convener: Thank you all very much.

I would like to start with Dr Wightman. I understand that your main interest is in air weapons, Dr Wightman. Can you give us an overview of how you think the bill is, as it stands?

Dr Wightman: I probably cannot make much of a contribution on the legal aspects of the bill, although I comment in my submission that the bill ought, in order to make them clear, state the current limits—12 foot pounds and 6 foot pounds—for air weapons, and state which weapons a certificate would cover and which would still need to be licensed.

My interest comes from work that we did with honours students on the damage that air weapons can cause. We fired air weapon pellets into ballistic gel, which is used as a simulant for flesh, and examined how far they penetrated. We embedded organs from animals from an abattoir in ballistic gel and saw that the pellets would penetrate them.

Obviously, things are much more complicated in real life; there is clothing, skin and bone. We have looked at the effects of clothing on the impact of pellets in ballistic gel, the impact of air rifle pellets on bone, and how the pellets can fragment. My interest is in the damage that can be caused.

As a consequence, I have taken an interest in the statistics for injuries from air weapons in the United Kingdom and other countries. Although the numbers are falling, there is still a significant number of injuries. One was reported in the news yesterday: an 11-year-old who had been at a football match in County Durham had an air rifle pellet embedded in his temple.

I am interested in the consequences that air weapons can have.
The Law Society's concern is that the bill does not address a number of non-policy-related matters in licensing law that are ripe for change. They are matters that affect the workability of the legislation and the ability of businesses to operate efficiently.

The key area is the transfer of licences. Ever since the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 came into force, there have been lots of unnecessary practical problems with the transfer of licences. There was a much simpler system under the previous legislation. The raw detail is set out in the society's full written submission, so I will not trouble you with that at the moment. Suffice it to say that the 2005 act makes the transfer of licensed businesses much more complicated than it needs to be. That is a purely technical matter that could be addressed without any policy implications.

There is also a problem—again, it sounds like a dry and dusty technical problem, but it is a serious one—with a lack of clarity in the 2005 act about licences ceasing to have effect in certain circumstances. Neither private practitioners nor their clerks know exactly what the act means in that situation.

There are problems with the surrender of licences by spiteful tenants who own them, and there is a continuing problem with the ability to make what we would call a site-only application for a licence, as was possible under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976.

That is all in the Law Society's written submission. It sounds arid and not terribly interesting but, nevertheless, the Scottish Government has long been aware of those matters and knows that the fix is pretty simple. It would certainly help lawyers, those whom they advise and—dare I say it?—those who advise licensing boards, if they could be addressed.

The committee will have noted that the Scottish Government has taken the trouble to make us sleep safer at night knowing that Angostura bitters will no longer be treated as alcohol. It strikes me that, if we can get down to that kind of technical level, we can get down to the technical level that the Law Society would like.

The Convener: Pink gins and long vodkas, eh?

Dr Shortt, your expertise, too, is in alcohol licensing, I believe. Do you have any comments on the bill?

Dr Shortt: Yes, I do. My interest in the bill concerns overprovision. In particular, my interest is in objective 4 of the licensing objectives in the 2005 act, which states that “protecting and improving public health” is a licensing objective. In the documentation that was sent through, it was stated that it is difficult for licensing boards to use their powers on overprovision in any meaningful way. I am not sure that the bill helps that.

I will put the matter in perspective. I am interested in overprovision because Scotland has one of the highest alcohol-related harm rates in western Europe. It has the highest alcohol-related death rate in the UK, and recent research that we carried out shows that alcohol-related death rates in areas that have the most outlets are more than double those in areas that have the fewest outlets. I want the bill to contain more on overprovision, types of premises and capacity within them.

The Convener: Have you done any research on whether provision is greater in areas of deprivation than it is in other areas?

Dr Shortt: Yes. I have a paper that is currently under review that considers density by deprivation. However, the study that we carried out on death rates controlled for deprivation. Those of you who are aware of statistical models will understand what I mean when I say that we hold deprivation constant. Our research found that across all areas—not just the most deprived—death rates are higher in areas with the highest number of outlets regardless of the level of poverty.

The Convener: Does Fiona Stewart have any comments to make from the SOLAR perspective?

Fiona Stewart: We share many of the Law Society’s concerns about transfers, variations and the lack of clarity in the 2005 act. The Government guidance that goes alongside the act is well out of date. We have had two further acts since that guidance was written—the Alcohol etc (Scotland) Act 2010 and the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010—so the guidance needs to be brought up to date. We definitely share the Law Society’s concerns about transfers, although we may differ slightly in some of our views on the solutions.

We welcome the fact that the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 will be updated electronically, but we suggest that it is time to overhaul that act. completely. It consolidated several codices, but life has moved on considerably since 1982 and the act’s provisions may no longer meet the requirements of today’s society.

The Convener: I turn to Sandra White, whose interest is in sexual entertainment venue licences.

Sandra White: It is, convener. Before I touch on some of the issues that have been raised, I thank the committee for allowing me to be here. I must admit that it is much more daunting being a witness on this side of the table than it is asking the questions as a member. I have the greatest respect for all the witnesses who turn up at committee.

I agree that a look at the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 is long overdue—it is a reason why I started my work on a sexual entertainment venue licensing member’s bill. Under that act, councils would refuse an application for licence; invariably, that decision would be appealed. The matter would then go to the Court of Session here in Edinburgh, where the appeal would be lost. The process resulted in councils having to spend a lot of taxpayers’ money, while having a number of constituents who were very unhappy not only about the sexual entertainment venue licences, but about overprovision of such licences.

I will touch on the transfer of licences—what I call grandfather rights—that Mr Cummins and Ms Stewart mentioned, and what happens when someone who has had premises licensed is refused a new licence. Proposed new section 45B(6)(e)(iii) of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 says:

“(6A) A local authority may refuse an application for the grant or renewal of a licence despite the fact that a premises licence under Part 3 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 is in effect in relation to the premises, vehicle, vessel or stall to which the application relates.”

That covers part of the grandfather rights issue.

Transfer of licences was also raised—not by the panellists, but by others—in regard to European legislation; EU legislation is also being satisfied in the bill. In addition, a precedent has been set in England and Wales, where local authorities have the choice whether to have zero tolerance to entertainment venue licences, but about overprovision of such licences.

I am happy to take questions on sexual entertainment venue licences.

The Convener: I am sure that we will get a number of those. First, Calum Steele will give us the Scottish Police Federation’s view on the bill.

Calum Steele: We have concentrated our comments largely on the air weapons licensing element of the bill. It is only right and proper that I advise the committee that I have been a participant in field sports for more than 25 years and I hold shooting insurance with the British Association for Shooting and Conservation.

Our comments are heavily informed by our members’ work experience, as well as by any personal experience that we may be able to bring to the table. We have some concerns that are not principally about the bill’s provisions, but are more about the capacity of the police to deliver on the expectations that would be placed on us. That said, there are some apparent inconsistencies between the current licensing regime, particularly for firearms and shotguns and the conditions that may be particularly applied to firearms but not shotgun certificates, and the question of applying specific conditions to an air weapons certificate.

More likely than not there will be a significant number of licensing offences created as a consequence of the legislation. It is unclear whether there is any evidence to support the view that the legislation in its own right will reduce the criminal use of air weapons, which everyone recognises is a problem. That is, in a nutshell, the middle and both ends of it.

The Convener: Thank you very much. I should probably declare that, many moons ago and very much in the yesteryear, I managed to achieve various marksman badges in the air training corps.

Anne, do you want to come back in?

Anne McTaggart: No, I am okay for now.

The Convener: If any of the witnesses wants to contribute at any point, just indicate that. The meeting is informal in that respect.

09:45

Sandra White: When I started looking at the licensing of sexual entertainment venues I was overwhelmed by the submissions not just from organisations but from individuals, and not just from Scotland but from London and other areas of Britain. I am concerned that women are being accosted on their way home from work by men who frequent such clubs—there is proof of that. I was also surprised to find that a body of professional women feel that they are unable to get promotion because part of their job is to entertain clients, which means taking them out to clubs such as lap-dancing clubs—I will not give the name of the particular club in London, as I am sure that you will know which one it is—and they have refused to do that. It is not just that women are being accosted; some women are being denied promotion for not engaging with that aspect of society.

Cameron Buchanan: What do you think about the use of the word “appropriate” in relation to the number of sexual entertainment clubs? They are going to exist, but how do you define “appropriate” in terms of areas or numbers?

Sandra White: We are allowing for zero tolerance rather than saying that we do not want any such clubs because we want to give the choice to local authorities. The bill will not make licensing of such clubs mandatory; it will be up to each local authority to fit into the legislation. On what is appropriate, if Glasgow City Council, for instance, thought that it would be appropriate to license no clubs, the bill will allow it to determine that. Personally, I would like none of these clubs to exist because they are demeaning to women. Women have contacted me after having been accosted on their way home from work going up the stairs in their close, which is next door to such a club. I see zero clubs as being the appropriate number.

Cameron Buchanan: I do not disagree with that, but I think that it is unrealistic to say that the number is going to be zero. Realistically, the choice must be left to local authorities, must it not?

Sandra White: That is why I decided not to make licensing mandatory. Under the bill, a local authority could choose to have two clubs if it wished, and it would be up to that local authority to explain to its electorate why it had chosen that number.

The Convener: I could play devil’s advocate and say that such clubs would be driven underground and would be unlicensed if there was a complete ban. What is SOLAR’s view on the issue?

Fiona Stewart: It is quite a difficult issue for SOLAR because we are the officers in local authorities and do not have any political clout. Our councillors would, ultimately, make the decision and, as officers, we would regulate any licensing scheme that came to us. The difficulty that we see in regulation is that the definitions in the provisions that are proposed for inclusion in the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 are different from the provisions on adult entertainment in the Licensing Conditions (Late Opening Premises) (Scotland) Regulations 2007. As officers, we would have to regulate and administer both systems, but who would be the regulator—the licensing board or the local authority? The different definitions would make it difficult for officers.

The Convener: Could you give us a flavour of those different definitions, please? That would be useful.

Fiona Stewart: The Licensing Conditions (Late Opening Premises) (Scotland) Regulations 2007 talk about “adult entertainment”—I cannot put my finger on the place where that phrase appears in the regulations—whereas “sexual entertainment” is more strictly and widely defined. The ruling in the recent case of Brightcrew Ltd v City of Glasgow Licensing Board stipulated that a licensing board cannot regulate anything that does not relate to the sale of alcohol. Therefore, it might be better to remove “adult entertainment” from the 2007 regulations and leave it in the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982, or vice versa.

From an officers’ perspective, something would have to be done about enforcement.

John Wilson: Good morning. I have a question for Ms Stewart, but Sandra White might also want to comment on it.

Sandra White has proposed that this type of entertainment be banned altogether by local government, or that we give each local authority the power to ban it from taking place in its area. Do you perceive a problem in that regard? If, for example, Glasgow took the decision to introduce a blanket ban while Edinburgh and Aberdeen decided to allow such clubs to exist, would that lead to legal action being taken against Glasgow for interpreting the legislation differently from other authorities in Scotland?

Fiona Stewart: I am not sure that I know the answer to that question.

Sandra White: John Wilson has raised an interesting point. Having looked through all the submissions with regard to that particular part of the legislation, I note that all the local authorities—Edinburgh and Glasgow in particular—are very keen to have it in place. I do not think that any legal concerns about the legislation would be raised.

In response to Ms Stewart’s comments about officers, I note that, in its submission, the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities welcomes the creation of a separate licensing regime for sexual entertainment venues and states that the legislation “gives local authorities proper powers”.

COSLA, which is obviously the umbrella body for all local authorities, very much welcomes that particular part of the legislation as a way forward that will make it easier for councils to differentiate between sexual entertainment, adult entertainment and alcohol licensing. Looking at its submission, I do not think that there would be a problem, but I am not an officer, so—

John Wilson: I am just trying to get some clarification on whether the Scottish Government should be leaving it to local authorities to license sexual entertainment. My fear is that we could end up with the same companies operating in Glasgow, Edinburgh and Aberdeen and then challenging a local authority and taking it to court on the basis that if such activity is permissible in Aberdeen and Edinburgh, it should be permissible in Glasgow. I just want to avoid lengthy legal wrangles in the courts, and the courts, rather than this Parliament, deciding on the appropriate use of the legislation.

Sandra White: Given that, as currently proposed, the legislation goes as far as zero tolerance, I would assume that if it became law, that would be the letter of the law. This is only my view, but I cannot see all those entertainment venues moving to one particular place.

As I have said, I have read the submission from the local authorities. They want some form of tightening up and, as COSLA has stated, they look forward to the legislation being implemented as they believe that it is the way forward. If the legislation is there and it goes as far as zero tolerance, each local authority will have the choice whether or not to implement it. I do not think that it would be possible to challenge a decision in court as it would be provided for in the legislation.

Cameron Buchanan: What about underage girls or boys? Is there any way that we can legislate with regard to under-18s or over-18s? Surely that is part of the problem, too.

Sandra White: I do not know whether Calum Steele wants to come in on that point. The police make regular visits to these sorts of clubs, and most of them have proof-of-age rules and that type of thing. I am talking only about entertainment licensing, but the same problems will exist in any pub or club. These places usually operate a system of tolerance that applies to the over-25 age group.

Given the concerns that were raised with me, I visited a number of these clubs in a purely professional role to see the situation for myself, and I certainly saw no underage girls or boys in there, either as customers or otherwise. The police and the licensing regulations would certainly look at the issue of underage people, and we would expect them to check anything in that regard. In any case, it is already against the law for underage people to go into licensed premises and consume a drink.

Cameron Buchanan: Can I raise another brief point, convener?

The Convener: Quickly, please.

Cameron Buchanan: In Austria, this kind of entertainment is licensed in some areas and not in others, and people can choose to go to those areas. The same could happen in Scotland. If Glasgow did not want such clubs but East Renfrewshire did, would people just go there?

Sandra White: I do not think that that would happen. People talk about the red light district in Amsterdam, for example, but it is closing down. It is not part of the economy, and it is no longer seen as a good thing for Amsterdam. That system has fallen apart, and I certainly do not think that the same set-up would happen in Scotland.

The Convener: I wonder whether Calum Steele could tell us about his members’ perspective on the policing of sexual entertainment licences. Does it cause a huge amount of difficulty?

Calum Steele: Thank you, convener. I am glad that you phrased the question in the way that you did, because I cannot speak for Police Scotland and would not presume to do so.

Sandra White’s point about the age of those who frequent such premises is certainly in keeping with the experience of our members, or at least those who have made any comments on the issue. It is probably of large significance that the matter does not feature regularly in Scottish Police Federation discussions, as it suggests that the issue of age is not a problem for us.

The Convener: Would a complete ban cause difficulties for your members as it might mean their having to deal with an industry that has gone underground?

Calum Steele: Many things—prostitution, for example—are illegal, and we deal with them day and daily. The question is whether this is the right thing to do, and ultimately the legislators will take a particular view.

Police officers are very adept at finding out where illegal activity takes place, but that does not necessarily mean that it is equally easy to enforce the law in such circumstances. It would be almost unusual for local police officers not to know, for example, where prostitution—I appreciate that I am drifting off on to prostitution again—was taking place in domestic dwellings, or underground, to use the terminology that would apply.

Similarly, given our exposure to such knowledge, we could identify premises where illegal adult entertainment was taking place. It would not take long for that information to come to our attention. Of course, having the knowledge and intelligence does not necessarily translate into having the information to bring a case to court, but the intelligence systems that are available to the police service mean that, if the industry was to prevail in an illegal manner, we would almost certainly have the capability to identify where such activity was happening and ultimately to work on developing the resource to enforce the legislation.

Jack Cummins: With regard to Sandra White’s comments about grandfather rights in relation to sexual entertainment venues, the Law Society notes a paradox in that respect. Some premises are licensed to sell alcohol under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005, and are authorised in their operating plan to provide adult entertainment—which, as Ms Stewart has pointed out, is rather different from sexual entertainment.

The Convener: What is the difference in the definition?

Fiona Stewart: You will not be able to find a definition in the 2005 act.

Jack Cummins: Indeed. Strangely enough, there is no definition of “adult entertainment” in the 2005 act, but the term is defined in the Licensing Conditions (Late Opening Premises) (Scotland) Regulations 2007. The definition of “sexual entertainment” proposed in the bill is very detailed, and I do not think that there is any room for doubt about what it means.

I think that adult entertainment is at, shall we say, a lesser level than sexual entertainment, if I can put it that generally. However, a situation—

The Convener: I am sorry to interrupt, Mr Cummins. Perhaps I am being a little naive, but I do not know what “a lesser level” means.

Jack Cummins: I am sure that you have looked at the definition of “sexual entertainment”. There is, if you like, more sexuality involved in sexual entertainment than in adult entertainment. In relation to the definition of “adult entertainment”, it is slightly frustrating that we cannot lay our hands on one of the 30 sets of regulations that have been published under the 2005 act. I am trying to think what it might amount to from a licensing board perspective.

Fiona Stewart: It would cover, say, Ann Summers parties, or a stag or hen night where a stripper is invited along, which could take place in any pub or hotel rather than in the sort of establishment in Glasgow, Edinburgh or Aberdeen that we have been discussing. It would be at that sort of level.

Jack Cummins: That is right; it might be, for example, a “Full Monty”-type event. The Law Society’s concern is that premises that have been granted a licence by the licensing board to sell alcohol and which are permitted to provide adult entertainment might end up being refused a licence to operate as a sexual entertainment venue by a separate licensing authority.

As it has said in its submission, the Law Society thinks it better for the licensing of sexual entertainment venues to be placed with the licensing board to ensure that the sale of alcohol and the regulation of sexual entertainment are dealt with by one body. After all, the licensing board will have experience and know the history of the premises in question, and will therefore know whether there have been problems with the premises and whether they have been well conducted.

10:00

The Convener: Or you hope the licensing board will have all of those things.

Jack Cummins: I beg your pardon?

The Convener: You hope that the licensing board will have all that knowledge.

Jack Cummins: I have always had every faith in licensing boards.

There is also the possibility that some premises that have not given the police or the licensing board any cause for concern will find themselves either out of business or having to reinvent themselves with some other form of entertainment that is not sexual entertainment.

Mark McDonald: Mr Cummins has suggested that a potential paradox is being set up, but I have to say that I do not see any problem. If we accept that a licence for sexual entertainment is for something that is a level beyond adult entertainment, it must follow that if a local authority takes the view that it is comfortable with the provision of adult entertainment as defined in the regulations but less comfortable with sexual entertainment as defined in the legislation, it is perfectly acceptable for it to refuse a licence for sexual entertainment, irrespective of whether the venue in question has an alcohol licence or the ability to provide adult entertainment. I am not sure that I would accept that that is either a paradox or, essentially, a bad thing.

Jack Cummins: This might be too simplistic an answer, but at the moment licensing boards are licensing premises that provide both adult and sexual entertainment because the lesser level is included in the greater level. The point that I was trying to make is that the licensing board will know about and have experience of these premises, because they will have been before the board on various occasions. The board will have a track record for premises that the licensing authority will not have. To put it crudely, I think that people who have not given the authorities any grief could go out of business as a result of what is being proposed. That is a policy matter and is therefore not for the Law Society, but it is certainly the paradox that I am referring to.

Mark McDonald: That is true, but by the same token, as Sandra White has pointed out, a number of venues have exploited a loophole in the 2005 act to offer entertainment of the type that the local authority does not wish to see being provided. Because the stipulations that will now be introduced have not existed before, venues have been able to circumvent the local authority’s wishes through legal challenges. Some premises might have been operating for some time, but they have been doing so as a consequence of a loophole rather than through any policy intention.

The Convener: I will bring Ms Stewart and then Mr Cummins back in.

Fiona Stewart: I have been handed a note of the definition in the 2007 regulations of “adult entertainment", which “means any form of entertainment which—

(a) involves a person performing an act of an erotic or sexually explicit nature; and

(b) is provided wholly or mainly for the sexual gratification or titillation of the audience.”

Jack Cummins: An important issue is the presence of a so-called regulatory gap that means that licensing boards supposedly do not have power to regulate sexual entertainment. Ms Stewart adverted earlier to the Brightcrew case. The Law Society committee does not have a unanimous view on the import of that case, but one view—which is obviously the view that the Scottish Government has taken—is that licensing boards can regulate only the sale of alcohol and cannot regulate other matters. That is one interpretation of the Brightcrew case, but in my view that is a misreading.

That said, I perfectly understand Mark McDonald’s point, as it is the point on which this part of the bill is proceeding.

The Convener: In my experience, some parts of Scotland have licensing boards that deal with alcohol provision and licensing committees that deal with aspects of the various civic acts. Are you basically saying that the licensing board would deal with alcohol? If so, would the licensing committee deal with the sexual entertainment aspects?

Jack Cummins: That is how matters are going to be structured.

The Convener: I am talking about the current situation. I see Ms Stewart shaking her head.

Fiona Stewart: At the moment, unless a licensing authority has resolved that a public entertainment licence requirement should apply to such venues, there will be no civic government licensing of sexual entertainment premises. In many parts of the country, they will have only a liquor licence at the moment.

The Convener: That makes things a bit clearer. I will call Sandra White next, but I should make it clear that I want to move on to other things instead of just sticking to this subject.

Sandra White: Ms Stewart is right—and that is where the problem lies. Mark McDonald has explained the issue very well. I take it from the complaints and concerns that local authorities have expressed in their submissions that they are powerless with regard to sexual entertainment licences. The bill’s provisions would give them the powers to deal with sexual entertainment, which would not necessarily have to be dealt with in conjunction with alcohol licences.

I take a bit of issue with regard to the point about Ann Summers parties. People would not apply to the local authority for a licence for an Ann Summers party, and I would take that out of the equation as far as this type of entertainment—if that is what people want to call it—is concerned.

I thank members for their comments. We will certainly look into the points that have been raised.

The Convener: I just want to get down to the nitty-gritty of some of these things. People can hold events in their own homes; after all, that is where most Ann Summers parties and that kind of thing take place—not that I have ever had one. However, there are also some quite big corporate events, are there not? I would imagine that they would have to be covered.

Fiona Stewart: It depends on the part of the country. In the rural authority area I come from, many of the licensed premises are community venues, and charity groups hold these kinds of functions in licensed premises rather than in people’s homes. I cited that particular example purely to highlight the difference between what could be classed as adult entertainment and what would be classed as sexual entertainment under the bill.

The Convener: So there is a lack of consistency across the country, which, hopefully, the bill will deal with. Is that right?

Fiona Stewart: I agree, but SOLAR still has concerns. Regulation is welcome, and it is possible to regulate the premises concerned, but who is regulating what? Adult entertainment is regulated by the licensing boards, and sexual entertainment is regulated by the local authority. Where do we draw the line? Enforcement officers would be going into premises under both regimes. What would they be looking for? Would venues be caught out under the liquor legislation or under the civic government legislation? That is where the different definitions give officers problems.

Alex Rowley: Are you saying that there needs to be further clarity?

Fiona Stewart: I would say so. Where does the role of the licensing board stop and the role of the local authority begin?

The Convener: That is useful—thank you.

I wish to move on. A lot of research has highlighted the fact that boards find the concepts... of overprovision and capacity difficult to define and measure. Like many others round the table, I come from a local authority background and I recall that licensing boards often decided not to grant a licence because of overprovision. Such decisions were almost immediately overturned by courts.

Will the provisions in the bill help in that regard? Will they give local authorities a bit more power such that, hopefully, the courts will not move in and overturn decisions that are made locally?

Dr Shortt: One of the most striking things in the documentation that you sent out was the very small number of applications that were refused. In 2011-12, only 21 licences were refused, whereas 347 were granted. In 2012-13, 12 were refused and 332 were granted. That shows the difficulties for local authorities in looking at the licensing objectives. The issue with overprovision is that nobody has defined what overprovision means, which is problematic for licensing boards and for local people.

Another problem in assessing overprovision is that local communities do not have the evidence available to them. For the study that we have just completed, it took us nine months to gather the data on the locations of alcohol outlets throughout Scotland. That information is not available in a central repository. If we look at the tobacco retailers register, we can easily get data on the location of tobacco retailers throughout Scotland. However, we do not have such a data set for alcohol outlets, so we had to contact each individual licensing board to gather that data and it took nine months of data gathering and data cleaning.

It is not made easy for local communities to go along to licensing boards and put across their side on overprovision because they simply do not have the data available. If anything could be done to make that data more readily available, it would help the licensing boards to meet that objective.

I would welcome the bill providing the ability to define an entire board area as an area of overprovision. That is because, in the health statistics that we work with to look at objective 4—the objective in section 1(4)(d) of the 2005 act—of “protecting and improving public health”, the data is not available at very small local area level. Often, we are asked, “If this pub opens in this area, what will happen?” That data is not released because it is confidential data. In addition, there is a statistical error if we work with very small numbers. If we can look at the data at a whole board level, we might be able to break it down a little bit, but I would be very happy if the bill gave us the ability to look at whole area levels with regard to overprovision.

The Convener: Previously, if there were difficulties with the amount of social housing, local authorities could put in pressured area status and stop sales of social housing in that patch. Are you suggesting that there could be provision in the bill to have a blanket ban on any new licences in particular areas or even in entire local authority areas?

Dr Shortt: I am sorry—I am not sure what you meant when you referenced social housing.

The Convener: It was just an example of how authorities have managed to control policy issues by having blanket bans on something happening in particular places. Could there be an argument for an overprovision blanket ban in communities or in entire local authority areas?

Dr Shortt: Yes, because I think that the concept of overprovision is not being used at the moment. Even if licensing boards refuse licences based on overprovision, the decisions are being overturned.

I am very passionate about the idea that, as residents, it should be easy for us to access data on the number of licensed premises in our areas that we can use when we go along to licensing boards.

Mark McDonald: I have a couple of points. First, I am very interested to know when your research is likely to become available. In the research, there will obviously be an aggregation around licensed premises. There are off-licences, pubs, nightclubs and hotels. Is that disaggregation covered as well? I can think of a community in my constituency where there are a number of hotels, a couple of community pubs and some off-licences. To all intents and purposes, if you were to look simply at the number of licensed premises in that area without looking at what those licensed premises were, it might give a misleading impression of overprovision in that community, although there are undoubtedly communities—I am sure that the convener, as somebody who represents a city centre area, will understand this—where there are a significant number of licensed premises in concentrated areas.

The Convener: I will try not to start talking about my constituency. Dr Shortt?

Dr Shortt: The report is available now. I can send it to you after the meeting. We were able to disaggregate the data by on-sales and off-sales premises and we found that the greatest effect was from off-sales premises. We think that that is because there are cheaper products available, the products could be accessible to people who are under age and there is no control over who the final recipient of the off-sales product is. The strong effect from off-sales premises is not unique to Scotland. This is the first time that such work has been done in Scotland, and there is evidence of such an effect elsewhere, particularly in North America and Australia.

What we were not able to do was look at capacity, which you mentioned, so we could not consider whether we were talking about village pubs or large, multifloor premises in the Grassmarket, for example. The data on that are simply not available, which is why I would like there to be a retailers register, much like the tobacco retailers register. If Scotland is to think about overprovision, we need the data so that we can ascertain what constitutes overprovision. That has been a problem for licensing boards, in that the information is often not available.

Mark McDonald: It would be useful to see the data that you collected and to have a look at your report. You made an interesting point, which I am sure that we can pick up at a later stage of our evidence gathering.

Stuart McMillan: Dr Shortt, you mentioned off-sales. Do you have information about the types of facility that sell alcohol? Is there a propensity for more alcohol to be sold by supermarkets as opposed to traditional off-sales premises?

Dr Shortt: Again, we need the data, so that we can find out whether we are talking about large supermarkets or small corner shops. We need to know the capacity of the off-sales retail units as well as the capacity of the on-sales retail units—we need to know how much floor space is given over to alcohol products. That is information that we will seek and build on in further work, but so far we have looked at on-sales and off-sales.

Jack Cummins: I think that the research to which Dr Shortt referred is the research that was presented to Alcohol Focus Scotland’s national licensing conference on 7 October.

Dr Shortt: Yes.

Jack Cummins: That postdates the Law Society’s submissions, so I am perhaps flying by the seat of my pants and expressing a personal view. As I understand it, the study was cross-sectional and further analysis is needed. I am not taking anything away from the report, which is interesting and highlights statistical anomalies. However, on page 10 you say that you cannot positively say that there is a correlation—a causal link, if you like—between the density of licensed premises and alcohol harm. You are no doubt aware that Cardiff University is involved in research that has £416,000-worth of funding from the National Institute for Health Research, which will—over three years, I think—look at the impact of changing alcohol outlet density on health-related harm.

You have done an important piece of work, Dr Shortt, but, with respect, a lot of things are happening in academia to seek answers on the link between health harms and outlet density, so it is important that a broad spectrum of academic research is examined.

The Convener: I assure you that we will be looking at a lot of things, Mr Cummins.

Dr Shortt: At the end of the report we noted our limitations, as is done in any good academic research. We noted that we had found correlation, not causation and that we need to look at the data through time if we are to identify causation. The statistics in the documentation show very little change in the granting of licences in Scotland, so we need to consider the data over a long period. A register would help us to do that.

I point you to an article that Campbell published in 2009 in the American Journal of Preventive Medicine, which was a systematic review of studies of alcohol licensing through time. The authors found nine time-series studies, seven of which found that increases in alcohol outlet density were linked causally, through time, with increases in alcohol consumption and related harms, particularly interpersonal violence. They also noted that their study—like ours—was cross-sectional, but of the 47 outcomes that were looked at by cross-sectional studies, positive associations were found in 41. It is important to say that, although we may find causation through time, in order to find causation we first need to find correlation, and that whenever there is correlation we may find causation.

The Convener: Stuart, do you want to come back in on that point?

Stuart McMillan: Yes, just briefly. As a consequence of the 2005 act, different regulations came in from 2007 onwards regarding the floor space available in facilities that sell alcohol. Do the research that you have undertaken and the information that you have gathered up to now show any change in the total amount of alcohol sold compared with pre-2005?

Dr Shortt: We do not have sales data.

The Convener: Mr Steele, do your members have a view on the overprovision of alcohol licences? I think that your members in my patch have a view, but is there a general view from the Scottish Police Federation?

Calum Steele: That is not something that we have considered in any great detail. However, the discussion is exposing the fact that the issue of overprovision is difficult to nail down. If you look at the capacity in many licensed venues between 10 o’clock at night and 3 o’clock in the morning, you will see that they are all full to the gunwales, and I dare say that many people would argue that if there were more such venues, more space could be contained within them, so it would be difficult to say that there is overprovision in that sense. However, the self-same venues will be largely empty from 11 o’clock in the morning until 3 o’clock in the afternoon, so measuring provision and capacity for provision is not easy, although it is universally accepted that protecting licensed premises that have on-sale capacity results in considerable additional demand on police time and resource outwith the premises when they eventually spill out.

John Wilson: I know that Dr Shortt’s study has been limited so far, but one of the big problems in many communities is not, as Mark McDonald indicated, the hotel or bar trade, but the off-licence trade and the small corner shops that sell the well-known tonic wine, particularly in areas such as the one that I live in—Lanarkshire—which have real problems.

How do you propose to measure that type of sale? Floor space does not come into the equation, given that I could take you to a small off-licence that will sell anything in excess of 200 bottles of that well-known tonic wine on a Friday night. How do we get to a position in which we can make an assessment of the situation in which, as well as a supermarket having an off-licence, a proliferation of small corner shops insist that they must have an off-licence in order to trade, although what they are trading in is a type of alcoholic beverage that is problematic in communities throughout Lanarkshire and central Scotland?

Dr Shortt: It is important that future research looks at types of outlets and at the products sold in different types of outlets. It is important to recognise that there are different pathways through which overprovision or a high density of outlets in an area can affect health and wellbeing. We often think only about the availability of those products or the ease of access to them and the fact that, because more of them are sold in our neighbourhoods, it is easier to get them, but there is also the idea that if premises are in close proximity to one another, there will be a reduction in prices because of competition and that the availability of such products can reinforce and shape our social norms and our attitudes towards alcohol. If we live in a society that is swimming with alcohol, that will shape the ideas and attitudes of teenagers in Scotland.

Fiona Stewart: Capacity is a vexed issue, not just for health and for the trade but for licensing boards. The total capacity cited for on-sale premises is virtually meaningless, because it changes from hour to hour, depending on the layout of a function room, how many tables and chairs are in it, how big the dance floor is and so on.

Even in relation to off-sales, capacity is not straightforward: sometimes it is measured in cubic metres and sometimes it is measured in square metres; sometimes it is the floor space that has shelves on it and sometimes it is just the shelves. From the beginning, there has been no clear steer for licensing boards on what capacity means in either on-sales or off-sales.

Officers in SOLAR are concerned about the proposals in the bill to bring licensed hours into the equation, because not every premises trades to the full hours that they have on their licence. Sometimes they are open for shorter hours, perhaps because they close during quiet times, so what meaningful information would licensed hours bring to the table?

As licensing boards and licensing board clerks, we are as vexed as everybody else is about how to deal with overprovision, but some clarification is needed on how capacity is to be taken into account in determining whether there is overprovision. It is not as straightforward as you might think, because of all the technical issues that we have to deal with.

John Wilson: Ms Stewart said that capacity can be measured in cubic metres, in square metres and so on, and she mentioned the situation with floor space in off-sales. Is any account taken of the amount of storage space that premises have? The restriction is on what is in front of customers when they walk in. I gave the example of tonic wine. There might be only one shelf full of tonic wine on display, but there might be 20 cases sitting in a store room. The shelf might be replenished every time somebody buys two bottles.

Fiona Stewart: Generally speaking, storage is not taken into account at the current time. It is purely the alcohol displays within the store that are considered.

Jack Cummins: That point is often overlooked. The real capacity is not what is on the shelf. Under the legislation, capacity is the amount of space on the premises that is given over to the display of alcohol for sale on the premises, but the length and height is not the capacity. It is just a two-dimensional measurement. Again, this is not the Law Society’s position, but my personal view has always been that the real capacity is what is in the back shop that can be used to refill the shelves whenever what is in the authorised space starts to run down.

I entirely agree with Ms Stewart about licensed hours being part of the assessment of whether there is overprovision, because they may or may not be used. I do not think that they contribute anything—nor does the Law Society—to a better understanding of what would constitute overprovision, so we are agreed on that.

Mark McDonald: I have two points. First, I am interested in the issue of storage space. In the dim and distant past, I worked for a major supermarket chain, which shall go unnamed, and all the alcohol had to be stored in a locked cage at the back of the warehouse. I do not know whether that was the result of regulation or whether it just was a choice that was made—

The Convener: Warehouses were normally open in those circumstances, in my experience of working in the same kind of stores.

Mark McDonald: My second point follows on from an interesting point that Mr Steele made about the pressures that are caused by large numbers of venues in a concentrated area spilling out at the same time. When I was a local authority councillor, I floated a suggestion that local authority licensing boards should look at implementing what I would call cool-down periods, with differentiation between the time period for the sale of alcohol and the closing time of premises, or differentiation between the closing times of premises in a certain area.

Neither of those ideas is necessarily a perfect solution, but are they already available to licensing boards? Would there be legal implications if they were to implement such proposals? I would be interested to learn a bit more about those things, because I am by no means an expert.

Jack Cummins: The policies that licensing boards implement usually provide for different terminal hours depending on the type of premises. For example, in Glasgow city centre, the terminal hour for pubs is 12 o’clock, for restaurants that meet certain criteria it is 1 o’clock and for nightclubs it is 3 o’clock. The situation is different throughout the country.

Your point about a large burst of people going on to the streets at the same time and the stress that that causes is one of the reasons why capacity became a feature of licensing legislation for the first time in 2005. As you probably know, the Nicholson committee reviewed licensing law in the run-up to the 2005 act. It noted that a licence was a licence and that, although a superpub might have much more trading space than a small, traditional pub, it was still counted as one licence.

From the Nicholson point of view, overprovision was linked to stress levels caused by a large number of people coming on to the street in a concentrated area late at night, which of course has police resource implications. Nicholson differentiated between different types of premises. Closing times are staggered throughout Scotland.

Mark McDonald: Let us go slightly further than that. For example, Justice Mill Lane in Aberdeen has a large concentration of premises that empty at 3 o’clock in the morning. I floated the suggestion that licences could be differentiated across those venues by changing the closing time of the premises or the time at which alcohol ceases to be sold. Can such local variations be made by licensing boards or would there be legal difficulty for them in taking that step?

The Convener: Before I let you answer, Mr Cummins, I want to add to that. When that has happened in certain places, I understand that rival premises owners have made challenges in court about who should close earlier and who should open later.

Jack Cummins: Let us look at West Dunbartonshire licensing board as a model. It was the first board to declare almost all of its area as overprovided. It was split into data zones and I think that I am right in saying that 15 out of 17 of those data zones were overprovided. However, overprovision only exists in relation to what might be called vertical drinking establishments and off-sales, so hotels and restaurants would not be caught by the overprovision policy and would be looked at in the normal way. Importantly, that policy was revised a couple of years ago and it now allows the licensing board to look at the benefits from inward investment for the economy and the health improvements that might come about from putting people into work.

The short answer is that there can be differentiation. For example, an area can say that it is not having any more off-sales. Highland licensing board recently said that it was not having any more off-sales with a display capacity in excess of 40m². That is quite an innovative step. All sorts of refinements are possible.

The Convener: Boards often face difficulties when owners challenge their decisions in court by saying, “The boy up the road is allowed to open until 1 o’clock in the morning, so why am I not allowed to do so?” That is where difficulties have arisen on my patch in the past. Does the bill help in that regard or are we still going to have sheriffs overruling licensing boards every day?

Jack Cummins: If the licensing board has a policy that certain premises should be able to be open until a certain time and the disgruntled licence holder that you describe tries to bring themselves within that policy, they will have to have a large chequebook and lots of money to challenge it, because litigating on licensing is phenomenally expensive.

I do not want to put her on the spot but, unless I misremember, I happen to know that Ms Stewart... has some experience of litigations from nightclubs, so she might be able to assist us.

Fiona Stewart: I think that you are misremembering.

The problem that licensing boards face is that the trade wants a level playing field and pubs and nightclubs want to operate the same hours across the board, whatever the licensing board has said those hours might be. For differentiation, it would be difficult to pick the establishments that would lose their hours. We would have to look at new premises coming in, but they would say that they ticked all the boxes and would ask why they were not getting to open for the same hours as the pub next door. Unless there was a specific problem with an individual premises that meant that the board could review whether its hours or capacity were causing a problem and take action if that was found to be the case, boards would be put into a difficult position, especially when the overwhelming evidence that has been coming before boards for a long time is that premises want to be treated the same and want a fair shot at the market.

That is why we see policies that say that pubs can open until 1 and nightclubs until 3. I know that some boards previously had curfews in place to try to control disorder, but Highland is the latest board to lift its curfew because the reasons for it are simply no longer there.

Alex Rowley: It would be useful to get the research that Dr Shortt talked about and to find out about any links to other research. It would also be useful to find out about experiences in other European countries, in some of which it is not possible to go to the corner shop to buy alcohol.

I want to switch subject and ask about air weapons. My question is for Calum Steele. In the financial memorandum to the bill, the Scottish Government states:

“The main costs falling to Police Scotland will arise from the initial certification of air weapons holders, and ongoing checks and renewals of certificates once the main regime is in place.”

However, it goes on to state:

“To a great extent all of the main elements of the regime are already in place”.

Therefore, the Government does not consider that there will be major costs involved. You seem to have a different position.

The Convener: Calum, can you answer that from a federation perspective?

Calum Steele: I can certainly give my view from a federation perspective. We find that, regardless of their hue, Governments traditionally underestimate the cost of any measure that they introduce, with the result that it is not uncommon for the costs to end up being borne largely by the service that has responsibility for the relevant area, whether we are talking about the licensing service, which has responsibility for alcohol licensing, or the police service, which has responsibility for firearms licensing.

The difficulty that the federation has with the financial memorandum is that it contains many suggestions but no evidence for how those conclusions have been reached. For example, there is no indication of why the statement that 40,000 air weapons might be held by firearms or shotgun certificate holders, many of whom will own more than one such weapon, has been made or what evidence supports it.

Given our experience and the number of staff who undertake such activities on a day-to-day basis, we have real difficulty in understanding how that translates into a limited number of inquiries based on there being a small number of individuals, when no guidance has been prepared on what will be required by way of background checks and supporting evidence before an air weapon certificate is granted.

I suspect that others will express a similar view; just because statements are made, that does not mean that they are true. Some evidence should be provided to support them. At a time when everyone in the public sector is under considerable pressure and—whether people admit it or not—a conversation is undoubtedly taking place about whether there should be fewer police officers in Scotland, it seems to me that the proposals in the bill cannot be glibly dismissed as having little impact on the police service. Any police officer who is involved in day-to-day response policing—those who answer calls and attend incidents—will tell you that they are stretched. The impact of adding the burden of potentially having to deal with up to 500,000 air weapons—although it is questionable whether that number would ever fall under the licensing regime—needs to be properly understood, and my organisation’s view is that that has not happened. All that we have had are bland statements.

The Convener: Dr Wightman, do you want to come in on that point?

Dr Wightman: I cannot add much on licensing. I would be interested to know where the figure of 500,000 air weapons comes from.

Alex Rowley: Do we have any idea of how many air weapons are out there? Is there a best guess?

Dr Wightman: I am afraid that I do not know.

Alex Rowley: There is also an assumption that, were licensing for air weapons to be introduced, people would surrender them. Are there many people who have air weapons that are just lying about and who, if they had to get them licensed, would just hand them back?

The Convener: You are talking about an amnesty.

Calum Steele: Every time there is an amnesty, a number of different weapons are surrendered. That would apply even now: if there was to be an amnesty tomorrow, unlicensed shotguns and unlicensed firearms would be handed in. It happens time and again: the same thing occurs as standard across most police services in the United Kingdom, and it would undoubtedly happen again. My experience, and I stress that this is just my own experience, suggests that there probably are instances of people who have weapons just lying around or sitting in a dusty garage. I suspect that there are as many people who hold and use air weapons properly and competently as there are people who bought them once upon a time and have forgotten that they still have them.

The Convener: I now have three members on my list—

Alex Rowley: Could I just finish, convener?

The Convener: Yes—if you are brief.

Alex Rowley: There is a stringent process in place, which includes background checks and so on, for people who hold or apply for shotgun licences. The financial memorandum seems to suggest that such extensive, detailed background checks will not be necessary for airgun licensing. What is your take on that?

Calum Steele: That is what the memorandum suggests. There is indeed a question about whether there needs to be additional consideration given to licensing in relation to people who currently hold firearm or shotgun certificates. It seems to the Scottish Police Federation, and it seems to me personally, that that would be an unusual step.

Levels of danger are difficult to quantify. If something is lethal, it is lethal regardless. It does not matter whether someone is bludgeoned to death or blitzed out of the air with a rocket-propelled grenade—they are still dead. The issue of how lethal or otherwise any particular weapon is needs to be properly understood.

Given that a very detailed approach is taken to the licensing system, particularly for shotguns and firearms, there would seem—if legislation proceeds in relation to this particular element—to be an easy win in providing the capacity for an existing firearm or shotgun certificate simply to cover an air weapon or air weapons.

However, your question particularly focuses on those people who do not fall into that category, and how much examination would be required in that regard. If the requirement was for something akin to the old-fashioned game licence—when people could go to the post office, pay for it, pick it up and walk out the door—that would be as meaningless as the game licence itself was. Other than that individual applications would be assessed in their own right, it is not clear what or who would or would not be subject to a detailed process of application and consideration.

Mark McDonald: The motivation behind licensing in this area is obviously related to both actual and perceived harm. I am interested in the study that you have done, Dr Wightman, and in what you have concluded from it with regard to the harm that can be caused by air weapon pellets. Can you give us a bit more detail on that?

Dr Wightman: Are you asking about the actual damage that air weapons can do, or the statistics?

Mark McDonald: Both, if you wish to offer that.

Dr Wightman: Initially, we looked at firing into ballistic gel, to simulate the damage to fleshy organs. We then looked at embedding animal organs from an abattoir into the gel and compared that with firing into the gel on its own. The ballistic gel is a reasonable model for the various soft tissues in the body. There is obviously a bit of variation between the organs—a lung is penetrated more readily than heart material—but the gel still provides a reasonable approximation. The fact that the pellet will go 10 cm to 15 cm in if there is no bone or anything else to prevent that means that there is a potential for serious injury within the body.

We have also looked at the effect of clothing, which can reduce penetration. Sometimes, clothing reduces penetration significantly; at other times, it does not seem to have so much effect. We have a project running this year that will examine why that is the case.

Although we have tried simulating skin, we have had difficulty in getting reproducible results. As I said in my introductory comments, we are talking about a complex system involving, for example, clothing, skin and fleshy organs, and perhaps bone behind all that. We have been trying to simplify the model but, from the work that we have done, it appears that pellets can penetrate quite a distance into the body.

Looking at the literature in medical journals, I would say that most of the work on the effect of air weapons has come from medical doctors examining the injuries and fatalities that have been caused by such weapons. That complements what we have been doing. There have been cases of quite serious injuries and fatalities as a result of air weapons; the number might be declining in the UK—the same is true of other firearms—but it is still significant.

John Wilson: In your submission, Mr Steele, you suggest that the costs of implementing the licensing regime for air weapons might have been underestimated. What might it cost to enforce the legislation with regard to individuals who decide not to get an air weapons licence? Would the police have to put on a major exercise to get as many unlicensed weapons off the streets as possible? Is it the case that the only time the police really come into contact or interact with air weapons is when illegal activities or perceived illegal activities take place?

Calum Steele: The issue of compliance costs is detailed in paragraph 76 of the financial memorandum, and there is a suggestion that the Police Service of Scotland should not pursue air weapons as a significant priority but deal with issues as and when they occur.

Costs should be broken down into three areas: the financial cost; the human cost, in terms of the impact on communities and individuals; and, of course, the cost of the time that police officers spend dealing with such cases. It might help to spend a bit of time on each area. As the financial cost will be identified only once the process has been worked through to the end, it will be really difficult to answer that question. However, what will inevitably contribute to that cost will be the increase in the number of licensing offences identified and, undoubtedly, reported to the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service. That will impact on the time that the service dedicates to dealing with such matters, which might, ultimately, translate into court time. The reporting time, the time that will be spent by the procurator fiscal and court time are all a considerable drain on police time, and I do not think that it will be acceptable either to the legislators or to our communities for the police to take an inconsistent approach where Joe Soap is deemed to be forgetful but someone else whose jib people do not like the look of gets reported. That is problematic.

The human cost will, of course, be the impact on individuals. I suspect that many tens of hundreds or possibly thousands—which is obviously the same thing; I meant tens of thousands—of individuals out there might well find themselves falling foul of the criminal justice system because of licensing offences. That has not been a feature before, and, because consideration has not been given to the movement of air weapons across borders, the issue applies not just to individuals who are domiciled in Scotland but to individuals who come to Scotland from elsewhere in the United Kingdom.

Although I consider that, in the early days, a potential prosecution, a recorded prosecution or a fixed-penalty disposal being brought against someone will be regarded as a relatively minor thing, the impact on individuals later in their lives could be great. A young person of, say, 18 or 19 years old could fall foul of the criminal justice system and, later in life, when they are going for employment or trying to get a job overseas—the global marketplace changes so quickly and competition for jobs is so vehement—they could find that that has a devastating impact on their future life chances. That needs to be properly understood.

It is suggested that there will be a long intervening period of non-active pursuance, if you like, when there may be enormous quantities of air weapons handed in for surrender. It is really difficult to make estimates about the transportation, physical seizure, recording and holding of those weapons until such time as they are taken away—if indeed they are to be taken away—by a scrap metal dealer.

As I said, the statements that have been made seem to be based on no evidence other than just a finger in the air and the feeling that this seems about right. Until such time as we have a reasonable grasp of what is out there—a reasonable gauge of how many current certificate holders would fall within the ambit of consideration—and how long it is going to take, it is going to be really difficult to accurately predict whether the cost on the service will be negligible. That is the case for time on its own, particularly in more rural areas and in the Highlands. There is a reference in our submission—

John Wilson: I have a supplementary question, convener.

The Convener: It has to be very brief, with a very brief answer.

John Wilson: It will be. Earlier, Mr Steele said that, when there is a weapons amnesty, a number of unregistered shotguns and firearms are submitted. Could he give the committee—perhaps not today—an indication of how many unregistered shotguns and firearms have been submitted in weapons amnesties in the past?

The Convener: I think that that would be difficult for Mr Steele to do, but we will get that information from Police Scotland.

Calum Steele: Yes.

Anne McTaggart: On the same note, Mr Steele, your submission mentions the information and communication technology system and its ability to absorb the additional data that may be created by the introduction of the licensing system for air weapons. Can you explain what you meant by that?

The Convener: Mr Steele, can you be quite brief, please?

Calum Steele: I will try to be brief; I am not renowned for that, but I will give it a go.

As everybody knows, our IT systems are not the best and whether they can deal with the potential increase in database entries that will be required has not been tested. As a consequence, it would be difficult to predict accurately how much an IT provider—recognising that the service is a hostage to fortune—would charge the service to make sure that the system has the capacity to deal with the additional data that it would be required to hold.

Stuart McMillan: I have heard everything that has been said up to now, but I want to go back to some of the other evidence that we have received. In the submission from the Scottish Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Michael Flynn states that, in the UK, “There are many activities that require to be licensed from driving to watching a television in your own home. UK citizens do not have a ‘right to bear arms’.”

In the UK at the moment, having a television without a TV licence is a criminal offence that can lead to a court appearance and a fine of up to £1,000.

This is day 1 of our consideration of the bill. Many people outside the Parliament might consider it quite strange that although they can be charged for not having a TV licence, there is no similar scheme in operation for air weapons.

Calum Steele: That goes back to the very essence of what this particular element of the bill is trying to deal with. Is it trying to create a licensing regime for air weapons, or is it trying to deal with the criminal use of air weapons?

If it is the former, the Parliament can by all means introduce a bill and create offences, so that people who breach the licensing provisions are regularly brought before the court—I suspect that that will happen regularly. However, if it is the latter and the intention is to deal with the criminal use of air weapons, I rather fear that people who are criminally inclined to use air weapons, much like those who are criminally inclined to use firearms and shotguns, will continue to be criminally inclined to use them, regardless of the licensing regime.

If the intention is to manage the availability of air weapons through a licensing system, we can introduce a licensing system, just as we have done in the context of driving a car or watching television. If the intention is to deal with criminality, that is a different thing altogether. Let us not forget that although there is a licensing requirement in relation to watching television or driving a car, many people do not have licences, because they are criminally inclined not to get them.

The Convener: Ms Stewart, members get quite a lot of complaints about the taxi licensing regime. The proposals in the bill arose from the need to tighten regulations and reduce the opportunities for circumventing the licensing regime. Does the bill tackle companies such as Uber that pick folk up, or will we have to rethink that?

Fiona Stewart: I was in a meeting recently with Scottish Government representatives, at which we discussed Uber and similar applications. To some extent we might have to rethink. In some parts of the country, unlicensed operators are not prevalent, although there has always been tension between the taxi trade and the private hire trade.

The law makes it a criminal offence not to have a licence, and the majority of taxi firms are licensed. Uber opens up a whole different world, but it does not take away anything from the current legislation, whereby anyone who operates a taxi or private hire car needs a licence to do so. I am not sure that we have reached a stage at which we can resolve the problem that Uber and similar applications present.

The Convener: Is SOLAR’s licensing working group satisfied with the bill’s provisions on taxis and private hire cars? Do we need to do anything else?

Fiona Stewart: We are concerned about the proposed limits on private hire cars and the different approaches to restricting numbers. Currently there is provision to assess unmet demand for taxis, and the bill will allow local authorities to consider overprovision of private hire cars. We are concerned that that approach might lead to an issue of plate value, just as some taxi plates have a value, and might not achieve the desired result.

Cameron Buchanan: Do you think that Uber has been banned in some countries because taxi drivers are afraid of the competition? There is a temporary ban in Germany, for example.

Fiona Stewart: I do not know the reasons why Germany banned Uber, although I am aware of the concerns of London taxi cab drivers. At our meeting with Scottish Government officials we did not go into such detail. The issue is how we deal with operators who give quotations online for a car to pick someone up. It appears that such operators are self-employed and are not employed by Uber. The person who books the car does not know whether the vehicle is licensed, and no one is taking responsibility for the ones that do not have licences.
Cameron Buchanan: I presume that there is also a problem with third-party insurance.

Fiona Stewart: Yes, and there are implications if there is an incident.

The Convener: I have been told that the ban was only in Berlin and has been overturned by the court.

The difficulty that Fiona Stewart has identified is that many folks who use such services do not realise that they are unlicensed. There have been serious incidents in Scotland after folk entered cars thinking that they were taxis or private hire cars, only to find that they were not. We have to get this absolutely right.

Thank you all for your evidence. We have had a fairly lengthy session and your input is very much appreciated. The clerks might well get back to you to clarify various points and seek further information.

Meeting suspended.

On resuming—

The Convener: I welcome our second panel of witnesses: Dr Colin Shedden, who is the chair of the British Association for Shooting and Conservation; John Batley, who is director of the Gun Trade Association; David John Penn from the British Shooting Sports Council; and Graham Ellis, who is chair of the Scottish Air Rifle and Pistol Association. I invite them to make a brief opening statement.

John Batley (Gun Trade Association): We were all together on the firearms consultative panel, and the minutes of all those deliberations are on record. We have worked consistently with the Scottish Government over the past three years on the aspects of the bill and have all made submissions on its provisions.

The Convener: We already have a licensing regime for shotguns and other firearms. Why should air weapons be treated any differently?

Dr Colin Shedden (British Association for Shooting and Conservation): Over a considerable number of decades, we have built up a system of licensing for firearms and shotguns, as you rightly identified. We have not had licensing for airguns at all.

We are faced with the problem that there is an estimated minimum of 500,000 airguns in Scotland. The vast majority of them do not have a serial number, unlike the vast majority of shotguns and other firearms. Consequently, introducing a licensing regime from scratch is unlikely to be successful because the only people who would submit themselves to it would be law-abiding people who wish to remain law-abiding.

Previous witnesses identified the existence of a criminal element who might not put themselves forward for licensing, so the question must be whether a licensing system will address criminal misuse of airguns or basically operate for its own sake.

David John Penn (British Shooting Sports Council): One must remember that there is widespread continuing use of air weapons in pony clubs, the boy scouts and cadet units as well as individual use. We never hear about that because nothing is going wrong. There is a huge use of air weapons and very little misuse in comparison.

Most other countries do not see the need to license air weapons. For instance, the European directive on weapons control excludes air weapons from its remit. We have to remember that weapons of the sort that we are talking about, which have a power threshold of less than 12 foot pounds and more than 1 joule, are designed for urban use—they are designed for use in the garden or in the home—because they are not powerful.

Graham Ellis (Scottish Air Rifle and Pistol Association): To reiterate what Colin Shedden said, there is little or no criminal element in our membership and the people who shoot airguns. The introduction of a licensing system will force people to go down that route and, probably, to migrate on to other sports. We are concerned that it does little or nothing to address the criminal element who would misuse airguns.

John Batley: Since 1969, when the rules setting the power of air weapons were introduced, England and Wales—leaving out Northern Ireland—and, up to this point, Scotland have had no licensing system for the presumed and, I believe, correct reason that there was no need for the licensing of low-powered air weapons.

The Convener: I will make a small admission—I should say that there was no criminality involved. When I was a young boy, I was in the air cadets and enjoyed shooting a fair bit. I had a friend whose father was also a shooter and had a variety of firearms, none of which we could ever have gained access to because he was always careful about that. However, there was also an air rifle in the house and we managed to get hold of that quite easily and go out and shoot a bit.

As I said, there was no criminality involved but there seems to be a difference in the level of responsibility. The man held a firearms licence and was very careful about the weaponry that he held under that, but he was less bothered about the air rifle. Would a licensing regime ensure that people were more responsible about safeguarding such weapons?

I should say that we were 13 and 14 at the time. We were probably more responsible than many who were about then.

11:15

Dr Shedden: Licensing is unnecessary in the kind of context that you have just described because current legislation states that it is an offence to allow anyone under the age of 18 unauthorised access to an air weapon. Those who have an air weapon in their house have an obligation to secure it under lock and key or otherwise keep it out of reach of young people. Inevitably, that has had an impact on the number of offences committed by young people, because technically they should now not be able to access air weapons in the home.

The Convener: If nobody else wants to comment on that, we will move on to Mark McDonald.

Mark McDonald: The point has been made a couple of times that there will always be an element who will circumvent the legislation. Surely the point about introducing certain legislation is that it allows us to differentiate easily between the law-abiding and the lawbreaking; otherwise, there would be no point to the legislation. Saying that a tiny minority will always circumvent the legislation is not an argument for not legislating. Surely the point is that we allow ourselves to differentiate between the law-abiding and the lawbreaking by introducing legislation.

John Batley: I agree, but the bill is a new departure. It is the first time that a bill has been introduced in the UK to license air weapons. For the 4 million owners of the roughly 7 million air weapons in the UK, the bill is a new departure. We are in uncharted waters and the bill that you have prepared sets out to deal with that. I do not think that I need go any further than that.

The Convener: It is not a bill that we have prepared; it is a bill from the Government.

John Batley: I beg your pardon.

Graham Ellis: As far as criminality goes, a raft of legislation is used day in and day out to prosecute those who would use air weapons criminally. Those who currently use an air weapon for sport, as a pastime or for vermin control would not have a major issue with the bill, but they would have an issue with its proportionality and the potential criminalisation of what is currently a perfectly legitimate pastime.

David John Penn: I think that one has to remember the point made by the Scottish Police Federation that a licensing system per se will not be very likely immediately to flush out those who are criminally inclined, because they will just stay quiet and not be licensed. They will come across only when they commit a criminal act, and then they will be prosecuted. However, plenty of law exists now to prosecute effectively people who misuse air weapons. The licensing of air weapons would not help very much. It would provide another stick to beat people with, but a raft of sticks is already available.

Dr Shedden: In an ideal world the suggestion of licensing would be very sensible, but the proposal in front of us in the bill is that Police Scotland will provide the resource for administering a licensing scheme but will not prioritise resources for identifying those who illegally possess airguns. If resources and police numbers were not an issue, it would be ideal if we could have licensing and police investigation into those who were committing an offence by illegally possessing an air weapon. However, we are not in that position.

Another point is that the number of offences involving air weapons has declined considerably over the past six years. The strategy that has been in place, which is a joint strategy between the Scottish Government, Police Scotland and the shooting organisations, is one of education and enforcement of existing legislation. I noted that the Cabinet Secretary for Justice used those very words—education and enforcement of existing legislation—when he supported a new strategy on knife crime in the west of Scotland.

The Convener: Mark McDonald wants to respond.

Mark McDonald: I have looked through the written submissions, which refer to the range of uses for air weapons, from pastime to pest control. Where do you perceive the issues arising in terms of people being prevented from using air weapons as a result of a licensing scheme? In fact, is it your main concern that a licensing regime will prevent people from using air weapons as a pastime? That is not my interpretation of the bill’s intention.

Dr Shedden: A number of good reasons are given for the granting of an air weapons certificate. They seem quite comprehensive, but the British Shooting Sports Council has identified that the vast majority of people who use air weapons in Scotland and the rest of the UK use them for informal target shooting in gardens, otherwise known as plinking. Although the bill does not prohibit plinking, the policy memorandum states that ministers would not normally accept shooting in domestic gardens as a good reason to grant a licence.
It concerns us enormously that a significant number of owners of air weapons could be prohibited from getting a licence because they cannot provide a good reason, they do not have access to a large area of ground or they are not members of clubs.

The Convener: Does anyone else want to comment on that?

John Batley: I think that we all support that view.

Mark McDonald: I want to check that I have understood the Gun Trade Association’s submission correctly. It appears to suggest that, if somebody who is below the age for a licence comes to Scotland from elsewhere, an exemption should be made for them because they can have an air weapon in their country at that age but they cannot have one under the licensing regime here. Have I picked that up correctly?

John Batley: Yes—absolutely.

Mark McDonald: Okay. It strikes me that age differentiation occurs in a range of areas, one of the most obvious being the purchase of alcohol. The logical extension of that argument would be that, if a young person comes to Scotland from elsewhere, we should allow them to be served in pubs because they can be served there at home. The suggestion strikes me as inconsistent.

John Batley: I believe there is a slight difference here. Let us assume that a young person below the age of 18 who can purchase an air weapon at 16 in his country comes to Scotland. He says that he cannot receive that air weapon while he is in Scotland—it has to be sent to him in his home country. In other words, he cannot take possession of the air weapon while he is in Scotland.

If he is allowed to buy an air weapon in his country but he just happens to be in Scotland and he is not going to take possession of it—if it is going to be sent to his country, which it would be, under the bill—I see no reason why he should not be allowed to purchase it. If he was seeking to take it away and take possession of it, I agree with what the bill says, but I believe that he should be allowed to purchase it.

Cameron Buchanan: Sporting activities are affected, and we have received an interesting submission from Scottish tetrathlon, which states:

“The majority of our members are under 17 and as such the air weapons licensing systems would have a huge effect on them. If however we were allowed to become an approved air weapon club and therefore exempt from individual licences this would work for our organisation.”

I think that most of its members are between 14 and 17. Are you in favour of amending the bill to allow what it suggests?

Graham Ellis: There are a number of issues around youth shooting. You mentioned Scottish tetrathlon, but there is also the Pony Club, the air training corps and the scouts. A whole plethora of youth organisations use shooting as a pastime or a sport. The regulation of facilities is fine where a dedicated facility is used, but a lot of events—for example, the tetrathlon—take place over various places.

The licensing of clubs would bring in certain concerns. Would it apply to private clubs where membership is limited to licensed individuals? Are we trying to cater for the general public or for specific groups? The licensing of clubs might be beneficial, but there are a bunch of pitfalls around it.

Cameron Buchanan: Would it not be a compromise if air weapons clubs, Pony Club branches or whatever could be licensed for sporting activities? The licence and the weapons would be held by the club rather than individually.

Graham Ellis: Our concern was that the licences that the bill mentions are for facilities as opposed to clubs. The licensing of a club in itself is not a major problem, but the provision may impact on those who do not belong to a club but still compete in sports such as tetrathlon or Pony Club activities. They may hold air weapons and will still require a licence. There is a trade-off on benefits.

David John Penn: What we are asking for effectively mirrors the existing situation with regard to approved rifle clubs for cartridge firearms. A club can hold a club certificate and its members may shoot the rifles without having a firearms certificate themselves. That is already a well-established practice in club shooting and causes no problems.

Cameron Buchanan: But shooting would have to take place on licensed premises. People could not practise in their gardens, for example—they would have to practise on the premises of a particular group or Pony Club branch.

David John Penn: Not necessarily—the existing approved club system allows for a club to exist without having its own range, so its members use other people’s premises or Ministry of Defence ranges.

Cameron Buchanan: That is understood. Obviously a club would not necessarily have its own premises, but if its members went on sporting events such as trap shooting for the Olympics, they could presumably use the premises of the society or club that they are at.

David John Penn: Indeed.
Stuart McMillan: Good morning, gentlemen. I had a question for Dr Shedden on his earlier comments, but it has gone from my mind. I will come back to that one in a moment.

My other question is on plinking taking place in Scotland and whether there is a clear divide between rural and urban areas in that respect. I grew up on a housing scheme and I was not aware of plinking taking place in my area.

Dr Shedden: Plinking does occur. It may not occur in areas where gardens are relatively small, but it is relatively common where gardens are large. What concerns me is that a sizeist element is creeping into the debate, and probably a financial element too. If someone lives in a large leafy suburb with a large garden, the police will inevitably think that that is a suitable place to use an air rifle for controlling rabbits, pigeons, squirrels or rats, or for informal target shooting. However, if someone has a relatively small garden, it may be deemed unsuitable. That is certainly what the policy memorandum states.

The advantage of air weapons, as we have already discussed, is that they are relatively low-powered and can be used in confined spaces for pest control and target shooting. In many situations, someone can safely set up a small range in a small garden and safely use an air rifle for their own informal target shooting. As I said, that is probably what the majority of people with air rifles in Scotland, and in the rest of the United Kingdom, actually do.

The Convener: I hope that you are referring to grey squirrels only.

Dr Shedden: Indeed.

John Batley: Under most circumstances, young people start their informal target shooting in the confines of their own premises, and most often they are supervised by a guardian or a parent.

We introduce people to shooting through airguns, which, as Colin Shedden said, are relatively low-powered items. Those people have good discipline and they are taught good safety. There does not seem to be a problem with the actual size of the place where someone is using the airgun, provided that there is a supervisor. That supervisor will have a certificate, as there is with firearms and shotguns, we require that young people cannot access the air weapons without supervision. Our code of practice has always advocated that. Although there is no legal requirement for air weapons to be stored in a steel box, as there is with firearms and shotguns, we have always advised owners of air weapons to ensure that those under age could not access them. Our code of practice has always been concerned with the fact that we will lose that introduction to airgun shooting if the legislation is too draconian.

Stuart McMillan: You say that you feel that you would lose that introduction. Are you suggesting that there will be an adverse effect on the sport of shooting if we are to go ahead with the legislation?

John Batley: Quite possibly—if we are not clear about where air weapons can be used.

If the bill is too restrictive, we will restrict people to joining clubs—as far as I understand it, there are not a great number of clubs in Scotland. Not everybody has access to private land, so they probably have to start their shooting and their airgun shooting within the confines of their own premises. There could well be a restriction and we could lose people to shooting.

The Convener: Is it possible that you would increase the number of people who came to shooting if there were more clubs in Scotland?

John Batley: Yes.

Stuart McMillan: Dr Shedden, you highlighted the current regulations about looking after weapons. Did your organisation support those regulations when they were introduced?

Dr Shedden: The legislation that I referred to was that which compelled the owners of air weapons to ensure that those under age could not access them. Our code of practice has always advocated that. Although there is no legal requirement for air weapons to be stored in a steel box, as there is with firearms and shotguns, we have always advised owners of air weapons to ensure that young people cannot access the air weapons without supervision.

Stuart McMillan: Did you support those regulations?

Dr Shedden: That was Westminster legislation; I tend to deal with Scottish legislation. However, I do not remember us opposing it. I am sure that David Penn will be able to confirm that.

David John Penn: I can confirm that the measures that we recommended were discussed at length with the Home Office and agreed by the shooting organisations.

Anne McTaggart: Mr Batley mentioned the sale of air weapons to people from abroad. Have you considered the financial impact of the bill on gun traders in that respect?

John Batley: Yes. It is difficult to calculate, but we believe that there will be an effect. However, that effect will be determined only when we know how many licences or certificates have been issued and how many people have handed in weapons. We will then be able to recalculate what trade is left. At the moment, for us to say, "There will be this number of people with air weapon certificates and this is how it will affect trade," would be pure guesswork.

There will be complications because of the fact that there is no border. There will be complications with visitors permits, which we would like to be addressed. A particular complication that we deal with in Scotland relates to what we call remote sales or, in other words, those in which a registered firearms dealer in Scotland sells an air weapon to somebody who is a visitor to Scotland and who has neither a certificate nor a visitors permit. The bill as it is drafted says that the dealer in Scotland may send that air weapon “outwith Great Britain”. The way in which that is written means that the dealer will not be able to send it to someone in England; they will have to send it elsewhere. The wording is “outwith Great Britain” and England is most certainly in Great Britain. We have picked up that anomaly in the bill.

The Convener: You talked about the possibility of an increase in the number of clubs if the legislation is passed. Does that mean, to use a well-known phrase, that the market may go up as well as down, in your trade?

John Batley: I wish that I knew the answer but I am afraid that I do not.

The Convener: Mr Penn, you wanted to comment.

David John Penn: John Batley covered the point that I was going to raise.

Anne McTaggart: Do the witnesses foresee any positive outcomes from the bill?

Dr Shedden: One of the unintended consequences, which could affect an organisation such as the BASC, is that people who have in the past had air weapons because they were unlicensed and who would now be exposed to a licensing regime may think to themselves, “I have a low-powered air weapon but if I need to get a licence I might as well get a licence for a more powerful rifle or a shotgun.” A number of people may move from unlicensed air weapon shooting into licensed firearm and shotgun shooting. From my perspective, that would be quite rewarding because I monitor how influential we are by the number of people in Scotland who have firearm or shotgun certificates. We may see an increase in “serious” shooting in Scotland as a consequence of the legislation.

David John Penn: I concur with Colin Shedden. I am afraid that I cannot see any other benefits arising from the bill.

Graham Ellis: The feedback from our membership is that, should a heavy licensing system come in, they will migrate to what Colin Shedden called proper shooting and move away from low-powered air weapons.

John Batley: The cost of the certificate will be an important issue. We must take into account the fact that a considerable proportion of the air weapons that are held in Scotland are probably worth less than £100. If the certificate is enormously expensive and security requirements are more than described in the bill, there will perhaps be a temptation for some people not to register voluntarily at the start of the scheme. The cost will have an influence on how many people register.

Anne McTaggart: I am not sure whether that is a positive or not. My question has raised even greater concerns.

John Wilson: Good morning, gentlemen. By way of disclosure, I should say that I used to plink as a child. I received a visit from the police when I was plinking out in my back garden. Although the police were satisfied that what I was doing was safe and within the limits, they suggested that I cease carrying out the activity because of the alarm and distress that could be caused to the neighbours.

One problem is that alarm and distress are perceived to be caused by such activities but the bill is about public safety. Is there sufficient reason for the introduction of legislation in relation to public safety, particularly in terms of plinking? As you said, many young adults and children get into the sport through that activity, but they may be subject to a visit by the police—as I was 40 years ago—because neighbours are concerned, despite the fact that their activities are causing no harm or serious danger to anyone else.

The Convener: I never had a visit from the police.

John Batley: The succinct answer to John Wilson’s question is that public safety forms the background of all firearms legislation and public safety is paramount for anything to do with firearms. Public safety has to be maintained and all the shooting organisations that I am aware of and am part of are very keen on public safety.

Graham Ellis: Licensing probably would not have done anything to resolve the situation that John Wilson describes. If someone were licensed to shoot in their backyard, the neighbours’ concern would probably still have arisen and the police would probably still have turned up. That example highlights a lack of public education: members of the public do not understand what airgun shooting is or the obligations and responsibilities that it involves. It also highlights a lack of communication. between the shooting community and the general public.

The Convener: You mentioned that folk do not know their obligations. If they were licensed, would they have more idea of their obligations?

John Batley: It depends very much on the shooting organisations—Dr Shedden will be able to answer that question. Shooting organisations are very keen on codes of practice, on explaining and on training and education.

David John Penn: I can only come back to the large number of air weapons that are out there in the hands of private individuals in Great Britain and, relatively speaking, the very small number of incidents that occur and the low levels of complaint, so far as we are aware. There is an awful lot of shooting going on, which is not causing very much of a problem. I agree with Graham Ellis that it is a question of better education of the public at large.

Dr Shedden: Public safety is very important. We spend a considerable amount of time on education, whether with young people or adults. In addition, we have, on occasion, been able to get along to schools to provide information and practical advice on the use of airguns. That points out to me the fact that there are probably people out there who could, if they took their airgun into their garden, cause some public concern. It would be wonderful if publicly funded facilities could be made available in certain situations—in urban areas, for instance—that could help to educate people and to facilitate safe air-rifle shooting.

The Convener: It was suggested that you might be better placed to talk about obligations. Would a licensing regime not ensure that folk knew what their obligations were?

Dr Shedden: I think that those who come forward voluntarily to submit themselves for a licence probably understand what their obligations are and what the law actually states. Over the past 10 or 20 years, we have found that the law is complex—in Scotland, there are about 30 pieces of legislation that cover air weapons. It has been a challenge to put that into simple codes of practice so that parents, in particular, can understand it, but we have achieved that. It is important that we get a simple message across. The message from the Scottish Government and us has been that air weapons are not toys and should not be treated as toys, but they can be used safely and responsibly in many situations.

John Wilson: Despite what you have said, we have been provided with a report by the Association of Chief Police Officers south of the border that says that airsoft weapons now have a capacity that is greater than that of some of the air weapons that will be licensed in Scotland. Do you think that weapons such as paintball weapons and airsoft weapons should be considered for inclusion in the bill? In following guidance and research from elsewhere and putting in limits regarding the air weapons that have to be licensed, should we go for a wider licensing regime that might include airsoft weapons and paintball weapons?

Dr Shedden: I defer to John Batley, who has much more knowledge of that.

John Batley: In introducing a lower limit of 1 joule, I think that the bill covers that quite adequately. There are many conflicting medical reports on the level of lethality. By utilising the term “air weapon”, the bill has neatly created a band of weapons that have a muzzle energy of between 1 joule and 6 or 12 foot pounds. We know that weapons above that level are licensable. For weapons that are below the 1 joule level that the bill introduces, the medical evidence that we have seen—we have looked into it in considerable depth—confirms that weapons such as the airsoft weapons to which you have referred are not lethal, provided that they are properly used.

John Wilson: But it could be said that air weapons are not lethal, if they are properly used.

John Batley: No—an air weapon as defined in section 1(3)(b) of the Firearms Act 1968 is always lethal; it is a lethal barrelled firearm. There is no question about that. A weapon that has a muzzle energy of less than 1 joule should not be lethal, so we do not consider it to be a firearm.

John Wilson: Right. I wanted to find out about the technical aspects of the lethality of air weapons, so it is useful to get that on the record.

Earlier, a question was asked about the number of clubs that exist. What is the average annual membership fee to be a member of an air weapons club in Scotland?

Graham Ellis: It varies marginally from club to club but, on average, an annual membership will cost from about £75 for an individual membership up to about £115 for a family membership. Above and beyond that, there are range fees for the use of facilities, competitions and so on. It is an entry-level sport, and it is relatively low cost.

John Wilson: But the annual membership fee can cost more than an air weapon.

Graham Ellis: Yes, but we find that once people enter a club shooting environment, they soon want to upgrade their equipment so that they can take part in whatever events, competitions and disciplines they choose to participate in. Therefore, although it might well cost less than £100 for an entry-level airgun such as a home plinker, a target shooter or a domestic shooter, it could cost anything from £2,000 up to £7,000 for a competition air rifle.

11:45

John Wilson: Can you give us an indication of how many clubs exist in Scotland?

Graham Ellis: In Scotland, under our regime, there are 13 clubs. Their membership varies from about 40 members through to about 120 members, so on average there are about 80 to 90 members per club. We are struggling to set up additional clubs because securing facilities and getting planning approval is exceedingly time consuming and complex.

John Wilson: You said that there are 13 clubs under your regime.

Graham Ellis: Yes. Obviously, there are the National Small-bore Rifle Association clubs, which also support air weapon shooting. I think that someone already mentioned this morning that there are about 150 NSRA clubs.

John Wilson: In Scotland?

Graham Ellis: In Scotland. However, those are predominantly for full-bore and rimfire rifles rather than air rifles, and the air rifle representation within those clubs is very small.

John Wilson: Thank you very much.

Alex Rowley: On the question of plinking, from what I can see in the policy memorandum, the Scottish Government seems to be saying that if an individual applies to have a licence for an air weapon and the police judge that where the individual wants to use that weapon—in a built-up area or in an urban garden next to other gardens, with children running about, for example—could cause a difficult hazard for others, they would refuse the licence. Does that not seem reasonable enough? Someone mentioned earlier that it could come down to whether someone has a big garden or a small garden, but is it not about the police judging whether it is safe for someone to use an air weapon that could be a threat to others in a built-up area?

Dr Shedden: Yes, it is reasonable that the good reason is investigated. The unfortunate thing is that the paperwork indicates that the average amount of time spent on 98 per cent of applications would be 1.2 hours, which does not give enough time for consideration or even for a site visit. Based on Police Scotland’s notification, I do not think that the police will have the ability to take each case on its merit. Basically, the police would look at someone in a suburban or urban area and decide that granting a licence would not be suitable.

Firearm and shotgun certificate applications usually require five hours of licensing officer time, so if each application were to be looked at in that way, that would significantly increase the cost. I think that that is what Calum Steele was trying to indicate. Some of the figures seem to have been plucked out of the air without real consideration of what happens on the ground. There would be a blanket ban against informal shooting in a garden. That is what concerns us.

Graham Ellis: We have competition shooters who shoot a pistol or a 10m rifle at the 6 foot pound level within their own houses. They do not need to go outside to the garden. That is happening within the safe bounds of their home, within concrete walls, but how would you differentiate between a built-up area and a controlled environment? The complexity of the issue is that it is not just about a zone, a house, or a garden; it is about the facilities that people have constructed.

Alex Rowley: To get to the crux of this, the Scottish Government seems to be saying in the policy memorandum that it is a question of whether somebody can have an air weapon and use that air weapon in a built-up area when it could be perceived to be a threat to others. It seems to be saying that it would come down to the judgment of the police in that regard. It seems to me—and you seem to agree—that it is not unreasonable to be able to introduce a law that would include that point.

It then comes back to the question of cost—that is another matter, which we tried to probe earlier. Do you have any views on the cost of the licence? Should the taxpayer bear any of that cost or should the licence applicant bear the cost? Should the cost of the licence resemble what the cost is of processing it?

The Convener: Who will go for that one?

Dr Shedden: Very briefly, the certificate holder obviously has to pay a proportion of the cost but we would also expect the taxpayer to pay a proportion of the cost because the whole process is designed to ensure public safety—it is not just about the certificate holder. As has been the case with firearm and shotgun certificates in the past, a proportion of the cost that the police face will be paid for by the applicant and the rest should be paid for by society because society benefits in relation to safety.

The Convener: I see from the nodding of heads that all the panel members agree with that statement from Dr Shedden, so the panel members believe that the taxpayer should pick up a proportion of the cost.

As there are no further questions from the committee, I thank you very much for your evidence this morning, gentlemen. We move into private session.
Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

09:31

The Convener: Item 3 is our second oral evidence session on the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. We will hear from two panels of witnesses: representatives of groups that support a licensing system for air weapons and witnesses from Police Scotland.

I welcome our first panel. Dr Michael North is from the Gun Control Network; Jennifer Dunn is the senior public affairs officer at the League Against Cruel Sports; and Mike Flynn is the chief superintendent of the Scottish Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.

I invite the witnesses to make opening statements, if they want to do so. Do you want to go first, Ms Dunn?

Jennifer Dunn (League Against Cruel Sports): I am happy to do so. I thank the committee for having me along today.

We support licensing because, as well as helping to reduce airgun attacks on people, it will help to reduce airgun attacks on animals. We think that the vast majority of airgun attacks on animals are not reported to the police. Our figures show that, from 2010 to 2012, the then police forces recorded 68 attacks on animals, whereas the SSPCA recorded 178 attacks in a single year. I asked Police Scotland for an updated figure, but I was told that it was not able to provide a figure for more recent years.

We think that the true figure is higher still. For example, the anatomy of domestic cats is such that, when they are shot with an airgun, the injury is often not apparent straight away. The cat makes its way home and then, in some cases, develops signs of illness. Only later, when it is taken to the vet, does it become apparent that the illness is due to an airgun injury, by which time the owner or vet might think that there is little point in reporting the incident.

Because there are so many airguns in circulation, we think that the only way to halt airgun attacks on animals is to implement some form of licensing.

Dr Michael North (Gun Control Network): I represent the Gun Control Network. Since GCN was founded, in 1996, we have had concerns about air weapons. Why it is felt necessary to differentiate between guns on the basis of their mechanisms has always been a major concern for us. We think that anything that is potentially lethal and that can maim or injure should be licensed.

We therefore welcome the Scottish Government's moves to license air weapons in Scotland.

In the 18 years for which GCN has been in existence, a number of fatalities have occurred as a result of airgun incidents, and some of our members have lost children or have had children injured. We feel that one of the problems has been a rather lax and casual attitude towards air weapons, and we feel strongly that registration will send out the right message and will reflect the degree of dangerousness of air weapons. We believe that a licensing system will make anyone who wants to use an air weapon think seriously about their need to have one, which will lead to a subsequent reduction in the number of weapons and, therefore, the number of serious incidents.

Mike Flynn (Scottish Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals): The Scottish SSPCA fully supports the Scottish Government's proposal. Our support is based solely on the work that we do. The 178 reports that Jennifer Dunn mentioned were reports made to us. We do not have people going out and trying to find animals, so those were cases in which vets or owners phoned us to let us know what had happened. Surprisingly, since the measure was first announced earlier this year, the number of cases that have been reported to us, which mainly involve cats and wildlife, has actually risen. Given that, under the bill, anyone who has a lawful purpose to have an air weapon will be allowed to have one, we see no reason why licensing is not a sensible solution.

The Convener: Some of the written submissions and some witnesses have suggested that the introduction of a licensing regime for air weapons will do nothing to reduce criminality or increase public safety, as those who choose to misuse such weapons will not bother to get a licence. What is your response to those suggestions?

Dr North: Although the reporting of incidents in the media leads to an underestimating of the extent of the problem, as we say in our submission, those reports show that the people who are responsible for such incidents are often not hardened criminals. Very often, the incidents involve casual use by people who would otherwise not undertake criminal activity, such as teenagers messing around with guns or someone who just happens to have an airgun and decides on the spur of the moment to use it to threaten somebody. The idea that we can divide society into criminals and non-criminals is simplistic and does not help.

Our reading of the various incidents is that many of them occur simply because people do not take their ownership of air weapons seriously and they misbehave with them, rather than because they go out to conduct criminal activity.

The Convener: Ms Dunn, do you have a view on that?

Jennifer Dunn: Yes, I agree. At the moment, it is easy to buy an air weapon. Virtually anyone who is over the required age can go into a shop and buy one. Although a licensing scheme will not solve the problem by itself, as there will also need to be an amnesty and publicity to let people know that the licensing is going to be introduced, at the moment, the situation with attacks on animals and people is unacceptable and licensing is the only way to address that.

Mike Flynn: The Government estimates that there are up to 500,000 air weapons out there, and I firmly believe that a lot of them will be handed in if a licensing scheme is introduced. That will take many weapons out of circulation. We have no idea how many of those weapons are used by the proper owner or by a relative or a youngster who is in the house.

Many of the attacks, particularly on cats, happen in housing estates, which is where the fit-and-proper person test comes in. We have always argued that people should have the landowner's permission if they are carrying out pest control and stuff like that, but nobody has the landowner's permission to shoot in places such as the Union canal in Edinburgh or Linlithgow loch. Under the fit-and-proper person test, somebody who is a fit and proper person will be allowed to have an air weapon, but that should include a requirement that people have to demonstrate where they will use the weapon and for what purpose.

Cameron Buchanan (Lothian) (Con): How will the police handle the rash of licence applications? There will be an awful lot of people to license.

The Convener: That is perhaps not a question for this panel to answer; it is maybe best saved for the next panel. If anyone has a view, please indicate that.

Mike Flynn: I am more than confident that the police will be able to answer that question fully for you.

Dr North: I feel the same. We have always suggested that such registration should have a phasing-in process, with new weapons coming under the registration system immediately and current owners getting licences over a number of years.

Jennifer Dunn: I agree that this panel is not best placed to answer that question.

Cameron Buchanan: Do you believe that people who do not want to register the guns will hand them in during an amnesty?

Mike Flynn: I think that there are a lot of responsible people who might not have used their airguns for years and do not want them to fall into the hands of others. I believe that—unless they decide to get a licence for their guns because they have a fit and proper purpose for having them—if those people know that they have to comply with a law, a lot of guns will be handed in.

Jennifer Dunn: I agree. A lot of airguns are kept in drawers and are brought out very occasionally. It would be better if they were out of circulation.

Dr North: As long as there is sufficient publicity to ensure that everyone is aware that now is the time to hand the airguns in, there will be a good response, as weapons that have been forgotten about will be remembered and handed in.

John Wilson (Central Scotland) (Ind): One of the arguments that we have heard against licensing is that it might cause some individuals to trade up and apply for a firearms licence or a shotgun licence instead of relying on an air weapon. Under the criteria that are set out, they might qualify for such a licence as a fit and proper person. Some people have said that, in some cases, it might eventually be easier to apply for a shotgun licence than to apply for an airgun licence.

Dr North: I hope that it would not become easier to get a shotgun licence. I hope that the standards that apply now would apply at that point.

I am not in a position to know what is in the minds of current airgun owners. I suspect that the scenario that you outline is unlikely and that only a small number of people who currently shoot with airguns and do not use rifles or shotguns would change their weapons. I suspect that those who are involved in shooting have overestimated the degree of interest in shooting that those who shoot only with airguns actually have in shooting. I am not clear that the problem, if it is seen as a problem, exists.

Jennifer Dunn: One of the attractions of airguns, which feeds into why they are a problem, is that they are fairly cheap and easy to get hold of. Shotguns are far more expensive and their storage and use are far more regulated. It is unlikely that many casual airgun users would trade up to a shotgun or seek to do so.

Mike Flynn: We would welcome anyone who wished to trade up applying to do so, simply because they would be checked by the police and made fully aware of the responsibilities of owning any weapon that can inflict pain, injury and, potentially, death.

Jennifer Dunn mentioned the issue of security. At the moment, I could buy an air rifle and keep it in my kitchen or somewhere like that, and if my house is broken into that gun could be taken and used by someone else. The police are more than capable of handling the licensing issue.

I declare an interest in that I hold a firearms licence because of my duties with the Scottish SPCA. I know the process that someone has to go through to get one, and I can tell you that the police are extremely stringent.

The committee or the Parliament would also have to consider the cost of applying for a licence. That cost should not be borne by the police. If someone wants to own a weapon and has a purpose for doing so, they should be willing to pay a licensing fee.

09:45

John Wilson: That is the point that I was trying to make in my earlier question. One issue that has arisen is the cost of applying for an air weapons licence. It may be more expensive than applying for a firearms or shotgun licence, because those licences are controlled by the United Kingdom Government and have been set at the same price since 2001.

If we opt for full cost recovery for an air weapons licence, the cost may be substantially higher than the current cost of a firearms or shotgun licence. How would you seek to ensure that the cost of an air weapons licence did not become too prohibitive?

Mike Flynn: That is for politicians down south to argue about. The burden of cost should not fall on the taxpayer or the police. In this country, we do not have a right to bear arms. If someone wants something that can potentially kill, they should be willing to pay for it. When people realise that they do not have a fit or lawful purpose or that they do not have permission to shoot in certain places, that will encourage many of them to get rid of their guns.

Dr North: We have had a lot of discussions recently with the Home Office and various ministers on the issue of the underfunding of the licensing process for firearms and shotguns. At one time, there was going to be a significant increase in the cost. I think that there will still be some sort of increase, but we understand that the current Government has blocked a full increase.

I am rather dismayed that the police have had to subsidise the current application process, as that raises the sort of problems that Mr Wilson has just mentioned. However, that is not a reason for not introducing airgun licensing.

Jennifer Dunn: I agree with everything that Mike Flynn and Dr North have said. My colleagues who lobby Westminster are raising with the Westminster Government the issue of the cost of shotgun licensing and the subsidy.

I should add that the League Against Cruel Sports, in its submission to the Smith commission, asked for weapons licensing to be devolved to the Scottish Parliament so that the licensing of airguns and higher-calibre weapons could be considered holistically. I do not think that the Westminster Government’s position should block progress in Scotland.

John Wilson: I have a final question for Dr North. You said in your opening remarks that there have been a number of fatalities caused by air weapons. We know from the evidence that we have heard previously that there have been a number of serious injuries. Can you quantify the number of fatalities that have been caused by air weapons?

Dr North: I cannot give you the number off the top of my head. The rate probably averages one per year in Great Britain. Over 20 years or so, there have been approximately 15 young people and teenagers killed in airgun incidents. Some were deemed to be accidents, and some—as in the case of Andrew Morton—were criminal acts.

It is important to say that, even in those incidents in which someone sustains a minor injury, the experience is still extremely stressful for the victim. We cannot dismiss such incidents as trivial just because a person sustains only a minor injury. We know, from communications that we receive, about the stress that people feel when they are hit, out of the blue, by something that is fired from a distance by someone else.

John Wilson: Thank you. As I said, we are looking at licensing in Scotland. You have given UK figures, but we are concentrating on the figures for Scotland. We suspect that 500,000 air weapons are held here—I do not know what the UK figure is—and I am trying to get a clear picture of the number of fatalities in Scotland.

Dr North: If it would help the committee, we could look back through the incidents and pick out the Scottish figures. They will certainly be available in the firearms crime statistics for the past few years.

The Convener: It would be extremely useful if we could have those figures, Dr North.

Willie Coffey: Good morning, panel.

Dr North, I am grateful for the written evidence that you submitted to the committee, some of which is quite harrowing. My colleague John Wilson introduced that aspect. You present some statistics in your submission, and you show that the majority of firearms offences in Scotland involve air weapons—indeed, you refer to a fatality.
As a new member of the committee, I would like to know in what way a licensing scheme will reduce that type of offending. What is it about licensing that will bring that number down and make the public safer?

Dr North: A number of the more serious incidents, particularly those involving young people, have occurred when someone has come across an airgun in the house that has been kept rather casually by the owner, who may be a parent, and has been playing around with it. We believe that, if the owner had to have a licence for that weapon, they would think seriously about whether it ought to be there.

I apologise for repeating this, but what runs through so many of the incidents is the casual way in which air weapons are treated. We think that if the signal is sent out that they are dangerous and therefore need to be licensed, a large number of people will think, "We don't want them any more, so we won't just leave them lying around the house."

Willie Coffey: There is also the practice of plinking, as I believe it is referred to.

The Convener: "Plinking" was a new word for me too, I have to say.

Willie Coffey: As I understand it, plinking involves a casual use of air weapons in people’s back gardens, presumably to take pot shots at objects or even people or animals. Do you think that a licensing scheme will really address that?

Dr North: I understand that plinking will no longer be legal. There are already measures in place that make it illegal to fire pellets outside the confines of one’s own property. Again, the Gun Control Network is contacted by people who are disturbed by the behaviour of neighbours and who find such activity intimidating and threatening. If they raise it with the neighbours, they find that they are challenged. Even when they complain to the police, no progress is made because it is sometimes difficult to prove that someone is firing slightly off line.

I know that that is the only form of shooting that some airgun owners undertake, but I think that they should consider what they do in a wider context and how their neighbours feel about it. If they are keen on shooting with an airgun, they can go to an airgun club and do it.

The Convener: For clarification, the bill, if it is enacted, will not necessarily put a halt to plinking, but through the licensing regime it may reduce the amount of it that goes on.

Willie Coffey: Lastly, do you have any views on how it should be determined whether a person is deemed fit to own an air weapon and to have good reason to own one? I intend to ask the police witnesses on the next panel how they propose to make that sort of assessment.

Jennifer Dunn: I wanted to raise a specific point about general licensing law. The committee may or may not know much about that, but it is the mechanism by which it is legal for people such as farmers or estate owners or employees to shoot animals that are deemed to be pests.

In general licensing law, if somebody has an unspent conviction for wildlife crime they are deemed unsuitable to kill animals. We would really like that provision to be extended to airgun licences, because we think it makes a lot of sense.

Dr North: There are obviously guidelines for other firearms. It is clearly important that anyone who is licensed to fire an airgun does it for the correct reasons. I know that there has been some debate about what those reasons should be, but I am sure that, with police help, appropriate guidelines can be formulated. What would not be allowed is the kind of casual use that we believe is responsible for so many of the incidents that harm people, property and animals.

Mike Flynn: I think that that is a question for the police to answer at the time that a licensing application is made. If the applicant is a young man who stays in a high-rise flat in a housing estate, who has no access to any land and who is not carrying out pest control on behalf of somebody else, the police will quite rightly ask why they want an airgun if they do not even have a garden that they could plink in.

On the plinking question, I firmly believe that many of the injuries to animals occur because, for a 17 or 18-year-old, shooting the same tin can gets a bit boring and if they see a moving target flying past, that might be an attractive option. To go back to our veterinary survey, I cannot think of any instance in which someone was aiming their air rifle at a tin can, but the pellet ricocheted off and ended up embedded in a cat or a swan’s head. People are deliberately aiming at animals. The licensing will get rid of the situation in which people have a gun but have nowhere lawful to use it.

Willie Coffey: I am very grateful for that. Thank you.

Anne McTaggart (Glasgow) (Lab): Good morning, panel. Given the wealth of experience and knowledge that you have, I seek your advice on the bill and the proposed licensing regime. Do you see any omissions? Is there anything that should be in the bill that is not in it?

Mike Flynn: If we are to go down this route, a definition of what a pest species is would have to be included. It would also have to be stated that people must have the landowner’s permission to Clare Adamson: What about plinking for scouting or cadet groups, or other groups that are doing target shooting as part of their activities? Should it take place in a more controlled environment?

Jennifer Dunn: If they were doing it in suitable premises, perhaps in association with a shooting club, and were not shooting live animals, I do not think that we would have any objection, as long as it was not being done in somebody’s back garden or casually.

Dr North: I assume that the scouts would be well organised and would conduct shooting in an appropriate place, not in somebody’s back garden.

Mike Flynn: I imagine that a body such as the Scout Association would use a proper purpose-built place. Moreover, the youngsters would be supervised. The gun club or the scoutmaster would be licensed through the police and would know the responsibilities that came with that.

Cameron Buchanan: Ms Dunn, you said in your submission that you felt that under-18s should not get a licence to shoot live animals. How would you regulate that? Are you still of that opinion?

Jennifer Dunn: Being shot with an airgun can be very painful for the animal—it might not be killed outright and it could suffer quite horribly. Someone needs to have a certain level of maturity and responsibility before they seek to take the life of an animal. We think that 18 is a suitable cut-off point.

Cameron Buchanan: But do you have evidence that a lot of people who are under 18 are trying to shoot live animals?

Jennifer Dunn: It goes back to the problem that the police have little evidence. Anecdotally, there are problems with teenagers shooting animals in parks and so on. I would love to be able to provide more figures, but the nature of the crime means that I cannot.

Cameron Buchanan: But you said that the legislation should be amended. That would be quite a difficult amendment to make; it would certainly be difficult to regulate that.

Jennifer Dunn: The pro-shooting organisations argue that the whole scheme will be difficult to regulate. I can see that there will be some difficulties with the practical application, but that is no reason to back away from laws that could be very sensible.

John Wilson: Since we have Superintendent Flynn with us today, I will take the opportunity to put the issue into context. How many animals have been shot using crossbows or archery bows?
Mike Flynn: We have not had any reports of incidents involving archery bows for a long time. This year, we have had two incidents with crossbows, both of which were in Inverness, in the area of Raigmore roundabout. In one case, it was believed that the animal had been hit by a bolt from a crossbow then dumped there. Before that, it was geese in Lanarkshire. It is not a huge problem, though—it is nowhere near as bad as the airgun situation.

John Wilson: Ms Dunn, do you know of any incidents in which crossbows or archery bows have been used?

Jennifer Dunn: The only one that I am aware of was two or three years ago in a park in Glasgow, when a swan was targeted. It is within the competency of the Scottish Parliament to legislate on crossbows. However, as Mike Flynn said, airguns are used more often than crossbows in attacks on animals.

The Convener: Would anyone like to give the committee any additional information?

Mike Flynn: It is not just the Scottish SPCA that supports what is being proposed. In the survey that we carried out in 2012, 91 per cent of veterinary practices that responded were in favour of a change in the legislation, 61 per cent supported licensing and only 5 per cent supported the status quo.

Respondents were members of the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons, who deal with the issue first hand and see the distress that the owners go through and the costs that owners incur. I would not like to think how much it cost the lady in Paisley to get her cat's leg amputated a couple of weeks ago or how much pain that animal went through. Imagine that your pet comes home after being shot. That is an attack on you as well as your pet—some people take it that way.

We dealt with 178 incidents that were reported to us. Those were incidents in which a live animal was involved and people thought that there was something that we could do to help. I have no idea how many people come across shot starlings or sparrows and do not report them to us because the birds are dead.

We firmly support what is being proposed.

The Convener: Could you tell us who carried out that survey and how many folk responded to it?

Mike Flynn: The Scottish SPCA wrote to 120 veterinary practices throughout Scotland, 75 per cent of which responded. Of them, more than 80 per cent had treated an animal that had come in with a pellet in it. Somebody's cat can go missing for a couple of days. It might come home with a limp, but the owner will not know that it has been shot until it is X-rayed. The vet has to decide whether to remove the pellet.

A couple of years ago, we had a Staffordshire bull terrier that we believed had been tied to a tree and shot, because it had 14 pellets in its head. Our vet, Mr Ian Footer, removed about nine of them. It was quite a heavily built Staffordshire and removing the other five pellets would have caused more damage than leaving them there; it was decided that they would not cause any problems if they were not removed. Luckily, two of the pellets just missed the dog's eye.

We have had cats' eyes taken out. We get the occasional fatality—swans seem to be a particular target. Two years ago, members of the public reported an incident in Livingston. When we X-rayed the swan, it had 14 separate pellets in it. The guns that we are talking about are not used like machine guns, which require only one pull of the trigger. That incident involved 14 loads, 14 aims and 14 shots. Sadly, the bird had to be put down. I could easily send to the committee X-rays of cats and swans that we have had in.

The Convener: The horror of the stories that you have just told tells us enough. We do not need to see the pictures, but thank you very much for the offer.

Dr North: In addition to the figures for fatalities and serious injuries, which I will find for the committee, it might be helpful if I got together a list of incidents that reflects the casual nature of some of them. I have a pile of examples, albeit that they are from the whole of Great Britain. If it would be useful for the committee to see some of the more recent press reports, I would be happy to send them.

The Convener: That would be useful. We are aware of some of them. When we had our first round-table session on licensing, we heard about an incident in County Durham. It would be good for us—particularly for some of our new committee members—to get a flavour of what is going on. We would be very grateful for that, Dr North.

Dr North: I will do that.

Jennifer Dunn: We have used case studies because of the difficulty of gathering figures. In those case studies, the injuries to cats, in particular, were horrible, as Mike Flynn has just described. I echo another of Mike’s points—the people we spoke to clearly felt less safe in their community when their pet had been targeted, particularly because airguns are so widely available. Except in one case, they had no idea who did it, other than that it was someone who lived in the same community as them.
The Convener: Thank you very much. Your evidence has been extremely useful and we are very grateful for your attendance.

10:09
Meeting suspended.

10:12
On resuming—

The Convener: I welcome our second panel this morning, who are all from Police Scotland: Assistant Chief Constable Wayne Mawson is head of policing for the west of Scotland; Superintendent Alick Irvine is from the licensing and violence reduction division; and Chief Inspector Fraser Lamb is from the firearms and explosives licensing division.

Do you have any opening remarks, gentlemen?

Assistant Chief Constable Wayne Mawson (Police Scotland): I do.

The Convener: On you go, Mr Mawson.

Assistant Chief Constable Mawson: Thank you, convener, and thanks for the opportunity to give evidence to the committee today.

Part 1 of the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill is principally about people, albeit that it sets out a licence regime that reflects the Firearms Act 1968, which deals with firearms and shotgun licensing. It is accepted that the law surrounding access to firearms is about public safety. As far as Police Scotland is concerned, the bill is about ensuring that inappropriate people do not get access to lethal barrelled weapons that can, by definition, kill.

The case of Andrew Morton, who was a two-year-old toddler when he was shot in the head by a man with an airgun in 2005, is a tragic example of what can happen when the wrong people have access to lethal barrelled weapons. Thankfully, such tragic incidents are very rare, but on most days the police and animal welfare groups have to deal with the results of air weapons being misused. Legislation that allows for responsible ownership of air weapons is to be welcomed. Air weapons in irresponsible hands are dangerous, and keeping people safe is the priority for Police Scotland.

As the committee will be aware, the chief constable of the police service in Scotland is responsible for licensing of firearms and shotguns, and of explosives. We understand that there is significant uncertainty about the number of air weapons in Scotland and, consequently, about the demand that will be placed on the police by the bill’s proposals, but it is a fact that we have at this time systems in place that cope with more than 53,000 certificate holders. Shogun—the information and communication technology system that is used to manage firearms in Scotland—has recently been linked up, which allows for the eight firearms-licensing processing centres effectively to manage workloads throughout Scotland. It can be relatively easily adapted to manage air weapons.

In other words, we have the expertise and experience to process applications and manage the risks. However, we do not have the budget to fund satisfying of that additional demand. Costs will be incurred in upgrading Shogun, in resourcing the departments that will administer the licensing regime and in subsequent criminal justice processes, for example ballistics examination. That is set against unknown demand.

We welcome the provisions of the bill, which will allow current certificate holders to possess air weapons under their firearms or shotgun certificates. That will reduce the demand on police resources.

The committee may be aware that, with the revisions that were introduced by the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1997, the term of certificates was increased from three years to five. That caused peaks and troughs in demand: there are three extremely busy years and two years in which demand reduces. In the light of that experience, it is essential that we legislate for a system that smooths or, as the earlier witnesses said, phases demand. That could be done by allowing the chief constable to determine the length of time for which a first air weapon certificate is issued. By doing that, and by setting a pro rata fee for the length of the first certificate, we can assess demand and allocate resources as required.

I understand that this is stage 1 of the bill and that amendments will likely follow after the committee’s and the Parliament’s considerations. That said, I reiterate that we commend the intention of the bill. We are of the opinion that it will reduce the ability of people who are intent, by design or recklessness, on criminally injuring people or animals, or on damaging property to do so.

The vast majority of people who legally hold firearms conduct their lives in a manner that reflects their acceptance of the responsibility for the safe use of their guns. The number of crimes involving legally held firearms is small in proportion to the number of guns that are held. Those people will not be detrimentally affected by the proposed legislation, but the people who should not have guns will be affected in a way that will only benefit the safety of people in Scotland.
The Convener: Thank you, assistant chief constable. Let us consider some of the budgetary implications that you talked about. You spoke about Shogun being easily adaptable to deal with air weapon licensing. Will it link into the i6 system when it comes into being?

Chief Inspector Fraser Lamb (Police Scotland): Yes.

The Convener: I am sure that that link will be helpful to investigating criminality involving air weapons.

Assistant Chief Constable Mawson: Absolutely. All eight legacy forces are now joined up. Shogun is working really well. It has been in place only since October, but there have been no issues so far. It helps us significantly with firearms licensing and an adaptation to it is a relatively easy fix at a relatively small cost. We have a provisional figure—I stress that it is provisional—of about £20,000.

The Convener: We heard from the previous panel of witnesses that the fees for firearms and shotgun licences, which are controlled by Westminster rather than by the Scottish Parliament, have not gone up for a long time. Those witnesses insinuated that the public are subsidising licenses. Does Police Scotland pick up the tab for that subsidy in Scotland?

Assistant Chief Constable Mawson: In short, yes it does, at the moment. We do a lot of work to ensure that only fit and proper people receive firearms or shotgun licences. A huge amount of work is involved in that, including visits, follow-up visits and checking gun cabinets. To be frank, the cost of that work is not covered by the existing fees. I believe that they have not changed since 2001.

The Convener: I do not want to ask you a particularly political question, Mr Mawson—feel free to say that you do not wish to answer it—but do you think that the costs of the licensing regime for firearms and shotguns should be borne by the owners, rather than by Police Scotland and the taxpayer?

Assistant Chief Constable Mawson: That is a fair question, and I think that the answer is yes. If people want to own a firearm of any kind, whether it is a shotgun, a rifle or an air weapon, they should pay the costs that are associated with that. We are not out to make any kind of profit from it; we just want the costs to be recovered.

The Convener: Before I move off the budgetary aspects, I note that the costs of dealing with airgun incidents must be fairly high. In my constituency a few years back, there was a spate of airgun incidents in the Seaton area. Is there any way of quantifying the costs to Police Scotland of dealing with crime involving air weapons?

Assistant Chief Constable Mawson: Yes. We have done some in-depth research into the matter. I will let my colleague Fraser Lamb answer the question.

Chief Inspector Lamb: Are you referring to the cost of investigation of crimes, convener?

The Convener: Obviously, you can answer only in relation to investigations. We know that there are other costs relating to the health service, and we know that there are also huge costs to lives and to the lives of animals. An indication of what you have would be useful.

Chief Inspector Lamb: I think that Assistant Chief Constable Mawson has been talking about the processing costs. In relation to actual investigations, the costs obviously vary, depending on how much inquiry needs to be done and how much time has to be taken to gather statements, to compile a police report and to record things.

One of the core aspects in such investigations is that we must, in order to establish that a firearms offence has occurred, prove the basic point that the article is an actual gun. Therefore, there is a ballistics cost of £180 each time, by the time we get the ballistics expertise, the provision of a report and a subsequent report being made to the procurator fiscal.

Can we specify how much the cost is per investigation? No—that would be very difficult. However, there are significant costs within the process.

The Convener: Of course, if somebody is killed by an air weapon, the cost of the investigation would be immense, would it not?

Assistant Chief Constable Mawson: The cost would not be a single number of thousands; a homicide inquiry of that nature costs many tens of thousands of pounds.

The Convener: What about a serious injury inquiry?

Assistant Chief Constable Mawson: That can cost several thousand pounds.

The Convener: So, we are not talking about insignificant amounts of money to investigate cases in which air weapons have been involved.

Assistant Chief Constable Mawson: No—absolutely not.

The Convener: I know that it is sometimes difficult to talk about monetary costs in this context. As I said previously, there is the human cost and the cost in animal life.
Clare Adamson: I apologise because as this is my first day on the committee, I am perhaps not as up to speed with the bill as I would have liked to be before this morning’s evidence-taking session. I therefore have a few background questions.

I appreciate that there is no storage issue with air guns; it is purely a matter of licensing. Will vetting of fit and proper persons be as stringent as it is under the shotgun legislation, in your opinion?

Chief Inspector Lamb: We have to reflect the Government’s intention on using a lighter touch.

The issue is the absolute lethality of such weapons. It is accepted beyond a shadow of doubt that they are lethal at close range. However, when we license a person for a firearms licence, they will have something that is used for sporting purposes that is capable of killing a deer at several hundred yards. An air weapon will not do that. Shotguns are extremely lethal at very short range—they have a more devastating effect and are proportionately more lethal than air weapons.

We must accept that we are talking about lethal weapons, but that there are different standards of range when it comes to lethality. We think that a lighter touch will be taken with air weapons, which will be proportionate to their lethality.

As far as checks are concerned, we do not go and visit everyone as part of the checks that we do for the Protection of Vulnerable Groups (Scotland) Act 2007, but if we trust people to work with children and other vulnerable people, should we not trust them to have an air weapon? I think that such an approach is a relatively good gauge. If, during the checking of the systems, information emerged that flagged up a challenge, we would resort back to our tried and tested processes for making sure that a person is a suitable person to have a firearm or a shotgun. Understandably, those processes are quite intrusive.

Clare Adamson: Given that the bill does not provide for any additional regulation about storage, is there anything that will mean that, in gaining a licence, the person will change their behaviour? For example, will guidelines be produced, or will it simply be the case that one has to have a licence to have an airgun?

Chief Inspector Lamb: I think that the people who apply for licences will be responsible. Under the bill, people will have three options: to hand in their air weapons, to apply for a certificate, or to risk becoming a criminal, because it will be an offence to have a weapon without having a certificate. I think that the people who apply for licences will be responsible because of their willingness to put themselves forward for the suitable person test.

We will work up guidance in relation to security, and recommendations on how such weapons should be secured. We will do that in conjunction with the Government.

Clare Adamson: The convener and Dr North had a difference of opinion on what the bill will do in relation to the legal situation on plinking. I am a bit concerned that there is an expectation that the bill will deliver a lot more than it actually provides for. What is your opinion on that point?

Superintendent Alick Irvine (Police Scotland): As far as plinking is concerned, there are sufficient powers to deal with reckless conduct in discharging a firearm. In my view, the bill is a preventative bill in that it will prevent people who are likely to engage in such conduct from getting access to air weapons. On the other side of that, should someone commit an offence, there is a licensing regime in place that will prevent their gaining an air weapon again. At the moment, if a person has committed such an offence, there is nothing to stop them purchasing or acquiring an air weapon. The bill’s intention is to stop that.

Clare Adamson: Given what we have just talked about, do you believe that the bill will result in a significant reduction in the misuse of airguns?

Superintendent Irvine: For me, the issue is access. At the moment, people have unfettered access to air weapons; there are no controls on that. Following the passing of the bill, there will undoubtedly be individuals who will want to surrender their weapons, which will reduce access. It is a question of controlling who can access weapons. To answer your question, I think that the bill will prevent access and will therefore reduce misuse.

John Wilson: Good morning. I refer to the submission that Police Scotland made to the committee. In the third paragraph of the answer to the first question, it states that “the misuse of air weapons has fallen in recent years to very low levels”.

Will you define what you mean by “very low levels”? What are you measuring that against?

10:30

Assistant Chief Constable Mawson: We have identified that recorded offences in Scotland involving all firearms fell in 2012-13 by 32 per cent to 365, compared with 535 offences in 2011-12. Of those 365 offences, almost half—171 offences—involved air weapons. That is the lowest figure that has been recorded in Scotland since comparable records began in 1980.

I will bring you right up to date with some research that we have completed for today’s meeting. It covers April to July this year, so it is from six or seven months ago. During that period, there were 84 offences specifically involving air weapons: 75 of those offences were in public places, six involved injuries to animals, nine involved injuries to humans—one of which was an attempted murder, when a man was shot in the head—nine were in a private dwelling or a garden, and so on.

There is a real threat; people are getting seriously hurt. We get calls all the time about air weapon misuse. I have been a firearms commander for 14 years in three different police forces and I can tell you that when we are busy and there is an awful lot of fast-time risk assessment to do, when we have cops on the ground and when people are pointing guns, it is very difficult to distinguish between an air weapon and a real firearm or shotgun. It is really difficult and challenging.

Another positive impact of the proposed legislation is that it will further reduce the risk of harm to people—including my officers—and it will significantly reduce the drain on my resources, because about half the firearms incidents in the last complete year for which we have figures were down to air weapons. There is an awful lot to be considered in the mix, so we are really supportive of what the legislation is trying to do.

John Wilson: I welcome the updated figures for offences involving air weapons for that four-month period because the total number of offences in that period represents 50 per cent of the total number of offences over the whole of the last accountable year. Based on that trajectory, we would expect a 50 per cent increase in offences across the year, compared with the previous total. I would appreciate it if the committee could get a copy of that list of incidents that have been reported as criminal activities and on which police have taken appropriate action.

You mentioned in your submission, and again just now, that you expect a reduction in the number of incidents as a result of the legislation. I know that it is very difficult for you to speculate, but how many of the 84 incidents that occurred between April and July involved people who would fall into the category of not being fit and proper to be licensed to have an air weapon?

Assistant Chief Constable Mawson: It is almost impossible to speculate on that. More generally, I can say that we expect that the benefit of legislation that prevents people who are not fit and proper, or who do not have a good reason to do so, from holding air weapons, will be that a huge number of air weapons will be handed in to the police for destruction. That means that there will be fewer air rifles and air pistols lying around in wardrobes, on bedside tables, in garages and in attics—where, to be frank, anybody could pick them up, including young people. That has to be a good thing. It is difficult to say which incidents would not have happened if legislation had been in place, but more generally we can say that the bill is definitely the right direction of travel.

John Wilson: In your submission you said:

“a 17 year old student shooting rats with an air weapon in a factory for a friend”— with the friend’s permission—

"would be contravening the proposed legislation."

If the 17-year-old had the property owner’s permission to deal with vermin, would the incident warrant action being taken against them?

Chief Inspector Lamb: The example was used in relation to the proposed conditions under which someone under 18 will be able to use an air weapon, one of which is that the person is employed to carry out pest control. That means that an individual under 18 who wanted legitimately to engage in pest control in an area where they were allowed to shoot would not be able to do so unless they were employed.

John Wilson: Do you think that the bill is in conflict with the Scottish Government’s intentions to lower the voting age to 16? I am just using that as an example of the age at which someone is regarded as a responsible adult. The bill sets the bar at 18—is that too high?

Chief Inspector Lamb: I think that the age limit of 18 in the bill reflects the Firearms Act 1968 and European legislation. I must admit that the issue to do with 16-year-olds voting had not crossed my mind; I was just making the point that the bill is too restrictive of opportunities to shoot for a lawful purpose, in that it requires pest control activity to be linked to employment.

John Wilson: Thank you. Finally, in the Police Scotland submission you asked why, under section 26, the chief officer of police must be notified within a certain time. Why is that a problem?

Chief Inspector Lamb: We were asking about the purpose of section 26. If an air weapon is sold to a French national, for instance, and has no serial number, what are we realistically expected to do with that piece of information? If someone who stays in France is sold an air weapon that to all intents and purposes is unidentifiable, what do we record and why? What would we do with the information? We could not see the point of the provision.

John Wilson: Finally—

The Convener: That is two finallys.

John Wilson: Sorry, I thought that I had better get this one in. How quickly will the police be able to introduce the new licensing regime, following royal assent?
Assistant Chief Constable Mawson: We have plenty of time between now and the likely introduction date to get our ICT and training systems in place and to get guidance out to staff. We will be ready for any likely introduction in 2016.

Willie Coffey: What guidance will enable you to assess whether an applicant is a fit and proper person and has “a good reason” for having an air weapon? Will there be a Scotland-wide licence, so that if a person gets a licence in one part of Scotland but moves to another they will not have to reapply?

Chief Inspector Lamb: The establishment of Police Scotland has enabled us to move towards the standardisation of processes. For example, whether someone applies for a certificate in Wick or Dumfries, the tests in relation to refusal, revocation and so on are the same. We are moving towards greater consistency, with the aim of having absolute consistency on firearms licensing.

The fit-and-proper person test is about responsibility. It is about whether a person is responsible and has a reason for accessing the firearm. Under the legislation, the reason for having a firearm would be extremely important. It would be consistent with the guidance, which would say what we accept as a good reason for having a firearm. That is already reflected. We are used to dealing with good reason tests for shotguns and firearms, so we would be able to adapt quickly our thinking and the tests that we would require to make under the bill.

Willie Coffey: Is the assessment mainly subjective or is it based on any evidence about the person’s history and record? If a person is refused a licence in Ayrshire but then moves up to Aberdeen and tries again, will there be a record of that attempt to get a licence? Does your information technology cope with that?

Also, is there a subjective element to the test in that a person could be lucky in the way that they are assessed in Aberdeen compared with how they would be assessed in Ayrshire?

Chief Inspector Lamb: If a person moves, their nominal details are recorded on Shogun, which is accessible to police working in Dumfries or Aberdeen. Someone who works in Aberdeen can bring up the record of someone who previously stayed in Dumfries and they would be able to see the decision-making process.

We will have to run up guidance on a good reason for a person to have a firearm, and we already have set criteria for good reason for shotguns and firearms, especially firearms, which come under the Firearms Act 1968. The criteria have to be really specific about what a person will use the gun for. They are also specific to guns. If someone has a .17 HMR, it will be used for small vermin. A much bigger calibre gun, such as a .270, will be used for deer.

I think of air weapons as tools to be used for different jobs. For instance, they are used for pest control such as shooting pigeons in a byre where they are defecating over cattle feed and so on. A much more powerful weapon could drill holes in the roof, so it would be inappropriate. It is about using the right tool for the job and having a good reason for it. If someone says that an air weapon is for shooting rats or pigeons, that would be accepted as a good reason.

Willie Coffey: Forgive my ignorance, but is there an appeal process so that a rejected person can appeal? Who would they appeal to if the assessment was Scotland-wide?

Chief Inspector Lamb: There is an appeal process contained within the bill and an appeal would go to the sheriff court. That is replicated in the 1968 act for someone who is refused or whose firearm or shotgun certificate is revoked.

Willie Coffey: We heard from Jennifer Dunn and Dr North that there are likely to be many more incidents than are ever reported because of the nature of the offences. When an incident occurs, are you permitted to consult the register and pay a visit to licensed airgun holders? Can you use the information that you have about unsuccessful applications to visit those persons in relation to any incident?

Chief Inspector Lamb: If we receive information that someone has used a gun inappropriately, we are all over it immediately. The prime reason for the legislation is to keep people safe. If we have information that suggests that someone is using a gun inappropriately, we want to find out all about it and what the circumstances are, and remove that gun at the earliest opportunity. We want to put our foot on the ball and think about what to do with the situation.

That will be recorded on the Shogun system. It is already recorded on the system, so the information never goes away. Would we be able to use the information from a previous application? Absolutely. The information is there; it is evidence in relation to what the inquiry officer found out and what the witnesses were speaking to.

We deal with the issue on a daily basis with the 53,000 people who are certificated to have firearms in Scotland. Much of what the bill proposes is reflected in the 1968 act, and we would try not to reinvent the wheel but to use very much the same processes.
10:45

Willie Coffey: To clarify, those who are unsuccessful in applying for a licence will still be known to you, and they could be among those who the police will wish to visit in relation to an incident.

Chief Inspector Lamb: Yes.

Willie Coffey: That is very helpful.

The Convener: With regard to Mr Coffey’s question about the Dumfries to Aberdeen situation, was Shogun in place before the inception of Police Scotland? Was there co-ordination among the eight forces on applications?

Chief Inspector Lamb: Before the inception of Police Scotland there were eight chief constables, who were each responsible for firearms licensing within the area in which the certificate resided. With one chief officer of police for the whole of Scotland, we have got to have consistency.

The Convener: Would it have been easier in yesteryear to move from Aberdeen to Dumfries and, having been refused a firearms licence in Aberdeen, to get one in Dumfries?

Chief Inspector Lamb: Certain markers were put on the police national computer in relation to refusal or revocation of a licence. Therefore, licensing staff in Aberdeen would have been able to identify that application very quickly and to say that there was a marker on the computer system showing that the person had been refused a licence or had had one revoked in Strathclyde. Police would pick up the phone and speak to—

The Convener: However, it was not as consistent as what you have in place now.

Chief Inspector Lamb: It is much more consistent now.

Superintendent Irvine: There was no formal mechanism for notification when certificate holders moved or when someone was refused a certificate in one chief constable’s area and then applied in another area. Certificates were linked to residence under the terms of the 1968 act. Practically, they would have to get in a different address under the chief constable who was making the decision. In practice, there was no way of us mapping across Scotland who was applying to different chief constables. However, the new system and the new processes that are in place allow us to manage it as a nation.

Assistant Chief Constable Mawson: The system is now much more joined up. Mr Coffey’s point about subjectivity is well made.

As lead for firearms licensing for Scotland, I have started a process of inviting all firearms licensing staff—whether police officers or support staff—to training events at Tulliallan for whole days at a time. They get the same training to the same standard, along with the same guidance. We share experiences, difficulties and challenges. That goes a long way towards reducing significantly the element of subjectivity.

Of course, everything is now recorded on the national database, which everyone has access to.

Cameron Buchanan: As I understand it, not every airgun or air pistol has a unique identification number. How will you get round that when you are trying to license them?

Chief Inspector Lamb: The bill is about people rather than guns. People will be allowed to have certificates to possess air weapons. Under the shotgun legislation, a person is allowed to hold as many shotguns as they wish under their shotgun certificate. It is different for a firearms certificate—

Cameron Buchanan: The person is identified on the shotgun certificate, are they not?

Chief Inspector Lamb: They are identified. As far as we understand the bill, there would not be a mechanism for identifying, for instance, that the weapon is a .22 air rifle. As you say, a lot of the weapons do not have identification numbers on them, so we would not be able to identify them. It would be a case of a person, as an individual, being allowed to possess their weapons.

Cameron Buchanan: Would the quantity be specified, as it is in the shotgun legislation? I have two shotguns, and it is specified what make and what number they are. For airguns, is it proposed that the certificate would say that someone can have two, three or four?

Chief Inspector Lamb: There is no proposal for that in the bill, as far as I am aware.

Anne McTaggart: I will ask the same question that I asked the previous panel. You will have had loads of time to make up a wish list—after all, it is the season to be jolly—but do you think that there is anything that would make the bill better? Has anything been omitted from it?

Assistant Chief Constable Mawson: I will let Alick Irvine and Fraser Lamb add some more value but, for me, the big strategic issue is how we will smooth things out. We cannot have thousands of applications coming in on one particular day, our struggling to cope and exactly the same thing happening five years later. That is not a pragmatic or commonsense approach, and we need some kind of phasing-in or smoothing-out process.

Superintendent Irvine: That is a critical issue for our organisations. With regard to the management of the offences and the licensing regime that will be created, I am pretty confident that the bill covers everything that will support us, keep our communities safe and allow a proportionate licensing regime to be put in place.

Chief Inspector Lamb: To reiterate Mr Mawson's point, it is hugely important that we get the smoothing right. When this legislation comes into force, a huge number—I am sorry; I should perhaps say an unknown but probably quite significant number—of people will apply for an air weapons certificate. Under the bill, there will be a small on-going demand, with a huge bulk of renewals every five years. That means that, every five years, we will have to deal with a huge workload over a very short time, while for the other four years and 11 months, that workload will diminish. That will make it very difficult to plan for staff, resources, commitment, checks and so on.

Under our smoothing proposal, the chief constable can decide how long the first certificate will last for, which will allow us to deal with the same number of renewal applications per month. In other words, certificate number 1 might last a year, certificate number 2 might last 13 months—and so on, until certificate number 60, which would last for five years and 11 months. Under that system, we would have the same number of people applying for a certificate every month, and we can plan for and resource that.

Anne McTaggart: How did you manage with your previous weapons amnesties, and what lessons did you learn?

Chief Inspector Lamb: In a recent firearms amnesty in England and Wales, 350 firearms were handed into the Metropolitan Police, about a quarter of which were air weapons. I think that our air weapons figures will outstrip those figures.

The Convener: Basically, you are telling us that there will be a lot of scrap metal about.

Chief Inspector Lamb: I think that a lot of air weapons will be handed in and destroyed, and the figures will dwarf the amnesty figures in England and Wales. There will be people saying, "My grandfather's air weapon is lying up in the loft: it's not been used for decades and we have no good reason to have it, so let's hand it in to the police."

Anne McTaggart: Thank you.

Clare Adamson: I have a supplementary to Cameron Buchanan's questions. If people have criminal intent, that is a difficulty for everyone in society; however, we cannot get over the fact that there will always be someone who will have such intent. That said, let me run a scenario past you. If you have no record of the number of guns that people with air gun licences have, can someone who is found in possession of a gun but not in possession of a licence not just claim that the gun is owned by a licence owner? That assumes, of course, that someone who is not upstanding slips through the system and gets an air gun licence. What would happen in that situation?

Chief Inspector Lamb: Police officers have a healthy dose of cynicism, and I think that we would ask the other person whether they had a certificate and pose all the investigative questions that we would expect officers to ask such individuals. We will be able to deal with that situation simply by investigating it appropriately and ascertaining what the facts are.

Clare Adamson: If, in that scenario, you suspected that someone was at it—in other words, the gun in question belonged to another person, and the two people involved were in collusion—would you be able, under the powers in the bill, to remove the licence?

Chief Inspector Lamb: Yes. It comes back to the unfit to be trusted test, which is quite a low bar in relation to firearms legislation. I think that, if it were proven that someone was telling lies, they would be unfit to be trusted with a firearm.

The Convener: Some have said that this legislation will affect only law-abiding citizens and will do nothing to stop or reduce criminality. Do you have anything to say about that view?

Assistant Chief Constable Mawson: I think that I have already covered that, convener. We know that there are a lot of air weapons out there; the exact number is not known, but the gun trade has suggested half a million. Three things will happen under this legislation. First, people will register—and they will for the most part be fit and proper people. Secondly, a huge number of weapons will be sent to the police to be disposed of as scrap. Thirdly, there will be a group of guns that will still lie around, but the number will be significantly smaller than the thousands that are currently in circulation and which someone could spontaneously pick up one day and do something very silly with. We have already mentioned the 84 offences that have been committed in the past four or five months, including an attempted murder with a shot to the head, and the bill will definitely have a positive impact on keeping people safe.

The Convener: Thank you very much for your evidence, gentlemen. It is appreciated.
Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

10:16

The Convener: Agenda item 2 is our third oral evidence session on the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. We have one panel of witnesses, who will discuss the alcohol licensing provisions in the bill.

Before I introduce the witnesses, I would like to clarify the committee’s approach to who we ask to appear before us and the general criteria that we adopt. This is directed towards those from the public sector, including local authorities in particular, although for others our approach is similar.

When deciding who to invite, we look to achieve a balance from across the country that covers both rural and urban. We also have in mind coverage from affluent and less affluent areas. We aim to spread the coverage across the whole country, although we recognise that those in the larger urban areas might have more experience and knowledge of particular issues to share with us. We also recognise that staff in the larger urban areas can be more specialised and potentially handle a wider variety of issues, but we are always looking to the impacts on smaller areas, too.

We consider written submissions and other pertinent information before we select witnesses, and we are always interested to hear from those who provide an opinion that may differ from the status quo. If we receive submissions that provide similar opinions, we will try to avoid duplication on our panels, and we will strive to have contrary views available to test what we are told.

When we issue an invitation, we expect witnesses to attend. We will cancel an invitation only in exceptional circumstances. These invitations are not like invites to attend Government or other working groups, and we do not consider acceptance to be discretionary. We have powers to compel, but we do not want to use them, as we appreciate that it is far better all round that people attend willingly.

If witnesses feel that they are not the appropriate person to attend, they should contact the clerk immediately. That will allow an opportunity to discuss whether there might be a better alternative. If witnesses leave it to the last minute to contact the clerks, they will not be allowed to withdraw, and we will expect them to attend.

I welcome the witnesses on today’s panel, who have accepted our invitation to appear in front of the committee. John Lee is public affairs manager of the Scottish Grocers Federation; Stephen McGowan is head of licensing at the Institute of Licensing; and Paul Waterson is chief executive of the Scottish Licensed Trade Association.

Welcome, gentlemen, and good morning. Would you like to make any opening remarks?

John Lee (Scottish Grocers Federation): The Scottish Grocers Federation is the national trade association for the convenience store industry in Scotland. There are about 5,500 convenience stores in Scotland; SGF would not claim to represent them all. There is a high density of convenience stores in Scotland relative to the rest of the United Kingdom. Convenience stores are embedded in every city and town in Scotland and in every community, whether in rural or urban areas.

Alcohol is an important category for our members. SGF is an active member of the Scottish Government alcohol industry partnership, it sits on Glasgow City Council’s local licensing forum and the City of Edinburgh Council’s licensing forum and is an active participant in the east Edinburgh community alcohol partnership.

In our written response to the committee, we focused mainly on overprovision. I am happy to answer any questions on that, and I thank the committee very much for inviting us to give evidence.

Paul Waterson (Scottish Licensed Trade Association): The Scottish Licensed Trade Association was formed in 1880. We represent the independent trade in Scotland. Our members run our nation’s pubs, bars and hotels. We also have some members in the off-sales sector, and our membership includes operators of late-opening premises. We are delighted to be here to give you our views.

Stephen McGowan (Institute of Licensing): I am here to represent the Institute of Licensing, which is an umbrella organisation that represents licensing practitioners across the UK, including practitioners in private practice and practitioners who work for local authorities and police authorities. It is representative of many stakeholders who are involved in the day-to-day administration of licensing systems across Scotland and the UK. I am a solicitor in private practice. I appear on behalf of the licensed trade at licensing boards across Scotland.

In our submission, we sought to draw to the committee’s attention three issues, all of which are technical. Although they are not among the larger issues, they are issues that, as practitioners, we feel are incredibly important. The first concerns the existing provisions for the transfer of licences under the alcohol licensing regime, which I think that every licensing practitioner in Scotland would agree require to be updated. I hope to address that later.

Our second key point relates to provisional alcohol licences. Such licences are sought when there is no building or when the building is under construction. There are difficulties on the ground—if I can use that phrase—with the existing system.

Finally, there is an issue with the status of licences that have been surrendered. The Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 does not deal with the surrender of licences particularly well, and I would like to address that. In addition, I would like to address the reintroduction of the fit-and-proper-person test and some issues that the institute has identified surrounding the use of police intelligence and the reference to the reintroduction of consideration of spent convictions.

The Convener: Thank you very much.

I will start with the subject of overprovision, which Mr Lee and Mr Waterson mentioned. I was quite surprised, given previous discussions that I have had with members of the bodies that you represent, that there are real concerns in some quarters about overprovision.

Mr Lee, what is the current experience of you and your members as regards how licensing authorities deal with their duty to assess overprovision?

John Lee: Under the 2005 act, all licensing boards must have regard to overprovision in their statement of licensing policy. It seems to us that, under the new bill, licensing boards are being encouraged to look at their entire geographical area as a potential area for overprovision. We feel that that could inhibit trade and be anti-competitive, particularly for our more independent members. If they were trying to refit their store and increase the size of their alcohol sales area, it could be an inhibitor for those types of expansion and investment plans.

There are different views on boards on the idea of overprovision. There has been a lot of focus recently on arguments that the number of alcohol outlets is responsible for alcohol-related harm. We feel that that is a misguided approach. I genuinely feel that there is not sufficient evidence to say that it is the number of outlets that causes harm.

There are a number of issues around overprovision that cause us concern. Overall, boards have to judge every case on its merits. When they look at a licence application, they have to consider whether the criteria for the licence have been met and either grant or refuse it on that basis. We do not think that a blanket approach to overprovision would be helpful.
The Convener: You mentioned that a retailer may plan to expand the area that they sell alcohol from. During one of our initial panel discussions, it was suggested that retailers could have a wee shelf with some alcohol on it that they could continually replenish from a huge storeroom out the back. How do we judge the retail space compared to the storage space when it comes to defining overprovision?

John Lee: At the moment, the Edinburgh licensing board requires applicants to state in their operating and layout plans the size of their alcohol sales area in linear metres. Our concern was that, if we start to drill down into the issue of overprovision and what will make an area into an area of overprovision, the overall metrage of alcohol sales area could come into play. We could almost put a cap on the sales area in a particular area and say that it cannot be increased at all. If, for some reason such as a shop refit or changing customer needs, a retailer wanted to expand the alcohol sales area, they may be prevented from doing so because of a particularly strict overprovision policy.

The Convener: Should licensing boards take into account the storage area, however? In some regards, what matters is not the shelf area but how they manage to keep that shelf stocked.

John Lee: Indeed, but it is only that shelf area that will be open to the public. That will determine the amount of alcohol that is on display and on sale at any given time.

The Convener: Do you think that, logically, the storage area should also be taken into account?

John Lee: I do not see how that would be helpful. There have also been discussions within Edinburgh about whether the volume of alcohol that an applicant expects to sell should be included in their application. Again, I do not see what utility that would bring.

The Convener: That would be quite difficult to define, one would imagine, particularly for a new premise.

Mr Waterson, I had the pleasure a number of years back of talking to your members at their annual general meeting in Aberdeen, and I was surprised that a lot of the offline chat was about overprovision and your members’ concerns about it. What do you feel about the current circumstances with licensing boards?

Paul Waterson: It is an argument that has been raging since before the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976, going back to the days of the Clayson report. Our position has not changed since then. Overprovision is included in the 2005 act, which means that it is a ground for refusal. It is recognised in principle. The question is, how do we make it work?

We have heard the detail about what should be taken into consideration, and controversial items come up from time to time. In 2010, the board in West Dunbartonshire came up with an approach that we thought was novel and that took into account a range of factors. It decided that the whole area was overprovided. However, because of board changes, the work that we had done with others in the area fell apart. We have seen controversy in Edinburgh, where there were board changes, or changes in political attitudes, after it had been decided that off-licences would be refused.

Without going into all the details and the arguments that rage about the issue, our position has always been that there should be a freeze on the number of licences. That would not stop development, because licences could be transferred within the system, so there would be plenty room for development of new premises. If somebody wanted to open premises, they would have to have a licence of a similar kind and for the same square footage. A freeze would not stop development—it would actually help, because it would give confidence. We should remember that overprovision is covered in the 2005 act, so it is up to us to try to make that work, and a freeze is the only way that we can see it working. That happens in Northern Ireland with some success.

What could be worse for the development of our trade than all liquor licensing sales in Scotland being controlled by five or six operators? If that does not stop development, I do not know what will. How do we get some balance back into the market? Ultimately, with overprovision, we get overcompetition, which is responsible for the downward pressure on price, and that creates the problems that have led to our Government’s attempts to implement minimum unit pricing. If minimum unit pricing is the short-term answer to cut pricing and the general race to the bottom and deterioration in standards, dealing with overprovision is the long-term answer. We want a trade that is based on the quality, not the quantity, of premises.

The Convener: The committee has received a petition that we are considering as part of our scrutiny of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill about a major supermarket chain—I will not name it—taking over smaller premises in high streets to set up the express kind of stores. Is that the kind of business that is taking over the market?
Paul Waterson: Supermarkets blitzkrieg their way through. I do not speak for convenience stores but, through time, the best sites will be snapped up by the big operators—we have seen that happen in Edinburgh—and we will lose independent operators. The situation is the same in the on-trade. I certainly do not want to lose independent operators, because they give people choice. Independent operators will be left with the scraps. They will be forced further and further out, and we will end up with five or six operators dominating the alcohol market in Scotland. Indeed, that is the case already—the figures are there to prove it. That is not good for competition or in any other way.

Licensing legislation is there to redress that balance. There is a host of arguments for and against the introduction of measures on overprovision. It is a numbers game, and it should be a numbers game. I stress that, within the numbers, licences could be transferred and development could still take place. People do not understand that. They think that, if the numbers are frozen, there will never be a new opening and it will not be possible to transfer licences in the system, but that is not right. A freeze will help development, not stop it.

The Convener: Mr Lee, would you like to comment on the issue about big operators coming into the high street?

John Lee: Yes, I am aware of the petition that you mentioned. Our members are under severe pressure from the organisation that is named in the petition and from other big operators like it. I am not here to defend them, or to speak up on their behalf—I do not even want to do them a favour—but we think that each application has to be judged on its individual merits. That has long been the case and should continue to be so.

The Convener: Mr McGowan, do you have some comments on overprovision?

Stephen McGowan: I endorse the point that each application should be considered on its merits. That has long been the case and should continue to be so.

The institute’s response on overprovision focuses on the introduction of licensed hours, which is in section 54 of the bill. There is an ongoing issue around the concept known as the duty to trade. In short compass, the duty to trade says that a licensed premises must be open throughout its licensed hours—it has a duty to remain open during the hours that have been granted. Very few licensing practitioners agree with that concept: the vast majority of, if not all, licensing practitioners in both private and local authority practice believe that there is no duty to trade. The institute therefore suggests that if licensed hours are to be a factor in overprovision, it would be helpful for the law to confirm that there is no duty for a licensee to open throughout all the hours in his or her licence.

In the 1976 act there was a specific section that stated that it was not a requirement for “any premises to be open for the sale or supply of alcoholic liquor during the permitted hours.” That wording was not carried through to the 2005 act and the institute would like to see that wording reintroduced if section 54 is to be enacted.

The Convener: Mr Waterson, do you have any comments on the licensing hours issue and the proposal to include licensed hours as part of the overprovision assessment?

Paul Waterson: That is just another point of detail that must be taken into account and further arguments will rage on that point. People will question whether other people are opening part time, or all the hours that they say they are opening. It will make the job of licensing boards far more difficult.

John Lee: We have no real desire to see licensing hours extended.

Cameron Buchanan (Lothian) (Con): I want to take up the point about occasional licences and members’ clubs. How do you regulate occasional licences and private clubs? Should they be regulated in the same way?

Stephen McGowan: Under the 2005 act, a voluntary organisation can apply for an occasional licence for its premises. The effect of that is to allow the public in. Under normal circumstances a licensed club premises has members, who are able to sign in members of the public as guests. The occasional-licence route circumvents that situation and allows members of the public access to such premises.

We are aware of issues across various licensing authorities in Scotland where there are concerns about the regulation of club premises. The 2005 act provides certain exemptions for club premises, one of which is that they do not have to name a premises manager in the way that bars and off-sales premises do. Some licensing authorities have raised concerns that clubs are not as well regulated as public access premises, such as pubs, bars and off-sales. It is a policy matter for the Scottish Parliament to decide whether further regulation is merited.

Paul Waterson: That is another problem that we thought would be addressed by the 2005 act but was not. Under the 1976 act, clubs were registered with the sheriff and there was no police entry, which we thought was not a good situation; we knew that there were some problems. Some clubs are very well run, but some are not. Under the 2005 act, clubs have to be licensed, so we thought that that would be the beginning of the end of badly run clubs, because there would be police entry. However, that did not take into account the constitutions of such clubs.

Many clubs simply run as pubs, while enjoying all the advantages of being registered clubs. That is a ridiculous situation, in which clubs are competing with pubs. In some cases, part of the club is licensed and part of it is still the club, but the club people cannot get in because the public are in—the people who want to get in for the reason that the club was formed cannot do so.

It is difficult for us to accept a situation in which the public are allowed into clubs on numerous occasions throughout the year. We would like the loopholes in the law to be closed, so that registered clubs can continue to do what they were meant to do, for their members, instead of making money from the general public.

The Convener: The issue is a bit out of your sphere, Mr Lee, but do you want to comment?

John Lee: I have no knowledge of clubs, convener.

Cameron Buchanan: Are the clubs that Mr Waterson described getting an unfair business advantage?

Paul Waterson: Clubs have an unfair business advantage to start with because they do not pay rates in the way that normal premises do, and they have other advantages. The whole basis is unfair, to start with. If clubs are then allowed occasional licences throughout the year, so that the public can go in, they become big businesses. Some clubs are well run—there is no doubt about that—but some bend the rules, and that is unfair.

Cameron Buchanan: Should we be dealing with all that together?

Paul Waterson: We should certainly go back to the approach whereby a club’s constitution was taken into account and members had to sign people in, along with the other rules and regulations. With clubs now being licensed, that would close a lot of the loopholes. The constitution must be part of the licence and must be taken into account, and clubs should not be allowed consistently to trade with occasional licences until such trade becomes their main business, and the main reason they are there is to make money.

Stephen McGowan: This might be a useful point of clarification. Under the 2005 act there is a limit on the number of occasional licences that club premises can seek—the maximum is 56 days in a calendar year. There is a wee bit more to it, but for the purposes of this discussion, 56 days in a calendar year is the maximum.

It would be useful for committee members to note that a number of club premises have varied their licences, in effect to make them full public-access pub premises, albeit that they have a constitution and appear on the face of it to be members’ clubs. Because they have changed the conditions of their licence, they are allowed full public access. A number of premises in Edinburgh and throughout the country, which were historically club premises that were open to members and bona fide guests, have varied their licences and are allowed public access without those rules applying.

John Wilson (Central Scotland) (Ind): The convener asked whether licensing boards should be able to designate the whole local authority area when assessing overprovision. Is such an approach appropriate or does it go too far? If Highland Council made a decision based on overprovision in Inverness that could impact on other towns and villages in the Highlands. For example, someone might be prevented from opening up a small retail outlet in Wick or Thurso.

John Lee: That is a good question, and your point about a very large local authority such as Highland is apposite. We think that the approach goes too far and that a locality approach should always be taken, right down to local data-zone level. An application should be considered on its merits, with consideration being given to comments and objections from the police, health agencies and so on. A blanket approach to overprovision in the whole geographical area is a step too far. We would not encourage boards to take such an approach under the bill.

As John Wilson said, in Highland, if the main target was a busy urban area such as Inverness, there would be a knock-on effect on local independent convenience stores in rural areas—and such stores are very important to those areas. The provision is a step too far.

Paul Waterson: We want the area to be the whole of Scotland: you know the SLTA’s answer to that.

Licensing boards are in a difficult position on the matter. If a licensing board was to designate its whole area—we believe that boards could do that anyway—and, for instance, a development was to try to get a licence in the area but decided to move into the next one, that could cause a problem for the members of the licensing board with their constituents. It is not good for boards to be in the situation of simply moving the licensing around because one area has a less lax overprovision policy. They worry about that.

Licensing boards are also under great pressure from the bigger operators and they certainly operate a two-tier decision-making system in relation to overprovision. They are very worried about the financial problems that would occur if a decision was appealed. They know that the bigger companies will appeal and that the independent trade perhaps does not have the finance to appeal, so they look upon the bigger developments more favourably than they do on others.

The question about what the area should be becomes part of the argument. We have heard the other side of the argument. There is only one way to sort it out, which is to make the whole country one area with no boundaries, while stressing the point that licenses can be transferred to different areas within the system.

John Wilson: Mr Waterson is basically saying that he would like the whole of Scotland to be categorised as a locality in relation to overprovision. Glasgow and Edinburgh—two major cities—have a lot of bars and off-licences in their city centres. How would it work if someone in Thurso or Wick applied for a licence? Based on your proposal, could somebody in Wick be denied an off-sales licence because of overprovision in Edinburgh or Glasgow?

Paul Waterson: The situation is interesting in rural areas because we have had so many closures and many villages in Scotland have now lost their pubs. If licences were just transferred within the system, it would give people confidence to go into those areas and open pubs.

Just because a village has one or two good pubs does not mean to say that it will have three; it could have three bad ones because the market is split up, and the three could close. The system could be managed so that places that have lost their pubs could get them back. We all know that when a village or another community loses its pub, it can lose its meeting place and its heart. There being a certain number of licences would mean that such things could be managed much better.

If you go into Glasgow or Edinburgh, the circuits of pubs get bigger and bigger. I refer not only to the numbers but to the capacity of the pubs. There are enough: overprovision is agreed, and the issue is how we apply it. That is why we think that the number system would work to take all the controversy away. It works in Northern Ireland. I do not see any problem with the development of pubs in Northern Ireland. There is a good spread of pubs there and the system seems to work okay.

Overcompetition consistently pulls prices down. The rate of closures probably proves the point anyway, but the market can change. It could overheat again—it did in the 1980s, and in the 1990s it went down again and there were closures but it grew again. The constant opening of more and more pubs can create problems.

Stephen McGowan: The institute’s position is that the existing law allows licensing boards to set their whole jurisdiction as an area of overprovision, notwithstanding that this bill seeks to allow that. There was, perhaps, a concern from one or two quarters that the existing terms of the 2005 act did not allow that. The Highland licensing board, for example, has an overprovision area that covers the whole of the Highland board area, but applies only to off-sales premises where the display of alcohol is 40m² or greater. That is a very good example of a local licensing board taking a very specific approach to overprovision.

Mr Wilson made a comment about cities. Glasgow is another good example of how licensing boards are picking and choosing defined areas within their locality, rather than going for the whole area. The Glasgow licensing board policy on overprovision is not based on where there are the most premises, but on where there is the most harm as a result of irresponsible sale or consumption of alcohol. From memory, I think that there are eight or nine small areas within the city of Glasgow where there is deemed, based on evidence that was presented to the Glasgow board in relation to health harms and crime and disorder, to be overprovision. For example, Sauchiehall Street is not an overprovision area, albeit that it is a very busy part of Glasgow. There are various other examples that I could give you from across Scotland.

John Lee: To follow up on Mr Wilson’s question, another problem with a blanket approach to overprovision is that it would not necessarily take account of the different types of premises that apply for licences. We outline the figures for Edinburgh in our submission. I apologise, because they may be out of date now. Edinburgh has roughly “449 restaurants, 428 bars/pubs but only 243 licensed convenience stores” so I do not think that the city is overprovided for in terms of the number of convenience stores. A blanket policy on overprovision would not take into account the differences between premises and what they offer, and the role that alcohol plays in their business model.

John Wilson: Mr McGowan quite rightly identified that Sauchiehall Street is not included in overprovision in Glasgow but that there are several localities where there are health issues with alcohol. Has any work been done by the trade or by the licensing boards on the type of alcohol that is being sold by off-licences, in particular in the areas that are seen to be suffering most from alcohol abuse? The issue that we constantly get bombarded with is the sale of cheap spirits and tonic wine in particular areas. Traditionally, convenience stores had an off-licence on the basis that they were catering for people who wanted to buy a bottle of wine to go with their meal. That was the traditional reason for granting permission to have an off-licence in a convenience store.

Stephen McGowan: I think that each board has dealt with the issue differently. Some boards have dealt with it based on a higher level of evidence than others. If we look at the Highland licensing policy on overprovision, we can see that the board took considerable evidence from various parties—including the national health service and Alcohol Focus Scotland—about the health-related issues in its area. I think that the Highland licensing board took the view that the problems in its area were more to do with off-sales than on-sales. That is why it formed the view that it would set an overprovision policy based on off-sales in large premises with large displays and would not set an overprovision policy in relation to on-sales.

There are other examples. In East Dunbartonshire and West Dunbartonshire, evidence has been led by various stakeholders and licensing boards have responded to that evidence. Some licensing boards have taken it upon themselves to go out and investigate those matters, but I suspect that in regard to policy formulation, the vast majority of boards are responding to the consultation responses that have been put before them.

Paul Waterson: The best example is West Dunbartonshire, which took many factors into account and came up with an approach in 2010. It is one of the worst areas in the country for alcohol abuse. All that work was done for the right reasons. The approach was novel and fair, and seemed to be workable, but it fell apart due to board changes. It was not sustainable.

The Convener: Do you think that that was down to personnel change on the board?

Paul Waterson: Yes. The council granted a couple of licences to big operators. It was under pressure because one of the big operators said that it would move to another licensing board area and the council believed that it would lose those jobs. I would argue with that, but the council believed that granting the licence would create jobs. The electorate believed it, too, so the council was under pressure. That is what happens in these situations. It happened in Edinburgh—the council comes to a decision but it is not sustainable.

The Convener: It is difficult for us, as a committee, to look at individual areas when we are not aware of the circumstances within those areas. Are there any licensing boards that have had a long-term strategic plan and have stuck to that plan, irrespective of personnel changes on the board? Should boards have a strategic plan, with some flexibility if required?

Paul Waterson: My experience is that there are not such boards. Some boards have had overprovision policies, but they have for one reason or another fallen apart.

John Lee: I am sure that the committee is aware of this, but my understanding is that licensing boards’ statements of licensing policy last for three years, so that is roughly the timeframe for their overall approach. I am not sure that there would be any utility in extending that to four or five years or whatever. That is probably time enough.

The Convener: Alex, is your question on this point?

Alex Rowley (Cowdenbeath) (Lab): Yes. I had intended to ask Mr Waterson to clarify what he meant by the two-tier licensing system, but I think that he did so when he talked about supermarket jobs in West Dunbartonshire. Is that the problem? How useful or realistic would it be to have a policy on overprovision if it was not implemented? What pressure are licensing boards under?

Paul Waterson: We are not saying, “Don’t open supermarkets.” We are saying that they should not be licensed. They can open what they want, but we are talking about licensing. The argument about the number of jobs that supermarkets take from other places will rage, but it puts boards under pressure.

There are all these resources behind big companies, which can play the system for three years. If a company is building a massive operation, three years is not too long to wait to exhaust the objections. In some areas, when people object to new licences—on and off-trade—the company plays the system and one by one, as time goes on, the objections fall apart. We cannot blame people for that. The applicant simply withdraws the application and waits. If there are 50 objections the first time the application is lodged, there might be only 20 the second time it is lodged and 10 the third time it is lodged.

If the company keeps withdrawing the application, eventually people are exhausted, because they have to go to the boards. Community councils are thwarted and lose the objection process, yet the reasons for objecting have not changed. Usually, the objections are very valid. The system is wrong in that respect.
The Convener: Should there be some kind of co-operation between licensing boards?

Paul Waterson: In what sense?

The Convener: Should there be an agreement between, say, West Dunbartonshire Council and one of the neighbouring authorities, such as Glasgow City Council, about licence provision in the boundary area?

Paul Waterson: I remember going to a licensing board many years ago and asking whether it could co-operate with another licensing board. I was told, “No, we always do the opposite of what they do.” There is not a lot of communication between boards. In some cases, they could be in conflict with each other on jobs. It might suit one area to say, “We want that,” if it thinks that there are more jobs in it. Because there is conflict between some boards, the area must be made wider.

The Convener: In Aberdeen, there are licensed premises in what one would think of as quite strange places. Going back in history, they were built there because they were outwith the city boundary and the travellers rule applied, on Sundays in particular. At that point, boards did not co-operate with each other. You argue that there should be a Scotland-wide scenario so that such conflicts do not exist.

Paul Waterson: Absolutely. It might be argued that there are too many boards anyway. When we gave evidence to the Nicholson committee, that committee said—I did not think that it was a good argument—that there are too many boards anyway and that such an approach would not make a difference, but I think that it would make a difference.

The Convener: Mr McGowan wants to come back in.

Stephen McGowan: I will make a couple of minor observations. First, the bill proposes increasing the three-year licensing period to five years. I understand that licensing board members sometimes feel hamstrung when they come in following a council election and have to pursue their predecessors’ policy, so it is helpful that the term of the policy will be linked to council terms instead of being triennial.

My other minor observation relates to Mr Rowley’s comment about licensing boards taking jobs and employment into account. The policy in West Dunbartonshire is clear. West Dunbartonshire Council looked at evidential studies that demonstrated that there are health benefits to employment, and the policy on overprovision was amended to allow the board to take into account the health benefits that could be brought through the creation of jobs. West Dunbartonshire’s licensing board has been specific on that point and is probably more advanced than a number of other licensing boards, because it was one of the first to introduce a large overprovision policy, back in 2010.

Willie Coffey (Kilmarnock and Irvine Valley) (SNP): Will you clarify what you just said about lining up the licence terms with the council terms? Would you suggest that, in the last year of a council’s term, licences be granted for only a year, until the next council election?

Stephen McGowan: Licensing policies currently run for three years and, because of when the 2005 Act came into force, the most recent periods have been 2010 to 2013 and 2013 to 2016. I understand that the bill will change the policy period to five years, on the basis that that is the length of a council term. That means that, when a new council comes in and a new board is established, a new policy can be written at that point and there will not be a one or two-year overlap with the predecessor policy. I believe that the boards requested that.

Willie Coffey: Will you tell us a wee bit more about the issues that you raised at the beginning of your evidence? You and Mr Waterson talked about the pros and cons associated with transfers and about issues relating to provisional licences when there is no building. You also talked about the status of surrendered licences. Will you tell us a wee bit more about your concerns?

Stephen McGowan: I am grateful for the opportunity to do so. I will endeavour to be as brief as possible. I think that licensing solicitors and practitioners would agree unanimously that transfers should be number 1 on the hit list of issues for the Parliament to look at. Licensing solicitors across the country have asked the Parliament to look at the status of surrendered licences. Will you tell us a wee bit more about your concerns?

Under the legislation, transfers take place when someone takes over existing licensed premises. That happens all the time. Normally, it happens because the premises have been bought or sold or have been leased to a new tenant, but it can also happen when a licensee dies, is declared mentally incapable or becomes insolvent. There are several reasons why a licence might have to be transferred.

The 2005 act does not deal with that correctly. It completely ignores the dissolution of companies. There is no provision on what happens to a licence that is held when a company has been dissolved. We are left scrabbling around trying to come up with a fix, with the good will of licensing clerks, to keep premises trading when such situations arise.

The legislation does not take account of the reality of how property transactions and conveyancing are done in Scotland. There are issues with the on-going operation of premises and how the 2005 act reacts to a simple case of a pub being bought and sold. Such cases happen almost every day, yet the act does not adequately deal with them.

The 2005 act does not allow what I call a deemed grant of a transfer. In other words, it does not allow someone to trade straight away while a transfer is pending in the background. However, in England and Wales, the Licensing Act 2003 allows the incoming occupier—they might have bought the premises or taken a lease—to trade before the full grant of the transfer.

The institute and—I hope that I am correct in saying this—just about every licensing solicitor in Scotland very much request that the Parliament look south of the border at the transfer provisions under the 2003 act. I know that the Law Society of Scotland’s licensing law sub-committee, of which I am a member, has offered the Parliament drafting assistance on that point. I would certainly want you to take up its offer.

On provisional licences or licences when the building has not yet been constructed or is under construction, there was a process under the 1976 act for a site-only provisional licence. That allowed a new licence application to be lodged for a premises that had not yet been constructed, without it having to include full and detailed plans. The system under the 2005 act does not allow that. The institute and practitioners want us to return to the 1976 position, whereby an applicant could put in what was known as a site-only application.

The change is being asked for because of the difficulties with the current system. It is hard to produce an architect’s drawing for a premises that might be three years off being built or to present a full application on those terms.

The Convener: Is there a conflict with planning legislation? A licensing board might find it difficult to grant a licence for a building that had not yet been given planning approval, and it might be seen by the public as a fait accompli for a premises to be given the planning go-ahead if a licence for it had already been granted.

Stephen McGowan: Planning approval would always come first; what I propose would not move away from that. The 2005 act requires planning approval to be in place before an application for a liquor licence can even be lodged. The proposal for a site-only application would not negate that. Planning permission would still need to be in place, but the full level of detail about where the bar and the seating were to be would not need to be demonstrated at that early point.

The change is needed because the current system puts off investment. A number of developments are based on capital ventures and loans from banks and so on. That funding often cannot be secured unless the parties know that a licence will be in place. At the early stages of developments where planning is in place but the full details of the premises layout are not yet known, it is difficult for those developments to proceed, because they do not have the certainty that a licence will be in place. That commercial certainty would be of great use. If the Parliament could reintroduce the site-only application, that would be useful. I am happy to give any ancillary points on that by written submission if that would help the committee.

I turn to surrenders of licences and thank the convener for his indulgence. The 2005 act does not deal particularly well with those surrenders. It allows licences to be surrendered, but the problem is that it does not say what the status of such a licence is thereafter. Does the licence exist or not? Is it in the ether somewhere?

Sometimes, a licence is surrendered for legitimate reasons—for example, a premises no longer wishes to trade. That is accepted, but the problem is that there are also examples of licences being surrendered out of spite. If a landlord—the owner of the premises—has allowed his tenant to hold the licence, but they fall out because the rent has not been paid or whatever, the tenant might surrender the licence out of spite. The landlord is left with a pub with no licence, which is not the best situation for them to be in.

The Institute of Licensing and other licensing professionals would like the Parliament to address that by dealing in one way or another with what happens to a licence after it has been surrendered. The Parliament could say that such licences have gone for good, in which case we will know that that is the case, or it could allow licences to be restarted in some way, perhaps through a transfer back to the landlord or to another party.

The 1976 act made no specific provision for surrender. Some parties wrote to licensing boards to say, “I surrender this licence,” but such licences could be retrieved by way of a transfer. We cannot do that under the 2005 act, because it contains the specific surrender provision, which did not exist before. We would like to have that cleared up in one way or another. Either the licence has gone and that is it, or we allow the affected landlord or whoever to reactivate the licence, perhaps by way of a transfer application.
Thank you for your time on those points.

John Wilson: I seek clarification. Included in the bill is the fit-and-proper-person test. I am not saying that there are landlords out there who are not fit and proper persons but, if a licence holder who is trading decides to surrender their licence, that raises a concern—for me, anyway. You suggested that the licence could be transferred to and held by the landlord, but you mentioned other issues about the application of licences and the determination of whether, on the sale of licensed premises or the surrender of a licence, a transfer can take place to someone who might not be deemed a fit and proper person by a board.

What safeguards do you want in the bill to ensure that, in the scenario that you described of a licence holder deciding through spite to surrender the licence, the landlord that the board is asked to and may decide to transfer the licence to is a fit and proper person to hold it? There is a conflict in ensuring that we have a fit-and-proper-person test. As I said, a landlord might not be deemed fit and proper, which is why they do not hold the licence for the premises.

Stephen McGowan: The Institute of Licensing supports the proposal to reintroduce the fit-and-proper-person test. I think that most people in the system support that. I have separate comments about police intelligence, but I will leave them for the moment. If there is a chance later, I will speak about that.

The reintroduction of the test, which we support, will certainly go some way towards addressing the concern that you raise. However, there are existing safeguards in the system. Any transfer application that is lodged can be refused by a licensing board, and Police Scotland can object to it. Every transfer that is lodged is reported on by the police. They will say, “This person has no convictions and we do not object,” or, “This person has convictions and therefore we object.” Even when there are no convictions, the police can object to the transfer of the licence under the existing law if they believe that the licensing objectives would be prejudiced by the grant of the transfer. The existing system has safeguards and the fit-and-proper-person test will supplement them.

Willie Coffey: I will return to the surrender of licences. Did you say that there are circumstances when it is possible for licences to be lost permanently because of that process, or do they get recycled in the system and transferred? Is it possible to lose them?

11:15

Stephen McGowan: Yes. The 2005 act contains the phrase “ceases to have effect”, but it does not define that. There is a debate among licensing practitioners about whether the phrase means that the licence is gone for ever or whether it means that it is somewhere in the ether and can be reactivated.

Willie Coffey: What is the solution to that?

Stephen McGowan: This is probably a policy matter for the Parliament, but the decision is either that the licence is gone or that it can be reactivated. Let us have a decision one way or the other. Practitioners would prefer to allow a licence to be reactivated by way of a transfer, rather than it being lost for ever. I suggest that it would be for the Parliament to decide which of the two options is the preferable policy, but let us have one or the other.

Willie Coffey: I presume that Mr Waterson would prefer licences to be recycled and transferred.

Paul Waterson: We need clarification.

Clare Adamson (Central Scotland) (SNP): I return to the proposal for a provisional site-only licence. Mr McGowan said that that would give investors a degree of confidence that there would be a licence for the premises, should the build go ahead. I understand that the licensing board would have to base its decision on whether it was appropriate to grant the licence on the final layout of the premises and on whether it met all the licensing requirements. The provisional site-only licence is not really a guarantee that the licensing board will offer a licence, because it has to base its decision on the final build. I am having difficulty seeing what kind of confidence or help that would offer.

Stephen McGowan: The existing provisional licence process has two stages. The provisional licence is granted and then there is a second process for confirmation. At that point, the licensing board in effect revisits the application on the basis of the work having been done and environmental health officers having inspected the premises to make sure that it complies with food hygiene requirements. When a provisional licence is granted, the premises cannot be traded from until the second process has been gone through.

To get the licence confirmed in the second process, an applicant has to show the licensing board that they have met all the building regulations and that the premises have been built safely, have passed kitchen checks and have clean sinks. The applicant also has to tell the licensing board who will be the named day-to-day manager of the premises. In some cases when there have been changes to the layout, the provisional licence has to be varied to show the board what the new layout is.
A licensing board would not confirm a provisional licence without knowing what the final layout was. That is part of the existing process. The difficulty is that people cannot lodge their application as early as some developers and applicants would like if they do not have the final layout. The licensing board will always know the final layout when it gets to the confirmation stage.

Clare Adamson: I am having difficulty seeing how a licensing board could even grant a provisional licence if the premises in question was, as you described, like an empty box. How could a provisional licence be granted when it had not been demonstrated to the board that the requirements had been met?

Stephen McGowan: There were 30 years of experience of licensing boards granting site-only provisional licences under the 1976 act without that system falling into disrepute. Under the new system, with a provisional licence, licensing plans and the layout of the premises are always a fiction. We are asking for that to be addressed. It is slightly odd that people have to invent a layout simply to get the application lodged when they do not know whether it will be the final layout.

Clare Adamson: I will return to the club issue that my colleague Mr Buchanan raised. Mr McGowan said that clubs do not have to show that they have a registered manager when they are getting a licence approved. Do all the other provisions about certificated people selling alcohol still apply to a club?

Stephen McGowan: Yes. The staff training regulations apply, which require anyone involved in the sale or supply of alcohol to have a minimum of two hours’ training on various topics—I think that there are 16 in total.

Staff members still have to do the training, but clubs do not have to have a named day-to-day manager or a personal licence holder. Many clubs have personal licence holders on the books, but they might not be named on the licence as a day-to-day manager of the premises.

Anne McTaggart (Glasgow) (Lab): Good morning, panel. I want to ask about the creation of the offence of supplying alcohol to someone who is under 18. That has changed from what it used to be. What difficulties might arise from that, particularly for retailers and staff?

John Lee: That is a good question. It relates to proxy purchase, which is a big issue for us. Unfortunately, there are people aged 18 and over who are willing to buy alcohol on behalf of young people. In general we support the idea of supplying alcohol to young people being an offence but, as you imply, there will always be issues with enforcement.

It is not an easy one to crack, but I think that a multi-agency approach is the way to address it. As I mentioned at the beginning of the meeting, we are involved in a project called the east Edinburgh community alcohol partnership, which is based in Portobello and Piershill in Edinburgh. The idea is to look at underage drinking specifically, and the issue of proxy purchases.

We feel that, because retailers have been successful in implementing the challenge 25 regime in store, the problem has been shifted outwith the store. There is now very little that responsible retailers can do about the problem. We have to bring in police, social services, education and the local community generally to look at cracking it, and the only way we can do that is by establishing things such as community alcohol partnerships. The new offence might be part of that effort.

There will be problems of enforcement, but the only way that we can crack the problem is by broadening it out and looking at what happens outwith the store, in the wider community and the home. That is the only way that we are going to address the issue of proxy purchasing and make the new offence workable.

Paul Waterson: We do not have the same problems with proxy purchase, but we have some sympathy with convenience stores on that. We support the new offence regarding the supply of alcohol to children. The history of our involvement in trying to stop underage drinking and our involvement in a number of agencies show that we are determined to try to sort it out, and not simply by moving it on for someone else to worry about.

The Convener: Mr Waterson, you say that you have no problem with proxy purchasing. I realise that most of your members represent pubs and hotels, but I have seen situations in the past, particularly in licensed premises with outdoor areas, where folk have gone into the pub to buy drink for underage folk who are drinking outside it. I would not go so far as saying that that is an impossibility.

Paul Waterson: Sorry. My point is that it is not as big a problem for us.

The Convener: Before Anne McTaggart comes back in, Clare Adamson has a question.

Clare Adamson: I want to clarify how the provision will affect premises that sell food, if at all—for example, if a child is out with their parents for a meal. Also, what will be the effect in the family home, such as when a parent offers alcohol to a young person as part of a meal in that social setting?

Stephen McGowan: The bill defines where the offence applies, which is a “public place”, so it would not apply to domestic residences. I think that church premises and religious establishments are mentioned as well.

Generally, the institute welcomes the provision as a tightening up of the offence. Historically, the issue was that the offence was tied to what happened on licensed premises as opposed to outside them. The police have had an issue with that for a number of years. The institute welcomes it being tightened up.

The Convener: Anne, do you want to come back in?

Anne McTaggart: No. I have finished.

The Convener: I know that you have been dying for me to ask this question, Mr McGowan. Would it be appropriate for a licensing board to consider spent convictions and police intelligence that has not necessarily been corroborated as part of its investigations into whether an applicant is a fit and proper person?

Stephen McGowan: Thank you for the opportunity to comment, convener. The institute firmly supports the reintroduction of a fit-and-proper-person test. We see that as a good thing for the trade. At the end of the day, all the stakeholders involved in the licensing system want alcohol to be sold and consumed responsibly, and a fit-and-proper-person test would assist that.

Our concern is that the test might, in assessing whether someone is fit and proper, open the door to the use of police intelligence—in other words, unknown and unseen evidence as to whether a person is unfit. The institute’s position is that human rights implications are raised in a situation where a police letter to a board suggests that someone should not hold a licence, but it will not say why. That is not something that a licensing board’s decision should be founded upon. The right to a fair trial and human rights implications certainly apply in those circumstances.

The police might have good reasons why they cannot introduce certain intelligence. There might be on-going investigations or undercover work that means that they cannot produce detailed information. However, the institute’s position is that it would not be correct for the police to point a finger at someone and say, “We don’t want you to get a licence but we’re not telling you why.” Licensing boards cannot really deal with such situations.

It is open to the police to endeavour to introduce police intelligence to licensing boards. In my other capacity as a private practice solicitor, I have appeared at hearings where such intelligence has been led. However, licensing boards find it difficult to respond when there is such a lack of detail. I imagine that licensing boards would be wary of finding a person unfit in those circumstances because they will be aware that applicants who have licences refused on those grounds will probably appeal to the sheriff, and my perception is that a sheriff would say that the board should not have taken the police intelligence into account.

The Convener: You said that that is your perception of what a sheriff would do.

Stephen McGowan: Yes, indeed. Often, the police will have legitimate concerns about an applicant, and it may well be that the person is involved in serious and organised crime, for example. However, even in those circumstances, if the evidence is not put before the applicant and they are not aware of the charges against them, how legitimately can the licensing board find that they are unfit?

The Convener: I will play devil’s advocate. If a person on a licensing board was deemed to be able to get more information round about intelligence, as certain members of police boards have been able to do in the past, would that be an acceptable way round the issue?

Stephen McGowan: Not if the applicant is not made aware of the information. It would not be appropriate for licensing board members to be given evidence that no one else has sight of, including the applicant.

We have accepted that licensing decisions should be made by our licensing authorities and not by the police. The institute is concerned that one of the proposals that has been made by other parties—it is not in the bill—is that a police intelligence commissioner should sit on licensing boards, pointing the finger as necessary but without giving any further information. The institute would be firmly opposed to that.

The Convener: We have concentrated on police intelligence. Do you differentiate between intelligence and spent convictions?

Stephen McGowan: Yes. There is a separate point to be made about spent convictions. Currently, licensing boards are not allowed to consider them. I would think that, before allowing that, the Parliament would have to hear evidence from Police Scotland that the licensed trade had fallen into disrepute as a result of boards not being able to consider spent convictions.

It should be borne in mind that the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974 is there to allow people to move on with their lives. Certain categories of employment are not covered by that act. For example, taxi drivers and private hire drivers are not entitled not to disclose spent convictions. However, to me, there is a difference between a taxi driver, who is in an enclosed space with an individual, and someone who works behind a bar, in a public place. On that basis, there are different considerations in relation to public protection.

11:30

The Convener: What if it is not a particularly busy bar and, at a particular time, there is only the bar person and one other person there?

Stephen McGowan: If there is evidence that the inability to refer to spent convictions has brought the system into disrepute, I am not aware of it.

The Convener: Do Mr Waterson and Mr Lee have anything to add before I bring in Mr Wilson?

Paul Waterson: We take a middle view. We believe that whether the 1974 act should apply depends on the severity of the crime. That is a decision for the police and the licensing board.

We are of the opinion that to hold a licence is a privilege. The premises manager and the personal licence holder are the most important people in the process. They are the ones who are standing there selling alcohol. We welcome the reintroduction of the fit-and-proper-person test. We should learn from 1976, when there were endless debates about what “fit and proper” meant. What we mean by it should be defined clearly, and if that takes into account training, age, the 1974 act and other elements, that will help us. Leaving the definition of “fit and proper” to people’s discretion caused real problems after 1976.

John Lee: We have no real problems with the reintroduction of the test, but we feel that applicants should be able to see any evidence that is presented against them.

John Wilson: Mr McGowan, I want to tease out the issue of police information being provided to licensing boards. My understanding—you can correct me if I am wrong—is that, at the end of the day, it is up to the board to decide whether to grant a licence. It is not up to the police. The board—at present and, as I understand it, in future—can note any information that is provided by the police in relation to an applicant, such as hard evidence of spent convictions or other issues, but it is at the board’s discretion to decide whether to grant a licence. Is that not the case?

Stephen McGowan: It is certainly down to the licensing board to make the decision. It has the ultimate discretion as to whether to grant a licence. In a practical situation, if someone is before a licensing board and the police say, “We don’t like this guy,” will that prejudice the licensing board, which will not know the full details? I think that that impinges on the right to a fair trial.

John Wilson: I equate this with other issues such as planning. National organisations go along to planning committees and say, “We don’t like this application, so we’re asking you to reject it.” The police and others can go along to a licensing board and say, “We’re not happy with this applicant” based on intelligence, spent convictions or whatever. There is an issue about what is meant by a spent conviction when somebody applies for a licence. Ultimately, however, as you said, the board has final discretion about whether to grant a licence to the applicant.

Stephen McGowan: That is certainly the case. The licensing board has the ultimate discretion. However, I reiterate that the position of the Institute of Licensing is that there is a human rights dimension to the reference to police intelligence. We do not believe that it is correct for an applicant to be faced with an allegation that is not substantiated or evidenced and to have their prospective livelihood held in the balance at a hearing without knowing what the evidence is.

John Wilson: What happens if police intelligence goes to the licensing board and says, “We suspect that this person is involved in serious and organised crime”? It goes back to the point that I raised earlier. A licence application may be being made on behalf of someone who owns the premises and is the landlord, and the police may have evidence that that individual is involved in serious and organised crime. The person who is applying for the licence could be accused of being a front person—

The Convener: A patsy.

John Wilson: —for someone who is involved in serious and organised crime and is effectively using criminal activities to fund the premises.

Stephen McGowan: Licensing boards will hear any evidence and place such weight as they deem to be appropriate on evidence that is presented to them, but the evidence has to be sufficient and probative. If it is neither of those things, the decision can be overturned on appeal.

That happened recently with a case in Aberdeen, Ask Entertainment v Aberdeen licensing board. In that case, a licensee had his licence revoked because of police information that was presented to the licensing board that a director of the licence-holding company was connected to or involved with serious and organised crime. Aberdeen sheriff court overturned that decision on appeal because of the lack of sufficiency and probativity of the evidence that the police had presented. That is the current state of play in case law under the 2005 act.

John Wilson: Thank you.

The Convener: Mr McGowan, you have offered a supplementary submission that will cover transfer provisions, provisional licences and surrender of licences. The committee would be grateful for that. Would it be possible to get it before Christmas?

Stephen McGowan: Absolutely.

The Convener: Thank you very much.

Stephen McGowan: Consider it a present.

The Convener: Merry Christmas, Mr McGowan.

Alex Rowley: Mr McGowan has set out three areas that he believes we should look further at. Are there any other areas in alcohol licensing where improvements could be made that would make licensing more business friendly and support businesses more?

The Convener: Let us go with Mr McGowan first, if you have anything.

John Lee: Consistency from boards would be helpful. That is one of the main issues that our members face. I know that it is unlikely to happen, but the Scottish Government is looking at extending something called primary authority partnerships, whereby businesses that operate across more than one local authority area can form a partnership with a single local authority for compliance, enforcement, inspection and so on. I know that it is highly unlikely but if, in future, we could do that with alcohol licensing, it would be hugely beneficial to our members. The overall lack of consistency from boards is an on-going issue for our members.

Paul Waterson: I agree. We have always had that problem since the formation of licensing boards. Inconsistency even within one board has raised its head on numerous occasions. Consistency between local licensing boards would be really helpful to us.

Stephen McGowan: I will restrict myself to one request, which is about personal licences. In the past week, committee members might have seen that almost 10,000 personal licences have been revoked as a result of failures in connection with training and notification of training to licensing boards. When almost 10,000 people have had their licences revoked, something must be wrong somewhere.

Section 57 of the bill seeks to address that by removing what I will refer to as the five-year ban on personal licensees who have had their licences revoked in those circumstances. However, the bill might not take effect for some time, so it is incumbent on me to ask Parliament to consider emergency legislation on that point to allow those 10,000 people to reapply for a personal licence rather than having to wait for the bill to be enacted in a year or so.

I am happy to write to the committee on this, but my point is that 10,000 people represents a large section of the licensed trade community. It would be great if the Parliament would consider whether the legislation could be amended, not to restore those licenses, because they have been lost through the licence holders’ own failure to notify the board, but to address the situation because the five-year ban seems draconian.

The Convener: Emergency legislation is not in the gift of the committee. Only the Government can take such a step.

Clare Adamson: I am very new to the committee—I attended my first meeting last week—so I am trying to get up to speed. To help us understand the scale of what you are talking about, perhaps you can tell us how many people hold personal licences in Scotland.

Stephen McGowan: I can only give you an estimate, because there is no national database. We estimate that there are 35,000 to 40,000 personal licence holders across Scotland. At the last count there were 7,600 revocations, but several licensing boards have not yet given out figures, so we anticipate that the number could rise to 10,000 or even more.

Clare Adamson: There are a lot of people who do bar work temporarily—students and young people—to supplement initial jobs and so on. How many of the revocations relate to people who have let the licence lapse as they are no longer in that role?

Stephen McGowan: A percentage of the 10,000 people will have left the trade and in some cases the licensee will have died. Such factors will always be involved, but even if we take into account those who have left the trade and those who are not interested in having a licence for whatever reason, there is still a large number of people out there who have lost their licence as a result of an administrative oversight.

Clare Adamson: Is that an administrative oversight on their part, or on the part of the board?

Stephen McGowan: It is an administrative oversight on their part—they have a duty to undertake a refresher course within a set period and then notify the licensing board that they have done so.

The Convener: I am going to put a stop to this because, at the end of the day, it is outwith the scope of the bill that we are scrutinising and is a call for emergency legislation. You are right to point out who is responsible for the problem.

I have never served on a licensing board, but of the many notes and briefings that we have had on this subject, there is one point that sticks out for me, which is that licensing boards must hold their meetings in public, except that they are allowed to conduct deliberations on a point in private before making a decision in public. Over the years, in my neck of the woods and elsewhere, I have heard many allegations about what goes on in the backroom. Do you have any comments on the behaviours or perceptions that there are about certain aspects of those bits and pieces of meetings that are held in private?

Stephen McGowan: I have appeared before a great number of licensing boards in Scotland. Some of them retire to consider applications before giving a decision and others will discuss everything in public. Personally, I think that all debates and discussions should be held in public—that is not necessarily the institute’s view, because I have not canvassed the members’ views on that point. It is preferable that applicants can see what the issues are and what issues the board members are concerned about, rather than the board retiring to consider in private.

Paul Waterson: Yes, I agree with that. However, sometimes I have seen boards that have very controversial applications before them not retire and immediately vote without any discussion at all. The members might look at one another before they put up their hands, but that probably means that the application was discussed before the meeting. In such cases, it is working the opposite way round and there are no public discussions.

The Convener: You talked about discussions taking place beforehand, but what about pre-meetings? There have been allegations that pre-meetings have been held in certain areas.

Paul Waterson: Absolutely. Stephen McGowan is right to say that any discussion should be held in public.

The Convener: Mr Lee, do you have a view on that?

John Lee: We would ask for the maximum amount of openness and transparency. The Edinburgh licensing forum is trying to move the board in the direction of podcasting and webcasting all its discussions, so that might be a way forward.

The Convener: On that note, I thank the witnesses for their evidence and close the public part of our meeting to continue our discussion in private.
Scottish Parliament
Local Government and Regeneration Committee

Wednesday 17 December 2014

[The Convener opened the meeting at 09:30]

Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener (Kevin Stewart): Good morning and welcome to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee’s 34th meeting in 2014. I ask everyone present to switch off mobile phones and other electronic devices, as they affect the broadcasting system. Some committee members may refer to tablets because we provide meeting papers in a digital format.

The first item of business is our fourth oral evidence session on the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. Two panels of witnesses will discuss the alcohol licensing and scrap metal dealership provisions.

I welcome the first panel: Dr Deborah Shipton, programme lead, Alcohol Focus Scotland; Dr Sonya Scott, consultant in public health medicine, NHS Ayrshire and Arran; Janice Thomson, alcohol and drug partnership co-ordinator, East Renfrewshire alcohol and drug partnership; and Audrey Watson, managing solicitor, West Lothian licensing board. Good morning to you all. Would you like to make any opening statements?

Dr Deborah Shipton (Alcohol Focus Scotland): I thank you for the opportunity to give evidence. Alcohol Focus Scotland is a national charity that works to reduce the harm that is experienced by individuals, families and communities. We know that alcohol causes significant harm in Scotland to those who consume it and to those around them. One in two people in Scotland each year will be affected by alcohol through its effect on family, friends and co-workers, and one in three will have a drinker in their lives. In total, alcohol harm costs Scotland £3.6 billion per year in areas such as health and criminal justice.

The evidence from around the world suggests that tackling the availability of alcohol is the most effective means of addressing alcohol harm, and licensing is one of the key levers that enable us to do that locally. The bill strengthens previous legislation and has the potential to create a robust licensing system. There are issues with how that translates in practice, as was identified in the evaluation of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005, and there remains an issue with the accountability and transparency of the current licensing regime, which limits how the system can function. I hope that we will have the opportunity to discuss those points this morning.

Janice Thomson (East Renfrewshire Alcohol and Drug Partnership): Alcohol and drug partnerships are responsible for planning and delivering effective local strategies to prevent and reduce harm from drugs and alcohol on the basis of evidence and need. The alcohol licensing system is an important means through which the Scottish Government’s priorities, as set out in “Changing Scotland’s Relationship with Alcohol: A Framework for Action”, can be achieved. The licensing system makes a key contribution, through the implementation of the licensing policy statement and the overprovision assessment, to supporting the achievement of community planning and alcohol and drug partnership priorities in preventing and reducing harm.

East Renfrewshire ADP welcomes the inclusion of provisions in the bill to criminalise the supply of alcohol to children and young people; to introduce a fit-and-proper-person test for applicants; and to redefine overprovision. We raised issues in our submission regarding the accountability and transparency of boards and how they exercise their function in relation to the licensing policy statement. We recommended that the guidance should be reviewed and amended to assist the proper interpretation and use of the evidence to support effective licensing practice and that boards should provide a summary of how they reached a decision on overprovision. Finally, we recommended that boards should provide an annual report on how they discharge their duties in relation to the licensing policy statement and the five licensing objectives.

The Convener: Would Dr Scott or Ms Watson like to add anything?

Dr Sonya Scott (NHS Ayrshire and Arran): I thank the committee for the opportunity to speak. Like my colleagues, I emphasise that there is good evidence to show an association between availability and harm. In particular, I advocate the retention of the requirement that boards must consider the capacity and number of outlets when thinking about overprovision. The Convener: We will look at overprovision first. What is your experience of how licensing authorities deal with their duty to assess overprovision?

Dr Shipton: We have information on that. AFS reviewed policy statements and found that they tended to lack evidence on how the outcome of the overprovision assessment was derived. More evidence is needed to back up the decisions that licensing boards make in that respect. My colleagues will talk about the difficulties that licensing boards have in trying to take evidence in order to make such decisions.

Dr Scott: Licensing boards have difficulty understanding what the concept of overprovision means. Initially, our national health service board gave a lot of evidence on levels of harm, mainly at local authority level. There are issues around data on harm and the appropriate geographical level at which we are able to provide it. The data is most robust for us at higher geographical levels.

Another difficulty is transferring from an individual perspective to a population perspective. As a public health doctor, I am interested in the population perspective, which involves aggregate levels of data.

On one level, given that alcohol-related harm is entirely avoidable, one could say that any harm equals overprovision. Overprovision could also be considered in terms of outlet density weighted for capacity, which would be a reasonable measure of availability.

As I said, boards struggle with overprovision, and there is no guidance or criteria on it for them. Many boards have said in their policy statements that their areas are not overprovided for, but there is no justification for why they have reached that decision or any evidence on the process of reaching it.

Janice Thomson: I agree with my colleagues that boards struggle with overprovision. There should be clear guidance on how overprovision should be interpreted.

We have discussed with our local board the data that is required and we have provided comprehensive and robust information. We have looked at the issue from an intermediate data zone level, and we have made clear recommendations that are with the board.

It is evident from looking at the AFS report that there is no clarity about how some boards have made their decisions, about the evidence that was used to underpin what was said about the five licensing objectives in policy statements and about how licensing boards decide on overprovision. Boards struggle, and our role is not only to support them but to be much clearer in guidance about what the process should involve.

Audrey Watson (West Lothian Licensing Board): When our board looked at overprovision last year, we had difficulty in getting evidence from the people whom we contacted. We sent out information to all the parties that are laid out in the guidance on section 142 of the 2005 act, but we got very little back, apart from a response from Police Scotland that identified hotspot areas, which allowed us to identify the localities. We had no response from NHS Lothian and very few up-to-date responses from any other parties.

The Convener: West Lothian licensing board’s submission said that health issues were not taken into account. Is that correct?

Audrey Watson: We have had no evidence, and the guidance makes it very clear that boards must make decisions based on evidence.

The Convener: So NHS Lothian has never given any evidence at all to West Lothian licensing board.

Audrey Watson: It has never given any evidence, nor does it respond to any applications that are sent to it. It has never had a presence at the board.

The Convener: Are you aware of any licensing boards in Lothian to which NHS Lothian has responded?

Audrey Watson: I am not. I can speak only for the past couple of years. At the beginning of 2009, there might have been a presence but, in the two years that I have been managing the team, no one from NHS Lothian has written to us or engaged with us in any way.

The Convener: Are any other witnesses aware of any health authorities contacting boards about overprovision?

Dr Shipton: Scotland has 40 licensing boards, and there is a good opportunity to identify best practice. Some licensing boards have worked very closely with their ADPs and their health boards to develop the evidence, and it is probably worth learning from that. Some licensing boards have developed quite nuanced overprovision statements—for example, the Western Isles board refers to vertical drinking establishments and off-sales-only establishments in an area, so it is responding to the needs in that area.

I understand that engagement with partners varies across the country, but it is worth identifying that there has been progress. The overprovision statement is more than five years old but is fairly new for such policy development. It is worth understanding that there is a lot to be learned but that there is good practice across Scotland.

Dr Scott: Our NHS board has provided significant evidence to the three licensing boards of our partner local authorities. We rely on alcohol and drug ring-fenced moneys, just as other areas of the national health service do to provide alcohol and drugs services. That can become an issue as budgets become tighter.

As Dr Shipton indicated, our work relies on strong relationships, particularly with ADPs. From a public health perspective, we see our work on alcohol and drugs as being carried out very much through our alcohol and drug partners. I am sure that Ms Thomson can speak about her experience of ADP evidence in East Renfrewshire.

The Convener: When we talk about licensing boards, we all make the mistake of talking about local authorities, and we must remember that licensing boards are quasi-judicial bodies. A local authority might well have its single outcome agreement various things relating to alcohol, but the licensing board is somewhat different. Will you tell us how you deal with licensing boards, rather than with local authorities?

Dr Scott: Absolutely. That was my error and I accept the correction. In our area, the licensing boards are coterminous with the local authorities, which are not subdivided, so I think of them in terms of north, south and east Ayrshire.

The Convener: Thank you.

Cameron Buchanan (Lothian) (Con): Does Audrey Watson think that her board did not get a response to its inquiries because NHS Lothian was reluctant to commit itself? What was the reason why no one replied?

Audrey Watson: I think that it was a lack of understanding as to what was required. The guidance should be updated and made clearer.

West Lothian is alone in having an increasing population. The assumption is that there is overprovision everywhere, but I do not know that that is correct. Our licensing board is very concerned about overconsumption, rather than overprovision, and I think that the committee should look at addressing the problem of overconsumption.

Cameron Buchanan: Do the two aspects go together?

Audrey Watson: Not necessarily. In Armadale in West Lothian, there is a new Asda supermarket. A supermarket was necessary, given the number of new houses that had been built in that area. I do not think that Asda would have opened there if it had not got an alcohol licence. However, there is overconsumption, and boards see that all the time when Police Scotland does review applications. The reality is that it has become socially acceptable for people to fall about drunk every weekend. We see that on closed-circuit television evidence, yet no one is ever prosecuted for it.

The Convener: You said in your submission that health is not being taken into account, so how do we deal with overconsumption versus overprovision? You say that there is a problem of overconsumption but that your board is not considering the health aspects.

Audrey Watson: We could not consider the health aspects because we had no evidence on them. That is not to say that we would not consider them if that evidence were available. We will be consulting our key stakeholders again on whether we should look at overprovision and whether there is evidence. That door was meant to have closed, but we were asked to keep it open until the end of 2014. We will look again at overprovision in West Lothian, subject to any evidence coming forward. If that evidence comes forward, we will carry out a full consultation exercise with all stakeholders.

The Convener: How proactive are you in seeking that evidence? You said that you have talked to stakeholders. If I were on a board—although I was a local authority councillor, I never sat on a licensing board—I would do everything possible to gather the evidence and be proactive in my relationships with the local alcohol and drug partnership and the NHS board to get it. What efforts have you made?

Audrey Watson: We have certainly written to all those stakeholders. We have also attended a number of licensing forum meetings that the stakeholders have been asked to attend to discuss overprovision. We followed that up with more correspondence and did a number of online surveys.

Cameron Buchanan: I think that we heard from the Scottish Retail Consortium that a supermarket company would not open a supermarket unless it could get an alcohol licence, because alcohol was where it made the biggest profit. Will you comment on that?

Audrey Watson: I cannot comment on that from a commercial or legal perspective, but it appears to me that a supermarket would not come unless it got an alcohol licence.

John Wilson (Central Scotland) (Ind): I put it on record that I served on a licensing board. It is about 32 years since I did that, so my experience is a bit dated.

I note that the panel includes two witnesses from smaller local authority areas. How do the witnesses feel that we should use the overprovision criteria not only in local authorities such as West Lothian Council and East Renfrewshire Council but in Scottish Borders Council, Dumfries and Galloway Council and Highland Council? How do we determine overprovision if some outlying villages are not served by an off-licence or other licensed premises? How do we deal with that in the criteria that we set for overprovision without denying communities the opportunity to participate in social drinking?

Janice Thomson: When we define overprovision, we consider the totality of the area, break it down into intermediate zones and align them with the licensing board regional areas. That exercise considers the number and capacity of licensed on-sales and off-sales premises in the area.

In East Renfrewshire, we included in that consideration the range of health harms and alcohol-related crime and violence. We also undertook an extensive consultation with the public and licensees on overprovision. There was a triangulation of quantitative and qualitative evidence.

Depending on the level of health harm and alcohol-related crime, boards might decide on the basis of the evidence in their overprovision assessment that the whole area is overprovided. However, that does not preclude existing premises from trading. The overprovision assessment might also state that only certain designated areas are overprovided. That does not preclude areas, including rural areas, from having access to alcohol.

When we did our assessment, we factored in people’s mobility. We asked how long it took them to access on-sales or off-sales in their area and by what means they travelled to get there. We found that all areas in our area were well served with alcohol, but we have not recommended that the whole area be treated as overprovided.

Audrey Watson: We have had evidence of a number of licensed premises surrendering their licences because operating was no longer commercially viable for them. Against that background, it is difficult to see where there is overprovision.

We have some areas that are high in social deprivation, which will perhaps increase the NHS figures. Not an awful lot of alcohol is available in those areas, but one of the biggest Asda stores in the country is a short taxi ride away.

The Convener: Is a lot of the surrendering of licences down to the fact that big chains have moved in? Is it mainly off-sales premises rather than on-sales premises that have surrendered licences?

Audrey Watson: It is on-sales and off-sales premises.

Dr Shipton: I agree with Ms Thomson on responding to local needs. That is the advantage of the overprovision statement.

The research by Dr Shortt from the University of Edinburgh that was presented to the committee at a previous meeting identified the outlet density throughout Scotland. That showed that some large areas in some licensing board areas have high levels of provision but, in other licensing board areas, that happens in pockets.

Overprovision statements can respond to that, as I have demonstrated. The Western Isles and other boards have responded with nuanced overprovision statements. Boards can protect rural areas and respond to high levels of provision in, for example, urban areas.

Dr Scott: I agree with what Dr Shipton just said. To answer the question directly, I think that density is a good way of considering availability. I argue that there is strong evidence of an association between availability, as it relates to overprovision, and consumption and harm. Provision, in terms of availability, and consumption levels are interrelated. That can be considered comparatively. Outlets per capita, weighted for the capacity of outlets, would be a more robust measure than just the number of outlets, but levels of harm also need to be considered. In Scotland, our levels of harm are twice those in England and Wales. About 72 per cent of that is accounted for by off-sales. There are issues about types of premises but, in general, I suggest that we are overprovided for across Scotland.

John Wilson: In her response to the question about the surrender of licences, Ms Watson seemed to equate that with the opening of a large supermarket. Dr Scott said that the level of off-sales consumption is potentially greater than the level of on-sales consumption. Surely that suggests that we should look more carefully at the selling of alcohol by large supermarkets rather than by some of the smaller premises. Ms Watson seemed to suggest that licensees were surrendering their licences because of the opening of a large supermarket that is selling alcohol. Surely licensing boards should be seriously asking major retailers—such as the one that you alluded to in Bathgate or Livingston—about those off-sales, rather than just restricting the on-sales trade.

Audrey Watson: Perhaps I confused members. There are two Asda stores in West Lothian. The biggest one is in Livingston, and there is a smaller one in a new development in Armadale.

I struggle with this issue, because there is no fixed licensing objective that says that boards must reduce the consumption of alcohol. We would all agree that that would be a good thing, but I do not think that it is for boards to tackle that problem on their own. A multi-agency task force must be set up. If Scotland wants to reduce alcohol consumption, it needs to do something about it. We have made drink-driving unacceptable, and we should make public drunkenness unacceptable, too. People learn behaviour, and they see from the time that they go to their prom that being drunk is acceptable. That certainly was not the case when I was growing up. I do not know how we have got here.

John Wilson: On that issue, are you saying that the bill that is before us does not go far enough?

Audrey Watson: The 2005 act was meant to regulate the sale of alcohol, not restrict the sale of alcohol. I think that some people in the alcohol-focus organisations would wish that that was not the case. However, when cases go before the courts, they are subject to the interpretation of what is in the legislation and, as I said, there is nothing in the legislation that says that boards have to take measures to reduce the consumption of alcohol.

Dr Scott: The five licensing objectives all have a health and wellbeing component. Obviously, there is an explicit objective of “protecting and improving public health”.

From a population perspective, with regard to the issue that we are discussing, the best way of achieving that objective is to reduce the availability of alcohol. I think that there is a discrepancy between the individual perspective and the population perspective.

Dr Shipton: I agree. The licensing regime has a public interest purpose. We must acknowledge that the level of harm that is caused through alcohol, and the level of alcohol consumption, in Scotland are high in comparison with the levels in the United Kingdom and western Europe. The public interest purpose is to reduce those levels, and two of the main levers to do that are availability and price.

In order to serve the public interest purpose, I agree that it is important to reduce availability and thereby consumption and harm. If that was not the case, a different requirement from the licensing regime would possibly be needed.

The Convener: I return to Ms Watson’s point about boards having no remit to reduce consumption and the point that I made to Dr Scott about the separation of boards, as quasi-judicial bodies, from local authorities. Ms Watson also talked about a multi-agency approach. However, at this time, because it is not up to boards to reduce consumption, how can a multi-agency approach be taken and progressed by the boards?

Audrey Watson: There are a number of licensing offences, including being drunk on licensed premises and serving a drunk person. However, because of the difficulties in interpreting what “drunk” means legally, those offences are prosecuted infrequently. In the past five years, we have seen only two cases of licence holders being prosecuted for licensing offences. However, when you consider the CCTV evidence that boards have seen of drunk people staggering out of night clubs at 2 and 3 in the morning, the two do not add up.

I have personal knowledge of cases in which the procurator fiscal has decided that it is not in the public interest to prosecute a licensing offence. Attitudes need to be changed. Although boards can play their part, it is not for them to reduce consumption.

The Convener: Does the West Lothian board go out with the police and visit premises?

Audrey Watson: Yes, we have done that on occasion.

The Convener: How often?

Audrey Watson: In every board cycle.

The Convener: So once every four or five years.

Audrey Watson: Yes. However, there are inherent difficulties in that approach. For example, if there are difficulties at a particular premises that then come before the board in a review and a member takes into account something that they have seen on a night when they were out with the police rather than on a night that we are talking about in the review, that is legally challengeable.

The Convener: I will play devil’s advocate. I am sorry that we keep coming back to you, Ms Watson. One of the licensing objectives under the 2005 act, at section 4(1)(d), is “protecting and improving public health”.

Does overconsumption not fall under that objective? Should boards not have an interest in overconsumption?

Audrey Watson: Yes, boards should have an interest in that. Under the legislation, boards should be notified if licence holders have been prosecuted for selling drink to drunk people and should then be able to take appropriate action. However, we have found a number of reviews for late-night premises in which there is CCTV evidence of a lot of drunk people milling around, but when the lawyers representing the licence holder ask the police whether anyone was prosecuted, the answer is no.

The Convener: In that case, surely the board should be more proactive and go out with the police to see what is going on. Would that not change attitudes?

Audrey Watson: Yes, but that behaviour is going on everywhere—on every street where there is a licensed premises, when the sun goes down. We all know that; it has become socially acceptable.
Dr Scott: It is important to remember that environments influence behaviour. We need to make healthy choices easy choices. From a population health perspective, that is often the best way in which to not only achieve good population averages, but narrow inequalities.

We know that our most deprived citizens are particularly affected by alcohol-related harm—there is certainly a deprivation gradient. From an inequalities perspective, the levers that boards have at their discretion to reduce availability are the best way of not only narrowing inequalities, but reducing overall harm.

On the idea of creating healthy environments, boards have powers there, but perhaps they are not being used as effectively as they could be. It is coming out strongly in Ms Watson’s evidence that availability is not just about physical availability and price competition—it also has an impact on social norms.

John Wilson: Ms Watson, I want to tease out an answer on a point that you raised: the issue of boards and the evidence that is presented to boards. One question that has come up in connection with the bill concerns police intelligence being presented to boards. Tying in to your comment about the number of convictions that take place in licensed premises, a national newspaper reported yesterday that at a premises in a west of Scotland local authority area there have been 94 visits by the police, and the board has finally decided to take action.

Can you give any examples in which the police have tried to take action against a licensee and the courts have been reluctant to prosecute?

10:00

Audrey Watson: I am afraid I cannot, because I do not know what cases are referred for prosecution.

John Wilson: Are there none in West Lothian?

Audrey Watson: I would not know what was referred for prosecution. All I can talk to you about is what happens when there is a review of a licence in West Lothian. We have had a number of reviews recently of late-night premises and, out of those cases, very few have been referred for prosecution. Of those that have been referred, not all have resulted in a prosecution.

John Wilson: In terms of police notifying the board of a potential prosecution or court action, is there no co-ordinated approach between the police and the board? Do the police notify the board that a licensee or premises has been reported to the procurator fiscal for court action?

Audrey Watson: Yes. The legislation allows for the police to ask for a review. In a review application, there will often be reference to the matters, or at least some of the matters, that are under review being referred for prosecution.

There is the difficulty that the board then has to liaise with the Procurator Fiscal Service on whether a hearing can be held, given that the matter could be sub judice and we cannot ask people to come and force them to speak about matters that they have pled not guilty to in a criminal court.

Clare Adamson (Central Scotland) (SNP): Given the commercial viability of premises, the difficulties that are caused in terms of what has been said about the licensing boards, and the effect that a large supermarket can have on an area, has any consideration been given to how minimum unit pricing of alcohol might change the situation? Have the licensing boards given any consideration to that?

Will minimum unit pricing of alcohol reduce consumption?

The Convener: Shall we start with Dr Shipton?

Dr Shipton: I cannot answer on how the licensing boards have reacted to the possibility of minimum unit pricing.

We find that there is overwhelming evidence that minimum unit pricing would reduce consumption. A high density of licensing availability results in price competition locally, which drives down price. Minimum unit pricing would help to prevent that from happening at the local level, so we would welcome it.

Dr Scott: I cannot comment on the specific impact of minimum unit pricing on supermarkets. However, in the most recent “Monitoring and Evaluating Scotland’s Alcohol Strategy” report, available sales data shows a difference between England and Wales and Scotland that is driven by about 72 per cent off-sales, and cheaper spirits make up the bulk of those sales. There is fantastic evidence that price is a good lever for reducing population levels of consumption and therefore harm, and minimum unit pricing is likely to have an impact on that area of sales.

Janice Thomson: From an alcohol and drug perspective, we wholly support minimum unit pricing for the reasons that were just cited. There is very strong evidence that its impacts on both price and availability support reductions in population-level consumption and reduce harm.

Audrey Watson: In our discussions on the policy statement we touched on minimum unit pricing, which the board was very much in favour of.
Our board is concerned about how some of the trade has found a way round the legislation that was supposed to prevent happy hours. The legislation, which is quite complex, has a condition on price variations but not on price reductions. Some premises in our area have brought in cheaper alcohol that they do not usually sell, so they are not varying the price. For example, they are selling Glen’s vodka at £1 a shot rather than Smirnoff at £2.20. That definitely needs to be tightened up.

Alex Rowley (Cowdenbeath) (Lab): I want to pick up on a number of points, the first of which is about on-licences and off-licences. Last week we heard from the licensing trade, and I know that a number of pubs would point to figures that I saw the other week, which show that although the number of pints that are being consumed in Scotland has fallen massively, the amount of alcohol that is being consumed has not, and a lot of pubs are closing. Is there a difference to be looked at in terms of off-sales versus the local pub?

Janice Thomson: In the overprovision assessment, we looked at on-sales and off-sales and at capacity. We looked at the period from 2010 to 2013 to see where the growth had been, and we found that it was not in on-sales but in off-sales. Again, it is important to consider the evidence so that when we are reviewing what is happening, or is required to happen, in a local area we have that vital information to hand.

Audrey Watson: Our board has had evidence that a number of late-night premises have been struggling recently as a result of people preloading—that is, drinking at home before going out very late. The alcohol for that is freely available from the big supermarkets and online sources.

Dr Shipton: On-sales and off-sales obviously have different requirements or issues, so I agree with Ms Thomson in that regard. The difference in price between on-sales and off-sales has widened; that has driven the general increase of 60 per cent in the availability of alcohol in Scotland since the 1960s. Alcohol has become a lot more affordable, which is driven by off-sales, so that is something local that needs to be looked at.

There is evidence around on-sales for local areas. A more generic comment is that on-sales contribute to the social norm, so a high provision of on-sales dictates what is available for people to do in an area. That is a local issue that might also need to be looked at.

Dr Scott: I agree that both on-sales and off-sales contribute to the availability of alcohol. Good data for both would help us to have a more nuanced assessment. Returning to the initial point in my written submission, I think that we need to retain looking at the number and the capacity of outlets. It would be good to have data for capacity-weighted outlets and to look at that in terms of population density. We could then subdivide that by the numbers of off-sales and on-sales.

Alex Rowley: Licensing boards seem to be taking into consideration a real mix of data out there. Perhaps we could ask about best practice, convener. There is a suggestion that there is good practice, so we could ask the witnesses to make that information available.

The Convener: Certainly.

Alex Rowley: Someone mentioned the role of ADPs in community planning partnerships. Could that role improve the situation?

Dr Shipton: Notwithstanding the comments about the separation between the licensing board and the local authority, I think that for the process to work appropriately and effectively there needs to be some working with the other planning structures, whether for community planning or land planning. That works very well in some areas. Some policy statements make reference to single outcome agreements and so on, which I think is appropriate to allow more joined-up working within the regime.

Dr Scott: There is synergy between the licensing board objectives and what community planning partners are trying to achieve. Both would be strengthened by greater consideration of each other’s objectives. It would be good for boards to have stronger links with ADPs and with the wider community planning infrastructure.

Janice Thomson: The ADP reports directly into community planning on the delivery of seven national outcomes. As Dr Scott highlighted, there is synergy between the licensing policy statement and overprovision assessment. We have that embedded within our delivery plan and therefore report annually to the community planning partnership on how we are progressing with supporting evidence on the overprovision assessment and so on.

Audrey Watson: I do not have any knowledge of community planning partnerships.

Alex Rowley: We might need to explore that area, given that we are looking at the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill and the role of community planning partnerships. From the licensing community point of view, there do not seem to be a lot of links. We would expect the ADPs to have the kind of information that would be useful when licensing boards are looking at overprovision. I just flag that area up for us for the future.
The other week, the Scottish Government was talking about a social responsibility tax. I asked the finance secretary whether the Government had any intentions of bringing anything forward because I wonder about the funding. The idea is that a local authority would be able to put a penny on a bottle of wine, for example, as a social responsibility tax to raise money that could be reinvested. A lot of the work on supporting people with alcohol and drugs problems is done by ADPs and the third sector. Is there a gap in funding? Problems with alcohol seem to be getting worse, so is funding available to those organisations so that they can support people?

The Convener: We are starting to stray out of scope but I will allow the question because it is necessary to get the answers.

Janice Thomson: Funding is available and is provided directly by the Government so that alcohol and drugs problems in an area can be addressed. This always comes back to the evidence. There is a great need for support for individuals with alcohol problems—a recent study shows that probably about 25 per cent of people are accessing alcohol treatment services and need support. However, within the economic constraints that we are all working under, generally there is never enough money to support the true unmet need.

Within the ADP, there is funding from all the partners. There is direct mainstream funding and funding directly from the council as well as funding from other budgets for prevention and early intervention. We clearly define what the budgets are and how they are spent on prevention and early intervention, treatment and supporting people into recovery. We have a financial framework in place that details that spend.

Dr Scott: From the preventative medicine point of view, there is a perennial tension between meeting the need to tackle raging fires, or immediate problems, and carving out a little bit of money for primary prevention, to stop coals that are not yet lit becoming raging fires—if you will excuse the analogy. I can see the attraction of a social responsibility levy. As we have already indicated, price is a very good way of reducing availability, as happened with tobacco. Increasing prices will have an impact on sales, consumption and harm. If that money could be ring fenced for preventative medicine, that would be all the better.

Dr Shipton: There is also the possibility of fees to recoup some of the costs. England has a late-night levy. We have heard of cases of the police taking lots of calls to certain premises. Several other countries have explored the idea of the licensing fee being directly related to the harms that might be caused by the sale of the product from that premises, so that could be explored. There is a large public sector bill to pay as a result of overconsumption; whether the cost could be recouped in some way would be worth exploring.

Audrey Watson: Again, that is outwith my area of expertise.

Alex Rowley: I have a comment to make on Audrey Watson's earlier point. Last week, people from the licensed trade made it clear to us that a conflict exists when a large supermarket chain wants to set up a supermarket in an area. There might well be overprovision, but given that the members of a licensing board will want to get re-elected, which of them will refuse an application from a supermarket that will provide hundreds of jobs? That tension has been brought to our attention and needs to be looked at in the context of overprovision.

I know that the witnesses broadly welcome the proposals in the bill but, from a policy maker's point of view, what is missing? What would be top of your agenda?

Dr Shipton: Accountability and transparency would be top of our agenda. Currently, there is no independent oversight of the performance of the licensing boards and how they carry out their functions. We have no outcomes, no monitoring data is reported and no review of licensing boards' performance is carried out internally or externally. We know that licensing boards are required to produce a policy, an overprovision statement and a public register of licensing data. Six months after the deadline, 11 of the 40 licensing boards still had not published statements and 17 had not published overprovision statements. More recently, using standard online searching mechanisms, we found 13 public registers of licensing data out of a possible 40. Given that it is a policy-driven process, not having a policy has huge implications for how a licensing board can function.

Information is absolutely key to monitoring performance locally and nationally. Without it, we have an information deficit and an accountability deficit. The committee heard from the University of Edinburgh researchers, and we know that NHS Health Scotland had to put in a freedom of information request to get the data that it required for its evaluation. We think it unlikely that stakeholders would be able to put in regular freedom of information requests to get such information.

Along with others, we ask for two main outcomes. First, we want outcomes data to be reported. We are not asking for any extra data but we feel that the data that the licensing boards obtain through the application process needs to be collated and made publicly available. We also think that they should have a duty to report annually on their performance against outcome measures and, more important, against their policy statements. At the moment, we have no way of identifying that. Those are the two things that we would push for.

Dr Scott: I am in complete agreement with Dr Shipton. We need much better data on the decisions that are being made, the number of licences, the capacity of premises and their opening hours. That should all be freely available to members of the public, to whom the boards are ultimately accountable. An annual report would be very useful, as would public consideration of whether decisions have achieved the boards’ objectives.

On the tension between economic regeneration and public health in licensing boards’ objectives, it is important to remember that what is good for health is not simply work but good work. Some consideration must be given to the types of jobs that are being brought into the economy. There is no evidence that increasing the number of licences, whether through off-sales, large supermarkets or other premises, has a net benefit. In fact, when we hear that the economy incurs costs of between £3 billion and £5 billion, I might suggest that, overall, such increases are an economic drain.

Janice Thomson: I agree with Dr Shipton and Dr Scott on the need to improve the accountability and transparency of licensing boards, particularly in relation to what evidence is considered and how, and who is consulted. Published policy statements that are underpinned by evidence and which promote the licensing objectives provide a clear guide to licensing practice and support consistent and well-reasoned decision making, which makes the licensing process more transparent.

It is important that licensing boards publish annual reports, which could be considered at the joint meeting of the licensing forum. It is there to keep under review the ways in which licensing boards exercise their functions and that meeting is a key opportunity to show how the boards exercise their functions under the 2005 act and promote the licensing objectives.

Audrey Watson: I would like the guidance to be looked at and to be much clearer, and I would also like a board’s powers to refuse applications to be much clearer to take account of the issues that members have discussed.

The Convener: Section 55 is on the annual financial report. Proposed new section 9A(4) of the 2005 act states:

“A report under this section may also include such other information about the exercise of the Licensing Board’s functions as they consider appropriate.”

Should the issues we are discussing be brought up under that section?

Dr Shipton: Yes. It is probably worth being quite explicit about that. As I said, under the 2005 act, licensing boards are required to produce a public register of licensing data. That has not been—and is not—efficient. Not all licensing boards have an accessible register and the data that is in registers is not appropriate for monitoring. It is great that that provision is in the bill, but there will need to be more guidance—

The Convener: It needs to be teased out.

Dr Shipton: Exactly.

The Convener: Okay—thank you. I have another question before we move away from the issues that Mr Rowley has raised. It would be helpful if the witnesses could provide us with examples of good and bad practice. I understand that licensing boards get together every year at a conference, shindig or whatever it may be. Is good practice shared at those events?

Audrey Watson: Do you mean the Alcohol Focus Scotland conference?

The Convener: Is that what it is called? I have no idea.

Audrey Watson: I have never been to one.

The Convener: Dr Shipton, do you want to comment?

Dr Shipton: There are quite a few licensing conferences.

The Convener: I do not think that it is one run by Alcohol Focus Scotland.

Dr Shipton: I do not think so. I think it is a different one.

The Convener: Okay. We will leave that, then.

Finally on the issues that Mr Rowley raised, is it a problem that licensing boards are quasi-judicial bodies that seem to be apart from other things such as community planning partnerships? A yes or no answer will suffice, and if you do not have any comment, that is also fine.

Dr Shipton: I cannot speak to the legal side of the separation; I would struggle to speak to the details of that. There needs to be some working together to address how that would happen while accommodating the legal side, but I am afraid that I cannot comment.

The Convener: The legal side may cause barriers. Ms Watson, you are probably the expert on the quasi-judicial aspect.
Audrey Watson: Except that I do not really know how anything else works. [Laughter.]

The Convener: Okay—that is very honest.

Audrey Watson: All I can say is that if a decision that a licensing board takes is not open to scrutiny by Alcohol Focus and others, it is open to scrutiny by the courts. When the courts deal with a licensing matter, they do not know how it works; they just look at the law and at the words used, and the words need to be tightened up.

The Convener: Okay. Before we move away from accountability and transparency, I note that licensing boards are supposed to take all their decisions in public, but there are often backroom discussions on certain points. Should that stop?

Audrey Watson: No. It is essential that there is a forum in which discussions can take place and legal advice can be given in private, as long as that is then reiterated in public and parties have an opportunity to comment.

The Convener: Is it only legal advice that is given in private to boards?

Audrey Watson: It is on my watch.

The Convener: Does anybody else have a comment on that?

Dr Scott: I would prefer it to be done in public, but I can see that there could be justification for doing that. If we had annual reports that detailed decision making, the rationale and how that contributes to meeting the objectives, that would provide us with a level of comfort with regard to accountability.

The Convener: Grand. Thank you.

Anne McTaggart (Glasgow) (Lab): I go back to the point that one of you made way back at the beginning about the proposal to create a criminal offence of supplying alcohol to someone under 18 in a public place. Does that go far enough?

The Convener: Let us start with Ms Thomson, please.

Janice Thomson: Whether it goes far enough will come down to enforcement. The proposal is very welcome—I know from conversations that we have had that it has been welcomed by Police Scotland.

Dr Scott: I am not sure how it could go further. I probably welcome it, too. Things like that send a strong message about what is and is not acceptable. I would be interested to hear what further steps there might be, but it is a starting point.

Dr Shipton: I agree. I would probably want to know what the other steps were before discussing it further. I welcome the proposal, though.

Anne McTaggart: Do you think that what is proposed now is fine and will do the job?

Dr Shipton: My understanding is that it was a response to difficulties that the police were having—you can take away alcohol, but it can be supplied again.

Audrey Watson: I wonder how it will be enforced and whether Police Scotland has sufficient numbers to enforce all the various licensing offences which, as I have said before, are not being enforced.

Willie Coffey (Kilmarnock and Irvine Valley) (SNP): Good morning. Picking up on issues of accountability and transparency mentioned by all members of the panel, I want to talk about overprovision, and whether it should be defined and who should define it. We heard in response to Mr Wilson’s questions that there is quite a variation throughout Scotland. Wherever you go, the situation is different. Dr Shipton mentioned that the Western Isles has a clear definition of overprovision, which applies locally.

Who should define overprovision in a locality? Should it be defined in the bill or should the bill say that it should be defined and that the board should define it? Who is best placed to define what we mean by overprovision?

Dr Shipton: It is right that it is part of the licensing board’s policy statement to define overprovision for its area. However, it would be quite good to have a national steer—and support and greater guidance—on how overprovision should be defined. The current guidance, which relates to the 2005 act, is ambiguous about the level of evidence of overprovision that is required. That has made it quite challenging for some licensing boards to evidence the overprovision in their area. There is a need for all stakeholders to support the licensing board to develop a definition. Alcohol Focus Scotland has a toolkit for that, which is helpful, but there needs to be a national steer, too.

Dr Scott: I agree. Some national guidance is probably needed. Overprovision is a tricky concept. As I have said, it can be considered from the point of view of availability, weighted for capacity, number of outlets and the density of those outlets, or from the point of view of harm.

From a community empowerment perspective, we must engage and fully inform the community. We want communities to understand the evidence, to think about what harm it considers acceptable and what cost it is willing to pay for that harm, and to relate that to availability.

Further to that are the difficulties relating to geographical boundaries. The geographical area that one board serves is clearly boundaryed. could have an area that is fantastic in its overprovision assessment and regulation and another that is not, but you cannot control what happens at the boundary. A national perspective is needed, too.

The Convener: I am a bit confused about the guidance that you are talking about. At the end of the day, courts will make decisions if they think that licensing boards are in the wrong. How likely is it that courts will overrule guidance that is not, as Mr Coffey indicated, included in legislation? Ms Watson, you are probably best placed to answer that.

10:30

Audrey Watson: The 2005 act says that the licensing board must follow the guidance in doing its job and taking decisions, so I think that the courts would welcome more detailed guidance.

The Convener: Would the boards take cognisance of that guidance in their decision making?

Audrey Watson: I think so. The members of the board are local authority elected representatives; they are not specialists in any of the matters that my colleagues are specialists in. Neither am I—I am a lawyer and I advise them, but I can only look at what the guidance says. Certainly in West Lothian, the people we have asked for evidence have struggled to know what sort of evidence we are looking for. It needs to come from the Government.

The Convener: Ms Thomson, I am sorry about leaping in there.

Janice Thomson: It is fine.

I concur that the guidance in relation to overprovision, particularly on the data that can be used in making an assessment of the evidence, should be strengthened. That would help boards to make the decision. Across Scotland, the extent to which public health data is used in practice varies, and there are varying interpretations of the evidence by licensing boards. The licensing policy outcome does not always reflect the health evidence that has been presented.

We actively engage with the licensing board on the data that we will provide. We also consult our local communities about overprovision. That is vital, because we can have the statistics at hand, but we also need the community’s views. The engagement and discussion have been very good.

Willie Coffey: If we do not get clear or rigorous national guidance along the lines that you hope for or expect, should the bill make a requirement that the criteria must be defined locally? Janice Thomson said that she would like boards to report and summarise how they come to their decisions. If the licensees and the public do not know what criteria are applied in making the decision, is there an issue with that? Should people be able to see that part of the process and what the criteria are? They could be different across Scotland.

Janice Thomson: The issue will always be about how areas assess overprovision and about the evidence that is considered in relation to alcohol-related harm, as well as the capacity and availability of licensed premises across the area. It will be down to licensing boards to make the final decision. We can provide the evidence and make recommendations that are based on the health indicators, the alcohol-related crime indicators and what the public say. We make our recommendation to the board and then it is down to the board to consider that. Because we have provided evidence, if the board does not accept that recommendation, we expect it to justify that. It is a transparent two-way process.

Willie Coffey: Should local licensees and the public be able to see in advance what overprovision means in their locality?

Janice Thomson: Yes. Well—

Willie Coffey: Should there be a clear statement of what is meant by that?

Janice Thomson: There is a clear statement. The board must provide or circulate for comment and consultation a draft overprovision assessment so that people have the opportunity to see it. We have engaged the public in wider discussions about alcohol availability in their area, as a precursor to the evidence.

Willie Coffey: Dr Scott, in your opening remarks, you said that you are here to argue for the retention of the numbers and capacity elements in the assessment. Do you foresee any circumstances in which a board would not include issues about numbers and capacity when assessing overprovision? Are you worried that boards might exclude that?

Dr Scott: Yes, I am worried, given the variation in practice that already exists. It is not an insubstantial piece of work to gather and collate that information—we currently do not have a database, which is the second step and which would be useful—so I am concerned that boards might not do it. As Dr Shipton has said, a number of policy statements that say that areas are overprovided for have no back-up on how that conclusion was reached or what was considered. It is essential that that remains a must rather than a may.

The Convener: There are a number of other questions. I hope that our witnesses are okay with that. I want to extend this questioning a little if I can, to get everything in.

Clare Adamson: At our evidence session last week, representation was made about changes in the way in which private members’ clubs are operating. Because such premises are subject to a less vigorous regime than an on-trade pub or club, occasional licences may have an impact. It has been said that such situations are not being taken into account when overprovision is being considered by the licensing boards. I would like to get your comments and your view on that.

Audrey Watson: As we do not have an overprovision policy—because we never got the evidence—it is difficult for me to talk about that. However, I can say that there are a number of members’ clubs in West Lothian that cater for the needs of a number of people in the more rural areas.

Janice Thomson: The East Renfrewshire alcohol and drug partnership has concerns regarding the rules and use of occasional licences. The current rules create a loophole enabling the legal requirements for fully licensed premises to be bypassed. That allows commercial premises to be run under a series of occasional licences, which is inequitable to premises with a permanent licence. Furthermore, that can increase the availability of alcohol in an area where that is not presently taken into account for overprovision assessment purposes.

We would advocate that both members’ clubs and occasional licences need to be included in the overprovision assessment, as they both increase the availability of alcohol.

Dr Scott: I agree: it is the aggregate level of availability that you want to consider. You want the assessment to be as robust as possible, so every contributor to that availability should be considered. I understand that the number of occasional licences is not insubstantial. Anecdotally, I am aware that they are potentially having an impact on young people in our area.

Dr Shipton: I agree that both need to be included in the overprovision assessment.

Clare Adamson: You cannot comment on overprovision, Ms Watson, but could you give us an indication of whether you have seen an increase in the number of occasional licences for members’ clubs?

Audrey Watson: Yes, I have. That has been the case over the past year, and it is largely due to Police Scotland taking an interest in members’ clubs and how they are run. It would appear, anecdotally, that a number of clubs have effectively been running as if they were not members’ clubs. The police have been telling them that they need to get occasional licences when they are opening their doors to everyone, which they do at this time of year in particular. On the one hand, that allows them to operate legally but, on the other hand, I can see that that might be a problem from an overprovision perspective.

The other problem that I have involves the large number of occasional licences, which are very difficult to deal with over a short timescale. We cannot get people to tell us soon enough that they are arranging an event, even if they have been arranging it for months. They might come to us only at the very end of the process, and they pay a fee of only £10.

We had one occasional licence recently for a school that was running an event. The organisers wanted to sell drink at half-time. If that is equated with having 250 people in a large venue, I do not see how we can count those events up and say that they are the same.

Dr Shipton: It comes back to the data. If we have an issue with capacity, there is something that could be done. We do not know how the number of occasional licences has changed over time. If we could obtain good outcomes data, it would be publicly available at the click of a button, and we could identify how the number of occasional licences has changed over time. We need to get better at identifying capacity for all types of licences.

The Convener: Surely the definition of “occasional” might need to be considered, too. Events where a school sells alcohol at half-time, for example, are probably very occasional. Judging by what we have been hearing, however, such licensing is regular, rather than occasional, when it comes to the licences for some places. Would that be fair to say? I see that everyone is nodding.

John Wilson: I have a quick comment on that: the problem is that a lot of members’ clubs have changed their operational structures to allow them to open up to the public because of the trading pressures on their sustainability.

I want to tackle an issue raised in the West Lothian licensing board’s submission in relation to “minor variation”. Ms Watson can maybe address this point. The submission states that extending the area of licensed premises can be considered to be a minor variation—I assume that that would include, for example, a beer garden. How would that relate to the issue of the supply of alcohol in public places? For example, a local bar could decide to stick a beer garden on to the front of the premises that would be next to shops.

In terms of the supply of alcohol in public places, in Glasgow in the summer every bar in Buchanan Street, Sauchiehall Street, Gordon...
Street and Ingram Street seems to want to open up for the consumption of alcohol in what would be to my mind a public place. How does that equate with responsible drinking and its promotion, particularly for those under the age of 18? One of the issues that we should be trying to address is the responsible consumption of alcohol. Total abolition or promoting temperance might be a worthy cause, but surely we should be promoting responsible alcohol consumption, particularly to those under the age of 18.

Audrey Watson: There is an example in my submission of a recent variation that crossed my desk that people in the local area might have objected to if they had been notified of it as a major variation, because it was about the extension of outside drinking. However, because of the way which the legislation is written and because the premises concerned already had a small outside drinking area, the variation was not regarded as the premises seeking to increase its capacity; in effect, it wanted everyone outside on a good day rather than inside, so the variation fell under the description of a minor variation and not a major variation.

That contrasts with an off-sales premises such as a convenience store that wants to open earlier than licensed hours, which is regarded as a major variation that must be advertised. When we have advertised such variations recently, people have written in and said that they are objecting to the sale of alcohol. However, it is not the sale of alcohol that is changing but only the opening hours of the convenience store. There is an issue that should be looked at.

The Convener: Does anyone else wish to comment on that?

Dr Scott: That example is about a potential increase in capacity. The contribution in terms of additional capacity of such an application to the capacity of the aggregate amount of licences could be considered from an objective and public health perspective. In terms of social norms, the more availability we have, the greater the social norm. I therefore agree that there is a concern from a young person perspective.

The Convener: Okay.

John Wilson: Sorry, convener, but Ms Watson just said that the minor variation in her example was for accommodating the premises’ existing clientele rather than for increasing the clientele. Do we not therefore have a contradiction in what a minor variation of a licence is?

As I said, in city centres during the summer a lot of pedestrianised areas are opened up for the consumption of alcohol. It is a matter of how we get the message over in terms of what is regarded as a minor variation. I am not sure how city centre premises apply for the outside areas for the consumption of alcohol, but I would argue that those areas are in a public place in a city centre that people walk through. The issue is the consumption of alcohol in public places versus that in licensed premises and what message the former sends out to young people in particular, given Dr Scott’s comment about social norms.

The Convener: Who wants to comment on that? I know that it is difficult because different rules apply in different areas in terms of scenarios for the licensing of outside areas. Am I right?

Audrey Watson: Our policy is that such areas should operate only until 9 pm. Of course, it is only a policy, and people can apply to open later than that.

A lot of the discussion has focused on applications coming before the board, but the difficulty is that because licences last for ever some premises simply do not come to the board’s attention unless there is a review. The way things are meant to happen is that we hear about premises only if they have a problem; otherwise, we have to assume that the outside areas are being run properly and that licence holders are taking appropriate steps to ensure, through monitoring by either closed-circuit television or staff positioned in the areas, that neither underage drinking nor overconsumption is taking place.

Dr Shipton: It all underlines the need for the policy and, indeed, for the policy to be adhered to. This kind of issue can be detailed for a particular local area.

The Convener: What are your views, if any, on plans to reintroduce the fit-and-proper-person test?

Dr Shipton: Licensing boards should be able to determine an applicant’s suitability, but we are concerned that the factors in question have not been specified. We therefore recommend that, in order to provide some clarity and transparency, boards identify the relevant factors, perhaps in a non-exhaustive list in their policy statement.

Dr Scott: I agree that reintroducing the test is a reasonable step, and I also think that boards should be required to specify the factors that they will consider. As for spent convictions, they are more of an issue for police and criminal justice colleagues to comment on.

Janice Thomson: From an alcohol and drug partnership perspective, we wholly agree with the reintroduction of the fit-and-proper-person test, and we believe that there should be clarity about the considerations that would be made in that respect. We, too, feel that spent convictions...
Audrey Watson: West Lothian licensing board wholly supports the proposal, but we are concerned about the suggestion that Police Scotland bring forward information that might have come to it from different sources about something that amounts to less than a conviction. After all, a decision of the board can be appealed if the board has proceeded on the basis of an incorrect material fact. Things can become difficult if the police tell us, “Well, we think he’s done this” or “We think he’s involved in organised crime,” because all the individual has to say is, “I’m not—prove it.”

The Convener: What about situations in which the licence is held by someone other than the owner of the premises?

Audrey Watson: Again, that is a difficulty that we have experienced locally.

Ironically, the licence owner is the only person in the system who does not need to be trained; the designated premises manager must be trained, but sometimes there is no correlation between the two individuals. We have had a lot of issues with people who are de facto managers but who are not the designated premises manager. I therefore think that the definition of “designated premises manager”—or “premises manager”, as they are termed in the legislation—needs to be looked at to ensure that we are talking about the person who is in control of the premises.

The Convener: Thank you very much for your evidence. It would be useful if you could supply us with examples of best practice and, indeed, bad practice. We have run a fair bit over time, so I thank you for your forbearance.

I suspend the meeting. We will recommence at 11 am.

10:49

Meeting suspended.

11:00

On resuming—

The Convener: I welcome our second panel of witnesses. Jake Adam is director of John R Adam & Sons Ltd, Ivor Williamson is managing director of Rosefield Salvage Ltd, Ian Hetherington is director general of the British Metals Recycling Association and Joe McCann is a site manager for Stephen Dalton Scrap Metal Merchants.

Does anyone have any opening remarks?

Ian Hetherington (British Metals Recycling Association): Thank you for listening to our evidence today. We appreciate that we will be discussing a rather different topic from the one that the committee was dealing with earlier. We recognise that, as a group, you will probably not be familiar with the scrap metal industry, so I will say a few words about the industry.

The recovery and processing of metals from consumer goods, demolished buildings, industrial processes and, more recently—this is particularly important in Scotland—the oil industry are a critical part of Scotland’s infrastructure. Every tonne of metal that is collected and processed has one destination: it goes into a steelworks or a metalworks and is reprocessed to become what it was in the first place. It is a perpetual and continuous process.

Metal recyclers and scrap metal dealers are interchangeable terms—we are not proud or worried about either name. Metal recyclers process about 1.3 million tonnes of metal every year in Scotland. The industry’s net turnover contributes about £500 million to the Scottish economy. In the current climate, with the demise of the steel industry in Scotland, about £300 million in foreign exchange is generated every year from the sale of recycled metal to metalworks overseas.

The industry has an unusual shape—a fact that is important and relevant to licensing of the industry. There are about 200,000 Scottish individuals, small businesses and large businesses who sell and supply scrap to our members, but our members sell to only about 200 to 350 customers. It is an upside-down industry, in that we have multiple suppliers and a very small number of end customers. The bill sets out to regulate the way in which we conduct our business with that large number of suppliers. It is unusual for a licence to dictate buying practices—licences typically dictate how products or services are sold.

Our members actively support the intentions and principles in the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill that relate to metal dealers. All the comments that we have submitted and the evidence that we provide today are aimed at supporting the intentions and strengthening the bill, as well as at making it more practical to implement and enforce.

However, we believe that the bill could be a great deal clearer. As it stands, enforcement of the provisions would be extremely difficult for the police and licensing authorities. Crucially, from our point of view, that will potentially disadvantage law-abiding metal recyclers in favour of those who work on the margins of the law.
Ivor Williamson (Rosefield Salvage Ltd): I would like to talk about our business. My business, Rosefield Salvage, is part of the Williamson Group, which is a family-owned metal recycling company that was founded in 1923. We are a fourth-generation firm and operate on five sites throughout Scotland, from Peterhead and Fraserburgh in the north to Uddingston and Dumfries in the south. We bought Rosefield Salvage in January 1995 and moved from its existing Dumfries town centre site to a fully concreted recycling facility on the edge of town. When we took over the business it had two employees. It now has 10 employees, and we have increased the tonnage from 5,000 tonnes to 25,000 tonnes. In monetary terms, that is an increase in turnover from about £200,000 to £19 million, and we have been in the top 20 companies in Scottish Business Insider magazine for the past three years.

At present, we have a wide variety of customers, ranging from the small householder who comes in with poles from his garden shed to people recycling aluminium cans to large multinational companies disposing of hundreds of tonnes of metal a week. The majority of our business is not cash based but is paid on account, but we also have a number of smaller profitable trades that we call door trades, with about 20 to 40 customers per day coming in and getting cash, ranging from householders disposing of aluminium cans to plumbers disposing of a redundant heating system. Those trades are generally paid in cash for convenience and customer ease. Most customers do not carry identification as such, and we see them only once or twice a year, depending on the nature of their business.

We currently service the Dumfries and Galloway area by buying ferrous and non-ferrous metals, and we have large machines that chop and bale the ferrous metal, which is then transported to larger ferrous metal merchants, who generally export it abroad. The higher value non-ferrous metals we bale, sort and export abroad ourselves in containers. We hope that the new proposals will bring tight regulation and strong enforcement, without which there would be a reduction in business. For the legislation to work, we want it to cut metal theft, but we also want it to incorporate companies such as car breakers, waste companies and demolition contractors that also deal with the metal industry but are not regulated in the same way.

Jake Adam (John R Adam & Sons Ltd): Thank you, Mr Convener, for the opportunity to be here today.

The Convener: I do not want to be a pedant, but you just need to call me “convener”. It is a good Scottish term that can apply to a man or a woman.

Jake Adam: Very true. Thank you, convener.

I am a director of J R Adam & Sons Ltd. We are a family business that is based in Glasgow, with two facilities in Glasgow and one in Ayrshire. We employ more than 70 people and are one of the five exporters in Scotland, and we export scrap metal all over the world. We export steel scrap mainly to Europe, to sell on to steel mills, which then remelt it into reinforcing bar for the construction industry. Over the past four years, our turnover has been more than £70 million, and in 2009 we won a Queen’s award for enterprise for international trade.

The Convener: Mr McCann, do you want to add anything?

Joe McCann (Stephen Dalton Scrap Metal Merchants): I agree in many respects with what the other gentlemen have said. I have been in the industry for 60 years and I have seen a lot of changes—some for the good and some for the not so good. In my opinion, the current licensing regime is such that, as Mr Williamson said, there are a lot of operators out there who do not work under the same conditions that we work under. We have to look at how we can stop it and where we can get co-operation, but we will not get cooperation if we are not on a level playing field.

The Convener: Let us start with a question about police investigation of metal theft. What is your experience of that, Mr Williamson?

Ivor Williamson: Generally, if something has been stolen, the police appear at your premises three or four days later, or sometimes a week later. We have even had them in six months after something has been reported stolen, which obviously makes it hard to identify whether it has been in our yard. I find that we do not have too big a problem with metal theft. Obviously we do not encourage particularly dodgy people to come into our yard. We want to get on with the police—we show them our records and we generally do not have a problem. The biggest problem is the length of time it takes from when something is reported stolen for the police to visit the yard.

The Convener: Let us look at some of the thefts that have taken place of late in my neck of the woods, which is the north-east of Scotland. We have seen thefts from railway lines, which put the Aberdeen to Inverness line out of action for a fair while, and quite a lot of thefts from electricity substations. If anybody comes to your yard with anything that you think is a bit suspect, do you contact the police?

Ivor Williamson: Yes. Lately the police have been in and given us a number to contact them on locally if anything suspect comes in. We have a text message system to contact them quickly. We are working with the police.

You mentioned the railway line thefts. People think that the cable went abroad and that the thefts were a result of organised crime, which is a major problem. Organised crime could come into the metal business and the waste business. If you ban the use of cash, organised crime might provide an avenue through which dealers can have cash to pay people, if you get what I mean. That is why we want to get everybody under one bill.

Jake Adam: I back up what Ivor Williamson said. We fully support and co-operate with the police on thefts of materials.

Sometimes the police come in quite quickly after a theft—a matter of days. At other times they come weeks after the theft has taken place. On a busy day we buy from other merchants, industry, the demolition industry and councils, all the way down to householders, and 800 tonnes of material can go through our yards. If stolen material comes in—either directly from the person who stole it or from another merchant—it can often have passed through the system by the time the police come, if they come a couple of weeks after the theft. However, as Mr Williamson said, if we suspect that anything is stolen we reject it and contact the police.

Joe McCann: I can speak only about Edinburgh. In Edinburgh we have the metal broker’s licence system, which contains rules and conditions that we adhere to. They say what time we can open, what time we shut, what we can buy and what we cannot buy. There is a limit on weights. We have had the system for many years and we have had no problems. The police can come in every day, if they want. They do not have to get a warrant and they can come in at any time of the day. Most members of the scrap industry do the same thing: they let the police come in at any time. We are quite happy with that and we cooperate with the police.

Ivan Hetherton: It is worth saying that the industry runs an online metal theft alert system; when people notify us of a theft we notify all our members. The issue comes down to speed: if we do not know about it because people do not tell us, material gets lost within hours.

BT is one of the largest suppliers of high-value copper cable to the industry; its network renewal programme is in large part being funded through the sale of surplus cable. We are seeing a flow of that material. Electricity companies such as Scottish Power and SSE sell a large quantity of cable to the industry, so differentiating between cable that is legitimately sold as part of renewal work and that which is stolen is sometimes difficult.

BT has really sorted it. Our members know that unless they have a contract with BT, they do not handle BT cable. However, lots of the other materials are not easy to identify as stolen. Just because it is cable does not mean that it is stolen.
Very often it is legitimate.

We work very closely with the network companies and the other provisioning companies.
If they were to tighten up their disposal routes that would make it a lot easier for our members to identify material that is actually stolen.

The Convener: You say that BT has contracts and that you deal with BT only through contracts.
Surely before that system was in place and in your dealings with other companies you would deal with company representatives.

Ian Hetherton: I will use Network Rail as an example, rather than BT, because BT has tightened up so much recently.

Network Rail’s small works contracts—which are not small by my standards—are let through main contractors to something like 400 subcontractors across the UK. That means that some very small subcontractors handle the material—it is not just Network Rail or main contractors. There is therefore a problem with planned disposal. However, the situation is getting better, and those companies have become more aware of the issue.

11:15

The Convener: Do you think that the cash ban, which is part of the bill, will be successful in removing incentives for metal theft?

Ivor Williamson: The cash ban would take away a portion of the incentive. There is always the corner of the trade that works outside the legal system. If you take away the cash, people who have historically been used to being paid in cash will still want to be paid in cash and will look for another avenue through which to get cash.
Obviously, we want to clamp down on that. We do not want other companies, such as waste companies, dealing with metal. Demolition companies get involved in dealing with metal, and you get people running around buying catalytic converters from garages and so on. There are many different avenues people can go down to get cash. Because the public have been used to getting cash for metal, if you suddenly say, “Right, you are only getting a cheque or money paid into your account,” they may well go to a garage that will give them cash. That means that the properly licensed scrapyard will be hurt, but people will still be being paid cash.
I have heard rumours that people who are involved in organised crime are getting into the trade in England, because they have access to amounts of cash. Obviously, we do not want that to happen up here.

Jake Adam: The bill will help, but it has to be tightened up dramatically. As Mr Williamson suggested, the definition of metal has to be tightened up to include catalytic converters, waste electrical equipment and end-of-life vehicles. The definition of a metal dealer also has to be tightened up. At the moment, metal dealers will have to adhere to the bill but, as was touched on by Mr Williamson, companies that are on the periphery of the industry—demolition companies, waste contractors, vehicle dismantlers—will not have to, which would mean that there would still be an opportunity for scrap metal to be purchased for cash.

Joe McCann: Basically, the bill means that people will be paid by cheque. However, as you are probably well aware, you cannot put your car into a garage and pay by cheque. That is not allowed and they will not accept it.

Cash is everybody’s right. Employees can ask to be paid in cash rather than by cheque. That is their right. It is the same in the scrap industry. If someone comes in and says, “I’m sorry but I don’t want to take your cheque; I’d like cash, please,” what are you going to do? Do you turn them away? No. You pay them in cash. To criminalise that would be totally out of order, because it would mean that we would get into a situation where Tesco would say that it will not take cash, and that people must pay by card. What if they do not have a card? You will get into the realms of banking and other things that you do not want to get into. Cash is cash. People are entitled to be paid in cash, if they wish.

Should we tighten up the rules? Yes. All the gentlemen here and everyone else in the scrap trade are quite happy for things to be tightened up. We look forward to that. However, we must be on a level playing field. As has been said, there are elements out there who will pay cash. People who would be paid by us with a cheque will go elsewhere, perhaps to the criminal element. Do you want that? No. You are looking for everyone to be back on a level playing field.

Ian Hetherington: The industry in Scotland is clear that it wants a range of provisions in the bill and that it fully accepts that the restrictions on payment are part of a suite of provisions that it would support. I differ from Joe McCann on this one. The industry is generally supportive of the changes, with all the provisos that you have heard from my colleagues.

The Convener: Will stopping cash payments help to catch those folks on the periphery who might be up to some criminal activity?

Ian Hetherington: Unless changing the law serves to embrace all the players that you have heard about, it will not do the job. If the bill is amended to cover all the loopholes that we are talking about, it will serve to help with that. We regard the identity provisions in the bill as critical to the process; they will reduce the industry’s provision of any outlet for stolen material, which is what we all want. The ID provisions have driven down crime and levels of metal theft in certain parts of England.

As part of a suite of measures, the provisions will, we hope, bear down on criminal activity generally.

Cameron Buchanan: As one of the few members who have actually been to a scrapyard, I have gained some superficial knowledge. The problem with cheques is that people who have been paid by cheque can go next door and cash the cheque immediately. It can be very difficult to stop cheques. However, cash is a problem, too. You keep talking about a level playing field. Could we have a maximum amount—£100, for example—that people could be paid in cash? Would that be an idea? There are two questions there really. The point about cheques is quite interesting because cheques are out of fashion now.

I also wonder whether the requirement for photographic ID would put off some of the less-hardened criminals, because they do not like having their picture taken.

Ivor Williamson: We all have CCTV. If the bill comes in and we have to identify customers using their photographic ID, we will have a copy of their ID and they will be on CCTV, too.

However, someone in a rural area—in the Highlands, for example—who has a couple of washing machines that are worth £5 and which they will not get money for will just throw them away at the side of the road. The requirement might therefore cause a problem in rural areas, although perhaps not in populated areas around the central belt.

I made a suggestion, but my suggestion got voted down at our meeting because people wanted to talk about the complete cash ban. They are worried about people coming in 10 times in one day and so on.

Cash is going the same way as cheque cashing, given that somebody who gets a cheque can go to the high street and cash it. Personally, I will not cash cheques in future. There will be a lot of different legislation on cheque cashing, but that will probably work only in the big cities such as Glasgow and Edinburgh anyway; I do not think that there will be a lot of uptake in rural areas.

I go back to the fact that you do not want anybody to pay cash. A car breaker might tell you that a scrap car is worth £100, but if it has five bags of copper in the back, it could be worth £500. It is all those little loopholes that we want to get rid of.

Jake Adam: Having photographic ID will help dramatically with the cheque-cashing issue. If my business issues a cheque and the customer is able to go to a cheque-cashing facility in Glasgow, that facility will require full identification so there will be a paper trail and full traceability. The big issue is that the material can be traced from the yard that it was sold to: there will be information on the name of the person who the material was bought from and the cheque-cashing facility will be able to identify the person who cashed the cheque. That is a slightly different issue, but, like Mr Williamson, we will not be looking to put cheque-cashing facilities on our premises.

For us, cash is a hassle. It is an expense and, more than anything, it is a security risk. When it goes, it will make our day-to-day business easier to run.

Joe McCann: I agree that cash is a hassle but, at the same time, we have to look at people's rights. When people come in, their registration, name, address and the time that they arrived are taken down. They are on CCTV on three different occasions: as they come into the yard, as they go down to the store and when they come back to be paid. They sign for their cash and they are on CCTV. Running the tape back is very simple. We do it, but the question is whether everyone else is doing it—and the answer is no. The small man does not have to put in all this equipment, and we do.

Ian Hetherington: The issue of cheques has been dealt with, but I note that the de minimis payment arrangement was trialled in France, although the trial was abandoned after six months and a full cash ban was brought in. People were getting round the system with multiple transactions and it was impossible to trace things. If we had a £100 limit, we would see a lot of people suddenly doing four or five £100 transactions in a day. Incidentally, in France, it was not only the police but the industry that deemed the arrangement to be completely unworkable, and the industry sought to have it transferred to a full ban.

Cameron Buchanan: I do not necessarily agree. Surely if photographic ID was required you would be able to spot the guy coming in every now and again.

Ian Hetherington: Yes, but the problem is that, unless you outlaw multiple transactions, you will need a very complex set of rules. Like all these things, unless the law is very clear, it will be difficult for industry people, local authorities and, more important, the police to enforce and understand it. Things can get very complex.

Cameron Buchanan: But what if, as in Mr Williamson's washing machine example, someone who comes to dump a washing machine cannot get cash and just says, "Sod it—I'll dump it in the river"? Should there not be a cash limit for those situations? Should we not apply a bit of common sense?

Ivor Williamson: The only problem is that that person could come to my yard and get £100, go to Jake Adam's yard and get another £100 and so on. He could split one load into four or five and go to four or five different yards.

Cameron Buchanan: Does that matter?

Ivor Williamson: It means that cash is still getting out there. If people want to steal material, they might think, "I can steal only £500-worth, but I can split it up and sell it to five different yards." I do not want to encourage that practice; I am just playing devil's advocate. In rural areas in the north of Scotland, where there are fewer scrapyards, people get money for the metal that they bring into yards. If we say, "We can take it, but by the time I check your ID and everything, it'll be worth nothing," they will tell us, "You're making a fortune out of this," and just dump whatever it is on the way home. In fact, that is what happens when the price of metal goes down: people think that you are making a fortune. This is also about people's perception.

John Wilson: Everybody around the table picked up on the convener's example of BT and Network Rail losing materials, but the main concern for many of the public is the brass plaque, the miners' memorial statue or whatever that is stolen and sold for scrap. How is the scrap metal industry challenging the perception that it is supporting that kind of crime?

Ivor Williamson: We share the distress caused by such actions. Many of our members subscribe to some of those monuments; in fact, in many cases where such thefts have occurred, our members have actually raised the money to replace them—not, I should add, out of guilt, but out of a sense of association. Such thefts are relatively rare but they are deeply distressing. It is perfectly clear that if a plaque with a name on it or a memorial were to be presented at a responsible scrap metal yard, it would be rejected and, I presume, the incident would be reported quickly.

As it happens, the most notable outbreak of such incidents was in London—it reached the national press—and it came down to one particular London yard that set out, in a deeply immoral way, to collect these things. The distress that is caused by those thefts is enormous, as is the impact, but the volumes of metal involved are so small that no responsible dealer wants them.

The theft of lead from church roofs is a classic example of something that causes immense community distress. We have done a lot with the lead industry to try to control high-grade heavy lead and make our members aware of the sorts of grades that might have come from historic buildings. We have done a great deal to counter the problem. I do not say that that addresses all the perception issues—that is a longer journey, but the bill is part of that journey.

Joe McCann: When people talk about scrap metal being stolen, the story is often elaborated—as if by a storyteller—and things get out of hand. You would be lucky if one half of half a per cent of stolen metal goes into the panel members’ yards, because they have got too much to lose. That is where I am coming from. If you have too much to lose, you do not take the metal. It is as simple as that.

Here in Edinburgh, we have a system where the police come in and tell us what has gone missing and then ask to look around the yard. The yard is open to them and we are happy with that. There is a similar system in Glasgow, although they do not have the same rules.

We therefore get a wee bit upset when people turn around and say, “Ah, the scappies—they’re a bunch of crooks and ne’er do wells.” I hold my head up. I am very proud of the scrap industry. I can go back to when we were called junkmen. Everyone thinks that the scrap metal trade is run by crooks, but it is not.

These gentlemen here have families who have been in the scrap trade for years and years. I have 60-odd years’ experience in the scrap trade. That is how we were brought up: you had to learn from the bottom and work your way up. If someone comes in with stolen material, you show them the door or phone the police, and when the police come in, they are quite happy.

The committee will find that the police have no problems with the majority of scrap merchants, particularly the big ones. How many of the big scrap merchants have been seen in court? None—apart from me, way back; I was in court about 40-odd years ago.

If the Parliament wants to stop illegal scrap, you need to sit and listen to these chaps—go around and do it slowly, bit by bit, to pull out where things have gone wrong. We know where the system has gone wrong, but do you listen? No.

The Convener: You are here today so that we can listen. Where has the system gone wrong, Mr McCann?

Joe McCann: The system has gone wrong because organisations such as the Scottish Environment Protection Agency and the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs created the waste industry. To me—the other gentlemen may not agree—scrap is not waste, but is a product that we have to process. We spend a lot of money on equipment. Even in the waste industry—I am also in that industry—we take the material in and what we recover goes in skips and back into the system. If we did not do that, it would cost the country a lot of money.

At one time, the scrap merchants were seen as the blue-eyed boys because we saved the country money by recycling—although I do not like that word. We brought in material that went to the steelworks, the brass foundries and so forth. We recycled and we saved the country a lot of money. Now, certain elements are causing us problems and that reflects on us all.

I get very passionate about this and when I read some of the legislation that goes through, I get upset. I would rather sit and talk to you. The police stop the illegal ones, but they say, “Oh, I’ve got a waste carrier’s licence,” so the police say, “Okay, on you go,” because they are licensed. We are the ones who have to take all the flak, although we abide by the law and make sure that everything goes well.

The Convener: It is up to us to try to safeguard legitimate traders. However, the problem that we have—the reason why the bill is in front of us—is that there are folk out there who are obviously not trading legitimately and we must ensure that the miners’ memorials, the railway infrastructure, the drain covers and so on do not disappear, causing lots of problems. We are trying to close down non-legitimate, criminal traders.

We are here to hear your views, and you can feed in anything that you like. We are not playing about with the scrutiny of the bill—it is up to us to ensure that it is as right as it possibly can be. The last thing that we want is to have to revisit it at a later date after having found that the problems have not been resolved.

Jake Adam: The industry fully supports the bill. I go back to the point about the brass plaques. In my opinion, if the bill is passed as currently drafted, theft will still occur because the industries that I have mentioned, which are on the periphery of the scrap trade and the metal recycling trade, will fall outwith the scope of the bill. There has been a lot in the press recently, particularly in Scotland from SEPA, about organised crime in the waste industry. The waste industry will fall outwith the scope of the bill as drafted, and if it is passed as drafted, it will not eradicate metal theft.

Ivor Williamson: I fully agree with Mr Adam. As Mr McCann set out, the bigger scrapyards are fixed entities and the police can check their CCTV records and everything. It is the smaller, maybe itinerant, traders who are possibly causing problems, and it is harder to police the ones who are on the outskirts of the law and who mostly do not want to abide by the law. Those are the ones that we are worried about. As Mr Adam says, we have to include businesses and companies that deal in metal but which do not fall within the scope of the bill.

The Convener: It would be useful for the committee if you were to list those dealers for us—all the associated trades that deal in metal—so that we could look at the matter in some depth. It would be extremely useful if you could do that, whether via Mr Hetherington’s organisation or individually.

Ivor Williamson: That is not a problem.

John Wilson: Thank you for your responses. As the convener has outlined, the committee is here to listen to your concerns about the legislation, because we need to ensure that we get the legislation right and relay your message to the Scottish Government. Part of the purpose of today’s evidence session is to allow us to hear what the industry thinks so that we can challenge the Government on what it puts forward.

Mr McCann, in your written submission you raise a concern over the separation of the waste management licence and the scrap metal broker’s licence. Can you expand on that so that we fully understand what you mean and what impact that separation might have on tackling the underlying problem of scrap metal theft?

Joe McCann: The waste licensing that is done through SEPA or DEFRA is entirely different from the broker’s licence. Anybody can apply for SEPA’s licence, as there are no hard and fast rules. That is for the likes of the car breakers, who can open 24/7, whereas we are curtailed to work between 7 in the morning and 5 at night, and between 7 in the morning and 12 noon on Saturdays. We cannot buy anything outside those hours—that is when we shut down. We adhere to that and are quite happy with it, but the ones on the periphery can work 24/7. They can walk into a pub and buy scrap. They will not pay with cash; they will pay with a cheque. Then they sell it elsewhere. Because they have a licence from SEPA, they are legal—they have a licence for recycling—but SEPA can also come into our yards and say that it is not happy with this or that and we have to spend money whereas the others do not. We are being penalised for what is going on with material that is being stolen and handled, and we are asking for a level playing field.

As I keep saying to you, I am happy with the system that we have for the broker’s licence. We have too much to lose. If scrap is worth £100 a tonne and you buy it at £50 a tonne over the door, and the scrap is stolen, you are charged with reset. You lose your cash and your scrap, and you can even lose your licence. That applies just to us, though; it does not apply to those who have licences from SEPA. There should be a level playing field. That is all that I am asking. If we can get the people who set out the laws to look closely, they will see that there is an unbelievable number of anomalies.

John Wilson: Mr McCann said that a broker could lose their licence. Mr Williamson’s submission suggests that somebody found breaking the licensing conditions should be struck off after three misdemeanours. That gives the impression that the current penalties—including the possibility of losing your licence—are not strong enough. Do you think that the prosecution system and the licensing system are strong enough to deal with these issues?

I take on board what all the witnesses have said. You are all legitimate businesses who are running legitimate businesses. The issue is how we tackle the illegitimate businesses that are causing most of the problems. As the convener said, we hear reports about theft from British Telecom and Network Rail. We have seen the footage on the television. The scrap is loaded into a container, the container is shipped off to a port and it is in China or India within a couple of weeks. It does not go through any system in Scotland or the rest of the UK. How do we tackle that? Can you assure us that you are fully behind consideration of the penalties and other opportunities that we have to curtail this type of trade?

Ivor Williamson: I think that what Mr McCann was getting at was that you need a waste carrier’s licence for carrying what is classed as waste, whether it is rubbish from a building site or scrap metal. That licence is about £140 from SEPA, for three years. If you are a plumber or you deal in metal, you need a waste carrier’s licence. A lot of itinerant and smaller dealers have those. However, it is only recently that the police have realised that a broker’s licence is also needed for dealing in metal. The police were not up to speed on a lot of the legislation.

SEPA gives out a licence to waste carriers, whereas local authorities give out what they call a metal dealer’s licence—which most of us have—or an exemption to a metal dealer’s licence. The smaller ones have a broker’s licence. If we have a metal dealer’s licence, we have opening times and times we are shut and so on. Those things are fixed, whereas the itinerants, who have a broker’s licence, are travelling around and are harder to police. The policing of that is a big problem.

SEPA has problems with other things. SEPA visits us only three or four times a year. It has a league that sets out how good our yards are. I suppose that the number of people that SEPA has available to check these things is all down to finances.

The three-stage idea was my suggestion—if somebody is dealing at the fringes and they get caught three times, they get their licence taken away. It was just a personal opinion. I thought that it might work.

Jake Adam: I believe that in England, if an individual or a company is charged with metal theft, they lose their licence. That should be the same for Scotland. A bill went through in England two years ago. It had a number of errors, which have since been changed. I believe that the legislation has been tightened up. However, Mr Hetherington is probably best placed to comment on the situation in England.

The Convener: Let us hear from Mr Hetherington, then, please.

Ian Hetherington: We heard about fit-and-proper-person tests in the previous evidence session this morning. We, too, would like a fit-and-proper-person test to be put in place under the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. We would also like some clear definition of what criteria a licensing authority could use—a non-exclusive list of offences, for example, which the authority could or should take into account.

We think that the sentencing levels that have been set out in the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982, as amended, are inadequate. The rewards for people acting illegally on the margins of the business are high—potentially very high—and we believe that a level 3 fine is not an adequate disincentive. In fact, it is at a level at which certain groups of people may well decide to take the hit occasionally, as the rewards are worth it. The levels of fine for certain offences are not adequate. Acting without a licence should be the number 1 offence and should attract the maximum fine.

On the whole, we believe that the levels are not adequate as they are currently defined. A licensing authority should have the ability to refuse a licence on the basis of a fit-and-proper-person test or, importantly, to revoke a licence if a certain range of offences need to be taken into account.

We would also ask that those who have been found guilty of serious environmental offences, not just criminal offences, should have those taken into account, so that we do not have a proliferation of people moving from waste crime into metal theft and back again, which is one of the dangers.

Joe McCann: It comes back to the need to examine these things very closely. I could show you paperwork going back to the waste directives. There are hundreds of waste-related provisions. Because scrap is classified as waste, anybody can apply for a waste transfer licence and a waste carrier’s licence. That is wrong. There must be proper definitions.

This is just my opinion about the other aspect of waste. This is nothing to do with scrap metal being stolen; it comes down to HM Revenue and Customs looking for ways to collect revenue for itself. It is so obvious it is unbelievable, but HMRC passes the buck. I would love to see the trade in stolen metals stopped, but that is only possible if the rules are tightened up.

The Convener: I point out that, at this time, the Parliament has no powers over HMRC.

Joe McCann: I understand that.

The Convener: I wish it were different. We are considering this matter entirely because of the difficulties that many organisations and people in general are having to suffer on a daily basis because of metal thefts. Ones that the committee has highlighted involve rail infrastructure, drains and memorial statues. That has nothing to do with scrap metal being stolen; it comes down to HM Revenue and Customs (HMRC); it is about the inconvenience that is being caused to people across the country.

Alex Rowley: I welcome the witnesses. Thank you for coming.

There is talk about the need for a national register of scrap metal dealers. Could you say a bit about that?

Ian Hetherington: We recognise that licensing will be a local process. However, unlike a lot of activities that are licensed by local authorities, this activity is not really localised. It is highly mobile. The sites of the gentlemen concerned are static. They are in the locations that they are in, and they can therefore be looked at and inspected. However, they may well be buying from businesses or suppliers from all over Scotland. By definition, they will be selling all over Scotland and beyond.

Itinerant collectors—I hate the word “itinerant”, which I think is pejorative; I would prefer to refer to them as mobile collectors, if we could have that amended at some point—are highly mobile and will work in multiple authority areas, so it is essential that there is a central and easily accessible place where the public, the police and site operators who are buying from those people can identify who is a legitimate, licensed operator in the industry. That would require local authorities to be under an obligation to provide the data, which could be collated in a single place and provided online.

Let us bear in mind that a lot of the public sell or give metal to collectors, sometimes on their own doorstep, and it is right that they should know that the people who are working in their communities doing door-to-door collecting are legitimate. That way, we might also be able to deal a death blow to the unfortunate occurrence of multiple local collectors going round housing estates in some of our conurbations.

It is an essential part of enforcement to have a national register, because if the police pull over a mobile collector somewhere west of Edinburgh, they will have no means of knowing whether he is legitimately licensed, or which authority to apply to to determine that. Having somebody present their licence within five days is not adequate. A licence should be displayed on premises or on a vehicle, and should be visible to the public, so that people can see immediately whether someone is licensed or not, and the police can then take action immediately, because anybody who has not displayed a licence will be committing an offence and the police can at least take the load away from them. The sort of sanction that we need is quick, effective policing.

SEPA is prepared, in principle, to undertake that work and to provide the register, which could sit alongside its existing registers, so it could be done. There is a cost issue, but that is probably open to discussion.

The Convener: Does anyone else have comments on the national register?

Ivor Williamson: At the moment, anybody can sell any metal to any person. If 98 per cent of the country wants to abide by the law, could you make a law that makes it illegal to sell metal to anybody who is not a properly registered dealer or scrap merchant? The majority of the public will want to deal with somebody who is properly registered. I do not know whether that could be fitted into the bill; it is just an idea.

The Convener: I do not know whether that is practical, but we have noted the suggestion.

Willie Coffey: Mr Hetherington, you mentioned the metal theft alert system in your opening remarks. Could you tell us more about that? Does it operate in Scotland or only in England, and do all dealers participate in it? Is it a visual system or a text system?

Ian Hetherington: It is an online alert system. Virtually all our members work with smartphones, which are de rigueur, so they all get a message identifying the theft, preferably including a photograph of the item or material that has been stolen. That message goes out within an hour of us being alerted to the theft.

Willie Coffey: Has it been effective so far in tracing items that have been stolen?

Ian Hetherington: Yes, it has, but it is a function of speed. If we get a really good description and get the message out within hours, we often get a response from a member saying that they have rejected the load or that they have seen a vehicle that looks familiar.

Willie Coffey: Who gets that information? Do the police get it?

Ian Hetherington: No, the police do not get it. It is aimed at the trade, because that is where we assume the stolen material is destined. As the convener has said, we are now beginning to see some direct exports from Scotland, but that is a different issue.

Willie Coffey: In terms of numbers, it cannot be the case that all traders, dealers and individuals are participating in the scheme. It would be great if they were, but how do we widen it to bring in more participants?

Ian Hetherington: We have just formed an industry partnership with a group that has a similar but smaller system that is technically much better than ours. We have raised some money to spread it out. The system will be linked to the police and will provide a police notification service.

The problem is speed and the time that it takes the notification to get to the police. I am not criticising the police; it is a resource issue. The information is not getting out quickly enough. As colleagues have said, if we are not notified within the day, it is difficult to track things.

We have done a lot with BT, and there is more that we can do with SSE and with Scottish Power, which has not been up to speed.

We are envisaging rolling the system out far more widely, beyond our own membership, which is also important.

Jake Adam: It is a case of closing down the avenues for the unscrupulous side of the trade. If someone offers you some lovely copper cable, you are not going to buy it, you are not going to give them cash for it and you do not want it, because it is not what you do. If the bill goes through as it is and the metal-recycling industry gets a full identification scheme and no longer deals in cash, but other industries on the periphery are still able to operate outwith the laws, there will still be a market for the unscrupulously procured material. If all those other industries are pulled into the bill, we hope that there will not be much of a market left for that material, if there is one at all. That should shut it down. People are not going to steal material if they cannot get money for it.

Willie Coffey: That was very helpful.

Clare Adamson: I will push a wee bit on one issue. You have all given examples of how your legitimate businesses operate and comply with all the regulations. I am not an expert on the industry, but my understanding from what has been said is that, in the pyramid of recycling, it is the ones at the bottom who do not have to comply with the same regulations that you have to.

Mr Hetherington mentioned smartphones; obviously technology is becoming much cheaper. In your opinion, are there regulations that you as larger operating businesses have to comply with that could be pushed down easily to the broker level?

Ian Hetherington: Yes, we believe that all of the regulations are quite manageable right the way through the trade, from the larger sites to the mobile collector. We have tested this idea across the border, mainly in Wales, where mobile collectors have been encouraged to use smartphones to photograph the material that they buy or collect. In our view, they should take some identification of where they have collected material, photograph addresses, and photograph payment methods if they are paying for material. All of that can be recorded on a phone and transferred very simply—this is not Superman stuff—and at no additional cost for equipment. It does take a bit of time, but it is time well spent.

All the provisions that we see here on identification and on payment restrictions should be applied at all levels of the industry and on the fringes of the industry, in our view. We do not see any barriers to small businesses gaining access to the technology. In fact, the proportionate cost is higher for larger businesses, because their installations will be more complex and have to be networked, and that will be at higher cost. All that technology exists at the moment.

Clare Adamson: Mr McCann, when you talked about a level playing field, did you mean the smaller businesses in the pyramid that was described or the ones that are external to the metal industry?

Joe McCann: We agree to the rules and we do our job, but the regulations do not apply to smaller unlicensed businesses. That is an anomaly that we must try to address. If we can address it, that will be great, but the other gentlemen on the panel do not want to go down a road that will end up with them in court and losing their businesses, because their names—believe it or not—are important to them. We guard our names jealously, and we get upset when what other people do could lead to our being criminalised, because of the way in which the bill has been written. As the joke goes, “In God we trust. Everyone else pays cash.” That is a fact of life. I am not trying to be flippant. It is something that the committee must look at and decide whether we are going the right way or the wrong way. Once you start the process and the bill goes through, you could have problems.

Cameron Buchanan: Having visited a scrapyard, I have seen the problems of storing material for 48 hours. It just does not seem to be practical. However, I see that Mr McCann of Dalton’s stores his metal for longer than 48 hours. What do the witnesses think about the storage rule? It seems to me to be onerous, because the police obviously do not come within 48 hours.

The Convener: Let us start with Mr McCann, who manages to cope with that at the moment.

Joe McCann: In Edinburgh, we have smaller materials from householders and we hold that stuff for 14 days. The stuff that we buy from engineering works we do not hold for that length of time, because we know exactly where it has come from and there is a paper trail, so it moves on. The smaller merchants hold the small materials for 14 days, so that part is clear, and if that material goes down to Mr Williamson’s yard he knows that it has sat with the person he has bought it from for 14 days and that the police have had a more than ample chance to visit. It may then sit in his yard for another 14 days, because the markets go up and down. That is how it is played, but unfortunately the rules are not always as we would like them to be. We all abide by the rules, but nobody else does, so we are the ones left holding the baby.

Ivor Williamson: I do not agree with that. If you have an acre of a yard and a weighbridge, a skip lorry may come in carrying council material in a 20-foot container. You could probably tip two or three such containers in a room this size, and that would take up 10 or 15 per cent of the yard space. By the end of a day, you would have run out of yard space if you had to keep that material and not move it for 48 hours.

There is another thing in the bill about notifying a date and time when you process material. The bigger the yard, the worse it is, because when material comes in we put it into machines, chop it up, squash it and bale it for moving on to larger steelworks or abroad—we are dealing with a large volume of light loose material that we have to process. The notification requirements would probably also cause a problem for SEPA, because there are tonnage limits and space confinements, and we are allowed certain materials in certain areas only for certain lengths of time. Some materials could come in and be chopped up and put in stock until the market goes up, but that would generally not work for scrap. I would have to shut my yard down within a week.

Jake Adam: I agree with Mr Williamson. Mr Buchanan saw the scrapyard in Edinburgh, so he knows that it would be impossible to fulfil the storage requirements. We would be able to operate on a Monday and a Thursday and that would be it. SEPA would have huge issues, as would the Health and Safety Executive, and the industry is under increased pressure from the Health and Safety Executive. Our insurance companies would also have huge issues with that requirement. It is just not workable.

Ian Hetherington: The definition of a mobile collector or itinerant collector is that they do not operate a site, so I am not sure how a mobile collector could hold material for 48 hours, apart from by piling it up on the road outside his house.

Ivor Williamson: If the cash ban comes in, which we all expect would stop 95 per cent of thefts, the 48-hour rule would not be needed.

Cameron Buchanan: That rule would be redundant.

Ivor Williamson: Yes, because dealers would want to keep the material for the police to see it. If you ban cash payments and think that you have stopped the crime, you do not need to keep the material.

John Wilson: Mr Hetherington’s submission to the committee refers to the fact that the bill wants to ban cash payments for scrap metal. You go on to talk about the Scrap Metal Dealers Act 2013 from England and Wales and you say that the bill contains significant weaknesses in comparison with the legislation down south. Will you expand on what those weaknesses are? Although we are not trying to mirror the English and Welsh legislation, we are certainly trying to achieve a level playing field and, if possible, to get better regulation in Scotland than currently applies.

Ian Hetherington: We deal with quite a number of the weaknesses, as we see them. I will go through them quickly. We believe that the definition of scrap metal is inadequate. Also, the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 defines a scrap metal dealer as “buying and selling” scrap metal; our strongly held view is that the definition of a scrap metal dealer should refer to their buying “or” selling scrap metal.

I know that the Scottish Government was keen to avoid getting into detail about payment methods, but that is an area in which there has to be detail and prescription, because it is complex. I give the example of cash cards that do not require the individual to hold any identification. In our view, that is the direct equivalent of cash. There might be an argument that the bill is non-prescriptive but, in essence, by not spelling things out, it lends itself to misinterpretation and poor enforcement.

I dealt with local authority licensing in relation to a register. On inconsistent licensing conditions, if mobile collectors are to be licensed only in one local authority, they will license themselves in the cheapest local authority, or the one that has the least stringent conditions. I have termed that “licence tourism”. It will be rampant. These are very bright people. That issue has to be dealt with. It is probably best dealt with through strong guidance and placing a strong duty of consistency on licensing authorities.

I have dealt with display of licences. We have not talked too much about establishing a seller’s identity. I know that the Scottish Government sought to avoid having too much detail on that in the bill, but it has to set out, either on the face of the bill or in definitive guidance, what forms of identity and what processes are required. In other words, do you need to verify the name and address by reference to a publicly available means of ID that contains a photograph and an address, for example? That would be our recommendation. The bill should also set out some alternatives.

We have referred to tag and hold. We believe that the lack of a suitable applicant test, or fit-and-proper-person test, is an omission. We also believe that there should be consultation with SEPA on applications for a new licence or for renewal of a licence. Joe McCann has highlighted the fact that, like it or not, the correlation between waste licensing and scrap metal dealer licensing is very close indeed. Frankly, if somebody is in breach of conditions on one side, that should be taken into account.

Some work needs to be done on who is being licensed. These are not all individuals; a large number of the licensees in Scotland are corporate entities of one sort or another. Some thought has to be given as to whether we should license the site manager—that goes back to the discussion that you had with the first panel—the owner or the controlling mind. The owner and the controlling mind might not be the same person, nor might either be the site manager.

Our assertion is that in a lot of these areas the bill needs more detail, I am afraid. I also comment—because I have been asked to—that trying to mesh this in with the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 adds a level of complexity and interweaving that makes the bill very difficult to read and understand, even for those of us whose job it is to read and understand these things.
We have been impertinent enough to produce a draft suggested rewording of some sections, which might bring it all together in one place, and which the Scottish Government and your clerks have received. We would be very happy, as the bill moves on, to work with the committee and with Scottish Government officials to try to make better legislation. We would like to see the best legislation in Scotland.

John Wilson: Thank you very much.

The Convener: No one has anything to add, so I thank you very much for your evidence. We now move into private session.

[The Convener opened the meeting at 09:33]
Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

09:37

The Convener: Agenda item 4 is our fifth oral evidence session on the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. We will begin with a round-table session, which will be followed by evidence from a panel.

I ask our witnesses to introduce themselves. We will go round the table, starting with Janet Hood.

Janet Hood (Association of Licensed Adult Entertainment Venues Scotland): I am from Janet Hood Consulting. I offer specialist licensing services to the trade. I am representing the Association of Licensed Adult Entertainment Venues Scotland. We thank the committee for the opportunity to present evidence. Do you just want a brief introduction?

The Convener: That is fine for now—we will come back to you on other matters.

Cameron Buchanan (Lothian) (Con): I am an MSP for Lothian and a member of the committee.

Andrew Cox: I am one of the managers in Glasgow’s Seventh Heaven lap-dancing club.

John Wilson (Central Scotland) (Ind): I am deputy convener of the committee and an MSP for Central Scotland.

Professor Phil Hubbard (University of Kent): I am from the University of Kent. I am the leading academic authority on the licensing of lap-dancing and sexual entertainment venues in England and Wales.

Alex Rowley (Cowdenbeath) (Lab): I am the MSP for the Cowdenbeath constituency.

Mairi Millar (Glasgow City Council): Good morning. I am legal manager for licensing at Glasgow City Council and clerk to the city of Glasgow licensing board.

Sandra White (Glasgow Kelvin) (SNP): I am the MSP for Glasgow Kelvin. I have an interest in relation to part of the bill. I thank the committee very much for allowing me to be here.

Cara Hilton: I am the MSP for Dunfermline.

Jon Morgan (Federation of Scottish Theatre): I am director of the Federation of Scottish Theatre, which is a membership body for dance and theatre companies and venues. We have around 160 members across Scotland.

Stewart Stevenson: I am the member of the Scottish Parliament for Banffshire and Buchan Coast.
Eric Anderson (Aberdeen City Council): Good morning. I am deputy clerk to Aberdeen city licensing board and legal adviser to the licensing committee, which is the committee that deals with civic government legislation.

Willie Coffey (Kilmarnock and Irvine Valley) (SNP): Hello. I am the MSP for Kilmarnock and Irvine Valley.

Laura Tomson (Zero Tolerance): I am from Zero Tolerance, which is a charity that works to end violence against women.

The Convener: I am the convener of the committee.

We have received apologies from Willie Taylor of Dumfries and Galloway Council. He is unable to attend because of bad weather conditions.

The panellists are most welcome. When you are called to speak, you do not need to press the button on your console to put on the microphone; that will be done for you. If I call you to speak, hands off the consoles—that would be grand.

My first question is about sexual entertainment premises. Many of us who represent areas where there are such venues know that there are often complaints from folks who live close by. These venues cause a little bit of controversy. What are folks’ feelings on that situation and on the positioning of some of the premises? Janet, would you like to go first?

Janet Hood: Yes, I would. The Scottish Parliament very cleverly regulated adult entertainment venues, which are what exist at the moment, under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005. One of the great boons in that act for anybody who has difficulty with any type of licensed premises is that any person can raise a complaint and any person can raise a review. If there are complaints about the running of these premises, they can easily be brought to licensing boards, which I have no doubt would deal with them.

The act is predicated upon five objectives, which include the protection of people; the preservation of public safety; the prevention of crime and disorder; and the protection of health. It is highly surprising that comments are made that these complaints are out there, given that—as far as I am aware; of course I am not omniscient—there have been no complaints on those grounds to do with the running of premises.

One could say, “Oh well, people might feel intimidated about coming to a licensing board,” but the Scottish Parliament thought about that. There are licensing standards officers and the police, to whom complaints can be made. I had experience of people complaining about noise nuisance from a noisy pub. The licensing standards officer took the complaint to the licensing board, as is his right, on behalf of the people who were making the complaint because they did not have the confidence to do so.

It is therefore surprising that, as far as I am aware, nothing has been raised with licensing boards to date.

The Convener: Thank you very much. Others should feel free to indicate if they want to come in. Professor Hubbard, would you like to comment?

Professor Hubbard: Yes. The academic evidence suggests that there is no particular association between criminality and the presence of lap-dance clubs or gentlemen’s clubs in particular communities, but we need to acknowledge that those clubs do create anxiety and moral disapproval from certain sections of society. There is a great deal of evidence that people are anxious about them being located close to residential premises, places of worship, schools and other community facilities.

The introduction of the Policing and Crime Act 2009 in England and Wales gave adoptive legislation to local authorities, allowing them to control these premises with a degree of flexibility and discretion and in many cases that has been done successfully. However, the introduction of the act in England and Wales was by and large farcical in the way that it was allowed to proceed.

We have a situation in England and Wales that I would like to see avoided in Scotland—I think you could learn the lessons from England and Wales. The legislation is adoptive, not mandatory. We have a situation, in London for example, where there is a licensing regime for these establishments in one local authority but not in a neighbouring one. The fees for the establishments range from £300 to £26,000. Some local authorities will ban nudity and others will not.

The situation has given rise to a whole range of appeal cases and litigation in which legal unreasonableness and inconsistency have been raised as valid concerns. Some of those appeals have been upheld. It has created a great deal of anxiety, expenditure and time for many local authorities, which have been left to evolve policies of their own.

My recommendation is that if Scotland introduces the bill, which I think it should, it should ensure that licensing of these types of premises is mandatory for all local authorities in Scotland and that the legislation provides a much clearer definition of sexual entertainment, because that is being challenged in England and Wales at the moment. The legislation needs to distinguish that form of entertainment from theatre performance. It also needs to ensure that it does not allow for massage parlour owners in effect to license their premises as brothels, which, as we know, would be contrary to other criminal law.

Finally, we need to ensure that there are clearer grounds for refusal in the primary legislation, not just in guidance notes. It needs to be stated in the legislation that local authorities should pay particular attention to the uses in the vicinity where those uses include education, places of worship, community facilities and so on. That should be stipulated in the legislation, so that if a case goes to appeal it is clear that the primary legislation indicates the grounds for refusal.

Sandra White: I would like to touch on what Janet Hood said about no one having objected. I appeared at the city of Glasgow licensing board in John Street with regard to clubs that were opening in Royal Exchange Square, along with a number of businesspeople who had businesses there, so it is untrue to say that people have not gone along to object. It is quite intimidating when you go to a licensing board, because the owners of the clubs are there as well, and you have to appear before a panel of councillors and give evidence. It is like a mini court, so it is quite intimidating, but I and others have certainly been there.

I would also like to pick up on the point that Professor Hubbard made. I agree with most of what he said, but when I was putting forward the bill we were advised that to make licensing mandatory would be much more difficult. The legislation in England and Wales went through before we managed to put our Scottish bill through.

The Convener: Could you clarify whether, when you talk about putting forward the bill, you are talking about the member's bill that you intended to introduce, rather than the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill, which we are dealing with now?

Sandra White: Yes, my intention at the time was to introduce a member's bill that would make the licensing of such premises mandatory, but our legal advice was that it would be much better to make it a matter for local authorities. It costs local authorities, such as Glasgow City Council, a lot of money if a case goes on appeal to the Court of Session, so they would invariably drop their cases as the owners appealed. It was therefore felt at the time that allowing each individual local authority to make its own choice was the best way forward, because that way the people who live in an area could ask their councils to adopt the legislation.

I shall leave it at that, convener, but thank you very much for allowing me to come in at that point. I may come back in on some other points later.

The Convener: We shall hear from Mairi Millar next, and then from Cameron Buchanan, Janet Hood and Stewart Stevenson.

Mairi Millar: I agree with some of the comments that Janet Hood made. In Glasgow, there are four lap-dancing clubs, or licensed premises with adult entertainment, and there have not been any reviews brought by members of the public against those premises. Equally, however, there have been no reviews brought against any licensed premises under the new provisions by any member of the public. That probably says a lot about people's understanding of and involvement in the licensing process.

We had an objection to a lap-dancing club at the time of the transitional arrangements, brought by one of the licensing standards officers, and that led to the appeal in the now famous case of Brightcrew Ltd v City of Glasgow Licensing Board. One of the issues that we have now is that, because of the Brightcrew decision, it became clear that the licensing board's responsibility is primarily in terms of the licensing objectives relating to the sale of alcohol. Licensing standards officers now do not regulate adult entertainment activity because of that decision, so the premises are largely unregulated.

I also support Sandra White's comments. When we have had new applications—going back quite some time—there has been a significant level of objections to those applications. Again, that supports the comments made by Professor Hubbard about the feelings of local communities about new establishments opening up in their area and the impact that that could have on a residential area.

Janet Hood: My understanding is that there have been no new applications for some time, certainly in Glasgow, and that we are in a falling market. There were 20 lap-dancing clubs in Scotland and we are now down to 17. Two of those 17 premises happen to be owned by the same person in the same building, so I suppose that we could say that there are 16. Aberdeen City Council turned me down for an application for a lap-dancing club in Chapel Street on the grounds of the protection of children from harm. It turned down another application in Union Street—I did not act for the client at the time—on the grounds of location, and it turned down another on the grounds of the unsuitability of the location.

The Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 and, indeed, the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 set out various criteria, one of which is that local government is a statutory objector or statutory consultee. As a result, local government already has the ability to comment or complain, but I have no idea whether it has commented on or complained about any of these licensing applications. It certainly has not done so with regard to any clients with whom I have dealt.

Taking up Professor Hubbard’s point, I should point out that location, character and condition already form part of the 2005 act. Licensing boards look at where the club in question is, and if it is near a school, a church or something of that ilk, it is highly unlikely that an adult entertainment licence for a premises where such activity takes place will be granted. If the character of the building overtly demonstrates what is going on within it—which is barred in the bulk of Scotland—not only the licensing board but the planning committee, which deals with advertisements, will comment on its unsuitability. That can be linked directly to the sale of alcohol because such advertising, whether it be a sign for Tennent’s or anything else, can lead people into the premises.

I find it unfortunate that it is being implied that local government has no say in this matter; it has a say, but so far it has chosen not to say anything—or so it appears.

Cameron Buchanan: I seek some clarification from Professor Hubbard. In England and Wales, is the licensing for theatre performance the same as that for sexual entertainment? You said that things in that respect were rather loosely worded.

Professor Hubbard: My expertise is in the area of sexual entertainment venue licensing, which is separate from the public entertainment licensing regime. As far as I know, no theatre or theatrical performance has applied for an SEV licence. At the moment, 221 venues in England and Wales are licensed for sexual entertainment, the majority of which are gentlemen’s clubs. There are five gay clubs with what are called dark rooms or fumble rooms that gay men frequent to have sex with each other, and there is one licensed swingers club. As far as I know, no theatrical entertainment or burlesque spaces are licensed in that way.

Cameron Buchanan: Thank you.

The Convener: Did you wish to make a point, Mr Morgan?

Jon Morgan: With regard to the licensing of theatres in England and Wales, I point out that they come under a single catch-all licence called a premises licence, which covers alcohol, public entertainment, theatres and cinemas.

Stewart Stevenson: This early part of the discussion has focused on the point that any such premises or activities taking place in communities need to be properly located away from sensitive areas such as schools, churches and so on. That immediately draws me to the exemption in the bill under which it is possible for premises to host sexual entertainment on no more than four occasions over the 12-month period. In other words, they are outside the regime altogether.

I wonder whether I can draw on the expertise of the people with us this morning by asking whether that might create disproportionate discomfort in communities. Because there would be no control over the location, there would in law be nothing to stop premises immediately next to a school being used for such activities—infrequently, perhaps, but enough to cause disproportionate concern to people whose kids go to that school. In fact, it might bring into disrepute the whole attempt to bring some sanity to the situation through this legislation.

Can the experts around the table contribute to that discussion? I have to say that I am quite uncomfortable about this exemption, particularly with regard to the issue of location.

The Convener: I will take Eric Anderson next, given that Aberdeen City Council has been mentioned. Perhaps you can also cover the point that Mr Stevenson has highlighted, Mr Anderson.

Eric Anderson: Certainly, convener. We expressed the same concern in our response to the consultation, and we think that it might create a loophole that organisers could exploit. Instead of having a permanent premises with a licence and proper facilities for performers, they could simply transfer the activity to different venues where there are no such facilities or protection. Such an exemption could therefore mean defeating the aims and purposes of the amendments to the 1982 act.

The Convener: Ms Hood made some comments about Aberdeen City Council. Do you want to react to those comments?

Eric Anderson: As far as the refusal of licences is concerned, I can confirm that, since the 2005 act was put in place, we have refused one premises. We have refused others in the past under the previous legislation—that is correct.

Laura Tomson: What has been missing from this conversation so far is what is different about sexual or adult entertainment and how that fits in with other policies across the Scottish Government. The Zero Tolerance position, along with the position of many other equalities organisations in Scotland and the Scottish Government’s violence against women strategy, is that sexual entertainment is a form of commercial sexual exploitation with links to violence against women.

The introduction of a separate licensing structure is important not just because we have had issues with alcohol licensing, but because there are so many issues around prostitution being accessed through lap dancing; research in Scotland shows that that is very prevalent. There are also issues around prostitution itself—for example, women who are involved in prostitution are much more likely to be victims of violence against women; women feel unsafe around the venues; and women who work in the venues face abuse and harassment.

If a new licensing regime is to be introduced—we support that, with the caveat that we would like to see an end to that kind of exploitation—the regime needs to take those broader themes into account. That is why I agree with Professor Hubbard that it should be mandatory for all local authorities in Scotland to take it up. If that does not happen, we will be ignoring a lot of very important issues, such as those around child protection; it should not be up to local authorities to decide whether those issues are relevant to them.

The regulations should include guidance for local authorities on what they should inspect and what they should expect licensed venues to do, for example in terms of allowing in welfare visitors to speak to their workers or contact between customers and workers. That is all very important.

On the point about the number of times that sexual entertainment happens in a venue, when those themes are taken into account, how many times it happens is irrelevant. The potential for harm is there no matter how many times it happens. In their submissions to the consultation, a lot of people expressed worries that organisers would simply move from venue to venue, which would make it much more difficult to regulate those harms. If sexual entertainment occurs once a year, the venue should have to have a licence for it.

When it comes to signage around schools, I point out that if you walk down Lothian Road—or what is called the pubic triangle by locals—in Edinburgh, you will see that it is very clear that very sexualised, very obvious signage is being used. It is being challenged by Zero Tolerance, but nothing has changed. The signage is within one or two streets of at least three schools, so obviously nothing is happening there.

The Convener: One thing that the committee has looked at in previous sessions is occasional alcohol licensing. The four-times-a-year allowance seems to raise that kind of occasionality again. Do such situations cause real difficulties for licensing boards?

Mairi Millar: It would be almost impossible to enforce the number of times that the activity is held. Licensing boards or licensing standards authorities simply would not know how many times it had happened, because there would be no requirement for them to know. They would be reliant on the premises to self-regulate and admit if they had not kept it to four times. We simply cannot rely on licensing standards authorities being able to cover all licensed premises to keep track of the number of times that an activity takes place. I share the concerns about it being unregulated generally, but I feel that a limit on the number of activities would be impossible to enforce.

Eric Anderson: I concur with everything that Mairi Millar just said. Control and monitoring would be very difficult if a premises were not properly licensed.

Professor Hubbard: Such restrictions are being introduced to deal with the situation that one finds in some holiday resorts in England and Wales, such as Newquay and Scarborough, and in particular for things that happen around the Cheltenham gold cup, for example, when, for the seven days’ duration of the event, premises will put on lap dancing—they will not have it for the rest of the year. That falls within the 12-times-a-year limit that has been set in England and Wales.

Local authorities would become very much aware of the fact that particular premises were abusing that law for the whole week, say, of a particular sporting event. If a particular pub or club was putting on that type of entertainment during the Edinburgh festival, for instance, it would become clear to the licensing board, through reports.

The Convener: I look to the licensing clerks to see whether they agree with that position. I imagine that, in certain cases, it might be a little bit more difficult for you guys to get to grips with what is going on at some private members’ clubs. Is that the case?

Mairi Millar: With regard to the example that has been given of a pop-up, one-off annual event, I suppose that there would be more visibility there. I was thinking about the idea of such entertainment being taken around different premises. It would be very difficult for a board or a licensing standards officer to keep track of that among licensed premises.

The Convener: There are a number of private members’ clubs in sports and social clubs in Aberdeen. Would you be able to keep track, Mr Anderson, if such a timetable was used?

Eric Anderson: There are indeed. It is difficult to keep track of all the activities. Where there is an opportunity to have an itinerant type of entertainment, which moves from place to place—here one day and gone the next—that makes monitoring, control and keeping tabs very difficult. I would certainly consider opposing that proposal.
As Professor Hubbard said, a one-off major event with consistent types of regular entertainment on an annual basis is one scenario. However, if things are arranged on a day-by-day or week-by-week basis, that is a different story altogether.

Janet Hood: I find myself, and my clients find themselves, in agreement with the licensing boards and with Zero Tolerance on this point. At the moment, the clubs that I represent in the Association of Licensed Adult Entertainment Venues are highly regulated. They have vast numbers of stewards, closed-circuit television and high levels of training for management. The premises are properly and well regulated. The dancers are not employees, and they are not forced to dance. They apply to dance within the premises, and they come there to dance.

We have particular concerns about the arrangement for allowing four events a year. Those events could take place in unregulated public places. That is bad enough, but what is happening now—we feel that the Scottish Government should be turning its eye on this—is that seriously unregulated sexual entertainment is going on in Scotland.

I spent an exceedingly unpleasant weekend last weekend typing “strippers Dundee” or “strippers Perth”, among other things, into Google—even “strippers Edzell”, which is where I live. I discovered to my horror that, although I am unlikely to do this, groups of young men or whoever could engage women to come to their premises for the purposes of performing a striptease. They could say that it was for a stag night or for something else. The women can come to a private house or to a hotel room. They will not turn up in tassels and a G-string; they will turn up and go to the room looking as if they are normal human beings.

That is completely unregulated. On each one of the websites, I asked whether I would have to pay for a chaperone, and I found out that there are no chaperones. Those women are the people who are being seriously exploited in Scotland, and my clients have serious concerns with that.

Among the comments that were made at a previous committee meeting, there was an implication that striptease performances and so on for hen nights or stag nights were not particularly serious. I would say that those instances are where the serious harm is likely to lie in Scotland. If the provisions involving four days a year are used, such events could probably happen in pubs and clubs. At least they will be in public, and there is a chance that the girls might get away unscathed.

However, they will not be regulated in the way that adult entertainment venues are currently regulated. My clients have an immigration and migrant toolkit, which has been presented to this committee, whereby girls are identified with a passport or driving licence and their next of kin is sourced. Photographs are taken of their identification documents and are passed to the police. That all helps to keep people safe—and not only within the clubs. Payments are made only to the girls’ bank accounts or into their hands; no payments are made to third parties. That is not the case when someone goes online to book a girl to come to their flat or bedroom. Those are matters with which the committee should be concerned.

Andrew Cox: In the club that I work in, no one has ever been arrested or charged with people trafficking, prostitution, money laundering or any of the other things that have been targeted at us.

Laura Tomson talked about letting welfare in. We are open to anybody. We let the police and licensing standards officers in. Anybody here is welcome to come in and talk to the girls.

My main concern, other than the girls, is myself. If there is a ban or zero licences for Glasgow, I will get put out of a job. I would like to know what is going to happen to me. Is there provision to help retrain me? There are nine or 10 full-time employees in my club—that is just one club—so you could quite easily be talking about 1,000 jobs, including the dancers. Will I get redundancy pay? Once the club loses its licence, the money will dry up. Who will help me pay my mortgage or plan for my future? I just want to know if that is going to be mentioned.

Stewart Stevenson: I want to follow up on Professor Hubbard’s description of the 12 occasions provision in the English legislation. As a substitute member of the committee, I am afraid that I might not be quite up to speed with some of my colleagues. I want to explore with the professor and with others who can make informed comment what the practical effect is. The example that was given was the Cheltenham gold cup, which is fair enough. Does the way that the 12 exemptions provision works inform the committee? I started from the point of view of whether taking those occasions entirely outside the licensing system, particularly if it meant that no drinks licence was associated with them—after all, bring your own bottle is common in other circumstances and it could apply here—causes difficulties for communities in England. Practical examples would help inform our understanding of what we should do in Scotland.

Professor Hubbard: I think that this issue is a red herring in relation to what we are talking about. We are talking about the licensing of a premises, not the licensing of an activity. If an activity is highly itinerant it is not likely that any community would identify a particular premises as being associated with it. Therefore, I cannot think of any particular situation where itinerant striptease at a venue has caused anxiety for communities. It is where a particular premises becomes identified, visibly known and advertised as a lap-dancing club that opposition and anxiety begins to be perpetuated.

Stewart Stevenson: The itinerant activity is presumably advertised by some means, otherwise it would be difficult for clients to arrive at the venue. How does that work in practice? Forgive my naivety.

Professor Hubbard: There are agencies in England and Wales that will provide dancers to certain striptease pubs. You cannot find websites for those pubs; they do it as an irregular activity and they will generally advertise through word of mouth or just by putting something on the chalk board outside. It might happen on a Sunday lunch time once every six months; it might happen on a regular Friday or Saturday night. Those places are not particularly known or reputed for sexual entertainment; they would not be understood by most residents as specifically having that type of entertainment and it might alternate with other forms of entertainment such as live music and comedy. This is a bit of a red herring. If you have particular anxieties about itinerant adult entertainment, you should license the dancers and the performers, not the premises.

Stewart Stevenson: What you are saying to the committee is that the premises that operate on the exemption basis are all premises that are otherwise regulated. You are suggesting to me—or at least I am hearing—that there are no cases in which premises that are not regulated by some regulatory regime are exploiting the exemption. Is that what I am being told?

Professor Hubbard: It is possible that some escape regulation, but the majority will be issued with a standard premises licence for alcohol.

Sandra White: I want to raise a number of issues. We are talking about local authorities, which have a very hard job to do. I would be interested to know how many times clubs in Aberdeen have appealed the decision.

In Aberdeen, I mentioned that, in one of the clubs that I was in, I spoke to a group of young men. I felt that they were being exploited because they were being egged on by their friends to put money—blah, blah, blah—to get a dance. I asked these young men what they thought about the women in the clubs and I could not repeat the language that they used. When I asked what they would do if it was their wife, girlfriend or sister, they said that they would never do that. That is another point that we have to consider.

We talk about employment. These dancers are self-employed. They pay to dance—they pay for their costumes and the tables. These girls are being exploited in many ways. It is about a perception that men in particular have of women when they see these dancers, or whatever you wish to call them. We talk about the public corner in Edinburgh, which is very well advertised. A lady who works in one of the clubs was accosted by a customer outside a club when she was not working. The treatment of that poor lady says a lot to me about how men perceive these dancers.

In my area, people coming from Central station—people coming from work and going about their business—have to walk past these clubs. We need to look at it seriously.

The Convener: Can I stop you again, Sandra? You said “this bill” again. You are talking about your previous proposed bill and not the bill that we are discussing.

Sandra White: Yes. I suppose that it is all experience to take us forward. I am very pleased that the committee is scrutinising the bill.

What struck me in some of the clubs that I went into was the lack of customers. I often wondered how the clubs made enough money to remain open.

We are missing an important point here, though. Laura Tomson raised the issue of how women are looked on by the men who frequent the clubs. In one of the clubs that I was in, I spoke to a group of young men. I felt that they were being exploited by their friends—blah, blah, blah—to get a dance. I asked these young men what they thought about the women in the clubs and I could not repeat the language that they used. When I asked what they would do if it was their wife, girlfriend or sister, they said that they would never do that. That is another point that we have to consider.

We talk about employment. These dancers are self-employed. They pay to dance—they pay for their costumes and the tables. These girls are being exploited in many ways. It is about a perception that men in particular have of women when they see these dancers, or whatever you wish to call them. We talk about the public corner in Edinburgh, which is very well advertised. A lady who works in one of the clubs was accosted by a customer outside a club when she was not working. The treatment of that poor lady says a lot to me about how men perceive these dancers.

In my area, people coming from Central station—people coming from work and going about their business—have to walk past these clubs. We need to look at it seriously.

The Convener: Eric Anderson, there was a specific question about Aberdeen.

Eric Anderson: In Aberdeen, I mentioned that, since the 2005 act, we have refused one application for a sex entertainment premises. That was not appealed by the applicant. Of course, we cannot read anything into that particular scenario. The other two came under previous legislation going back into the mists of time. As I recall, the case in question attracted objections into double figures.

Janet Hood: There were 22 objections. Sorry, I beg your pardon. It is just that it was mine.

Eric Anderson: I did not clerk that meeting. There is a particular concern, as you can perhaps detect from that.
Mairi Millar: I want to follow up on points regarding the occasional use of premises. It could be that the temporary licence provisions would suit, so that, if premises are to be used on an occasional basis, an application could be made for a temporary licence, just as a one-off public entertainment event can be covered by a temporary licence. I am not sure whether the provisions currently extend to include the temporary licence provisions—I would need to check that—but it would certainly be an option, rather than having the de minimis provision.

On a more general point, following on from Sandra White’s comments, it strikes me that we have licensing legislation and regulations to cover everything from window cleaning to selling burgers from a van or selling chewing gum at 3 o’clock in the morning under late hours catering regulations, but adult entertainment activity is currently not regulated. There are no provisions and there is no control over the conduct of such activity, and that is a fundamental point about what the bill would allow local authorities to do that is not currently available to them or to licensing boards.

Janet Hood: I would like to come in on Laura Tomson’s point about the advertising of clubs in the Lothian Road area. Advertising is in the control of local government planning committees. If advertising is deemed by the local authority, which might, according to Mairi Millar, be anxious to control such venues, to cause offence, one would have thought that such advertising, which was mentioned by Laura Tomson and Sandra White, should be controlled by the planning authority. That is a matter that should be taken up with planning authorities.

Mairi Millar suggests that the Brightcrew decision has removed any element of control. The five objectives, and the requirement to consider any form of criminality through the fit-and-proper-person test that is coming back in, give licensing boards huge control. My clients’ premises are among the most controlled premises in Scotland. That is why we have so few incidents of any harm happening. The controls are implemented by management, staff and stewarding. All the activities in the clubs are open to scrutiny by the police, licensing standards officers and, as has been indicated by Andrew Cox, any other person from local government, or from anywhere else, who wishes to come in, and they are always welcome. My clients are not trying to hide anything that they do. They welcome scrutiny because they wish to be in a position to demonstrate how well the clubs are regulated.

Part of the issue in the Brightcrew case was whether a kettle should be produced in a changing room. There were issues that really had nothing to do with the preservation of order and good practice within premises. I defy anybody round this table to suggest that the clients I represent do not carry out good practice and care for the dancers, the public, the staff and people in the vicinity.

Andrew Cox: Sandra White said that it is quite daunting going to a licensing board. It is just as daunting for me to give evidence to this committee.

Sandra White mentioned that the premises were near a church. As a layman, I would have assumed that churches are morning things, so I do not think that the two crowds would bump into each other. I thought that that was a bit strange. People have been talking about this club and that club, but I am interested in my club. We have succeeded in meeting every single regulation that we are hit with, and we are happy to do it. It has been said that the girls are self-employed and that there is a lack of customers. The girls obviously make money, and it does not matter how many customers there are. If it is quiet, one millionaire is as good as many other people who are spending the same money on the same things.

People have also commented on how the girls are looked on by men. My girlfriend, who is my future wife, was a dancer and how she was looked on by men has done no damage to her. She is more than happy, so I do not really see how you can categorise everything with the one thing. Every girl is different and every club is different.

Sandra White: Could I come in on that?

The Convener: I have a list of people who want to speak, Sandra, but I will let you come back in later. Let us hear from Professor Hubbard.

Professor Hubbard: I return to the issue of advertising. In general, I am in favour of the introduction of the new power, because licensing provides flexibility and discretion to local authorities that the planning system does not. It allows people to react to changes in a way that, once initial permission has been given, perhaps cannot be dealt with under the remit of a planning committee.

I note that the system has to be proportionate. The fees must not be contrary to EU competition rules, particularly the EU services directive, which says that businesses should be unfettered by unfair legislation—they should not be overregulated.

On advertising, I point out that the bill is proposing an amendment to the schedule to the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 on sex shops, which mentions the control of advertising in or on sex shop premises. That should be amended to read “in, on or in the vicinity of”.

England and Wales, A-frames are being located on the street indicating “lap dancing this way”. That might not be mentioned in the licensing conditions, given the current framing of the sex shops legislation. There is also touting, pamphletting and so on. Adding “in the vicinity of” to the provisions would allow licensing committees to impose some fairly commonsense rules and conditions on advertising in, on and in the vicinity of premises that are licensed for sexual entertainment.

Laura Tomson: The aim of the regime should be to make it easy for communities to complain about or object to planning decisions, sexual entertainment venues or alcohol licences—for example, if people feel that the advertising signage outside the venues on Lothian Road is not suitable two streets away from a school. Different things are covered by different planning and licensing authorities, which is confusing for people. The point should be to bring everything under sexual entertainment venue licensing, which would make things easy.

Andrew Cox said that all venues are different, all managers are different and all the women who work there are different. That is the point. That is why licensing should be mandatory and coherent across Scotland. Just because one venue is run effectively does not mean that they all are.

The Convener: Do you have examples that you have dealt with where folks have gone from pillar to post with their objections? Their objection might not necessarily be against the venue per se; it might concern some of the advertising.

Laura Tomson: Yes. Different people object to different things. There are probably people who feel comfortable with things happening as long as their children do not have to walk past the venues on the way to school every morning. It is very obvious in the Lothian Road area what happens there, and there are some very objectifying views of girls and women. There is more and more research linking that to violence against women and to inequality.

It is important that people get to raise their objections in a simple way. Colleagues have raised objections about the signage on Lothian Road, but nothing has happened even though, as far as we can see, it contravenes policy. We have been told by people we have spoken to that we have taken our eyes off those places. From our experience, I personally do not see that the policy is functioning well at the moment.

The Convener: I will let you come back in briefly, Sandra, although other folks are on the list.

Sandra White: That is fine. I just wanted to say to Andrew Cox that I did not make up the rules about the churches and schools. That is part of the parcel, as Janet Hood has explained. I will leave it at that.

There is a further issue that I want to discuss, which nobody else has mentioned: the immigration and licence toolkit. Is it okay to mention that just now? I know it is something different.

The Convener: Yes—go ahead.

Sandra White: I spoke to Janet Hood earlier, and she will be sending me an immigration and licence toolkit. I have never heard about such a proposal for any other form of employment.

The Convener: Janet Hood mentioned earlier that the committee has had sight of that toolkit. I have spoken to the clerks, and we do not have that information. It would be extremely useful for us to have that information, so that we can have a look at it in the course of our deliberations.

Janet Hood: We would be delighted to send it in. We included it as part of our sexual entertainment venues consultation response. We are sorry that it has not come to MSPs and to members around this table. We will certainly ensure that it is sent to your clerk.

The Convener: Could that have been in response to the Government, rather than to the committee’s call for evidence?

Janet Hood: Yes, it would have been.

The Convener: That is a separate process. I ask you to send that to our clerks.

Janet Hood: With pleasure.

The Convener: That would be grand—thank you.

Sandra White: I will wait until I see the toolkit. Is that all right, convener?

The Convener: That would be the best way forward.

Sandra White: That is fine.

The Convener: We will ensure that it is disseminated to you, Sandra, as well as to other committee members.

Sandra White: Thank you.

Willie Coffey: Could our city council colleagues clarify the issue of financial gain? The submissions of both Aberdeen and Glasgow councils mentioned a lack of clarity in the bill’s proposal on that point. Could you tell us exactly what your concern is and how it might be addressed and tidied up in the bill? Perhaps we could also hear what the response of the club operators or association colleagues might be to that.

Mairi Millar: My concern is that the bill would allow an escape provision. It would be arguable that the premises owner was not making any financial gain from a sexual entertainment activity—that an event was laid on free of charge, for example, and that their financial gain was through the sale of alcohol or some other activity. Litigation would then be required to determine whether they were properly making a financial gain. The concern is over the interpretation that could be given to the link to financial gain and the difficulty of enforcement.

Eric Anderson: Again I find myself endorsing what Mairi Millar has said. The definition of financial gain appears sufficient, but some more clarity may be useful. It is interesting that, if we look at the changes to the 1982 act and what had gone before, we see that similar provision for the payment of money or money's worth has recently been removed from the licensing of places of public entertainment, yet the financial gain element is to be stipulated for this particular activity, which is a concern. That is just a general comment on the bill.

Professor Hubbard: Again, I think that this issue is a red herring. The provisions clearly refer to direct or indirect financial gain. There has been no case in England in which anybody has challenged the idea that somebody providing free striptease entertainment may not be benefitting indirectly from increased patronage, which results in increased alcohol sales. I think that the definition is adequate in that sense.

My concern is that—and licensing authorities and a licensing solicitor have advised me of this—there is a disjunction where the bill says that the definition of sexual entertainment is “any live performance, or ... live display”.

I think that it should read “any live performance involving live nudity”. As the bill is drafted, it could involve just a live display of nudity, which would begin to include massage parlours, because in a massage parlour there is a live display of nudity in some instances, where a massage is provided by somebody who is topless or naked. We know that that goes on—it is advertised, and it is known to be for the purposes of sexual stimulation. There is financial gain for the organiser who runs the massage parlour, even if he or she denies knowledge of that. As the provisions are framed, there is a danger that they bring massage parlours into the equation. Although we would like to turn a blind eye to the fact that it goes on, in Scotland, as in England and Wales, saunas and massage parlours are known and advertised as places where sex is purchased.

There needs to be an additional section inserted that suggests, under section 45A(7), that the bill should exclude any premises resorted to or used by more than one woman or man for the purposes of prostitution or fornication. Otherwise, one could get into a situation in which a licensing board, on a very good day, decides to issue a massage parlour a sexual entertainment licence. Then we would have a civic regime that is licensing massage parlours contrary to the criminal law, which forbids the running of a brothel, or a disorderly house. That situation has not been challenged in England and Wales, but it is going to be challenged soon.

Janet Hood: I am quite surprised by Professor Hubbard’s comments. It appears that we should be turning a blind eye to prostitution and serious abuse of women. If that were the case, it would be rather depressing.

However, I would say that the main point for local government—and I have 21 years of experience on clerking boards and committees in local government—is going to be the challenge of trying to marry two separate definitions. Adult entertainment is defined differently from sexual entertainment. I think that it would be almost impossible to decide how anybody is going to determine what is happening in a premises. That in itself could tie local government up not only in the local courts but in courts furth of Scotland, should the legislation come in. My clients are particularly concerned about that, because it will be impossible to get the two regimes to marry.

My clients would certainly be happy if grandfather rights were issued to those places that are currently operating under the safely and properly regulated system under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005, and they hope that the Government will look at the licensing of sexual entertainment venues coming in for new places. However, if you do not manage to marry up the two definitions, it will cause enormous cost and difficulty for local government. The issue has been canvassed by Jack Cummins, Stephen McGowan and other people who have appeared before the committee, and it is something that you will have to take on board in deciding how it will work.

The last question on that point is what you are going to do about the places that are currently licensed under the 2005 act to provide adult entertainment. They have been deemed fit to provide adult entertainment. There has been no slipping in under the rug or under the counter. Under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976, you had to declare the type of entertainment that took place in those premises. That was accepted by licensing boards then, with all the rules that we have already talked about concerning location and so on.
Under the 2005 act, the activities had to be declared, and the premises have been deemed to be fit for those activities to take place. How are you going to marry that up with the new regime if, for instance, Glasgow City Council decides—as it has already declared in the press—that it wants a zero number? That is rather odd, because it has not considered anything. How will Glasgow deal with the premises that already exist that are providing legitimate activities in a well-regulated set-up? How can that consent be removed from the licensed premises under the 2005 act? That is a quandary for everybody.

Jon Morgan: On definitions and exclusions, I would like to explore the potential implications for theatre, dance and other kinds of legitimate performance.

The Convener: While you are at it, maybe you can tell us about a number of your practical concerns around the bill’s impact on theatres, because I know that we have missed that out.

Jon Morgan: I was not quite sure when would be the right moment to come in.

The Convener: You go ahead, sir.

Jon Morgan: I will deal first of all with licences for sexual entertainment venues. We do not have a position on the substantive proposal, but we are certainly not speaking in opposition to it. Our main concern is around the definition of sexual entertainment as it is currently constituted and the potential impact on freedom of artistic expression for legitimate artists.

We are pleased to see that there are provisions elsewhere in the bill to continue the ban against censorship, which was in the Theatres Act 1968, and to prevent local authorities from attaching conditions to public entertainment licences about which plays may be performed or the manner in which they may be performed. Those are important safeguards for freedom of artistic expression. Our concern is that the bill might inadvertently—we know that it is not the intention—have an impact on freedom of artistic expression.

We surveyed our members about the issue and they were unanimous in their concerns, which are threefold. One is about the potential misinterpretation or misapplication of sexual entertainment venue licensing to restrict unreasonably their legitimate artistic performances. The second is the potential for individual members of the public to make vexatious complaints, perhaps on the ground of taste or decency rather than on the ground of a performance being an example of sexual entertainment. The third is about self-censorship by our own sector: out of fear of falling foul of the legislation, people may simply choose not to put on a particular performance or production.

I will not go into detail, but there are examples, such as burlesque artists and artists whose performances explore questions of sex, sexuality, prostitution and pornography. Such examples include the production of “Wonderland” that was on at the Edinburgh international festival two years ago, which explicitly explored pornography and involved nudity on stage. There was also a performance at the festival last year called “Sister”, which involved a lap dance as part of the performance, to demonstrate the different attitudes of the women in the performance to that kind of sexual performance. We are concerned that such performances, which push at the boundaries of taste and decency for many people but which are not illegal, may fall foul of the definition.

We have some proposals about how the definition might be changed. We would request an exemption under proposed new section 45A(7) of the 1982 act for venues with a public entertainment licence, and an explicit exemption for artistic or theatrical performances, whose intention is artistic or creative.

I noted that, when the consultation on the matter came out in June 2013, the guidance notes contained an explicit statement that the proposed measures were not intended inadvertently to affect artistic performances. However, that explicit statement does not exist anywhere in the bill at present. We would like to see that in the bill and in the accompanying guidance.

Professor Hubbard: I would demur slightly from that. As proposed new section 45A(3) already indicates,

"’sexual entertainment’ means—
(a) any live performance, or
(b) any live display of nudity, which ... it must reasonably be assumed to be provided solely or principally for the purpose of sexually stimulating ... the audience (whether by verbal or other means)."

Our understanding would be that an artistic or theatrical performance would not be construed as being "solely or principally for the purpose of" sexual stimulation.

One could add—and I am advised that it may be prudent to do so—the phrase “including advertising” after "whether by verbal or other means".

There is a clear difference. I could set up premises called “Bottoms Up”, for example, or “Cuddles” or something along those lines, and the act of advertising in that way would indicate that the entertainment that I was providing was for the purpose of sexual stimulation. If I have premises that I call a theatre, it becomes clear that my primary objective is not sexual stimulation, but artistic entertainment.

Jon Morgan: Here in Edinburgh, there are lots of venues that are not normally called theatres, but which become theatres during the fringe and the festival. I am not sure that that approach would provide sufficient protection.

Professor Hubbard: Yes. There have been similar instances but, given the nature of advertising, a commonsense view would be that “verbal or other means, including advertising,” would indicate that a programme of entertainment was part of a particular cultural season. If it was indicated, somewhat differently, that the entertainment was about sexual stimulation, the outcome would be very different. The issue is something of a red herring, and the legislation as it is framed makes adequate provision for local authorities to distinguish between what is and what is not exempted.

The Convener: I will play devil’s advocate. If I wanted to get round some of the regulations, I might say that my venue was a theatre, rather than anything else. Were some of the original venues for sexual entertainment in Soho not dubbed “theatres” at one point?

Professor Hubbard: I do not think that such instances are likely to occur. With regard to advertising and likely patronage, people would be unlikely to follow that particular route. There has been no such occurrence in England and Wales over the past five years.

John Wilson: I wish to ask Mr Morgan about theatre performances. I have a fear that, because of the way in which the bill is laid out, different licensing authorities may have different interpretations of a theatre production.

Let us say that a theatre production containing live nudity takes place in Glasgow, and the same production tries to go to West Dunbartonshire, East Dunbartonshire or North Lanarkshire, where the licensing authority decides that it is not fit for performance in its area. Part of my difficulty is with trying to ensure that the legislation will have the same effect throughout Scotland, and that audiences in Glasgow, for example, will have the same rights as those elsewhere in Scotland: we are relying on 32 licensing authorities interpreting the legislation.

Mr Morgan can comment on this, but I feel that there may be an issue with artistic licence being taken away from theatre productions, based on the decision of licensing boards in some areas. That is the difficulty, and we should try to define the provisions in such a way that does not allow that to happen.

Jon Morgan: That is our concern. The phrase “must reasonably be assumed” means that interpretation and subjectivity are involved. We are concerned that different local authorities or licensing boards could take a different view of the same show or production, as you said.

We feel that the simple inclusion of a section that provides for an exemption for legitimate artistic or theatre performances and an exemption for venues with a PEL would provide a sufficient safeguard.

I take your point that someone could say, “Well, I run a theatre and I have a public entertainment licence,” but the issue is about proportionality. There are hundreds of theatres and community arts venues up and down the country, and we are talking about 20 sexual entertainment venues. Surely it must be possible to verify that someone is legitimately running a theatre or a sexual entertainment venue.

The Convener: I will let John Wilson come back in. If he does not pick up on that, I will.

John Wilson: You should pick up on it, convener, because I was going to move on.

The Convener: My question is on the definition of “legitimate theatre performance”. You and I may think that something is a legitimate theatre performance, but others may not agree. The issue is about that definition in law.

I often think that the more that we legislate on things, the more that we create a rod for our own backs, in some regards, because definitions often cause us great difficulty.

Jon Morgan: The definition in the Theatres Act 1968 will subsist under the bill, because not all of the 1968 act is being repealed. There is a definition of “play”, which would cover a legitimate theatrical performance. One could use that definition.

John Wilson: My next question follows on from Laura Tomson’s point about signage outside premises, on which I seek clarification—maybe one of our witnesses can clarify it. My difficulty is that the licensing of premises is done by the licensing board or licensing committee, but the display of signage is covered by planning regulations. The licensing board determines what is acceptable to it, in terms of licensing, whereas, as Ms Tomson indicated, signage outside those premises falls into the planning regime. Has there been any discussion of that crossover? Is it clear to people when they make a complaint about signage that they are complaining to the right department? The licensing officers around the room might be able to clarify the link between the planning department and the licensing board in ensuring that signage does not impinge on decency, in terms of residents and other citizens in the area concerned.

Laura Tomson: I do not have an answer to that. We think that signage should come under the licensing of the venue, because as far as I am aware—and I am not an expert on this—planning objections can be raised only once. A school or a religious centre could be built down the street from premises that have already been given planning permission for a certain type of signage, and there is nothing that the community can do about that. It can be a very convoluted process, in terms of local people understanding who they should approach.

The Convener: I will bring in the licensing folk. I imagine that some clubs are in areas that may be conservation zones or have other planning strictures around them. You might want to comment on that, because if that were the case it would allow not just a single objection but an ongoing scenario.

Eric Anderson: I refer to one case that took place a few years ago, regarding premises that a business wanted to expand and which displayed signs that led to a number of complaints from members of the public. Those complaints went to the local authority in general—some went to planning and some went to the licensing board. To deal with the situation, we put everything to the planners, who were able to investigate. As a result, the offending signs were adapted and were displayed within accepted terms.

The Convener: Had an application been made for that, or had the business existed for a while, with changes made?

Eric Anderson: The premises were fairly new. The business wished to expand and develop, and I guess that the sign was a form of advert. Such things are in the eye of the beholder as far as signs are concerned; nevertheless the signs attracted a number of complaints. The issue was dealt with fairly quickly, I must say.

Mairi Millar: Our approach is that the licensing and planning regimes are entirely separate and do not cross over. In my experience, that tends to be the biggest single frustration for members of the public. There is certainly a big misconception around the fact that one cannot enforce the decisions of the other. People who come to the licensing section to complain about advertising on licensed premises become frustrated that that issue does not sit with the licensing board and that we have to pass it on to planning to deal with. Members of the public struggle with that distinction.

The Convener: I take it that you have a level of co-operation in your local authority and that the licensing board will deal with the planning department and pass on any such complaints.

Mairi Millar: If I received a complaint, I would pass it on to my colleagues in planning to deal with. However, I would not necessarily request a report back on the issue because there would not be anything that I could really do with that information.

Professor Hubbard: I am sorry to come in again on this, but it is in my area of expertise. I refer members to a case law example from south Buckinghamshire in 2003, where a local authority gave planning permission for a lap-dance club in a rural location and approved signage, advertising and elevation. It had all the information and approved it. However, two weeks later, the licensing committee rejected the licence application. It is entirely possible for a licensing committee to draw completely different conclusions from those drawn by planning from the same set of evidence. They are separate regimes and case law suggests that they can be treated as such.

By moving the control of advertising to the licensing regime, you would have flexibility through annual renewal to look at what had been happening and to impose new conditions on signage and advertising in, on, or in the vicinity of particular premises. It would seem sensible to acknowledge that and give licensing committees that control.

The contradiction between the two regimes and the fact that they do not have to pay much attention to each other is interesting and unresolved as far as I can see, given that they both consider the material effect of premises on a locality. The bill is particularly mindful of the impact of premises on a locality, with the definition of the locality to be decided in accordance with the facts of the application. Again, a planning committee and a licensing committee can define the locality differently, but it cannot be defined in advance.

John Wilson: I have no further questions.

Janet Hood: I have a quick point on advertising.

One of the objectives of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 is “preventing public nuisance”. If people are offended and upset by signage, that could be a route by which they could make a complaint to the licensing board. The licensing board would then have a legitimate reason for at least looking at the effect of signage, and it would no doubt report back to the planning service.

I know this because my clients change their signs all the time, but if somebody changes a sign—for example, if they call their hotel Janet Hood’s hotel today and Stewart Stevenson’s hotel... tomorrow—they require planning consent for the new sign, even though there was, we would hope, nothing offensive in either of the two names. It is quite important that the committee realises that. The signage in the Lothian Road area must have been approved by the City of Edinburgh Council. The local authority—after all, the planning committee is part of the local authority—must have made a decision about that, and it is subject to ratification at council level. Therefore, we must be careful.

The licensing board is undoubtedly the appropriate place to deal with such venues; it has the powers to control these matters. I think that dual licensing will confuse the issue and make it harder for the public to know where to bring their complaints—or where to attack.

The Convener: One thing that may be a little bit difficult for us today as regards the signage aspects is that we do not have anyone present from planning. We may have to write to authorities and ask for clarification on how they deal with the issues. I imagine that some of them have been dealt with not by planning committees per se but by officers under delegated powers. Some of the difficulty may well lie in the fact that there is no elected member overview at some points. We will write to some planning committees or to local authorities to get their planning views on that.

Cameron Buchanan: I will pick up on Professor Hubbard’s point. The word “vicinity” is very important in relation to signage. A-frame boards are sometimes spread all over the place, which is not very helpful.

What do the panel members think of occasional licences? The policy memorandum suggests that venues that host sexual entertainments on no more than three occasions a year will be exempt. What do the panel members think about that? I could not gather what people thought.

The Convener: We have already covered some of that.

Cameron Buchanan: Only some of it.

The Convener: Does anyone want to come in?

Mairi Millar: I do not support the exemption. I do not think that there should be a de minimis rule.

Eric Anderson: I agree with Mairi Millar.

Janet Hood: We agree with that point.

Willie Coffey: What are the panel’s views on the proposal to permit under-18s to work on the premises, albeit outwith the operational hours of the entertainment?

Janet Hood: Our clients have nobody under the age of 18 working on the premises and I do not think that it is something that would happen. Licensed premises such as ours and other licensed premises are often not suitable for persons under the age of 18 to work in.

Laura Tomson: I agree with Janet Hood. We are talking about premises, not just activity that happens within the premises. There is an issue with the images in such premises and, I would argue, with the attitudes and daily work of most of the people who work in them. It is not appropriate for under-18s to be in such premises.

Professor Hubbard: I suspect that that proposal was added as a result of equalities legislation, which suggests that anyone of working age ought to be able to have employment within such premises. Issues in relation to the age of consent may also come into play.

The Convener: Are there any other views on that aspect of the bill?

Sandra White: I want to raise the important issue of artistic performance and expression. We have said that the bill would not have a negative effect on that and you have admitted that.

The premise of the bill is to enable local authorities to license premises that provide a certain type of sexual entertainment that has nothing to do with artistic expression, or with theatres where there are visiting theatre companies and every so often there is a different type of entertainment. Jon Morgan and others have raised concerns about that. The licensing laws that we have at the moment mean that some local authorities will not allow some forms of entertainment under “artistic expression” in their theatres, but it is allowed in other council areas. There is an anomaly, but the bill should clarify things. As the committee is scrutinising the bill, perhaps that could be specifically included somewhere in it. The bill is in no way intended to prevent artistic expression in places such as those where Edinburgh festival events are held and in various other fantastic entertainment venues.

Jon Morgan: Thank you for that reassurance. We understand that that is not the intention or purpose of the bill, but we would like an explicit statement to that effect in the bill, as you suggested. We want very clear guidance for local authorities.

At some point I would like to comment on theatres and public entertainment licences, although it is a completely different subject.

The Convener: I intend to get all of that in.

Jon Morgan: Okay. Thank you.

Alex Rowley: I want to pick up on that point. Glasgow City Council’s submission says that consideration should be given to repealing the Cinemas Act 1985. Are there practical concerns in moving to a new licensing regime, and if so, what are they?

Mairi Millar: That is part of a wider point that we are making about having so many different licensing acts and regulations. The system in England and Wales is effectively covered by one act—the Licensing Act 2003—and a single premises licence authorises all the various activities. We are some distance from that in Scotland.

The proposal to repeal the licensing requirement under the Theatres Act 1968 and to bring theatre licensing into the general public entertainment provisions of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 is a significant step forward, but something has been missed: the Cinemas Act 1985 has not been looked at for a long time; to bring cinemas into the scope of the 1982 act, so that we would not require so many separate licences, would represent progress.

Eric Anderson: Licensing legislation, in its broadest sense, needs consolidation. For example, for liquor licensing we have the 2005 act and about 40 statutory instruments, to which have been added two more acts: the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010 and the Alcohol etc (Scotland) Act 2010. Now we have the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill, and bits and pieces are being added to the 1982 act. What is needed is consolidation, rather than bits being added piecemeal. I heartily endorse what Mairi Millar said about including the provisions of the Cinemas Act 1985, but in any event what we need is far broader consolidation of the licensing legislation.

The Convener: Thank you. That is extremely useful. Does Alex Rowley want to come back in on that point?

Alex Rowley: No.

Janet Hood: May I quickly make a point about the differences between licensing boards? It would be unwise to try to fetter the decision making of licensing boards, licensing committees or planning committees. We have to allow local decision making, whether we are talking about sexual entertainment venues, alcohol licensing or anything else. I do not think that it is the purpose of the Scottish Government to try to impose a draconian regime to be followed by elected members who consider what is required in their communities.

“Life of Brian” was banned in Glasgow for 20 years, and “Emmanuelle” was barred from certain rural cinemas for years, although those films could be viewed openly virtually everywhere else in Scotland. Those were decisions taken by local government for whatever reasons the decision makers had, and whether or not we approve of the decisions, they were taken legitimately by people who were concerned about people in their areas. My clients recognise that; their position is not that there should not be differences between local authorities but that they should be treated fairly and how they operate should be recognised.

The Convener: That inevitably leads me to ask whether authorities should be able to set the number of venues at zero.

Mairi Millar: Local authorities should be given the power to set the number of venues at zero. However—this follows on from Janet Hood’s comment earlier—each local authority would have to gather a significant amount of research evidence to determine the appropriate number in its area. It is not my position, on behalf of my local authority, that the number would automatically be zero. Such a decision would have to be based on wide-ranging consultation and evidence gathering.

Local authorities should have the ability to limit the number of venues, including setting the number at zero, but it is important that we have clear guidance and regulations about whether existing licensed premises should be granted grandfather rights.

Eric Anderson: The local authority should be given the flexibility to consider the number of premises in its locality. That said, the decision cannot be arbitrary; it has to be made properly, with proper evidence. Guidance and proper legislation to assist local authorities in making that decision would be welcome.

Professor Hubbard: I have strong views on this. The whole notion of setting a nil limit in advance is legally unreasonable and indefensible, and would put a huge burden of proof on the local authority to demonstrate in advance that it had no suitable localities in which sexual entertainment could occur. The approach would be extremely burdensome. Local authorities would have to draw up a policy that reviewed localities and established a basis for why sexual entertainment should not be present. The policy would have to be renewed annually, because localities change annually, which would create a huge burden for local authority officers. I would strike out all reference to a nil limit from proposed new sub-paragraph 5A of paragraph 9 of schedule 2 to the 1982 act.

I would also be mindful of situations such as that of Andrew Cox’s club, which has been running lawfully for a good number of years. A nil limit would be legally unreasonable in that regard. The bill should make it clear that every case should be decided on its merits and in relation to the facts of the case, to provide flexibility to local authorities to do that.

The Convener: Does Andrew Cox want to say anything on that point?
Andrew Cox: No—I am fine.

The Convener: Does Eric Anderson want to come back in?

11:00

Eric Anderson: Proposed new sub-paragraph 5A in the bill says:

“For the purposes of sub-paragraph (5)(c)— which is what we are talking about just now—

“a local authority must ... from time to time determine the appropriate number of sexual entertainment venues for their area and for each relevant locality, and ... publicise the determination in such manner as they consider appropriate.”

I have an issue with the words, “from time to time”.

That means that, once a local authority has determined how many such venues can be in their locality—which might be zero—it “must ... from time to time determine the appropriate number” of them. That is too general. I would be looking for something more specific so that a local authority would have proper guidance.

I had originally thought that it would be better if the word “may” were used, as in: “if a local authority considers it appropriate or reasonable, it may from time to time determine the appropriate number”. However, if the word “must” is used, it would be better if, rather than saying “from time to time”, a more specific timeframe were set out.

Laura Tomson: It will come as no surprise that Zero Tolerance would welcome local authorities being able to set a limit. It is up to the local authority to decide whether that is suitable for it. It is completely appropriate that local authorities should decide that, based on their violence against women and equality policies. That is a completely reasonable rationale.

Janet Hood: The matter could easily be dealt with by the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005, which permits licensing boards to consider overprovision in their areas in terms not only of numbers but of types of premises. As has been pointed out by many people today, it is hardly difficult to spot an adult entertainment venue. There are 17 in Scotland—they are quite overt—and it would be easy for licensing boards to identify them. When my application on behalf of a client was refused, the Aberdeen licensing board suggested that overprovision might come into the matter, because, at that time, there were eight venues in Aberdeen. The chairman of the board stated that she was concerned about overprovision, although that was not the basis of the decision.

The aspects of law that we are discussing already exist in the 2005 act, and the challenge is for boards to decide to take them up. New legislation is not required. This committee has to consider whether the provisions in the bill are actually necessary.

Stewart Stevenson: There are few benefits of being older than colleagues, but one of them is that I remember things that others might not remember. Some might recall the veto poll provisions, which were abolished in—I think—1964. Basically, they involved people in a ward voting on whether to allow any licensed premises at all. I think that the last area in Glasgow to have a veto was Cathcart—that is my distant memory. So, in the past, there have been ways in which such matters have been handled. However, that provision was abolished. My grandfather, who was a Rechabite, would no doubt be desirous of that provision being brought back, but I suspect that, today, communities would be unlikely to vote for it. We should not discount the fact that there are ways in which it is possible to add legitimacy to a community’s quite properly deciding on whether it wants such premises, and on other matters as well.

The Convener: I will turn to theatre licensing. I appreciate Mr Morgan’s patience, as a lot of the discussion so far has been around sexual entertainment.

Do you have concerns that some theatres might be exempt from a requirement to hold a public entertainment licence because they have a licence to sell alcohol?

Jon Morgan: We welcome the fact that the provision simplifies things somewhat. As Mr Anderson and Ms Millar said, things could be simplified even further by having a single licensing regime to cover alcohol, theatre and cinema, as is the case in England. It certainly helps to simplify matters for some venues in our membership. Some hold only a theatre licence at the moment. Some, even though they do not need to, hold a theatre licence and a PEL because there is confusion and they were not sure. Village and community halls up and down the country, which typically have an alcohol licence or, perhaps, a PEL but not a theatre licence, will no longer have to apply for a temporary theatre licence for the occasional showing of a touring theatre company.

From that point of view, the fact that there is flexibility between operating within an alcohol licence or a PEL is welcome. The only concern is that alcohol licensing does not give much guidance on the specifics and safety issues of running a theatre venue. We want those rules to be retained and licensing officers to continue to have a close relationship with theatres on safety issues, which are specific to theatres, rather than relating to pubs or other alcohol-selling establishments.
The other question for us concerns cost. There is huge variation around the country in the cost of a PEL, let alone a theatre licence. In one local authority area, it will cost £140 for a year if the venue is up to 5,000 seats and, in another, it will cost £1,855 for the same size of venue. There is a huge discrepancy. The regulations in England and Wales also introduced consistent fees across the country for premises licences, which makes the system much fairer and simpler for everybody concerned. Although that is not within the bill’s current remit, we would certainly like it to be considered.

We also assume that there would be no reason for licensing authorities to increase the current costs of their public entertainment licences because of the changes in the bill, and we would not be happy if that were to happen, because the bill simplifies the system and makes it cheaper and easier to obtain a licence rather than more expensive.

Those are our main views on the matter.

Mairi Millar: Glasgow City Council certainly supports the inclusion of the theatre licence provisions within public entertainment and the abolition of the separate licensing regime. We already include theatres in our public entertainment resolution because, having worked with the theatre trade, we recognised and took on board the difficulties of applying for a theatre licence for the plethora of different types of premises. We also have a broad range of fee categories that suit the different types of premises. Therefore, we support the provisions in the bill.

Eric Anderson: Aberdeen City Council supports the provisions in the bill. If the bill becomes law, it will be interesting to see what the effect will be on some premises that have gone for a theatre licence because, although they do not restrict themselves to producing plays and might have other activities, they do not also require a public entertainment licence.

The Convener: Will you give us examples?

Eric Anderson: The Aberdeen Exhibition and Conference Centre puts on a number of different activities, dependent on its programme. There could be plays and there could be different activities to do with sport, or there could be concerts, if it is used as music venue, which can be covered by a public entertainment licence or by a theatre licence. If that is to be changed and there is a need for a public entertainment licence, rather than a theatre licence, the centre will have to have a public entertainment licence for a range of named activities. If the centre wished to broaden the range of activities, it would have to apply for a variation. That is one of the implications that could result from the bill.

The Convener: Mr Morgan looked a bit puzzled.

Jon Morgan: Yes. Surely all those things are included in a PEL anyway, so there would be no need for a variation.

Eric Anderson: They are included now, if the premises has a theatre licence, but with a public entertainment licence, the activities that are to be carried out must be named. Therefore, for example, if somebody names three activities, which may include theatre, but wishes to add another, they will have to apply for a variation.

The Convener: What you describe is maybe an argument for consolidation.

Janet Hood: It is exactly that. A lot of my licensed premises—that have nothing to do with SEVs, you will be pleased to hear—have ticked the boxes for theatre and cinema on the list of activities. Those are usually bigger premises, but they are often village premises that used to be wedding function rooms, where a variety of things occur. If the measure comes into force, will those premises have to apply for a public entertainment licence?

There was a lacuna in the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010 in relation to the requirement for late-hours catering licences. With places such as supermarkets that had 24-hour opening, although not for the sale of alcohol, some local authorities decided that they had to get late-hours catering licences to enable them to sell tins of beans, while others decided that they did not. The 1976 act dealt with that by making liquor licensing cover those things, so they were exempt.

We should ensure that we do not have multiple licensing on premises, because that leads to confusion and difficulty not only for local government licensing boards but for police and enforcement officers and, more particularly—from my clients’ or anybody’s point of view—for the trade. As you say, convener, consolidation might be the answer.

The Convener: Mr Morgan, we have kind of strayed away from theatres.

Jon Morgan: It is all related. My understanding is that, under the proposed legislation and in the 1982 act, a public entertainment licence is not needed for entertainment if there is a premises licence for alcohol, provided that the entertainment is during licensed hours. In one respect, the bill simplifies things and in another respect it complicates things. My understanding is that, if the bill is passed, local authorities will not be able to oblige people who run theatres to have a public entertainment licence. They could simply say that they will put on plays, dance performances or whatever during the licensed hours under the

On resuming—

The Convener: I welcome our next panellists: Michael McDougall, solicitor, Glasgow City Council; Gary Walker, principal policy officer, waste unit, national operations, Scottish Environment Protection Agency; and Guy Jefferson, director, SP Distribution, Scottish Power.

Would you like to make some opening remarks, gentlemen? Mr Jefferson, do you want to go first?

Guy Jefferson (Scottish Power): Good morning, convener, and thank you for the opportunity to give evidence. SP Energy Networks, which I represent, maintains the electricity network in the central belt of Scotland and we also have infrastructure interests in England and Wales, so I guess that we are well placed to look across those three regimes and compare and contrast.

Metal theft has been a serious problem for us. Over the past four years, we have had more than 1,000 incidents of attempted or actual metal theft to deal with. That has cost us about £4 million in direct repairs, but we could probably double that to take account of loss of revenue and the number of proactive security measures that we have had to put in place.

The cost is rather outweighed by the risk to health and safety, however. We have had a number of instances of fatalities of thieves who have attempted to steal metal, and also some what I would describe as near misses with members of the public and customers who have been affected by metal thefts. It is not a victimless crime.

On that basis, we fully support the bill. The key areas that we wish to see included, which are in our written submission, are: the removal of all cash transactions; effective record retention; verification of proof of identity for those who sell metals, as we see that as a big deterrent; establishment of an accreditation scheme or a list of registered, compliant and trustworthy dealers; and appropriate penalties for those who are found to have breached the legislation.

In addition, whatever the shape of the legislation, it will be vital to put in place a robust mechanism to implement the new processes and monitor them accordingly.
Guy Jefferson: Thank you for inviting us to give evidence. As you may know, SEPA is Scotland’s principal environmental regulator. Our main purpose is to protect and improve the environment, but it is also to contribute to the health and wellbeing of the people of Scotland and to the achievement of sustainable economic growth.

SEPA is responsible for regulating the environmental impacts of scrap yards through a system of waste management licensing, and we also regulate waste carriers. Although SEPA has no role in the implementation of a scrap metal dealers licensing system, there is an overlap in relation to businesses that are impacted on and targeted by them, albeit for entirely different purposes.

SEPA welcomes the bill. We are concerned about metal theft and have been involved with the metal theft task force and in multi-agency work with the British Transport Police and Police Scotland. The bill offers a series of proposals to disincentivise metal theft.

Michael McDougall (Glasgow City Council): Thank you for the invitation to give evidence. Glasgow City Council, as a licensing authority, regulates scrap metal dealers. For some time, the council has been concerned about the extent of metal theft at both national and local level, not just because of the financial implications, but because of the risk to the public and to perpetrators themselves, which has been mentioned.

Glasgow City Council welcomes the bill’s proposals, especially the introduction of cashless payments and the removal of the exemption warrant system.

The Convener: Mr Jefferson talked of a loss of some £4 million, and probably greater losses beyond that. Obviously, those costs are likely to be passed on to your customers, are they not?

Guy Jefferson: Yes, we have an allowance as part of our regulatory regime, which we utilise, but the costs so far have gone well beyond that given what we have had to do, not only to perform repairs to our network but to put in proactive measures, such as security cameras, to ensure that we keep the thieves out and the lights on.

The Convener: Have there been any examples of major safety difficulties because of the theft of metal, or have you been lucky thus far?

Guy Jefferson: I can give you a couple of examples; we have had a number of issues. Probably the biggest issue was in Govan, about three years ago, when thieves got access to some 132,000-volt cables and set them on fire, expecting the protective systems to trip out the cables so that they could saw them up and take them away to sell for scrap. They caused a major fire that closed the M8 because of the smoke and took out the infrastructure to the Govan area and the west end of Glasgow, putting around 30,000 customers at risk for a period of about three days while we repaired the cables. We had to invoke the gold command emergency authority, and we could have had a situation in which Govan was blacked out for the repair time for a cable—about 36 hours. We came close to a major incident in that case.

In other cases, we have seen theft in substations cause high fluctuating voltages to customers’ premises, and that has caused house fires. We had such a situation in Greenock about a year and a half ago. We worked with a member of the Scottish Parliament who used to be on the Local Government and Regeneration Committee, Stuart McMillan. He was directly involved in dealing with the incident, in which an elderly lady suffered from smoke inhalation because of a small fire caused by voltage fluctuation in her premises.

Those are two examples, but there are a number of others that I could relate.

The Convener: That is useful, Mr Jefferson. Thank you.

Cameron Buchanan: The cash ban is obviously worth while, but having heard some evidence already, I was concerned that, because somebody could pay by cheque, they could just go next door and cash the cheque; therefore, photographic identification is obviously essential. Do you all think that banning cash is right and that photographic ID is essential?

Gary Walker: As I said, SEPA has no experience of the operation of the scrap metal dealers’ system; it is not something that we are responsible for. However, as a regulator, we can understand the importance of identifying the people involved in transactions. We are undertaking some work through the Regulatory Reform (Scotland) Act 2014 to improve our own identity checks when it comes to licensing, so we think that the provisions concerning identification are a good part of the bill.

We also understand and recognise the benefits of cashless transactions in making metal theft less attractive or less easy and convenient.

Michael McDougall: The licensing authority supports the ban on cash payments and the adoption of a cashless system. We are of the view that it will be a vital tool in combating stolen metal entering the system through metal dealers. I understand that the Scrap Metal Dealers Act 2013 requires photographic identification and proof of address, such as a utility bill. We support the introduction of a similar measure.

Guy Jefferson: It would probably be appropriate to mention evidence that we have seen in England and Wales, where, as my colleague suggested, the system of cashless transactions and identification is already in place. There has been a big drop in metal theft in England and Wales, certainly partly—although probably not wholly—as a result of the legislation, and what I would call opportunist thefts have been almost completely removed. Those are the ones that we would expect to involve transactions of the level of cash that we are talking about. I believe that that is almost wholly down to the introduction of cashless transactions in England and Wales, alongside the use of photographic identification and, in many situations, CCTV.

Cameron Buchanan: An issue that was raised in one of the submissions was that someone who wanted to sell their car for scrap for a minimal amount would be put off, with the result that they might just dump their car. The same might be true of someone who wanted to get a fiver for their fridge. Would not such people be put off, or would you want to ban all transactions anyway?

Guy Jefferson: My expertise in that area is limited, but in our industry we have seen the complete eradication of opportunist thefts. That is because the people who might have carried out such small thefts now have nowhere to go to get cash.

The Convener: Does SEPA have concerns about an increase in dumping if cash payments are not made for small amounts of scrap metal?

Gary Walker: I think that it is a legitimate concern. There is the potential for that to happen on a small scale with materials that are not valuable but, along with local authorities, we operate a system called flycapture, which monitors and tracks fly-tipping, so we should be able to monitor the impact. I would not expect it to be massive. The value of the materials that are stolen is relatively high, so I do not think that there would be much of an effect.

Michael McDougall: I agree with Mr Walker that it is a genuine concern, but such is the extent of metal theft that a balance needs to be struck, and I submit that a cashless payment system is a vital tool in tackling metal theft.

The Convener: An issue that some of the scrap metal dealers raised when they gave evidence to the committee was that itinerant waste dealers who are licensed by SEPA might be left out of the regime. Mr Walker, would you like to comment on that? Should itinerant waste dealers also have to be licensed for scrap metal dealing if that is what they are doing? If they do not have to be licensed for scrap metal dealing, might the bill not stop some of the things that are currently going on?

Gary Walker: The itinerant metal dealers on our books are dealers who do not operate from a site—they might operate from a vehicle that they use to transport waste and would be registered as waste carriers, if they have registered and comply with the legislation. We have many thousands of registered waste carriers and, within that portfolio of registered carriers, it is not possible to identify who is an itinerant scrap metal dealer, so our systems do not help with coverage of that area.

Should those people be licensed as scrap metal dealers? That is more a matter for the experts on scrap metal dealing licensing, but I understand that the split is about 50:50—50 per cent of scrap metal dealers operate from sites and 50 per cent are suspected of being itinerant. From my perspective as a regulator, it would make sense to try and capture the entire sector. That would be my approach to environmental legislation and waste management licensing. I suspect that itinerant scrap metal dealers should be covered by the bill but, as I said, we are not experts in scrap metal dealing licensing.

The Convener: Do you have any information about how many of the folks who are licensed by you for the waste aspects would be dealing in scrap metal at any point in time?

Gary Walker: We have somewhere in the region of 267 licensed premises, which are licensed specifically to deal with scrap metal. That could involve end-of-life vehicles, precious metals or a combination of metal dealing. We have 69 sites registered with us that are exempt from licensing.

The Convener: Why are they exempt?

Gary Walker: Although they are exempt from licensing, they still have to register with us. There is not an exclusion from the licensing system altogether; it is a lower tier within the licensing system, with basic standards in the legislation rather than in the licences. The sites concerned operate in the breaking of depolluted cars, for example—it is perceived that there is less of an environmental risk with cars that have already been depolluted. Operators that depollute cars deal with oils. They operate within the upper tier of the licensing system, and they require a licence.

There are 69 sites that are registered with SEPA as exempt. It is not possible to tell how many of them are also registered with the 32 local authorities as scrap metal dealers. We do not have that information.

The Convener: The scrap metal dealers who were here seemed to indicate that some of the itinerant folks were handling quite large amounts of scrap metal. Do you have any evidence that that is the case?

Gary Walker: We do not have any evidence on that.

John Wilson: I seek Mr Walker’s view on whether SEPA would wish to operate a national registration scheme, rather than what we have at present. You mentioned the 32 local authorities and the number of scrap dealers that are licensed with them. Would it not be preferable, and in the greater interest of everyone concerned, to have a national licensing scheme that SEPA or some other national body oversaw, with everybody being registered with that body?

Gary Walker: There were a couple of different questions there. There is the issue around dealing with the applications, which is perhaps different from the question of the register itself; there is also the matter of the difference between having a national register and the option of using SEPA to host that register. SEPA’s view is that a national register could deliver benefits and improvements. That is the kind of system that we operate. That would allow better co-ordination and multi-agency efforts to tackle metal theft, and it could improve information sharing between the authorities, Police Scotland and the British Transport Police. It could also help to address some of the concerns around the control and oversight of itinerant metal dealers.

We think that a national register could be beneficial. However, any move to a national register would require a thorough evaluation of options, costs and benefits. The matter would need to be considered alongside the licensing process. Do we separate out the licensing process and retain it with the 32 local authorities, with a central national register? Would that national register necessarily have to be hosted by one body? Could a virtual national register be operated by the 32 local authorities? There are a range of potential options that would need to be explored.

At the moment, SEPA is not resourced to provide a national register of scrap metal dealers, but we recognise that delivering a national register through SEPA could be an option. We would be happy to explore that.

Guy Jefferson: I would support a national register. We deal with quite a lot of scrap, and our contractors deal mainly with our scrap. It would be helpful to have the capability to put it in contracts that the register exists, and that we expect our contractors to work within the register and to go to registered scrap dealers, so as to ensure that the scrap metal may be traced through its various cycles.

I echo some of Mr Walker’s comments. I know, because of our involvement in England and Wales, that a parliamentary group will meet in three weeks to discuss the implementation in the south of the provisions of the Metal Theft (Prevention) Bill. The biggest issue for them is how they maintain a national register in terms of the responsibilities of local authorities and of—in this case—the Environment Agency as the overseeing body. I know that they are having problems getting the registers in place because the responsibilities are not absolutely clear. There are a number of on-going discussions about the resources that are available to undertake the task.

Having a national register is key and I think that there is a good opportunity for Scotland to take the lead on that.

Michael McDougall: There is clearly a strong argument for having a national register, particularly because, as you will appreciate, once an itinerant metal dealer is granted a licence they can trade Scotland-wide. However, the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 is very much predicated on the local level and having visibility for local voices to act on local conditions. Any move to a national licensing system would require evaluation of all the options, which would include a national register.

John Wilson: Mr Walker said that SEPA might be in favour of a national register. Mr Jefferson gave a good example of what is happening in England and Wales regarding a register because of perceived conflicts about who would be responsible for what. In relation to that and to Mr McDougall’s response, I know that SEPA works closely with local authority planning departments and environmental health departments but could that same arrangement be applied to SEPA so that it had overall authority?

According to what Mr McDougall said, if an itinerant scrap metal dealer gets licensed in Glasgow, they can also operate in Dumfries and Galloway, for example. Given that, would it not be better if all dealers were registered with SEPA as the overarching authority instead of having the current situation whereby 32 local authorities issue licences to itinerant scrap metal dealers? At the moment, depending on a local authority’s decisions, dealers can operate throughout Scotland in different local authority areas with no apparent control over what they do.

Gary Walker: We recognise the benefits of local decision making for local licensing considerations. We understand that and can quite easily work alongside and complement it. As I said earlier, the licensing process could be distinct from a national register and the two aspects could work in a complementary fashion, if that was desired and it became evident after an options appraisal that it was the right way forward. However, to pick up on the experiences of our colleagues down south, it would have to be clear what the responsibilities were and that they would be effectively implemented by all involved: the 32 local authorities and SEPA. Itinerant dealers could be registered with a local authority, if that system could be made to work, or directly with a national body, such as SEPA, that hosted a national register. The pros and cons of all the options could be considered.

On the point about SEPA having the ultimate authority over decision making, it would not be good to have local decision making with a licensing board and then for a national authority such as SEPA to have a second bite at it. A distinct streamlining of licensing decisions would need to be part of any proposed system.

John Wilson: The convener raised the issue of local authority licensing of itinerant scrap metal dealers. I referred to the example of somebody being licensed in Glasgow but being able to operate in Dumfries and Galloway; they would also be allowed to operate in Orkney or Shetland, for example. Who has the authority to oversee how they are gathering the materials that they are trading and what they are doing with them? When an itinerant scrap metal dealer is licensed in one authority but operates throughout Scotland, who has ultimate oversight of what that dealer does?

The Convener: How would Glasgow handle that?

Michael McDougall: We would look to Police Scotland to be the enforcement body to take action. Obviously, Police Scotland would deal with unlicensed dealers. If there was a breach of condition we would be able to make a complaint that would be brought before the licensing committee, so it would probably be dealt with in that way. Glasgow’s local authority officers would not have knowledge of what was happening in Orkney, so we would turn to Police Scotland. That is one of the benefits of a joined-up police force, and we would look to it to make the committee aware of a complaint.

John Wilson: In effect, you are saying that if Glasgow issued an itinerant scrap metal dealer’s licence, it would not always know what that dealer did in other parts of the country and that you would rely on Police Scotland to intervene.

Michael McDougall: Yes.

John Wilson: I assume that Police Scotland would report to Glasgow, and Glasgow would then have to take action to remove the licence.

Michael McDougall: I am not aware of any specific examples—

John Wilson: But speaking hypothetically—

Michael McDougall: Yes. The police would be able to bring a complaint to the Glasgow licensing committee.

John Wilson: Clearly that highlights an issue with the current licensing regime, particularly for itinerant scrap metal dealers. Oversight of what such dealers do and how they operate in other areas of Scotland becomes difficult. That raises another issue regarding Police Scotland’s role and the link between Police Scotland, other agencies and local authorities.

Michael McDougall said that he did not have any examples of Police Scotland reporting incidents. Is SEPA aware of any incidents of itinerant scrap metal dealers acting illegally or outwith their licence agreement?

Gary Walker: I am not aware of any circumstances.

John Wilson: We might have to contact Police Scotland to seek clarification on that.

The Convener: We have used the terminology “itinerant scrap metal dealer”. What about itinerant waste dealers who might not be registered as scrap metal dealers because they fall outwith the current regulation? Are you aware of any of them having been reported to Police Scotland for metal theft and metal dealing?

Gary Walker: I am not aware of any cases in Scotland.

The Convener: Okay.

Willie Coffey: Guy Jefferson mentioned 1,000 incidents. I will ask the question the other way round: how can the bill reduce that figure? I am interested in what happens in those incidents. Is the stolen metal repurposed really quickly and does it disappear into the system? Is there an issue there? How does the legislation help with that? Alternatively, is it all about the registration scheme and its cashless nature? Would that reduce the number of incidents? Perhaps you could give us a couple of examples of the incidents and say how they get through the system undetected.

Guy Jefferson: I am happy to do that. Speaking from our experience in England and Wales, my view is that two types of thieves are associated with metal theft. There are the organised groups that hit a variety of sites in a short period. That could involve overhead lines, for example; across the country we have seen a big upsurge in activity in that area. An organised group might concentrate in the Falkirk area. We have 25,000km of overhead lines, so it is very difficult to proactively manage and secure that asset base. The thieves will hit an area over a week and get quite a lot of scrap; they then—I believe—take it abroad via containers. The legislation would not necessarily assist in that area.

The other type is the smaller opportunist thief, and the implementation of the scheme has had a big effect in that respect in England and Wales. You are right to note that the thieves do not get ready cash for the scrap metal. They have to present themselves with identification, and there may be CCTV on the site. The scheme acts as a general deterrent, and—as I said—we have seen a big reduction in that type of theft in England and Wales since the legislation was introduced.

I am happy to provide the committee after the meeting with evidence on that. Such activity started to increase in Scotland as some of the opportunists came north to take advantage of our less stringent system. Evidence exists not only for electricity infrastructure, but for other utilities too.

Willie Coffey: Is the material pretty much unidentifiable soon after it has been stolen?

Guy Jefferson: Yes, in general. We provide information to Police Scotland on our specific types of cables so that, on days of action—in which we get involved—with scrap dealers in central Scotland, the police are able to identify our cables. They are not marked with “Scottish Power” or any other identifying mark, partly because of the cost. It would cost us significantly more to do that, and the reality is that we turn over perhaps 1 to 2 per cent of our assets every year, so the benefit that we would gain from doing that in terms of addressing theft would be fairly limited for the extra expense.

We tend to invest more in proactive measures such as CCTV and guarding high-risk sites and sites that are often targeted by thieves. Generic cables can be identified, but they are not marked specifically with our name.

Willie Coffey: I have one last question. Should the 48-hour rule on retaining metal on the premises be fixed or retained? Should it be flexible, or more stringent?

Guy Jefferson: Again, that is probably a matter for Police Scotland rather than for us. As long as sufficiently detailed records are kept, it is not critical to have the metal on site for a prolonged period, but Police Scotland would be better equipped to answer that question.

Gary Walker: My answer runs along similar lines: Police Scotland’s views are foremost in that respect. We have noted the British Metals Recycling Association’s concerns about the tag-and-hold system and a potential conflict with the waste management licensing conditions that are part of our licensing system.

We are comfortable with the current proposal in the bill to remove the so-called tag-and-hold provision. If that system was brought back in, we would just have to do a bit more work with Police Scotland to ensure that our efforts were coordinated collaboratively and effectively.

Michael McDougall: As Mr Jefferson and Mr Walker have said, it would be useful to hear Police Scotland’s comments on the issue.

The licensing authority recognises that the tag-and-hold requirement may be a burden on metal dealers owing to the market in which they work and the need to turn around metal quickly, and—as Mr Walker mentioned—the requirements of a SEPA licence. Given the introduction of new record-keeping requirements, the licensing authority believes that the provision could be done away with.

The Convener: Are the record-keeping requirements that are proposed in the bill sufficient to deal with the matter?

Michael McDougall: Yes, they are.

The Convener: Do you agree, Mr Walker?

Gary Walker: Yes.

The Convener: And Mr Jefferson?

Guy Jefferson: Yes.

Alex Rowley: I have a question on the 48-hour requirement for the witness from SEPA. The scrap metal dealers have argued that larger dealers would have to find more land and run a much bigger operation. Would that create difficulties for SEPA in trying to regulate compliance with conditions that require extra land?

Gary Walker: Yes, there can be a knock-on effect. I have visited scrap yards and I know that on many sites space is constrained. For environmental protection reasons, we often impose conditions, such as maximum quantity and storage limits and storage conditions—for example some material has to be stored on impermeable concrete. Tag and hold—the requirement to store metal for 48 hours—can have an impact on how operators respond to our licensing conditions and may cause them some difficulties. As I said, we might have to work through that with Police Scotland and individual operators.

The Convener: Does the current legal penalty for failure to comply with the licensing regime, which is a maximum fine of £5,000, need to be increased?
Michael McDougall: The licensing authority does not have a specific view on the matter.

Gary Walker: The fine level is comparable with that for some environmental offences. If it would be helpful, I could provide some information to the committee on environmental offences and fine levels, which would allow you to see whether there is parity there.

The Convener: That would be extremely useful for the committee. If that could be sent to the clerks, we would be grateful. Mr Jefferson, do you have a view on the fine?

Guy Jefferson: Speaking from my experience, I do not believe that that level of fine has been a sufficient deterrent for the thieves that Police Scotland and the police authorities in England and Wales have apprehended on our sites. A higher fine or some other penalty needs to be considered. I talked earlier about the impact on communities. This is not a victimless crime. It would be beneficial if the penalty were to make a significant statement. This is not my area of expertise but, given my experience in England and Wales and in Scotland, I do not believe that £5,000 is a sufficient deterrent.

The Convener: What is the value of some of these thefts? In the Govan example that you gave earlier, what was the cost to Scottish Power and its customers?

Guy Jefferson: The cost of that individual event was in the region of £750,000. That was an extreme event—it is the worst that we have had in the past four years. At the other end of the scale, there is the Greenock example that I gave, in which there were a small number of house fires and an elderly member of the public suffered smoke inhalation. The value of the metal that was stolen that resulted in that incident was probably no more than £10.

The Convener: Going back to the Govan scenario, was £750,000 the cost of the metal that was stolen or the cost of the entire event?

Guy Jefferson: It was the cost of the entire event. No metal was stolen.

The Convener: No metal was stolen but the event cost £750,000.

Guy Jefferson: A fire was set but it went out of control and the thieves had to abandon the scene without recovering any metal.

John Wilson: I want to put a similar question to Mr Jefferson. In earlier evidence you talked about the theft of £4 million-worth of material. The £750,000 cost of putting right the incident in Govan gives us a good indication of the cost to Scottish Power of carrying out work to bring power back to a line and of repairing the damage caused, even though, in that case, the thieves did not steal any metal.

On the £4 million, it would be useful if you could provide us with the estimated costs to Scottish Power of replacing the scrap metal that was stolen. In the Greenock incident, you said that the value of the metal would have been about £10; however, the cost to Scottish Power would have been substantially more than £10. Will you indicate the cost of putting right the thefts that have taken place so that we can compare that with the fines that are being imposed—or might be imposed—on the criminals involved?

Guy Jefferson: I clarify that the £4 million that I mentioned is the direct cost of repairs and not the value of the metal. As I said, we could approximately double that to take account of revenue losses and the other costs associated with the events and managing our response to them. I will provide you with some information on the value of the metal that has been stolen, but it is significantly lower than £4 million.

The Convener: It would be useful for us to get an idea of the value of the metal, but the overall cost is of great interest to us, as is the inconvenience to your customers. The more that it gets out there how much this is costing people, the better, because it is your customers who are bearing the burden of the costs that arise because of the thieves. We would be immensely grateful for any additional information that you can provide, Mr Jefferson.

Guy Jefferson: Okay.

Stewart Stevenson: To supplement that, if there is anything available about the cost that is borne by your customers—there may not be—that would be helpful.

The Convener: Mr McDougall, you are involved in the licensing regime. Are you aware that Glasgow City Council has removed licences from scrap metal dealers in recent times? How many refusals have there been in recent times for scrap metal dealing licences?

Michael McDougall: Unfortunately I do not have those figures to hand, but I could provide them, if appropriate, to your clerk.

The Convener: That would be useful. It would also be extremely useful if we could have an indication of how many applications you have had, as an authority, for scrap metal dealing licences in recent times. That would give us an idea of the scale of what local authorities have to deal with. As you are a larger local authority, that information would give us a good indication.
Alex Rowley: On the point about enforcement, I assume that for a licensing authority such as Glasgow City Council, or indeed any of the 32, the majority of breaches of licences will be picked up by the police. I assume that you do not have enforcement officers who are constantly checking on what is happening.

I also want to ask SEPA about that issue in relation to licensed scrap yards. Does SEPA have enforcement officers who carry out regular checks or are we very much reliant on Police Scotland to ensure that people are sticking to what they say?

Michael McDougall: My view is that Police Scotland is responsible for the bulk of enforcement. There are proposals in the bill relating to civic licensing standards officers, who, if the bill is passed, may also have a role in relation to metal dealers. I will not go on about that at length, but the bill proposes that they have an information and guidance role. That could assist not just with enforcement but with bringing people who should have a licence into the system, so that they are subject to the scrutiny of the licensing regime.

Gary Walker: SEPA has waste management licences and there is a licensing functionality that covers people going through the process of applying for licences and our issuing them. Beyond that, there is an enforcement resource within SEPA. We have environment protection officers who routinely visit licensed and authorised sites to check compliance with licence conditions and we publish on our website compliance assessment scores for all our licensed and permitted premises.

The Convener: Thank you. Are there any other questions?

Alex Rowley: I have a question about the differences between the licensing regime in Scotland and the one in England and Wales. A comment was made about some opportunistic people coming up here because the rules are different. What are the main differences?

The Convener: Mr Jefferson, I think that you mentioned that. Do you know the main differences?

Guy Jefferson: Are you asking about the licensing regime that exists at the moment?

Alex Rowley: Yes.

Guy Jefferson: The registration system is different. I do not think that identification is required to the same extent as is proposed in the bill and is in place in England and Wales. Also, cash can be transacted.

I do not believe that there is a huge difference between what is proposed for Scotland and what exists in England and Wales, but there are one or two things that are still being debated about the legislation in England and Wales that it would be important for us to ensure are included in the bill. As I said, the main one concerns the administration of the scheme. We need to get absolute clarity on that.

I also strongly support the idea that we have some sort of national accreditation system, because that would provide an incentive to the scrap dealers as well. If they are on it, companies such as Scottish Power are much more likely to use them for managing scrap, so there is an incentive for them to be accredited at a national level. Unless we have some incentives in the system, people will not necessarily comply.

The Convener: Mr Walker, do you have anything to add on that?

Gary Walker: I have nothing to add.

The Convener: How about you, Mr McDougall?

Michael McDougall: As Mr Jefferson remarked, the main difference is that England and Wales already have a cashless payment system in operation. I believe that they also do not have an exemption warrant system. The implementation of those two measures in Scotland will be fundamental in preventing regime shopping—that is, people coming from England and Wales to dispose of scrap metal in Scotland.

The Convener: Thank you very much for your evidence. Some of the information that you have provided will be helpful when we hear from Police Scotland on the issue on 28 January.
The Convener: Item 2 is our sixth oral evidence session on the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. We will take evidence from witnesses on the provisions that relate to taxi and private car hire. We begin with evidence from Dr James Cooper of Edinburgh Napier University and the University of Missouri—St Louis in the United States of America. We will then hear from a panel of witnesses from the taxi and private car hire trade and then from licensing authorities and hire car service users. I point out that witnesses do not need to press the buttons on the consoles; the microphones will be operated by the sound engineer.

I welcome Dr James Cooper. Would you like to make opening remarks?

Dr James Cooper (Edinburgh Napier University): Thank you ever so much for inviting me to give evidence, convener. I have prepared a short presentation for the committee and I would be delighted to take questions to the extent that I can answer them.

The Convener: Please go ahead.

Dr Cooper: Good morning, ladies and gentlemen, and thank you ever so much for inviting me. My presentation will address issues specific to licensing of taxis, which in my definition will include hackney carriages, private hire cars and other operators of vehicle types that offer a comparable service, which have in some places been titled transportation network companies—examples include Uber, uberX, Lyft and others that provide services in a taxi-like way. If I mention trade names and company names in my commentary, that is intended to give you an example of a service type; it is not intended to single out any company.

I commend the Parliament and the Government for their desire and effort to develop taxi and private hire car legislation. It is appropriate and commendable to provide a legislative framework that facilitates and protects in the public interest.

I believe that legislation needs to be aware of the current market, current change in the market and future activities that might impact on its effectiveness and implementation. I contend that the bill fails to address the needs of the transformed market that is likely to emerge in the very near future.

I highlight the view that, in framing legislation, it is easy to suffer from a belief that the legislative framework itself is sufficient to ensure appropriate supply. Evidence from locations where the market has been transformed does not uphold that view. Many of the new entrants sit between legislative instruments. It is important that that point is made clear. The market in its transformed state will be very different from the market that we see now.

I suppose that the most important question is: what is a transformed market? I highlight that it is the opposite of the legacy market—the one that we know and which has operated successfully for a significant time, with legislation dating back to 1847 and even prior to that still being in force in some places in the United Kingdom.

The transformed market will include new technology operators—predominantly those associated with smartphone applications, otherwise known as apps. Those exist in a number of generations and have been present in the taxi and taxi-like industries for about five years.

We have had six generations of apps, which suggests a rapid evolution in the market of one revolution per eight months or thereabouts, as opposed to one revolution in legislation for taxis every 80 years or so. That difference is significant.

The transformed market will include quasi-taxis—vehicles that operate in the taxi market and provide a taxi-like service, which are often indistinguishable from taxis to those who wish to use them. Those operator types have in the United States of America been named transportation network companies, which are often abbreviated to TNCs. New services will spread across licensing categories to offer services from a variety of traditional licensing distinctions and many services that sit outwith current legislation.

The transformed market will facilitate service provision by private individuals offering trips in their private cars under what is in effect a private contract. That does not fit readily into the distinction of ride sharing, which is a term that has been applied in some locations. In my definition, ride sharing is a positive public contribution that offers a ride for part of a trip that would exist in any case, whereas TNCs or quasi-taxis provide ride sharing on a commercial basis for profit.

It is worth noting that the transformed market and specifically the apps that facilitate transportation will often obscure from the user the category of vehicle that is being engaged and thus its legality or otherwise.

It is appropriate to frame legislation currently, but it needs to be sustainable. The Government and the Parliament need to be aware of the transformed market in developing legislation and must legislate to an extent that supports policy in the new market dynamic.

I will touch on taxi and private hire car distinctions. Hackney carriage and private hire car services are distinct only in the legacy market. They are consistent only in their legislative differences.

Apps in effect provide an electronic hail to quasi-taxis, which removes one of the few distinctions of the hackney carriage. Number constraint, which is a part of some hackney carriage markets, might become ineffective under the current testing of it if the regulation that allows for it is unenforceable. Number constraint might also become irrelevant if its market impact is lost.

The measurements that are applied to number constraint, commonly known as measures of significant unmet demand or SUD, will become impossible to use in their current form in a transformed market. That does not exclude the possibility of testing and measurement, but that requires change. That will have an impact on all other areas of regulatory control, to wit, quality control and economic constraint—fares and leases. The three elements of quantity, quality and economic controls are completely interlinked and cannot be divorced from one another.

If I may, I will touch briefly on taxi numbers and quantity constraints.

The Convener: Please be brief, as we have quite a lot of questions to get through.

Dr Cooper: The concept of quantity restraint has been based on a view of market failure and a lack of equilibrium. Concerns change when the market is transformed. The concept that is being proposed for the licensing and regulation of private hire car numbers appears to be unenforceable in a transformed market and is not measurable for quasi-taxis. I also note that the cost indicated for studies appears to be completely incorrect.

I will touch briefly on two further points, the first of which is market transformation. There has been and continues to be a clear demand for app-based booking. That is not being and has not been predicted in any SUD study, to my knowledge. The transformed market has grown, but it has also had an impact on traditional hackney carriages, resulting in a 20 to 40 per cent loss in taxi use. There is evidence that cities and Governments might find it easier to recast legislation than to seek to enforce it.

My final point relates to accessibility. To date, no TNC fleet vehicle has been accessible at all—the term “accessible” is well defined in relation to wheelchair-accessible vehicles—because the companies that provide such services rely primarily on private individuals to supply vehicles. That is an uberX type of service that negates any desire for equality of access at the same price.
I point out one area that relates to market manipulation. The licensing review discusses the concept of cost neutrality to councils, as the costs of any tests applied are covered through the fees of the private hire and taxi industries. A TNC does not need to win any legal challenge. It simply needs to push the price in the taxi industry beyond a tipping point where taxi supply becomes an uneconomic and non-commercial venture.

The Convener: You have highlighted some areas that the committee has already asked the Government for clarification on. We posed questions to the Government on the growth of mobile phone apps and Uber and had a response from civil servants that states that, while the taxi and private hire car provisions in the bill do not specifically address technological developments, the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 provides considerable scope for secondary legislation to address such issues, and that the Government has the ability to provide clarification and best practice guidance for local authorities. What do you think of that response?

Dr Cooper: The technology appears to have moved so quickly that any response needs to be aware of its current and future development. It is true that the taxi industry has provided apps and app-based booking. The relative effectiveness of those services pales in comparison with the TNC operations, and they are restrained by the commercial operations in which they fit. The technology is advancing at such a speed that it might not be possible to understand its impact fully prior to its application.

The Convener: Uber has tried to be somewhat conciliatory this week in response to criticisms that have been made. It faces legal challenges in a number of countries and has been accused of flouting competition rules, and there are major concerns in some places about the lack of sufficient safety checks on drivers and their vehicles. How can we ensure that, if and when such companies enter the Scottish market, they cannot flout safety rules and regulations?

Dr Cooper: The question is difficult to answer, as evidence suggests that most cities and Governments have been powerless to control the excesses of some of the TNCs. To my knowledge, the most common response is to fine and place citations on Uber drivers. A difficulty is that the company that provides the service considers itself to be not a transportation company at all but a technology company and therefore outside the regulation of transport that applies to the drivers who happen to use its service. Citations and fines are therefore placed on the drivers, and the most common response by Uber has been to pay the fines as, in effect, a cost of entering the market.

The only really successful action against Uber has been in the Spanish courts and has removed telecommunications access to its app, which prevents anybody from getting to Uber through their smartphone. That comes at a high price, in that not everything that the technology allows is a bad idea. Perhaps its application is bad or even illegal, but the concept behind it might be harmed by the removal of the service.

It is hard to accommodate Uber. Cities in the US that have done so have done that by changing their laws, chapters and codes in a way that is satisfactory—if you will excise the term—to the companies that want the change. That has been the only method by which the service has become fully legal.

The Convener: Do you think that we have the flexibility under the current legislation and the bill to make changes in law if necessary, should Uber or others try to enter the Scottish market?

Dr Cooper: I am afraid that I do not. The bill as it stands reflects the legacy market alone and will not be fit for the following market.

The Convener: Do you disagree with the statement that I read out earlier from a civil servant in response to our questions?

Dr Cooper: I am afraid that I do.

The Convener: What is your reason for that?

Dr Cooper: I believe that Uber accrues a benefit in being seen to be on the wrong side of the law. It gains notoriety among its user group and benefits from that position. I also contend that the market that the bill will facilitate—the market that we are heading to—has inherent problems that will require further addressing. We are heading towards a monopolistic provider based on app provision. That will require considerable review in the future. I fear that the concepts as set out in the bill, and the proposals on the ability to control technological developments, do not foresee the extent to which the market will change.

The Convener: I will bring in Mr Rowley in a minute as he wants to ask a supplementary question, but first I have a question about the monopoly of the application of the app. This morning, I took a taxi in to Parliament—I should say, before anybody suggests that I am abusing my position, that I did so at my own expense. Sitting in the taxi, I saw an advert for the app for that taxi company, which I could download to my phone and then use to order and track the taxi—that is what the advert says, although I have not used the app.
You say that Uber has a monopoly on such applications, or is monopolistic. How is that possible when all those other apps are being developed?

Dr Cooper: The contention was that it may become monopolistic. The Edinburgh hackney carriage apps are extremely good and I can recommend them.

The benefits of the technology should not be underestimated. There are very good reasons for having such apps. Where Uber sits, in terms of its market dominance and share, and where others of the same type sit, are due to the nature of the market. For the first time, we are dealing with a company that is not local but global. The app is transferable, without any penalty, between locations. It has a great deal of power.

Of the six generations, while the taxi companies have a very good product, they are still behind the TNCs, primarily because their product is distinct to one form of transportation, whereas the TNC product crosses multiple distinctions, vehicles and prices. If you look you will see that the Uber app allows one to slide between vehicles of different types, without any particular awareness of the distinction of licensing and legality that such choice results in.

Alex Rowley (Cowdenbeath) (Lab): I have spoken to people who tell me that the bill does not reflect the transformed market. What does the bill need to do to reflect that market and are there examples of legislation in other countries that we can consider?

Dr Cooper: There are examples of legislation, in a transformed market, that exist post-app development; I point you to the Washington DC, chapter 31 regulations and the code in Houston, Texas. A significant difficulty arises in the testing and assurance of driver safety and vehicle safety. There are other issues around quality and age of vehicles. Those will often be handled by external third parties, against the will of the licensing authority and the traditional taxi industry. The taxi industry fits in a very distinct niche—this is how we do it and this is what is legally required—and tends to see the newcomer as not following the same rules, at a significantly lower cost. It is a competitive issue as well as a legislative issue.

The Convener: Would it be fair to say that in Scotland we have not yet entered what you call a transformed market?

Dr Cooper: That is a fair comment. I believe that Scotland is on the brink of entering the transformed market and will develop exceptionally quickly, once it starts.

The Convener: You say “on the brink”, but do you have any idea when the transformed market is likely to happen here?

Dr Cooper: I understand that Uber Britannia has applied for licences in Glasgow and Edinburgh. They will be granted and that company will begin to operate a variety of services in Scotland, starting with those that fall under private hire car legislation, but rapidly expanding into other forms of Uber—that is what evidence from other locations suggests.

Uber is not a single product, but is about seven different products. London, for example, has five Uber products, including something that it calls UberTAXI. The most contentious product is uberX, in which the private individual provides transportation; uberX gives me most concern in terms of its legislative standing and the power that it has to change the market to the greatest extent. The timescale from launch to uberX is probably six months.

Cameron Buchanan (Lothian) (Con): Do you consider that the underlying reasons underpinning the need for the licensing of taxis and private hire cars are necessary? You said in your submission that we should probably recast the legislation. Does that mean that we should abandon the proposals that are before us for the moment, because the technology is moving too fast? Have we covered only half the problem?

Dr Cooper: If we wait until the market is settled, we will have five or six more generations. The problem is that the technology will continue to change; what we see now will be followed by innovations that might involve planned ride sharing. The simple answer is that, in my view, there should be current legislation. However, that current legislation should provide sufficient power and regulatory authority to address changes that are currently foreseen.

Cameron Buchanan: What are the advantages of the two-tier system that we have at the moment, with private hire and hackney carriages? Are there any advantages?

Dr Cooper: Today in 2015, yes; tomorrow in 2015, no.

Cameron Buchanan: Right—that is what I thought. Should we be recasting the proposed measures or slightly changing them? Should we take them out of the bill and reform or tighten the provisions?

Dr Cooper: I certainly agree that they need tightening. I do not have an alternative text for you, for which my apologies.

The single-tier/dual-tier system question is significant. In effect, it may become irrelevant—however many tiers you choose to have—if some people ignore the tiers altogether, which is where things are going. The current dual-tier system serves, and has served, a purpose very well. That purpose and the reasons for the distinction will remain.

There is then a need to ask why we regulate in the first place. What is the purpose of having regulation? In a purely commercial market there is very limited control, but the taxi market has not operated in that way for hundreds of years, with good reason. The question is why we control it, what potential benefit there is to maintaining it and what potential disbenefit there is in the loss of that control.

Cameron Buchanan: Given that technology is moving so fast, if we do not remove the provisions from the bill, should we make them a bit looser, so that they cover all aspects? That is what I really meant earlier regarding the future.

Dr Cooper: It is appropriate to cover all aspects. It would be a loss of opportunity not to address the aspects that we foresee as being relevant in transformed markets elsewhere.

One of the fundamentals of taxis is street hire, or applying for hire, and operating in a restricted market in some locations. There is a question around the validity of tests being applied for maintaining that market once the market has transformed. We view that as the significant unmet demand test. Even if the industry were to move, as suggested, from taxis alone to taxis and private hire cars, that would require significant renovation in order to remain valid, and even further renovation in a fully transformed market with players that do not abide by it anyway.

John Wilson (Central Scotland) (Ind): Bearing in mind the transformed market that you have described, surely the issue around the legislation is to ensure that all cars and all drivers are licensed. Would that not be a way of getting round Uber and UberX? It would be a matter of saying that, if someone is providing a service for profit, the car should be licensed and the appropriate insurances should apply to the delivery of that service, rather than just moving towards a transformed market in which anybody can use an app and hail a car to come and pick them up. The individual does not know whether the driver or the car is licensed. They do not know whether the car is fully equipped to deal with its passengers or, more important, whether it is insured in the event of an injury or other incident arising from its use.

Dr Cooper: I need to preface my answer by saying that it is essential, in the public interest, that vehicles are insured and tested and that drivers are safe, insured, licensed and controlled. I have no hesitation in saying that that is the correct outcome of a licensing and regulatory regime. That is the role of Government and its regulators.

I say that as a preface because I have observed multiple cities—too many to count—where the belief was that regulation and laws were sufficient to their purpose; in effect, they were saying, “My city has laws that are sufficiently good. Why would anybody break them or attempt to twist them?” Time after time, that has been proven wrong. There are determined companies with huge resource that seek to achieve reform or change that reduces and makes unenforceable the legislation of that city.

I give you the example of Houston, Texas. A year or a year and a half ago, Houston’s view was that its regulations were strong enough. The regulations were effective and strong in an industry that chose to follow them. The moment that a player came in with a massive number of operators—2,000, 3,000 or 10,000 private individuals—that law became unenforceable simply through the mechanics of its enforcement regime. If the same thing were to happen in Scotland, with Police Scotland seeking to prosecute tens of thousands of drivers and a company that was prepared to cover the fines applied to those drivers, it begins to paint a picture of a less enforceable regime.

It is a perfect storm, if you like. It is one that we cannot solve while we have an entity that chooses to go a different route. That is why so many cities answer the problem by changing their laws to reflect the demands of the incoming player, much to the complaint of existing players—who have done nothing wrong—and indeed much to their harm. When we have an incomer that takes up to 40 per cent of the market, the traditional market will be different. It will be a poorer market. The quality of services will be poorer. One of the outcomes of regulation as it stands is that we have very high-quality taxis in this city and others in the country. The impact on users of that service will be negative.

I could talk about relative qualities of service. In Scotland, there is a large advantage to the traditional taxi trade in that it is much better than its US counterpart. However, that in itself may not be a sufficient distinction to maintain the market share that it enjoys currently.

John Wilson: You referred to the current enforcement regimes and the fines applied. You said that Uber had picked up some of the fines that had been imposed on drivers in other jurisdictions. Are the fines sufficient? Do you think that there is a way under the present regime of international legislation of fining Uber itself?
You said that Uber claims to be a technology company but it contracts drivers to deliver a service for the company, so I do not regard it as a technology company. I regard Uber as a business that uses drivers. Are we tackling the issue correctly by fining drivers? Should any legislation that is introduced be able to target the company, which is, in effect, undermining the existing legislation of a region or area? You also said that Uber is a new entrant to the market, but you are giving me an image of a company that is undermining legislation and acting illegally, and will do so for future legislation.

Dr Cooper: I certainly agree with your stylisation of what Uber does, but I am not sure that it would agree with it. My perception is that Uber does a job that is no different from that done by a traditional radio taxi circuit in Scotland at present; the only difference is the way in which bookings are done—Uber will make a distinct difference.

There are examples of the company—Uber Technologies Inc—being indicted and prosecuted. The most recent example was in Spain, but a more relevant example might be the one in Germany, where the company was found to be in breach of regulations but was let off on a technicality, to use an American term, in that the wrong company was prosecuted. I have to make it clear that there are a number of Ubers and others: it is not simply one company. Authorities need to be aware of that and ensure that the prosecution goes to the right company, which I believe is Uber Technologies Inc Amsterdam, although I might be incorrect.

The problem that I have seen in the United States is that the value of the fine that can be imposed is not harmful or punitive for the company, but it can be very harmful and punitive for the driver. In some instances, the driver has their vehicle removed as well as receiving a fine. A fine for the company, which is unbelievably huge, is nothing to it and the company could interpret it as a cost of market entry. However, a fine is very significant to the driver and, were Uber not to pick up the fine, there would be a change in behaviour.

Do I believe that legislation can do something to tackle Uber? I believe that that is possible, but I do not think that it would be easy. The extent to which an enforcement regime would need to go after multiple individuals would make it very hard for enforcement to work.

John Wilson: Thank you.

The Convener: We talked earlier about safety checks on both drivers and vehicles, but it seems that Uber and the like do not have to comply with safety checks in many of the areas in which they operate or that they force licensing regimes to dilute the nature of their safety checks. As well as having an expectation of safety when we go into a cab or a private hire car, we have an expectation of knowing how much we are likely to pay. We expect to know how much we will pay per mile and for waiting times. Maybe I am a bit naive, but what is the arrangement for payment with Uber cabs? How could anybody be sure that they were not being conned? How could we deal with that in terms of legislation?

Dr Cooper: I highlight the fact that private hire cars do not have the same regulatory requirements as taxis, but the point is absolutely appropriate. Uber publishes its fare and decides it on a competitive basis—it often sets a base fare that is below that of taxis. In fact, it makes a point of being lower than the taxi tariff. A tariff is a very fine system for taxis, because it is a distinct and clear measurement of cost and is unequivocal. Uber’s fare seeks to mirror that, at least in the first instance, in which it is based on a defined distance and time cost. Actually, it differs from taxi tariffs in that the customer pays on the basis of distance and time, whereas the taxi tariff is based on distance or time, depending on the circumstances.

Uber, however, also practises something that it calls surge pricing. To give a brief description, that is a change in price above the tariff or base fare. Uber describes that as a method of ensuring supply—that is its claim. Surge prices are not just a little more; they are many multiples of the base fare. There are many references in press statements to a price of seven times the base fare. People are not obliged to accept that, so they are not being conned, but it is the price of accepting the service. People accept it or they do not get a trip—it is that simple.

If we compare the claimed driver income—Uber almost says, “Work for us and you get this amount of money”—with the number of trips and the base fare, it appears that a driver would not make the money that is suggested. In other words, at some point, there will be a requirement for surge pricing to be put into effect. Therefore, it is not an accident of supply. It appears to be an intentional policy to massage the market to profit maximise on the basis of the ability to do so. That is purely an interpretation. It is reasonable for fares to differ at different points of demand—that is the basis of night-time fares. Tariff 2 is an additional fare in the taxi industry and is related to the assurance of supply. That is not an unreasonable argument but, in practice, it appears to me to be not only a necessary application but one that seeks to profit maximise.

The Convener: You said at the beginning of that answer that the charging regime for private hire cars is not the same as that for hackney cabs. However, in the city of Aberdeen, which I represent, if I order a taxi by phone, I might get a yellow-plate hackney cab or a red-plate private hire car but the charging regime will be exactly the same. Will you clarify that? Do you mean that there might be differences in the charging regime in some areas but not in others?

Dr Cooper: That is the correct interpretation—

The Convener: At present, it is up to each individual licensing area to decide on the situation in that regard.

Dr Cooper: Yes.

The Convener: Does that in itself cause difficulty?

Dr Cooper: I believe that local regulation of fares is appropriate, as the fares reflect local circumstances and costs. We have a regime that bases the fare on a measured consideration of the costs of production. By definition, that is a local activity. We might choose to define “local” as meaning a city or a country, but the issue is still related to the measurable costs.

One aspect of costs that might be worth touching on briefly is that the taxi fare models of which I am aware, particularly those in Glasgow, Edinburgh, Inverness and, I believe, Aberdeen, include an element called driver’s wages, which is the amount that the driver takes home after everything else is gone. In any instance where that model exists and a market shift occurs when somebody else joins the market, any additional service that reduces income is likely to result in an increase in tariff to maintain that level.

The Convener: I have one other question about local flexibility before I bring in Willie Coffey. It is about the distinction that exists between hackney licences and private hire car licences in most areas whereby a private hire car licensee would not have to sit a knowledge test yet a hackney cab driver would of course have to do so. In Aberdeen, if someone applies for a private hire car, they also have to sit that knowledge test, which means that there is really no distinction between a private hire plate and a hackney plate. Does that happen anywhere else in the country? Does that local distinction cause any tensions at all?

Dr Cooper: I am not aware of the approach of every authority so I cannot give you a definitive answer. I believe that the primary distinction between taxis and PHCs relates to street pick-up. The knowledge test or the ability to control drivers of any vehicle type appears to be an appropriate power of any authority.

The only place that I can identify where there is conflict is on the boundary between one authority and another, where someone’s trip may cross an authority boundary and therefore give them a choice of one system or another. It is my belief that assurance of driver safety and ability is a very logical and desirable outcome. Whether that requires a knowledge test sits in the power of the authority making the regulation. I am not sure how I can answer better than to say that that should be based on the circumstances of the location.

The Convener: Thank you.

Willie Coffey (Kilmarnock and Irvine Valley) (SNP): Good morning, Dr Cooper. As a former software engineer, I look at things such as applications as being a positive development for the customer, so it would come as a worry to me—and, I am sure, to others—if the application of the technology was providing opportunities for loopholes or illegality. Is that what you are saying is happening? What are established taxi companies doing to catch up and deploy the variety of technologies that we have heard about this morning? Would that be a way for them to overcome the threat that you have described?

Dr Cooper: I agree that the technology itself is a good thing. It provides access that has not existed before, it makes this market sector more attractive to its users and it increases the number of trips that are being made in the sector. All those developments are very positive.

The taxi industry was slow to respond—it was a late entrant to the application concept. Although local companies have a quality product, mirroring many of the benefits of the market leader, the market leader has one legal distinction and one less legal distinction that make it an advantageous choice to the user.

The legal distinction is that it is a multinational product that works across cities regardless of where you are. You get off your train or your aeroplane and your app works. The user does not need to seek out a local app, which would be a cost to them. The slightly less legal distinction is that the app allows access to a variety of service types that the traditional taxi company’s app does not. That is the case whether you sit in the PHC or the taxi or the ride-share TNC category. The user may well not be aware of the legality of the choice that they make, and I believe that that may be intentional.

Willie Coffey: How would we overcome that? Would we have to define the types of use for which such applications can provide services?

Dr Cooper: One of the greatest marketing coups in the debate on these apps is the categorisation of pundits—those providing commentary—as either loving or hating the app and having an emotional attachment to it. I love many apps and they do a lot for me, but emotion does not fit in to the discussion. I make that comment because many responses fall into the categories of “I love it” or “I hate it”, which courts could style as being anti-technology, and even anti-free market. The question becomes a fundamental one that lies at the core of the market’s operation. The response of preventing access—as in the most recent response, in Spain—raises large question marks about the ability for a free market to operate. The authorities in Spain, for example, took such an extreme measure because it appeared to be the only measure that would have any effect.

I caution against the outright banning of something that brings benefit, but I cannot see a very good intermediate step, because so far most intermediate steps have been ineffective.

Willie Coffey: That is certainly food for thought.

I want to switch the conversation slightly to take advantage of Dr Cooper’s experience. There is an example in the media this morning of a driver of dubious reputation, let us say, who was able to move from one authority to another to evade the record that he had acquired in the first authority. He basically lied about his prior circumstances and was able to gain a licence in another authority. How could we—and should we—close that loophole to protect the public?

Dr Cooper: One of the strongest opportunities for ensuring that there is no licence tourism is for services to maintain a relationship with Police Scotland through the fit-and-proper-person test and the ways in which we identify criminal backgrounds. That is a correct and proper outcome of the regulatory structure as it stands. I am not aware of the instance to which Willie Coffey refers but, as part of the structure in which an authority is designated as the competent authority to determine, the test is at least possible, even if it is not always applied effectively.

When we lose control to third parties, that opportunity and that certainty are lost. You may hear arguments that the third parties do a better job, and we have certainly seen that in some United States cities, where an authority will seek a Federal Bureau of Investigation fingerprinting check. However good they may be, the third parties need to have some relationship to regulation that is sustainable, and I do not believe that that is where they are at this point in time.

The short answer is that the competent authority must be associated with and approved by government, even if it is not government itself.

Willie Coffey: The problem in the instance that I mentioned occurred because the person sought to evade his past record. Is there an opportunity through software, applications and so on for that kind of information to be shared among licensing boards so that a person cannot evade detection and has to reveal their past history?

Dr Cooper: There is a great deal of opportunity, but I am not sure that the will to use it is there. In this instance, the issue is not just the technology as we currently see it but its potential to provide a linked-up service.

As a researcher, and in my role on regulatory commissions, I would strongly seek to have information from the applications fed to me or to the authority. Although there is one case where it is getting a bit more friendly, so far the new technology companies have not provided any such feedback, despite the obvious benefit of feedback being made available.

John Wilson: I will follow up on that. Dr Cooper, You referred to the competent authority. Mr Coffey’s example was a good one. Suppose that someone applying to operate a licensed car decides not to apply to one authority because they have been told that its licensing regime is tough and takes cognisance of, say, reports from Police Scotland, whereas the licensing committee in a neighbouring authority may not be as stringent. What would you say about those circumstances? How can we ensure that there is a level playing field across Scotland?

Dr Cooper: The example that you give seems to me to be of a failure of one of the licensing authorities to fully take advantage of national information on drivers. I am not aware of any instances that fit the example.

The Convener: Is the authority in the example failing to fully take an opportunity or is it failing to comply with what it should be doing legally?

Dr Cooper: I do not know.

John Wilson: I will try to clarify the point. My understanding is that, at present, if a Police Scotland report appears before a licensing committee, the committee can take cognisance of the report or set it aside. Is that the situation?

Dr Cooper: I can only assume that it is, from what you say. I do not know the extent to which a report can be put aside; I am not aware of that.

To the question whether we can level the playing field for other groups, the answer is no. We are in the best position that we can be where there is a Police Scotland report of which cognisance is taken. Where that decision is given or assumed by a party that does not go through licensing, there is no way of ensuring a level playing field.

Clare Adamson (Central Scotland) (SNP): Thank you, Dr Cooper, for helping sort out what we have covered already this morning.
The Scottish Government has stated that it believes that services run by the community, social enterprises and voluntary services, such as cancer transport services, should still be exempt from the hire car licensing regime. Do you agree with its position on those organisations?

Dr Cooper: I have no view that I can give you helpfully. The only comment that may be helpful is that, were those services to be contracted to the taxi or private hire car industry, I see no reason why those taxis or private hire cars should not abide by all existing regulations.

Alex Rowley: Would it be fair to distinguish between the urban and rural areas of Scotland in terms of demand? For example, the evidence that we have received has generally welcomed the removal of the exemption for cars that are contracted for 24 hours or more, but the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities notes a division between urban and rural authorities. Rural authorities are more concerned that it could lead to a withdrawal from the market. That is what I want to touch on. Is there a major difference between urban and rural areas? You talk about Glasgow, Edinburgh and the other big cities, but there is not the same demand and, therefore, supply in rural Scotland.

Dr Cooper: Urban and rural areas are not the same—they are different, and their markets are different. Historically, that is why rural locations have one form of taxi-type service and urban locations have two.

From the evidence that I have on market entrants and TNCs, I believe that there will be very limited movement into rural areas by the TNCs simply because the market is not there for them—it is not a profitable venture.

As to whether differences will result from the removal of the exemption for cars that are contracted for 24 hours or more, that is not an issue that I have had in the forefront of my mind, and it is one on which I do not have a prepared answer—I apologise.

Alex Rowley: We can perhaps follow up on that at a later stage.

The Convener: Thank you very much for your evidence, Dr Cooper. It has been extremely useful.

I suspend the meeting for a few minutes to allow for a change of witnesses.

Meeting suspended.

10:36

On resuming—

The Convener: We move to our second panel of witnesses. I welcome Kevin Woodburn of Edinburgh City Private Hire, Les McVay of City Cabs and Bill McIntosh of the Scottish Taxi Federation. Would you like to make any opening remarks, gentlemen?

Bill McIntosh (Scottish Taxi Federation): I am not entirely sure what we have come here for today. I assume that we are giving evidence with regard to issues arising from the new bill on civic licensing. I will be brief in that respect.

As you know, there is an option to remove clause 22(c) of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982, which allows vehicles and drivers to be hired on a 24-hour basis. We fully support removal of that clause because we have seen attempts by groups and bodies—including one body, in particular, that is publicly funded—to use such vehicles in an effort to get around the restrictions that are placed under licensing. As long as there is a loophole to allow unlicensed activity, some people will be willing to take the opportunity to drive a coach and horses through it. The Scottish Taxi Federation strongly supports removal of that clause.

We do not have any firm feelings on the option to extend driver training to private hire car drivers, although in our view that is unnecessary and would become burdensome for the local authorities involved. My local authority in Glasgow struggles to accommodate the number of taxi drivers who apply to take the test before they are granted a licence, and the situation would only get worse if the private hire sector was included. I know that it is intended to be an option and that councils may not choose to do that, but I understand that quite a high percentage of councils were in favour of it in their responses to the Government. I believe that it would slow up the feed of drivers into the private hire sector and, from there, into the taxi business.

The issue that concerns us most is the option to allow councils to limit the number of private hire cars. It is not that we object to limiting the number of private hire cars. We are concerned that, because of the way in which the option is structured, it has been decided that, rather than have unmet demand, there is to be overprovision. In his evidence, Dr Cooper alluded to the fact that there is, at this time, no measurement available—it is difficult to imagine how there could be any measurement—of whether there are too many private hire cars in any one area.

Section 60 of the bill seems to take its approach from the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005. It is fairly simple to walk down a street in any city, count 10 public houses and conclude that the street does not need another pub; it is an entirely different matter to try to measure the number of private hire cars that might be available.

Our major concern is that the financial memorandum says that although there are likely to be many more court challenges in respect of overprovision, there is nothing to worry about, because the costs will be recovered through the licence fees that the taxi and private hire trade are charged. I do not think that we should pick up the tab for an inept piece of legislation. The Government needs to find some other way of protecting councils from being dragged into court at every opportunity.

The Convener: Okay. We will tease out some of that in questioning, Mr McIntosh. Mr Woodburn, do you want to make opening remarks?

Kevin Woodburn (Edinburgh City Private Hire): No, I just want to thank you for inviting us to give evidence. I am very interested in answering the questions that members pose.

The Convener: Thank you. Mr McVay?

Les McVay (City Cabs): I echo that. I have been asked to give a more local view: Dr Cooper gave a more global view. I hope that I can give a more positive picture of the measures that are being taken in the taxi trade to generate competition and ensure that our drivers and vehicles meet a certain standard.

The Convener: Do you want to give us a brief overview now?

Les McVay: One of the things that Dr Cooper said was that we were slow to take up the app. We were offered the app by our service provider and we signed up the following day. We have used it for about two years now. We actively advertise it on the radio and in the back of the taxis, and we had an advertisement on the local Edinburgh Scottish Television channel recently. The number of jobs that come from the app has grown from zero to about 6,000 a month, but it is something that the public has to take up.

Another issue that was raised was the level of checks on drivers. Along with Central Radio Taxis, we put all our drivers through the protection of vulnerable groups process every three years, so we get a report back every three years for every driver who works with City Cabs. I know that Central Taxis does that, too, and I believe that Edinburgh City Private Hire does it, so two thirds of the Edinburgh trade checks drivers every three years.

The Convener: People are going above and beyond the current legislation.

Les McVay: Yes.

The Convener: Let us think about the current legislation and the proposals in the bill. Are the current differences in licensing requirements between taxis and private cars justified?

Les McVay: I have been the service manager for Edinburgh airport’s public rank for the past seven years. Two years ago, City Cabs was successful in winning the contract for five years—perhaps seven. We sit alongside the private hire cars. Before the contract was awarded, the private hire cars sat behind the fence. Onward travel was run by ComCab, on the premise that people would book a private hire car from a portakabin. However, bookings were never made—it was a sham. Because it was behind the fence, no one saw.

This time round, when the contract was renegotiated the private hire cars came out from behind the fence to sit alongside the public hire taxis. The public has a choice. We have a rank, and the private hire cars have an area where they rank up—they cannot officially call it a rank. It suits people to have a choice. Someone might come into Edinburgh and want a black taxi and a driver who has the knowledge, but if they are on their way to Gleneagles with golf clubs and suitcases they might want a people carrier or a saloon car, which is perceived to be a little more comfortable. People have a choice, which is what Edinburgh airport required.

The Convener: That is the Edinburgh perspective. Will Bill McIntosh give a national perspective? It can be difficult for the public to get their heads round the two regimes. Are the current differences justified?

Bill McIntosh: As I am sure you are aware, the situation that you describe evolved with the advent of the 1982 act and has been in place since. Over that period, a lot of confusion has built up, not the least part of which is caused by the media, who constantly refer to everything as a taxi, because they see the word “taxi” as a generic term. My colleague mentioned freedom of choice. The current two-tier regime gives the public choice. For that reason, above all else, I feel that we are justified in hanging on to where we are now.

Kevin Woodburn: The honest answer is that it hinges on where you are coming from, in that there is a distinct difference between the two trades. There is a two-tier licensing system and, although there are areas of convergence and similarities between the jobs, there are distinct differences.

You have to understand the historical differences that come to the forefront for drivers every single day out on the streets. A lot of the differences hinge around what we wanted from a two-tier licensing system. If we could go back in time and speak to the people who put the legislation in place originally, we could ask what was their purpose. Was it to have two forms of transportation and two forms of taxi-like situations? If that were the case, why has the whole thing been eroded over the years?

My comments may be slightly controversial to my two colleagues on either side of me, but the situation now is that there are public hire vehicles—taxis, to all intents and purposes—that were originally designed to ply for hire, and there are private hire vehicles, which were brought in because they cannot ply for hire. That is the difference between the two trades. If one sector of the trade is pre-booked hires only, why would the other sector, which was designed as public hire, be allowed to do pre-booked hire work?

That is where the whole thing got blurred and changed. We have continued down that path over the years and we are now being asked whether there should be a single-tier or two-tier licensing system. The truth is that I do not think that it matters that much any more, to be honest, because at the end of the day the market and the public will dictate. With all due respect to the committee, and to the various committees that I have sat in front of and been questioned by, what gets lost in all this is that it is about the public. The public will decide what they want. We can talk all day long about apps and about what we do as companies, but the public will decide whether to use us. The public are not stupid; they make decisions based on the factors that are important to them in whatever area of the country they live in, whether it be a rural area or the centre of Glasgow or Edinburgh. They decide based on what is on offer to them.

The Convener: You said that the market will decide and Mr McIntosh talked about provision in the bill for the limitation of private hire car licences. However, without the bill having been passed, a number of local authorities are already using the 1982 act to limit the number of licences, maybe to the detriment of the general public, who are not being fully served.

I ask all of you whether you think, in the light of Kevin Woodburn’s comment about the market deciding, that that is often not the case because of the limitations that are put in place by a licensing authority. Are any areas—I know that you can probably talk only about your own locales—not being particularly well served because of possible misapplication of the 1982 act? Might the new legislation help in that regard? Alternatively, do some of the things that are in place, or that could be in place, make the entry of Uber and others easier because the market is not being served?

Kevin Woodburn: I will try and remember the various points that you made in that one question.

The Convener: I am sorry, it was very long.

Kevin Woodburn: At the end of the day, the market is being served in respect of the proposals in the bill to change the ceiling—for want of a better description—on private hire. It is not necessarily a bad thing for local authorities to have the power to decide whether private hire should have a ceiling. Colleagues in the private hire sector would probably disagree with me, but I am giving you my personal opinion. Much of what you have heard so far today, without being too nasty about it, is scaremongering, which there is a lot of in the taxi and private hire trade. I am thinking of the things that have been discussed today, in relation to the app, for example. There is a lot of misunderstanding out there.

Mr Wilson pointed out something very relevant earlier on. We seem to be targeting Uber and the apps as the big bad wolf coming over the hill, but nobody has asked the big bad wolf whether that is what they are. If Uber wants to come into the marketplace and do some of the nasty things that are being suggested, why has it even applied for a booking office licence? Why has Uber not just decided to start taking bookings and to not comply with the current legislation? It has applied for a licence.

A lot of what goes on is scaremongering and the trade is as guilty as anybody for causing the situation. Legislation is already in place. A company that takes bookings must have a booking office licence and if it has one but then supplies unlicensed vehicles the licence will be taken away by the relevant authority, whether it be the City of Edinburgh Council, Glasgow City Council or West Lothian Council, whose representative is at the committee today.

We need to change legislative problems in some respects, but in others the problem is how legislation has been twisted over the years. Going back in time and asking the people who enacted the legislation in the first place what they were trying to do might give everyone a clearer picture.

Les McVay: I disagree that there is any scaremongering about Uber by Edinburgh taxi companies or the public hire trade. I am aware of Uber; I know their working practices and their strengths and weakness. One of their weaknesses will be price surging. I know of two examples of that from Sydney. When the Sydney siege was in progress there was a surge in requirement for vehicles, whether public hire, private hire or Uber. Uber’s system has an algorithm through which if demand goes up to a certain level the surge price kicks in and, as Professor Cooper mentioned, it goes up and up. In Sydney regular customers were charged up to four times the normal price to take them away from the siege area.

On hogmanay, I was sent an email from a guy who lives in Sydney who uses Uber. Prior to the hogmanay celebrations, all the Uber customers were sent an email, with a graph, which warned them when the price surge would come into effect—it was from half past eleven right through to four o’clock. The warning said that a normal $30 fare would go up to more than $100. The email asked them to form groups to share vehicles. That is the level that Uber is coming into the market at, and that is how it prices.

I have seen the guy who runs Uber, Travers Kalanick, justify surge prices along the lines that if someone books a hotel at peak times the price goes up. He also tries to justify it by getting vehicles from outwith an area to travel to the area and pick up fares. I do not think that the Edinburgh public will take it too kindly if they are charged two or three times the normal amount just because the service is failing them. The taxi trade is quite strong in Edinburgh.

I will give another example. An Uber driver is charged 20 per cent: when someone books a taxi, they pay up front with a credit card and Uber keeps 20 per cent, while the driver gets 80 per cent. Currently in Edinburgh there are two strong associations, Central Taxis and City Cabs, and all the drivers are part of that, or the members own a share of the company. They are non-profit organisations. Our arrangement is flexible and depends on how many hours a driver works, but we try to work it out so that a driver will pay 10 per cent of every fare that they get from City Cabs or Central Taxis. However, a driver will pay 20 per cent to Uber.

The taxi sector in Edinburgh has moved on considerably over the past few years. We have become more responsible and adaptable. We incorporate all the latest technology—for example, we were the first ones to get GPRS—general packet radio service. This is maybe not an answer to your question, convener, but while I have it in my mind I want to point something out—again, in a positive way. If Uber comes in and starts taking drivers, if there is an incident regarding a passenger or suchlike, who will be responsible? At the moment, if there is a police inquiry about an incident, the police come to the taxi company’s door at whatever hour of the day. We give them full access to all our information, because every taxi is tracked and monitored, and we know every turn that a taxi driver makes. We have been involved in solving quite a few crimes in the Edinburgh area in recent times. I know that Central Taxis and ComCab offer the same service as us in that regard. However, who would do that if the company involved was Uber?

The Convener: Mr McIntosh?

Bill McIntosh: I am afraid that I have lost the thread of your the question.

The Convener: It was about the market deciding at the moment. Given the restrictions that can be put in place by local licensing authorities, does the market really decide? Do such restrictions make it easier for the likes of Uber to enter the market?

Bill McIntosh: It could be argued that they are making it easier for Uber to enter the market. You will be surprised to hear that I disagree with my colleague when he says that we need a different type of system. I think that the one that we have just now is tried and tested; it has worked very well since 1982 and is still working very well. Taxis supply both radio and street services. The street service is unlikely to discontinue, so I can see that there is going to be a need for the foreseeable future to retain a two-tier system—that is how I would like to see it go.

The Convener: Okay. You represent a national body, but you operate in Glasgow and the other two gentlemen are from Edinburgh. Do you think that the market is well served by the current licensing regimes in each of the 32 licensing authority areas?

Bill McIntosh: The short answer is yes, for the most part.

The Convener: Thank you.

Cara Hilton (Dunfermline) (Lab): Bill McIntosh just said that the current system is “tried and tested”, but what are the panel’s observations on Dr Cooper’s comment that the market is transforming in such a way that the two-tier licensing regime may be very difficult to enforce in future and that we could be heading towards a monopolistic provider?

Les McVay: Does “monopolistic” refer to Uber or to private hire or public hire taking over each other? I think that the two tiers work well. Uber will come, but I ask that, as Mr Wilson mentioned, it be allowed to use only licensed drivers and vehicles. In some areas in America, Uber just uses people who download its app, who are unlicensed and use an unlicensed vehicle. That is just a horror story, as far as I am concerned.

As I said, Uber will come, so it is up to us to pull up our socks and be on our toes to provide a better service—nobody is looking for a monopoly.
Again, it is up to the drivers, whether public hire or private hire. City Cabs has a taxi school, and about 40 per cent of the people coming to us to sit their test see the school as the way to the next level because they want to be public hire drivers.

I do not know whether Kevin Woodburn will agree with this, but drivers go into private hire because it is easier to do that, as they do not have to sit for their brief. They might have no knowledge of Edinburgh city, but they can study for their brief while driving for private hire. Some stay with private hire, and we have guys who have left public hire and gone to private hire because it suited them.

In terms of choice, there is sometimes a line where the choice between public hire and private hire becomes confusing for people. We see that at the airport every day, where some people like the choice but others get confused. I do not know how you would legislate against that.

Kevin Woodburn: My view is very similar to Les McVay's. I referred earlier to Uber—it is coming and whether we like that or not is, frankly, irrelevant. It is a company that is coming to the Edinburgh and Glasgow areas, and as long as it plays by the same rules as everybody else and the relevant legislation applies, that is fine—it is competition.

Uber is different from every other company out there in that it does not have any vehicles on its circuit, if you like. It comes to a city and tries to attract all the vehicles that are already working in the city—I am referring to private hire vehicles, not hackney cabs. It tries to get those drivers to associate themselves with the Uber app. We have around 500 drivers in our company. All of those 500 drivers could join Uber and stay with us. Drivers could feed into both systems—us when we were busy and Uber was quiet; and Uber, when it was busy and we were quiet. In effect, that is what the app is about, as far as drivers—rather than the public—are concerned. As long as the rules are the same, licensed vehicles are supplied and licensed drivers are used, I do not think that we will ever get a monopolistic situation.

As Les McVay said, the issue will come back down to price. There are parameters in the pricing structure, and there are things that can be done on both sides of the trade; it would be entirely up to individual companies whether they wanted to do them. I very much doubt that the public would ever allow there to be a monopolistic situation if there were surge pricing, for example. Would anyone in the room pay four or even seven times the normal price? We would not, because we all know that there are choices. The fact that we use a company once does not mean that we will use it 10 times over and that we must pay whatever it wants to charge us, because we all know that there are choices out there, and that is the way it should be.

On whether there should be a single or a two-tier licensing system, it could be argued that choices are available because of the two-tier system. The situation might or might not change; there are reasons why it should change and there are reasons why it should not. What happens will come down to choice, which will relate to the availability of different types of vehicles. Does the legislation allow for the market to decide? That is a very difficult question to answer.

Bill McIntosh: I disagree with Dr Cooper's view that Uber or any other app company will have a monopoly. What we should be more concerned about is that the app suppliers comply with the current legislation. From the various bits of information that are available on YouTube and other sites, it would appear that they do not comply with the legislation in other countries. The situation might well be different here, but the main concern that the taxi industry has is that such companies create huge potential for unlicensed activity. The Government must find some way of legislating to deal with that.

We have already suggested that one way of tackling the issue might be to use the booking office legislation. That legislation would not necessarily have to be changed; more mandatory conditions could be created that would bring companies such as Uber under it.

The Convener: I want to touch on an issue that I raised earlier. Mr Woodburn, Mr McVay said that some of the private hire drivers use your training school because they want to complete the knowledge test. In Edinburgh, private hire drivers do not have to complete a knowledge test. Is that correct?

Kevin Woodburn: They do not have to.

The Convener: There is no obligation on them to do so. Is that the situation in most local authority areas?

Kevin Woodburn: To my knowledge, yes. I think that the situation might be different in Aberdeen.

The Convener: Aberdeen is the anomaly, and that is causing me difficulties. As far as the application of the 1982 act is concerned, Aberdeen is the only place that makes private hire drivers sit the knowledge test.

Kevin Woodburn: Yes—it is the only place that makes private hire drivers sit the knowledge test, but there are other areas of the country where companies get their drivers to do the knowledge test. For example, my company has its own Kevin Woodburn: We choose to train our drivers; we choose to take them to whatever standard we feel is appropriate for the marketplace that we are in.

When it comes to the legislative side of things, my company has no fear of there being legislation on the training of drivers. My slight concern would be if we were talking about training a private hire driver to the same level as a taxi driver. If that is the case, is it just about knowledge or is it as much about the other modules that a taxi driver may have to look at, such as the law on health and safety, disability discrimination and other things? All those things are important in training, if that is what we are talking about. As far as I understand it, the bill is talking only about knowledge training.

The Convener: Thank you. That is very useful.

Cameron Buchanan: You touched on the fact that you want a level playing field. What do you think of the two-tier system? The differences with private hire are that drivers do not need to have the knowledge in the same way and that there is no buying or selling of a plate, as is there is with hackney cabs. Would you favour any changes to the system? I could not gather that from your reply, although you said that you wanted competition. Should things be altered in any way?

Kevin Woodburn: I am trying to sit on the fence.

Cameron Buchanan: I gathered that from your reply.

Kevin Woodburn: It is a difficult question to answer, because there are parts of the legislation where a two-tier system currently works well, but there are other aspects that I would not necessarily agree work well. It is not clear exactly what is being proposed, for example, in relation to the numbers game and allowing local authorities to cap the number of private hire cars in a given area. That is fine, depending on the test that is applied to get the number correct, if everyone in the area agrees that that is the correct way to decide the numbers, but what is the next stage? Does the plate then become transferrable? Are we talking about the incorporation of private hire plates that can then be sold on for a price, or are we saying that that is not to happen for private hire, taking us back to a situation in which private hire and hackney cabs are treated differently? What concerns me about all the proposals is that they rely on local authority interpretation of what happens next.

Cameron Buchanan: Do you think that it is a good idea to keep control within the local authorities, or would you suggest some other arrangement?

Kevin Woodburn: There is a case to be made for keeping it under the control of the local authorities, because they know their own local environment best, as long as those local authorities are not concerning themselves with the vested interest groups that are lobbying them more strongly than other groups. I have concerns about all those things, but that is perhaps slightly more controversial.

The Convener: The 1982 act does not allow for capping, but we already see the capping of private hire licences in certain local authority areas, do we not?

Kevin Woodburn: No, not to my knowledge.

The Convener: Is it not the case that Aberdeen has a cap?

Kevin Woodburn: I do not have intimate knowledge of the situation in Aberdeen.

The Convener: I am being a bit parochial.

Kevin Woodburn: I do not think that a local authority can legally put a cap on the number of private hire licences at present. It cannot say that it will not issue any more licenses. That is not my understanding of the current legislation.

The Convener: Thank you, Mr Woodburn.

Cameron Buchanan: Just to be clear, did you say that local authorities cannot legislate as to how many private hire cars they license?

Kevin Woodburn: Today, no, not to my understanding—not when it comes to private hire licences.

Cameron Buchanan: The bill proposes that, but at the moment it is not the case.

Kevin Woodburn: The test would be to pick up the phone now to Aberdeen City Council and ask, “Can I put a private hire plate on?” If the reply is yes, there is your answer.

John Wilson: I want to pick up on a couple of the responses that we have heard so far. I seek clarification from Mr Woodburn about the issue of private hire drivers signing up for Uber. You gave the impression that private hire drivers could sign up for Uber as well as being members of Edinburgh City Private Hire. Is that what you were implying?

Kevin Woodburn: I am stating that Uber works by coming into a marketplace and attracting drivers who are already in the marketplace but who are perhaps with other companies. Our company has two different types of drivers—owner-drivers, who own their own vehicles and pay us a fee for the work that we provide them, and what I would class as rental drivers, who drive company vehicles that we supply to them.

The difficulty for us with the Uber scenario is that there is no way in which I could easily enforce a rule to prevent an owner-driver from covering work for Uber—or for any other company, for that matter. I have a slightly stronger hand in relation to our vehicles that we supply to drivers, as we can specify that they cannot work for anybody else. However, under the legislation as it stands, a private hire driver can work for 10 companies if he chooses to; the only issue is gaining access to the work that those companies have. Alternatively, he can work just for himself and not for any companies. He can take bookings himself without needing a booking office licence.

John Wilson: I thank Mr Woodburn for that clarification. However, our understanding—which might be a misconception that arises from the material that is publicly available—is that Uber comes in and recruits non-licensed drivers—

Kevin Woodburn: They did—

John Wilson: Let me finish, Mr Woodburn.

Kevin Woodburn: Sorry.

John Wilson: Uber comes in and recruits non-licensed drivers with non-licensed cars. The examples that we have heard about in other jurisdictions worldwide show that Uber tends to attract individuals who are not existing drivers—private hire or hackney cab drivers—to operate the service. Would it not be a major worry for the black-hack companies and the private hire companies if Uber were to come in and say, “We’re not going to recruit or use any of the existing licensed cars or drivers; we are going to recruit publicly to build our own business that has no current association with any of the licensed cars or drivers”?

Kevin Woodburn: Would that be a concern? Yes, of course it would. I suggest that it would be more of a concern to the public than to the trade, because I do not honestly believe for one second that the public would stand for unlicensed drivers and unlicensed cars running around the city picking them up at 2 or 3 o’clock in the morning. I genuinely cannot see that happening.

Again, I do not want to sit here and sound as though I am a fan of Uber—I am trying hard to sit on the fence and be objective. At the end of the day, however, my understanding is that Uber or companies like it would come in to a marketplace and try to recruit—for want of a better word—licensed drivers with licensed vehicles. Were that not to be the case, we would all be standing here objecting vehemently to the idea of allowing into the sector any company that runs unlicensed drivers and unlicensed cars. We would be the first to stand up and object to it, but I think that the public would be very close behind us.

John Wilson: Mr Woodburn, you referred to the booking office scenario, and said that Uber would have to operate a booking office. My understanding is that, at present, someone who operates a taxi firm—whether it is a private hire or a black-hack firm—has their booking office in the premises from which they are licensed to operate by the local authority.

Uber, as I understand it, would not, as an app system, have 32 booking offices throughout Scotland to coincide with the licensing authority areas. It would, if it had a booking office at all, have one operational centre and apply the app to the whole of Scotland. How does that fit in with the current legislation, and with the proposed legislation whereby booking offices are associated with the licensing authority?

Kevin Woodburn: If you are correct in saying—I am not suggesting that you are not, as I do not know the facts, but I can tell you what I think the situation is—that Uber would come in and run one centre encompassing all 32 licensing authorities, that would be a huge problem. I think that the licensing authorities themselves would have a major problem with that.

However, that is not my understanding of what will happen. As far as I am aware, at this precise moment in time, Uber has applied for a booking office licence for Edinburgh to run an office somewhere on George Street, and for a licence for Glasgow. That suggests to me that if Uber was seeking to come into other areas of Scotland, it would apply for booking office licences in those specific licensing authority areas. However, I am not Uber, so it might be a good idea for you to speak to it. That is my understanding, anyway.

John Wilson: Mr McVay or Mr McIntosh, do you have any comments?

Les McVay: My understanding is that Uber has to apply for a booking office licence in any city in which it operates. That is the current legislation. If it were to start using unlicensed vehicles and unlicensed drivers, I would have thought that that would be a major concern for Police Scotland. You would have a gradual movement, over time, of no one going into the private hire sector.

We have a very good, competitive market in Edinburgh at the moment. No one is queueing up for public or private hire licences. I would suggest that that is market forces—that is what everyone is looking for. It is a good example of what can happen. If there is a surge anywhere, people will come in and look to buy public or private hire licences. At the moment, there is no movement. There are various reasons for that. The City of Edinburgh Council employs Halcrow to do surveys of unmet demand every three years. I do not want to bang the drum for Edinburgh, but it is a very good, healthy market.

I am aware of Uber and its strengths and weaknesses. The Edinburgh trade—private and public hire—has to step up and meet the challenge. That is where the real situation will develop. As Kevin Woodburn said, the public will decide whether they want to get into a vehicle and be charged three or four times as much. In the festive season in Edinburgh—Christmas and new year—we implement a tariff 4. We lose work because of that tariff 4 because it goes up to a certain level. It was introduced several years ago to try to bring the supply up to meet the demand.
All that it has done is to reduce demand during that period. Through the tariff review, we are trying to bring that tariff 4 down to a reasonable level to get our customers back. At a time of year when our customers most need us, we are overpricing.

The Convener: Mr McIntosh?

Bill McIntosh: Sorry, could you repeat the question?

John Wilson: It was that long ago that I have forgotten it. It was about Uber coming in, and the location of booking offices, and other issues, such as the recruitment of unlicensed drivers and cars.
Is that an issue for your members?

Bill McIntosh: It is obviously an issue for our members; I would imagine that it would also be an issue for local authorities. Booking office legislation is quite clear—it applies to every local authority in Scotland. It is difficult to see how Uber would be able to operate in Dundee from an office in Edinburgh. That would be a major concern. In Dundee at least, it would be breaching the regulations.

John Wilson: How is a booking office registered with the licensing board? My fear is that Uber could say, “We’ve got one operator operating from a housing estate in Dundee and that’s the booking office,” and registers that. It does not need anyone at the end of a telephone because the computerised system will do all that for it.
Should guidance or regulations be put in place to say that a booking office should operate in a certain way? Most of Uber’s bookings will be done through the app. The drivers will use a smartphone rather than a radio control system.
How do we ensure that 32 people employed throughout Scotland is not the limit of Uber’s operation, or that of any similar company, in 32 licensing board authorities?

Bill McIntosh: That is a difficult question to answer. I hear what you are saying. Uber could have booking offices in 32 areas that are, in effect, not operating. The fact of the matter is that Uber could probably run its operation from the Netherlands or anywhere else if it chose to do so, because it is all done in cyberspace. It is very difficult for me, as an ordinary individual, to say what legislation is required.

Kevin Woodburn: I agree with Bill McIntosh, to an extent. We are so-called experts in our field because of our 25 to 30 years’ experience in the sector—some would say that we are dinosaurs rather than experts. At the end of the day, our expertise is based on the fact that we have had that length of time in a certain trade.

When it comes to the specifics of the question, there is nothing in the checks and balances that are already in place in each licensing authority to ensure that the rules are being applied. The stupidity, if you like, of the situation that we are currently in is demonstrated by the fact that local cab inspectors can do nothing about a situation that they know is going on if the company involved is not a licensed company. The inspectors do not have a remit even to go and speak to that company because it is not licensed.

In response to Mr Wilson’s hypothetical situation, I would say that there are great concerns about whether such things might apply in the future. As trade people, we just have to hope that the legislation that is in place is enforced and that, if it needs to be changed, it is changed quickly. My concern is that we are still working under the provisions of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 and are talking about little changes here and there. I fully understand that in the greater scheme of things in the country, taxi and private hire licensing is nowhere near the top of the tree—of course, it should not be—but it is at the top of our tree.

The Convener: At this moment, it is at the top of our tree as well, Mr Woodburn.

Kevin Woodburn: I will get off the tree, then.

Les McVay: We applied for a booking office licence and received a visit from the council and Police Scotland. We have had two checks since then, over the past four or five years. We do get site visits from the police, who look at our system, but they know it anyway, because they are up there every second weekend.

Uber has been quite responsible in having applied for a licence. There is a company called Get Taxi that is currently going round the ranks in Edinburgh, trying to get our drivers to download its app and get work in that way. I do not think that there has been much take-up, although I imagine that some street cars might trial it during this quiet period; it is a matter of choice. However, that company does not have a booking office—that is the problem. That is where cyberspace comes in.
Get Taxi has not made any effort to get a booking office licence, which the legislation requires, yet it is going round the ranks at the moment.
We have seen that happen twice before over the past year to 18 months, with companies trying to get drivers to use them. There has been very little take-up. Two thirds of the public car drivers in Edinburgh belong to a circuit—City Cabs, Central Taxis or ComCab. Street cars are street cabs for a reason: they do not want to be part of a radio-controlled company or an app-controlled company. It is a matter of choice. The difficulty is that Uber has applied for a booking office licence and Get Taxi has not. The two companies that previously went round the ranks promoting their business disappeared as quickly as they appeared.

Kevin Woodburn: Was one of them Hailo?

Les McVay: No, it was not Hailo.

The Convener: The other companies are not relevant to us, although if you want to send us that information later that would be fine.

Les McVay: No, I am just giving you an example. Uber has applied for a licence but the other app companies do not apply. For me, it is about market forces and how the current suppliers respond to the new guys who are coming in.

Clare Adamson: I want to take us back to an earlier part of the discussion in which we talked about the knowledge test. Given that we are also talking about apps, and given that most cars and smartphones now have satellite navigation systems, is the knowledge test still fit for purpose?

Bill McIntosh: Absolutely, it serves a purpose. Taxi drivers are hired instantly at the taxi stand. Very often, they pick up people who have come from abroad and who do not know how to get where they are going or where it is. The taxi driver needs to be able to instantly plot the journey, mostly in his head. I am sure that you will be aware that, in London, it takes up to two years to learn the geographical knowledge, although the situation is not quite so bad in Edinburgh or perhaps Aberdeen and Glasgow. Nonetheless, the test serves a useful purpose because, if drivers do not have the knowledge for that instant hire, when someone gets in the door there and then, where are we? They will be sitting pressing buttons on a satellite navigation unit. The test is definitely required.

Kevin Woodburn: That is a controversial question for me. At the end of the day, there is a need for a knowledge test for the hackney trade. For the private hire trade, a knowledge test is not a bad thing as a form of training for private hire drivers. Anything that raises the standard of drivers has to be a good thing.

That might or might not be controversial for other people in the private hire sector, but I do not see why training of drivers should be a negative thing. My concern is the same as the one that I mentioned earlier: it is not necessary to have the same testing of knowledge of streets for private hire drivers as is applied to taxi drivers. That is because, as Bill McIntosh stated, a public hire driver—a taxi driver—takes there-and-then hires in a public place. Without boring you to tears on the current legislation, that is my stance on the matter.

Les McVay: Definitely, yes. As Kevin Woodburn says, the test shows commitment and sets a standard for people coming into the trade. We have to have knowledge of routes and the whole thing if it is not going to be a casual trade. At our taxi school, we teach about all types of situations that drivers will get involved in. I am sure that, if we made the system more casual, everybody who got into taxis in Edinburgh would start complaining if drivers did not know where they were going or had to turn on their sat nav to find out. We have had instances where guys have followed the sat nav, perhaps because new briefs have come in, and we have had to sit them down and go over things again because they have gone round the bypass and that has added an extra £5 or £6 on the fare. The drivers have to have the knowledge—that is a key part of our service.

Willie Coffey: On that last point, I want to share with the committee an unfortunate experience that I had in Edinburgh a couple of years ago.

Les McVay: There is always one.

Willie Coffey: Aye. This particular taxi driver did not have a clue how to get to Easter Road stadium. I mean, it is quite a big structure that has been there for quite a while. He charged me 20 quid for the pleasure of driving round in circles and he still could not find it.

The Convener: He maybe supported Hearts.

Les McVay: Was it a black taxi?

Willie Coffey: I cannot remember.

Kevin Woodburn: I hope it was a City Cab.

The Convener: Let us not deal with Willie’s stadium problems now, anyway.

Willie Coffey: I want to tease out the idea of protection of the public and to connect that to the issue that John Wilson raised about unlicensed taxis and drivers appearing on the scene. What do we do in those circumstances? Do we need to tighten up the legislation, or is the solution to improve public awareness? When a car turns up at 2 in the morning, people do not look out the window and say, “Oh, there is no plate on that car, so I am not getting in it.” What should we do to advise the public about their rights and obligations and to protect them? To go back to the issue of apps, which we have been talking about all morning, can an app not somehow signal to the customer that the car that is coming to get them is My concern with all these things is that over the think, that is surely what all the legislation is about. Ultimately, regardless of what the trade might answering questions about public safety.

Those of you who have more technical skills than me can add all sorts of technical innovations that can be added into apps to make them more public-safety oriented. When a response is sent via an app, a picture of the driver and his badge is sent with it. There are all sorts of technical innovations that can be added into apps to make them more public-safety oriented.

I am delighted that we are sitting here answering questions about public safety. Ultimately, regardless of what the trade might think, that is surely what all the legislation is about. My concern with all these things is that over the years we have lost track of why we are doing what we are doing.

Bill McIntosh: You have asked a very difficult question. We have been trying to educate the public since 1982, and the message still has not got across. There are so many people in the cities at weekends who will jump into anything that has four wheels, as long as they get home—that is their only objective. They do not look to see whether the car has a licence number or whether it is for pre-booked hires only or is a taxi; they just want to get home quickly. I really do not know how to answer that question. It would take a major media campaign to achieve what you are looking for.

Kevin Woodburn: I totally agree with Bill McIntosh. If you go into any city centre on a Saturday night you will find a multitude of different vehicles picking people up left, right and centre, whether they are licensed or unlicensed. Let us not pretend that Uber coming into the marketplace is the start of potentially unlicensed vehicles going out on a Saturday night plying for hire. It already happens in every city across the country every Saturday night in life. There are public hires, if you like, and there are unscrupulous private hire operators who will ply for hire on a Saturday night. The private hire companies can do their best to tell their drivers what they must not do, but once the drivers are out there driving around the streets, it is virtually unenforceable. That is the problem.

Mr Coffey is right that it comes back to educating the public. I do not know how you do that—good luck with that—but at the end of the day, it is the only answer. You have to start with the younger ones and work your way up eventually to the dinosaurs like us.

I am not saying that young guys are not vulnerable, but young females out at the weekend are probably the most vulnerable of all. We have all heard examples of people jumping into what they think is a private hire car or taxi. We must consider things like better and more appropriate signage.

We have talked about apps. It could be that when a response is sent via an app, a picture of the driver and his badge is sent with it. There are all sorts of technical innovations that can be added into apps to make them more public-safety oriented.

I am delighted that we are sitting here answering questions about public safety. Ultimately, regardless of what the trade might think, that is surely what all the legislation is about. My concern with all these things is that over the have asked Colin Keir to try to get the campaign going the week before the office parties instead of the week after the office parties.

The Convener: I am sure that he will read the Official Report and get on to that, Mr McVay.

Les McVay: I just wanted to highlight that.

Willie Coffey: I have one last question, again on public safety. If a taxi turns up and a customer is unhappy about the circumstances, from the benefit of your own knowledge and experience, is the customer at liberty at that point to reject the transaction—or the contract, if you like? At what point does the contract become valid? I just want to make the public aware that if they are not happy with a car or a driver, they can reject the transaction.

Les McVay: Any time a customer is not happy, for whatever reason, they can reject the car or the driver. They can do that at any time.

Willie Coffey: When is the contract complete? When you have made the journey?

Les McVay: The contract is made after the journey is complete. If the driver fails to complete the journey for any reason—if the car breaks down, for example—he cannot charge.

Willie Coffey: Or if he could not find where he was supposed to be going.

Les McVay: You have had some bad experiences, haven’t you? It is very much in the customer’s favour. The customer can call off the transaction at any time for whatever reason.

Willie Coffey: So a taxi driver cannot say to a person, “You’ve rejected the booking but you still owe me the money.”

Les McVay: Tomorrow, I am going down to Pentland Security and I hope to be the first taxi driver in Edinburgh who puts closed-circuit television cameras in his taxis. We have tried for this for five, six or seven years and we have always fallen at the last hurdle, but hopefully it will happen tomorrow. I have the variation of licence—the licence holder acts as data controller—and it all meets the requirements of the City of Edinburgh Council. We will have a CCTV unit in the back of the taxis with a forward-facing camera on the driver and a camera on the back for the customers.

Kevin Woodburn: I agree with Les that the contract can be cancelled at any point prior to the journey commencing. There is a cancellation charge within the tariff sheet; there are elements of treating it as a proper contract, so a cancellation fee can be levied. However, the circumstances are unique and individual to each and every journey. It is probably impossible to have a policy in place—whether it be a company policy or a legislative policy—that will cover every possible eventuality. I think that what is already in place serves pretty well.

Bill McIntosh: I do not have a lot to add to what has already been said except to say that in my opinion, when a member of the public hires a taxi, whether it be in the street or through a dispatch company, they have the right to terminate that at any time. It then becomes a civil matter between them and the driver concerned and I do not know of any driver who would pursue the loss of a fare through the courts, so as far as I am concerned, customers can terminate at any time if they have good cause.

Cameron Buchanan: I declare that I have a contract with Edinburgh City Private Hire. I have sometimes had a problem with the drivers’ lack of knowledge of English. Do you give the drivers an English test as well as a security test?

Kevin Woodburn: Is that a hypothetical question?

Cameron Buchanan: It is.

Kevin Woodburn: I just wanted to clarify that it was a hypothetical question.

The Convener: We are straying into strange realms that are completely and utterly outwith the scope of the bill. You can have that conversation with the gentleman afterwards.

Cameron Buchanan: Can I ask another question?

The Convener: If it is on another matter, you can ask it.

Cameron Buchanan: Does the bill have major flaws? Does it go far enough?

Les McVay: I think that it probably goes far enough. We have best practice guidance that councils work within. You cannot legislate for every area, whether urban, rural or in a city; it has to be flexible enough for every area. The guy who is operating in Pitlochry does not necessarily need to meet the same requirements as the people in Edinburgh. It is difficult to legislate for every single taxi or private hire service in Scotland. It has to be flexible.

Regulation and restriction are good, but only if the taxi firms do not try to hide behind them. Meeting the requirements of the public and the demands in relation to competition are where regulation and restriction come in, and that maintains a standard. As I say, it is very difficult to bring in laws to legislate for every single taxi enterprise or private hire business in Scotland.

Kevin Woodburn: I do not know the politics behind the provisions in the three sections of the bill that are relevant to our trade. I am not suggesting that there is any politics behind them; but if there is any, I do not know the reasoning behind it. The question is very difficult to answer. Do the provisions go far enough regarding the three points that are covered in the bill? They probably do, yes.

Should there be some form of training? Yes. I would like to drill down into the specifics of that, and I would also like to drill down into the specifics of the numerical capping of licences and the formula that will be used in each individual authority area to achieve that. Is it a bad thing that capping is potentially allowable? No, I do not think so.

I am happy enough with the three things that are covered in the bill. Could it go further? Could more things be added? Probably, yes. Again, however, without going into the politics of it all and without knowing the motivation behind the three sections, it is difficult to add anything more.

Bill McIntosh: As we stated earlier, we have concerns regarding the overprovision measures, mainly because there is no measurement of which I am aware that councils can use to ascertain whether there is an appropriate number of private hire cars or not. I have no doubt that that will be challenged by some sharp lawyers, and that councils will end up in court on a regular basis by refusing. There is a cost factor to that, and the cost will end up on the back of the cab and private hire industry. That is our concern. The matter is by no means closed.

We suggested a controversial solution to the Government, although it did not find much favour with it. Our proposal was that the burden of proof of whether there is unmet demand—whether there is overprovision or underprovision—should rest with the applicant, not the local authority.

John Wilson: I have a question about unmet demand. Mr McVay intimated earlier that the City of Edinburgh Council does a survey every three years. Mr McIntosh, do you know of any other authority that does a survey about unmet demand?

Bill McIntosh: A lot of local authorities carry out their own surveys. How they do that I have no idea. The only other councils that carry out surveys on a regular basis as far as I am aware are Dundee and, to a lesser extent, Stirling. I am not saying that others do not do it, but it is a very costly exercise.

The Convener: Is there enough in the current and proposed legislation dealing with disability access issues?

Kevin Woodburn: That is a difficult issue for me to delve into deeply. Given how the current legislation on disability sits and because private hire services must be pre-booked, there is a dearth of wheelchair-accessible vehicles in the private hire sector, other than the ones that are currently used for local authority school hires, for example. It is extremely difficult for me to go into detail or comment too much on the disability aspect, because there is not a lot of manoeuvrability in the private hire sector. It is probably better if the two taxi guys respond on that.

Bill McIntosh: There remains a difficulty in respect of access because there are so many different disabilities. People in wheelchairs are now well catered for; there are plenty of wheelchair-accessible vehicles in major cities such as Edinburgh and Glasgow. However, there are many other disabilities that affect people and the wheelchair-accessible vehicle might not be appropriate for their needs.

As I said in my letter to the committee, the cost of the vehicles is prohibitive as it stands. If we were to try to supply a vehicle that would meet every disability, the cost would be such that no one could afford to buy it or hire it. There are many difficulties to be understood and overcome.

Les McVay: Edinburgh was the first city in Britain to supply a fully wheelchair-accessible fleet, back in the mid-1980s. Every public hire vehicle on the road has a wheelchair facility. Again, that is fine in Edinburgh, but for rural areas where there may be only one wheelchair fare a month or whatever, the cost of putting in a wheelchair-accessible vehicle would be prohibitive, as Bill McIntosh said. It has to be driven by economics, rather than by legislation.

Is Glasgow not fully wheelchair accessible, like Edinburgh?

Bill McIntosh: Yes, that is right.

Les McVay: Glasgow is the same. I do not know what the situation is in Aberdeen, where they have saloon cars. You would have to legislate for different situations and ratios of wheelchair-accessible cars to saloon cars. In Edinburgh, all the hacks, or public hires, are wheelchair accessible.

The Convener: Thank you, gentlemen. I will suspend the meeting for a few minutes as I suspect that you want to talk to members about Easter Road and various other things.

11:46

Meeting suspended.
11:56

On resuming—

The Convener: I welcome our third and final panel of witnesses: Audrey Watson, managing solicitor at West Lothian Council, who was here a few weeks ago—welcome back; Douglas Campbell, assistant managing solicitor for licensing at Renfrewshire Council; and Tom Berney, chair of the Scottish Older Persons Assembly.

Would any of you like to make any opening remarks?

Douglas Campbell (Renfrewshire Council): Thank you for the opportunity to come along to address the committee on behalf of Renfrewshire Council. By way of introduction, I note that we are the authority that covers Glasgow airport. We have a numbers limitation in relation to taxis and we have a fairly high number of private hire cars. It might also be helpful for members to know that we have a taxi knowledge test and a wheelchair accessibility policy.

Tom Berney (Scottish Older Persons Assembly): In case people do not know, I explain that the Scottish Older Persons Assembly represents all the major voluntary organisations for older people in Scotland. We hold an annual assembly and we also go round the country inviting older people to tell us what they think is important. We then lobby Government on those issues. I confess that we have not done too much of that on taxis, but maybe I will say more about that later.

Audrey Watson (West Lothian Licensing Board): Thank you for inviting me back. I am happy to answer any questions on West Lothian’s submission. We are near an urban area, but we are not quite an urban area. We are a semi-rural area.

The Convener: Thank you. What do you consider to be the advantages and disadvantages of the current two-tier licensing system? Please include in your answer whether you think that there are benefits for service users who have additional needs. Mr Berney, do you have an opinion on that?

Tom Berney: It is a little bit different for us, because we are concerned about the service that old people receive from taxis. There is more concern about that than about the structure of how they are organised, but I have comments on that as well.

If I may say so, this morning, Dr James Cooper and Kevin Woodburn talked about what seemed to me to be a free-market free-for-all for hire cars, which seemed quite scary. As you touched on earlier, we are putting vulnerable people—into potentially hazardous situations, so we are naturally in favour of licensing and regulation in principle, and we think that all hire-car people should be trained.

Perhaps I can give the committee a wee anecdote. Once when I was in London, I asked the people at my hotel to get me a taxi. A minicab turned up and I asked the driver to take me to the Department of Trade and Industry. He did not know where it was, so I said, “Victoria Street”, but he still did not know where it was. I said, “It’s near Westminster abbey”—and still he did not know where it was. When you get a driver who does not have a clue, you realise just how vulnerable you are.

You asked about the importance of knowledge testing. It is very important indeed, because people want to be confident that their driver at least knows where they are going. We are concerned that a lot of people who use taxis and hire cars are taking a step into the dark, because they are not too sure of their rights or the sort of service that they can reasonably expect from their driver.

Drivers should be thoughtful; for example, they should take note of the passenger’s condition and treat older people as if they were their own mother or father. Our concerns are about the driver and his or her performance, and it seems to me that the only way of achieving what is needed in that respect is through regulation, testing, authorities licensing drivers and so on.

Little things make a difference. For example, a lot of older people who get a cab might have arthritis, or they might have just been picked up from a hospital, but drivers sometimes drive over speed bumps, which will be quite painful. There needs to be consideration for the passengers.

I am going to give you a list of problems that we—

The Convener: We will hear that list of problems as we move through the questions. I suggest that we stick to the specific question, and you will get an opportunity to go through all the other problems that you referred to, Mr Berney.

Tom Berney: What was the specific question?

The Convener: It was about the impact of the two-tier licensing system on service users with additional needs.

Tom Berney: I think—

The Convener: I think that you have already given us a fairly lengthy answer, Mr Berney. We will come back to you, but for the moment let us hear from Mr Campbell.
Douglas Campbell: The principal advantage of moving to a one-tier system is that there will be no issue with illegal ply for hires, as everyone will be able to ply for hire, but I am concerned about the disadvantages that such a move could bring. For instance, Renfrewshire has a wheelchair accessible vehicle policy for taxis, but private hire cars can be saloon cars, estate cars or hatchbacks—or even bigger vehicles such as multi-purpose vehicles, which we ask to be wheelchair accessible. In such scenarios, operators might well wish to carry more passengers.

As far as taxis are concerned, we have a separate set of conditions in a number of areas, but principally for wheelchair accessibility, and I am concerned that, if that distinction was removed, the question of who would run the saloon cars and the wheelchair-accessible vehicles would arise. After all, one is cheaper than the other. Having a wheelchair accessibility policy means that we have sufficient numbers of wheelchair-accessible vehicles to serve the travelling public, and particularly disabled people, who need them.

Audrey Watson: I echo Mr Campbell’s comments. The policies that West Lothian Council has put in place over the past few years allow taxis and private hire cars to complement each other. If someone wants a specialist vehicle to carry a heavy wheelchair, they can book one of our type 2 private hire cars, and from the end of this month, they will know that a taxi that they hail in the street or queue up for will be an accessible one, because it will have to meet the accessibility standard.

In the past, we have found that the private hire trade was using bigger vehicles that were eminently suitable as wheelchair-accessible or disabled-accessible vehicles, but there was nothing to compel the operators to meet the requirements that would allow disabled people to access them easily.

The Convener: With regard to knowledge testing and the other points that Mr Berney highlighted, do you as licensing authorities try to ensure that taxi or private hire car drivers take into account the needs of the folks who use their services, or do you consider that to be a matter for the individual operators or companies?

Audrey Watson: I feel strongly about that. We are in a world that is quite regulated. The last time that I came to the committee, we were talking about liquor licensing. Almost everyone in liquor licensing needs to pass a test, and everyone in the hire car sphere should have a certain level of expertise. In West Lothian, most of those people are self-employed, so no employer will come along and tell them that they need to sit a particular test.

In that situation, the Government should set a standard.

West Lothian is one of two councils that worked with the Scottish Government on looking at training and testing for hire car drivers. We worked with People First, which set up modules covering customer service, accessibility, pricing and the law, and that was well received. We would like to put that in place, but we would like the Government to say that it should be in place for all areas.

Douglas Campbell: On assisting the travelling public in general, we have a condition for taxis that passengers should be given reasonable assistance with luggage. We also have a knowledge test, and I agree with Mrs Watson that such tests should be encouraged. However, there is a resource implication for local authorities, because the tests have to be invigilated.

The Convener: Is there a knowledge test for hackney cabs and private hire drivers?

Douglas Campbell: No, the test is only for taxis. If the provision were to be introduced, it would give authorities the discretion to introduce such a policy. The numbers are bigger in relation to private hire cars; we have 214 taxis in Renfrewshire, which is our limit, but there are more than three times—there are almost four times—that number of private hire vehicles. That would have to be accommodated.

Knowledge tests differ throughout the country, but section 13 of the 1982 act is geared towards topography and knowledge of the streets in an area, plus “such other matters” as the council thinks appropriate.

I accept what Mrs Watson said about the People First training, but there are difficulties in having that as a mandatory system, given the current provision. The difficulty with extending the training and making it wider is that, although the legislation states that it can cover “such other matters” as the council thinks appropriate, it may be a moot point as to whether that would include child protection and so on.

Tom Berney: We would prefer that private hire drivers also had to be licensed and undergo knowledge testing. I have heard comments today about regulations varying around the country and arrangements varying between different companies in the same area, but people want clarity about what they are getting into when they hire a car, whether it is a taxi or a hire car. We recommend that there is some kind of taxi passengers charter.

Mr Woodburn said that the important thing is to educate the public about the use of private hire cars. It is one thing to have regulations, but the public should know what the regulations are and what they are entitled to under them, in terms of both the price that they will pay and the service that they can expect from drivers. Rather than just talking about the detail of the regulation and how it will work between the two different sectors, I would like us to publish guidance for drivers and the public about the type of training that is done.

We have heard that drivers do training modules on disability and various other things. I did not know that, and it is something that the public should know. The public should know that every driver has been trained and should understand what type of training it was and the kind of service that they should be given.

I am not saying that all taxi drivers are bad, by any means. Most are very good, but we get the odd case where a driver seems not to accept that they have some responsibility for the passengers. I would like to see something that makes that clear. It could be press adverts saying what the charter is between the hire company and the passenger and what they are entitled to, or there could be little notices in doctors’ waiting rooms and community centres to try to get across to the public how the licensing process works—

The Convener: Do you think that the public are interested in how the licensing process works?

Tom Berney: No—that is what I was going to say. They want to know not so much how the licensing process works but the implications of that for what they are entitled to, which cars they can use, how much they can be charged and what type of service the driver should provide. They want to know what kind of cars they can have and whether they should have ramps.

The Convener: I will stop you there. I am going to play devil’s advocate. I always say—my fellow committee members are probably bored of me saying it—that sometimes we cannot legislate for common sense. We could create lots of different things, but the charter that you talked about and all the advertising and booklets would have to be paid for through the fees that are charged to the trade, which would be reflected in the fares that the public had to pay. Would what you suggest be welcomed by the public if they were likely to be charged for it?

Tom Berney: Mr Woodburn talked about the free market and said that the market will decide and that people have a choice, but people do not have a choice unless they have an informed choice. People want to know how one company is different from another. For example, some companies advertise that they are women friendly because they have particular concern for women. Why not also have companies saying that they are age friendly and that they will have particular concern for older people? That is the type of thing that I am talking about.

The Convener: Is that not up to individual companies, which will gain—or not—from what they do? Again, that is a market scenario.

Tom Berney: That depends on your view of what the Government should do. Some might say that we can have a public service—that is what taxis come down to, in the end—that is run solely on the basis of what individual companies decide, but I believe that as part of the licensing arrangements there should be Government oversight of the service and the commitment that companies give to vulnerable groups.

John Wilson: Mr Campbell said, I think, that 214 taxis is the upper limit or the maximum number of taxis, but he said that there are about three times as many as private hire cars. Do you have an upper limit for private hire cars?

Douglas Campbell: Sorry, but I said that there are more than three times as many private hire cars because we do not have an upper limit. I take the view that we cannot have an upper limit at present.

John Wilson: Why is it the authority’s view that you cannot have an upper limit for private hire cars but you can have one for taxis?

Douglas Campbell: Section 10 of the 1982 act specifically allows authorities to refuse an application for a taxi licence where there is no significant unmet demand for taxi services in the area. There is no provision on private hire cars. One provision is made explicitly, but it is not replicated in the act for private hire cars.

John Wilson: I am trying to find out why you feel that an upper limit can be applied to taxis but not to private hire cars when the lines are being blurred in the distinction between the two.

As I said earlier to a couple of colleagues, I was on a licensing board in 1980, and I vaguely remember that part of the reason for the change in the legislation in 1982 was that it was felt that there was an adequate number of taxis in local authority areas but that private hire cars could be used to help to service peak-time demand. Your authority says that the maximum number of taxis is 214, but you make no distinction in terms of private hire cars. How do you make that distinction between how a private hire car operates and how a taxi operates?

Douglas Campbell: I will explain some of the context. We have a numbers limitation on taxis. The view that we have taken of the legislation is, I understand, the view of other authorities as well.
Because the provision is explicit for one but not for the other, it would not be competent for us to introduce a policy at the moment. Obviously, that would change if the provision in the bill was enacted.

Any decision on that has to be evidence based. Because we have the power in relation to taxis, we have an external survey produced from time to time, and we boost that evidence on a voluntary basis with taxi stance observations by our civic enforcement officer. Because there is no provision in legislation at present, it is not something that we have sought, and I have to add that it would come at a considerable cost to get the evidence to inform such a policy.

I add that, although there is a bottleneck and an issue of peak time demand, the case law under the 1982 act seems to say that there will be periods when demand reaches a peak and there may be an element of waiting time at ranks. The guiding principle, as I understand it, relates more to a general demand by the public for services.

John Wilson: I understand that, Mr Campbell. I am picking your authority in particular because of the distinction that it has made between taxis and private hire cars. How often are the surveys carried out by your authority? Given that Renfrewshire Council is the authority responsible for taxi ranks at Glasgow airport, has any account been taken of the increased demand that might have arisen because of the increased number of passengers arriving at the airport? Moreover, do you have any indication of unmet demand, or demand peaks, during the Commonwealth games and other such events that the local authority could have taken into account to increase the number of taxi licences?

Douglas Campbell: With regard to how often the surveys are carried out, I think that the last update, which was done externally, was done in 2010. Civic government enforcement officers make periodic inspections, and I know that stance observations have been done from time to time, but I am not sure that there was any particular examination during the Commonwealth games. We have to work to general demand as well; there will be times of peak business, and obviously private hire cars, too, can service the market.

With regard to the process, I should point out that even if a report on numbers from an external organisation indicates that we have reached our numbers threshold, that does not bar people from applying for a taxi licence. A person is entitled to make an application, and it will be considered by our regulatory functions board, which is effectively our civic licensing committee.

John Wilson: Just for clarification, Mr Campbell, if you have reached your maximum number of operational taxis in Renfrewshire, and somebody makes an application, will that application be rejected?

Douglas Campbell: No, we cannot do that. There is case law, in particular from the mid-noughties, with regard to residual discretion. Having a policy does not mean that we can rigidly adhere to it; we have to be able to listen to people and make exceptions. I am not able to project what the board might consider to be a successful application, but we have to put any applications that we receive before it. Initially, it will be flagged to the applicant that we have reached our threshold and that, as a result, there is a risk that their application will not find favour with the board, but ultimately it is a matter for councillors and it is not a reason for an officer to bounce an application.

The Convener: Can I take you back a little bit? You have said that, under section 10 of the 1982 act, you cannot put a cap on the number of private hire cars. If a local authority were to put a cap on private hire cars, would it, under the current legislation, be in breach of the 1982 act?

Douglas Campbell: Not explicitly. There is a specific provision for taxis that has not been replicated for private hire cars. I do not know what a court would make of that—I am not sure whether the point has been taken up before.

The Convener: I know that you will probably not be able to answer this, but how many local authorities that you are aware of have a cap on private hire?

Douglas Campbell: I am not aware of any, but there might be some.

The Convener: Ms Watson, what is your interpretation of section 10 of the 1982 act with regard to a cap on the number of private hire cars?

Audrey Watson: I agree with Mr Campbell—I have always thought that no authority had a limit. I certainly think that, if an authority had such a limit, it would be challengeable on appeal under the current legislation.

John Wilson: I am still trying to understand the remit of the licensing committee in Mr Campbell’s authority. Are you saying that, if the cap has been reached and someone makes an application, the licensing committee can adjust its thinking and grant a taxi licence? If the licensing committee agreed to grant another licence, your limit would go up from 214 to 215, so is there really a cap?

Douglas Campbell: The limit would still be 214. If the situation that you are describing arose—and it is not a situation that we face at the moment—the limit as far as the policy was concerned would remain at 214. However, we would de facto have made an exception, which would take the number of licences that had been issued to 215.

The point that I am trying to make about the application process is that although we have a policy, someone can still make an application. The wording of the 1982 act is such that we “may” refuse a licence when we consider that there is “no significant unmet demand”. It does not say that we “shall” refuse a licence if we find that there is no such demand.

John Wilson: As I have said, convener, I am just trying to get my head round the flexibility that exists for licensing committees to exceed an upper limit that has already been set.

The Convener: I think that the answer is that the licensing committee or board will set the limit but will still consider applications that might breach that limit.

Douglas Campbell: We must consider applications. Every application is considered on its own merits, and the board has discretion, which, as the courts have made clear, cannot be fettered. It is not to say that a good case might not merit an exception.

Cameron Buchanan: I presume that, when you used the phrase “significant unmet demand”, you were talking about somewhere outwith the reach of the centre of, say, West Lothian. Is that what you meant?

Douglas Campbell: No. I think that the test is that we can refuse an application for a taxi licence if we are satisfied that there is “no significant unmet demand”. I apologise if I did not make that as clear as I might have done.

Cameron Buchanan: So it is the other way round. Thank you.

Alex Rowley: Does determining whether there is overprovision involve significant costs? Do the kinds of surveys that you have to do to establish whether there is overprovision of private hire have major cost implications? A previous witness raised the question of how you can determine what constitutes overprovision of private hire cars.

The Convener: We will start with Ms Watson this time.

Audrey Watson: In 2009, West Lothian Council decided to do away with its limit on the number of licensed taxis for two reasons. First, we did not think that there could be no unmet demand if new private hire cars were being licensed every day. The market must work; these people need to find work in order to remain licensed, and the number of private hire cars has gone up steadily over the past few decades. We therefore thought that the situation presented a difficulty.

Secondly, having a cap creates a black market for licences. Licence plates change hands for money. The legislation provides that a licence comes to an end when the holder dies, but we found situations in which Mr A no longer wished to operate his taxi, so he leased it to Mr B, who might otherwise have provided a new vehicle. When Mr A died, the licence came to an end. We did not think that that was right, so we did away with the limit.

Douglas Campbell: There are substantial costs even for doing a taxi survey. I broadly welcome anything that gives discretion to local licensing authorities, but there is a different test for private hire cars and I am not sure whether the costs of surveys would double if an authority decided to go down that route on the question of overprovision. I cannot release any figures on how much we spend—I am not aware at the moment what those figures are—but even a single survey of taxis would cost a substantial amount.

Measuring private hire cars is perhaps more difficult than measuring taxis; after all, you can measure taxis at ranks. I am not sure how you would establish overprovision of pre-booked cars. As far as the proposed legislation is concerned, that would also require an examination of demand.

I do not understand how the proposal would work in practice. With liquor licensing, there are clear licensing objectives that the legislation seeks to achieve, such as crime prevention, securing public safety, preventing public nuisance, and health. I am not sure whether overprovision, as opposed to unmet demand, necessarily sits well with taxis. It would be hard to say whether there were too many cars to take people home at the end of an evening.

The Convener: We are talking about demand. Ms Watson has described an approach in which the authority lets the market decide—even though you are paying for surveys and so on—and Mr Campbell has just referred to surveying demand. Local authorities survey residents quite a lot and in various ways. Would it be wise in those surveys of residents, whether they take place with citizens panels or whatever, to survey the general public on what they think about taxi and private hire car provision in their areas?

Tom Berney: That is a good point. Of course, I come here with a different remit from the other members of the panel, as I do not represent a local authority and I am not a taxi owner; we come from the point of view of the customer. I presume that, at the end of the day, the reason why you are tidying up the regulations is to make life better and safer for customers and the general public. I do not think that you can really do that unless you tell them what you have done and what you have achieved. One of the things that I was asking for—and I do not think that I am winning here—

The Convener: You’re nae losing, either, Mr Berney.

Tom Berney: If, in order to be licensed, drivers must have disability training, discrimination training, health training and so on, it would be helpful for the public to know that. I also think that it would be interesting to know whether taxi drivers must have that training but private hire car drivers do not. If that is the case, that is wrong. I think that anyone who is being paid to drive the public around ought to be properly qualified, and part of that qualification ought to be some training in how to deal with disabled people and so on.

The Convener: Mr Berney, I know that you have views on all of those things, and we will get to them. However, the specific question was: do you think that local authorities should be asking the public about demand in their area and whether the provision of taxis and private hire cars in their areas is enough?

Tom Berney: Yes, certainly. We are organising another series of meetings around the country. If you want, we can make that one of the issues that we discuss with our people.

The Convener: That would be extremely useful. We would be grateful for anything that you could feed back to us.

Douglas Campbell: Perhaps for the first time today, I will be brief. Bluntly, I think that it would be wise to survey the public. To put that in context, I should say that we carry out external surveys of taxis from time to time. Those surveys are quite detailed and thorough; ultimately, all of this is challengeable in the courts, so we tend to produce evidence that is robust.

Audrey Watson: In our submission, we mention a lot of the changes that West Lothian Council has brought in since 2009. In our 2008 survey, we got a very good response rate—more than 40 per cent, which is quite incredible. The biggest response was on disability issues, so the council decided to set up a consultative group with representatives from key stakeholders, and that is where our changes came from.

The biggest fault was the lack of disabled-accessible vehicles. Some people told us that they had had a very good response from the local operators that they used, but the vast majority of respondents said that there were not enough vehicles that were accessible to them. It is not only people with wheelchairs who need accessibility, but those who are hard of hearing or cannot see properly and people who need ramps and steps.

Drivers need to be trained as well, and we believe that it is important that the Government introduces such training for all drivers.

The Convener: What did your survey show with regard to demand? Did the results lead to any policy changes, or were your changes already in place?

Audrey Watson: The survey told us loud and clear that there were not enough accessible vehicles, so it was a no-brainer: our policy restricting the number of accessible vehicles that were licensed—and therefore the overall limit on taxis—had to go. Over the past five years, taxi numbers have stayed at almost the same level, but the number of private hire cars has gone down and the number of accessible vehicles has gone up.

The Convener: Thank you. That was extremely useful.

Willie Coffey: I want to take some advice from my local authority colleagues on the issue that I raised earlier of protecting the public. I used the example of a taxi driver who had moved from one authority to another, but the second authority did not know that a substantial number of complaints about the driver had been made to the first authority. How can we improve that situation to ensure that the public are protected?

Douglas Campbell: Our application forms ask whether applicants have applied to other authorities, which covers one aspect. Obviously, all applications are sent to Police Scotland, which will comment on them, and those comments can highlight convictions and non-conviction conduct that has not gone as far.

I appreciate the point that you have made. The situation might depend on the strength of the information that is available to the police, and ultimately on the presentation to the board. There will always be differences in the approach taken by any board of elected members, because the legislation entrusts them with discretion. Local authorities are certainly concerned about the issue that you have raised, but as I have said, we ask applicants whether they have applied to another authority and we take into account information from the police.

On a related point that was raised earlier, the board would not set aside the police letter. It would exercise discretion in deciding how much weight should be given to certain information that came before it.

Willie Coffey: If the person was intent on concealing and lying about his or her personal circumstances, how would the second authority find out? I am not talking about your particular authorities, but how would you know? Is one
Nevertheless, limousine companies that had

Douglas Campbell: I am not absolutely certain about that. The application form that asks that question is passed on to Police Scotland, which sometimes highlights that, for example, the applicant applied to Glasgow for a licence and was refused. That happens.

Audrey Watson: Our application forms say the same thing. It probably works fine for criminal matters, but if we are talking about low-level conduct, I am not entirely sure whether we would know that a driver had had problems in other areas short of their being suspended.

Willie Coffey: So an authority would not necessarily pass on to neighbouring authorities information that substantial complaints had been raised about a particular driver. They would not naturally share that information, would they?

Audrey Watson: I am not a data protection specialist, but I can see issues with that.

The Convener: Okay.

Do you welcome the removal of the contract exemption? What might the practical implications of that be? We have heard that some rural local authorities are concerned about the withdrawal of the exemption because the additional cost might cause some hire car operators to withdraw from the market and because there might be an adverse impact on councils’ procurement of transport to take children to school and older folk to lunch clubs or whatever, for example. Do you have a view on that, Mr Berney?

Tom Berney: No. I do not have a comment to make on that.

The Convener: Do you have a view, Mr Campbell?

Douglas Campbell: I am not involved in the procurement process, but I think that it is part of our standard framework that those who have contracts hold such licences anyway, so I do not know whether there would be any implications for Renfrewshire.

In broad terms, I welcome the proposal to remove the exemption, as I indicated in our consultation response. It is an enforcement lacuna because, unless a driver is monitored 24 hours a day—which cannot realistically be done—and they say that they take only one hire a day, that gives them a potential loophole. Ms Watson cites a couple of cases in her response, and I accept that there may be merit in an exemption in such cases, although I did not argue for that in our response. Nevertheless, limousine companies that had limousines with eight or fewer passenger seats could say, “You can’t license us.” It is an issue, and I think that there could be more control if the exemption were to be removed, as is proposed.

Audrey Watson: In my consultation response, I said that it would be quite difficult to identify the top end—the chauffeur-driven vehicles. How would Police Scotland know whether they were taking someone on a hire car journey? There would have to be some sort of signage, and that would have to differ from the private hire signage. As you have heard this morning, a lot of steps have been taken to ensure that the public know the difference between a taxi and a private hire car. In West Lothian and in Edinburgh there are door signs, but I do not imagine that the top end of the market would want that. However, if the top end did not have that signage, how would anyone identify what was the top end? What markers would there be? I worry about how that would work in practice. In England, private hire cars have plates in the boot that passengers can check to make sure that the vehicles are licensed, but I do not see how enforcement officers could check that.

The Convener: Okay. That is useful.

Do you share the Scottish Government’s view that services that are run by community groups or charities and that are not for profit should continue to be exempt from the licensing regime?

Tom Berney: I know that some local communities have been running their own services, and that worries me a bit because I would want to feel that the people who were doing that had had some testing before they were allowed to do it. It is one thing for me to say that I can give somebody a lift to the hospital occasionally, which I do, but it is another thing to run such a service. In some cases, those services are being used to cover up the lack of public transport, and that is a worry. I would prefer there to be some sort of testing for people who run those services, too.

The Convener: You think that community groups and charities that run services should be included in the licensing regime.

Tom Berney: I think so, although it could be a less-restrictive licensing regime. It worries me that someone could just start replacing the local bus service. I know a couple of people who are doing that down in Dumfries, and it is a bit worrying. I would want people to know that they had at least a public service vehicle operator licence or something and that they were properly qualified to run such a service.

Douglas Campbell: Coming at it from a regulation perspective, I take the protection of the public as a starting premise. I understand why the view that has been described would be held, but I do not feel that I can comment further on that.

Audrey Watson: I imagine that most hires would be covered by the Protection of Vulnerable Groups (Scotland) Act 2007, which protects people from the drivers. I am simply not aware of whether there have been issues with vehicles that are not in a good state of repair being used to take people around. We certainly would not want to be involved in licensing vehicles if they did not need to be licensed.

The Convener: Do you have any concerns about the operation of the licensing regime that are not being addressed in the bill?

Audrey Watson: On the checking of previous convictions, if someone is a taxi or private hire applicant no offences are spent unless they are offences that have been dealt with by alternatives to prosecution, which are the fixed penalties that were introduced a few years ago. I would like to see those not becoming spent for taxi and private hire car drivers, because we are seeing some fairly serious offences, such as violent disorder and drugs offences, being dealt with day and daily by ATPs. Some of them become spent immediately they are issued and some within three months. It means that, if the police want to bring forward a person’s entire history, they have to do what is known as a two-stage test. That can become quite legalistic and I do not think that it is necessary for members of committees to deal with that. They first have to say, “There is something that is not here that we want to tell you about. Will you let us tell you about it?” Then they need to say what it is if it passes that test. If someone wants to transport the public, their whole record should be before the committee so that it can decide whether they are a fit and proper person. A lot of the offences that I have concerns about are drugs offences.

Douglas Campbell: I echo Ms Watson’s thoughts. The two-stage test becomes quite complicated when we get into different regimes, because there are exclusions and exceptions in relation to drivers of private hire and taxi vehicles. As I understand it, that can in effect disable boards from looking at offences that have become spent, either immediately for fiscal warnings or after three months in the case of fiscal fines.

The Convener: We have heard concerns about companies such as Uber and Hailo entering the market. Do you have concerns on those fronts and, if so, what are they?

Tom Berney: I am sorry. I did not catch the question.

The Convener: I was asking about Uber and Hailo, the app companies that we were talking about earlier. Do you have any concerns about them entering the market?

Tom Berney: As I said at the beginning, I have an app on my phone, like most people do, and I can contact the local taxi company. That is relatively secure. The worry is about the possible explosion in the market that Dr Cooper described. If there are a few local companies, people can get to know their reputation, but if there is a complete free-for-all with dozens of companies and people are not sure who they are getting, that could be worrying. Dr Cooper’s paper outlined the difficulty of keeping track of that type of thing, but it is important that the local authority takes a grip of the situation to ensure that anyone who provides a service is a properly qualified driver. I can see the problems involved in that. If someone picks up their phone and dials a number to get a car, how do they know? As I said, the important thing will be to let the public know what the situation is with those companies.

Douglas Campbell: There is widespread concern about the points that Dr Cooper raised; he certainly raised considerable concerns. All that I would add to those concerns—Dr Cooper is probably best placed to speak about them in detail, given his knowledge of the technology and his specialism—is that we have level 2 fines in civic government where offences are committed by people not having licences and so on, whereas there are level 5 fines for liquor licensing. Perhaps, at some point, the levels of those penalties might be looked at.

Audrey Watson: I was interested in what members of the previous panel said about booking office licences. Mr Campbell and I had a quick look at the legislation when we were sitting in the public gallery. As far as we could see, the evidence that you heard was not correct. Firms do not need to be licensed in their area to have a booking office. We have a booking office that operates vehicles from the Falkirk area, which is licensed in West Lothian. There is nothing to say that the booking office, the vehicles and our drivers have to be connected.

Most people in the cities work for one of the big companies, but that is simply not the case outwith the cities. Lots of people there are self-employed, they might have their own vehicles and they might not be involved with any booking office at all. As far as I can see, it may not be the case that Uber would need booking office licences. If someone had a booking office in England, I do not think that they would need a licence. That should be tightened up immediately.
The Convener: That is extremely useful information.

Tom Berney: Regarding the situation that Dr Cooper described, I am worried that, given how the internet works, I could launch a website tomorrow, for instance, inviting people to put forward their names to be drivers. They could put their names on my website, someone would consult the site and the job would go to one or other of the drivers. How can it be ensured that such things are properly regulated, rather than our just having that kind of random system, to which the internet lends itself? That is the type of thing that Dr Cooper described as being difficult to control.

Douglas Campbell: I am not quite sure on this point. I take Ms Watson's points entirely. We had a discussion, and I agree with what she said. However, I am not sure how things would work if the office was outwith Scotland altogether. That might be theoretically possible, although it must be relevant vehicles that are registered at booking offices, so it is perhaps less likely that they would be registered in England.

In Renfrewshire, we have a local condition, in addition to the mandatory conditions, regarding booking offices. It states:

“The holder of a taxi licence shall not have installed in his taxi a two way radio or similar device the base of operation or control point of which is situated outwith the boundary of Renfrewshire Council.”

That was introduced when the booking office regime came in. It may be that, given that there are other mandatory conditions for booking offices, such measures could be considered.

Audrey Watson: That would be an excellent idea. My issue is that we do not have a condition like that. I am not satisfied that that is a reasonable condition that would stand up to scrutiny in the appeal court. However, if such a condition was in the guidance, it certainly would.

Things have moved on very quickly, as Dr Cooper said earlier. The mandatory and other conditions and the guidance all need to be scrutinised to ensure that they are completely up to date.

The Convener: There are no further questions from members. Thank you very much for your evidence.

[The Convener opened the meeting at 10:00]

Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener (Kevin Stewart): Good morning and welcome to the fourth meeting in 2015 of the Local Government and Regeneration Committee. I ask everyone present to switch off mobile phones and other electronic equipment, as they affect the broadcasting system. Because we provide papers in digital format, some committee members might consult tablets during the meeting.

Agenda item 1 is our seventh oral evidence session on the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. Today we will take evidence from the British Transport Police and Police Scotland on the provisions on scrap metal dealing, alcohol licensing, taxi and private hire car licensing and sexual entertainment venue licensing. Before we start, I should point out to the witnesses that they do not need to press the buttons on their microphones as they will be operated by the sound engineer.

We will start the session with questions on scrap metal dealing. As the British Transport Police witnesses will take the lead on that, we should direct our questions to them. Once we have exhausted those questions, they will step down from the table and we will continue the rest of the session with Police Scotland.

I welcome from the British Transport Police Chief Superintendent John McBride, divisional commander for Scotland, and Superintendent Alison Evans, national metal theft task force; and from Police Scotland Assistant Chief Constable Nelson Telfer, head of policing, west of Scotland, and Chief Inspector Morag Stewart, liquor and civic licensing policy. Chief Superintendent McBride and Superintendent Evans, do you wish to make any opening remarks on the scrap metal provisions in the bill?

Superintendent Alison Evans (British Transport Police): Yes, convener. I will provide evidence on the activity that has been undertaken in England and Wales.

The Scrap Metal Dealers Act 2013 came into force in December 2013 as part of a suite of measures that we have undertaken on metal theft, the aim of which is to make metal harder to steal. That involves putting protections in place and trying to work with industries to ensure that we make metal as safe as possible, either by marking it or by increasing and enhancing the protection around it. Our other aim is to make it easier to catch offenders, so we have taken enforcement measures as part of the task force, and we are ensuring that activity is joined up between the Home Office forces, the BTP and, importantly, other agencies such as the Environment Agency and local authorities, which have a huge part to play.

It is important to put the Scrap Metal Dealers Act 2013 in that context and to see it in the round as part of that activity. The legislation was hugely important, and it has been very necessary and very helpful, but it forms only part of the activity that has been undertaken.

The results speak for themselves. In 2012-13, England and Wales saw an overall 43 per cent reduction in metal theft. That figure is for all types of metal theft including theft of power cables, media cables, lead from church roofs and catalytic converters. We need to talk about the metal that is stolen in the round and ensure that we do not think about metal theft just in terms of the cable with which it is usually associated.

That reduction was matched in the BTP figures; in 2013-14, the BTP saw a further reduction of 36 per cent. We do not have the overall figures for England and Wales for 2013-14. Although they are due to be published imminently, unfortunately I have not had foresight of them, but we have been told anecdotally by the forces that we are working with that, over the year, they have seen a similar reduction. Therefore, in the round—and certainly for the BTP—we are looking at an 80 per cent reduction.

Although one might expect that there is no way that such decreases can continue, we have seen in the period since April 2014 another reduction of 48 per cent in both live and non-live crimes. By live crimes, I mean the theft of cable that affects the running of the railway. For example, the theft of the cable that is part of the signalling equipment can stop trains running.

There are also thefts from depots and from line side that do not necessarily affect the running of the railway but which still have a huge impact on and financial cost to Network Rail. Although I cannot say that the figures that I have mentioned are completely reflected in England and Wales as a whole, the effects of the Scrap Metal Dealers Act 2013, particularly the cash ban and the licensing requirements, are indicative of its success.

We have worked closely with the Local Government Association and individual local
The Convener: Does Police Scotland have anything to add?

Assistant Chief Constable Nelson Telfer (Police Scotland): Not at this point, convener.

The Convener: We will move on to questions. The committee has heard a fair amount of evidence about the impact of metal thefts. I am looking at a press report from the Hamilton Advertiser about thefts from Aitkenhead farm, Tannochside, of 200m of cable carrying 11,000 volts. It is quite unbelievable to think that folks would risk life and limb for that, but that sort of thing seems to be quite commonplace. Incidents galore have been listed, and we know that there have been major impacts on the railways over the piece.

The police submissions suggest that a national register of metal dealers be created. Why do you think that there should be such a register?

Chief Superintendent McBride: A national register would be really helpful from a number of points of view. For a start, it would certainly help members of the public who are looking to dispose of household waste metal if they were able to identify recognised, bona fide scrap metal dealers.

From an enforcement point of view, there are good opportunities for sharing information and intelligence among a number of law enforcement agencies that have jurisdiction over this issue. It would be really useful if we, SEPA and local authorities—which have some locus in this—could share information on a business-by-business basis when we visit scrap metal dealers, and it would also be very useful to have clarity and visibility around who has registration and licensing in which local authority areas, not just for scrap metal dealers but for itinerant mobile collectors.

The Convener: Does Police Scotland have a view on the national register?

Assistant Chief Constable Telfer: We support Chief Superintendent McBride’s comments about regulation and the sharing of information and intelligence. We would welcome that, and we support our colleague’s position on it.

The Convener: You mentioned itinerant dealers, Chief Superintendent McBride. The committee has heard about waste dealers who deal in smaller amounts of metal. How do we deal with those folks and ensure that they stay within the law? We have heard from others that that might be much more difficult to police.

Chief Superintendent McBride: Something that would strengthen regulation would be a definition of dealers, which should include those who buy or sell. Such a mechanism would allow us to catch a number of itinerant or mobile collectors within the legislation. From operations... that have been carried out in Scotland—the experience will be very similar in England and Wales—we have found that, although itinerant and mobile collectors do a social good in uplifting scrap metal, there is considerable evidence that an element of them steal metal. Of course, that gets into the chain of being sold to unscrupulous dealers and, as a result, harm is done to local communities. There is, for example, evidence of garden furniture and trampolines being taken out of gardens.

There has been a proliferation of metal collectors, because the value of metal has been such that stealing it has become a good, low-risk, high-reward crime to get involved in. If the legislation as the committee scrutinises it could be strengthened to include itinerant and mobile collectors, that would be really valuable, because it would prevent a fairly significant section of this industry from sitting outwith the legislation.

The Convener: How have itinerant dealers been dealt with in England and Wales?

Superintendent Evans: Each mobile collector is required to have a licence for the local authority area in which they collect, and there has been some discussion about the display of those licences. Mobile collectors have said, “If we collect in several areas, how are we meant to display the licences? We would have licences all over our window and it wouldn’t be safe.” That is a slightly ridiculous argument, because they are required to display the licence only for the area in which they are collecting at that time.

Some local authorities have gone down the photographic route. That has been really helpful, as it means that people cannot swap their licences with other people. It also gives the public great reassurance. If the licence is on display, the public can check whether the person who comes to their door asking for metal is genuine and legitimate.

Displaying licences also makes our life easier when we do road-side stops, because we can see immediately that the person has one. We can check their records, and if they are keeping the appropriate records, they can go on their way. We make sure that we focus our activity on the people who are totally contravening the law or who might also be contravening environmental legislation. We are working with partners on the road-side operations that Mr McBride has described to ensure that we have all the parties at the table and that if someone is not keeping appropriate records we can seize loads or whatever as necessary.

Cameron Buchanan (Lothian) (Con): Good morning. Your submissions say that you are interested in a national register, a requirement to display identification and the banning of cash payments. Will those things help a lot? Some witnesses have highlighted the problem that someone could just get a cheque instead and then go next door to cash it.

Chief Superintendent McBride: There is no doubt that the availability of cash in the industry leads—if I can put it this way—to poor business practice. Given the good evidence that we have of industry scams that are probably driven by the availability of cash, I support the prohibition suggested in the bill, as it will take away some of that temptation.

A more important point is that the availability of cash in some ways greases the wheels of criminality. It does not allow for any traceability in transactions, and where record keeping is poor or is designed to wrong-foot investigations, it provides anonymity. Those two things ease criminality, and it would be useful if we could prohibit the use of cash by introducing a mechanism that allowed some traceability, either through non-transferable cheques or electronic payments.

Cameron Buchanan’s point is very well made: people might very well go to a cheque-cashing outlet to cash a cheque. However, that takes us into the area of money service bureaux and businesses, and that brings with it a considerable amount of regulation from HMRC and the know your customer checks, in which identification is required to create that kind of relationship. In some ways, the know your customer regulations and requirements are much more stringent than anything we have ever seen for registration and record keeping in the scrap metal dealing industry. I fully support a prohibition on the use of cash to buy or sell scrap metal.

Assistant Chief Constable Telfer: I emphasise our full support for our BTP colleagues and their position. I have nothing further to add.

Cameron Buchanan: You are keen on photographic ID, which I would have thought should be essential. As far as the display of licences is concerned, I believe that you said that only the licence for a particular area requires to be displayed.

Chief Superintendent McBride: That is right.

Superintendent Evans: Yes.

Clare Adamson (Central Scotland) (SNP): Chief Superintendent McBride, you talked about tightening up the definition. The phrase you used was someone who “buys or sells”. Should that become “buys and sells”? I am conscious that there might be a point at which an ordinary householder would be required to have a licence if they were just selling.
Chief Superintendent McBride: I worded that carefully, because it is intended to capture everyone who is involved. We talked about itinerants and mobile collectors, who do not always buy on the doorstep; they may be given things. It is important that it is not “buy and sell”, because such people do not always buy; it could create a loophole in the legislation for people who are of a mind to step around it.

Clare Adamson: At what point would a householder who is selling trampolines or used garden furniture require a licence? Would it be based on the sales at a particular time, the value of the sales or what?

Chief Superintendent McBride: I see what you mean: your question is just about householders. There are provisions in England and Wales that cater for that and I do not think that anything suggested in the bill would make us any different in that regard.

The Convener: Ms Adamson is trying to make the point that sometimes in our lives we might get rid of excess, whatever it might be. Do the England and Wales provisions have something about the regularity of the buying and selling being the thing that requires a licence, or if we sold a bit of garden furniture or whatever as a one-off, would we suddenly find ourselves in breach of the law?

Superintendent Evans: The England and Wales 2013 act talks about someone “carrying on business as a scrap metal dealer” who, in their role in that business, buys or sells. Therefore, it would exclude me or you selling something as a one-off or irregularly. There is a business proposition, if you like. We would like the bill to say “buy or sell” so that it includes the mobile collectors who do not buy but definitely sell.

Chief Inspector Morag Stewart (Police Scotland): If the records are kept better and we are allowed the power of entry and inspection, we will be able to ascertain whether somebody who does not have a licence is going quite frequently to a scrap dealer and we will be able to address that. That would deal with that element as well.

The Convener: As it stands, the bill says:

“This section applies where a metal dealer or an itinerant metal dealer (‘the dealer’), in the course of the dealer’s business—

(a) acquires any metal (whether or not for value), or

(b) processes or disposes of any metal (by any means).”

Is that similar to the English and Welsh legislation?

Superintendent Evans: Yes.

John Wilson (Central Scotland) (Ind): Good morning. My first question is for you, Superintendent Evans. Earlier you said that, in England and Wales, mobile itinerant collectors are registered in every local authority in which they operate. Is that correct?

Superintendent Evans: That is right, yes.

John Wilson: As I understand it, under the current legislation in Scotland, they need to be registered in only one local authority area but can collect in other parts of Scotland. Do Police Scotland or the British Transport Police have any comments on whether it would be appropriate to introduce a national licensing regime to ensure that any itinerant mobile collector is covered? That ties into the convener’s question about a national licensing regime. As has been asked previously, if someone who is licensed in Glasgow is stopped in the Highlands, how would their licence be checked out?

Superintendent Evans: If you had a national or Scottish register, anybody who stopped somebody with a licence from Glasgow in the Highlands would be able to check the register to ensure that the licence was legitimate.

Chief Inspector Stewart: The situation is similar to the way in which the pedlar’s certificate operates. Although the police issue that certificate, pedlars are allowed to operate throughout Scotland. In England, they are licensed on a local authority basis, which might keep tighter control of them.

John Wilson: I ask for clarification, Chief Inspector Stewart. At present, the police in Scotland issue pedlars’ licences. Is that correct?

Chief Inspector Stewart: Yes.

John Wilson: Have there been any discussions with Police Scotland about issuing the itinerant mobile collectors licence?

Chief Inspector Stewart: No, the local authority would issue that licence.

John Wilson: I am just trying to work out why the police would issue pedlars’ licences and not the other ones.

Chief Inspector Stewart: A pedlar’s licence is given for the sale of goods and wares whereas a metal dealers licence is specific to a dealer in metal as opposed to other ancillary items.

John Wilson: So you already have a national register for pedlars in Scotland.

Chief Inspector Stewart: We have records of those who have been issued with licences.

John Wilson: Thank you.

Scrap metal dealers have told us that if we cut out the ability to pay cash for scrap, there might be an increase in fly-tipping. However,
Superintendent Evans said that the BTP had not seen any relationship between the introduction of the new legislation in England and Wales and levels of fly-tipping.

Superintendent Evans: When we worked with local authorities and the Home Office to draft the 2013 act, we did not even think that that might be an issue, as far as I am aware.

It is good that the issue has been raised here and that you are considering it—it is something that we need to take back. However, in talking to individual local authorities and national bodies—the Local Government Association and the Environment Agency—nothing has been raised at all to suggest that that has occurred. However, I am happy to take the issue back and to ask those questions, and I will perhaps submit written evidence to the committee if that would be helpful.

The Convener: That would be extremely useful, if possible.

Willie Coffey (Kilmarnock and Irvine Valley) (SNP): I want to ask about how well the cash ban has been working in England and Wales. I presume that cash transactions are now criminalised in England and Wales. Is there any evidence from data gathering on criminal activity to show how that is proceeding? It might be a wee bit naive to think that no cash transactions are taking place because of the legislation down there. How has that panned out? Have there been any prosecutions in relation to cash transactions?

Superintendent Evans: Yes, there have been prosecutions in various parts of the country for dealing in cash, not keeping appropriate records and not checking people’s identification. Therefore, all parts of the legislation have been enforced. Part of our work has involved educating the judiciary on how important the cash ban is, so that those who have contravened it have had more serious fines, although we have not had any imprisonment sentences. The fines for contravention have ranged up to £1,000.

Willie Coffey: Has that made the biggest contribution to the impressive reduction in the number of metal thefts?

Superintendent Evans: It has removed the ability of low-level offenders to process metal with no risk and to get an immediate reward. That was what was so easy for them previously. Metal is relatively untraceable and is prevalent in our communities, so it is difficult to make it much harder to steal. Therefore, we had to think of another approach. Our approach has been to look at the middleman and to get the co-operation of the scrap metal dealers to make those enhanced checks. Through the identification checks, the dealers are almost policing the issue themselves. We had to get the legitimate industry on board, and to do that we had to show it that we will take enforcement activity against those who contravene the law.

Our thinking is that, as legislation has been introduced, we really have to show the legitimate industry that we are doing something and taking out the bad guys, because otherwise the legitimate industry will not have any faith in us and will not keep giving us intelligence. We do not have that many resources, so we have to focus them on the people who are taking stolen metal through the dealers. The cash ban is hugely important, therefore, because it takes out that immediate realisation and puts another step in the way. It also gives us another way of identifying people who hand in stolen metal. It creates another hoop that people have to jump through before they have cash in their hand for metal.

Chief Superintendent McBride: It might be helpful to share the fact that when a cash ban was introduced in France, the evidence was that the level playing field between those who operate legitimately and within the law and those who operate outwith it meant that reporting from within the industry in France increased, which allowed the police to target those who were operating outwith the law. The experience has been similar in England and Wales, where competitors, through their intelligence networks in the industry, have been reporting instances of people not operating within the law. We expect a similar experience here if the bill becomes law.

Willie Coffey: I have a question for the British Transport Police and Police Scotland on the requirement to keep metal on site for 48 hours. Both organisations have said that they would prefer to retain the requirement, but we have heard in previous evidence sessions that the police are perhaps not always able to investigate metal theft within 48 hours. Will you give us your advice on that?

Chief Superintendent McBride: Our minimum standards of investigation have been written up by BTP and shared in England and Wales and with our colleagues in Police Scotland. When there is a metal theft attack on the railway, part of our minimum standard is to visit the three closest scrap metal dealers, to look for the stolen metal. The 48-hour requirement would be very helpful to us in such cases.

In reality, the BTP understand the pressures on the industry. It is heavily regulated by SEPA—and rightly so, to prevent environmental pollution—and there is no doubt that the longer that metals are left on the ground, the greater the danger of soil pollution, so I understand that pressure. I also understand the pressure on throughput and that keeping stacks of metal for 48 hours might be problematic for the industry. From an investigative point of view, the retention period would be helpful, but I understand the business considerations and environmental impacts that it might have.

Assistant Chief Constable Telfer: I would echo those comments. I understand that in lesser cases, in which scrap metal is going through dealers, we do not get there in 48 hours, but such is the gravity of some theft cases now and the volume of metal involved that we take those cases seriously and expedite their investigation. We are suggesting that we keep the 48-hour retention period, which provides a good balance between our approach to investigating the more serious metal thefts and the business concerns that John McBride has just highlighted. We support keeping the 48-hour requirement.

Willie Coffey: The bill proposes a requirement to improve record keeping. Would that be any compensation if we were to lose the 48-hour requirement? Would you prefer to keep the 48-hour requirement?

Assistant Chief Constable Telfer: In the most grave cases of metal theft, it is beneficial for us to retain the best evidence, and the 48-hour window of opportunity is particularly beneficial in getting that evidence. To do away with it would be to do away with our opportunity to gain the best evidence and to recover stolen property.

Chief Superintendent McBride: There is a balance to be struck. If the bill becomes an act, there will be new provisions requiring better record keeping and identification, which will help to reduce anonymity. If the ban on cash transactions is enacted, it would improve the traceability of suspects.

I agree with Mr Telfer about the best evidence. If you have been in a scrap metal dealer’s, especially one of the bigger ones, you will know that the reality is that there is metal all over the place. We would need some fairly good processes that the dealers signed up to to keep the 48-hour stock—which they obviously want to keep moving—in such a way that when we go in looking for any stolen metals after a crime has occurred, it is fairly clear to us where it will be.

I am trying to say that there are several ways in which they could get round the issue by not having the 48-hour stock in the 48-hour pile where we might expect to see it. It is all a balance.

Alex Rowley (Cowdenbeath) (Lab): It is about trying to strike that balance. I appreciate what you say about best evidence, but how often do the police use the power? The scrap dealers who came to give evidence, particularly the larger ones, were saying that it was very difficult for them to keep metal for 48 hours. As you say, their processes involve moving stuff on. Will the other provisions that are being put in place, around cash, record keeping, photo ID and so on, not compensate for losing the 48-hour requirement?

Where is the balance? Do you feel strongly about the matter or, although you might not get the best evidence, can you agree to it if all the other procedures are put in place?

Chief Superintendent McBride: It is difficult, because there is the business need, which we have talked about, the environmental need, which SEPA would certainly and rightly be concerned about, and the need for best evidence in investigations. If the metal is there and we can find and identify it, given some of the challenges that Alison Evans outlined, that would definitely be the best evidence, which would help us. Some of the safeguards that might come into being as the bill progresses might help us as well, and they might offer a compromise.

The Convener: Superintendent Evans, there is no 48-hour requirement in England and Wales. How does that work there? Is the fact that you do not have it in place an impediment?

Superintendent Evans: In an ideal world, we as enforcement agencies would have everything in place that we possibly could. The 48-hour rule would help considerably. We do not know how much our not having it impedes us, because we do not have it. The BTP’s minimum standard is to get to the closest three scrap metal dealers within 24 hours. Each provision that is put in place is a step towards improving the traceability of stolen metal. The requirement for 48-hour retention is another step that would assist us. However, we have consideration for BMRA colleagues, so we recognise that it could prove very onerous for some of the smaller operators to have to comply with that as well as with the Environment Agency requirements that are placed upon them. We understand the business objections. However, in our world, we would prefer to have as much assistance as possible to trace the metal.

The Convener: What is Police Scotland’s view?

Chief Inspector Stewart: Given the gravity of some of the incidents of metal theft, the time when it is reported, the multiple locations involved, and the need to identify what dealers the metal has been taken to—they can cover the whole of Scotland—I suggest that 48 hours is a minimum to allow enforcement agencies to make any positive inquiry. If we did not have that, it would certainly impede any investigation. People will not necessarily go to the nearest scrap metal dealer to process the metal. The thefts could come from multiple locations—we do not know. The investigations take time. The removal of the 48-hour provision could be significant.

The Convener: Alex, do you want to come back in?

Alex Rowley: The trade is quite concerned about the 48 hours, particularly the larger dealers. Their view is that there is no practical benefit and that record keeping can be just as effective. Would you dispute that?

Chief Inspector Stewart: I can understand where they are coming from, but it would be effective only if the record keeping is up to standard and the dealers are checking identification. As I have said, there are difficulties for any police inquiry, from when the incidents occur to locating the stolen items. Having 48 hours to identify where the metal is is not a long time for the police. Beyond that, the metal is gone and it is easily disposed of. If the records have not been kept and there is no closed-circuit television, that makes it even more difficult for us to trace it. In my opinion, the requirement provides a compromise between allowing the enforcement agency time at least to try to make inquiries and start an investigation and considering how long dealers can keep the metal and comply with SEPA’s requirements.

Clare Adamson: Like my colleague Willie Coffey, I was impressed by the figures that you quoted on the reductions in England and Wales. As well as the licensing legislation there, there is also a considerable amount of work with different industries. Have you seen similar reductions in heritage thefts? Is the work that you do with the industry paralleled in Scotland at the moment?

Superintendent Evans: We work very closely with English Heritage and Ecclesiastical Insurance, which is the main insurer for churches and which looks at the theft of lead from church roofs. We get evidence from a variety of sources about the increase or decrease in thefts.

English Heritage will tell us that it has seen an incremental decrease in such thefts, and the number of claims that Ecclesiastical Insurance has had from churches for the theft of lead from their roofs has decreased between 2011 and 2014—the period of the task force—by around £2 million to £3 million. We can definitely say that we are seeing the decrease not only in the rail networks and the power networks, and in stories in the media; we see it across the piece. The only gap is around the theft of catalytic converters, which is probably a side issue in relation to what we are discussing today.

Cameron Buchanan: On the issue of the 48-hour period, a scrap metal dealer we visited said that it would be quite easy to hide some of the stolen metal and just give up a bit of it. However, they were not keen on storing metal, because it takes up valuable space. Would anyone like to comment on that?

Chief Superintendent McBride: Those points are true. I have been in a number of scrap metal dealerships and I understand the challenges that they face in relation to the storage of material.

I imagine that, as the industry’s representative body, the BMRA might have raised the other point. The BMRA would suggest that the proportion of processed materials that are stolen is incredibly small when you consider all the recycling that is done in the industry. It would make a perfectly valid argument that 99 per cent of its processed material is legitimate and is not stolen and that having to store it would impose disproportionate burdens on its members. It is hard to argue against that.

With regard to some of the evidence that the committee has received on some of the more major or more impactive metal thefts—when hospitals have had their power cut, tens of thousands of houses have had their electricity supply affected and so on—those are the cases in relation to which it is critical that we are able to get into the yards around the locus of the crime and further afield to find the metal and take the inquiry forward. That is when the pressure is on us.

The Convener: Does Police Scotland have anything to add to that?

Chief Inspector Stewart: As previously articulated, the only other way around the concern about the 48-hour period would be to further tighten the bureaucracy involved. However, I would be concerned about the removal of the time period, given the time required to undertake a police inquiry, particularly in significant situations in which the metal will be moved on quickly.

The Convener: I thank the representatives of the British Transport Police for giving evidence today. We will continue to take evidence from Police Scotland in relation to other aspects of the bill after a short suspension.

Meeting suspended.

10:46

On resuming—

The Convener: We continue the session with Police Scotland, focusing on alcohol licensing, taxi and private hire licensing and sexual entertainment venue licensing. I intend to deal with this section by section, beginning with alcohol licensing.
Assistant Chief Constable Telfer: Thank you for the opportunity to present evidence to the committee today. I will deal with alcohol licensing first. As the committee is aware, the purpose of licensing and regulation is to maintain standards and control activities that have the potential to be harmful. An effective licensing regime provides safeguards, promotes public safety and reduces the risk of criminality. It also reduces the risk of those who are linked with serious and organised crime being able to exploit legitimate enterprises. That is an important aspect of licensing.

The cost to society from poorly managed licensed activity, ranging from the sale and supply of alcohol through to the theft of metal as we have been discussing, should not be underestimated. It can place undue burdens on both the public and private sectors.

Recent case law, such as Brightcrew Ltd v City of Glasgow Licensing Board, which I am sure that we will cover, has frustrated the ability of both the police and local authorities to tackle issues that are not directly linked to the sale and supply of alcohol in licensed premises. The regulation and management of licensing is a key priority for Police Scotland. It is pivotal to our prevention and intervention strategy. We welcome the proposals in the bill that seek to enhance the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 and the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982, which will enable us to tackle the impact of licensing within our communities and to keep people safe.

There are key elements in relation to part 2 of the bill, which seeks to improve regulation pertaining to the sale and supply of alcohol, but I will skip over those just now.

It is estimated that the excessive consumption of alcohol costs the Scottish economy about £3.6 billion per annum. That figure includes costs incurred by the police, the Scottish Ambulance Service, the national health service and social work services, to name just a few. In times of budgetary constraints, it is of real concern that the public purse and the Scottish economy suffer such detriment as a result of the misuse of alcohol. Many factors, such as availability, accessibility and cultural attitudes, underpin our poor relationship with alcohol. I am sure that we will discuss those.

The bill outlines proposals to assist licensing boards in identifying areas of overprovision. It includes a provision to include a whole board area as a single locality and for terminal hours to be considered as part of a board’s determination. However, one of the main aspects for Police Scotland is the irresponsible sale and supply of alcohol being a contributory factor to other crime. Daily, my officers encounter incidents of violence, disorder, antisocial behaviour and domestic abuse that are often linked to the overconsumption and sale of alcohol. From a national perspective, 23.2 per cent of young people who engaged in rowdy and disorderly conduct had consumed alcohol. I have some stark additional figures on that, which we could discuss later if members wish.

There is a particular problem regarding children and young people. As the committee is aware, alcohol is an age-restricted product. It is often supplied to children and young people through agent or proxy purchase by unscrupulous adults. Drinking dens and alcohol-related youth disorder remain a big concern for local communities. Alcohol consumption by children and young people has an exponential impact on their health, educational attainment and future employability. It is imperative that we have the ability to address youth drinking and its results.

Under current provisions, the licensing objectives refer only to keeping children safe. We welcome the extension to include young persons. That will provide clarity to licensing boards and enforcement agencies around the sale of alcohol to young persons in relation to reporting and the preparation of reviews.

As members are aware, there is a new offence of supply of alcohol to children and young persons. Currently, it is not illegal to supply alcohol to a child or young person. The new offence will allow us to take more robust measures to tackle the supply of alcohol to underage drinkers and will create a new offence of supplying alcohol to a young person or a child in a public place.

I move on to the fit-and-proper-person criteria and spent convictions. Briefly, provisions relating to those areas were removed from the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976. The bill proposes to reintroduce a fit-and-proper-person test in respect of licensing applications, transfers, renewals, reviews and revocation of licences. It also outlines a proposal to repeal section 129 of the 2005 act on spent convictions and foreign offences. That is a positive move, which will allow the police to supply details of spent convictions and foreign offences, thus providing greater information regarding individual conduct for consideration by licensing boards. We welcome those proposals, but it remains to be seen how they will operate in practice and how the proposed fit-and-proper-person test will correlate to the licensing objectives.

On part 2 of the bill, section 40A of the 2005 act provides that "a person is an interested party in relation to licensed premises if the person is not the holder of the premises licence nor the premises manager in respect of the premises but—

(a) has an interest in the premises as an owner or tenant, or
(b) has management and control over the premises or the business carried on on the premises."

Although section 40A has never been commenced and the bill sets out measures for its repeal, our position, having considered the matter, is that it would be advantageous to maintain and enact the legislation, which would afford greater opportunities for the police to identify and disrupt serious and organised crime's involvement in the licensed trade.

The Convener: That was pretty comprehensive. I move on to an area that has not yet been mentioned. The committee has heard concerns relating to club licences and occasional licences. Do you have any concerns about the current regime on such matters? Does that area need tightening in any way?

Chief Inspector Stewart: I am aware that occasional licences are often used to circumvent the need to obtain a personal entertainment licence for larger events. An occasional licence is relatively cheap—about £10—and can be used to operate music events and so on. Local authorities have expressed concern about the frequent use of occasional licences.

Occasional licences have also come to the fore in the context of serious and organised crime and terrorism, where an individual can obtain an occasional licence in order to fundraise for the particular faction that they support. However, that is based on intelligence and it is on-going work. Nevertheless, I appreciate that the main concern that may have been raised by the Society of Local Authority Lawyers and Administrators in Scotland was the abuse of the occasional licences and some anomalies with the clubs.

The Convener: Occasional licences are interesting for us, and we have not heard that before. Are you saying that they can be used by terrorist organisations to raise funds for what they are trying to do?

Chief Inspector Stewart: Yes. I would not say that such use is widespread and I do not want to raise any fear or alarm, but there have been occasions on which people with known links to organised crime have obtained an occasional licence under the pretext of a charity or fundraising event. Obviously, there is concern about that.

Assistant Chief Constable Telfer: To clarify, the terrorism that Morag Stewart mentioned is mainly domestic and relates to the terrorist groups that are normally affiliated with the Northern Ireland situation; as you are aware, they sometimes infiltrate the west of Scotland for fundraising events.

The Convener: That brings something new into the equation. It would be extremely useful for the committee to get some written examples of that—without compromising any on-going operations, obviously. More detail about that would be very useful for us.

We have heard from those in the licensed trade that they feel that the clubs’ uses of their licences and occasional licences allow them to get round the law that others have to comply with. Does Police Scotland agree with that and does it cause you difficulties?

Chief Inspector Stewart: That has not come to the fore with me.

Assistant Chief Constable Telfer: I am not aware of that, but I am happy to take it away and see whether I can provide further information.

Alex Rowley: I would like to come in on the question of overprovision. How could that be used for benefit? Some of the evidence that we have heard has suggested that a large supermarket could come along and locate in a certain area, and that the attraction of jobs means that it will not have any real problem in locating there and providing a massive alcohol outlet. Do the police have a view on overprovision in relation to off-licences, pubs and other outlets? How could the proposals on overprovision help?

Assistant Chief Constable Telfer: There is a balance to be struck. You mentioned the attraction of job opportunities, but that has to be balanced with current businesses that are in place. The example of a supermarket is a good one. At the planning stage, local authorities scrutinise thoroughly the additionality of a big supermarket and how it will impact on local businesses. Recently, I saw an example of a supermarket planning application being knocked back because of overprovision, in relation not only to alcohol but to other aspects of life.

It is important that overprovision is looked at in each local authority area, and I am glad that the whole local authority area will be taken into consideration in those terms, because the availability of alcohol needs to be regulated. The knock-on effect of alcohol being overly available is there for all to see; I could certainly substantiate that with some figures for offending behaviour and public health issues.

An important aspect for us is that premises where alcohol is available, whether they are off-licences or on-sales premises, should be regulated by each local authority. We are involved in those discussions.

Alex Rowley: Is there a trend? If we take underage drinking, for example, are supermarkets better regulated? Are corner shops the problem?
Are there other things that can be done, regardless of the legislation?

I remember a test purchasing operation in Fife. Young people went round visiting shops and if they were able to buy alcohol, the police were right there. Will legislation contribute to reducing the numbers of young people who are accessing alcohol, or are there other things that the police need to be doing?

Assistant Chief Constable Telfer: The legislation will certainly contribute. Any further safeguards that we can put in place are very welcome. We still carry out test purchasing operations, throughout local authority areas. I have tended to find that our off-sales are very compliant, and that there are few cases in which they have failed and have had to be reported to a licensing board.

Availability of or access to alcohol is a big issue for children and young persons. Access happens mainly through agent purchase or by proxy. The additional offence of supplying alcohol to children and young persons in public places is very welcome, because there has been a gap with regard to 16 and 17-year-olds. There has also been a gap when it comes to how we can address public space drinking dens and antisocial behaviour, because until now we have been able to seize alcohol only where an 18-year-old is supplying to younger people. The additional offence will assist us in addressing the public space aspect of the problem.

Unfortunately, accessibility to alcohol occurs in private spaces and dwellings, too. That will continue to be a problem for us with regard to children and young people being able to access alcohol within the home. Carers or parents have responsibility there. As things stand, if we come across something like that, we have to deal with it under the Children and Young People (Scotland) Act 2014, under provisions relating to neglect and so on.

The new legislation in relation to public space is very welcome, but there will still be issues in relation to private space.

Cara Hilton (Dunfermline) (Lab): I want to link into Alex Rowley’s question about overprovision. In your submission, you raise specific concerns about home delivery services. Can you outline your concerns about services that supply alcohol outside licensing hours? Is that a big or growing problem? Do you have any suggestions on how the law could be altered to better regulate such sales?

Chief Inspector Stewart: At present, alcohol that is purchased for home delivery must be purchased during normal off-sale hours. However, the alcohol can be delivered up to 12 o’clock at night and as early as 6 o’clock in the morning. In effect, that extends the period of time in which people have access to alcohol. It would be better if the sale, supply and purchase of alcohol in home deliveries were coterminous with current off-sales provision. That would mean that it would not be possible to have home deliveries after 10 o’clock at night or at 6 o’clock in the morning.

In addition, we are looking at the issue of home deliveries, particularly for those that are not licensed. There is scope and provision to tighten up the situation and make it coterminous with off-sale hours.

The Convener: Do you have anything to add, Mr Telfer?

Assistant Chief Constable Telfer: I would say only that dial-a-booze—as it is commonly known—is becoming a significant problem. I have just come from an operational environment, and in the division that I was covering there were a few instances involving such deliveries. Tightening the legislation around that would be very welcome.

The Convener: It is a new one on me.

Cara Hilton: It was a new one on me, too; that is why I asked the question.

John Wilson: To follow up Cara Hilton’s question, who is the supplier of alcohol after 10 o’clock at night and from 6 in the morning? I am aware of the issues that ACC Telfer raises to do with certain sales of alcohol. An issue that was raised in my local area is that, when you buy your curry carry-out, you can also order up a couple of bottles of the local brew that is consumed in Lanarkshire. Who is supplying alcohol from 10 o’clock at night to 12 o’clock and from 6 in the morning?

Chief Inspector Stewart: The legislation permits the delivery of alcohol at those times by those who have a licence. I anticipate that it would be supermarkets delivering weekly shopping along with whatever alcohol has been purchased, with the checks and balances in place to check identification. The situation in Lanarkshire that you referred to, of fast food accompanied by alcohol, would tend to involve premises that were not licensed to sell alcohol, which is what Mr Telfer was referring to. They are unlicensed, so they fall out of the scope of the legislation.

John Wilson: I was just asking for clarification. It is interesting that, if you go into a supermarket, you can buy alcohol only between 10 am and 10 pm, but you are saying that if someone makes an order and asks for it to be delivered after 10 pm, they can include alcohol in that order. It is useful to get that on the record.

Chief Inspector Stewart: The purchase has to be made within—
The issue of occasional licences came up earlier. I will not go into that discussion, but it raised the question of Police Scotland’s relationship with licensing boards in Scotland. Chief Inspector Stewart, you mentioned the intelligence that the police have on applications that are being made, and ACC Telfer referred to premises for which people apply for a licence but which belong to someone else or some other organisation. What is the feeling regarding the current relationship between licensing boards and the police? Are licensing boards taking full account of the information being provided by the police before they grant licences?

The Convener: Who will take a crack at that one first?

Assistant Chief Constable Telfer: I will certainly speak on that. I respectfully suggest that the relationship between Police Scotland and licensing boards has never been stronger. I say that having just come from a police division in Scotland. Licensing boards take full account of our observations and we are represented at each of their sittings.

I will bring my answer to a quick conclusion by saying that I am very heartened by the way in which things are moving on licensing. Aspects of the bill will add to that, but in my opinion relationships have never been stronger. I am sure that Morag Stewart can speak from a central perspective.

Chief Inspector Stewart: I concur with Mr Telfer. The relationship that Police Scotland has built with licensing boards continues to develop and grow. However, we must remember that licensing boards are a distinct legal entity.

John Wilson: In previous evidence sessions, the issue was raised of whether police intelligence could be presented to licensing boards and whether licensing boards would take account of it. We heard that some boards would take evidence-based decisions rather than intelligence-based decisions. What are your views on those issues? You gave the example of occasional licences, but most decisions on occasional licences would be intelligence-based, rather than evidence based.

Chief Inspector Stewart: It does not come down to poor relationships; it comes down to uncertainty in licensing boards about whether to use intelligence and risk legal action or a challenge to their decision. Discussions are taking place about what kind of intelligence can be used and the format and form of words, so that information rather than intelligence as such is presented. Some licensing boards are looking to establish the provenance of intelligence, such as whether it has come from a covert human intelligence source. A short-life working group has been set up, which includes the crime division, licensing clerks and solicitors and the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities. We hope to work through the issue and, together, come to an agreement about what intelligence can be used in submissions to licensing boards.

Clare Adamson: You mentioned that you welcome the additional crime of supplying alcohol to young people. However, we have heard evidence about the lack of enforcement of current legislation and the few prosecutions that have been made for selling alcohol to an intoxicated person. You mentioned all the social and crime problems relating to alcohol, of which we are all aware. Will you comment on how the legislation is used?

Chief Inspector Stewart: To clarify, are you talking about the selling of alcohol to intoxicated patrons within licensed premises?

Clare Adamson: Yes.

Chief Inspector Stewart: That is difficult to prove, and there is no definition of intoxication. It is difficult to ascertain who provided the alcohol and what stage the person was at when they came in. However, from a policing perspective, it comes down to further informing and training our officers on what their powers are, what they should look out for when they go into licensed premises, how to conduct an inspection and how to work with the trade. It is about awareness raising. However, there are difficulties to do with the definition of intoxication.

Assistant Chief Constable Telfer: To expand on Morag Stewart’s comments, another aspect is training and awareness raising in the licensing trade, on which we work quite furiously. That is the proactive aspect. However, the point that the member raises is an issue. The reactive aspect is that, if an incident that occurs in licensed premises appears to be the result of alcohol being sold to an intoxicated person, we will take the necessary executive action and bring that to the attention of the licensing board. Once we have established what has happened, we will take the necessary action. There is a proactive stage, which is about training our officers and those in the licensing trade, and there is the reactive stage, when unfortunate incidents occur.

Willie Coffey: What are your views on the fit-and-proper-person test? In your submission, you welcome it, but would you like it to be further defined and should there be guidelines? Who should determine what information is used in a fit-and-proper-person assessment?

Chief Inspector Stewart: I absolutely welcome the reintroduction of the fit-and-proper-person test, which will mirror provisions in the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982. In the 1982 act, the test is not defined or prescriptive, and that is the best approach. It is best left to whatever regulatory committee deals with the issue, whether that is liquor licensing or in the civic world, to determine what is fit and proper, based on previous convictions. That will be further enhanced, in that spent convictions will be able to be considered.

The only issue that I have is that the test will still be linked to the licensing objectives on the sale and supply of alcohol. It remains to be seen how that will work out.

11:15

The Convener: Mr Telfer, do you want to add to that?

Assistant Chief Constable Telfer: Although I agree with Morag Stewart’s point about difficulties that might occur because of the correlation with the licensing objectives, I think that the five licensing objectives probably cover all aspects of anything that might happen in licensed premises.

I reiterate that the reintroduction of the fit-and-proper-person test is very welcome and will assist us on a number of fronts, in relation to not only what actually happens in licensed premises but who has management and control of premises. There might well be links to serious and organised crime. That has been proven to be the case in the past. The approach in the bill will enable us to have an impact on that front.

Willie Coffey: Thank you.

The Convener: It says in my briefing:

“Police Scotland has called for the provisions requiring notification of ‘interested parties’ (those with a general commercial or other interest in the licence) to be retained. Witnesses could be asked to outline their concerns if this requirement is removed from the 2005 Act”.

Do you want to comment on that?

Chief Inspector Stewart: Section 40A of the 2005 act relates to interested parties, but the provision has never been commenced and would be repealed by the bill. We think that it would be advantageous to retain the provision. Quite often, an interested party is a tenant. When we look at issues on licensed premises, we are able to take action against the licence holder and designated premises manager—we know who they are—but if there is no provision that covers who the tenant is and the tenant’s involvement, there is not much that we can do to hold the tenant to account or check that they are a fit and proper individual. In the context of organised crime involvement in licensed premises, in particular, the repeal of the provision could impede our ability to tackle issues.

The Convener: What about the vicarious liability aspect, which might muddy the waters?

Chief Inspector Stewart: I appreciate that the definition of “interested party” is being amended, so that in the context of vicarious liability the interested party becomes the designated premises manager. Currently a designated premises manager has to have a personal licence, and it is the police who do the background checks and report back to licensing boards. I am quite content with the vicarious liability aspect.

Let me give an example of why we would want a tenant to be an interested party. A building’s owner might lease the building to a business, which would be the licence holder. The licence holder then leases the building to another person, the tenant, and puts in a designated premises manager—I know, it gets a bit confusing.

The Convener: You are explaining it very well.

Chief Inspector Stewart: The police are able to take action if the designated premises manager does not have control of his premises and there have been numerous incidents, and if the licence holder is culpable, they could be taken to a review. However, the tenant remains out of the scope of the action, because the section 40A provision has never been commenced. Quite often, the tenant could be linked to criminality, including serious and organised crime, or they might simply be involved in the poor management of the premises, but we cannot take further action in that regard. If section 40A is not enacted and is repealed, that could hinder progress in the area.

The Convener: Some folk have argued that there are difficulties in making a person liable for offences committed by their employees. What do you think about that?

Chief Inspector Stewart: A DPM does not have to be on the premises, so I understand the issue from a certain perspective, given that they will have vicarious responsibility, as an interested party, under the amended legislation. However, it is a DPM’s duty to make sure that everyone is fully trained. I do not have further comment to make on that.

The Convener: Do you want to add anything, ACC Telfer?

Assistant Chief Constable Telfer: I have nothing to add.

Cameron Buchanan: When the holder of a licence for a public house, for example, has his... licences taken away, can he get it back reasonably quickly? What happens to the premises if the licence is not in anybody's name? At the moment, a licence has to be in somebody's name, does it not?

Chief Inspector Stewart: They would not hold a licence. Under the 2005 act, the premises have a licence.

Cameron Buchanan: Is it not the person?

Chief Inspector Stewart: The person applies for the licence, but the licence would remain in perpetuity. It could be transferred over.

Cameron Buchanan: It could be transferred to another person without penalty.

Chief Inspector Stewart: Yes.

Assistant Chief Constable Telfer: There have been issues with transferring premises, as they may well fall into the hands of someone who is involved in serious and organised crime. There were practical examples of that in a major city, in which four pubs were closed after we cottoned on to that. There is a long, unwieldy process for transferring premises and it is a loophole that we are looking to close.

The Convener: We will move on to taxi and private car hire licensing. Do you have any opening remarks on that, Mr Telfer?

Assistant Chief Constable Telfer: You will be pleased to know that these remarks are very brief compared with my previous ones.

We welcome the proposals to improve training in respect of private hire car licences, which will undoubtedly improve standards and public safety and facilitate greater consistency. Police Scotland also welcomes proposals to remove exemptions that currently apply to vehicles that are being used for the carriage of passengers under a contract for exclusive hire for a period of not less than 24 hours. In our opinion, that will facilitate greater consistency in this business area and allow the police to provide comment and present information to the regulatory body, to ensure that the applicant is a fit and proper person, to further promote public safety and to act as a deterrent for those involved in serious crime.

The Convener: There are supposed to be quite big differences between the licensing of taxis and the licensing of private hire cars, but from the evidence that we heard it seems that some local authorities, including Aberdeen City Council, which covers my constituency, treat taxi and private hire car licensing in exactly the same manner, which does not follow what is written in the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982. Do the different regimes cause Police Scotland any difficulties in policing licensing across the country? It must be difficult for your officers, who are now working across local authority borders, to deal with different aspects in different places. Does that cause you trouble?

Chief Inspector Stewart: No. When a licence—whether for a taxi or a private hire car—is applied for, as consultee to the regulatory committee we will receive the application. We will scrutinise applications in the same way and report back. Are you referring to operational issues, out on the streets?

The Convener: I am talking about application and operation. In some places, private hire car licensing and its policing, by you or by the local authority, seem to be exactly same as taxi licensing and its policing, rather than there being the two regimes that most definitely exist in other places such as Edinburgh or Glasgow.

Chief Inspector Stewart: It does not present us with any difficulties. The same scrutiny is applied to any application, whether it be for a taxi or a private hire car. On operational matters, the difference between a taxi and private hire car is that a taxi can uplift somebody from the street.

Assistant Chief Constable Telfer: From a national perspective, greater consistency on the application of the regulations on both taxis and private hire cars would be welcome. I take your point, convener, and I understand the difficulties that there may be if licensing regulations are being applied differently in different parts of the country. We would welcome greater consistency across the country.

Willie Coffey: My question is related to yours, convener. At last week's committee meeting, I raised a case that had received some media coverage. A taxi driver moved from one authority to another and although the first authority received a string of complaints against him, those complaints were not made known to the second authority. What are your views on that, and how can we close down that problem?

Chief Inspector Stewart: I can understand how that has been a problem—it is perhaps down to communication between each policing or local authority area. However, we are developing a national information and communication technology licensing system called Inn Keeper, on which will be every licence, whether it is a premises licence for alcohol or a licence for a taxi or private hire car. The system will be available to every police officer in Scotland. When an application comes through, any details, such as those to which you refer, will be on the system, and the system will flag up those matters and inform the response to the relevant local authority.
Willie Coffey: Will the details include, for example, complaints against a person that might not have gone right through the process and therefore might not have been determined?

Chief Inspector Stewart: Yes, if the complaints have been received by the police. However, if a complaint has gone to a local authority, it is the authority that will hold the information. Therefore, it is down to the authority to communicate that to the police to investigate.

Assistant Chief Constable Telfer: On Inn Keeper, we are in dialogue with every local authority to establish whether they want to embrace that approach.

Willie Coffey made a point about complaints being made to local authorities. That is a big sales point for me: we need to share and record information that is disclosed to various agencies.

Willie Coffey: How soon do you expect the new software to be in place?

Chief Inspector Stewart: We hope that it will be in place between May and June.

Willie Coffey: Will every authority be able to feed into that?

Chief Inspector Stewart: Local authorities will send us applications, which we will check. We will keep that information. It is a police database. However, I am aware that a working group is looking at a single system for local authority licensing. It would be ideal if that could interface with our system, so that any request from a local authority could be sent directly to the system electronically. That would be a more comprehensive approach and would improve communications between the police and local authorities.

Willie Coffey: Good.

The Convener: Will Inn Keeper interact in any way with the police’s i6 software system, or is that beyond your ken?

Chief Inspector Stewart: I am not a technical person, but I believe that Inn Keeper can be bolted on to i6, which will be of considerable benefit. That will make us much more efficient when doing background checks and responding to local authorities.

The Convener: On the interaction between local authorities and the police, have you come across any data protection issues that have stopped the required level of communication and may even have led to criminality?

Chief Inspector Stewart: No, not that I am aware of. There are information-sharing protocols between the police and local authorities. In addition, the police are a statutory consultee for civic and liquor licensing. That exchange of information happens only when it is pertinent and applicable; we would not provide information on anything if it would be wrong to do so.

Assistant Chief Constable Telfer: I am certainly not aware of any instances where that has occurred.

Alex Rowley: In evidence, there have been mixed views about the number of unlicensed operators—those who just operate on the streets. One of the taxi operators said that, in our major cities and particularly at the weekends, a lot of such activity goes on. What is your view, and how do you police that activity?

Chief Inspector Stewart: Information is provided by legitimate taxi and private hire car operators. On a number of occasions, I have had dialogue with Glasgow TOA Taxi, a hackney taxi provider, in which it has raised that issue. It is about getting that intelligence and information so that we can proactively target that area for enforcement.

That would be in addition to the intelligence that police officers and our partners obtain, and I know that there have been a number of operations in conjunction with road policing to target individuals who purport to have private hire cars and who pick up individuals in the night-time economy, which is an area of particular risk.

Assistant Chief Constable Telfer: Alex Rowley is right that the issue of unlicensed operators, who operate mainly in the big cities at the weekends, has been on-going for a while. Targeting the area is built into every city centre policing plan for the weekend night-time economy. Our cops are well briefed on what to look out for and they make the necessary interventions when they suspect that an unlicensed operator is picking somebody up off the street.

Alex Rowley: My other question is about the proposal to give licensing authorities the ability to limit the number of private hire car licences in their area. We had a mixed response to that proposal. West Lothian licensing board said that it basically leaves the matter to supply and demand. It suggested that, at the end of the day, supply and demand would govern any decision. Is there a need for the proposed provision?

Assistant Chief Constable Telfer: In my opinion, taxis or private hire vehicles serve a purpose in keeping people safe at the weekend: they get the patrons of licensed premises and people who have gone out socialising home safely. The way that we operate taxi ranks and safe zones has been very beneficial and has reduced the number of victims of crime in the city centre. The question is difficult for me to answer, because I welcome the presence of taxis and private hire cars on our streets as they get people home safely, but I understand the balance: people have to make a living and the supply-and-demand issue must also come into play. I have probably not answered your question, other than to say that taxis and private hire vehicles are a good resource for us as they help to keep people safe at the weekend.

Chief Inspector Stewart: I agree. However, it is entirely up to the local authority. It would be quite hard to determine a limit, although limits can be imposed on taxi licences.

Clare Adamson: I return to your point about information sharing and the local authority working group. I want to get an idea of the scope of that work. Obviously, given that, with Police Scotland, there is now one policing body, it is easy for you to cover the whole of Scotland. Would COSLA be involved in the working group? To be 100 per cent effective, the 32 local authorities would need to sign up. Is there any indication of the buy-in to the process?

Chief Inspector Stewart: The short-life working group is still very much in its infancy. There was one meeting last year—the next is its first since then. We want to try to get a bit more momentum behind it. We appreciate that others will need to become involved, such as the BTP. I envisage that we would have to go out to get agreement on the working group’s work. COSLA would cover most of the local authorities, and we would get input from the licensing clerks through SOLAR. We would also invite the Society of Local Authority Chief Executives and Senior Managers. We are doing things incrementally. We need to get agreement, although we will not always get agreement with every board area. Where we can get agreement, that will give us an opportunity.

Clare Adamson: Thank you.

The Convener: I always worry when I hear the words “short-life working group”.

John Wilson: I want to follow up Alex Rowley’s question about private hire cars. There is an issue with unlicensed operators, particularly app-based operators such as Uber, coming into the market. Does Police Scotland have any views about unlicensed drivers and unlicensed cars operating in the streets of Scotland?

Chief Inspector Stewart: I think that this follows on from what Mr Telfer previously articulated. Anybody who is unlicensed and unregulated is a concern, because we do not know who they are and whether the vehicle that they are driving is safe. Whether an operator is app based or is quite simply not licensed, that is a concern. We will take robust action, based on whatever information and intelligence is to hand.

John Wilson: What robust action can you take? I know that in other countries there have been challenges to the operation of Uber-type organisations. At present, what robust action can you take against someone who uses an app to get an unlicensed car or driver to pick them up? What legal enforcement action is available to you to take against such operations?

Chief Inspector Stewart: I have become aware of Uber in a licensing context. I know that it operates in London and that it has recently been banned from operating in France, Germany and India. There will be a variety of reasons for that. One reason might be that it presents a threat to other taxi and private hire car operators in the sector. Another reason might be its operating plan and business model, where it engages drivers to pick people up and car share. Effectively, Uber acts as a broker, which means that it can avoid having an operator’s licence or a booking-office licence. We are looking into that.

The example of Uber has been highlighted to the national policy group for licensing, on which I sit. We have had discussions with the licensing department in St Andrew’s house, because of the concerns about unregulated drivers picking people up, the condition of the vehicles and the question of what checks Uber has made of the drivers whom it has engaged. Those drivers are classed as self-employed because they have not been hired by Uber.

There are a number of issues. I would be happy to come back to the committee with more information, once we have pulled it all together.

John Wilson: As part of our examination of the bill, we are trying to ensure that it is as future-proofed as it can be. Do you have any recommendations about how we ensure that we have in place legislation that can stand the test of time—even if that is a short time—rather than legislation that could become unworkable within weeks of being enacted?

The Convener: Mr Wilson is putting you on the spot there. You can write back to the committee if anything comes up that you feel could help us.

John Wilson: I am sure that Chief Inspector Stewart can answer the question.

Chief Inspector Stewart: I understand where you are coming from. At the moment, we have a similar situation, to a more diluted degree, of a booking office that takes online bookings from people who stay outwith the area. The difference is that we can challenge that, because a company is allowed to operate only in the area for which the local authority has granted its booking office a licence.

It seems to me that Uber is bypassing that because all it has is one office although it will have taxis operating across Scotland via the app. We are looking into the potential ramifications of that across Scotland. I would be happy to report back to the committee on that in due course.

The Convener: You have said something that contradicts evidence that we heard last week, when we were told that a booking office did not have to be in the area in which its taxis operate. We were given an example of a booking office that was on the border between local authority areas, with the company operating in another local authority area. Is that not allowed under current legislation?

Chief Inspector Stewart: My understanding is that a company has to have a booking office licence in the local authority area where it has been licensed to operate. I would have to check that and get back to you. I believe that there is relevant case law.

The Convener: I think that we need clarification, because some of the licensing authorities said that what I described was possible.

Chief Inspector Stewart: I can include that in the report on Uber.

John Wilson: Given the evidence that we have heard, what is Police Scotland’s definition of a booking office? At a previous meeting, I put to the witnesses a scenario of a booking office that was one person sitting in a room in their house with a computer and a smartphone. As far as Police Scotland is concerned, could that be defined as a booking office?

Chief Inspector Stewart: According to the legislation, a booking office is defined as a place from which you operate more than three cars and organise the hire of vehicles and so on, regardless of where it is.

John Wilson: So I could sit at night in my house with a smartphone and, as long as I was operating more than three cars, I could register that as a booking office.

Chief Inspector Stewart: You would have to apply for a licence, and the licensing authority would determine whether that was a booking office. A booking office does not tend to be someone in their house with a smartphone. However, it is up to the local authority to license booking offices.

John Wilson: Thank you very much.

The Convener: I will ask about the licensing of cars and drivers. It is obviously of concern to the committee if operators are unlicensed and perhaps have unsafe cars with dubious people behind the wheel. As the situation stands, before any of these new operators enter the market, how much criminality has arisen from unlicensed cars and drivers, and what kind of criminality are we talking about?

Chief Inspector Stewart: I do not have any figures with me, but I can provide them to the committee. Mr Telfer will no doubt be able to add more from his experience in Glasgow city centre, but the intelligence that we hold shows that the crimes that you are talking about are often committed by sexual predators or opportunists—it goes from one extreme to the other. However, if operators are not regulated, we do not know whether an individual driver is a fit and proper person to carry passengers. Further, any passengers might be vulnerable due to the effects of alcohol, given that such operators tend to target the night-time economy because that is when most money can be made. That is a concern.

The Convener: It would be useful if we could get the figures, because I believe that some extremely serious crimes have taken place after folk have gone into unlicensed cars thinking that that is an easy way to get home.

We move on to sexual entertainment venue licensing. Does Mr Telfer have some opening remarks?

Assistant Chief Constable Telfer: I do, convener. Thanks very much.

Sexual entertainment venues such as lap-dancing venues are currently licensed under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005. The subsequent case law that I referred to previously, Brightcrew Ltd v City of Glasgow Licensing Board, which dates from circa July 2011, has significantly impacted on the ability of Police Scotland and the licensing boards to address on-going issues with such establishments and, indeed, other premises licensed under the 2005 act, unless the issue is directly related to the sale and supply of alcohol.

The bill seeks in part to remedy the situation in respect of the licensing of sexual entertainment venues. The bill advocates a dual licensing system, whereby the premises will require a liquor licence and a civic licence in order to operate. That will provide the police and the local authority with greater scope to ensure compliance in this business area and will remove some of the barriers that have resulted from the Brightcrew judgment. That will better enable the police and partners to ensure the safety and wellbeing of those who work in such premises and to pursue enforcement activity where it is required.

In principle, Police Scotland is supportive of the measures outlined in the bill. However, there remains uncertainty about how dual licensing will operate in practice. Licensing boards and regulatory committees have separate and distinct responsibilities for liquor and civic licences, so a situation may arise in which a liquor licence is revoked and the sexual entertainment licence remains in effect. It would be beneficial if a mechanism existed whereby each regulatory body communicated and agreed matters such as terminal hours.

Two different inspection regimes will also be in place, which may impact on local authority licensing standard officers or the proposed civic licensing standards officers. It would be advantageous if their respective powers were cross-transferable.

The regulation of sexual entertainment venues should also be mandatory rather than subject to a resolution, as it is in the bill. It should not be left to the discretion of each local authority. Such a situation would encourage regime shopping, whereby there might be a disproportionate presence of sexual entertainment venues in an area where they are not a licensed activity.

We also believe that consensus needs to be reached on the definition of adult sexual entertainment, which would subsequently inform conditions of licence to improve standards in the industry and enable robust mandatory conditions that outline what is and is not acceptable and promote a consistent approach across Scotland.

The Convener: Thank you. Let us discuss the point that you made about communication between, say, a licensing board that may revoke an alcohol licence and a licensing committee or other regulatory committee that may deal with the sexual entertainment aspects. You say that there would be difficulty if one part was revoked but not the other. Another thing that we have heard in evidence is that advertising outside the venues comes under another regime, usually planning. That seems to be a real problem. Should there be holistic regulation of sexual entertainment venues under one regime rather than regulation being split all over the place?

Chief Inspector Stewart: Advertising directly outside premises could be taken into consideration in the dual licensing regime. The problem that we have thereafter is flyposting and other communications elsewhere. We need to consider more fully who would take responsibility for that.

The Convener: In terms of flyposting and leaflets, I suppose you are saying—

Chief Inspector Stewart: There may be advertising directly outside the venue—posters, for instance. We need to consider the content of that, and there might then be flyposting in the surrounding area.

The Convener: Surely there are other pieces of legislation that can stop flyposting—

Chief Inspector Stewart: Yes, but it is the content.

The Convener: —and if leaflets are offensive, surely similar actions can be taken in that regard.

Chief Inspector Stewart: That is what I am saying. There are two distinct things—the advertising directly outside the premises and the advertising elsewhere.

The Convener: We are looking at advertising round about the premises. Any other illegal activity in that regard does not come within the scope of the bill. However, I get where you are coming from on those behaviours.

Would it be good to bring all the regulatory regimes for these venues into one?

Assistant Chief Constable Telfer: I certainly take your point, convener. Things need to be joined up, and the best way to do that is to have one regime. Whether that is achievable is another matter, but that would be utopian, as far as we are concerned. It would join things up and enable one body to have an overview.

Alex Rowley: What would be the problem with licensing boards having that responsibility?

Chief Inspector Stewart: Sexual entertainment venues are currently licensed under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005. There have been difficulties and frustrations because of the Brightcrew decision, which means that licensing boards cannot tackle ancillary conduct that is not linked to the sale and supply of alcohol. Licensing boards are allowed to deal only with the sale and supply of alcohol. That is where the issue has arisen. I imagine that they are looking for the bill to be enacted so that they can tackle issues with sexual entertainment venues outwith the sale and supply of alcohol.

The Convener: Cameron, is your question on the same point?

Cameron Buchanan: No.

The Convener: Let us continue on the same theme, then. Chief Inspector Stewart, you mentioned that licensing boards can deal with alcohol licensing only. What would the situation be if a licensing board had a difficulty with a casino, for example? The board might be worried about the operation of a casino that provides something else, and the board’s concerns might not involve the alcohol aspects. Does that create a dilemma under the current legislation about what a licensing board could and could not do?

Chief Inspector Stewart: In a recent example in Glasgow, it basically came down to the alcohol side of things, and that is why it was dealt with. The Gambling Commission would be able to consider incidents in premises such as casinos. That might cause some difficulty.

The Convener: That was a bit of a left-field question anyway—sorry about that.

John Wilson: You have introduced a fourth element of the licensing regime, potentially. There is a casino in Glasgow that is a large venue, and it is hired out to various organisations for parties and other things. What would stop the casino being hired out or used as a venue for adult entertainment on a Friday or Saturday night, allied to the other activities that take place there?

The Convener: That takes us to my next line of questioning anyway, so you can respond to all these points in a oner. This concerns premises that hold sexual entertainment on no more than four occasions per year. That might involve the casino that Mr Wilson has just mentioned, where the venue has no need, in some regards, to follow the normal licensing regime. Do you have enforcement concerns about that? What are Police Scotland’s views about occasional licences for one-off sexual entertainment events—or four-off events, as the case may be?

Assistant Chief Constable Telfer: That certainly throws up some concern and is a potential loophole. Morag Stewart has previously commented on the potential for roadshowing and for a particular group that provides adult entertainment to travel the length and breadth of the country but only to have events in venues once or twice, thus exploiting a loophole. I would have concerns about the definition, which allows three or fewer events in any particular premises.

Mr Wilson’s point about the potential for a casino to host adult entertainment, with all the various regulatory bodies having oversight of their particular areas, suggests to me that it might all become quite messy. That goes back to the original point about one body overseeing sexual entertainment venues and adult entertainment. We do have concerns about the point that you raise.

The Convener: You described a round-Scotland tour, which could be organised using occasional licences. It would be much more difficult for you folks to police what happens on such a tour. Have there been difficulties in the past around such scenarios, as far as you are aware?

Chief Inspector Stewart: Not that I am aware of, but it was one of the considerations when we were examining the proposals in the bill. As Mr Telfer articulated earlier, licensing is about keeping people safe. That includes the people who work at the venues and those who attend the premises as customers.

If there was an exclusion because of a restriction to three or four occasions, whether or not that was in the operating plan for the licence—as I anticipate it would be—the issue comes back to the Brightcrew decision, which means that we would not be able to regulate or challenge the arrangements effectively, unless the matter concerned the sale and supply of alcohol. It would be better if that provision was not there, so that we were able to tackle such situations—as long as what happens is catered for in a licence.

The Convener: Will your Inn Keeper system be able to keep track of occasional licences for alcohol as well, or will that fall out of the remit because you might not be aware of the occasional licences that are granted?

Chief Inspector Stewart: The occasional licences would be contained on the Inn Keeper system and would be linked to the premises. However, I would rather that there was not an exemption and that, if the premises wanted to undertake that activity, it had to get a licence for it so that we would know that it was happening and that it was also outlined in the operating plan for the liquor licence. That means that the information would be joined up.

Cameron Buchanan: This seems to be a bit of a minefield. There is an anomaly with places of sexual entertainment on an occasional basis, for example if someone phones up and books a stripogram or something like that. Have you got concerns about that? If that were happening regularly in a premises—weekly or monthly—privately but for financial gain, would you be concerned?

Assistant Chief Constable Telfer: That goes back to the final point in my opening remarks about the definition of adult sexual entertainment. That definition needs to be quite concise. If stripograms are being booked every weekend for stag and hen parties, so be it, but we need to have some dialogue about what falls within the definition.

Cameron Buchanan: There is no simple answer to it, realistically. You have concerns but there is no answer that you can enunciate.

Assistant Chief Constable Telfer: There is no particular answer to the question at this moment in time. We have concerns about it although there have been no particular examples of the type of stag and hen parties situation that you spoke about throwing up any significant issues. There is no evidence for including that type of situation, but it can be quite contextual; it depends on the situation. As you say, it is really quite a grey area.

Cameron Buchanan: Are you saying that action would be discretionary as far as you are concerned?

Assistant Chief Constable Telfer: There needs to be an element of discretion but, as I say, we need a concise definition of adult sexual entertainment because that will help us in policing. Most issues that arise from lap dancing are about the vulnerability and exploitation of some of the employees. That flies in the face of the Scottish Government’s approach to the victimisation of women. That is what we have been most concerned about in the past.

The Convener: There have been lots of allegations that adult sexual entertainment venues attract a criminal element. Does Police Scotland agree with that? Is the level of criminal activity in those venues that much different from that in nightclubs?

Assistant Chief Constable Telfer: It is certainly an area that attracts certain elements of criminality because of its nature and its potential for generating income for organised crime. It could happen in various licensed establishments. It is just another opportunity for organised crime and it has been shown in the past that some establishments are linked to a particular crime group that is exploiting the venue for illegitimate purposes such as laundering money.

The Convener: It might be useful for the committee to get an idea of the police figures for some of those places so that we have an indication and can make a comparison with others.

Assistant Chief Constable Telfer: There are certainly difficulties with the administration of such venues and, as we have highlighted previously in relation to other issues, different areas take different approaches. We will do our best to provide those figures.

The Convener: Grand. I thank you for your evidence this morning. I ask the witnesses to keep their seats for a few seconds.

Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill: Stage 1

The Convener (Kevin Stewart): Good morning and welcome to the Local Government and Regeneration Committee’s sixth meeting in 2015. I ask everyone present to switch off mobile phones and other electronic devices, as they interfere with the broadcasting system. However, some committee members will refer to tablets, because we provide papers in digital format.

Agenda item 1 is our eighth oral evidence session on the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. We will take evidence from local authority witnesses on general licensing provisions. I welcome Andrew Mitchell, community safety manager with the City of Edinburgh Council, and Peter Smith, senior licensing officer with Glasgow City Council. Gentlemen, would you like to make any opening remarks? Maybe you could tell us a little about your jobs.

Peter Smith (Glasgow City Council): On behalf of Glasgow City Council, I again thank the committee for inviting us to give evidence. My role in the council's licensing team is in essence to oversee the service delivery aspect of the business and to ensure that we deliver the correct level of service to our customers and our communities.

As we have outlined in previous evidence sessions, the council supports the proposals in the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. We will take evidence from local authority witnesses on general licensing provisions. I welcome Andrew Mitchell, community safety manager with the City of Edinburgh Council, and Peter Smith, senior licensing officer with Glasgow City Council. Gentlemen, would you like to make any opening remarks? Maybe you could tell us a little about your jobs.

Peter Smith (Glasgow City Council): On behalf of Glasgow City Council, I again thank the committee for inviting us to give evidence. My role in the council's licensing team is in essence to oversee the service delivery aspect of the business and to ensure that we deliver the correct level of service to our customers and our communities.

As we have outlined in previous evidence sessions, the council supports the proposals in the bill in and of themselves, although we give a caveat or qualify that by again raising the issue that the licensing system and in particular the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 are not fit for purpose—consolidation or revision of the act is required to improve the licensing service that is delivered to the businesses and communities that we serve.

The Convener: What is your role?

Peter Smith: I oversee service delivery in the licensing section. That involves dealing with the legal aspect of the business and the operational side, such as dealing with agents and businesses and ensuring that applications are processed timeously and that the legal and administrative processes of the role are fulfilled by the team.

Andrew Mitchell (City of Edinburgh Council): Thank you for inviting me. I am the City of Edinburgh Council’s community safety manager. I have responsibility for the council’s licensing functions, from policy through to the administration of processing applications. I am also responsible for the council’s regulatory functions that relate to licensed premises, which includes managing the licensing standards officers.

The council broadly welcomes the bill, but we take a similar view to that of Glasgow City Council, in that we believe that the 1982 act has probably passed its sell-by date. Quite a few other bits of legislation out there that deal with licensing need to be tidied and brought into a consolidated act. We are particularly interested in the training of private hire car drivers, which is essential. We are also concerned about the provisions in the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 that relate to occasional premises. I am happy to go through the details of those issues to help the committee. We broadly support the bill as far as it goes.

The Convener: You have both said that the 1982 act is outdated and no longer fit for purpose. What are the main flaws in that act and how will the bill resolve some of those difficulties?

Peter Smith: We have to begin with the fact that the 1982 act was drafted more than 30 years ago. It deals with a variety of activities that require to be regulated, from obvious things such as taxis and private hire cars to more obscure things such as window cleaners and boat hire licences.

The act has served its purpose over the years but, as Scotland has moved on and business has changed, the provisions have not kept pace. The 2005 act represents what is probably the benchmark for how licensing should work in 21st century Scotland. When we compare the two acts, we can see that the 1982 act is deficient in several areas.

The lack of licensing objectives is a major concern about the 1982 act. We are charged with granting licences and setting conditions, but those conditions do not go as far as setting objectives for licence holders. We might condition a licence. For example, with scrap metal dealers, we might be given the power to condition a licence for non-cash payments, but that is not backed by a requirement for the licence holder to meet objectives such as preventing crime and disorder and securing public safety.

I guess that I am talking about the technical minutiae of how the two acts work, but the lack of objectives is a major concern for us. The 2005 act creates an expectation about how licensing authorities should deal with businesses and we do not have the same powers under the 1982 act.
Specific provisions in the 1982 act for things such as street trading were drafted to deal with burger vans and people selling hats, scarves and badges at football matches. We have to use that legislation in 21st century Scotland to regulate everything from car washes to pedicabs, and it is clear that the 1982 act was never intended to regulate such activities. As we move on, it becomes more apparent that the act is not suitable for dealing with that type of thing.

Andrew Mitchell: I can give the committee an example of what the public think. The 2005 act and planning legislation contain quite a sophisticated system for neighbour notification, but there is no equivalent in the 1982 act. One of the most common complaints that we get from residents and members of the public is that premises spring up beside them and they have very little chance to become aware that premises are likely to apply for a licence before they open. Such examples show how, when compared with other pieces of legislation, the 1982 act, which was passed more than 30 years ago, has fallen well behind what one would expect for public involvement and people’s awareness of what is going on in their community.

The Convener: What do you consider to be the advantages and disadvantages of creating a new civic licensing standards officer role?

Peter Smith: The advantage is that the role creates a single point of contact for communities that are concerned about activities that are licensed under the 1982 act. At the moment, officers in councils are spread across different teams, such as trading standards and environmental health, and they deal with aspects of activities that are regulated under the act. There is no single point of contact for someone who has an issue with a licensed premises, so creating the role is helpful for dealing with a specific issue.

In reality, I am not confident that every local authority will create a specific licensing standards officer role for civic licensing. The responsibility might simply be divided up and given to the different officers who deal with different aspects of licensing. An environmental health officer might also be a civic licensing officer, rather than an individual position being created. We will not know whether that will happen until the provisions are put in place.

On disadvantages, the creation of a civic licensing standards officer creates an expectation that someone in the council can deal with licensed premises issues. The reality is that the officer would not be able to do that. They would be charged with dealing with breaches of licence conditions. Because there are no objectives under the 1982 act, if the premises were creating a public nuisance, a civic officer could not deal with that. They could deal only with a breach of a specific condition under the act, because there is no overriding objective to which businesses have to adhere.

There are advantages to creating the role, because it will give communities comfort that there is someone for them to contact. At the same time, I am concerned that such a role might create the expectation that a local authority can deal with issues that it is not charged with dealing with.

I will give an example to contextualise that. If a street trader suddenly swung up outside someone’s front door with a burger van, the civic licensing standards officer could deal with a breach of that street trader’s conditions, but if the community did not want the street trader to be there or if the street trader was creating a public nuisance, the officer could not deal with those issues, because there is no objective to tie them to. The officer could deal only with the physical licence conditions—for example, does the trader have suitable bins for any waste that they are producing? Are they operating within the licence’s terms?

I have mixed feelings about the creation of the civic licensing standards officer role. Overall, I think that it is a good idea but, in the context of the 1982 act, there are flaws.

The Convener: Basically, you are saying that the public’s perception will be, “Yes, we have these new officers, but they are not going to deliver what we want.” Is that right?

Peter Smith: The officers will be able to deliver aspects of what people want, but they will not be able to deliver the overall service that the public would expect them to deliver.

The Convener: Will the officers be able to help the public and guide them on dealing with objections to licences in the future?

Peter Smith: Yes—absolutely.

The Convener: Will they help with objecting to a burger van being in a specific place or whatever it may be?

Peter Smith: Not with the burger van because—unfortunately—there is very little chance under the 1982 act that the community would know that the burger van was going to turn up before the licence was granted.

The Convener: Under the new provisions, will the public be more likely to know about the licence application of the said burger van?

Peter Smith: The public might be more likely to know, but that is not guaranteed under the provisions. We come back to what the officers will be able to do, compared with people’s expectations of what they will be able to do.
The Convener: So we might be boosting the public’s confidence in all this only to dash their confidence when it becomes a reality.

Peter Smith: That is well put.

Andrew Mitchell: Local authorities across the piece will take different views on civic licensing standards officers. Smaller authorities might struggle to find the resources to create the role. My authority has put all the expertise in dealing with the area in one team, and we would be likely to assign an existing officer such as an environmental health officer to carry out the functions.

It is important that the bill envisages a mediation role. Most local authorities try to mediate to resolve difficulties between the public and licence holders. However, like my colleague Peter Smith, I do not think that the officer role in itself will solve every problem under the 1982 act. To go back to my point about neighbour notification, it is highly unlikely that the officer role as it has been created would resolve that difficulty to any great extent.

Cameron Buchanan (Lothian) (Con): Good morning. I was interested in the example of the burger van, not per se but in terms of who would deal with it. Would people be able to phone the police to ask them to get rid of such a van if it was outside their house or causing a nuisance in their area? What party would deal with those issues?

Peter Smith: There is no party—that is one of the 1982 act’s fundamental flaws. Once the licence is granted, unless there is a breach of conditions—or a criminal matter, when the police can get involved—there is no route for communities to say, “This is a public nuisance and we want the committee to reconsider whether this application should be granted.”

If there was an issue about food smells, we could ask environmental health to look at that or at a breach of conditions, but the overarching idea that a licence holder who is creating a public nuisance can be dealt with is wrong. That cannot be dealt with. Under the 1982 act, there is no provision to deal with that.

Cameron Buchanan: Will the new bill close that loophole?

Peter Smith: No. Really addressing the issues would involve going back to the beginning and looking at the 1982 act on a fundamental level. If that was done, something that was much more like the 2005 act would probably be created in the end. Many of the activities that are regulated under the 1982 act could move to a model like the 2005 act or even become part of the 2005 act.

That would create a system that was more in line with the one that operates in England and Wales, where a premises licence comes under one licence that licenses multiple activities. That licence includes a sensible level of objectives that the licence holder and the local authority are tied to ensuring. Without that—if we continue with the 1982 act—the problems will continue.

Andrew Mitchell: In practical terms, the only realistic opportunity that the community would have to object in the situation that has been described would arise when the licence came up for renewal. If the community became aware of the renewal—that is a big “if”—it could seek to object at that point. However, if the operation had been there for the previous year or however long without any problems or breaches of conditions, I would have thought it unlikely that, even at the renewal stage, the committee would take the view that renewal was inappropriate.

John Wilson (Central Scotland) (Ind): Given those responses, what is required to be included in the bill to satisfy Edinburgh, Glasgow and potentially other local authorities throughout Scotland that what we are doing will deliver the public’s expectation and make that a reality? What I have heard and what I picked up from Mr Smith is that the bill does not go far enough to meet the public’s expectations, which we might be raising, as the convener said. What do we need to do to meet those expectations?

Peter Smith: Any change would have to be substantial. I am teetering on the brink of saying that I do not think that enough amendments could be made to the bill to address the issues. The fundamental issue is that the 1982 act has been in place for more than 30 years. It has served its purpose; it has had its time. It needs to be rebuilt from the ground up, in line with the 2005 act, and to set out an entirely different framework for how we approach licensing.

The provisions that would have to be put into the 1982 act to implement objectives, the removal of fixed-term licences, the missing review procedures that would allow people to bring issues to a local authority at any time, and annual fee proposals instead of three-year fixed renewals—that is, all the provisions that exist in the 2005 act—would require changes that were so substantive that you would almost be writing a new piece of legislation. That is why Parliament would have to go right back to the beginning and start again with the 1982 act, so that it could pass legislation that is fit for purpose in a modern Scotland.

Andrew Mitchell: I agree. The City of Edinburgh Council’s view is that introducing a form of the licensing objectives is essential if the 1982 act is to be retained. The act has been amended so many times that it has become a question of how many times Parliament can keep on amending it.

I will give an example of how far behind other bits of legislation the 1982 act is and how it hampers local authorities’ ability to deal with problems. We can revoke a licence under liquor legislation, we can revoke a house in multiple occupation licence and we can even revoke a sex shop licence, but there is no power to revoke a licence under the 1982 act. A council can suspend a licence for the unexpired portion but, even if someone can say that there is a problem or that there has been serious misconduct by the applicant, there is no power under the act to revoke a licence, which is fairly fundamental. That shows how far that act has drifted behind other pieces of legislation.

The Convener: Willie Coffey appears to be desperate to come in.

Willie Coffey (Kilmarnock and Irvine Valley) (SNP): I want to ask about burger vans and where they can and cannot operate. My understanding is that East Ayrshire Council, which is my local authority, applies conditions on where businesses such as burger vans can operate. For example, it does not permit them to be located within a specified distance from schools. Is not the solution to the problem in the conditions that the local authority can apply to prevent such things from happening—to prevent someone setting up outside a person’s front door or window? Councils have the powers, through the conditions that they can set, to be a bit more prescriptive about where such businesses can operate.

Peter Smith: I suppose that the answer is yes and no. Conditions are applied to a licence once it is granted, so that councils control their operation. The local authority could set policies around not wanting licences to be granted near schools or particular establishments, but how legally sound those policies would be is open to debate. Street trading is a very good example of—

The Convener: You say that the legality is open to debate, but how many times has Glasgow City Council faced challenges in relation to such policies?

Peter Smith: I do not have an exact number, but over the past 30 years, the council has been challenged hundreds of times in respect of policies and conditions.

Street trading is dealt with in four paragraphs in the 1982 act. No two authorities in Scotland approach street trading in the same way: some authorities license street traders on a mobile basis, some license for localities, some license in specific locations and some license individuals or businesses. There is an incredible mix, and traders who operate across Scotland face multiple different licensing regimes.

Conditions and policies can tackle some issues, but it is entirely conceivable that a person could apply for a licence that does not fall within policies, that the consultation might just be with the police, and that the licence would be granted and the business would start to operate suddenly, which is the point at which the community would ask why the business had been licensed.

The activities of street traders are dealt with under the 1982 act, but there is no mechanism by which to take a licence away if it is causing a problem, unless it is a matter of criminality or there is a breach of a specific condition.

That situation is not analogous with the powers that we have under the 2005 act, which give communities, the police and local licensing standards officers powers under the review procedures to bring an issue to the licensing board at any time, whether it is a breach of conditions or of the licensing objectives.

The Convener: Why would you want to remove a licence if there had not been a breach of conditions?

Peter Smith: That would be about public nuisance. A community may not want a licence that has been granted to remain in force, because the business is causing definable public nuisance, so it is right that communities should have the power to bring the issue to licensing authorities and allow them to make a decision. At the moment, communities do not have that power, but they have a similar power under the 2005 act, in respect of licensed premises.

The Convener: I like playing devil’s advocate on the committee. A number of years ago, my father had an ice-cream van, which was dealt with under the licensing legislation. The van served several communities, as defined in the licence. There were one or two individuals who did not want an ice-cream van in their area, so time and again they would report a breach of the conditions on use of chimes—in relation to a van that did not actually have any chimes.

Can you give me an idea of how many complaints about licences there are from individuals who may not reflect the views of entire communities?

Peter Smith: The lack of a review process in the 1982 act means that we do not deal with many complaints in relation to licensed premises, because at the initial inquiry we realise that there is nothing that we can do. However, we deal with objections regularly, through the application process. It is probable that 10 per cent of licence applications garner some form of objection. That process allows individuals to bring a matter to the licensing authority and for the licensing authority to deal with it. If an individual does not represent their community, the licensing authority can establish that through the application process, and can determine the relevant weight to attach to that individual’s view.

If we had a review process, the authority would have the ability to treat repeat complainers as frivolous or vexatious and so would not have to deal with them continually. That is an example of where the 1982 act does not have the robust provisions of the 2005 act to deal effectively with repeat complainers.

It is, of course, important to balance both sides. Communities need a route to raise issues about licence holders and licensed activities, but effective legislation will also contain measures to ensure that, where complaints are repeated or vexatious, or are raised by one individual and are not representative of the community’s view, that can be established and appropriate mechanisms can be put in place to address the issue. We have that broadly in the 2005 act, but there are no equivalent provisions in the 1982 act.

Andrew Mitchell: Our local experience is that we receive quite a large volume of complaints about licensed businesses and how they interact with individuals. It can be difficult for the licensing authority to come to a view about the point at which somebody’s individual grievance with a particular licensed premises that they happen to live next door to or above becomes representative of a wider community concern about an impact on the community. The grounds for refusing under the 1982 act, which in essence are the grounds on which we could consider taking action such as suspension, are fairly limited. There is a fairly high standard.

I welcome the introduction of mediation as a means for civic licensing standards officers to resolve issues. I do not think that it will resolve all the issues, but it will at least give us a formal route that is similar to the one that LSOs use under the 2005 act to mediate between individuals and licensed premises.

The Convener: What kind of licensed premises are most complaints about? Is it hot food takeaways, for example?

Andrew Mitchell: That question is quite topical. We use street-trading provisions to license pedicabs. Individual pedicabs are not a particular issue, but we now have a problem in the city with the volume of pedicabs in areas where they operate at night, which is causing significant community concern. We are struggling to use the powers in the 1982 act to control the collective impact of those licences. Individual licence holders might technically be breaching the act, but the problem is the cumulative impact. In certain streets in Edinburgh at night, there is a congregation of pedicabs blocking pavements and so on. The 1982 act is not particularly adept at dealing with that kind of issue.

The Convener: That is interesting.

I will be devil’s advocate again. How many times do you find that somebody moves into a community and then starts moaning about a licence that is in place? For example, someone might buy a house above a Chinese takeaway and then suddenly start moaning about noxious smells. I ask about that because, many years ago, in my old council ward, a woman moved into a house next to a playground and then started a campaign to remove the playground.

Peter Smith: More often than not it is the other way, in my experience; community councils and established residents who have lived in an area for a long time complain about new licensed activity that springs up in their area. Any licensing authority will have examples like the one that the convener mentioned of somebody moving into an area and then complaining. In that situation, part of you thinks that the business was there beforehand, so it should not come as a surprise to that person. Because of the lack of community engagement and because the legislation does not really empower communities to shape licensing, we are not empowered to do anything about such issues when they spring up.

Andrew Mitchell: The City of Edinburgh Council sees a similar pattern, although we also see issues such as the convener raised. For example, a topical issue for us is the impact of live music in premises that are licensed under the 1982 act and the 2005 act. There is an issue about the impact of the noise on neighbours in residential premises. Music promoters have raised concerns with the council that those who complain are often people who move into areas where there are long-established venues that have been there for many years. In some circumstances, the pattern that the convener outlined exists in our city.

Cameron Buchanan: I want to take up the issue of pedicabs, without going into too much detail. Who are you licensing? Are you licensing the cab or the driver? Are there many problems with them? They seem to be prevalent in Edinburgh; are they prevalent in other cities? The committee has not dealt with the issue to any great degree before.

Andrew Mitchell: For pedicabs, we use the street trading provisions—I know that Glasgow takes a very different approach. We license the pedicab operator and the individual pedicab drivers—I say “drivers” for want of a better word. For us, the problem is the volume of them; we now have several hundred operating in the city. Standards of behaviour are also an issue—some operators have recently been called to the licensing sub-committee to discuss the standards of behaviour of the drivers with regard to issues such as blocking of pavements. There is a zone within which they are supposed to operate—roughly speaking, it is the world heritage site map—but they can often be found outside that area. That is a clear breach of their conditions, although I suppose that they are going where the market takes them.

Cameron Buchanan: Are you limiting the amount of pedicabs? I have not used them myself, but they seem to be providing a service.

Andrew Mitchell: We take the view that we have no power to limit them, so the issue is how we manage what we have.

John Wilson: For a burger van, a community council would, as a statutory consultee under planning legislation, be notified if a planning application was submitted and considered by the council, and neighbours within a certain distance would be notified that a planning change was taking place. Do you see any value in a neighbour notification condition or statutory consultee condition applying to the issuing of licences for things such as burger vans in particular areas?

Andrew Mitchell: Certainly, that is worth exploring. There is an issue around how that would be administered and the associated logistics, but that aside, we would advise the police of the burger van application and we would, as a courtesy, tell elected members and community councils, even though we are not under a statutory obligation to do so. Beyond that, for members of the public who happen to live beside the potential site of a burger van, unless they check our online registers or happen to see the site notice, there is no way of knowing that an application has been considered, up to the point at which a licence is granted and the burger van becomes a reality in their street.

Peter Smith: I absolutely agree with my colleague’s comments on that. We would welcome a statutory requirement to ensure that community councils and local elected members were engaged. The neighbourhood notification is technical and complicated but, again, we can make statutory provision to do that work. It would certainly help with regard to engagement, which would be helpful within the application process. Of course, that does not address the other side, which is that once a licence is granted there is not much in the way of powers to deal with issues that arise.

Willie Coffey: In a situation in which neighbours within a certain radius must be notified, there is nothing preventing the authority from also notifying people outside that radius. A common fault that is raised with me in complaints that I receive concerns situations in which someone who is five steps over the line received no notification. Surely local authorities have the power to extend the area in which notification is given to cover people whom they decide might be impacted on by a new shop or other facility. Councils do not need an amendment to legislation to enable that; they can use discretion to decide that neighbours will be impacted on and will therefore be notified. Is that your understanding of the position?

Peter Smith: Our solicitors would shift uncomfortably if they heard that suggestion.

The Convener: Do they not always?

Peter Smith: They can be reasonable sometimes.

On that specific issue, we are always conscious that we have to work within the lines of the legislation. Where we might say that it would be reasonable to go outwith those lines, we run the risk of seeking objections and overstepping our boundaries as a body that is dealing with an application in an open and transparent way. If we go seeking objections, does that not taint that process?

The Convener: Why would providing notification amount to seeking objections? If I hark back to my days as a councillor, there were probably times when I—I am sure that other members who have served on councils would say the same—told folk in large swathes of an area about applications that had come in without telling them whether they should object or what they should do. What is so wrong with simply letting people know what is happening?

Peter Smith: I am looking at the issue from the perspective of the licensing authority. There is legislation that instructs licensing authorities on what they should do. If an authority goes beyond what it should do, an assessment has to be made about whether that authority is seeking objections.

If we pass the matter on to the local members for the ward—

The Convener: Do you do that?

Peter Smith: Yes—in some instances we pass such issues on to local members and community councils for them to take further, but if we have legislation that says that we should only consult within 4m and we decided to extend that to 5m for some applications, the solicitors who are prone to shift uncomfortably would say that that would be overstepping the mark and seeking objections.

Andrew Mitchell: Notwithstanding legal issues, there is no mechanism in the 1982 act for neighbour notification, so if local authorities were to provide neighbour notification, they would be doing so entirely voluntarily. The biggest barrier would be cost; the authority would have to find the staff to work out which premises to notify, to prepare the letters, to send them out at cost—

The Convener: Let me play devil’s advocate again. If you notified people more widely, might not that save on complaints and officer time in the long run? Extending the notification process might end up saving you a great deal of money.

Andrew Mitchell: Under the 1982 act, there is no neighbour notification obligation, so it is not a question of providing further notification. To answer your question directly, in my experience the more we make people aware of such premises, the more likely we are to get complaints and objections.

The Convener: At the beginning.

Andrew Mitchell: It happens at any point in the process. If an authority were to advertise that an application or a renewal was pending, I suspect that it would get complaints and objections.

I will give an example. Houses in multiple occupation are not dealt with in the 1982 act, but we have people who have complained about individual HMOs for 10 years in a row. They complain year after year, despite the fact that the committee has heard their complaints and ruled on them. I would certainly advocate some form of neighbour notification, because it would deal with some aspects of the public’s disengagement from the licensing system. However, it would generate a volume of work. To go back to Mr Coffey’s question, I think that that is probably the biggest barrier to local authorities choosing to do that.

The Convener: John Wilson has a supplementary. Could you be brief, please? I want to move off this topic.

John Wilson: Yes. The financial memorandum says that local authorities would be able to recover any costs associated with applications through licensing fees. In the situation that you outlined, surely any additional costs to do with consultation could be recovered through the application process.

Andrew Mitchell: Absolutely—that is where the costs would be recovered. The costs would translate into a cost on business, because the applicants who pay the fees would have to pay extra in order to pay for neighbour notification.

The Convener: Do you have anything to add, Mr Smith?

Peter Smith: From Glasgow City Council’s perspective, if the legislation were to impose neighbour notification requirements on the authority, we would implement them—we would engage with communities, which would help to raise their awareness. The costs would be passed on to business, but the legislation is structured such that that is how the model works. If it was the will of the committee that we should engage in neighbour notification, we would be able to do that.

The Convener: The Convention of Scottish Local Authorities has suggested that licensing standards officers should be given additional enforcement powers under the Gambling Act 2005. Would that be helpful?

Peter Smith: I would not find that helpful at all. The Gambling Act 2005 is United Kingdom-wide legislation, but certain regulations were enacted to give local authorities in Scotland specific powers. However, the regulations to give local authorities the power to inspect gambling premises were not enacted correctly and local authorities do not have any powers to do that. To extend the remit of those officers to deal with gambling would be somewhat pointless, as we have no powers to inspect gambling premises in Scotland.

The Convener: Because the legislation was written wrongly.

Peter Smith: Yes. There was misdrafting in one of the regulations.

The Convener: Thank you. Mr Mitchell, do you agree with that?

Andrew Mitchell: I am not sure how we got here, because I am not particularly an expert on gambling, but we are finding that we are having to do the work and go out and check the premises in the absence of explicit statutory powers. Anything that can be done to address that would be useful.

There are some issues with the powers in the 1982 act. For example, only the police have powers in relation to unlicensed premises. If you are creating a new role, I suggest that that needs to be looked at, because the police may or may not pick up on unlicensed premises. To create a role for council officers to deal with licensing issues without giving them powers to deal with unlicensed premises seems to be an obvious gap.

The Convener: Okay. I move on to how information is shared between the council’s various licensing functions. Are there formal links in your councils between the licensing board and the licensing committee?
Peter Smith: They are both administered by the same team, so there is an underlying—

The Convener: Sometimes that means nothing. They may be administered by the same team, but often information is not shared within teams. Is there sharing of information in Glasgow?

Peter Smith: Absolutely, at the administrative level. I am not sure whether there are specific examples that you could give me—

The Convener: I could probably give you numerous examples, but I will not do that, Mr Smith. I am just interested to hear what you have to say on the issue.

Peter Smith: On the administrative side, committees and boards tend to be dealt with by teams that will be integrated to some extent. In Glasgow, there is complete integration; it is one team, and that information is available to both. When we go out with that, we find different set-ups in different local authorities, with enforcement teams and licensing standards teams. As my colleague explained, Edinburgh has an integrated model. In Glasgow, our taxi enforcement and licensing standards teams sit within entirely separate services in the council, and if we have civic licensing standards officers, they will sit in an entirely different part of the council.

We have well-established links to share information and we continue to make sure that they are improved so that there is a level of joined-up thinking, but in essence the administrative side of licensing will hold the information and it is our responsibility to ensure that there are effective links to the enforcement teams to share that information—and that there are suitable links to give external bodies such as Police Scotland that information as well.

The Convener: We have heard from folks that members of the public who call to try to get a problem resolved will be moved from pillar to post and from one person to another. Does that happen in Glasgow with the situation that you have there?

Peter Smith: That will happen in every local authority, given the licensing set-up and the fact that local authorities deal with so many disparate parts. A good example is the licensing standards officers who deal with alcohol, especially when we bring Brightcrew Ltd v City of Glasgow Licensing Board into the mix. If someone has a problem with noise coming from a licensed premises, they will contact either the licensing board or licensing standards officers. In either case, they will eventually be directed to licensing standards officers, but those officers in Glasgow may take the view that it is a noise issue, and there is specific legislation to deal with noise, so the matter then has to be transferred to the noise team, which will deal with the noise issue. It might then bring the case back to licensing standards if it believes that a licensing issue is contained within the noise issue, and the case might then come back to the board.

Certainly people will be directed from pillar to post; it is a complicated system. Liquor and civic standards officers are a good idea and would give the public a single point of contact to engage with the process, but the reality is that they may still be directed elsewhere. If someone contacts a civic enforcement officer about an issue with late-hours catering premises, and it is a food complaint, the issue will have to be transferred to environmental health to be investigated.

As you understand, councils are large structures. It is important to give people single points of contact to come into the processes, but sometimes the reality is that once they engage with the council they will have to be directed elsewhere.

The Convener: Should the single point of contact not be the liaison for the entire process, so that the matter can be dealt with in a single manner? The committee has heard about complaints about sexual entertainment venues. In some cases there have been licensing board and licensing committee matters, and beyond that there have been advertising matters that fall within the remit of the council as the planning authority. Would it not be much easier if there was a single point of contact, which acted as the sole liaison to deal with the complaint? Further than that, maybe it would be wise to bring sexual entertainment venues, for example, under one regime—maybe the licensing board, rather than all the rest of it. Do you have a view on that?

Peter Smith: That is entirely sensible. To achieve that would require that to be in legislation and to have the statutory guidance that supports that legislation. Without that clear guidance, local authorities will not consistently take that view.

As I said, the enforcement teams in the council do not sit within the licensing remit, so even if I did share your view, dealing with complaints in the manner in which they are dealt with is the decision of a completely separate part of the council. I can certainly understand the frustration of a community that engages with a licensing standards officer, perhaps on a noise complaint, and is told that the issue must be dealt with by the noise team. However, without clear guidance on the Brightcrew case or what a licensing standards officer should do with a noise complaint—which is something that I imagine will be dealt with fairly regularly across Scotland—there will be different approaches between councils. That could be addressed through the guidance.

Andrew Mitchell: Across Scotland, different authorities will take different views. Part of the reason why Edinburgh put all the licensing functions under one service grouping and one manager was to address some of the issues that you have outlined, convener. I say honestly that we are making progress, but I would not say that we are all the way to making it a streamlined system.

Adult entertainment and sexual entertainment are an interesting example. I would take the view that the adult entertainment provisions are fairly much redundant, post Brightcrew. Our experience in Edinburgh is that licensing standards officers are trying to manage a regime with very few powers to do so. We are one of the authorities that have had complaints about adverts and the impact of these types of premises on the community, and I can honestly say that communities are probably frustrated partly because there are very few powers—planning, trading standards, licensing or otherwise—to deal with those types of issues, outside of what is being proposed in the bill.

The Convener: That is extremely useful. The public often feel that they will contact someone and get very little response, which is commonly known in the north-east as the slopey-shoulder scenario: it is not my job; I will pass it on to somebody else.

If we can move on, I will ask you—

Clare Adamson (Central Scotland) (SNP): Sorry, convener.

The Convener: Clare, I am sorry—I did not notice you. On you go.

Clare Adamson: Will the bill’s provisions make any significant change to the way that sexual entertainment is dealt with? Will bringing together the granting of alcohol licences and sexual entertainment licences under one body help with some of the problems that you have experienced?

Andrew Mitchell: I take a slightly different perspective from that of my colleague, because I think that licensing boards are not suited to dealing with such issues. The City of Edinburgh Council’s view is that local authorities are best placed to do so, and we welcome the provisions regarding sexual entertainment venues and the use of schedule 2. It needs some updating but it is certainly more effective than most other things that we have at present. For example, schedule 2—if that is where sexual entertainment will be dealt with—would allow us to control the form and content of adverts by means of condition and whether or not people can see into premises. I do not think that the adult entertainment provisions have been at all successful, partly because boards exist largely to regulate the sale of alcohol and are not suited to deal with such wider community issues. However, that is just my personal view.

The Convener: Why could they not be adapted to cover all the issues?

Andrew Mitchell: I suppose that they could, and Parliament will have to make that choice. However, our view is that local authorities have a broader base of responsibilities and are more accountable to the community for sexual entertainment venues. That is why we suggest that the licensing of those venues should be part of a council’s function and that the boards should be left to get on with licensing alcohol.

The Convener: Yet, from the evidence that we have taken, it seems that communities do not feel that councils have done what they need to do to deal with the issues that communities have raised with them.

Andrew Mitchell: At present, councils have no powers. The creation of the new licensing scheme would, for the first time, give councils—as opposed to boards—the power to deal with such premises.

The Convener: Mr Smith, do you have a view on these issues?

Peter Smith: I do. I think that we need one licensing authority. There is no real need to have two distinct licensing authorities—a licensing committee and a licensing board. In Glasgow, we have racked our brains for many years to understand why there is a licensing board and why there is not just one licensing function.

On the specific issue of alcohol and sexual entertainment venues, the reason that you are having to introduce sexual entertainment licensing is the Brightcrew decision that the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005 is about regulating just the sale of alcohol and not the other activities. You would not have to introduce sexual entertainment licensing if you fixed Brightcrew. If you created a licence scheme that dealt with not just the sale of alcohol but a range of activities flowing from a premises, you could easily regulate alcohol and sexual entertainment under one licensing scheme and one licensing body.

It comes back to the fact that the overall system is just not right. You would have to go back to the beginning and create something that was singular and coherent. There is no real need to have two licensing bodies.

John Wilson: In a previous evidence session, I said that I had served on a licensing board and on the licensing committee of an authority. They were two separate bodies but the same members were on both bodies. One would make decisions on licensing applications and the other would deal with, for instance, private hire car and taxi licences. What would be the problem in bringing those two functions together? I understand that the licensing board was seen as a quasi-legal body whereas the committee was seen as just one of the council’s committees. What would be the practical difficulties in bringing all the licensing under one body, whether that was a licensing board or an authority’s licensing committee?

The Convener: In Aberdeen City Council, those were deemed to be quasi-judicial bodies.

Peter Smith: I agree that they would both have been quasi-judicial. I imagine that they would not have treated an application for a private hire licence any differently from the way in which they would have treated an application for an alcohol licence. They would both have been considered in the same way under the legal frameworks.

I do not want to give an off-the-cuff answer and say that it would be easy to amalgamate the two bodies; I think that there would probably be a lot of legal issues in the minutiae of how that would work. However, as an overall concept, from a local authority perspective, it is unclear why we have two distinct licensing bodies—a committee and a board—dealing with two different aspects of licensing. If they were merged into a single, coherent structure with the right regulatory framework around it, that would be a far better model than what we have at the moment. I feel that the licensing board is a historical thing that has been kept going for years and years.

Andrew Mitchell: My perspective is probably similar. I am sure that licensing board clerks up and down the country will be quite agitated at this point.

The boards are a separate legal entity and have been for a number of years. For practical purposes, the same council staff and councillors deal with the licensing board and, in our case, the regulatory committee and the licensing sub-committee. We have a number of councillors who sit on both. My experience is that that is not well understood by the public. People think that their licensing board is just another council committee, whereas in law it is not. The only practical difference is that the council can formulate overall policy to which committees should have regard, and that does not impact on the licensing board because it is entirely separate.

The Convener: The bill would remove some of the connections between the licensing requirements that are placed on second-hand dealers and metal dealers. Do you have any concerns about that?

Peter Smith: No, those specific aspects are well drafted. I return to my comments that they are trying to fix a system that is, for want of a better word, broken. I do not have any concerns about the interrelationship that those changes will make.

Andrew Mitchell: The strengthening of the metal dealer provision is long overdue. Some of the current aspects cause concern. For example, a metal dealer who is above a certain financial threshold is exempt from the requirement to obtain a licence. I have never quite understood why that particular legislation was set up in that particular way. Anything that strengthens that part of the legislation would be welcome.

The Convener: Willie Coffey has a brief question.

Willie Coffey: I wanted to ask the witnesses for their views on taxi licence applications. An example was covered in the media in which a person who had had a string of complaints and allegations made against them moved to another local authority area and made an application for a taxi driver’s licence without that information being brought to the table. How do we resolve a problem like that?

Peter Smith: In the past couple of years, Glasgow City Council has looked at the integration of enforcement teams across different local authorities to ensure that they work in partnership so that if a driver from Renfrewshire comes into Glasgow, or a driver from Glasgow moves into Renfrewshire, that can be dealt with. Moving on from that work, we need to look at better sharing of information between those processes.

The 1982 act is structured in such a way that an application will go to the police and, if there is a query about a conviction, or intelligence to some extent—let us not go there—the issues can be brought to the committee. There is probably a gap between local authority enforcement teams when it comes to a concern being passed from one team to another. As we move forward with integration and look at new technology solutions, we will look to address that.

However, I do not think that there is a mechanism in place to address that problem right now. It is about looking at cross-border enforcement of that sector and at technical solutions to ensure that the information can be shared. There might be challenges if the information is not about a conviction but about something that is being investigated by another local authority; questions could be asked about how much weight can be attached to that enforcement but, as we move forward and technology advances, it is only right and proper that we ensure that local authorities have such information available to them when they make decisions in future.
Andrew Mitchell: The move to a single police force has helped in some ways, but there are still variances across the country. A police team might object in one part of the country but not in another.

We have a particularly high turnover of private hire car drivers and we recognise the phenomenon of people from England and Wales, for example, who have been refused licences by their authorities. They are almost shopping around and trying to obtain a private hire car driver’s licence so that they can move to where that licence to work operates. Local authorities’ powers in relation to private hire car drivers do not help. For example, because we choose to put taxi drivers through an element of training, that discourages people who are not serious about moving to an area. We recognise that there is a problem because local authorities’ powers in relation to private hire car drivers are relatively weak.

Willie Coffey: Thank you.

The Convener: Thank you for your evidence today, gentlemen. It has been very useful.
The Convener: Agenda item 2 is our ninth and final oral evidence session on the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill. We will take evidence from the Cabinet Secretary for Justice, who is accompanied by officials from the Scottish Government’s bill team.

I plan to take questions on each part of the bill in turn. We will start with air weapons and move through the bill in order. I hope that we can conclude the session by about 12.30 at the latest.

I welcome the Cabinet Secretary for Justice, Michael Matheson MSP; Quentin Fisher, bill team leader; Peter Reid, senior policy officer; Walter Drummond-Murray, policy officer; and Keith Main, policy manager.

Would you like to make an opening statement, cabinet secretary?

The Cabinet Secretary for Justice (Michael Matheson): No, convener. I am happy to move straight to questions.

The Convener: That is grand.

It has been suggested that the introduction of a licensing regime for air weapons will do nothing to reduce criminality or increase public safety, because those who choose to misuse such weapons would not apply for a licence. What is your response to that suggestion?

Michael Matheson: I do not necessarily agree with that because, as a result of creating the licensing provision, we require individuals who wish to have, or have, an air weapon to have a licence for it. It is worth keeping in mind that air weapons are lethal weapons that can kill or seriously maim individuals. Therefore, it is important that we have a regime in place that allows us to deal with some of the risks that are associated with them.

It is clear that there will be people who will choose not to have a licence. If they choose not to have a licence, they will be committing an offence. We are providing the police with the necessary powers so that, if they deem it appropriate, an individual will not be given a licence to hold an air weapon. Equally, the police will have powers to take action if an individual holds a licence and uses the air weapon inappropriately or in an unsuitable way. That is an appropriate mechanism that can assist us in preventing some of the criminality that is associated with air weapons.

The Convener: Thank you.
Clare Adamson (Central Scotland) (SNP): Inevitably, comparisons have been made between the licensing of shotguns and what has been proposed, and there is certainly a great expectation among people such as those in the League Against Cruel Sports that the bill will make a significant difference. The licensing of shotguns compelled behavioural change in respect of where weapons are stored, but with the licence in question as it stands, the individual airgun will not be identified and there will be no limit on the number of airguns that can be applied to a licence.

Do you have any concerns that the bill does not go far enough and that the police will still have problems in identifying who owns a particular airgun if it has been used in a criminal situation?

Michael Matheson: There are slightly different provisions for shotguns and for firearms. All firearms have to have a registration number on them, but not all shotguns do, and as things stand, air weapons do not have registration numbers on them either. The approach that we have taken is to license the individual and assess whether it is appropriate for them to have an air weapon. We have also tried to ensure that the licensing regime that we are introducing for air weapons is broadly similar to that for firearms and shotguns.

We are trying to do it in a proportionate way, and the bill tries to strike that balance. I believe that it has got the balance right by focusing on the individual and associating the licence with them. If we were to get into a situation where each individual air weapon was licensed, all air weapons that were manufactured and produced would have to have a serial number on them. That is simply not how they are produced at present. The system that we are introducing reflects the position with shotgun licensing? My understanding is that it is not the individual shotgun that is licensed. The individual shotgun is registered with the licence holder. A person does not apply for an individual licence for a shotgun. They apply for a licence to be a shotgun holder, and then the individual weapons are registered with the police. Is that correct?

Michael Matheson: Yes. That is my understanding. As I mentioned, the serial numbering of shotguns is different from that of firearms.

John Wilson: The committee has discussed how we could get individual markings on air weapons. We hope that the Scottish Government will look at some way of having individual air weapons marked so that, given that people register for an air weapons licence, weapons can be identified and traced to an individual owner.

Most of the production of air weapons takes place outwith the United Kingdom and most manufacturers do not put individual identifiers on weapons as they are manufactured. However, it would be useful if we could get some consideration of the marking of the individual air weapons that registered holders register with the police so that, if there are any incidents involving them, the police can easily identify the owner.

Michael Matheson: I fully understand where Mr Wilson is coming from on the issue. The challenge is to create a system that does not lend itself to being misused. The benefit of the serial number process for firearms is that there is numbering at the point of manufacture, and it is a system that is much more difficult to tamper with. It would be a much wider issue for us to try to deal with air weapons by having serial numbers embedded into them. That would go well beyond Scotland and would probably have to be taken forward on a Europe-wide basis, because there are also European regulations on firearms.

I appreciate the purpose and intent of what you would like to achieve, but it is outwith the scope of what we are doing at present. That is why we have taken what we believe is the pragmatic approach of licensing the individual in order to try to improve the way in which air weapons are held within the community.

John Wilson: I move on to the cost of applying for a licence. We know that the Scottish Government is keen to go for full cost recovery, and that the UK Government is considering the cost of registering firearms and shotguns.

The figures that have been presented include a UK figure of £88, but last night I read Association of Chief Police Officers in Scotland figures that indicate that the follow-through cost to the police of registering a firearm or shotgun will be in the region of £196. That equates to a subsidy of £146 for every licence that is applied for. If, as ACPOS says, shotgun licences cost £196 to process, and the UK Government controls the fees for licensing shotguns, if we go for full cost recovery of air weapons licensing, will it not, in effect, cost double to license an air weapon what it would cost to license a rifle or a shotgun?

Michael Matheson: Not necessarily. To be clear, we do not control the setting of the fees that are charged for firearms and shotguns, both of which are £50. The Home Office is looking at the possibility of increasing that figure; I do not think that it has been increased for some time and there is a general view that it should have been. Whether it will go to full cost recovery is a matter for the Home Office to determine, although I understand that it is looking at two types of costs: one for shotguns and one for firearms.

The checks that will be undertaken for the purposes of licensing an air weapon will not be of the same degree as those for the licensing of a firearm. The work that the police will do will not be as onerous as it is when someone applies for a firearms certificate. A large part of it will be consideration of the application and the police may do a quick check—almost a disclosure check—of whether anything in the person’s background suggests that they should not be allowed to have an air weapon, and a check on where the person stays and the purpose for which the air weapon is intended. The process is unlikely to involve to any great extent home visits, inspection of the device’s location and so on. The nature of the regime for air weapons licensing will not be as onerous as the nature of the regime for firearms. Therefore, it is reasonable to expect that the cost will be significantly less as a result.

We must wait for the outcome of the Home Office’s decision on what the rate for firearms and shotguns should be. Once it has determined that level, we will be able to consider what level the fee should be set at for an air weapon licence here in Scotland. That will be taken forward through secondary legislation.

John Wilson: Are you, or is anyone in your department, involved in negotiations with the Home Office regarding the setting of fees for firearms and shotguns? You said that you would await the outcome of the Home Office’s deliberations on licence fees for firearms and shotguns, which may impact on the fees that will be charged for an air weapon. Is the intention to go for full cost recovery for the licensing of an air weapon, rather than just to base the fee on a comparison with the licence fee for a shotgun or other weapons? Are we looking to have some kind of comparator for the fees that are charged for shotguns and other weapons and the fees that are charged for air weapons?

Michael Matheson: We have indicated to the Home Office that we believe there should be an increase in the fees for firearms and shotguns. Ultimately, it is for the Home Office to determine what the fees will be.

On air weapon licensing, we would like to get as close to full cost recovery as we can, but we have to wait to see how far we can pursue that, as it will be dependent on the approach that the Home Office takes to setting fees for firearms and shotguns. As I am sure members will appreciate, it would be difficult to put in place a fee for an air weapon that was significantly higher than the fee for firearms or a shotgun. We should try to get as close to full cost recovery as we can; we will have to wait for the Home Office’s determination on this matter, but we have indicated to it that we want the fees for firearms and shotguns to be increased.

10:15

Cameron Buchanan (Lothian) (Con): Good morning, cabinet secretary. We are concerned about group licences for triathlon clubs and so on that use airguns off premises. It is not very clear, but is it your intention that the whole group be licensed or that one person in the group be the licence holder? After all, it is often younger people who have these guns at home or in other places for use in triathlons, tetrathlons or whatever it is. Are we going to license the club, the manager of the club or the person who has the gun?

Michael Matheson: I will try to clarify that and then ask officials to give some more detail on specific aspects of the bill.

The general approach is for not only the club to have a licence as a shooting club but individuals who hold an air weapon to have an individual licence. In other words, anyone who wishes to purchase an air weapon will be required to have a licence for that purpose. As you will be aware, the bill contains a number of provisions under which under-18s from the age of 14 upwards can have a licence, but there are specific conditions on the circumstances in which the air weapon can be used, such as in shooting clubs or on private land. Those under 14 can use a weapon on private land as long as they are with an adult, by which we mean someone who is 21 or older.

That broadly mirrors the approach in firearms legislation, but it might help if I get my officials to give you a bit more detail about how the group provisions will work in practice.

Keith Main (Scottish Government): The bill contains a reference to the approval of clubs. Next month, we will meet the Scottish Target Shooting Federation and the Scottish Air Rifle and Pistol Association, and we are having discussions with them about how clubs will work in practice. The bill outlines an approval process that mirrors that for existing rifle clubs. A club can apply for a licence for set premises, and the police will look at the premises and approve the application if they consider that public safety will not be compromised.

Schedule 1 to the bill contains a series of exemptions, and there are also provisions governing permits for events. For example, you mentioned tetrathlons. If there is a Pony Club event or a Highland games at which air weapons are being used, the event organiser can apply for a permit, and individuals will be able to shoot within the conditions of the event without requiring their own licence.
As the cabinet secretary has said, it is a decision for individuals. Anyone who wants their own air weapon can apply for an individual licence, but there is an exemption for those who are shooting at an approved event or in an approved club.

Cameron Buchanan: My question was actually about a situation in which someone shoots for a shooting club at a match, tetrathlon or whatever in premises in, say, Carlisle or somewhere in the south that are not particularly licensed. However, you have made it clear that you are speaking to the organisations about that.

Keith Main: We are talking to the clubs about how exactly that would work, and our thinking is that, as we work through the issue with the federation and other organisations, we will set out the exact processes in secondary legislation and/or guidance.

Cameron Buchanan: Thank you very much.

Michael Matheson: It might be helpful if I explain that part of the reason for putting some of these things in secondary legislation is to allow us to tweak the system in response to any unintended consequences or difficulties that might arise. It just gives us a bit of flexibility to make some changes.

The Convener: That was useful, cabinet secretary. Thank you.

Cara Hilton (Dunfermline) (Lab): Let us return to the resourcing of the bill. It has been suggested that the introduction of the licensing scheme will have a significant impact on the resources of Police Scotland. Can you reassure the committee that Police Scotland will have the necessary resources at its disposal to administer the scheme? That is particularly a concern given that it could be dealing with tens of thousands of applications.

Michael Matheson: We have discussed with Police Scotland the best way in which we can manage what will be a significant increase in the number of licences that will have to be issued as a result of the bill. I found it interesting that there are significant peaks and troughs in firearms and shotgun registrations. There are periods when the police are busy with them and there are periods, over a couple of years, when it is quiet. They happen to be going into a busy period at the moment, as the 2015 to 2017 period is when there is a peak in the re-registration of firearms.

We have discussed with the police how we can shift much of the air weapons stuff to the periods when they are quieter, and part of the work that we are doing with them is looking at how we will commence implementation of the bill, including the lead-in time for people needing a certificate. We want to move the registrations to a quieter period for the police in order to level out their workload. We are working with the police to achieve that, and some of the commencement provisions in the bill also seek to achieve that in order to reduce the burden that the police may face over the next two years as the licensing of air weapons is added to their workload. We are keen to work with the police, and we are already engaged with them in looking at how we can achieve that most effectively.

Cara Hilton: I have a wee supplementary question. The cabinet secretary has hinted at an answer in his response.

Police Scotland has suggested a number of steps that would smooth the application process and avoid peak pressure points. You have already talked a bit about that, cabinet secretary. Would you be amenable to lodging appropriate amendments at stage 2 to give effect to the smoothing proposals that Police Scotland has suggested?

Michael Matheson: If there is a reasonable way in which we can achieve that. Some of the provisions on the commencement of different aspects of the bill can assist us in achieving that as well, through setting a lead-in time. I am open to working with the police on that.

The database system that the police use for the registration of such things is called Shogun, and they have said that it is more than capable. It is a recently developed piece of software. The legacy forces operated different systems, but we are now down to a single system for the whole of Scotland for the registration of firearms and Police Scotland has confirmed that the system is fit for purpose to deal with the registration.

Willie Coffey (Kilmarnock and Irvine Valley) (SNP): Good morning, cabinet secretary. Let us turn briefly to the issue of people who fail to get a licence and who perhaps go on to commit further offences with airguns. The expectation is that prosecutions for licensing offences are likely to be picked up in the investigation of other crimes. Do you have in mind a penalty for a person who fails to register an airgun and who is apprehended or investigated for some other crime?

Michael Matheson: Prosecution would be a matter for the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service, and the sanction that was applied would be a matter for the courts. I am reluctant to say what any penalty would be, as that would be for the courts to determine independently of Government.

One of the things that we are looking at, in the context of the commencement of the bill, is what would be a reasonable period of time for someone who has an air weapon to get it registered in. A public information campaign will ensure that those who currently own an air weapon are aware that they need to get a licence for it. There is also an element for the procurators fiscal and the Crown Office in working with us to take that forward.

The determination of the sanction would be a matter for the courts, and prosecution would be for the COPFS. It is important that we have a good information campaign to ensure that the owners of the potentially half a million air weapons that are out there are aware that they have a responsibility to have their weapons licensed—and, if they do not, that they could be committing an offence and could find themselves prosecuted. It would then be for the courts to determine the most appropriate sanction, depending on the individual circumstances.

Willie Coffey: I suspect that you will say the same thing, but I will take the question further. Should a person, as you indicated in your opening remarks, commit an offence with an air weapon—which can be particularly serious and can lead to death—would a different outcome be imposed on the person who commits such an offence and does not have a licensed weapon, or is that something that you would rather not speculate on?

Michael Matheson: If they do not have a licence, there is the offence of which they have committed in which they have injured someone with an air weapon and there is also the offence of not having a licence for the weapon. I would expect the courts to take that into account when any case is brought before them. There would be the potential for more than one offence to have been committed in such a case. It would not just be a case of their not having a licence; if they have injured or killed someone, there would be another offence for which they could be prosecuted. If they do not have a licence, that could be one of the factors that they could find themselves being prosecuted for.

Clare Adamson: I have a very brief supplementary. My original question, and that of Mr Coffey, concerns what the criminal element of this will be. The police said in evidence that a misuse of plinking can be dealt with under current legislation, and any animal cruelty elements are also seen as criminal activities at the moment. However, there is the issue of how ownership of a weapon is determined in the situation in which there is no link between the licence holder and a particular air weapon. What would be the criminality of someone not having a licence, and how would that be identified? If there is no compulsion for a licence holder to store a weapon at a particular address, could someone not just say that they had borrowed it?

Michael Matheson: It will be an offence to have an air weapon that does not have a licence. If a person does not have a licence for the weapon, they will be committing an offence from the outset. For example, the police might turn up at a property because of a domestic dispute and, while they are there, they might see an air rifle sitting in the hall. At present, they are powerless to do anything about that, and they have no knowledge of what the weapon might be used for. Under the bill, the police will be able to ask whether the person has a licence for the weapon. If the person does not have a licence, they will be committing an offence.

When someone applies for a licence for an air weapon, they will have to explain to the police the purpose for which they want the licence—how they intend to use the weapon. For example, is it for vermin control? Is it for sporting purposes? Is it for plinking? If it is for plinking, the police would consider the circumstances, finding out where the person lives and where the plinking might take place. The purpose for which the air weapon is held will be part of the check when someone applies for a licence. For example, if someone is applying for an air weapon to do plinking and they stay in a tenement with a back garden that is shared with the rest of the folk in the tenement, the police will be allowed to say that they do not think that it is appropriate for that person to have an air weapon to undertake that plinking in the shared back garden of their tenement. That is the approach that the police will be able to take under the bill.

Linking a particular incident to a particular weapon will always be a challenge. It can be a challenge for firearms and for shotguns, too. Earlier this week, the British Transport Police put out another call for evidence on a railway worker who had been shot with an airgun in High Bonnybridge, in my constituency. That is the type of thing that people continue to experience.

We are providing the powers for the police, when they see an air weapon, to check that it has a licence. If it does not have a licence, a person has committed an offence and the weapon can be seized.

The Convener: We move on to alcohol licensing. We have heard quite a lot about the Brightcrew Ltd v City of Glasgow Licensing Board court decision. What effect has that decision had on licensing decision making generally? What steps, if any, does the Government plan to take to address the matter?

10:30

Michael Matheson: Our general view about the Brightcrew decision was that it confirmed the purpose of an alcohol licence for premises. There was clearly an issue about the way in which the case was conducted and about how the licensing board of Glasgow City Council sought to use the licence for other entertainment that was taking place within the establishment.

The Brightcrew case probably provides a reason why we have chosen to take a position on licensing provision for other types of entertainment that can take place in such premises; we have made additional provision within the proposed legislation for a further licensing measure to be taken by a local authority, for example for sexual entertainment that is offered within a premises. Licensing authorities will now be able to have a stated policy in that respect.

The Convener: We will come to the sexual entertainment aspects later. You are obviously making provision to close loopholes. We have taken a fair bit of evidence in correspondence from the police about members’ clubs. We know that members’ clubs are not included in an assessment of overprovision and cannot be refused a premises licence or a variation on those grounds. They are under no requirement to have a designated premises manager—DPM—or to have safe and supply of alcohol authorised by a personal licence holder. Furthermore, we have heard that there is a fair amount of use of occasional licences in members’ clubs.

Do you think that those legislative loopholes should be closed and that the same rules should apply to members’ clubs as apply to other licensed premises?

Michael Matheson: I am aware that there are some issues. When the Licensing (Scotland) Bill—the eventual Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005—was being scrutinised, Parliament decided that members’ clubs should have some extra provisions. That was largely reflective of the nature of such clubs in some of our communities: they could be associated with particular companies or businesses, including factories that used to be based the community; they could be social clubs; or they could be sports clubs that have a members’ club attached. Parliament took the view that members’ clubs have particular value within communities and so the licensing regime should reflect that. It was considered that such clubs should be given some exemptions under provisions in the 2005 act.

I am still of the view that such clubs have an important part to play. Any changes would have to be very carefully considered, bearing in mind the potential negative consequences on members’ clubs, many of which do not operate commercially—they are not full profit-making businesses, as others are. I am open to hearing and considering the committee’s views on the matter, if there are particular aspects that you believe could or should be addressed, but I would want to be very careful about introducing any changes that could have unintended consequences.

There are more points to make about occasional licences. First, occasional licences should not be abused; it is important that local licensing boards ensure that that is the case. Where there is evidence that they are being misused, whether by members’ clubs or others, I would expect the local licensing board to take appropriate action to ensure that that does not happen. There is absolutely no reason why local licensing boards cannot take action if they believe that occasional licences are being misused by particular members’ clubs or any other party.

The Convener: It has been suggested by a number of witnesses that occasional licences become almost permanent licences, because it is the norm for a club or another body to apply for the same thing again and again. Do you feel that that is an abuse of the occasional licence system? How do we ensure that licensing boards do not continue to sign off occasional licences that have become the norm?

Michael Matheson: The purpose of the occasional licence was to provide flexibility for local licensing boards. There are provisions in the existing legislation for voluntary organisations, for instance. In any period of 12 months, the total number of days for which an occasional licence is issued may not exceed 56.

If there is clear evidence in a particular local authority area of misuse of the provisions of the 2005 act in how occasional licences are being granted, we can consider that in our engagement with the clerks of licensing boards. If necessary, we can consider whether any further guidance needs to be issued to them on how such licences should be used and when they should not be used. If there is clear evidence of misuse, I am more than happy for our officials to consider that.

The Convener: Does the Government currently analyse the number of occasional licences that are issued by each board?

Michael Matheson: I am not aware of that. Peter Reid is probably better placed to advise you.

Peter Reid (Scottish Government): We collect figures on premises licences and personal licences. Unfortunately, we do not currently collect figures on the number of occasional licences. We believe that a considerable number are applied for.

There is an existing order-making power that would allow us to impose a limit on the number of occasional licences that can be applied for related to a premises licence or personal licence. That power has not been used yet, but the limit is something like the 56 days relating to voluntary clubs. It could be applied, if necessary.

The Convener: It seems from the evidence that we have taken that granting of occasional licences is a major problem for some areas. It might be wise to collect and analyse figures so that you can see whether there is a real problem in certain places. It may be that some folk are overegging the pudding, but that does not seem to be the case.

Michael Matheson: Let us take that issue away. We can consider what further work can be done to get a better handle on the figures in various licensing board areas, and what further measures could assist in addressing some of the concerns that the committee has heard.

Cameron Buchanan: I notice that the term “voluntary organisation” has not really been defined. Do you intend to define it a bit more clearly in relation to occasional licences?

Michael Matheson: I am not sure where that is within the existing legislation, but I presume that it is tied in with the statutory provision for voluntary organisations.

Peter Reid: It is correct that voluntary organisation is not currently defined. My understanding is that that expression has been in the existing legislation since it was introduced. I was looking at a paralegal handbook the other day, whose author says that he is not aware of any particular abuse of the lack of a definition, which you have pointed to. If we become aware of such concerns, we can certainly look into the matter.

Cameron Buchanan: Some people have said that the term “voluntary organisation” should be more closely defined—I think that that was in the submission from Police Scotland.

Michael Matheson: As Peter Reid said, if there is an identifiable problem, we can consider addressing it. The most obvious way to do that is to tie the matter into registrations of voluntary organisations. Voluntary organisations have a legal responsibility to register. We can address the issue if necessary, but I would be keen first to see evidence of a problem.

John Wilson: We have heard from health and other organisations that we should be trying with the bill to address overprovision and the effects of alcohol on many communities throughout Scotland. The suggestion is that licensing boards should be more proactive—that it should be ensured that a clear statement is made by the local authority or licensing board about overprovision and that that is monitored very carefully. However, some licensing clerks have said that the legislation that is in place does not allow them to be as proactive as those organisations would like them to be. Do you see the bill and the advice or guidance that is given to licensing boards and clerks leading to a sea change in overprovision of licensed premises?

Michael Matheson: I am always interested, when someone says that legislation does not go far enough, in giving them guidance. I have found that one licensing board can take a very proactive approach on overprovision while a neighbouring licensing board takes a less proactive approach. I am not entirely convinced that the ability to address overprovision is to do with legislation itself.

We must ensure that public health is one of the five key principles on which licensing policy is founded and should be taken forward. A big part of this is to make sure that local licensing policy is properly reflective of that, and that there is good engagement among stakeholders, particularly in terms of colleagues in public health commenting. The legislation already makes some provision for that.

One thing that we are doing with this bill is giving licensing boards more scope to consider overprovision in their wider areas and not just within small localities, including scope to look at issues such as hours for licensed premises within their area. Greater scope will give them more flexibility to consider a wider range of issues related to overprovision.

As a former Minister for Public Health, I say that this is an area where we can make more progress, and I would like to see more progress being made. Some licensing boards have been enlightened and much more proactive than others; I would like to see more of them being proactive. It is important to make sure that local licensing policies are more reflective of public health.

I am keen for us to look at any further measures that we can take forward at national level, whether through guidance or through work with licensing board members themselves, to make sure that the whole issue of overprovision and how it ties in to public health is seen as an important part of their responsibility and how they take forward their policy.

John Wilson: I welcome that statement. The difficulty is, as you just outlined, the discrepancy that seems to exist in terms of interpretation of the powers that licensing boards have under the current legislation. Given the discrepancies in interpretation among boards, what assurances can you give us that there will be greater clarity in the application of this new legislation? As you mentioned, in your previous role as Minister for Public Health, you saw for yourself examples of overprovision—particularly of off-licence sales—having a dramatic effect on the health and wellbeing of many communities. What assurances can we have that the health impact on communities will be addressed through the bill?

Michael Matheson: We are giving licensing boards additional scope in terms of the range of things that they can consider when it comes to overprovision. As I mentioned, that scope is around establishments’ hours of operation and around boards’ ability to look at the wider area and not just a locality. The bill will allow wider scope to take in those factors.

The other part is about some aspects of the alignment of the local licensing policies and how boards arrive at that. There has been some difficulty, for example, with the way in which the policies have been taken forward and how they align with local government elections. We are taking forward some measures to assist in achieving that.

One thing that struck me in my previous role is that good practice is not always as widely disseminated as it should be. There are things that we do at national level involving different stakeholder groups, and there are events that are aimed at trying to spread and embed some of that good practice.

I accept that there is still a significant way to go. I do not think that it is just about legislation; some of it is about the policy approach, and some of it is about making sure that overprovision is seen as a much higher priority by the boards that do not prioritise it as highly as they should. Part of that is about the guidance and direction and what we do with licensing boards and other stakeholders to ensure that the matter is seen as a priority.

The other issue is to ensure that local territorial health boards are proactive in the local licensing forum and in responding to the new applications or major variations that they must be consulted on. They should make their positions very clear and respond appropriately in order to inform licensing boards.

Trying to get everybody to move in the same direction at the same time is never easy. There is a range of things in the bill to ensure that the issue is seen as a major priority that people need to be more proactive on, and we are doing work that can assist us in helping to achieve that.

John Wilson: Thank you.

Clare Adamson: I have a couple of questions about personal licence holders. The bill seeks to remove the automatic five-year ban for people who have not retrained for personal licences, but quite a number of people will be caught up before the eventual act’s introduction. Obviously, that ban would have a detrimental effect on their employment prospects. Can the Scottish Government do anything to alleviate that situation before the bill becomes law?

Michael Matheson: We would require primary legislation to alter that. There is no quick fix by which we can deal with the issue. The provisions in the bill that will address it will help to restate it.

A tremendous amount of work has been taken forward to ensure that refresher courses are available in the trade and through the licensing boards, but it is clear that some people have missed out on them, for whatever reason.

The five-year period for which people are prevented from having a personal licence is too long. Once the bill is through Parliament, we can look at how quickly we can commence the provision in the bill to try to address the matter as quickly as possible. I have asked officials to look at that. Once the bill is through the parliamentary process and has the consent of Parliament, we will try to commence the provision as early as we can to address the issue. MSPs have written to me with various options that they think may be available to try to address it. We have looked at the legal issues, and we cannot use those options: primary legislation is required. I have outlined the quickest way for us to deal with the matter.

Clare Adamson: Obviously, when personal licence holders were introduced, there were definite intentions with regard to selling alcohol. We took evidence from a council legal representative who was concerned about the lack of prosecutions of licence holders who sell alcohol to people who are drunk. Obviously, the antisocial behaviour aspect of people being drunk in the community is the big consideration for many people. Police Scotland said in evidence when I asked that that is very difficult to establish, so it does not use that part of the legislation. Does it concern you that there is maybe a gap where there was an intention that it would be more difficult to sell to people who were already drunk, and that licence holders would need to be more responsible. The intention is not currently being enforced.

Michael Matheson: Was there an issue about a lack of prosecutions or a lack of reporting?

Clare Adamson: I am pretty sure that the representative from Midlothian Council—I think—said that the problem is the lack of prosecutions. Basically, the police said that it is very difficult to establish what “drunk” means and who was responsible for selling alcohol to a person who was involved in antisocial behaviour or a public display of drunkenness afterwards.
Michael Matheson: Obviously, there are two aspects. There is reporting a matter for the police to investigate, and there is reporting to the procurator fiscal. Decisions on prosecution are for the Crown Office and Procurator Fiscal Service. We cannot direct that.

I would be interested to know whether it is being said that cases are being reported to the Procurator Fiscal Service but not being prosecuted, or whether the police are saying that in such circumstances there is not sufficient evidence to put a report to the procurator fiscal.

It is important that the power exists, although I think that it is more appropriate in relation to a regular pattern emerging in a particular establishment. I am sure that members have at various times had representations from communities about particular local issues. There will be better scope to look at taking that forward.

However, there is a distinction to be made between cases that the police think are difficult to prove or demonstrate and therefore to report to the procurator fiscal, and cases that are reported to the procurator fiscal, who chooses not to prosecute them. We need to clarify that.

I am more than happy for us to discuss with the Crown Office what particular issues are arising and what could assist it in deciding which cases should be prosecuted. We can take that away and discuss it with the Crown Office.

Clare Adamson: That would be very helpful.

Cameron Buchanan: At one of our meetings we discussed the plight of personal licence holders who had lost their licence and for whom it would take a long time to get it back. I understood that that would be dealt with in secondary legislation.

The Convener: I think that the cabinet secretary has just said that that could be done only in primary legislation.

Cameron Buchanan: Yes—he said that, but we had been told that it could be done in secondary legislation. What is the issue?

The Convener: Cabinet secretary, perhaps you could just reiterate what you have just said to Miss Adamson.

Michael Matheson: There have been representations suggesting that the issue could be tackled in secondary legislation; those are being considered. The legal advice from our officials is that we need to amend primary legislation to deal with the issue. The provisions in the bill will do that. We are looking at trying to commence the relevant provision as early as we reasonably can in order to deal with the issue.

Cameron Buchanan: Thank you.

The Convener: At the moment, 11 out of 40 licensing boards have not published licensing policy statements and 17 have not published overprovision statements. What action can the Government take to address that situation and ensure that the system works properly for the people of Scotland?

Michael Matheson: By their very nature, licensing boards are quasi-judicial bodies, which, to a large extent, sit to the side of the local authority, given that local councillors sit on them. It is important that we provide them with the right support and assistance.

Peter Reid can perhaps explain some of the work that has been undertaken to try to ensure that the licensing boards are taking forward the licensing policies and updating them, as well as the measures that we have taken to encourage them to produce overprovision statements.

Peter Reid: The licensing policy statement is a relatively recent innovation in licensing. The intention is to provide a shift to a more policy-based regime that can be adopted by licensing boards. The regime would be more akin to something like planning regimes, in which there is an overall strategy within which decisions are delivered. The licensing policy statement is intended to be a tool to assist boards in deciding how they want to deliver the overarching strategy. Within that, the overprovision assessment gives them a strong ground to refuse a licence or major variation should they choose to do so. I see it as a tool to support boards in decision making. It is unfortunate that some licensing boards have failed to be proactive, or as proactive as they should be, and have not grasped the opportunity to use the licensing regime in that strategic way.

The Convener: You said that some boards “have failed to be proactive”, and the cabinet secretary talked about “enlightened” boards. Is it fair to say that by not having plans in place to ensure that they are able to have a say in what is going on, boards are not carrying out their duty to serve the public in their area? Does the fact that boards do not have policy statements or overprovision statements in place mean that it is much easier for them to be defeated in court?

Peter Reid: In part, yes, but we accept that licensing boards face a wide variety of circumstances. The sort of issues that we might discuss in relation to overprovision and some of the other material that would be included in the licensing policy statement might be more germane to and faster moving in some areas.

I am not seeking to tar all areas with the same brush. There are major issues in some areas while... others are at more of a steady state and there is less change from year to year. It is absolutely appropriate that some licensing boards are not so proactive in updating the documents because they have probably not much need to.

The Convener: Are they not proactive or are they damned useless?

Peter Reid: That is not for me to say.

Michael Matheson: The convener made a fair point about the fact that some licensing boards have been less proactive. Clearly, the committee is concerned about the issue, so I would be more than happy to consider the committee’s views on how that could be more readily addressed and on particular measures that the committee believes would achieve that. We could consider whether there is further work that we could take forward to deal with boards that are not being as proactive as either the committee or I would like.

The Convener: Thank you, cabinet secretary. We move on to taxi and private hire car licensing.

One of the things that we have found while taking evidence is that this is an ever-moving feast in terms of new technologies. We are keen to hear about how we can future proof or come back to the issue in the future if need be. There are app-based company models in place in many parts of the world, and only today we see reported in The Scotsman that a company hopes to establish a presence in Edinburgh and Glasgow. How do we ensure that we continue with the regime that we have here, which means that the car is licensed and the individual is licensed to deal with the public?

I always look at this issue by asking whether I would be happy for one of my nieces to step into a car. The current regime, which means that there are licences for vehicles and licences for drivers, pacifies me. How do we ensure that that continues and that any of the new companies that enter the market do not get away with not having both their transport and drivers licensed?

Michael Matheson: Someone who is operating a taxi needs a taxi licence and someone who is operating a private hire car needs a private hire licence. We have in place a legal framework that covers when someone orders a taxi using an app, which some taxi companies and private hire companies use and which I have no doubt we will see more of in the years to come.

Anyone who operates a private hire car without a private hire licence is committing an offence. The regulatory regime that is in place says that no matter how someone orders their taxi or private hire car, it has to comply with the licensing regime. If a company uses an app that allows private hire cars to operate without a private hire licence, that company is committing an offence. There is also licensing of booking offices.

We have a fairly robust system in place and we can alter it in the future through secondary legislation as necessary. It is important to ensure that the legislation is appropriately enforced.

The Convener: Does a booking office have to be in the local authority area in which the company is operating, or is it possible to have a booking office for the whole of Scotland? There seemed to be some debate about that with regard to the provisions of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982. Also, what is the definition of a booking office? Could a booking office be established in somebody’s front room or the cupboard under the stairs?

Michael Matheson: That would be an interesting place to have a booking office. Peter Reid is probably better placed to tell you where the booking office has to be based for the purpose of the licence.

We have in place a robust legislative framework and, even if new technology is being used, that still has to be complied with. It is important that we enforce that and make that clear.

Peter Reid: We were interested in the conversations that were had at the evidence-gathering sessions and the various views that were expressed. The booking office regime is entirely in secondary legislation. It has been created under secondary legislation and we could also amend it in secondary legislation. Therefore, it is not something that we would be compelled to amend within the scope of the bill.

From looking at it quickly, our view was that the premises would have to be licensed where the order was taken. However, if genuine difficulty and confusion in relation to licensing is being experienced by licensing authorities, it is possible for us to amend the relevant order to clarify that.

The Convener: But now that there are apps and so on, how can you define where the order is taken? It is not as though I am phoning up and talking to someone in an office. It is a different world now.

Peter Reid: Yes, you make a good point. Clearly, when it was drafted, the original secondary legislation envisaged somebody sitting somewhere receiving a phone call and taking the order. That notion does not translate quite so well to a smartphone app existing in the ether. We would be happy to consider that further.

The Convener: And will you do so? You suggested at the beginning that you might do it, but I think that it is something that has to be considered further.

Michael Matheson: What we are confident about is the licensing regime that we have. We can adapt to developments in new technology if particular circumstances arise that need to be addressed. That is why we deal with these issues through secondary legislation. As and when issues are presented to us that indicate that there is a need for us to alter the secondary legislation, we can respond to that at that point.

The Convener: Thank you.

Willie Coffey: During our discussions about this matter, a case arose in the media about a taxi driver who had had a series of complaints made against him and did not make that information known to a neighbouring authority when he applied for a taxi driver's licence there. How can we help to protect the public from those types of risks, and is it possible to share that level of information between licensing boards if it has not already made it on to, for example, the Police Scotland database system?

Michael Matheson: It is possible for the information to be shared between licensing boards if they consider that appropriate. For example, if someone is applying for a licence to a particular local authority for a taxi and private hire licence and that authority knew that the person had been operating somewhere else, it would be reasonable for that authority to contact the other authority to see whether there was any information that should be brought to its attention. There is also the possibility to get further information from the police and to have a case checked to see whether there is something on their system.

Local authorities can undertake quite a significant level of checking, as they see fit, in particular circumstances.

Willie Coffey: Is it a discretionary matter for the local authority that is being applied to? It is not always going to be certain where the person has operated previously. It might be the local authority area in which they live, but it might not be. Is there any central way of accessing that information, much in the way that Police Scotland has national access to that kind of information?

Michael Matheson: Certain information will have to be disclosed at the time of application for a licence, but the undertaking of any wider checks would be at the discretion of the local authority and its individual application of the law. Some information will have to be provided and local authorities will have the discretion to carry out further checks on an individual, but there is no mandatory requirement for that.

Willie Coffey: Thank you.

John Wilson: During the evidence sessions, the issue has been raised of the discrepancy in the licensing of taxis and private hire cars. The representative of one local authority said that it applies a cap on the number of taxis that can operate in the area but not on the number of private hire licences that it issues. They claimed that the authority is using the 1982 act to impose a cap on the number of taxis but that that act does not give it the power to impose a cap on the number of private hire cars. The issue is whether it is fair practice to have a cap on the number of taxis that are operating in an area without having a similar cap on the number of private hire cars.

Michael Matheson: These are difficult things to measure. Because of the way in which a taxi operates—it can be hailed or ranked—demand can be measured more readily. It is more difficult to measure the demand for private hire cars, which are not ranked and cannot be hailed. We have taken two different approaches in how licensing authorities can measure demand in order to give them the scope to address that.

I am not entirely sure whether there is provision in the 1982 act for what you describe.

Peter Reid: At present, there is an unmet demand test for taxi vehicle licences. The Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill proposes an overprovision test for private hire car vehicle licences. As the cabinet secretary points out, the tests are slightly different because the two types of vehicle operate in slightly different ways.

Michael Matheson: The bill will provide a mechanism for local authorities to measure overprovision of private hire cars, and we will undertake some work with local authorities on how they can do that and what that process might look like. It is more difficult to measure demand for private hire cars given that they operate in a different way from taxis, which can be ranked and hailed and, therefore, measured more readily.

The Convener: It has been suggested that a cap on the number of private hire cars already exists in certain parts of the country, including in my city of Aberdeen. Is that allowed under the 1982 act?

Peter Reid: I had a word with somebody in Aberdeen City Council. It does not apply a cap on the number of private hire cars, but I recall that there are very few private hire cars in Aberdeen. The regimes are different throughout the country and look quite different.
The Convener: Do you think that there are fewer private hire cars in Aberdeen because there is an unofficial cap?

Peter Reid: My understanding is that there is no cap. Maybe people prefer to operate as taxis rather than private hires. If the licence fees are about the same, it makes sense to apply for a taxi licence.

The Convener: Could you better monitor the different ways in which local authorities handle and interpret the legislation? Do you think that you will be able to apply the new legislation better than you are able to apply the current legislation in terms of monitoring?

Michael Matheson: The idea behind the new legislation is to give local authorities more flexibility in how they can measure such things, and we will do some additional work to assist them in that. What we have not tried to do is create a one-size-fits-all approach. The approach taken in Aberdeen is not necessarily the approach that should be taken in Inverness, so we try to allow a level of flexibility for local licensing authorities to determine how many taxis they should have to serve their purposes—and the issues around that—and what mechanisms they have in place to deal with private hires. We are trying to get a balance between allowing local flexibility and having in place a regime that people can have confidence in and which helps them assess the issues at the local level.

The Convener: Apologies, John, but I had to get the Aberdeen issue in.

John Wilson: No problem, convener.

Cabinet secretary, I raised the issue of taxis versus private hire cars because, in many taxi ranks in Scottish towns and cities, you will find taxis sitting there, not getting any business, whereas outside major supermarkets you will see private hire cars regularly picking up shoppers, because they have direct lines to some of the private hire companies.

My question is whether we are getting the balance right between unmet demand and overprovision. Should we have more taxis operating or should we allow the ever-increasing growth of private hire cars that seems to be happening in many areas in Scotland? As you are well aware, private hire cars do not have the same restrictions on them as taxis have, in terms of the knowledge, the licensing of the car and the other issues that apply to a taxi operator. Would it not be fair to bring some of the private hire car operators into line with some of the restrictions that we apply to taxis?

Michael Matheson: It is not for the Government to set what the percentage should be of taxis and private hire cars in a local authority area; it is local licensing authorities’ responsibility to reflect local need. We are providing a mechanism for the consideration of the issue of overprovision. Some of the work that we will do off the back of the bill will assist in how that can be applied locally. It will then be for local authorities to determine how they want to take that forward at the local policy level.

I recognise the point that John Wilson makes, but we would get into very dangerous territory if the Government started to try to set some of the limits around these matters. We are providing a mechanism and the scope for local licensing authorities to determine things at local level, depending on local circumstances, and we will do support work to help them to achieve that as effectively as possible.

John Wilson: Will you assure me that the Government will work closely with local authorities on identifying overprovision? Earlier, when you spoke about overprovision and unmet need, you raised the issue that there are clear difficulties in measuring that in the private hire car sector rather than the taxi sector, given how the private hire car sector operates and how it records journeys.

Michael Matheson: We are providing a legal framework for local authorities to assess those matters, and we are giving them the support that they need to interpret that at the local level. We are not going to get into the situation where we start to set limits nationally on how things should be applied locally, because rural areas have different needs to urban areas.

I can assure you that we are going to do some work on the overprovision assessment with local authorities, regarding how they can apply that and interpret it locally, in order to determine policy.

The Convener: It has been suggested that a number of rural authorities may be concerned about the impact of removing the contract exemption. Would you consider making the power to do so discretionary?

Michael Matheson: Before we remove the contract exemption, we are going to work with local authorities to understand how that would apply to their circumstances. We can address some of the concerns through secondary legislation. Before we go ahead with the removal, we will take forward some aspects that will allow local authorities to provide exemptions as they see fit. We will deal with that through secondary legislation.

The Convener: Thank you.

We move on to metal dealer licensing. During the evidence taking, there was quite some discussion about the definition of a metal dealer. We heard from some of the folk from the industry that waste dealers can deal in metal as well. How can we ensure that the bill works properly and prevents people who might not currently be defined as metal dealers from dealing in stolen metal?

Michael Matheson: We are trying to achieve an approach that does not mean that a plumber who deals with a bit of discarded metal, such as copper, is classified as a metal dealer. The definitions that we have set out in the bill try to achieve that balance as best we can. The licensing regime that has been put in place for metal dealers assists us in achieving that. It is not our intention for a plumber who might have some scrap copper from his work to find that he needs to register as a metal dealer. The bill’s provisions should guard against that happening.

The Convener: I understand that. It is the commonsense approach. However, we heard from folks in the industry about waste dealers who are licensed by the Scottish Environment Protection Agency and often deal in metal. In many cases, they were referred to as itinerant dealers. How do we ensure that they are covered by the regime?

Michael Matheson: If those people deal in waste, they obviously have to be registered with SEPA, but was the view that they should also be required to register as scrap metal dealers?

The Convener: The scrap metal dealers felt that waste dealers were given much freer rein than they were, although the waste dealers often deal with substantial amounts of metal.

Michael Matheson: I am more than happy to take that issue away and consider whether we can do something further on it. I do not know whether there is any further scope to do anything in the bill, but we were generally of the view that the current definition of metal dealers and the registration scheme for them were sufficient. Walter Drummond-Murray might be able to say a bit more about that.

Walter Drummond-Murray (Scottish Government): The bill does not amend the definition in the 1982 act. That definition has been in operation for 33 years and, on that basis, cannot be miles away from being right. However, we are aware of the concerns that the dealers raised in their evidence. We have had discussions with them and are happy to consider whether amendment of the definition is required at stage 2.

As the cabinet secretary mentioned, it is a question of balance. We want to catch some of the people who are on the margins, such as the itinerant dealers who only collect door to door but do not make a payment for the metal and, in effect, only sell. They would not be caught at the moment, so there is a suggestion that we should change the definition of a dealer from somebody who buys and sells to somebody who buys or sells. We are happy to consider that while trying to maintain the balance of not capturing people who are very peripheral, a plumber being the classic example.

The Convener: Just because something has been in place for 33 years does not necessarily mean that it is right, Mr Drummond-Murray. The matter certainly seems to worry the scrap metal dealers, who obviously want to co-operate. They feel that others are in the same business but not facing the same regulatory regime.

During the evidence that the police gave on the licensing of metal dealers, it came to light that they deal with the licensing of pedlars on a nationwide basis. Instead of licensing scrap metal dealers at a local level, would it be wiser to license them at a national level and bring the itinerant dealers into that regime too?

Michael Matheson: It is possible to do that. I am not entirely sure how extensive an issue it is or how much of a problem it is. The important point is that we are trying to take a proportionate approach. We do not want to inadvertently draw people into the registration process whom we had not intended to draw in through the provision. I recognise your concern, but I am not entirely sure how extensive the issue is and whether it would require further registration to deal with it.

The Convener: Okay.

Willie Coffey: Cabinet secretary, we heard in evidence that some of the greatest gains that were made down south were due to the removal of the cash payment system. One of the proposals in this bill is to remove the requirement to store metal for 48 hours before processing and we also heard in evidence that some people felt that it was unlikely that the police would be able to respond and inspect premises within 48 hours. If we remove the 48-hour requirement but the police have difficulty in inspecting premises within that timeframe in any case, how effective might that be in aiding the detection of metal theft?

Michael Matheson: Again, that is an example of trying to take a proportionate approach. Once a metal dealer holds certain types of metal for a particular period of time, they have to get into registration from SEPA and so on, which can add a significant burden to the process. There are particular time thresholds for certain metal types. Once people pass those thresholds and they have to have that certification from SEPA, how the metal is stocked has to change as regards individual piles and so on. Many of the scrap metal dealers just do not have the space to be able to accommodate that.
Again, we have tried to take a balanced approach. We need to recognise the possibility that we could push the burden so far that, for many metal dealers, it would become unsustainable and they would not be able to operate their businesses because of the additional regulation that they would face for holding certain metals and because of how those metals would have to be stored.

We need to balance that possibility against trying to ensure that we have a reasonable enforcement regime that is able to deal with metal theft, which is—and has been—a big problem. It is about trying to balance those factors as appropriately as we can. The timeframe is a reflection of that.

Willie Coffey: Will the greatest gain for us be in the removal of the cash element? That seemed to have a significant effect down south, according to those who gave evidence from the relevant jurisdictions.

Michael Matheson: That has now been in place for a year or two down south and it appears to have made a significant impact. I think that it will work here too because it creates an auditable trail that can be pursued. The removal of the cash element will also challenge those who may have got metals illegally—it will place them in much greater difficulty as regards being able to dispose of those metals because of how payment will have to be carried out. I think that it will act as a deterrent and that it will assist us in being able to investigate cases and pursue cases in which metal has been gained illegally.

Cameron Buchanan: I think that you may have already answered my question—I wanted to ask about the advantage of a national licence system. I am not sure whether you think that it is a good idea to have a national licence system.

Michael Matheson: It is about trying to take a proportionate approach at a local level. I am keen for local authorities to be able to take things forward in a way that best fits their areas. I think that the regime that we have set out can best help achieve that, rather than a move to a national registration scheme.

John Wilson: Cabinet secretary, in one evidence session, we heard from some of the power companies regarding the cost of scrap metal. In effect, they were arguing that the pieces of metal or wiring or cabling that are stolen have fairly insignificant value but the cost of the damage that is done in stealing it could run into thousands or even hundreds of thousands of pounds and could endanger life in the affected area.

How would you like to see us incorporate not just the value of the metal stolen but the overall cost of the damage that has been caused to the energy companies, households and others when individuals are before the courts for the theft of cabling or metal?

Michael Matheson: It is really for the courts to determine that. It would not really be appropriate for the Government to set down what it would expect the court to do in dealing with the costs. I am sure that members are aware that when it comes to determining a sentence, courts will look at the full range of circumstances, including the associated costs, the relative damage and the danger that someone committing metal theft may have caused. The final determination would be a matter for the courts.

I have heard of cases of metal theft in which those carrying out the theft not only have caused others to be put in danger but have put themselves in significant danger in order to get the metal, as well as causing a lot of other people significant inconvenience, including by causing power cuts. I suffered a power cut a number of months back as a result of a metal theft—or attempted metal theft—that was taking place in what I think was a Scottish Power facility.

It is a serious issue, and some of the additional measures that we are taking recognise that, in order to deal with it much more effectively. I have no doubt that courts will take these things extremely seriously, but it is not for me to start determining what the courts should do. I would be very reluctant to go down that route, given courts’ independence.

John Wilson: I am well aware of the independence of the judicial system in Scotland and the UK, but I am keen to ensure that when the police and the Procurator Fiscal Service take forward cases, they look at the total cost of the damage that has been done to a community by the theft of cabling or other metals, so that when someone appears before the courts, not just do they answer for the theft of £200 or £1,000 of cabling, but the other factors, including the cost of repairing the damage, are taken into consideration, so that the courts can fully understand not just the final cost of the metal stolen but the other issues caused.

Michael Matheson: I would expect that when a case is being prosecuted in the courts the overall cost would form part of the case. I would expect that the prosecution would make sure that it was brought to the attention of the courts and that it would be part of the facts presented. How much weight an individual sheriff or judge gave that would obviously be for them to determine, but I would certainly expect it to be part of the information that is put before the court when a case is being prosecuted.
Cara Hilton: We heard evidence that changing the law in itself does not reduce crime; in England and Wales it seemed to be specific enforcement action that made the difference. I would be keen to hear more about what plans the Scottish Government has to encourage and resource enforcement action to support the new licensing regime when it comes in.

Michael Matheson: A major part of the enforcement is for Police Scotland to take forward. I am confident that it has the resources to be able to do that effectively. The other measures that we are putting in place assist Police Scotland to investigate these matters more thoroughly. The provision that one is not able to pay cash for metal and the requirement to take down details will create an auditable trail, which will allow anyone in the police who is investigating something to be able to trace things much more effectively and to see who was involved in procuring the metal in the first place. The measures will assist us in tackling some of that, but I am confident that Police Scotland has the resource to be able to take forward appropriate enforcement measures as it sees fit.

The Convener: I return to Mr Wilson’s comment about the offence. The bill states:

“a person who commits an offence under this section is liable, on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding level 5 on the standard scale.”

My understanding is that a level 5 fine is not that high.

Michael Matheson: We can give you some details on that.

Walter Drummond-Murray: You are right that in our view the penalties are probably inadequate. That is something that we may seek to address at stage 2.

The Convener: Okay. Thanks very much. I suggest that we take a very short comfort break before we move on to the final couple of furlongs. I suspend the meeting for five minutes.

11:30

Meeting suspended.

11:35

On resuming—

The Convener: We move on to the provisions that deal with sexual entertainment licensing. In taking evidence, we found frustration among members of the public about the different bodies that deal with the various aspects of such licensing. The Brightcrew case highlighted the alcohol aspects. Some elements are dealt with by licensing committees rather than boards. We have also found that planning authorities are responsible for advertising outwith premises, which seems to be a major problem. We realise that certain aspects are being brought together, but would it not be better to bring together all the aspects of sexual entertainment licensing and advertising under the remit of one body so that the public know where to go if they have a complaint about a venue?

Michael Matheson: I can see the attraction of that, although licensing boards have a specific statutory function to undertake, which is somewhat different from but similar to that of local authority licensing committees. I would be reluctant to go down the route of having a single committee or board that was responsible for all the licensing provisions. There might be a practical challenge with taking forward some of that work at local level for the licensing body members who would deal with all that.

There are particular specialities. One benefit that we get from licensing boards is that we have a group of elected members who have had additional specialist training and have developed expertise in and understanding of alcohol licensing. We should value that.

I am inclined to retain the current approach, although that is not to say that there is no scope for improving how the system operates. When an individual wants to complain to a local authority—whether about alcohol or some form of entertainment—they should be put through to the relevant officer, who will pursue that for them. That applies to any matter in a local authority. I do not think that having one committee or board to deal with all the issues would necessarily improve that process.

The Convener: I agree that people should be able to go to one individual in a local authority and get the service that is required, but that is not happening. The other week, we heard from licensing officers, who suggested that the reason why some of the regimes are split is more to do with tradition than anything else. That is why some places have a licensing board and a licensing committee. My experience of the local authorities that I know about is that the licensing teams of solicitors and officers are the same for the licensing board and the licensing committee, and many of the members who serve on the licensing board also serve on the licensing committee.

It is difficult for the public to get their heads round what the difference is. In fact, it has been difficult for this committee and some of the folks who support us to get our heads round the different terminologies. I wonder whether we do the things that we do more out of tradition than logic.
Michael Matheson: There are situations where that is the case, but I am not persuaded that moving to a single body to do all the work at local level is the best approach. You were a councillor in Aberdeen, so you have first-hand experience of some of the challenges but, given the licensing purposes that the different bodies have, there is benefit in having two separate bodies. If the view in the future is that—for whatever reason—the licensing regime could be delivered more effectively by one body, that could be considered, but at this stage I am not persuaded that there is sufficient reason for us to move to a single body.

The Convener: Could sexual entertainment licences be dealt with by one body rather than the gamut that exists, which seems to be leading to frustration?

Michael Matheson: A venue needs a licence for the entertainment that it provides and a licence for selling alcohol on the premises, if that is what it intends to do, so that is one issue. I recognise that some individuals feel that there are unnecessary complications in the process, but my general view is that the system operates fairly well. There are always areas in which it could be improved, but it serves us pretty well.

The additional measures in the bill will improve the licensing regime for sexual entertainment venues and will provide local authorities with additional powers to deal with the issues more effectively. We are improving the existing legislation, but I am not persuaded that moving to a single committee or board would improve things further.

The Convener: It was clear in the evidence that we took that those who are pretty pro sexual entertainment and those who are very anti sexual entertainment share the view that it would be more logical for all the elements to be brought under one regime.

Michael Matheson: I appreciate the view that it is worth moving to a single committee that deals with all the aspects, but the system largely serves us well. I am reluctant to change it without sufficient evidence to suggest that the arrangements are not operating effectively, which I do not think is the case.

The Convener: In the Brightcrew case, one regime tried to deal with an aspect that was controlled by another regime, and all of that fell foul of the law. Am I right in saying that, if all the elements had been dealt with together appropriately, that situation might not have arisen?

Michael Matheson: No—I am not entirely sure that that is correct. The Brightcrew case was about an attempt to use a provision in the 2005 act for a slightly wider purpose than that for which it provides. As a result of that decision, the bill provides for civic licensing of sexual entertainment venues.

Having one board or committee dealing with matters would not necessarily have changed the outcome in that case. The Brightcrew decision reflected the fact that the 2005 act was not sufficient for the purpose for which those involved tried to use it, which is why we are creating a new licensing regime. That case was about the interpretation of the legislation rather than the structure, which is why we are making additional provisions in the bill.

The Convener: Would taking a commonsense approach to structure by bringing everything together and creating the required legislative framework not be the way to proceed? It would be easy for one body to deal with all the aspects of that one legislative framework to ensure that venues were up to scratch in every regard: alcohol, advertising and the entertainment.

Michael Matheson: If we moved to a single licensing regime for civic and alcohol matters, we would have to go back to the beginning. It is worth keeping it in mind that the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 was reviewed just 10 years ago. It was considered in great detail and found to be fit for purpose. The 1982 act is flexible enough to allow us to add to and amend it as circumstances change, which has happened over the years. The Nicholson committee also considered the whole issue of licensing, which led to the 2005 act.

We would have to go right back and redo licensing for alcohol and for civic purposes if the idea was that we should move to a single unified piece of legislation for both aspects. That would be a significant piece of work and a significant undertaking, and it would be well outwith the scope of the bill that we are considering. There is a debate to be had, but I highlight the work that has been undertaken on licensing for alcohol and on civic licensing in the past 10 years.

We have new licensing legislation for alcohol, and the 1982 act has been found to be fit for purpose. I would be reluctant to change the system, given that the legislation seems to be operating effectively and is flexible enough for us to add to it and change it as necessary.

Cameron Buchanan: There is a certain logic to having the same licensing regime. Apparently—I emphasise the word “apparently”; it is what we were told—sexual entertainment or strip clubs make real money only when they sell alcohol, which suggests that the licensing regime should be the same.
Michael Matheson: I confess that I am not entirely au fait with the business model of such venues.

Cameron Buchanan: Nor am I.

Michael Matheson: I do not recall whether the money is made just through alcohol, but the point brings us back to the Brightcrew case, in which trying to use the alcohol licensing regime to manage other aspects created difficulties. That is why we have brought in a requirement for further licences for such venues. We want to give local authorities the scope to regulate venues in a meaningful way that allows them to engage with other stakeholders and consider a range of factors before they decide on their local policy for such venues.

Clare Adamson: It is proposed that a venue that has been used for such entertainment on no more than four occasions would be exempt from the requirement for a licence. What is the justification for that? Given that there is quite a lot of opposition to the provision, could an alternative, like the occasional licence for alcohol, be considered? Are you considering tightening up that aspect following the evidence on the bill?

Michael Matheson: The provision was considered in quite a bit of detail before the bill was drafted. We were trying to strike a balance. In our approach to licensing sexual entertainment venues, we recognise that such facilities operate in only a handful of local authority areas—about four or five. We want to take an approach that will allow them to develop policy in a way that best reflects their local circumstances. That is why we have made the provision discretionary rather than mandatory. It does not demand, for example, that local authorities that have no such venues in their areas have to implement a particular policy.

We recognise that some form of sexual entertainment might be provided on occasion at a particular event in a particular venue. It is difficult to regulate that because of issues with knowing where those venues are and when events are happening and with assessing the full extent of the activity.

In England, the approach is that venues can hold 12 events a year—or one a month—for which, technically, they would need a sexual entertainment licence if such events were happening daily. We thought that 12 events a year would be too many, and we arrived at the figure of four a year. Of course, I am open to hearing the committee’s views on whether the right balance has been struck.

The exemption was included largely to reflect the fact that there could be unintended occasions on which a venue finds that it might have required an additional licence. It would be difficult for us to regulate such situations or to understand the full extent of that activity, and the exemption provision is an attempt to strike a balance.

Clare Adamson: My only concern is about ambiguity. Under alcohol licensing, someone cannot sell alcohol unless they have an occasional licence or a full licence. If premises knew that they had to have a sexual entertainment licence, that would provide more clarity, but I would be happy to hear your thoughts on that as the bill progresses.

Michael Matheson: I am more than happy to listen to the committee’s views. If members feel that the balance that we have struck is not quite right, I will be happy to consider that at stage 2.

The Convener: Would the Government consider issuing guidance on how existing sexual entertainment venues should be treated if a local authority sets a lower limit on the appropriate number of venues in the area?

Michael Matheson: We will provide guidance to assist local authorities. They must go through a number of stages before they set a limit and they must consider a range of factors. We will take forward work to provide them with guidance on interpretation in that area.

The Convener: That is grand.

John Wilson: The committee heard evidence from theatre group representatives who were concerned that their artistic expression might be impacted on by vexatious complaints or by individuals who used the bill to shut down theatrical productions. Can you give any assurances to theatre companies whose productions might contain nudity, for example, that they could be exempted from the relevant provisions of the bill?

Michael Matheson: That is a fair point to raise. It is reasonable for some establishments to have such concerns. That is why we will produce guidance to give specific direction about the premises and productions that would be exempt in such circumstances. An example would be a performance or a series of performances by a theatre company that involved some nudity. We will address that through the guidance and through secondary provisions that we will put in place to ensure that situations of the kind that you describe do not come about.

John Wilson: Another issue, which the convener has raised, is about a local authority wanting to reduce the number of premises that provide sexual entertainment in an area. You said that guidance will be issued to local authorities. Some authorities might decide to go for a zero-tolerance policy, which would involve a blanket ban on sexual entertainment venues in their areas.
What would happen if, say, the City of Edinburgh Council or Glasgow City Council adopted a zero-tolerance approach? How would that fit in with what some in the industry argue are grandfather rights in relation to the continuing provision of such premises?

Michael Matheson: In setting the number of sexual entertainment premises that are desirable in an area, local authorities will have to go through a rational decision-making process that involves consultation and engagement. They will not have an unfettered power—they will have to show that they took a rational approach in coming to a final determination.

When local authorities set the number of sexual entertainment premises that are desirable in their area—that number can be zero—it will be important that they go through that process. The guidance that we will issue will give them some direction on and understanding of what that process should involve. If they do not go through the proper process, they will find themselves the subject of a legal challenge for applying a measure for no rational reason or for not considering the issue proportionately.

Willie Coffey: One of the issues that came up during discussion was the employment of under-18s in these establishments, albeit in ancillary roles such as cleaner. The evidence that we heard was very much against permitting that to continue. Do you have a view on that, or is it outwith the scope of consideration for us as an employment rights issue?

Michael Matheson: It can be dealt with through the licensing provision because, as it stands, under-18s are not allowed in premises where sexual entertainment is taking place. It would be possible, though, for an under-18 to be in the premises at other times. An example would be the case of a cleaner who was in the premises in the morning. They would be able to be in the venue for the purposes of undertaking the cleaning of it when sexual entertainment was not taking place, but they would not be allowed to be in the premises at any time when sexual entertainment was taking place.

Willie Coffey: Thank you for clarifying that. That was the nature of the discussion—whether it was appropriate, even in those circumstances, for youngsters or young adults of that age to be working in those premises, even outwith the times of the licensed activity. The only evidence that I can recall hearing was very much opposed to continuing to allow that. What is your view?

Michael Matheson: That would be banning under-18s from being cleaners in venues that are used for sexual entertainment. I think that the challenge would be to achieve that within the terms of this bill. Given the nature and intended purpose of such a provision, we would have to consult more widely on what the implications would be. First of all, it would be interesting to know how many venues employ under-18s as cleaners. My suspicion is that it would be very few, if any at all. I understand the point and where it comes from, but I do not think that it is something that we can address within the scope of this bill.

Cara Hilton: Looking at the wider issue, given the Scottish Government’s recognition of the harm that is caused by commercial sexual exploitation to the position of women and girls right across society, why is it that the Scottish Government has not decided to ban those types of venue, instead of licensing them?

Michael Matheson: What we are doing is giving local authorities the power to license the venues and to determine what the number of them should be. If a local authority believes that the desirable number is zero, there is a process that it can go through in order to achieve that. Rather than the Government determining those matters, we are allowing local authorities to determine them. I think that that is the most appropriate way for something of this nature to be taken forward.

The Convener: We now move to the civic licensing aspects of the bill. After our call for evidence and in some of the oral evidence that we have had in committee, licensing officials from Edinburgh and Glasgow gave a detailed critique of the legislation. In fact, they ripped into certain parts of the 1982 act, including the fact that it gives no powers to review or to revoke a licence. There was also a major discussion about the lack of notification. Does the Scottish Government have any plans to review the 1982 act or to address the specific concerns about the way that it operates?

Michael Matheson: We have no plans to fundamentally review the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982. As I mentioned, it was reviewed only some 10 years ago and found fit for purpose. What we are always willing to do is to listen to concerns and issues that are raised by local authority colleagues about where they feel that there is a deficiency in the legislation that we can address in addressing if there is a need to do so.

For example, you mentioned the issue of being unable to revoke a licence under the 1982 act. That is something that we are considering. It is worth keeping in mind that, although a local authority cannot revoke someone’s licence, it can suspend it, which can have the same effect. We are considering where further measures can be taken in relation to revoking licences, and if we can improve the way in which the system is operating for local authorities we are more than happy to consider that.
The Convener: Another issue that was discussed related to notifications. The example that was given by officers related to a burger van and the fact that they could only notify folk who were within 4m of the stance for the van. Do you think that that is giving the public a fair deal in being able to find out what is going on in their patch and to engage with licensing authorities about any objections that they may have?

Michael Matheson: I do not know about the technical aspect of a 4m notification radius for a burger van. I would be concerned if communities felt that they were limited in terms of making representations when a burger van was establishing itself. We could consider modernising the notification process.

I think that that could be dealt with through secondary legislation. Would it require primary legislation?

Walter Drummond-Murray: It would have to be done at stage 2 of the bill. There are requirements in the schedule of the 1982 act that local authorities have to publish applications for licences. It is quite archaic and the requirement is currently met by publishing a notice in the local library or something like that. It is not terribly fit for purpose in the modern world. We could certainly look at that.

Michael Matheson: We can look to improve that, but there is nothing to prevent local authorities from being more proactive in the way in which they engage with local communities that are affected by such things.

The Convener: Can I stop you there, cabinet secretary? We have covered that in a huge amount of depth, and we know that many local authorities are risk averse and that—I will be controversial here—if you put two solicitors in a room you will get six different opinions. When it comes to risk aversion, it seems that this is one of the worst aspects.

We specifically asked the witnesses about informing people beyond the levels specified, and there was huge reticence. We have knowledge round the table of this: as a local councillor I used to inform entire neighbourhoods about things, but it would send the solicitors at the council into a huge panic; Mr Coffey has had similar experiences. The legislation is not fit for purpose.

The committee is currently looking at the Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill, but we are also considering aspects of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Bill. The reality is that what we have here is not empowering communities but actually impeding some of the good work that the Government wants to see done in other areas.

Michael Matheson: I do not accept that it is not fit for purpose, because it can be changed. There are aspects that relate to local policy and the approach that local authorities take.

You have referred to the fact that, when you were a local elected member, certain things happened in your ward and you took the opportunity to inform the whole area. That happens in other areas, too. Local authorities can be more proactive. I recognise that they can be risk averse, but just because local authorities are risk averse it does not mean that the legislation is deficient. However, if there are ways in which we can improve it, in order to help to engage and push greater engagement with local authorities, we will look at trying to achieve that.

Local members—as you will be well aware in Aberdeen, convener—are the ones who should be setting the course of direction for officials in how they take forward local policy, rather than officials at local level always determining what the policy should be.

The Convener: I understand that all too well, but the evidence that we have heard shows clearly that many local authorities feel that they are restricted in what they can do.

One thing that the licensing officials said was that they want a link to licensing objectives, as is the case in the 2005 act. Is that possible?

Michael Matheson: The purpose of the 2005 act is very different and the five objectives within the 2005 act were set after considerable consideration. I am conscious that officials want to have objectives set within the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982. What will that lead to them doing differently?

The Convener: I cannot answer that question; that is a matter for the licensing officials.

Michael Matheson: But that is the point. I often hear that it would be better if we put something in the legislation but sometimes the issue is not a deficiency in the legislation; sometimes it is about proactive policy at a local level.

The Convener: They felt that dealing with public nuisance aspects would be easier if there were some changes. Beyond that, they argue that some of what is currently in legislation seems to be nonsensical, including, for example, those 4m notifications. All that a burger van would need to do would be to park well over 4m away from something and be all right.

Willie Coffey: I just want to take this opportunity to say something about the notification process. I have had some experience in the past in which the authority did not and would not notify anyone outside the radius of the particular application, despite there being a clear view that there it would impact on the public beyond that. The fear was that local authorities might be challenged for seeking objections beyond the limits of the notification distance that was in place. They were fearful of such legal challenges thereafter.

The feeling among members was that we needed to think more about the impact on the community rather than the distance from an application. That would be much more in tune with public perception and would receive public support.

Michael Matheson: Clearly, part of the issue is down to interpretation within a given local authority area and to officials deciding to interpret a law in a particular way. If the legislation can be improved to address some of those concerns, I am open to looking at that. However, I do not think that a good way to go about doing things is to put something in legislation because some council officials do not like or do not want to do something. There is a balance to be struck.

When a reasonable case is made that improving the legislation could help to improve engagement with local communities and that can be justified, I am open to looking at that. I have experienced such difficulties in my own constituency. I must confess that I can be a bit sceptical about some of the excuses that council officials give about why they do not do things when it would be reasonable for them to do so because of their particular interpretation of a particular piece of legislation when those in another local authority area have chosen to interpret it much more liberally.

We should be careful that we are not just legislating for those local authorities that tend to be less reluctant to take forward proactive policies to engage with communities.

The Convener: Thank you for that, cabinet secretary. Could your officials have a look at the Official Report of the evidence from the licensing officials? I share your frustration about the interpretation in certain local authorities being different from that in others, but the key issue for the committee is that we have to make sure that the public is served and feels empowered about certain of these decisions. It seems to me that certain things in the 1982 act fly in the face of common sense, so I urge your officials to go back and have an in-depth look at what licensing officials said at the committee meeting because it seemed to be entirely logical to me.

Michael Matheson: I give you the commitment that we will do that, convener. We will also consider the concerns that the committee has raised, notwithstanding my frustration at the approach that some local authorities take on these matters.

Dear members,

I write to you as one of the 22,000 people who signed the petition against the proposed airgun licencing in Scotland, and therefore suggest that these views are not only mine but those of the majority of the 22,000.

As was reported in the news in May, it seems that the SNP and Kenny MacAskill in particular, has decided to continue with its badly thought out, unneeded and likely very costly proposal to licence airguns. As I am sure you are all aware, as well as the 22,000 people who signed the petition, 87% of responses to the public consultation on Airgun Licencing opposed the measure outright. Many of the comments described this proposal as "disproportionate" "unjustified" and "attack on individual liberty". Many senior members of the Scottish Police Service responded to the public consultation and they commented that the proposal was ill thought and was totally unmanageable.

I would like to ask that your committee and the Scottish Government does not ignore the aforementioned people and reconsiders this proposal and cancels all plans to adopt a licence once and for all.

Publicly available statistics show that all firearms crime including airgun crime has fallen massively since 2006. Last year there were only 171 offences. To put this into perspective this is less than 0.04 offences per airgun in Scotland and less than 0.004 for head of population. Around 12.4% of cars registered in Scotland are involved in an offence each year. It is also my understanding that there were more injuries caused by dog bites admitted to one hospital alone in Scotland than airgun offences (which do not always include injury) for the whole nation.

There are already 30 laws directly relating to airguns and punishing misuse as well as countless others than can also be used to punish offensive behaviour.

I am a Health & Safety professional and in my line of work, we look at finding the root cause of accidents/incidents to try and prevent them from reoccurring. It is too late when you are mopping up the blood from an injury. The Government needs to look at the root cause as to why someone would want to misuse an item to cause harm to others and spend the money in educating them. They would also probably find that a combination of bad parenting, lack of good family values and low self worth causes the issues in the first place. However, because these things are harder to solve, the soft option is once more heralded - attack the law abiding because they will comply and Governments can say 'look what we have achieved'. Well I'm sorry, but you won't have achieved anything at all.

Using figures obtained from the Association of Chief Police Officers for the cost of processing shotgun certificate applications (£195) and estimates on the number of individual airgun owners in Scotland(up to and likely over 500,000), simple mathematics would say that this could potentially cost nearly £100,000,000 to implement. The Association of Scottish Police Superintendents has also voiced concerns over potential costs.
Airguns are a vital tool used in pest control and preventing damage to crops and other land, especially where shotguns and more powerful rifles are unsuitable for use due to lack of backstops, livestock, other farm workers having to share the working area, etc. According to a report sponsored by the Scottish Government rabbits alone cost £56,000,000/year in damage to crops in Scotland. This type of pest control is often carried out with airguns free of charge. If a licence is introduced additional costs may put people off from providing this service or they may have to charge for their services. This again adds unnecessary costs to law abiding people. An often little known fact is that airguns are often used to carry out pest control on Scottish golf courses as they are low powered and safe for use. Many people are unaware of the hard work airgun owners put in to help ensure courses are kept in prime condition. Airguns are also commonly used as a form of pest control which helps protect native wild life such as controlling the Grey Squirrel population to conserve the native Red Squirrel.

It is often thought that airguns are cheap at around £100 but many are actually between £500-1000 which some as high as £2-3,000. If people are unable to obtain a licence the Scottish Government should pay out compensation to people who have had to give up their sport. My two rifles alone cost £450 each.

The proposal also intends to ban recreational shooting (plinking) in one’s own back garden. I and many other people find this a gross violation of people’s private property rights. Plinking is perhaps the most common form of air gun shooting and is carried out safely by thousands of people. There are already laws in place to punish any irresponsibility in this area. Many Scottish sporting champions will have started out shooting in this manner and stopping this may be hindering Scotland’s future sporting success.

UK law states that it is an offence to fire an air rifle within 50 feet of the centre of a highway if this results in someone being injured, interrupted or endangered. These offences could be committed, for example, when someone is shooting in their garden close to a road and the pellets ricochet onto the highway. The definition of a highway is a properly constructed (tarmacadam or similar surfaced) road. As long as people take necessary precautions to prevent their pellets from straying (backstop made of an energy absorbing material), what harm are they doing?

The greatest effect of this proposal will be on law abiding airgun owners, especially those who are on lower incomes and do not have the money to spare for the additional costs of this scheme. It is more than just the cost of a licence, many people face having to travel several miles to find a club. This places additional costs in terms of fuel and travel time. It also has an environmental impact due to the extra traveling.

The driving force behind this legislation seems to be the tragic death of Andrew Morton, and in fact Mr MacAskill and many others often quote this incident in the press when the subject arises. However I would like to point out that in addition to the perpetrator being caught and properly punished by the courts, a licence is unlikely to have changed his behaviour or prevented the incident.
There will be no effect whatsoever on the very small amount of crimes committed with air rifles. The law abiding citizens who shoot air rifles and can afford the costs of the licence will apply and pay for them, with the poorer law abiding citizens giving up their hobby. The real criminals (the very few) who use their air guns for malicious purposes will carry on as normal and will not register their ownership.

Licencing does not and has not ever had the effect that you propose. A bank robber does not apply for a SGC (shotgun certificate) and register his shotgun on that certificate in his own name, nor does he buy a car and register it in his own name/address at the DVLA, to then use in his bank robbery. Both items would be illegally held and not registered. The huge majority of firearms used in criminal activities are illegally held and not registered, so how would this new legislation change that?

There was an incident where a young child was beaten to death with a golf club yet we do not see the same attitude towards golf clubs.

Good legislation should be proportionate, effective and objective. The facts in this case are airgun crime is very low and has been falling for the past 7 years, this proposal is disproportionate, expensive and will affect many more law abiding people than it does criminals.

I also find that the Scottish Government is very hypocritical – they are currently pushing the Yes vote for independence and freedom for the nation, but that freedom doesn’t extend it seems to the freedom of the individual to practice his chosen past-time without beaurocracy and unnecessary burden and cost.

Yours Sincerely

Richard Hill

1. Air Weapons Licensing

You may respond to all the questions or only those you have a specific interest in. (Text boxes have no word limit, they will increase in size accordingly).

13. In what ways will the creation of an air weapons licensing system in Scotland contribute to preserving public order and safety, reducing crime and advancing public health policy?

It will not reduce crime at all since criminals will not register their air guns. All it will do is penalise law abiding airgun owners with higher fees, having to join a club, restrictions in lawful use and a reduction in airgun ownership. All countries which have implemented some form of gun or airgun licensing regime or another has not seen a reduction in gun crime. We only have to look at the Handgun ban in 1997 to see how handgun crime has actually gone up after the ban. Similar things will happen if this licensing regime for low powered airguns is introduced.

14. Is there sufficient provision, or sufficient capacity to provide, suitable numbers of air weapons clubs across all areas of Scotland for use by registered air weapons owners/ users?

No there isn't. Half a million airguns with a lot of owners. The new bill doesn't allow for the gun to be shot in the back garden in what is termed as "plinking" so tens of thousands of people will have to join an airgun or a gun club, for which there is no capacity. This will effectively result in a de-facto ban on some airgun owners, who either can't afford to join an airgun club or who live too far away from one to be economically viable to join one. Think of someone living in the Scottish highlands, who will be in a ridiculous position of having to travel say 100 miles to an airgun club to use their airgun while being prohibited from shooting on their land, in a remote location with the nearest neighbour tens of miles away. Effectively legislation like this will likely be ignored, meaning extra police will have to be drafted to prosecute this new “criminal class”. Law abiding people who their only fault is owning some inanimate object without some license.

15. How will the air weapons licensing system affect those using air weapons for personal/recreational use?
In a bad way. It will:

- restrict where you can use the airgun, no garden plinking

- increase cost due to having to join airgun club.

- make airgun shooting harder for people in remote areas.

- double the paperwork load on police departments for licensing.

- create a new class of criminal overnight. People who might not be aware of the law or might disagree with the law will be prosecuted for daring to own an inanimate object without a license.

- make it harder for youngsters to get into the sport.

16. How will the air weapons licensing system affect those aged 14 to 17 who use air weapons?

It would restrict their participation depending on what age groups a license will be issued to. In the rest of the UK (England, Wales and Northern Ireland), an airgun cannot be bought or possessed by anyone over 18, with an adult needed to be present to supervise people under this age.

This will put a strain on youngsters starting shooting with airguns. Since shooting with airguns from a young age leads onto further shooting in later years with more powerful firearms, this licensing regime for airguns will impact real gun ownership in Scotland in the future. Youngsters not applying for airgun licenses due to cost/hassle will unlikely use shotguns or rifles in the future when they become adults. This licensing regime is a calculated stifling of not just air gun ownership but future firearm ownership in Scotland and that is outrageous!
17. How will the air weapons licensing system affect those using air weapons for commercial/professional reasons (for example: for pest control; as part of the tourist/hunting season; as part of fairs, paintballing centre, entertainment sector etc.)?

Firstly with a license, it will mean that the police will have to approve each bit of land that a license holder wants to shoot over. Until that is done, to shoot on that land with an airgun will be breaking the law which will lead to airgun license revocation, penalties and even prison time.

This will impact of course commercial shooting on farmland where often farmers who only control small game such as rats/pigeon will have to get a license to control the same vermin they have done safely and lawfully without a license. This will of course increase their costs.

Airgun ranges operating for tourists might not be able to do so hassle free, due to the fact that they will have strict guidelines to obey and all shooters might have to join a club as probationary members rather than have an informal shoot with air rifles or pistols in a controlled environment.

18. How will the air weapons licensing system affect those using air weapons for competitive sporting purposes?

It will affect Scotland in the future when youngsters will find it much harder to start up airgun shooting than before the licensing regime. With a drying pool of young talent, less scottish people will take up shooting sports therefore ensuring less sports shooters in the future.

19. Is it equitable for those applying for an air weapons certificate to pay a fee which cannot be refundable irrespective of whether a certificate is granted or not?

No a fee should be refunded if a license is not granted. However I already said that I am against this licensing proposal.
20. Will the air weapons licensing system have a positive or negative impact on other areas of the public sector in Scotland (eg. The work of local government, public agencies etc.)?

Negative effect. More work for police both in licensing and in prosecuting which were otherwise law abiding people. Police already are short staffed when dealing with the current system for shotgun and firearm licenses. What is going to happen when an estimated 50-100 thousand people apply for an airgun license? More work for courts and the judiciary when people get refused an airgun license and decide to fight the decision in the court to get one issued.

21. What, if any, might the unintended consequences of introducing an air weapons licensing system in Scotland be?

All of the above I mentioned, not to mention people might just give up airgun shooting and just apply for a shotgun or firearms license instead, if the hassle for applying for one will be the same. I know the Scottish Parliament is generally anti-gun so I am sure they would not like it if due to the fact that they will introduce an airgun licensing system as they say for public safety. Well that will spectacularly backfire if instead people will apply for more powerful guns.
22. Do you have any other comments to make on air weapons licensing aspects of the Bill?

I am totally against it and I believe that Mr Kenny McAskill doesn't give a damn what the people of the UK think. I have personally written to all the Scottish Parliament on this issue. They have said to me concerning this consultation: Most replies against the previous consultation were from England and this shows that the 87% of people against the licensing regime is not based on pure scottish support. I say this:

Scotland is still part of the United Kingdom and until they vote for independence I will consider myself BRITISH first and Scottish second so of course it matters if English people post their opinion on this Bill. Also the licensing regime wants to introduce visitor permits for people from England, Wales or Northern Ireland visiting Scotland with airguns, therefore they have just as much right to comment on this Bill since it will impact them directly.

Last and not least, me being a libertarian I am actually against all gun licensing I believe that airgun and gun control is not about airguns or real guns, ITS ABOUT CONTROL!

That is all I have to say, thank you very much for reading this!

12. Do you have any other comments on the impact of the proposals contained in the Bill relation to Scottish Government objectives?
2. Air Weapons Licensing

You may respond to all the questions or only those you have a specific interest in. (Text boxes have no word limit, they will increase in size accordingly).

13. In what ways will the creation of an air weapons licensing system in Scotland contribute to preserving public order and safety, reducing crime and advancing public health policy?

It will not. Criminals will continue to misuse airguns and the law-abiding airgunner, who is not responsible for criminal misuse of airguns, will pay the price. Crime will not be reduced and public health will not be advanced.

This policy is a gross over-reaction to a public nuisance whose scale has declined very significantly in recent years without licensing. It will not be effective and represents a waste of public money and police time.

This policy has a political dimension to its origins, in that Mr MacAskill has publicly allied himself with anti-airgun campaigns and campaigners, and does not seek to represent the whole community, which includes sporting and casual airgunners, who are overwhelmingly opposed to licensing.

14. Is there sufficient provision, or sufficient capacity to provide, suitable numbers of air weapons clubs across all areas of Scotland for use by registered air weapons owners/ users?

No comment.

15. How will the air weapons licensing system affect those using air weapons for personal/recreational use?
It will be a deterrent to the lawful use of airguns.

By prohibiting the casual use of airguns in private spaces, known as ‘plinking’, it will restrict a harmless activity that is already governed by laws to protect the public. It therefore represents an intolerable infringement of privacy.

16. How will the air weapons licensing system affect those aged 14 to 17 who use air weapons?

No comment.

17. How will the air weapons licensing system affect those using air weapons for commercial/professional reasons (for example: for pest control; as part of the tourist/hunting season; as part of fairs, paintballing centre, entertainment sector etc.)?

No comment.

18. How will the air weapons licensing system affect those using air weapons for competitive sporting purposes?

At very least it will reduce the pool of those who enjoy shooting airguns casually, from which competitive shooters are drawn.
19. Is it equitable for those applying for an air weapons certificate to pay a fee which cannot be refundable irrespective of whether a certificate is granted or not?

No.

20. Will the air weapons licensing system have a positive or negative impact on other areas of the public sector in Scotland (eg. The work of local government, public agencies etc.)?

It will have a negative impact in so far as it will cost police time with no foreseeable gain in improved public order.

21. What, if any, might the unintended consequences of introducing an air weapons licensing system in Scotland be?

It may have an impact on the numbers of visitors to Scotland.

It will encourage a sense of an over-wheening, intrusive government that acts on behalf of small but vocal sections of the population and rides roughshod over less vocal sections of the population.

22. Do you have any other comments to make on air weapons licensing aspects of the Bill?

To whom it may concern.

I am an airgun owner currently residing in England, and whilst this law will have little effect on me, I still wish to lend my support of my fellow shooters north of the border by making my opinion known.

I do not agree with this proposed law in the slightest. Air guns do not present a danger to the public in Scotland, despite a relatively high number of unregulated airguns in circulation (500,000 according to estimates), deaths and injuries from such weapons remain an absolute rarity. Clear proof in my opinion that the overwhelming majority of Scots in possession of these weapons are entirely trustworthy and responsible. As for the irresponsible minority, laws already exist to deal with those who misuse airguns (though they are often not properly enforced). I believe a rigorous campaign against the misuse of airguns and strict enforcement of existing laws will be far more effective than licensing.

Licensing will only affect and inconvenience the law abiding. It is utterly laughable to think that the criminally motivated will willingly turn in their airguns to the police or apply for a licence. Furthermore, what is to stop criminals from simply buying airguns in England or Wales and taking them back to Scotland? Virtually nothing, considering there is no border control.

I am also curious to know how the government will enforce this legislation and cover the costs. 500,000 airguns (and that number could well be even higher) in circulation, nobody knows where they are or who has them. Ensuring that every single one goes on a licence or is turned in for destruction will be a logistical nightmare for an already overstretch police force and legal system.

In conclusion, at best I see this law as little more than political posturing and vote buying. At worst, yet another sinister attack on individual liberty and an attempt to further disarm the public and create a total state monopoly on bearing arms. A disturbing prospect to one such as myself who has studied political history extensively and knows what can happen when a state has such disproportionate power over a populace, but that's another subject entirely. I sincerely hope the Scottish government sees sense and shelves this ill thought out law, but I won't hold my breath. King Salmond seems to have made up his mind on this one. So much for democracy.

To whom this may concern,

Firstly let me thank you in advance for taking the time to read this email. I have just read the questions put to the SNP government, Kenny McAskill in relation to this draconian bill currently being put to parliament. Mr McAskill put this to public consultation and I believe somewhere in the region of 87% rejected these plans to licence Air Weapons, yet this man ignored the public's wishes, the same public that voted him in and no doubt will vote SNP out at the next election.

The questions that have been put to parliament are valid. I have no doubt that gun crime has been falling year on year, I have no doubt that should anyone commit crime then the law as it currently stands is sufficient to punish wrong doers. I question the motives of Mr McAskill as does other voters, of course the tragedy of young Andrew Morton in Easterhouse in Glasgow was a parent's worst nightmare, Mr McAskill keeps banging on about this incident, but fails to expand on the full background in relation to Andrews parents and indeed the shooter himself, who was as you know dealt with, a licencing system in my opinion would not have prevented this tragedy.

The same applies to the unlawful shooting of domestic pets and wildlife, a licencing system will not stop this or add anymore weight to the law. In my opinion it is a vote gathering issue by Mr McAskill But I digress. Those that act irresponsibly are dealt with, bringing in a licencing system will not detect or bring anymore wrong doers to justice than is currently achieved. It is the same as the old dog licencing days, those that bought licences did and those that didn't, didn't. You could argue that having these new laws will restrict ammunition sales, but oh, no, they can nip over the border into England and purchase airgun ammunition. On the subject of England, I also find it incredible that if this bill goes through our English counterparts can come north with their shotgun or section one firearm quite easily, but would have to apply for a visitor's permit for a sub 12 foot pound air rifle.

I myself am Ex Military having served Queen and Country for some 14 years. I hold my SGC and FAC. I am a qualified Range Officer through the NRA able to run Smallbore, Fullbore and Gallery Ranges respectively. I Deer Stalk holding Deer Management Qualification One. I carry out vermin control in the control of all relevant pest species, I use a sub 12 foot pound air rifle for these purposes. I am also the Secretary of a Small bore Rifle club approved by the Scottish Government, I liaise with Police Scotland in relation to new club members and run background checks accordingly. On the subject of the question of approved air weapon clubs in Scotland. There are NONE.

So in summary I am a law abiding citizen who will be further penalised and licensed unnecessarily to try and eradicate air weapon crime, which clearly will unfortunately never be eradicated. The law breakers will continue to do so. And THERE ARE sufficient laws currently in place to deal with these people. Licencing air weapons will put a further strain on what is currently a system that is over worked and ready to burst and will put undue pressure on the system.
I also believe in conservation and I am a fully paid up member of BASC, I don't go around blasting everything I come across, indeed I was trimming some trees today and uncovered a wood pigeon nest, the hen bird was brooding some young, I left her undisturbed and will finish the trim once the young have fledged, but again I digress somewhat. Introducing this bill will also have a major impact on the Scottish economy as air gun shooters, whether it be back garden plinkers, vermin control or target shooting contribute millions in revenue. On the subject of back garden plinking, within this bill Mr McAskill intends to ban back garden plinking. How much of any firearms incidents have involved rear garden plinking, I suggest very few. Back garden plinking is the entry point to most air rifle shooting, it's where I learned, and it's where I learned my children in a responsible manner. I have a pellet catcher and a good backstop. One could argue that not all take the same precautions as myself, but the statistics would suggest otherwise, as there are very few incidents in the rear garden.

I have written to various MSPs, MPs and have had the standard replies of wait and see or tough we are doing it no matter what you say even though you voted me in to represent you. I hope by the questions you are putting to parliament this bill can be seen for what it is, a sham, a waste of public money, a system that is against the wishes of the public, doomed to fail, and will not make any difference to the law breakers, who will continue to break the law, it will however further penalise the thousands of law abiding people like myself. I must once again thank you for taking the time to read this and hope that common sense will prevail.

Yours Gary Gibb... A proud Scottish Citizen.

Local Government and Regeneration Committee – Air Weapons and Licensing (Scotland) Bill

* 6. Invitations to give oral evidence to the Committee on the Bill will be based on the submissions received. If you wish your submission to be included amongst those considered for possible invitation to give oral evidence, please indicate here.

☑ Yes
☐ No

* 7. You may answer questions on the entire Bill, or on any part of the Bill. Please indicate which parts of the Bill you are responding to? (You may select as many options that apply).

☐ All of the Bill
☐ Equalities, climate change and other Scottish Government objectives
☑ Air Weapons
☐ General licensing issues
☐ Alcohol licensing
☐ Civic licensing – taxi/private hire car licensing
☐ Civic licensing – scrap metal dealers
☐ Civic licensing – theatre licensing
☐ Civic licensing – sexual entertainment venues
16. How will the air weapons licensing system affect those aged 14 to 17 who use air weapons?

Please see above at (15). This age bracket are probably the ones who will be most adversely affected due to their lower incomes and lesser ability to travel to reach approved clubs to practise their sport.

17. How will the air weapons licensing system affect those using air weapons for commercial/professional reasons (for example: for pest control; as part of the tourist/hunting season; as part of fairs, paintballing centre, entertainment sector etc.)?

It is my belief that the proposed licensing system will adversely affect commercial/professional users due to increased operating costs. This will in turn knock-on to reduce profits or even, in the worst case, make the difference between making a living and making a loss.

18. How will the air weapons licensing system affect those using air weapons for competitive sporting purposes?

Traditionally, air rifle shooting is the main entry route for young competitive shooters to come into the sport. By imposing considerable costs on young shooters (travel, secure storage, license costs) it may prevent some people from competing at all.

19. Is it equitable for those applying for an air weapons certificate to pay a fee which cannot be refundable irrespective of whether a certificate is granted or not?

I do not think this is equitable. It would be more equitable to refund part of the fee, allowing for retention of sufficient funds to cover the cost of paperwork, background checks and inspections.

8. Do you consider that the Bill has any implications for meeting Scotland’s climate change commitments? Please explain.

9. Do you consider that the Bill has any implications for meeting Scotland’s equality and/or human rights commitments? Please explain.

10. Do you consider that the Bill has any implications for preventative spending and/or public services reform? Please explain.

11. Do you consider that the Bill has any implications in relation to European Union issues? Please explain.
12. Do you have any other comments on the impact of the proposals contained in the Bill relation to Scottish Government objectives?
2. Air Weapons Licensing

You may respond to all the questions or only those you have a specific interest in. (Text boxes have no word limit, they will increase in size accordingly).

13. In what ways will the creation of an air weapons licensing system in Scotland contribute to preserving public order and safety, reducing crime and advancing public health policy?

None at all as criminals will ignore the law. Crime committed using airguns in falling anyway so the Bill will have effect what so ever on crime.

14. Is there sufficient provision, or sufficient capacity to provide, suitable numbers of air weapons clubs across all areas of Scotland for use by registered air weapons owners/users?

No there isn’t as all airgun clubs will have to be approved by the Scottish Government.

15. How will the air weapons licensing system affect those using air weapons for personal/recreational use?

It will almost kill the sport which is an Olympic Sport as plinking in the back garden will be outlawed and that is how most people get into air gunning.
16. How will the air weapons licensing system affect those aged 14 to 17 who use air weapons?

Please see answer 15

17. How will the air weapons licensing system affect those using air weapons for commercial/professional reasons (for example: for pest control; as part of the tourist/hunting season; as part of fairs, paintballing centre, entertainment sector etc.)?

It will mean the end of those who use airguns for pest control doing so for free. They will start charging the landowners which will increase the farmers costs and put up food prices

18. How will the air weapons licensing system affect those using air weapons for competitive sporting purposes?

It will mean less competitions and less people travelling to Scotland to compete in the matches which will mean a loss of revenue for Scotland. I for one will not even visit Scotland if this bill is given Royal Assent

19. Is it equitable for those applying for an air weapons certificate to pay a fee which cannot be refundable irrespective of whether a certificate is granted or not?

No it is not as it is not even equitable to have a licencing system for air guns
20. Will the air weapons licensing system have a positive or negative impact on other areas of the public sector in Scotland (eg. The work of local government, public agencies etc.)?

Negative

21. What, if any, might the unintended consequences of introducing an air weapons licensing system in Scotland be?

Reduction of visitor numbers to Scotland, loss of revenue and jobs. Shooting brings in £2 Billion to the UK economy. If Scotland brings in this Bill Scotlands part of this money will fall.

22. Do you have any other comments to make on air weapons licensing aspects of the Bill?

The Bill is badly thought out and written and is based on one incident that committed using an airgun that had been illegally modified. 87% of those who responded to the original consultation didn’t want the Bill and yet it was pursued. Crime committed using airguns is already legislated for in the Firearms Act 1968 and its various Amendments and the Violent Crime Reduction Act 2006.
3. General Licensing Issues

You may respond to all questions or only those you have a specific interest in. (Text boxes have no word limit, they will increase in size accordingly).

23. Is the current Scottish licensing regime, as set out in the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 and the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005, fit for purpose?

24. Should a licensing system seek to regulate individual behaviour or communities of space (eg. ‘city space’ etc.)?

25. In what way should the licensing system in Scotland interact with the support the land use planning system, community planning and regeneration?
26. How does the licensing system in Scotland assist with the delivery of sustainable development and economic balanced areas?

27. In what way does the licensing system in Scotland support health and planning, addressing health inequalities and public health wellbeing outcomes?
4. Alcohol Licensing

You may respond to all questions or only those you have a specific interest in. (Text boxes have no word limit, they will increase in size accordingly).

28. In what ways will the Bill’s provisions on alcohol licensing allow for reductions in crime and the preservation of public order?

29. Are there any other measures which should be taken to assist in the reduction of crime and the preservation of public order?

30. In what ways will the provisions in the Bill enhance the licensing objectives set out in the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005?

31. In what ways will the re-introduction of the “fit and proper person” test assist with the implementation of the licensing objectives set out in the 2005 act?

32. Have there been any unintended consequences arising from the 2005 Act, for example, in rural areas or the economic regeneration of areas?

33. Which, if any, types of spent relevant offences should be required to be disclosed and what do you think the benefits of disclosure will be?

34. Do you have any other comments to make on the alcohol licensing aspects of the Bill?
5. Taxi and Private Hire Car Licensing

You may respond to all questions or only those you have a specific interest in. (Text boxes have no word limit, they will increase in size accordingly).

35. What benefits should the licensing of taxis and private hire cars deliver for customers?

36. In what ways do customers, providers of taxi/private hire car services and local authorities benefit from the two-tier licensing regime for taxis and private hire cars?

37. The Government states that a radical overhaul of the current two-tier licensing regime would “clearly require a very high level of resource and would cause significant disruption for the trade, local authorities, the police and ultimately the travelling public”. What are your views on this and would the potential costs and disruptions outweigh any potential benefits of a unified system?
38. Do the changes made by sections 60 (overprovision of private hire car licences) and 61 (testing of private hire car drivers) of the Bill strike the right balance in terms of introducing greater consistency while maintaining justifiable differences?

39. Do you have any views on the section 62 provisions bringing vehicles contracted for exclusive use for 24 or more hours within the licensing regime for taxis and private hire cars, and should any exemptions be included in the Bill?

6. Scrap Metal Dealer Licensing

You may respond to all questions or only those you have a specific interest in. (Text boxes have no word limit, they will increase in size accordingly).

40. Taking the proposals in sections 63 to 66 of the Bill together, how will they have the desired effect of strengthening the metal dealers' licensing regime to the extent that metal theft and related criminal activity is reduced?

41. In your view, could the Bill be further strengthened in any way, for example, by including an accreditation scheme for metal dealers?

42. Removal of exemption warrant - do you wish to comment on the proposal to remove the exemption warrant system?
43. Removal of requirement to retain metal on-site - what impact will the proposal to remove the retention of metal requirement have on the enforcement of the licensing regime and prevention of criminal activities?

44. Forms of payment - what is your view on the proposal to go 'cashless' and is there merit in considering whether metal dealers could be allowed to operate using cash for only very small transactions, which could be limited to a certain number per month?
45. Forms of identification and record keeping:

In line with the Scrap Metal Dealers Act 2013, the Bill adds additional record keeping requirements to a metal dealer's licence including recording the means by which a seller's name and address was verified and retaining a copy of the document, and the method of payment and a copy of the payment document. The Bill will also require a metal dealer to record information in books with serially numbered pages or by means of an electronic device, and to keep separate records at each place of business. Such information and documents are to be kept for three rather than the current two years.

How important is it that the record keeping requirements reflect those in the Scrap Metal Dealers Act 2013, and do you agree with the Scottish Government that the proposed record keeping requirements are not unduly burdensome?
46. Mandatory and discretionary licensing requirements:

The Scottish Ministers can impose mandatory licensing requirements, such as those included in the Bill relating to record keeping and the identification of customers. In addition, local authorities can also attach discretionary requirements to licences in their areas.

Does the Bill get the balance right between mandatory and discretionary licensing requirements? Should the Bill include other mandatory conditions for obtaining a metal dealer’s licence, such as installing CCTV at metal dealers’ premises or in relation to labelling of metal and ‘forensic coding’?
7. Civic Licensing – Theatre Licensing

You may respond to all the questions or only those you have a specific interest in. (Text boxes have no word limit, they will increase in size accordingly).

47. Will there be any impacts during the transitional period between ending the current theatre licence and starting the public entertainment licence?

48. Are there additional costs or resource implications on theatres or licensing authorities?

49. How should licensing authorities integrate their current fee charging structure into their public entertainment regime?
8. Civic Licensing – Sexual Entertainment Venues

You may respond to all questions or only those you have a specific interest in. (Text boxes have no word limit, they will increase in size accordingly).

50. What are the consequences of operating the new licensing regime using the definitions set out at section 68 of the Bill?

- 'sexual entertainment venue'
- 'audience'
- 'financial gain'
- 'organiser'
- 'premises'
- 'sexual entertainment', and
- 'display of nudity'

51. The Bill specifies that a venue hosting sexual entertainment on three occasions or less within a 12 month period would not be treated as a sexual entertainment venue: does this have any unintended consequences?
52. Local licensing authorities will be able to set the number of sexual entertainment venues in their area to below the existing level, or zero: are there any advantages or disadvantages to this approach?

53. The Bill relies mainly on the existing licensing regime for sex shops as set out in section 44 and Schedule 2 of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 (application, notification, objections and representations, revocation of licences etc., enforcement and appeals): is this mechanism adequate for the licensing of sexual entertainment venues - if not, please explain why?

54. Are there any barriers to licensing authorities operating the new licensing regime?
55. Civic Licensing

Do you have any other comments to make on the civic licensing aspects of the Bill?

1. Equalities, Climate Change and other Scottish Government objectives

You may respond to all the questions or only those you have a specific interest in. (Text boxes have no word limit, they will increase in size accordingly).

8. Do you consider that the Bill has any implications for meeting Scotland's climate change commitments? Please explain.

   Relating to the airgun licencing components of the bill;

   There will certainly be an impact in that journeys made by Firearms Enquiries Officers to 328,000 individuals will use carbon releasing fuel.

   Individuals who are required to surrender their legal property will need to travel to approved locations to hand it in.

   Safe disposal of metal, including lead needs to be considered.

   Plastic components will require careful disposal

   Will wooden components be recycled?

9. Do you consider that the Bill has any implications for meeting Scotland's equality and/or human rights commitments? Please explain.

   The airgun licensing aspect of the bill will have a negative impact. You are restricting individual’s rights to use their own property within the bounds of their own land in possible breach of ECHR Articles 1, 8, 14 & 17 and UDHR Articles 2, 12, 17, 24 & 27.

   If you do not provide adequate compensation to those who have no criminal record that choose to hand in their airguns or are forced to hand them in I believe that the government is committing theft

   It is appalling that the Justice Secretary has so blatantly ignored the results of the Public Consultation where 87% of respondents were opposed to airgun licensing.

10. Do you consider that the Bill has any implications for preventative spending and/or public services reform? Please explain.

I estimated that airgun licensing will cost in the region of £75,600,000. If you do not recoup the full cost of the licensing scheme and funds are required from the public purse there will be less money available for more worthy causes.

11. Do you consider that the Bill has any implications in relation to European Union issues? Please explain.

Possible breach of ECHR Articles 1, 8, 14 & 17
Trade with European airgun manufacturers will be impacted International airgun competition will be impacted

12. Do you have any other comments on the impact of the proposals contained in the Bill relation to Scottish Government objectives?

NO
2. Air Weapons Licensing

You may respond to all the questions or only those you have a specific interest in. (Text boxes have no word limit, they will increase in size accordingly).

13. In what ways will the creation of an air weapons licensing system in Scotland contribute to preserving public order and safety, reducing crime and advancing public health policy?

Simple - It will not

There will be no reduction in airgun crime directly attributed to a licensing scheme. Existing legislation if properly implemented provides adequate controls against the misuse of low powered airguns. I believe that there will be an initial increase in airgun related crime. Not necessarily violent crime but inadvertent crime, e.g. being in possession of an airgun whilst not knowing that a certificate is required.

Money used to fund the scheme could be better used to advance public health, say by using it for hospitals, safer roads, driving education (bad driving kills far more than guns do), youth education etc.

14. Is there sufficient provision, or sufficient capacity to provide, suitable numbers of air weapons clubs across all areas of Scotland for use by registered air weapons owners/users?

No there is not.

I estimate that there are in the region of 678,860 low powered airguns in Scotland. These are owned by around 378,073 people. I obtained these figures using the airgun ownership figures for England & Wales which gives 7.24% of the E&W population owning airguns (7,000,000 airguns owned by 4,000,000 people - Gun Trade Association 2010). 7.24% of the Scottish population based on 2010 numbers is 378,073 (ONS 2010)

A number of people use low powered airguns safely and responsibly in the gardens and on other land they have authority to do so. If “plinking” is to become “illegal” it is unlikely that there would be enough space in existing airgun clubs to cater for those who now have nowhere to shoot. Despite the government’s statement that it would encourage shooting at “approved” clubs, I doubt very much that the Scottish government would be willing to fund the setup of new shooting clubs given their well-known anti-shooting stance.

Even if 50% dispose of their property that still leaves a significant number of people looking for clubs that simply don’t exist.
15. How will the air weapons licensing system affect those using air weapons for personal/recreational use?

It will devastate the sport - which is the intention of the Scottish government.

16. How will the air weapons licensing system affect those aged 14 to 17 who use air weapons?

It will prevent new people entering the sport - a Scottish government intention.

It will make low powered airguns “special” and more attractive to young people who are intent on misbehaving and causing trouble. “Look I have an illegal airgun”.

I have found that young people involved in sports shooting are responsible and safe individuals. They tend to be more disciplined, responsive to instruction, dedicated and patient. All positive traits.

The Commonwealth Charter

“Importance of Young People in the Commonwealth
We recognise the positive and active role and contributions of young people in promoting development, peace, democracy and in protecting and promoting other Commonwealth values, such as tolerance and understanding, including respect for other cultures. The future success of the Commonwealth rests with the continued commitment and contributions of young people in promoting and sustaining the Commonwealth and its values and principles, and we commit to investing in and promoting their development, particularly through the creation of opportunities for youth employment and entrepreneurship”

Yet government constantly removes activities and opportunities from young people.

17. How will the air weapons licensing system affect those using air weapons for commercial/professional reasons (for example: for pest control; as part of the tourist/hunting season; as part of fairs, paintballing centre, entertainment sector etc.)?

Pest Control

Those who charge for pest control will probably put up their prices. Potential customers may decide not to employ pest controllers and may choose other method, perhaps illegal, to remove pests. Or perhaps they may not bother removing the pest at all. Perhaps they may acquire an "illegal" airgun themselves?

The cost of food may go up as pests are not being controlled to the same extent.

Perhaps less environmental friendly means of pest control will be used.

Rabbits and Rats are often controlled by shooting by airgun

“The Economic Cost of Invasive Non-Native Species on Great Britain” November 2010, sponsored by the Scottish Government (and others) states;

In Scotland Rat control costs £2,867,450 per year

Estimated annual cost to agriculture in Scotland
Rabbit £58,563,000
Rats £6,549,000

Estimated annual Yield Loss to Rabbits in Scotland £56,965,000

Tourism

There will be no airgun related tourism. Why come to Scotland if you have to get a Visitor permit, I’m sure they would rather spend their money elsewhere. Airgun shooting competitions will stop

Fairs

There is very little, if any, shooting at public fairs and events. The “anti-shooting” movement and anti-gun biased media have made a perfectly safe and enjoyable activity almost non-existent.

18. How will the air weapons licensing system affect those using air weapons for competitive sporting purposes?
Those who compete at the highest level will probably continue to do so, however casual recreational competition will cease. Eventually high level competitive shooting in Scotland will cease as there will be no new talent entering the sport. Perhaps those who compete at international level will choose to represent other countries. They may be forced to train elsewhere, like GB pistol shooters have to.

19. Is it equitable for those applying for an air weapons certificate to pay a fee which cannot be refundable irrespective of whether a certificate is granted or not?

A non-refundable application would be disgraceful. People are being forced in to applying for a certificate for an inanimate item they have owned and used safely and responsibly for many years. If they don’t have land permission or are not a member of a club they will not be granted a certificate, therefore their application fee should be refunded in full.

20. Will the air weapons licensing system have a positive or negative impact on other areas of the public sector in Scotland (eg. The work of local government, public agencies etc.)?

NEGATIVE

Scotland is already the laughing stock of the UK, Europe and further afield. People in the shooting community throughout the globe cannot believe the stupidity of such a scheme.

The Police do not have the resources to manage airgun licensing, they are struggling with the existing Firearms/Shotgun Licensing at the moment. There are still eight different licensing departments, with eight different interpretations of Firearms Legislation, within the single Police Force. Home Office guidance is NOT being followed and the personal opinions of Firearms Enquiries Officers is determining who does/doesn’t get a certificate and what firearms may/may not be permitted on the certificate. Firearms Legislation in general is completely mismanaged and a disgrace.

21. What, if any, might the unintended consequences of introducing an air weapons licensing system in Scotland be?
I don't believe that the Scottish government have any unintended consequences. They are anti-shooting and want to remove all "guns" of all types from civilian ownership and use.

Airgun licensing is the only area of Firearms Legislation that has been devolved and is therefore the first area the Scottish government can attack. The Scottish government is using this as a test run in order to get the systems in place (at massive expense) in case additional Firearms Legislation is devolved or should Scotland become independent (Heaven Help Us!). The Scottish government is intent on attacking the interests of law abiding shooting enthusiasts who are generally among the most law abiding people in the country.

However, to answer the question in the context that was meant; There may be Common Law implications; Under Common Law no crime is committed unless others are harmed or threatened, therefore using an airgun on your own property or having it on your possession and no person being harmed or threatened and no damage to property is NOT a Common Law crime.

You may find that enterprising people may go to England to purchase cheap airguns, hand them in and claim compensation from the Scottish government. I have yet to see figures on the estimated compensation bill, I expect it will run to millions.

How will the borders be policed to stop illegal importation of airguns?

Breach of the IOC Olympic Charter

"The practise of sport is a human right. Every individual must have the possibility of practising sport, without discrimination of any kind and in the Olympic spirit, which requires mutual understanding with a spirit of friendship, solidarity and fair play."

"Any form of discrimination with regard to a country or a person on grounds of race, religion, politics, gender or otherwise is incompatible with belonging to the Olympic Movement"

"Belonging to the Olympic Movement requires compliance with the Olympic Charter and recognition by the IOC"

NOTE: If Scotland remains within the United Kingdom, then Great Britain has two options;

1. No longer be a member of the Olympic movement as Scottish airgun shooters will be unfairly discriminated against in that they will face higher costs and restriction to where they can practise, whereas their English & Welsh counterparts do not have these restrictions. (Northern Ireland airgun shooters are also unfairly discriminated against).

Or....

2. Make the whole of Great Britain a level playing field by implementing an airgun licensing for England & Wales (and amending the requirements in Northern Ireland). The estimated cost for an airgun licensing scheme in England & Wales is £800,000,000

Possible breach of ECHR, UDHR, Common Law, Claim of Right Act 1689 and Commonwealth Charter.

22. Do you have any other comments to make on air weapons licensing aspects of the Bill?

A complete waste of tax payers (my) money.

All Police officers I have spoken with about the issue claim it will do nothing to reduce airgun crime.
3. General Licensing Issues

You may respond to all questions or only those you have a specific interest in. (Text boxes have no word limit, they will increase in size accordingly).

23. Is the current Scottish licensing regime, as set out in the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 and the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005, fit for purpose?

24. Should a licensing system seek to regulate individual behaviour or communities of space (e.g. ‘city space’ etc.)?

25. In what way should the licensing system in Scotland interact with the support the land use planning system, community planning and regeneration?
26. How does the licensing system in Scotland assist with the delivery of sustainable development and economic balanced areas?

27. In what way does the licensing system in Scotland support health and planning, addressing health inequalities and public health wellbeing outcomes?
4. Alcohol Licensing

You may respond to all questions or only those you have a specific interest in.
(Text boxes have no word limit, they will increase in size accordingly).

28. In what ways will the Bill's provisions on alcohol licensing allow for reductions in crime and the preservation of public order?

29. Are there any other measures which should be taken to assist in the reduction of crime and the preservation of public order?

30. In what ways will the provisions in the Bill enhance the licensing objectives set out in the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005?
31. In what ways will the re-introduction of the “fit and proper person” test assist with the implementation of the licensing objectives set out in the 2005 act?

32. Have there been any unintended consequences arising from the 2005 Act, for example, in rural areas or the economic regeneration of areas?

33. Which, if any, types of spent relevant offences should be required to be disclosed and what do you think the benefits of disclosure will be?

34. Do you have any other comments to make on the alcohol licensing aspects of the Bill?
5. Taxi and Private Hire Car Licensing

You may respond to all questions or only those you have a specific interest in. (Text boxes have no word limit, they will increase in size accordingly).

35. What benefits should the licensing of taxis and private hire cars deliver for customers?

36. In what ways do customers, providers of taxi/private hire car services and local authorities benefit from the two-tier licensing regime for taxis and private hire cars?

37. The Government states that a radical overhaul of the current two-tier licensing regime would “clearly require a very high level of resource and would cause significant disruption for the trade, local authorities, the police and ultimately the travelling public”. What are your views on this and would the potential costs and disruptions outweigh any potential benefits of a unified system?
38. Do the changes made by sections 60 (overprovision of private hire car licences) and 61 (testing of private hire car drivers) of the Bill strike the right balance in terms of introducing greater consistency while maintaining justifiable differences?

39. Do you have any views on the section 62 provisions bringing vehicles contracted for exclusive use for 24 or more hours within the licensing regime for taxis and private hire cars, and should any exemptions be included in the Bill?
6. Scrap Metal Dealer Licensing

You may respond to all questions or only those you have a specific interest in. (Text boxes have no word limit, they will increase in size accordingly).

40. Taking the proposals in sections 63 to 66 of the Bill together, how will they have the desired effect of strengthening the metal dealers’ licensing regime to the extent that metal theft and related criminal activity is reduced?

41. In your view, could the Bill be further strengthened in any way, for example, by including an accreditation scheme for metal dealers?

42. Removal of exemption warrant - do you wish to comment on the proposal to remove the exemption warrant system?
43. Removal of requirement to retain metal on-site - what impact will the proposal to remove the retention of metal requirement have on the enforcement of the licensing regime and prevention of criminal activities?

44. Forms of payment - what is your view on the proposal to go 'cashless' and is there merit in considering whether metal dealers could be allowed to operate using cash for only very small transactions, which could be limited to a certain number per month?
45. Forms of identification and record keeping:

In line with the Scrap Metal Dealers Act 2013, the Bill adds additional record keeping requirements to a metal dealer’s licence including recording the means by which a seller’s name and address was verified and retaining a copy of the document, and the method of payment and a copy of the payment document. The Bill will also require a metal dealer to record information in books with serially numbered pages or by means of an electronic device, and to keep separate records at each place of business. Such information and documents are to be kept for three rather than the current two years.

How important is it that the record keeping requirements reflect those in the Scrap Metal Dealers Act 2013, and do you agree with the Scottish Government that the proposed record keeping requirements are not unduly burdensome?
46. Mandatory and discretionary licensing requirements:

The Scottish Ministers can impose mandatory licensing requirements, such as those included in the Bill relating to record keeping and the identification of customers. In addition, local authorities can also attach discretionary requirements to licences in their areas.

Does the Bill get the balance right between mandatory and discretionary licensing requirements? Should the Bill include other mandatory conditions for obtaining a metal dealer's licence, such as installing CCTV at metal dealers' premises or in relation to labelling of metal and 'forensic coding'?
7. Civic Licensing – Theatre Licensing

You may respond to all the questions or only those you have a specific interest in. (Text boxes have no word limit, they will increase in size accordingly).

47. Will there be any impacts during the transitional period between ending the current theatre licence and starting the public entertainment licence?

48. Are there additional costs or resource implications on theatres or licensing authorities?

49. How should licensing authorities integrate their current fee charging structure into their public entertainment regime?
8. Civic Licensing – Sexual Entertainment Venues

You may respond to all questions or only those you have a specific interest in. (Text boxes have no word limit, they will increase in size accordingly).

50. What are the consequences of operating the new licensing regime using the definitions set out at section 68 of the Bill?

- 'sexual entertainment venue'
- 'audience'
- 'financial gain'
- 'organiser'
- 'premises'
- 'sexual entertainment', and
- 'display of nudity'

51. The Bill specifies that a venue hosting sexual entertainment on three occasions or less within a 12 month period would not be treated as a sexual entertainment venue: does this have any unintended consequences?
52. Local licensing authorities will be able to set the number of sexual entertainment venues in their area to below the existing level, or zero: are there any advantages or disadvantages to this approach?

53. The Bill relies mainly on the existing licensing regime for sex shops as set out in section 44 and Schedule 2 of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 (application, notification, objections and representations, revocation of licences etc., enforcement and appeals): is this mechanism adequate for the licensing of sexual entertainment venues - if not, please explain why?

54. Are there any barriers to licensing authorities operating the new licensing regime?
55. Civic Licensing

Do you have any other comments to make on the civic licensing aspects of the Bill?
Dear Mr. Stewart,

I am a keen airgunner, 57 years old and shooting from the age of 10. I own over 100 airguns, many of sentimental value. I tend to shoot targets informally as do my family and friends. I used to shoot full bore pistol until they were banned. In my opinion, the proposed Bill will do nothing to prevent airgun misuse as those intent on misusing airguns will ignore any legislation, and my view is the laws already in place are robust enough. The extra expense and red tape in licencing will deter many from a sport that is an integral part of Scotland's rural life, and to suggest airgunners join a club is unrealistic due to lack of locations and the fact that most airgunners shoot at short notice and enjoy the solitude. I would urge the Scottish Government to reconsider implementing this Bill.

Yours faithfully,

Craig Short
Dear Mr. Cullum,

I am a keen air rifle user living in East Lothian, I work in country sports tourism and I am writing to you in regards to the proposed licensing of air rifles in Scotland. I obtained your email address from the Scottish Countryside Alliance so I hope you are the right person to contact (if not would it be possible to either forward this to the correct person or perhaps give me the email address of the relevant person/department).

I should start by saying that as far as I was aware the law to introduce licensing for air rifles had already been approved and was only awaiting implementation, if I am wrong on this matter I would be very happy indeed, sadly however I don't think I am.

I have already contacted my local MSP Ian Gray on this issue to which he politely replied. The reply I relieved was as I expected i.e. that the Scottish Labour party were in agreement with the SNP in favour of licensing air rifles with the strong proviso that those who have a legitimate use for an air rifle not be blocked from obtaining a license. Although this response was considered and polite it left no doubt that my local MSP would not be fighting against the imposition of licenses for air rifles.

With the response I received from my local MSP in mind I was very much heartened to read (via the BBC) that the Scottish government were now seeking opinions on the licensing of air rifles.

Ignorating the opinions of the Scottish people

As a starting point I must say I'm slightly bewildered as to why the government are once again seeking opinions on this matter, a consultation has already been held with the result being an overwhelming rejection of the proposal (87%). Shockingly the result of the consultation was totally ignored showing very clearly the nanny state "big brother knows best" attitude of the current Scottish government. What on earth is the point of holding a consultation only to ignore the results if they were not the results the government wanted to hear, it's a complete waste of tax payers money and shows the complete disregard the government shows for the opinion of the people of Scotland when those opinions don't match their own. The respondents of the consultation are those who are interested in air rifles and their use, those who actively use them for legitimate reasons such as sport, pest control or as collectors, these are the people who will be most affected by the necessity to license air rifles yet their voices were ignored.

Criminalise law abiding citizens

What this law will do is potentially criminalize a huge amount of law abiding citizens while doing absolutely nothing to stop people committing crimes with air weapons. If a person owns an air rifle and plans to use it for criminal purposes then the idea that they will come forward to obtain a license for that weapon is totally laughable. The case in 2005 of a toddler being murder by someone with an air rifle is truly shocking but this represents an infinitesimally miniscule minority of air owners; law abiding citizens should not be punished for the offenses of the criminal few (the murder was also a known drug addict). In response to this argument I'm sure figures will be wheeled out concerning the amount of injuries cause by air rifles each year, these however will still represent a tiny proportion in relation to the estimate 1/2 million air weapons in Scotland.

Air rifles as tools

Air rifles are a tool as much as any other weapon, they are only as dangerous as the person that wields them, the overwhelming majority of air rifle users cause zero harm and will be financially punished by having to pay to license their weapons, those who do intend to cause harm will not be punished in any way, they will hurt innocent people and will probably do so regardless of whether or not they are in possession of an air weapon. Punish any offense that intentionally causes harm to the maximum extent of the law, do not punish the weapon. Air rifles are of course capable of inflicting injuries and yet so are knives.

Responsible adults who use knives for legitimate purposes do not need a license yet people who use air rifles for equally legitimate purposes will need a license. The Scottish Government should treat their citizens like responsible human beings and trust that they will act as such other wise (and I'm again reducing the argument to the extreme), what is next, compulsory knife licenses!? So again my argument can be reduced to "punish the crime not the weapon".

Disproportionate consequences

I, like many other people in Scotland, have owned air rifles for many years and have used them for sporting purposes and vermin control without causing an iota of harm or concern to anyone (I live in a very rural setting). The idea that in a few months/years (depending on how long it will take to enact the law) that I will have to apply for a license (with no grantee of it being granted) for something that I have legally owned for 10 + years is utterly ridiculous. It will be at my expense that any license will be issued, if I fail to apply, or fail to pay for or fail to be granted a license, my air weapons will have to be handed in to the police, not because I have done something wrong, but because a law has been enacted, a law that has been roundly rejected by the very people whose opinion's the Scottish government asked for.

The consequences for disobeying the new law are monstrously disproportionate, to put the unlicensed owner ship of an air rifle (which are currently limited to 12 foot pounds of pressure any way) in the same category as the unlicensed ownership of a shotgun or rifle is ludicrous. To suggest jail time could be imposed on someone for owning an air rifle (without causing harm to any one) without a license in madness of the highest order. The proposed law could see someone who was unaware there was an air rifle in the house (perhaps left in the attic by a parent etc.) go to jail, one could argue that this is reducing the argument to the absurd but the fact that this very scenario was mentioned in the original consultation shows the pen-pushing pedantry to which the Scottish Government can stoop.
A Waste of police time and resources

As Ian Gray MSP was so keen to point out, those with a legitimate reason to hold an air rifle will not be stopped from obtaining a license. Who is it that will decide what a legitimate reason for holding an air rifle will be? The answer is of course the police. The police force of Scotland have plenty to deal with as it is with the licensing of shotguns and other firearms, introducing a law that would require 1/2 million air rifles to also be licensed would be an unwarranted and un-sustainable use of their time and resources. It is my also my understanding that the police force are considering increasing the cost of firearms certificates in general, what further evidence does one need to show that licensing is expensive and cumbersome?

Plinking

Finally I noticed that the government were also taking aim at (excuse the pun) "plinking", the practice of target practice in people's back gardens. Now I can see why in a health and safety obsessed nanny state this might be an issue but again I go back to my previous point of treating people like reasonable human beings. Parents have been introducing their children to guns and gun safety for years by setting up targets in their back garden. Normal, sensible members of society will go to every length to ensure this is done in a safe and considerate manner, installing a solid back stop and pellet catcher, informing neighbours, making sure pellets don't stray across the boundaries of their property etc. As far as I'm aware there has been no recent upsurge in the amount of complaints about "plinking", no spate of tragic accidents cause by stray pellets and therefore there should be no need to legislate against it.

A large proportion of the gun owning population (be it air rifles, shotguns, 22’s etc.) learnt the basics of gun safety by using air rifles in their gardens under the watchful eye of their parents and therefore the good behaviour of Scotland's air rifle owners in, in-part, due to "plinking". To say that "plinking" is a dangerous and unnecessary use of an air rifle and therefore deny a large number of license applications under the new law is to deny children (under supervision) a safe, fun and cheap introduction to the correct use of guns.

Thank you for taking the time to read this, I hope it might be of use in the debate on the licensing of air rifles.

Kind Regards

Alex Pearson

1. Equalities, Climate Change and other Scottish Government objectives

You may respond to all the questions or only those you have a specific interest in. (Text boxes have no word limit, they will increase in size accordingly).

8. Do you consider that the Bill has any implications for meeting Scotland’s climate change commitments? Please explain.

Airgun Licencing will have several negative effects for the Scottish environment.

As recreational shooting not be classed as good reason many people will have to join clubs or obtain approved land to shoot on. These people will then have to travel to these areas. I have been quoted by some people that a journey of up to 60 miles is required to get to their nearest club.

This increased road use will have a negative impact on the environment due to increased fuel usage and thus emissions. If the figures of E&W airgun owners are extrapolated for Scotland and an average of 10 miles total travel distance to clubs and back once a week is used this could be 65 Million miles travelled in a year because people will no longer be allowed to carry out recreational shooting on their own property.

(125,000 people x 10 miles/week x 52 weeks)

There may also be issues with costs and environmental impacts of disposing of a large percentage of the estimated 500,000 airguns in Scotland which law abiding people will have confiscated from them.

9. Do you consider that the Bill has any implications for meeting Scotland’s equality and/or human rights commitments? Please explain.
It will also have a greater negative effect on those with lower incomes who cannot afford the additional expenses of club membership/traveling etc. Changing a sport that was widely open to everyone to a sport for those with greater disposable incomes.

I have been lead to believe that this bill and other acts of Scottish and British parliament may contravene several acts of constitutional law. Including the Claim of Right, Bill of Rights and the ECHR.

Specifically relating to the ECHR this law violates article 1, Article 5 Article 8, Article 14

I also believe that although this is not technically a ban the Scottish Government should be require to fairly compensate air gun owners who have been forced to sell or destroy their airguns by this law. All airguns in Scotland will suddenly depreciate very quickly due to a flooding of the market with unwanted guns. Many people will lose a lot of money so it is only fair and reasonable that the Scottish Government compensates people up to a fair market value if this proposal goes ahead.

10. Do you consider that the Bill has any implications for preventative spending and/ or public services reform? Please explain.

We have estimated potential costs up to £100,000,000 but with a likely cost of around £75,000,000 in processing application fees alone. This does not take into account additional costs faced by public services.

If compensation is paid out this will also increase costs to the public purse.

A huge amount of money and public services time will be wasted that could be better directed to more worthy and effective efforts.

11. Do you consider that the Bill has any implications in relation to European Union issues? Please explain.
Please see response to question 9

“I have been led to believe that this bill and other acts of Scottish and British parliament may contravene several acts of constitutional law. Including the Claim of Right, Bill of Rights and the ECHR.

12. Do you have any other comments on the impact of the proposals contained in the Bill relation to Scottish Government objectives?

Since the Scottish Governments objectives appear to be the destruction of Firearms ownership and shooting sports in Scotland it would seem that this bill is well on the way to completing this.

However if the Scottish Governments objectives are promoting individual freedom, equality, sports and supporting people on low incomes this bill should be scrapped.

Shooting is an inclusive sport and firearms owners are amongst the most law abiding sections of society yet are being used as the scape goat by a Government keen to win cheap political points.

No other section of society would face the discrimination firearms enthusiasts face because of a very small minority of irresponsible people.
2. Air Weapons Licensing

You may respond to all the questions or only those you have a specific interest in. (Text boxes have no word limit, they will increase in size accordingly).

13. In what ways will the creation of an air weapons licensing system in Scotland contribute to preserving public order and safety, reducing crime and advancing public health policy?

In my opinion it will have a negligible effect on crime prevention, public safety and possibly have a negative effect on public safety.

Airgun crime has fallen 76% since 2006. A massive drop. This legislation is being fuelled by exploiting the understandable emotions felt after the shooting of young Andrew Morton. However it should be noted that this was before the introduction of the Violent Crimes Reduction Act. The introduction of this act which toughened up regulations on air guns has corresponded with this huge drop. Alongside continued education and enforcement of current laws we should continue to see drops without the need for costly, discriminatory and disproportionate legislation.

The ratio of airgun offences to the number of airguns is less than 0.04% compared to motor vehicles which is approximately 12.4%. In 2012 there were more cases of injuries caused by dog bites admitted to one Scottish hospital than airgun offences for the whole of Scotland. Again the effect of airguns on public health is negligible and there are bigger problems at hand.

Public health could also be affected by a rise in pest species as airguns are a vital tool in pest control and land management. This service is often done for free by airgun owners who faced with rising costs or unable to meet the ridiculous requirements may choose to give up. This could result in increases in pest species spreading disease and damaging crops.

14. Is there sufficient provision, or sufficient capacity to provide, suitable numbers of air weapons clubs across all areas of Scotland for use by registered air weapons owners/ users?
No there is not. There are an estimated 500,000 airguns in Scotland and if extrapolating this number using figures from England and Wales it would suggest that these guns are owned by 125,000 individuals.

Many people safely shoot recreationally on their own property; it is a popular pass time as there is no need for club membership or having access to land. Clubs simply could not cope with a huge influx of airgun members. I have also spoken with many people who shoot airguns and some face a 60 mile round trip to their nearest gun club.

This again increases costs to the individual and pollutes the environment due to increased road travel.

15. How will the air weapons licensing system affect those using air weapons for personal/recreational use?

As mentioned above many people who use airguns do so on their own property. It is carried out by tens of thousands of people every year safely and without incident. There are already laws placing responsibilities on the shooter to ensure best practice and provisions to ensure punishment if acting irresponsibly.

Many people will be forced out of their sports due to increased costs, or ridiculously high standards. They will lose out financially as they will also have to sell their airguns at a depreciated value due to the market being flooded by airguns.

Those that remain in the sport will also face the increased costs in travelling, fees and time.

In short every law abiding air gun user will be facing criminalisation overnight, the destruction of their sports/hobbies and a violation of their private property rights because of a very small minority of irresponsible people.

It must be repeated that the vast majority of airgun owners are responsible and law abiding and it would be unacceptable if any other group were punished in this disproportionate manner because of the reckless few.
16. How will the air weapons licensing system affect those aged 14 to 17 who use air weapons?

It will affect the ease of which young people can be introduced to shooting sports. Therefore it will have a negative effect on the number of people who take up shooting as a hobby or for sport. It will reduce the number of future sporting champions. It will affect the number of young people taking part in active outdoor pursuits.

17. How will the air weapons licensing system affect those using air weapons for commercial/professional reasons (for example: for pest control; as part of the tourist/hunting season; as part of fairs, paintballing centre, entertainment sector etc.)?

Those who use airguns for commercial or business reasons will have to face the additional costs but will no doubt be able to get a certificate.

However the biggest effect will be on those who carry out pest control for free. This service is carried out often free for charge. It is often used on farmland to protect crop damage, golf courses to protect course damage and in urban areas to control pigeon populations as their faeces is harmful to human health.

It cannot be underestimated how vital these services are to the Scottish economy if people have to pay money to acquire a certificate through club membership or obtaining the rights to land they may start to charge for their services or stop carrying them out.

Any increases in costs will be passed on to the Scottish consumer.

It is important to note that Airguns are often used for the purposes of Rabbit control. In 2012 rabbits cost £56,000,000 of crop damage in Scotland. This would likely increase airgun users are forced to give up.

In addition it would appear than some forms of soft air guns will be affected by this act thus potentially damaging the popular sport of skirmishing in Scotland.

I have spoken with many people who reside down south and come up for shooting holidays with friends. They have stated that they will no longer visit Scotland if they have to acquire certificates or visitors permits for their airguns.
18. How will the air weapons licensing system affect those using air weapons for competitive sporting purposes?

Competitive sportsmen and women will no doubt be able to continue with their sports with the added expense however the system will affect the number of people introduced to the sport and have a negative overall impact as the sport may begin to stagnate.

It is my understanding that the majority of airgun owners shoot for recreation on their own land not for competition and thus would not be eligible for a certificate. Thus being deprived of their property and pastime.

19. Is it equitable for those applying for an air weapons certificate to pay a fee which cannot be refundable irrespective of whether a certificate is granted or not?

No if a certificate is refused a full refund should be given as is the case with a Shotgun or Firearms Certificate. However I believe that since certificates offer no value to the applicant/holder and are essentially forced upon us due to public safety concerns it should be a free as it is a public service. The majority of Firearms/airgun owners are taxpayers so are essentially paying for a certificate twice.

20. Will the air weapons licensing system have a positive or negative impact on other areas of the public sector in Scotland (eg. The work of local government, public agencies etc.)?

This regime will have a huge negative effect on Police Scotland and its Firearms Licence Departments.

Countless man hours will be wasted policing this regime and affect the standard of service in dealing with Firearms and Shotgun Certificates. I believe that this may actually hinder public safety not improve it.

It is my opinion that the Scottish Governments estimates on costs are vastly underestimated. Using figures obtained from the ACPO and the estimated number of airgun owners in Scotland we believe costs could be anywhere from £25-100,000,000 in processing applications alone. This
21. What, if any, might the unintended consequences of introducing an air weapons licensing system in Scotland be?

Although I do not believe it to be unintended the consequences will be a reduction in the number of law abiding people who are introduced and take part in shooting sports.

Many people are first introduced to shooting through airguns as there is no requirement for a certificate and it can be done in ones back garden.

Faced with rising costs and red tape many people may decide to give up their sports or never take part.

Many sporting champions first learned to shoot in this manner especially those representing Scotland at the Commonwealth games and it will affect the likelihood of future undiscovered talent being introduced to the sports and bringing glory to Scotland.

22. Do you have any other comments to make on air weapons licensing aspects of the Bill?

The bill is disproportionate and will affect many more law abiding citizens than it does criminals.

As you are already aware a public consultation was carried out in which 87% of the responses were against the proposal. It has been argued that since there were approximately 1,100 responses this cannot be given as an indication of the General public’s view.

If the result were in favour of the proposal I doubt this argument would have been used by the Scottish Government. However there have been no major calls from the general public to ban/licence airguns. It is likely that most Scotsmen and women who are neither in pro gun or anti-gun camps do not have any great interest in the matter and many of those who will be in favour of a licence will have been swayed by emotional rhetoric and not facts.

It is simply facts that should be looked at.

Those in favour of a licence rely solely on exploiting a tragic but very rare event, there is little evidence to back up their claims and thus they manipulate people’s emotions to gain support for their cause.

It is the duty of good Government to ensure that emotive knee jerk reactions are not allowed to influence law making. We have seen knee jerk reactions in the past and whilst it makes for good publicity for political parties it does very little for public safety or crime prevention.

This proposal has been criticized by various organisations including the Association of Scottish Police Superintendents on grounds of costs and manageability and the Regulatory Review Group of Scotland who have stated that proper impact assessments have not been carried out. This is in addition to the various shooting organisations that should be considered as experts in this field.

Messages of support from all over the world have been sent to the No to Airgun Licencing In Scotland campaign with many of the same sentiments that were heard in the original consultation. Indeed many are watching the Scottish Government/Parliament closely and are disturbed at the heavy handed draconian nature of this law.

Airgun crime is down 76% since 2006. This coincides with the introduction of the Violent Crime Reduction Act. This was not in place at the time of young Andrew Morton’s death.

All Firearms crime is at a 30 year low in Scotland. The mention of over half of offences involving airguns is just wordplay to justify this risible legislation.

There are already over 30 laws that directly and indirectly punish airgun misuse and should be enforced properly. If 30 laws do not deter people with criminal intent why will 31?
Additional costs may also be faced by members of the public indirectly as airguns are a vital tool in carrying out pest control on farmland, golf courses and inner city areas. These services are often carried out for free but rising costs may see people charge which will be passed on to consumers.

This proposal appears to be nothing more than populist politics that will have no effect of crime and is simply a way to achieve a backdoor ban on shooting sports.

Further Correspondence Received 20/09/2014

Dear Sir/Madam,

I have already provided written evidence regarding this bill however upon reading the Scottish Governments replies to the Committees excellent and very valid questions I feel I must highlight what I consider to be very serious issues with the Governments attitude and further emphasise why the committee should do all it can to stop this legislation.

In their response to Question 1, the Scottish Government accepts that airgun crime has fallen by a further 13%. Given the already miniscule number of airgun offences this is an excellent result achieved without licencing. Whilst the Government response uses wordplay by stating that airgun offences are 47% of firearms offences to make it sound serious that fact remains that out of the estimated 500,000 airguns in Scotland less than 0.04% are involved in an offence. Airgun crime is quite simply almost non-existent.

Regarding Question 2, it is unacceptable that Government or authority is able to define good reason as this can come down to opinion and is often left open to abuse. The Section 2 system for Shotgun certificates works very well as it provides a better balance between the rights of individuals to participate in sports but still allows the necessary checks to be performed by the police.

Scotland has a tradition of respecting individual liberty and excessive legislation requiring “good reason” is nothing to do with public safety and simply a way to exercise more power over individuals who have committed no crime.

Regarding Question 5, Again the Government accepts that those who will knowingly misuse airguns will not apply for a licence. What then is the point of this process? The police already have the ability to confiscate airguns if they believe an offence has been or is about to be committed.

The Government also mentions people who will not apply for a licence because they do not meet the ridiculously high requirements. These people may not have any criminal intent to do harm or loss to another but are being criminalised by the Government because of this ridiculous law.

This law does nothing but create a victimless offence, hinder law abiding people, waste police time and leave a huge cost burden to the tax payer.

There are countless laws pertaining both directly and indirectly to airguns that allow the police to keep the peace and the justice system to punish misuse.

This law is another attack on law abiding firearms owners in an attempt to reduce their numbers and to achieve a “backdoor ban”. Shooting is worth millions to the Scottish Economy and firearms enthusiasts deserve to be treated better than this.

Name/Organisation: Duncan Rogers,

1. Air Weapons Licensing

You may respond to all the questions or only those you have a specific interest in. (Text boxes have no word limit, they will increase in size accordingly).

13. In what ways will the creation of an air weapons licensing system in Scotland contribute to preserving public order and safety, reducing crime and advancing public health policy?
I strongly feel that the creation of an airgun licensing system will have no beneficial effects on public safety, order or the reduction of crime or indeed on the advancement of any public health policy. Most of the airguns that this proposed bill is targeting are used (in the majority of cases) for target shooting and/or pest control. A small minority of people carry out illegal activities with airguns. These are the very (type) of person who will ignore entirely any legislation introduced and will continue to misuse these tools. These tools are not used, in the vast majority of cases, to create a public nuisance or a health hazard; and yet, to hear the Scottish parliament's Justice Minister speak on the subject, we are led to believe that they are an ever present scourge within our nation. This is patently NOT the case. Indeed, by the Scottish governments own figures publicly available, airgun crime is at an all time low.

A public consultation recently carried out by the Scottish governments agents, returned a resounding 87% NO vote on the question as to whether there should be any implementation of licensing for airguns. Despite this figure, Mr Kenny MacAskill initially responded by stating that despite this return figure the Scottish Government would be proceeding with the proposed legislation regardless.

Later, Mr MacAskill amended this statement to the effect that the original public consultation did not relate to the question of whether or not to licence airguns, but instead stated that it related to whether or not it would affect other parts of life in Scotland. This (last) is the most disgraceful piece of cherry picking of facts I have had the misfortune to listen to in many a year from a politician.

Our Justice Minister is clearly on a mission, and even at the expense of completely disregarding a public consultation; and completely disregarding his chief police officers, and completely ignoring his own governments crime figures, he is bent on this course and nothing will sway him.

I would suggest that this behaviour is not the behaviour of a democratically elected justice minister, but is rather the behaviour of a despot or an autocrat.

We have laws & rules aplenty to deal with miscreants who misuse airguns (or any guns)

Why not apply these laws more assiduously, instead of potentially at best, marginalising, and at worst criminalising a sizeable population of law abiding citizens in Scotland?

14. Is there sufficient provision, or sufficient capacity to provide, suitable numbers of air weapons clubs across all areas of Scotland for use by registered air weapons owners/users?
There is certainly NOT enough capacity in existent clubs in Scotland to cater for (potentially) hundreds of thousands more users. I have personal knowledge of this as a former member (& New Member Secretary/range safety adviser) at Dunfermline Airgun Club. For decades, the club has held around twenty to twenty five members, and now? It is bursting at the seams with forty five members and only waiting space available. All of the clubs in Scotland are now in this position.

15. How will the air weapons licensing system affect those using air weapons for personal/recreational use?

It will be restrictive if introduced, the public perception that airguns 'are bad' has been pushed and further pushed by the Scottish Governments spin doctors, with Mr MacAskill at the helm. This perception WILL be fermented in future in order to further restrict the use of airguns for recreational use. Of this I have absolutely no doubt whatsoever. Eventually, the only places that can will be allowed for recreational use of airguns will be licensed clubs.

16. How will the air weapons licensing system affect those aged 14 to 17 who use air weapons?

It will put off the young from entering into a very enjoyable pastime. Their parents, who will be hoodwinked into believing the myth that airguns are bad, by our governments publicity system, will deny many the opportunity to partake of a thoroughly harmless and safe hobby. The sports participants will dwindle.

17. How will the air weapons licensing system affect those using air weapons for commercial/professional reasons (for example: for pest control; as part of the tourist/hunting season; as part of fairs, paintballing centre, entertainment sector etc.)?
I personally carry out significant pest control activities on a number of permissions throughout central Scotland, Fife & Perth Kinross.
I own literally thousands of pounds worth of kit to enable me to do this safely and efficiently.
I personally remove thousands of prey species per year.
In addition to this service, I also monitor the permissions I shoot over and report concerns & issues to the landowners or their neighbours.
If newcomers are discouraged from this activity, who will, in future, control the depredations of rabbit, grey squirrel, rat and numerous other pest species that low powered airguns are the perfect tool for controlling?

18. How will the air weapons licensing system affect those using air weapons for competitive sporting purposes?

I used to participate in competitive shooting discipline, Field Target & Hunter Field Target. I spent many days and not a little money on this activity. Thousands of other shooters do the same. There are hundreds of thousands of airgun shooters in the UK.

Teams from all over the UK would visit each others nations, clubs and grounds to participate. How will visitors to Scotland bring airguns into Scotland if licensing becomes a reality?

19. Is it equitable for those applying for an air weapons certificate to pay a fee which cannot be refundable irrespective of whether a certificate is granted or not?

No it most certainly would NOT be equitable to pay a non refundable fee in the event that a licence were not granted

20. Will the air weapons licensing system have a positive or negative impact on other areas of the public sector in Scotland (eg. The work of local government, public agencies etc.)?
I suspect that implementation of licensing in Scotland for an unknown number of guns (estimated by the Scottish government's own figures to be anywhere to 100,000+ individual items) will be an organisational nightmare with no benefit.

21. What, if any, might the unintended consequences of introducing an air weapons licensing system in Scotland be?

Criminalisation of a huge number of people, reduction in the pest control area and commensurate damage of structure, property, food and loss of revenue for farmers & food producers.

Also the loss of sales of shooting equipment (guns, sights, clothing, kit) will have a significant effect on many businesses throughout Scotland.

22. Do you have any other comments to make on air weapons licensing aspects of the Bill?

I firmly believe this proposed Bill will do nothing but produce distress and hardship for a huge number of shooters & business owners in Scotland.

3. General Licensing Issues

You may respond to all questions or only those you have a specific interest in. (Text boxes have no word limit, they will increase in size accordingly).

23. Is the current Scottish licensing regime, as set out in the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 and the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005, fit for purpose?

24. Should a licensing system seek to regulate individual behaviour or communities of space (eg. ‘city space’ etc.)?

25. In what way should the licensing system in Scotland interact with the support the land use planning system, community planning and regeneration?
26. How does the licensing system in Scotland assist with the delivery of sustainable development and economic balanced areas?

27. In what way does the licensing system in Scotland support health and planning, addressing health inequalities and public health wellbeing outcomes?
4. Alcohol Licensing

You may respond to all questions or only those you have a specific interest in. (Text boxes have no word limit, they will increase in size accordingly).

28. In what ways will the Bill’s provisions on alcohol licensing allow for reductions in crime and the preservation of public order?

29. Are there any other measures which should be taken to assist in the reduction of crime and the preservation of public order?

30. In what ways will the provisions in the Bill enhance the licensing objectives set out in the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005?
31. In what ways will the re-introduction of the “fit and proper person” test assist with the implementation of the licensing objectives set out in the 2005 act?

32. Have there been any unintended consequences arising from the 2005 Act, for example, in rural areas or the economic regeneration of areas?

33. Which, if any, types of spent relevant offences should be required to be disclosed and what do you think the benefits of disclosure will be?

34. Do you have any other comments to make on the alcohol licensing aspects of the Bill?
5. Taxi and Private Hire Car Licensing

You may respond to all questions or only those you have a specific interest in. (Text boxes have no word limit, they will increase in size accordingly).

35. What benefits should the licensing of taxis and private hire cars deliver for customers?

36. In what ways do customers, providers of taxi/private hire car services and local authorities benefit from the two-tier licensing regime for taxis and private hire cars?

37. The Government states that a radical overhaul of the current two-tier licensing regime would “clearly require a very high level of resource and would cause significant disruption for the trade, local authorities, the police and ultimately the travelling public”. What are your views on this and would the potential costs and disruptions outweigh any potential benefits of a unified system?
38. Do the changes made by sections 60 (overprovision of private hire car licences) and 61 (testing of private hire car drivers) of the Bill strike the right balance in terms of introducing greater consistency while maintaining justifiable differences?

39. Do you have any views on the section 62 provisions bringing vehicles contracted for exclusive use for 24 or more hours within the licensing regime for taxis and private hire cars, and should any exemptions be included in the Bill?
6. Scrap Metal Dealer Licensing

You may respond to all questions or only those you have a specific interest in. (Text boxes have no word limit, they will increase in size accordingly).

40. Taking the proposals in sections 63 to 66 of the Bill together, how will they have the desired effect of strengthening the metal dealers' licensing regime to the extent that metal theft and related criminal activity is reduced?

41. In your view, could the Bill be further strengthened in any way, for example, by including an accreditation scheme for metal dealers?

42. Removal of exemption warrant - do you wish to comment on the proposal to remove the exemption warrant system?
43. Removal of requirement to retain metal on-site - what impact will the proposal to remove the retention of metal requirement have on the enforcement of the licensing regime and prevention of criminal activities?

44. Forms of payment - what is your view on the proposal to go 'cashless' and is there merit in considering whether metal dealers could be allowed to operate using cash for only very small transactions, which could be limited to a certain number per month?
45. Forms of identification and record keeping:

In line with the Scrap Metal Dealers Act 2013, the Bill adds additional record keeping requirements to a metal dealer’s licence including recording the means by which a seller’s name and address was verified and retaining a copy of the document, and the method of payment and a copy of the payment document. The Bill will also require a metal dealer to record information in books with serially numbered pages or by means of an electronic device, and to keep separate records at each place of business. Such information and documents are to be kept for three rather than the current two years.

How important is it that the record keeping requirements reflect those in the Scrap Metal Dealers Act 2013, and do you agree with the Scottish Government that the proposed record keeping requirements are not unduly burdensome?
46. Mandatory and discretionary licensing requirements:

The Scottish Ministers can impose mandatory licensing requirements, such as those included in the Bill relating to record keeping and the identification of customers. In addition, local authorities can also attach discretionary requirements to licences in their areas.

Does the Bill get the balance right between mandatory and discretionary licensing requirements? Should the Bill include other mandatory conditions for obtaining a metal dealer's licence, such as installing CCTV at metal dealers' premises or in relation to labelling of metal and 'forensic coding'?
7. Civic Licensing – Theatre Licensing

You may respond to all the questions or only those you have a specific interest in. (Text boxes have no word limit, they will increase in size accordingly).

47. Will there be any impacts during the transitional period between ending the current theatre licence and starting the public entertainment licence?

48. Are there additional costs or resource implications on theatres or licensing authorities?

49. How should licensing authorities integrate their current fee charging structure into their public entertainment regime?
8. Civic Licensing – Sexual Entertainment Venues

You may respond to all questions or only those you have a specific interest in. (Text boxes have no word limit, they will increase in size accordingly).

50. What are the consequences of operating the new licensing regime using the definitions set out at section 68 of the Bill?

- 'sexual entertainment venue'
- 'audience'
- 'financial gain'
- 'organiser'
- 'premises'
- 'sexual entertainment', and
- 'display of nudity'

The term adult entertainment is more fitting although the dancing may be sexual to some people it is not everyone an example being groups on stag parties enjoy the entertainment but not in a sexual way.

51. The Bill specifies that a venue hosting sexual entertainment on three occasions or less within a 12 month period would not be treated as a sexual entertainment venue: does this have any unintended consequences?

Yes, if this kind of entertainment is to be regulated it should be so 100% of the time to the same standard in every venue every time.
52. Local licensing authorities will be able to set the number of sexual entertainment venues in their area to below the existing level, or zero: are there any advantages or disadvantages to this approach?

It in effect allows an activity to be deemed acceptable in one city but banned in another although we all operate under the same laws of the country. It draws attention to the idea that dancers can work in Edinburgh but not in Glasgow when the dancing in Glasgow which is only topless is to be banned but full nude dancing is to be kept on and an authority on alcohol is the one to make this decision.

53. The Bill relies mainly on the existing licensing regime for sex shops as set out in section 44 and Schedule 2 of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 (application, notification, objections and representations, revocation of licences etc., enforcement and appeals): is this mechanism adequate for the licensing of sexual entertainment venues - if not, please explain why?

54. Are there any barriers to licensing authorities operating the new licensing regime?

It gives the local authority the power to close established businesses whose owners managers and staff have met if not exceeded every guideline, objective and code of conduct put to them.
55. Civic Licensing

Do you have any other comments to make on the civic licensing aspects of the Bill?

Having spent almost exactly half of my career in the licensing trade working in an adult entertainment venue I would like to take this chance to present to those who have little or no experience of these venues a truthful account of how the proposed ability for councils to limit or indeed to close this industry is affecting the people who work in it and give an insight into how the club / dancer relationship works while also explaining how terms such as ‘sex worker’ ‘sexual entertainment’ are inappropriate.

For the past few years I have lived and worked with the constant threat of having my job taken away from me. Unusually through not because of a failing business, technological change or being no longer needed. Instead it’s because in the opinion of a few people a totally legal and perfectly acceptable form of entertainment is to be demonised and taken away.

When I first met my partner I ran a nightclub and she was a part time dancer, now all of a sudden she’s to be a sex worker and I am employed to offer sexual entertainment. I find this hard to accept as nothing literally nothing has changed in our jobs. The club is the same, the hours are the same, the customers are the same and the dances given by the dancers are the same.

Unfortunately due to the shadow of unemployment hanging over us our living conditions also remain the same. Despite wanting to move to a house, get married have children etc. we remain living in a one bed flat able to commit to each other but unable to commit to anything financially binding.

I know sadly we are not alone in fearing the uncertainty this prolonged attack on our industry is causing. Many of the girls working in the club are in the same situation with their boyfriends and husbands.

The feelings of frustration felt are heightened by the pride in which the staff of the club have. The club is run very professionally we have no history of trouble or violence, no arrests or problems with the police. The club goes to great lengths to ensure the girls who choose to work in it are safe, happy and have the best facilities possible. In the same way as many jobs in which the work force is particularly skilled the club puts a great deal of effort into attracting the best dancers possible.

I would very much like to give evidence in person to the committee.

- 'sexual entertainment', and
- 'display of nudity'

I think the term sexual entertainment could be misleading to customers, as there is no form of sex available on the premises

51. The Bill specifies that a venue hosting sexual entertainment on three occasions or less within a 12 month period would not be treated as a sexual entertainment venue: does this have any unintended consequences?

I would not agree that lap dancing in any random venue would be appropriate. The clubs are licenced and have proper security and cctv in place therefore making it a safe environment for all staff and dancers.
52. Local licensing authorities will be able to set the number of sexual entertainment venues in their area to below the existing level, or zero: are there any advantages or disadvantages to this approach?

I cannot see any advantage of the existing number of clubs in Glasgow being zero. Lots of people out of work and no dancing bars for the clients to enjoy a night out. The dancers would be forced to travel to Edinburgh or Newcastle to work perhaps even further a field where the regulations of lap dancing are different from Glasgow.

53. The Bill relies mainly on the existing licensing regime for sex shops as set out in section 44 and Schedule 2 of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 (application, notification, objections and representations, revocation of licences etc., enforcement and appeals): is this mechanism adequate for the licensing of sexual entertainment venues - if not, please explain why?

54. Are there any barriers to licensing authorities operating the new licensing regime?

As far as I'm aware the licensing authorities licence alcohol and not pole or lap dancing.
55. Civic Licensing

Do you have any other comments to make on the civic licensing aspects of the Bill?

My name is Siobhan Murphy my stage name was [REDACTED] when I worked in [REDACTED] nightclub in Glasgow. I am twenty seven years old when I was dancing I worked in club for approximately two and a half years working mainly Saturday and the odd Sunday nights. I have a career as a hairdresser and work full time so the club offered me flexible shifts and a good way of saving money.

In the time I worked as a dancer I met lots of girls who were around my age I made friends with most of them and also met my boyfriend who is one of the managers in the club. It gave me a chance to make money to save as my wages from hairdressing are only just enough to live on and paying high rent on private lets and lots of bills is difficult so having extra money for dancing was helpful. There is a good social element to it also working along side friends and meeting new people.

The club had lots of staff and was a comfortable place to work there are lots of security and is a safe place to be. I did not mind the lap dancing as I was always in control I never felt under pressure and always made money for myself and for the club. Sometimes it could be quiet and if you did not earn enough to pay club fees they were always reasonable ensuring you never left the workplace worst off.

28. In what ways will the Bill’s provisions on alcohol licensing allow for reductions in crime and the preservation of public order?

29. Are there any other measures which should be taken to assist in the reduction of crime and the preservation of public order?

30. In what ways will the provisions in the Bill enhance the licensing objectives set out in the Licensing (Scotland) Act 2005?
31. In what ways will the re-introduction of the “fit and proper person” test assist with the implementation of the licensing objectives set out in the 2005 act?

Highland Licensing Board agree that returning to a “fit and proper” test would allow greater scope to present information to Boards and give Boards the ability to consider a greater breadth of relevant information when determining an application for all licences. The “fit and proper test” is still used without problem in the non-liquor licensing regime in relation to licences issued under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982, Houses in Multiple Occupation etc. Although allowing greater scope, tying it to the licensing objectives should mean that it cannot be used without relevance being established.

32. Have there been any unintended consequences arising from the 2005 Act, for example, in rural areas or the economic regeneration of areas?

33. Which, if any, types of spent relevant offences should be required to be disclosed and what do you think the benefits of disclosure will be?

If spent convictions are to be disclosed, it should be all spent convictions for relevant offences. There would be no logic in requiring disclosure of spent convictions only in respect of certain types of relevant offences and it would create confusion for applicants. The benefit of full disclosure would be to show whether there was any long-term pattern of recurring convictions for relevant offences.

It is assumed that the authors of the Bill are aware that in addition to repeal of section 129(4) of the 2005 Act, amendment to Schedule 1 to The Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974 (Exclusions and Exceptions) (Scotland) Order 2013 will be required before spent convictions can lawfully be considered by Licensing Boards in proceedings before them.
34. Do you have any other comments to make on the alcohol licensing aspects of the Bill?

An opportunity has been missed to deal with a number of issues of concern to all involved in liquor licensing and which have been consistently made known to the Government before and since the 2005 Act came into force.

Consolidated Act

To find the law, one has to look in the 2005 Act which has been amended several times eg the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010, the Alcohol etc (Scotland) Act 2010 and now the proposed new Act. In addition there are some 37 Statutory Instruments. It is difficult enough for solicitors to find out the law; it is even more so for “lay” persons and those involved on the trade side.

Transfers

Sections 33 and 34 can lead to difficulties in the buying, selling and leasing of licensed premises. This is particularly so with regard to the following areas:

1. Tenant doing a “runner”;
2. Company dissolution;

1. Most leases will include clauses to ensure that on termination the out-going tenant will be obligated to co-operate with a transfer to the new tenant or Landlord. This would usually happen under Section 33 and is fine when the lease termination is civilised and professional. However it is well known that in business it does not always work out that way. Landlords and tenants do disagree and two things can happen – The tenant disappears with the licence and cannot be contacted or traced, or the aggrieved tenant surrenders the licence to the licensing board.

In scenario 1, the landlord re-claims possession but they need to transfer the licence to themselves or a new tenant. They can’t transfer under Section 33, and none of the events in Section 34 have happened: the business carried on in the premises probably hasn’t technically transferred. The licence doesn’t cease to have effect so a new application can’t be made. This isn’t something theoretical, this happens fairly regularly and the Act provides no solution. The only way to get round it has been to work with the Board’s Clerk, who have to take a practical and pragmatic approach and allowed for transfers under Section 34 to be lodged. Now there may be technically no business transfer but to treat it as such is the only workable solution. This is clearly not acceptable and could lead the Clerk open to criticism or worse.

In scenario 2, if the licence is surrendered correctly, the Landlord is in a very difficult situation and has to lodge a new application. Clerks are under pressure to process the application quickly and to grant occasional licences in the intervening period, to allow the business to trade as soon as possible.
